extensive and important district of the county, which is absolutely required for the successful prosecution of their business, will be advantaged, and a very considerable additional traffic will be brought to the Intercolonial Railway. A contract was made with the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company for this service; but in consequence of the loss of one of their boats by fire, the service was very much deranged; and I have no hesitation in saying that the complaints made were well founded on the part of the persons interested in this service, as to the very inadequate manner in which it was performed. So much was this the case, that the Government refused to pay over the subsidy provided, and a very considerable deduction was made owing to the failure to perform the service in a thoroughly efficient manner. The company were then notified that the contract would be entirely withdrawn, unless they provided and properly equipped a thoroughly good steamer, which was capable at all seasons of the year to keep up constant and thorough communication. There was not a suitable boat, I believe, to be found in this country, and the company sent to New York, and obtained a suitable steamer. Having reported this to the Government, I asked the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to send down an inspector, who was qualified to judge as to the capacity of the boat, before she was accepted. This steamer, I believe, will be found to be admirably adapted to the service, and I hope that in the future it will be carried on to the entire satisfaction of that large and important section of the country, which is so deeply interested in this matter.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has stated that the putting of the steamer on this route has largely increased the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said it did.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe, however, that this increased traffic of the Intercolonial Railway is not charged with the expense of maintaining this steamer, as far as I can learn from the Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman obtains an increment of the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, and does not charge to the expense of running it the machinery by which this increased traffic is obtained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has never been done. I may say, for the information of the hon. gentleman, that this service was established by the late Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I know it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The same system that was then, is still followed. It will be quite impossible, as the hon. gentleman will see, to charge—in establishing a new service of that kind—and a mail service as well—to the Intercolonial Railway, and the lines of steamers that may be established in connection with the mail and other services in that relation. It has always been maintained as an independent service.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman will remember that we gave a very small subsidy to this steamer—$4,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And it was found to be quite inadequate for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This Government raised it to $10,000. We intended to carry the mail principally by land, and occasionally by steam communication of that sort, without incurring one-half the expense to which the hon. gentleman has gone, independent altogether of its being a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway. The trade from that quarter in any case went to the Intercolonial, and it was only in connection with the carrying of the mail that we asked for a subsidy at the time when it first originated, and at that time the road was not quite finished, and certainly not open, and nothing could be charged to the running expenses in that department.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the vessel—the Admiral, I think she is called—was purchased, or to be purchased, by the contractors who have this service in charge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understood that an inspector was sent to New York, and that he has sent a report to the Government. I would like to know if there is any objection to this report being laid on the Table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The fact is that I have had a different account of the vessel from that which the hon. gentleman has given. I will not say anything on the subject just now; but I hope the report when it is brought down will not confirm the information I have on the subject. I would like to know if the vessel has been actually purchased by the company, and whether she is intended to be engaged in the service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume she has been purchased. The report that they were prepared to put her on this line for the performance of this service was made to the Government; but before we accepted her as a suitable vessel the Government took measures to send down the ablest officials they could obtain to have her properly inspected. It was only after she was reported to be thoroughly adequate for the service, and a thoroughly good steamer, that the Government consented to accept her. The report of Mr. Croker, the inspector sent down by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and of the person whom he engaged to do that portion of the work of the inspection which he was not expected to perform, will be brought down.

THE POSTMASTERSHIP OF FLORENCEVILLE, NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. IRVINE moved for all copies of all letters, reports and other documents relating to any complaint or charge preferred against Stephen G. Burpee, Postmaster at Florenceville, New Brunswick, since 1st January, 1879.

Mr. CARLING. I have no objections to bring down papers, except of course any confidential reports or letters that may be in the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. Is a man allowed, by the practice of the Department, to make a confidential complaint.

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Then if there be any complaints they should not be so treated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman referred to the report.

Mr. BLAKE. I was not speaking of a confidential report; but this hon. gentleman spoke of confidential letters or reports.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Exactly; but a report might be a letter, or a letter might be a report. The hon. gentleman knows that no letters or reports written by the officer in charge should be brought down, and that it is contrary to all practice to have them brought down. Any complaint, however, that may be made might be brought down.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; but my hon. friend's language was so wide that I thought it might include the proposition that it was a letter of complaint, which, of course, should not be secret under any circumstances.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not.

APPOINTMENT OF JAMES JACQUES AND CHARLES KEARNEY TO THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. IRVINE, in moving for copies of all correspondence which passed between any Department of the Government and any person whomsoever in relation to the appointment of James H. Jacques and Charles Kearney, of Carleton county, New Brunswick, both or either of them, to positions in the Civil Service of Canada, said: I have no doubt that if I were a supporter of the present Ministry, it would not be necessary for me to make a motion of this kind, as I probably could send across the floor and make application to the Department, and get the information I require. Unfortunately for me in this respect, however, I was elected as an avowed opponent of the Government and of that protective policy which has imposed such unnecessary burdens on the people of New Brunswick without any compensating advantages. If I may believe the reports which have been published in the Government press of Canada, I am led to believe that unless I vote with the present Government, upon every occasion and on every question, I am not to be consulted, nor is any man in Canada to be consulted, no matter what constituency he represents in reference to any appointment to the Civil Service, or the dispensing of the patronage of his own county. The question might be fairly asked by hon. gentlemen whether those appointments were previous to the Election of 1881, or since. I think I may fairly say that I was pleased by the declaration made by the hon. First Minister a few weeks ago in reference to the appointment of a Committee in this House according to the complexion of the members thereof, and he professed to have a grave respect for the wishes of the people. I could wish, if I were not asking too much, that that respect should not only be given according to the complexion of parties in this House, but also according to the complexion of every constituency which sends a member to Parliament. If these appointments were made in the public interests I have not a word to say—I calmly submit to the will of this Government. They have laid down the principle that for a member to obtain the patronage of his county he must yield an unswerving support to the Government; but if these appointments were not in the public interest we wish to know whom to hold responsible for them. We wish to know what man in the county is entrusted with the patronage for the county or whether the hon. Minister of Customs is himself responsible, because so far we have not been able to find a man in Carleton county who will acknowledge the responsibility for these appointments.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not even their own fathers and mothers.

Mr. IRVINE. I am speaking politically, not personally. It is incumbent upon me, as the representative of the county of Carleton, N.B., to show to this House and this Government, that the appointments then made, at least one of them, never should have been made, not being in the public interests. The western boundary of the county of Carleton forms part of the eastern boundary of the State of Maine, and it is very well known to those acquainted with the topography of that county, that there are two high-ways connecting that county with the State of Maine. The first runs from Woodstock, on the St. John River, to Holton, in the State of Maine, and the other from Florenceville, on the St. John River, to Bridgewater, in the State of Maine. Between those two roads, a distance of twenty miles, we have no less than four preventive officers—Mr. Ivory Kilburn, on the Richmond Road; Mr. Henry T. Scholey, at Centreville, on the Florenceville Road; Mr. H. Wolhaupter, on the Blomfield Road; and Mr. Charles Kearney, at Florenceville, on the Florenceville Road.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

After Recess.

Mr. IRVINE. From Florenceville, on the River St. John, to Bridgewater, on the American side, the distance by the road is some eight miles; probably on an air line it would be a mile less. On that road an officer was appointed during the Mackenzie Administration in the double capacity of preventive officer and sub-collector. There never had been a preventive officer on that frontier on the Florenceville Road, I believe, till then; but it was understood that it would be convenient to have an officer there to receive duties instead of importers being compelled to go twenty miles to Woodstock. That officer I am willing to admit, was a very vigilant one; perhaps the only offence laid to his charge was that he had too much zeal. The duties at first collected at that office were comparatively small, but I think they rose to something like $700 during the past fiscal year. In my judgment one officer is sufficient for that district, and when another officer was appointed at some four miles distant, I came to the conclusion that his office was simply a sinecure. I have more than one reason for holding that opinion. In the first place, I think if the Government were earnestly desirous to enforce the fiscal regulations of the country, they would not appoint a man doing a mercantile business of, perhaps, $10,000 or $15,000 a year. I imagine that such a man would not find it convenient to give a great deal of attention to his duties as a preventive officer. You might as well appoint a merchant in the city of Ottawa to enforce the Customs regulations on the border of Carleton county, as to appoint Mr. Kearney, at Florenceville. I wish it to be understood that I make no charge against Mr. Kearney as a man; he is a very respectable and honorable man; but I wish to point out that while we have four officers between the Woodstock Road and the Florenceville Road, the American Government, to my certain knowledge, have never had more than one on their side. I am not referring to the officers in the town of Woodstock, or Holton, but to the officers along the border. Previous to the introduction of the National Policy, as everybody acquainted with the fiscal regulations of both countries knows, the inducement to smuggle from the Canadian to the American side was always the greater. Any man who would consult the Tariff of both countries would find that at one time woollens and other dry goods were imported from the Old Country, and traders along the border know very well the rich harvest they made out of the American trade. From the introduction of the high Tariff to the present time, the Americans have not thought it necessary to put more than one officer on that frontier. At present the people of the county which I have the honor to represent, and which is the best agricultural county in New Brunswick—sell all their sheep and potatoes to the Boston market, and also carry on a good trade with the Americans in horses and cattle. The inducement is still stronger for the Americans to smuggle from our side than for our people to smuggle from the American side, yet they guard that frontier with only one officer. If the hon. Finance Minister be correct in saying that cotton goods are as cheap here as the same class of goods in the United States, there can be no inducement to smuggle, and no necessity for four officers on twenty miles of road. The hon. gentleman could not make his financial statement before ascertaining what changes were made in the American Tariff. In reference to tobacco, he said our Tariff had to be assimilated to theirs, because if there was a great difference it would induce smuggling. He has, however, reduced the duty on tobacco for the purpose of making it as cheap on this side of the line as on the other, thus making it unnecessary to keep up a large staff of preventive officers on the frontier. As our farm produce is sold on the other side, the temptation to smuggle is greater with the Americans, and if they can guard their frontier with only one officer why should we require more. We have two officers on the one road, one within four miles of the boundary, and the other four miles from him. This is a purely nonsensical arrangement which no sane man would recommend, and both the Government and the man who recommended it should be ashamed of such an arrangement. Having noticed this point I will refer to the other officer, Mr. Jacques, against whom I do not make the same objection. His office was created by the Mackenzie Administration on the completion of the New Brunswick Railway from Fredericton into the State of Maine. As goods had to pass over this road in bond, it was necessary that an officer should be stationed at Woodstock. What his exact duties were I cannot explain—no doubt the hon. Minister of Customs can—but I believe his business was to see to the arrival and departure of trains and the forwarding of bonded goods, and he was called a tidewater. The Conservatives of the town and county at that time declared that the office was a sinecure. Over and over again, they said the office was unnecessary, and that Mr. Merritt, Collector of Customs in Woodstock, should discharge the whole duty. Mr. Drysdale resigned in March 1881—at least according to the Trade and Navigation Returns that is the date at which his salary ceased, and therefore I presume the date of his resignation. The office remained unfilled until the 27th June, 1882, and it was thought, of course, by the Liberals of the county, from the view taken by the Conservatives, that it would never be filled again. Since that date Mr. Jacques has been reappointed to perform the same duties. He is no longer called tidewater, but a preventive officer, though the duties are unchanged. I simply refer to this to show that the persecution to which that officer was subjected was undeserved, and that the office has been found necessary. I will not further take up the time of the House, but will simply emphasize my declaration that I think it foolish—I will not use a stronger term—on the part of any Government to appoint Mr. Kearney a preventive officer at Florenceville in Carleton county.

Mr. MOFFAT. It surely does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman to charge the Government with wrong doing after the statement as to the necessity of the office. If the statement he made in reference to his constituents is true, the Government had very little to choose from. In this sweeping character he gave his constituents, he did not have even the saving clause that was left during the memorable argument that preceded the destruction of the cities of the plains. They were protectionists by day and freebooters by night. No doubt, therefore, the official, who had also been an opponent of the hon. member for Carleton, must be an unworthy holder of the office. The hon. gentleman gave his speech in a very lachrymose style, and had reason for it, since as his county is divided into ten, it is only appropriate he should come here in a tearful manner.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to bring down whatever correspondence there may be in the Department; but at present I am not aware of any that would be of interest to the hon. gentleman, or his constituents. With reference to the appointment of the gentleman to whom he has referred, and to which he makes so much objection, all I can say is that it was made in the interests of the revenue, and that it does not always follow that the best place to station a preventive officer is at the very point at which the smugglers enter. On the contrary, though an officer may live some miles from the border, it is very often at some central point at which different roads from the American frontier centres. Representations were made to me that goods came in at various points along the frontier of the United States, not always upon the main road to which the hon. gentleman refers. But I must confess this is the first time I have heard that this gentleman is one of the largest importing merchants of that village, and that is a matter, I assure him, that is worthy of consideration. He must remember that when he was speaking on the Tariff last Session he informed the House and country, and that has been very properly referred to by the hon. member for Restigouche, that nearly every man in his county obtained his supplies without payment of duty from the American side of the border; and if that were true, his constituents have only him to thank if additional officers have been put on in order to protect the revenue. If, however, upon investigation, it be found that there are more officers in that locality than are necessary, I have no doubt Government will be very glad to relieve the revenue of any charges it may have incurred in connection with their officers, and relieve them of responsibility. The hon. gentleman has told the House that three of the officers were appointed by the late Government. It is true that the preventive officer to which he has referred was appointed by this Government and for purposes which I have pointed out. As to the persecution which he says Mr. Drysdale received from the Conservative party, I know nothing of it, and the only complaints that were made in reference to Mr. Drysdale were to the effect that he refused to perform certain duties that appertain to his office, and that he was carrying on a large business, which, I suppose, was much more lucrative than his office, as he refused to give up the business. He preferred to attend to his own private business, which was that of a manufacturer, and I suppose in connection with it, at least it was so reported to me, an importer also. I freely admit that Customs officers should not be selected from those who are importers. Though they might be honest they would always be open to the imputation of using the position in order to benefit themselves; and I say to the hon. gentleman again, that is a point which will receive the attention of the Government. Mr. Jacques was appointed because it was represented that assistance was required, in the town of Woodstock properly to perform the duties of collection, and the duties which were necessary to be performed at the railway station, and frequent applications were made for the post by those who were in a position to know the facts. I do not know what Mr. Drysdale was called. I believe, however, that in New Brunswick the title of tidewater was very often applied to officers that were regularly appointed, even in the interior. I did not so style him, but I gave him the same title that is given to officers holding the same position in different parts of the Dominion not upon the sea-board, that is landing waiter, imposing upon him the duties of a clerk in the office to assist the collector. I have not yet heard that either immorality or want of qualification can be brought against Mr. Jacques. The hon. gentleman himself has not brought any charge against him or his qualifications, and the only point was as to whether the appointment was necessary. It was found that the increase of business at that port, not only at the office proper, but at the railway station, was such that Mr. Merritt needed an assistant, and Mr. Jacques was appointed to fill that position.

Mr. IRVINE. I did not use the word "reprimand" in my former remarks. Nor did I mention the name of the hon. member for Restigouche in reference to the complaints. The hon. member has got the matter somewhat muddled. It was the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), not I, who said that Tories were Protectionists in the daytime and Free Traders all night.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, it is among you.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. KIRK moved for all correspondence, papers or telegrams that have passed between the Government of the Dominion or any member thereof, and the Government of the United States of America or any member or officer thereof, and any member or officer of the United States National Distillers' Association, in relation to the modification of the existing Customs Laws and Regulations of this Dominion, and all Orders in Council in relation thereto, and also all petitions, correspondence and telegrams from persons or associations in this Dominion relating to the subject.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to the motion, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is no Order in Council in connection with the matter. The correspondence between the United States Government and the Secretary of the Distillers' Association, and this Government, will be brought down at the earliest convenience.

THE ELECTION IN BOTHWELL.

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the motion of which I have given notice, I am fully aware of the responsibility which I assume. In so far as I myself am individually concerned in connection with the recent election in the County of Bothwell, I could very well afford to await the verdict of the courts in this case; I could very well afford to await the verdict which comes in the ordinary course of justice, and which, like a great river when temporarily dammed, still will find its way eventually to the great ocean of justice. Four years experience of the Election Act, passed in 1874, convinced Parliament that it was necessary to add something still further to the machinery whereby the Election Act might be worked out fairly and impartially to every one concerned. Under the Act of 1874 no provision was made for a recount, and frequently it was found that if there had been machinery whereby a recount of the votes as recorded and as summed up by the various deputy returning officers could have been had, a good deal of litigation and of after trouble and expenses might have been avoided. To supply this want in 1878 the county Judge was given certain duties to perform in connection with the administration of the Act. Down to that time Deputy Returning Officers were, as they are now, in the habit of making up their returns, of counting and re-counting the ballots, and of deciding most important points upon which the representation of the country depends. Now, we all know that, in the rural districts especially it is very difficult to obtain twenty, twenty-five or even forty officers in the various constituencies who shall be in every respect men perfectly competent, not only to perform their duties but to learn from the Act and study out for themselves the real responsibilities which they have assumed. It has been the custom of the courts to receive their work when questioned with a good deal of leniency, for the reason which I have stated. Then, again, the returning officer is a man who, in many instances, has not all the legal attainments necessary to form a correct judgment of the responsibilities and duties which he assumes. But if any one were to suppose that either a deputy returning officer or a returning officer in assuming the duties which they do assume, do not thereby incur a heavy responsibility, not only in respect to their standing before their neighbors and before their country, but also in respect to heavy penalties which are imposed for any dereliction of duty or criminal negligence on their part, such a person is seriously mistaken. As I have said, in order to obviate the difficulty which was found in operating the Act of 1874, it was enacted, in amendment to that Act in 1878, that there shall be, under certain circumstances, a recount before the County Judge of all the ballots cast in the Election. I am aware of the painful nature of the duty imposed on me to-night, and, as I have said, if no one were concerned except myself I would await the course of the trial of this case, should it ever come to trial.

Mr. KIRK.

But when I tell this House and the country that the returning officer has been pursued in a most violent manner, that even his wife and family have not been free from insult in the streets of the town in which they live; that one of the leading organs published in Ontario, issuing daily perhaps 6,000 or 7,000 copies, has continuously, from the 20th June last down to the present time, maligned this man and accused him of every species of fraud and wrong doing in his capacity of returning officer, I think it is high time this case should be placed before the country. I say that a leading organ has acted thus, but I should include almost every organ in Ontario published in the interest of the Reform party. This returning officer, who is a man of substance and of comparative wealth, assumed certain responsibilities. He is liable to certain pains and penalties if he has acted wrongly, and why has he not been prosecuted in the courts, as he might have been prosecuted under the Act for the enforcement of those pains and penalties? No; they have pursued him in the press, in the London Advertiser, in the Hamilton Times, and frequently in the Toronto Globe, and have denounced him in unmeasured and unwarrantable terms. In order to place the facts fully within the knowledge of the House, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to review briefly the clauses of the Act. Section 59 says:

"The returning officer at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them, in the presence of the Election Clerk, the candidates or their representatives, if present, and of at least two electors, if the candidates or representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate, from the statement contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers:

"The candidate who shall, on the summing up of the votes, be found to have a majority of votes shall be then declared elected."

Now this is the doctrine which was contended for the other day by the other side of the House, among others by the hon. leader of the Opposition, when a similar case was discussed by the House. We find sections 60 and 61 provide as follows:—

"60. When, on the final addition of votes by the returning officer, an equality of votes is found to exist between any of the candidates, and the addition of a vote would entitle any of such candidates to be declared elected, the returning officer shall give such additional or casting vote, but shall in no other case have the right to vote.

"61. The returning officer shall, immediately after the sixth day after such verification, unless before that time he receives notice that he is required to attend before a Judge for the purpose of a re-count of the votes given at the Election, transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected, and shall forward to each of the respective candidates a duplicate or copy thereof, and such return shall be in the form Schedule S to this Act.

"The returning officer shall accompany his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with a report of his proceedings, in which report he shall make any observation he may think proper as to the state of the ballot boxes or ballot papers as received by him;

"The returning officer shall also transmit to the Clerk of the Crown, with his return, the ballot papers, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers, referred to in section fifty-seven of this Act, together with the voters' lists used in the several polling districts, and any other lists and documents used or required at such Election, or which may have been transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers;

"Such return and report shall be sent through the post office, after being registered."

Now, all of this the returning officer of the county of Bothwell did. According to the terms of the proclamation, he did all things which he is commanded to do here; and going over the returns what did he find? That in several polling places very great irregularities had existed; and allow me here, in passing, to state that the returning officer of the county of Bothwell, appointed at least one-third of the deputy returning officers, who were strong supporters of, and voted for my late opponent, the hon. David Mills. It has been charged that they were partizans and friends of mine; but I state here on the floor of this House—and I challenge its contradiction here or elsewhere—that

I never had the naming of a single deputy returning officer of the whole thirty-three who acted in my Election. Well, we find further that provision is made in the Act for a case where there may be any ballot boxes missing, or lost, or failed to turn up; but where there are none missing, what is the duty of the returning officer? It is declared here in section 59:

"The candidate who shall, on the summing up of the votes, be found to have the majority of the votes, shall then be declared elected."

But the returning officer in this case went further. He procured legal advice and placed himself in the hands of his counsel; and he was advised that there being two ballot boxes in which there were no statements, and several in which there were no sworn affidavits, as to the statements in regard to his duty; and after full consideration, knowing well the responsibility which he assumed, and that he might be sued for a penalty of $500 for returning the wrong candidate, and that he might be sued, and held responsible for all costs in unseating me, if he returned me improperly as the candidate elected, still he went through with the performance of his duty. At this stage of the proceedings there was another procedure, that could be brought to bear in the matter which probably would have settled the dispute in this case. There was another functionary; and when we speak of the Judges of the land, we ought certainly to speak of them with all respect, deference and reverence, because we are proud to know that there have been but few cases wherein the conduct of our Judges has ever had to be brought into question in this Canada of ours. I remember, a few years ago, before the late lamented Chief Justice Harrison went on the Bench, receiving a letter from him, in somewhat similar circumstances to the present, in which he said, speaking of something which had transpired of a partizan nature, in one of the County Courts: "Thank God, Mr. Hawkins, we still have a tribunal in this country, against whose base the waves of partizanship have as yet surged in vain." He meant the Superior Courts, the high courts of the land. But he was at that time speaking with regard to one of the county courts. I have to say now, with reference to this matter, that here we find the duty of the County Judge or of the District Judges in Lower Canada, or in the other Provinces, laid down just as exactly, just as strictly, and within just as narrow limits as are the duties of the returning officer, or of the deputy returning officers; and in so far as this Act constitutes these Judges a part of the machinery for effecting and carrying out the wishes of Parliament, they are to all intents and purposes, Election officers; and being so, we have a perfect right, and in fact it is our bounden duty to criticise their acts with even more severity than we would the acts of unlearned men, who act as deputy returning officers, and are liable to make errors of the head and not of the heart. We find in the progress of this case, the duty of the Judge defined as follows:—

"67. In case it is made to appear within four days after that on which the Returning Officer has made the final addition of the votes for the purpose of declaring the candidate (or candidates) elected, on the affidavit of any credible witness, to the County Judge of any county, or in Quebec to a Judge of the Superior Court ordinarily discharging his duties in any Judicial District in which the electoral district or any part thereof is situated, that such witness believes that any Deputy Returning Officer at any election in such electoral district, in counting the votes, has improperly counted or rejected any ballot papers at such election, or that the Returning Officer has improperly summed up the votes, and in case the applicant deposits within the said time with the Clerk of the Court the sum of one hundred dollars as a security for the costs of the candidate, in respect of the re-count, appearing by the addition to be elected; the said Judge shall appoint a time within four days after the receipt of the said affidavit by him, to re-count the votes, or to make the final addition, as the case may be, and shall give notice in writing to the candidates or their agents of the time and place at which he will proceed to re-count the same, or to make such final addition, as the case may be, and shall summon and command the Returning Officer and his Election Clerk to attend then and there with the parcels containing the ballots used at the election, which command the Returning Officer and his Election Clerk shall obey:

"1. The said Judge, the Returning Officer and his Election Clerk, and each candidate, or his agent appointed to attend such re-count of votes, or in case any candidate cannot attend, then not more than one agent of such candidate, and if the candidates and their agents are absent, then at least three electors shall be present at such re-count of the votes."

Here it will be seen, that there is just as clear a restriction and just as exact a definition of who may be present, and who may participate in the re-count before the County Judge, as that with respect to similar proceedings before the returning and deputy returning officers; and yet, what are the facts in respect to this pretended re-count, which was held in the town of Chatham, touching the Bothwell election? Why, there was a mob of upwards of fifty violent partizans, admitted to the room; and when I protested and pointed out, that I had come there in conformity with the law, having no person with me, but my counsel, and being in doubt—as the Act leaves it very doubtful—whether the candidates and their counsel may both be present, yet we find fifty or sixty violent partizans, allowed to be present in a very small room in which the ballot papers, and all the papers connected with the Election, had necessarily to be spread out. We called the attention of the Judge to the fact, that a large number of persons were there contrary to the wording of the law; but he decided that it was an open court and that these people might remain; but the decisions in all the other re-counts, held throughout the country, were to the effect, that those who are named in the Act, and only those named, should be allowed to be present at such re-counts. The duty of the Judge is further defined as follows:—

"2. At the time and place appointed, the said Judge shall proceed to re-count all the votes or ballot papers returned by the several Deputy Returning Officers, and shall, in the presence of the parties aforesaid, if they attend, open the sealed packets containing—(1) the used ballot papers which have been counted; (2) the rejected ballot papers; (3) the spoiled ballot papers—and no other ballot papers."

Here we find the Act in each succeeding clause reiterating over and over again the duties of the Judge, commanding him in the strongest language to proceed with the re-count in the manner laid down under section 55 for the direction of Deputy Returning Officers. Now, we find that section 55 defines the order in which the ballots shall be counted, and how the counting shall be done. That section reads as follows:—

"55. Immediately after the close of the poll, the Deputy Returning Officer shall, in the presence of the Poll Clerk and the candidates or their agents, and if the candidates and their agents or any of them are absent, then in the presence of such, if any, of them as are present, and of at least three electors, open the ballot box and proceed to count the number of votes given for each candidate: In doing so he shall reject all ballot papers which have not been supplied by the Deputy Returning Officer, all those by which votes have been given for more candidates than are to be elected, and all those upon which there is any writing or mark by which the voter could be identified."

Here is the application which was served by the hon. Mr. Mills for this, as I say, pretended re-count:

"In the matter of the election of a candidate to represent the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell in the House of Commons, Canada.

"You are hereby required to take notice that I, on the application of Matthew Wilson, Esq., Solicitor for David Mills, one of the candidates at said Election, and on reading the affidavits of William Thomas Smith and Robert Ferguson and the certificate of deposit of $100 as required by law, have appointed Monday, the 26th day of June, A.D. 1882, at the hour of eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at my chambers in the Town of Chatham, to make the final addition of votes taken at said election on the 20th day of June, A.D. 1882, and that at said time and place, that is to say, on the said 26th day of June, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, I will proceed to make such final addition; and I further command you, James Stephens, Returning Officer, and Charles Stephens, Election Clerk, at said election, to attend before me then and there with the parcels containing the ballots used at said Election.

" Dated at my chambers, in the Town of Chatham, this 24th day of June, A. D. 1882.

" A. BELL,
" Judge of the County Court of the " County of Kent.

" To JOHN JOSEPH HAWKINS, Esquire, JAMES STEPHENS, Returning Officer, and to CHARLES STEPHENS, Election Clerk."

We find him following the terms of the command given him in the Statute—the command that the Returning Officer shall bring before him, not only the statements which are found contained in the ballot boxes as made by the Deputy Returning Officers, but shall bring the ballots with him. This was done on Monday morning. It became known to me that a caucus had been held at the house of the Judge, and that they sat until two o'clock in the morning for the purpose of finding means whereby they should not give the fair open count which the Act contemplates. I found that the Judge had stated publicly in the streets of Chatham the course of procedure which he would adopt. He said—and there are those who will come before a Committee and swear to the statement—that he would take in one of the rejected polling places and leave out the other, thereby declaring Mr. Mills to be elected. Now, what are we to think of a Judge who would determine, before hearing the facts, that he would disfranchise between 150 and 200 of the electorate in the face of the letter of the law, which commands him to open the ballot packages and to count them and ascertain exactly the state of the case. I have read the notice which was served upon me. I may say that I received quite a pleasant surprise at an early hour in the morning. We are in the habit, when stopping at hotels, of placing our boots outside the door, and at seven o'clock in the morning I found a notice in one of my boots stating that I should attend at ten o'clock and answer to this proceeding, and say if I had any objections. But I had scarcely got upstairs to prepare to get my breakfast, when Mr. Wilson came along and served me with this paper. Afterwards these rumors were current in the streets of Chatham. I telegraphed to Toronto for counsel, and went to London personally, and was advised by counsel that I had an undoubted right to demand a re-count at the hands of the Judge even under Mr. Mills application. The Act does not contemplate—I defy anybody to say that the Act does contemplate—any such one-sided and unfair proceeding as that whereby, having the ballot papers in his hand—having the packages laid there in the true course of the law—the Judge, sooner than perform his duty, sooner than go through the procedure that is laid down so plainly, would disfranchise from 150 to 200 of the electorate, and thereby take, as I consider, a very high-handed course. Forewarned, it is said, is forearmed; and I was advised by my counsel in London to prepare an application whereby I might demand a re-count in plain open terms. Here is the application as served upon the Judge:

" In the matter of the Election of a Candidate to represent the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell, in the House of Commons of Canada.

" County of } I, James Dawson, of the Township of Sombra, " To Wit. } in the County of Lambton, lumber merchant, make oath and say:

" 1. That I am an elector of the Electoral District of Bothwell.
" 2. That I allege that the Deputy Returning Officers for the election holden for the said Electoral District, on the 20th day of June instant improperly counted and also improperly rejected ballot papers at the said election, and that a recount of the said ballot papers is desirable and necessary for the purpose of determining in whose favor a majority of the said ballot papers was deposited.

" Sworn before me at the Town of Chatham, in the County of Kent, this 26th day of June, A. D. 1882.

" J. DAWSON.

" A. McDONELL,
" A Commissioner, &c., Kent."
Mr. HAWKINS.

This is accompanied with the necessary deposit, duly sealed by the Deputy Clerk of the Crown and Pleas for the County of Kent:

" In the matter of the Election of a Candidate for the Electoral Division of Bothwell to the House of Commons.

" I, William A. Campbell, Deputy Clerk of the Crown and Pleas for the County of Kent, do certify that John Joseph Hawkins has deposited with me the sum of $100 as a deposit for the costs of a re-count of the ballots cast at the Election held on the 20th day of June, 1882, before the Judge of the County Court, Kent.

" WILLIAM A. CAMPBELL,
" D.C.C., &c.

" Dated, January 26th, 1882."

It is true that the London Advertiser has denied again and again that any such application was made, but I repeat that this application was served upon the Judge in my presence, before he had proceeded with his resumming, as he called it, in which he threw out the votes of an electoral sub-division. The only answer I may say that he made to it was to fold it up, throw it back to my counsel, and state that he was now dealing with that case. Once he proceeded with the final resumming, the Act does not contemplate that he may at a subsequent stage of the proceedings go on with a full re-count of the ballots. The truth is, on the contrary, that he is to make up the number of votes from the ballot papers—make the final addition, and then issue his certificate to the Returning Officer declaring the candidate having the highest number of votes; but as if to prove that there really was partizanship in the course he adopted, as if to do away with all possibility of the supposition that he was laboring under the belief that he could afterwards proceed with the re-count of all the ballots, we find him taking each one of those thirty-three packages of ballots and duly affixing his seal to each one of them. To break any one of these seals afterwards was to do a highly improper and condemnable action, because there is no authority in the land permitting him or any person else after these seals have been affixed to go on with a re-count of the ballots at any subsequent stage of the proceedings. Knowing this, he sealed them up, and thereby effectually and finally deprived a large portion of the electors of Bothwell, of their due voice in returning a candidate to represent them in this House. Now, I ask whose conduct was most to be censured—that of the Returning Officer who strictly adhered to the letter of the law, who proceeded in a due and orderly manner with the performance of his duty, and who, when he appeared before the Judge, and found that the Judge was about to proceed in what he conceived, and my counsel conceived, to be an illegal manner, demanded before he placed those statements in the hands of the Judge, that the Judge should carry out the intention of the Act; or that of the Judge, who made a partial and pretended resumming instead of the fair and impartial re-count contemplated by the Statute? Sub-section 5 of section 67 of the Act says:

" The Returning Officer, after the receipt of a notice from the Judge of such re-count of ballots, shall delay making his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, until he receives a certificate from the Judge of the result of such re-count, and upon the receipt of such certificate the Returning Officer shall proceed to make his return in the form of Schedule S of the said Act."

Now, here was the position of the Returning Officer in this case: his commandment is to make his return only upon the receipt of a certificate from the Judge of the re-count that is specifically called for in the Act, in terms so explicit and exact that it is almost impossible to conceive that any man could deliberately mistake their meaning. Now, he knew that there had been no such re-count; he knew that the re-count had been demanded and been refused; he knew that at the time and place the Judge took this proceeding, he had in his hands the ballot papers, and had the power to say really what the will of the people was, and that he deliberately refused to take that course. Well, under the best advice obtainable, the Returning Officer on the next lawful day on which the declaration should be reversed or re-affirmed, re-affirmed his declaration, and set forth his reasons for so doing; and this has been published to the country again and again. Here is the Judge's certificate to the Returning Officer:

"In the matter of the Election of the Candidate of the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell in the House of Commons, Canada.—Pursuant to an appointment and order made by me on the 24th June, A.D. 1882, and in the presence of David Mills and John Joseph Hawkins, and of James Stephens, Returning Officer, and Charles Stephens, Election Clerk, and after examining the statements and papers produced by said Returning Officer and Election Clerk, and after hearing counsel for all parties, and adding and summing up the votes given at said election for the respective candidates, as shown by the statements of the various Deputy Returning Officers, I find and declare that fifteen hundred and seventy-six votes were given at said Election for said David Mills, and fifteen hundred and sixty-four votes for said John Joseph Hawkins, and that David Mills is elected for said Electoral District by a majority of twelve votes."

Here we find the Judge states that he has summed up the votes, and that he had taken into account the position of the respective candidates. He had done nothing of the kind. He had refused to examine and find what the state of the case was. He had refused to perform his functions; and I have yet to be convinced that any man is obliged to obey a Judge, no matter how high his position may be, when the mandate given by him is outside and beyond his power. The Judge was an Election officer just as the Returning Officer was, and the Returning Officer, knowing that the Judge had refused to make the legal and proper recount and return, made his return, on the following night, as follows:—

"I hereby certify that the member elected for the Electoral Division of Bothwell, in pursuance of the within written writ as having received the majority of votes lawfully given, is John Joseph Hawkins of the city of Brantford, in the county of Brant, Esquire. I further certify upon the grounds mentioned in my Report that after having declared the said John Joseph Hawkins elected a final addition or summing up of the votes given at the said election was had before the Judge of the County Court of the county of Kent, and a certificate issued therefrom by the said Judge that upon adding and summing up the votes given at the said Election for the respective candidates as shown by the statements of the various Deputy Returning Officers, that he found and declared that between fifteen hundred and seventy-six votes were given at said election for David Mills, one of the candidates, and fifteen hundred and sixty-four votes for said John Joseph Hawkins, and that said David Mills was elected for said Electoral District by a majority of twelve votes; but I have been served with no certificate of re-count of said ballots, nor have said ballots been re-counted."

Now, there is the whole matter before the House. I have been urged again and again, in my own interest and on my own behalf, to give to the press of the Conservative party, to which I belong, a full and complete statement of the transactions that took place in connection with this pretended re-count. But, Sir, confident of my own right, confident that, if this matter ever comes to be passed upon or examined into by the courts, I will be found to have pursued the same honorable course that I have ever pursued.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAWKINS. I defy any man in this House, or out of this House, to charge me, in my fifteen years of political toil, with dishonorable conduct, in the service of my party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Which party?

Mr. HAWKINS. Because I think that the man who serves his party honorably, serves his country in doing so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Which party?

Mr. HAWKINS. And I have served without fee or reward on all occasions. An hon. member opposite wants to know which party. I served that party to defeat whose candidate he is commonly reputed to have subscribed $5,000 in June last, when the hon. gentleman who sits so smilingly before me was confronted, one day early in June last, with the state of affairs wherein the hon. David Mills was chosen the candidate for West Elgin. It is reported that he subscribed a good deal of money for the purpose of assisting his friend against me in another county. It is quite certain, at any rate, that a resolution was duly and openly passed at the said Reform Convention, pledging them, by every means in their power, to assist the hon. David Mills to defeat me. And the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) took such an interest in my affairs at that time that he made me a prominent figure by name in his address in West Elgin, although I was a candidate in another county. So much for the good humor and good nature of the hon. member for West Elgin at the present moment. Now, I have to say this: Is it not a scandalous state of affairs, when a matter is sub judice, not that these organs should attack a politician, not that they should attack me—because I have been accustomed to that for years, and the only effect of those attacks upon me personally has been to make me more popular and stronger with my own party—but that the Returning Officer who, for the short period in which he was acting, was not in the capacity of a politician, and I defy any one to show that he in any way contravened or overstepped his authority, or failed to perform his duty that he should be so falsely and maliciously attacked. Therefore, is it not scandalous that he should have been pursued as he has been in this newspaper, the London Advertiser. I will only give three extracts out of two or three hundred which I might quote. Here is one:

"The Free Press has at last proved equal to the occasion, and in its columns editorials have appeared whitewashing the Returning Officer and attacking Mr. Mills, which read amazingly like Hawkins' speeches. Can it be that our contemporary has lent its editorial columns to J. J. Hawkins to defend one of the most shameless frauds ever committed by a Returning Officer? It was well known before the day of declaration that Mr. Stephens intended to return Hawkins. His son was offering to bet with Reformers that Mr. Mills would not be returned by his father. Mr. Stephens appointed his own house as the place where the declaration was to be made in order to keep Reformers away."

There is not one word of truth in this. Should the matter ever come to trial, it will be found that neither the Returning Officer nor his son, the Election Clerk, were guilty of one iota of these charges made against them in that article. The next extract I will read is from the same paper in the month of August:

"The Brantford Courier is very indignant because we said that in the appeal to Judge Bell from the declaration of the Returning Officer in the case of the Bothwell Election, Mr. Mills' counsel did not object to a re-count of the ballots, although he did not ask for it, nor did Judge Bell refuse Mr. Hawkins a re-count."

Here, after having seen my demand, served in his own presence, and in the presence of his counsel, and having heard this counsel contend against the granting of a re-count, after coming from a meeting where it was arranged I should not obtain one, he ventures to affirm that I never asked for a re-count:

"Will the Courier tell us when the application was made to the Judge? Against which of Mr. Hawkins' many friends among the Deputy Returning Officers was complaint made?"

I have given the proofs here. Here it is under the hand and seal of the Clerk of the Crown. Here is the affidavit of Mr. James Dawson, and should this Committee be able to proceed with this work, we will be able to produce the evidence that these were served on the Judge before there was any proceeding, in the presence of the counsel on the other side, and in their presence he refused to give the re-count we were entitled to.

"Mr. J. J. Hawkins, the member for James Stephen, made his first speech in the House of Commons in favor of the Orange Incorporation Bill."

I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite who say "hear, hear," that Mr. James Stephens is as respectable a man as any man who sits on the Opposition benches this night, that he was elected over and over again—six or seven times—as Reeve, the highest municipal office in the town in which he lives, that he is a man of substance and he is prepared to assume all the responsibility of his conduct as Returning Officer. In conclusion, I wish to say that I have felt it to be my bounden duty to lift my voice and demand on behalf of this Returning Officer, on behalf of this man who has been maligned and persecuted, who has scarcely been allowed peaceably to walk the streets of the town in which he lives, whose name is attempted to be made odious throughout the length and breadth of the land, and all because he performs his duties honestly, legally and orderly according to the directions laid down in the Statutes. If he had been present in the gallery of this House recently, when another matter of a similar nature was discussed, he would have been delighted to know that every word that fell from the lips of the hon. leader of the Opposition and several of his most prominent supporters, fully vindicated the course which he pursued as Returning Officer. I have no more to say in regard to this. I am quite able to take care of myself either in this House or out of it, but I have seen fit to raise my voice on behalf of a man who has been pursued with the greatest virulence and cruelty since the events of which I am now speaking. I have done no more than my duty in impugning the conduct even of one of the Judges of the land—not as a Judge, but rather as an officer in the Election. It was found after four years experience, under the administration of the Reformers themselves, that this Act was imperfect, that it was necessary, in order to have a final summing of the votes, that the Judge of the county—a man who should be above suspicion, above lifting his hand against the law—and I contend that the law was made not only for the electorate and for the Returning and Deputy Returning Officers, but for the Judges just as well as for the humblest subject in the land; and I conceived in my simplicity, perhaps, that when a Judge is found exercising that duty in a partizan manner, he is the more worthy of denunciation, and his conduct should be dealt with the more severely, and he should be brought more closely to book, than those who perhaps may have done inadvertently acts not completely in accordance with the letter of the law. Therefore, I contend and hold that the County Judge, in his capacity as an Election officer to re-count those votes, is just as strongly held and bound to perform those duties therein laid down, as the humblest Returning Officer or Deputy Returning Officer who may have had to do with the Election. Why, what had he to do in this case? When those ballot papers were placed before the Judge, he had under his own hands the means of absolutely determining how the electors had cast their votes. He had the means of taking each statement and of verifying it. Everybody knows that the Deputy Returning Officer makes up his statement, and deposits it in the box with the ballots, and everybody knows also that Deputy Returning Officers make mistakes. Everybody knows that in a county where thirty-three Deputy Returning Officers have to decide whether ballots are good or bad, as to whether a ballot should be rejected or counted in, mistakes will occur; everybody knows that there is likely to be a multiplicity of councils prevailing; but when you afterwards bring those ballots and statements to the Returning Officer, has he the means in his hands to make a correct rendering of the state of affairs? He has not, he is bound to take them as he finds them. He is bound to add them all and sum them up just as he finds them. Well, here is a copy of the adding up and of the summing up of the Returning Officer, just as he found those in the ballot box, and the summing up was 1,520 votes recorded for Mr. Hawkins, and 1,504 recorded for Mr. Mills. But when we came to the County Judge, if he had opened those ballot packages, if he had counted them and verified each statement to see that everything was done openly and fairly, all would have been well; and when he came to those two ballot boxes, in which there were no statements, when he came to those two packages of ballot papers, which he did take into his hands and which he did weigh—why, he was like a young lady receiving her first love-letter; he picked up those packages and he turned them over and over, and up and down, and one would almost fancy he was endeavoring to see into them without opening them to get the state of affairs. Now, why did not he tear open the envelopes and count those ballots? Because he knew that if he opened one package he would be bound to open all, and would have no reason, no excuse whatever, for not going on and counting the whole thirty-three packages. He refused to do this; he refused to perform his duty; he sealed those ballot papers hermetically; although he had never opened them, he placed the seal of the court upon them, and now they cannot be got at except for their scrutiny—an expensive and most tedious process. That is all that can be done, then, instead of the re-count, such as is contemplated under the Act, such as I was willing to submit to, such as I demanded when I found he was not willing to accord it to me. Perhaps this dispute would have been ended and settled long ago, if the person who received the majority of votes cast in that county had been returned regularly. Therefore, I contend that I am justified in hoping that the House will order an investigation into the matter. We all know that a great many more elections may come off, and undoubtedly will come off, before another Election Law is passed; and is it not an improper state of things, is it not dangerous to say that such proceedings shall be an example set to Judges from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island. That they may take first whichever course their leanings may happen to induce them to take, that they may refuse to count the ballots in a case where the statements are imperfect, that they may take a course which will certainly, if it is not checked, introduce great confusion and injustice? This is the first instance of the kind. I challenge any man to instance a case wherein a re-count was made in the manner in which it was attempted to be made in the county of Bothwell. I can very well understand that if both candidates were willing and consenting parties to dispense with the counting of the ballots, it might be possible by legal proceedings, for the Judge to make up his statements without a re-count. But what have we seen in Toronto recently? We have seen in the last election for Mayor the two candidates agreeing to dispense with certain portions of the Election Law, and to submit the case so made to the courts for decision. When the matter came before the courts that agreement was held to be irregular, it was held to be illegal, and the courts refused to carry it out. Therefore, I hold that in this case the Judge did that which he was not warranted in doing, and which renders him liable to the suspicion of having acted partially in the case. Therefore, I expect that every hon. gentleman in this House will say by his vote here to-night that while the Deputy Returning Officers shall be held liable in penalties of $500, while the Returning Officers shall be held liable in penalties of $1,000, with the addition of imprisonment for one or two years in certain cases, it shall not be said that any Judge or any man, no matter how high his position, may lift his hand with impunity against the majesty of the law, as I contend was done in this case. I therefore move for a Special Committee to examine and report upon the conduct of the County Judge of the County of Kent, Province of Ontario, in refusing to re-count the votes or ballots cast at the election for a member to represent the Electoral District of Bothwell in the House of Commons of Canada, held in the month of June, 1882, though application therefor was duly made, accompanied with a deposit receipt showing that the necessary deposit in money had been made with the Clerk of the Crown and Pleas for the County of Kent, by James Dawson, a duly qualified elector of the said district, on behalf of J. J. Hawkins, one of the candidates at the said election. And that the said Committee be composed of Messrs. Beaty, Daly, Macmaster, Macmillan (East Middlesex), Tupper, (Pictou), Amyot, Weldon, Wells and Davies, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why he has singled out the Judges of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, as those to whom a special example should be set?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the question of my hon. friend from Victoria is a poser. I must say that, being in Parliament for some years, I have listened to many extraordinary motions, and have listened to a great many extraordinary speeches, but a more extraordinary motion than has been submitted to this House just now, or a more extraordinary speech than has been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I think I never listened to before on the floor of Parliament. The hon. gentleman's motion says:

"To examine and report upon the conduct of the County Judge of the County of Kent, Province of Ontario, in refusing to re-count the votes or ballots cast at the election for a member to represent the Electoral District of Bothwell, in the House of Commons of Canada, held in the month of June, 1882, though application therefor was duly made, accompanied with a deposit receipt showing that the necessary deposit in money had been made with the County Clerk, by James Dawson, a duly qualified elector of the said district, on behalf of J. J. Hawkins, one of the candidates at the said election."

Half the hon. gentleman's speech was taken up with adulation of his friend the Returning Officer. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman who occupies the seat for Bothwell should have lauded the Returning Officer for Bothwell. The hon. gentleman has good ground for lauding him; he has good ground to say that Mr. James Stephens, the Returning Officer, is an exceptionally good man; he has received from him favors and considerations that few men who are returned to Parliament receive at the hands of a Returning Officer, and therefore he has good reason to be thankful and to be grateful in his inmost heart for the kindness and consideration shown to him by James Stephens, Returning Officer for the Electoral District of Bothwell. He complains that Mr. Stephens is hounded and abused—that his family, his children, cannot walk the streets of the little village in which they live without the neighbors insulting them. I think any respectable man in any community, unless he has committed a serious wrong—and then he ceases to be respectable—can walk the streets of his own town without being insulted by the boys and neighbors. When the hon. gentleman talks in this way, it convinces one that there was something wrong with this respectable man in being thus treated by his neighbors. The hon. gentleman has pursued an extraordinary course. He has pursued a course which few men in Parliament would pursue, and I venture to say few men out of Parliament would pursue. He has availed himself of the opportunity to place a motion on the Notice Paper, with a view of vindicating, if he could, the character of the Returning Officer, and with a view to having a slap at the County Court Judge of Kent. I do not know what are the Judge's politics, if Judges on the Bench have any political sympathies. But I say it is an unheard-of proceeding, it is a cheeky proceeding, while a case is pending before the Courts that an hon. gentleman interested in it should be allowed to rise in Parliament and, under the pretence of investigating the conduct of a County Court Judge, attempt to vindicate an officer whose conduct is scandalous and is now before the courts of Ontario. The hon. gentleman tells us that he was advised by his best friends to publish a statement of the whole facts of the case in the Conservative press of Ontario, but that the hon. gentleman's native modesty prevented his publishing such a statement of the case. The hon. gentleman was entirely too modest to give to the country through the press his vindication of the conduct of the Returning Officer. He was not too diffident or modest to avail himself of the privilege which the Returning Officer has given him of vindicating on the floor of Parliament the conduct of the Returning Officer. He tells us that nothing prevented him from publishing a statement in the public press except the fact that the case was in the courts, and it would therefore be highly improper for the hon. member for Bothwell to publish in the public press, in the Conservative press, a statement of the case. But it is not at all improper for the hon. gentleman and his friends, or inconsistent with his position and duty as a Member of Parliament, to go over the whole details of the case in the House and give his version of the facts, because he knows perfectly well it will be published in the whole press of the country, and will be reported in Hansard. And this the hon. gentleman thinks is consistent with his duties and his position, occupying as he does the seat of a man who should have been returned to Parliament, to avail himself of the power the Returning Officer gave him to attempt to blacken and ruin the character of a Judge who had no opportunity to defend himself. The hon. gentleman says it is a scandalous thing when this case is before the courts, that the Liberal press, the London Advertiser and the Toronto Globe, should, day after day, assail the Returning Officer. I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not think it a scandalous and outrageous thing—a thing no man should do—that, while this case is pending in the courts, and the Returning Officer's conduct is before the courts, that the hon. gentleman should avail himself of the opportunity the procedure of Parliament gives him to vindicate, as best he can, the conduct of the Returning Officer, to assail the character of one of the Judges of the land. The hon. gentleman tells us he has done so in vindication of the conduct of the Returning Officer. I do not think the Returning Officer will be at all obliged to him when all the facts are revealed; and recollect that, so far, we have only received the hon. gentleman's own statement. Although I deprecate as strongly as I can possibly do, the conduct and the motives of that hon. member of Parliament who, for his own purposes and to vindicate his own friend, will see fit to place such a motion on the paper; still I do not regret the course pursued by the hon. gentleman; because the conduct of the Returning Officer will not appear in the most favorable light when carefully investigated. A few words as to the motion before the House, before I proceed to deal with the merits of the case. In my judgment, the hon. First Minister, as representing the Crown, and the hon. Minister of Justice, should not have allowed this motion to be put. It is a motion, if not out of order, at all events it is one of a kind that never has been put, either in the Canadian Parliament or Imperial Parliament, based as it is only on the statement of a member without anything to support it. When a motion was made, some time ago in this House, to enquire into the conduct of a Judge, I submitted one or two propositions, to all of which the hon. First Minister substantially agreed. If the hon. gentleman agreed with those propositions in the case to which I have referred, it was evidently his duty to have stopped further consideration of this motion. What is the nature of this motion? The motion is to examine and report upon the conduct of a County Court Judge. There are certain duties imposed upon him by Act of Parliament, but he is not an officer of this House, and the motion does not say that he is an officer. Stripped of verbiage the motion is simply one to enquire into the conduct of a Judge and ascertain whether he performed certain duties assigned to him or not; to ascertain whether he is guilty of wrong-doing or not—and that is an impeachment of a Judge, and should not be proceeded with in this manner. I say that charges against a Judge, of all men, should be entered upon with care and caution, and with all the formality the law and the practice of Parliament require. No Judge should be open to be attacked by a side issue and without notice being given him, and simply on the motion of an hon. member who avails himself of the opportunity given him to make a statement of alleged facts. I doubt whether they are facts or not. I prefer not to take my facts from the hon. gentleman. I have read the petition against the hon. gentleman and the answer of the Returning Officer, and I prefer getting my facts from this petition and answer or in some other way than out of the mouth of the hon. gentleman. I say no gentleman should allow a Judge to be attacked in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has seen fit to attack this Judge. It is contrary to the practice of Parliament and the precedents laid down in the English and in our own Parliament, and I was amazed at the hon. gentleman who leads this House, and who is supposed to be the guardian of the reputation of our Judges, that he should have sat silent and still while the hon. gentleman launched a tirade of abuse against the Judge of the County Court of Kent. The course pursued by the hon. gentleman is unprecedented and illegal. This the hon. gentleman must know, that at the last Session of Parliament we passed an Act here providing the mode in which, when complaints were made against County Court Judges, they should be tried in cases of alleged incapacity, inability, or misbehavior. The hon. gentleman has complained of the Judge of this County Court for misbehavior, and if so, he and his friends have only one remedy, and that is prescribed under the Statute passed in the Session of 1882. But proceeding under that Act would not serve the hon. gentleman's purpose; he could not then make a speech—a speech that would go to the country and vindicate his friend the Returning Officer; he could not then point out how this his friend had been scandalized and black-guarded and abused, and how the London Advertiser had said that the member for Bothwell was not the member for Bothwell, but the hon. member for Jim Stephens. Instead of making an application to the Government to try this Judge for misconduct, if he were guilty of it, the hon. gentleman, in a most cowardly manner, availed himself of his position in this House for the purpose of abusing, slandering and defaming this Judge. Now, I say, another rule is laid down by the highest authorities on the practice of Parliament, that where Judges are liable to impeachment before Parliament, it could only be done in one way: by petition presented to the House, setting out the facts on which the grounds of complaint or the charges were based. The hon. First Minister knows that this question was up for consideration in the application made against the late Chief Justice of the Province of Manitoba; and I cited during that discussion, some authorities, I think, on that point from the English Parliament, and the hon. gentleman knows, that the only mode in which, even under the old practice and procedure, we could reach a Judge, was by impeachment through the High Court of Parliament; and in that case the impeachment or resolution had to be based on a petition presented to the House. That course was pursued in several English as well as several Canadian cases. The hon. gentleman will recollect one case which was referred to. Fox, one of the Irish Judges, against whom complaint was made before the Imperial Parliament, that complaint was based on a petition setting out the facts complained of in the conduct of that Judge. So in the case of McLellan, also an Irish Judge, a Member of Parliament presented a petition showing certain grounds of complaint, and this petition, I believe, was referred to a Committee. Chief Baron O'Grady, also an Irish Judge, was proceeded against in the same way; and again, a Justice of the Peace of Wales, and a Justice of one of the Courts of Wales, was proceeded against similarly. There was also an English case. The hon. gentleman will recollect many years ago, that a complaint was made to Parliament against the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and a long discussion took place in the House on the subject. In the case I have just referred to, of the Chief Baron, the proceedings were by petition; and so with one of the Judges of the Dominion here, Judge Loranger. A petition was also presented against the late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Province of Manitoba. In all these cases, the proceedings were initiated by petition presented to the House by a member, setting forth distinctly and clearly, the grounds of complaint against the Judge; and I think I can challenge the First Minister to refer to a single case, in which a Judge was impeached either in the Imperial, or in a Colonial Parliament, in which the proceedings were not based on petition. But here, without any petition, without any notice, to the implicated Judge, or to anybody acting for the Judge—if anybody could act for him in such a case—sprang on the House by forty-eight hours' notice, the hon. gentleman assails the character of a Judge here;—and I say, it is the duty of the hon. First Minister in his place in Parliament, to vindicate this Judge, at all events, against the aspersions cast upon him by the person who has just taken his seat, and who has acted entirely out of order, in not proceeding in the ordinary and regular way. In addition to all this, however, certain other duties are imposed on the hon. First Minister, to which I beg to draw his attention—and I drew his attention to them before and the hon. gentleman then agreed with me—that no proceedings should be had against a Judge, that a Select Committee should not be appointed to enquire into the conduct of a Judge, unless on certain well-understood conditions, according to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, and, I submit, equally well-understood conditions according to the practice of the Canadian Parliament. I say, that before we can enter on a Parliamentary enquiry—and the hon. gentleman now seeks to make Parliament investigate into the conduct of this Judge—into the conduct of a Judge, the Ministers, or the First Minister, should himself investigate into the charge against the Judge, with the view of determining whether he ought to facilitate the interference of Parliament. I ask the hon. First Minister, if he knows the first thing about the charges made against this Judge, except what has issued from the lips of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat? If he has made the slightest enquiry as to whether or not a single statement uttered by that hon. gentleman is based upon facts or not? I ask him whether he has made any investigation as to the conduct of this man, or rather as to the facts, upon which the allegations made by the hon. gentleman are based. Todd, on page 742 of his valuable work on this subject, enunciates the doctrine which I have first stated, and says:

“The House of Commons should not initiate, and the Ministers of the Crown should not sanction, any attempt to institute criminal charges against anyone unless on some distinct and definite basis, and in the case of a Judge, such charges should only be entertained by the House, or by the Government, on allegations of misconduct which should be sufficient, if proved, to justify the removal from the Bench.”

Now, can the hon. gentleman say that he has made such an investigation, as will lead his mind to the conclusion, that if these charges were proved, they would justify the removal of this Judge from the Bench? I am quite satisfied that the hon. gentleman has not done so; and further, that when the hon. gentleman enquires into it, he will say in his place in this House, that, if every one of the statements made in this motion were correct, that would not justify the removal of this Judge from the Bench. What are these statements: that this Judge refused a re-count? The reasons why, are not before us; whether or not, the motion was made in time, or regularly, or not; a score of other reasons, by which a Judge might be influenced in refusing to direct a re-count, are all absent from our information, and the hon. gentleman cannot say, that he has given this matter such consideration, as would lead his mind to any conclusion. There is another proposition clearly laid down :

"The House of Commons should not initiate, and the Minister of the Crown should not sanction any attempt to institute criminal charges against anyone, unless upon a distinct and definite basis."

I ask the hon. gentleman, what distinct and definite basis is here? This Judge, it is alleged, refused the re-count; but the reason why is not given; and there may be a good reason. The Judge may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, have refused the re-count; and yet we are asked to refer the conduct of the Judge to the investigation of a Secret Committee upstairs, where he will be on trial in a sort of Star Chamber fashion. There is another principle laid down: a charge should not be entertained by the House, or by the Government, against a Judge, unless upon allegations of misconduct, that would, if proved, justify his dismissal. That rule is laid down and referred to by Fodd in the quotation which I have just read to the House. I submit—apart from the merits of the case altogether, on which I have a word or two to say—that the hon. First Minister is bound to refuse and reject this motion, having regard to the rules which we have already laid down, and the practice which has hitherto prevailed in Parliament; but the hon. gentleman says that he bases his application upon the merits of the case. Now, I regret that we have to consider the merits of the case at all; and that the hon. gentleman should have invited the House to the consideration of the conduct of the Returning Officer and Judge. I regret that he should have invited the consideration of the House to his own conduct in this matter, because it is not altogether free from blame; and I am quite sure, on the facts within my knowledge, at all events, Mr. Speaker, that the conduct of the Returning Officer, is conduct that no man can justify—I do not care on which side of the House he may be on. I regret having to say anything about the conduct of this Returning Officer; but the hon. gentleman, by his own conduct, has invited comment on that subject, and for that reason I cannot allow his speech to go to the public without, in my humble way, attempting to answer it. The hon. gentleman has carefully abstained from a minute investigation of the circumstances and facts before the Returning Officer. He has carefully abstained from a minute investigation of the facts that were before the County Judge on his summing up of the votes cast for the respective candidates for the Electoral District of Bothwell. It would not serve his purpose, which is to justify the Returning Officer and abuse the County Court Judge. This case is before the courts, and the hon. gentleman's justification of the one and his abuse of the other, will not influence the Judges when they are considering whether the hon. gentleman represents improperly the Electoral District of Bothwell in this House, or whether or not the hon. David Mills is the man who is fairly entitled to the seat. I find by the papers in my hands that there were four polling divisions in which there were irregularities. In No. 1 sub-division, in the township of Camden, the Deputy Returning Officer returned the ballot box with the statement in the ballot box, inside of an envelope which had marked on it the number of votes for each candidate; and the statement itself contained the number of votes cast for each candidate; the statement was not signed by the Deputy Returning Officer, and because it was not so signed by this Deputy Returning Officer—this extraordinary good man, this honest man, this fair man, whose name is known in all the churches of Bothwell, declined to count for either candidate the number of votes cast for each of them respectively in this sub-division. Will the hon. gentleman deny that statement? No, Sir, he will not, because he cannot. I have the facts under my hand. At that polling sub-division the hon. David Mills happened to have a majority of twenty-eight. The Returning Officer refused to count that statement because it was not signed—he improperly refused to count it, he had no business to reject it, as the law does not require that it shall be signed by the Deputy Returning Officer. All the law requires is that the blank statement shall be filled up with the number of votes cast for each candidate and enclosed with the ballot box and returned to the Returning Officer. This Returning Officer—this pet of the hon. gentleman—this man who is hounded through the county, returned the hon. gentleman by a majority of sixteen, although if Mr. Mills had had the benefit of the majority in polling division No. 1, Camden, it would have left the hon. gentleman at home, and he would not have had the opportunity of writing M.P. after his name for five years at least. The Returning Officer rejected these votes, and he counted in—that is the proper expression—the hon. gentleman who now occupies the seat. The Returning Officer was told that there was no necessity for signing the statement; he was asked to adjourn the declaration for a few hours or a day or so to enable Mr. Mills to get the Deputy Returning Officer to sign the statement, but he would not do that, although when the declaration commenced he stated openly where the declaration took place, that if the statements were not all correct he would adjourn the declaration in order to have them corrected. But when it turned out that the statement in polling division No. 1, Camden, was not correct according to the Returning Officer's view of the law, and when he was asked to adjourn the declaration in order to correct it he would not do so. Still we are asked to believe that he performed every duty imposed on him by the law, with the honesty that should characterize every Returning Officer—this friend of the hon. member for Bothwell—this millionaire who is such an object of respect and reverence by everybody—this man who does not fear the penalties of imprisonment—this man who took advantage of an oversight on the part of one of his own deputies to count in his pet candidate, is, according to the present member for Bothwell, to be lauded and commended. But this is not all. In polling division No. 3, Dawn, the hon. Mr. Mills had a majority of five. The statement was put in the ballot box, but was not filled in at all; it was a dead blank—there was nothing in it. Now, it is possible that the Returning Officer might not be justified in refusing to receive that statement, because there were no figures in it, but it was only a question of a majority of five either way, and the deputy returning officer of that sub-division, while the declaration was under consideration, while the investigation was going on, arrived at the Returning Officer's house, and the Returning Officer got him to fill up and sign the statement, and put it in the ballot box. I will not say whether the Returning Officer was right or wrong in so doing in that case; but that is what he did, and that would give Mr. Mills a majority of five in that sub-division which, added to the twenty-eight in No. 1, Camden, would have given Mr. Mills a majority of thirty-three, if he had received justice, and if the statements that should have been counted had been counted. In the village of Dresden Mr. Mills had a majority of twelve. I gather from the paper which has been sent to me that the statement in that case was filled up, the votes were marked on the envelope and in the statement paper, but it was not signed by the Returning Officer. I believe that division was counted and properly counted, but there was another polling sub-division, that of No. 2, Camden, where the majority was not for Mr. Mills. The hon. gentleman who now occupies his seat had a majority of forty-eight in that sub-division. I am told on authority which cannot be impeached, that in that ballot box there was no statement filled up and signed—that the statement paper was a blank. The Deputy Returning Officer arrived at the Returning Officer's house while the dispute was going on, and through his instrumentality, or in some other way, the seal which the Deputy Returning Officer put on the box was broken open, the statement filled up and put in the ballot box. The result of that was that the gentleman who now occupies the seat for the county of Bothwell had a majority over the other candidate. Camden No. 2, gave a majority of forty-eight in the hon. gentleman's favor, and Camden No. 1, gave a majority of twenty-eight in Mr. Mills' favor, which left the gentleman now occupying the seat in a majority of sixteen. In Camden No. 2, the statement was a blank; in Camden No. 1, the statement was not a blank, and the only informality was that the Deputy Returning Officer did not sign it. In the one case the Returning Officer counted the statement, in the other case he did not do so. I ask if there ever was a grosser outrage perpetrated? The result was that the hon. David Mills was left in a minority of sixteen, whereas, had all the papers been counted, he would have been in a majority of seventeen. That was the state of affairs. The Returning Officer refused to return Mr. Mills, though he had a clear majority of the votes polled, and he made no effort to compel the Deputy Returning Officer to complete his return, although he lived within one mile of his house; and I may add that during the progress of the summing up, notice was given to this Deputy Returning Officer to skedaddle, and he got out of the way. It is a marvellous thing that in these three sub-divisions, Mr. Mills had a majority of forty-five that these three Deputies were the warm partisans of the hon. gentleman who now occupies the seat, and that in these three sub-divisions these mistakes occurred. It may have been an accident or an oversight; but, if it was, it was a very extraordinary one. But in any event these were the facts. What was left for Mr. Mills to do? He made application to the Judge of the County Court under the advice of his legal advisers, for a re-summing up. The County Judge, it is said, has no right to entertain an application of that kind; and with all the authority that a constitutional lawyer could assume the hon. gentleman says that the Judge went beyond his duty in entertaining an appeal for a summing up from the Returning Officer. I am not going to argue that question; it is not a matter of much consequence; but there are good grounds for arguing that Mr. Mills was perfectly correct within the spirit of the law in appealing to the County Judge against the Returning Officer's conduct and against his summing up, and that the Judge was perfectly right in granting it. In 41 Vic., chap. 6, section 14, the law is laid down:

"In case it is made to appear within four days after that on which the Returning Officer has made the final addition of the votes for the purpose of declaring the candidate or candidates elected, on the affidavit of any credible witness to the County Judge of any county, or in Quebec to a Judge of the Superior Court ordinarily discharging the duties in any Judicial District in which the Electoral District, or any part thereof is situated, that such witness believes that any Deputy Returning Officer at any election in such Electoral District in counting the votes has improperly counted or rejected any ballot papers at such election"—

In this case, the Deputy Returning Officers did not make any mistake in counting up; the mistake was in not signing the statement; so that the language of the section so far could not apply to this case; but the law goes on to say:

"Or that the Returning Officer has improperly summed up the votes,"—

There is the point:

"And in the case the applicant deposits within the said time with the Clerk of the Court the sum of $100, as a security for the costs of the candidate, in respect of the re-count, appearing by the addition to be elected, the said Judge shall appoint a time within four days after the receipt of the said affidavit by him, to re-count the votes or to make the final addition as the case may be."

I think there is good ground for argument that this section applies to this case, and that the County Judge acted properly in re-summing up. The application for the re-summing up came before the County Judge, and he disposed of that application. At the hour fixed for the investigation, the counsel of the sitting member appeared before the County Judge. As the hon. gentleman has seen fit to read to the House certain documents, I propose to read to the House a letter from the candidate on the other side, stating exactly what took place at that summing up; and I ask the House to attach just as much importance to the letter of the hon. David Mills as they do to the statement of the gentleman who now occupies the seat of the hon. David Mills. Mr. Mills says:

"When the time appointed arrived and the Judge was proceeding with the work, Hawkins' counsel said, 'We object to a re-summing up, and demand a re-count.' The Judge replied: 'This is a complaint against the final addition made by the Returning Officer on behalf of Mr. Mills; a re-addition by me is asked for. If Mr. Hawkins wants a re-count he must make application in proper form and make the necessary deposit.' His counsel said: 'We will make application now, and make the deposit, and we ask to have the final addition stopped.' My counsel said: 'We do not object to a re-count, but do not ask for it.' The Judge said, 'I must proceed with this addition, and the parties will be in the position they would be in if a proper addition had been made. My impression is that I have not any right to take evidence, and I shall on a re-addition confine myself to the information which is found in the ballot boxes. If Mr. Hawkins or Mr. Mills wants a re-count of the ballots, application must be made, based on the proper affidavits, and the money required by the Statute deposited.' Hawkins' deposit was made. He was advised against applying for a re-count, and withdrew it on the evening the time expired."

I ask the hon. gentleman if he withdrew the money, and when?

Mr. HAWKINS. I withdrew the money two months after I deposited it.

Mr. CAMERON. I am bound to take the hon. gentleman's word; but Mr. Mills says that the money was withdrawn, and I attach as much importance to what Mr. Mills says as to what the hon. gentleman says. The letter goes on:

"It was left, I have no doubt, to prevent, as it was thought it would, a re-count being asked for by my lawyer."

Now, you have what Mr. Mills says on the subject, and you have heard what the hon. gentleman says; I am not going to say what is the truth of the matter. The Judge in summing up had these statements before him; he had the statement from Camden, No. 1, which gave Mr. Mills a majority of twenty-eight. If that statement contained the addition required by law, showing the number of votes polled for each candidate, if it was in the ballot-box, I lay it down as incontrovertible law that that statement did not require to be signed, and that the Returning Officer was bound by law to count the votes polled in sub-division Camden No. 1. If he had counted the votes polled in that sub-division, the hon. gentleman to whom we have just listened would not be in his place to-night, representing the constituency of Bothwell. The Judge counted these statements, but the Judge left out No. 3 division, Dawn, because it was not filled up. The result of the summing up was that Mr. Mills was in a majority of twelve, and the Judge sent his certificate to this effect to the Returning Officer. Having received an authority and a certificate like that from the County Judge, it was the bounden duty of the Returning Officer to obey that certificate, and to have declared elected the man that had the highest number of votes. If there is anything clear, from the papers submitted by the hon. gentleman himself, from the petition presented against him and the Returning Officer, from the answer of the Returning Officer, in which he admits he did not count sub-division No. 1, Camden, it is that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is a minority member. He is not the only minority member in Parliament now, and it is of the first possible consequence that we should understand what the duty of Returning Officers is, with reference to this matter. I discussed a similar question in connection with another case some weeks ago, and I only wish the Government of the day had acted as they should have, by seating the man fairly entitled to the seat, and leaving to others the remedy provided by law. The hon. gentleman complains of the conduct of the County Judge. The hon. gentleman has no grounds for complaint. Everything appeared to me to have been done fairly and above board. He complained that the notice served on him was placed in his boots, but the hon. gentleman ought to be the last man to make a charge of that kind, for he is to-day standing in another man's boots. The conduct of the Judge should not be attacked, and his motives misrepresented in the way the hon. gentleman has seen fit to adopt on this motion. I cannot understand what induced the hon. gentleman to make this motion. Does he expect to make political capital out of it? Does he expect it to clear his character by ventilating his grievances on the floor of Parliament? Does he expect that his widespread reputation—extending, as he told us, all over this Dominion—is going to be benefited by taking the case from the Judges, who are the proper men to deal with it, and transferring it to the floor of Parliament? This hon. gentleman has no grievance. The hon. gentleman was jubilant over his supposed election to a seat in Parliament. Let me read what the hon. gentleman said when he returned from this magnificent victory that he achieved over the Grits of Bothwell:

"After having fairly and honorably won the victory, a dastardly attempt had been made to cheat him (Mr. Hawkins) of his laurels, but this attempt failed miserably and he stood before them in his unassailable right, as the first Conservative member ever returned for Bothwell."

The hon. gentleman had great ground for triumph. In the first place he was nominated for a constituency so gerrymandered as to give him a majority of 254—a constituency carved out for this special benefit—with a Returning Officer appointed at his request, a Returning Officer, who was his own creature, and who appointed all his deputies violent political partisans; yet with all these advantages he was left in a minority of seventeen by the independent electors. Why, the hon. gentleman knows he is no more the member for Bothwell than I am, yet he undertakes to congratulate himself on having fairly and honorably won this triumphant victory—he, the first Conservative candidate for Bothwell. I did not know until he announced it that the hon. gentleman was a Conservative. He has been on all sides of politics. I recollect some years ago when he was in my county posing before a convention as a Liberal candidate, and where he obtained seven votes. On that occasion he said the hon. First Minister's sun had set in a sea of political infamy. Now he triumphs over the victory he has won—as a Conservative. I never knew a man who had less reason for self glorification, and more reason to be thankful for the good offices of a friendly Returning Officer, than the hon. gentleman has.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am exceedingly obliged to the hon. gentleman for giving me a lesson as to my duties. His great Parliamentary experience and impartiality on all political subjects give him a special right to lecture anyone in this House. I had understood that in Parliament all members were equal and had the same rights; that an hon. gentleman who was elected yesterday had precisely the power and right to lay any matter before the House as the leader of the House had, no matter how strong might be his majority. The hon. gentleman says I ought not to have allowed any hon. gentleman to introduce this motion. If any hon. gentleman on that side had made the motion, and I had tried—improperly, without any reason—to stop him, I would have been told to mind my own business, and no one would have said so in language more unmistakable than the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says my hon. friend has attacked a County Judge behind his back in a most cowardly manner, that these public officers must and ought to be protected; and yet what is the speech of the hon. gentleman in return? If an attack was made against the County Judge, what was the hon. gentleman's language against the Returning Officer? He was a public officer; he had the same rights as the County Judge, the same character to defend, and as great responsibility in case he acted wrong, illegally, or corruptly. But what did the hon. gentleman, who professes such horror at the cowardly conduct of the hon. member for Bothwell in attacking a man behind his back, do but use slang as hard as he could—because the coarse language of the hon. gentleman deserves no other term—and abuse Mr. Stephens, the Returning Officer, in every possible way. The hon. gentleman, a man of Parliamentary experience, who poses as a great legal and constitutional authority, who knows and ought to know the respect a public officer should receive until he is proved guilty, sets to work and deliberately abuses, in the grossest and unparliamentary language, Mr. Stephens. I do not know whether Mr. Stephens or the County Judge is right. Until this discussion was brought on, I had never read anything about this case. I had too much to do, and I avoid sedulously, before circumstances force upon me legally, to enter into these matters. Whether this Judge is right or wrong, whether Mr. Stephens acted legally or illegally, I do not know, nor do I care to know until I am informed in legal form. I do not think this House can accept this motion. I think that as it is sub judice the hon. gentleman ought to have postponed his motion until after the final decision of the case. There will be time enough to bring it up; but I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman—especially as the hon. gentleman has only sat in Parliament a couple of months—I am not surprised that he should in his place, when he is attacked, and the Returning Officer is attacked, and everybody concerned in supporting him is attacked, that he should get up in his place, smarting under these attacks—as he believes undeserved attacks upon the Returning Officer—that he should state his grievance, and I think he stated it in a calm way enough, and in Parliamentary language. The hon. gentleman says this is an unheard-of thing, that a statement of this kind should not be received in Parliament at all, because it did not commence by petition. Why, Mr. Speaker, he says that I knew it; he says I knew that no complaint could be made against a Judge unless it was by petition. He was quoting a case where a petition must be presented. Why? Because all these petitions were presented against a Judge whose tenure of office depended upon a vote of both Houses. But neither this House, nor the other House, nor the two Houses together can, by any action of theirs, remove a Judge—they cannot remove a County Judge. That is another and a different tribunal. It is said, and said truly enough, that when a Judge is attacked, he can only be attacked when the charge is sufficient to warrant his removal. That is quite true, because the House ought not to discuss the character of a Judge unless they take the responsibility of removing him under power given by the Statute. Now, in the same way, a County Judge holds his tenure during good behavior, and the two Houses cannot remove him. I have no doubt that, if both Houses addressed the Crown, and the Crown did not remove him, there might be very considerable difference of opinion, and, perhaps, difference of action, between the Executive and the Legislative power. But I am not at all prepared to say that a County Judge, although he holds office during good behavior, cannot be removed by the Governor in Council. The Judge of a County Court holds office during good behavior and his residence within the county; he may be removed from office, by order of the Governor General in Council, from old age, inability, ill-health, misbehavior, or any other cause established to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council, provided that the circumstances respecting the inability, incapacity, misbehavior, have first been enquired into by and under order of the Governor in Council, and that the Judge has been given notice of the time and place of enquiry, and has been afforded an opportunity, by himself or his counsel, of being heard thereat. The hon. gentleman says that the hon. member for Bothwell' instead of making his statement in this House, ought to have proceeded first before the Governor in Council, ought to have acted on the Statute of last Session. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Government ought to have received such a petition? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that, when the matter was before the courts to decide whether the Judge was right or wrong in his act in this matter, we should, if a petition had been presented, have acted, as the hon. gentleman said the Government ought to have acted, to entertain the petition, and to have tried the County Judge upon what their idea of the law was, when the matter was before the courts? No, Sir; I am quite satisfied that no Government, whether the present Government or the Government which was led by the hon. gentleman from East York, would entertain any such position; however strongly they might have felt that the Judge had acted illegally or with improper motives, they would not have entertained it until the election matter itself had been settled by the courts. But I am not at all prepared to say—I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite, in protection of the rights of the electors, is prepared to say—that, after the matter has been decided, and after the courts have decided, that the Judge acted illegally, if a charge against a County Judge was brought before the Government of the day, and if, as very likely might have been said, that the County Judge was improperly shielded in his misconduct, because he was a friend of the Government, or because, as County Judge, he had decided erroneously, from improper motives, in favor of a supporter of the Government—I am not at all prepared to say that, after the final decision of the court, this House would not have a right, in protection of the liberty of the subject, to enquire into the conduct of the Judge, that being specially an Election matter in which the final right of decision would come before this House. That seems to me, Mr. Speaker, a very doubtful thing. I should be very sorry to see it laid down without great consideration that if a County Judge had by judgment seated a Ministerial supporter, and if, upon petition against that Judge before the Government, before the Ministry, and that the Ministry had acted improperly and had shielded the Judge in his misconduct, that this House would have ultimately to enquire into the matter. Sir, this is a case that ought not, until the case is decided before the courts, and cannot be dealt with by this House, either by the Special Committee moved by my hon. friend, or by sending it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It cannot, it ought not; and I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion. But I must say that I think that the hon. gentleman who has spoken last, while he reproved my hon. friend for bringing this matter before the House at all, might have acted in a more judicial spirit than he did, when he betrayed his failing in every word he said. At all events he made up his mind that my hon. friend has no right to a seat in this House, and that the hon. David Mills has. He has given his judgment, the court has decided, and I think that, should this matter ever come before this House in any way whatever, the hon. gentleman has precluded himself, by the positive manner in which he has decided the case, from exercising a calm, deliberate and impartial judgment on the case.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. leader of the Government says he is obliged to my hon. friend from West Huron, for giving him a lesson in Parliamentary practice. He says he always understood that the youngest member of the House has an equal right to bring any subject before the House with the leader of a Government, no matter how strong. Well, Sir, if the right hon. gentleman did understand things literally in that sense, I think he should have been obliged to my hon. friend from West Huron for pointing out his mistake; but I have not the slightest idea that he ever did hold that opinion in the literal sense of the words. It would imply that the youngest member of this

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

House would have as good a right to bring any measure before this House as the right hon. gentleman himself. I do not think he has ever been willing to concede that right to the youngest or any other member of the House. Above all things it would imply that the youngest member of the House has as good a right to institute proceedings against a member of the judiciary in this country as the leader of the Government, the custodian of public morals and whose special duty it is to see that justice is properly administered. Now, the right hon. gentleman would not for a moment admit so much. He does not suppose that the hon. gentleman who sits for Bothwell, has as good a right to institute proceedings against a Judge as he has himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I mean to say that any member has as much right as I possess to proceed against a Judge and bring the impeachment of a Judge before the House. If the hon. gentleman will look into the cases he will find that such cases have been brought forward in England by private members and not by members of the Government. Indeed, I am not aware, among the cases which I now remember, that they were brought up by the Government.

Mr. CASEY. The important case of Chief Justice Wood of Manitoba was not brought up by one of the youngest members of the House. The serious case of Judge Loranger was also not so proceeded with. Proceedings in the latter case were commenced by petition to the Executive and afterwards to this House, and the motion was made by "Mr. Blake, seconded by Mr. Cartwright," that the evidence be printed and be referred to a Special Committee, empowered to take evidence on oath, for enquiry. In that case proceedings were taken by the hon. Minister of Justice. The hon. Minister who had special charge of the administration of justice conducted the impeachment, and it was through that channel that action should come in this case; or if it be not taken by the Premier or the hon. Minister of Justice, the matter should proceed only after consultation with the hon. Minister, and after full consideration by the Government as to whether the proceedings should be taken. The hon. leader of the Government said he could not have prevented the gentleman who sits for Bothwell from moving this resolution. One would almost imagine that the hon. gentleman had grown more diffident than he used to be, and was afraid of losing influence with his followers. We remember times when the hon. leader of the House has asked older members than the gentleman who sits for Bothwell to stay their hands for reasons best known to the hon. gentleman, and they have done so; but now the hon. gentleman is timid and diffident and dare not ask even the gentleman who sits for Bothwell to stay his hand, because the Government did not think it desirable to bring on the question. It may be possible that the hon. First Minister was not consulted in this matter; it may be possible on the other hand, that he was consulted and thought it better to allow the gentleman who sits for Bothwell an opportunity to air his grievances, and do as he had done to-night, attack, I may say slander, a County Court Judge, his allegations to appear in the Debates and be published in the press, and then give the gentleman who sits for Bothwell a gentle little snub by telling him he had commenced in the wrong way, and let the whole matter rest with the allegations made on both sides of the House. The action of the hon. First Minister in allowing things to go so far, well knowing that it was not possible for them to go further, was derogatory to the dignity of the Bench, and of this House, and unworthy of his own position. It made no difference whether the Judge was a County Court Judge or a Judge of a Superior Court. It might make some difference as to the manner of impeachment, but no one should be allowed to attack the character of the Judge unless the hon. Premier was prepared to push the attack to completion and deprive the Judge of his position. By allowing such an attack to be made on the judiciary, it tended to lower the dignity of this House. Coming to the tu quoque argument, the hon. Premier has told the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) he is a bad boy for abusing the Returning Officer. The language used on both sides was fairly strong. I do not know whether the language of the hon. member for Huron was as strong as the occasion demanded. I do not see that it is as strong respecting the Returning Officer than was the statement of the gentleman who sits for Bothwell, who told the House that the effect of the Returning Officer's conduct upon his own neighbors was such that he and his family were hooted on the streets. We may recollect that the Judges are not in the same position as the Returning Officer. The latter was an officer of the House, and was liable to attack, abuse and censure in the House; but our Judges occupy a different position. The hon. First Minister would not permit similar action to be taken towards Judges who try Election petitions. The Judges are acting in a judicial capacity, and although doing work assigned by Parliament in connection with Elections, they are not subject to criticism and attack as was the case with Returning Officers. Whatever may have been the merits of the Returning Officer, whether the hon. member for Huron was correctly informed as to the facts, he was perfectly justified in saying what he believed to be true respecting the officer. It appears to have been quite as much the object of the gentleman who sits for Bothwell to whitewash the Returning Officer as to blackwash the Judge, and the hon. gentleman was allowed to say all the pretty things he chose about the Returning Officer, and they would have gone to the country as established facts if they had not been denied on the other side; and assertions based upon the facts brought to the knowledge of the hon. member for West Huron by the best evidence, were equally proper to go to the country on the other side. When all is said and done, what is the direct object of the motion which the evil genius of the gentleman who sits for Bothwell led him to move? The hon. gentleman says he is able to take care of himself, either inside or outside of the House. We have no knowledge of the hon. gentleman's ability to take care of himself out of the House, but if he has to-day shown his ability to take care of himself in the House, I do not know that hon. members will subscribe to that statement. The second youngest member of the House might with advantage be appointed to supervise his parliamentary action, and see that he does not again propose such a motion. He has been complaining that the Returning Officer has been hooted through the streets of his native town, on account of his action in this case. He has told us that the Reform papers throughout Ontario, call himself the "member for Jim Stephens." One would think it was bad enough to have the papers publish this through the length and breadth of Ontario; but the hon. gentleman, not content with that—not at all satisfied with the celebrity which he has made for himself in his own Province, wishes to be as celebrated all over the Dominion, and to have Jim Stephens just as celebrated. He has, consequently, taken care to publish to the House these facts, and to make the country throughout the length and breadth of Canada, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, know that the hon. member is the "member for Jim Stephens," and that owing to Jim Stephens' action in connection with this matter, he cannot go through his own neighborhood without insult. If this is not getting himself into a mess, I do not know what is, and if that is proof of his ability to take care of himself in this House I do not want to take care of myself in the same way. Perhaps he has succeeded to the height of his expectations in one respect, for certainly he has drawn the attention of the House and of the public to himself to an extent which he could not secure in any other way. Of course it was something to be the man who had beaten the hon. David Mills. That was a mark of distinction, where he was known. The hon. David Mills was a man of importance in the House. Notwithstanding the sneering laughs of hon. gentlemen opposite, he held even almost as high a position in the estimation of the House as the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow), who is sneering at him; and he held almost as prominent a position as his successor is likely to hold, and it was a mark of distinction in Conservative ranks throughout Ontario to have beaten Mr. Mills, even in the way he did. And how did he do so? With a manufactured, a gerrymandered majority in the riding of 250 votes in his favor? Did he beat him with that, though he went to the polls with that majority at his back? No. After the riding had been specially cut, and carved, and contrived, to give the hon. gentleman a majority at the polls, he did not get it; but he had another engine at the back of that—the Returning Officer, appointed at his own nomination, I suppose, as he does not deny it. He appointed the Returning Officer himself for the purpose of returning him to Parliament, and this officer was more faithful to his duty than was the supposed majority of 250, which was not sufficient to elect the hon. gentleman. They went back on him. The 250 Conservatives felt the injustice of the act, of the cutting and carving of the riding, and the contrast between the two candidates, to such an extent as to give Mr. Mills, a noted clear Grit, a majority of seventeen over the champion, sent down from Brantford to run as their own candidate. So he had to fall back on the Returning Officer, who was more faithful to his trust than the 250, and the Returning Officer did his duty. What does the hon. gentleman say? "It was the duty of the Returning Officer to return the man having the majority of the votes;" and then, he says: "the Returning Officer, in this case, went further." Yes, he did. He returned the man having the minority of votes. He says this officer knew he might be sued for $500, and was liable to the costs of unseating him, if he were unduly returned; but the officer did his duty. Yes; he did the duty for which he was appointed—the duty of returning the hon. gentleman. And after this glorious victory, so gloriously achieved and having sated himself with the admiration of his friends in Western Ontario, he—the gentleman who sits for Bothwell—has taken the extreme and peculiar course of publishing this wonderful victory throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and making it apparent to the whole Dominion, how and why, and by the act of what particular individual he has obtained his seat in this House. I shall not go into the question of how the Judge has acted at all. I think that this was well attended to by my hon. friend from Huron. Moreover, it is beside the question now, since the Premier has decided that we have nothing to do with it. My hon. friend said he had been frequently asked to give these details to the press and had refused. My hon. friend from Huron said he did not do so, on account of his modesty. This is one way of putting it; but I think there is another reason for it. The hon. gentleman had another reason. He has accused the County Judge of the County Kent of malfeasance of office—of holding a caucus in his rooms to decide and determine, how to evade and get around the law, and of informing his opponent beforehand, what his decision would be. These are accusations of direct malfeasance. These are libellous statements for which he would be criminally liable, if he made them in a newspaper, and could not prove them; and he dare not make them in a newspaper, because he was afraid of his criminal liability if he could not prove the charges afterwards, and so he comes here, and shelters himself behind his temporary privilege as a member of this House.

Hon. MEMBERS. Order. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. gentleman should forbear using such language with respect to an hon. member of this House, as sheltering himself behind his privilege to evade a criminal action.

Mr. HAWKINS. I rise to another point of order; the hon. member alludes to me continually as the hon. gentleman who sits for Bothwell. Now, I am the member for Bothwell.

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. We do not know that; it is a question sub judice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to a question of order; and I think it is a point which it is desirable to settle. I submit that the hon. member for Bothwell has a perfect right—and will be sustained by this House in that right—to insist that no member, no person returned to this House, who approaches that Table and is permitted to take the oath, and is instructed by you from your place in the Chair, and you having instructed him to take his seat in this House, shall be referred to as a person who sits in this House but who is not a member of it. I submit whether it is competent for any member of this House to insult any other member of this House by any reference of that kind.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to reply to the point of order. I did not say that the hon. gentleman was not the member for Bothwell. I said he sits as the member for Bothwell; and that is a correct description of the fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. I should not have allowed the debate to proceed to such length, and I cannot allow it to proceed further in this strain. No offensive or insulting language should be used by any member towards any member of the House as long as that member has a seat in this House, and is a member for a constituency.

Mr. CASEY. Very well; in deference to your ruling, I will allude to the hon. gentleman carefully in future, as the member for Bothwell. I did not say that he was not the member for Bothwell. If anybody chose to draw that inference, it was not my fault. I also abandon the particular language which I was about to use, when first called to order, and I will put it in this way: that the hon. gentleman, instead of giving his charges to the newspapers, has stated them here on the floor of the House, and this is a mere statement of fact which cannot be challenged, where his privilege shelters him from any attack as to the statements which he may make. The hon. gentleman made a personal allusion to myself, which I will only touch upon in passing. He said that I contributed $5,000—as nearly as I can understand it—to secure his defeat in the Riding of Bothwell, and to secure Mr. Mills' election. I did not contribute it for very good reasons; first, because I could not spare $5,000, and second, because it was not needed, as the result shows. Mr. Mills was able, without the assistance of a dollar or a cent or a day's work from me, to beat the hon. member at the polls. I was not asked to contribute one dollar or one cent, and it was not necessary to give a day's assistance to Mr. Mills. I confess my willingness to have done anything in my power to assist Mr. Mills; and at the convention at which I was selected as the candidate for West Elgin, we pledged our support as individuals to secure Mr. Mills' election; and the result appeared to show that he was successful. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Mills had been selected as the candidate for West Elgin. But, Sir, Mr. Mills did not offer himself as a candidate for West Elgin. He never offered himself to the convention, and he declared his intention of sticking to the riding he had so long represented, and of fighting out the contest to the final result under the adverse circumstances under which it had to be fought out. I do not intend to refer any further to these matters. I am quite satisfied, if the hon. member for Bothwell is satisfied with the result of his motion to-night. I can assure him that I and most of my friends here—I can speak for those from Western Ontario, at all events—are perfectly well satisfied with having had the opportunity of ventilating this matter, and having had him ventilate the matter. We are satisfied that even his own statement of the facts should be published to the House at large and to the whole Dominion of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I do not know whether the hon. member for Bothwell wishes to close the debate, but if he does, I desire to say a word or two. I am glad indeed that the hon. First Minister has decided that the motion should be withdrawn. I am only sorry, Sir, that that decision was not arrived at before we had the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell. It is very much to be regretted that a man who holds such an important position as a County Court Judge holds, should have such gross reflections and imputations cast upon his conduct without being in a position to enter his defence. I do not wonder at—I am not going to say that I blame the member for Bothwell for defending the Returning Officer, but that might have been done without casting such aspersions upon the County Judge as he has cast upon the County Judge of Kent, and I must blame him and the hon. First Minister for allowing the discussion to take the range which it did take. Is it not too bad that a County Judge should be charged in this House and through the press of this country, with permitting a caucus to be held at his private residence to determine what the law was, in order that a decision might be arrived at whereby Mr. Mills should be returned for Bothwell, and not Mr. Hawkins? I am not saying whether that statement is true or is not true, but I am personally acquainted with the Judge—

Mr. HAWKINS. Repeat the charge.

Mr. ROSS. The charge was that a caucus was held at the Judge's residence to decide what the law was in this particular matter, and after it was decided what the law was that they proceeded to re-count the ballots. I say I am personally acquainted with the Judge, and I believe that he is utterly incapable of receiving a statement from either party, before assuming the Bench or acting in any judicial capacity. This is the most disagreeable form which this matter has taken before the House. I am aware that in previous charges against the Bench the hon. First Minister was among the first members in this House to rise in his place and say that the charge should not assume such a form as would discredit a Judge unless the Judge was put in a position to enter his own defence. I think that was fair; and I also remember—if the House will pardon me for alluding to previous debate—that in the discussion the other night with regard to Mr. Dewdney, the hon. First Minister was very careful to say that no aspersion should be cast on the character of an officer without his entering a vigorous defence for that officer. But we had no defence from the hon. First Minister of the County Judge of Kent, either directly or indirectly. I regret this exceedingly, because in these Election trials our political lives are, to a certain extent, in the hands of the County Court Judges. We have all an interest in seeing that their characters are maintained, and that no reflections are cast upon their judicial conduct which would lower their final decision in the estimation of the public. But the hon. gentleman was not content with making what I call a gross and unpardonable attack upon the judicial character of the Judge; he was not content with lauding the impartiality and the substantiality of the Returning Officer, but he must also include himself in some of the laudations presented to this House. "He was capable of taking care of himself," he said, "either inside or outside of Parliament." Who is questioning his capability? He was compelled, by a process which the hon. member for Huron characterizes as very peculiar, to put himself in a position whereby he could take care of himself inside of the House, and we who have met him on the public platforms throughout the country know that he can take care of himself outside of Parliament, as I believe every hon. member can. We are not infants—we are not under age—and we are all quite capable of taking care of ourselves, so that it was quite unnecessary for him to make that boast. But there was a boast which the hon. gentleman made which is somewhat open to question. He boasted of his career as a supporter of the party—an honorable career, he said—and the question was asked, from this side, which party he meant. I suppose hon. gentlemen are not aware that the hon. member's political career is not, perhaps, the most consistent one—or, shall I say, the most straightforward one?—using the word in a Parliamentary sense. The hon. gentleman was, in the earlier part of his career, a strong supporter of the Liberal party; but, as he said in his speech which he delivered in my riding on the 17th of September, 1874, he saw reason for changing his political course. In that speech, delivered in Glencoe, he said:

"He was one of those Reformers who, in 1867, went in for the new order of things—went in for carrying out the great objects of Confederation. They were aware that at that time they had the sanction of some of their leaders for the course that he had pursued. To say nothing with regard to the time at which such Reformers should have separated themselves from the Conservatives, with whom they then went into coalition for the purpose of carrying out Confederation; he would say that he believed the time had now come, and more especially in Ontario, when all such Reformers should withdraw themselves from the connection which they made at that time, and become again united with their old friends."

So the hon. gentleman withdrew himself from that coalition and united himself with his old friends. He then went on to refer to the Election Laws, and he used the following language in the same speech:—

"They found that the law which had been obtained mainly through the advocacy of the hon. Edward Blake in regard to elections was being administered with rigid severity. The sword was falling without fear, favor or affection in every quarter where corruption had been used, and only in this way could the country be purged from the corruption which had eaten into the core of our electoral system and had been fostered by the late Dominion Government.

As an old Reformer, who had voted with the Reform party up to 1867, and who, though not exactly in accord with them since that time, had been able to command their respect and confidence, he believed that it was incumbent upon him, as a man who knew none but Reform principles in the conduct of the affairs of the country, to again unite himself with the party from which he had been temporarily separated. This he should do heartily and thoroughly, and he believed that all old Reformers who were now in the Opposition ranks would come to the same conclusion if they considered the state of public affairs dispassionately. He had been present at the firing of the last gun when the political sun of Sir John Macdonald went down for ever in the winding up of the nefarious Pacific Scandal transaction. From a mistaken sense of honor, from a feeling that it was dishonorable to desert a man in an hour of misfortune, he had followed a falling man until the firing of the last gun in North Huron, when his sun went down for ever. He did not say that the Opposition would never again get into power, but if they did he believed it would be under the leadership of very different men from those who were at present seeking the suffrages of the people, and endeavoring to secure the reins of power in this Province mainly with a view to again secure possession of power in the larger sphere of the Dominion."

Now, I was present when the hon. gentleman made that speech, and I thought it was an exceedingly good speech. He made it with a great deal of unctious. We appreciated the motives from which he made that speech; we believed he was sincere, and he gave evidences of sincerity. He looked so sincere that I doubted if ever that look would leave his countenance. But we found the hon. gentleman as sincere in a year or two afterwards advocating the cause of the party which he said was connected with the nefarious Pacific Scandal. He pursued the same line in Provincial politics. He said he has been an honorable supporter of the Conservative party for the last fifteen years, and has labored and toiled in its support. But he also supported the Liberal party in Provincial politics. Let me read what the hon. gentleman said in regard to the enterprise of the Ontario Government. He spoke at London in the same year as follows:—

"But we know the Premier (Mr. Mowat) is not the man to cast dirt in their eyes—he will say that is true and right or he will not speak at all. He (Hawkins) could say that so long as the Government of the Province is conducted by such men as hon. Mr. Mowat, hon. Mr.

Pardee, and that young and rising statesman, hon. Mr. Fraser—there need be no fear but that the country will be ruled honestly and well."

I am delighted with these expressions of appreciation from the hon. gentleman. I do not think either of these parties need any certificate of character from him; but still, when we get such a strong certificate of character from an opponent, we must conclude that either he was not sincere then, or that he is not sincere now. Of course, being able to take care of himself, he thought he ought to take care of his friends, and he did it in a kindly way. Now, he is not returning to his first love, but clinging to the skirts of his second love; and now he boasts of his honorable career. I will not say anything about that; but will leave the House to judge of it. He speaks of fifteen years of toil and service. Well, let the hon. gentleman boast. The House knows that an hon. gentleman, who bestows such plaudits on one party at one time and reverses them at another time, is an hon. gentleman whose boasts have to be discounted; and when he assumes to take a position in this House, and boasts of that position, then we have a right to enquire as to the soundness of his political views. I feel a little sorry for the hon. gentleman to-night—not for his inconsistencies, but that being a young member of the House—and I know what it is to be a young member—he should have been "sat upon" by the Government—should have been literally snuffed out by the hon. First Minister, and should have had his resolution, not simply ordered to be withdrawn, but condemned and censured by the hon. leader of the Government. I do not want to be personal to the hon. gentleman, but we read that and young members of Parliament sometimes rush in where older members fear to tread. I hope he will take the lesson which he has got to-night—a lesson which I think will not be forgotten by the hon. gentleman. We, at any rate, will not allow it to be forgotten, and it may be necessary for us occasionally to remind him of it. The hon. gentleman certainly placed himself in a very uncomfortable position, when he forced the hon. leader of the Government to tell him that his motion must be withdrawn, that it was improper, and not such a motion as he could permit the hon. gentleman to have a vote upon.

Mr. McCALLUM. What I understood from the boast of the hon. member for Bothwell, was, that he did not care anything about the slanders that was circulated about himself, but was able to take care of himself. It is somewhat amusing to me to find hon. members opposite, taking the Judiciary under their protection. We remember how they slandered a Judge of the Bench, because, in giving a judgment, he referred to a certain "Big Push" letter. I myself, have been accused in this House of securing the appointment of a Returning Officer. I had nothing to do with it. I believe the Returning Officers of this country have done nothing but their duty. To show how hon. gentlemen opposite do business, I will state that at a local election in my county, at which there was an open nomination, the Returning Officer forgot himself so far as to come down from the stand and encourage the people to make a disturbance, in order to prevent me from speaking to the electors. He published a paper for five years to try to keep me out of Parliament; and these hon. gentlemen afterwards rewarded him by creating an office, and paying him $500 a year. I have not spoken of it in the House before, and I would not have done so now, but that hon. gentlemen opposite and their press are always making charges, without caring whether they are true or false. I venture to say that they cannot prove one tittle against the Returning Officers in this country. The hon. member for Bothwell, may feel perfectly safe from the sympathy from the hon. member for West Middlesex. The hon. gentleman says: "You were with us for a time, and you went away from us." Well, he could not say with them, and he left them like a great many others in this country.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the discussion closes I wish to say a word or two with reference to that which is, after all, the most important part of this discussion in its permanent form. It is, no doubt, of very great consequence to us that Returning Officers should do their duty. It is, no doubt, of great consequence to us that the Judges, in so far as they interfere with our elections, should also do their duty. But in so far as the conduct of this Returning Officer is concerned, it is supposed to be under investigation, a petition has been filed and is now pending, and I believe the hon. member for Bothwell has objected to the jurisdiction of the court or made some preliminary objection, which has prevented trial of the case and which, perhaps, has given us the pleasure of the hon. gentleman's presence in Parliament and the speech we have just heard. The question of the conduct of the Judge, or the action of the Judge, may or may not come under investigation in the course of this petition, but I wish to refer to the mode in which the circumstances under which the conduct of the Judge has been called in question this afternoon. There is no function of ours of higher importance or greater consequence to the public weal than the function that we hold of enquiring into or censuring, or dealing with the conduct of the Judiciary. Upon the character of the Judges rests, no doubt, to a large extent, that confidence in the masses of the population in their decisions, which is essential to the good administration of justice, and that their conduct should come in question in a political assemblage of this kind, and particularly in connection with the discharge of a judicial duty, closely concerned with an election, is a circumstance which shows how delicate our relations are to a Judge in this particular regard. I am not one of those who at all object to this great, this highest court of all, this grand inquest enquiring by proper means into the conduct of the Judges. As I have said, I believe that to be our highest, our most important and also our most delicate function. We have had occasions before now in which the conduct of Judges, of a higher rank, holding their offices by a tenure in one sense more secure than of a County Court Judge—we had occasion to consider what the procedure should be, what manner of crime or offence it should be that would be properly imputed to a Judge in order that his conduct might be here called in question. I have no quarrel with the statement of the hon. First Minister, in part, when he declared that a Judge's conduct ought not to be attacked, at any rate, with view to an enquiry such as this, unless the charge against him be one of serious impropriety—a charge, I think the hon. member said, which, if true, would warrant his dismissal from office. That is a just proposition to which I assent. Now, that being the nature of a charge which alone, under any circumstances, should form the foundation of an enquiry into the conduct of the Judge, we have also to consider what the proper steps should be before such enquiry is proposed in this House. The hon. Minister objected to the language of my hon. friend from Huron, who mentioned the course of a petition as being the sole proper one and said that applied only to the case of a Supreme Court Judge, who may be dismissed upon an address from both Houses. I do not think the observation was just. I do not know that a petition is more essential in one case than in the other. I believe it to be essential in all cases that that, or some procedure of that nature, should be adopted for this reason, that where you attack the conduct of a Judge, you ought at any rate to give him that measure of notice, which is involved in the statement of the accusation made, in plain terms, some little time at least before the House is asked to proceed upon it. What does the hon. gentleman put upon the paper? He puts a notice of motion for a Select Committee to enquire into the conduct of the Judge in refusing the application made on his behalf for a re-count of the votes. The Judge may have been right or may have been wrong in refusing the recount. I purposely abstain from discussing a single word of the particulars. It is not because he was wrong in law that we would enquire into this case any more than we would enquire into the case of an erroneous judgment in the discharge of any judicial function, for I differ from the hon. member for Bothwell in the opinion that we have the right any more to interfere with a Judge in the discharge of this judicial function than in the discharge of any other. We did not make him an officer of the House, but we imposed upon the County Judges of Ontario and of some other Provinces, and the Judges of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, certain functions in their judicial capacity; and I would have been one of the last to sustain the proposal that these functions should have been imposed on the Judges, had I dreamed for a moment it could ever be suggested that they could discharge those functions in any other than a judicial capacity, had I thought they could be considered in any other sense than as Judges discharging that particular function, under all the sacred obligations which appertain to a man that fills the Bench of Justice. In this matter we must hold, all the more because these are matters that do excite party feeling, that the Judge who is discharging this political function is discharging it in the same spirit, protected in the same manner, and subject to the same liabilities as in the discharge of any other judicial function. We could not complain of a Judge because he erred in his judgment, or misconstrued the law, or misapplied the facts. Why? What have we Courts of Appeal for? We have one Court of Appeal after another. You find the County Court Judges' decisions reversed in the Court of Appeal, those of the Superior Court reversed in the Court of Appeal, and those of the Appeal Court reversed in the Supreme Court which may find that the primary Judge is right, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council finding something else altogether. There is a constant error of judgment, because Judges, like other men, are fallible, and it is an error in judgment that should form the subject even of an observation here. Therefore, upon the face of the hon. gentleman's notice of motion which simply said: I want a Select Committee to enquire into the conduct of this Judge for refusing to grant me a re-count: we could find nothing, we could find no accusation against the Judge, we could not even find subject for an argument as to whether the Judge was right or wrong in refusing the re-count, or as to whether there had been a proper application made at the proper time, accompanied by the proper formalities, and what the reasons were. We had none of that even before us for an interesting legal argument. But that would not have been enough if we had had all that. What was the cause, then, which could properly bring this Judge's action under our consideration? It was a charge of impartiality, of malfeasance in office—not that the Judge erred, for all may err in judgment, but that he degraded his office, betrayed his trust, wilfully and knowingly did a wrong thing, perverted justice and judgment—that is the nature of a charge which could alone make it proper to have been brought here. Of that there is no allegation in the notice of motion; of that there was still less statement of fact, and it was not until in the course of his harangue, which was largely devoted to the vindication of the Returning Officer rather than to the attack upon the Judge, that the hon. member stated that there had been some caucus—I think he called it—in the office of the Judge, of political parties to decide—or the residence of the Judge, to decide what course should be taken. He then proceeded to state that it had been declared upon the street before hand, the Judge had declared precisely the course he was about to take in the court. Now, Sir, I maintain that these statements, which are the gravamen of the charge against the Judge which the hon. gentleman has brought forward, ought in common justice, in common decency, to have been stated beforehand, so that that officer might have had an opportunity of making his statement to the tribunal before which the charges were brought. What opportunity has he had? What opportunity is he now to have to make his statement and to clear his character? The hon. gentleman does not state his charge against him, he does not make it public until he springs it in this House in the evening, and in an hour afterwards the motion is to be disposed of, and it is to be disposed of out of this High Court without the Judge having an opportunity to say a word. I say then, Sir, that in whatever form you choose to observe the essentials of justice and of propriety, when we are engaged on this matter, the Judge should have an opportunity to give an answer to the charge. What is now to happen? It is now to happen that the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity of making his attack upon the Judge. He kept it bottled up, corked up and secreted in his breast until he put it forth in this Chamber, and to the whole of this country to-morrow, not giving the man he was about to accuse the slightest opportunity of making his answer. Now, Sir, Judges occupying a high position have thought, and I believe rightly, that it was proper they should answer such charges. I do not mean to say that a Judge would be bound to answer them. The hon. member will recollect very well the case of the petition presented to the House of Lords by Earl Russell, by Mr. Wasson, accusing Lord Chancellor Thesiger of gross misconduct, with reference to an Election petition, of a species of misconduct, which, although it was not in his judicial capacity to perform—for he had not yet achieved the Bench—would have been of a character to render it impossible to have continued there. The petition lay upon the Table for a time, and was to be brought up for the consideration of the House. In the meantime the learned Judge had had that opportunity, which this learned Judge is not able to have by this procedure. The petition had, of course, reached his cognizance, and he communicated with—I forget whether it was to a member of the Government or an ex-Chancellor—and made his statement of the case, which he would have communicated to the House of Peers, coincidentally with the first step taken upon the petition in the House. It was the general sense of the House that every statement made by Mr. Wasson had been so satisfactorily answered that Earl Russell was recommended by those of the greatest name, weight and authority, instead of moving the reception of the petition, to ask leave to withdraw it, and it was withdrawn, and the whole matter was thus set at rest. I state that as a case which shows to you the justice and propriety and decency of adopting a course different from the course which has been adopted on this occasion. Now, the essentials of practice are always the same. This is the course which we would have insisted upon had it been the case of a Superior Court Judge, removable only upon an address; this is the course which we should insist on as preliminary in the case of a County Court Judge. It is true that we cannot remove a County Court Judge ourselves, but we can, as the right hon. gentleman has said, address the Crown for his removal, or we could address the Crown to issue that preliminary enquiry which, under the Act of last Session, is a necessary pre requisite to further proceedings. We would not do either of those things without an investigation of our own. We would ascertain whether there was a prima facie case against the Judge, as in the case of a Judge long ago upon petition presented from the county of Ottawa in the first or second Session after Confederation. I think that we ought, considering that that would be the course which we would take if malfeasance had been charged against this judicial officer, to insist that our course of procedure should give him some opportunity to answer the charge, to state his case when it was being debated before this House, as we would give to any other judicial officer. It is for this reason, and for this reason alone, that I have spoken. I hold, as I have said, that we have a right, and it may be our bounden duty, to enquire; but I hold that exercising that right and discharging that duty we ought—and it is the least we owe to the Bench and to the administration of justice—to give to them what we give to the meanest criminal who appears before their bar, an opportunity of answering the charge, and not leave the Judge, as this Judge is unfortunately to be left, without that opportunity of answering here to us now the present charges which the hon. gentleman, by the course he has pursued, has made, in my opinion, most unwarrantably in point of form, whatever may be the truth of their substance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Although I have spoken already, perhaps the House will allow me to make a remark on the legal question. I have not much objection to what my hon. friend opposite has stated; in fact, we agree in the conclusion. But he rather misapprehended my argument about the necessity of a petition being required only with regard to Judges of the Superior Court. The hon. member for West Huron took the technical objection that as such proceedings against a Judge must be commenced by petition, my answer was, that that technical objection only applied to Judges of the Superior Court. Originally a Judge of the Superior Court could only be removed by an appeal or impeachment presented by the House of Commons to the House of Lords, and a trial by impeachment. As that was an inconvenient form and almost effete, the law was altered, and instead of impeachment by the Commons and trial by the House of Lords, the mode was substituted of an address by both Houses for the removal of a Judge. It was thought that, that being our substitution of the practice of impeachment, the petition should be prepared and presented setting forth all the essential matters with the same particularity as in criminal cases; and that there was, therefore, a technical reason why, with regard to Judges of the Superior Court, a petition must be presented. That was the extent of my argument. I want further to show that the same reason did not apply with respect to charges against County Court Judges, but the hon. gentleman goes further and states, that in the mode adopted by my hon. friend of making his statement in Parliament, and afterwards withdrawing his motion, the Judge has had no opportunity of answering the charge. Whether it commences by a statement made by a member in his place in Parliament or by a petition, the same result may occur. I know myself of two occasions on which, in consecutive Sessions, petitions were presented against a Judge of the Superior Court. I will not mention the name, because no results followed these petitions. It attacked the Judge's character and conduct and his fitness for the office, and the charges were broadly stated in that petition. As it was presented to the House it was read, it appeared in the minutes and it was in the newspapers. I took the ground that the petition was insufficient, as even if it were true it was so vague in its terms that no final action of dismissal could properly be found upon it. The Judge suffered all the same, because the attack was made. The next Session the petition was renewed and made more particular; but I took the same ground that, although it was more specific than the first petition, yet it was not specific enough, and did not amount to an impeachment or indictment. The petition was withdrawn, but still the Judge had to suffer from the fact that the petition was presented and the contents became known. So I take it that if the hon. gentleman makes a statement, whether against a judicial officer or a member of the Government, the result is the same whether it be made by written petition or verbal statement, the effect on the person whose character is assailed is precisely the same. The petition is printed, it is published and a copy by the practice must be served upon the Judge, who must have every opportunity of being heard on the petition. But the petition may be withdrawn before it has been served on the Judge. In the same way if a statement is made affecting the character or honor of a member of the Government or a Judge, although it be verbal, it goes to the public and is published in Hansard, and in either case I take it that if a member takes the responsibility of making a statement impeaching his conduct, Parliament will give time, but the effect on the Judge will be the same whether the charge is verbal or written. It is just as well that this discussion has taken place. I do not like to say positively without having looked the matter up, but I think, if I am not very much mistaken, that there has been a series of charges brought in the House of Commons against County Court Judges in England, and one especial charge was made against a Judge of eccentricity in his decisions without the slightest attack being made against his honesty or honor. This was a series of charges made, not by written petition, but by hon. members in the House, acting on their responsibility. I cannot speak positively as to the mode in which the charges were brought before the House, but the result was that the Government insisted upon the Judge resigning, although there was no charge against his honor or integrity.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose he was incompetent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He was eccentric.

Mr. BLAKE. So eccentric that he was mad, very probably.

Mr. HAWKINS. Before this matter is finally closed and dealt with, I wish to say a few words in reply to hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on it. I quite agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition as to the necessity of our holding a very high opinion of the position of the Bench in this country. I quite agree with him that the Judges should not for light causes, but only for very grave causes, be charged in the manner that I have charged this Judge. But I fancied, and I still imagine, that a Judge in his capacity as a Judge administering the law is one thing, and a Judge who is made a portion of the machinery by which the will of the people at the polls may be declared, is another thing. I believe that in this case the form of procedure may be wrong, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said; but, nevertheless, if that is all we disagree upon, if that is the only point at which I am at fault, it is one which may hereafter be rectified. The charges remain and they shall remain, and in this form or in some other form they will be pushed home to, I believe, convincing proof to the House and the country. But while the hon. gentleman is so careful in regard to the treatment and the measure of estimation we should have for the Judiciary, does he not think it was rather beneath him and his position as leader of the Opposition and of the great Reform party to go to Bowmanville, as he did last fall, and there make a savage onslaught on this Returning Officer, who was equally under the protection of the court?

Mr. BLAKE. I am responsible for what I said at Bowmanville.

Mr. HAWKINS. And again at the Reform Convention at Toronto he made reflections on this Returning Officer; and in this House, by a sort of side wind, not by a direct and open charge, he hinted that there was a member sitting in this House who was returned by a Returning Officer.

Mr. BLAKE. So there is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are 211 such members.

Mr. HAWKINS. While hon. gentlemen opposite have been so mealy-mouthed in this House, and have had so little to say against my right to sit here, the organs of the Reform party have teemed for months past, and are teeming to-day, with charges and statements which they dare not attempt to substantiate in this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE. Because the case is before the courts.

Mr. HAWKINS. If that be the reason, why should not the same measure of protection be extended to the Returning Officer? There is another matter in connection with the Bothwell Election which I forgot to mention. We know that in all portions of the country the Election of 1882 was held upon the rolls of 1881. I have an additional charge to make against this Judge. I charge that, in the only Conservative township in the county of Bothwell, the electors were forced to vote on the roll of 1880, while in every other township the electors voted on the last Revised Assessment Roll, the difference being seventy or eighty votes against the Conservative candidate. This also was in connection with that Election. Now, if we can conceive the immeasurable distance from the leader of the Opposition to the member for West Elgin, perhaps you will pardon me for devoting a few moments of my time to that gentleman. The celebrated French philosopher, Rochefoucault, says: "that some men have the gift of talking a great deal, and of saying very little." Now, I think, that this exactly fits the case of our friend, the hon. member for West Elgin, and when it goes out to the country to-morrow that in some sense an attempt was made to answer my presentment by the hon. member for West Elgin, I do imagine that the only effect will be a broad laugh throughout and over the whole face of the country. Why, his own side of the House have frequently made him the butt of their ridicule, owing to the fact that he is continually bobbing up and speaking on all manner of questions, altogether regardless of the amount of information which he may have in regard thereto. Now, while the hon. gentleman carefully denied that he had subscribed $5,000 to assist in defeating me—if it were possible—he carefully abstained from denying, that in consideration of Mr. Mills retiring from the nomination of West Elgin, the Reform Convention of West Elgin pledged themselves by resolution, to do all in their power to succeed in returning Mr. Mills for Bothwell; and he also carefully refrained from denying that he inserted my name in his address to the electors of West Elgin at the late election. The hon. gentleman speaks of his friends in the west; but who are the friends of the hon. gentleman in the west? Are they to be found in Kent, in North or South Essex, in North Middlesex, in East Middlesex, in Bothwell, in North Huron, or in what was formerly Centre Huron? In fact, are they to be found at all, except in three or four places, on the whole face of the western part of the Province of Ontario? Why, if there ever came back a battered, a defeated and a discredited party before the House, it is the party that the hon. gentleman from West Elgin claims to be composed of his friends. Let any person cast his eyes over the front benches of the Opposition, and see who are missing therefrom: where now is the Speaker of this House, who was chosen in 1874?

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). That is old.

Mr. HAWKINS. Where is Sir Richard Cartwright?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In Kingston.

Mr. HAWKINS. I fancy that he will remain there for a long time; and I fancy that my hon. friend from South Brant, who says, he is in Kingston, hopes sincerely from the bottom of his heart, that he may long remain there.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Oh, no.

Mr. HAWKINS. And where is David Mills, where is Sir Albert Smith; and where are the rest of them?

Mr. SPEAKER. When I permitted the hon. member for West Middlesex to read the long speech which he read to the House, I saw that it would lead to just what is now taking place, which is altogether foreign to the question before the House, and I hope that the hon. member will refrain from continuing the remarks in which he has just been indulging.

Mr. ROSS, (Middlesex). I hope that you will not punish the hon. member for Bothwell for my shortcomings, Mr. Speaker.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; but for your long-comings.

Mr. HAWKINS. Under that ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will only say this in reply to my hon. friend from West Middlesex, that the only genuine laugh which I have seen on his countenance during the last half hour, appeared when you announced that this portion of the discussion had better be dropped.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I laugh all the time.

Mr. HAWKINS. I have recently been in the hon. gentleman's county, and there has been a great reversal in the state of affairs in that county; and if we are correctly informed, the hon. gentleman has reason to feel very uneasy in respect to his own position.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). That is not true.

Mr. HAWKINS. With respect to the hon. member for West Huron, I can only say that his speech was made up entirely of a re-hash of articles that have constantly and continually been appearing in the organ of the late hon. member for Bothwell. I myself read three or four extracts from the Advertiser, and if I had continued to read, if I had read a dozen of them—I would have found that every word uttered by the hon. member for West Huron in respect to what happened in this and that polling division, and at the Returning Officer's house, would have been anticipated; and the House has witnessed only a re-hash, and a careful studying up of the charges which have been bandied back and forth for months and months past in the organ of the late hon. member for Bothwell. Now, I believe that the time of the House has been sufficiently taken up.

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAWKINS. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem very glad that this discussion should come to an end, but before I close I will only say this: it does seem extraordinary that a proposal to examine into the reasons why the plain letter and the plain enactment of the Election Law of 1874 and 1878 was disobeyed by one of the officers who were to carry it out, has evoked such feelings from the Opposition side of the House, as it has done to-night. I can only say before I sit down, I was charged with having formerly been a supporter of the Reform party. Now, Mr. Speaker, down to 1874 my record is well known on many a hard-fought field, and on many a hard-fought field I met many of these gentlemen who are now so anxious to stand up in their places and attack me to-night. In 1874, it is well known to the House and to the country, and to my worthy and respected leader, that I was for a few months not in accord with the party with respect to some questions; and it is further known, that for a few months, after Mr. Mowat had come down from the Bench, and we had formed a better opinion with regard to that Government, and before he began to do all those things which the country has recently condemned, I did say a few kind words about him; but have I not the right to range myself in company with the 40,000 Reformers, who went to the polls in 1878, and swept their own leaders out of office, together with the supporters and the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite? With respect to the pretended speech quoted from here to-night, by the hon. member for West Middlesex, I can only say, that it came from the same impure source—the same journal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAWKINS. Yes, "hear, hear." I can only say, that it came from this organ, the Advertiser, of London, which has pursued me in season and out of season during years past, and from which paper, searched during the last eight or nine years, it will be found that a great deal of space and time has been devoted to as—I think—the very unnecessary work of endeavoring to hound me down. It emanated from there, and was doctored there, and in fact, it is substantially untrue, and was never uttered by me in the shape presented. Now, I have done. I understand that the manner of procedure ought somewhat to be changed; and consequently if it is the desire of the Government and of the right hon. leader of the House, that this motion of mine should be withdrawn, I will withdraw it upon the request of the Government, because it appears that this is not the proper method of pursuing the end in view; but I pledge myself, by all legitimate means, when the time comes, that it shall be pursued, and in the manner in which it should be pursued; and I will then endeavor to prove substantially everything, that has been advanced and charged here by me, to-night. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to the withdrawal of the motion. Motion negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 10th April, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved, that as Messrs. Ross (Middlesex), Blake, Burpee (St. John), Laurier, Casgrain and Robertson (Shelburne), have declared that they decline to sit on the Select Committee on the paragraph of the Speech from the Throne read on Friday, 16th March, Messrs. Shakespeare, Bowell, Burns, Gigault, Landry and Allison be appointed Members of the same, and that the 78th Rule of this House be suspended for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERY LEASES AND LICENSES.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend "The Fisheries Act," by making better provision for the issue of fishery leases and licenses, and with respect to the use of nets and other apparatus for the capture of salmon, by providing for the definition of the tidal boundary of estuary fishing, by making more stringent provision with regard to the seizure and confiscation of materials, implements and appliances used in contravention of the Act; by giving the prosecutor (not being a fishery officer) a share of fine or forfeitures incurred by the offender prosecuted by him; and by making provision with respect to appeals from convictions under the Act, and for the protection of officers employed under the Act by extending to them the privileges and rights given for like purposes to officers of Her Majesty's Customs.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McLELAN. The necessity for this has arisen in consequence of the decision of the Supreme Court lately given. It has been found necessary that we should have the power to lease and issue licenses with respect to the time and mode of fishing, and to define the tidal boundary of estuary fishing. We also propose an alteration in respect to the fishery officer. In the Act at present he is entitled to a share of the fines and forfeitures. We propose to abolish that and allow him only his salary. We propose, also, to make provisions for the protection of the fishery officers. The original idea was to give them the same protection as to Customs officers; but as the Customs Bill has not passed we thought it best to strike that clause out.

Resolution reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 101) further to amend the Fisheries Act.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT, 1874.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend "The General Inspection Act, 1874," by adding the City of Winnipeg to the cities mentioned in the second section of the said Act; and further by providing that Flinty Fife wheat, when grown in the Province of Manitoba or the North-West Territories, may be inspected as higher than No. 2.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COSTIGAN. The necessity of this amendment arises from the fact that in section two of the Act of 1874, the city of Winnipeg is not named, and it is necessary it should come under that Act. The next clause is to alter the classification of wheat in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. It has been found that the kind of wheat known as the Flinty Fife wheat is the best quality of wheat for that country, and the best adapted to it. The millers give a higher price for it than for any other class of wheat grown in that country, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have offered to carry that kind of wheat, when intended for seed purposes, free of charge, everything indicating that in that country that class of wheat is held in the highest esteem. Under the Act as it is now we have the power of appointing inspectors, but they cannot rate the wheat higher than No. 2, and this amendment is simply to declare that wheat grown in Manitoba and the North-West may be classed higher than grade No. 2, and as high or as low as its quality may warrant.

Resolution reported.

Mr. COSTIGAN introduced Bill (No. 104) further to amend the General Inspection Act, 1874.

THE MILITIA OF CANADA.

Mr. CARON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 31) to consolidate and amend the laws affecting the Militia of Canada, said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I beg to make a few remarks concerning our Militia force, which, I hope, may be of some interest to hon. members. The Militia organization which now controls the Militia force of Canada has been in existence since 1868; but if we penetrate more deeply into the history of the Militia force of Canada it will be found that the organization, as a Militia organization, dates far back into the history of our country to a period as remote as 250 years ago. Sir, it is of some interest to those who have studied the history of our country to find that military events have been mixed up with the history of the people of our country more than with any other colony, and possibly more than any other country. A large proportion of our population can trace their descent from a military ancestry. Whether you study the history of the old French colonists of La Nouvelle France, under a different flag from the one which now presides over the destinies of this country, or whether you study the history of the English portion of our population, you will find that a great many of both nationalities can trace their descent from military men, and from men who took an active part in the military events of the country. Sir, it is a pleasure for me, in introducing a Bill to consolidate the old Militia Laws of Canada, and introducing the changes which are required from the great development of the country, to take a retrospect of our past military history, because I believe that we cannot too jealously cherish this part of our history, nor value too highly the records of the progress which has been made by our people, more especially as they are composed of two nationalities who at one time fought against each other, but who, ever since the English flag has waved over this country, have fought side by side the battles of their native land. Sir, I am happy to say that the record of the Militia force of Canada, is one of which any country might be proud, and one which must always form the most important part of the history of Canada. Mr. Speaker, in this material age of ours it may look somewhat sentimental for me to go far back in our history and recount the most important circumstances attending our military history. From 1636 to 1883, the Militia force of Canada have taken part in fourteen or fifteen wars, not speaking of Fenian raids, and some of these wars lasting for years. I can only refer to some of the most important engagements which have taken place on Canadian soil. Those who have studied our history will remember the ever memorable struggle between the French and Indians, which took place at Long Sault, in 1660, when Dollard, Desormeau, and a few Canadians, supported by fifty or sixty Indians, resisted the whole powers of the Iroquois nation, and fought a battle which lasted twenty-six days. On this occasion, they prevented the city of Montreal from being attacked by the Iroquois, who were meditating a blow upon the city of Montreal, which they hoped would annihilate the French colony in Canada. In all that period the military force, those who comprised the Militia of Canada, like to-day, whenever the call of duty was sounded were ready to go and fight their battles without counting numbers; and they succeeded in preventing, as I have just stated, what might have been at that time a death blow to the growing colony of France. Not only in the battle of Long Sault, but in the defence of Quebec in 1690, the Militia force of Canada and the military element came promptly to the front fighting the battles of the country, and doing the duty that should be imposed on a Militia force, which is a defensive force. The Militia of Canada to-day should be proud of having these records of the past, these precedents which must naturally and necessarily contribute to the maintenance of this military spirit which exists among our population, and which more than anything else contributes to make the Militia force what it is to-day. Then we had the war of Spanish succession, from 1701 to 1713; the campaign from 1744 to 1749, and the seven years' war, from 1754 to 1760, which terminated, as we all know, in the transfer of this colony from the French flag to the English flag; the American invasion in 1775-76—and I can say that when this war took place and the French population were called upon to fight the battles of their new flag and new allegiance, the people of Lower Canada fought side by side, with their friends and brothers belonging to other nationalities, the battles of their country, and they fought them as bravely as any other nationality. I am proud to say, that upon our records we are able to show victories of which, I think, any nationality and people would be proud of. If I have gone back into the history of the past, it is not merely for the purpose of bringing before the House this record of the battles and military achievements of the people of Canada, but it is for the purpose of showing that there is a reason why, at the present moment, there should exist a deeply-rooted love for military life, and that deep sense of military duty which has always been shown to prevail among the people of Canada. We have the evidence of gentlemen who have been in a position to appreciate that deep feeling which exists among our people, and they testify that there is a love of military life, a sense of duty, a determination to do what is required of a soldier in the way of discipline; and if that feeling exists so eminently among our people, it can only be traced back to that record of the past which has turned the people to that military life which I consider to be one of the most prominent features in the history of our own country. When all these wars, which I have had the honor to bring prominently before the House, were over, after the peace of 1815 was proclaimed, one would have imagined that the people would have forgotten all their military antecedents and given up all that which constitutes to-day so prominent a feature in the military history of Canada, and that they would have given up all idea of military life; but it is a very extraordinary fact, nevertheless it is still a fact, in the historical records of the country, that the people lost none of their military ardor, and on receiving scant notice when again called upon to organize a Militia force, the old spirit which had been fostered by our historians and by our poets, who had composed songs relating to past events in our military history, and which were sung in our hamlets, recording the military deeds of their forefathers, revived; and this training, these records, and this past history, were sufficient to maintain that military feeling which, at very short notice, enabled the people of Canada to constitute a Militia force which, to-day, is an honor to any country, whether a colony or a nation. I do not speak of the continental nations of Europe, which keep up large standing armies, under an entirely different system; but I speak of Canada, on this continent, as a colony, and of the nations on this continent, and I say our Militia force is a credit to us, and would be a credit to any nation on this continent. The other day, when I was preparing the consolidation of the Militia Acts, and was reading over the proof sheets of a Bill, a pensioner called at my Department to draw his pension. His papers were produced, and the record of his military achievements was laid before me, and it really constituted a most interesting page of history. The man's name was Roderique, and, no doubt, it was the old Spanish name which is met with to-day in several of our French parishes. This man told me he had fought for Canada from 1812 to 1815; in 1817 he fought on Red River. From 1820 to 1830 he was fighting in Bermuda and the West Indies. He was in the Mexican war of 1847. There was a tinge of sadness about him when he told me that in 1863 he had been rejected when he offered his services to the American people to fight the battle of the North against secession. He told me, they refused me—parce que l'on m'a trouvé trop vieux—in consequence of his advanced age; and having fought in all these battles, he considered that the American people had done him an injustice in not accepting him as one of the warriors who was prepared to fight the battles of the country. This veteran who told me what he had done is only one of a class which, during those years which I have cited, existed in this country, as an element in it, and, as is perfectly well known, these were men who were fond of a military life, and ever ready to fight battles in what they considered to be a just cause. They were always prepared to engage in military services; and I believe that to-day the same spirit still lives among the people of Canada. On the 31st of March, 1868, when my illustrious predecessor, Sir George E. Cartier, that statesman whom we have always deeply regretted, and whose departure from amongst us can never be too warmly deplored, introduced his Militia Bill, he stated—and I read his words from the speech which he then delivered:

“I consider the passing of this measure necessary to complete Confederation. I have already stated on a former occasion that we have in this Confederation the three elements necessary to constitute a nation. We have the peasant, the territory, and the maritime element, and when those three elements of national strength and power have been attained, there is still one other element to crown the whole edifice, and that is the military element.”

He stated that no nation can pretend to be a nation until it has attained the military element, or power of defence; and he knew his country as well as any statesman who has been called upon to introduce an important measure in any Legislative Assembly. I do not desire to secure a military organization for any aggressive purpose; our ambition is to quietly and peacefully work out the field before us at home, since our Constitution permits us to extend our frontiers from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Sir George Cartier, in introducing his Bill, called attention to the important fact, that during the then past few years several new measures affecting the Militia had been proposed without meeting with success; but nevertheless public opinion was favorable to the passage of such a measure as he proposed. He stated that the great difficulty experienced was to establish, with a small sum, a system which in other countries had always been very expensive. In Sir George Cartier's time, as now, fortunately, we did not require a force for any aggressive purpose, or any other purpose, save securing the safety of the person, protecting property, and defending ourselves against any attack which might, as previously, give us occasion to resist and repel any disorganized, or small organized band crossing the frontier, as was attempted in 1865, but without success. But outside of this, as Sir George Cartier stated, it was indispensable for every nation to have some kind of organization, which might at any time be used to help the Government in enforcing the laws, and resisting disorder at home. Between 1815 and 1868 nothing had been done in Canada, as far as forming or perfecting a military organization was concerned. The same old spirit existed, but there was no organization, no regularly organized body of men existed, save the old Militia, which, on St. Peter's Day, used to meet to count heads, when the captain called out his men, and made his returns to the Government; but with this exception, if you look into the matter as I have had occasion to do, in the records of the Militia Department, you will find that there was no organization; and in 1868, Sir George Cartier had to create almost everything. He had to find men, to educate officers, and to equip them all; and, moreover, as we all know, he had to fight against some opposition which then existed to the scheme. It is wonderful how rapidly the old military spirit of our people came to the rescue of the then hon. Minister of Militia, who was trying to organize a force, and no sooner were military schools organized than they were filled. People from the country, from the great commercial centres, and from every part of the country, flocked into them. The result was that in a few short years, as those who then went through these schools are well aware, we had officers perfectly competent to take in hand the command of companies or regiments, and to perform all the duties of military men. At that time the military schools were organized; and shortly afterwards, as we know, a movement was organized among some of our people, owing to which a large number of our French-Canadian friends joined the Pontifical army, and went off to Italy to fight a foreign battle. They there acquired a knowledge of military life and experience, which once obtained can never be forgotten; and, in addition to this, we saw 50,000 Canadians enter the American army to fight the battles of the North against the South. From these indications we may see that, although for years and years the people of Canada have not been called upon to take any prominent part in military matters, still the old military feeling existed, and they promptly availed themselves of the first opportunity which presented itself, to go abroad and acquire that military experience which I believe has permeated the population of Canada, and which is of so great advantage to us. Shortly after the Bill of Sir George Cartier was introduced—something like two years afterwards—the two batteries, "A" and "B," were organized. The education and instruction which is given in these batteries is exactly the education and instruction which is acquired in the very best training schools of that class in England; and I may here take the opportunity, as Minister of Militia, of saying how much we were indebted to the Imperial Government for sending out to us men who started our organization, so far as these batteries were concerned. They were the men who had the experience, which was acquired in the permanent, continuous service, which only can exist in a country like England, or other countries where a permanent army is kept up. I can say to these gentlemen that we are much indebted to them for the instruction they gave to us; and when the leave of absence of these officers had expired we were able to have them replaced by Canadian officers—young men who had enjoyed the advantage of having been trained by these officers who knew their business, and who certainly have succeeded remarkably well in taking the places of those from whom they received their instruction. The result of this instruction is that today we have at the head of our batteries Canadian officers—

Mr. CARON.

I do not say Canadians only in the sense of their belonging to this country, but men who have been educated in Canada by these officers of the Imperial Service. Outside these batteries enough men have been trained, who are now living in the different Provinces of the Dominion, that in case of need they could be looked upon with confidence as the best possible men to organize a force, or to act as instructors in organizing any force which might be required in case of necessity. Some years after, under a different Administration, the Royal Military College was established in Kingston. It may be a question whether it was premature to establish this college or not; but I say that, in my view, this College, organized as it is, and producing the results which it is producing, ought to be looked upon as a permanent institution in the country, and one which has already contributed much advantage to our Militia force. We have, moreover, established in the Dominion a cartridge factory for small-arm ammunition. This, again, I look upon as a step in the right direction. Previous to its establishment the Dominion was called upon to import large quantities of ammunition. The interest on the money which was expended on this ammunition, as it accumulated during a number of years, represented a very large amount of capital; and besides, as is well known, the ammunition which was kept for so long a period was not just as good as it might be expected to be if it were manufactured within a short time, and not kept in store for a long period. We have in this factory an establishment which, if it were called upon to work to its fullest extent, could manufacture any quantity of ammunition within the shortest possible period of time. I am proud to say that in the establishment of that factory, it was the privilege of the Minister of Militia of that time to send over to England a Canadian officer who was trained at Woolwich, who passed the examination required for a person taking charge of a factory of that kind, and that that officer is now at the head of the cartridge factory in Quebec. That shows that we have been taking advantage of the facilities for military education to be obtained for our own people in England, and that whenever the chance has presented itself to give Canadians positions of trust and importance we have invariably taken advantage of those opportunities. As I have already stated, when Sir George Cartier introduced his measure, everything had to be created. There was nothing which had existed in the way of a permanent organization up to that time. Let us look back these fifteen years past, and see what progress we have made. Let us see what has been accomplished by the liberality of the different Parliaments of Canada, and the feeling which exists amongst the large proportion of our people, that this military force is not only a necessity but an advantage to us. When Sir George Cartier introduced his Bill, we were absolutely dependent upon a foreign market for everything which was used by the Militia force; but today we are not altogether dependent upon other countries for these supplies. Through the policy which has introduced into this country so many manufacturing establishments we have been able to provide our militiamen from our own market with most of the articles required in the different branches of the Department. We have been able to substitute Canadian made blankets for the blankets which we formerly imported from England. We have been able to provide for the Military Schools, for the Royal Military College, and for the different batteries, the shirting, sheeting, and everything required in the way of linen, from our own manufacturers. All the harness received in the different batteries, all the new saddlery, has been provided by our own manufacturers. We have provided in the same way the head-dresses of the soldiers, except some of the more expensive ones, which could not be manufactured in Canada except at a much greater cost than we could obtain them abroad for. We have also been able to obtain in Canada the rifle butts, which used to be imported. Most of the new gun carriages are manufactured in Canada. I should like to be able to add that we have also been able to manufacture our own guns; but although we have proved the possibility of manufacturing heavy ordnance in Canada, the attempt so far, for various reasons, has not been of any practical value. Now, Sir, comparing our position to-day with our position in 1868, I can say that we have a staff at headquarters, and in the twelve military districts, that any Department might well be proud of. We have men who have been devoting the best years of their life to the service of their country, in a profession which, in a country like ours, is not a money-making profession. They have given up their different occupations and pursuits in life in order to pursue their military profession in a professional way, and the result is that we have a staff which would be a credit to any country and to any organization. These gentlemen have been improving their knowledge of military matters in every way. When I visited the different districts, and went into the offices of the deputy-adjutants-general, and into the headquarters of the different batteries, I was surprised and glad to see that they had brought from England and the continent, at their own expense, the best reviews and the best books that could be collected on military matters. Well, Sir, as their pay is not very large, I think the zeal which they display in procuring for themselves that military knowledge which would become of great value to their country in time of difficulty, deserves to be commended; and I am glad to be able to say so here to-day. Before passing on to explain the changes which are intended to be made by this Bill, I wish to say that our stores, as the returns to this House have shown, are under the control of most competent men. Many of our storekeepers are men who belonged to the British army, and who came to this country with a complete knowledge and training. Under their valuable tuition, we have been able to train men, selected from among young Canadian militiamen, to such a state of efficiency that they are now competent to take the place of their instructors. Now, it may be said that, since 1868, we have had no opportunity of testing the efficiency of our Militia force. Let me say that, since 1868, we have had the Red River troubles, the Fenian troubles, workingmen's riots, and various other troubles which imposed upon the Government the necessity of putting that force to the test. With regard to the Red River expedition, let me cite the opinion of the leading General of England to-day. When Lord Wolseley, then Colonel Wolseley, was called upon to take the command of the Militia force, organized for the purpose of going to the Red River, he stated that he would not wish for a better army than he had on that occasion. This is a testimony that we may all be proud of, apart from our own prejudice in favor of our own people. The Canadian Militia force may also feel proud when a man like Lord Wolseley is able to state that he could not wish for a better army than an army of Canadians. I wish to save hon. members any trouble in going over the old law as it existed, and as it will exist, under the new Bill. All the changes are in italics so that hon. members will find it easy to distinguish them. As its title indicates, the Bill is a consolidation of all the existing laws relating to the Militia. It is also a Bill providing, in addition, for changes rendered necessary by the altered condition of our forces. It will be seen that sub-section six has been amended so as to provide for only two divisions of Militia—active and reserve Militia. This will simplify considerably the distinctions under the old existing law. At present the Militia will comprise the two great divisions of active and reserve Militia, land force, and active and reserve Militia and marine force. Section seven, of the existing law, provides for the consolidation of the forces in the different Provinces.

When Confederation took place each Province had its own Militia organizations, and when the Bill of 1868 was passed, it became necessary to introduce a clause whereby these different organizations would not be completely destroyed, but would be gradually brought under the new system contemplated by that Bill. When the Bill of 1868 was passed it became necessary to introduce a clause whereby these different organizations would not be completely destroyed, but be brought gradually under the new system provided in section seven of the Bill for the consolidation of the forces of the different Provinces; but now, all being under the one control of the Dominion, the section has been amended so as to provide for the continuance of the existing force while striking out the provision with regard to reenrolment which is no longer required. Sections ten and eleven, which also provided for the transition stage at Confederation are not now required, and have been dropped; consequently the sections up to twenty-two have been renumbered. Number one clause of section twenty-one provides for the organization, in addition to the ordinary active Militia force, of a troop of cavalry, three batteries of artillery (of which two shall be the "A" and "B" Batteries, now embodied), and three companies of infantry. This is the most important feature of the Bill. I should like to read to the House, and comment as briefly as possible upon these changes which are really indispensable, provided it be conceded that Canada wishes to keep up a Militia force. Section 21 provides for the organization of three infantry schools, also for a troop of cavalry being organized with very little cost to the country. This troop it is intended to divide between Quebec and Kingston, and I shall explain why it is intended to organize this troop in the way provided by this Bill. In Quebec, as is well known, we have "A" Battery; in Kingston, "B" Battery, which is also used for the training of the cadets of the Royal Military College, and of any officer who wishes to pass an examination for the purpose of giving instructions, whether in infantry or artillery, in the various branches of the service taught in that school of instruction. The intention is to divide a troop of thirty-two horses between Quebec and Kingston, attaching half to "B" and half to "A" Battery. In providing for that addition to the strength of the batteries, it is intended, at a very small cost, to provide for a school of instruction, which I consider to be of the greatest possible importance so far as our Militia affairs are concerned. The late events in Egypt have shown us to what good purpose the mounted infantry were put. It is impossible to suppose that there can be any efficiency in any force which requires a mounted officer to command it unless that mounted officer be able to command his horse as well. It is absolutely necessary that our officers, before they can get promotion, should be taught how to ride, so that in case of emergency they can take the position of a mounted officer. Clause twenty-one says:

"It being necessary in consequence of the withdrawal of Imperial Regular troops, to provide for the care and protection of forts, magazines, armaments, warlike stores and such like service, also to secure the establishment of Schools of Military instruction in connection with corps enlisted for continuous service, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to raise, station, and maintain, in addition to the ordinary Active Militia Force, one troop of cavalry, three batteries of artillery, (of which two shall be the "A" and "B" Batteries of Artillery now embodied), and not more than three companies of infantry, the whole strength of which several Corps shall not exceed seven hundred and fifty men. The officers shall be appointed during pleasure, and the men shall be enlisted under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, for periods of three years, continuous service."

According to the rules and regulations of the Department of Militia no officer in any infantry battalion can get his commission unless he has passed a qualifying examination and has a certificate thereof. Since the disappearance of the military schools, organized under the regime of Sir George E. Cartier, we have really had no schools of instruction except "A" and "B" Batteries which have rendered such valu-ableservices to the country—noschools of instruction wherein military officers could follow a course, take a certificate and get their commission. Mr. Speaker, you know, as a military man, that the most important feature of a military organization is to have thoroughly instructed officers and non-commissioned officers. Such officers properly trained, and thoroughly educated, can, within a very short time, take the raw material and organize an effective force that can do good service in time of need. The most important feature in the Bill relating to these infantry schools is that providing for the means of giving a military education and training to infantry officers who intend to make a profession of the military life. It is intended to give in these schools all the instruction which artillery officers in their branch of the service, acquire in the schools of instruction at Quebec and Kingston. It is spending money uselessly to have a Militia force in Canada unless you have a properly trained, drilled and educated lot of officers and non-commissioned officers. If this Bill becomes law it is the intention of the Department not to give a commission, nor to allow non-commissioned officers to be promoted from the ranks, until they have a certificate to show that they have gone through this infantry school, and are qualified to perform the duties of the position which they assume in the Militia force. I believe it is money well spent to organize the force on a proper footing. We see, to-day, what great results have followed the establishment of "A" and "B" Batteries; we see scattered all over the Dominion men who, having been but a short time in those schools, possess a very competent military knowledge, as far as artillery is concerned; and I do not hesitate to say that some of these men who have been three or four years, or perhaps six or seven years, in those batteries, are as well trained as any regular you can find in the British Army. The intention is to provide an instruction in these schools which will render the same service to the infantry that "A" and "B" Batteries give to those who attend them in artillery matters.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us where he intends to open those schools?

Mr. CARON. I can say that there will be a school of infantry for the Maritime Provinces. There may be one for the great Province of Ontario, but I am not quite sure that it will be located in the hon. gentleman's county; and there may be one for the Province of Quebec.

Mr. ROSS. That is near enough.

Mr. CARON. A sub-section has been added to section twenty-nine, providing for a Quartermaster-General at headquarters, who shall have the rank of Colonel in the Militia. To those who have looked into the question, I need not point out the importance of such an officer in a force organized as our force is. He may be appointed or not, but we make a provision for the appointment. As I do not wish to trouble the House very often by asking for amendments to the Bill, a sub-section has also been added to section thirty, to provide that two or more districts may be amalgamated for administrative purposes, and only one Deputy Adjutant-General to be appointed for the districts so amalgamated. Section thirty-seven has been amended so as to strike out the original clause exempting Militia officers from taxation. The reason why this change has been made is because I consider that clause altogether ultra vires. This Parliament has no power to interfere with the taxation of any individual, which subject is left altogether within the jurisdiction of the Provinces, and to the municipalities in which members of the force may live. I thought it useless to allow that clause to remain upon the Statute-book, and, consequently, I ask the House to strike it out. Sections forty-five and forty-seven have been amended, so that officers and non-commissioned officers shall receive drill pay according to rank, instead of the pay which they receive to-day as provided by the existing law. Also, that when corps are ordered to assemble in camps of exercise for drill they will be provided with rations and shelter in addition to their drill pay. I must say, Mr. Speaker, and all those who have belonged to a Militia force know it, that shelter and provisions are furnished according to the practice of the last fifteen years. Such has always been provided, as I have said; but on looking over the Statute I found no clause which really made it a part of the existing system of law which controls the Militia organization, and I thought, on consolidating and amending the law, I would introduce this clause, so as to carry out legally what has been done for the last fifteen years. The remaining changes relate to discipline. Section sixty-four has been amended by striking out the words "and also while wearing the uniform of ... corps." A sub-section, each taken from the Imperial Army Act, has been added to sections seventy-three and eighty-three, to provide for the punishment of persons summoned as witnesses who refuse to give evidence before courts-martial, and to provide for the punishment of persons who entice militiamen to desert. As far as this clause is concerned, it will be found that it transfers to a civil tribunal, where a court martial may have been holding its sittings, the case which came before the court-martial; and if the civic tribunal considers that the act complained of is a contempt, and should be punished, this clause leaves the ordinary tribunal to deal with the case and not with the court-martial called for the purpose of judging the military offence. Section seventy-five has been amended so as to provide for the punishment of persons who claim pay for annual drill in more than one corps. We find there are instances where men of one corps have drawn pay for drill from another corps, and we considered it was necessary to change the law so as to be able to meet this irregularity in the service. I have now submitted to the House all the changes contemplated by the Bill. I believe this is a Bill which will be acceptable to the country, and to those who take an interest in the Militia force. It has been my pleasure to meet several of those gentlemen, and I have always endeavored to elicit their views upon the most important points relating to the organization, as it applies to the people of Canada, and from all I have been able to ascertain from those hon. gentlemen who have read the Bill, it is looked upon as one which will be acceptable. I am sorry to have occupied the attention of the House for so long a time. I may say, however, that it is not often I trouble the House, and so I hope it may be forgiven, especially when it is remembered that I take not only the interest which my Department exacts from me as Minister, but also a personal interest in the force, having for some time, at a period when that force was supposed to be likely to be called upon for active service, taken a great deal of interest in it. I have endeavored, to the best of my ability, and after obtaining all the information within my reach, to frame a measure which I believe will be to the advantage of Canada and to the Militia force.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House very long. I am sure hon. members must feel under great obligation, as I do, to the hon. Minister of Militia for the very interesting history he has given of the Militia force for the last twenty five or thirty years, or perhaps even longer. I quite agree with what he said in respect to the Militia; that it is a very valuable force, composed of men who are equal to the Militia force of any country. I am quite sure if the force was called upon to turn out in the defence of the country, it would give as good an account of itself as the force of any other country. I believe, not only the Militia would turn out in the defence of Canada, but every man, not only in this House, but in the country, if such was necessary for the general defence. So we are pretty much on the same footing, but the Militia as a body, composed of paid men, would be obliged to turn out in the first instance. If the House is prepared at the present time to pass this Bill, I, as having occupied the position of Minister of Militia and Defence during three or four years, would be the last one to object to it, because I would like to see the Militia system made as perfect as possible. But it seems to me that up to the time the Military College was established, the Minister of Militia at that time would have had very good reason to have brought down such a Bill, and provided for the schools provided for in this Bill; but I consider that day is past, and that the amount of money now spent for the Military College, where the young men of the country are being instructed in military branches, will in future time provide all the trained men who will be required in the Dominion. We now spend $59,000, according to the Estimates, for the Military College, and if we are to establish, under this Bill, what may be called a standing army—for it is nothing more nor less than that—the expenditure involved will be from $250,000 to $300,000. I see no objection to it. The hon. Minister has not told the House what it will cost, but it cannot be less than the amount I have stated, when it is remembered that two batteries cost from $125,000 to $128,000, and we have never had a strength of over 150 men in either "A" or "B" Battery, and at present "A" Battery is much weaker. The hon. Minister has told us that was the only important change. I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that is the most important change. But there is another clause to which he has referred which will add a further expense to the country, in the shape of fixed expenditure to the amount of $2,300 as I observe by the Estimates. I do not desire to cut down the expenditure which may be really necessary, but the House should understand that this amount will be for a fixed salary. I do not know who performs all the duties of a Quartermaster General, but there should be somebody, and it should not be necessary to increase the staff by another official at headquarters at an expense of $2,000. There is another matter to which the hon. Minister has referred, and that is the equipment and clothing of the men. The hon. Minister has told us that, of course that money will be expended in the country. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has not followed out that rule heretofore. I have noticed that whenever an hon. member has risen in the House and said that Canada must be for the Canadians, he has been applauded from one end of the House to the other. What do hon. gentlemen find in the expenditure for last year? When I was at the head of the Department Canada was for the Canadians, and we expended the amount voted for clothing in Canada. Was that done last year? No. As the Public Accounts show, $53,000 were expended in England for Militia clothing. Is that keeping Canada for the Canadians? It seems to me it does not look like it in the Public Accounts. I do not pretend to say that all we require in the shape of clothing could be as well manufactured in this country as in England; and this House could not have objected in our time, if we imported all this clothing from England, because we never pretended to restrict anybody importing when it was of advantage to the individual, or to the country, to import; but as the Government have laid down the policy of Protection, and that Canada must be for the Canadians, I think that they ought to restrict the expenditure, not only of the Militia Department, but of all the other Departments, as far as they can, to the Dominion of Canada. It is not necessary for me to occupy the time of the House further. This Bill, I suppose, will go through the second reading, and when it is considered clause by clause, we will try to scrutinize it as far as we can; and if it is to be passed by the House, we will endeavor to make it as perfect as possible; but I must give the country to understand that the Government of the day and the hon. Minister of Militia must take the responsibility of increasing the expenditure in connection with the organization of the Militia.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am sure that the House listened with great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Minister of Militia, and especially those who, like myself, have spent a great deal of time, and a little money, and have performed a great deal of hard work in keeping up the force under existing circumstances. I think that the best evidence of the hon. gentleman's statement that Canada is—I will not say a military people, because I believe a people may be military without being warlike, a warlike people, is to be found in the fact that the Militia force exists at all under present circumstances. Now, the only part of the hon. gentleman's speech with which I am not cordially inclined to agree, was the remark he made of a somewhat apologetic nature, with regard to the increased expenditure; and I observe that when any one rises to speak in this House, he must always bring in an apology in this relation. The hon. Minister of Finance, when he announced to the House, a few days ago, a slight increase—some $10,000—in the Militia Estimates, in one particular, thought it necessary to apologize for being obliged to make that statement. Now it is very poor encouragement to many hon. gentlemen who have worked as many hon. members of the House have labored, and who are still connected actively in this relation, that the Militia force, and everything connected with it, is to be treated in that sort of spirit; and I think it ill-becomes the late Minister of Militia to raise the question in the way in which he did with regard to the possible appointment of a staff officer whose services certainly would be required if any serious contingency arose. Now, we always got quite enough of one thing: pleasant speeches, and complimentary remarks; but the people in this country seem to think, and I am sorry to say that too many representatives in this House take the same view, that the force can exist without a reasonable expenditure; and no reasonable effort is made to increase its efficiency without this sort of apology being deemed necessary, on the ground of seeming extravagance. I think that the easiest way of disposing of this matter, is to call the attention of the House and the hon. Minister of Militia to the fact that no people pretending to have anything like a military organization pay as little for a military force as do the people of Canada; I think that at Confederation there was a sort of understanding—that I am unable to find evidence of it, but I believe it is admitted that it did exist—that this country on receiving the remainder of the ordnance lands—this being part of the question—were to expend for a certain number of years, not less than $1,000,000 annually in organizing and maintaining an active force; and what is that to the population of the country? I think, if my arithmetic is correct, that it is something like 25 cts. a head; and yet you and the House know, as a matter of fact, that for a very large portion of the time, during the last ten years at any rate, our Militia force has not cost the country much more than three-quarters of that sum, and sometimes very little more than $500,000. Many gentlemen are very fond of referring to our neighbors on the other side of the line; and we may at times reasonably do so, not as a principle—because we have very little in common—but with regard to practical points, respecting which we can frequently take lessons from them. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will be surprised to know the amount of money which the United States spend annually in their military expenditure, leaving altogether out of consideration the navy. I find that, from 1872 to 1882, during these ten years, when all the expenditure of the war was over, the American people, through the Federal Government, spent on an average about $40,000,000 a year on their army alone. Well, that, at a very easy calculation, is something like $1 a head, according to their average population during these ten years; and, in addition, it is just as well that we should know that a number of individual States also spent sums of money, large according to their population, which was very nearly equal to what we spend for the whole Dominion of Canada; and if anybody will take the trouble of looking into the reports of the Adjutants-General of the different States, I think he will be somewhat surprised to find that several States in the Union have been going steadily on, until they have a force equipped and armed—I cannot say equal to ours—but very little difference is to be perceived. They have men properly enrolled, and under conditions quite as severe as ours; and the term of service is seven years in several of the States. The men are under the same terms of service that we have, though, of course, under different titles; they get a certain amount of pay. And what will most clearly show the interest which they take in the matter is this: The State of New York spent, in 1880, which is the last return I can find, no less than a trifle under $500,000 on the State Militia alone—nearly as much as we spend on the whole of the Militia of the Dominion of Canada—$481,679. The State of Massachusetts spent $172,000, and Pennsylvania spent $300,000; so it is evident from this, if any practical lesson is to be learned from the manner in which our neighbors across the line carry on their affairs of Government in this relation, that if they think it necessary, in addition to a standing army costing forty times as much as our Militia costs us, to spend very nearly as much per head as we do on our force on their State Militia alone, nobody can reasonably find fault with the expenditure which we make on our Militia, intended for the service of the whole Dominion. One point of some importance was referred to by the hon. Minister of Militia, and by his predecessor in office: the establishment of the Military College. I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Militia, that it having been established, it would be a great pity to do away with it; but I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, whether he cannot devise some scheme by which it can be made of some practical use to the active force; for at the present moment it simply robs the active force of money which otherwise might be spent upon it. What we want is, not a highly trained staff of officers, but regimental officers, and these the Military College does not supply, and it never will do so as long as it lasts. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia to consider whether he cannot devise some plan, whereby the talent and the high attainments employed in carrying on this college could be utilized more practically; could there not be some course of instruction appointed which would be useful to officers in the active force? By this two great ends would be gained: First, instruction, which is so much required, would be given; and, second, the college would be brought in harmony with the feelings of the active force, which is at present not the case. Several other regulations might be considered by which it would be brought into harmony with the force, and by which those who belong to it would be made to feel that its existence was in the interest of the country. The result now is, that many persons obtain there a most excellent education. I suppose that it is the best school perhaps on the continent, and I am sure that if I had a son to educate I would send him there; but the case now is that so much money is being taken from the active force, to secure a few highly trained staff officers whom we can always get, but not what we really require, trained regimental officers, to obtain whom we have to go to a considerable additional expenditure at the present time. Now, with regard to this particular Bill, there are two or three matters which, I suppose, the hon. Minister of Militia called amendments to which I wish to call his attention, because I think he has inadvertently made one or two mistakes. If he will look at the eighth and ninth clauses I think he will notice that there is considerable doubt as to whether the six months' notice which is required runs concurrently with the period of service, or is intended to be given at the time of the expiration of that period. I know that at present a good deal of doubt exists among many officers and men on this point, and I notice that these doubts are not removed by the Bill before the House. There is another matter to which the hon. gentleman referred in the latter part of his remarks, and which I hope he will reconsider so as to allow the sixty-fourth clause to stand in its original form. He has struck out the only portion of the Bill which gave authority to officers for the control of men who are in uniform except when on drill or parade. At present if men appear in uniform, which they have a perfect right to do, if they are not obeying orders we have the right to punish them; but with the omission of those lines which the hon. Minister of Militia has struck out, there will be no possible way left for reaching them. I would go even further than the original clause, and would add a line somewhat to this effect: "that the men shall be subject to the Queen's regulations at all times when wearing the uniform of their corps." This is a point upon which there should be no doubt, and I think if the hon. Minister will consider it carefully he will conclude that he has made an error, and will expunge it from the Bill. I think, however, that it is satisfactory that the hon. Minister has not been led away by the many theories which we hear propounded from time to time with regard to our active force. Every little while a number of people appear to get a craze for writing letters about the Militia force, and all sorts of theories are propounded which, in the writer's opinion, will render the force more effective. Without speaking presumptuously, but speaking from some knowledge of the service—having served in every grade since the time of the Trent affair—I may say that I have come to the conclusion that there is no system that can be adopted better suited to the condition and the requirements of Canada than the present. I believe that while it is best suited to the circumstances of the country, it is, at the same time, capable of the easiest and least expensive expansion, if expansion is necessary. But if the force is to be made thoroughly effective, the hon. Minister of Militia should be prepared to come to the House and ask sufficient money to call out the forces once every year; and I believe that if the House were to give the matter full consideration it would be willing to grant the money required for that purpose. As the law now stands, and as the Estimates brought down to the House are framed, these forces are called out only once every second year. This might be a matter of very little consequence if this whole question of a Militia force were one merely of amusement, but if we are in earnest in spending this money for the purpose of maintaining an effective Militia force, it seems to me a pity that so large a proportion of the $750,000 which appear in the Estimates for Militia, should be practically wasted, as I consider it is, under the present system of drilling every other year. I took to camp a regiment, last year, newly formed and completely filled. My turn will not come this year, and the third year will have to come round before these men will go to camp again. The result is that all the labor we took in re-organizing our battalion—which was necessary under the peculiar circumstances that existed—all the money spent on the last annual drill will be absolutely wasted because those men will have forgotten by the next drill everything they learned at the last. Not only so, but this long interval between camp drills has the effect of breaking up the esprit de corps and taking away the pride which the men feel in their own efficiency and the efficiency of their regiment. By the time the third drill came around the time spent in drill would be wholly lost, because all the men will then be entitled to leave the force. I repeat that the first year's drill is of little use because it is not followed up, but the third year is absolutely wasted. It seems to me that if the hon. Minister of Militia would have the courage to come down to the House and ask for the comparatively small addition of expenditure which would be required—and an increase of the Estimate to $1,000,000 would do it—that the House and the country would consider the money well spent. The sum of $150,000 additional would enable us to drill the whole force for the small period now allotted every year. By this means the men would get to know their officers, and the officers their men, the efficiency of the regiment would gradually improve, and the force generally would be in a better position for active duty. Making the strongest appeal which can be made to those with whom economy is the principal consideration, it is beyond doubt that the money now expended is largely wasted, while, with the comparatively small addition of expenditure which I have mentioned, some practical benefit would be accomplished. We are obliged to keep the staff in a state of efficiency, and I would be sorry that their present state of efficiency should be lowered; but, under existing circumstances, the money, which goes into the men's pockets is the smallest part of the expenditure; and if we were to increase that expenditure by $150,000 we would be able to have a force quite as efficient as the country requires at the present time. Unless something of that kind is done, I for one am of the opinion that the money now expended might just as well be thrown into Lake Ontario. There seems to be an idea among some hon. members, and it has its influence upon the hon. members of the Government, that the force is so unpopular in the country that it would not be advisable to expend upon them the amount of money which would be required to make them efficient. Well, Sir, I think that the number of officers of the force who have been elected to seats in this House is some evidence that the force is not so unpopular in the country as is sometimes believed. I believe that there is no expenditure that the people grudge less than that upon Militia, as they fully understand that the bulk of it goes back to the country and into their pockets; and, therefore, on that ground, as well as for the other reasons I have mentioned, I think neither the hon. Minister nor the Government should be alarmed or should feel that they are treading on dangerous ground when they touch Militia expenditure. I hope that when the Estimates come down, and as I believe they intend making this grant for the purpose of infantry schools, they will also make this additional expenditure for the purpose of making the force efficient. Either the expenditure should be sufficient to drill the whole force effectively, or else the force itself should be cut down to meet the expenditure. To reduce the force would, however, be a matter of impossibility, for I would not like to see the hon. Minister of Militia endeavor to do away with any existing military organization. If he has any doubt as to whether or not the service is popular, let him try his hand at striking off, say one-half of the regiments now in the force. I think he would find that a good deal more dangerous than increasing the Militia estimates, in order to bring the force up to the necessary point of efficiency. There is another point to which I wish to refer, and is one which I think will be appreciated by every officer of the force, and it is that the period of the annual drill should be fixed. Under the present arrangement if a man is employed he is only able to go to his employer perhaps a week or ten days before drill and tell him that he must get away. In many cases the employer is very likely to tell him that if he goes away he need not come back. But if it was understood that at a certain period of the year the force would be called out for drill these difficulties would cease, because there is no trouble about getting leave if there is a proper understanding in advance as to the time when the men require to be absent on duty. At present it generally happens that the officers know nothing about the period of drill until a short time before, and it cannot be expected that satisfactory arrangements can be made between officers and men, or between the men and their employers under such circumstances. I have spoken on this subject because I think I know something about it, and I would ask the Government to consider these points, because I believe they are of practical importance. I should very much prefer, instead of spending more money in establishing infantry schools, that the course of studies at the Kingston Military College should be so framed that young men wanting to fit themselves to take commissions might go there, identifying the college with the force; and it might be arranged that every young man, after obtaining a first year's or second year's certificate at the Military College, should become connected with some regiment, and be prepared to take his post with that regiment when it should be called out. If that were done we should hear no more complaints of the college. As it is now, the expenditure on that institution is regarded as simply a piece of robbery; because, though it is a valuable school, it is felt that it should not be carried on entirely at the expense of the country.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I have to congratulate the hon. Minister of Militia upon his military knowledge and his acquaintance with the military history of this country; but I cannot congratulate him upon the change which he proposes to make by this Bill. I am pleased, however, that he proposes a consolidation of the Militia Acts, in order that we may have the law on this subject easily at command; but, as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has said, the amendments the hon. Minister proposes are entirely in the wrong direction. The success of our Militia force is a matter that we ought not to lose sight of. I believe that the hon. Minister of Militia is enthusiastic in the administration of his Department—I do not know that we could have a more enthusiastic Minister than he is—but I think he takes the wrong course if he desires to make the Militia force of this country effective. We have at present a well trained corps of officers, and we are training more in the "A" and "B" Batteries, and at the Military College; we are having the educational side of our Militia system pretty well attended to, but the weak part is in the drill and the instruction of the men. If the hon. Minister expects that he can secure the best value for our expenditure by training the officers as well as they can possibly be trained, without seeing that reasonable care is bestowed on the training of the men, I think he is making a mistake; and, as the hon. member for Muskoka has admirably pointed out, he is going very far in the direction of rendering it absolutely impossible for us to spend more money on the training of the men. Our Militia service now costs us about $300,000 a year. When the expenditure proposed to be added by this Bill is incurred, the expenditure will amount to nearly $1,000,000 a year. The hon. gentleman proposes to establish a new battery. Our present batteries cost us $60,000 each, and I suppose I am right in assuming that the new one will cost the same. He also proposes to establish schools of military instruction and three companies of infantry, which are not likely to be less expensive than those we have at present.

Mr. CARON. Much less expensive.

Mr. ROSS. Well, I do not think the cost of all these changes can be less than $100,000; and this adds to the expenditure devoted to the training of officers, who are pretty well trained now, whereas the rank and file, the men on whom we depend in emergencies to do the fighting, are only receiving a sort of perfunctory training for twelve days in the year. I hope the hon. Minister will reconsider his proposal, and, instead of making the increase in the direction that he proposes, if an increase is necessary devote it to a thorough training of the young men in the active Militia. He might give them more pay per diem than they are now receiving. They are willing to spend their time without full remuneration for their services. There is something in the glory of war as well as in the toil of war, and they let the glory go, I suppose, and take 50 cts. for the toil. Let us enlarge the time for drill, and let us make the force more efficient, instead of spending a large amount of money in the mere trappings and flummery of military service. I do not charge the hon. gentleman with being extravagant in his Department; but I am afraid that there are evidences in the Public Accounts that he is taken up more with the pageantry and the display of the service than with its efficiency. What I want him to do is not to be carried away with the pomp and display of military reviews, but to come down to the hard, solid, honest work of improving the drill for our men, or else let us abandon the whole thing. It is utterly useless for us to expend nearly $1,000,000 a year if our service is not made more efficient than it is. If the hon. Minister has any surplus money on hand, I think he should use it in repaying our volunteers for the many sacrifices they make, instead of foisting upon us a Quartermaster-General, who may not be called upon for a hundred years. If an invasion occurs, the hon. gentleman could obtain a Quartermaster-General in a day, who would know at what points to send the supplies; but this Bill will probably give us a Quartermaster-General whose greatest duty will be, I suppose, to draw his monthly salary. I am very much pleased that the hon. Minister of Militia has a kind word to say for the Military College. I believe that is one of the useful departments in connection with the Militia. Our young men get a training there, which not only infuses into them a military spirit—although, judging from the tone of the hon. Minister of Militia's remarks, we have all got the military spirit—but it will give our young men a thorough intellectual as well as a physical training. I am glad, then, that he stands by the Military College. I regret, however, that he does not propose to substitute a Canadian-trained officer for the present Major-General. I am not going to repeat the stale talk about keeping Canada for the Canadians. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon the present Major-General. I believe that, after all the training which the hon. gentleman claims our Militia has received since 1836 down to the present time, we ought to find in Canada a Major-General—a Canadian-trained officer with knowledge enough of military tactics and of all the duties of a Major-General, to serve us in that capacity as well as one brought from England. I appreciate the talent of these men, but we have had disagreeable collisions between the Major-General and the officers in the service—even with the hon. Minister of Militia himself. These arise not from the unfitness of the officer, but from the fact that men trained in the English military system are not sufficiently flexible or elastic to understand the genius and disposition of our people. Our volunteers cannot stand being knocked about like English regular soldiers. They are not accustomed to that rigid drill, to that constant drill in barracks, which brings soldiers down to that state of discipline and obedience which perhaps a Major-General from the Old Country trained in the English service expects. Our volunteers may make as good officers and stand fire as well, but not being trained to that system of subordination, are not prepared to be treated as an English soldier would permit himself to be treated. One remedy for that would be a Canadian Major-General, an officer trained here who would understand our people, the difficulties of our military institutions, and the wants of our people generally. I hope the hon. Minister, should a vacancy occur in this office of the service, which I believe he is sincerely anxious to improve, will find an officer of Canadian training suitable for that position and appoint him to it, that we may have the satisfaction of conferring on a Canadian the highest prize of the service. When we come to the various clauses of the Bill I will criticise them more closely. For instance, I do not know there is any necessity for the hon. Minister taking to himself the power of establishing a torpedo corps, which may not be called into operation for some time. Perhaps we might let that stand. I would like to have fuller details of the cartridge factory, which the hon. gentleman referred to as an era in the history of our Militia; but as I have a notice on the paper in reference to that, I will say no more about it. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider the suggestions made by the hon. member for Muskoka, and see his way clear not to fasten on the Militia service the enormous burdens entailed by this troop of cavalry and the additional battery.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. IVES. We were all delighted with the resumé of history which the hon. Minister of Militia gave us in moving the second reading of this Bill; and I am sure the volunteers throughout the Dominion will be pleased and gratified by the highly complimentary manner in which the hon. Minister alluded to them and their services in the past. But I was also very much pleased with the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka. It struck me as containing a very large share of practical common sense within a very small compass. It seems to me that this question of the Militia and Militia expenditure is one upon which common sense ought especially to be exercised; and I do not think a more fitting occasion will arise than the present, for discussing the principle upon which this expenditure is made. This is a practical utilitarian age. It is just the time when the spear is likely to be beaten into the pruning hook, when probably less respect is paid for the pomps and glories of war than ever before. And when we consider that a very large sum of money, considering our receipts, is expended by the hon. Minister of War in Canada, it will not be out of place to discuss the reasons for this expenditure and the principle upon which it is made. Now, there are certain objects which we may have in view in this expenditure, and which the Government may have in view in bringing down the annual Estimates for the Militia forces. In the first place, their object may be to have in Canada a force sufficient to restrain domestic riots or insurrections, and to enforce the laws of the country. That may be their only object. Or their object may be to build up, to train and control a force which would be sufficient successfully to protect our territory from the foreign invader; or possibly their object may be twofold—to put down domestic insurrection, and, in case of need, to repel foreign invasion. The time, I think, has come when the hon. Minister of War should be able to state to the House whether his object is simply to have a force available for defending the laws of Canada and protecting us from domestic insurrection and riot, or whether his object is further than that, to build up, train, and control, a force here which shall be sufficient—or all we can do in that direction—to repel the foreign invader. If his object be the latter, if that be the purpose which the Government have in view in this expenditure, it seems to me a very different course should be pursued from that if the object were simply to have a force here for use in case of domestic insurrection. In one case we would require a small but well drilled regular force—such a force as the “A” and “B” Batteries—and which force, perhaps a little more scattered over the Dominion, would be amply sufficient for that purpose, and there would be no need whatever for the volunteer system or the volunteer Militia. We would have no need for the Military College, or for military schools, with their large and expensive staffs. If the object is simply to have a force sufficient to quell an insurrection, then a small regular force, like "A" and "B" Batteries, is all that we require. I must take it, therefore, that the hon. Minister has in view the building up and training of a force for other purposes, in order to enable him successfully to resist the invasion of the country, because he has gone very much further than organizing and keeping up a small army. But it strikes me that if the object be simply to prepare our people for a war, "A" and "B" Batteries and the increased force proposed in this Bill are entirely out of keeping and out of point with the rest of the system. There is no possible connection between the regular force and the volunteer force. The regular force is not an example to the volunteer force, because the volunteers never see the regulars, unless they happen to live in Kingston or Quebec. The regular force does not furnish drill instructors for the volunteers—they have no connection with the volunteers. Then I say that if the object of the hon. Minister of Militia is to educate our people to fight the foreign invader, whence the necessity of the regular army that we are commencing to build up, and whence the necessity of increasing that regular force? It does not help to educate the great mass of our people. If we have a few men in Kingston and Quebec thoroughly drilled and trained, it would not help to educate the masses of the people in the use of the rifle if we were to increase that force, and if we were to add to it a troop of cavalry, as is proposed. I say that there is no logical connection between the regular force that we have, and the scheme of educating our people to resist a foreign invasion. There is no sequence, no connection, between the Military College at Kingston and the education of the volunteers, because, as I understand it, that college is not intended to educate regimental officers, it is not intended as a training school for commissioned and non-commissioned officers who are to command our regiments; therefore, it is something which has no connection with what we must take to be the main object the hon. Minister has in view in this Militia expenditure. Now, if the object be to train our people into warlike habits, if you will, or, at all events, in the use of the rifle, then there are two courses to take. In the first place, we might create skeleton companies; and, in the next place, we might have, as we are supposed to have, full companies. Now, the Government have proceeded on the plan of enlisting full companies of fifty men, and of organizing complete regiments. We must suppose that their object is to drill and train those full companies, but for the reason that they cannot afford the necessary money to do it, instead of drilling and training them every year, as the hon. member for Muskoka says is necessary, in order to make training of any avail, they drill them every other year, and the result is, as the hon. member for Muskoka, who is a practical warrior, has told us, that before they come to the next drill they have forgotten all they learned at the first. It does seem to me that from this point the hon. Minister ought to start with a more definite object in view. If his object is simply to have a force sufficient to put down an insurrection, then a small regular force like "A" and "B" Batteries is sufficient, and we do not need a volunteer system at all. If his object is to teach our people to be able to repel a foreign invasion, then those batteries form no part of that scheme and he ought to find means necessary to educate and drill the soldiers so as to make their training of some use to them. Now, I have always been in favor of the plan of a skeleton army. We cannot possibly be expected to expend the money necessary to drill and train, in an efficient manner, the nominal number of volunteers now enrolled in Canada. We cannot be expected to do that with no war in view, with no probability of an invasion; we cannot be expected to furnish the necessary money to drill even the present number of volunteers efficiently and thoroughly. Then what should we do? In my opinion we should adopt the skeleton system; that is to say: instead of having companies of fifty we should have companies of ten; instead of drilling fifty men and paying them we should have a less number and drill them efficiently. We should not drill them biennially but annually, we should pay them sufficient remuneration so that we could get a suitable class of men to enter the force, and we should insist upon their remaining during the whole term for which they have enlisted. Under the present system the pay is so much less than can be obtained in any other pursuit, that it is very difficult indeed to obtain the right class of men to enter the force as volunteers. And from the fact that the pay is so little, it is almost impossible to enforce discipline, and the result is that the man who is enrolled to-day, and who goes out this year into camp, is more unlikely to be there at the next drill than any other man in the community. By the time the next drill comes round he has gone to the United States, or to Winnipeg or Fort McLeod, or to some other part of the Dominion. There is no effort made to keep him, or to bring him back to continue his drill on the next occasion when the company is called out. The result is that when the drill is ordered the men who form the force are comparatively new men. But there would be the same advantage gained even though these men were scattered, even though they were to be found in Ontario or Manitoba, whereas they formerly belonged to a company in Quebec, if they had been sufficiently educated to retain the advantage of the education they had received. But the time is so short and they are so seldom called out that they do not get their drill sufficiently learned to be of any use to them anywhere. The only advantage they get from the drill is the knowledge of the use of the rifle, how to handle it, and how to shoot with some degree of precision. Now, it seems to me that if no greater amount of money can be afforded than is at present given to this object, the hon. Minister should enroll a less number of men, and should drill them every year, and drill them for a longer period and pay them better; and he should insist upon having in some cases a better class of men, and upon their remaining in the force during the time for which they have enlisted. It seems to me this plan of skeleton battalions would exactly meet the object which the hon. Minister has in view. He would then have always ten men to form the nucleus of a company; he would always have ten men thoroughly drilled and trained, who could furnish the non-commissioned officers when the company was filled up. He would have at least ten men who would thoroughly know their drill, and in case of invasion, or war, and of wanting to prepare for war, the organization would be complete, the company would be organized, the officers would be ready to take their places, and all that would be necessary would be to fill up the company with the full strength of fifty men. Now, I undertake to say that if the hon. Minister would cut down the number of men he undertakes to drill, would give an annual drill, would give a longer period of drill, and would make the men actual soldiers, the scheme of educating our people and of forming the nucleus of an army would be much more successful than it has been in the past. It seems to me that the measure which the hon. Minister has proposed, in so far as it changes the old law, is a step, not in the direction of making better soldiers, but of making more officers. The defect in our system is not the want of officers so much, not the want of experienced officers so much, as the want of training and drill in the force at large, in the rank and file. The system that we are pursuing is giving us highly trained officers, graduates of Kingston College, officers who have been taught by "A" and "B" Batteries; but the men are not drilled, have but a superficial knowledge of the use of fire-arms, and take very little interest in the force, because they are not properly paid, and because they feel that the Government is treating them niggardly and unfairly. They have no esprit de corps, and take no interest in their duties. Of course, to these remarks there are exceptions. There are regiments and battalions who do take an interest for the love of it; there are corps which it is necessary to except, but these remarks apply—I can appeal to officers who represent constituencies in this House, if it is not the fact—generally to the Militia force of Canada at the present time. Now, as I have said before, the measure which the hon. Minister proposes, in so far as it is an amendment of the existing laws, instead of being a step towards giving the men more pay, of drilling them oftener and for a longer time, is a step towards enlarging the standing army and creating more schools for officers. When I go down to Richmond and am accosted by the officers and men of the Richmond Battalion, and they ask me: what about these old coats and hats we have had to wear for years, what answer shall I make them? I will tell them that the Government cannot give them any new uniforms because they have no money with which to buy uniforms; but they must remember this: that the Government has a very fine Military College at Kingston. And if they find fault with those great guns, to which I referred the other evening, as being altogether unsuitable for the purpose, the only consolation I can give is, that the regular army is being increased, and that it has very fine guns, fittings and trappings throughout. If they say that their pay is insufficient, that 50 cts. a day is not sufficient to induce them to give up their occupation and enter the volunteer force, or continue in it, the reply naturally will be, that the hon. Minister of Militia has created an additional staff officer, a new Quartermaster-General. I am not going to quarrel with the measure further than this: to say—and I appeal to volunteer officers in the House—that the defects in our system are not the want of officers, not the want of military schools, not that there is a too small standing army, but that the pay given to the volunteers, and the length of time they are drilled, are not sufficient to create an efficient volunteer force. It is very easy for us to talk about the volunteers of the country and the services they have rendered. They have rendered noble services, and they would render noble services again, if occasion required, and so would every inhabitant, whether belonging to the force or not. If the country were invaded, every body would turn out to repel the invaders; but it is useless to deceive ourselves with the idea that the volunteers are satisfied with 50 cts. a day and biennial drill. They are not, and do not consider themselves sufficiently drilled. We will never have good volunteers, and an interest taken by volunteers in volunteering, unless the Government are prepared to increase the Estimates for the payment of the men, not for the officers' schools and the standing army, but for the rank and file, which comprise the volunteer force of the Dominion.

Mr. HESSON. I am very much in accord with the remarks which have fallen from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), and also from the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). I feel that of the large sum expended for military purposes in Canada, $773,000, a very small proportion is expended on the rank and file of the volunteer force. That sum amounts to only $250,000 for the purposes of drill and similar expenditures, out of the total sum of $773,000, which is a small sum for training an armed force in Canada. If it is necessary to have and to encourage a military spirit, and I presume it is, for I do not think there is any hon. member who does not feel it is absolutely necessary, not only for the present, but for the future, a considerable expenditure is necessary. If the Dominion is to make such progress as we anticipate, the military spirit must increase with the growth and development of our resources; and if we have interests to defend and protect, we must have the necessary appliances, and these can only be obtained by encouraging the rank and file of the Militia force to devote a small portion of their time to the duties that devolve upon them. It is unreasonable to expect that a volunteer can, by having a biennial drill of eight or ten days, secure such practice as will be of advantage to a regular force, or such a force as we hope to have for such an outlay as we are making. If the hon. Minister finds it necessary to establish three more schools for the purpose of educating men as officers, I think a large expenditure is necessary in the direction spoken of by the hon. members for Richmond and Wolfe, and Muskoka, namely, on the rank and file, who do not consider 50 cts. a day is proper consideration for the duties they are called upon to undertake as volunteers. I am quite certain, from the information I have obtained, that the various companies in Canada are perfectly willing to give their time and talents in order to do all they can to encourage the spirit of the volunteer movement, and they cannot do that with no allowance made to the men for drilling at other periods than at the biennial drill of eight or ten days. These companies must be brought out and kept in something like actual drill during a portion of the year, as well as at the brigade camps. I feel it to be a great injustice to the men, who are at times called upon, perhaps, to abandon very remunerative employments, to go and drill at camps and the brigade camps during the busy seasons, and to make these sacrifices for the small pay of 50 cts. a day; and, as has been said by gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the spirit required in a soldier, this cannot very well be secured, if it is possible, that, at the end of the drill, he may go away, and two years afterwards, if he returns, he will have no more information than when he first commenced his drill. I feel it is necessary that if large expenditures are to be made in the direction of establishing schools, to give us, as you might say, a regular standing army, and to qualify officers to discharge their duties, it is equally incumbent on the House to place a large sum in the Estimates for the rank and file. What is the use of an able staff officer without men to command; and we know the difficulties which officers commanding companies in the various battalions throughout Canada experience in securing men to keep them together. Seeing that they have so little inducements to offer, the hon. Minister of Militia ought to go further than he has gone, and give all the battalions now enrolled in Canada an annual drill instead of biennial, as in the past. I just rose to say that I endorse what has been stated by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe and the hon. member for Muskoka in that direction; and I feel that other gentlemen acquainted with this matter in this House, would express views on this question, in the direction of paying the rank and file more liberally, and of giving them more frequent opportunities of drill. I am surprised that in this expenditure of $773,000, there is no less a sum than $52,000 set down for the care of stores and ammunition. This appears to me to be one-fifth of the whole sum paid to the rank and file; and if this be a fair proportion of the total expenditure under this head, then the men and officers who do the hard work are not sufficiently paid; and I would like to see a large sum voted for that purpose.

Mr. LISTER. I rise not for the purpose of criticising this Bill in a hostile manner, that I leave to those who are more familiar with the subject—the Captains and Colonels, and Brigadier-Generals in the House, who are possessed of all the necessary information. I suppose that the hon. Minister of Militia has decided that this Bill shall become law; and if so, it is expedient that it should be, in every respect, put into desirable shape. I am not very familiar with this subject, but I have had handed me by a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with it, a copy of the Bill, which I consider to be in some respects defective. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to certain of its clauses in order that before it again comes before the House it may receive that consideration which I am sure he will give it. If he turns to clause thirty-nine he will find it provided that the commanding officer shall have the right to institute an action against any person for the value of public property taken by the men or others. Public property in this Bill is distinguished from certain other property belonging to battalions and companies, such as the colors of the regiment, the regimental books, records, band instruments, &c.; and I would suggest the propriety of inserting, in addition to the public property they are responsible for, the words "the property of the corps." I would also call the attention of the hon. gentleman to section forty-two, and suggest that the words "of the corps" be inserted after the words "public property." In this way, the men or persons who may covert such property, would be amenable to the law at the instance of a certain person, and it would be competent and proper to prosecute them under the provisions of this Bill, the same as if they had covert such public property. These are, to my mind, very important additions to the Bill, and will make it more perfect, if it is decided by the Government that it shall become law. I think that the remarks of my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe, strike the key-note on this question; and while congratulating the hon. Minister of Militia on the very able and eloquent way in which he put his views before the House on this subject, I feel that such is not the case when the hon. Minister states that the country would not vote against the organization as it now exists. I am not prepared to express my own opinion on this subject; but I do say that, so far as the volunteer service is concerned, in its present condition, there is a very wide difference of opinion as to the desirability of keeping it up. I well remember, in 1878, when the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches were before the country seeking to defeat the Mackenzie Administration, that upon every platform throughout the country, where a volunteer company was in existence, these men sounded the changes on the fact that the Mackenzie Government was only paying the volunteers the miserable and wretched sum of 50 cts. a day. The object for which this was done, and the inference which was to be drawn therefrom are obvious: that if these hon. gentlemen were placed in power, the volunteers, who had been so inadequately paid in the past, and who had been asked to make such great sacrifices in the public interest, would be compensated to the degree and extent to which they were entitled. I say that the Bill before the House will be looked upon by the people of this country with amazement, when they consider that the men, who go out year after year, and expose themselves to expense and privation, as these men have to do, in drilling annually, are only to get the miserable, wretched, and miserly sum of 50 cts. a day for their services, while the hon. Minister of War adds to the staff—to the large staff—which already exists, and which consumes, I am safe to say, three-quarters of the immense appropriation which he asks from this House. These are questions which the people of this country will, at no very distant date, perhaps, have brought before them; and they will feel that it is an injustice to the volunteers that these men should only get 50 cts. a day notwithstanding our boasted surplus, while the Minister of War adds officer after officer at princely salaries to be paid out of the public Treasury of the country. I say, therefore, that it is no wonder that my hon. friend the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) should have taken a position of semi-hostility to the Government, as he has done on the question before the House. We must not forget that these men, whom the hon. Minister of Militia has been lauding so highly—these men who were so ready to take up arms when their country was in danger—should be compensated for the services they have rendered. The hon. member for Muskoka, who, I have no doubt, has been a veteran himself, for he certainly looks like a warlike man, does not speak approvingly of the Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Militia; and I hope that, in the interests of and in justice to the volunteers, the scheme proposed in the Bill will be abandoned, and that one more simple and feasible—one which will at least, to a small extent, do justice to our volunteers who sprang to our defence in the past, and are ever ready to defend us in the future, will be introduced. With regard to the hon. Minister of Militia, so long as hon. gentlemen opposite are in power, I believe there is no man in their party who is better fitted for the position than he is—I have not a word to say against him. I believe he is thoroughly in earnest in his endeavors to improve the Militia system; but he must have seen, when he visited the camp in London in company with General Luard, or the other gatherings of the volunteers which have been held throughout the country, that many of these men require new and better clothing than they have at present. Instead of spending money as is proposed to be done, and in adding new officers to the force, in providing for the payment of large salaries to friends, it would be better to give the money to the volunteers of the country so as to encourage them to serve and make more efficient soldiers, and a more efficient force generally. I thank the House for the indulgence it has shown me in the few words I have uttered on this question; and if my remarks shall have any effect in extending to the volunteers a fairer amount of consideration than they appear to have received in this Bill, I shall be amply satisfied with the performance of the duty I have undertaken in addressing the House.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate at any considerable extent. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) alluded to the fact that there are a good many representatives of the volunteers in this House. I have been somewhat surprised, however, that so few of these hon. gentlemen have taken part in this debate, for the discussion has been carried on almost exclusively by hon. members who, like myself, are laymen, and cannot claim that experience which would enable them to discuss this question as intelligibly as they might desire. But all of us have had opportunities of observation, and whether we have had the honor of commanding battalions or not, or of commanding companies in battalions, we cannot have shut our eyes to the defect of the system now in force. I must say that I subscribe almost entirely to the opinions which have been uttered by my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe. Like myself he represents a constituency in which the volunteer element is pretty large. I have no doubt that in his constituency, as in mine, there are many men, whom, like the hon. member for Muskoka, have served their country faithfully and well—have taken a warm and enthusiastic interest in the volunteer movement, and have devoted much time and labor and incurred considerable expense in what has been, I regret to say, a somewhat vain attempt to raise this system to an efficient point. I am bound to say that there has been deterioration rather than improvement of late years, and I am bound to express the opinion that the cause of this deterioration has not been in the want of efficient, trained, and earnest officers, but has lain rather in the deterioration in the rank and file. It has arisen, at all events in the frontier counties, from two causes: first, the utterly insufficient pay given to the volunteers during the term of their drill; and, secondly, the great movement which is constantly taking place among large numbers of our young men by their removal to the North-West and the Western States. It has been almost a matter of necessity to bring new men into the ranks, and it has been also almost a matter of necessity, in order to obtain the full strength of the companies, to have young men, or rather boys, who are not fitted to be taken into camp at all; and many of these have only had the benefit, as my hon. friend has said, of a few days drill which is given in each year. I do not know that this difficulty can be remedied to any great extent. It will continue to exist, at all events, as long as the present movement of the young men to the North-West continues; but it can be remedied in some measure by an increase of the pay which has been given to the volunteers. I believe, with the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, that there is no need for more officers, that the movement contemplated by the Bill of the hon. Minister of Militia has not been called for, and that it would be much more judicious to expend the money which it is proposed to expend in the establishment of these additional schools, in the payment of the volunteers when they are out, and for having annual drills instead of biennial drills. I sincerely trust that the hon. Minister of Militia will be disposed to reconsider this question, and if he cannot see his way clear to change his policy with regard to the establishment of these schools, he will, at all events, give ear to the representations given to him regarding the propriety of having more frequent drills and increasing the pay of the men who take part in them.

Mr. BERGIN. The complaint made by my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), that hon. gentlemen connected with the force have not taken part in this debate, is certainly refreshing. We have attempted to get the floor on several occasions since this debate began, but our lay brethren have forestalled us. They were anxious to take part in this fray, though they were not so anxious to take part in the other fray which took place some years ago.

Mr. SCRIVER. We were high privates, and we shouldered our rifles, too.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not suppose that the Bill of the hon. Minister of Militia is perfect. No doubt, like other Bills, it has its imperfections, but that it is in the right direction, I think, no member of the active Militia, who thoroughly understands its wants and knows how it has been treated in the past, will attempt to dispute. I think, Sir, that the hon. Minister of Militia deserves very great credit for this attempt to consolidate the Militia Law, to place within a compass, that they can be easily got at, all the obligations which the law demands of the Militia force. In doing this he has added somewhat to the law, and I am sorry to say, that in some respects, he has not taken from the old law some of what, I think, the force look upon as its most objectionable clauses. But I think he has done a great deal under the circumstances, and when I hear to night, from gentlemen who are laymen; who really know nothing of the force, that the force has deteriorated, I cannot hold expressing my astonishment. I have been connected with the force for more than twenty years; I have the honor to command as fine a Militia regiment, I think, as there is to be found in the Dominion—a regiment which, I think, is an honor to those glorious old counties of Stormont and Glengarry, and which has not deteriorated. Its physique is as good, its morale as good, and its ranks as full, as it was when first gazetted and admitted to the active force. If the Militia force has deteriorated, why should this regiment be any exception? If, Sir, there be any change—I flatter myself there is a change—it is a better regiment than it was fifteen years ago.

Mr. SCRIVER. It has a better colonel.

Mr. BERGIN. I accept the compliment. I have improved with age, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is as accurate in this as he was in some of the remarks he made to-night. However, whether a good or a bad colonel, I have the interest of the service at heart, and I have done everything I could to benefit, not only that regiment, but the whole force. It is true, as has been said, that the militiamen, when in camp, receive only

Mr. SCRIVER.

50 cts. a day and rations. This is not a very large sum. I should be glad to see it raised to 75 cts., or $1. I admit it would not be sufficient to remunerate the men for their loss of time; but I know that the militiamen of this country look upon their annual camp as a holiday, and are delighted to go out for sixteen days in the year, because they feel that the sum awarded to them from the Government, is not so much a remuneration for their services, as to protect them from actual loss and to provide them pocket money for the time they are abroad serving their country. The officers, we all know, are paid but a small sum also; but they go cheerfully and willingly to the camp, though they have often to make great sacrifices to do so. As a matter of fact the men of the volunteer Militia, who are desirous of doing their duty, do not complain that they are not sufficiently paid at 50 cts. a day, but that they are not allowed to go out for sixteen days in every year for 50 cts. a day. And this brings me to notice one of the most objectionable features of this Bill. It fixes the period of enlistment at three years only. How much service does the hon. Minister of Militia expect to obtain from a militiaman in three years, if he is only to be called out for eight days every other year? How much knowledge can he acquire of his duties in that time? A militiaman is only able to get cleaned up, or, as a smart officer once said, get "licked into shape," when his eight days drill expires. But if there were sixteen days, in the first eight days he would acquire, not the frippery and the frummery, as the hon. member for West Middlesex says, of the service, but a knowledge of his duties as a soldier. He learns to take care of his dress, to be properly accoutred, and so forth. Would the hon. member for West Middlesex prefer a soldier going through the street with his cap drawn down below his brows, looking at his feet, and slouching along as though ashamed of the service, or the gallant fellow, with cap above his brow, looking straight to the front, and afraid of nobody, not even of the critics opposite, proud to be a servant of Her Majesty and wear her uniform. If there is one thing more than another for which the hon. Minister of Militia deserves credit—and he has been a painstaking, industrious head of the department since he has been appointed—it is that he has not been ashamed to go abroad and show that he is a member of the force, and give encouragement to the officers, who have not hesitated to put their hands deep into their pockets and provide themselves with expensive uniforms and other necessities, so as to set a good example to their men. If you look at the history of the British army, you will find that the men who took the most pride in dress, like Wellington and the gallant Picton, were the men most beloved by their troops, who established the best discipline, and had behind them the best soldiers. So the hon. Minister of Militia has inspired the officers and men of the force with a good morale, and I have no doubt his visits have had the effect of infusing a better spirit and renewed interest. It has been said that the expenditure on the military school is money thrown away. Well, it is not a school of our creation, I believe. But there can be no doubt that it has done, and is doing, a great deal of good. Since it is the custom to-night to give advice to the hon. Minister of Militia, let me make a suggestion as to the use to which he could put the men educated in the college. In 1866, one of the great wants felt by General Macdougall was that of a topographical survey of this country. We have no such thing as a good topographical map of Canada. There is a good deal of ability in that school, and it might be held out as a reward to the men who distinguish themselves, that, after they got through, they should be employed by the Government in making a topographical survey of the country. In this way we should be utilizing these young men both for their own good and the good of the country.

I may be permitted to call the attention of the hon. Minister to one or two objections that I have to the Bill, which he perhaps may feel it in his power to remove. I notice that, in one of the clauses of this Bill, if a company of the Active Militia called out for active service is not filled, it will be in the power of the commanding officer to fill the vacancies by the ballot. This, I think, is a mistake, for company service at all events.

Mr. CARON. That is only in case of active service, and is an old law.

Mr. BERGIN. I am glad to be corrected if I have misunderstood the clause, because I think that would be a very great mistake. I would also call the attention of the hon. Minister to what I think is an omission in the Bill. I know it is a fact, from knowledge acquired in the various camps I have attended, that occasionally in a squad of first-class men there will be a man of bad character, a drunkard, a profane wretch, one who makes the night hideous and disturbs every man in the camp. Under the present Militia Law, it is not in the power of the officer commanding the company, or the officer commanding the regiment, to dismiss him. I think if this power were given to the officer commanding the regiment, upon enquiry, it would conduce very much to the advantage and discipline of the force. If the hon. Minister can see his way to add to the annual grant for drill purposes, so that men can be kept out for sixteen days in the year and drilled every year, he will be conferring a very great boon on the force. There can be no question, as I said before, that eight days is entirely too short a period in which to teach a man his drill; and, really, if you expect to teach him much drill in sixteen days you will be disappointed; but you will have taught that which is more necessary even than drill—discipline—and that is all you can expect to teach men even in sixteen days. To accomplish that you require to keep them out that period, because the period of enlistment being for three years only, you must have them out every year, or, to use the words of a former speaker, the money expended on these annual camps will be entirely thrown away. So far as regards the proposal to appoint a Quartermaster-General, I do not see that the Act expresses that intention; but, as I understand it, the hon. Minister of Militia merely takes power, should he find it necessary so to do, to appoint a Quartermaster-General. As to the enrolment of the extra corps, I am not prepared to give an opinion at this moment. No doubt the hon. Minister of Militia and the Government have considered the matter carefully, and have good reason for the introduction of this clause in the Bill, and the establishment of these extra branches of the force on a permanent footing. If they are to form a nucleus for a regular army, if they are intended to be used for police purposes, as well as for purposes of instruction, I do not think the number to be enrolled is any too large; at all events, I think the experiment will be worth the expenditure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The debate on this question has been so prolonged that I hesitate to occupy the attention of the House, even for a very few moments, but having been so many years connected with the Active Militia, I feel that in justice I may do so. I must commend the hon. Minister of Militia for the care he has taken in the preparation of this Bill. As the law stood, it was scattered about in different Statute-books, quite beyond the reach of any officer of the Active Militia. The hon. gentleman has added, I might say, an increase of confidence to that which the Active Militia throughout the whole country has always extended to him. In him they felt they had at their head a Minister who took a deep interest in their welfare, in the development of the force, and in that loyal sentiment which alone actuates them in coming forward to enroll themselves to defend their country. I fear that the groove, perhaps, into which many hon. gentlemen have fallen in connection with this matter, has been rather a narrow one. I look upon the Bill, not as referring alone to the active or the volunteer force, but as embracing the whole defensive force of the country—the Reserve and Active Militia and Marine. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross), I understand, has made an attempt to mislead the House and to make it appear that the object Canadians have in enrolling themselves in the active Canadian Militia is simply for parade. To my knowledge, such is not at all the case. I feel they are actuated by a far higher motive. I feel that we have enrolled ourselves more for the object of defending our country in every way we possibly can. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, during the course of his remarks, objected strongly to the formation of "A" and "B" Batteries, because, in his estimation, they are a standing army. I look upon them in an entirely different light. I look upon them simply as schools of instruction for the Active Militia, and if they are kept as they are the expenditure made on them ought not in any way tend to decrease the expenditure upon the active Militia generally. There can be no doubt it is quite impossible to keep a force thoroughly efficient, which is only called out for active service once in two years. What we sadly lack are schools of instruction, which the non-commissioned officers of the different regiments—the officers—as well, can attend, occasionally, in order to refresh their knowledge of military matters. If camps were formed every alternate year for non-commissioned and commissioned officers of the corps which are not called out, it would add greatly to the efficiency of the force. During a discussion in the House a few days ago some papers were moved for by some hon. gentleman, asking for returns of correspondence in reference to the withdrawal of British troops from Halifax. I was glad to hear that no such correspondence had taken place. I trust that the hon. Minister of Militia, as well as the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, will resist any effort of that kind. It seems to me that a station at Halifax and a station at Victoria, in British Columbia, should be Imperial stations, and that we Canadians should enroll ourselves and do all that we possibly can towards defending the long line between the two oceans. My hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) has cast a reflection upon the present efficiency of the volunteer force which I, as a member, cannot allow to pass unchallenged. My experience is that the force is quite as efficient now as it was many years ago. True, we have not now excitement to induce men to come forward and fill the ranks that we had then, but the force is composed of a respectable body of men, and the officers, to my knowledge, are very well up in their duties. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), in the course of his remarks, asked whether the intention of the Minister of Militia was to enroll a force for the internal protection of the country, or for defence against invasion. Well, Sir, it seems to me that under this Act which the hon. Minister has introduced, there would be no difficulty whatever in placing the Reserve Militia in such a position that it could be enrolled for defensive purposes and would always be ready. We find that the graduates of the Military Schools of Gunnery pass away from the Active Militia altogether, they do not remain in the force; whereas they could be utilized to a great extent by being added to the reserve force, so that their services would be available whenever they are required.

Mr. DAWSON. I listened with a good deal of attention to the speech of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. I must say, from all I can see of this Bill, that I think it is a step in the right direction. I do not think the alterations proposed are open to the severe criticisms which have been passed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, and several other hon. gentlemen. Of course, in an extended country like ours, we cannot have a perfect system extending everywhere, but still something has been done, and I have no doubt that the changes proposed will be to the advantage of the country at large. It is certainly necessary that we should have a Militia organization of some sort, for imperfect as it may be, in the event of the necessity arising, these companies would serve as a nucleus to a much larger force in the future. However, I only rose with the intention of drawing the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to the particular district which I have the honor to represent. Now, I think when a certain sum is to be expended on Militia, and on the organization of volunteer companies, it should be extended over the Dominion at large. I think there should be some system adopted, by which every part of the Dominion might participate in that expenditure. The district I represent is 900 miles long, from east to west, and it has a population verging on 40,000, but we have only half a company in the whole of that district. At Sault Ste. Marie, at Prince Arthur's Landing, which is now getting to be a considerable place, and on Lake Huron, the Island of Manitoulin and other places, they are very anxious to form volunteer companies, but nothing has as yet been done. I hope the Minister of Militia and Defence will see his way to acting towards that district as he has done to other districts in Canada. So far as I can see, I believe the Bill is a step in the right direction, and I shall be very happy to give it my cordial support.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with some little attention and a great deal of pleasure to the interesting discussion with which the several military gentlemen have indulged this House, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia what these great improvements and this Consolidation Bill of my hon. friend are going to cost the country?

Mr. CARON. I think, from the discussion which has taken place to-night, that it is quite evident that all the hon. members in this House take a deep interest in the Militia force of Canada. This is a fact very gratifying to myself, for it is evident that in a country like ours, increasing every day, becoming prosperous and powerful, it behoves our people to take an increasing interest in the Militia force. We ought to have some organization—not for aggressive purposes, far from that—but an organization which can be utilized by whatever Government presides over the destinies of the country, that can be utilized for enforcing law, for protecting property, and for repelling any attack which might be made against us. I was very happy, indeed, to hear my predecessor, the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) express his views upon this Bill. As I understood him, he considered that the Military College could furnish all the instruction which we propose to give to the militiamen of Canada by the Bill which is now submitted to this honorable House. Well, Sir, I can say that the Military College is an institution which does give instruction—an instruction that must ever be useful to Canada and to Canadian interests. I may be allowed to bring before this House some statistics from the Department over which I have the honor of presiding, and which I have collected for the purpose of showing how the cadets and the graduates of the Military College have been faring so far. As I have already stated the establishment of the Royal Military College is not the Act of the present Government, nor is it the Act of the party to which I have the honor to belong. The Military College having been organized, I believe it is an institution which should not be looked down upon and frowned down upon, as some hon. gentlemen have done to-night. I believe it has done a great deal of good for Canada. It has done a great deal of good in proving that the instruction which Canada confers upon the cadets is an instruction which may be accepted and compared with the standard as required in England, to allow men to take prominent positions in the British service. I look upon it that the fact that cadets who have accepted commissions in the British army is of great advantage to Canada. Some hon. gentlemen may not view the question as I view it; but I hold that these cadets who leave Canada to enter the British army still remain Canadians, and after a few years of valuable experience, which they must acquire in the British service, they return to the Dominion and we are able to utilize their services, and the experience which they have thus obtained is of great value to this country. Fifty-four cadets have graduated from the Royal Military College up to July, 1882. These cadets have been employed as follows: eleven have joined the army; Canada has kept thirty-four graduates, who have been employed on railways and in other pursuits, but whose services have been of use to Canada and have been utilized on Canadian soil; one has gone to New Zealand, and there are eight now in the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CARON. An hon. member says "hear, hear," but he must remember that out of those eight, two are employed on the Grand Trunk Railway, and I consider that, if a great railway company like the Grand Trunk, or the Canada Pacific, utilizes the services of these graduates on railway works, employing them in Canada or elsewhere, they are employing Canadians in Canadian companies.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. gentleman state how many, if any, graduates have commissions in the Canadian Volunteer force.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman, who evidently takes a deep interest in Militia matters, has been carried away by this Bill without looking at the subject-matter attempted to be dealt with by it. The hon. gentleman should know that every cadet has been, and is to-day, enrolled in some Militia company, and there is not a single cadet who graduates from the Royal Military College who is not a member of the Militia force of Canada. That shows that this College is not an institution which can be looked down upon by the Militia force. Every cadet who leaves that college is, as I have said, drafted into the Militia force, and their high training is of very great service. I leave that matter to any hon. gentleman who knows anything about the force, and the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) has stated that their services in the various branches of the service are really invaluable, on account of the lessons of discipline taught them in the college, and the experience and knowledge they have acquired. I was rather amused at what seemed to me to be rather a risky statement, made on the part of my predecessor, the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), when he stated that under his administration of the Department over which I have the honor to preside, every dollar's worth of clothing used was obtained in Canada. Such is the statement made by the hon. gentleman; but I can say that looking into the records of the Department, his statements are not substantiated by facts. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman was very anxious, as we are all anxious, to obtain all possible clothing in Canada, although he does not believe in the National Policy and in fostering our native industries. Nevertheless, ever since the hon. gentleman left the Department there has been more clothing and more manufactured goods obtained in Canada than the hon. member for Digby ever dreamed of obtaining, under his administration. That is a fact which cannot be controverted, because the records of the Department establish, beyond possibility of doubt, that the hon. gentleman, during his administration, so far from getting in Canada all the goods he has spoken of, imported them all from outside. Within the period that the policy which now prevails in this country has been in existence, the Department of Militia and Defence has availed itself of every possible opportunity to purchase articles of Canadian manufacture, and we have steadily reduced the importations from abroad, as the Public Accounts will show. Hon. gentlemen will remember, as I said before, in my opening remarks, which it was my privilege to make to the House, when I moved the second reading of the Bill, that I mentioned several articles manufactured in Canada, which a couple of years ago had to be imported. I can only say that, every day, we are obtaining, in Canada, articles which formerly we imported from England; but it will be understood that there are still some articles required for our Department which, notwithstanding the development of our industries, and the establishment of new factories constantly in the different portions of the Dominion, for years to come cannot be manufactured in Canada. I have before had occasion to state that, for various reasons which manufacturers have explained to me, it is impossible to manufacture at any reasonable price the scarlet cloth used for the tunics of a large portion of the force; and the reason is, that where this cloth is made—in England, for instance—it is prepared, not only for the use of the English army, but also for an extensive market on the continent. It requires, I understand, a factory almost alone for its own production. The great trouble connected with the preparation of it, relates to the operation of dyeing, which requires that the factory should be devoted entirely to this work. Before the cloth is dyed, it is white, and when it is to be dyed, the workman must be dressed in linen in order that no article of any foreign nature can be dropped upon the cloth during the process of dyeing, which is expensive, especially in view of the fact that every other production must be abandoned for the purpose of preparing this work. But with this exception, the blue cloth and our heavy goods are manufactured in Canada. I heard a great deal said to-night about the enormous expenditure connected with this Bill. It may be that hon. members have not examined into the amount of money which Canada pays for her military organization, which is as perfect as any that exists in any country in the world, for the purposes for which it is required. It is not a standing army which we do not need; and the hon. gentlemen who speak of organizing a standing army, are completely mistaken as to the intentions of this Bill. Fortunately on this continent, we do not require standing armies, but an organization—call it a military organization, call it by whatever name you wish—merely for the purpose of strengthening the civil Government, of carrying out the laws, of preventing disturbances at home, and of repelling any attack that may be made on us by designing marauders, such as we have already repulsed. The whole military force of Canada costs per capita 19 cts.; and I will submit to the House statistics which I collected to show that I am not really as extravagant as the hon. member for Middlesex seeks to make it appear. I do not wish to obtain more money for military purposes than we really require. I am aware that in this growing country, where large and important public works are every day needed in the different sections of it, it would be wrong, it would be unpatriotic to take from those indispensable expenditures, any sum of money for the purposes of—as my hon. friend from Middlesex puts it—pageantry, as being the leading characteristic of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. Well, I must say, I never knew, among all the faults which I possess and acknowledge, that this was one of them; but, of course, the hon. gentleman must know better than I do myself whether this be the case, and I have no manner of doubt, that he can be in error; but still, when one comes to the actual facts—facts, after all, should be the only argument which should control and influence this House—as I understand them, of this most important question, it will be seen that the charge is unfounded. I will now compare the present current Militia expenditure with that which was made previous to Confederation, when the ordinary expenditure for Ontario and Quebec was at the rate of 35 cts. a head; and at that time, in addition, we had regular troops in this country, a large standing army, which was stationed by the Imperial authorities in the important cities, and at the leading strategical points where they were required. Each of the other Provinces had their own Militia, which also cost a great deal of money. The following table shows the expenditure of Canada and the United States and England for the year 1881-82, for it is only by comparison that this question, which, to a number of gentlemen whom the hon. member for Cornwall styled laymen, may not appear to be of very great importance, that its real nature becomes apparent. I do not doubt that the motives of these hon. gentlemen, when they rose in their places and criticised this Bill, are excellent; but I believe, and am convinced, that if, prior to taking part in this discussion, they had looked into the figures and ascertained the exact position which is occupied so far as relates to the expenditure and utility of the Militia force of Canada, these hon. gentlemen would have come to the conclusion that the Department of Militia and Defence is not administered in any extravagant manner, but that it really costs very little money in view of the great services which are rendered by the force to Canada and to the country. It will be seen that in Canada, our population being 4,500,000, and the taxation being $7.41 per capita, the expenditure on army and navy is 19 cts. per capita. In the United States the expenditure is $1.12 per capita by the Federal Government, outside of all the expenditure in the different States, some of which maintain a very expensive force for their own State purposes. In England the whole expenditure per capita for army and navy is $4. Now, it should be understood in Canada that, if the Militia force is to be abolished, if that is what is desired, it should be abolished completely; but if it is considered to be a useful force, one which is indispensable to a country like Canada, hon. gentlemen should not grumble at the small expenditure of 19 cts. per capita for the maintenance of the Militia force. I must say, however, that I cannot complain much of the grumbling. The criticism indulged in by hon. members has been very friendly, and it has conveyed to me some very valuable information from gentlemen who have taken so deep an interest in the force as my hon. friend the member for Cornwall, and my hon. friend the member for Muskoka. That hon. gentleman stated that he could speak as one having been connected with the force, for many years, and I am ready to say for him that during the time he has been connected with the force no gentleman has kept a better record in the Department of Militia than he has. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) criticised this Bill as he generally does military matters, and I think that, as usual, he has not taken the trouble of reading the Bill before he undertook to criticise it. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman made these criticisms with the best possible motives, but I do not think that he was as well prepared on the subject as we have a right to expect of an hon. member who holds so prominent a position in the Opposition as he does. The hon. gentleman says that all the training required is received in "A" and "B" Batteries. Now, I would ask him, why should the infantry be deprived of the advantage which is granted to the artillery in "A" and "B" Batteries. Is it not a fact that these batteries, have been very successful in training artillerymen. The mere fact that our Canadian artillerymen presented themselves for competition against the artillerymen of England, and carried to this country one of the most important prizes awarded in that competition, proved beyond the possibility of discussion, that "A" and "B" Batteries have been schools of instruction which have educated that branch of the service to a very high standard. I leave it to any hon.

gentleman who has taken an interest in the question, and who knows what the competition at Shoeburyness is, to state whether I am exaggerating or not, when I say that the fact of our Canadian team having competed successfully against the picked men of England, is not a high tribute to the instruction received at these batteries. Now, if this training has been of such great value to the artillery, why should the infantry, when Canada can afford to give them that training which Canada gives to the artillery, be deprived of such a training. It has been said that we have got all the training we require, and that we should give all the money to the rank and file. In reply to that, I would be ready and willing to-morrow to leave it to the rank and file to say whether or not, in the view of the whole force, they should not have thoroughly trained officers and non-commissioned officers in the infantry, whether we should not take that force and drill and train it in such a way that instead of being a disorganized force it will become a thoroughly organized force, which is just exactly what we intend to do by this Bill. We wish to expend the money in such a way that the expenditure will be of the greatest possible service to Canada. We wish not to expend the money on pageantry, as an hon. gentleman chose to style it. It is not pageantry, and when the hon. gentleman was quietly at home, the very force which he has been accusing of turning out for the purpose of showing their uniform—for the purpose of pageantry—was defending his property and protecting the country against those who were trying to invade it. At that time the hon. gentleman did not say a word, he did not consider then that there was any pageantry in the Militia force of Canada, though to-day he says it is all pageantry. We have heard a great deal of criticism from the hon. gentleman about this new Quartermaster-General who is not appointed, who if he is required will be appointed, but who if he is not required certainly will not be appointed. I ask the hon. gentleman who has criticised the Bill, without looking into it, whether it was not right in consolidating the militia law of Canada, and making changes which were required by the changes which have taken place in this country to provide for the appointment of this officer. Any hon. gentleman who has taken the trouble to look into military matters knows that the Quartermaster-General is one of the most important staff officers required in every military organization; and it was right and proper to take authority in this Bill to appoint such an officer, if required. Before any hon. gentleman expresses an opinion on the subject of this appointment he should wait until the Estimates are brought down; for the Estimates which have already been brought down do not make any provision for it, and the Supplementary Estimates may not do so. Until they do, it is impossible for any hon. member to decide whether this is a piece of extravagance on the part of the Government or not. In any case, every hon. gentleman who has taken the trouble to read in the press of England, and of other military nations, of recent developments, will know that if we required a force for active service a Quartermaster-General would be indispensable, although it may be a question whether the Quartermaster-General should be also the Adjutant General, or whether the two offices should be separate. The hon. member for West Middlesex again displayed his great knowledge of military matters by stating that this torpedo corps should not possibly be tolerated—that it was frightful extravagance. Now, there again the hon. gentleman was talking about a question which he had not taken the trouble of studying. If there is one thing that is not extravagant in the Bill, it is the provision regarding the torpedo corps. With our extensive coast, if we have a thorough and efficient torpedo organization we shall be able to dispense with ships, batteries and many other expensive things; so I knew when the hon. gentleman accused me of extravagance, he did not half know me, because I really am not extravagant.

Mr. CARON,

Mr. O'BRIEN. You are not half extravagant enough.
 Mr. CARON. My hon. friend says, I am not half extravagant enough, and I am beginning to believe he is right. But, in proposing a torpedo corps, I am really proposing to save a great deal of expense to the country; and, if the hon. gentleman wishes, I will send him a lot of the most recent works published in England, Germany, the United States, France and other countries, indicating that the proper modern mode of defence for seaboard as extended as ours is the torpedo corps. The hon. member will find this out when he studies the question; but, it may take him much more time than remains this Session, because he has not begun to understand it yet, and, if I send to my hon. friend all the books I have consulted, I am afraid the hon. gentleman will not be able to express an opinion until next Session; but, by next Session, I am convinced the hon. gentleman will say that I was right and that he was wrong. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), has gone into this subject very thoroughly—and my hon. friend, though generally right, was not right upon this question. The hon. gentleman states that we are expending a very large amount of money, and he calls upon me as Minister of Militia to state whether we want to get up a standing army, or whether we want to get up a force merely for domestic troubles. The hon. gentleman knows that we could not get up a standing army without his knowledge, and the Bill states beyond any possibility of doubt, exactly what the intentions of the Government are in organizing this force. Now, Sir, this great standing army would be a force numbering 750 men. You can imagine what a sensation we, as a military nation, would produce among the military nations of the world, when they heard that we had organized a standing army of 750 men. Well, Sir, we are organizing, not a standing army, but a force for purposes of instruction; we are organizing for the infantry, schools such as we have already established for the artillery, and which have had such a beneficial effect upon that branch of the service. I think that, ever since I have been at the head of the Militia Department, I have not attempted to increase the expenditure on the staff or the officers, and I am not proposing to do so in the measure I am now submitting to the House. If hon. gentlemen will look into the accounts they will see that since I have been Minister of Militia I have reduced the expenditure on the staff. That saving on the pay of the staff I have given to the rank and file; and I ask any hon. gentleman whether it is not a fact that these camps have been of great benefit to the force? I state so not upon my own authority, because I can understand that hon. gentlemen would say I am not in a position to express an opinion on such matters, that I am not a competent authority on such matters, but I express that opinion, taking the record that appears in every report published in the Department of Militia and Defence; I express it as being the opinion of military men who have had a large experience in the British service, and who say that the military forces of Canada during their twelve days drill have done more work and acquired more experience than they ever before had an opportunity of acquiring. I can frankly state that I should like a yearly drill instead of a biennial camp drill in every district of every Province, because men can learn more in these camps than in the drill at headquarters. No doubt, at headquarters drill the men do their duty and do it well, but you have not got the large number of men together that you have in camps, and men cannot gain the experience there that they acquire in camps, nor learn the drill which is given in camps and can never be given at headquarters, and, besides, in camps that feeling is aroused which should always exist in any authorized force; and I should like to see camps where men would be brought together from the different sections of the country. But if I am extravagant, as the hon. member for Middlesex says I am, how can I ask this honorable House to vote the appropriations which would be required in order to have camps every year. That I can understand would be of great value; but as we have been proceeding gradually, improving, Session after Session, our force, we should not be too anxious and ask Parliament now to vote a large amount for yearly camps. We must wait; and the force knows that whenever Canada, after the great expenditure which naturally has to be incurred on public works becomes less heavy, can provide for yearly camps, we will have them. I believe that in this matter, as in every other, we should proceed gradually, so that the country will not be burdened by any extravagant expenditure. Now, hon. gentlemen attacked the expenditure upon the staff. If hon. gentlemen had looked into the matter before attacking our most efficient staff, and trying to prevent these men from getting the remuneration their services are worth, they would find that really the staff costs very little of the money voted by Parliament—not more than one-twentieth. Now, it must be considered that the men who thus devote themselves, have not, like others in the Civil Service, the privilege of retiring on pensions or getting superannuation money. The day they have to leave the service they have nothing to fall back upon, but the accumulation of the large salary which has been given them per annum, during the term of years they have served their country. I do not wish to say anything more about the staff, except to ask hon. gentlemen to consider whether out of the whole amount voted by Parliament, one-twentieth is an extravagant amount to devote to the staff. I am certain that hon. gentlemen wish to deal with this question in the fairest possible manner, and I am perfectly certain that when they look into it, they will see that it is impossible to spend less money on the Militia force. Hon. gentlemen spoke of the pay which is given to the rank and file, 50 cts. per day. I would ask the hon. gentleman to take up the best paid military service in any country—take Switzerland, France or Germany, any country you wish—and say whether the 50 cts. per day is not really paying the rank and file as liberally as they can expect to be paid. I know that, in a country progressing like our own, where every man who has energy can find employment, and obtain for his services an amount compared with which this is a very small pittance; but let me say to the Militia force of Canada, that at 50 cts. a day we have never found it difficult, without making any appeal, except to the volunteer zeal of the people, in filling up the rank and file. With the rank and file it is not a question of earning 50 cts. a day, but it is a work of love—it is the old feeling of patriotism which exists among all classes in Canada, and whenever the occasion has arisen and the force was required to come out, there was no question whether they should be paid 50 or 75 cts. a day, but they came to the front and did their duty like men. I have visited many camps, and have seen men who told me they were paying $1 a day to men who were replacing them on their farm, in order that they might attend drill in camp. If we look at the question from that point of view, I know that 50 cts. a day is no remuneration for men of their intelligence and good behavior; and I know equally well that in giving them 50 cts. a day, Canada virtually says to her militiamen that it is only to defray their expenses, and she makes no pretension of compensating them for their time; and, under these conditions, these men go into camp, and pay the extra amount which is required to provide substitutes on their farms. A very important feature of this Bill is the provision to train and educate thoroughly the officers and non-commissioned officers; and I leave it to any hon. gentleman who has taken an interest in military matters, whether, if we can thoroughly drill and educate officers with the sum that will be asked for to support those infantry schools, Canada will not be prepared for any emergency that is ever likely to arise. But, Sir, in speaking of the expenditure of money we must consider that when we undertook to organize a military force in Canada, England had made over to us valuable properties in several sections of the country—the forts at Point Levis, for instance, having cost millions upon millions—and it was right and proper for us, when the Imperial troops were withdrawn, as is stated in clause 21 of the Bill providing for the formation of these infantry schools, to add a little to the expenditure already devoted by Parliament to Militia matters in order to be better able to rely upon our own resources. It is simple prudence for us so to organize our force that it will be not only a credit to the country, but that it may be utilized by any Government which may happen to be in power for the purpose of protecting ourselves against any home disturbances, or resisting any attack that might be made from outside. The hon. member for West Lambton has drawn my attention to clause 39. Well, Sir, this is no change in the old law, and I see no reason why there should be a change, because this clause really provides for what is absolutely required. I do not say that there can be any question about responsibility for that, as I think that the hon. member in reading it over again carefully, will see that these schools are really required. It is not a new law, it is not an amendment of mine, and I think the hon. member will see that the clause is really required. The hon. member for Algoma has taken a very deep interest indeed in Militia matters in his section of the country, and it was a pleasure to me to discuss this question with him from his stand-point. When the hon. gentleman called at my office and submitted the matter to me, I must say, as I told the hon. gentleman, that I could not give the hon. member all that he requires, because his constituency is a kingdom and it would require a standing army, such as my hon. friend from West Middlesex desires for Canada; but I think that, in making the changes which it is possible for me to make, that I can give the hon. member about one-half he has asked for, and I am sorry it will be so little. I must say that I feel deeply grateful to those hon. gentlemen who have considered this question and favored the House with their views. I can only say that I have endeavored to draw up a measure which would be as inexpensive as possible for Canada, but at the same time one which will make the militia force a force that will be perfectly organized and put upon a sound basis. I believe that, without the modifications in the present Bill which I have asked the House to accept, the money we are now expending is expended without our receiving the value for it we ought to receive. I believe that this training, which I have asked the House to provide for, would be well worth the money it will cost; I am perfectly satisfied that any hon. gentleman who takes an interest in the subject and who has looked over the Bill and studied its changes carefully, will recognize that this Bill is a step in the right direction.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question I asked him as to the extra cost this Bill would impose upon the country for the maintenance of the force which he proposes to establish under it?

Mr. CARON. I am sorry, indeed, to have forgotten the question of the hon. gentleman. We military men know so little about figures that the hon. gentleman's question, which was asked at the end of the discussion, had quite escaped me. Under the new Bill, the organization contemplated will cost about $150,000 per annum; and when the hon. gentleman sees the details of the expenditure, I hope to be able to convince him that it is really as low a figure as can possibly be applied to the organization contemplated.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that over and above the cost under the existing law?

Mr. CARON. Yes, under the existing law; but the hon. gentleman will find that the existing law gives very little money to the Militia.

Bill read the second time; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 21,

Mr. VAIL. Will the hon. gentleman give the Committee some further information as to how he arrived at the estimate of $150,000. The two present batteries cost $125,000 a year, and they do not number more than 150 men; yet the hon. gentleman proposes an additional corps of 750 men, part of which is to be cavalry, which is the most expensive arm of the service, and he estimates $150,000 as the cost. I would like the hon. Minister to explain on what basis he has made his calculation and to give the cost of each arm of the service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in calling on the hon. Minister to count the cost of the new organization. My hon. friend will do that by resolution, of which we have prepared a series, and on considering those resolutions in Committee it will be proper for the hon. gentleman to make a full explanation. The clause of the Bill provides for the formation of a certain force, but if the money is not voted its provisions cannot be carried out.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not agree with that proposition. After the Bill has been passed we must vote money to carry it out, but in order that we may pass the Bill we must know the cost involved.

Mr. CARON. I do not so understand the matter. If the resolutions are not acceptable to the House, the provisions of the Bill cannot be carried out.

Mr. BLAKE. The twenty-first clause makes it lawful for His Excellency to maintain 750 troops, and so forth. We have a right to know, before we agree to this proposal, something as to what will be the cost involved. When the hon. gentleman brings down the Estimates he will say, "You have passed the Bill, and the Estimates are merely to carry out its provisions."

Mr. CARON. As I understand it, the hon. leader of the Government has stated that the details will be explained when the resolutions providing for the expenditure of the necessary money will be presented to the House; and if the hon. gentleman takes the view, as I understand he does, that matters connected with the expenditure of money must be brought down by resolution, it seems to me that it is impossible to adopt any other mode than the mode suggested, that when the resolutions are brought down the details of the measure shall be discussed, and if found acceptable by Parliament, money will be voted. If they are not acceptable to Parliament the money will be refused, and the provisions of the Bill will not go into effect.

Mr. BLAKE. Then you decline to give any further details to the House. It is stated that the Bill is necessary in consequence of the withdrawal of Imperial and regular troops. What regular troops are to be withdrawn and when?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman knows, I suppose, that the Imperial forces have been largely withdrawn from Canada. At one time Imperial troops were stationed at Quebec, Montreal, and Toronto, and these have been withdrawn. That is what I mean. When those Imperial troops were withdrawn it became necessary to provide for the care of valuable property which had been transferred by the Imperial Government to the Canadian Government. I do not allude to any further withdrawal; I am merely speaking of the withdrawal with which every hon. member is acquainted.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it is because seven years ago the troops were withdrawn, that it is necessary now to increase permanently the fixed force; but what have we been doing to take care of this property in the meantime?

Mr. PAINT. May I remark that I think I see the point in this Bill. Last autumn I made a rather careful examination of the fortress at Quebec, with an officer, and it was plain that not less than 500 men can keep this fortress in order; only 150 men were there, and at every turn you could see that the fortress was dismantled; grass was growing in the street, and it was utterly out of order and unkept as a military position. I am rather pleased that the hon. Minister of Militia has found out a way of protecting this fortress. We have either to give it up or maintain it as a credit to the Dominion; and I am in thorough accord with this scheme.

Mr. VAIL. I presume the hon. Minister of Militia has based his calculation of the cost of this force on the cost of the present two batteries. Will the hon. gentleman kindly inform the House of the strength of the battery at Quebec—A? He has provided $125,000 for the future, and the Estimates name $128,000 as the amount spent last year. Does he decline to give the information?

Mr. CARON. I do not decline at all; but the hon. gentleman is completely mistaken with regard to my calculation. I have not calculated on the basis of "A" and "B" Batteries, because batteries of artillery have to keep up an establishment of horses, which are very much more expensive than is an infantry school, which we mean to establish; and it would be a very false basis to go upon. The hon. gentleman knows very well, from his previous great experience in the Department of Militia and Defence, that artillery batteries cost a great deal more money than would an infantry school.

Mr. VAIL. My hon. friend has given us no information at all, as to the strength of Battery "A" at Quebec; but I have a very clear recollection that when I occupied that position, he desired very particular information as to the cost of the battery at Quebec, and I naturally presumed that the hon. gentleman would be able to give us all the information necessary with reference to the cost of this battery—I quite concur with him as to the cost of the force, which he proposes to provide, because if he has to have cavalry, he must acknowledge; that it is the most expensive arm in the force; and how is he to have cavalry without horses, and how is he to get horses without money; and he knows very well the expense connected with providing horses now, of keeping them up, and of replacing them, as they become old and unfit for service. This will be a very heavy charge to the Department. I only ask for information; and I think that it should be given before this clause is allowed to pass. This is not a clause providing for a force to exist for one or two years but for a permanent force, and nothing short of that; you may say that the military organization of England is not permanent, because they are ten years men. We are providing for a force of three years men, only a shorter term of service, but this is as much permanent as is the military organization of Great Britain. I cannot see, for the life of me, why we should be asked to incur this increased expenditure, to be for ever a charge on the revenue, without fuller information on the subject.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman, from his experience, knows exactly the number of men that constitute a troop of cavalry. He will see that by this Bill, that I provide for one troop of cavalry; consequently, the hon. gentleman knows exactly what that number of horses and men will cost. As far as the organization of and expenditure connected with a school of infantry are concerned, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, that in a troop of cavalry or battery of artillery, the horses are a very expensive item; but in a corps of infantry, you have no such expenditure. I am very desirous that the hon. gentleman should understand that I will allow those clauses to remain over, consulting the hon. gentleman's wishes, in order that he may look into them; and I believe he will then find, that the proposed expenditure is very much smaller than he believes it will be.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad that these clauses are to be left over, to give the hon. gentlemen an opportunity of looking into them; but these hon. gentlemen are a Minister and an ex-Minister of Militia, and it must be remembered that some persons here have not had the good fortune to occupy those distinguished positions, and yet who have some responsibility connected with this measure—so I hope that besides this hon. gentleman looking into it the hon. Minister of Militia will also look into it, and avail himself of further information in order that he may be able to communicate it to the Committee at large on the next occasion, because I intend myself—for I confess that at this moment I do not know how many horses and men are in a troop of cavalry—then to make enquiries respecting this and such like matters.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman, the ex-Minister of Militia, will tell my hon. friend.

Clause stood.

On section 27,

Mr. BLAKE. As this clause appears to involve a charge on the revenue, it is clear that it cannot be proceeded with as it can only be dealt with by a resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I differ toto cœlo with the hon. gentleman, as to there being any necessity of commencing it by a resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say commencing it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no principle clearer than when an Act is a consolidation or a codification of an old statute, the organization of the Bill by resolution is not required, even in the case of money clauses, because no doubt these were introduced originally by resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say it was necessary to mention the Bill by resolution. I say that money clauses could be incorporated only by resolution, and this is not only a consolidation Bill but an amendment Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But this is a consolidation clause.

On section 29,

Mr. BLAKE. I object to that clause, as it is one which cannot be introduced except by resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Clause stood.

On section 30,

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain this clause?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman will understand from what has taken place already in the Department, exactly what this clause means. We had occasion to appoint one Deputy Adjutant-General who now has control of three military districts, namely, Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor, who now has control of the military district of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It may occur again that it will be necessary to amalgamate two districts for administrative purposes, in which case we would dispense with the services of the two Deputy Adjutants-General and replace them by one who would take control of the amalgamated districts.

Mr. VAIL. I can readily see that it might be a great advantage to amalgamate these districts, but I would like to know whether we may infer, from this clause being printed in italics, that it is intended to enable the Department to appoint one Deputy Adjutant-General for every district at a salary of $1,200.

Mr. CARON. No.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman says that he has now only one Adjutant-General for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It may be the case that he has but one Adjutant-General over some two districts, and, if so, he has one officer where this clause would give him power to appoint two. I merely ask for information whether that is his intention.

Mr. CARON. When the hon. gentleman was Minister of Militia and Defence, he will remember that he had a Deputy Adjutant-General for Nova Scotia, one for New Brunswick and one for Prince Edward Island; but, in order to economize as far as possible, we place the military districts of these three Provinces under one Deputy Adjutant-General, and reduce the expenditure by dispensing with the services of two. The Bill divides the country into twelve military districts, the same number as existed under the law; but this clause provides for the amalgamation of two districts under one Deputy Adjutant-General.

Mr. VAIL. But the clause has two meanings. In the first place, it authorizes the Government to appoint one Deputy Adjutant-General for every one of the twelve districts, at a salary of $1,200 a year; and it also authorizes the Government to amalgamate these different districts if they like. I think we ought to have a little more information on this subject, and as one or two other clauses have been allowed to stand, this might stand also.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman must know that the pay provided by the old Act was $1,200.

Mr. VAIL. I know that the amount paid was something like $1,600 or $1,700. Consequently there is some object in changing the clause, and I only want to know what that object was.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is completely mistaken about the salaries being $1,600 or $1,700.

Mr. VAIL. Not at all. The salaries and perquisites amounted to $1,600 or $1,700.

Mr. CARON. The allowances are not salaries, and they might be withdrawn to-morrow by Order in Council. The hon. gentleman will find that the salaries are $1,200 per annum. We are not interfering with the law as it exists, but we are taking the liberty to dispense with the services of one or more Deputy Adjutants-Generals if we like, for the sake of economy. It is not intended to increase the number of appointments.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By the present law, as I understand it, there are twelve military districts, each of which is to have a Deputy Adjutant-General at a salary of $1,200 per annum. But my hon. friend, as an experiment and for the sake of economy, has, for the present, amalgamated the three districts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island under one Deputy Adjutant-General, and he takes authority so to amalgamate them. For the present the three are amalgamated, and he takes authority so to amalgamate; but should the experiment prove a failure, should an alteration of circumstances, such as fear of war, occur, the Government would have the right to re-appoint a Deputy Adjutant-General to each of the three districts now amalgamated.

Mr. BLAKE. Unless unforeseen circumstances arise it is not proposed to depart from the existing policy. What is the object of the fourth sub-section of the clause?

Mr. CARON. At present the officer in command of our military districts is designated as Deputy Adjutant-General.

Now, the Deputy Adjutant-General can never be a field officer, because he is supposed to remain at home for the purpose of providing everything required for a force going abroad or for active service. He is the channel through which all the necessary arrangements have to be worked for the purpose of expediting the force on active service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He organizes the victory.

Mr. CARON. He organizes the victory. It may be considered necessary in case of active service, instead of having the Deputy Adjutant-General in command of the district, to appoint an officer who would be designated as colonel. For instance, the hon. gentleman knows that previous to 1868 commands were vested in the hands of the colonels who at that time were not lieutenant-colonels but colonels of the district and had control of the forces. In the case of active service, these men would not have taken command and become field officers, whereas in ordinary circumstances it suits perfectly well to have the control of the military district in the hands of the Deputy Adjutant-General, but a case of necessity might arise when it would be necessary for the Department to transfer the command—without dispensing with the Deputy Adjutant-General—from the Deputy Adjutant-General to the colonels.

On section 32,

Mr. BLAKE. Are the words "under regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council" in the existing law.

Mr. CARON. As the law now stands we draw up the regulations which are submitted to the Governor in Council. It is now provided that the Governor in Council, will have, under these regulations, the right of providing for exactly what we have been doing. We followed the system we mean to follow now, but it did not appear in the law.

Mr. BLAKE. There are two important points. The first is that the existing Act gives this provision as to retirement only with reference to officers holding commission in the Militia, on the day on which the former Act came into force. It would not give the power to any officers who had commissions subsequent to that day. The second point is that provision in the old Act, amended as it was, is that they may be placed on the retired list with or without a step of honorary rank. That is omitted now altogether. The hon. gentleman says it is important that the Governor in Council should pass regulations under which steps of honorary rank should be given, but he omits the clause under which the step of honorary rank may be given altogether. There is now no clause in the new Bill which would allow steps of honorary rank to be given to a retired officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, the original clause was apparently inserted at the time that the Militia force in each of the Provinces was amalgamated into one Militia force, and in order to enable arrangements to be made it was provided that officers should be allowed to retire with or without honorary rank to those below the rank of lieutenant-colonel, that is to say, that no person could get above the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and any persons below that could get up to that rank. The practice has been ever since that the Governor General, as Commander of the Forces in Her Majesty's name, had the power to fix the rank which the officers should retire upon. At all events, this is a good clause to have in the Act, that arrangements should be made by order of the Governor in Council under the direct authority of the Commander of the Forces.

Mr. VAIL. As I understand the clause, the object is to allow officers of the Militia to be retired, and to appoint somebody who might be more competent to fill the position, in the event of its being found necessary.

Mr. CARON.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman will see that provision is made for changes which were necessitated by the amalgamation of the whole Militia force under one system, when Confederation took place. I find in my notes referring to this clause that the first part of it was dropped. The hon. gentleman will find by referring to that law, that this clause provided for the retirement of officers who had served previous to Confederation under a different system, and this clause merely provides for one uniform system of retiring these officers and putting them on the retired list by the regulations being approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it, or is it not, intended that the Governor in Council may hold the authority which was formerly given him of giving a step of honorary rank upon retirement after the passing of this Act? Is it intended that it should be implied and exercised without the statutory authority under the new Act?

Mr. CARON. The question is left now for the Governor in Council to decide whether that right which was statutory will be exercised or not. Under the old law it was statutory, and there is no discretion that could be exercised. Under the new system it will be left to the Governor in Council to accept and to approve of the regulations which will retire these officers under this clause.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There was a discretion under the old law, and an officer might be retired with or without a step of honorary rank. It was therefore discretionary to give or withhold honorary rank upon retirement. There was no right to the officer retiring to have rank, but it was discretionary with the Executive under the Statute to give or withhold a step of honorary rank. I ask now, whether it is intended that the power to give honorary rank shall be statutory in the future?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In order to prevent the possibility of doubt, I think the clause ought to be amended as follows:—

Officers holding commissions in the Militia may be placed on the retired list with honorary rank not exceeding the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, or without honorary rank, according to regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. Why not adopt the old law which is in effect what has just been proposed?

Mr. CARON. This clause applied to the old officers previous to Confederation. The hon. gentleman will see that it really confers on the Governor General in Council the right which was exercised by Statute previous to Confederation, of retiring officers.

Progress reported; Committee to sit again.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 45) further to amend and consolidate, as so amended, the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion therein mentioned.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Customs.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:40 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 11th April, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CANADIAN ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. BERGERON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 105) to confer certain powers on the Canadian Electric Light Company, and that Rule 49 be suspended so far as it relates to such Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Has a petition been reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. A petition was reported on the 18th of March, but the Bill was not introduced, owing to an omission.

Mr. BERGERON. It was my fault that the Bill was not brought down earlier, and not the fault of the company.

SEMAPHORES.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Whether the Government have erected any semaphores on the coast of Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, last year; if so, how many, in what places, and at what cost. If none were erected last year, is it the intention to erect any this year; and if so, how many?

Mr. LANGEVIN. The Government have erected no semaphores on the coast of Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, last year; and it is not decided whether any will be erected this year; nor how many.

POSTMASTER, IBERVILLE COUNTY.

Mr. BÉCHARD enquired, Whether a postmaster had been appointed at Mount Johnson, County of Iberville, since the 15th March last; if so, what is his name, and on whose recommendation has he been appointed? Does he receive a fixed salary; and if so, what is the amount?

Mr. CARLING. The postmaster was appointed on the 15th March last, Mr. C. V. Pain. He is paid by commission in the ordinary way. He was appointed on the responsibility of the Department.

IRISH IMMIGRATION.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. CASEY, enquired, What steps have been taken by the Government, or by any railway or steamship company, with the knowledge and approval of the Government, to secure a share of the immigration from the distressed districts of Ireland; and with what success?

Mr. POPE. Correspondence has been going on with the Commissioners on the other side with respect to Irish immigration. Two gentlemen were sent from here to talk the matter over, and an understanding has been come to that seems to be satisfactory; and I have no doubt we will get a fair share of Irish immigration.

MOUNT FOREST AND GLEN EDEN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to establish a daily mail between Mount Forest and Glen Eden at an early date?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is under consideration.

FLESHERTON AND VANDELEUR MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to establish a daily mail between Flesherton and Vandeleur; if so, when?

Mr. CARLING. I am not aware that an application has been made for a daily mail. One was made by Mr. Sproule, for a tri-weekly mail, and it has been referred to the Inspector for report.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR A. T. GALT.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant), in the absence of Mr. Ross (Middlesex), moved for a return of instructions given to Sir A. T. Galt, by which he was directed to negotiate more liberal trade relations between Canada and Spain, or any Spanish colony.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the absence of the hon. First Minister, I desire to say to my hon. friend who has made this motion, that the instructions cannot be brought down without prejudice to the public interest. Negotiations are still in progress. As it is considered that the instructions, which are confidential instructions given to Sir A. T. Galt, cannot be made public without prejudice to the object which is endeavored to be attained, I am quite certain that, after this explanation, my hon. friend will withdraw his motion.

Motion withdrawn.

TARIFF ALTERATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for letters, memorials, or representations asking for an increase in the Tariff on any of the articles on which the proposed Tariff resolutions alter the rates of duty; and also asked permission to add the words "or grant a bounty."

Mr. BOWELL. I have not only an objection to the addition that the hon. gentleman proposes to make to his motion, but to the motion altogether. Most all the communications asked for by this motion are of a confidential character. When information is asked from any gentleman, whether he be a manufacturer or an importer, as to the values of certain goods, he, of necessity, sends them to the hon. Finance Minister, and they are of a confidential character. It would destroy, in the future, any prospect of obtaining information from persons engaged in manufactures, if you were to expose or advertise—for such would be the effect of the motion—all the letters which have been sent to the Department on questions of this kind. When information is desired in reference either to an increase or change of duty, it is obtained from all possible sources: from importers, manufacturers, merchants, and every other person interested in that particular article; and upon this information the Government decide whether to increase or diminish the duty. I am quite satisfied that if the hon. gentleman ever had occasion to enquire into the desirability of making changes in the Tariff, he obtained his information in the manner I have indicated, and I am sure he would see the force of the objection which I take to the production of those letters. In addition to the letters there are a number of specimens of articles which were affected, and if they were all to be brought down here we would have a tolerably good cart load of them, and tumble them on to the Table. The correspondence is somewhat voluminous, and even if the Government consented to the passage of this resolution it would take sometime to prepare these letters. But I take a broader ground than that—and I think the hon. gentleman will see the force of it—that it would be improper to bring down this correspondence and lay it on the Table, from the very fact that it would be exposing the business of every man who has, either at his own instance or at the instance of the Government, furnished the information required. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I make a distinction. If the Government obtained, either from manufacturers, importers or other persons having cognizance of the facts, information for their purpose, confidentially, and agreed that the answer should be confidential, of course such confidential information as the Government so obtained ought not to be brought down, because otherwise, as the hon. gentleman has said, if they make an application in confidence and the answer is given in confidence, and then brought down and laid on the Table, they would not be very likely to obtain replies to future applications of the same kind. That is one thing; but there is a great deal, or may be a great deal, of correspondence not of that character. I think if a person engaged in trade communicates with the Government, either by letter, memorial or representation, and sets forth that he requires an increase of duty in order that the public interests may be promoted by his manufacture being continued, developed or created, I see no reason why that evidence which is so tendered to the Government, should not be laid before Parliament. I see no reason whatever why such representations as are made on the part of one man or another to the Government to induce particular action with respect to the Tariff should be brought down to this House. We have had Tariff after Tariff. Every Session there have been various changes, and now there are no less than 135 Tariff resolutions before us, and many of them are based on the statement made by the hon. Minister that it has been represented that an increase of duty is required. Did he go around to the manufacturers and others and ask them to say what they wanted, or whether they wanted anything? Did he confidentially communicate to them that he was going to introduce changes in the Tariff, and asked them how much they would like? Did he apply to them to give him information, so as to enable him to judge how much more duty they wanted? I presume as these changes were made upon representations made to the hon. Finance Minister, they were necessary in the opinions of those who made the representations, either for the creation or development of industries in the country. In the course of last Session we were told that representations had been made to the Government that, if the Administration was sustained, some millions of capital would come into the country in the way of new industries. I suppose different persons came and surrounded the hon. Finance Minister—in fact he mentioned that several persons came to him with respect to a particular industry, and told him so-and-so. I say if John Jones and Thomas Smith come to the hon. Minister and say: "If you increase the duty from 30 to 50 per cent. or so on, I propose to establish a factory for the manufacture of such-and-such an article," there is no reason why the application should not be brought down to Parliament, and why we should not ascertain the moving causes of the increase in the duty, and have produced the voluntary applications of the different individuals for alterations in the law; and, therefore, I am unable to consent to withdraw the motion, though I do not, after the declaration of the hon. Minister of Customs, expect it will prevail.

Mr. BOWELL. Permit me to add a word or two in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. Even if the papers to which the hon. gentleman refers were brought down they would give a very imperfect idea indeed of the reasons which may have induced the hon. Finance Minister to have made a change on any particular article in the Tariff. For instance, to-day, if the hon. gentlemen and members of the Opposition are desirous of having all the information reviewed, we should have required two or three shorthand reporters, as from eleven o'clock until the meeting of the House, Ministers have been receiving three or four deputations, one deputation consisting of some thirty persons, all urging particular points in connection with the Tariff. While their representations were urged notes were made by the Minister who received the deputations of the points to which they referred; but no correspondence giving an idea of what took place at that interview could be brought down to the House. It is not true that either the hon. Finance Minister or any member of the Government ran around to ascertain whether manufacturers desired any increase in the Tariff; but the hon. Finance Minister, and other members of the Government have, whenever their time permitted, visited the manufacturing industries of this country to witness the progress made, and ascertain what was necessary to be done, if anything, in order to establish them more firmly, and whether the prices of the articles manufactured were not as cheap as they are procured in any part of the world. I do not believe it is a crime for any member of the Government to visit any industry, nor a crime in myself, as Minister of Customs, administering the laws placed on the Statute-book, to consult leading importers and ascertain if there is any harshness or grinding in the manner in which the officers are carrying it out, and endeavoring, as far as I possibly can, from the information I may obtain from them, to make the law work more smoothly in its operation, adhering strictly to the law, and at the same time to prevent any clashing or any difficulty which might arise from a want of knowledge on the part of any of the officers carrying out the law. I do not know whether it was a sneer which the hon. gentleman cast at Ministers for "going around" and endeavoring to ascertain what the requirements of the country are, or have been, in the past; but this I can assure the hon. gentleman, that I think it is the duty of every Minister having anything to do with the administration of the laws, or with changing or perfecting the Tariff, to ascertain and obtain from every individual that he can possibly reach, all the information he can to make the Tariff perfect. It is true a number of changes have been made since the new policy has been inaugurated, and admitting as the hon. Finance Minister did, and as every one must know, that in the changes made you cannot possibly reach and provide for all cases that continually arise, and more particularly in the adoption of a new policy in a country like this where new industries are continually springing up, I deem it to be the duty of the Government on every occasion when they find there is anything in the Tariff which requires amendment, to come down to the House and ask it either to increase the duty or reduce it, as the case may be, or the requirements of the trade may suggest. I certainly think, with the explanation I have given, that it would be more in accord with sound policy and sound procedure for the hon. leader of the Opposition not to press his motion for the papers, because, as I repeat, they will not supply anything like the information which the hon. gentleman would like to obtain by the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not charge that it was a crime against the Government to endeavor to ascertain what has been the progress of industry, and what is the position of the importing trade. On the contrary, I believe it is a prime duty of the Government to do so. I did not make any sneer in respect to hon. Ministers having interviews with manufacturers and importers. On the contrary, I hold that they would be grossly neglecting their duty if they were not to obtain information from such parties; but, I did say, that I did not suppose the hon. Ministers had gone around to manufacturers and asked them how much duty they wanted; and that there were applications for increased or new duties made voluntarily by manufacturers, and to which the attribute of confidence could not properly be applied. The hon. gentleman stated that it would be imperfect, because he cannot bring down all the samples, of which there may be a cart-load, and further that it would be imperfect, because he cannot bring down words of mouth which passed on the subject. We all know that there is hardly a return brought down to the House which is a perfect picture of all that has passed on the subject, because, in almost all cases, there have been words of mouth as well as written correspondence; but whoever heard an hon. Minister say, that he would not bring down the papers, because he could not bring down the talking too. We see what is written, and hear what is said; but now, because we cannot get on paper what was said, we cannot see what is written either.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so; that is all.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am a little surprised at the hon. Minister of Customs not bringing down correspondence, in which the public is so seriously interested. I think that if there is one thing above another on which the House is entitled to information, it is in relation either to increases or decreases in the taxes imposed on the people. The mover of the motion does not ask—he at once concedes this point—for any correspondence or any information given to the Department, or the Government, of a private nature; but there must be a vast amount of information upon which increases or recessions of duties are granted, which this House ought to have; and I must say, coming as I do from a county which suffers under the National Policy—I am free to admit it—that I regret this refusal. I was one of those who stood in the breach, because I thought that the National Policy was in the interests of the whole country of Canada; and I believe so now. I accepted the consequences of it, and went down and defended that policy and suffered for it; but the people, feeling that they had taught me a lesson, said to me: “Mr. Mitchell, while the National Policy may be for the good of Canada, we expect you, when you go back to Ottawa, to endeavor to see that the extension of this policy is not applied in such a way as to bear hardly and arduously upon the people of our class—fishermen, lumbermen and farmers;” and when I see the hon. Minister of Customs refuse to give information upon what increased duties are based, I must say I think that this information ought to be conceded to this House which he has very injudiciously refused to grant. I have had, during the past twelve months, brought to my notice many, very many, instances of hardship connected with the National Policy. In the county I have the honor to represent, I know of no one single interest which is benefited by its application. I am not one who is afraid to admit the facts—I am independent enough to do so—and I say that in a fishing and lumbering community no interest is benefited by the introduction of the National Policy. The axes which the lumbermen use, the chains with which he hitches his logs to haul them out—

Mr. CARLING. These articles are not dearer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are they not dearer, we will come to that by-and-bye. The harness they put on their horses, the flour that they use, the cornmeal which feeds not only the people but the horses, everything that goes into the development of the natural resources of a country such as Northumberland is, and a lumbering community, is taxed by the National Policy. I may be told that the bounty is given the fishermen, but there are not ten men in my county benefited by it. They are not boat but net fishermen; and I find that the hon. Minister of Marine, in introducing his Bill, deprives them of fifty miles of river frontage on the Miramichi, of the right to set their nets, which they have enjoyed from time immemorial. I am one of the members who was sacrificed for the National Policy. I supported it, and I believe in it, to-day, as the means of establishing Canada, and of erecting within Canada the material for making a great nation of her; but in its personal application to the affairs of my county it is detrimental; and when we find that taxes are to be imposed, and that the hon. Minister of Customs refuses to give the information through which these taxes are imposed, it is not such treatment as this House has the right to expect. I am not now going to make any extended remarks about it. I will take the proper time to deal with the question of how far the present duties apply unfairly and unjustly to the county I represent; but I do say, that when information such as has been asked for is demanded, the people's representatives in this House have a right to that information; and it is not for the hon. Minister of Customs to tell us that he gets information of a confidential character. This the mover of the motion has conceded, and it is not asked for; but the general information on which this legislation is based, I have a right to expect, and I think that the hon. gentleman is in the same position.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I think that this matter should be better understood before we go much further. Does the hon. gentleman refuse to bring down the information on which the hon. Minister of Finance bases the duties on several articles mentioned in the motion? I would like to know how the motion can be intelligently discussed in this House, with respect to specific and ad valorem duties of the articles—

Mr. BOWELL. It would be well for the hon. gentleman to discuss the motion before the House.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I understand that the hon. gentleman refused even that information.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. Minister of Customs did nothing of the kind.

Mr. BURPEE. I will then refer to the correspondence. This correspondence must contain a great deal of matter, placed before the Government, not of a confidential character, stating why the duty should be increased, and there should be no objection to bring this down, as it cannot be very numerous. There are two classes in this matter of particular interest: first, one side of the House, and then the other side; and it would be just as well that those who suffer by this taxation should know the reasons why they are taxed, as well as that those who benefit from it should inform the Government why they should get this increase in taxation. The party opposed to it should know the reasons for it, and I think the hon. Minister of Customs should certainly bring down the correspondence which is not of a confidential character, and give the reasons why this taxation is increased.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It certainly must strike the hon. members of the House as very strange that the hon. Minister of Customs has taken the decided stand which he has on this question. The motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition is that the House shall be placed in possession of information which is furnished to the Government, and on which they acted in framing the alterations in the Tariff, and which have a bearing on the interests of the whole country; and why this should be refused is something that is not very intelligible to Parliament. Of course, he has raised a difficulty in suggesting—what was not at all raised by the motion—that the correspondence might be something of a confidential nature. The hon. leader of the Opposition never by any act in this House—and I am sure he never will be—was guilty of asking directly or indirectly for any information of a private or confidential nature; and we have a right to get the information asked for. To say that there is a difficulty in the production of it would also be to ignore the line of argument of the hon. Finance Minister himself on a previous occasion. Why, who does not remember, and if any one does not remember it let him turn up last year's Hansard, and read the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, that the hon. gentleman then became an advertising agent for several large importing and manufacturing firms of the country, and did not scruple even to use the dignity of a Minister of Finance to advertise the private affairs of companies in this country. A letter there appears—if I am not mistaken—written by Mr. Greene, of Montreal, in which he detailed how this business had enormously increased. This was a cheap advertisement for Mr. Greene, and was very desirable to him; and this is precisely one of the increases respecting which information is asked for by the hon. member for Durham, voluntarily given by the hon. Minister of Finance on that occasion, because he thought it suited his purpose and arbitrarily refused by the hon. Minister of Customs on this occasion because we are forced to the suspicion that there is some correspondence there which might reveal something of a selfish nature on the part of the correspondents rather than a sincere desire for the benefit of the whole. Take again the statement of the hon. Finance Minister in this House in his Budget Speech:

"A gentleman said to me the other day: 'If you lay down the principle that books not published in Canada shall be admitted free, what would I, an author in Montreal, do? I would go to the United States and have my books published there, and bring them in duty free. I would thereby have both markets, and there would be no inducement to me to have my books published in Canada; but, on the contrary, there would be an inducement to go to the United States and publish them there.'"

Here we have the hon. Finance Minister giving to us what I would take to be a private conversation with a certain gentleman upon a certain subject which led him to take a certain direction in the legislation which he was proposing to this House on the Tariff; but the hon. Minister of Customs to-day tells us that it would be unsafe and unwise to give us such information. The hon. Minister of Customs says that all this information has been considered, and that after mature deliberation they have made up their minds; but the House wants precisely the same information in order that they may make up their minds. Perhaps this information if it were received, would redound to the credit of hon. gentlemen opposite—perhaps hon. members on this side who hold themselves ever open to conviction might alter their opinions if they had the benefit of this information. Here is another matter of information which is in the possession of the Department, judging from the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, and which I would like to have before us:

"We find now that circulars are being distributed with reference to certain articles, and stating that if they could crush these manufacturers out for a year or two they could have the market for themselves, and they are making an effort to get it."

Sir, I want to see one of those circulars. I do not deny the statement, but I want to see the circular, and I think I have a right to see it. It has been publicly alluded to, and I want it laid on the Table of the House so that I and the people of Canada may be in possession of that authoritative document so that it may be printed in our newspapers, in order that we may understand the line adopted to us by our neighbors. It is in the public interest that we should have it, and I think it is in the public interest that the motion before the House has been made, and I think that better reasons will have to be given before we feel satisfied with a negative answer to the request which has been made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it must be quite evident, from the speech we have just listened to that the hon. gentleman does not intend to be a Minister of Finance because if he had the most remote idea of filling that office, he would not have made the announcement which we have just heard; because no Finance Minister can carry on the business of the country, can collect the necessary information, can thoroughly do his duty, if he would accede to the proposition contained in the motion, and which has been pressed so strongly by the hon. gentleman. It is the business of the hon. Finance Minister to get all kinds of information from all sources—from interested sources, from suspicious sources, from sources which are dishonest, as well as those which are honest. He has to get such evidence as he can, and he has to weigh that evidence and consider it; and then, on his own responsibility, and the responsibility of the Government, he has to decide what he shall propose in the way of taxation, or the remission of taxation, when bringing down this his Financial Policy. He does it on his own responsibility and the responsibility of the Government, and he has to give such reasons as he thinks necessary to convince the reason and the conscience of the House; and the House will judge of these reasons and of these grounds, without reference to what influence may have been behind him. What does it matter to this House what Mr. A or Mr. B says, or Mr. Green or Mr. Blue. It is a matter of no consequence what information he gets, for he is obliged to submit to this House such good reasons for the measure he proposes that the House will accept them, and if they are not satisfactory, they will reject his proposition. The hon. gentleman says that this information ought to be given, because, last Session, the hon. Minister of Finance, in the exercise of his own discretion, quoted a letter from a Mr. Greene, and he said that was a great advertisement for Mr. Greene, and that it promoted the interests of that gentleman. If I remember aright, the hon. gentleman, in his place in the House, objected to my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Finance reading that letter. Did he not say that it should not be used as an advertisement? Has the hon. gentleman, or has any friends of his own, any representations which they want to get advertised? Does he think that there is, among all those papers, any correspondence of that kind—for, at all events, we have agreed that there is some duty to be put on cigars? Does the hon. gentleman wish to search among the archives of the Finance Department to find out whether there is any such statement—any such advertisement of the necessity of protecting cigars?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). All right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well what I mean.

Mr. PATERSON. I know what you insinuate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows what I have said. I am rather surprised that the hon. leader of the Opposition has made this motion, which strikes at the very root of the means of obtaining the best, fullest, and most exhaustive information on all subjects connected with finances. If it is to be understood that every manufacturer, and every person who is supposed to have a direct or indirect interest in the subject, is to have his letters pressing his own views published to the world, the Government will be deprived of the usual and ordinary means of getting such information; and I venture to say that in the last 150 years no such motion has been made in the British Parliament; and that if made it would be laughed out of the House. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), says he is surprised that this motion should not be granted. That hon. gentleman, when he was the able and efficient Minister of Marine and Fisheries, got an immense amount of information of every possible kind connected with the claims of Canada for compensation for injuries done to the fishermen; but if there had been the most remote idea amongst his informants that their statements would be published to the world, Canada would have lost all that information which enabled her to get the large verdict of $5,000,000—information which gave Canada and Great Britain a triumph, and information which got another hon. member an honor and a decoration which ought to adorn the breast of my hon. friend. If such a motion as the present had been made with regard to the hon. gentleman's Department, I am sure he would have risen with very vigorous indignation and rejected it. I have no hesitation in saying that this motion really strikes at the efficient administration of every Department. I oppose it, and I shall ask all my friends and all the friends of effective administration of affairs to resist this motion as unusual, as uncalled for, and I venture to say, unprecedented.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must ask the forbearance of the House for a few moments. As the right hon. gentleman has chosen to refer to me in a manner so distinct, and I may say so complimentary, I may venture, in justification of myself, to draw a distinction between the two cases he has referred to. The right hon. gentleman has referred to the vast amount of information obtained by me in connection with the Fishery question. I admit that I did obtain a great deal of information in relation to that matter, and I admit that there was a great deal of correspondence moved for that it would have been prejudicial to the public interest to have brought down, and that was not brought down. There are occasions in the experience of every hon. Minister, when it would be improper to make public, matters that come before the Government. The hon. gentleman has referred to distinguished honors having been conferred upon gentlemen in connection with the Treaty of Washington. It is a little singular that he should refer to these matters. There was a time when honors were being conferred upon my colleagues for services performed in connection with the creation of this great Confederation, when titles were being distributed with lavish hands all around, when the hon. gentleman had it in his power to give a title to Mr. Mitchell, as well as others, and he was left out. I may say that I did not suffer much from the omission, because I am not one who values these honors much. Sour grapes, it may be said; but I have survived. This case is a very different one from that to which the hon. First Minister has referred. The hon. member for Cardwell says: "Not a bit of it." He will, perhaps, blindly follow his leader, because it is said, although I will not say it, that he is the nominee of the hon. first Minister —

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Who says order? I am not out of order. I am speaking the honest conviction of my mind in this matter, and I say that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who may follow the hon. First Minister blindly, and when he calls upon them to refuse to give this information, I suppose they will follow him, and vote down the motion. The case brought up by the hon. First Minister is entirely different from this case. It relates to information obtained from a foreign country, and obtained in a way which hon. gentlemen opposite chose to designate as improper; and I may say that I owe but little to hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side for the manner in which they dealt with the information then obtained; but when there is a question of principle, involving the right of this House to information as to how our taxes are imposed on the people, whether they are for the advantage of the manufacturer or of the people, I put aside party and the flattering reference which the hon. First Minister has made, and I deal with the bold question as to whether the people of this country have a right to ask for every information that is in the hands of the Ministry, which can be given to this House without detriment to the Government, or contrary to the interest of the country.

Mr. BURNS. Coming as I do from a county in the same Province as the hon. gentleman's county is in, and having identical interests with the county of Northumberland, I think it right to criticise, in a few words, the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who represents that county. I think he was rather unfortunate in the argument he addressed to the House. I think he was rather unfortunate in claiming that the National Policy had not only not benefited the lumbering and the fishing industries of the county of Northumberland, but was actually injuring them. That I entirely deny. The hon. gentleman mentions two or three items to show how the National Policy has injured these industries. He mentioned the item of axes. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman how many axes have been imported into the county of Northumberland during the past fifteen years? I contend that 95 per cent. of the axes used in the county of Northumberland during that time, and under a Tariff of 15 or 17½ per cent., were manufactured in the Province of New Brunswick or in the Province of Quebec. The National Policy did not affect the price one iota, unless it lowered the price, by giving the manufacturers an enlarged market. With regard to chains, to which he also referred, I ask him if their cost has been increased 2½ per cent. by the National Policy? I might ask the same question with regard to the article of harness. I can simply say that not 5 per cent. of the harness used in the County of Northumberland, during the last fifteen or twenty years, has been imported. All the harness used in the lumber industry has been made in Canada, and largely in the chief town of the county; and its cost has not been increased to any appreciable extent. The hon. gentleman also spoke of flour. How many barrels of flour have been imported from the United States into the county of Northumberland during the last fifteen years? All the flour used in the northern part of New Brunswick comes from Quebec or Ontario, and that flour, being a portion of the surplus produced by those Provinces, is not enhanced one cent in its price. In regard to the question of cornmeal I am free to admit that the sentiment of the people of New Brunswick is in favor of placing cornmeal on the Free List; but, in acknowledging that fact, I say there is not the clamor against the imposition of the duty which is represented to exist, nor is cornmeal used down there as a matter of food to the extent claimed. A great portion of that which is used in New Brunswick is used for horse feed, and, on account of the imposition of the duty, a large quantity of oats is kept out of the country to the damage of the American farmers and the advantage of the farmers of New Brunswick, Quebec and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is evident we are drifting into a discussion on the Tariff, instead of limiting it to the question whether the papers asked for should be produced or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hardly know how much latitude is to be given in this matter. The papers called for all relate to the Tariff and it is difficult to say whether they have not some connection with the subject brought up by the hon. gentleman. I would ask the hon. gentleman to use his discretion, and not branch out on other matters.

Mr. BURNS. I do not want to branch out at all. Unlike the hon. member for Northumberland, I endeavored to give my views on the Tariff in the debate on the Budget. I was saying that cornmeal is not used for human food in the Lower Provinces to the extent represented, and, therefore, when it comes into competition with grain the benefit is to the farmer. I come to another item which shows the fallacy of the arguments of the hon. member for Northumberland, that is with respect to the fisheries. He has claimed that very few people derive any benefit from the fishery bounty. I am not prepared to say what is the number who are benefited in his county by it; but in the county I have the honor to represent a very great deal of good has been and is being done because of that bounty. We have at least 500 fishing boats there. The House can easily understand the immense benefit the bounty is to the people of Gloucester. In connection with the fishing and lumbering business I may refer to two important articles of food, tea and pork. We have now free tea. That is a great boon to the lumbermen and fishermen. No man knows better than the hon. member for Northumberland the enormous consumption of tea there is in the woods. Any time you go to a lumbering camp, the first thing put before you is a tin panakin of good black tea, and as the quantity consumed is very large the admission of tea without duty is a great boon to the lumbermen. The next item is that of pork. Under the old Tariff the same duty was imposed on pork as now, that is one cent per lb., so that in respect to that article the Tariff does not impose any additional duty. I have no desire to occupy the attention of the House at greater length, but rose simply to refute a number of statements made by the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. FARROW. I would very much like to have had an opportunity of discussing the National Policy, while the debate on the Budget was going on; but as time would not then admit of my doing so, I think I may be allowed a few minutes now to give the coming Finance Minister a little advice. I am sorry the hon. Finance Minister is not in his place; but I think the hon. member for Brant has received all he could expect to receive from the hon. Minister of Customs. If the hon. gentleman is seeking information, I can give him one of these circulars. I am as little acquainted with the hon. Finance Minister's business as any man in this House. I know nothing about his secrets, about his Department, so as to speak with regard to secrets. I do not know who has gone to him, or what representations have been made to him; but I do know that there are circulars throughout Canada—American circulars, which show that the Americans are trying to get, if possible, the trade of this country, and break down our own manufactures. I am sorry that a man of worth—a coming man—such as the hon. member for South Brant, should have any such teetotal ignorance about these circulars. I never expect to be a Finance Minister. I make no pretence to that, but really I have seen one of these circulars.

An hon. MEMBER. Send it over.

Mr. FARROW. I will send it over. I am sorry to say that that side of the House are generally wanting in gentlemanliness, as I have found after about a dozen years' experience in this House. Now, the Americans had a very good schooling when they began to manufacture goods to send to this country. When they commenced to manufacture axes the British manufacturers drew together and set to work to devise means to kill this competition. Take the manufacture of axes. How shall we find out their prices? One says: "I will tell you how; we will, for one or two years, if necessary, send in axes at a reduced cost and kill them out." They tried that. They hampered them as much as they could, but nevertheless the Americans succeeded. How? By placing higher duties. Now, if there is one manufacturing interest in Canada that has been helped by the National Policy, it is the manufacture of musical instruments, organs and pianos.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order. I wish to enquire whether we are discussing the Tariff, the National Policy, or the motion on the paper.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that in discussing anything relating to an increase in the Tariff, an hon. member may say that an increase upon one article has raised the price of other articles, that the duty was before too high, or out of proportion. He may cite these facts to justify the state of the Tariff heretofore, or justify the increase of certain duties. If he can go into the Tariff at all he can go into the whole Tariff.

Mr. FARROW. I will bring my remarks to a close by giving you this circular. There is a gentleman residing in Washington, New Jersey, named Daniel F. Beatty. He sells organs for $125 in his own country. He puts an advertisement in the Christian Guardian, of Toronto—a religious paper than which there is no better paper that I know of—that he will give Canadians that organ for $79 if they will remit in ten days. He says: "If you will clip out this little bit of coupon that appears in the Guardian, that little piece of waste paper shall be taken as good as $46. He goes on to say: "All freights shall be prepaid. There are twenty-seven stops. There are two golden reeds. There is a music stool. There is a supply of music for a century nearly. And all this at a reduction of $46, by sending this little scrap of paper, if you buy from us within ten days." Why not twenty days? Why not forty days? Why not for a whole year? Will the hon. gentleman tell me that $125 is not the real price of the organ, and that this $46 off is for the very purpose of getting the trade of organs in this country and swamping it? I am glad that there is an organ company in Bowmanville; I am glad the hon. leader of the Opposition represents Bowmanville, and I am glad that that organ company manufactures both organs and pianos. They produce just as good articles and as cheap as can be bought in the United States. The point is this: If you let this Yankee bring in these organs for $79, that are worth $125, the Bowmanville factory will be snuffed out, the Bell Organ Factory at Guelph will be snuffed out, the Clinton Organ Factory in my county will be snuffed out, and all these men who are working in these factories will be snuffed out. They will go to Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, New Jersey. I will close by sending this circular to my hon. friend the Finance Minister of the Opposition, and I trust that he will read it carefully. I trust he will glean the news it contains. I hope and trust that there will be sufficient good sense on both sides of the House to refuse the motion that has been moved by the hon. member.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have not had time to look at the circular, but I listened attentively to it, and I did not find that it says what the hon. First Minister said was in it. What I want is that circular in which the American manufacturers say—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is not a personal explanation.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; it is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it is not.

Mr. PATERSON. It is setting myself right. I have been misquoted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is allowed to make an explanation if he has been misquoted.

Mr. PATERSON. I have been misquoted. The hon. First Minister need not have tried to take that point. This is what the hon. First Minister said:

"But more than that, we find that our enterprising neighbors to the south of us have made up their minds that if such a thing is possible they will have for their manufactures the market of Canada at any price. We find now that circulars are being distributed with reference to certain articles, and stating that if they could crush these manufactures out for a year or two they could have the market themselves, and they are making an effort to get it."

That is what I said before. I do not deny that there is such a circular, but I want to see it. I have not seen it in the paper that has been sent across the floor.

Mr. FARROW. Does the hon. gentleman not think that that kind of work will do it effectually?

Mr. PATERSON. I am talking about a direct statement of the hon. First Minister.

Mr. CHARLTON. I imagined, a few moments ago, that I was listening to the dulcet tones of an organ, although I could not imagine it was a Yankee organ. It was undoubtedly a good loyal Canadian organ. It had only one stop, and we were very anxious to have that stop applied. Finally it was, and the organ ceased its tone. Well, Sir, I think this is a most humiliating come-down, from the position taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to this circular—quoting an advertisement in a newspaper with reference to the sale of organs, an advertisement that professes to sell an organ for $79, the list price of which is $125. Well, Sir, I do not know that it would be a very great detriment to the purchaser in Canada if he got the value of $125 for $79. I cannot see it in that light. It strikes me something as it did the little boy who was training his bull dog-pup once. He got his father to get down on the floor and let the pup take him by the nose. During the operation the father yelled with pain, but the boy assured him that while it might be hard on his father it was the making of the pup. So, while buying organs at this price may be hard on the organ manufacturer in Canada, it is certainly good for those who have to buy the organs. However, I assure the hon. gentlemen in this House that though this manufacturer sells his organs at a discount of $46, he is still selling them on better terms than they are usually sold. I am informed that from the price list of musical instruments a discount of 40 per cent. is given to the trade. The discount on that organ, valued at $125, would be $50, and the manufacturer was offering the organ at $4 higher than the regular terms of the trade to the Canadian purchaser. If this is all the hon. gentleman has to show to back up the assertion that American manufacturers are determined to ruin manufacturers in Canada, certainly it is a very humiliating come-down from the statement made. I do not propose to follow the example of the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Huron, and travel the ground so widely as they have done, with reference to the National Policy. The question before the House is a motion moved by the hon. member for West Durham, calling for certain specific informations, calling for letters or documents with respect to the increase of duties. A very small return would be necessary to include this correspondence. The hon. gentleman does not ask for any private correspondence; he asks for nothing but informations that was placed in the hands of the hon. Finance Minister, with respect to the duties on certain articles. There is nothing improper in the demand, and nothing improper in the hon. Finance Minister acceding to the motion. The hon. First Minister has told the House that the demand strikes at the right of the Finance Minister to receive and make use of confidential information. The hon. gentleman has told the House that the hon. Finance Minister makes use of dishonest informations, as well as honest informations. I dare say he does. I dare say a part of the informations submitted to the hon. Finance Minister to induce him to make particular changes in the Tariff, was dishonest, and that some of the influences used were dishonest. I believe the hon. Minister was approached by interested parties, not from a desire to promote the country's good, but to promote their private and selfish ends, and the hon. gentleman never spoke a greater truth in this House than when he said the hon. Finance Minister made use of dishonest informations, furnished by dishonest parties for dishonest purposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did the masses of the people go before the hon. Finance Minister and urge upon him changes in the Tariff? No; it was parties interested in having high duties imposed in order that their gains might be increased. The hon. First Minister has told the House that no Finance Minister can conduct his business, if the information he obtains is published. No papers are asked for which will interfere with the efficient administration of our financial affairs. Let me tell the hon. First Minister the way in which Tariff changes are made in the country from which he copied his fiscal policy. The United States last year was perambulated by a Tariff Commission which sat in every principal city in the country. It called before it parties interested in changes being made in the Tariff—manufacturers, producers, and agriculturists. It did not sit in the Star Chamber fashion in which this Government considers Tariff changes, but it sat in the open light of day, and in the presence of reporters of the press. How are Tariff changes effected in the United States? Not by the Secretary of the Treasury receiving private information, correspondence and deputations, but changes are organized in Committee of the House of Representatives in open court, in the presence of reporters of the press, and where all interested in the matter could attend and know exactly what was going on. There is no secrecy there. I hold that if the Government decline to furnish this information, the inference which the country will draw will be that the information was of an improper character, that there is something to conceal; and the country will be justified in drawing that inference. If I were not in this House, I would draw that inference.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course you would.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman had nothing to conceal, if the information was proper for the Government to listen to, the information should be placed in the light of day. Not only have the hon. members of this House, but the whole population of the Dominion, through their representatives, have a right to demand that Government should lay before Parliament the information that induced them to make changes in the Tariff. If the Government deny this information they stifle free enquiry, they stifle the demand made by the representatives of the people, that the people shall know what is going on in the Star Chamber, and ascertain what were the influences which produced the Tariff changes. The Government dare not make public the information. They know that conflicting, selfish interests were seeking to over-ride each other and obtain unjust arrangements under the Protective Tariff. The people do not require to be taught on this matter. I regret the Government should refuse to furnish the information asked for. I cannot say I am surprised, for it was inevitable they should do so. There is something to conceal, information which cannot be laid before the country without drawing on them the condemnation of the people.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman has referred to the United States as if there could be any possible analogy between that country and ours. When he is compelled to refer to the method adopted there in regard to changes in the Tariff in order to justify a motion of this kind, I think we may fairly say hon. gentlemen opposite have given up the case. In the United States there is no Government responsible to the representatives of the people for the Tariff changes brought down. The Tariff is adopted by Congress itself, by the House of Representatives, and the Senate. It is an open question; any member may propose what changes he pleases, and Congress can appoint, as it did appoint last year, a Tariff Commission to gather information on the subject. In this country, on the contrary, we have a responsible Ministry—thank God for that—and it is a decided advantage of which we may be proud.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) does not think so.

Mr. WHITE. The fact that the hon. gentleman prefers the American system shows how little he is capable of judging as to what is the proper course to follow under our constitutional system.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a personal explanation. I am accused of drawing a comparison which is unfair. It is the right of the people to know what are the influences which have produced changes in the Tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WHITE. I never object to any hon. member interrupting me if he has a correction to make; but the hon.

gentleman is now simply referring to the point which he urged, that the people should have an opportunity of knowing precisely what was the information and from what sources the Government obtained it, which enabled them to bring down their policy to the House. It is a matter of no consequence where the information came from if the Government assume the responsibility of submitting their conclusions upon it to Parliament. The objection I entertain to the motion is this: If we adopt this principle it will be impossible for any hon. Minister, no matter the Department over which he presides, to be able to obtain information from outside sources, from independent sources, from sources which do not desire to come before the public, not because of any special interest they possess in the matter, but simply from the fact that they are quiet people who do not like the prominence which the publication of their letters would give them. If we had adopted the principle at the time of Confederation, that every gentleman writing a letter to an hon. Minister on any subject of public interest, is liable to have the letter brought down to the House, as a public document on an Order of the House, I could, perhaps, understand a reason for the present motion; but gentlemen may have written to the Government in perfect good faith, conveying information which they do not desire the public and parties in the same branch of trade as themselves should learn; yet, by this motion, the House will undertake to make public that which the writer supposed, according to all precedents which have obtained in this country, should be a personal and private communication. I have reason to feel somewhat strongly on this question myself. Last summer a gentleman happened to call at my office in Montreal, and said: "I see by the newspapers that the Government are going to give a subsidy for a German line of steamers. Is it not possible that German Lloyd's, of which I am agent, may secure an opportunity to compete for the subsidy?" I said: "I do not know." He asked: "Will you write to Sir Leonard Tilley?" I said: "I have no objection." I wrote a letter which I considered a private letter. I received an answer asking for further information. I handed the letter to Mr. Gilmour, who is the party in question. He thereupon gave me certain documents, which I transmitted to the hon. Finance Minister. That was all that occurred, and yet I find myself paraded all through the newspapers as being interested in German Lloyd's steamers, and as trying to get the subsidy, which I never thought of, or dreamed of. That is a mere incident of what may occur. I happen to be a public man, and have to bear such charges; but merchants are not public men, and the hon. Finance Minister must and ought to be in a position to obtain from merchants all information possible. Now, in this particular case which is asked for, how are we going to get this information? Let us take what is now going on, and is known from the newspapers as going on; let us take the case of agricultural implements, for instance, respecting which there is a proposal before us that the duties should be increased—I am not discussing the question whether this is wise or unwise, but am merely stating a fact—what did we see the other day? That a deputation of persons—agricultural implement makers—came to Ottawa and had an interview with the hon. Finance Minister; their names were given in the newspapers, and they then went away. Now, how are we going to get any information under this motion as to what they stated in the Finance Department? The only possible information that we could get under a motion of this kind is precisely that information for which we ought not to ask, because it is information given by gentlemen to remain private, as they supposed would be the case, although they might not have marked their letters private—under the practice which has always obtained, that communications of this kind never come down to the House at all. What we have to deal with here is the Tariff resolutions submitted by the Government. They are responsible for those Tariff resolutions; and we have to obtain from the hon. Minister, on the floor of Parliament, the information upon which he has arrived at the conclusion to submit them to Parliament; but when we ask him to divulge the names of persons with whom he may have communicated—and communicated in perfect good faith, with the view of ascertaining what the opinions of experts, who may not be directly connected with the business in question at the time regarding these matters—and when we ask him to bring that correspondence down here, I think that if we passed this Order, we should simply destroy a very useful means of information which the hon. Minister of Finance in particular may have in the future.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Such letters are not included in the motion.

Mr. WHITE. I beg your pardon. Letters are included.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. WHITE. All letters not marked private are included.

Mr. PATERSON. Only those asking for increases in duty.

Mr. WHITE. I beg your pardon. But suppose they are asking for an increase in duty; suppose, for instance, that a merchant writes up to say that he thinks it would be for the advantage of the country—not asking for it personally, but merely suggesting—that there should be an increase in the duty on any particular article, and a correspondence occurred between him and the hon. Finance Minister with relation to it. The hon. Finance Minister considers it, and may adopt it, or he may not. It may be or it may not be embodied in the resolutions brought down here at all; but are we to say that because that gentleman wrote a letter, which he considered a private letter, to the hon. Finance Minister asking for an increase of duty, or suggesting one, he is to be paraded all over the country as having been seeking secretly to obtain that kind of increase of duty, or that change in the Tariff? What we have to do with, is simply with the resolutions as brought down here; and we hold the Government, as a Government, and the hon. Finance Minister especially, responsible for their provisions. I am not going to refer to the remarks of my pleasant friend the hon. member for Northumberland, who appears to be so touchy with relation to his own personality in this House, that he cannot even hear anybody say "hear, hear," without angrily flinging back something in retort. The hon. gentleman was a Minister of the Crown for six years. I was a supporter of the Government during that whole time, and if I wanted to put a witness in the witness box to prove that I am not subservient I would select the hon. gentleman himself. Sir, as a party man, I know my obligations, and as member sent here to support the Government I know my duty; I intend to support them until I find that their general policy is such that I cannot support them; and then I think, as a public man, responsible to my constituents and to my own conscience, I will know what course to take. But that the hon. gentleman, who was a Minister of the Crown, and who was very glad to get members of Parliament, and members of the press, and friends outside of Parliament to support him, and was very indignant when they did not support him—who has been a Minister of the Crown, and who knows the obligations of Members of Parliament to their party and to the Government should simply—because I ventured to say that the cases were analogous, as I believe them to be—throw that insult,—shall I say—

Mr. MITCHELL. Say what you like.

Mr. WHITE. No; I take nothing from the hon. gentleman as an insult, because I know him too well to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. Might I ask the permission of the House to say a word in response to the insulting remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell—the impertinent remarks of the hon member for Cardwell?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and who appears to have irritated the susceptibilities of his mutual friend to such an extent, says there is no analogy between the manner in which the Tariff is changed in the United States and in Canada; that here we have a responsible Government which formulates the Tariff, while, in the United States, anybody may propose a Tariff in Congress, and Congress may adopt it or not, and that there is no analogy between the methods of collecting information on this subject here and there; but I cannot see that this is the case. It seems to me that whatever be the mode in which the Tariff is actually formulated, the interest of the public in knowing exactly on what grounds certain duties are imposed, and for what reasons certain privileges are granted to certain people, is exactly the same here as in the United States. By a sound principle in Canada, a Tariff should be proposed upon information carefully gathered by a Commissioner or otherwise as in the United States; but my hon. friend says that the position is different; that in the United States, where Congress may do as it pleases with the Tariff, it is necessary to have a Commission to get evidence and formulate the logical principles of a Tariff which is best suited to the wants of the country; but in Canada, nothing of that sort is needed at all. We have a responsible Government, thank God! he says, to procure information in whatever way they may choose, from private persons, from interviews with the Department and from private letters which are not to be shown to anybody, and which ask for increases in the duties. They may collect information in all these ways, and then come down to the House and tell the House that they must accept this Tariff. He (Mr. White) says it is of no consequence where the information comes from if the Government take the responsibility of submitting the changes proposed. That may be the case with hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, and with hon. gentlemen who support any Government—because I do not confine it to hon. gentlemen opposite—but it is not the case with the public at large. It is of great consequence to the public at large where the information comes from, when a certain amount of money is taken from their pockets and put into the pockets of other people; and it is not only of consequence to them, but they have a perfect right to know the details as to how the Tariff is formulated, and, at the least, on what information increases are proposed, and in what manner the Government propose to justify the changes which they lay before the House; but there is one difference: my hon. friend was correct in saying that there is some difference between the state of things in the United States and here, although there is an analogy. There it is necessary to lobby the whole majority of the House, for the time being, while here it is only necessary to lobby the Government—that is the difference; and it is just because the lobbying is confined to the few gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches that we have all the more right to know; and it is the more necessary for us to demand on what information this small clique of men found the proposed changes which they have laid before the House. My hon. friend from Cardwell has been proceeding throughout his speech on the supposition that the letters asked for by this resolution include all the letters containing information which might be useful to the Government. Although I say we have the right to get all the information on which the Government have proposed changes, I do not say, and I do not think, that we have the right to ask for all the private letters containing private information as to the processes of trade, &c.; but the Government should give us the general results of them. We have not the right to ask for letters in detail, which may reveal trade secrets injurious to business; but what the resolution asks for is simply letters from manufacturers and others, requesting increases in the Tariff on individual items. It does not ask for the letters which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said should not be brought down, but it does ask for the letters which should be brought down. When changes in the Tariff are suddenly proposed by the Government, I think we should have some explanation as to why these changes are required; we should know whether or not there has been a public demand for them; and when those changes are made without notification, we are driven to enquire into the peculiar reasons which may have led the Government to propose them. These letters, which are said to be private, are about public business; they are asking the Government to give these particular individuals certain advantages over other individuals—to give them the right of charging more for their productions than they otherwise could. A letter which asks the Government to give a man a public advantage cannot be a private letter, in the sense that a letter which would reveal trade processes or secrets would be a private letter. I repeat that a letter asking the Government to give away a pecuniary advantage to an individual is a public letter, and should be brought down to the House.

NORTHERN AND NORTH-WESTERN BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Lieut. Governor of the Province of Ontario in relation to the award respecting the Northern and North-Western Boundaries of that Province not already communicated to this House, said: I propose, when the papers are brought down, to call the attention of the House to this subject, which is one of sufficient importance to engage the attention of Parliament during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT AT MORPETH HARBOR.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for copies of all correspondence, reports, &c., relative to proposed improvements at Morpeth Harbor, on Lake Erie; with statement of appropriations made for such improvements, and of sums contributed by private subscriptions or by the township of Howard, or any part thereof, towards such improvements; showing what disposition has been made of any funds so appropriated or contributed, said: It appears that during the Session of 1878 an appropriation of $750 was made for improvements in Morpeth Harbor, on Lake Erie. During the summer of that year, the southern portion of the township of Howard—in which municipality Morpeth is situated—voted something over $3,000 towards the same work. Shortly afterwards the Government was changed, as a result of the Elections of that year; and it turned out—I suppose on account of the poverty which overtook the public Exchequer in consequence of the change of Government—that this money could not be paid over; but whether that was the reason or not, the money has not been spent I believe. I am informed, also, that a large portion of the money voted by the Council, besides the further sum of $1,500, which was subscribed by private individuals, was put into the hands of the Government. I do not know all the details of the case, because the Council of Howard was not in my constituency at the time; but I am informed that the money was paid over to the Government, and that it has remained in their hands ever since. The contributors wish to know, in the first place, why the Government grant was not expended, and, secondly, why the moneys contributed towards the work was not returned. I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Public Works will be able to give the necessary explanations.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman evidently knows the facts, as he has thought proper to lay them before the House before the papers were brought down; but if he did know them, it was very unfair on his part to lay before the House as facts, figures and statements which he cannot say are accurate. Under these circumstances, he will excuse me if I decline to give any information just now. When the correspondence is brought down, he may find that he is mistaken as to some of his figures.

Mr. CASEY. I must correct the hon. Minister. My object in moving for these papers was to ascertain why this money was not expended, and what funds, if any, were handed over to the Government as the result of private or municipal subscriptions. I am informed that certain sums were paid over—I do not know whether my information is correct, or whether my informant knew the facts. It is simply because there appears to be an injustice on the face of the matter that I have moved for the papers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman began by saying that he thought it was on account of the change of Government that the Exchequer was so poor, and that the money was not expended. As he himself has given the reason why the money was not expended, I shall have to leave him with that impression until the papers come down.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that what I said about the poverty of the Exchequer was meant as a joke; but I think it would have been better for the hon. Minister of Public Works to have explained the real reason why the money was not expended. But as he has deferred giving these reasons for such a trifling excuse, I hope the papers when they come down will give full information on the subject. If the papers do not give full information, I hope he will be prepared to give a supplementary explanation at a later date. Probably the papers will not show all the reasons, and therefore I think the hon. Minister should supplement them by a personal explanation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that the hon. gentleman moves for papers, because the papers do not give the information he wants.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Statement showing the reduction made by change of mode of construction in contracts A and B Canadian Pacific Railway, and the amount involved by such change; also, for a statement showing the amount of each payment made to the respective contractors for each month since the letting of the work; also, a statement of all claims made by the contractors on each of these contracts, and the date of each claim.—(Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Copies of all correspondence in reference to any contract or contracts for lithographing entered into between G. B. Burland & Co., of Montreal, and the Government of the Dominion, showing what offers, if any, have been made by other parties for the performance of similar work, the names and addresses of such parties, and the scale of prices upon which such offers were based; also the scale of prices agreed upon between the Government and the said G. B. Burland & Co., or any other person.—(Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Statement of the values assigned in making the calculations of the duties to be proposed for the various articles on which specific or combined specific and ad valorem duties are proposed to be charged under the Tariff resolutions on the Table.—(Mr. Blake.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No 36) to amend the Act incorporating the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company, and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. Gunn.)

Bill (No 65) to amend the Act to amend the Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No 80) to amend the Act incorporating the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed :—

Bill (No. 42) to amend and continue in force the Act incorporating the Grafton Harbor Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No 78) to amend the Act passed in the forty-fifth year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled: An Act to repeal the duty of Promissory Notes, Drafts and Bills of Exchange.—(Mr. Weldon.)

ACADIA POWDER COMPANY.

Mr. McCARTHY, in the absence of Mr. TUPPER, moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company, limited.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. IVES. I would suggest to the promoter of this Bill that it should be again sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, a sub-Committee of which has been considering, in connection with a Bill to incorporate the Grange Trust, questions almost precisely similar to those raised in connection with this Bill, and have come to a conclusion that it would be preferable to have an independent Act of incorporation. I think it would be advisable to take the same course with respect to this company, rather than pass the Bill in its present shape. I am sure there is no disposition to prevent the passage of this Bill; on the contrary, it is desired to take an action in the matter that would form a precedent in future cases.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have been asked by my hon. friend from Pictou, who has charge of the Bill, to move it to-night, as he is unable to be in his place. I do not like to take the responsibility of accepting the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and if I had charge of the measure I would not feel disposed to accept it. I think it would be useless to establish two corporations when there is one already existing which has applied to this Parliament merely to have its power extended. The House has agreed that it has authority to grant those powers, and those who are interested in the incorporation are the best judges of what is most advantageous to themselves. What I propose is that the second, the fourth and fifth clauses should be struck out, and that the first and the third should stand. The result of that will be that we should be granting this corporation those powers which it could not obtain from the Local Legislature; power will be given to the company to have a place of business outside the Province in which it was created, and the other powers asked for will be left to be granted by the Local Legislature which incorporated the company.

Mr. IVES. If those clauses are struck out, my objections to the Bill will be practically removed. My principal objection to the Bill was that it was creating a sort of Dominion corporation with local powers; but I think there is no particular objection to giving a local corporation powers such as to extend its business over the whole Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the Local Act provides that the head office shall be in Halifax. If we authorize the company to change its headquarters, we shall be in fact amending the Local Act in that particular. I suppose the hon. gentleman considers that in our power, because the Local Legislature cannot give the company power to have its head office outside of Nova Scotia; but it rather appears to me that we are turning the company into a Dominion corporation.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think so. We are merely giving it power to do business outside of the Province.

Mr. BLAKE. How much longer will it continue to be a local corporation if it establishes its head office in British Columbia?

Mr. McCARTHY. It will be a local corporation, because it is incorporated by a local body; but it may do business in any Province, or in a foreign country by the usual courtesy.

Mr. BLAKE. Quite so; but it appears to me that it would be advisable to strike that clause out.

Mr. AMYOT. I am not the only one in this House who believes this Bill is entirely ultra vires; but at this stage of the Session, and under the present circumstances, I do not intend making any further opposition to the Bill. I hope, however, this will not be taken as an acquiescence in the principle. I have, with some other hon. members, decided to wait until next Session, and then to bring down an abstract motion as a declaration of principle against legislation of this kind. In this way we will avoid the accusations to which we have been subjected, of opposing certain Bills because they came from other hon. members—accusations which are always very disagreeable, especially when coming from our friends whom we support so cordially.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like this clause, as to the head offices of the company, unless there be something really requiring the company to have that power, to disappear from the Bill. It seems to me this will complicate matters very much, as we will have to look to the two Acts of Parliament, not merely as to the extension of the power of the company, but also to domestic details, such as the situation of the head office. If the hon. member for Pictou were here, and able, as I suppose he would be, to say it is not intended to remove the head offices from Halifax, there would then be no reason for the introduction of the clause, and if there be no reason, the Bill would be a better piece of legislation without it. Some of my hon. friends behind me think we are overstepping our jurisdiction in interpolating that clause; and without expressing at present my concurrence in that opinion, I think there is a great deal of force in that objection.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not likely the hon. member for Pictou will be here for some days; and at this stage of the Session it is, perhaps, best the Bill should better be read the third time.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

RETURNS CONCERNING DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that I moved for certain returns about two months ago to which I have had no answer yet. About two weeks ago I visited the Department, and saw Mr. Burgess, and arranged with him to give me an abstract of the information I wanted, which he informed me could be prepared without much trouble in the course of a few days. The facts I wished to get have reference to the following points: The first motion was for a return showing the total number of applications for land under colonization plan No. 1, and the names of the applicants. I wished upon that motion to have merely the total number of applicants and the total amount of land applied for. Another motion was for the total number of applicants for land where the conditions had been complied with, and the names, &c. I wished, under that motion, to learn merely the total number of acres granted. Another motion was for the total number of applications and the total number of acres where the conditions had not been complied with, and where extension of time had not been granted.

Another one was for returns giving copies of all regulations made by the Department of Interior concerning the management and sale of agricultural, mineral, timber and pasture lands, since the 1st December, 1881. Another was for an order showing the total number of acres of lands sold during 1882; and another for a form of patent or agreement between the companies and the Government. Now, Sir, an abstract of the information that I referred to can be easily given, and if it is to be of any service during this Session it will be necessary to have it very soon. The Land Bill may come up for discussion on its second reading in a day or two, and I take the liberty of asking the right hon. gentleman for an abstract of the information which I have been informed could be given.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he saw Mr. Burgess on the matter. Mr. Burgess sent me yesterday a memorandum of the first part as to the number of colonization companies, applications, numbers allotted, and the numbers on which first instalments had been paid, and the numbers on which second instalments had not yet been paid. But on looking at this memorandum the gentleman who acts for me said there was an error in one particular, and I sent it back for correction. He said it would be ready at three o'clock to-day. The others I will enquire about. Mr. Burgess is looking after all these returns.

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume it will only be necessary for the right hon. gentleman to tell Mr. Burgess to get these things out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is told that already.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

The Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy, that the Bill (No. 14) respecting Carriers by Land be now considered, and the motion of Mr. Ouimet in amendment thereto, being read,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the hon. member to allow this Order to stand. I know it will be a disappointment to him if he should allow it; but the fact of the matter is this: I was not in the House at the time the discussion took place, and have been so exceedingly busy in matters of administration as not to have been able to read the debate. If the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to stand, I will take care that he will have an opportunity of moving it, and that he will lose nothing by the delay.

Order allowed to stand.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

The Order for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 3) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, being read,

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker. This Bill has been reported from the Standing Committee on Railways, and the report is adverse to the Bill. Under ordinary circumstances, I would be inclined to accept the decision of the Committee, carried as that was by a very large majority; but I feel that this question has not yet been discussed in this House, and that it is by hon. members, and even by those who are on the Railway Committee, but imperfectly understood. For that, perhaps, I am somewhat to blame. Although the question has been up many years, it has never yet been discussed at any length, and I myself have not gone into detail in explaining the provisions of the measure which I have the honor to introduce. I believe there is, notwithstanding the adverse vote in Committee, a very strong public opinion—I am quite satisfied there is in the Province of Ontario—in favor of this measure; and I desire it to be understood that the Bill is not by any means dead yet, although it may have been disposed of for this Session, but the measure will re-appear, I trust, with a larger support than it at present receives in this House, if we are to judge by the vote given against it in the Railway Committee. I, therefore, desire to take this opportunity of stating, as briefly as I can, the provisions of the measure, and to endeavor, as I think I can, to dissipate the misapprehensions which prevail regarding it. The Bill deals with more than one matter. Although, of course, primarily it is for the appointment of a Railway Commission, it also proposes to amend the Railway Act, and to transfer from the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, duties which have heretofore fallen upon it. These matters must be dealt with separately. I observe in the discussion which has taken place upon the measure that some hon. gentlemen were opposed to the Bill, because it transferred the power of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, because in point of fact it practically abolishes the Railway Committee. If that is it he only objection these hon. members have to the measure, it can be eliminated from the Bill. The Bill is not by any means dependent upon that particular branch of the subject. I, for my part, have prepared the Bill in the form in which I think the measure should receive the sanction of the House; but I may be wrong in that, and if it be the opinion of the House that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council should not be abolished, there is no difficulty in eliminating from the Bill all passages which refer to that particular subject. I think, however, a consideration of the matter will induce the House to adopt the form which I support. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council is not a judicial body. It is, of course, composed of politicians, sometimes from one side of the House and sometimes from the other; always, I am afraid, more or less weighed by political motives.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. During the hon. gentleman's term of office that was not so, I dare say; but such an exceedingly good and excellent man is not easily found, and perhaps he may not be found again. In most cases, at all events, politics have something to say in the disposition of matters by that Railway Committee, and whether political motives between great railway companies do or do not influence the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in determining matters with which they are called upon to deal, it is a tribunal which is unsatisfactory in this regard. It is not always easy to get the Committee together. I am told by those who have had matters of this kind before the Committee, that one set of members, perhaps, heard the first part of the case, and another set heard the rest of the case another day; and the delay involved in dealing with questions before that Committee is another objection which is apparent from the statement I make. However, as I say, that is by no means the most important part of the measure, and if, in the opinion of the House, it would be well to try a Railway Commission without vesting the powers of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in the Commission, that can be done in the first place. But I propose to amend the Railway Act—and I think most hon. members will agree with me that the Act requires amendment—and that the amendments I propose are in the right direction. The power of railway companies to impose tolls is vested in the companies themselves. In this country, differing in this respect from England, there is no maximum rate of tolls placed in the charters incorporating the companies. The tolls are imposed by railway companies, subject to the approval of the by-laws imposing those tolls by the Governor in Council. That is the manner in which railway companies have a right to fix their tolls. The law provides that they may from time to time alter those tolls, but whenever that shall take place the by-laws must be submitted to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and receive the sanction of that body. This Bill does not in the slightest degree propose to deal with this matter. It does not propose to say that railway rates shall be fixed in any other manner than that provided by the existing incorporation of the companies by the provisions of the General Railway Law of 1879. It leaves railway companies in that respect just as they are, because in that respect they may be said to have vested rights. But the Bill does propose to impose additional obligations on the companies, obligations which, I venture to say, most of the members of this House have hitherto thought had been imposed by this Parliament. If hon. members will look at the thirty-second section of the Bill they will find it is copied word for word from the English Railway Act of 1854; and if they will compare that with the corresponding section in our own Statute, it will be found that although the language of section sixty, sub-section two of the Railway Act, is not very dissimilar from the legislation apparently proposed by the thirty-second section. By the difference of language used, a very great difference indeed is made in the enacting clause. In the Act, which I propose, it reads as follows:—

32. Every railway company shall, according to its power, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving, and forwarding and delivery of traffic upon and from the several railways belonging to or worked by such company, and for the return of carriages, trucks and other vehicles; and no such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favor of any particular person or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Now, allow me to read the corresponding section as it stands on the Statute-book to-day:

"Every railway company shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities to any other railway company for receiving, and forwarding and the delivery of traffic upon and over the several railways belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages and trucks, and other vehicles; and no company shall give or continue any preference or any advantage to or in favor of any particular company, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatever."

Now, the difference is great. By the law as it stands, the railway companies are prohibited from giving any discrimination—to use a word which perhaps will more fully convey my meaning—against any other railway company. By the law as it is in England, by the section which purports to be embraced in this sub-section of section sixty of the Railway Act, the object was to prevent discrimination between any particular person or any particular description of traffic, or in favor of any person or of any particular description of traffic. The difference therefore is very great, and I propose, Sir, and I think that the House will assent at all events to the wisdom of that proposition—that sub-section two of section sixty should be amended by adding to it, or by incorporating with it the substance of the section which is section thirty-two in this Bill. Now, I will read to the House the language of a writer on railways, and a recognized authority on the English railways, with regard to this section, Sir Wm. Hodges, who observes:

"It is perhaps difficult to select any one clause in a modern Act of Parliament which is more pregnant in the results than the above."

That is the clause as I have it, section thirty-two in the Bill, and not the clause that is at present the law of this land. He continued:

"Its avowed object is to protect the public from any evil consequences that may result from the grant which the Legislature has undoubtedly made to the railway companies of a virtual monopoly of the traffic over these great public highways. It is well known that the Crown has, from time immemorial exercised a control over the public roads of the Kingdom, and the name they obtained of King's Highways, sufficiently points to this right which the sovereign, as representing the nation, invariably exercised. The necessity of a supervision of some kind over the traffic on our railways has long been acknowledged, as it was felt that it would have been an intolerable abuse if the Queen's subjects were deprived of the protection which the Crown formerly afforded them when travelled over the ancient highways; and it may be assumed, that the need of a vigorous control and representation is even more necessary than it formerly was, when there could be no monopoly of the means of conveyance."

Now, this beneficial clause thus spoken of by an acknowledged authority upon the laws of railways, thus in force in England since 1854, is not yet, I am astonished to say, the law of this country; and why? Why is it that the railway companies here, possessing as they do, the monopoly to even a greater extent than in England, are not bound down as strictly as they are in England? Not to give undue facilities, not to discriminate in the way of traffic against individuals, and why is it? I would like to have explained that when this clause was incorporated in our railway legislation, it was altered in a way which practically makes it wholly inefficient, wholly worthless, wholly without effect; because no two railways run in any manner that it can be said of them that this section can be made operative, or can be applied to them in any sense whatever. Now, take this section as I propose to amend it, and add to that the other section which is substantially the law, as it is at present—that is section twenty-seven of this Bill, sub-section six of section seventeen of the Railway Act, known as the equality clause. We have substantially the law, as it is in England to-day; and as I believe it is on the other side of the line. Now, let me explain to the House what the equality clause means. By the Common Law of England, which is the Common Law of this country, carriers were not bound to carry at even rates for individuals. The duty that was imposed on common carriers, was that rates should be fair rates and should not be exorbitant. Well, Sir, as long as the carrying was done by stage coaches in the old fashioned way, that law was found to be sufficient, because, if the carrier imposed unfair rates, or exorbitant rates, he was very quickly brought to his senses by an opposition line being established; but when railways were created, when they virtually had, as they have, a monopoly of all the carrying trade of the country, it was deemed prudent and necessary that they should be bound to carry upon equal terms, and a clause, called the equality clause, which I have copied in terms from the English Act, and which I think is a little better and more full than we find it in our Railway Act—though substantially I admit it is to be found there—imposed that duty on railway companies; that is, between equal points, for the same class of goods, they shall charge equal rates. Then, adding to that this other clause which I have already spoken of, as in clause thirty-two, I produce the same law that has worked so beneficially in England since 1854, and these are all the changes, or rather this is the only change—and I deem it a most important one—which is proposed for the regulation of railways. Now, as an adjunct to this clause thirty-two, and in order to work it, the House will find clause thirty-three with its sub-section; and what does that provide? Clause thirty-two, amongst other things, provides this:

"That one railway company shall be an aid to another."

That in point of fact the whole railway system of the country shall be for the benefit of the public, as if it is but one railway system under one control and management. So that if a man wants to send goods from one point on any particular railway over another system of railways, he has a right to go to the railway company and to ask that company to impose a through rate; and that rate so imposed can be enforced upon the other companies, so that in fact the whole railway system of the country is made for the benefit of the public, as if it was, as I have already said, one railway system. Now, Sir, is there any objection to that? Is there any reason why a merchant or trader of any kind living on a line of road—it may be a short or it may be a long road—but short or long it would not reach the point to which he desires to send his goods; and is there any reason why this merchant should not have the right to forward his goods over the line on which he ships to another line, or for that matter, a third line, to the place of destination?—and how is that provided for? In this way: That the forwarding company, that the company which receives the goods, shall fix the rate; say it be from any point in the interior to the city of Montreal, going over two lines, they shall fix the rate for the whole distance; they shall notify the company on whose road they propose to send the goods that that is the rate suggested by the forwarding company of which they purport to give such a percentage, or so much to the second company. The second company either accepts that rate or they reject it. If they accept it, the matter is settled at once. If they reject it, then this Commission has power to settle whether it is a fair rate for the whole distance, whether the proportion that is to be given to each company is fair, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and to compel the different railways to be what they were intended to be, contributory to one another for the benefit of the public. These are the main provisions of the amendment of the Railway Law—I am not now speaking about the court, but about those provisions which are necessary to be made, and without which the court would be useless and unnecessary. First, we must enact the law, and having enacted it, it will be for the court to see that it is carried out. Now, taking the equality clause in the first place, taking the clause providing against discrimination and compelling the companies to give facilities which will afford the means of working out that clause in one particular, and I ask this House whether there is any one of these amendments which is not in the public interest, or any one to which any railway manager or company could fairly or properly object to become subject to. Then, Sir, if it be conceded that these amendments are in the right direction, if they should become the law of the land, then how are the railway companies to be made subject to that law. Some of my hon. friends will perhaps say that there are the courts, and if the railway companies do not obey the laws you can appeal to the courts. When the clause which I have alluded to as clause 32 was first made the law in England, it was perfectly plain that it was a matter which could not be enforced in the ordinary courts. It was a matter, as stated by several of the law lords, more of administration than of law, and it was considered that the courts would not effectively execute law in that respect. Notwithstanding these opinions, the head of one of the courts—the Court of Common pleas I believe—thought otherwise, and the jurisdiction of working out this clause thirty-two was imposed on that court. Several years elapsed, and that court was found to be wholly inefficient for the purpose—wholly unfitted for the discharge of the duties which had been imposed upon it; and this section, beneficial as it was considered to be by everyone who understood the subject, was found to be a dead letter, because there was no effective tribunal before which railway companies could be summoned and compelled to obey it. The result was that an amalgamated Committee of the House of Commons and the House of Lords determined that it was necessary, not that this law should be repealed because it was a dead letter, but that a court should be constituted which would be able to enforce obedience to its provisions and give the public the benefit to which it was considered the public were entitled to, and accordingly the Court of Railway Commissioners was established. Since that time the law has been workable, and the railway companies have not required to be brought into court, for they yield that obedience to the law which

prior to the establishment of this court they had wholly failed to do. Having thus briefly explained the provisions of the Bill in that respect, let me disabuse the minds of some of my hon. friends as to the powers of this Commission. The powers of the Commission, speaking generally, are confined to the enforcement of these three sections. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think, and judging by the statements made before the Railway Committee by those who attended here as a deputation in the railway interest, they also seemed to think that the Commission was intended to regulate the rates of all the railways in the Dominion, to interfere in all their traffic arrangements, and to meddle in their business whether they were called by any person to do so or not. There could not be a greater mistake. The Railway Commission will not have power to interfere unless there has been a violation of the provisions I have referred to, and unless by reason of that violation complaint has been made to them by some person who, under the Act, has power to make complaint. Now, if the equality clause is a proper clause, if it is honest and right that railway companies should between the same points, and under similar circumstances, carry goods for one man at the same rate as for another, if they violate that law, I would like to know why it is that they should be free from obeying the law, and being made subject to it. If the clause with regard to discrimination and affording facilities is a proper clause, why should not the railways be made to obey it? When we consider, after all we have heard, that the matter has been so grossly misunderstood, that many respectable mercantile men have come here and represented that this is an interference with the whole railway interest of the country, when it is only providing means by which the railway company shall be compelled to obey the law, I think it will be seen that the explanation I am now making is not entirely unnecessary. It was argued by the representative of the Northern Railway Company before the Railway Committee—and I have a right to refer to that matter because the papers have been sent down to us—that notwithstanding this change, the people who suffer would still have to resort to the ordinary courts of the land. Nothing can be further from the truth. The Bill provides a simple and easy method by which the companies may be compelled to obey the law. At present, if the railway companies do not grant equal rates, if they carry at a lower rate from point to point for one man than for another, I admit that the man who is charged the over rate can sue the company, if he pays the extra rate under protest, and recover the balance. There is no doubt about that; but it has been found in practice that this is not an adequate means of compelling the railway companies to obey the law because one individual is not able to fight a railway company. He is carried from court to court, and the amount involved, though, when multiplied in a number of transactions, becomes a serious matter for him, is not in each transaction of itself of sufficient importance to warrant him in taking proceedings in a court. Provision is made as follows:—

“Any municipality or railway company may, with reference to any of the matters set forth in the preamble, or any person complaining of anything done or any omission made in violation or contravention of the sections of the Railway Act relating to traffic arrangements or of this Act, apply to the Court.

“Any Municipal Corporation, Board of Trade, Chamber of Commerce, Corn Exchange or Agricultural Association, or any number of persons not less than five, being persons whose goods are forwarded or carried by any line of railway against which complaint is made, may be the complainants in respect of any violation or contravention of the Railway Act or of this Act; and the municipal or other bodies corporate or such five persons as aforesaid, shall have a locus standi to be complainants without being required to show any interest in the matter of the said complaint.”

I think that meets one great difficulty which is found in the laws now in force against railway companies. A man may suffer, and he may not be willing to incur all the risks of a law suit on his own account. In agricultural districts farmers may suffer by being virtually taxed by tolls improperly imposed, and yet you would hardly expect one farmer to involve himself in a lawsuit to enforce his rights; but in this case an agricultural association of which he is a member may, if the majority of the farmers belonging to it agree, become complainants; and so with a Corn Exchange, and a Board of Trade. But, although they may be complainants, they cannot be complainants unless there is a violation of the law. I desire the House to bear that in mind. They cannot call upon the Commission to inter-meddle with the officers of a railway company so long as it acts fairly and in accordance with the law; but if it is guilty of a breach of the duties for which it obtained its charter, then these parties only become complainants, and see that the law is enforced. These provisions, it appears to me, are not unfair to the railway companies. And that brings me, now, after the short explanation of the different powers the Bill proposes to confer, to consider the manner in which it would affect railway companies. In the first place, do we doubt, ought we to doubt, that the railway companies now habitually violate the law? My hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways, seem to think I am incorrect in charging the railway companies with a habitual violence of the law. I venture to say that there are not many men of that mind in the Province from which I come. I venture to say that it is as well known as any matter can be known which has not been absolutely proved, that railway companies are constantly and daily in the habit of discriminating both between individuals and between different classes of goods. I believe it to be a fact capable of the clearest possible proof that the railway companies so manage their business that they can make one man's fortune and ruin another man. I believe they so manage their business that they can build up one town, and let the grass grow in the streets of another, just at the mere whim of the manager. I speak of what I know, learned from my own experience. What is the answer to this? It is said: "If you interfere with our railway system, you will destroy the through traffic; if you impose by this measure restrictions upon the companies—if, in fact, you make them obey the laws under which they have obtained their charters, you will destroy the through trade of the country, and you will cause the vast quantities of freight that now find an outlet at the ports of Halifax and Montreal to be directed to Boston and other ports." I entirely deny that. If you invest this Commission with absolute power, I utterly deny that there is a word or a syllable in the Bill which would give to the Commissioners the power to increase the rate of toll between Chicago and Montreal, or between Chicago and Halifax, or any such points. All that the Bill proposes to do is to require that the rate shall be equal, not to enhance it or to prevent a company in Canada from carrying the through trade on competitive terms with companies on the other side of the line; but it provides also that, so far as the jurisdiction of the Parliament extends, companies chartered by this Parliament shall obey the law under which they have obtained their charters—that railway companies shall carry on equal terms and conditions to all men; that there shall not be this and that favorite; and in this respect a great deal has been said which was wholly beside the object of the Bill. Sir, it is plain to me that an attempt has been made by the chief railway company in Canada, which has entered into the contest, and made it, as it were, a personal matter, to defeat this Bill, and has brought down here deputations in hundreds to oppose it. A great attempt has been made by that company to imbue the public mind with the idea that if this Bill is passed, the through trade of the company will be destroyed. We have listened to their assertions; but did either Mr. Barker, of the Northern, or Mr. Bell, of the Grand Trunk, or any of the deputations who came to address us, point to one syllable which interferes with the through traffic of the railways? Why, it was amusing to hear one of these gentlemen, Mr. Plewes, tell us that the trade would be very seriously affected by the provision of the Bill, that the rates could not be lowered without thirty days' notice. We turned to the Bill, and we found that the provision was that the rate could not be increased without thirty days' notice. Mr. Matthews, from the Toronto Corn Exchange, fell into the same error. These gentlemen did not even understand the measure they came to oppose. All they said in the way of argument was that that provision would seriously injure the trade; but the provision is in the opposite direction, and why? Is it not right, if a man imports goods, whether from the United States or England, on the basis of the existing rate, that a reasonable notice should be given to him of a change in that rate? Is it unreasonable to say to a railway company, you have power to change your rates from time to time, but before you increase those rates—not lower them—you shall be bound to give sufficient notice to enable the trader, whether an importer or an exporter, to make his arrangements accordingly? Then it is said, you will destroy the shipping of the country, if you interfere with railway rates. Well, I ask hon. gentlemen to look at the measure for themselves, and point out to me where it makes any attempt to destroy the shipping of the country, or to deprive them of any freight which they convey to or from our shores. It is a fact that the railway companies carry from Brantford to Halifax, or from Brantford to Montreal for Mr. Plewes at a given rate, and that they charge his neighbor 5 cts. a bushel or 5 cts. a hundred more. Does that build up the trade of the country? Would it interfere with or destroy the trade of the country to require the railway companies to carry at the same rate for Mr. Brown, or Mr. Jones, or any one else, as they do for Mr. Plewes? All that the Bill stipulates is that whatever the rate is, whatever the special bargain is, that bargain shall be published at the railway office and shall be known to everybody, and that the railway companies shall be bound to carry for everybody at the same rate. But, it is said, "wholesale transactions are always done at a cheaper rate than retail transactions," and therefore it is impossible to allow Mr. Brown, a poor man, who is able to send only two or three car loads of grain, to compete with Mr. Plewes who is able to send twenty car loads. Now, if that is a good argument we ought to carry it out here. Mark you, I draw the line when I speak of discrimination between goods carried the same way, and I say the rates per ton ought to be the same, if goods are to be sent by the ton, per hundred if they are to be sent by the hundred, and by the car load if they are to be sent by the car load. But beyond that there should be no discrimination, because one man can send ten and a poorer man only one car. A friend of mine gave me an illustration which appears to me to be an apt one, and I take no credit for it myself. "Why," said he, "if railway companies have a right to discriminate because they carry twenty car loads for one man and ten for another, then a man who imports $100,000 worth of goods ought to get a reduced rate of Customs as compared with the man who imports only $1,000 worth." Is not that a fair illustration. You have on the one hand the wholesale transaction in the case of the great importer who brings in his $100,000 worth, and a retail transaction in the case of the man who imports only $1,000 worth; and according to this argument the former should have, say the 25 per cent. rate of duty reduced to 20, and the other should be compelled to pay the full 25.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh, no.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend will have an opportunity for pointing out why the same argument does not apply in both cases. I say it does apply and I venture to say when we know trains are made up, not because I send a car load of goods—they do not send off my particular car load to the sea-board at once but they wait until they get a number of cars. That I cannot object to. Then why should that car of mine, forming one of twenty, pay a higher rate than the one twentieth of the twenty cars which the rich man has to send forward. But, it is beyond argument. This is not a matter now open to argument, because the law of the land says so. If the hon. Minister of Railways thinks that is a wrong law let him repeal it. Let him come down and say the equality clause should not be the law; but so long as it is—and I venture to say no hon. Minister of Railways would dare to assert that it should be repealed—the law should be enforced; and it is equality according to the law that railway companies should charge per ton, per car, per mile and not by the train load. If you like you can say that when a man furnishes a train load he should get a cheaper rate. I deny that. It would destroy the business of every man of ordinary means in the country. Take grain, for instance. I am a buyer of grain. I go into the market and I buy from the farmers on the same terms as my neighbor. I pay $1 per bushel for it if the price be $1 per bushel, and I send it to the same destination as he; but because, forsooth, I am able to send twenty car loads forward and get $1.10 per bushel at the end I am able to make a profit of 5 cts. per bushel, whereas the man who sends five car loads forward can, although he gets the same price, only makes 3 cts. per bushel profit on the transaction. Is there any fairness in that? Is there any reason why these great monopolies which we have chartered, which we have constituted as our highways, to which we have surrendered, we may say, the whole carrying trade of the country, should have the right, at their option, to fix rates in that manner. In the same way, when we speak of the shipping we are told that Mr. Andrew Allan is adverse to the Bill; we are told that Mr. Cramp who appeared here and who is, I believe, the agent or one of the proprietors of the Dominion line, is adverse to the Bill. Of course, we are bound to pay respect to men who have large interests in the country. We are bound to listen to what they have to say. But, after all, if we have merely the opinion of Mr. Andrew Allan, and Mr. Cramp, and Mr. Andrew Robertson, they do not give us any argument, I do not think we are bound to pay respect to their opinions when not founded, as I submit they are not, on reason. These are the reasons which commend themselves to me, as I venture to say, unanswerable. I may be quite wrong in this; I may be quite prejudiced; I may have espoused this matter so strongly as to be blinded; but I venture to say that so far, at all events—and I have studied and read with very great care the authorities, and listened carefully to the arguments, on the question—no solid ground has been advanced why this power to discriminate should be given the railway companies in this country, with its several million dollars invested in railways, with its 8,000 to 10,000 miles of railways, a very large portion of which were built with the aid of bonuses given by the people, giving a special claim to the people to impose conditions and terms on the companies, and differing in that respect wholly from England, where the railway companies were established by capitalists and private means. Why, the people furnished 33 per cent. of the amount which has gone to build up our railway system, and yet we are deprived by the power of the railway companies, by the controlling influence they exercise, of the same rights over them that is to be found in England over the railway companies there, of the same means of controlling them that is now to be found in several States of the Union—seventeen, I believe—where Railway Commissions are established, and all on what grounds? Let me recapitulate them. Our position, they say, is so wholly different from that of England that no comparisons can be fairly drawn. That is not correct. I am willing, still, if this House is sensitive on the point, to have it enacted that through rates shall not be interfered with. I do not believe that this is at all necessary. I think the good sense of the Commissioners would be quite ample protection. But I am willing that through rates should not be affected. Then, if these are not affected, in what other respect do we differ from England with regard to our railways? Why, our railways, if we take out the through rates, are simply the conveyances for local purposes, and ought certainly to be subject to our laws. They ought not to have the right to discriminate between individuals and between point and point. A railway company ought not to have the right to ruin one town by carrying perhaps to the same point of destination freight from 150 miles distance at a cheaper rate than from 100 miles distance, passing over the same line. It may be said there is competition, but competition for how long. The manager of the Northern road told the Railway Committee that it was, in point of fact, doing an injury to these places which had intelligence and public spirit to establish competitive lines. Why, in the country from which I have the honor to come, they did establish competitive lines at an enormous expense to that country; they built a rival road to that other road which the manager of the Northern road represented, bonusing it to the extent probably of a third of its cost, and the people expected all the benefits from this competition. Well, within six months, under the precious Railway Laws of this country, these two roads joined hands, pooled receipts, and put up freights all round; and yet the Northern Railway manager tells the Railway Committee that if this Bill is passed we will destroy public competition and public spirit for the establishment of railways. That is, but a single instance, and there are many others of that kind which could be pointed out. Then we are told—and that is the favorite argument of the hon. Minister of Railways—that our railway system is in its infancy, that we are still suppliants in the money market for more capital to build more roads, and if we pass this Bill we will frighten capitalists away, and I think my hon. friend was so far imposed upon as to tell the Committee that the stock market in London was shaken to its foundation, or in some state of trepidation at the action of this House. Well, now, if the people of England who have their money invested in railway companies have been willing to create a court for enforcing the laws which regulate railways, they, who are, perhaps the most conservative, in the sense in which I use the term with regard to capital, of any people on the face of the globe. Is it likely that these same English capitalists would be frightened by our repeating their law in this country?

Mr. McCARTHY,

Mr. MACKENZIE. It was stated on the Committee that the Commission had ceased to exist.

Mr. McCARTHY. That was a mistake. I have since conferred with my hon. friend from Pictou, and he admits he made a mistake. I must tell my hon. friend opposite that that law is yet in force and will be in force until the end of this year, as he will find by looking at the list of expiring laws for the year 1882. Why is it enforced until the end of this year? Because there was a Committee sitting in 1882 which had been constituted in 1881, and at the close of 1881 this Committee was only able to report that they thought the court should be continued, and they recommended that it should be continued to the next Session. In the Session of 1882 the same Committee was re-appointed, and they came down at the end of that Session with a report in favor of continuing the court, in favor of making it more permanent and giving it increased powers; and yet it would be supposed that in face of that report, the House of Commons intended to abolish the Railway Commission. But nothing can be found of the kind, and if my hon. friend will take the trouble to look he will find that the Railway Commission is yet in force. Now, I do not really know at the moment what other objections there are to meet in this. I think I have sufficiently established that the amendments proposed in the Bill are in the right direction—I mean the amendments to the law regulating railways; and I trust, whatever be the fate of this Bill, that my hon. friend will not lose sight of these amendments when he brings down the Railway Act which is promised to us. In making that the law of the land it is proposed that there should be some adequate means of enforcing that law. It is not the intention, nor is there a syllable in the Act which would give rise to the argument that this court is to be a court to meddle with railway companies unless they have brought themselves under the censure of law, unless they have been carrying at illegal rates, unless they have been discriminating against localities or individuals, unless they have been dealing in a manner in which they are not permitted to deal by their charter, they cannot be interfered with by this Court. Their rates are not within the purview of this Commission so long as they are kept within their by-law, nor can they be reduced, increased, or affected. That is a matter which is not proposed to be dealt with. All that is to be dealt with is that their rates shall be equal. My hon. friend from Monck suggested that if we do that these railway companies will at once put up their rates. I believe it to be a fact that they are now carrying at less rates than by law they could carry at. Why? Because they are already exacting as much in the shape of tolls as they can get goods to carry at. They know that there is no other obligation upon them, and they do not do it for love of the public. They are not the great benefactors that carriers by water are, they are not the great benefactors in that respect that my hon. friend may be, for they are carrying simply at the highest rate they can exact and get a car load of goods. The law of supply and demand regulates that as it does almost everything else. That law fixes the rate and says: If you charge beyond a certain rate those goods will not bear it. If you charge passengers, for instance, beyond a certain rate the result is there will be less travel. If you do not give return tickets it is found there is not as much money made in the passenger traffic. Why? Because the lower you charge—within reason, of course, I speak—the greater is the bulk of travel, and the greater in the aggregate is the amount of receipts. I venture to say that all railway managers regulate their tariff and their tolls simply by the quantity of goods they have to carry and what charges these goods will bear, knowing full well that an additional amount would in all probability prevent the carriage. Now, that same law will still exist. That same rule, which is higher than any law, will still prevail and will still compel railway companies to carry at rates which the public can endure in that sense, and which will bring the most profit and the most money into their coffers. Therefore, I think that argument has only to be mentioned to be disposed of; and so it is with all the other arguments. I think if time and opportunity were afforded for a full and fair discussion here in open day in presence of the people's representatives and before the people themselves by means of the gentlemen of the gallery, that it will be found that great misapprehensions prevail as to this Bill, that the railway companies have endeavored to create them, to foster them with a view of preventing the Bill from passing. But I still think this Bill is in the public interest, and that this law cannot be much longer delayed. I, therefore, move that you do now leave the Chair, and that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon this Bill.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Carrier). I do not intend to speak very long upon the motion of my hon. friend. It is sufficient to mention that his Bill was rejected by a vote of seventy-six to twelve to be convinced that it is not a popular one, at least in this House. Is it more popular in the country? We have had several deputations and petitions against it, while most of the petitions in favor of the Bill came from municipalities. We did not, however, hear the representatives of those municipalities before the Committee. We received a petition from the Board of Trade of Toronto, but that body was evenly divided on the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is a mistake. The Board of Trade was divided at the first meeting, not on the final vote. At the first meeting there was but a small attendance, and the vote stood ten for to ten against. At the second meeting there were seventy or eighty present, but when the vote was taken it stood nineteen for to one against.

Mr. GIROUARD. I presume the fifty or sixty members who did not vote had left the meeting under the impression that the question would not come to a vote. However that may be, we have a petition from the Board of Trade of Montreal strongly objecting to the Bill. We also heard the shipping companies of the Dominion make the same objection. Now, what is the real object of the Bill? Is it to introduce new principles? The hon. gentleman says it is not. He says that the "equality" principle has been in existence not only in this country for years, but also in England, and in the United States; in fact we know that it has been in force in England since 1834, and in Canada since 1849, but the hon. gentleman says we have no means of enforcing that law. We all agree upon the principle; we all know that when the goods are offered for transportation from one point to another under similar circumstances, the same rates must be charged. We all agree with that principle, but the hon. gentleman wants to introduce a new mode of enforcing the law. I contend that the mode before the ordinary tribunals is quite ample. I will not trouble the House by quoting all the decisions on the point, but I will mention that from 1851, down to the present time, at least ten decisions will be found in the law reports of England, where the difference charged by companies to shippers has been returned to the party who had been wronged. I will trouble the House only with a quotation from one of the decisions. It was rendered in 1869 in the case of the Great Western Railway Company against Sutton rendered in the House of Lords in England. The noble lord, Lord Chelmsford, said:

"The last subject to be considered is the form of the action; whether an action for money had and received, will lie to recover back overcharges made upon the carriage of the plaintiff's goods, not absolutely, but relatively to the charges made to other persons. It was argued for the defendants that the charge upon the plaintiff's packed parcels being warranted by the 10th and 11th Victoria, chapter 226; and being reasonable, and within the absolute discretion of the company, the plaintiff was not injured by other persons being charged less than he was. But this is a fallacious way of viewing the question. The plaintiff's complaint is not that others are charged less than himself, but the fact of their having been charged less, entitled him to claim the same rate of charge, and that all beyond that rate is overcharge. The very fact of the smaller charge to others is the ground of his complaint of an overcharge to himself. Now, if the defendants were bound to charge the plaintiff for the carriage of his goods, a less sum, and they refused to carry them except upon payment of a greater sum, as he was compelled to pay the amount demanded, and could not otherwise have his goods carried, the case falls within the principle of several decided cases, in which it has been held that money which a party has been wrongfully compelled to pay under circumstances in which he was unable to resist the imposition, may be recovered back in an action for money had and received. In the language of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Parker vs. The Great Western Railway Company, the payments made by the plaintiff were not voluntary, but were made in order to induce the company to do that which they were bound to do without them."

But the hon. member for North Simcoe asks how it happens that if ordinary modes of proceeding had been efficient, a special Railway Commission had been appointed in England? The reason is very plain. The English railway system is not in its infancy. The whole country is covered with railways, and as differences between shippers and forwarders and the companies were becoming more frequent, it was thought desirable, with a view to adjusting claims, that a special court should be appointed. But the circumstances there are not the same as here. This country is new; our railway system is only in its infancy. The movement of the hon. member for Simcoe seems, therefore, to be in the wrong direction. Not only do we find decisions in England and the United States on that point, but we also find decisions rendered both recently and some time ago in the Dominion. A remarkable case is on record in the Ontario courts. The shipper did not claim damages for the difference between the true rate and the overcharge. He went further and asked through the Attorney-General for an injunction against the company. The injunction was granted, and it was to the effect that the railway company should not make any discrimination. In that case the court said:

"Different rates may be charged, even upon the same portion of the road under different circumstances; but then those different rates must be sanctioned by approved rules, applicable to all Her Majesty's subjects using the road under the same circumstances. But in the present case the established tariff has been reduced, most materially reduced in favor of the defendants, not upon any principle recognized by the by-laws of the company and applicable to the public generally, but in virtue of a private contract, in which no other member of the community has any right to participate."

Not only an injunction will lie from the Attorney-General, but I believe an injunction applied for by a private party will lie also. I say more, that proceedings can be taken in the name of the Attorney-General to have a railway company's charter cancelled for having evaded the provisions of the law. It seems to me, therefore, we have to-day ample means to enforce the law, and I do not see why the country should go to the expense of establishing a court which will cost at least $40,000 or $50,000 to enforce laws which can be enforced to-day by the ordinary tribunals, especially as the Bill is not demanded by the people. The hon. member for North Simcoe said that great advantage would arise if actions could be taken in the names of municipalities and agricultural societies, as the railway corporations were very powerful and would take a litigant from court to court until his means were exhausted. What has been the experience in this respect in the results of cases against railway companies? Invariably not only the jury, but also the Judges are in sympathy with the individual parties. And it is very remarkable in looking at the eight or ten cases I have referred to, that in every case the railway company was condemned. It is true that one company carried the case to the House of Lords, but there the company lost it. There is no more difficulty in enforcing claims against railway companies for overcharges than there is for damage to, or loss of goods. For these reasons, I think there is no necessity at the present time for the Bill, and it will not be required for a great many years to come, at least until we have covered Canada with railways, as is the case in Great Britain and the United States to-day.

Mr. McCALLUM. Mr. Speaker: I desire to state the reasons why I intend to vote against the Bill of the hon. member for Simcoe. In the first place it may be remembered that there are $300,000,000 invested in Canadian railways, and by the Consolidated Railway Act they can charge tolls until they earn 15 per cent. on the capital invested. The investment of this capital gives the companies vested rights, and while I am in sympathy with the people, I do not desire to check the development of our railway system and place the companies in the hands of three Commissioners. Listening to the remarks of the hon. member for North Simcoe, one would imagine the railway companies were operating their roads to favor one class of the community more than another, and lays down the doctrine that if a man ships goods, the companies should carry 1,500 lbs. as cheaply as they would a ton—in other words, they should haul one car load as cheaply as a whole train. Now, I have practical knowledge on this question, and it is somewhat different from that; and if any one will consider it, he will see that if you ship a steam engine, it will cost you more than a car load of goods; and if you ship goods in a vessel which has to call at two or three storehouses to load, you will pay more than if she has to load only at one place; and it will cost the railway companies more to carry one car load than twenty car loads in proportion, because they may have to load at half a dozen different stations to make up the train. So to-day, although my hon. friend thinks that they are discriminating, they are really not doing so; they are only charging what is right and proper in that respect. Further, the hon. gentleman says he is willing to strike out some of the clauses in his Bill, because he had desired to place it in the power of three men, not only to run, but to pronounce as to the building of these roads. He wished to put the power of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council into the hands of these three men, who, I may say, would not be responsible. I tell him that to place the whole railway system of the country from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, in the hands of three men would be intolerable; the people would be obliged to come from thence to Ottawa to present all their grievances, and this would be most inconvenient. He says, he does not want to interfere with their rates; but in his speech, when he introduced the Bill, he had a grievance, and what was it? He then at least intended to interfere with their rates, holding that it was a great injustice to the people, because they carried goods from Chicago to some other place, at less than the local rate. He said:

"One instance occurs to me at this moment where a large corporation carried a certain kind of goods from the city of Chicago to the interior of the Province of Ontario at a less rate than from one part of Ontario to another. I think it was this: This company charges more to carry by the carload from a local point to Belleville than to carry it all the way from Chicago."

This must have been a grievance, which he wanted to remedy by this Bill; but if he does not now want to interfere with through rates, why did he make these remarks? Mention is made of the management of railways in England; but it is, of course, differently situated. They have there no foreign railway competition, while we have to compete with American railways, and if our railway companies are to be curtailed in their powers, in any way, respecting through traffic, it will work them great injury. My worst grievance against the railway companies is this: When two roads get on bad terms with each other, they make their connections as crooked as they can, and one train often leaves five minutes before the connecting train of the other line reaches the station. This is the greatest fault I have to find with them. When my hon. friend says that the railways of this country are taking all the money they can out of the people, I can say I know better than that; and I have no doubt that every man within the hearing of my voice knows that, if they so desired, they could take more money from the people. In fact it is not desirable for these companies to be on bad terms with the people. While on this question I would observe that, before long, this Parliament will have to compel the railway companies to afford protection to the lives of the brakemen in particular, which could be done by the expenditure of probably $4 or $5 a car, in placing a hand rail on the top of the cars. I know that a great many young men have lost their lives owing to the absence of this protection, and it could be provided at a very small expense. I thought that my hon. friend, in view of the feeling of the Railway Committee, would drop this Bill; and I have no doubt at all, that if he does not withdraw it, the House will soon dispose of it.

Mr. CASEY. I confess I sympathize to a very great extent with the promoter of the Bill in the position which he has taken. I think that the public have an undoubted right to regulate a great many points connected with railway traffic, even more than we now do so. There is no doubt that, as these companies owe their existence and privileges—many of which are very remarkable, and which entrench to a considerable extent on what otherwise would be the rights and liberties of the people in the way of expropriating lands, &c.—we have the right to regulate their action afterwards and see that it is guided to some extent by the public interest, and not merely by the interest of the roads themselves. Beyond this is the fact that a great deal of the people's money is invested in these roads. We are told here night after night how much private capital is invested in them, but we are not so frequently told how much of the people's money is so invested, and how much has been given them by this and the Local Governments and by the different municipalities. We are apt to forget these large contributions, by which we are, to some extent, shareholders in them, and as such have a direct right to interfere in their management. It is scarcely worth while to discuss this point further, because our right to regulate them is admitted and maintained Session after Session, in our legislation. The question at issue is rather as to the mode in which the regulating laws should be enforced than as to our right to regulate, and I am convinced that a Commission of some sort, though perhaps not exactly such as the hon. gentleman proposes, would be for many purposes the most convenient way of enforcing existing laws. No doubt it is true that we have a remedy in the courts for any actual breach of the law by these companies, but many of these breaches are in themselves so slight and unimportant that it is scarcely worth anybody's while to go to law about it, while, at the same time, they create great inconvenience and irritation amongst the people. In other cases, although I believe there is some truth in the statement made, the juries are apt to go against railways, still undoubtedly a railway company has a great advantage in appealing from one court to another, and can fight an action of this sort much longer than can a private party. We have all known of cases of poor people, who are scarcely able to bring the first suit, resisted by the companies in claims which appear to be just on the face of them, and are carried on until the suitor is worn out, and an apparent injustice is done. I think, Sir, that it is possible in many cases the Commission might act very efficiently as arbitrators—more efficiently than a court, and that the railway companies would be willing to agree to an arbitration before the Commission. My hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Mackenzie) reminds me that there is an appeal from the Commission, but still I think the Commission might act as arbitrators in such cases. I think it is rather in the way of prevention than of remedy that the Commission will be useful. I think that the regulations that they have power to make, would have the effect of preventing many of those cases of litigation which arise between railway companies and individuals. Of course, competition keeps our railway companies in order to a great extent. When two railways run between the same points, the one which is the more obliging, and gives the better rates, will have an advantage over the other. But we must recollect, that the day of competition is apparently come to an end, and that the amalgamation of these great corporations is prevailing to an alarming extent. Rumor has it, that what virtually amounts to an amalgamation is going still further, and that arrangements are being made between the two great corporations which control nearly all our iron highways—I mean the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway—which will have the effect of amalgamation so far as traffic is concerned. If this rumor should be realized, as is not improbable in the future, if not immediately, the check of competition will be almost entirely gone, for there will only remain a few small roads here and there calling themselves independent, but really dependent on the large roads for what freight they carried. I think under those circumstances there should be some means of enforcing fair rates and arrangements of traffic which will control all the roads of the country. We are told by the opponents of the Bill, that the argument derived from the existence of a Railway Commission in England is of no force here, because of the different circumstances in this country, our roads having to compete with the railways across the line. True there is a difference, and it would not be possible for a Commission in Canada to enforce rates with the same uniformity as in England. Some account would have to be taken of the competition of these American roads, but we must remember that this competition to-day is of a character which is reckless, and what some people would think of a stupid character. We find these roads carrying passengers at rates which do not pay them, but it must also be remembered that we, the people of Canada, have to pay so far as it is possible to make us pay, for the losses which are incurred in carrying freights and passengers at these low rates. That, Sir, is a direction in which a Commission might regulate with advantage, although, as I said, they could not enforce such absolute uniformity as they can in England, but there are other matters which a Commission would have to take care of besides the mere regulation of freight charges and passenger rates. There are many regulations necessary for the safety and comfort of the passengers, which cost something to the railways, and which they are not likely to adopt of their own motion unless they are going to gain something thereby. Where keen competition exists these accommodations will be provided to the passengers, but where competition does not exist, and I fear that within a year or two it will not exist in Canada, there is no incentive to the companies to do more than is necessary to give ordinary accommodation to travellers so as to prevent them from shunning the railways altogether. But, of course, people must travel, and they must travel largely by railway, so that there is little power to ensure those comforts and conveniences, and a Commission could do valuable service in this direction. I need not go further into all the Commission might profitably do for the benefit of the public. I think we are all agreed that some central power, having regulative authority over railways, would be an advantage; but as to the particular scheme proposed by the hon. gentleman, I am forced to agree, to a great extent, to what was advanced in the Railway Committee. I am afraid that the Committees, or even a Special Committee, have not the time and, perhaps, have not the knowledge of railway matters sufficient to frame a perfect scheme. I am afraid I have to agree with the proposition to proceed no further with this Bill at the present time, and that the proper mode would be to have a Commission of Enquiry, before which evidence might be taken on both sides of the question. I am afraid—although I am one of the twelve—apostolic in number, if nothing else—

Mr. McCARTHY. I am afraid you are the Judas of the twelve.

Mr. CASEY. I say I am afraid that though I was one of those who voted for the preamble of the Bill, in order that it might be saved and that we might have a further discussion in the House, that there is not the slightest prospect of getting anything accomplished under the present state of feeling, and I think it would be rather wasting the time of the House to go on discussing the Bill in detail when we have not sufficient evidence on the matter before us. I trust that the proposition first mooted, I believe, by the hon. Minister of Railways, to have a Commission of Enquiry, will be carried out, and that we will be in a position to act intelligibly next Session with all the evidence before us which can be obtained from both sides on the question. But if the Government do not see proper to take this step I think I shall be inclined, under those circumstances, to assist the hon. gentleman and as far as we can to get the best possible Bill under the circumstances.

Mr. ORTON. Notwithstanding the expression of opinion given by the Railway Committee, and notwithstanding the views of the hon. Minister of Railways for whose opinion I have the highest respect, and who is held in the highest respect by the people of this country, for the eminent services he has rendered in developing our resources, by the encouragement he has given for great railway enterprises, and the able manner in which he has administered the Railway Department—I say that, notwithstanding these opinions, I feel that this matter is one of such great moment, that the more it is discussed the better it appears to be in the general interests of the country. I cannot help feeling that the time is coming when a great battle will have to be fought for the rights of the people, against the claimed rights of the large railway corporations of the country. I must say that this Bill is, at any rate, in the right direction, and so far as I can judge of its different clauses, I believe if it were carried out by the House, and brought into effect, it would do away with a vast number of the evils which are acknowledged on all hands to exist with reference to the management of our railway corporations. I shall endeavor to go over some of these evils for the purpose, in my feeble way, of placing them before the House in order that they may be remedied. The first great evil which the people of this country are feeling more and more every day, is the discrimination given by our great railway corporations in favor of the produce of the neighboring Republic, over the produce of our own country, in carrying it to the markets of the world. I referred, before the Railway Committee, to some facts which are very suggestive in this particular. Last fall the Grand Trunk Railway carried American flour from Detroit to Boston at 14 cts. per barrel cheaper than it was carried from the county town of Wellington, and 20 cts. cheaper than it was carried from Chatham. Millers at Chatham had the flour taken to Detroit, in order to have it shipped from Detroit to Boston and thence to the Lower Provinces. Now, the National Policy was promised to give the farmers of this country the first choice in their own markets, but owing to the discrimination which has been given by the great railway companies of the country in favor of American produce, the beneficial effects of that policy, with reference to flour and other products of the farm, have been, to a large extent, destroyed. Why, Sir, we find that American millers are sending a much larger amount of flour and selling it in Canadian markets this year than they did last year. Why is this? Simply because they get lower railway rates. In Montreal American flour is much more largely sold than it was last year. If this continues I have little doubt that we shall, in the future, see the flour of Minneapolis and the wheat raised by the farmers of Minnesota and Dakota passing over the Canadian Pacific Railway, past the very doors of our own farmers, to supply the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec at a cheaper rate than the railways will permit our own people to do. During the past year the railway companies have perpetrated another great wrong upon our people to a greater extent than they did in former years. I refer to the discrimination which they have given in favor of the United States over our own country in the accommodation provided for carrying farm produce. There is hardly a point in Ontario where complaints are not made by those engaged in purchasing the products of our farmers, that they cannot get what they have bought taken to the markets of our own country for the want of cars. The railway companies are employing themselves more and more in carrying the produce of the United States, and they allow the produce of our own country to remain until a more convenient season. The result is serious loss to the farmers of Canada. There is not a farmer in the country but is deeply interested in this important question; and I venture to say that in a short time they will show, in a very unmistakable way, that they desire to have some such legislation carried into effect, as this Bill proposes. The discrimination in favor of individuals is also a very grave wrong. We were told before the Railway Committee, the other day, by a gentleman engaged largely in the shipping trade, that cheaper freights were given to individuals who knew how to be courteous and polite to the railway companies—in other words, to those who knew how to behave themselves, and would conform to the railway companies' rules. In that remark a gentleman was giving away his case, because he came down here in the interest of the railway companies, and he proved that the railway companies do discriminate in favor of individuals, in spite of the provisions of the General Railway Act. Moreover, they do not make their rates public. They evade the law by giving rebates, and the true rates are not made known to the public, to the great loss and injury of shippers and others. Now, we see railway companies coming to this House, day after day, seeking for incorporation and asking for great powers. We see them asking to be allowed to hold timber limits and mineral berths, and to engage in the work of developing them; and I have no doubt they will shortly want to engage in the business of purchasing and dealing in grain. We can easily see what serious evils are likely to arise from the exercise of these powers by railway companies. The result will be that individuals who are not subservient to them, cannot possibly compete with them in purchasing produce, or in developing the timber and mineral resources of this country; so that in time the railway companies will have a monopoly of our natural resources, and will absorb the great bulk of the profits that should accrue to the people at large. I am strongly in favor of this Bill. It has been said that the people of England, who have tried a Railway Commission, have become disgusted with it; but so far as I can learn, such is not the case, on the contrary I learn that the English Railway Commission has been an eminent success. Other countries also are learning the evils of railway monopoly. In Germany the large railways have been bought up by the Government, and the same course has been taken in France and other countries. It is not the intention of this Bill to interfere with through traffic in the proper sense, that is, traffic passing from a foreign country through our country to another foreign country. It is, no doubt, of the greatest importance that we should encourage the products of the United States, whether agricultural or manufactured, to pass through this country to other foreign countries, but it is not in the interest of the people of Canada that these products should be brought to our own markets at more favorable rates than our railways will give to our own people. There has also been great evils in connection with the amalgamation of railway companies. Many municipalities which have given large bonuses, and involved themselves in very serious debts in order to obtain competition, have been totally defeated in the objects for which they invested their money, by these railway companies exercising their power of amalgamating. We find that their lines are absorbed by the great railways, and they have only one line instead of two. Now, I hold that when municipalities have, for the sole purpose of creating competition in railway freights, given large bonuses, no Government should allow any large corporation to amalgamate with or buy up said railways without refunding to the municipality or individuals the bonuses they have given for the purpose of creating competition. It is said that railway companies have lost money in this country. While this may have been true in reference to the Grand Trunk Railway, we all know that this railway was built at enormous expense, at a time when railway construction was, I might say, in its infancy on this continent; but we know that to-day railways can be built at one-half or almost one-third of the cost at which the Grand Trunk Railway was built. I would also point out the fact that on the other side of the line the wealthy men are the great railway kings. The Vanderbilts, the Goulds and other men of that stamp are the accumulators of wealth in the neighboring Republic, and when we recollect that we have in the Dominion as large an area as the United States, and with a great variety of resources, there is no reason why our railway corporations should not accumulate wealth in a legitimate, honorable way in this country. I maintain that the railways are chartered for the purpose of being the public carriers for our people and not for the people of a foreign country alone, and they should therefore afford proper accommodation for our people, and then if they can also accommodate the people of a foreign country, let them do so and gain all the profit possible. I shall not make further remarks this evening in reference to this matter, but I hope this House will, at any rate, give a great deal of encouragement to the movement of my hon. friend.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I cannot hope that any remarks of mine will have the effect of inducing this House to accede to the motion placed in its hands by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Indeed, if I had any hopes of that from the beginning, the fact that the hon. member for West Elgin, one of the twelve apostles who voted for this Bill in the Railway Committee, has declared himself now against the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe, would have disabused my mind of any such idea. History repeats itself, but I hope that hon. gentleman will not follow the example of that other apostle who went out and hanged himself. I made a statement in the Railway Committee the other day—a statement which I declared was, to my own personal knowledge true, that a discriminating rate had been made by a railway company in favor of one shipper against another on freight between the same points and under similar circumstances. That statement was correct, but I have since been informed by the manager of the railway company to which I referred, that the discrimination arose from some incomprehensible error on the part of the agent, at the point at which these goods were shipped, and I think it due to the railway company and myself to take this opportunity of putting that explanation before the House. I accept that explanation on the part of the manager of that railway company, but, notwithstanding that, I believe that discriminations are sometimes made, and I believe that they are made under the law as it stands. It has been declared by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this Bill, and who are opposed to it—and I think the hon. member for North Simcoe expressed the same opinion—that the law regarding equality, as it stands on the Statute-book, is such that if the courts were called upon it could be enforced, it would be found, however, that the railway companies may discriminate in favor of certain persons without being amenable to the law at all. The clause reads as follows:—

“All or any of the tolls may, by any by-law, be reduced and again raised as often as deemed necessary for the interests of the undertaking; but the same tolls shall be payable at the same time and under the same circumstances upon all goods, and by all persons, so that no undue advantage, privilege or monopoly, may be afforded to any person or class of persons, by any by-laws relating to the tolls.”

You will observe their declaration is that no undue advantage may be given to any person by any by-law of the company relating to tolls; but even under that provision of the law, a lower rate than that fixed by the company might be given to some particular individual. I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to this clause of the Act, and suggest to him, in addition to what has already been suggested by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that the 60th section of the Act, relating to traffic arrangements, should be amended, that the 17th section be also amended, so as to provide that no undue advantage—if this court is not to be constituted—be given to any person, under similar circumstances, by a railway company, either by its by-laws or in any other way. It is a matter of fact, whatever may be said to the contrary, that railway companies do often violate the law as it stands upon the Statute-book. The 26th section of this Act provides that railway companies shall put up at every station, where there is a telegraph pole, a board upon which they shall register the time of the passenger trains that are overdue. I believe that very few, if any, of the railway companies in this country observe that law. It is true a penalty is provided and railway companies may be sued for that omission, but the very fact which was stated in the Railway Committee the other day, by a gentleman who appeared against this Bill, on behalf of railway companies, that the companies did sometimes discriminate in favor of those who addressed themselves properly to the railway magnates, will, I think, establish the fact that it is almost impossible for any individual who expects to have any business to do with the company, to put the machinery of the law in force, and punish the company for the violation of the law. I simply desire to draw the attention of the House to these two questions—first, for the purpose of setting myself right, or giving to the House the statement of the manager of the railway company to which I referred the other day in the Railway Committee, and secondly, for the purpose of drawing the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to that clause which has been called the equality clause, and which I think ought to be put in a better position than that in which it stands at present on the Statute-book.

Mr. McNEILL. It is not my intention at this late hour to occupy the time of the House at any length, but the question is one of such great importance and so very interesting to the country that I should like to claim the indulgence of the House, while I make one or two observations with reference to it. It seems to me there are two questions involved in that matter. The first is whether the interests of the public, in their dealings with these great railway monopolies, are properly guarded, or whether they are in some degree at the mercy of these corporations; and the next question is whether, if they are not properly safeguarded, we can, by some such machinery as that proposed in this Bill, safeguard them without at the same time doing greater harm to the railway companies themselves and thereby injuring those very public interests we wish to protect. Now, as to whether the public interests are efficiently guarded in their dealings with the railway companies, I venture to think there can be but one opinion. I venture to think there is no hon. gentleman in this House who does not know and feel that the public are simply helpless in the hands of these great railway monopolies, and that in Canada we are especially and of necessity so. The people of Canada are a scattered population, and a comparatively poor population, and they find themselves constantly in the presence of a few great and powerful corporations who have laid their hands upon the whole carrying trade of the country. That is a condition of things which unfortunately admits of no dispute; it is notorious and patent to everyone. Now, the public carriers of Canada occupy such a position as I have described. They are theoretically subject to the laws, theoretically any individual may have his grievances redressed by appeal to the courts of law; but we all know that practically there is no such redress, we all know that practically no private individual is in a position to carry on litigation with a railway company; we all know that if he attempts anything of the kind he will be ruined, and he knows it very well and consequently does not attempt it. Now, with the permission of the House, I will call the attention of hon. members to the evidence on this subject of Mr. Scott, the Manager of the South-Eastern Railway Company of England, who was examined before a Joint Commission of the Lords and Commons. Though Mr. Scott was a hostile witness, and says that Mr. Cardwell's Act was a strong power to protect the public interests from encroachment by the railway companies, yet he says :

"No private trader scarcely, unless he is a large carrier or nominal owner, has sufficient stake to raise an action in a court of law."

But Mr. Scott being, as I have said, a hostile witness, proves his hostility by his remarks in answer to another question :

"I think it is very difficult to appoint a board, or define what the board shall be composed of, or what its functions are to be. It appears to me that the legislation already provided should be exhausted before any new legislation is attempted."

This is a line of argument with which we are familiar in this country, and it is a line of argument which had formerly been employed in England in reference to this matter. Now, just as we have these grievances, just as we have this difficulty in Canada, so they have had to encounter in England the same difficulties, where they found it was necessary in some way to build the power of the railway companies. But there was this difference in England, that the railway companies there never had and never could have the same power and influence that they have in Canada. The circumstances were widely different. In the first place, the population of England was not, as it is in Canada, a scattered and comparatively poor population, but it was a population which was very dense and very rich. In the next place, railway enterprise had its origin in England, and so to say, passed its childhood there, and it was, therefore, subject to the great influences by which it was surrounded in that country. Railway enterprise in England was subject to the influence of the great corporations of the ancient cities of England; it was also subject to the influence of the ancient and wealthy guilds, to that of the landed aristocracy, and to that of the enormously wealthy commercial classes of England. It was also subject to an influence which was still more powerful and effective, and that was the influence of society as it is constituted in an old-established country, a society which is very jealous of any interference with its rights and ready to resent such interference. These are some of the influences which controlled railway companies in England, which prevented them from obtaining dominance in that country; but notwithstanding these great influences which they had to contend with it was found in the case of England that the railway companies, holding, as they did, the whole carrying trade of the nation, required to be controlled, and the people of England set about discovering some remedy for this state of things. The first proposal was that the railways should be taken over by the Government of the country, that the Government should deal with the matter themselves and protect the public interests by taking possession of the railways. This idea was, however, soon exploded. It was thought, for many reasons, undesirable that the Government should take possession of the railways, one reason being that it would be an enormous political engine in the hands of the Government, such as it would be unsafe to entrust them with. The matter, however, was not allowed to rest. It was considered of too great importance, and a number of Commissions and Committees were appointed by Parliament and the Government to investigate the matter. Finally it was decided that a remedy should be tried—or that a remedy having been provided it should, at all events, be put into operation. The experiment tried was a suggestion by a Joint Commission of the Houses of Lords and Commons, and was some such remedy as that proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe, the remedy of a Railway Commission composed of three members, an eminent lawyer, an eminent railway man, and a person who is designated by the hon. gentleman as a man of common sense. This Commission was appointed and it sat, and has carried out its functions from that day till now. Some doubt has been raised, both in this House and the country, as to whether the Commission has been a success or not. That is a point which, I think, can be very easily decided. If this issue is to be decided on the answer to the question whether the Commission in England has been a success or not, we can decide it in a very short time, because a Committee composed of twenty-seven of the most experienced members of the House of Commons was appointed recently by the Imperial Parliament to consider this matter and report upon it. The Committee was appointed and reported, and fortunately they reported unanimously. And it is worthy of remark that when the Commission reported as to the advisability of appointing a Railway Commission there was a difference of opinion; but after the Railway Commission had been in operation this Committee of twenty-seven members submitted a unanimous report. It will commend itself to hon. members that if twenty-seven members of a Special Committee appointed to investigate the subject, after having obtained all possible evidence, arrived at a unanimous decision, that decision should have considerable weight with this House and the country, and the Committee of the Imperial House of Commons reported as follows :—

"The Railway Commission has, to a great extent, been hindered in its work by the temporary character with which it has hitherto been invested. At the same time your Committee are convinced that the establishment of the Commission has been of great public advantage, not merely in causing justice to be speedily done in those cases that have been brought before it, but also in preventing differences from arising as between railway companies and the public. Its utility is not to be measured solely by the instances in which it has been called upon to hear and determine, but also by the deterrent and controlling influence of its existence."

That was the unanimous report of the Special Committee, and they proceeded to recommend that the Railway Commission be made permanent, and a Court of Record. I therefore think the matter should now be finally set at rest, so far as the success of the Railway Commission in England is concerned. There can be, I think, no possible doubt on that head. It has been suggested that, because legislation has not been placed on the Statute-book to carry out the recommendations of the Committee, there still remains some doubt as to whether the Commission has been a success or not. But I venture to say there has not been time for such legislation to be passed, because the Committee's report was only brought in at the close of the Session; and even suppose there had been time, the fact that Mr. Gladstone's Government have not placed such legislation on the Statute-book is no evidence that the Commission has not been a success. It may be a reason why there should be a vote of censure on Mr. Gladstone's Government, but it does not alter, in the slightest degree, one tittle of the evidence placed before the Government by the Committee which the Government itself called into existence. There has been an attempt made to show that, although the Railway Commission in England has been successful, yet, for some reason or other, such a Commission would not be a success in Canada. A number of objections have been brought against the present Bill, and it is rather curious to note that almost every one of the objections brought against it have been proved by the best of all tests—the test of practical experience—to have been fallacious. One of the objections is that the law as it at present stands is sufficient. That was brought up again and again before the Commission, during their enquiry in England. Another objection is that if the railways are interfered with by a Commission, the shareholders' money will be endangered, and railway companies will thus be endangered. I will read what the late Mr. Ward Hunt, who was one of the men upon the Commission of Enquiry, said, in raising the same objection :

"Your regulations may be well calculated to produce the highest possible dividend for your shareholders, but they are not well adapted for giving the greatest possible facilities to the public; and as the interests of the company and the interests of the public do not coincide, we shall force you to sacrifice the interests of the shareholders to those of the public."

Another objection raised was, that it would be an injurious interference with through freights, and so would dislocate traffic. The same objection was taken in England, and on it Mr. Pease said:

"Being himself engaged in trade, he depended very much on the through rates on railways, but he very much doubted how far Parliament could sanction the powers which this Bill gave to revise every special Act and special toll, and to treat as waste paper agreements between existing companies which had been sanctioned by Committees of both Houses, and by the House itself."

Then we have the objection that the enormous amount of property invested in railways is to be handed over to three gentlemen who would make ducks and drakes of it. The same objection was raised in England, and on it Mr. Pease said:

"With regard to the appointment of the Commission, one of the Commissioners was to be a lawyer of great eminence, another was to be a man of experience in railways, and of the third they had no description at all. Such was the tribunal to which was confided a trust affecting the £600,000,000 of capital which Parliament had given the companies power to raise."

Another objection is thus stated by Mr. Pease:

"The Commissioners were to be paid at the rate of £3,000 a year each, a sum that would not secure the services of men required for the discharge of such important duties as they would have to perform; in fact they would be paid salaries inferior to that received by many railway managers."

So here is another of the same objections, another of our old friends urged here, as it was in England; but we find, by the test of experience, that it is utterly fallacious. We have another objection presented: that such an interference with railway management would depress the stock market and reduce railway values. This is a very important objection, and we find that the very same objection was urged in England. The Railway Commissioners in England, themselves, on the sixth page of their Report of 1878, referring to the very same objection, say:

"We have seen it stated here and there that this right is fraught with possible danger to railway property; but certainly, as yet, it has done no harm, nor developed any tendency to do harm: rather has it been of excellent effect as an additional motive to harmony of arrangement, and an additional motive to induce the companies to act as one concern in providing for the forwarding of through traffic."

Another objection is made that capital is sensitive, and that the appointment of this Commission, and even the knowledge going forth that such a Commission is likely to be appointed, would deter capital from coming into this country to be invested in railway enterprises. So far from this being the case, I venture to say that the very opposite is the case. What is it that deters more than anything else the investment of capital in new railway enterprises? Is it not the fact that new, young, and feeble railway enterprises will be dominated by large railway corporations in this country? Is not this the thing which more than any other prevents the construction of railways in this country at present? And you find on reading the reports of the Railway Commissioners, as they have been presented from time to time to Parliament in England, that one of the greatest feats they have achieved, and one of the greatest advantages which has accrued to the country from the existence of a Railway Commission there, is the fact that they have interfered to protect feeble companies against the stronger companies, and have forced the larger companies in England to do justice to the smaller companies, and to give them opportunities for through rates over the line, and for connecting trade and carrying on traffic, which otherwise they would be unable to carry on, just as we have seen companies in Canada unable to carry on traffic here, eventually being obliged to strike the flag to the larger companies, by whom they are swallowed up. I would like to refer to one other objection; that, owing to the through traffic passing from some point of the United States through Canada, there will be some insuperable difficulty which would make it impossible for this Commission to work here. I just wish to call attention to the fact, that such an objection may be urged, I think, with much greater weight and force to the existence of the Railway Commission in England. If you take traffic from the north of Ireland by Belfast to Liverpool and Southampton, and to some port on the continent, you will find, that there is a far greater difficulty to its application in this case, than in that which is pointed to us as an insuperable difficulty here. Take linen for example, which is being bleached at Lintourne, carried by railway to Belfast, shipped thence to Liverpool, and then carried by railway to Southampton, and then carried to some port in Europe. Now, you will find, that in this process there are two portions of the freightage which are altogether beyond the control and outside of the control of the Railway Commissioners; the sea voyage from Belfast to Liverpool, and the sea voyage from Southampton to the Continent; and yet through rates there are and must be influenced by the sea freight rates; just in the same way, as you find, the freights passing through Canada are influenced by the rates on American lines. Moreover, you have another system there outside of the railway system altogether, which competes with the railways in such transactions, the shipment by sea. Vessels are lying in Belfast ready to carry that freight which passes over the railways in England direct to the ports on the continent in Europe; and, again, when the freight reaches Liverpool you also have vessels there prepared to do the same thing. This brings me to the objection that there is no system so competing in England as in Canada with the railway system, and there never was a statement made which is more inconsistent with the facts than is that statement. You have the whole shipping trade and interest of England competing with the railway system. Take, for example, freights from Glasgow which are to be carried to Southampton by railway: you have a railway making the charges and fixing the tolls, while, lying at the same port, you have vessels ready to carry the same merchandise at competing rates to Southampton, and this system is entirely outside and beyond the control of the Railway Commissioners in England just as much as any system which we have on this continent. I have only to say, in conclusion, I am perfectly satisfied on this point: that there is a feeling in this country that if the Government do not in some way control the railways the railways will before long control the Government; and there is a feeling in this country, and it is growing up day by day in the breasts of the people, that they are helpless and at the mercy of the railway companies of this country, and with that feeling there is a feeling of indignation growing up in the country; and I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen when they go back to their constituents, will find that the hon. member for North Simcoe has the people of the country at his back on this question. I am perfectly certain that the people will not be satisfied until there is some control brought to bear on the railway companies of this country. I do not wish to be misunderstood as to what I am saying. I am not one of those who would join in a howl of execration against the railway companies. I venture to say that they have done a great deal of good for Canada, and that they have on the whole treated the people of this country well, more especially when one considers the position in which they stand, and when one knows that they have absolute power in their hands. But I venture to say this, that it is just as true of human nature to-day as when Robert Burns said it, that:

"When self the wavering balance sets,
It's rarely right adjusted."

The railway companies of this country have the setting of the balance entirely in their own hands, and the people object to that. The people of Canada knowing, as they will know, when the remarks of my hon. friend go forth, that the people of England have a remedy which is practically effectual, or at all events of enormous advantage, knowing that there is such a remedy in the United States and that in the continent of Europe the railways are controlled and the people are not left to the mercies of these corporations—I say, knowing this, the people of Canada will call upon the Government to put in force such a remedy here to protect the interests of the people.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. At this late hour of the evening I have no intention of taking up the time of the House at any great length. But I do not wish to give a silent vote upon this question, and I have to say that I feel it my duty to vote for the Bill. I have the honor of representing part of the county of Middlesex, one of the largest and most populous in the Dominion. The County Council of that county is composed of more than fifty members, and from a long acquaintance with them, I am in a position to say that no more intelligent men of that description exist anywhere in the Dominion, and they have unanimously petitioned this House to pass some such measure as the one before us to-night. It therefore becomes my duty to vote for the measure. At the same time I beg to state that the Bill commends itself, to my sense of right; I entirely agree with its principle. I may go further and say that I am happy to think that there is an hon. gentleman in this House who has the courage to bring the matter before the public; and if it is any satisfaction to him, I can assure him that there is one humble individual who, whether in this House or out of it, will stand shoulder to shoulder with him in the fight. Great stress has been laid on the fact that a few days ago a very large deputation came down to the House to oppose this measure. I quite acknowledge the fact, and I have to say, at the same time, that I was very much astonished to see some of the gentlemen who composed that deputation. I do not know what the motives were that prompted them to come. We know that a free ride on the railway, with the condiments thrown in, is a great inducement to some persons, and I have had ocular demonstration that railway magnates, when they have great interests at stake, are not niggardly with the condiments. I would not for one moment suppose that the gentlemen composing that deputation were influenced by any such motives—I know many of them too well to suppose that. Then, Sir, there is the other alternative that they were in some way or other compelled to come. I do not wish to insinuate that that was the case, but we do know that these railway corporations, where there is no competition, largely have the fortunes of the people carrying on business with them, almost in their hands—that they can make one man and ruin another at their will. I do not mean to say that these gentlemen were coerced, but I am somewhat forcibly reminded of a little incident of the war on the other side. One of our newspaper men was going down the streets of New York one day where a great row was going on. Newspaper men are always very enquiring, and wish to know the reason of everything, so this gentleman waited until one individual became detached from the crowd, and he asked him what was the matter. This man happened to be a rollicking Irishman, and he replied: "O, nothing; they are only forcing a man to volunteer!" A word or two about the necessity of a measure of this kind. Facts have been brought before the House and the Committee, showing that railways do make most unjust discrimination. As the promoter of the Bill said to-night, they can, if they see fit, build up one place and let the grass grow in another. They can do the same thing with individuals, and this discrimination in certain localities is, perhaps, one of our greatest grievances. Allow me to refer to one or two instances in my own observation. A number of years ago I left this city in company with a friend who was going to a point on the Grand Trunk Railway. On the way to the station he said: "I will ask what is the price of a ticket to Buffalo." We went into the station and he asked the price of a ticket; and would you believe that the price of a ticket to travel 150 miles further was $1 less than the price of a ticket to the place he was going to. Another case that came under my own observation was that of a gentleman who was buying cattle in one of our western localities. He was something between twenty and thirty miles from the far end of the railway and he was buying cattle and driving them on foot to that end of the railway and then shipping them back, and he said he was making money by so doing. I believe if my hon. friend from North Middlesex (Mr. Coughlin), would state what he knows on this subject he would say that at the present day they not only drive them on foot but put them on the cars, send them back to the end of the railway, and then re-ship them in the opposite direction and thereby make money. Some years ago one of the largest millers in the city of London, which, as hon. gentlemen know, is just half way between the two termini of the Great Western, actually shipped a cargo of flour that he wished to send to the East all the way back to the other terminus, from which it was reshipped back in the other direction, and he made money on the transaction. These are the things which compel us to come to the House and ask for relief. Great stress has been laid on the rights of the railways. We have been told that these railways have an enormous amount of capital in their enterprises, and that if we were to do anything which would injure them we would deprive them of part of their rights. I am prepared to admit to the fullest extent the rights of these corporations; but, Sir, we are pointed to the fact that these railway corporations are not paying dividends to the stockholders. I know that there are many hundreds and thousands of poor people who have invested their all in the railways of this country from which they have received no return; but who is to blame for that? Is it the people of the country? Have they had anything to do with it? Why, it has been the fault of the railway corporations themselves. Allusion has been made to-night to the original cost of our railways. It is a notorious fact that, to assist in building the Grand Trunk Railway, the Parliament of this country gave something over $20,000,000; and it was only two or three years ago that Mr. Laidlaw, of Toronto, in a speech he delivered there, stated that he could take the bonuses that had been given by Parliament and the municipalities to the different railways, and build the railways with them, without asking the stockholders for a single cent. That is the way the railways came to be unremunerative. That same Grand Trunk Railway, too, instead of paying dividends, has been engaged in buying up all the railways it could get its hands upon, with the view of shutting out competition completely. With regard to the Great Western Railway, now a part of the same concern, time was when its stock was selling at 140, and to-day it is not selling at one-half of that figure. That company, being carried away by its anxiety to obtain the trade of the Western Peninsula, built a loop line, which it had no more need of than a cart has of a third wheel. But, Sir, it seems to me that there are other parties besides the railway companies that have rights in this matter. What about the great mass of the people of this country—have they no rights? Is it not a fact that almost every municipality in the country has burdened itself by voting bonuses and granting privileges of various kinds to railways? They have done so, if not in the hope of obtaining competition, at least to prevent this very discrimination of rates of which complaint has been made. They have burdened themselves almost ruinously, and what has been the result? The very companies so aided in a very few years have amalgamated with the very companies they were given the bonuses to compete with, and the municipalities have been left with nothing but the disappointment and the debt. They, I think, have some rights that this House is bound to consider. Allusion has been made to-night to the great question of railway monopoly. We have been told that the indications are, and I believe events point in that direction, that so far as this Dominion is concerned, one single management is going soon to control the whole of its railway business, and on the other side of the line the same process has been going on. If we can judge anything from the events of the past and the indications for the future, at no very distant day the same thing is going to happen there, and when it does happen, and there are only two competing railway systems, what is to prevent them from going together and consolidating into one? I ask this hon. House if it is the part of wisdom to wait until that combination becomes so strong that it requires nothing short of a revolution to successfully grapple with it? Is it not the part of wisdom, while it is in our power, to grapple with the evil, to try to have it remedied? Objection may be raised. Hon. gentlemen have a perfect right to take exception to some provisions of the Bill if they see fit; but their proper course is to have the Bill amended and made workable, and I cannot see any other way in which the evil can be remedied than by some such measure. I have a pretty vivid recollection of the speeches made in this House not many years ago, when the Pacific Railway Company's charter was about to be granted. It was pointed out that a tremendous wrong was going to be done to the people of the North-West by imposing upon them, for twenty years—nay, for all time to come—a grinding monopoly. I want to ask in what better condition are four-fifths of the people of the rest of the Dominion to-day, or in what better condition are they likely to be in unless the House takes hold of this question, and passes such a measure as that now before it? I have great pleasure in voting for the Bill.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The question before the House has resolved itself, in my mind, into two parts. In the Committee and in the House arguments have been advanced to prove that there is no grievance. It is to this branch of the question that I wish for a few moments to direct my remarks. I am one of that now celebrated twelve who in the Committee sanctioned the preamble of the Bill—not that I was sure that it was the remedy, but because arguments had been advanced in order to show that there were no causes of complaint. In treating this question, it is necessary to keep constantly in view the real subject with which we are dealing. Roads in one form or another are by no means new. The man who views Rome in her greatness, and refuses to consider her magnificent highways, twelve in number, with many branches extending over the country, and constructed with a view to such permanence that some of them have resisted the wear of 2,000 years, and are serviceable as highways to-day—the man who does not consider these will fail to appreciate the full greatness of Rome. It is well known that the peculiar civilization of Peru was marked by her highways. In England the highways attracted great attention at the beginning of this century. Under the skill displayed by Macadam and Telford, her roads underwent a great change. In Canada we have passed through several periods in roads. We have passed through the period of the blazed lines, we have come through corduroy roads, the turnpike and the gravel roads, and the railway is now the public highway. It has passed from the period of being a luxury to that of being a necessity. Any man who has anything to buy, or to sell, is forced to use these highways; and this is the first time in the history of our race, in which the State has not owned the highway. The highway is now in the hands of a few corporations; but this result has been brought about so gradually that we have hardly perceived it. The perfecting of roads has been attained by the reduction of friction and the utilizing of the most economical forces by the combined use of steam and steel. We probably have arrived at the greatest perfection that it is possible to attain. We thought we had advanced much when we were using the iron rail, but the discovery of the Bessemer process for converting iron into steel rails, has quite revolutionized our highways again. It lessened the expense of maintaining railways very materially—so much as to quite revolutionize commerce. Now, I do not wish to be understood for one moment as being opposed to railways, or as opposing the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other line, but I wish simply to call attention to some of the difficulties under which the people labor. As was remarked in the Committee, this question is not one which can be buried in a hole dug in the Committee room, but is one which is before the people, and to which attention will be called until the existing evils are remedied. Under this wonderful change in the character of our highways fortunes have been amassed, to which the world before was a stranger. As an illustration of this, I may refer to the report which appeared in the press a few days ago, that one of our railway kings expended $27,000 on a faucet for conveying water to his bath room. It has been intimated that the railways have shown no discrimination. That is not correct. To my own knowledge, I am positive that discriminations of a very injurious character have occurred and may occur again, but there is one point to which attention has not been called. It has been claimed that we wish to interfere with through rates. I believe such is not the case. There can be no contention based upon sound reason that we should injuriously interfere with railway's relation to their through freights which give employment and in many ways benefit the country. But there is a point in connection with through freight to which I wish to call attention. It is this: that local freights should not be compelled to wait upon the convenience of through freight. I know that in my own county much suffering has occurred, time and again, from this cause. Empty trains of grain cars have passed through to the west, while the granaries of the stations were filled with grain, and the shippers had to wait many weeks before they could ship at all, although the empty trains were passing through to the Western States to accommodate through freight. It is necessary some steps should be taken to prevent Canada being made simply a right of way, over which railways may carry on the business of the United States. I think that Canadian business should not have to wait upon the through business, and that the Canadian farmer and shipper should not be compelled to wait until the American shipper has been fully accommodated. I do not wish to presume on the patience of the House at this hour, and will conclude my remarks by simply saying to those others of the twelve that as allusion has been made to another twelve, who lived a long period ago, we should bear in mind that their doctrines spread nearly over all the civilized world.

Motion negatived.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11.40 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

TITLES OF LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY, in introducing Bill (No. 97) for the declaration of titles to land, and to facilitate its transfer in the Territories of Canada, said: The Bill which I have the honor to introduce, is for the purpose of bringing into force in the Territories of this Dominion what is known as the Torrence system of the transfer and registration of land. This system was introduced in Australia, founded—or rather invented—if I may use the term—by Sir Robert Torrence, as he now is, who, at that time, was a clerk in one of the Customs offices, and who conceived the notion that land might be as easily transferred as vessel property—as shares in vessels are according to the Merchants' Shipping Act. He followed that idea up, and the result was it became the law in the colony of South Australia, in the year 1855. It has since been adopted in New Zealand, in Tasmania, in Victoria, and to the same extent also, though not altogether, in England. The object of it is to simplify the transfer of land, and to render the title of land absolute, and indefeasible, and unquestionable. When a person is entitled to a lot, or parcel of land, either by patent from the Crown, or by bringing a portion of the land which he owns under the operation of this law, he obtains a certificate to that effect. That certificate enables him to transfer the land to any person without the necessity of the purchaser seeing or examining the title; it enables the purchaser to assume, as he has the right to assume, that the certificate is, as it purports to be, the statement that he is the owner of the land subject to such claims as may appear endorsed on the certificate, and which he has himself created and burdened the land with. When the owner's title ceases; in other words, when he transfers absolutely his property, that certificate is brought back and a new certificate issued, so that the purchaser of the land is not required to, as in the old Provinces of the Dominion, go back to the time of the issue of the patent from the Crown, and see that the various conveyances or instruments by which the property has passed from hand to hand are correct, and be subject to the possibility of some difficulty arising, notwithstanding all the care he may exercise, and be deprived of his estate; but he is entitled to rely absolutely on the certificate which the owner has and which enables him to transfer the land as if it were a chattel property. The Bill is a lengthy one and deals with these different matters in detail. One thing it is to do, for instance, is to make land pass as personal property, so that on the death of an owner of land, the property goes to his personal representative instead of being distributed among his heirs, if he dies intestate; or among his various legatees if he makes a will. It then goes to the executor or administrator, who becomes, for the purposes of the Act, the owner, holding it subject, however, to the trusts and to the rights of the heirs at law, or the devisees, as the case may be. So in case of bankruptcy, or any other case, provision is made by the Bill which it would be wearisome for me to enter into at any length. Now, this is by no means at the present day a new law, and in considering the expediency of adopting it we would be guided very much by the success it has met with in those colonies where it has been in force for some years. We have in our North-West an enormous quantity of land. I find in the new Provinces which have recently been created, provisionally of course, that there are 431,000 square miles, and if I am right in my arithmetic that would be about 200,000,000 acres of land. Probably that 200,000,000 acres of land, apart altogether from the division into town lots and town sites, would afford settlement for about 2,000,000 settlers. Now, we have been at great expense, in the first place, in obtaining that North West; we are at very great expense in opening up that great country; and we are at very considerable expense in bringing immigrants in, and we give to all bona fide settlers 160 acres of land free upon payment of a small registration fee of $10. Sir, it will be a great boon, I believe, if, to those settlers, we also give a cheap and inexpensive system of indefeasible title. It will be another additional reason, to those which that great country already has, why settlers should settle there where they will be free from the burdens entailed in the old Provinces with respect to the transfer of property. How is it with us here? When property is sold the purchaser has a right to call upon the vendor for an abstract. The purchaser or his solicitor examines the abstract and makes what he calls perquisitions or objections to it, matters that require to be cleared up; and although it is not yet as bad with us as it is in England, yet it may be very many weeks and sometimes months before a title can be deduced and made satisfactory if strictness be insisted upon. Under this system that would be entirely dispensed with. A man would have his certificate, occupying not much more than a sheet of paper. If there was a mortgage it would appear on the face of it; if there was a lease it would also appear there; whatever he himself had done would also appear on the face of the document. When he sold either the whole or a part of it a new certificate would issue, and from that title he could start afresh as if a patent had been granted for the land. Under these circumstances, it does not appear to me that we ought to lose a day in bringing this law into operation in our great territories. We cannot of course deal with any of the Provinces which have already the powers of Government, but we have a vast territory, far greater than the old Provinces, including in that term the Province of Manitoba, yet subject to the laws of this Parliament, in which the greatest part of the land is yet not taken up; and I would press upon this House, that not a moment is to be lost if the law is, as I believe it to be, of a most beneficial character, for it adds to a great extent to the value of the land by simplifying the transfer of it in those territories. Let me draw the attention of the House to the fact that, according to the report of the hon. Minister of Interior, there have been some 21,000 entries made in our North West Territories, including, I suppose, the Province of Manitoba. This is exclusive of 3,000,000 acres of land which have been granted to colonization companies, and altogether it appears that, to the end of last year, there are in the neighborhood of 7,000,000 acres of land sold or agreed to be sold to different settlers of different companies. Now, these have not yet, except in rare instances, received their patents, and to all who have not received patents, this Act at once becomes operative; to those who have received their patents, they can make application to the registrar of land titles, and if satisfied that the patentee is the rightful owner of the land, these cases will also come under the operation of the Act. Now, it would be unwise for us to deal in a matter of this importance, to make this great change in the law of real property, without examining how it has worked elsewhere. We are fortunate in having brought down, amongst papers of the House of Commons, reports from the various colonies in which this law has been in force. One report was brought down in 1872; I will not trouble the House with any reference to it, but I will read some extracts from the report brought down in answer to an Address passed in May, 1881. The first of these is from the colony of South Australia, and the report is made by the solicitors to the Lands and Titles Department, and what do they say?

"Up to the present time, October, 1880, no difficulty whatever has occurred in carrying out the ordinary transactions in land, such as transfers, mortgages and leases, and there can be no question that, as regards such transactions, the 'Torrence system' is a perfect success; land, in fact, being as easily and securely dealt with as stock in the funds."

Again:

"As to indefeasibility of title: This important result of the 'Torrence system' of registration of title has not yet been upset. The only instances in which a certificate of title has been ordered by the Supreme Court to be cancelled, are as follows."

He gives one or two instances where certificates have been obtained by fraud. This is, in short, a report from the first colony in which this law was introduced. Now, from the colony of Queensland, also to be found in the same return to the Imperial House of Commons, I find this statement. First, this question was asked:

"Whether indefeasibility of title has been practically secured under the law in force in your colony, or whether the courts of law or equity have been upset, and if so upon what grounds, any title which has been registered under such law?"

The answer to it is this:

"Although the number of new titles issued by the office to the end of the year 1879, was 57,143, there has been no title registered under the Act sought to be upset in a court of law or equity. A case occurred about eight years ago when a purchaser of a town property, having, by the blunder of his surveyor, included in his transfer a larger piece of land than the vendor was possessed of, and the mistake, not having been observed by the draftsman of the Real Property Office, a title was wrongfully issued for the whole of the land asked for, and the purchaser sustained serious loss, by erecting a valuable building upon another person's land. The loser did not proceed against the office by action at law, but petitioned the House of Assembly for compensation, and a Select Committee, appointed by the House, recommended that he should be paid the sum of £1,500 for the loss sustained."

I should have mentioned, perhaps, that it is impossible in every instance to avoid mistakes, but it has been enacted, and it is strictly observed that the certificate of title is indefeasible. If a mistake be made compensation is to be given to the true owner. I am now assuming the land certificate to be given to the wrong man; that man has transferred it to a bona fide holder, and the question arises between the man who is the true owner of the land and the person to whom the certificate has been transferred. According to the law, and without that enactment, the law would not be workable, the man who has a certificate, and has bought upon the faith of it, is entitled to hold the land; but the true owner is not without redress, as he is entitled to compensation. For that purpose an insurance fund has been established, which is found amply sufficient in those colonies to make such compensation as, in the circumstances to which I refer, can possibly be called for. Another question asked was:

"Whether persons availing themselves of the provisions of the Act have, as a general rule, recourse to legal advice, and whether it is considered that they do so unnecessarily, or that their expenses are thereby much increased?"

The answer is:

"In the great bulk of transactions the general public have recourse to professional assistance, the general opinion being that the filling up of the form is so simple that legal advice is unnecessary; but this does not apply to the bringing of land under the Act, by applications or transmissions of property, through death of registered owner, as in such cases professional assistance is almost invariably resorted to."

"How has the law worked in respect to mortgages and leases?"
 "There does not appear to be any difficulty in the working of the Acts as to mortgages and leases. The Real Property Acts have greatly facilitated mortgages and leases, the simple form of mortgage and release allowing small sums of money, raised on mortgage, to be promptly registered at very little cost, as professional assistance is not required in the preparation of the deed."

If the House should think it worth while I could refer to similar statements made respecting New Zealand and the colony of Victoria. They are in purport the same as I have already read, and, therefore, I need not trouble the House in reading them in detail. The result appears to be that, after over twenty years experience of this law in those great colonies, it has been found to be workable and to have given unqualified satisfaction. It simplifies the transfer, and if hon. members, when the Bill is distributed, will look at the schedules to the Act, the practicable way in which the matter is to be carried out will then be seen. A man, for instance, who is owner of land and either has a patent for it or desires to bring it under the operation of this Act, obtains this certificate: A.B. (of such a place) is now seized of an estate (whatever the estate may be) subject, nevertheless, to such encumbrances, liens and interest as are notified by memorandum endorsed thereon, in that parcel of land situated in the (township, town or city,) as the case may be. That is his title deed. His patent is held in the office, but this deed enables him to sell to any person, and so long as he can produce that paper the man's land can be sold without the necessity of examining all the deeds. The transfer is also quite simple in form. If the man does not propose to part in toto with his land, but merely to encumber, mortgage or lease it, the mortgage is stated, as in bills of sale for shares in ships, on the back of the certificate, and appears on the face of his muniment of title. Then, upon the death of the owner, his representatives come in bringing letters of administration or letters of probate, as the case may be, and the transfer is made equally as simply and inexpensive. I, therefore, have ventured to introduce this measure, believing it should go into operation. I believe it will enhance the value of the land in the North-West, and, when understood, it will prove an inducement to settlers to come here on learning that they can obtain land almost for nothing, and would hold it in such a way that its transfer would not be attended with any considerable cost, and would practically, therefore, add to the value of the estate. I have much pleasure in introducing this Bill, and I may inform the House that it is already in type and will be distributed within a day or two to hon. members. It may be impossible, and probably will be impossible, to carry the Bill through this Session unless the Government choose to adopt it as a measure which is in the public interest, and that is the reason I have occupied so much time in making the statement on the Bill which I have the honor of submitting to the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has introduced this Bill. Without enquiring into the details and ascertaining how far the hon. gentleman has adopted or departed from the general line which is taken by the Australian Acts, it is impossible to speak of the merits of the measure in detail, but that an immense improvement will be effected and a boon of increasing value conferred upon the people who are to inhabit the North-West is very clear in the satisfactory and workable method which I doubt not has been adopted by the hon. member. A former member of this House, one whom some of us believe to have been elected at the late Elections, and whom we hope will shortly vindicate his right to sit here, did, several years ago, introduce a Bill to accomplish this particular purpose, which Bill is to be found among our records. I do not speak of that Bill as commending all its details—there were some that might have been improved—but it was the first practical application to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. Since that period I have, on several occasions, called the attention of the hon. First Minister, who is mainly charged with directing the affairs of the House, and who is in charge of the Department of Interior, to this particular subject, and to the fact that the introduction and application of a Bill of this kind would be infinitely easier, while the country is yet unsettled and lands are yet unpatented, than at a later period. On the last occasion on which I called his attention to the subject the hon. First Minister said he was exceedingly doubtful, however applicable the principle might be to the Australian colonies, whether it would be applicable to the North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman did not give any reason for that statement, and I confess I do not see any particular reason for it either. I know the point of difficulty in a measure of this kind is the one to which the hon. gentleman has alluded—the apprehension of mistakes or fraud, and the possibility of large liabilities being incurred in consequence thereof. That was a matter on which we could speculate only when the Australian measure was introduced, and upon which, as the hon. gentleman has stated, the practical experience furnished to us valuable information; but before we could rest with absolute confidence upon that particular expression as satisfying us in this regard, it would, of course, be necessary to ascertain the number of cases in which there have been transfers, and so forth, and to see what are the differences between the cases dealt with under the Australian Act and our own Act. I think if we adopt a good plan as to its details, and if we obtain high class officers, as regards intelligence and integrity, for I think them essential, we would manage very well, without the danger of imposing a heavy burden on the public. An assurance fund, such as that to which the hon. member has referred, would be found adequate, if such were thought necessary, in order to quiet the apprehension of the public. As I have said, this will not only be a great boon, but an increasing boon, not merely for the present generation, but for generations yet to come, because they will be benefited, and that in a constantly increasing degree, as under the present system of land tenure, the more transfers, mortgages and liens there are, the more confused do titles become. The longer each link in the weary chain through which the purchaser has to cause to be investigated, tested and tried, to discover whether the title be good, the more expensive the operation, the more uncertain, the more doubtful; if then we can adopt a plan by which each man can obtain in this simple form a title, clear, plain and indefeasible, no doubt we will have done a great thing for the country. I recollect, Sir, that on one occasion, when a notable character in fiction was being consoled for a great grief he had sustained, Weller remarked to his son: "After all there was some consolation for this dispensation, else what would become of the undertakers;" I think the one question that may be asked on this occasion when we are not consoling with anybody in affliction, but are congratulating ourselves on a great boon, and one counterbalancing and consoling reflection which may serve to moderate our joy, when our hon. friend's joy is achieved, is, "What will become of the lawyers!"

TORONTO HARBOR AND ESPLANADE.

Mr. SMALL, in introducing Bill (No. 106) to increase the harbor accommodation of the city of Toronto, extend the Esplanade, and control the use thereof by railway companies, said: I may say that in consequence of the accommodation furnished vessels in the harbor of Toronto being insufficient as to the depth of water, it has become absolutely necessary, in the interests of the vessel owners and of the citizens of Toronto, that the Esplanade should be extended to deep water for some little direction; and owing to the crowded state of the Esplanade, by reason of the many railway tracks extended over the water front, to compensate the Esplanade, impeded by cars standing constantly on the track and to provide for the safety of the inhabitants, it is absolutely necessary to increase the accommodation; and hence it is thought advisable that a new Esplanade should be constructed, and that there should be a rearrangement of the different railway tracks running along the Esplanade; and that a Board of Commissioners should be appointed by the Government for the purpose of rearranging the different lines of railway. The Bill is not yet printed, but it will be shortly placed in the hands of members.

INLAND REVENUE CONSOLIDATION ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved,—That it is expedient to consolidate the Acts respecting the Inland Revenue and to amend the same as follows:—

To provide that returns under the Act shall be made monthly, and that stock shall be taken annually.

To provide that the license bonds to be taken for carrying on business subject to Excise shall cover over the duty accruing on goods in warehouse use during the currency of the license.

To provide that the security of an approved guarantee company may be accepted by the Department of Inland Revenue in lieu of other securities.

To provide better means for obtaining evidence in matters connected with the collection of the revenue, and for enforcing penalties for infractions of the law.

To facilitate the use of distillery apparatus used in the manufacture of medicinal, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations.

To make better provision as to the warehousing and ex-warehousing of goods subject to Excise.

To authorize the establishment of Inland Revenue bonding warehouses by the Governor in Council, and the making of regulations for the use thereof, and for the bottling of spirits in bond.

To make better provision for the protection of the revenue in respect of used stamps and stamped packages, of the affixing and cancellation of stamps, brands and labels, and of the taking of raw leaf tobacco into tobacco and cigar manufactories.

To provide for the granting of a drawback in respect of stamps used in the payment of the duty on certain manufactured tobacco put up in packages of one pound or less, when entered for duty ex-manufactory.

To provide for the separation of cigar manufacturing from tobacco manufacturing, and for defining certain limits within which licenses for either may be granted.

To establish a minimum rate of production of tobacco and cigars in relation to the quantity of raw material taken for use.

To provide for charging the duty on cigars by the thousand instead of by weight.

To provide for the registration of cigar makers.

To provide for a modification of the methods in which packages of tobacco may be put up for sale and sold.

To provide that the duties of Excise on tobacco and cigars shall be as follows:—

On all manufactured tobacco, the product of foreign raw leaf (except moist snuff) 12 cts. per lb.

On cigarettes or cut tobacco, the product of foreign raw leaf tobacco, when put up in packages of one-twentieth of a pound or less, 20 cts. per lb.

On moist snuff, 8 cts. per lb.

On manufactured tobacco (including Canada twist) the product of raw leaf tobacco grown in Canada, exclusively, 2 cts. per lb.

On cigars manufactured from foreign raw leaf tobacco, 30 cts. per lb. until 30th June, 1883, and $3 per 1,000 thereafter.

On cigars manufactured from Canadian raw leaf tobacco, exclusively, 15 cts. per lb. until 30th June, 1883, and $1.50 per 1,000 thereafter.

All such duties to be charged from and after 1st May, 1883.

I would ask the indulgence of the House for a very few moments while I offer a few explanations with regard to the above resolutions. In the first place, it has been thought advisable that all the Acts respecting the Inland Revenue should be consolidated in the interests of the Government as well as of the public, and certain amendments have also been found necessary. Provision is made that the returns shall be made monthly, and this regulation will be equally effective for the parties concerned and important for the Government. It is further provided that stock shall be taken by the manufacturers annually. Under the present Act our officers have power to take stock, but this is not obligatory on the manufacturer. The next clause provided that the license bonds to be taken for carrying on business subject to Excise shall cover the duty accruing on goods in warehouse during the currency of the license. This clause provides for a change in the law with regard to the license bonds which are taken out. There are complaints that these bonds are very heavy at present and difficult to obtain. Parties are put to great inconvenience not only on account of the amount required to be given, but because a separate bond is required for each transaction. The proposed change will provide for greater convenience to the Department as well as to the public, because one bond may be given governing all the transactions during the currency of the license. The next clause provides that the security of an approved Guarantee Company may be accepted by the Department of Inland Revenue in lieu of other securities. This will be a great convenience to the public, and will at the same time afford an equal surety to the Department. The next clause is to provide better means for obtaining evidence in matters connected with the collection of the revenue, and for enforcing penalties for infractions of the law. At present the officers of the Department are obliged to proceed in certain courts, or before certain Judges, but under the proposed system the cases may be brought before any Judge or court having jurisdiction in such cases, and penalties may be recovered. The next clause is to facilitate the use of distillery apparatus used in the manufacture of medicines, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations. By this clause there will be increased convenience to those using such apparatus, and a greater control will be exercised over them by the Department. The next clause is to make better provision as to the warehousing and ex-warehousing of goods subject to Excise. Under the existing law no provision is made for ex-warehousing or warehousing, except in the case of malt; but under this provision other articles will be treated in the same way in that respect. The next clause is to authorize the establishment of Inland Revenue bonding warehouses by the Governor in Council, and the making of regulations for the use thereof, and for the bottling of spirits in bond. This provides, when put in force by Order in Council, that Inland Revenue bonding warehouses may be in the same building as the Inland Revenue Department in those smaller places where warehouses do not at present exist. The next clause is to make better provision for the protection of the revenue in respect of used stamps and stamped packages, of the affixing and cancellation of stamps, brands and labels, and of the taking of raw leaf tobacco into tobacco and cigar manufactories. This is a matter of detail in the working of the Department dealing with the manner in which stamps shall be used and affixed. It provides also that manufacturers shall be obliged to have all the raw leaf taken in by the entrance, and a notice to the public is to be put over the door of such entrance. The next clause provides for the granting of a drawback in respect of stamps used in the payment of duty on certain manufactured tobacco put up in packages of one pound or less, when entered for duty ex-manufactory. The parties who will be affected by this change are those engaged in the manufacture of cut tobacco put up in packages of one pound or less. Such tobacco forms the great proportion of the tobacco paying duty at present, and for the greater protection of the Department and the convenience of the public, it has been found necessary to require payment of the duties in advance, and a drawback of 2 per cent. in consideration of the money being paid in advance. The next clause provides for the separation of cigar manufacturing from tobacco manufacturing, and for defining certain limits within which licenses for either may be granted. This provision will only affect two establishments which are carried on in the one place. It has been found almost impossible so far to provide regulations which would allow the working of these two branches of manufacture together satisfactorily. The next clause is to establish a minimum rate of production of tobacco and cigars in relation to the quantity of raw material taken for use. The necessity of such a provision has always been recognized, but it is not provided for in the present Act. The next clause provides for charging the duty on cigars by the thousand instead of by weight. This is consistent with the other clause which declares that a maximum amount shall be fixed for the protection of cigars and tobacco. The next clause is to provide for the registration of cigar makers employed by manufacturers from time to time. While we establish a minimum rate of protection for tobacco as well as cigars, we ought also to know, for the protection of the revenue, the number of men employed, so as to form an idea whether the production is consistent with the strength of the establishment. It is no great inconvenience to the public, and will be a source of protection to the revenue. The next clause provides for a modification of the methods in which packages of tobacco may be put up for sale and sold. I may say that these modifications are very few and slight. The next clause provides that the duties of Excise on tobacco and cigars shall be as follows:—

On all manufactured tobacco, the product of foreign leaf (except moist snuff), 12 cts. per lb.

On cigarettes or cut tobacco, the product of foreign raw leaf tobacco, when put up in packages of one-twentieth of a lb. or less, 20 cts. per lb. On moist snuff, 8 cts. per lb.

On manufactured tobacco (including Canada twist) the product of raw leaf tobacco grown in Canada, exclusively, 2 cts. per lb.

On cigars manufactured from foreign raw leaf tobacco, 30 cts. per lb. until 30th June, 1883, and $3 per 1,000 thereafter.

On cigars manufactured from Canadian raw leaf tobacco, exclusively, 15 cts. per lb. until 30th June, 1883, and $1.50 per 1,000 thereafter.

The reason that we fix the 30th June as the time at which this change shall come in force is, that the Department is not at present prepared with the requisite amount of stamps. Having gone over these changes in detail, I may now be allowed to add a few words as to what I think their effect will be. All the changes contained in the first portion of the resolutions are for the better working of the Department—in some cases, for the greater convenience of the public having business to transact with the Department. The other portion relates to tobacco. Hon. members who have listened to previous discussions on this question, must agree with me that the cultivation of Canadian grown tobacco is a subject which is beginning to attract a great deal of attention. Not long ago it was thought that this country and this climate were not suitable for the growth of such a leaf as could be manufactured into a merchantable article. I am glad to know that that impression has given place to more favorable ideas as to the capabilities of the country. From what I have learned of Canadian grown tobacco, I am firmly convinced that, at no distant day, it will be very largely produced and consumed in the country. I am quite satisfied with the progress being made, and with the introduction of new seed, that a quality of Canadian leaf will soon be produced that will, to a great extent, take the place of the foreign leaf. Having stated the changes proposed to be made in the Excise duties on tobacco, I wish to add that some difficulty has been experienced, since I had the honor of taking charge of the Department, as to the proper interpretation of the law, and as to the privileges accorded to the growers of tobacco. It is the intention of the Government, and I am sure it is the intention of the House, that no doubt should remain in the minds of the people as to the meaning of the law, after this Act passes. The Bill to be introduced upon these resolutions will fix the amount of Excise duty to be paid on foreign leaf and on Canadian leaf. It fixes the duty on tobacco manufactured from Canadian leaf, at 2 cts., and on so-called Canadian twist or roll tobacco at 2 cts. also. Those who have taken a great interest in the tobacco question, were quite willing that the manufacture of Canadian twist should be entirely prohibited, and that the growers should be compelled to sell to manufacturers or licensed dealers. They would then not consider it a hardship that Canadian twist should be charged 2 cts. a lb. They are free to manufacture roll tobacco within the limits prescribed by the Act, for their own use, without any duty whatever. What, I think, the growers of tobacco will be most pleased to hear, is that in the growth and cultivation of tobacco they will be as free as in the growing of oats, or wheat, or any other produce. No restriction will be placed on the cultivation of tobacco. We have taken a little additional power to control the leaf in the manufacturer's hands. Besides that, the only change made in the law is the reduction of the license duty, and the removal of restrictions imposed on the growers of Canadian leaf. With these short explanations, I think I may leave the resolutions in the hands of the House. I may give some further explanations at a future stage.

Mr. BLAKE. I would suggest that the resolutions be fixed for to-morrow, so that we may be able to see them and to properly consider them.

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to say a few words with respect to the resolutions now in your hands, so far as they relate to the production of tobacco. This is the third time since the present Government came into power that the Excise Laws regarding tobacco has been altered. In 1880 the scale of duties then existing were replaced by another scale, under which the duty on foreign leaf was fixed at 20 cts. a lb., and on Canadian leaf and Canadian twist at 14 cts. Provision was also taken to control the growth of Canadian tobacco; the grower could not sell it except to licensed dealers. Last year again, the duty was interfered with, the duty on Canadian leaf being reduced from 14 cts. to 10 cts. in the two following years, and to 8 cts. afterwards; and the provisions which had been adopted to regulate the growth of tobacco had been removed. I remember distinctly hearing last year what we are told this year—that henceforth the growth of Canadian tobacco would be as free as the growth of potatoes. It was found, however, that when the Bill came back from the Senate the benefits promised amounted to very little; the growth of tobacco was affected so far that it could be grown without a license, but it had to be sold to a licensed dealer. This year another alteration was made, by which the duty on the foreign leaf is fixed at 12 cts., and on Canadian leaf is reduced from 8 cts. to 2 cts. I have no fault to find with the reduction in the duty: but every one will admit that the constant alterations in the Tariff are very prejudicial to the public interests. They are not only annoying and injurious to the trade as it now exists, but deter new enterprises. Everyone will agree with me that it would be extremely desirable that the law should be so framed as to be permanent in its character; but I think we cannot expect anything like permanence in the proposed changes. I think the proposed duty of 2 cts. on Canadian tobacco, under present circumstances, is extremely objectionable. The hon. member has explained that the object of discriminating between the foreign leaf and the Canadian leaf is to afford the Canadian grower of tobacco Protection against the foreign grower, and the Canadian product Protection against the foreign product. So far so good. A duty of 12 cts. is kept on the foreign leaf for revenue purposes; but I am sure the hon. Minister does not expect to get a revenue out of Canadian tobacco when he reduces the duty to 2 cts. a lb. The statistics which we have before us show that in the year 1881 the total production of Canadian tobacco was a little over 445,000 lbs. A duty of 2 cts. a lb. upon this quantity would give a revenue of a little more than $8,000. I need not go any further to show that the intention of the Government cannot be to get a revenue from this duty. Now, an Excise Law should only have one purpose, that is, to produce a revenue; unless it does that, it is not only purposeless, but useless tyranny. Of all the taxes levied on a civilized nation, there is no tax so obnoxious as the Excise taxes, because there is no other that so interferes with the liberty of the subject. The Customs Act is not to be compared with it in that respect. The importer has only to remove his goods from the Custom House, and then he is free from the Customs officers; but the man who has to pay an Excise tax is forced to live in the constant companionship of the Excise officer. He is almost compelled to sleep with him. His goods are under lock and key, but the key is not in his pocket, but in the pocket of the Excise officer; his books are in his possession, it is true, but they must always be under the gaze of the Excise officer; and by the new provisions of the law, he must take his goods into his building through a particular door. All these things show that there is no law so tyrannical as an Excise Law; yet we know, by the experience of all nations, that these restrictions are necessary for the collection of a revenue. But there is nothing whatever that can justify such interference with the liberty of the subject but the collection of the revenue, and the moment it is shown that the revenue cannot be benefited, there is no reason for such a law. Nay, more, I am warranted in saying that such a law is not only purposeless, but it is tyrannical. But there is another consideration, and that is the cost of operating that law. How much will it cost to collect those $9,000 revenue, which the hon. Minister expects to receive from that source? I have not made a calculation, but I am sure the cost must exceed $3,000 or $4,000 at least, and perhaps more. For these considerations I submit to the hon. Minister and to the House that this duty should be removed altogether. The duty is now but 2 cts., and I see no reason why the Minister should not do 2 cts. better, and abolish it altogether.

Mr. BOURBEAU (Translation). I have heard, with a good deal of satisfaction, the explanations which the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has given us. I have also listened to the observations of the hon. member from Quebec East. The hon. member from Quebec East, appears not to complacently accept the resolutions which are intended to impose a duty of 2 cts. a lb. on manufactured tobacco. I, nevertheless, think that the Government has always proposed good measures, that is to say, measures intended to diminish the tax on the Canadian tobacco leaf. As the hon. member from Quebec East explained, the duty was 20 cts., and I think that was the rate levied when the hon. member was Minister of Inland Revenue. After his retirement from this Department, the hon. Minister who succeeded him deemed it advisable to reduce the rate to 14 cts. This, as I just observed, was a step in the right direction, in reducing the tax on tobacco which is raised by the Canadian farmer. Later on, Mr. Speaker, it was deemed advisable to still further reduce this tax to 8 cts. This was a further step in the right direction, and, for my part, I approve of the policy of the Government in reducing the tax on Canadian tobacco leaf. But to-day it is not 8 but only 2 cts., that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue proposes to impose on manufactured tobacco. It is necessary to observe, and I think I well understood the observations of the hon. Minister, that Canadian tobacco, if unmanufactured, will be subject to no duty. This announcement, Mr. Speaker, affords me much pleasure, because last summer the electors manifested some dissatisfaction—and I shared their feelings—when they learned that the Senate had not entirely approved of the Bill submitted by the hon. Minister. The Government was, consequently, obliged to pass certain resolutions and restore the tax which had been previously in operation. Today the Government is making a new effort, and presents a Bill, the effect of which will permit the sale of the leaf free from all duty, just as was proposed last year. In our county the farmers constitute a great majority of the electors, and I think that the farmers desire that what they produce should be placed on the market free of duty. I think that the Government is doing its duty, and that it will be very agreeable for them to learn that Canadian leaf tobacco will henceforth be sold in the market free of duty. Great efforts were made in the country, especially in the Province of Quebec, to encourage the cultivation of the sugar beet. And why were these efforts made? Why did the Government of Quebec make certain sacrifices for this purpose? Why did it offer certain sums of money to develop the cultivation of the sugar beet? Because it realized the necessity of improving the lands of the country, and they said with reason, when the sugar beet is extensively cultivated, we will have succeeded in improving the land. Mr. Speaker, we are not here to discuss this question of the sugar beet, but I availed myself of it as a comparison, and I say that the Government, in encouraging the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, as proposed by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, is taking a step in the right direction, and by this means he will considerably increase the growth of Canadian tobacco and thereby improve the lands of the country. As I observed a moment ago, it is necessary to know how to understand the difference between the tobacco which enters into manufacture and that which does not. Tobacco which is manufactured will pay a duty of 2 cts. a lb. Now, as to the imposition of the tax. I do not think we could charge less, and I think, for my part, that we ought to accept that tax as imposed on the manufacturer. It is just that he who manufactures the tobacco, since he pays a duty on foreign tobacco, it is just that he should pay a duty on Canadian tobacco, and the manufacturer cannot complain when he will learn that he will only have to pay a duty of 2 cts. a lb. Mr. Speaker, I will venture to relate here what took place last summer after the General Elections. During our Elections we announced the good news to the electors that Canadian tobacco would be placed on the market free of duty, and the farmers received this announcement with great satisfaction, and I believe that this assisted us very much to obtain large majorities in the Province of Quebec. It contributed to increase the majorities very much. It contributed to increase our majorities to a great extent, when we informed them that the hon. Ministers of the Government had announced last year that Canadian leaf tobacco could be cultivated and sold like the other products of Canada; but it further gave them an agreeable surprise, and I think that our Ministers of the Province of Quebec have been satisfied, have reason to be happy in offering to the hon. Premier, the leader of the Government, the grand majority which the Liberal-Conservative party of the Province of Quebec gave him. I think that our leader from the Province of Quebec ought to be satisfied with that majority. But, Mr. Speaker, it was with regret that, later on, we saw the regulations that the Government had been forced to adopt, because the Senate refused to pass the Excise Bill which had been adopted by the House last Session. Those who opposed us at the last Elections did not fail to publicly declare that we had deceived the electors in announcing to the electors that we intended to place Canadian leaf tobacco on our market free of duty. They endeavored, by all means in their power, to arouse indignation among our friends and told them: "Just look at these Conservative gentlemen in times of election, they fail not to proclaim everything which may be advantageous to them, but they fail not to deceive you and the proof is the new law on Canadian tobacco." Now, Mr. Speaker, when these men who have spoken in this manner against us, learn that the Government is endeavoring, and absolutely desires that Canadian leaf tobacco shall be offered on our markets free of charge, I believe that these persons will understand that we did not intend to deceive the farmers, that we have worked in their interests, and I believe that they will be satisfied. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say any more; the law is clear on the face of it, and will give every satisfaction that we desire. I congratulate and thank the Government for having acquiesced in the desire of those who have endeavored to diminish the tax imposed on leaf tobacco when this tobacco enters into manufacture, and to have entirely removed the duty on it when sold in an unmanufactured state.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). I have only a few words to add to the remarks which my hon. friend the member from Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau) has just made, and it is to reply to the observations presented to the House by the hon. member from Quebec East. The hon. member from Quebec East does not express now the same opinions as in the days gone by, when he occupied a seat on the Ministerial benches. It is not very long since the hon. member prepared measures similar to these just submitted by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, and on that occasion he expressed himself in a manner which perhaps he forgets to day. He announced at that time a principle which contradicts his present opinions, and with the permission of the House I will venture to repeat to the hon. member the words which he uttered in 1878, when being Minister of Inland Revenue he presented a resolution on the subject which engages our attention to-day. The hon. member in changing position has also changed his views. To-day, according to him, nothing is more iniquitous than any tax on tobacco. Nevertheless, Sir, in 1878 he proposed one; not only he proposed one, but he sustained his position in a speech which the Debates of the House have preserved, and in which he said:

"There is no person in a civilized country who will pretend that tobacco should be exempt from taxes; it is, among all others, the one on which every Government imposes taxes. At the present time there is not a civilized country which would dare abolish these Excise duties and exempt tobacco from taxes."

Well, Mr. Speaker, we must believe that the country has retrograded and that we are no longer in a civilized country, or it is the hon. member from Quebec East himself who has retrograded, and he asks to-day precisely that exemption from taxes which, according to him, no civilized country would dare ask. And the hon. member went further; he adds:

"In the second place, it is impossible to impose duty on foreign tobacco, unless we impose the same duty on Canadian tobacco."

You will thus perceive that the views of the hon. member from Quebec East have entirely changed on this subject. The hon. member asked not only an Excise duty, and declared that no civilized country would dare take off the Excise duties on tobacco, but he wished also to impose the same duty on Canadian as on foreign tobacco. He further said:

"I am of opinion that tobacco is one of the articles on which a duty should be imposed, and that it would be a most erroneous and ruinous policy to the revenue to take off such duty."

Why, then, Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member indignant to-day at what he then worshipped? The reason is very apparent: then he was a member of the Government, he had the interests of the country at heart, and it was at least his duty to enhance them. To-day he makes war on the Government, and the present measure offers him a favorable occasion to direct against the present Administration the blows which he received in the past, but which were cast on him simply because his promises did not meet the views of the people of the Province precisely, because the policy which he announced in his speech placed the Canadian tobacco on the same footing as the foreign tobacco, and consequently prevented the triumph of the National Policy on that question. I join with my hon. friend who has just spoken to congratulate the Government on the course it has been pleased to adopt on this question. The hon. members from the Province of Quebec in particular, have always taken a profound interest in this question of Canadian tobacco, and the Government in introducing the measure which is before the House, has acceded to the requests which we have at various times made. This condescension of the Government to yield to the demands which are made in the interest of our Province—this condescension, I say, deserves from us, an expression of our recognition.

Mr. LESAGE (Translation). I did not intend to speak on this question, especially in view of the able manner in which it has been treated by my hon. friends the members from Quebec. It may seem a little parsimonious to members who are strangers to our Province to observe that we take so much interest in the cultivation of an article which has not yet received in the rest of the country, all the attention which it deserves; nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, if we consider the importance of this product, we will understand the reasons which induce us to regard it so favorably in the Province of Quebec. In various districts to the south of Quebec, we have observed that during a certain number of years the production of tobacco had considerably diminished. This was owing to the fact that our farmers were obliged to submit to a system of inspection at times very arbitrary, and more calculated to discourage than increase this source of production. Some years later, especially since the present Government came in power in 1878, we have been able to establish a very considerable increase in the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, owing to the fact, that the representatives from the Quebec district had promised the farmers, that the cultivation of the Canadian tobacco, in view of the state of the finances, in view of the surplus in the Treasury, would be relieved ere long from all taxation. Gradually this idea expanded, and at the General Elections in 1882 we promised our electors that the law passed in 1880 should be interpreted in this sense: That is to say, that the cultivation of Canadian tobacco and the sale of the leaf would be free as a matter of fact. Nevertheless, certain interpretations were put on our promises and gave rise to commentaries of a more or less interesting character. One contended on the hustings that we had availed ourselves of a false interpretation of the law to increase our majority, and that this law would not bear the broad interpretation we had put upon it. I am, therefore, happy to note the resolutions which the Government introduced to-day, because they entirely justify the promises which it seemed right to us to hold out to the electors. We promised, in the name of the Government, that according to a law which in one sense had ceased to exist, that the sale of the leaf would be free on our markets. Now this is an established fact by these resolutions. This, Mr. Speaker, is an important question for the Province of Quebec, as it is estimated by the Census of 1881 that our Province produces 2,400,000 lbs. of tobacco, whilst in all the other Provinces the production is much less. Upper Canada only produces 160,000 lbs., Prince Edward Island 13,000 lbs., and the others in like proportion. I remember that at the time of the discussion of the Tariff in this House, an hon. member, on the right of the Speaker, calculated this difference of production between the Provinces; in seeking an explanation of the cause, he believed he found it in the fact that in Upper Canada the duties imposed on this product were levied, whereas in Lower Canada the law was a dead letter. Well, this goes to prove that the tax imposed on tobacco prevents its cultivation. If such is the case I consider that the resolutions which are now submitted, must have the effect of considerably augmenting the cultivation of tobacco, since we import into this country 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 lbs. of tobacco. I do not see why the Province of Quebec, which undoubtedly produces 2,300,000 lbs., should not receive all necessary encouragement. I live in an agricultural district, and I doubted that we raised tobacco on this grand scale; nevertheless, we raise in my county some 50,000 lbs. per annum. If, then, tobacco manufactories are established, they will naturally be supplied by the surplus product, and the cultivation of Canadian tobacco will receive a great stimulus in the other Provinces. The time will then arrive when the hon. Minister who presides over this Department—and I trust the present one may continue to be so then—when he will impose an additional duty on tobacco, which will be a luxury, and thus diminish in proportion the taxes on other articles. I, therefore, congratulate the Government and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue on the measure just introduced. This measure may not, perhaps, appear very important to our friends in the Maritime Provinces, but is highly so for us, in order to relieve us from certain accusations made against us in the Elections of 1882. I again unite with my hon. friends, who have discussed this question more at length, in congratulating the Government on this question.

Mr. BÉCHARD (Translation). Mr. Speaker. The hon. member from Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau) was pleased to congratulate the Minister of Inland Revenue on the concessions made in favor of the free cultivation of Canadian tobacco. I do not hesitate to join in the congratulations of the hon. Member, but he will permit me to observe that he has made a comparison relative to the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, which I would call an unfortunate comparison. He mentioned the cultivation of the sugar beet, which he called an ameliorating product, a product which contributed to add to the fertilization of the soil. That is all very good. Everyone knows that; it is not necessary to know much about agriculture to learn that the cultivation of the sugar beet improves the soil. But when he said it was the same with relation to the cultivation of tobacco, I think he is very much mistaken, because every one knows that the cultivation of this product, instead of enriching, exhausts the soil. This comparison led me to the conclusion that he did not understand any more about selling than cultivating tobacco. Now, I take the same ground on the present that I did on past occasions, regarding the cultivation of Canadian tobacco. Last year the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue proposed a reduction of the Excise duties on Canadian tobacco. This year the present hon. Minister proposes another reduction. He proposes that the tax on manufactured Canadian tobacco be reduced from 8 cts., which was the duty last year, to 2 cts. This is another step in the right direction. But as we seemingly can only impose a duty of 2 cts. per lb., I think we might go a step further and take the duty off altogether. It is said, with a good deal of reason, that tobacco is an article of luxury; but on the other side, Mr. Speaker, I have always thought that the cultivation and manufacture of tobacco might be left free, because it is a great agricultural industry in which protection can be given to the farmer; and since the party in power has undertaken for the last five years to give what it calls protection to the farmer, I do not see why it should not give it, to be consistent with its teachings, to the producers of Canadian tobacco the greatest liberty for the cultivation and manufacture of tobacco. I would then understand that the farmer receives protection. There is only one means of affording complete protection to the producers of Canadian tobacco. Tobacco is a product which we are obliged to import because we do not produce enough for consumption, and in imposing a duty on foreign tobacco we encourage the production of domestic tobacco. But, again, you tax the manufacturer of Canadian tobacco; instead of giving protection you discourage production. This tax of 2 cts. per lb. is not worth the trouble of collecting, and the cost of collection will probably amount to more than the amount collected. In our rural districts, at least in the Province of Quebec, those who raise tobacco prefer to manufacture it themselves. They make it in plugs and rolls; they roll the tobacco. This is a practice in vogue everywhere in Canada. They do this work in the evenings or in bad weather, when their work cannot be otherwise utilized, and when they have made their tobacco in this form they bring it to market. It is true that the sale of the tobacco leaf is free, but I can tell you that this is not sufficient for the cultivation of Canadian tobacco. If you wish to see it raised in large quantities, if you wish tobacco to become an important factor in our agricultural industries, I say you must leave the producer free to cultivate his tobacco, and make it free in every particular. It must not be restricted in this respect, for the moment that you handicap it and prevent its manufacture, or that you impose taxes on the manufacture of tobacco, you discourage its cultivation. The Canadian farmer will only raise tobacco in proportion as he is perfectly free not only to produce the leaf but also to manufacture in his manner and sell it free of taxes. Mr. Speaker, everyone wants to be protected—we are protecting the manufacturers of cotton, of agricultural implements, of overshoes—we protect all classes of manufactures and we pretend to protect agriculture. Well, I say that tobacco is one of the rare agricultural products, relative to which the farmer can receive protection, and if you wish to protect him, and if you wish to make him have faith in that protection, give him entire liberty to cultivate tobacco at home, to manufacture and sell it without obliging him to pay any tax. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) was pleased to attack my hon. friend the member from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). The hon. member from Quebec is able to take care of himself and to defend himself in this House or elsewhere. But as, according to the Rules of the House, he cannot reply to the charges brought against him, I will venture to say a few words in reply to my hon. friend the member from Montmagny. The hon. member reproached the member from Quebec East, of expressing opinions on this question of Canadian tobacco which formerly he did not hold; it is possible he has changed his views. But, Mr. Speaker, if that is the case he will have only followed the example which has been so often given by gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House. I remember that in 1867 or 1868 a duty was imposed on agricultural products, and in the following Session this tariff was abolished. I remember also that in 1869, I believe before dinner a tax was imposed on coal and flour, and after dinner the same men who imposed this tax withdrew and abolished it. They changed their opinions rather quicker, I think, than the hon. member from Quebec East did on the question of Canadian tobacco.

Mr. GIGULT (Translation). Mr. Speaker. It is surprising to see the Opposition criticise a measure of the present Government, when we remember what our opponents did when they were in power. We remember that the Liberal party, when it was in power, far from diminishing the taxes on Canadian tobacco, increased them; and the hon. member from Quebec East, who was then a Minister, strongly approved of this tax, and pretended, as the hon. member from Montmagny has proved, that this tax should be imposed in every civilized country. It seems to me that the hon. member from Iberville, who sustained that Government, cannot with good grace reproach the present Government with discouraging the cultivation of Canadian tobacco. On the contrary the present Government has done much to encourage its cultivation, and the facts are here to prove it. I know that in my county, and in the neighboring counties, there are farmers who raise two, three and four acres of tobacco, who under the Mackenzie Government raised very little. I asked during this Session, for a statement of the amount of Canadian tobacco used in the manufactories, which is Canadian tobacco, and by this report it appears that 194,529 lbs. of Canadian tobacco were used in manufactories, whilst under the regime of the Mackenzie Government not one pound was manufactured, and every one knows that to-day Canadian tobacco sells at a much higher price than four five or years ago. We know that this tobacco brings 4, 5 or 6 cts. more now than under the former regime. I, therefore, say it ill-becomes the hon. member from Iberville to say that the present Government has adopted a policy which discourages the cultivation of Canadian tobacco. I contend that we ought to maintain a tax on Canadian tobacco, as long as we maintain taxes on molasses and other necessaries of life. Tobacco is an article of luxury, and all writers on political economy agree in this, that tobacco and spirits ought to be taxed rather than articles of prime necessity in life. This tax of 2 cts. is very light, and ought to be approved of, when we remember that the present Government has always sought to impose much higher duties on foreign tobacco than on our own. We know, moreover, the practice which exists in several other countries. In England the cultivation of tobacco is entirely prohibited. There the importation of foreign tobacco is alone permitted. In France we know that the cultivation and manufacture of tobacco are entirely in the hands of the Government. And in most other countries it has been decided that tobacco should be taxed, and employed to largely contribute to the revenue and expenses of the Government. We know that the tax on tobacco produces a revenue of more than $1,900,000, as is calculated in the Report of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue for the past year, and consequently we should act prudently with this question, if we do not want to impose other taxes—which the people would not so generally accept by far, as that imposed on Canadian tobacco. We remember that when, in 1880, we commenced to impose a Protective Tariff, and to increase the duty on foreign tobacco used in our manufactories, we remember that several hon. members of the Opposition severely criticised this measure. Among others Messrs. Anglin and Cartwright, who said that the tax on tobacco ought not to be lowered, and that it would be very bad policy to do so. I cannot understand why, to-day, the very liberal measure of the Government is criticised, when it tends to considerably lower the duties, and is of a nature to cause to be used in our factories, a large quantity of tobacco actually produced in the country.

Mr. DUGAS (Translation). Mr. Speaker: The question which is now before the House merits our most serious consideration, as it has a tendency to develop a new industry, which will be a source of immense wealth to the agricultural class. Convinced as we are that agriculture is the basis of the wealth of nations, it becomes us to unite, and by united action, stimulate as much as possible, the cultivation of this native product. As my constituents are deeply interested in the growth of tobacco, I think I would be wanting in my duty if I did not raise my voice in the interest of this large body, whose interests at times are considered secondary. It is unnecessary for me to dilate on the immense advantages and importance for the Province of Quebec and the other Provinces of the Dominion, of giving more attention to the cultivation of tobacco, than has hitherto been bestowed, as this question has been, at great length and ability, discussed before this House. The interest which the Government takes in this industry, the instructions, and the various pamphlets issued to give information concerning the cultivation of this plant, and on the approved methods for drying and preparing the plant, have originated in the rural districts. Much emulation and progress has been attained in the cultivation of the leaf, but it is far from realizing as yet, the exigencies of the manufacturer and consumer. This industry is being much extended this year, and with proper improvement in the mode of culture, will become very remunerative for the agricultural class. According to the report which has been submitted during this Session, it has been proved to us that of the 400,000 lbs. of tobacco, on which duties have been collected, 300,000 lbs. were raised in the district of Joliette, in the county of Montcalm; and I can say with pride and with truth, that the county of Montcalm is the banner county in the matter of the cultivation of tobacco. And I can state before this House that the improved cultivation of this plant has largely contributed to the prosperity of those who have embarked in this industry. Mr. Speaker, what is the object which we desire to attain in legislating on this question? It is to increase, by every legitimate means, the cultivation of this plant, to gradually diminish the importaiton of foreign tobacco into our country, to get control of the market ourselves, in producing a sufficient quantity for local consumption, and finally to retain at home the millions of dollars which we give to the foreigner; and to attain this end, what must we do? In my opinion, it is necessary to protect both the producer and the manufacturer, whose interests are identical, and thus immediately establish a market for our tobacco, and introduce a competition which will favor the producer, and give an impulse to the cultivation of this plant. These, Mr. Speaker, are the considerations which I submit to this House. Congratulating the Government at the same time for the interest which they have manifested in this industry for the last few years, I must also extend my congratulations to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, for the care and skill with which he has prepared these resolutions which he has submitted to us, and which I am convinced will be favorably accepted by this House, as well as by the producer and manufacturer.

Mr. LABROSSE (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I concur entirely in the views propounded by the hon. members who have preceded me, in approving of the resolutions submitted to this House by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue; and as a member from the Province of Ontario, I may say that in my county the cultivation of Canadian tobacco has been commenced, and that it has proved very successful; but in view of the higher duty which had been imposed on Canadian tobacco some years ago, and that the manufacturer and the farmer had to obtain licenses to sell their tobacco, its cultivation was impeded. To-day I am happy to announce that in my county the farmers will be happy to learn that the members here manifest a desire to see the Canadian leaf tobacco placed in the market free of duty, and moreover the farmers will be able to sell without impediment their tobacco to the manufacturers and merchants of the city. I have reason to believe that some will this year be influenced to multiply their production in order to increase the cultivation in the counties where it has heretofore proved a success; in these counties where the manufacture of butter and cheese have progressed in the last two or three years. I therefore assert that the cultivation of tobacco, with the slight duty which it is proposed to impose upon it, and the promise that the Canadian leaf tobacco will be free of impost—I say—that this will be a great advantage to the country in general, and especially to the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. DUPONT (Translation). Mr. Speaker: The opinions expressed on the question submitted by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, by the hon. members from the other side of the House appear to me entirely erroneous, and very amusing. These hon. gentlemen, when they occupied the Treasury benches, were hostile to the adoption of the policy now proposed, but at the present time, are more enthusiastic in its favor than we are ourselves. They desire that the cultivation of this product shall be absolutely free from duty, and that even the manufacture of Canadian tobacco shall be relieved from all Excise duty. These tergiversations, on the part of these hon. members, in regard to the measure of protection on this product, so important for the Province of Quebec, and I might say for the entire Dominion—these tergiversations, I say, remind me of an individual who, having passed his life in sin, and arriving in another world, regretted not having practiced here below the virtues which would have assured him happiness in the world beyond. The opinions expressed by the hon. gentlemen of the left, in the matter of protection, induce me to believe that they regret very much, now that they are in Opposition, not to have treated the Canadian people better when they occupied the Treasury benches, and especially not to have better protected the Canadian farmer, when, time and again, they demanded the protection which is now afforded to them by the present Government. An hon. member ventured to say that the cultivation of Canadian tobacco was not the only industry which the Government could protect, was not the only protection which the Canadian Government could bestow on the Quebec farmer. I, nevertheless, think that the hon. members of the left, if they continue to pursue the course which they followed before 1878, will find it enough to protect the Canadian farmers in this matter; but I must candidly say that the Government have not confined themselves to protecting the farmers on this one point alone, of Canadian tobacco. But that this Protection has extended to all agricultural products in general, to the products of the Province of Quebec, as well as to all those of the other Provinces. I had not the honor of being a member of this House when the present Government propounded its Tariff, but I remember well that, having glanced over this Tariff, to assist us in the Elections, we were able to demonstrate to the members of the Opposition, during the electoral campaign, that the present Government had protected the cultivation and sale of all products of the Canadian farmer. Thus when my hon. friend made the assertion above alluded to, he certainly made an inaccurate one, and gave manifest proof of the habitual ingratitude of the hon. members of the Opposition towards a Government which had accorded all the protection that any Government under like circumstances could bestow, having regard to our finances and our economical position. I should say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members who now occupy the Ministerial benches, differ in opinion from their predecessors. The hon. members who have spoken on the subject under discussion, my hon. friend from Quebec East, and my hon. friend from Iberville, who now share our opinions in giving protection to the Canadian agriculturist, held very different opinions when they occupied the Ministerial benches. To obtain their positions, they made promises which they did not carry out, and that is the reason why they were forced to surrender their positions; and if the members of the present Government occupy the Treasury benches to-day, after having submitted their policy for the approbation of the people, it is, Mr. Speaker, because they know how to keep the promises they made to the people, and not later than the last Elections, when we appeared before the electors, when we were in a position to state that the Government had taken off the duties on the product of tobacco, in such a manner as to admit of the free sale of the raw leaf, we believed we were making a correct statement. Unfortunately, in the law of 1882, there was a contradiction which had the effect of destroying all the advantages of the protection which that law was intended to confer on the producer of Canadian tobacco. Well, Mr. Speaker, having represented to the present Government, the promises which we had made to the electors, they hastened to take off all restrictions on the free sale of Canadian tobacco on the market. This, Mr. Speaker, is what we call keeping promises, and a Government which advances in this direction, must necessarily obtain the confidence of the people and of the House. For my part I am decided to give to the present Government that confidence which the entire country has accorded to it, because, in the financial administration of the affairs of the country, I think the present Government has done its duty, that it has fulfilled all the promises it made.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I will make a few observations in reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I must first congratulate the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue on having lowered the taxes on Canadian tobacco. In that, I believe, I am altogether consistent with the course I have taken in the past. Indeed, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, whenever the tobacco question came up I have always voted for the abolition of duties on Canadian tobacco, and in favor of the free sale of the leaf. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, accordingly as they lessen the duties, the hon. Ministers approach the ideas that I have already advanced on this subject. I will now say a few words in explanation of the stand taken by the Liberal party, whilst in power, on the tobacco question. The hon. gentlemen on the right have accused us of inconsistency because of our having placed a duty of 10 cts. per lb. on Canadian tobacco whilst we were in power, and because to-day we ask that this duty be taken off altogether. I believe I can prove that this inconsistency does not really exist, and for this reason: whilst we were in power we established a Revenue Tariff, and every one knows there was a deficiency then in the public treasury. I hear some members cry "hear, hear." I am only speaking of facts admitted by every one, and repeated to us time and again in this House and on the hustings. It was an inconsistency then on the part of our opponents to ask for the complete abolition of taxes, because at that time we had a lower Tariff than to-day and the revenue was insufficient. The abolition of duty on Canadian tobacco does not lower the revenue merely on the native, but also on the foreign tobacco, and the reduction of the revenue would have been from $500,000 to $750,000. If we to-day, Mr. Speaker, demand the entire removal of duties on Canadian tobacco it is because we have a Protective Tariff and that the other taxes are very high. We contend that the farmers who are taxed on everything they buy, have a right to a special protection on Canadian tobacco. I do not think there is any contradiction in that. We say that since we have a Protective Tariff which discriminates against the farmers on cottons, woollens, and everything they buy, we ought to grant them a compensation for the heavy taxes which they are forced to pay. The hon. member for Rouville said, just a moment ago, that we ought to admit the propriety of imposing a duty on tobacco because of its being an article of luxury, there is no doubt we ought to admit that if any article should be taxed, it is tobacco. But there is all the difference in the world between the English Tariff to which the hon. gentleman alluded and the Canadian Tariff. The English is a Revenue Tariff, and there is no doubt that the means to obtain a large revenue is to prevent the growth of domestic tobacco. If we ask the complete removal of the 2 cts. duty on Canadian tobacco it is simply because we have a Protective Tariff—and if we had as formerly a Revenue Tariff I would not rise to ask the abolition of duty on Canadian, and the lowering of the tax on foreign tobacco. The hon. member from Dorchester (Mr. Lesage) has reminded us that the product of Canadian tobacco during the last few years has considerably diminished. He gave as a reason for this decrease, the high taxes which were imposed on this plant. Well, I will tell you one thing which has been more injurious than the tax itself. It was the system of inspection established by the Minister of Inland Revenue. For some years the farmers have been harassed by a legion of inspectors, who came from all parts, scoured the country, frightened the farmers and unjustly and needlessly tormented the agricultural class. This system for which the hon. gentlemen on the right are responsible, injured the production of tobacco more than duties which we imposed whilst we were in power. I will not extend my remarks; I share the opinion of the hon. member for Iberville, who asks the abolition of the 2 cts. tax, because I consider the revenue derived from it will not be sufficient to compensate for the cost of production; and I am perfectly convinced that within one or two years the Minister of Inland Revenue will be again obliged to amend the duties on domestic tobacco, as he has already done five or six times during the few years the Conservative party has been in power. No doubt he will come to the conclusion that the cost of collection of this tax will far exceed the revenue derived from it, and moreover, that this tax which will afford no revenue will prove a great nuisance to the Canadian tobacco grower.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker: I am glad to see that most of the members of the Opposition join in the praises which on all sides are bestowed on the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Government. There is one point, however, which the Opposition does not seem to appreciate. There is one politico-economic maxim upon which we all agree, that is, that objects of luxury such as tobacco and liquor, ought first of all to be taxed. We also to-day agree that we should give all possible protection to agricultural products. Nay, we differ with the Opposition as to the measures necessary to attain this end. When the Liberal party was in power it was their policy to tax Canadian tobacco as high as foreign tobacco. We desire to have a discriminating duty. We say if you tax Canadian tobacco, the production of which is only in its infancy, the Canadian producer being still ignorant of the secret of ripening and preparing it, if you tax it as high as foreign tobacco you will not give him a chance to compete with the latter which has the advantage of an experienced cultivation. But if you tax foreign tobacco more than the Canadian, if you put a discriminating duty in favor of the latter, you encourage the farmer to cultivate tobacco and ensure its production here. It was objected when we inaugurated this policy that enormous deficits would follow. This was the era of deficits, but this era has passed. A wise policy has produced surpluses. What does the Government do? It lays down the principle without any danger to the Treasury, that the farmer must be afforded sufficient protection for all the products of the farm, not only for wheat, oats, barley, potatoes and other products of the farm, but also on tobacco. On the one hand it makes the cultivation and sale of leaf tobacco free, and on the other it reduces the tax on Canadian manufactured tobacco from 8 cts. to 2 cts. Why? Firstly, to protect the farmer who raises the raw material, the tobacco plant; and secondly, to maintain the principle that objects of luxury should be taxed. But it fixes the rate to correspond with the lowering of the tax in the United States. If the tax on tobacco in the United States had not been reduced, that on Canadian manufactured tobacco could not have been so much reduced. The Government had an only alternative to maintain in favor of Canadian tobacco, a differential duty. It is necessary also not to take off the tax altogether in order that the people may not lose sight of the idea that objects of luxury must be taxed in preference to objects of prime necessity. The Government merely inaugurated last year the encouragement of the cultivation of tobacco. A new era is opening. We import each year nearly 10,000,000 lbs. of tobacco from the United States. At 6 cts. a lb. $600,000 of Canadian money is annually sent to our neighbors. Of these 10,000,000, 600,000 enter into Canadian manufactures to make twist tobacco. The experience which we have acquired in the last two years has clearly proved that Canadian tobacco is better than that of the United States for twist tobacco. We have to-day a certain market for 6,000,000 lbs. not for smoking tobacco, but for twist tobacco. This latter will be exported to the West, where it will find a large and good market. So much money will cease to be exported to the United States, and remain in the country, thanks to the encouragement given to Canadian tobacco. This, Mr. Speaker, is a very important point. We know by experience that any person who cultivates his tobacco properly can realize from its cultivation, from $30 to $50 per acre, per annum. The hon. member from Iberville (Mr. Béchard), with the experience which characterizes him, and the eloquence which distinguishes him, tells us that the cultivation of tobacco is ruinous to the soil. I will venture to inform him that if the cultivation of tobacco exhausts somewhat the soil for a short time, it benefits it in destroying weeds. The soil where tobacco has been cultivated becomes susceptible when manured, of raising wheat, barley, and the richest grains, and the harvest which it yields is clean, it is not necessary to make it pass through the ordinary process of sifting and cleaning. The hon. member from Drummond and Arthabaska, was therefore entirely justified in saying that the cultivation of tobacco was beneficial to the soil, because it improves and cleans the soil. Mr. Speaker, I just observed that we import millions of pounds of tobacco, but the population of Canada increases considerably each year, thanks to the wise policy of the hon. Ministers. A large population is going to the North-West and British Columbia. There are so many more comers, which will augment by many millions of pounds the consumption of tobacco which we can produce, manufacture here, and export. After a careful study of the question, after having weighed as much as possible the demands of the Treasury, those of the manufacturer and farmer, we say to the Government: In principle tobacco should be taxed; but in the beginning of this industry when the farmers of all parts of the Dominion are only, I may say, preparing for it; when the people of Canada are only realizing the possibility of this product in this country, we ask you to give to the farmer all possible latitude, to leave cultivation and sale of Canadian leaf tobacco entirely free, in order to induce the people of the Dominion to cultivate this plant, and prevent it from importing its tobacco from the United States. We ask this from the Government, not only on account of the promises we made, and which you repeated, not only on account of the late law but also for the farmer in the interest of this product, in order to give him a more rapid and complete stimulus, so that he may know what it is necessary to do to perfect its cultivation. The Government has consented to it—if it has been possible to do so, it is because the Treasury is rich enough to submit to the reduction of receipts consequent thereto. It is owing to this that the Government can suffer a reduction of duties on this article, to the extent of a million or more; encouraging and creating, at the same time, a new industry which will contribute very much to the prosperity of the agriculturist. Secondly, we said to the Government: We know that Canadian tobacco is not first-class smoking tobacco, but it is preferable for twist tobacco. But give the manufacturer the exclusive right of manufacturing tobacco so that neither the farmer, nor the merchant, nor anyone else will have the right to sell it except the licensed manufacturers, and we may rest assured that factories will be established and that Canadian tobacco will find its market. When the tobacco enters into manufacture, it is prepared in a special manner according to modern processes; it will become a tobacco of good quality. As these manufacturers will have the exclusive right of manufacturing tobacco, they will be sure to control the market sufficiently to obtain a suitable return, which will reimburse them for their expenditure and for interest on their capital. The profits will be sufficient to maintain fair prices. Thirdly, we said to the Government: We know that your receipts will be diminished, we know that they will be less in the first few years. We understand that, but when the cultivation of tobacco has become extensive, well understood, well performed, when we are in a position to produce all the tobacco which we need for the consumption of the country, then you can say to the people the tax on tobacco should be increased. This is the real position which we took, Mr. Speaker, we who have paid so much attention to this product in an agricultural and manufacturing point of view. I am exceedingly happy to realize that the Government has formally considered this demand. I was sure of it from the beginning, for I have the greatest confidence in the Government. I was sure that they would understand our desires and the necessities of the population. I am happy to note that the measure submitted is the most equitable one possible, and the best adopted to encourage the farmer to raise tobacco, and to manufacture it at the factory. There is another point which we have not been able to attain; but I know that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is very anxious to concede it, and that sooner or later he will find a solution of the problem. It is difficult, in the first instance, to build factories exclusively intended to manufacture Canadian tobacco; and if it were possible to allow manufacturers of foreign tobacco to manufacture Canadian tobacco in the same establishment it would be a great advantage, and I am sure the manufacturer would try and mix the two tobaccos, which would add to the value of our tobacco and extend the market for it. The present manufacturers desire this; they are ready to favor and encourage, on this condition, the cultivation of our tobacco. I know that the hon. Minister is giving all possible attention to this question, and if it is possible to arrive at a solution of properly guarding the revenues he will concede our request. Before closing I wish to say a word about rolled tobacco. We have already stated here what is the general opinion on this point. If you permit the farmer to roll the tobacco—there are among this class, as among all classes, dishonest individuals—it will happen that some will use bad tobacco, will cover it with a good leaf, and will sell it in the market for tobacco of good quality. He who buys it perceives in cutting it that the tobacco which he buys is of an inferior quality, and he thinks that all Canadian tobacco is of the same quality. Thus you see our rolled tobacco, instead of being an advantage to Canadian tobacco, injures its reputation. It is better, therefore, that rolled tobacco should disappear, and that the farmer shall only have the right to sell the leaf tobacco, provided he can sell it free and without duty in its original state. This is the best way to render this cultivation prosperous. I congratulate the Government on the measure it proposes. It is a new proof of its devotion to the agricultural and manufacturing interests. The people demanded that its cultivation should be free, and it will be grateful for having rendered it so. The Opposition says it would like to see the duty disappear, and have tobacco placed on the same footing as wheat, oats and rye. But when these things enter into the distillery or brewery are they not taxed? and the Opposition do not ask that they should be exempted from duty. Why should it be otherwise for manufactured tobacco? The Opposition has no plausible reason to make such a demand when the cultivation of the tobacco leaf is free, and, as in the matter of manufactured tobacco, Canadian is the most favored of all countries.

Mr. De St. GEORGES (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I am happy to join with those who have congratulated the Government for having reduced the tax on Canadian tobacco, but I regret with the hon. members from Iberville and Lotbinière, that it did not go a step further in the right direction and abolish altogether the tax. In 1874, I moved a resolution which was one of want of confidence in the Government which I supported, because it refused to abolish altogether the tax on tobacco. I did not succeed at the time because the Treasury was empty, and we could not sustain such a drain on the Treasury. To-day we are no longer in the same position; we have a surplus, and the Government can afford to dispense with this Excise duty altogether. When I made the aforesaid motion in 1874, I was assisted by the hon. the present First Minister, the hon. Minister of Railways, and by a large number of Conservatives, nevertheless we were defeated by a majority of fifty-six. I congratulate the Government on having adopted the advice which I then gave, and I am happy to be able to congratulate myself on the fact that the little I did then has borne its fruit, and that it has induced the Government to reduce the tax on tobacco. The county which I represent, produces much tobacco, and could greatly increase its production, the soil being adapted for the growth of this plant, but the fear of fine and imprisonment prevents the farmer from giving proper attention to the cultivation of this plant. It would be, however, a very remunerative husbandry, as it is established that we can obtain therefrom from $50 to $100 per acre, something which we are far from being able to realize from the cultivation of oats and other grains. It will, therefore, be a protection for the farmer to permit him to raise, manufacture and sell his tobacco without a single cent of duty. This is the protection which I ask and especially for the finest county in the Province which I have the honor to represent. But this is not all we must do in encouraging the cultivation of tobacco, we must find a market for its sale. You will find this market in the factories. But the Government fears that Canadian tobacco will be mixed with foreign tobacco. Let the Government then appoint officers to watch the preparation of tobacco in the factories, and let those officers be paid one-half by the manufacturers and one-half by the Government. This proposition was made by one of the largest manufacturers of the Province, Mr. Lemesurier, of Quebec. I hold in my hands a letter in which he makes this proposition. I do not share the opinion of the hon. member from Bellechasse, who says that the Canadian is superior to the American tobacco. And this is my reason: the Canadian tobacco would certainly be superior to the American if it were properly prepared, but the farmer not having the desired encouragement cannot make the necessary expenditure in order to prepare the tobacco in such a manner as to make it of first-class quality. I still ask for this protection. Let the farmer be free to cultivate the tobacco without tax, let him manufacture it without any restriction, and I am sure that ere long he will know how to prepare his tobacco so as to render it not only equal but superior in quality to the American tobacco. I hope the Government will continue in the good course on which it has entered, and that perhaps this year or next year it will abolish altogether the tax on tobacco, as also on all the necessaries of life such as wheat and flour. If it cannot do it the people will be satisfied, and we will thank the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid on the Table:—

Report of the Minister of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada, for the Calendar year, 1882.—(Mr. Pope).

MILITIA OF CANADA.

Mr. CARON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 31) to consolidate and amend the laws affecting the Militia of Canada.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 37,

Mr. CARON. When the Committee rose and reported the other night we had arrived at clause 37. I propose to amend this clause by striking out the words after "arms and accoutrements." Hon. gentlemen will see—at least those belonging to the legal profession—that the provision made in the old law, as I view it, is ultra vires, infringing on Provincial rights, and the rights of the municipal councils to impose taxation. The clause, amended as I propose to amend it, will read: "Officers shall provide their own uniforms and accoutrements."

On section 39,

Mr. CARON. I propose to amend this clause by introducing what I really consider will be of great benefit to our different battalions and military organizations. The amendment I propose is to add, after the words "shall have the power to recover the value of such articles of public property" the words "or property of the corps." Hon. gentlemen who take an interest in Militia matters know that outside of the public property, which is the property of the Government and the Department, there may be articles, such as musical instruments, which really do not belong to the Government, and it is only right that the protection to Government property should be extended to this property. I am glad an hon. gentleman mentioned this point to me; and hon. gentlemen will readily understand that in framing a measure of this kind it is only by an exchange of views with hon. gentlemen on both sides, who take an especial interest in Militia matters that one can hope to frame a comprehensive measure.

Mr. BLAKE. That provision the hon. gentleman refers to would permit the recovery by the hon. Minister, or by his nominee, of the value of articles of public property, or of the corps, articles which may have been deficient or damaged. I think the hon. member for Lambton suggested there was sometimes difficulty in obtaining recovery of band instruments in species, not that they were lost, but there was a difficulty in getting hold of them—perhaps for want of harmony among the officers—and the question is whether, if we have power to provide that value may be recovered, we ought not also to provide some summary means for holding custody of corps property, which would enable speedy jurisdiction to be exercised over any officers or men, in order to get back the property in species.

Mr. CARON. I can see the force of the arguments, but the hon. gentleman will see that we are treating this property exactly in the same way and in as favorable a manner as we treat Government property. It is very difficult in a Bill of this kind to provide for cases which might enter into a civil suit and come under the regulations and procedure of a court of justice. I felt that gentlemen who are at the head of battalions, and who had expended money in organizing bands, or in improving the appearance of the battalion, ought to be able to consider that property in exactly the same light, and that it should be protected in the same way as Government property. However, to meet the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton, I will amend the section by adding the words "or corps" between the words "public" and "property."

On section 44,

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it would be much preferable if a less number were drilled annually than 45,000—say 15,000; if they were drilled annually you would have a more effectual force than you have now in these 45,000 drilled every alternate year. Their pay might be increased without increasing the burthens of the country, which would be a great inducement for the men to serve. I think it is worth the hon. Minister's consideration. We have in the hon. Minister of Militia an hon. gentleman who has taken a very lively interest in Militia affairs, and one who, from my stand-point, at all events, has given very great satisfaction irrespective of his politics. They are bad, but we can't help that. I trust he will take into consideration the suggestion I have made.

Mr. CARON. I am exactly in the same position as my hon. friend. Although I do not approve of his politics, I have had occasion to know what an excellent military man he is himself. I can assure my hon. friend that in everything relating to the Militia force I try to forget my bad training, politically, and think of nothing else but the interests of the force. I consider the suggestion my hon. friend has made is one of very great importance. I have considered the matter seriously. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble of looking into the strength of the force, for a few years back, he will see that we have been gradually working in the direction he indicates. We have reduced the force by 5,000 men already. The hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is to reduce an old organized force which has always done its duty so well. I have taken the number of men as laid down in the original Bill. I am glad to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that whenever any corps have been found to be inefficient, and unable to contribute to the general efficiency of the whole force, we have been gradually disbanding them.

On section 57,

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us how many officers there are with certificates, and how many of them are available?

Mr. CARON. That is rather an extensive subject, but I will be very glad to procure that information from the Department.

Mr. BERGIN. Would it not be well, while forming camps of instruction, to order officers without certificates from the Board of Volunteer officers to attend these camps?

Mr. CARON. I look upon the suggestion as really an excellent one, and it will have the consideration of the Department. I do not think that the law as it is now at present, would prevent that suggestion being acted upon.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not think that, under this clause, it would be possible to order the attendance of commissioned officers, excepting those who had received certificates from the regular schools.

Mr. CARON. I am perfectly willing to add the words "to attend the camp or camps of instruction."

On section 59,

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). How far have these provisions been accepted by the schools and colleges in the country? How many companies have been formed for drill in these institutions? This clause was introduced some years ago; it is a desirable one; and it would be very agreeable to know how many have taken advantage of the provision?

Mr. CARON. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on the interest which he seems to take in the Militia force; but the hon. gentleman will understand that I have not come here arrayed in perfect fighting order, and am consequently unable to give the precise figures; but I can inform the hon. gentleman that several schools have taken advantage of the provision, and the Department has received applications from others. This movement, which I consider to be of the greatest possible importance, is extending and growing in Canada. The boys in the different schools, trained, I may almost say, as part of their holiday performances, acquire a knowledge of military discipline, order, and science—if I can so speak—which they never forget; and I have had most satisfactory reports from schools in Ontario, Quebec, and elsewhere, on this subject. The system promises very considerable extension. It is inexpensive; the boys are fond of it; and it does a great deal of good. If the hon. gentleman so wishes, I will have the information prepared.

Mr. ROSS. I will be glad to have it. I looked through the Militia report for it, and did not find it. I consider this a very important part of the service; and on that account, am anxious to obtain the information. I agree with the hon. Minister, it is very desirable that the schools should accept the proposition of the Department and organize these companies. The effect upon our young men physically will be to them a decided advantage; and I think that the military spirit that the hon. Minister considers so important, and which we all appreciate, will also in this way be cultivated and be of some benefit to the country. If the report on this subject is not satisfactory, I will suggest another mode by which the same results in my judgment may perhaps be more successfully attained.

Mr. VAIL. Have schools in Ontario taken advantage of this clause? Before I left the Department several in Quebec had done so.

Mr. CARON.

Mr. CARON. Yes; a number have.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am glad to see so many laymen take an interest in this question. My hon. friend from Huntingdon complained recently—and I think justly—of their lack of interest in it; and it is a fact, that in many Sessions of Parliament, when the Militia estimates were under consideration, they hardly involved more than one hour, or an hour and a-half, in discussion. I am glad that they have woken up to the importance of the question now before the House. I rise for the purpose of asking the hon. Minister a question in reference to this clause. It provides that:

"There shall be furnished to every Normal School, University, College or School in Canada, in which there shall be instituted classes of instruction in military drill and exercises under regulations prescribed by Her Majesty, arms and accoutrements necessary for the instruction of the pupils thereof over the age of twelve years."

Is it the intention to furnish them with arms and accoutrements? I hardly think myself that it will be necessary in the general public schools of the country, as I think it would be sufficient that the pupils of the schools should be taught extension motions, marching and counter-marching, while arms might be placed in the hands of more advanced pupils with safety and advantage.

Mr. CARON. We do not intend furnishing arms to the ordinary schools. The hon. gentleman will see, if he looks into the system of France and Switzerland, that they give arms to the smaller schools, or those outside of the normal schools and colleges. I have some specimens in the Department of the arms they furnish; they are a very light and nicely made weapon, but, of course, they have no range whatever, and are used merely by children of say fourteen or fifteen years of age. As the cost of these arms is between $4 and $5, if they were to be furnished to all the schools, an expenditure would be entailed which we are at present not inclined to incur.

On section 64,

Mr. CARON. I ask leave of the Committee to insert in the middle of line twenty-three, after the words "or as a spectator," the words "and also when going to or from the place of drill or parade of his corps."

Mr. VAIL. Would it not be well to leave the clause as it stood in the old Bill?

Mr. CARON. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. In a country like Canada we must consider that we have a force equal to any volunteer force in the world, and I do not think the privileges of these volunteers, outside of their military service, should be interfered with. Any militiaman, or any one who takes an interest in the force, will see that the words I have suggested to the Committee practically cover the whole ground. Hon. gentlemen will see that if we re-enacted the old clause it would put the Militia force of Canada in this position: that at any organization which is not a military organization these men might be punished for what would be during active service looked upon as a military offence. By the other clauses of this Act militiamen may be punished for wearing their uniforms when they are not entitled to wear them. We lay down the rule which, according to my experience of military life, will cover every possible occasion when they may turn out in uniform; but I do not want to see our citizen soldiers who are doing service as military men, brought on any occasion, outside the service, before any except the ordinary tribunals of their country.

Mr. VAIL. I have never yet heard any complaint against this clause in the old Act. Some better reason should be given for an important change like this. I consider that when any member puts on the uniform of the Queen, as officer or private, he is bound to be a gentleman, and he ought to be under discipline; otherwise he should not wear his volunteer attire. Under this clause, as it stands, he may wear his uniform for a week before going to or coming from drill, and is not amenable to anybody, except that he may be punished for using his military clothing improperly. The hon. Minister of Militia should mention some case in point, if he knows of any, in which the old clause worked badly, and we will accept his view; but otherwise I can see no reason for the change.

Mr. BERGIN. The changes will be, I am sure, acceptable to every member of the Militia force. The law as formerly worded was no doubt a hardship. Under it gentlemen going to a ball or dinner in uniform were under martial law. Now the clause is so worded as to apply only to militiamen when on duty; and "going to and from the parade of their corps," covers all that the officers of Militia think necessary to be added to this clause.

Mr. VAIL. If I am not mistaken, one hon. gentleman who spoke very highly of the Bill the other day, mentioned this as objectionable. That hon. gentleman is not present now, but he probably would reiterate his objection.

Mr. BERGIN. The alteration is made in the sense required.

Mr. VAIL. I should like to know the opinion of the inspecting field officer or the Inspector of Militia.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some two or three years ago when drill was held in the city of Toronto, the Grey battalion attended that drill, and about seven or eight members of the Durham company contracted typhoid fever in consequence. It came upon them shortly after they came home. No provision was made to defray the expenses incident to their illness, which was long and tedious. In one instance that came under my notice, a young man was confined to his bed for months. I understand that the Militia Department was applied to for payment of the expenses he incurred during his illness, and no response was given. If this clause was in the old Militia Act he had certainly claim for compensation for the time he lost and the expenditure incurred through the illness, which it is quite clear to my mind he contracted in service. Seven others contracted the same fever through the same cause, and no compensation was given them, though application was made in two instances to the Department for compensation. I think I made application myself, and I understand that an officer came to make inspection and to report. He was thoroughly satisfied that these volunteers had contracted the disease in the service. I might add that they were not in very comfortable circumstances, and that after they came home a brother of one of them contracted the same illness and subsequently died. This, I think, is a fitting time to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to these cases, and we know that with all his eminent qualifications for the position he holds, he has the generous heart of a soldier. It is only fair that these men who prepare themselves to defend their country, and are ready if necessary to die in its service, should receive compensation for injuries contracted in that service. Now that I have brought this matter up, the hon. Minister of Militia will not be able to say that it never came under his personal notice. I can give him the names of every one of the volunteers who suffered illness, and I hope they will yet be compensated for the losses they sustained on this account.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for South Grey is laboring under a misapprehension in attempting to put any blame on the Department in this matter. I saw the report which was made by Dr. Barnhardt, the surgeon of the 31st Battalion, to which this company belonged, and that report was to the effect that the volunteers in question were not suffering from typhoid fever at all, and that their sickness was not contracted at their annual drill. It would be very unreasonable to expect the Department to give compensation for all pretended claims that might arise through men being sick for weeks after their annual drill.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Two of the cases came under my own notice professionally, and were tended by me during six weeks. The disease was typhoid fever, and no other person saw those cases. Dr. Barnhardt came and consulted with me. I told him it was typhoid fever, and he said compensation should be given. What report was made I know not, but I know the cases were well marked cases of typhoid fever. Both the surgeon of the battalion and the captain of the Durham company were of the opinion these men should be paid. I did not ask the Department to give anything to those who were not entitled to any compensation; and the hon. member for East Grey has no right to make the statements he has made, when I state that I know those cases, and that they were distinctly typhoid fever of a most virulent form.

Mr. SPROULE. I read the report, and I think the Department have nothing else to go on but the report of the surgeon of the battalion. In that report it is stated that the disease was not typhoid fever. I have letters from Dr. Barnhardt in reference to cases which I supposed were the same as those referred to by the hon. member for South Grey. I understand a claim was set up by several doctors for compensation, and their fees were put at extensive figures, expecting the Department to pay those fees, and, no doubt, the hon. member for South Grey feels it hard that he did not make a haul out of the Department. I ask whether the Department are not in duty bound to accept the report of the surgeon of the battalion, and not that of an outside person.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Those parties live about forty miles from the surgeon of the battalion, and it was impossible for him to render them assistance. I made no claim for compensation for professional attendance, I sent in no bill, and if I had I do not think I would be anything but justified in the matter. I have only to state this, that if any person from the Department or any surgeon made the statement that these were not cases of typhoid fever, and that the disease was not contracted when on service, he made a statement which I think to be untrue. I understood there were five or seven cases in the Durham company, and I understood they contracted it in the same way. Of these I have no personal knowledge, but of the two cases that came to my own notice, I have no hesitation in affirming that they contracted the disease while on service, and suffered a long and dangerous illness. I think they are entitled to compensation. I think I am entitled to compensation for my services. I do not ask the Department to compensate me, but I want the Department to compensate those that suffered loss. I know perfectly well of what I speak. It was impossible for the surgeon of the battalion, who was about forty miles from those parties, to have known anything further than what I told him myself, and he admitted at the time that they should receive compensation.

Mr. CARON. We see here how difficult it is for the Department to decide all such cases that are submitted to it. When doctors differ it is difficult for the Department to decide who is right and who is wrong. I regret extremely any illness that may have been contracted by any member of the force. Every case of that kind is always thoroughly investigated, and we try to give every possible help to the men who meet with any injury or contract any disease while serving in the Militia force.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would observe to the hon. Minister that these men were taken from Owen Sound to Toronto on an open flat car. It rained nearly all the way to Toronto, and I think this was one of the causes of the illness from which they suffered. The weather came out very hot immediately afterwards, and I understood that the water they drank from the bay was unhealthy. It was doubtless from these causes that they contracted the disease.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am pleased to see the provision made in the sixty-eighth section, but I think the word "liberal" should be inserted before the word "provision." In the town of Gananoque, where I reside, we have a Field Battery of Artillery, which, I think, stands second to none in Canada, and I think the hon. Minister of Militia will agree with me when I make that statement. I had the honor to be present at Brockville last fall when that hon. gentleman was there, and I think our company stood at the head of the list. Some years ago, when the country was threatened with a Fenian invasion, orders came from Ottawa for our company to report themselves at Brockville on the shortest possible notice. This order was received at nine o'clock at night, and next morning at eight o'clock they reported themselves for active service at Brockville, thirty-two miles distant. Last year, on the Queen's birthday, the same battery received orders from the Department here to proceed to Kingston to join in the celebration there. While on service at Kingston, and performing their duty, one of the drivers, Mr. John Dempster, who was in charge of a team, met with a fatal accident. His horse stumbled, and he fell, and was thrown on the road, and a cannon passed over him, killing him instantly. There was no fever, in this case, and no dispute about the matter. This case is now engaging the attention of the Government, and when I say that this young man had only been married three weeks before his death, I think the House will admit that the Government ought to make liberal and ample provision for the care of that young widow.

Mr. CARON. I can tell my hon. friend that this matter has received the attention of the Government, and upon the urgent solicitation of my hon. friend made in behalf of the widow, the Government is reconsidering the matter.

Mr. IVES. While upon this clause, I beg to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to a case which has been receiving his attention for the last fifteen or sixteen months, and there is very great danger that if the consideration lasts much longer that the widow of the man who is killed may starve to death, possibly before his consideration is terminated. In this case my unfortunate friend had been married for a number of years, but still he was a comparatively young man, and the injury he received was of a character to render him perhaps as useless as he would have been if he had died. I think it is a case that deserves the attention of the hon. Minister, and I hope he will not take three months longer to come to a decision.

On section 73,

Mr. CARON. The only change in this section is introducing the law which prevails in England, and which is taken from the Army Act as to the attendance of witnesses who are summoned to give evidence. We feel it necessary to have some provision by which offences against the regulations of the Militia force could be dealt with. These clauses have been submitted to the hon. Minister of Justice for his careful consideration, and I think they are fraught with no danger to the civil liberties of the subject. For instance, it is provided that any refusal to obey a court-martial, or any contempt, cannot be tried by any court-martial or military tribunal, but must be referred to a civil tribunal, the offence to be certified by the president of the court-martial as an offence against the court-martial. If the act is considered to be a contempt of the civil tribunals I will have to deal with it, and while it is proper not to give too extended powers to a military tribunal it is proper to protect military tribunals and court-martials against ill-will on the part of witnesses who should refuse to give evidence necessary in the interest of justice and to carry out the law of the land.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the law as regards oaths and affirmations in courts-martial? Is it according to the law of the Province in which the court-martial happens to sit?

Mr. CARON. It is according to the law prevailing in the different Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. The provisions seem to be reasonable; the only point respecting which I have doubt is as to the machinery. It is different with countries such as England, where all the civil courts are entirely under the control of the central Parliament than what it is with us. What is proposed to punish under this Bill are not criminal offences, but such acts as breaches of discipline. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has considered how far the local courts will be affected.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman has pointed out the very difficulty which stared me in the face when I had to provide this machinery. We know that in England, France, and other continental nations, the military court is as perfect a court for the trial of the military as any court under a civil code, and they act upon the code just as completely as they do in civil matters under the codes of law which exist in the different countries. In Canada we found, from our experience with "A" and "B" Batteries, that we had offences to punish which we could not treat as cases, coming before an ordinary magistrate, and it became necessary to introduce into this Bill laws which I believe are not antagonistic to our system of Criminal Law, and which will meet all the requirements of the force for all time to come. Those laws afford no danger to the subject, and meet the requirements of the case.

On section 80,

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think there is a little ambiguity here. One clause of the Bill gives power to an officer to call out a company for drill. Is it intended to give the officer power to prosecute a man who does not attend?

Mr. CARON. The clause provides for that case. I think it is only right that it should do so.

On section 83,

Mr. CARON. This is a new provision, and it is inserted for the following reason: We found last year that when owing to the lateness of the season, seamen were difficult to get in Quebec, attempts were made by civilians to induce members of "A" Battery to desert, and this provision is copied from the English Army Act providing for such a case; although they have not frequently occurred, still they may happen.

On section 89,

Mr. BLAKE. Do you intend to have any Militia in the Territories at all?

Mr. CARON. We have in Prince Albert, and some other of the Territories, several companies.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Suppose that a portion of the force in Ontario was sent to the unorganized territories in the North-West, would they be under the same law as if they were in the Province of Ontario?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman and gallant officer knows that if they were sent out on active service they would be under military law, which would then apply to the whole Dominion, and even outside of the Dominion.

On section 90,

Mr. BLAKE. Have we still a Receiver-General?

Mr. CARON. We have, and all the money that we receive in the shape of penalties is always paid over to him, though I think it should come to the Department.

On section 100,

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister of Militia, the advisability of inserting a clause in this Bill, prohibiting the use of intoxicating drinks in the camps. I know very well that in some parts of the Dominion, intoxicating drinks are used very freely in camps, and are supplied by the officers to the men. I am not aware that there are any provisions prohibiting such conduct; if there are, they are violated; and if not, I think it wise to place them in this Act. We have the authority of the greatest soldier of the day, for the statement that the men who abstained from intoxicating drinks altogether are the men who are to be the most relied upon; and also the men who are capable of the greatest amount of endurance; hence, I think, it would be well for the hon. Minister, who evidently takes very great interest in the military affairs of this Dominion, to have a clause of that kind inserted, imposing a penalty on the officer who supplies intoxicating drinks to the men while in camp. It seems to me to be very proper that such a provision should be in this Act, for this reason: we expect the young men of this Dominion to join the Militia. Many of those men are of temperate habits previous to joining, but whilst in camp they are confronted with the temptation of drinking intoxicating liquors, perhaps for the first time in their lives, and many of them, I am sorry to say, have yielded to that temptation and have become perfectly demoralized under the influence of liquor presented to them in camp by their superior officers. I speak feelingly on this matter because I have a son in the Militia, and may have two or three there in time perhaps. I sincerely trust that the hon. Minister of Militia will think favorably of this suggestion, and have a clause inserted in the Act in that direction.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the hon. member who has just spoken is a member of the Select Committee on the subject of the Liquor Laws, and perhaps he may bring this matter under the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that when the Militia are out on service they are altogether controlled by the rules and regulations of the army. They cover everything, and the men are punished for every offence. The sale of intoxicating liquors is not allowed in any way to be carried on during the existence of the camp.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. It may not be allowed but it is carried on. It is well known that officers themselves supply intoxicating liquors to the men whilst in camp.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I know it; I have seen it, and I speak from experience. Since I have been in Ottawa I have heard that the same thing occurs in other parts of the Dominion. I have been told by those who are in the Militia that the officers themselves supply intoxicating liquors to the men in camp. The hon. leader of the Opposition suggests that I should bring this matter up in the Committee, but that is not the proper place. This is the proper place and time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My experience is entirely different from that of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. This is a matter which is entirely controlled and regulated by the Queen's Regulations, as the hon. gentleman will see by referring to paragraph 60 of the regulations.

Mr. BLAKE. But is not paragraph 59 a little more elastic?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That does not apply to the Militia Act of Canada.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If any officer of the Militia supplies liquor to the men, I have never heard of it, and I have attended a good many camps. I think the hon. gentleman is making a statement—no doubt ignorantly—altogether void of foundation, when he says that the officers have sold liquor to their own advantage to the men in camp.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I never said that an officer sold liquor to the men. I said that they gave it to them whilst in camp.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Of course, if an officer chooses to give a man a glass of liquor of his own I do not know of anything to prevent him. My own opinion is in favor of having regimental canteens, although I am aware that that system is condemned by some authorities. I have always been in favor of having in camp canteens for the sale of beer and other necessaries that the men like, entirely under regimental control. You bring a lot of young men together in camp who are not teetotalers at home, and who are, therefore, not likely led for the first time to drink intoxicating liquors, and my experience is that it would be better to have these canteens controlled under the conditions of the Queen's Regulations than to allow men who want liquor to make excuses to go to the taverns in the towns. I have found that where these canteens are established there is less drinking than under the other system. Leaving out the question of whether men should be teetotalers or not, which, of course, we cannot control, my experience is that regimental canteens under proper control rather promote sobriety and temperance than the opposite.

Mr. THOMPSON. While I would go as far as any man in keeping liquor from the volunteers, I may say that two years ago I attended camp at Niagara, where I found that there were canteens in some regiments and none in others. I have found, when I was detailed to inspect the canteen, that no liquor was given or sold to the knowledge of the officers, and I found no liquor in them.

Mr. BLAKE. When is the Act to come into force?

Mr. CARON. It is to come into force immediately.

Progress reported; Committee so sit again.

THE CUSTOMS ACT, 1883.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Customs.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 7,

Mr. MITCHELL. What does this clause mean?

Mr. BOWELL. It is a clause that has been in the law ever since there has been a Customs Act. It simply means that if an article is entered for duty, and there is a difficulty of deciding to which class of goods it belongs, the duty charged is to be what is charged upon the article it most resembles, and if it resembles two articles, then the highest rate of duty shall be charged.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to get the information. The law may be the same, but we know that the administration of the law is quite a different thing, and I know that we have never had so much trouble in the administration of the law for the enforcement of the Customs regulations as we have had lately, and therefore we require to examine this Bill very carefully.

Mr. BOWELL. I hope that in the administration of the law, my hon. friend from Northumberland is satisfied that we carry it out as it is on the Statute-book.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no doubt of that. What I complain of is that sometimes the letter of the law is strained too far. I would like to see a little relaxation, and a little more elasticity. Instead of the hon. gentleman saying, this is a cast-iron rule, and we will adhere to it, I would take the spirit and the intention, not only of the law, but of the people who deal and make entries.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, if that is the manner in which the hon. gentleman wants the law to be administered, I do not think he will find it so administered while I preside over the Department. What I understand him to desire is that a meaning should be applied to the law—to suit the particular case and the requirements of a person who has violated the law. To attempt to carry it out in such a way as he suggests would be impossible, and you might as well repeal it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not mean to say that you should act upon the law so as to violate it, but I do say that when people in any mercantile business pursue the usual course and happen from error or other cause to violate the law, the circumstances should be taken into consideration, and they should be dealt with liberally. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. BOWELL. I mean to say that is done.

Mr. MITCHELL. I mean to say it is sometimes.

Mr. BOWELL. No one knows better than my hon. friend that when attempts are made to defraud the revenue, I am not one of those who think that the parties so offending should be dealt with leniently.

Mr. MITCHELL. While I am quite willing to concede that the hon. Minister makes every effort to administer the law, I am under the impression that it is administered with a severity that ought not to be characteristic of a Government disposed to foster and encourage public industry and public commerce, and that the hon. gentleman should not lay down such rigid rules as he does, and as my own experience has taught me he has done in several cases.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

On section 13,

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to add a new clause here, in order to provide for fixing a value on foreign coins or foreign paper money. At present we have to accept arbitrarily the values put upon foreign money, whether paper or coin, by the Treasury Department of the United States; but there has been no real authority for that, and I desire to insert a clause to put that difficulty beyond dispute. In the purchase of teas from China and Japan, or of sugars from Brazil, invoices are very often made out in the currency of the country from which the goods are imported; but that currency fluctuates very much in value, and in order to prevent any difficulty in the future, that upon the certificate of some British or Foreign Consul being attached to the invoice as to the value of the coin, that shall be accepted as evidence of its true value. In other cases, it used to be the practice to take the bill of exchange, which is sent to cover the purchase, as the value for duty of the article imported. This simply gives us the power to do what has been done in the past during my administration, and, no doubt, during the administration of my hon. friend. Then, in order to prevent constant demands for readjustment, when once the bill of exchange is accepted as the value of the article for duty, according to the value of the currency in the country where it was purchased, the transaction is considered final.

On section 24,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause is made to apply to employés and officers of railway companies who are privy to or aid or abet in unlawful importations. The penalty formerly applied to goods unlawfully imported by vessels and other vehicles, and not by railways. We now propose to extend it to railways, but not to punish the railway companies altogether; that is to say, this clause relieves the Department from the necessity of seizing railway trains, but if employés are privy to and aid in unlawful importations, they can be fined, instead of the railway train being seized.

Mr. MITCHELL.

On section 27,

Mr. BOWELL. We have added the words "shall go without delay, when such vessel is anchored or moored, directly to the Custom House." This places beyond dispute cases where vessels have been in the harbor and the officers have not gone ashore. Various interpretations have been given to this clause. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) has given me one, and the hon. Minister of Justice has advised me in another direction—that it shall become necessary in all cases where vessels coming from foreign ports, enter our harbors even from stress of weather they shall report to the Custom House why they are there.

On section 34,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause is to provide for cases of vehicles crossing the border, with which, under the old law, there was no power or authority to deal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Complaints have been frequently made to me that an unnecessarily strict examination of the baggage of travellers is made. I do not know whether this clause applies to the case, or whether it leaves matters pretty much as they are.

Mr. BOWELL. This clause does not provide for cases mentioned by the hon. member, but simply that vehicles when they have crossed the border shall at once report at the Custom House.

On section 35,

Mr. BOWELL. There is a provision in the Merchants Shipping Act, from which this clause is copied, giving certain powers to Custom House officers where there is no Receiver of Wrecks, and we thought to embody it in the Customs Act, so that every officer should know what his duty was under the circumstances.

On section 38,

Mr. BOWELL. This is a clause added for the purpose of comparing the importation of goods in registered vessels, so that the Government can have some control over them. There is a provision in the Customs Act of our neighbors of a like character, only much more restricted, particularly on the Pacific coast, where they prevent, under their coasting laws, the employment of any vessel under thirty tons to carry on the trade of the country. It was thought by the Government it would be much more in the interest of the revenue if the carriage of goods imported into Canada by vessel should be confined to vessels having a register. There is a great deal of this kind of smuggling, by bringing goods in small boats across the St. Lawrence where it is impossible for the Department to have proper surveillance on them.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). There are no vessels without a register, only row-boats.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; row-boats and small sail-boats which are generally used for the purpose of smuggling; and we want to stop smuggling if possible.

On section 41,

Mr. BOWELL. The old Act simply provides for the entry of goods by the bill which the parties might have in their possession. Great difficulty has arisen from the fact of having bills of goods without any description whatever. This clause provides what the bills of entry inwards shall show.

On section 50,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause gives greater facilities for warehousing goods by vessels. These words are new in the third line:

If the vessel-owner or master desires to warehouse the same for re-shipment for the future use of the vessel, the collector may permit him to do so.

That is, in case he has taken out more stores than he requires, and returns to port, it is proposed to allow the owner or master of a fishing or any vessel—if he has ex-warehoused goods for ship's stores, and some remain over when he returns to port—to re-warehouse them and take them out again, when he goes to sea, without paying duty; this is a little further concession to ship-owners.

On section 53,

Mr. BOWELL. Here is a somewhat important change. The House will remember that last Session, or the Session before, provision was made for reducing the value for duty of goods, which had been injured—particularly grain, upon which a specific duty was paid. Under the old law, damaged goods were revalued for duty, when this was ad valorem; but there was no such provision for goods paying specific duty. This clause provides that any goods coming into this country, whether they pay specific or ad valorem duty, shall be reduced in value in proportion to the damage done to the goods before they enter, and in cases of mixed duty, then the value of the goods, when appraised, shall be reduced to an ad valorem equal to whatever amount the specific will be, and charged accordingly.

Mr. VAIL. By the appraiser?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

On section 57,

Mr. BOWELL. This is a new clause:

Upon the collector, or appraiser, ascertaining the percentage of damage—

This clause provides for the manner, or mode, in which they shall arrive at a proper value—

Such percentage shall be deducted from the original value thereof, and duty shall then be levied and collected on such reduced value at an ad valorem rate which shall be equivalent to the rate of specific or specific and ad valorem duty which should have been collected upon such goods if they had not been so damaged.

On section 66,

Mr. BOWELL. This is new, but is only carrying out what we have been doing since we adopted the present Tariff. It provides that:

The Governor in Council may appoint one or more appraisers, to be called Dominion Customs Appraisers, with jurisdiction at all ports and places in Canada; and may also appoint Customs Appraisers with jurisdiction at such ports and places in Canada as may be designated in the Order in Council in that behalf; and each such appraiser shall, before acting as such, take and subscribe the oath.

Which is provided in the old law. It simply extends the power of the Governor in Council to the appointment of Dominion appraisers, and designates that they shall have authority in all our ports.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). That is an improvement on the old Act, which says that the Government shall appoint.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, I think that it is a decided improvement.

On section 68,

Mr. BOWELL. This is different from the old Customs Act, but the principle was adopted by the House, in the Tariff Resolutions a few years ago, when it was provided, that the value for duty should be the value of the goods in the country in which they are purchased when sold for home consumption.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood the system, on which this clause in the law was administered, when he explained it some time ago, to be—the evidence was taken, in case of a dispute between the importer and the Customs authorities; and they received such evidence as was available on both sides with the view of arriving at what the price was, at which the goods were ordinarily sold by the manufacturer or jobber—it is not the retail price, I understand.

Mr. BOWELL. No, no.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the first price.

Mr. BOWELL. It is the wholesale price.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall ask the hon. gentleman to make a statement on that subject, because I have seen within the last few days, a few persons from the North-West, who say—as they understand it—that the rule has been applied in cases in which they are concerned—and they are not ordinary traders, but occasionally import in this way: the value is fixed from the list price, which is not the price which the goods are sold to the individual at all, but prices subject to discount for all persons. Certain goods were specified to me, such as safe doors, and also safes, as having been charged, and charged systematically at Winnipeg, at prices that were far in excess of the prices at which they were sold in the United States to the purchaser in that country. I think they thought they were charging about double the price.

Mr. BOWELL. The principle of the Customs laws is this: that the value for duty on any article purchased, say in the United States, shall be the price at which it is sold for home consumption in that country. In the case to which the hon. gentleman refers, that of doors for safes which are somewhat expensive, they were raised in value when they were entered at Halifax, but that was done on the very best evidence procurable in the United States that the prices at which they were sold for importation to Canada were lower than the prices at which they were sold for home consumption. Difficulties often arise in this way: say that my hon. friend should go to the manufacturer wanting some of these articles, he would get them at a certain price. The agent who is selling for this same house would be allowed a discount upon all the safe doors he could sell in any part of the country, whether in the United States or Canada. It has been ruled, and I think it is strictly in accordance with the law, that the value for duty is the price for which the article can be purchased by any merchant going to the manufacturer and purchasing it, and not the value for duty with the discount which he pays the agent deducted from it. Another difficulty has also arisen, and it will present itself to any merchant, and, no doubt, to my hon. friend also, and it is this: a wholesale merchant goes to the manufacturer in the United States and purchases very largely. He may buy a hundred dozen of a particular article, say shovels. That man gets a larger discount than a smaller merchant who goes to the same manufacturer and buys say twenty dozens. The ruling of the Department has been this: that if the discount which is given to the Canadian merchant who purchases largely be no greater than that which is given to the merchant who purchases them for sale in the United States, he is allowed the full amount of the discount; and from this reasoning that it is true the wholesale market value in the United States for that quantity or number of articles sold.

Mr. BLAKE. That is to say, if any United States manufacturer makes a distinction between the large purchaser and the small purchaser, then the Canadian merchant who happens to be a large purchaser, gets the benefit of the same line of discount. In the other case, one difficulty which occurs to me—perhaps the hon. gentleman will remove it—is of this kind. The hon. gentleman suggests the case of agents. Now, there may be some firms—and I believe there are some—that conduct their business of sale through agents who act as commission houses, and whose sales are, therefore, in effect, retail sales. If, instead of selling to wholesale merchants for their own account, who then sells to the ultimate consumer of the article—the last purchaser—the sale is made to an agent or person who buys on commission, the discount would seem to be analagous to the price to the wholesale merchant in the other case; but I can hardly think that the proportion given to me could possibly have been correct without there being some error in the application of the law. I am not at all objecting to the general principle which the hon. gentleman lays down as to the administration of the law. It is, I believe, the fair way in which the law should be administered, but I think in whatever form the producer of the article—the manufacturer—conducts his business, it should be that which is equivalent to the wholesale price in the country of consumption, which should be the measure of the price at which the article should be entered for duty.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is quite correct, and that is the principle on which decisions have been given by the Department. The particular case to which he refers I will illustrate in this way. The agent employed in the selling of these safe doors visited Ottawa, and I put this question to him: "Supposing I were living in Utica, and went to Boston to the manufacturer, and asked him to sell me a set of these doors, would he charge me the same price that you received from the Halifax merchant?" He said: "Yes." "Then," I said, "you stand in the position of an agent dealing directly with the manufacturer, who is responsible to the party to whom he sells?" He replied: "Yes." "And he gives you the commission which he would take out of the merchant if he sold directly to him?" He said: "Yes." "Then," I said, "the value of the article for duty is the value put on that article in case I was a merchant purchasing for home consumption in the United States. Any arrangements you may have with the manufacturer we have nothing to do with." In other words, if the merchant went to Boston to purchase a set of doors, they were sold at the same price the agent paid for them. The only difference in that case would be that he would take the responsibility in case there was credit, or any loss which might accrue to him, while in the other case he would hold the agent responsible.

Mr. BLAKE. The only point on which we differ is that it seems to me that this is practically insisting upon the retail price of the goods being the price for which they are entered for duty, because the hon. gentleman puts the case of simply a pair of doors being purchased. Now, it may be—though I do not know much about the business—that this particular business is carried on in the way to which I referred, and in that case—

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will excuse me, but that is where he is in error. This is a special case in which the whole business is conducted precisely in the manner I have stated. They do not sell a merchant, say, half a dozen or so, but the articles are manufactured specially for some particular places or buildings, and consequently the rule which pertains to the sale of a large quantity of any particular article does not apply in this case.

Mr. BLAKE. But the practical result in this particular article is that it is the retail price at which it is entered?

Mr. BOWELL. There is no wholesale price, consequently you cannot apply a wholesale principle.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no wholesale price because the system is one of a commission intervening between the ultimate purchaser and the manufacturer, instead of the wholesale merchant.

Mr. BOWELL. But if the contractor purchased directly himself instead of through an agent he would pay to the manufacturer the same sum that he pays the agent. But if he buys through an agent, by adopting the principle laid down by my hon. friend, then he would save the duty upon whatever amount of commission there might be paid to him by the manufacturer. The only possible principle we can adopt is to take the price charged for the article by the manufacturer to any person who would go to his establishment and purchase it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows, of course, that some manufacturers have a set of prices for retail and a set of prices for wholesale, and, of course, he would adopt the wholesale prices for the party who was entering goods and who obtained them at the lower price. He would not charge them up at the retail price but at the wholesale price.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the same rule apply to the collection of duties on safes as is applied to vault doors?

Mr. BOWELL. No; I do not consider the business of selling safes is conducted on the same principle. The difficulty with safes, we find from all the information we could obtain, is that the American manufacturers sell to Canadian consumers cheaper than they can sell to their own people, because they are recouped by a drawback, and this leads to a great deal of difficulty of valuing imported goods. That there may be errors, I am not prepared to deny.

Mr. BLAKE. But the principle applied to safes, so far as the Department knows, is to charge the duty of the wholesale price in the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. While we are on this question I wish to put a case which has occurred. Suppose a person wishes to buy half a dozen locomotives, and goes to a United States manufacturer and makes a contract for their manufacture and delivery; it takes three months to construct them; suppose they cost $8,000, but by the time they are ready for delivery the price rises 5 or 10 per cent. Will the duty be charged on the invoice price, or on the price that prevails at the time of delivery?

Mr. BOWELL. The law is very clear and distinct on that point. The Customs Act on the Statute-book, when the present Government came into power, provided that the value should be the invoice price, no matter what that was. If the hon. gentleman made a bargain to-day for the delivery of an engine six months hence, and paid $10,000 for it, and if the value of engines decreased so that at the end of the six months it was worth only $7,500, the value for duty would be the actual amount paid for the engine; but if, on the contrary, the engine had increased in value and became worth $15,000, then, under the old law, he would have had to pay duty on the $15,000 value. The present law provides for the payment of the duty upon the value of the article, whatever it may be at the time of exportation from the country whence it comes. If the hon. gentleman contracts to-day for engines, for which he has to pay $10,000, on delivery three months hence, and if they rise in value to $12,500 at the time of paying the duty, he would have to pay the duty on $12,500. If, on the other hand, they decrease in value to $7,500, he would have to pay the duty upon the decreased value. That is the principle upon which we act, and that is the law.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the hon. gentleman says he will charge the duty on the value on the article at the time it is entered, I want to know how that value is ascertained. He sends an expert to the different manufacturers in the United States, perhaps when business is slack, and he finds that because business is slack, the manufacturers will manufacture for less than they did three months ago; but he gets their prices to-day for locomotives to be delivered three months hence, because they cannot give the price of locomotives off-hand, as though they were kept in stock. I want to know from the hon. Minister of Customs whether, under the circumstances, he would take the price locomotives were contracted for, or the price his expert gets for locomotives delivered three months hence.

Mr. BOWELL. I thought I was sufficiently explicit. I said that no matter what you may have purchased the engine for, the duty would be charged upon the value of the article at the time it was entered. If you go to England and order a hundred tons of iron at £10 per ton, to be delivered next spring, and the price falls to £7 10s. at the time the iron is put on shipboard at Liverpool, the duty would be charged upon £7 10s. On the contrary, if you had paid £7 10s. for the iron and it had increased in value at the time of exportation to £10 per ton, you would pay the duty on £10.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not speaking of an article like iron or cotton or goods of that kind, deliverable at once, but of an article like locomotives, which it requires him to manufacture and deliver.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The hon. Minister says the rule works both ways. If the price goes up you are at a disadvantage; if it goes down you get the benefit. Have the officers the power to deduct as well as to add to invoices at their option?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; under the law as amended two Sessions ago. I have a case in my mind's eye of a hardware merchant in St. John, N.B., the market price of whose iron when he entered it was lower than when he purchased it, and having proved that fact beyond doubt by documents from Liverpool, we made the rebate.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. Minister of Customs is quite right. It will be impossible to regulate the matter in any other way. A merchant in Halifax buys molasses and sugar, which he leaves in the hands of the West India merchant until some months later. In the meantime the prices advance, and an individual who purchases at the end of that time pays a higher rate. Both come into port at the same time, and it would be unfair that the first merchant should pay less duty because he bought at a cheaper rate. The meaning of the Customs Act is: that an ad valorem duty shall be paid on the value of the goods in the port at the time the goods were exported.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Northumberland is correct in asking explanations of this important clause, but it is very evident that the hon. member would be glad to take a rebate on the price of his locomotives if the price had declined, and, admitting this, the course taken by the hon. member was perfectly correct. My hon. friend must expect to take the risk of the market the same as any other importer.

On section 72,

Mr. BLAKE. The operation of this clause seems to be very onerous with respect to the duty on packers of crockery. I understand from this clause there is no deduction from the invoice price, unless there is a special charge for the amount of the package. In the case of crockery the packages form a large portion of the cost, although not separately invoiced, and that is not so in the case of dry goods.

Mr. BOWELL. This has been the law for the last ten or fifteen years. The packages on goods, particularly in the line referred to, were placed in the Statute for this reason: that crockery is sold in the Old Country in crates or packages in the same manner as for exportation. Take the case of hardware, which is sold in a barrel or box. That forms part of the value of the article for duty, but the barrel in which they are contained does not under these circumstances. If you purchase coal oil, for instance, so much a gallon for fifty gallons, then the barrel is extra for duty at a certain price, but if you purchase an article the package containing which forms part of the value of the whole, then it is not chargeable for duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad this matter has come up, because I have been written to on the subject by more than one person engaged in the trade. I think a great injustice is being done to particular trades. Under the law in relation to dry goods and hardware, the packages in which these goods are imported come in duty free, but if you take it in relation to crockeryware you find that the crates which cost 15s. in England, but which are worth practically nothing here, or at most 80 cents or $1, are charged a duty. Now, I will give my hon. friend an illustration which was given to me by a crockeryware merchant in Montreal, who is an importer of goods which are considered hardware. He imports a dozen bundles of oil lamp burners; he imports at the same time and from the same source a dozen barrels of lamp chimneys for the very same lamps for which the burners are purchased. The barrel in which the chimneys are enclosed is charged for duty, the barrel in which the burners are enclosed comes in free; in other words, the hardware branch of the business is charged nothing for packages, but the crockery branch of the business is charged for packages. Take a case of crockery costing $10. It is charged 15s. sterling, or £2 10s. to £3. The crate in which it is enclosed costs 15s. sterling, and then the carriage in England, shipping charges, freight, and everything else is added to the value of the package as well as the crate.

Mr. POWELL. In England the inland transportation is not added.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed that it is. But we will suppose the inland charges are not added, but the crate itself is added. He has not only got to pay duty on the $10 or $12 of property enclosed in that crate, but 20 or 25 per cent. duty on the crate itself, which is not worth more than 80 cts. A gentleman, who is particularly well informed on this subject, and who showed me the hardships of his trade, said to me: "I do not desire to interfere with the National Policy; if they wish more duty, let them put the duty on the goods, but don't let them set up the dry goods and hardware trades as having their packages free of duty, and charge for the packages of the trade in which I am engaged, unless they can show some good reason." Now, if there is any reason why the crockery trade should be charged for the packages, and other trades not charged, I would like to know it. I am sure that this incongruity has crept in accidentally and should be set right.

Mr. VAIL. There seems to be something about coal oil which is excessive. When you come to take the amount of duty and add to it the duty on the barrel, and the inspection besides, it amounts to a large sum. For instance, a barrel of coal oil containing 50 gallons wine measure, costing 11 cts., we will say, in the States, would amount to $5.50, and the barrel costs $1.25, making in all $6.75. The price of the barrel is fixed at $2 for duty, although costing $1.25; add inspection, - 0 cts., and you have a very considerable total cost. I cannot think that is the intention of the Act. It seems to me straining a point to make the duty so excessive.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a fair question to discuss when the hon. Finance Minister has the Tariff before the House. We are only discussing now the mode of collecting that excessive tax to which he refers.

Mr. VAIL. I was only following my hon. friend from Northumberland in the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Minister has not replied to my observations.

Mr. BOWELL. I have simply to repeat what I said before, that it is a mode of charging duty which has existed since I have been in the House. I remember well a discussion that occurred on this very question when Sir Francis Hincks was Finance Minister, and I think my hon. friend was Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the same Cabinet. It was then that this particular duty upon packages was put on the Statute-book. The question as to the propriety of continuing it is one which may fairly be discussed. If my recollection serves me aright the reason given for putting a tax on the crate as well as upon its contents, or rather making the crate part of the value, was that crockery of that kind is sold in the home market in the same condition in which it is sent here. Unless you buy in small quantities it is put in crates. Another difficulty has arisen as to the value of these crates. My hon. friend from Northumberland says the value of a crate is 15s. in England; my impression is that it averages from 17s. 6d. to 21s.—I suppose varying in price. I have been told by those who have been administering the law that the difficulty is this: that particularly in this branch of business the merchant at home, or in the country where the purchase is made, would put a very large and excessive value upon the crate and a consequent reduction upon the contents of the crate. When the purchaser entered his goods in Canada, while he would make a truthful declaration that that was the cost of the goods to him, the revenue would lose just in proportion to the difference between the actual value of the crockery and the additional value placed upon the crate. Probably my predecessor may have some recollection of the difficulty that presented itself in that respect. But this is a particular kind of intricate mode of defrauding the revenue which may occur in the case of any goods that are imported. But if the package clause be repealed in the line laid down by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), then it will be equal to a reduction of the ad valorem duty on the price of the articles to that extent, and as the hon. gentleman says, if there is an ad valorem duty on the goods that is also payable on the crate. If the value of the crate be deducted and that is one-third of one-half value of the whole, it will be equivalent to a reduction of the ad valorem duty of that amount. These are the only reasons I know that induced the former Parliament and Government to adopt this clause. The old law relating to packages, and the present one identical with it, was as follows:—

“No deduction from the value of goods contained in any invoice shall be allowed on account of the assumed value of a package or packages, where no charge for such package or packages has been made in such invoice; and where such charge is made it shall be the duty of the Customs officer to see that the charge is fair and reasonable, and represents no more than the original cost thereof.”

There is a special provision made in regard to molasses and sugar; so the law does not apply exclusively to crockeryware. The 31st clause of the old law provides specially for the addition of the value of packages to the articles for duty; but there has been a special provision made in the late Tariff Act, to relieve from duty packages containing sugar and molasses when the importation is direct from the country of growth to this country, and that was done for the purpose of encouraging direct trade as much as possible, and the bringing of those articles in our own ships to our own ports.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has dealt with only one point. I refer to the importation of hardware in barrels from the United States, which barrels are not charged for duty, while crockery crates are so charged. In regard to the importation of molasses, it must be remembered that barrels form part of the article, as molasses cannot be sold, except at retail, without the casks. With respect to the value of crates, I think it is a hardship that one of the value of £2 or £3 sterling, containing goods which will be consumed by poor people, should be asked to pay duty, while another costing £12 or £15 sterling, and containing goods for the rich, is admitted free. The hon. Minister has stated that this discrepancy in the Customs Law prevailed while I was in the Ministry. No doubt, but I attended to my own Department, and paid little attention to the Customs Department.

Mr. BOWELL.

No doubt this distinction crept into the Act by mistake, and now that the attention of the hon. Minister has been called to the incongruity, he will be prepared to have it amended.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a question of considerable importance. I do not very well understand the principle on which those particular clauses to which the hon. gentleman referred as having been taken from the Tariff Act of 1874, are introduced here, unless it is intended to bring in all clauses which bear on duty on packages.

Mr. BOWELL. The clause coming from the Tariff Act has nothing to do with this clause. If the hon. Minister will look at clauses 70 and 71 he will observe they are from the Tariff Act of 1879, and they refer exclusively to the manner in which you shall judge of the value of an article, declaring that drawback shall not be deducted in the one case.

Mr. BLAKE. What about clause 77?

Mr. BOWELL. That is under the old Customs Act; but I pointed out that under the Tariff Act, there is a special provision made which applies to packages containing sugar and molasses, when imported direct from the country of growth. That is not included in this Bill because it is liable to be changed at any time.

Mr. BLAKE. My information is that hardly a fractionable percentage of the cheap crockery imported in crates is sold in the original packages, and therefore the theory to which the hon. Minister has referred as justifying the counting of the value of the packages as part of the value of the goods does not apply. Take a barrel containing hardware packed in paper and tied up. The wholesale importer who pays duty upon the barrel, takes the articles out and sells them in the other packages, and therefore the barrel is no part of the value of the goods. So with respect to crockery ware. It is not sold in crates, but the crates are broken up. The actual cost of a crockery crate after the duty has been paid is about $5.65, and as only 65 cts. is obtained there is here an enormous increment in the cost of the goods. These goods upon which this impressive tax is imposed, are those upon which the cost for charges, packages and freight bears an enormous proportion of the whole cost. They are bulky and fragile, they require careful packing and involve a heavy freight charge, and the practical result is that when laid down with the duty imposed at that rate, the advance is equal to 70, 80, or 90 per cent. And that is irrespective of the importer's profit. Under these circumstances, I do not see how it can be reasonably defended that there should be a duty to this extent on packages which constitute so large a proportion of the cost of the goods. The hon. Minister has said, that the reason is that when duties are charged otherwise, only on the goods without the packages, the importers frequently charge the packages too high and the goods too low, and that is not confined, as this clause 72 proves, to this class of goods, because the hon. gentleman guards against other trades—there are tricks in all trades, they say. I find:

“No deduction from the value of goods contained in any invoice shall be allowed on account of the assumed value of a package or packages, where no charge for such package or packages has been made in such invoice; and where such charge is made it shall be the duty of the Customs officer to see that the charge is fair and reasonable, and represents no more than the original cost thereof.”

So it is obvious that the legislation observed that where there was a charge made in the invoice there was a temptation sometimes too great for the virtue of the parties concerned to put too large a charge in, and the Customs officer had to adjust the charge. The hon. gentleman has had an opportunity pretty well to ascertain the cost of packages as they really and legitimately ought to be. For a long time there has been no temptation whatever to exaggerate the cost of the package, to the prejudice of the cost of the goods, inasmuch as both were dutiable; and, therefore, it is very easy to tell, unless there has been some very serious change in the cost of material, now, and for a good while to come, what the cost of the package would be, and I, therefore, hope that what the hon. gentleman said is worthy of consideration and will be considered.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. What I intended to say was, that crockery was sold in the European market in crates for home consumption in the same manner as they are sold to those who purchase for export to Canada, and consequently the crate forms part of the value of the goods purchased; and that is one of the reasons why this rule is followed. The same principle prevails through the whole of the Customs Act; but where an article is purchased in which the package forms part of the value of the whole contents, then it is not dutiable.

Mr. BLAKE. I may say I have seen a considerable number of invoices of crockery of this description; and, of course, it was no object to the manufacturer to invoice the goods in a different way than ordinarily was his custom in trade, because the packages are dutiable; and invariably the invoices contained the cost of the goods and package separately, from which I assumed that the goods are not sold at one price, including the package, and that the ordinary course of the trade is to charge for the goods and package separately.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course, my hon. friend only speaks for those he has seen.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly.

Mr. BOWELL. This point I will bring under the notice of my colleagues, and I will see whether they are prepared to accept that proposition; but the House will bear this in mind that, if the crate is deducted from the value for duty, it is just a reduction of that much duty on the article itself, and thus it does not carry with it the same protection to the manufacturer, with which my hon. friend says he has no desire to interfere, because in proportion to the amount you deduct from the invoice, so in proportion you lessen the duty on the contents.

Mr. MITCHELL. One of the chief importers in Canada of crockery said to me: "I have no desire to reduce the protection of the crockery trade in Canada at all."

Mr. BOWELL. He told me the same thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am quite willing, if the duty is not sufficient, to see imposed an additional duty on the goods equivalent to the value of the packages; but the point complained of is the duty put on unfairly, because the same cost is incurred in a crate of goods that is charged £2 10s. and £2 as for a crate which costs £14 or £15; and the extra cost comes on the poor man. There is another point: The gentlemen in the crockery trade feel that they are unfairly legislated against, because their packages are charged when others come in free.

Mr. HESSON. I was in the business some years ago, and imported in the original packages; then I had no duty to pay on the packages; the invoice charged the value of the goods, which, no doubt, covered the cost of the package. I have also bought packages of goods in this country, from importers, and then got a discount of 12½ or 15 per cent., according to the quality of crockery, if I took the risk of breakage; but if the packages were broken, the importers charged for the packages, although they had paid no duty on them. I would be very glad if the hon. Minister of Customs withdrew charges on all packages of any kind or character. Molasses, for instance, is usually imported in puncheons, and then barrelled. Barrels can be made in this country; and the original packages are absolutely valueless; and if a duty is charged on them, it is unfair. I have also imported dry goods from Glasgow and other places, and the duty I had to pay was a very high charge—£1 5s. for an ordinary case, which, when emptied in my shop, could not be sold for 50 cts.; and I think that this is not fair. I think that the reference of the hon. member for Northumberland as to the duty on packages, is worthy of consideration; and I fancy it would be a step in the right direction to withdraw all charges for original packages. The trade would be the better of it, and besides the revenue could afford it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. Minister did not desire to go the whole way, but to retain the protection which the Tariff designs to give to the manufacturer, could he not settle on a fixed value for crates, to be equivalent to the value paid by the manufacturer here; and this would leave the latter with the precise amount of protection which the Tariff designs to give him, while it would afford relief in the direction desired.

Mr. BOWELL. The law does not give the Government or Minister power to fix an arbitrary value; and if it be thought advisable by the House that the Government should have this power, I have no objection.

On section 73,

Mr. BOWELL. This is only making law that which has been the practice. Take, for instance, a package of hardware which is put up with cord or wire and paper. The value of the package which surrounds the article and is sold with it is made part of the value for duty.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell), presented the Third Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the reporting and printing of the Debates, and moved the adoption thereof. He said: The Committee recommend that hereafter, when the Debates reach 1,200 pages or upwards, they shall be bound in two volumes. Last year they reached 1,700 pages, and being bound in one volume it was bound altogether too bulky.

Motion agreed to:

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 107) respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: I do not propose to invite discussion on the measure until it is in the hands of hon. members, but I may state shortly what the principle of the Bill is. The principle is that the franchise shall be uniform throughout the Dominion, so that the same classes shall have the franchise in the various Provinces. As far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned the Bill will operate on the whole as an enlargement of the franchise. It will affect other Provinces variously according to the principles on which their various present franchises are framed. It is proposed after a given date that votes in cities and towns and incorporated villages shall have the same qualifications. Every person who has been a resident for a year, and is not disqualified in any way, and is a British subject either by birth or naturalization, shall have a vote if the owner of real property within any such city or town, or part of a city or town, of the actual value of $300—in Ontario it is $400 at present—or is the tenant of real property within any city or town, or part of a city or town, under a lease for not less than one year, at an annual rental of at least $20—it is $30 at present—who has been in possession thereof as such tenant for at least one year next before the 1st day of November, 1883. The date will be fixed by the House after mature consideration. The bona fide occupant of real property within any such city or town, or part of a city or town, of the actual value of $300, whether such occupation be under a license of occupation or agreement, to purchase from the Crown or from any other person or corporation, or whether the same exists in any other manner except as owner or tenant, provided in any case that such person has been in possession of said real property as such occupant for one year next before the 1st day of November, 1883, or in any subsequent year, and is and has been for said time in the enjoyment for the use of such occupant, of the revenues and profits thereof, or, in the case of a married man, for his own use or for the use of his wife; or is a resident within such city or town or part of a city or town, and derives an income from some trade, calling, office, or profession of not less than $400 annually, and who has been such resident for one year next before the said 1st day of November, 1883, or any subsequent year. Those are the provisions in respect to cities and towns. In the counties the voter shall be every person who is of the age of twenty-one years, and is not disqualified by this Act, or otherwise by any law of the Dominion of Canada, or prevented from voting; is a British subject by birth or naturalization; is the owner of real property within any such electoral district, of the actual value of $200; or is the tenant of real property within any such electoral district, under a lease for not less than a year, at an annual rental of at least $20 in money or in kind, who has been in possession thereof as such tenant for at least one year next before the 1st day of November, 1883, or in any subsequent year, and has really and bona fide paid one year's rent for such real property at not less than the rate aforesaid: Provided that the year's rent so required to be paid to entitle such tenant to vote shall be the year's rent up to the last yearly, half-yearly, quarterly or monthly day of payment, as the case may be, which shall have occurred next before the said 1st day of November in each of the said year's respectively; and provided also, that a change of tenancy during the year next before the said 1st day of November in each of said years respectively, shall not deprive the tenant of the right to vote, if such change be without any intermission of time, and the several tenancies be such as would entitle the tenant to vote had such tenant been in possession under either of them as such tenant for the year next before the said 1st day of November in each of said years respectively; or is the bona fide occupant of real property within such electoral district of the actual value of $200 whether such occupation be under a license of occupation or agreement to purchase from the Crown, or from any other person or corporation, or whether the same exists in any other manner except as owner or tenant; provided in any case, that such person has been in possession of said real property as such occupant for one year next before the 1st day of November in the year of Our Lord 1883, or in any subsequent year, and is and has been for said time in the enjoyment for the use of such occupant, of the revenues and profits thereof, or in the case of a married man, for his own use or for the use of his wife; or is a resident within such electoral district, and derives an income from some trade, office calling, or profession of not less than $400 annually, and who has been such resident for one year next before the said 1st day of November in the year of Our Lord 1883, or in any subsequent year. That is a late alteration I have made in the Bill, to provide for cases where men who have conveyed their property to their sons or children on condition of support, and reserve as security a mortgage on the property.

Mr. BLAKE. What is to be the amount of the income?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. $400. Then as regards counties, farmer's sons, such can qualify if he is a farmer's son not otherwise qualified as a voter, and who is resident and has been resident continuously on the farm of his father or mother (after the death of his father) in such electoral district for one year next prior to the 1st day of November in the year of Our Lord 1883, or in any subsequent year, if the said farm be of sufficient value if equally divided amongst them as co-owners, to qualify as voters under this Act. It is, in fact, the farmer's sons' qualification given by the Ontario Act, and which has hitherto not been extended to any other Province. This principle I propose to apply to both city and county constituencies. I propose to extend it to other classes than the class of farmer's sons, namely, to a son of any owner of real property, and not otherwise qualified to vote, and who is and has been resident continuously with his father (or with his mother after the death of his father) being such owner, in such city or town or part of a city or town for one year next prior to the 1st day of November, in the year of Our Lord 1883, or in any subsequent year.

Mr. BLAKE. And is the qualification the same as for farmer's sons? Must the value of the property be sufficient to enable them to vote as co-owners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. The same son and the father must not only be the occupant but the owner. Of course, in towns, if the father was not the owner, and the son was to have a vote also, it would be simply universal suffrage. In the farmer's sons franchise in Ontario the father must be the occupant and the owner in order that the son may vote. I may say that under this qualification unmarried women will have a vote, that is to say, they will have the right to vote, if they have the qualification, the same as if they were men. That is an extension to the franchise. The question arises as to the mode of settling the qualification. It is proposed that there shall be a revising officer or barrister for one or more counties or constituencies, that the County Court Judges and three or four Judges in the Province of Quebec in several districts shall be invited to accept the appointment. The Government do not think it can be forced upon them; but they will be invited, and if they should refuse, a barrister, an advocate of five years' standing, may be appointed to act as revising officer for one constituency or a group of constituencies, and that the tenure of office shall be during good behavior. But such officer—this being a Bill affecting the privileges of the House, the electoral franchise, and the other branches of the Legislature—not being supposed to have any right of control over the matter—is to hold office during good behavior, but the Bill makes him subject to be removed by a vote of this House, instead of a Superior Court Judge by a vote of both Houses. In England revising barristers are appointed for two years by the Lord Chancellor. The Bill provides for an appeal as to matters of law to the Superior Court, but the revising barrister and Judge to be the sole and final judge as to matters of fact. These shortly are the terms of the Bill. I will not trouble the House with the machinery. The Bill is in type, and it will be distributed in a few days.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman has failed to state who shall make the list of voters primarily.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revising barrister. He has to take the assessment roll and the voters' lists in the different constituencies as being prima facie evidence, and hold a court as in England; any person who has to make a claim, puts it in before him, and there can be the same system of objections that now exist in the two Provinces with which I am most familiar, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He has to correct the list. He has to make out the list from his documents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He makes out the original list—yes. I move the first reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to enter on any discussion, which the hon. gentleman suggests would be inopportune to-day, as to the details of the measure which the hon. gentleman has introduced, at this moment. Some of them are details which it is very important to consider, not merely in reference to that Province—the franchise of the Province of Ontario, from which the hon. gentleman's inspiration seems to be tolerably largely drawn, but also with reference to the operation of the franchise for the several other Provinces of the Dominion, with which I, as well as himself, may be less familiar than with the operation of that Province. I recollect, Sir, unless the franchise has been very seriously altered in some of the Lower Provinces, that there is here a mixed qualification, of real and personal property, very small in proportion, which is required of each class. How far the franchise which the hon. gentleman proposes as a uniform one, may effect that class of the population, I do not know; but speaking at this moment, it seems to me that the objection which he took a number of years ago in this Chamber, when the hon. gentleman proposed a uniform franchise for the last time up to the present, namely, that there would be a very considerable disfranchisement from the operation of the voters, the fishing voters particularly, in some of the Maritime Provinces, would apply also to this measure. The view that has been taken on the other side on this subject, is the general evidence, and the question of expense as well. All point to the retention, so long as no practical evil is established to exist from that retention, of the local and Provincial franchise; and I observe on this occasion that the hon. gentleman has addressed himself not to reply to those arguments, which were formerly so potent, that they prevailed to cause him, although then at the head of the Government, with a very large majority in the House, to abandon his measure not to be renewed until this time. I regret very much, Sir, that this measure has been brought before this House at this stage of the Session. I have often wished the hon. gentleman a long life, because I know no one who requires a greater period for repentance than he does; and if he employs the prolonged years, with which I hope he may yet be blessed—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With which the country may be blessed.

Mr. BLAKE. In the same manner in which he has employed those which have lapsed since he last brought in a Franchise Bill, I am afraid that the last stage of that man will be worse than the first; because on that last occasion—now thirteen years ago—when the hon. gentleman introduced a Franchise Bill for the consideration of the House, he proposed to establish the general principle of a uniform franchise; he proposed the establishment of courts or officers by whom the rolls should be made up, and subsequently revised for all the Provinces; he proposed various property qualifications, some of them not very dissimilar to those, although in some respects this Bill is more liberal than that one. On that occasion the hon. gentleman sufficiently regarded what was the true principle on which the Government should act in proposing such important legislation, by introducing that measure, and almost on the next day after the opening of the Session. The Session opened about the 15th of February; the Franchise Bill in that year—it was 1870, if I remember aright—was brought forward on the 24th of that month; it was read on the 23rd, or rather the second reading was moved on the twenty-third day of the Session, a fortnight later; the debate was continued at intervals until the thirty-seventh day; and it was till the forty-second day, when on a motion attacking the very principle of the Bill, and proposing Provincial franchises in preference, the debate of that motion was adjourned never to be resumed; the hon. gentleman on a subsequent day proposed to discharge the Order. Now, I maintain, that a measure of this description, which of itself necessarily involves the consideration of numerous details, and which goes very largely into the consideration of questions, which, so far as a people are a political people, they are called upon to consider for themselves—is a measure which should be earlier introduced; the suggestions of which should be taken leisurely. We should have a full opportunity not merely to consider them here, but also to consult constituencies throughout the various parts of this extensive country; and we should deal with them, so that, in all the stages, there should not be merely a large period between the stages, but also time for full, earnest and—as the hon. gentleman formerly suggested—microscopic discussion. We all know what the state of the paper is now. We have been here in Session more than two months, and have done hardly any of the business that was proposed at the opening of the Session. We know what we knew a long time ago, that we will have to pay for that; the period of payment has now arrived, and we shall have to consider the essential business of the Session, within the very short time during which we may expect to remain here. I say, Sir, that it is a very grievous wrong on the part of the hon. gentleman that he should propose for our consideration at this day of the Session, without a speech on his part, the measure which he now proposes for introduction to this House. The measure is not, although the hon. gentleman has called it so in the Speech from the Throne, one which it is very important to force on us now. The hon. gentleman is very apt, when he thinks that something ought to be done, to declare that it is of great consequence; and when he thinks that a thing ought not to be done, to declare that unheard of calamities will follow if that thing is done; and he told us, as long ago as I have said—thirteen years ago—that the laws in force on the subject of the franchise in the several Provinces of the Dominion vary very much in their operation. The Bill which he then proposed, was discharged, and he has never since invited the House to resume consideration of the subject, during the many years during which he has sat on one side or on the other of this Chamber; on the contrary, when a hostile and opposing principle was proposed for introduction into the Act passed, I think in 1874, under the Administration of my hon. friend from East York, the hon. gentleman did not, or any of his followers either, oppose the amendment; on the contrary, he again sitting in Opposition for these four or five years, he never promulgated any different principle as a plank on which to go before the people; on the contrary again, sitting in power on that side of the House for the last four years he never suggested anything of the kind, as a thing fit to be done, or fit to be proposed, as an Election plank, on which to go before the people; on the contrary, the Election was run, without any suggestion from the hon. gentleman, though this would be a plank in his platform—to make uniform Election Laws; but the first Session after the Election is over, the hon. gentleman comes down, and recurs to those early remarks of his, addressed through his advice to the House thirteen years ago, reiterates them almost verbatim from his speech, and proposes, during the first Session of this new Parliament, to declare that the constituency which has returned him to power, is not a proper constituency by which members should be returned for the Parliament of the country. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is either too soon or too late. And if the conclusion he has reached is the true conclusion, he should have used some period of the past four years to provide a fit constituency in which to hold the last Election; but if it was not the true conclusion for 1882, then it is a little too soon to propose a new constituency, immediately after the people have spoken by the defective constituency of which he now complains. Unless it follow as the result and consequence of the passing of this Bill, which declares the existing constituency to be defective, that as soon as he has prepared the new constituency, he shall appeal to that altered and amended constituency for a renewal of that confidence placed in him by the constituency he is now condemning, I trust, Sir, that late as this measure is coming down, if it is to be pressed upon the consideration of the House this Session, he will adopt the views he expressed thirteen years ago, as to the mode by which the Government should regulate discussions on measures of this kind, and that we shall have time not merely for a full and ample discussion ourselves, but also to obtain the sense of those who are interested in these matters abroad, before we reach a final conclusion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall not be drawn into the discussion of this matter at this stage of the Bill. As I have said already, it would be profitless to do so until the Bill has been printed and put in the hands of hon. gentlemen. It is, at all events, the fact that the franchise, which is to be proposed, is a large extension of that enjoyed by the people of Ontario, and whether the hon. gentleman, as a Liberal, desires to keep up the same restricted franchise, or is opposed to the extension of the principle, I do not know, but certainly I, as a Liberal-Conservative, am not opposed to such an extension.

Mr. BLAKE. I distinctly stated that I would offer no opinion as to the details of the hon. gentleman's Bill just now.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that on every Wednesday hereafter Government business shall have precedence over other business.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I propose to address the House very briefly on the subject of the Tariff, and matters connected with it. I quite recognise the fact that the Session is far advanced, that there has been a great deal of discussion on this subject, and that there is not much more to be said except engaging in repetitions, which I never like to do. But the hon. gentleman's speech was of such a character that I cannot avoid paying some attention to it before the debate shall finally close. Responsible as I was as a Minister for the policy of 1878, which I failed to carry into effect at the General Elections, I am not willing that the hon. gentleman should imagine that the policy which he thinks has triumphed is really the policy which the country has fully accepted, and will long continue to endure. The hon. gentleman was very defiant in his attitude, and very aggressive in his manner. The Budget Speech is usually a business statement of the affairs of the nation, and as such ought to be unaccompanied by the attacks on political opponents, and the almost virulent justification of his own course on previous occasions, which characterized the hon. gentleman's financial statement. The hon. gentleman assumed, as a matter of course, and other hon. gentlemen behind him also assumed, that because they had succeeded in carrying a Protective policy into practical operation, hon. gentlemen on this side were necessarily debarred from exercising their right of criticising that policy. We were enjoined to bow to the decision of the country, and we were required by the hon. Minister, and some of his supporters, to do this on pain of being considered unpatriotic. It was laid down gravely by those hon. gentlemen that we are bound to acknowledge a principle which we battled against, because we were defeated in the struggle for the maintenance of another principle. I do not so recognize my duty as a member of Parliament. On the other hand, I believe that no matter how much my policy may have been defeated, how few may have been the number of electors who approved of that policy, we should maintain the struggle for the vindication of right, no matter how long it may take to succeed in that struggle; and I am not to be debarred from justifying my own policy and the policy of the party with whom I am associated, in order to afford a more lasting apparent triumph to hon. gentlemen who have secured a victory on other grounds. The hon. gentleman opposite, in delivering his Budget Speech, was not content with exhibiting what I have called a defiant attitude, and an aggressive manner in presenting his views of the fiscal policy of the Government, but he was content with nothing less than the invocation of a malediction upon the heads of his opponents, when the hon. gentleman stood out from his desk, held out his right hand, and with defiant manner called on some authority or other to perish the hand that should touch the fabric—that fabric of fraud which the hon. gentleman stood to guard as Cerberus stands to guard a somewhat worse place. The hon. gentleman gave us to understand that his Tariff was infallible, and that it was to endure as long as Canada was Canada. The air of self-righteous conceit which characterized the hon. gentleman's deliverance was the most amusing part of his speech. It seems he has no faith in the perpetuity of the bond which connects us with Great Britain; it seems he has little faith in the perpetuity which we enjoy. He is evidently an ardent advocate for annexation, when he declares that that wretched system of Protection which he has introduced and called the National Policy is to endure as long as this country has a being. The hon. gentleman has his dues nailed up to the door of the Treasury office, and he has written over them these words:

"He who doth those dues displace, Must meet Bombastes face to face."

We are warned by the hon. gentleman that we have to fight for our liberty. We are warned by him that it is unpatriotic to attempt a justification of our own policy. Now, I believe that the policy we adopted in 1874, and conserved during the term of my Administration, was one much more eminently calculated to subserve the interests of the country. I believe, Sir, that accidental circumstances have given a fictitious appearance of prosperity to the country, and of success to the hon. gentleman's policy, to which it was not entitled. The hon. gentleman knows as well as any of us know, that the prosperity enjoyed by the country during the last three years has been owing simply to the return of a period of general prosperity from causes altogether unconnected with Tariff legislation. He may be prepared to lay down the political thesis, and defend it, and amplify it, and justify it, that taxation produces wealth, but I have never yet heard it done by any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House. He coolly ascribes the prosperity to the policy of the hon. gentleman, which is one of necessary taxation. We, on the other hand, have shown, my hon. friends from West Middlesex, and from North Norfolk in particular—have shown, as was shown last year and the year before, that the enormous and excellent crops produced in the country, and the poor crops produced in England, had much to do with the prosperity that prevailed. It was quite impossible that $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of additional money, above what was obtained for our products the previous three years, could have been spent in the country without producing prosperity. But the hon. gentleman was not content with ascribing the prosperity to his own system. He had an inkling that some calamity might occur, that another year might be less productive of good crops, of a good market for our timber, less productive, in short, of a market for our exports, with high prices; and the Government therefore determined to forestall the General Elections, and hold them about a year and a-half before the time when the Parliament would naturally expire. This was undoubtedly done in order to secure the Elections while a period of prosperity prevailed, and while they might have an opportunity of asserting that that prosperity was owing altogether to their zealous efforts in legislating upon Tariff and Customs matters. Now, Sir, I would not allude to the last General Election to day at all but for the hon. gentleman's remarks, for I believe in such discussion we should confine our remarks to the business immediately before the House; but it is impossible to avoid dealing with it to some extent in consequence of the course the hon. gentleman and his friends have taken. Not only did they anticipate the General Election by over a year, but they also prepared themselves in another way. Not less than eight or ten gentlemen from my own Province are sitting in this House because of the legislation of the previous Session as to the territorial division of constituencies. The Gerrymandering Bill gave that number of seats to the Ministry, which, by no consideration, could possibly have been obtained without that effort of legislation. We were, therefore, placed in the position after the General Election, apparently, of having sustained a severe defeat upon the principles involved in the National Policy. I do not believe, Sir, that we were defeated. I do not believe that the majority of votes in the Province of Ontario were recorded in favor of that policy. The division of constituencies, as I have said, gave a certain number of members to the Ministerial side, altogether apart from the principles involved in the Tariff legislation of the Government. In addition to that the power that was taken by the Government to appoint returning officers after their own heart produced effects of a similar character, as some gentlemen are sitting in the House at present who represent simply the returning officer of the respective divisions which they are seeming to represent. These matters, Sir, are so patent to everyone that I was surprised that the hon. gentleman should claim as a triumph of his policy, that the General Elections were carried by the Government to such an extent as they were. I believe that public opinion is rapidly veering round towards the views that I myself hold.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My hon. friend from Simcoe says "hear, hear." I am sure he knows as well as I do—I am sure that were he candid enough, and out of political life—and out of this House I have no doubt he would be candid enough—he would admit that the policy, which is called a Protective policy, is not one that can be conducive to the prosperity of a country. There may be under it a redistribution of wealth; there is a redistribution of wealth under it; there is an arbitrary redistribution of wealth; there is a system of putting hands into the pockets of A and B, and filling the pockets of C and D, from the pockets of their neighbors; but there can be no prosperity from increased taxation. Circumstances which I have endeavored to set forth have given the appearance of prosperity—and I do not blame hon. gentlemen opposite for taking advantages of these appearances—appearances of prosperity as the result of Protective legislation. I recollect very well pointing out, when the system was introduced, as I did before the Election of 1878, that while there would be an appearance of prosperity for a time, there would be sowed the seeds of decay, even for the manufacturers, that would bear fruit in future years. I was able to point out the result of a similar policy to many manufacturing industries in the United States. Those results are rapidly being developed in our own country, and already some of the industries most excessively protected are showing signs of decadence by coming to this House for additional privileges at the expense of the people; and from indications which we have privately, we can see that over-production has already commenced to show its effects. As soon as over-production comes, we shall have application made to the Government for additional taxation, to enable certain manufacturers to carry on their operations. The hon. gentleman, in his present Tariff, has, for instance, proposed to give an additional bounty of $1.50 per ton for the production of pig iron. There is before us, upon all our desks, a memorial from the rolling mills where scrap iron is manufactured into bar iron, pointing out how unjustly this has militated against them; and the hon. gentlemen is called upon to increase the duty on bar iron to meet the bounty he has given to another manufacture. This is the natural and inevitable result of a Protective policy; there must be a constant tinkering with the duties while it lasts, a constant combination of manufacturers; while there is the hope of obtaining additional advantages, our doors will be constantly besieged by manufacturers demanding increased favors; nay, more, Sir, there is another effect which is beginning to show its face. I recollect pointing out many years ago that one of the inevitable results of Protection of an excessive character was the deterioration of manufactured articles supported by such excessive Protection. I recollect also pointing out that it was inevitable, and I illustrated the fact by reference to the history of other nations, that a high Protective policy extended to all branches of manufacture at home would simply make it impossible to carry on trade with foreign countries; and we have thus early in our Protective period, been able to prove that this has been the result on our own commercial transactions; we are every year exporting less and less of our manufactured commodities; and this is quite natural and inevitable, because if manufacturers obtain additional prices for their goods, they have to pay additional wages, they have to pay higher prices for some of the raw material they use, thus they bring the prices up to a point above that at which other nations can export such articles to the countries we usually trade with. We have now the remarkable fact given us by an hon. member from Manitoba the other night that in the North-West, Canadian agricultural implements and machinery have become relatively so deteriorated within the last few years, that it is next to impossible to sell any in that country. This is given as a reason why the Government should make a reduction instead of adding an additional impost in favor of agricultural implement makers. There was no demand previous to 1878 from the agricultural implement makers for additional Protection, because the incidental Protection they then had in the 17½ per cent. Tariff was not only ample to secure our market to them, but actually enabled them to export a good many of the costlier machines to the United States. I speak of what I know when I say that a considerable quantity of our agricultural machines were exported to the United States previous to the Protective period. But since that period—when they had to pay additional duties on the iron they used, on the paints and varnishes, and everything else that went into the manufacture of those implements, except, perhaps, the timber—they have had either to make the articles cheaper and slighter, to put them together more hurriedly, or else encounter the difficulty of selling at prices which could not compete with those of the foreign article. Being forced to meet the changed conditions, they make their machines light. We are told by the hon. member for Selkirk, and have also ascertained the same fact from other parties who have written me, that these articles are unfit for use, and that it is next to impossible to obtain a sale for them in our North-West. Now, one of the articles that was said to be insufficiently protected was these agricultural implements. I have said, and I have abundant testimony to prove it, from the manufacturers themselves, that the manufacturer did not demand Protection, that it was of no use to them, that they had control of the whole home market, and that only special articles, such as new improvements, were introduced from the United States. But in Manitoba the case was entirely different, as our machines had to be exported a long way to get there, and had to enter into active competition with those produced near the frontier by the Americans. The result of this Protective policy of the hon. gentleman is, that we must leave our North-West Territory uncultivated or force our people to buy machines with which they cannot compete with their neighbors owing to the inferiority of the article. This is an undoubted effect of Protection as a policy; yet we are asked to consider this policy as the perfection of human wisdom; we are told that it is unpatriotic to discuss it in a hostile spirit; we are told that it is that which has brought wealth and prosperity to the country, and that, therefore, we must not venture, on any account, to touch this political ark of the hon. gentleman with our profane hand. I object to a Protective policy in limine. I object to it altogether as a principle. The principle is an evil one. My hon. friend beside me with his usual generosity, admitted that it would be possible to have a worse Tariff. Perhaps it would, but it would not be possible to have a worse principle, and it is the principle which characterizes the measure. The hon. gentleman may have failed to make some portions of it as bad as the rest, is measuring his efforts day by day, and in the but he end will succeed in procuring a monster which will be like nothing in the heavens above or the earth beneath. He glories in a policy which has for its very bases injustice from man to man. He is endeavoring to vindicate and glorify as a principle that it is right to take by legislative authority one man's wealth and distribute it among others. He is advocating and declaring to be beyond repeal a policy which taxes the mass for the benefit of the few. That policy cannot be righteous which has this operation; that policy cannot be just which does an injustice to the humblest individual of the commonwealth. This is my objection to the whole policy of the hon. gentleman. I have said, months before the last General Elections, that a distinction must be drawn between the course which a man may be forced to pursue in a particular state of the nation and the principles upon which he controls his action. I say this because hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored to represent myself and others, who hold the same opinion, as being not only willing, but determined, if legislative authority or power should be placed in our hands, to return immediately to the state which we believe to be the right state—that of a Revenue Tariff. I have said, and I admit it frankly, it would be impossible for the present Opposition, were they to assume the reins of power, to return at once to the state which existed some years ago; for however unjust may be the principle on which the Legislature has acted, it has created interests which we are not at liberty to destroy wantonly, and it has established certain things by its natural operations, which it may take many years to remove and to restore to their normal condition; but in the meantime I conceive it to be my duty to vindicate right principles by fair argument. I do not find any fault with hon. gentlemen who conscientiously believe in a Protective policy, and I have no doubt there are many such; but I have no doubt, on the other hand, that the great mass of Protectionists are those who want Protection because they have selfish objects to gratify. I am not at all surprised that those who have huge manufactories of some kind desire to obtain an undue Protection, and I say that it is perfectly monstrous that huge cotton factories should be permitted to make a dividend of from 50 to 60 per cent. on their capital invested. All this comes out of the pockets of the people, and the people have shown an amount of long suffering, under the injuries inflicted upon them by the legislation of this House, which would astonish anyone who did not know the law-abiding disposition of our people generally. But for the crops the country has produced, but for the new markets which have opened out for our lumber, and but for the adverse circumstances in other countries, there would have been, long before now, an outcry against the present system of legislation which the hon. gentlemen and his friends would have found it hard to contend with. And if they have escaped for a time, in consequence of the wants I have referred to, they may depend upon it that the principles which they have put in operation will produce here, as they have produced elsewhere, their natural effect in the ultimate ruin of many of our manufacturers, in the production of a state—not of prosperity, but of adversity, and in bringing about a state of things which would render it impossible for the hon. gentleman to content himself, without an entire reversal of the policy which he now glories in. I do not think, Sir, that there is any pleasure in referring to matters which indicate a cessation of that prosperity to which I have referred to; but in discussing the policy of the Government, which the hon. gentleman who leads the House on financial matters and subjects of taxation makes it appear, from his point of view, and invites his supporters to follow his example, that the country is in a state of prosperity not enjoyed for many years. I am bound to say, that there are indications in the commercial atmosphere which presage a storm near at hand. The hon. gentleman knows, and I need not refer him to the fact, that the state of commercial affairs in our large cities, at this moment, is one that is anything but a condition of prosperity. The hon. gentleman knows, as well as I know, that the banks and monied institutions have been for months back exercising the greatest caution in respect to their circulation, credit, and lines of discount, in order to meet the storm that they apprehend to be not far distant in the future. We find in the official publications this extraordinary fact, that while, in the first quarter of 1881, there were, in the Canadian Provinces, altogether 174 failures, with actual liabilities of $2,750,000 in round numbers; we have, in the first quarter of this year, no less than 409 failures, with liabilities aggregating within a fraction of $6,000,000. Now, Sir, it is shown that the hon. gentleman is flattering himself with the promise of a state of prosperity to our manufacturing towns and cities, that really does not exist, and that we have to meet a different state of circumstances, it may be at any time. If there should be as good a crop this year as during the last three years, if the markets for the products of our forests continue as good as they have been, the hon. gentleman and his Government will be able to tide over the effect of their Protective policy for a season; but if there should be a collapse in these great industries of the country, the hon. gentleman may depend upon it that he will have to meet a state of circumstances that he does not appear to anticipate at the present moment. What are the industries of the country? We are accused of being adverse to the interests of the country in that respect, on this side of the House, because we are opposed to giving a Protective policy in its integrity to our manufacturers. Under the circumstances, there would be, and there must be, a very large Protection as long as we raise our resources mainly from Customs duties; but anything that goes beyond the legitimate taxation required for the discharge of the obligations of the Government, in respect to public works and otherwise, is, in my opinion, an undue Protection, and one which will work ruin to the manufacturers themselves in the course of a few years. But the great industry of this country is the farming industry, and the industry which brings out the products of our forest; and I would like to know one single article that these great industries produce, which has had a particle of benefit from the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite. They have existed and flourished, not because of the policy of the Government, but in spite of the policy of the Government. They have flourished simply because it has pleased Providence to smile upon us, and because a state of things existed on the other side of the Atlantic, melancholy enough in many of its aspects, which gave us immense advantages as a country producing grain, mineral products, and timber and lumber. These advantages may not continue; but whether they continue or not to the same extent as at present, the result will inevitably be the same in the long run. Any policy which is adverse to human rights cannot be justified. It may serve a temporary purpose, as it has served the temporary purpose of the hon. gentleman opposite, but that purpose will soon fail. We cannot buoy ourselves up by looking to the effects of a Protective policy in the United States. It is a common argument of hon. gentlemen opposite to say: "Look at the United States, you will admit that they are more highly protected in their commercial protection than we are. Have they not prosperity?" Well, Sir, they have prosperity, not a continuous, invariable prosperity, however. They have suffered great commercial reverses, but they possess a country immensely richer in its variety of products—not richer than ours in the products that we have to an extent corresponding to our population and area, perhaps. But where there is a country like the United States, producing every variety of product, from that of an almost frigid zone to the southern side of a temperate climate—almost to the torrid zone—a country like that, extending from sea to sea, and from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, is in a position to stand more of a Protective policy than a country situated as the British Provinces are. They have an immense inter-State trade, and that trade is largely engaged in conveying the products of the North to the South and of the South to the North. We have neither a North nor a South; we have an East and a West, and our products are all those of the temperate zone. We are not, therefore, in a position to point to them as likely to be a fair example of what could be produced in the British Provinces by a system of Protection. I believe, in short, that we should shape our commercial policy, if it is possible at all, in accordance with that which has produced so much prosperity in the Mother Country. I will not say one word to-day about the balance of trade, nor do I intend to discuss the commercial features of the Tariff any further than calling attention to its principles. The balance of trade matter has been sufficiently dealt with, and the hon. Minister of Finance has practically been obliged to acknowledge that his former fears, respecting the balance of trade, have not been borne out by the recent development of the commercial interests of the country. He knows, too, I am sure he cannot forget it, that England has had an adverse balance of trade during the whole of this century, averaging, I presume, no less than £50,000,000 sterling a year. I speak from memory, but I have no doubt my memory is sufficiently correct in that respect. I have felt that it would be, for us Canadians, an extremely wise course if we could adopt and follow the commercial policy of the Mother Country; whether we should or should not have a Confederation of British dependencies, with Britain itself, possessing a legislative union, and possessing a common interest in our legislation upon commercial affairs—I do hope we shall always have a desire to co-operate with the Mother Country and our sister colonies in promoting a commercial revenue system, which will produce, amongst ourselves, that prosperity which a Protective policy so miserably failed to produce in the Mother Country, during its existence. It is useless for me to continue to address the House upon the different subjects which the Tariff presents—I have no intention of doing that—but I feel that I could not occupy the position I do in this House as an ex-Minister, responsible for a different policy than that which hon. gentlemen opposite have brought into operation, I could not avoid availing myself of the indulgence of the House for a few moments in placing myself, at all events, right in the eyes of the country, and in vindicating the course which the Opposition generally have taken in resisting the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in commercial matters, and standing up for that system which I believe to be the only righteous and true one, that of inflicting taxation only as a means of revenue and not as a means of placing money in the pockets of a certain number of people in the country. I admit the principle of taxation for national objects to the fullest extent, and when the hon. gentleman asks money for any legitimate purpose, I will be sorry indeed to vote against him, or in any way by my vote say I was not willing to sustain the actual Government of the country for the time being for every useful purpose; but when the hon. gentleman asks me to agree to a system of taxation which is simply to give the State a very small revenue, if any, but to give a large revenue to several parties in the State who are living at the expense of the State, upon the product of other people's labor, then I say it is time to call a halt.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Who is the party who is living at the expense of the State?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I refer to all who are profiting by the Protective policy. The hon. gentleman, I think, is not one of those? I think he will claim to be one of the sufferers, if he will tell us frankly what his opinion is. At all events, he is one of the class now asking additional Protection at the hands of the Government, and we will have such a demand made on us continually. Why should not every interest seek to obtain its full share of the plunder? If it is to be an universal liquidation, why should not every one have his share? If there is to be a general Protective policy, let every interest be protected. But the hon. Finance Minister discriminates. Why, the hon. gentleman discriminates even against twins. He is adverse to the production of human life in the country, for when he taxes an ordinary baby carriage $1, he taxes a carriage for twins $3; and I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman has not touched triplets, because as everything is regulated by supply and demand there is no saying what injurious effect the hon. gentleman's policy may have in preventing the production of twins. It would be easy to occupy an almost endless amount of time in dissecting the erudities of the hon. gentleman's Tariff, passed, present, and I might say to come; but it is one of the unfortunate circumstances connected with the Protective policy, that after the policy has been fairly inaugurated, the hon. Minister has to endeavor to meet the demands of the different interests which come before him. Does any one believe, or will any one assert, that the imposition of taxation produces wealth of itself, that any one is made rich by Protection except those who are benefited by the State becoming collectors for them? No one can believe that, and, therefore, I am always at a loss to understand how it is possible—I presume it is possible—that a thoroughly earnest discriminating man can to-day justify between man and man, and hug the Protectionist principle, because we must know that it does injustice to a certain section or the other section would derive no benefit. If they proved that Protection produces wealth I could understand their position, but that cannot possibly be, for it diminishes the resources of the nation, it destroys our foreign market, it inflicts absolute injury on the majority of the people; and I, for one, will never agree to consent to endorse it while I have a voice to lift in the Legislature or out of it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to speak at any length in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. In common with other members on this side of the House, I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman address the House on this important question. I thought, when the debate was adjourned, that we would not hear him perhaps from physical or other causes, and I am glad we have had the pleasure to-day. I must, however, repudiate the attack made by the hon. gentleman on me personally and the charge that, when delivering the Budget Speech, I made a fierce and violent attack upon our political opponents. I have been a great many years in public life, and I have been known to some hon. members of this House during the last ten or fifteen years, and I can appeal to those hon. gentlemen whether, from the day I entered the House at the time of Confederation down to the present, I have laid myself open to the charge of attacking political opponents. Sir, I recollect the first Budget Speech I delivered in 1879 when I came back here. I recollect perfectly well calling the attention of the House to attacks made on me in my absence by my successor; but I then said it was not the duty of the Finance Minister to deal with personal questions when making his financial statement. I think in that statement, and in every financial statement I have made since, I have paid due regard to the feelings of our political opponents. I stated on those occasions, as I state now, that the principle which has actuated me in public life is, that there is nothing to be gained by abuse of political opponents. If the case of the Government will not stand on the facts presented, then the case is a weak one, especially if we have to resort to the abuse of our political opponents. I did take the liberty, if you can call it a liberty, of referring to the verdict given in June last with respect to this policy—was that an attack on our political opponents? It was simply a declaration that so great was public sentiment on the question of Protection that ex-members of the Free Trade Government had been rejected. Was that speaking disrespectfully of our opponents? It was the strongest declaration that could be made, that the principle of the National Policy was fairly rooted in the hearts of the people, because many voters left their party because their political friends were opposed to a Protective policy. I thought I was justified in referring to that fact, and I thought I might also refer to the fact that, between 1878 and 1882, we were supported by only four members from New Brunswick, whereas the result of the appeal has been to give us a majority of the representatives from that Province. I think I may safely call on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) to point out a single observation made by me, that may be considered out of place in the Budget Speech, or a fierce and violent attack on our political opponents. I think I may do so with perfect safety. Now, Sir, the hon. member has reaffirmed the statements, the repeated statements, which he has made here on former occasions, with reference to his views on Free Trade. He has placed them again on record. It was stated during the last Election, and previously to it, that leading members of the Opposition had assured their supporters, when questioned as to the policy of the new Government, should they come into power, on the Tariff question, that, in that event, they would not change this policy. I am satisfied, however, that my hon. friend could not have been one of them, because it would have been inconsistent with his principles. He declares that he has nailed his colors to the mast, and by them he would stand, whatever might be the opinions of others. If there were no such statements made, it was currently reported, and generally understood, by a great many electors who believed in the National Policy, but whose sympathies were with the opposite side, that if their party came into power there would be no change made in the National Policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Now, Sir, there might be reasons for all that, because some hon. gentlemen on the other side had previously, as was stated here the other night, entertained pronounced opinions on this subject. I do not wish to enlarge on that question, but rather to refer to one or two points on which the hon. gentleman touched, and respecting which, I think, it would not be treating him with the proper courtesy—although I would like to get at the resolutions—not to say a few words in reply. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has stated that we have had great prosperity; but several leading members of the Opposition have undertaken to show that this prosperity was not the result of the National Policy, but, on the contrary, our prosperity was due to the large exports of the last four years from the Dominion of Canada. Now, then, let me say this: It cannot be the result of the increased exports which made the difference between 1874-78 and 1879-82, because if you take the exports for the years to which I have referred you will find that the value of the exports of 1874-78 averaged $80,000,000, while during the past four years they averaged $89,000,000, and that increase in the exports is one in proportion to the increase in our population. If that be the measure by which this question is to be judged, then I say they have no proof whatever to show that the increased exports of the last three or four years, have brought about the state of prosperity which exists in this country. The hon. gentleman from Brant said, the other night, I was the first—and I take credit for it—to acknowledge that the country is more prosperous than it was before. Here are we now, on the floor of this House, declaring this with reference to the prosperous condition of the country—and the admission was made last Session—and what follows? The ruin is near at hand! Take the declaration of the hon. member who followed me, the hon. member for Brant, and read the words he used on that occasion. He declared that they had been waiting for this day of desolation to come—that it was near at hand; and he said let the day of depression come, and where will this National Policy be? Mr. Speaker, let me say that if there is to be a period in the history of the country that will require the National Policy, it will be the day of depression. Hon. members on the other side speak of it, as if, when that day comes, the people will rise up in their might and defeat the Government now in power, because that day has come. That there may be such a thing is possible; but I hold, that if, at any period in the history of the country the National Policy is to prove itself a success, it will be when our exports decrease, when our people will be out of employment, when this National Policy will give them employment, and reduce necessarily the imports, and save them—if anything can save them—in the day of depression. Then, above all other times, the National Policy will shine out more brilliantly than at present, because the people will feel that they, at that time, have some institution, some employment, and something to fall back upon, when, perhaps, our lumber industries, and the products of the farm, may not be as valuable as they are at present; and then will come in the employment of the people, under this National Policy, which has been fostered and sustained during the last four years. That is my judgment respecting this matter. These hon. gentlemen say that hard times are coming. Well, hard times may come; but it is distressing, it is to be regretted, I think, that we should have these declarations made here on the floor of the House day after day, and night after night, that hard times are at hand, for if anything will produce them speedily, it is just such speeches as these. If anything will induce the directors and managers of banking institutions and business men to hold their bonds and bring about that state of things, it is that declaration made on the floor of Parliament. I would rather err—if I erred at all—in expressing words of hope with reference to the future, even if they might be considered a little extravagant, rather than say a word that will dishearten our people and give to our opponents and competitors in the United States, words which they may quote abroad to prevent us obtaining the abundant blessings that this policy may produce. Sir, it is to be regretted that that should be the case; but so it is. We cannot help it, and we must take the consequence; but let us, who are on this side of the House, and who think differently, meet it promptly, and at once, in order that the antidote may go with the bane, and the man who reads the one may read the other. Therefore, I re-affirm here, Sir, notwithstanding what has been said on the other side, that with ordinary prudence, with reference to importers and the transaction of their business, there is no reason why—with the enormous expenditure which we are to have in the construction and extension of our railway system in the North-West and elsewhere in the Dominion of Canada—we should not continue to enjoy the benefits to be derived from the National Policy. This in itself will not prevent, as I said before, in connection with the National Policy, the speedy return of that pendulum to which I refer, and which, I hope, we will not see for many days yet to come. The hon. member has also referred to the destructive character of this policy on our export of manufactures, as going on decreasing year after year. I think that the hon. member is not quite right in this. If my memory serves me correctly, they are not decreasing year after year, although they have not increased during the last year or so. What is the fact? I stated this fact, I think, last Session, or the year before, in illustration of the causes of this. I recollect perfectly well—and I repeat the circumstances here now—meeting a gentleman some two years since, and when we were discussing the object of his mission to England, he said to me: "I am on my way to England for the purpose of entering into contracts, if I can, for supplying boots and shoes in the English market." I said to him: "What! do you expect to make contracts to supply boots and shoes in the English market?" "Yes," he replied, "I do. My hands are employed only for a certain portion of the year, to supply what we want in Canada. I cannot allow them to leave me—my whole establishment would then be broken up; and if I can get in England simply what it costs to manufacture these goods, I am determined to enter on contracts for that purpose." He did so; and when he was here some time since he told me that he had made contracts there for three years. It is about four years since he crossed the Atlantic for that purpose. "Now," he says, "I am about completing my arrangements made in England. I was able to employ my men in Canada, but I had no profit. Now I have ample and sufficient market at home, and I am making a profit, and I do not intend to renew that contract." Therefore, I say that large quantities of boots and shoes were exported by that manufacturer alone because he had not employment for his men at home. That is one illustration of the argument. Manufacturers were driven to other parts of the world for markets in those days, because they had not the home market. The hon. member (Mr. Mckenzie) says there are certain branches of manufacture which are paying from 50 to 60 per cent. to the men who invested their money in them; and, on the other hand, he says that these manufacturers will be in such a position in a few years, owing to the increased competition, that their property will depreciate, and ruin will come upon them because of the cheap goods which they will have to sell to the consumers. He says that they will then be making no profit whatever, and that they will then require the 50 or 60 per cent. they are making now to balance the deficits which will occur at the time when the great mass of the people will be getting their goods so cheap that there will be no profit for the maker. The hon. gentleman refers to the Policy in the United States. He says that they have great natural advantages—that they have a widely extended country though not more so than our own; but they have a greater variety of climate and can produce some articles which we cannot. Will the hon. gentleman say—I suppose he will—that if that country had for the last twenty-five years, pursued a Free Trade Policy, or had a revenue of say 17½ per cent., would it have been in the condition in which it is to-day? Now, Sir, I hold that the people themselves are the best judges of what is good for them. The people of the United States will perhaps compare in business ability with those of any other people on the face of the world, and can it be expected that after the experience they have had for so many years, if this policy of Protection is what the hon. gentleman has represented it to be, that they would have stood it as they have for the last twenty years? Not only so, but I say they will stand it, though from the large amount they receive from Customs and Excise they may find it necessary to reduce the amount of their taxation. But what do we find even in the last American Tariff? We find that the reduction is largely in Excise, and that though there is a reduction in many articles, still there is at the same time an increased Protection given to many of the industries of the country in that Tariff. Now, it appears to me that if this great country lying alongside of us with its eminent statesmen, its leading and able merchants, and its practical men of all classes, had found this policy so oppressive and injurious as has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, such a fact would have been made manifest at some of the Elections. Everybody knows that the last President who was elected in that country was elected because the party to which he belonged declared in favor of Protection. His position was doubtful for a time until they began to realize that his defeat would perhaps endanger the Protective policy of the country, and then they came to the rescue and voted the party ticket, and even Democrats voted for him because his policy was to protect the labor of the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. What was the result of the last Congressional Election?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will tell you what was the cause at work in that Election. They have a large surplus—over $100,000,000—and the question was shall that surplus be reduced? That was the point more than the question of Protection.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Why did they reduce the duty on steel rails?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Because, under a Protective policy, they have made them so that they compete at the present time with the outside world.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was not Tariff reform a distinct issue in that contest?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It seems that it takes no less than three coming Finance Ministers to rise and correct me. I think, however, that until they can manage to get a majority in favor of Free Trade, Protection will be the policy of that country; and if the Free Trade party were in power to-morrow in the United States, even they would not have a Tariff as low as ours; in fact, our Tariff would be considered a Free Trade Tariff in that country. The hon. gentleman called attention to the duty on agricultural implements. I think I understood him to say that agricultural implements were made in Canada of first class quality, and that the makers supplied the demands of the country; and in the same breath he told us that they were manufacturing a miserable article that was not fit for use.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think the hon. gentleman desires to misrepresent me. What I said was, that, under the former system, implements were made of good quality, and that a good many of them were exported to the United States. I then referred to the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Sutherland), the other night, to show that we had lost the market for implements in the west in consequence of their inferior quality—a fact of which I was not aware until that speech was delivered, though I have received letters since that time confirmatory of that statement. The hon. gentleman has had deputations before him. Will he tell us candidly what they said?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They said that arrangements had been made with American manufacturers this year to send in a large quantity. We have not had that market to any extent in the past. The fact is, that it is becoming an important matter for the American manufacturers as well as our own, and they are making a desperate effort to get it. There may be some cases of inferior implements going to that country; but I venture to say that every manufacturer will consider it an insult to be told that the implements they are manufacturing are not fit for use, or that they are inferior to those of the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman tell us frankly what the deputation told him?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They came for the purpose of showing that this year a large engagement had been made for agricultural implements in the United States by parties who had been dealing to a very considerable extent in Canadian implements. They said that $400,000 worth of these implements had been arranged for; and they gave us the assurance that if Parliament would say to these Americans, that they should not flood this market and prevent them getting in by making it a slaughter market, the Canadian manufacturers would pledge themselves to give to the farmers of that country implements as cheap as the Americans have been selling, and of as good a quality; and moreover, that they would furnish them in sufficient numbers to supply the people of that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman say why they made this arrangement with the United States manufacturers for importing so many of these articles?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I suppose the Americans, anxious to get that market, secured the services of a gentleman who has been selling Canadian implements, and did so for a consideration. No man works without a consideration. It has been quite open for American manufacturers, if they have more goods than they can sell in their own market, to sell at lower prices, as we know they have done in our market for the purpose of destroying our industries and thus doing the business themselves. That is a common business operation. I do not blame them, because if we were in the same position we would do the same thing; but shall we as Canadians give them the opportunity of shutting up our industries and taking the trade to a foreign country? The remark was made the other night that the North-West was the wet nurse for the rest of the Dominion. The wet nurse—I was struck with that remark—a wet nurse for the rest of the Dominion! The old Provinces have spent thirty or forty millions in opening up that country, by which some of the people there have made their millions. We have been giving them all facilities for becoming rich; we have been giving them the lands for nothing; and we simply ask that our people may have the opportunity of selling to them manufactured articles as cheaply as another country with which they might trade. Reference was made to the fact that $1,250,000 of revenues were collected there during the past year, and we were told that we should give it all back. Have we not exercised the most paternal care over that country? Have we not spent that $1,250,000 in keeping the Indians quiet and preventing them from scattering these people, so that they might live contented and satisfied lives? Have we not spent nearly $500,000 a year for the police in that country? Have we not spent all we could in order to promote the prosperity of that Province? And while we have had, and have the most liberal intentions and desires with regard to the North-West, I do not hesitate to say that if the Government felt to-day that the imposition of a single cent of this taxation would prevent its settlement, we would not ask Parliament to grant it. While speaking of the money we have spent in that country, I should mention that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company also spent a great deal of money, that the contractors on that road took in thousands of men, and by their expenditures made business brisk and lively. All these things helped to make that country what it is; and I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman speak of it as the wet nurse for the rest of the Dominion. I want the hon. gentleman who made that remark to think it over, and to ask himself whether the Government deserved it—whether we have not made most extensive sacrifices in order to make it the great country that it is. It is a pride to the older Provinces to make these sacrifices, but they ask in return that they shall have the privilege of selling their manufactured goods on the same terms as foreigners, and that the people there shall give them favorable support. I need not enter largely into the question of agricultural implements, because we shall probably have some discussion upon them hereafter. The hon. gentleman who was so anxious about the twin carriages will find, when we submit our propositions, that they are to be taxed only in proportion to their size, so that the twin carriages will not have to pay the extra dollar. With reference to the question of the balance of trade, the hon. gentleman says that I have begun to find out that my theory is not a correct one. No; I have not begun to find that out at all. Although our exports have not covered our imports, still there has been a very marked improvement during the past four years as compared with any other four years since Confederation. When the hon. gentleman refers to England as a country with the balance of trade against it, does he know how that balance of trade is met? What would be the condition of that country if its imports did not materially exceed its exports, with all their profits on their shipping? In addition to that, it has incomes from various industries and various investments. I have not changed my views at all, and the nearer we can approximate our imports to our exports the more prosperous shall we be. I do not want to delay the House any longer, but I cannot allow the House to go into Committee without answering the hon. gentleman's remarks; and I cannot see from any remark of mine that he was warranted in saying that I made a violent attack on the Opposition. I think I stated in a courteous and Parliamentary manner what the course of the Government was to be, and in a manner which, I think, could not fairly be objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. DAVIES. I am not desirous, Mr. Speaker, of preventing the House from going into Committee on the motion of the hon. Finance Minister, and therefore I will not make any very extended remarks; but it was my intention the other evening to have said a few words, which I had to omit, owing to the lateness of the hour. However, as the debate is reopened now, I will ask the indulgence of the House for a short time. The hon. Finance Minister has stated that in the last General Elections members of the party to which I belong went to the country, differing among themselves on the question of the Tariff; but he did not give the names of any who had done so. As far as my knowledge goes, the party went to the country upon the principles laid down in the card of their leader. Those principles were clearly and distinctly enunciated, and were circulated from one end of this Dominion to the other, and I do not believe one member of this party went to the country flying false colors, but every one proclaimed himself in favor of a Revenue Tariff; not because it was more beneficial than Free Trade, but because in the present circumstances of this country a Revenue Tariff is a necessity. Now, before I refer to the matters I rise, in the first instance, to speak about, I would call attention to the remarks of the hon. Finance Minister, that this high Protective policy is not only beneficial in good times, such as those we are passing through, but is a policy which would commend itself to the people in hard times. It is news to me to learn that when times are hard money scarce, and people out of employment, increasing the taxes will benefit them. I always thought that it was labor and not taxes which produced wealth. This is a most astonishing proposition, that when hard times come around and people find it difficult to meet their engagements, and employment is scarce, with reduced wages, when merchants cannot sell their goods at paying prices, it is certainly startling to find that the way to improve this condition of things is to increase the taxes of the people. I do not subscribe to any such proposition; and although I will not enter into the school of the prophets, I would venture on this occasion to prophesy that if the hon. gentleman should still be Finance Minister when that period of depression, which he admits will come around, will have arrived, he will find himself compelled, in the interest of the country at large, to reverse this policy which, while it may be approved of during the period of good times, will be felt most injuriously during hard times. The hon. gentleman says that the old Provinces of the Dominion—and the remark is a very curious one—have expended millions in opening up the North-West, and that it seems hard we should object to a prohibitive Tariff, and in particular to a prohibitive duty on foreign agricultural implements, by which Canadian manufacturers in the older Provinces are enabled to control the North-West markets. Might I ask how the imposition of a prohibitive duty on agricultural implements is going to recoup the people of the older Provinces for the millions they have contributed to develop that country? It may keep out the manufactures of the United States, and put money into the pockets of the few who have capital invested in the manufacture of agricultural implements; but how is it going to refund the taxpayers the millions they have paid out? I would like to obtain an answer to that question. I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments to a matter with which I am more particularly interested as it relates to Prince Edward Island. In the general chorus of rejoicing sung by hon. gentlemen opposite, I listened attentively in the hope of hearing at least one small, shrill pipe from the Island supporters of the Government. I wanted to hear from them what benefit this policy has conferred on the people they represent; and I thought they would have risen to say whether or not this prosperity which seems to exist in many parts of the country, according to general admission, has been experienced in Prince Edward Island, whether the faintest glimmer of it has reached that Province. These hon. gentlemen know it has not. The hon. member for North Perth, who closed the debate, at a very late hour the other evening, made a statement which is not correct, and which I am sure he must have made through some error of reference, or under some misapprehension, for I do not believe he would wilfully mislead the House with reference to our Province as this statement is certainly calculated to do. The hon. gentleman, having glanced superficially, I presume, over the Trade and Navigation Returns, noticed that according to them Prince Edward Island paid, in Customs duties only $1.80 per head and stated that this was the only instance of a Province showing a decrease of taxation in regard to Customs. The hon. gentleman cannot be acquainted with the facts, and has taken a very superficial view of the application of the Customs to Prince Edward Island which is entirely misleading, as it appears in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. HESSON. Does the hon. gentleman deny that the returns were quoted correctly?

Mr. DAVIES. I do not. But what I say is that the return itself, though honestly quoted, is calculated to mislead, and I will show how. These Trade and Navigation Returns only show the Customs duties as collected in each particular Province, from the goods entered at the Custom Houses there; and it is well known to every man who lives in Prince Edward Island, and it is well known in fact throughout all the Maritime Provinces, that a large proportion of dutiable goods consumed there, are bought from Montreal merchants and the duties are paid in Montreal. Although we purchased the goods in Montreal, the returns do not show that the duties are paid by us, though it is evident that when we buy from the Montreal merchants we must recoup him the Customs duties and pay him an increased profit on that account besides. If any hon. gentleman wishes to know the real amount of duties extracted from the people of Prince Edward Island by means of this high Protective policy he can ascertain it in this way. It will not be argued that the people of this Island consume less goods now than before Confederation, and the imports before Confederation gives a fair basis on which to ascertain the amount of duty paid by the Prince Edward Islanders now. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the returns, he will find that we then imported about $2,000,000 worth per year. Apply our high Protective Tariff to this amount, and the hon. gentleman will find that we pay nigh upon $600,000 per year in Customs duties, or nearly $6 per head of the population instead of $1.80 as stated by the hon. member for North Perth. The same remark applies some, although not to the same extent, with reference to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and also to some extent to Ontario, as the hon. member for East York has shown (Mr. Mackenzie). Montreal is the entrepôt from which goods are distributed over the country, and the Customs duties are paid there. But no one can imagine on that account that the people of Quebec pay the Customs duties on all the goods brought into Montreal.

Mr. HESSON. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether his Province buys more in Montreal now than before Confederation in 1872?

Mr. DAVIES. We had a very low Tariff in the Island before we joined Confederation. I wish I could say the same to-day. We are one fortieth of the population of the Dominion, and I assert that the contribution which the people of that Province actually pay is a corresponding portion of the entire Customs duties. In 1874, the duties collected in the Dominion, were \$14,000,000 on which the portion paid by us, on this basis, was \$390,000. Last year the duties collected were \$21,000,000,  $\frac{1}{4}$ th of which is \$550,000, showing an increased taxation of \$150,000 for the privilege of living under this high Protective policy of the hon. gentleman. In 1873, we paid \$3 per head, and in 1882, \$6 per head. Now the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) in his remarks, referred to Prince Edward Island as being in a state of prosperity. Nothing was disturbing the people there he said, but the contested election in the King's County case. The hon. gentleman undertook to pass in review all the Provinces of the Dominion, and to assert that they were all in a state of prosperity. Well, Sir, all I have got to tell him is this: That if his views and statements are as far away from the truth with reference to the other Provinces as they are with reference to the Province of which I have personal knowledge, his speech is not worth much. I can tell him—and I deeply regret to be obliged to stand up here and state this fact—that the people of Prince Edward Island are disturbed over matters much more serious than the King's County election. They are disturbed at the lamentable decay of their general trade. I can remember when the wharves of that little Island were thronged with shipping, when her harbors were whitened with the sails of ships coming to and fro from day to day, and year to year, carrying to the Island the chief products we purchased in other countries, and carrying away from the Island the products we were enabled to sell to them at a profit. I am bound to say that things are sadly changed now, and if the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) will do the Island the honor of paying us a visit next year, he will find that the large and numerous wharves which surround one or two cities in that Island are deserted, that the shipping is gone, that the trade that once existed has vanished, and the people are anxiously enquiring where it has gone, and how it is to be brought back. That is disturbing the people of the Island at present. The collapse of the shipping interest is disturbing it; and before I am done I will give a few figures concerning the shipping interest, which, if they are correct, show a very different state of things from that presented by the hon. member for King's. The people of the Island are disturbed at present by the unparalleled depreciation in the value of real estate there. I made a statement in this House a short time ago on that point, and if I mistake not my remarks were objected to by an hon. gentleman who comes from the same Province as myself, and I suppose the House would hardly know whose statement to accept. The very next mail that brought the papers from Prince Edward Island brought reports of the annual bank meetings in that Province. I take up these reports, and I find that the statement I made in this House is borne out by the declaration made, not by politicians to advance their political interests, but by business men engaged in banking in the Island. I find by their report that the directors of the Union Bank, said:

"Your directors regret that the satisfactory results of the business of the past year are greatly impaired by the large amount it has been found necessary, after careful revision of the assets of the bank, to write off, owing to several accounts which, from the unparalleled depreciation in value of properties and other causes, have turned out more unfavorably than could have been anticipated."

Sir, the depreciation in property is not only unparalleled, but it is causing—I won't use the word ruin, because I would be accused of exaggeration at once—it is causing very serious trouble, not only in financial circles but among all those who own property in that Island.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Are there not special reasons for that?

Mr. DAVIES. There may be, but I am not charging the depreciation in the value as entirely due to the high rate of taxation. But I can remember, Sir, when the hon. Finance Minister and his colleagues came to Prince Edward Island, and they told the people there that if they would vote in favor of this system, property would go up in value, things would become prosperous, that labor would find capital to employ it, that prosperous times would come upon us, and everybody would rejoice. It has not been so. Their predictions have been falsified by the stern logic of facts. Not only is that the opinion of the bank directors, but I take up one of the leading newspapers of the Island, and what do I find it saying—and, mark you, at the very time we were discussing this question in the House:

"At the present gloomy hour the wail of poverty and distress is heard at many a door. A tidal wave of depression lashes our shores. Fortunes, suddenly heaped up, disappear like the morning dew, and the bravest hearts quail at the sad ruin."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. What paper is that?

Mr. DAVIES,

Mr. DAVIES. That is the organ of the leader of the Conservative Government of Prince Edward Island, that is the Herald newspaper of February 21st. The people of the Island are disturbed at another fact, and a very sad fact, and it is something which disturbs the people of Nova Scotia, too, in the beautiful Annapolis valley. They are concerned at the vacant farms which are found in every village and in every settlement; they are disturbed at the exodus of the young men of that country, who are leaving it and going abroad. I am not charging that the exodus is entirely due to that policy; I am charging that the National Policy or this high policy of taxation, has not succeeded as we were promised it would do in keeping the young men at home. It has not succeeded in giving them employment, and they are leaving our country in large numbers. That is a sad statement to make, but I ask you, Sir, are we supposed to discharge our duty to our constituents by coming here and making statements that are not true? or are we not supposed to be discharging our duties better when we come to this House, and tell the hon. Finance Minister, each one from his own Province, that his policy is ruining his respective Province? I tell him how it is working there, and if he had listened attentively to the able speech of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) the other night, although the House was so thin, and I wish more hon. members had been present, he would have learned that the same results are working themselves out in Nova Scotia. Time was when these Maritime Provinces, with a low tariff and low taxation were prosperous and happy. That time is rapidly passing away, and the young men see it and know that they cannot make homes there, and so they are going abroad some to the United States and I am happy also to say that a great many of them are going to our own North-West Territories.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon. members cheer that sentiment. I wish they would all go to the North-West instead of going to a foreign country, but would it alter the fact if I were to come here and put a false color upon it? I tell you that the people of the Maritime Provinces are leaving in thousands and going to the States. Are you going to ignore that fact? Did you hear the hon. member for Digby make a statement to the same effect the other night that was not challenged by one member from Nova Scotia?

Mr. HESSON. Do they go to the United States to seek higher protection?

Mr. DAVIES. No; they go to make a living. They are driven away from the land that refuses them a living. These exiles are not the people of Prince Edward Island alone, but people from all the Provinces. Sir, the people of Prince Edward Island are disturbed over the waning prospects of ever obtaining a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. Those prospects were bright enough at one time—or reasonable enough, rather—but they are being rapidly dispelled, and nobody who listened to the closing remarks of the Finance Minister in his speech the other night could have left this House except with the conviction upon his mind that, so far, at any rate, as the policy of the present Government can lead up to it, there shall be no Reciprocity Treaty between this country and the United States. Their policy is the very opposite. Their Protective policy, he says, is Canada for the Canadians; exclude all the outside world; we do not want trade with them, we can make money by trading with ourselves. Sir, that is not the belief of the people of the Province from which I come, and it is not, I venture the assertion, the hope or the belief of the people of the Province which the Finance Minister represents in this House. I verily believe, that, if the people of any of the Maritime Provinces had suspected it was the intention of the Finance Minister to put away Reciprocity as far as ever he could and prevent it ever coming into operation, a very different result would have been shown at the last election, and I believe, when it is known and is understood by them, a very different result will be shown at the next elections. I desire now to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the increased deposits in the savings banks, which he has adduced as one of the evidences of prosperity in the Maritime Provinces. It is a proper argument for him to use, speaking from his stand-point, that the increase in these deposits is strong evidence of increased prosperity. But when they come to be examined I think it will be found that they do not present any such evidence. The very large increase which has taken place in the deposits in Nova Scotia was fully explained the other night by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), and I will not weary the House by repeating his statement. But if his statement was true, then he showed that the deposits in the savings banks in Nova Scotia did not represent the accumulation and savings of the working classes, but rather the deposits of capitalists who were afraid to invest their money in other channels or could not find profitable investments, and so deposited their money in the savings bank until better times came. In Prince Edward Island there has been a rapid increase in the deposits. I should like to ask my colleague whether he is prepared to tell the House that the increased deposits in the savings banks represent the savings of the working people to any appreciable extent? It is a very easy matter to explain why there has been a large increase in the deposits there. In 1873, when the Island entered the Dominion, there were only $249,941.40 deposits in the savings bank. The deposits have been increased very largely since, and I will show where the money to a very large extent came from. At that time many of the capitalists had money invested in Provincial debentures. Provincial debentures had been issued to the amount of $607,000, nearly all of which was held in the Island. I am not including the debentures for the Island Railway, most of which were held in England. These Provincial debentures have been all called in since then, and the money which was paid to the holders had to find investment elsewhere. I made enquiry from a gentleman who is more conversant with our savings banks than any other man, who was the means of establishing it, and for many years was in charge, and I learnt from him, and it corroborated the fact of which I was satisfied myself, that a large proportion of that money received from the payment of those debentures was deposited in the savings bank.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When were those debentures paid off?

Mr. DAVIES. Since 1873. I can give the hon. gentleman dates and amounts, as I have a statement here containing those particulars. The hon. Minister stated in his speech that a very large increase was perceptible. It is true there was a very large increase last year, which was due to a local cause. The Bank of Prince Edward Island, which enjoyed the confidence of nearly the whole population suspended and became bankrupt in the autumn of 1881. The people who had deposits in other banks lost confidence and withdrew their deposits and placed them in the savings bank, and that accounts for the increase last year.

Mr. ORTON. All that accounts for the depression.

Mr. DAVIES. It may to some extent, but if the hon. gentleman will make enquiries he will find that the unparalleled depreciation in the value of property took place before the bank suspended; it has existed ever since the National Policy came into force, and though it cannot be charged altogether to the National Policy, no doubt that policy contributed largely to that depreciation. As the hon. Finance Minister has declared that his policy is to be a final one, and not subject to revision hereafter, and should be accepted by the Opposition, I think it may not be out of place, in view of the discussion which took place this afternoon between the hon. Finance Minister and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), if I call the attention of the House to some figures in connection with the working of a similar policy in the United States as contrasted with the working of the policy almost diametrically opposed to it in Great Britain. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) state that of all the countries in the world Great Britain was the only one not sharing in the great prosperity which exists over the globe. That statement took me very much by surprise, and led me to make an examination into the statistics, and I will satisfy the hon. gentleman and other hon. members that the hon. gentleman's statement was as far from being correct as it was possible to be. The hon. gentleman must have been referring to a previous period of British history. There was a period in British history, as the House well knows, when trade and commerce were not thriving and prosperous, and it was before the introduction of Free Trade principles. There was a time when wages were low, when food was scarce, when ignorance was rife, when a great gulf separated one class from another, when workingmen could hardly live, when riots frequently occurred; and anyone who takes up Greville's Memoirs, published a few years ago, will obtain some idea of the state of things which prevailed in Great Britain between 1830 and 1840. That has been changed, and so far from Great Britain not sharing in the general prosperity she is at the present time almost monopolizing the trade and commerce of the world. In the course of my examination of the authorities, I came across a curious statement made by Sydney Smith about the time to which I have referred; and the state of things set forth by that writer will be equalled in Canada, if the hon. Finance Minister continues to increase the duties year by year as he is doing now. Sydney Smith wrote:

"Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth or covers the back, or is placed under the foot—taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste—taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion—taxes on everything on earth and in the waters under the earth—on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home—taxes on the raw material—taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man—taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and the drug that restores him to health, on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal, on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice, on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride—at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The schoolboy whips his taxed top, the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle on a taxed road, and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine which has paid 7 per cent. into a spoon that has paid 15 per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid 22 per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary, who has paid a license of $100 for the privilege of putting him to death."

Mr. WOODWORTH. Why does not the hon. member recite it as he did thirty years ago at school?

Mr. DAVIES. If I could hope to rival the hon. member in elocution; but that I cannot hope to do.

Mr. WOODWORTH. There is not a schoolboy in Canada, who has not recited that in school.

Mr. DAVIES. Allow me to conclude my quotation:

"His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel, his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers—to be taxed no more."

That is the quotation; and that represents the state of matters in England, while this policy, which is lauded so much on the other side of the House, was in full force; but let hon. members look at the change which took place in the commerce of that country, as soon as a different policy was introduced, and he will find—I will not weary the House with many figures—that while the combined exports and imports of that country were only £172,000,000 sterling in 1840, they have risen, Sir, until they have now reached the extraordinary figure of £611,000,000 sterling. That, I say, is a statement of facts which cannot be paralleled by any country in the wide world, and you can only obtain it in a Free Trade country. Well, Sir, the trade and commerce of that country has not only increased so enormously but—as was shown by my hon. friend who sits alongside of me—the purchasing power of money has largely augmented during the same time, and the poor man there is now buying better food, better clothing, than he could in those old times. Let me draw—as I said I intended to do—a comparison between the present trade and commerce of Great Britain and the commerce and trade in manufactured goods of our neighbors across the line. I think, Sir, that the figures are very instructive, and I think that if some of these hon. gentlemen opposite would sit down with a sincere desire to come to an honest conclusion as to whether or not a protective system is beneficial to the people, after a perusal of these figures, they might rise up with a different opinion than the one they now entertain—possibly. Why, Sir, I find, by reference to the statistics of Great Britain, that it produced in 1881, and exported something like £190,000,000 sterling worth of manufactured goods. Why, those figures a man's mind cannot grasp! Very well, Sir; what did the United States export that year? £10,000,000 sterling only in value. So there is a country with a population of fifty millions, as compared with the thirty-five millions of Great Britain; they have illimitable resources which during the past twenty years have been developed with marvellous rapidity, and a country, as my hon. friend from East York explained, covering almost all the productive zones of the earth, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and traversed by magnificent rivers. Nature has provided them with everything that goes to make them a great nation: and yet this great nation with all the vigor, and all the energy, and all the shrewdness, characteristic of that people, only export, under a protective policy in force for some twenty years, £18,000,000 sterling worth of manufactured goods, while Free Trade England exports £190,000,000 sterling a year. Sir, those figures are eloquent in themselves, and point to the conclusion which I wish hon. members on the other side—or some of them at least—would bring their minds to. Now, in 1880, I find, that Great Britain exported to the United States of America—and mark, too, that the United States has a Tariff almost prohibitory—in spite of that prohibitory Tariff, £24,000,000 sterling worth of manufactured goods; but what did the United States export to England? £3,000,000 sterling worth. There was Free Trade England opening her ports and inviting the goods of the world to come in free; and yet all the United States could send her was £3,000,000 sterling worth; whereas Free Trade England, in spite of the Protective Tariff of the United States, almost prohibitive in its terms, sends them £24,000,000 sterling worth of manufactured goods. Sir, do those figures not tell the tale? In 1840, I find that the whole exports of Great Britain per head were £1 18s. 9d., while in 1881 they had risen to £6 9s. 5d. What were those of the United States during that period? In 1840, they were £1 11s. 1d., and in 1881, £3 8s. 1d.; and thus while the United States had only increased their exports—and, mark you, these are the whole exports of the country, not manufactured goods alone—£1 17s. per head of the population, Great Britain with her limited area and producing very little raw material which they could export, or none to speak of, being engaged almost entirely in manufacturing, advanced her exports £4 10s., the exports being £6 9s. 5d. per head. Well, Sir, if we look at the imports of Great Britain, which are very large, we find that they brought into that country for manufacture and export, goods to an enormous amount in value—and how are they able to do that? Can hon. gentlemen opposite tell me how Great Britain is able to go to the United States and buy raw cotton, raw material and carry it across the Atlantic manufacture it into goods, and send them back, compelling the Americans to take them and sell them to the Americans cheaper than their own people can make them for? What are the facts? Out of a total importation of £411,000,000 sterling only £35,000,000 sterling worth were retained for their own use; and the balance, over £376,000,000 sterling worth of manufactured goods, was sent abroad and purchased by foreign nations, sending back a stream of wealth to Great Britain, and levying tribute on almost the entire habitable globe for the support of her working population. Then, Sir, look at the special industries of Great Britain—and I would call the attention of the hon. members opposite to these special industries more than to general figures, because general figures may or may not be explained away by ingenious people, while with regard to the special industries, this cannot be done. Take the difference between the exports from the two countries of cotton goods, made from raw cotton, a bulky material, and costly of transit. In the United States, manufactured cotton is subject to a duty of from 30 to 60 per cent.; and you will find that, notwithstanding the fact that it produces such an enormous quantity of raw cotton, and has a duty which almost prohibits the importation into it of foreign manufactured cotton, notwithstanding these facts, the United States was only able to export £2,000,000 sterling worth in 1880. But how much do you suppose Great Britain exported? Why, £70,000,000 sterling worth, of which a very respectable proportion went to the United States of America; and how much cotton goods, do you suppose the United States of America sent to England, £751,000 sterling worth only. The figures show conclusively that the Protective Tariff of the United States has not enabled that country to compete successfully, even in their own markets, let alone in the other markets of the world, with England. The Free Trade policy of England has made that country the emporium almost of the manufactures of the whole world. Take the article of wool, and the same story is there told. The woollen industries are specially protected in the United States with duties of from 40 to 100 per cent.; but what is the result—that the total export, in the year 1880, of woollen manufactures from the United States was only $45,000 worth. It is almost incredible until hon. members examine the figures, that in that great country they are only able to export $45,000 worth of woollen goods in one year. What are the facts with regard to Great Britain? These exports of Great Britain were, in 1880, £20,000,000 sterling worth; and mark you, the United States imported from Great Britain, the same year, £11,000,000 sterling worth of woollen goods. In the face of their prohibitory tariff, ranging from 60 to 100 per cent., they had to go home to that country and buy woollen goods to the extent of £11,000,000 sterling. Take next iron and steel, of which we heard so much a few years ago. We were told that the American manufacturers were competing successfully in Great Britain with the English manufacturers. What are the facts? Statistics show that although the duties in the United States are from 40 to 60 per cent., the American exports are less than £3,000,000, while Great Britain exports £30,000,000; and of those £30,000,000 no less than £10,000,000 are purchased by the people of the United States in the face of a prohibitory Tariff amounting in some cases to 100 per cent.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Quebec and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 70) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. DAVIES. When the House took recess I was endeavoring, by a comparison of the Trade Returns of Great Britain with those of the United States, to show the lamentable effect of the system of Protection upon the trade of the latter country, and the marvellous development of the manufactures of England under the system of Free Trade which has been in vogue there for the last thirty years. I gave some extracts from the Trade Returns to show the effects of these two policies upon certain specific manufactures, and I propose to close my argument in that branch of the case by referring to the article of boots and shoes, which was alluded to by the hon. Finance Minister, this afternoon. The duties in the United States on the leather used in the manufacture of boots and shoes amount to between 15 and 25 per cent. Now, what effect has that duty had in promoting the manufacture and the exports of these articles? I find that in 1863 the United States exported nearly $1,500,000 worth of boots and shoes, whereas in 1869 the exports of the same articles fell in value to the pitiful figure of $175,000, and from that day to this they have not increased a dollar. What has been the effect of Free Trade in Great Britain upon the same articles? In the same year, 1863, the exports of boots and shoes from Great Britain amounted to $7,000,000, but instead of decreasing, they have risen to the sum of $8,280,000, in 1881. I give these figures to confirm the argument I had the honor to present to the House before recess. Now, I will leave that branch of my argument, and ask the indulgence of the House while I call attention to the shipping interest of these two great countries. I am prepared to show from the Trade Returns of both those countries, that notwithstanding the great advantages which the United States possess, notwithstanding the large sea-board on her eastern and western coasts, notwithstanding their inland seas, of which they have almost sole control, as far as the carrying trade is concerned; notwithstanding their noble rivers, capable of affording accommodation almost to the largest ships; notwithstanding their unlimited resources only now being developed—I am prepared to show that their shipping interest has lamentably declined and that the natural productions, even of their own country, have not been carried by their own shipping, but have fallen into the hands of foreign carriers, so that at present 80 per cent. of American foreign trade is carried in British bottoms. This is a very important factor which hon. gentlemen lose sight of very often. Let us examine briefly in detail. I have gone over the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States, and I find that in 1860 the entire exports and imports carried in American bottoms amounted to $507,000,000, and only $255,000,000 worth was carried in foreign bottoms; or, in 1860, 66 per cent. of the American foreign trade was carried in their own bottoms, furnishing employment to a large number of people, and bringing in an immense amount of money to their shipping owners especially. On comparing the year 1860 with 1870, we find that the total export and imports of the United States carried in their own vessels had fallen from $507,000,000 to $352,000,000, while foreign ships carried $638,000,000. In 1880 we find the same decrease continuing, only $280,000,000 of United States trade was carried in American vessels, while $1,300,000,000 was carried in foreign bottoms. These facts, to my mind, speak very strongly and show conclusively that so far as the carrying trade of the United States is concerned, while the Americans in 1860 carried the largest portion of it in their own vessels—almost 70 per cent.—in 1880 they only carried 17 per cent., while the foreign ships carried 83 per cent. If you examine also the returns of the tonnage of the United States engaged in the foreign trade, you will find that in 1860 it amounted to 2,379,000 tons, and in 1880 to 1,319,000 tons. Compare those statistics with those of Great Britain during the same period. In 1860, while Great Britain had only 3,000,000 tons engaged in the foreign trade, in 1880 she had 5,212,000 tons. On the one hand we find the British shipping increasing in strength by marvellous strides from year to year and decade to decade, not only monopolizing the carrying trade of its own country, but that of the United States as well, there is also a most lamentable and corresponding decrease on the part of American ship building. In 1860 they built to the extent of 270,000 tons; in 1880 this amount had dwindled down to 157,000 tons. In England, on the contrary, the annual tonnage of ships built increased from 226,000 tons in 1860, to 473,000 tons in 1880, so that their tonnage of ships built has more than doubled during the same period that the American tonnage has decreased one-half. I say that these figures are very convincing to anyone who chooses to look at them dispassionately. Passing from the comparison between the English and American shipping trade we come down to our own trade, and what do we find? We find that in 1874 some of the leading gentlemen on the other side of the House who were then in Opposition, prophesied that if an attempt was made to hamper the ship-building interest of the Dominion by imposing higher duties on articles which entered into the construction of ships, and by making living dearer, the result would be the destruction of this important interest. We found them repeating in eloquent language that we ought to be proud as a Canadian people that we were the fourth maritime power in the world, and they warned the then Government not to apply the axe to the root of this industry. In 1874 the hon. Minister of Railways, who was then in Opposition, opposing a small increase in the Tariff which the Government considered necessary for revenue purposes, spoke as follows:—

“He inveighed strongly against the imposition of an increased duty on material used in manufacturing machinery and in ship-building. There was not a sea in the world which was not whitened with the sails of the shipping of Canada, and he held that to increase the tax on this most important industry would be to inflict irreparable injury upon it, for even though the Tariff were to be removed next year, the same vitality could not be restored to the industry which now characterizes it, for men could not invest their money in the business with the same confidence which they had hitherto done.”

I also found the same hon. member reported further as saying:

“I fear the hon. Minister (Mr. Cartwright) is seeking to enter the thin edge of Protection, which will eventually work ruin and desolation to the Maritime Provinces. Let the hon. Minister look at the neighboring Republic and he will find that the policy of that country has swept their flag off the seas and given to others the carrying trade of the world.”

That statement made in eloquent language, by the hon. Minister of Railways was true, as far as the United States is concerned, as I have proved to you by the figures taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns. Their shipping has been swept off the sea, and the trade which was formerly in their hands has now passed to Free Trade England, whose shippers are making an enormous amount of money out of it. We find also the hon. member for Kings, N.B. (Mr. Foster) rising in his place in this House and posing in the character of an impartial speaker and severely censuring the Opposition for persisting in looking on the one side only, while he gave the House to understand he had figures and arguments on both sides, thus intimating that hon. gentlemen opposed to him were unduly biased in their opinions. Well, how does he maintain the impartial character he had for the nonce assumed? In the first place, he goes on to show that an enormous increase of $30,000,000 took place in our expenditure while the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was First Minister. But in his character of impartial advocate he forgot to tell the House that that large increase was due—and I do not think I am exaggerating in any way—to the fact that when the late Government came into power they found enormous contracts let out by their predecessors which they had to carry out; and this money was spent in carrying out contracts to which the faith of the country was pledged. So I say that the hon. member did not present that phase of his case in a fair or impartial manner. He presented one side of the shield alone, and that, Sir, the side which was the pleasant one for the argument he wished to present to the House. But he went on and spoke of the large increase of the debt under the present Government. Oh! he says, there is no harm in that; it was a deadly crime on the part of the hon. member for East York and his associates to increase the debt of this country in carrying out the contracts entered into by their predecessors; but it is not a crime, and it is not wrong, for the present Government, because, he says, they have plenty of assets to show in the shape of public works. He talks of the assets of the country and credits them to the present Government, forgetting that many of them were made by their predecessors, though he gives them no credit at all. He goes on to take credit for the carrying trade of the intercolonial, and how it has developed inter-provincial trade. He forgot to tell this House that the larger part of that road was built under the late Mackenzie Government. That important fact he withheld, and when he withheld it to my mind he lost his character as an impartial man, and degenerated simply into that of a politician who was desirous, not of presenting the whole case, but simply one side, and I say by the presentation of that one side it is calculated to give a false impression. But he went on to talk about the shipping of this country. The hon. member talked very eloquently, and I think, he has a right to receive the congratulation of his friends for the eloquent speech he delivered in this House. But the question we have here to discuss is, not whether his speech was an eloquent one, not whether it was delivered in choice language and adorned with literary references, but whether the facts he gave are true in themselves, or true in their application to the trade of this country. Now, just let us look at them for a moment. The hon. gentleman says—and he makes use of very strong language in saying it—that everything is lovely in all the Provinces. There is an immense inter-provincial trade growing up, but he fails to give any figures in proof of that assertion. I can tell him that there are very many men who are thoroughly acquainted with the trade of this country, and who believe that there never can be a very large inter-provincial trade between the Maritime Provinces and the Upper Provinces, for the reason that our agricultural products are of that character that they are not required by the people up here who produce plenty of them themselves. We have to buy their manufactures, but we send them very little in return. The trade is all on one side. Now, I want to call the attention of this House to his remarks on the shipping interest. In order to prove that the commerce of this country had increased very largely—and no one doubted that fact, for the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) showed that from year to year since 1879, our exports of the forest, and of the field, and of the farm had enormously increased, and, of course, that greatly increased our commerce, which merely consists in bartering our own products for those that we require from abroad—the hon. member went on and tried to prove this fact, which, I say, he did not prove; and the reverse of which is the fact, as I will show by reference to figures directly. He went on to show that the carrying trade of this country and our shipping had not decreased. And how did he do it? He took the Trade and Navigation Returns, and he quotes the tonnage engaged in the carrying of the products of this country abroad, and the bringing in of the goods that we require, and he gave us to understand that he was merely quoting the figures of Canadian shipping only. Why, Sir, when I tell the House that the figures the hon. member has quoted are not the figures of all of the Canadian tonnage employed, but the figures of foreign vessels, Canadian and British vessels combined, the House will understand that his argument was not worth a snap, so far as showing that the Canadian shipping had increased at all. But he went on, and wound up his sentence by saying as follows:—

“I am aware that these figures do not show the number of vessels engaged in the trade, but as they show in both cases the arrivals, and departures of vessels at particular ports, the comparative statement cannot be impugned.”

And then feeling sure of his position he winds up with the following very strong language, which only a very thorough examination of the statistics of the case will justify any man in employing, which I say his examination of the statistics do not justify him in employing. He says:

“I think I have effectually disposed of the statement that the commerce of this country has decreased, and you will not make it any more clear to the House or the country if you give from now to doomsday all the figures to be found in the books of all the Departments.”

Very well. Now, we will turn to the books of the Departments and see whether the hon. gentleman's statement that the shipping had not decreased is true or not. In the first place, I will call your attention to the figures contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns as the registered shipping of this country. I find by these returns that in the year 1873 the registered tonnage—

Mr. FOSTER. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Will he please state now what he is going to disprove, and what he says I attempted to prove? If he says I attempted to prove that the shipping of this country had not decreased he states what I did not state.

Mr. DAVIES. I am bound to accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman that he did not intend to make the statement. Now I will read to the House the exact language used, as found in the official report, to show what he did say:

“In 1878 there were sea-going vessels inward and outward, 48,027; in 1882, 55,620. In 1878 the number of tons registered was 12,054,890; in 1882 the number of tons registered was 13,379,882.”

What is the hon. gentleman attempting to prove there? Is it not an attempt to lead the House to believe that the registered tonnage had increased 1,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to allow any hon. member on the other side of the House to misrepresent my argument. I was not speaking at all of Canadian shipping in its decline, or in its increase. I was on the point of commerce, and I was stating the arrivals and departures of vessels at ports in this Dominion.

Mr. DAVIES. I shall not adopt the course which the hon. gentleman opposite pursued in reference to an hon. member on this side of the House, of refusing to read all his speech. I shall go further, not stopping at what I have read, but I will read a little more and if the hon. gentleman did not intend to say what he has said, then I shall have achieved my object if I can draw from him a repudiation of the only conclusion that can be drawn from the speech as printed in Hansard. He goes on to say:

Would any man in the country, reading that speech, doubt that the hon. gentleman had reference to Canadian shipping? Of course not.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. Finance Minister had better not laugh until he is out of the woods. I will continue to read:

"The crews employed in 1878 were 465,776; in 1882 they were 512,738."

What boots it to the people of this country that foreign shipping had increased or decreased? What does the hon. member mean to prove? What if the shipping engaged in the carrying trade of this country had increased, if, as a matter of fact, it was foreign shipping that had increased? And so he goes on. I will show by the next sentence what the hon. member intended to prove by the use of that language:

"Does not the extra employment of men show the extra trade which is taking place in the matter of sea-going vessels? And if we take the coasting trade we find it equally favorable."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. He is boasting.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. Finance Minister laughs. I do not wonder at his laughing at a boast of one of his followers that the men employed in foreign shipping had increased in number, and that that indicates the prosperity of this country. Now, after having read that statement, I proceed to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the registered shipping of this Dominion as I extract it from the Report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. In 1873 there were 1,073,718 tons in this Dominion, and in 1878 the tonnage had increased to 1,333,015. During that period of depression when the hon. member for East York was in power, and we had a Revenue Tariff, the shipping had increased by 259,257 tons. If I turn to the Report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I find it stated that the value of every ton of shipping to the country is $30, and applying those figures to the increased registered tonnage of 1878 the result shows the value of the increased registered tonnage to be $7,778,910. Is that nothing? We will take the next period from 1878 to 1882, and what do we find? In 1879 it was 1,333,000 tons, in 1882 it had decreased to 1,260,777 tons; so that during the period when the hon. Finance Minister had charge of the country, and when his fiscal policy was in full operation, shipping instead of having increased, as it had done during the former period, actually decreased 72,238 tons, or a value of $2,167,000. These are facts which cannot be controverted, and which have been taken from the hon. gentleman's own returns. Let the hon. member take his own Province of New Brunswick, and what will he find? The same ratio of increase between 1873 and 1878, and the same lamentable decrease from 1878 to 1882. I will give the figures to the House. In 1873 there were 277,850 tons of registered shipping in New Brunswick; in 1878 the tonnage had risen to 335,965 tons, or an increase of 58,115 tons, equal to a value of nearly $2,000,000, during that dreadful period when hon. gentlemen opposite declared the country went to the dogs. Since then there has been a decrease of 26,895 tons, equal to a value of nearly $1,000,000 in New Brunswick alone. The shipping of Prince Edward Island increased from 1873 to 1878, 15,000 tons of the value of nearly $500,000, while it decreased from the latter year down to 1882, 12,000 tons, or a value of $376,000. These figures show that the same result has followed the application of a high Protective Tariff to our shipping which has occurred in the United States, and which was predicted by the hon. Minister of Railways if it should ever be introduced here. His prediction has been verified and the shipping interest has been largely injured, as the hon. gentlemen who come from the Maritime Provinces know. If we take the shipping built in the Dominion we find that in 1871 there were built 106,000 tons, and in 1878 the same number of tons, the average annually for the period being 152,000 tons the yearly tonnage having largely increased in the intervening years. Between 1878 and 1882 the tonnage dropped to 68,000 tons, or an average annually of 79,000, and that during the remarkable period when everything was lovely as compared with an average annually of 152,000 tons in the previous years from 1873 to 1878, I find the same ratio of increase and decrease applies to the Provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I need not trouble the House by reading the figures. It thus appears that the shipping industry, of which we are all so proud, instead of being promoted or increased by this high protective policy, has been very seriously damaged, and to day instead of retaining the high position we have occupied as the fourth maritime power we are rapidly falling behind and will soon occupy an inferior position to some of the smaller countries of Europe.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. In answer to the cheer, I tell him that if the decrease goes on in the same ratio as it has done during the past four years, he will not be able to make the proud statement another year, that Canada is the fourth maritime power in the world. Let us look at the results of this enormous high Tariff upon the manufacturing industries of the country, and I will only detain the House a few moments on this point. In the articles of cottons, woollens, and manufactures of iron and steel—while, in 1874, we imported $34,000,000 worth, in 1879 we imported only $21,000,000 worth. We were going to have Canada for the Canadians, after the introduction of this new policy; we were not going to import cheap goods from foreign countries, but we were going to manufacture them ourselves. What has been the result? Instead of importing $21,000,000 worth as in 1879, in 1882 we imported $33,000,000 worth. Has the policy had the effect of giving Canada to the Canadians? We have imported many more million dollars worth of these very goods, than we did under the Revenue Tariff that formerly existed. As regards goods susceptible of being manufactured here, the same thing would apply. From 1874 to 1879 there was a decrease of $29,000,000 in the imports of these goods, and from 1879 to 1882 they rose to $59,000,000, or an increase of $30,000,000. So that this policy had not the effect which hon. gentlemen predicted for it when it was introduced, and which some hon. members are fond of saying, without looking at the figures, has resulted. Just one word with respect to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), and the manner in which he treated the debt and expenditure of this country. He tossed about millions as a juggler tossed his balls in the air; he talked as glibly of millions as if they were thousands, and although he gave some particulars of the debt of the country between several periods, he did not put the case fairly. I am only repeating the figures by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), when he made his able and exhaustive speech, which has never been answered from the other side of the House. The only attempt to answer that speech was made in the address delivered this afternoon by the hon. Finance Minister, and I may have a word to say directly in reply to it. In 1867-68 the expenditure of the country was $13,486,000; 1873-74, $23,000,000; and in 1873-79, the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, $24,455,381, while the estimated expenditure of the present Government for 1883-84 is $30,000,000. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) treats this increase as if it was nothing at all. What will his constituents say when called upon to pay the shot? Will they be satisfied of the action of the hon. member in supporting that increase? But it is in the controllable expenditure that the increase is most observable. In 1873-74 it was $8,324,000; in 1878, under the economical Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) it had decreased to $6,999,000.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will you tell what the controllable expenditure was in 1876?

Mr. DAVIES. I will repeat the figures for the hon. gentleman. In 1873 when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) took charge of public affairs the controllable expenditure was $8,324,000, and when he left office in 1878 he had decreased that controllable expenditure by $1,332,000.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Will he give us the controllable expenditure for the year 1876? If so, he will find it larger than it was for the Macdonald Government in 1873-74.

Mr. DAVIES. It is impossible to present a continuous argument to the House, if I am interrupted every few minutes. I was going to draw the attention of the House to the lamentable increase in the controllable expenditure by the Conservative Government—and the hon. gentleman is not going, by drawing a herring over the trails to draw me from it. Now let me present the other side of the shield, and ask what has been the fact. Has that decrease under the Mackenzie Government been continued by their successors, and the taxes of the people saved, as was the case under the former Administration? No; I find that while the controllable expenditure had gone on decreasing during the Administration of the hon. member for East York, they have gone on increasing ever since these hon. gentlemen came into power. For 1833 the Estimates of controllable expenditure are $10,000,000 odd, being an increase of over $3,000,000 during the period since they last came into power, and to-day to give these figures for a period of years, is the only fair and honest way of presenting this case to the country. I remarked a moment ago, that no answer had ever been given or attempted to be given to the argument presented by the hon. member for South Brant? What did he say? One point in his case—and I only wish to touch upon it because the hon. Finance Minister attempted to reply to it—was this: that the cause of the prosperity of this country to-day is not the increase in the taxes placed upon us, and put upon nearly every branch of industry, and on everything that we eat, drink, and wear, but is owing to the fact that a bountiful Providence has smiled upon us and enabled us to export, as he put it, $60,000,000 of increase in the products of the forest, field and mine, in the year 1882, over and above what we exported in 1879—$10,000,000 in 1880, $20,000,000 in 1881, and $30,000,000 in 1882. What is the answer of the hon. Finance Minister? This cannot be the cause, says he, because if you take the average of these exports for the whole four years, 1878 to 1882, you will find that the exports are not greater than during a certain other number of years; but the hon. Finance Minister forgets that he has never claimed, that 1879 or 1880 were prosperous years. Prosperity only began, when our exports commenced to increase over the amount which they reached in the years when the depression existed; and until they reached in 1882, which is alleged to have been the most prosperous year in the history of Canada, $102,000,000, we were not prosperous, and the hon. member for South Brant showed that they were $30,000,000 more in 1882 than they were in 1879. I say, that this answer, or rather attempted answer by the hon. Finance Minister, was a complete failure; and that the argument of the hon. member for South Brant, will go forth to the country as one that cannot be answered, and has not been attempted to be answered by any hon. gentleman on that side of the House. I will now say a word with reference to the mild and able speech, as I may term it, delivered by the hon. member for Westmoreland. That hon. gentleman was aware of the real facts, because he is largely engaged in the shipping interest; and he did not fall into the mistake of the hon. member for King's (N.B.) he admitted at once that the shipping interest of the country was declining, and went on to urge that the lumbering trade of the country was also a waning industry. But what is the remedy which the hon. gentleman prescribes? Why, one would imagine that these two great industries, which in years gone by have contributed so much to build up this Dominion of ours, had a right to receive some consideration at the hands of the Government, and had a right, if they are waning and cannot bear up against the taxation placed upon them, to some attention. One would suppose that the remedy which the hon. gentleman would propose would be to take off some of the taxes, and give them fair play; but no, he says they are waning industries, and therefore proposes to support them by imposing still further taxes which will have the effect of depreciating these industries still more. Certainly this is adopting the motto laid down of old: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken, even what he seemeth to have." The ship-building and lumber industries are waning, and so he takes from them what they have, and gives it to some sugar industry at Moncton—or some other of the few industries which profit and benefit a few capitalists, but do not benefit the great mass of the taxpayers of this country. One of the remarks of the hon. Finance Minister I was most sorry to hear—was wherein he announced to this country that the policy of imposing high protective duties and taxes on the necessities of life in this country was to be the policy of the Government for all time, and that there was no hope for the taxpayers of this country that in the distant future any of these taxes were to be withdrawn. He told us that the hand was to be blasted that ever removed a stone, Sir, from this wonderful superstructure which he and his friends have built up. That was a sad statement for me to hear, very sad, and it will be a sad statement for the people of the Maritime Provinces, to hear,—because we were told, when these high protective duties were put on, that we should bear them for a few years, and a few years only, that the only justification for putting them on, was this: that certain industries in Canada, were struggling against competitors in the United States, and that for a few years they required to be supported at the public expense; but once on their feet, they would be able to compete successfully with the manufacturers of any part of the world, and that then the duties would be taken off, and this taxation removed from the shoulders of the people. But we are now told that they will never be able to compete successfully, that these taxes will remain on for all time, and there is no hope at all of their being taken off the people of this country in the future. Apart from that there is another reason. Sir, the hon. gentleman boasts—and perhaps he has a right to boast—that the Election of 1882 showed that the party, which he leads in financial matters, enjoyed the confidence of the country. Perhaps they do; I am not denying that they polled the majority of the votes at the last Election, but I do contend this: that when they first promulgated their policy in the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, the main reasons which induced the people of those Provinces to give even the support they did to them was this: that coupled with the introduction of that policy, was the solemn promise made, that if the people would vote for it, it would bring about Reciprocity with the United States in two or three years. I tell you, there is no boon you could confer on the people of the Maritime Provinces, which they will appreciate so much as reciprocal Free Trade with the United States of America, as we had it from 1854 to 1864. The people of those Provinces remember well that in 1854, their trade was very small and very dull, and that a great impetus was given to that trade by the introduction of reciprocal Free Trade relations with the United States. Sir, the statistics show that the trade of the Maritime Provinces alone increased from $6,671,000 in 1853 to $20,277,000 in 1864; while for the whole Dominion it increased from $17,000,000 to $32,000,000, or an increase of $65,000,000. Why, it is within my own recollection, that during the existence of that Treaty, trade thrived in almost every part of the Maritime Provinces, there was not a navigable creek or a harbor upon which you would not find small schooners bringing in the wares which the United States can produce so much more cheaply than we can, and taking away our eggs, our butter, pelts, oats, potatoes, barley, &c., in exchange, and thereby carrying on a trade which was mutually profitable. We have been longing for the time when that state of matters shall be resumed again. I remember very well that in 1878 when the hon. Minister of Railways came down to the Maritime Provinces and endeavoured to seduce them from their allegiance to the principles of Free Trade and to get them to join the Protectionist Army, he said to the people: "If you will fight for this policy it will bring about Reciprocity with the United States, and I want you to support our policy for that reason." I remember quite well the words he addressed to an enormous gathering at Charlottetown, in which he depicted the prosperity which flowed through the Maritime Provinces when reciprocal trade relations existed there with the United States in the ten years from 1853 to 1863, and when he said, "If you want to bring back these good times vote in favor of this National Policy of ours and we will use it as a lever to bring about Reciprocity." But what does the Finance Minister say now? He rises in his place and says: "We will not use the National Policy for any such purpose; we do not want Reciprocity; we intend to continue the existing state of things forever and aye." I will quote the language made use of by the Minister of Railways at that meeting:

"All that you have to do to-day is to support the Protective National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald in order to obtain a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States within two years."

People were seduced into supporting that policy, and with what result? Have these promises been fulfilled? No, they have not. They were told at the last General Election that negotiations were in progress, but we find to-day that a denial is given to all these predictions and promises. The hon. Finance Minister tells us that his present policy is a finality, and that the hand is to be palsied that dares to lift $1,000 from the taxation laid upon the people. Sir, I do not believe in that policy, and I was pleased and proud to hear the hon. member for West Middlesex, the other day, deliver an able and exhaustive speech in favor of reciprocal trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon. gentlemen cheer derisively, but they had better wait until they hear what I was going to say. I say I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman deliver a speech in favor of honorable steps being taken at an early day to bring about Reciprocity. It was one of the ablest speeches I have listened to for a long time, and I hope it will be generally read throughout the country, for it is pregnant with facts and figures, and the deductions which he drew from those facts and figures are believed in, I believe, by every trader in the Maritime Provinces. Whenever a statement is made on this side of the House, taken from the statistics of the country, or from the experience which each individual man gains in his own Province, showing that the great prosperity alleged to exist by hon. gentlemen on the other side is not universal, or showing that it may not be perpetual—showing that we should be careful in husbanding our resources and not rush into an era of extravagance, the cry of "blue ruin" is raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they say you are not a patriot; you must not tell the truth. The hon. gentleman himself said that by hon. members on both sides only shouting prosperity loud enough and long enough, we will keep on the good times we are now enjoying. What a farce! Does the hon. gentleman think that the trade and commerce of the country are improved by shouting "prosperity" where none exists. Sir, it is the duty, as well as the privilege, of hon. members, when they find that a particular branch of trade is not prospering, or that a particular Province is not prospering, to say so openly. I say, they are only discharging their duty to the people and to the House by telling the facts, and it is no answer to these facts to shout "blue ruin." I say that a man who warns the country and warns the Finance Minister that he is rushing on a career of extravagance, is discharging a duty for which the people will thank him. I find that these warnings are not entirely confined to the politicians in the House. I find that monetary men who have no political interest to serve have time and again warned the hon. gentleman that the seven years of prosperity which he predicted, and which we all hope may come, is not so very sure as he thinks. I find that the Monetary Times, an authority which I suppose will be received with some degree of credit on both sides of the House, as far back as October, 1882, raised a note of warning in this regard. It called attention to the liabilities of the banks of the country in the following language:—

"In August, 1880, their liabilities were $98,000,000; in August, 1882, they were $131,000,000. Thus, then, with a heavy increase of liability, amounting to no less than $33,000,000, the banks find themselves, in two years, with $14,000,000 less cash resources to meet them."

The writer goes on to say:

"Now, when we add that out of a total available cash of $31,000,000 they show the utterly inadequate sum of $3,300,000, it is surely evident that it is time for somebody to consider the position. We give the facts. They speak loudly enough. We have hoisted a little preparatory storm signal. It is for those who are concerned to give heed to it."

Does the hon. Finance Minister or his followers think they can brush aside these warnings by a mere cavalier remark that there is no fear? The next week the same journal hoists another storm signal in the following language:—

"But for more than half a century back it has been noticeable that about once in every ten years there comes a sort of financial earthquake. Some edifices then tumble down altogether; they were too heavy, or so many rotten materials had been built in that they could stand no longer; and the solidest and strongest of them get a good number of stones shaken out so that a year or two of patient labor is required to put them in as strong a position as they were in before. It is evident to the most cursory observer that Canada is piling up her edifice of credit operations at a very rapid rate. Our bank discounts are nothing but an expansion of credit. Discounts are credits past. Their increase is an increase of indebtedness. The people of Canada, it is evident, are getting deeper into debt as every month rolls round and time will show whether they are able to pay these debts or not. The edifice of credit is mounting higher and higher."

He goes on to show that there has been a year's increase in the amount of money which the people of Canada owed the banks, of $50,000,000, and he says that this fact is suggestive rather of eagerness to do business than wise discrimination. At the end of the year the same journal winds up a review of the year's business in a very able article, by showing that the amount which the banks of the country have loaned the people of the Dominion, had risen to the sum of $180,000,000, and that after this country had exported all its surplus products, and got in the returns from those products, they were only able to reduce that indebtedness by $2,000,000. The Monetary Times says that this is a very serious aspect of affairs, and calls for very serious consideration. It goes on to say:

"The year 1882, financially speaking, was a weather-breeder. It was a period of very great prosperity. Business expanded rapidly. Our imports went on increasing in spite of heavy duties; and all our manufacturing industries were in a state of unexampled prosperity. The North-West received a large accession of population, and its great line of railway was pushed out to the westward, over the prairie, at a rate never heard of before, even on this continent. The city of Winnipeg nearly doubled its population; and if the assessment roll is a true indicator, it more than doubles the value of its property. It has expanded at a rate never before known, even in the early days of Chicago."

Then, after referring to the statistics of the banks and the trade of the country, the writer goes on to say:

"As confirming our forecast, we have to call attention to the record of 'insolvencies.' Nothing is better worth studying than this suggestive record, furnished by Dun, Wiman & Co., from year to year. In 1880, the total fell from $29,000,000 to $8,000,000. This was significant of improved business. In 1881, it was better still. The total was then $5,700,000, being the lowest for many years. It has now, however, begun to move up again. Insolvencies increased 50 per cent. in 1882; and over 1881, the total was $8,500,000. The amount is not dangerous, but the movement is significant."

These are the opinions, not of politicians, not of men who wish to decry the credit of the country; but they are the carefully prepared written opinions of our best financial men in the review published in the Monetary Times. I say those statements deserve careful consideration at the hands of the hon. Finance Minister, and not the flippant reply that those who are saying the same thing in this House are shouting "blue ruin." I have to thank the House for the patient hearing they have given me during the time I have occupied in addressing them on this question.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria, N.S.) In speaking upon this policy I do not pretend to follow the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) in his argument. It was, no doubt, an able speech, and if it had been in a good cause I have no doubt he would have had a good deal of satisfaction from it. When I had the honor of a seat in this House before, I spoke several times upon this National Policy of self-protection, but the Government of that day slighted the idea. I have the pleasure now of coming here, four or five years afterwards, and seeing them on the other side of the House I do not at all wonder that they abuse this policy in the way they are doing. It is a wonder they do not frighten the hon. Minister of Finance, and induce him to change the whole thing, by all the eloquence and action they have shown on the subject since it has been introduced. I could not let the discussion pass without saying a few feeble words in defence of this policy, because I claim some of the credit to myself for advocating it before it was initiated. The hon. member for Queen's says that England is a Free Trade country, and at the same time he tells us that England raised a revenue of $390,000,000 in one year. Well, if England raises that much revenue, it must raise it by taxing something. I was in England some time ago, and I do not think I ever saw such a highly taxed people in my life. Everything seemed to be taxed. They taxed a man's window glass; they taxed his horses and carriage, his income, and many other things. His tobacco costs $2.50 a pound, which we buy here for 70 cents. We prefer to tax American cottons and American coal. The hon. member says that people are leaving this country for the United States. They are leaving England also, and that is a Free Trade country. The hon. member for Queen's is arguing against the high Tariff of the United States, and at the same time he says our people are going there. Are they going there to be taxed more highly than we tax them ourselves? I cannot see the force of that argument. I know our own people are going, and they are going to a highly protected country. That is one reason why we should imitate the Tariff of the United States. I might say that I am not satisfied with the Tariff as it is now. I will never be contented with it until it is equal to that of our neighbors; let us tax them as they tax us—that is what I call reciprocity—and then our people will come back to us. I do not think our taxes are so very high; they only amount to an average of about 19 per cent., and I find that we import about $112,000,000—on which we collect $21,000,000, or an average of 19 per cent.—worth of goods for consumption. I have never heard any one complain about that taxation, except the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he went down and spoke to the people at St. John. He was the only one I ever heard complaining of the price of grey cotton advancing. I want the Tariff made higher still as soon as the country is educated up to the necessity of it; but I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Finance that it is no use going too strong on the thing at once, because the people of this country are not prepared for it. When I spoke of a duty being placed on coal hon. gentlemen opposite scouted the idea—who was going to pay duty on Nova Scotia coal? I am sorry to hear that the Government are burning American coal in the Buildings here; it is not very patriotic, I must say. Hon. gentlemen opposite also complain that there is too much money collected. Well, we must remember that bill stamps, which were a most obnoxious tax on the business of the country, have been abolished. The taxes had to be raised in some way, and the Opposition raised them by bill stamps, and which caused a great deal of annoyance in the country. Then there is the question of the ship-building industry, and I contend that in encouraging this industry the Government has given satisfaction to those engaged in it. The amount so expended comes out of the revenue. I am sure hon. gentlemen on the other side have spoken to the effect that it is too little; but it is only a commencement. Then what an outcry was raised about the bounty to fishing vessels, and the ground taken was that the bounty was practically no encouragement at all on account of the smallness of the amount—only $2 per ton. But this, no doubt, will be increased to double the amount whenever the revenue will allow of such an increase. In passing thus far I feel that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite—and I have read their speeches carefully—do not touch any particular point. They are simply a tirade of abuse of the National Policy, without coming down to particulars. I have read the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I fail to see in any part what they have to complain of. If they would mention any particular industry or article that is overtaxed or crushed out of existence by this National Policy, we would be able to seize such an argument and discuss it; but they confine themselves to general terms. I do not blame them, because it was the means of causing their downfall. Bounty on pig iron, I am satisfied, is as judicious a policy as any ever introduced by any Government, and the hon. Minister of Finance explained it very well in his speech the other night, when he spoke of the necessity of preparing in time to build our own iron ships, as wooden vessels were getting out of date, and the time to begin properly was to begin at the very foundation, to find the iron and manufacture it into ribs and keels in the first place, and then into plates. This National Policy will commend itself to every impartial man—all these taxes put together, only 19 per cent. ad valorem, and that was the difference between importing now, and before iron ships came into vogue. This revenue of 19 per cent. has worked two ways. It has given us inducement to invest in new industries and to benefit those which have been commenced; while it benefits the manufacturers, the laborers are kept among ourselves. Many hon. gentlemen on both sides were invited the other day to join in the inauguration of a Canadian cotton factory; and I am sure if an hon. member of the Opposition had been invited to speak, I am sure he would not have made a speech of the kind the Opposition often make here. I say, if there was a factory in every village we would not see our population going away. It is enough to make them go away to hear hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wonder they have not all gone. These hon. gentlemen have been singing the same song for the last six years, creating discontent throughout the country, and it makes me disgusted to hear them preach such doctrines, and the papers write such articles from day to day, and I wish there was a law to punish them. Protective duties are charged with not benefiting the North-West. When that North-West was purchased some twelve or fifteen years ago, this House will recollect the hue-and-cry that was raised against the Macdonald Government for throwing away £300,000 sterling on a wilderness composed of nothing but snow and rock. The country was to be ruined. Is any man bold enough now to get up and condemn that transaction. Why, what is the result? That country that was bought for £300,000, and which was granted by the British Government is to-day worth the whole debt of the Dominion, $78,000,000 I think. No one would now advocate the selling of it for $78,000,000, and if it has entailed some taxation, we have a country to open up which our children will be proud of, and where, instead of the British Government allowing their people to be exported to a foreign country to fight against our cause, they will obtain homes here, and this country, in course of time—in the course of another century—will be filled by an industrious and loyal population. It may take half a century, or perhaps three or four centuries, to achieve this result, because its limits are almost boundless; but, in the near future, when the railway will be built from Victoria (N.S.), to Victoria in Vancouver's Island, we shall see an immense inter-provincial trade established, and hon. gentlemen opposite will look back with disgust at the speeches they made, and their children will wonder what their fathers were made of when they made such speeches. Just compare the state of the country to-day with what it was six years ago. When I was here six years ago I protested against the policy the Government of the day was pursuing. I told them the handwriting was on the wall, and it has come to pass. The people have rendered two verdicts since then in favor of the National Policy, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite should have a little more consideration than to throw dirt in the face of the people of this country, saying that they did not know what they were doing. We went square to the country with this National Policy, and we came back justified and complimented by the people. I should think that would be enough for hon. gentlemen opposite, without their wearying us here, from day to day, with repetitions of their hustings speeches. Six years ago every man in the country was frightened; he was afraid to touch anything. Why? It was not because money had flown away; it was not because the soil had refused to yield its fruits, or the sea to yield its fish—it was because the people had lost confidence in the Government. I myself, as a business man, saw that it was not safe to touch anything, and you could not tell from one day to another what the Government was going to do. Capitalists locked up their gold and silver and were afraid to invest it. It took $3 worth to make $1, and possibly you lost the $1 after all. One half the mines in Nova Scotia, where millions of money had been spent, were allowed to close up and were filled with water. What is the result to-day? Those that had kept above water are making money, and those that were closed up are being opened—the yield is doubling. People are not now leaving the country. They have plenty of work to do and plenty of wages. Contentment reigns everywhere. Mr. Speaker, it was the same two dozen years ago. It was the so-called Liberals that were in opposition to every step of progress. At that time all the coal mines in Nova Scotia were in the hands of a monopoly, the creditors of the Duke of York; and an arrangement was entered into by which the duty was reduced from 50 cts. to 10 cts., which should have been taken off at the time of Confederation, and the Conservative party attempted to break the monopoly up; but the Liberals fought it as far as they could, and there is not a man in the House to-day that would stand up and defend that monopoly. To-day six times the quantity of coal is produced that was produced then. In speaking of coal I would observe to the hon. Finance Minister, that there is a royalty on coal yet, that has been continued from the time the General Money Association had the monopoly. An arrangement was made then by which the royalty was reduced from 50 cts. to 10 cts. a ton, and that is paid on coal yet. I think that is not in accord with the views the hon. Minister of Finance has carried out in other things. There should be no duty on the production of minerals. If you want to encourage the development of the country

those things should be free. This matter should have been arranged at the time of Confederation, because it is the General Government that gets the benefit from the increase of labor and machinery, and duty and revenue; therefore, they should relieve it from this tax and negotiate with the Government of Nova Scotia to let us off. It has been brought to the notice of the hon. Finance Minister, and no doubt he will see the force of my remarks. Then, again, it was the Liberals that opposed Confederation in Nova Scotia, and they fought it for years. Now, however, I do not think any of them would be bold enough to get up in this House and make a speech against Confederation. I may be mistaken; as they are still opposing the National Policy they might oppose Confederation. But I do not think any hon. gentleman who has any standing in the House would do it. Then with regard to the North-West there was the same cry. Is there any hon. gentleman on that side of the House that would get up and argue in favor of going back to the position we occupied before? Six years ago there was much talk of dissatisfaction which prevailed in the country. British Columbia was in a state of rebellion and threatened to secede from the Confederation compact. Not a word is heard about that now; the Province is quiet and the people are peaceable and satisfied. The hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.), found fault with the hon. Finance Minister as to the way he has managed the financial affairs of the country; but, in view of his economical expenditures and the large surplus, I think the hon. gentleman is deserving of credit.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not wish to make a speech, as the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's have been well answered by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. But I asked that hon. gentleman a question which he could very easily have answered, but instead of doing so he accused me of drawing a herring across the track. I suppose the hon. member for Queen's thought he was making so many points and delivering so great an oration that we would be carried away by it, but I have listened to this debate and I have come to the opinion that nothing new to me has been said. When, as I have said, I asked the amount of the controllable expenditure under the Government of the hon. member for East York in 1876, he did not answer me. The hon. gentleman, in placing his figures before the House, did not give that expenditure, only that for the last year of the Mackenzie Government; but I have the statistics here, and every member who has the Public Accounts can judge whether I quote them correctly or not. In 1875-76 the controllable expenditure was $8,569,774; in 1882, $8,293,161, or less by $276,613. Let us consider these figures a little. The country was in a state of poverty, the people were groaning under burdens and had no employment. The only industry encouraged was the soup kitchen. Let us look at the other years and see the result, for the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite might be termed dishonest, if that were a Parliamentary term. In 1874-75 the controllable expenditure was $7,868,690; in 1881, $7,293,563, or less by $575,125. It is astonishing that hon. gentlemen opposite should place wrong figures before the House when the Public Accounts are in the hands of every hon. member. They are also fond of referring to the question of balance of trade, because when we were in Opposition we always argued that the industries of the country should be encouraged, so that we should reach a position when we could have a balance of trade in our favor, and that then the country would be prosperous. I have given considerable attention to the subject, and I venture to say that if you deduct the amount of labor-saving machinery brought into the country and the amount of imports for the Canada Pacific Railway, the balance of trade against us would all disappear. The hon. member for Queen's pretends that he does not know why the ship-building has declined. Iron has taken the place of wood in ship-building. He must know that, and if he does not he should know it. But the hon. gentleman will not tell the country this fact. Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of accusing the Government of being extravagant. Reference has been made to the decrease in the public debt made by hon. gentlemen opposite. All I ask any impartial man to do is to look at the expenditure and government and they will find that those hon. gentlemen could not collect sufficient money to pay the current expenditure for the year; in fact, they were looking around to see how they could come to direct taxation. If those hon. gentlemen had retained possession of the Treasury benches, there is no doubt they would have tax-gatherers around collecting the revenue by direct taxation. The House should look at their expenditure and at the manner in which they have increased the debt, and consider what the country obtained in return. They increased the expenditure by $40,000,000. At the time of Confederation the debt of Ontario and Quebec was $10,500,000. The Dominion assumed that debt and the debts of other Provinces, and yet, from 1867 to 1873, the indebtedness of the country only increased $6,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, increased the debt between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000. What did the country receive for it? Hon. gentleman opposite built part of the Intercolonial Railway, and part of the Welland Canal. The moment they came into power by changing the system of contracts, the Government lost $288,000 on the first movement they made in connection with the Welland Canal Works; and I know what I am speaking of. What did they give us for the rest? They gave us the water-stretches; and they built the Fort Frances Locks. They tell me now that—I do not know whether it is so or no—some enterprising lumberman is filling up the Fort Frances Locks, which cost us nearly half a million, with saw-dust. Let any man look at the Public Accounts before him, and he will see that what I say is correct as far as the increase in the debt under these hon. gentlemen, as far as the controllable expenditure of these hon. gentlemen and the revenue under these hon. gentlemen, are concerned; and everything that I said is true; and the Public Accounts bear me out in it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not anxious to lengthen this debate, and I do not intend to do so to any appreciable extent. If we were merely concerned with the hon. members of this House, I should not have attempted to have explained with reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.). I am long suffering enough to have allowed the hon. gentleman, if it were necessary, in order that he should make a speech—to misstate my position in order to get material for his speech. I was quite willing to do that to a certain extent, but there is a point beyond which endurance ceases to be a virtue, and I do not care to have my position turned upside down and sent out to the country, even though it be to afford the hon. gentleman an excellent chance to make a speech before this House. I make these remarks to set myself right before the country, as I am already set right before the House—for I do not think that there is an hon. gentleman on this or on the other side of the House, but saw the ridiculous mistake into which the hon. member for Queen's fell. I want to have the matter fairly stated, and if I do not state it fairly will the hon. gentleman please put me right? He endeavored to prove to this House that I stated that the shipping interest of this country had not declined. Is that true, or is it not true?

Mr. DAVIES. I said the hon. member had made use of figures, from which a disinterested person could only draw one conclusion, namely, that he intended by these figures to show that the shipping interests of the Dominion had largely increased, and that in quoting these figures, he had given the shipping, not of Canada alone, but embraced with it the tonnage of Great Britain and foreign shipping; and he then went on to show that the number of men employed had increased, while the figures given had reference to foreign as well as to Canadian shipping.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that the hon. gentleman has made himself quite clear, and the statement I made has been quite substantiated. Later on, when he was speaking with reference to the hon. member for Westmoreland, he stated with reference to myself—I had declared that the shipping interests had not declined; that was evidently the gist of his remark. Now, he took up the Debates to prove it. If he will turn to the Debates on the 23rd page, just at the beginning of the paragraph, he will find the subject-matter about which I was speaking, where I say:

"Now, the next criticism of the hon. member for Middlesex, was with reference to the commerce of the country."

That is the subject with which I was dealing. The first point I made, as an argument, to prove that the commerce of the country had not decreased was this:—that the volume of our trade had grown. The hon. gentleman can mark that. A few lines further down, he will see the next point I endeavored to make, which was that the internal commerce of the country had grown. I said it had grown, because of the decrease of imports in the Maritime Provinces, which argued, that they had got what they formerly obtained from the outside, from these Upper Provinces. I then went on to say:

"Here is a second pointer which gives another idea of that. Take the Manitoba trade."

I showed that as the imports into Manitoba had increased the trade from these Provinces to Manitoba, the internal trade had also increased. I had still another argument, and that was this: with regard to our carrying trade, I said:

"There is another point in our favor."

And I then asked the House to look at the carrying trade, and here are exactly the words which I used:

"Hon. gentlemen opposite had stated that the shipping interest is declining fast; but let us look at the carrying trade as another pointer."

Another pointer to what? Another pointer referring to the preceding ones—all leading to the fact that the commerce of this country had not decreased, and was not decreasing. Now, let us go on. The hon. gentleman is not young; I am. He is not at all verdant in politics; I am supposed to be. He has been, I believe, a Solicitor-General of his Province; and I think he has been a leader of the Government in his Province. It think that probably from childhood up, and certainly through his political career, he has never lived outside of the sound of the deep seas. If any man then should know anything about the shipping of the Maritime Provinces, it should be the hon. member for Queen's, (Mr. Davies). Now, do you see the ridiculous manner in which he tries to prove me in the wrong? My statement was with reference to the vessels coming in and going out, exclusive of the coasting trade: First, I attempted to prove that the commerce of this country had not decreased, but had increased. I stated that in 1878, there were of these vessels, 48,027, that the number of tons registered was 12,054,690; and that the number of men employed was 465,776. The hon. member for Queen's, not a young member, not verdant in politics, living by the seaside, makes the ridiculous attempt to show us that as we had, as I said, 12,000,000 tons register at one time, and employed 465,776 men, I must perforce have been saying this with reference to the tonnage of the Canadian Dominion. Now, does the hon. gentleman know that 465,776 men will give one man to every twenty-six tons, which will man every one of our 300-ton brigs with one hundred men and every one of our 150-ton schooners with fifty men; and yet he tries to make it appear that I was talking with reference to the Canadian shipping on such figures as those. Now, then, the hon. gentleman says I stated that our shipping interest was not declining. Will he look down the twenty-fourth page of Hansard, a little way—not into the gallery—and he will find this. After I had gone through with my arguments, I stated as the concluding sentence :

“ I think I have effectually disposed of the statement, that the commerce of the country has decreased.”

Then I go on to speak of the shipping interest, and say :

“ The hon. gentleman, unfortunately for himself, declared that our shipping interests had fallen off, and that he has showed the failure of the National Policy, which was to help our shipping interests.”

Did I state that our shipping interest had not declined? The hon. gentleman has his eye on the very page and the very line, and reads just now along with me this :

“ I find that from 1875 to 1879 under the policy, there was a decrease of 44 per cent. in the shipping built in Canada, while from 1879 to 1882, there was a decrease of but 34 per cent.”

If the hon. gentleman will look on the same page about fifteen lines further down he will see the direct statement :

“ Shipping has declined in Canada.”

Now, why should the hon. gentleman attempt to misrepresent my position in order to make a point for himself. It is an old saying that a man will never throw sand until he runs out of rocks, and the hon. gentleman must have run out of the rocks of argument when he attempts to blind the eyes of the House with the sand of subterfuge. I have already said two or three times that Prince Edward Island was quiet except with reference to the contested election. I take leave to revise that statement, and make it read something like this; that in Prince Edward Island it is all calm and quiet with the exception of the contested election in King's County, but that in a day or two when the synoptical report of the speech delivered to-night by the member for Queen's County goes down to the Island, and is read there, there will be the additional disquietude that they should have sent a gentleman from Queen's County to indulge in these lachrymose lamentations over the country, and thus destroy the fair fame and the good name of the beautiful Province down by the sea.

Mr. BRECKEN. I should not have made any remarks to-night, had it not been that my hon. colleague had thought proper to speak on this question. I may say further that I have not made the researches into the statistics of the country which he has given to the House to-night. But as he has alluded to Prince Edward Island, I feel that it is my duty to give my version of the position of that Province under the operation of the National Policy. I make this statement at the outset: that it is not that the National Policy works injuriously to Prince Edward Island, but I admit that Prince Edward Island is not exactly in the same position as the other Provinces, to reap the same advantages from that policy. We are an agricultural country, and we are surrounded by very valuable fisheries. We have not a surplus population, nor have we that great accumulation of capital that would qualify the people to go into manufactures to any extent. When I say that we have no great accumulation of capital, I am not prepared to join in the wail which fell from the lips of my hon. colleague, in describing the deplorable state of affairs which exists in the Island. I believe the people of the Island, from one end to the other, are as comfortable and as independent as any people in any part of the Dominion. There are, perhaps, no cases of the accumulation of very great wealth. We know that while agriculture is looked upon as the first source of wealth in a country, it is not an occupation by which men can accumulate fortunes with the rapidity that speculators, contractors, or merchants can accumulate them, though the farmers' prospects are more steady and certain. I repeat again, that the people of the Island are in independent circumstances, and are as comfortably off as the farmers in any part of the Dominion, considering the extent of their holdings. There is not one word which fell from the hon. gentleman's lips, that I have not heard him repeat time and again from the hustings on the Island. This House may not be informed of the fact that the hon. gentleman is the leading Liberal in the Province we come from, and that his utterances, among his own political party, have a good deal of weight. I have heard the same arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman on the hustings. I have heard him time and again point to the empty wharves of Prince Edward Island. It is true that our wharves are not as crowded with shipping as they were some years ago. It is true that you do not find the same number of square-rigged vessels in our harbors as we had in the years before Confederation; but I can give the explanation, and it is not in any way connected with the National Policy. I do not give it as my own information, because my vocation in life is similar to that of my hon. friend, but I have heard statements advanced time and again, by experienced merchants, in opposition to the statement of the hon. gentleman. They say, and all the Islanders know, that some years ago, when our Island was well wooded, ship-building was one of our large industries, and our chief export to the Mother Country; and the hon. gentleman will agree with me in saying that our ships were built for the English market, and were, as I have stated, the chief industry we had in the Island. That shipping had declined long before the hon. Finance Minister introduced the National Policy, and it declined for these reasons. In the first place, the Island became denuded of ship timber. I venture the assertion that it is impossible at this day to build on the Island a spar-rigged vessel of 400 tons from native wood. Ship-building has decreased with us because we have not the material. It has decreased with us as in other parts of the Dominion where the material still exists, because iron vessels have taken the place of wooden vessels; and as stated this Session on the floor of the House, there are few branches of trade indeed in which wooden vessels are preferred to those of iron. The improvements are such that in a few years wooden vessels will no longer be heard of. So much by way of the true explanation of the decline of ship owning in the Island. I will now give the true reason why we have not the same amount of shipping floating in our harbors. The reason is that the chief importations which we had for our vessels was rigging and ship materials—anchors and chains. In our little Island a steamer which we had, the Prince Edward Island, a vessel of 1,200 or 1,400 tons—which is now, I am sorry to say, disposed of—was almost capable of bringing sufficient goods from the English market to supply the Province; and it is idle to say that the general trade of the colony required the employment of all those ships. They came there, as I have said, for the purpose of bringing our rigging, canvas, anchors, chains and the usual outfit for ships. That decline would have taken place if the hon. Finance Minister had never introduced a protective policy into this country. The hon. gentleman also raised a great cry about the depreciation of land. I regret to say that there is some truth in that, but let the truth be known. That depreciation has occurred chiefly in our rising towns and villages, and one reason for it is this. Like the hon. gentleman I have had a good deal of experience dealing with lands and investing money, and I do not hesitate to say that for many years land in the cities and towns was at a fictitious value.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, during the building of the railway.

Mr. BRECKEN. Particularly so then, but even previous to that time. We met with a great calamity in our Island. In the eyes of hon. gentlemen who live in large cities, and talk of millions and have large banking institutions, it would not appear to be much of a calamity, but the failure of the Bank of Prince Edward Island was as great a catastrophe to that little community as the failure of that great commercial institution, the Bank of Montreal, would be to the centre of commerce, the Dominion of Canada. The consequence was a contraction and a drawing in which I can hardly describe. Land went down simply because there was no one to buy it; people were not in a position to purchase. That commercial depression, the failure of that bank, and as the hon. gentleman knows, a misfortune that overtook another bank which is now perhaps holding its own under careful management, and of which the hon. gentleman is one of the directors, were chiefly the causes, and they had nothing to do with the National Policy. They were not chiefly due to depression in trade; I know it, and I speak with regret, because I am a severe loser in one of these banks. I do not hesitate to say that the failure of these banks was due to the amount of reckless credit given to mushroom traders and merchants. This course had the effect of limiting accommodation to old and well-established mercantile houses which were doing legitimate trade; but the capital that ought to have been used in developing the legitimate trade of the country was given to speculators and schemers, so that in a short time the money was dissipated, and the men who carried on business on a solid basis were deprived of it, and thus prevented from diminishing the depression and distress which fell upon us. These are the facts of that matter. Now, as I said before, we were not in a position to avail ourselves of the National Policy as the inhabitants of the great and wealthy Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This is simply owing to our position. My hon. friend says that we pay duties to the amount of $600,000. He says that a great many dutiable goods that we consume are entered at Montreal, at Halifax, and perhaps some at Quebec, and that the duties are paid there, and we do not get any credit for them. I suppose to a certain extent that may be true. I have heard my hon. friend make the same statement on the hustings throughout the length and breadth of the Province, and I have met him in this way. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of saying intentionally what is not correct, but I say that that is not a fair way of putting the matter, for this reason: that a large quantity of the goods we consume are manufactured in the Dominion of Canada, and pay no duty at all. In 1880 the imports of Prince Edward Island amounted to $799,281. In 1881 to $993,593; in 1882 to $785,610. The exports from the Island in 1880 were $1,736,533; in 1881; $1,774,810; in 1882 they increased to $1,887,146 in the figures. I cannot see any evidence of commercial decay, but rather of increased trade.

Mr. DAVIES. That is directly entered for Customs duty.

Mr. BRECKEN. Yes; I am coming to that. This is the amount of goods entered in the Customs Department in the Province, and there is also, no doubt, a certain quantity brought from Montreal and Halifax and other places where this duty is paid—none of us know to what extent, because there is no way to ascertain it—but I think the hon. gentleman exaggerates it, because I think some of these goods come to the Island in bond, and we pay the duty upon them. If all the manufactured goods we consume paid duties, and we did not import anything from the other parts of Canada, my hon. friend would be correct; but a large proportion of our goods come from Canada. I had the honor of being a member of a delegation that went to Detroit at the time of the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1865, and I remember that at that time our trade with Canada amounted to about two thousand pounds a year, and I believe that trade would not have existed but that a gentleman, from a brewery in Quebec, visited our Island a few years before, and arranged to send us some beer. Now, our trade with Canada amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and a great deal of this is duty free. Now, I throw down the challenge to my hon. friend: will he point his finger to one single manufactured article consumed by the people of Prince Edward Island, that costs one cent more to-day than it did before the introduction of the National Policy. I throw down this challenge to him in all seriousness. I know that his experience and mine would, perhaps, be limited to purchases for ourselves and our families. I am not speaking of my own limited experience, but I am speaking upon the authority of merchants who buy in foreign markets. If there has been a change, it has been in the right direction—in the direction of cheapness in necessary articles of common wear. Now, Sir, I remember once standing up in this House and advocating something on behalf of little Prince Edward Island; and I believe the members from Prince Edward Island have the reputation of not being able to define the significance of the word "enough," but they take it to always mean a little more. I remember an able and talented member of this House, the hon. Mr. Huntington, rebuking me in strong but courteous language, and saying that I should drop a sectional policy, and should remember that when a man comes to this House he is not only a representative of the constituency which sends him here and of the Province in which that constituency is situated, but that he holds the higher office of a representative of the Dominion at large. That was the doctrine announced to me by that honorable and experienced statesman. I knew it before I heard it from him, and I must tell my hon. friend that when he comes here as the representative of a large and intelligent and independent constituency, he stands here also as a representative of the interests of the Dominion as a whole; and I ask him, as a Canadian, if he is prepared to denounce a policy that has conferred such advantages on millions of people, and which the people at the last Dominion Election have proclaimed has been conferred? And would he find fault with it because, unfortunately, the Province we come from, containing 110,000 people, does not reap the same advantages? I thought, Mr. Speaker, that the greatest good to the greatest number was the policy that ought to actuate the minds of men who hold the reins of power and mould the destinies of the country. Now, Sir, as I said, the best test is the price of manufactured articles in the country; and there is no doubt that prices are lower to-day than they were before Confederation. It is true if a man is not satisfied to wear the textures made in this country, if a man is too proud, too fastidious, too much of a Beau Brummell to wear the tweeds made in Canada, and must have West of England broadcloth, he must pay a duty of 30 per cent. upon it, if he is not a smuggler; but a man holding that view and indulging in such tastes has no claims upon the consideration of my hon. friend the Finance Minister. My hon. friend from Queen's is not so candid as the hon. member for South Brant, who played the rôle of critic of the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, because that hon. gentleman did occasionally, whether unintentionally in his warmth or not I cannot say, admit that Canada was in a prosperous condition—and I do notice that some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, forgetting their duty to their party, and only thinking of the truth, have occasionally let drop remarks showing that the National Policy is a blessing to the country. I have heard my hon. friend from East York, whose utterances I always listen to with especial attention. He has the courage of a politician, he has been an old leader, he has great moral courage. I listened to his speech to-night as I would listen to the speech of an able and eloquent statesman, from whose language I knew I would learn something. I heard him lay down some axioms, some abstract propositions, that no man dare deny. I heard him lay down the proposition that it was a cruel thing, as between man and man, to so shape the Tariff for the purpose, not of raising the revenue, but of putting money in the hands of monopolists, in the hands of speculators, and compel the poor man who is obliged to buy the common necessities of life, to go into the dearest instead of the cheapest market. That proposition nobody can gainsay. I have heard him say that it was a cruel thing for a few men so to shape the fiscal policy of the country, as to drain the pockets of the poor man by excessive taxation, for the purpose of enabling monopolists to wallow in wealth and in luxury. No man can deny the truth of that proposition; but while you are listening to the reasoning, ingenious and able, of the hon. member, it is your duty to make use of the judgment God has given you, and to reflect how far those abstract principles truly apply to this country. I know it is difficult to answer the arguments of Free Trade, but the only way to answer them is to look at the practical working of Free Trade. It is not a cast-iron rule; I know it is the emanation of very able men, and great political economists, but it is not like Holloway's pills and ointments a panacea for all troubles, guaranteed to cure everything from a headache to a broken leg. I believe some of the most able and talented advocates of Free Trade have admitted that a country may be in a position when the application of the abstract principles of Free Trade would not be profitable; and I believe that is when a country is in its youth, struggling to establish manufactures so as to give employment to its people and build up the country. I would not set myself against the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), but I know that the only country in the commercial world that advocates Free Trade—and that in a qualified sense—is Great Britain. I know that they have had great statesmen, and great men who thought over and conceived that idea and inaugurated it; I know that, in the days of Sir Robert Peel, Cobden, Villiers, John Bright, and Gladstone, England was in a very different position from ours. Before the repeal of the Corn Laws and the introduction of Free Trade, England had a monopoly of manufacturing skill and capital; she had a surplus population, and, in her midst, the material of coal and iron, which gives a country a vast advantage. Great Britain, before the repeal of the Corn Laws, was manufacturing everything; she had a great accumulation of wealth; she had a vast correspondence, and was head and shoulders over every other country. But there was one thing England could not do that Canada can—she could not feed her own people—and when a duty was placed on breadstuffs that came from Russia and America, a cry was raised for its repeal. I recollect, as a boy, the cartoons published when Sir Robert Peel and Lord Derby were fighting this question, in which the protectionists were represented holding a little scrap loaf, and the Free Traders with a large and bountiful loaf. After the duty was taken off, food became cheap, the poor man could be fed cheaper, wages became lower, and men like John Bright, who had large manufactories, and employed great numbers, were protected and benefited by the repeal. In Canada we are in a better position in this respect: that we feed ourselves, and can afford to export a portion to other countries. But we had to compete in trade with an older country—a country, as the hon. member for East York stated, far ahead of ours in variety of climate, soil and trade; a country which has a population of 50,000,000 against our 4,000,000; whose vast territory is covered with a network of railways, which has all the advantages of an older and more advanced country, while we are struggling in our infancy. I have yet to know it is a crime against Free Trade and sound political policy, to take this young country by the hand and help her to gain a position so that by-and-by the statesmen of the future—when my right hon. friend and his valiant opponent will have gone to their long home—will find this country so advanced in manufacturing skill and ability and in such a state of prosperity that the barriers may be thrown down and the Dominion enter the field of unrestrained competition with every part of the world. I believe that is to be the outcome of the sound policy of the hon. Finance Minister, but where is the necessity for me to raise my feeble voice to establish that proposition? Let my hon. friend learn to listen for a moment. When I had the privilege of being in this House in 1879, when the hon. Finance Minister introduced a policy that will be to him an everlasting memorial—which, when he goes down to his grave, will stand bright, brilliant, untarnished, undimmed and unspotted by the aspersions of political malevolence and misrepresentation—what was the state of things then, when the hon. Finance Minister introduced his policy? What was he told by the hon. members who predicted ruin then? They told his right hon. leader that his party had stolen a march on the people, that in the early and celebrated Election of 1878 they gave the assurance that taxation was not to be raised, and that no sooner had they gained the peoples' confidence than they betrayed it, and placed grinding taxation on the shoulders of the people. I was resolved, when we saw the late hon. Finance Minister of the Liberal Government, Sir R. Cartwright, standing up in this House with his hands dangling powerless by his side—after having obtained permission and again from Parliament to impose this tax to meet the requirements of the country—it was time to adopt the policy of my hon. friend instead of that of the hon. Finance Minister, who announced that all his experiments had failed and that he and his colleagues were powerless to remove the depression as the fly can make the wheel revolve. The 30,000 or 40,000 of the electors in that independent Province of Ontario, who believed in and followed the hon. member for East York in general politics, were so disappointed and distressed at the miserable failure of his trade policy, that they turned their backs on him, left his ranks and contributed largely by their votes to place the right hon. the present leader of the Government and his Finance Minister in power at the Election of 1878, and accepted the policy of the present Government.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. BRECKEN. Yes, for they say it is true.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. BRECKEN. They say it is true that 30,000 or 40,000 did so. Well, this policy of deception, as it is called by the hon. gentleman opposite, was carried on for four years by the hon. Finance Minister. Taxes, they say, were piled on. Promises that were made on the hustings previous to the Elections of 1878, were broken. My right hon. friend, conscious that they were acting in the best interests of the country, appealed to the people one year before the Constitution compelled him to do so, and the people returned his Government with an overwhelming majority. Now, I agree with my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Campbell), that the Opposition should be satisfied. I thought that it was fundamental doctrine of a Liberal in politics, that his party was a reflex of the voice of the people, that their motto was, Vox populi, vox Dei. On the question of this policy, the hon. gentlemen opposite have had an overwhelming verdict against them from the very people that they say now are going to be ruined on the very policy that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gilmor), says is horrible to contemplate when transacted between two honest men. Yet this verdict was obtained from the people, in the first instance, at the very time that the hon. gentlemen opposite were industriously attacking the right hon. leader of the Government, when they were attacking him with all his sins and imperfections on his head; but notwithstanding the cry that was raised against him, notwithstanding all his alleged faults and misdoings, the people were satisfied of the ruinous effect of the fiscal policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. In the exercise of a sound and wise discretion they sent back the most able statesman in the Dominion, and with him one of the most able Finance Ministers this country has ever had. Some hon. gentlemen seem to be under the impression that they cannot make a speech on the Budget unless they indulge in a shower-bath of figures. My hon. friend from Queen's, (P.E.I.), has gone into a lot of statistics. He has shown that the exports of England are about £180,000,000, and the exports of the United States $18,000,000. But we must remember, in the first place, that Great Britain has had a start. She has immense facilities for manufacturing, she is like an old commercial house over a young one. Moreover, America has got a home market. Besides her population of 50,000,000 she receives nearly 500,000 a year by immigration alone. Now, did it never occur to my hon. friend that his position borders somewhat on the ridiculous when he gets up here and raises the cry of misery and despair, not only for Prince Edward Island, but also for the United States? How long have they had this Protective Policy? What an enormous debt they have paid off, and out of this ruinous policy! Does not that hon. gentleman know that the commercial men of the United States are just as shrewd and have just as great a desire to make money as either the hon. member or myself. Surely he will admit that they are men of great experience, and after so many years of trial they ought to know what will best promote the interests of their country. Now, if there is one feature in the American character that stands out more prominently than another it is the love and pride that he takes in the advancement of his country—in very unfavorable contrast, I must say, to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I know the abilities of my hon. friend from Queen's, but I hope he will excuse me if I say that I accept with a very large reservation his comments and conclusions on the policy of American statesmen when I see that policy persisted in by men who, I believe, know what are the true interests of their country. My hon. friend has not only the privilege of being in a minority in this House, but in a minority in the Maritime Provinces. Nova Scotia held her own at the last Election—that is the test. What was the case in New Brunswick? My hon. friend was desirous of distinguishing himself by setting right that talented member for King's (N.B.) and he did it in a manner that it drew upon him such a castigation from the member for King's that it almost aroused my pity for my colleague. Now, what is the state of the returns from the Province of New Brunswick? That is a better list than the hon. member's figures. New Brunswick returned sixteen members, and in the Election of September, 1878, she returned eleven Liberals to five Conservatives; while in the last Election she returned only nine Liberals to seven Conservatives. Let it be borne in mind that this last result was obtained after this policy had had four years of trial, and four years of severe criticism from the hon. members opposite. So bent were they upon breaking down the policy, that they did not hesitate to libel the country, and my hon. friend from Victoria was not very far astray, when he said that there ought to be a Criminal Act passed to prevent the country from being libelled by the utterances of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which are of a character to deter the inhabitants of the over-crowded cities of Europe from coming into this country and helping to build it up. My hon. colleague talked with a sneer about the readiness with which we speak of millions here. I had the same impression when I first came into this House. But what does that prove? It proves how vastly the resources of this country are increasing. Down in the Maritime Provinces, we speak of thousands with as much caution as hon. members here speak of millions, but it simply proves that this great country is developing so fast, that in speaking of values we have to speak of large sums of money. I was struck by an expression that fell from the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Sutherland), when he said that the North-West was a wet nurse for the old Provinces of Canada. I said a few minutes ago that it was almost impossible for any hon. member, though endeavoring to decry Canada, if he stuck to facts, involuntarily to avoid paying a compliment to his country. I thought what a compliment it was to the policy of the present Government, that the North-West should be looked upon as the nurse of the Dominion. I have only been in the House a few years, and yet I recollect that at the first Session of Parliament, when the best mode of developing the great North-West was being discussed, I heard the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) state that the lands of that country were worthless, or at all events of so little value, that they would hardly pay the expense of surveying them and mapping them out.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You never heard me say that.

Mr. BRECKEN. Something very nearly approaching it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. BRECKEN. And when the policy was discussed as to our laying aside millions of acres of land to pay the cost of a portion of that railway, we were told it was perfectly useless.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. BRECKEN. The hon. gentleman need not be so much ashamed of his actions at that time, because it is pretty well known that scant information was possessed by hon. members as to the capabilities of that great country. I give the hon. gentleman credit for having used, when leading the Government, his best exertions, and with great ability, to devise some scheme for the development of that country. The only thing I find fault is that when a grand scheme was propounded, his patriotism did not override his partisanship. When it was stated, the other night, that the North-West was the nursing mother of the Dominion, what a great compliment it was to the leader of the Government, who propounded the North-West policy to the hon. Minister of Railways, who brought in a magnificent policy, under which the Pacific Railway is being so rapidly carried out as to astonish and amaze hon. members on both sides of the House; and to the fiscal policy of the hon. Finance Minister, who braved opposition and the "blue ruin" prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite, that this North-West country was not of sufficient value to defray the cost of the railway. It was not deemed possible then, than an hon. member for Winnipeg, speaking, no doubt, the truth from his daily observation of the progress of the country, would be able to state that the older Provinces are receiving their nourishment and sustenance from the overflowing breast of the North-West. If the water-stretches and the patchwork policy of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie)—I do not wish to be disrespectful, but I desire to state what I mean—had been followed, would it have been in the power of the hon. gentleman for Winnipeg to have said, with a grin on his face, the North-West has come to be the nursing mother of the older Provinces. If it is the nursing mother it has made wonderful progress. I believe there is a great future in store for the North-West, but Manitobians and the inhabitants of the Territories should never forget the men who have made the country what it is, who have enabled us to see a child five years of age now so prosperous and independent that she can afford to maintain the support of a father and of a mother.

Mr. BENSON. In regard to the question of the prosperity of England, allow me to read an extract from a letter received by the last mail. It is dated March 23rd. The writer is a gentleman and a large landholder in England and a partner in a large manufacturing concern in Yorkshire. He says:

"Nothing can be more depressing than the prospects of trade and investment in the Old Country. Competition and so-called Free Trade have brought prices down until no one can live, and to sell either mills, machinery, houses, coal mines, iron works, or in fact almost anything, is simply disastrous. Depend upon it we are in a poor way, and much mental depression is caused by the gloomy outlook."

Having given this writer's extract in proof of the present position of England, I take the opportunity of complimenting the hon. Finance Minister on his Budget Speech. As one of the oldest manufacturers in this Dominion, it did me good to hear him boldly declare that he made such and such alterations in the Tariff for the sake of encouraging manufacturers, for often and often have I been discouraged and disgusted by statements of many of his predecessors that they impose duties for the sake of revenue and not to encourage manufactures. It was pretty hard when a manufacturer had spent a fortune in building his works, and another fortune in getting a connection, to be told that he must be snuffed out because the article that he manufactured had ceased to yield a revenue. I also am glad to see an increase in the number of specific duties. As a manufacturer I like a specific duty, but I believe the average Custom House officer is about the greatest enemy a manufacturer has, and a specific duty prevents him favoring the importer, though I have known officers so clever that they would get over the difficulty by calling the article something else, or entering it under another name. Nevertheless, were I beginning a new industry, I would prefer a specific duty of 20 per cent. to an ad valorem duty of double the amount. I must say that I differ altogether from the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) in his idea about Free Trade. I believe the National Policy was the very thing this country required. No country ever became a manufacturing country without protection being afforded to its rising industries, and I maintain that England herself was made great by a protection amounting to almost prohibition, enforced by penal laws, such as cutting off the left, in case these restrictions were evaded. It would have been well for her after admitting breadstuffs free, which were a raw material, if she had exercised some common sense instead of drifting into a fetish-like worship of impracticable theories. Had she protected herself and her colonies against all other countries that refused to admit her manufactures free, I believe that long ago she would have had a reciprocity almost tantamount to Free Trade; and if she had failed in this she would, at all events, have developed her colonies and have afforded homes for her surplus population who would have been loyal subjects and friends instead of possible enemies. The manufacturers of England have often laughed at me because I was satisfied that sooner or later they would get tired of this one-sided Free Trade, but even now a reaction has set in, for, under the new name of Fair Trade they are harking back and are asking a return to good, wholesome protection which they discarded and cast away. I do not desire to speak further of the Old Country, but I want to allude to a point not touched upon by the eloquent speakers who have preceded me, and it has some reference to the assertion made by members of the Opposition: that manufacturers do no good to the country. The point I wish to allude to is this. Manufactures, when once established in a country, become to a very large extent self-supporting. As in a community, the baker buys from the butcher, and the butcher from the baker, and from the shoemaker, the tailor and store-keeper, and they all buy from each other, and from the farmers who always benefit. The farmer in his turn supports the blacksmith, and the carriage maker, and the harness maker; so manufacturers support each other when once established, and hundreds of manufacturers in the old country, can find a market for the whole of their products for the use of other manufacturers, and never sell to a merchant at all; and if we have a continuation of steady and efficient protection, it will be the same with us. When the sugar refineries were shut up by our friends on this side of the House, it not only did harm to Montreal, but the farmers at once felt the loss of the business. They did not sell their bolts, their head-bolts and stave-bolts, and their hoops. Now, since these refineries are going on again, there is a demand for all these things, and for spruce staves the demand is greater than the supply. For hundreds of miles around, the farmers are all prosperous, even for six hundred miles around, for on the Canada Southern Railway, which is, I believe, some six hundred miles from Montreal, thousands and thousands of staves are sent down to the sugar refineries of Montreal. One point more and I am done; these hon. gentlemen seem to think that we have not improved through the National Policy. Manufacturing in Canada used to be something like living over a volcano—you never knew when you would be blown up, but you felt quite satisfied that your end would come some time. Twenty years ago, when, wearied out with the struggle, I tried to get up a joint stock company, I called upon the most influential men in Quebec, the richest in Montreal, and the most enterprising in Toronto, Hamilton and London, but I could not get one person amongst the whole of these cities and towns to subscribe and take a $50 share. They instanced case after case in which manufactures had commenced and failed; and said that they would not waste their money in an enterprise that the stroke of a pen of some heaven-born financier could wipe out—though I believe that they did not say "heaven-born," which was a phrase invented afterwards. I think they thought that the inspiration came from another source; but, whether from above or below, it was always in those times detrimental to the interests of the manufacturers. Now, we see manufactories springing up one very side; but, I believe, they would spring up with double rapidity if hon. members of the Opposition had not done all they possibly could to make the National Policy a failure. In every possible way they have used their influence against the National Policy, and, I am sorry to say, with too great success; for though we have prospered very greatly, I know, for a fact, that their croaking speeches, as reported in the press and sent across the Atlantic, have done us a great deal more damage than we can ever estimate.

Mr. HESSON. I rise for the purpose of correcting the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), wherein he sought to impress on the minds of those who heard him that I had in some way stated figures to this House that were not correctly represented—though I might have possibly unintentionally done so. I represented the facts and figures exactly as they are given in the Trade and Navigation Returns and the Public Reports; and these are the only evidences which we can take as to the rate at which taxation is distributed, as the tables are prepared from year to year on that basis. I will again just state here briefly, what I hold to be a most remarkable fact, with reference to Prince Edward Island, that of all the Provinces which compose this Dominion, Prince Edward Island alone stands in the position of having entered Confederation with a larger per capita tax upon the Customs imports than it is to-day. In 1874 it was $2.33 per head; in 1875, $3.57; in 1876, $3.12; in 1877, $2.83, and in 1878, $2.46; divide this by five years and we have the average, $2.84½ per annum of taxation for Customs. We will take the figures under the National Policy and see what the result has been; and it will remain for that hon. gentleman and his friends to say why trade that was diverted from its original channels, is now done in the Upper Provinces, or Montreal, and that the duties were paid in Montreal instead of at Summerside and Charlottetown. In 1879, the rate was $2.19 per head; in 1880, $2.11; in 1881, $2.38; and, in 1882, it had declined to $1.82, being an average for these four years of $2.12½, as against $2.84½, under the preceding five years of what we might call a Free Trade Policy, showing a saving of 72 cts. under the National Policy. If the hon. gentleman could say that this applied to all the Provinces, and that the same result would be found elsewhere, I would suppose that they had made out a case against the way in which the taxation was distributed; but I find in reference to the other Provinces similarly situated, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—at all events, so far east that importations from Montreal would be as unlikely to their ports, as to the Province of Prince Edward Island—the rate has increased, as also is the case in all the other Provinces. So much for that. I state again that I did not misrepresent the figures, but gave them exactly as they appear in the Public Accounts. I am further convinced that there is much more in this than my hon friend is willing to admit. He would make it appear that this statement and these tables are not of a character that they could be accepted. I took the trouble, while the hon. gentleman was giving us his very brilliant speech, at least from his standpoint of ruin and decay to that beautiful little Province down by the sea, where everything was going to ruin—I took the trouble to go through the Trade and Navigation Reports for a few years back, as I wondered why it was so. I do not, however, wish to trouble the House with the figures for each year. If hon. gentlemen will excuse me, there are some of them of so much importance, and they explain, to my mind, clearly the reason why this taxation has been reduced, as shown by this table, that I would like to trouble the House with them:

Year.	Exports.	Imports.	Duty.
1875.....	1,908,461	1,983,419	317,163
1876.....	1,655,519	1,382,679	293,547
1877.....	1,384,673	1,380,878	266,483
1878.....	1,700,752	1,293,225	231,386
Totals.....	6,835,015	7,948,723	1,328,037

Subtracting the total exports from the total imports for those five years, we find the balance of trade, $1,113,718, during the five years of the ruin Administration, as I might fairly call it, of hon. gentlemen on the other side, while the average annual duty for the same period was $265,607. Now, in order to see whether that Island has suffered by Confederation, or whether it has suffered by the National Policy, it is only fair that we should give the figures since the National Policy was inaugurated. In 1879, the exports had risen to $1,831,369, and the imports had fallen to $910,987, and the duty paid was $206,245. The following table will show the exports, the imports, and the duty for the three succeeding years:—

Year.	Exports.	Imports.	Duty.
1880.....	$1,736,533	$799,287	$198,542
1881.....	1,774,246	993,593	256,513
1882.....	1,887,146	785,610	196,586

Now we have this result, that for the four years from 1879 to 1882, the total exports were $7,229,314; the imports for the same period were $3,489,477, leaving the balance of trade in favor of the Island, $3,739,837. Now, if you take those figures into consideration in connection with the fact which we heard stated the other day in this House, by an hon. gentleman who is in a position to make that statement, and it can be verified by referring to the Canada Gazette, that the deposits had largely increased—increased, I believe, in a larger proportion than some of the western Provinces—we will find as a result a large increase of the wealth of the people of Prince Edward Island. Now, Sir, in order to see whether they were fairly dealt with by this Government in connection with the National Policy, let us take the average duty which they paid for those four years, and compare it with the average under the previous Administration. We find that the total duty paid was $860,886, or an average of $215,331; so that while we have a lower amount of duty paid in the latter of these two periods, we have at the same time a balance of trade in their favor amounting to $3,739,837. Under these circumstances I cannot conceive why the representatives of that Province should have any reason to cry out ruin, when the fact stands so clearly forward in their favor; for while the balance of trade is against the whole Dominion, it is in favor of that Province by fully 100 per cent. If there is anything in having the balance of trade in favor of a Province they have that advantage, and hon. gentlemen opposite from the Island do not pretend to say that the people are worse clothed or fed than they were before. My own impression is that the great cause of the reduction of direct importations to the Island from foreign countries is the increased intercourse which the Province has with the western Provinces. I believe we are selling them more flour and meal, and other produce of these Provinces, which they formerly purchased from the United States; and I think it was for that very purpose that the Provinces entered into Confederation, namely, that we should have inter-provincial trade. I believe, moreover, that we should have a Committee of this House established for the purpose, if possible, of working up a more extensive trade of that description. I am sorry to hear hon. gentlemen rise up in this House and say that the policy of this Government is against the interest of any Province, and when they do make such statements I would like to hear them substantiate them in an honest way. But when they come forward and make broad assertions without producing the figures to support them, or to show whether they are correct or not, I think they should not assume that we on this side, or the people of the country who can read the figures for themselves, will accept those statements as facts. I fancy, Sir, that the debate has gone so far that it will not be necessary for me to say one word with reference to the National Policy. The country has accepted that policy; it has been reendorsed by the people, and as the hon. Minister of Finance has stated it will never be reversed by this country so long as our people have common sense about them. I am confident that it will go on, and that the people finding that they have surpluses instead of deficits, finding that they have prosperity and happiness throughout the Provinces generally, will support that policy. And believing that, I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to predict the ruin and the decay which they say will come some time, but which I trust, if it is to come at all, will not come before fifty-five years hence—as calculated by an hon. friend on this side of the house—a time when we shall have passed away at all events, so that if our children, or our children's children, have to take the risk of another period of mis-government by hon. gentlemen opposite, we at all events will know nothing about it.

Mr. HACKETT. I will not detain the House with any lengthened remarks, but I would be delinquent in my duty to my constituents, and unjust to myself, were I not to make some reply to the very extravagant and unwarranted assertions which were made by the hon. member for Queen's, with regard to the operation of the National Policy in Prince Edward Island. Having had the privilege of sitting in this House for the last four years, I have a very good idea of what hon. gentlemen opposite think of the National Policy. From year to year, from the day that policy was introduced into this Parliament up to the present time, we have heard these hon. gentlemen denouncing this policy in most unmeasured terms. One year they call it a policy of spoliation, and the next year they call it legalized robbery. They say: You are driving the people out of the country for the purpose of building up a few manufactures. When the hon. Finance Minister introduced his policy, they said: Your policy will not produce a revenue; the Tariff you propose is a prohibitory Tariff; the revenues will fall off; and consequently you will have to come down year after year and declare a deficit. Well, Sir, after the policy had been in operation one year, they came back and said: You promised us prosperity, and look at the country; bank stocks have decreased and you have a deficit. Year after year they come down here with the same tone; but this year, I am glad to see, they have come to their senses, and admit that prosperity prevails in Canada; but while they admit the prosperity, they are unwilling to admit that it is due to the National Policy. They say: The country has prosperity; we are glad to see it. You have a surplus, that is a good thing for the country; but these are not due to the National Policy; they are due to the fact that the bright sunshine and the genial showers have given us good crops and good prices for our produce. They also point to the singular coincidence that while we have had sunshine and showers in Canada, they have had floods and poor crops in England. Well, Sir, I wonder if we had one continuous Wiggins' storm in Canada during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite? Had we nothing but rain, and hail, and storm, and whirlwind during all that time? I do not believe it; on the contrary, I am prepared to prove that, during the time of the late Administration, there were very large exports from Canada. If hon. gentlemen will look at the Speech from the Throne in 1876, they will see that His Excellency was made to congratulate the country upon a good crop and a bountiful harvest in Canada. The hon. member for East Elgin who moved the Address, also congratulated the country on a bountiful harvest. I am not going to confine my remarks to any particular year, but I will compare the exports of Canada during three years hon. gentlemen opposite were in office with those during three years of the present Administration. In 1874 our exports amounted to $89,351,928; in 1875, to $77,887,979, and in 1876 to $80,956,435; or a total for the three years of $248,205,342. Now, here is a very creditable export, but what was the state of Canada during that period? Why, Sir, every industry in the country was paralyzed, and, notwithstanding the fact that our exports were so large, and that we must have an increased import as a consequence, yet the Finance Minister had to come down, year after year, and admit that there was a deficit. But let us see what the exports were during the first three years this Administration was in power. In 1879 they were $71,491,225; in 1880 they were $87,911,450, and in 1881 they were $98,290,823; a total of $257,693,528, or only about $9,000,000 more than the three years of the Mackenzie Administration. It cannot be possible that this amount exported in excess of what was exported during the time of hon. gentlemen opposite could have produced the prosperity. It was due to other causes—to the change in the fiscal policy of the country, that encouraged the people of Canada and set in motion the wheels of industry in all parts of the country. That is one reason why we have increased prosperity. Another reason is, that the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia has increased largely during the past four years. I was glad to hear my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron), state the other evening that in the Island of Cape Breton alone the output of coal has increased 300,000 tons. It cannot be possible that the rain or the sunshine has penetrated to the bottom of the coal mines to produce this great increase, but I attribute it to the fiscal policy of the country that set the wheels of industry in motion, creating an increased demand for Nova Scotia coal. But I consider that the hon. member for North Norfolk, in the course of his remarks, gave up the case altogether. While hon. gentlemen opposite have been unwilling to admit that any industry was created by the National Policy or that the prosperity was in any way due to it, the hon. member for North Norfolk, in the course of his remarks, said:

"If my hon. friend for West Durham were at the head of the Government he would find, I have no doubt, that in dealing with this question he would have to have a due regard for the interests which have grown up under this Tariff."

Here is an admission that interests have grown up under the Tariff, and in making it the hon. gentleman gave up his whole case. Why would he not leave them to the sunshine and the showers? We know what the result would be. We know that these industries would at once go down, and that the people would at once become discouraged, and would fear a return to the hard times that prevailed from 1874 to 1878 while hon. gentlemen opposite were on the Treasury benches. It is not necessary for me to deal any longer with this branch of the question. I now come to the question of expenditure. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that there has been an increase of some millions of dollars in the controllable expenditure. The hon. member for Brant, whose speech was referred to in such high terms this evening by the hon. member for Queen's, made a close analysis of the expenditure, and what did he find? The only item he could pick out of this extravagant expenditure was the sum of $881 for cab hire. If the Government were reckless in their expenditure on any other items, why did the hon. gentleman not point them out? He did not do so, but, as the hon. member for King's said the other evening, he descended to the region of cab hire. I do not think he descended to that region, for he never rose from that region; he was found there and remained there. It is quite impossible that the Government of Canada, having to deal with the great and increasing interests of the country, could go on from year to year with a fixed expenditure. There are many public works to be built in Canada; there is a great country to be opened up; the increasing necessities of the country, in the post offices and in other services, require increased accommodation and consequently increased expenditure. I am happy that the public buildings are being erected. I may say here that, coming from Prince Edward Island, I find in the Estimates this year $250,000 for the purpose of carrying out the terms of Confederation. I am prepared to support the Government and their expenditure. We have been long looking for it, and if we are to receive $250,000 for the purpose of carrying out the terms of Confederation, and if we are to receive money for the construction of public works, we must believe the same expenditure should go on in the other Provinces, and we should be prepared to support an expenditure of this kind. While our friends opposite are unable to point to one item in the expenditure which they can say is extravagant, while they have simply with these $881 cab hire to talk about, they have not proved their case. The hon. member for West Middlesex stated a great increase had taken place in the salaries of postmasters. When the trade of the county is prosperous the revenue at the post offices is increasing. Every hon. gentleman who represents a country constituency knows that fact, and is aware that the postmasters only receive $10 per annum. This is a mere pittance to give to any person for placing his house at the service of the public; but when the revenue increases the postmaster should be paid 40 per cent. when it goes above $10. This is increased every year, and if the revenue has increased the postmaster must have an increased salary. I intend to deal with the speech of the hon. member for Queen's, who, this evening, endeavored to decry as much as possible, the Province from which he has the honor to come. It is true, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth, that Prince Edward Island has not received as great advantages from the National Policy as the other Provinces. Hon. gentlemen will readily understand this. We are a country that is cut off by ice in the winter season from connection with the main land, and consequently manufactures have not grown up. I deny that the National Policy has not had a beneficial effect on our Province. On the contrary, I believe that were it not for the National Policy the Province would be in a worse condition than that in which it is to-day. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Customs duties per head are very much greater than in the other Provinces, and to show how this may occur he made a comparison of the last years' revenue before Confederation with that of last year. Nothing could be more unfair. Previous to Confederation all the goods entered paid duty, those coming from the other Provinces as well as those coming from foreign countries, and the result was that a very large revenue was raised. But now these goods are manufactured in other parts of the country, by the Canadian people, and we buy them without paying a cent of duty. Before making an assertion of that kind the hon. gentleman should show that the people pay more for their goods now than in 1878; but, on the contrary, in many lines they are sold cheaper. The hon. gentleman went on to say that there was no ship-building on the Island, but this can be accounted for in the same way. Of course the ship-building industry has been declining in that Province, as was stated by the hon. member for Queen's, and it was due to the fact that the material was not to be had there. It must be remembered that the iron ship is to be the ship of the future; that the ships engaged in the shipping trade are now made of iron, and that is one reason of the decline. In reference to the trade of the Island, and his endeavor to make it appear that there was no trade, I will give the number of vessels employed in the different years. In 1878, the number was 6,024; in 1882, 6,174, an increase of 150 under the National Policy. When the hon. gentleman said foreign trade was ruined, and that no vessels came with cargoes from England, he would find, if he looked through the Trade Returns, that in 1877, thirty vessels carried 4,462 tons of freight from the United Kingdom to Prince Edward Island; that in 1878, the number of vessels was forty-five, and the tons of freight 10,600; in 1880, thirty-seven vessels arrived with 7,440 tons of freight; in 1881, thirty-five vessels with 8,012 tons, making a total of 15,452 tons, or an increase of 613. That goes to show that the shipping has not been contracted by the National Policy as the hon. gentleman represents. But he told us there has been a great depreciation in the value of real estate in Prince Edward Island. This is not true to the extent represented. In the towns and villages where there is a depreciation to a limited extent, there was an inflation at the time of the building of the railway, and high expectations were aroused which were not carried out completely, and, consequently, there has been a reaction in value in the towns and villages; and in the farming districts there has been a slight depreciation, due altogether to other reasons than the National Policy. I might state to the hon. gentleman, and he will not deny it, that one reason why there should be a depreciation in the value of real estate in the farming districts is that the hon. gentleman, when he was leader of the Local Government, got direct taxes imposed on real estate. This depreciation resulting from that legislation had commenced before the National Policy was introduced, and if he will take time to enquire he would date it to the passing of his Assessment Act in 1872. At a time when the hon. gentleman had sufficient funds he imposed a direct tax on the farming interests, and so dissatisfied were the farmers that they refused to give him their support. I hope soon to see that the real estate of the country will have risen to its former value. The hon. gentleman has gone on to state that hard times prevail in Prince Edward Island, that the young men are leaving the country in thousands. Now, that is not the fact. Some young men do go away. It is quite impossible to keep all the young men in any Province. They are possessed of a spirit of adventure, and seek to better their position. But I am happy to state that if the young men of Prince Edward Island go away it is not to the United States that they turn their faces, as they did under the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite, but to our own North-West. They do not go to Free Trade England; and if any of them go to the United States it is to a country where there is much greater protection than in Canada. Now, I want to show from the organs supporting hon. gentlemen opposite that hard times do not prevail in Prince Edward Island to the extent that has been represented. The hon. member for Queen's read an extract from the Herald, a newspaper that supports the Government.

Mr. HACKETT.

Now, Sir, no quotation from any journal has been read in this House with a purpose so misleading as the extract which the hon. gentleman read this evening. It was for the purpose of deceiving this House as to the fact. The hon. gentleman simply cut out part of an editorial article in the paper. The heading of the article itself showed that it had no relation whatever to the National Policy, but it related to the whole world. The editor was moralizing on the mission of the press, and he said that the Christian press would have a great effect in preventing certain evils. It was a most unfair thing to do on the part of the hon. gentleman, and does not do him any honor. Now, I am going to give you a quotation from one of the papers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, I mean the Charlottetown Patriot, owned and edited by the ex-Governor of the North-West Territories. That hon. gentleman, in his paper of the 1st March, 1883, says:

"Where will you find another 100,000 people in Canada who are better off than the people in Prince Edward Island? I am sure it is not in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Quebec."

That is what the ex-Governor of the North-West Territories has to say with regard to the people of Prince Edward Island, and I put that against the garbled extract given to this House by the hon. member for Queen's. But I have an extract from another newspaper, published in the county I represent, and which has been a thick-and-thin supporter of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Here is what the Summerside Journal, of 20th March, 1883, says:

SUMMERSIDE'S PROSPECTS FOR 1883.

"We are glad to say that the prospects for our town are better this year than they have been for a long time. A walk through the several ship yards show a marked improvement in that line of industry.

"Hon. John Lefurgy has in his yard the frames for two vessels—one to be about 400 and the other about 1,000 tons.

"The stern post and part of the frame of the former is already in position.

"At the yard of Angus Macmillan, Esq., everything is booming on a small vessel of something over 200 tons, and the frame is being delivered for another about the same size.

"Captain William Richards is preparing a 500-ton barquentine, and judging from the immense amount of lumber in his yard he will have the vessel pretty well on in a short time.

"In addition to the ship-building interest, the Merchants' Bank of Halifax are preparing for the erection of a handsome brick building on the site just east of R. T. Holman's store. This building will likely be one of the best ever erected in our town.

"Then again the probabilities are that tenders will be called ere long for the new Post Office, Custom House and Savings Bank building, followed, no doubt, in a short time, by the buildings being erected.

"With those several improvements, added to which there are and will be many of less importance, we can safely say that Summerside has not been in so prosperous a condition for many years."

I think that is quite sufficient to meet anything advanced by the hon. gentleman opposite, and I am willing to put that against the theories of the hon. gentleman with regard to Free Trade and Protection. But the hon. gentleman says this Government is opposed to Reciprocity. He says that, in listening to the admirable speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex, he was fascinated, but that the Government did not seem to pay much attention to it. Let the hon. gentleman consult the records, and he will find that this Government is not opposed to Reciprocity; on the contrary, he will find a standing invitation to our friends across the border to reciprocate with us. He will find in the Revenue Law of 1879 the following:

"Any or all of the following articles, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, pease and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal, and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon Proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such Proclamation when imported into Canada."

Now, here is Reciprocity at once. It does not require any legislation, simply an Order in Council. Whenever our friends across the border wish to reciprocate, our Government will be prepared to meet them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is a standing invitation.

An hon. MEMBER. That is for manufactures.

Mr. HACKETT. No, it does not extend to manufactures. What we want is Reciprocity in the products of the country, in the raw material. The hon. gentleman endeavored to make it appear that because there was an increase of some $300,000 in the deposits in the savings bank of Charlottetown last year, it was due to the Government debentures that were taken up in 1873. What became of the money from 1873 to 1882? The increase in the deposits was not due to the facts stated by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), but to the fact that the farmers of the Island are in a good position, are able to pay their bills at the stores, and when they come to close up their accounts in the fall are able to place to their credit in the savings bank a very comfortable sum. I agree with Mr. Laird, Editor of the Charlottetown Patriot, that you cannot get any 100,000 people in Canada more comfortably circumstanced than the people of Prince Edward Island. It is true they have no great amount of wealth, but the people are comfortable, and although you will find in every country some poor people, I say again that the bulk of the farming population are to-day happy, prosperous and contented. The hon. member for Queen's referred to the United States and said that country possessed a variety of soil and climate; and the same point was made by another hon. member. It is true the States have a greater variety of soil and climate than Canada, but it is not true that they have any advantage in this respect over Canada. We have as good a soil and climate as may be required for the purpose of colonizing or promoting the industries in the country. Let the hon. gentleman take the railway from Montreal to Boston. Let him note in Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts, the great manufacturing industries established there. Let him follow the course of the Merrimac and observe the rising towns and villages where the manufacture of cotton, sugar, steel, iron and other articles is being carried on. The soil is not better than with us; in New Hampshire it is very much worse. Travelling through the hilly country you will come to prosperous towns from which the smoke of factories rise. Business, life and activity permeate all classes of the people. The climate is as cold as ours, their soil is no better, their water power is no better, and they are no more talented than our people. The advantage they possess is that their industries have been fostered and protected by a policy such as we have in Canada. We can bring our raw material from the country of growth. Cotton can be brought to Canada and manufactured as well here as in Massachusetts. Raw sugar can be brought here and manufactured, and as the great manufacturing centres of the United States are found in the north, so in a few years under the fostering care of Protection manufactures will be developed in Canada, and we will be able to meet the Americans on their own ground. The hon. member for Queen's has referred to the question of taxation. I was surprised he should have touched that question, because no hon. gentleman has such a bad record in connection with taxation as the hon. gentleman himself. The people of Prince Edward Island, in a moment of temporary insanity, placed him at the head of their affairs. When he assumed the reigns of power he found the exchequer of the country in a good position, there being sufficient money to carry on public affairs, and after he had done so for a year there was a nice sum in the Treasury of thirty or forty thousand dollars. But the hon. gentleman was not satisfied. He wanted to make his mark, and he did so effectually. He imposed an iniquitous assessment tax, one of the worst ever imposed in any civilized country without a doubt. The hon. gentleman increased the taxes of the people of the Island, who were the most lightly taxed people of Canada. They paid at that time a small acreage tax amounting to $1 per hundred acres. The hon. gentleman increased the taxes by 300 per cent., viz.: from $1 to $3. The hon. gentleman read from Sydney Smith in respect to the burdens of taxation, but there never was a greater burlesque in the history of any country than the system of taxation introduced by the hon. gentleman; and the people of the Island took the first opportunity before his natural term expired to hurl him from power, and I hope he will not come back again to power on the Island. I will not speak further of the hon. gentleman, but I want to say a word with regard to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), an ex-Minister of the Crown. In the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman said that when the Maritime Provinces entered the Union—I suppose he specially referred to Nova Scotia—that it was on the understanding that the duties should not exceed 15 per cent., and charged the present Government with having enormously increased the taxes. Who broke faith with the Province? The hon. gentleman and his friends found the rate of taxation at 15 per cent., and they made a horizontal advance of 2½ per cent., and thus broke faith. When they made that increase, they taxed our tea, which was free before, and the material for ship building, which had been free before, and made it pay 5 per cent.; and yet the hon. gentleman has the audacity to say that the present Government have broken faith with the people of the Province. Such a charge comes with a very bad grace from the hon. gentleman, as the Government in power from 1874 to 1878 raised the taxes and broke faith with them. The hon. gentleman also said that Nova Scotia is being crushed between the upper and nether mill-stone. Hon. gentlemen are, however, endeavoring to array Province against Province, and to create sectional feeling. They do not wish to weld the Dominion into a solid body, but to bring about divisions which may ultimately split up the Dominion. When the hon. member for West Durham spoke, in 1880, in respect to the Pacific Railway, he endeavored to make it appear that Ontario was the milch cow of the Dominion. Speaking of Nova Scotia, he said:

"For Nova Scotia, the receipts were $19,112,000; the expenditure, $21,175,000; the deficit, $2,063,000. That did not show that Nova Scotia was being ground between the upper and nether mill-stone."

Those are the words of the hon. gentleman's leader, and although the hon. gentleman spoke of Manitoba being bound hand and foot, what did the Opposition leader say? He said that the receipts for Manitoba were $876,000 and the expenditure $1,599,000, and the deficit under this head $723,000; that Manitoba had withdrawn some three-quarters of a million more from the Dominion of Canada than it had paid in; but still he said that it was bound hand and foot, and tossed about by the present Government. Let me now come to the small Province from which I have the honor to come, and I wish to refer to what the hon. gentleman said with regard to what was done in that Province. He stated that the receipts from Prince Edward Island were $1,596,000, the expenditure $2,624,000, and the deficit $1,027,000. Now, I have no confidence in any hon. gentleman who aspires to lead a party in this country, and who endeavors to create sectional feeling, and make it appear that a small Province is extracting more than it has a right to from the larger Provinces—Ontario and Quebec. I do not believe that such an hon. gentleman will deal justly and fairly by a Province, when he rises in his place and takes the responsibility of stating that a Province takes more out of the Dominion than it has paid in. An hon. gentleman across the House referred to the fact that there was an increase in our exports. I find that in 1871—and these figures are taken from the Customs Returns of the Local Government before Confederation—the total exports of Prince Edward Island amounted to $1,350,640, while in 1882, a memorandum compiled by the Local Government of the Province, a few days ago, places the whole of the foreign exports, and to the other Provinces of the Dominion, at $3,052,150, or an increase of $1,701,490 in ten years. I think that while Prince Edward Island goes on producing at this rate and exporting, they can obtain better prices for their products at present than they got four years ago. Oats, which is a staple on the Island, realize higher prices in the markets of the Maritime Provinces than could be secured across the ocean; and while they can sell their oats, and potatoes, and pork, and butter, and pelts, &c., at higher prices, there can be no fear but that Prince Edward Island must go on progressing. When I see the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government in his place in this House surrounded as he is by colleagues who have always shown a desire to deal justly and fairly by Prince Edward Island, I know that the hon. Minister of Railways, during the five years he was in Opposition in this House, always nobly and manfully battled for the rights of Prince Edward Island, when there was no gentleman in this House who would raise his voice in its favor, although a majority here—a servile majority—supported the Government of the day. That hon. gentleman then contended for our rights; and when I see those hon. gentlemen placing in the Estimates large sums to carry out the terms of Confederation, I have no fear but that they will deal honestly and justly with the Province from which I come. But when I look across the House and find the hon. leader of the Opposition state that Prince Edward Island has taken $1,227,000 from the Dominion more than it has paid in, and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) stating here that the Dominion had dealt fairly by Prince Edward Island and carried out the Terms of Union to the fullest possible extent, I cannot have any confidence in those hon. gentlemen, and I believe that it would be to the disadvantage and ruin of the Province from which I come if these hon. gentlemen should unfortunately occupy the Treasury benches. We have as good a climate, although it is a little cold in winter, as prevails in any part of the Dominion; we have, I believe, as good, as energetic, as active, and as industrious a people as are to be found in the Dominion of Canada. While we have them there and find the country progressing, and have a Government here willing to deal fairly and justly by us—it should be the prayer of every Prince Edward Islander, that this Government will long continue in power; and when I look over the Dominion of Canada and see benefited, by the fiscal policy of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, all the industries and trade of this country, and that our trade is increasing; and while I see the people of this country employed, and know that it is the aim and desire of the Government to create employment and foster the industries of the country—I can only hope, Sir, that the day is far distant when there shall be a change in the Administration.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry that the hour is so late, but I shall not occupy the time of the House very long. I simply want, as a new member, and as coming from a rural constituency, to refute some of the statements made with regard to the prices paid by farmers in this country for manufactured goods, as not being increased. I contend that through the Election of 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite appealed to the country on the promise of the National Policy, it was stated on every hustings, that the produce of the farmer would be increased in price by the introduction of the National Policy; and that our farmers would have the surplus produce of the United States shut out of our markets, that they would reap the advantages of the home market, and that a home market would be created whereby we would get better prices for the produce of the soil; and I contend, that they have not realized this promise, and that the farmers have not received increased prices for their surplus produce in the case of a single item. In place of these increases, he is called upon to pay increased prices for every single thing which he buys. I would like very much to accompany the hon. Finance Minister across the Atlantic, and see him take a cargo of wheat, or barley, or cheese to Liverpool, and offer it to the buyers there, and hear the introductory remarks which he would make in presenting these articles to the people in that market. I presume that he would do so in something after this fashion: "In keeping with the promises made to the agriculturists of this country, where this produce is raised, I wish to say to you, Mr. Buyer, we have there what is called a National Policy, and at the inauguration of that policy we promised the people there to secure to them better prices for the surplus produce of the soil; and I want you, under these circumstances, to give me something in excess of what you ordinarily give for our produce in this market, and place me in a position to return across the Atlantic, to the farmers of Canada and tell them that I have carried out the promises made by me to them and to those who supported me in that country, and to prove to them undoubtedly that the surplus produce of their soil does get a higher price in the Liverpool market, than they could obtain, if the National Policy had never been introduced. I want you to give the increased price asked." Will he do so? No, Sir. Now I contend that it is impossible, by any argument for any hon. gentleman opposite to prove that the farmer reaps any benefit whatever in a single item he has to sell. In the constituency I represent we went over the different items of farm produce, from wheat to oats, barley, peas, cheese and every single item of the produce of the soil; and I say that my opponent failed to prove that in a single instance the farmer gets one cent more under the operations of the National Policy than if it had never been introduced. The next thing to which I want to draw the attention of the House is, that he pays more for everything he buys. It has been stated here that goods are sold now as cheap as they were before 1878; but that is not the question. The question before this House is: are the goods now entering into daily consumption of the farming community, and of the laboring classes of this country, sold as cheap over the retail counter to-day as they would be were there no National Policy? I say that they are not. I will take the article of cotton—of grey cotton, for instance. Prior to the introduction of the National Policy, grey cotton was brought into this country at 17½ per cent. The duty now is 15 per cent., and one cent per square yard specific. Take ordinary cotton, which will cost three pence a yard, or five cents, which would represent 20 yards for $1. To that you add 15 cts., which will make $1.15. We will suppose the cloth is ¾ of a yard wide which would make 15 square yards on the 20, and we add 15 cts. more, or in other words 30 per cent. This makes $1.30 for the 20 yards when laid down here, and this quantity would cost under the old Tariff $1.17½. I was amused to hear an hon. gentleman state the other evening—I think it was the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wigle)—that goods are brought into this country and sold as cheaply as they were prior to the introduction of the National Policy. He says he is in the trade and handles these goods, but I would like to ask him this question: If he went to the market of Montreal to buy goods and entered an establishment and asked, at what rate of advance on sterling will you sell me certain goods, the merchant would reply, 17½ per cent. He goes across the way and asks another merchant: At what rate on sterling will you sell? The other merchant replies, 30 per cent. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman which of those merchants he would buy from? Will he take the goods from the man who sells at 17½ per cent. advance, or the man who sells at 30 per cent. advance? Yet these hon. gentlemen will have the assurance to tell the House and the country that this policy makes no difference in the price. I say that the goods which are sold to, and consumed by, the farmers of this country, are increased in every item. What about cottons? I had a conversation, a few days ago, with a man largely interested in the cotton manufacturing business. I enquired of him how they fixed the price just now. They take imported cottons, say, 33 inches wide; they estimate the texture and the quality, and they put it alongside the goods manufactured in this country, of the same width. They bring out their own manufactured article, and they say at what price it can be sold under the duty. They fix what it would cost the consumer here, and then they say: That is what we will sell ours for. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen if there is any competition in that? There is no cotton factory in this country which does not get orders in advance of what they can fill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear;" but that is the very thing that kills competition, and it is the very thing which compels the farmer and the mechanic to pay the outside figure—the last farthing—for every article they consume. I would like the hon. Finance Minister to act upon the suggestion made a few evenings ago with regard to placing the farmers of this country upon the same footing as the manufacturers. If he were to do so, I think it possible that some scheme might be inaugurated whereby the farmers might get some little advantage under the operation of the National Policy. If he were to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and give an export bounty on every bushel of wheat, every barrel of flour, every pound of cheese and everything else the farmer exports, then he would bring to our doors the markets of Liverpool, then he would be keeping Canada for the Canadians, and instead of compelling the farmers to send their produce across the Atlantic, they would be able to secure in our own markets the prices they would obtain in Liverpool. I would like to ask how the manufacturers would receive such a suggestion? Why, Sir, you would have the biggest howl that was ever heard, and the largest crowd that ever gathered on Parliament Square to oppose the change. Manufacturers would say: why make the change? Why give us 50 cts. in one pocket while from the other you take 50 cts. by making us pay an increased price for what the farmers have to sell. The fact is the manufacturers must have something which will give them a special advantage, and if the National Policy does not give them that it is of no use to them. Then, as an hon. member stated, a policy which is fair all round would cease to be a protective policy; it would not reach the pockets of the manufacturers to an extent which would satisfy them, and the result would be that they would spurn it. When the various deputations were waiting on the hon. Finance Minister asking for protection to the industries of the country I would like to know who was standing at his other elbow, urging that he should not listen to these men and grant them all they ask. I would like to know who stood by urging the interests of those men who go with their spade to dig their living out of the earth, at $1.50 a day, to support a family of children, and who, out of that $1.50, have to pay 10 cts. or 15 cts. to the cotton manufacturer, and the furniture manufacturer, and all the rest of them—a policy which compels them, out of their hard earnings, to sacrifice a certain percentage because certain manufacturers want certain advantages. I say it is an iniquitous, an unjust, and unrighteous law; and I say no honest Government, no honest country, should tolerate a system which compels one man to contribute to the wealth of another against his will, and by force of law. I tell the hon. Finance Minister that his policy is one-sided and that the people will wake up to the fact that it is not in their interests to support it. I know he has a majority at his back and that the Elections were carried in his favor, but why was that? They went to the country before the Parliament expired and under circumstances which were specially favorable to carrying out the National Policy. They told the people that it was building up this country and making them rich, and the people in their simplicity and under that illusion went to the polls and supported him. But I have no doubt if they had the chance again he would find that there are many men who have opened their eyes, because they have found out that it is not the National Policy that keeps up the price of barley, or wheat, and other articles which the farmer produces. I was amused when hon. gentlemen opposite told us that if our party were ever to occupy the Treasury benches they would have to adopt the National Policy from top to bottom. But it struck me that he should have told us how we should keep the Treasury benches if we gained them. He should have told us that we would have to learn how to gerrymander the constituencies and to take advantage of good times, to go to the country before the people had awoken to the fact that they were laboring under a delusion, and that there has not been time to show the folly and the hollowness of the policy on which he appealed to the country.

Mr. RYKERT. Mowat will tell you how to do that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mowat never gerrymandered.

Mr. HESSON. Here is a plan of Centre Wellington, and the hon. member represents North Wellington.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). How about North Perth.

Mr. HESSON. North Perth is a square riding.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would just say that any remark on the question of the gerrymander would come with better grace from any other member of this House than from the hon. member for North Perth. If there is any man in this House who gerrymandered his constituency to make it undoubtedly certain for himself, it is the hon. member for North Perth. After I was nominated for the representation of North Wellington, that hon. gentleman along with others coolly set apart and attached to my riding a certain township that had formerly given him about 150 majority, and took another township from me. He did that in the hope of defeating me, but he did not succeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will kindly confine himself to the question under debate.

Mr. McMULLEN. I stand corrected, and I apologize if I erred in departing from the question under discussion. I was amused the other evening in listening to some remarks that fell from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I can remember when that hon. gentleman came into the section of the county I represent, and while speaking on the question of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, declared positively that the Government were going to build the railway out of the receipts from the sales of land in the North-West, and that it was not going to cost the people of this country one dollar. I was quite amused the other evening, to notice with what feelings of ecstasy, with what smiles of gratification the hon. member for Lincoln received the announcement from the hon. Finance Minister, that if the people would only submit to the extra strain of taxation he was putting upon them, the Government would be able to build the Canadian Pacific Railway without going abroad for any money, for he would be able to build it out of the taxes the people are now paying. Now, I say, that the people have no right, after submitting themselves to enormous taxation in order to build the Grand Trunk and other railways, to be imposed upon to the extent the hon. Finance Minister intends to tax them, in order to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. It appears that he is extremely anxious to meet the views of the deputations that call upon him for the purpose of obtaining further increases in the taxes. It appears that there are two items entering largely into the consumption of the farmer and laboring classes, on which he has consented to increase the duties: winceys and the ordinary standard printed goods. If there are any two items upon which the hon. Finance Minister ought to have hesitated to increase the taxes, they are these two. He proposes to increase the duty on cotton goods, because there is a factory to be started for the printing of cottons. Now, I contend that it is quite within the ability of the people of this country to manufacture the coarser goods, such as liens, drillings and duck, in which the quality consists largely in the strength and durability of the goods; but the moment we leave these lines, and undertake the manufacture of printed goods, in which the value consists largely in the style and finish, we cannot manufacture such goods of that class as will meet the demand. There is no one circumstance that will so convince the people of the country of the fallacy of the National Policy as having placed on a counter before them the miserable article, the mere excuse for printed goods, that will be placed before them as the production of this country. Even the United States, although they have been printing goods for thirty years, cannot hope to compete in the same article with England. Although we are so close to the United States, what percentage of this class of goods sold over the counter is imported from the United States? Not 5 per cent. All the printed goods in this country are imported from Great Britain. The United States manufacturers have never been able to reach the style and finish attained by English manufacturers, and it will not be in the lifetime of the youngest member of this House that the printed goods manufactured in Canada will be of that quality to meet the eye of the purchaser. I say the imposition of a protective duty on this article is a mistake, and will be found to be a great burden on the poorer classes of the people. I was rather amused, too, with the remarks made with regard to the desire that was supposed to exist among hon. members on this side of the House for hard times. We have no desire whatever to see hard times. I hope and trust that the predictions made by the hon. Finance Minister, of seven years of prosperity, will be realized by every man in this country. I hope that, like Pharaoh of old, he has been dreaming a dream, and that in the interpretation of his dream he is correct; but I hope we shall not have seven years of bad times after his seven years of good times. If so, I hope he will lay up the corn. He is bound to put on taxes, but, although he had $6,000,000 of a surplus last year and has $8,000,000 this year, he has not reduced the taxation, except on such articles as saw-dust; but on the principal staple articles that enter into the consumption of the poorer classes, the taxes remain. Perhaps the hon. gentleman intends to lay up corn; I hope he does, and I hope his prediction will be realized. We do not want hard times, but good times. Hon. gentlemen opposite always point to us as free-traders. It is impossible for us to have Free Trade in this country, where we have a large debt, which is swelling every year; but the true basis of all assessment is the necessities of the country, and the moment you leave that basis and adopt a policy of Protection, that moment you drift upon a sea of difficulties, and the hon. Finance Minister is beginning to find this out. Day after day he is visited by deputations. He announces in his Budget Speech that he is going to make changes in the Tariff, and immediately we read in the papers of meetings in Toronto and in Montreal, and deputations come here to expostulate with him upon his proposed changes. How absurd to say that that policy would be perpetual, for though the hon. Minister has announced to us that he is not going to make any further changes, yet I venture to predict that next year when he brings down his Budget Speech, he will have some more changes to suggest. Every year, no doubt, all the changes will be in the direction of a step higher, and an additional row added to the height of this National Policy, which will keep growing every year. With regard to the fact that in the United States the National Policy is supreme, the reason is that the manufacturers and those engaged in their manufactories constitute about five-twelfths of the entire voting population, which has become a solid body to resist any reduction of the Tariff. That organized body of five-twelfths control the remaining seven-twelfths, and the result is that any Government which undertakes to interfere with the Protective Tariff, does so at the risk of its life. The manufacturers will receive such benefits from the operation of the policy that they will form one solid mass opposed to any reduction to the burdens of the people, and wielding an irresistible influence over the Government. Talk about the North-West as the wet-nurse of this portion of the Dominion, I tell you that the farmers of this country are the wet-nurses of the National Policy and the manufacturers, and the day will come when the people will find out the great mistake they have made in placing in office the present Government. The farmers are not fairly dealt with under this policy, which promised that their produce would increase in value through its operation, and I defy any of the hon. gentlemen to prove that it has caused any single article of produce to raise in price. The farmers have to pay additional prices for everything they purchase over the counter. I would like to have an opportunity of asking some of those hon. gentlemen who are so positive in their regard for the National Policy, how it is that the price of salt has largely increased? Two years ago we could buy salt at from 75 cts. to 90 cts. a barrel, and now we have to pay $1.50. The reason of this increase is very simple. The Government, in order to meet the wishes of the salt manufacturers, legislated in their behalf, and the farmer has to pay the difference. That is a fact which no one will dare to deny.

Mr. FARROW. I deny it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You cannot deny it, if you do the farmers will say that you are stating what is not true. I was rather amused with the remarks that dropped from the hon. gentleman who addressed the House from the seat of the hon. Minister of Railways, and was not certain but that possibly his remarks were in the direction of a warning that the Government intended that he should occupy the position of the hon. Minister of Railways. I understand the hon. gentleman comes from the same Province, and I have heard little whispers that he will probably replace the hon. Minister.

Mr. FARROW. I will only occupy the attention of the House with a few remarks in answer to the speech we have just heard. I do not know that I would have troubled myself with noticing the hon. gentleman's remarks if he had not spoken of the salt question. That is an article in which I have a great interest, and which is manufactured in my county and the adjoining county. The hon. gentleman made this plain statement—I took it down—that the farmer does not get a single cent more under the National Policy for anything he has to sell than he did before. Is that correctly taken?

Mr. ROSS. No.

Mr. FARROW. I am glad to be able to state that there is an industry just adjoining the hon. gentleman's riding, situated in the town of Listowel, which is a furniture manufactory and gives in a nutshell an answer to the objections made against the National Policy. What is true in this establishment is true with the others throughout the Province, and I will just read statistics connected with this manufactory to show the good work it is doing. In 1878 the manufacturer could only give employment to 53 men in his establishment. In 1882 he employed 131 men. And further, while the wages paid in 1878 were $1 per day, in 1882 they were $1.80 a day. The manufacturer said something further: that in 1878 he could find no sale for his goods, but had to store them away, and to hire buildings, barns, and outhouses in order to do so. Since the National Policy was adopted he could not keep pace with the orders, and easily got rid of the accumulations from former years. And these men were working overtime, 14 or 15 hours a day, and still could not keep up. Now, I come to the point. The hon. gentleman said the farmer was not getting a single cent more for anything. What does Mr. Hesson say:

"Farmers that were selling thin elm logs for 60 cents a standard in 1878, in 1882 were getting $1.25 for them."

Now will that hon. gentleman rise in his seat and say that is not the truth? And how can these men get up and state, as they do state, that the farmer is not getting a cent more for any article he has to sell now than he did before? What confidence can we place in such statements. Now about salt. I acknowledge that salt is dearer to-day than it was a year ago. Salt was sold at a ridiculously low figure eighteen months ago, but the rise is not owing to any duty that has been placed on it. The rise in salt has been about one-fifth greater than it was a year ago. What is the reason of that? It is not because that he listened to me when I tried to coax him to put a duty on the salt coming from Great Britain. We wanted him to do that, but he refused. Salt has risen because fuel has risen and labor has risen. In my own village the price has risen 75 per cent. and labor has risen from 50 to 75 per cent., and the men who were conducting these salt works, finding that they have to pay extra for fuel and for labor, have come to the conclusion that they could not sell salt at the old figures, and hence the rise. But the hon. gentleman takes the farmer under his protection. Now, I am a farmer; he is not a farmer.

An hon. MEMBER. A money-shaver.

Mr. FARROW. I do not know whether he is a money-shaver or a store-keeper. I understand he is a merchant. How is the farmer to-day compared with his position when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? First, our tea and coffee were taxed, now they are free. Another commodity used in every farm house, rice, is made cheaper. We find that molasses and syrups are cheaper by about 10 per cent. I have canvassed the neighborhood in which I live, and every lady who manages a household and goes to the store from week to week to buy her groceries, declares that in all her experience in Canada she never knew groceries, cottons, woollens, and everything else the family requires, as cheap as they have been during the regime of my hon. friend the Finance Minister. Now, that is the testimony of the ladies of the country, and nothing could be more decisive in favor of the National Policy. But that is not all; the farmer is getting more for his stuff now. Here is a little Blue-book that cost this country a good deal of money; it was compiled last Session. There were nearly three hundred questions submitted to the Reeves of Ontario. Now, the Reeves of Ontario are not all Grits, nor all Tories; they are a mixture of both. They were asked to give their opinion about the rise and fall of the prices of the different articles. This question: Has the price of oats increased? was sent to 228 Reeves, and what do you think they said? 104 said yes, and only 43 said no.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). How many said it was owing to the National Policy?

Mr. FARROW. Ninety-six said corn had increased, and thirteen said it had not. About rye, forty-seven said it had increased in price, and twelve answered "no." Wheat, and flour from wheat, ninety-nine said it had increased in price, against sixty-three that said "no." And so I might go on through the whole list. The testimony from first to last is that the farmer had been benefited by the National Policy. I notice that the hon. gentlemen opposite like to take the farmer under their wing, but I guess when they get him into their law offices they squeeze him pretty well, and he knows it, too. This debate has been noticeable to me in one particular. They have been talking about the low price of grain this season. It has been fluctuating up and down, they said. They spoke of wheat, barley, and other grains. Take pease. I raised a great many hundred bushels of pease last year. I took them to market and got a first-class price for them. Oats brought a good price. Take clover seed. Last year it was $4.25 a bushel, to-day it is $10. Pork and dressed hogs are enormously high. What about eggs?—and, as a practical farmer, I want just to tell the facts about eggs. It has been contended that the hon. Finance Minister did not make the hens lay more eggs. I contend that he did, and I will prove it. During the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office farmers kept a few of the common breed of hens; they took no care of them, because the eggs were worth practically nothing. So soon as the present Finance Minister took office eggs attained a good price, and farmers began to see that they must obtain better breeds that would lay more eggs. Such were obtained, and the hens were better fed, so that they laid right through winter, and when spring came there was the multiplication of eggs. This is no small matter when it is remembered that eggs in Ottawa to-day are worth 25 cts. a dozen. Then with regard to the fattening of pigs. When the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power pork was so low in price that it was not worth while for a farmer to properly feed his hogs, and he felt that every bushel of peas he fed was equal to giving them away. Now, the farmers feed them three times a day, and hogs may be seen on the Ottawa market 800 lbs. in weight. Therefore, are not only the hens laying better but the hogs are fattening better. Cows also give more milk. If you starve a cow through winter, you need not expect much milk or butter. It was not worth while under the old Government to feed a cow well. When the present Government came into power farmers wives soon found that the cows must be fed better and that they could be made profitable with butter at 25 cts. a pound and milk at 10 cts. a quart. Thanks should be given to the Finance Minister, because he had actually made the hens lay more eggs, the pigs to fatten better and the cows to give more milk and butter. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) declare that under the Mackenzie Administration farm implements came in free. Every member of this House who makes any pretence to be a legislator should know that they paid a duty of 17½ per cent.; yet the House has been compelled to listen to such trash day after day, and week after week. Hon. gentlemen are standing in their own light, and if they expect ever to come into power they must adopt this very policy, and if they had succeeded at the last Election very little change would have been made in the Tariff. The hon. leader of the Opposition made a statement to that effect before the Elections. They have just said: Oh, we will get into power, and find this order of things established; the people seem to be pretty well satisfied with it, and we will keep right on this track; and that would have been the last of it. We ought not to find fault with these hon. gentlemen for talking by the hour, as they are doing, as it is helping us every time and every day; and I am sure, that if they cannot see this they cannot see very far ahead of them. They cannot forecast things much.

Mr. WATSON. I rise to make a few statements in the hearing of the hon. Finance Minister with regard to the duty on agricultural implements, which greatly interests Manitoba. I do not think I will take up any time in replying to the hon. gentleman from North Huron as to when hens lay best, or as to whether the cows give more milk now than before the National Policy was established; but I will confine myself to agricultural implements. This question has been argued, and strongly, here by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, both for and against, and it appears to be necessary for a member to leave home in order to learn what are the interests of his constituents. We find hon. gentlemen stating here that it is right to increase this duty, while the members of the Opposition claim the contrary; and several statements have been made by the hon. Finance Minister to the effect that our country is made a slaughter market by the Americans, for these implements; but this statement is not correct. The American machines are sold in Manitoba in all cases at higher figures than are Canadian machines; and consequently there is no slaughter market. I have a list of the prices in Minnesota and Manitoba, and I find that a self-binder costs $85 more in Manitoba than in Minnesota; a reaper, $35 more; a sulky plough, $23.50 more; a Walker plough, $5.30 more; and seeders, $13.60 more. An hon. gentleman has stated, that in the future the North-West will pay off the whole debt of the Dominion. I think that the Government should then do all in their power to encourage its settlement, as that cannot be done until it is settled and the country is cultivated. I am not here to state that we have not as good natural inducements to offer immigrants, as they have in Minnesota or Dakota. I believe that we have greater natural inducements than those regions possess; and if we have any fair chance of supplying immigrants and settlers with the necessaries of life, and the implements to cultivate the land, we certainly ought to settle up the North-West a great deal quicker than our neighbors to the south of us can settle their vacant lands; but I regret to say, we are in such a position, that we find we have very strong competitors in our neighbors to the south, even supposing that we have more natural advantages. They have inducements to offer which we lack; for instance, the price of lumber and agricultural implements are higher with us, while better prices are paid for grain in the States. This paper, which is the organ of the Government in Winnipeg, also goes on to say:

"The relative prices of these commodities tell still more heavily against the North-West in the districts remote from railroad communication. Minnesota and Dakota being older and more populous regions than this have more railroads, and therefore better rural markets. Before long, of course, we shall be as well off as they in all these important respects; meanwhile is it wise for the Government, by increasing the duty on agricultural implements, to increase the temporary disadvantages under which the North-West labors? This is not a political question; it is a case of life or death with this region."

This evidently is not published in a partisan sense, and is worthy of consideration. The hon. Finance Minister might well be enlightened with regard to the quality of agricultural implements. The Americans have had certainly a longer time, and a greater experience in the manufacture of agricultural implements for a prairie country, and it would be naturally supposed that they can make better implements than the Canadians can. I am not here to state that the Canadian manufacturers are not capable of manufacturing, or have not enough ingenuity to manufacture machinery. I think they have, but at the same time the first lot of these implements which was sent up from Ontario to us, after the Tariff was increased in 1878, did a great deal of harm to the Ontario manufacturers. The work was slighted, waggons were made out of green lumber, and this was also the case with agricultural implements. Since that time it has been hard to place Canadian implements in the market in competition with American implements. There is one article in particular as to which I know the Canadian manufacturers cannot at all compete with the Americans, and that is ploughs. I know there are hundreds of ploughs made by Canadian manufacturers which are stacked up in different parts of Manitoba, which can be bought at 25 cts. on the dollar of their cost, and it is only the most inexperienced settlers that purchase ploughs of this kind. With regard to the deputation from Winnipeg and from the agricultural implement manufacturers of Ontario who waited on the hon. Finance Minister, I am in a position to state that, with perhaps one or two exceptions, every Canadian manufacturer who sells goods in Manitoba, handles some class of American goods, along with the Canadian goods which he sells. One firm last year brought in 144 self-binding reapers. These will not be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns, because they were shipped after the 30th June; and when these returns are made it will be seen that the importations into that country are much greater than is generally supposed. Another fact which I would like to mention is this: that I do not believe that the manufacturers of Ontario can supply the North-West, and that is one of the reasons why I think the hon. Finance Minister should not increase the duties on agricultural implements going into that country. I know that 250 self-binders were imported last year, but still the demand was greater than the supply, and all those machines were in use in taking off the crop. What would have been the case if the duty had been increased 10 or 15 per cent. last year? The result would have been either that they would have paid so much more for machines, or their crops would have rotted in the fields. I hope and trust that the hon. Finance Minister will do a favor to the settlers of that country and not impose this additional 10 per cent. duty on agricultural implements, especially as so far the North-West has not been made a slaughter market for these goods. As remarks which are made on this side of the House are taken to be of a partisan character, I will read an extract from the Winnipeg Times, of the 9th of April, on the subject of this duty. It has been stated that the hon. gentleman believes in the greatest good to the greatest number, and that is the principle in which I believe, and which I am advocating now. I am advocating the interests of the great number of farmers who will settle in the North-West this year against the interests of a few Ontario manufacturers. The Times said:

"It is telegraphed that when a protest was entered in the House of Commons by a Manitoba member against the proposed increase of duty on agricultural implements, the Finance Minister laughed sarcastically."

"Sir Leonard's laugh was ill-timed. This is probably a more serious business than he imagines. Nature, a more potent ruler than any New Brunswick statesman, has placed nearly a thousand miles of rock between us and Ontario. She has decreed, too, that our most convenient markets are St Paul and Chicago. The Eastern Provinces ought to treat this region not as satrapy to be over-run by their carpet-baggers, but rather as a distant sister in the Confederation entitled, if not to special consideration, at least to decent treatment. The North-West taxpayers owe nothing to the taxpayers in the East. Old Canada paid $1,500,000 for the extinguishment of the Hudson's Bay title here, but she borrowed the money; and we are paying our share of the interest on it in the proportion of $16 to the $5 paid in Customs duties by our friends below. The Dominion is building the Canadian Pacific, but, according to the same Customs returns, we are paying more than thrice an equal division of the cash subsidy. True, it is a national work which benefits us more than the Eastern people; but, then, we are paying more than our fair proportion of the interest on the vast debts contracted for the construction of public works in the East, which do not and never will enrich us to the value of one cent. We owe the East nothing, and why we should be taxed to enrich the East is a question Sir Leonard cannot down by any amount of 'sarcastic laughter.'

"The fact that the Finance Minister was cajoled into suggesting an increase in the duties by the Ontario implement makers, and that he did not think it worth while to ask the Manitoba members how it would suit their people, is not highly creditable to him. His first and highest consideration ought to have been for the settler. The settler is a much more numerous person than the Ontario manufacturer, and, what is more, on him, not on the Ontario manufacturer, turns the destiny of the North-West. Our settlers, under the most favorable circumstances, have a hard life of it; and that Sir Leonard should deliberately increase the taxes on the necessities of farm life is not evidence of superior statesmanship. It may suit the Ontario manufacturer, but he is not our king, and we owe him no tribute. The increase of this duty would kindle a feeling of hostility to Eastern Canada which Sir Leonard would not be able to smother by any concessions the troublous future might wring from him. It appears, however, from our Ottawa despatches to-day, that the Finance Minister is carefully reconsidering the proposal."

I am sorry to learn, from what I have heard here to-night, that the hon. Finance Minister is not likely to reconsider this matter, for he put it pretty strongly in his speech, and he accused the implement dealers who handled these American implements of receiving a consideration for so doing.

Mr. BOWELL. Did these agents act for these American manufacturers for nothing?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so, but that is not what the hon. Finance Minister meant. The inference I draw from his remarks was that they were paid more for handling these machines in Canada, so as to make it a slaughter market, than they could get from the Canadian manufacturer for handling his machines. The firm most interested in those machines is one which has purchased $370,000 worth of American machines for the coming season. The firm which purchased those machines, which he has referred to as probably receiving a consideration, do not sell on commission; they buy them and sell them out on their own responsibility. That firm is one of the most respectable and responsible firms in the North-West, and the men who compose it give their customers good satisfaction. I believe their business is one of the largest in the North-West. I hope the Finance Minister will consider whether he should not encourage the immigrants who go into the North-West by giving them all the facilities in his power, such as giving them their agricultural implements at the lowest possible rate and giving them also, as I think he should, a reduction of the duty on lumber. I do not think it is a good policy for a Government, after spending money in taking immigrants into a country, to put obstacles in the way which will counteract every encouragement extended to them.

Mr. BOWELL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if responsible parties in Winnipeg were not offering to furnish the council of that city with any quantity of lumber they required at $24.95 per thousand, or, without certain handling, at $23.95.

Mr. WATSON. I suppose a dealer in lumber can get lumber for $24, and he would be quite willing to sell a large quantity, perhaps 1,000,000 feet, to the city of Winnipeg at a slight advance. But I am talking in the interest of the settler and not that of the large dealer.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the following resolution:—

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I propose to make two or three slight alterations. Aniline dyes in packages of 5 lbs. and upwards were to be free; but we find that a large portion of the packages imported are 1 lb. packages, and these we propose to admit free. I propose also to add to "wire of spring steel, coppered, for the manufacture of mattresses." No 9 gauge and smaller, and to place weekly literary papers on the Free List.

Mr. BLAKE. There are a number of these items on which I do not wish to make any observations at all, but the item of books and that of steel railway bars and railway fish-plates, I wish to have an opportunity of discussing. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would pass those items that will not involve discussion and allow these to stand.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What will be the loss of revenue resulting from these changes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. About $75,000 or $80,000, as a result of placing these articles on the Free List. These resolutions cannot be separated, and I would suggest that they be carried in Committee to-night, and that the discussion take place on concurrence.

Mr. BLAKE. If it is understood that the discussion will be as free as in Committee.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; I can promise that there will be every opportunity afforded for discussion. There are certain proprietary medicines which are now sent in in bulk, and bottled at the price they cost, and the Department cannot get at the value without having the proprietary name attached so as to ascertain the correct value.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

Mr. BLAKE. Would the hon. gentleman state generally, what changes he proposes to make in the other resolutions?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The changes are, as I stated, children's carriages, named as they are in the printed list, to be 35 per cent. With reference to wool and muslins, it is proposed to increase the weight of the goods from three ounces to three and a-half the line yard. All agricultural implements that paid specific and ad valorem duty equivalent to 35 per cent. are changed. Gloves, leather, buck, deer, elk and antelope is to be placed on the 10 per cent. list, but sheep, kid and lamb are to be struck out. Files are to be made 35 per cent. specific and ad valorem. Portable steam engines, 35 per cent. Jams are to pay 5 cts. per lb.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:40 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 16th April, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK AND NORTH SHORE RAILWAYS AMALGAMATION BILL.

Mr. COLBY moved that the petition presented this day from the Grand Trunk Railway Company, asking leave to present a petition for a Private Bill, notwithstanding the expiration of the time for the presentation of such petitions, be now read and received, and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain.

Mr. COLBY. It appears, by the petition which I have moved to be read, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, on 10th March last, entered into a traffic arrangement with the North Shore Railway Company for a period of twenty-one years, the period limited by the General Railway Act; but there was a proviso in the arrangement that it should be extended for a period of fifty years provided Parliamentary sanction could be obtained. That arrangement was confirmed by the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway in England on 29th March, and was only confirmed by the shareholders of the North Shore Railway Company on Friday last. This is, therefore, the first day on which the petition could be presented. It has been represented to me that, in the public interests, as well as in the interests of the companies, there should be a Private Bill introduced to enable them to extend the period of the arrangement to fifty years as arranged between the contracting parties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection.

Motion agreed to; and petition read:
by LEONARD TILLEY.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. COLBY, in moving that the First Report of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament be concurred in, said: The report will be found in Votes and Proceedings (No. 38) of 6th April. The important features in the report are the following: The Committee make a recommendation in regard to the Library of the Supreme Court. By an arrangement entered into last Session a considerable portion of the Supreme Court Library has already been removed from the Library of Parliament to the Library in connection with the Supreme Court building. The Committee are of opinion that the two libraries should be kept distinct, but that such law books, text books and such books as are convenient for reference by members, during the Session of Parliament, should be retained in this Library; that a separation and discrimination should be exercised by which those books which are peculiarly needed in connection with the Supreme Court would be transferred to that building, but those books which are convenient for reference by members would be retained here. The Committee also call attention to the fact that the Library grant of former years is quite insufficient. Since the establishment of the Supreme Court a very large portion of the annual appropriation has been expended on the purchase of books which are necessary for that court, so that of the whole appropriation—I think for a period of five or six years—not more than $2,500 have been available for general literature, the consequence of which is that the Library is evidently retrograding, and it is evident if the Library of Parliament is to be kept in a respectable condition an increased appropriation must be had. The Committee also call attention to the fact that there are certain books relating to North America which are now in existence, but which are rapidly going out of existence; and they deem it advisable that an appropriation for a limited period should be made for the purpose of securing from time to time such books as would shortly go out of print, and not be available on any terms, and with a view to keeping them in the small rooms, not to be taken out under any condition, but placed among our permanent records for historical purposes. The Committee also call attention to the application of the Clerk of the House, Mr. Bourinot, who has, during the last few years, been engaged in the preparation of a very important book, a work that will be very useful to Members of Parliament and others. We have a very excellent book by Mr. Todd, on the Law of Parliament, but none for convenient reference on the Procedure of Parliament. The Committee recommend that a limited number of copies be purchased in order to enable Mr. Bourinot to proceed with the publication of his work. These are the salient features of the report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD I take a little blame to myself for not having been able to consider this report before. I had promised my hon. friend who now moves concurrence in the report that I would do so. My engagements have been such that I have not been able to consider it, nor yet the Government. Some of the recommendations bring up the question which will have to be undertaken and considered at a very early day. Our Library is neither the one thing nor the other just now. It is not a British Museum, or a Canadian Museum, or a National Library. It falls as it were, between two stools. I may say the same thing, however, with regard to the great Library at Washington. It is assumed from the number of the volumes, that it has the character of a National Library, and yet it is commonly, and technically, merely a Parliamentary Library. Now our selection of books is far too great to be considered a Parliamentary Library, which should be a collection of works to assist Members of Parliament to perform their duties intelligently—books of reference, books containing all the information necessary for legislators; that is the idea in England, where the Parliamentary Library, which is used by the two Houses, the House of Peers and the House of Commons, is one distinctly of reference. A Member of Parliament wanting information on any possible subject, to which his attention may be called as a legislator, will find it in the Parliamentary Library; but the general collection of books, and the Library of the nation, is the British Museum. We will have to face that subject very soon. Our Library is a very good, a very respectable Library, and considering the misfortunes we have suffered, in having our Library twice destroyed in my recollection, twice burned, it is a very creditable collection of books, and it is really worthy of the name of a Library. I would ask my hon. friend to allow this matter to stand over for a few days more. I think that we ought now, having to some extent curtailed the unauthorised expenditure of the Library Committee, and having reduced the debt, to be really in a position to add materially to the Library; but still every addition we make of every volume in science, literature, and art, &c., that does not belong to a Parliamentary Library, but belongs to the national branch of the question, and I think that this we will have to consider. Perhaps the Library Committee will take up that question; because we ought really to have—the Dominion of Canada really ought to have—a National Library, containing every book worthy of being kept on the shelves of a Library, but we cannot be continually adding to these buildings, and to Parliamentary Libraries. It ought to be quite a separate and distinct question, which should be taken up at an early day. As this matter involves a not inconsiderable vote of money, I would ask my hon. friend to allow it to stand over for a few days.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, there is no objection to the motion standing over; but the hon. gentleman appears to be under some misapprehension as to the question, that this involves an increased expenditure beyond the proposals of the Government contained in the Estimates before us. The propositions are three-fold, and it is well that the House should understand them: first, that the Law Library, strictly so-called, beyond the books essential to the discharge of our Parliamentary duties, should be entirely now—as in bulk it is—in charge of the Supreme Court and of the Department of Justice; that the hon. gentleman will agree is within the theory of his remarks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not part of the Library of Parliament, and belongs to something else. It was the Supreme Court which gave birth to the great additions made to it. The Government have gone a long way in this direction, because they have put a vote in the Estimates for an addition to that Library separately. I observe also that they have put another vote in the Estimates for an addition to the Departmental Library of the Department of Justice; and I may venture to suggest now—and it will be better at this time, if our plan and the plan of the Library Committee is adopted—that the Department of Justice ought not to attempt to obtain a separate library for its purposes. I quite agree it is fit, for the Department of Justice, that there should be in it those few volumes which are constantly required in it—ready reference books.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. For every day use; but a Law Library is of no use for enquiry unless it is a complete library.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. It is just the book which is missing that you want; and if anything wants to be looked into, the officers of the Department have to go down to the big Law Library and delve into that; so I do not, myself, see any present objection to what I know of it. The Department of Justice advises the expenditure of $1,000 a year for books for its library, which will have to be duplicated below—so much for law; then the Government proposes $10,000 as a grant. Now, all we propose is that there should be $10,000 as a general grant, and $2,000 a year for five years, to be voted especially to those books on North America which are badly wanted, but are not current volumes, not coming out every year. Owing to the losses and misfortunes to which the hon. gentleman has referred, partly owing to the very great shrinkage which has taken place in the Library votes of late years, we are as a Library, as many of us know, shamefully defective in books of interest concerning the history of the North American Continent, and I think that those books, in view of our duties as Members of Parliament, ought to be supplied. It turns out, from the information we have been able to get, that these books can be obtained now only occasionally at sales, and through casual circumstances, and we propose that this particular vote shall be available for that; and above all, to that particular purpose, as occasion arises, to complete the North American department of the Library. For the rest of the $10,000, which is the vote that the Government propose in the Estimates, the Library Committee propose $10,000 a year; and so the whole of our proposals may be said to go beyond the proposals of the Government only to the extent of the North American vote, $2,000 a year.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Do I understand it is suggested that the Law Library is to be removed to the Supreme Court?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON. I think it would be extremely inconvenient if all the law books are to be taken away from here and to be sent down there.

Mr. BLAKE. All the law books are not to be removed. I am sorry that my hon. friend has not read the report. I may say to Members of Parliament, who, as members of the legal profession, require more particular reference to these works, it is proposed that the books wanted in a Constitutional Library and a Library of Parliament shall be retained here, and that such further books that are occasionally wanted by Members of Parliament shall be removed to the Supreme Court, as also the books that are wanted by Members of Parliament who may want them here to carry on their legal business, here. All the books ordinarily required for the use of hon. members for the business of Parliament will be kept in the Library of Parliament, but for the rest hon. members will have a preferential right of access to the Library of the Supreme Court.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Committee have really considered the question of having a National Library as one distinct from the Library connected with the Buildings.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not the spokesman of the Committee. My hon. friend from Stanstead acts as its spokesman; but I may say that the Library Committee did not think it was within its province to propose the creation of a National Library.

FIRST READING.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 103) respecting Insolvent Banks, Insurance Companies, Loan Companies, Building Societies and Trading Corporations.—(From the Senate.)

Bill read the first time.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Davis and Lawrence Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

LOYAL ORANGE ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH AMERICA.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of British America, said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I wish to say a few words by way of explanation. When I first introduced the Bill to the House, I, perhaps, spoke a little hastily in my remarks in reply to the motion made by the hon. member for East Montreal (Mr. Coursol). He left the impression on my mind that he was going to move the six months' hoist of the Bill. I may be wrong, I may have misunderstood him, and if I have I regret that I said that the motion was cowardly. I do not wish to make a remark on this question that will offend or injure the feelings of any hon. member of this House. I might say further, that this Bill is not in my hands to be moved in this honorable House by my wish, for when I was asked to take charge of the Bill I advised the promoters to put it into the hands of a member better qualified than myself to bring it before this honorable House. I advised them to put it in the hands of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy) or the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), or the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I believe that either of these hon. gentlemen could have brought this matter before Parliament a great deal better than I can do. I believe that their force of character, their industry, and their moderation were such as would enable them to promote the Bill much better than I possibly can do. I had no other object in view, when I advised that the Bill should be handed to them, than its promotion and advancement; and that it should be placed on the Statute-book of the country. We had a Bill placed before the Local Parliament of the Province of Ontario. That Bill passed through the different stages necessary for it to become law, but according to the Rules and the usages it was necessary to have the Governor assent to the Bill, and that assent was reserved. A similar Bill was moved and became law in the Province of New Brunswick; one was passed and is law in the Province of Nova Scotia; one was passed, but has not become law, in the Province of Prince Edward Island, the Lieut.-Governor reserving his right to put his signature to the Bill. I may also say that during the past year a Bill somewhat similar to the present Bill passed the Legislature of Manitoba. When that Bill was brought before that honorable House, the Catholic members there asked the advice of those who held prominent positions in their church, who advised them not to oppose the Bill—and I must say that that was a kind and sympathetic act on the part of Archbishop Taché. Although that great and wise man advised the passage of the Bill, the Lieut.-Governor, it is said, by the advice of the present hon. First Minister of that Province, declined to put his signature to the Bill, so that it has not become law in that Province. Some years ago a Bill similar to this present Bill came before the old Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada, and in the list of those who voted for that Bill, I find the names of Sir George E. Cartier, Sir John A. Macdonald, the hon. Mr. Brown, and others. With regard to the hon. Mr. Brown, we all regret that he was carried hence by the assassin's bullet, and that he is not to-day living to assist, by his pen and his eloquent tongue, in carrying on the affairs of this country, and to warn the Government of the day to discharge its duties in the interest of this vast country. He was certainly a man who knew what was necessary for the interests of all parties, and he wished the country governed wisely and well. Let me also say of the hon. leader of the present Government that a great deal of his success in life has been due to the fact that he has always been anxious to do justice to all parties in order that this country might be prosperous, happy and contented. We must not forget that the late Sir George

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Cartier, not only voted for the introduction of the Bill, but that he voted for it twice on the same day; and I have yet to learn that Sir George Cartier was not in reality a true-hearted Frenchman, anxious to promote the best interests of the church of his choice; that he was not anxious to promote the interests of the people who spoke the same language as himself; that he was not capable at all times to discharge his duties in the best interests of the Province of Quebec. But, Mr. Speaker, I regret to learn that very few from that Province to-day, speaking the same language, having faith in the same church, are going to support the second reading of the Bill now before this honorable House. Be that as it may with these hon. members, I am not going to have any difference, they have a right to do as they think best; but the same privilege should be accorded to us. Many hon. gentlemen think that I hold an office for the society for which I am speaking. That is not correct. I am one of the humblest members of it; I do not hold any office in connection with it, nor have I held any for the last five years, and I am confident that it will be a long time before I shall do so. Not that I would shrink from the responsibility, but I have not the time to attend to the duties of the institution. But what do we ask this honorable House? What do we ask the representatives of the people of the country. We ask the right, as I said when I last addressed this House, to buy a piece of land; the right to buy lumber or other material, to erect a building in which to hold our meetings; we ask that when we get through with that building, we may, by the vote of a majority of the members, sell it, or employ it in whatever way we think best—and I am confident that the proceeds from the sale of any building would be placed in a fund for the support of the orphans and widows of members of the society. Mr. Speaker, why should we be refused this? I ask any hon. gentleman—I care not what Province he comes from, or what political party he belongs to, or what church he worships in—I ask him why, in the name of common sense, should any party of men, sworn to be loyal to the Queen and to be true to the Constitution, who pay taxes, who support the Government of the country, and who are ready at all times to go forth to defend the homes and fire-sides of the people of the country—why should they be deprived of the right to hold a piece of property for their own use, when they are ready to pay for it, and to pay the taxes upon it? If this measure is refused, there must be some secret reason for the refusal. Many hon. gentlemen have said to me that I must speak very cautiously on this matter—that I must use language that will not offend. One of the principles of our institution is to be slow to take offence, and to give none. I trust not to use a word in this discussion that will offend anyone; but let me make this remark, that we wish to know who is for us and who is against us. Mr. Speaker, we have a right to come to the Parliament of Canada, and to ask the House to give us this right. If it is refused, we want to know who refuses it, and why it is refused. I trust that this honorable House, or a majority of it, will grant what is asked for by the society of which I am a member; and I trust that it will do it in a manner that will leave us to feel that the Parliament of Canada is an independent Parliament, composed of true, honest and free men, prepared to do justice to all parties alike. I will now just move, seconded by Mr. O'Brien, that the Bill to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of British America be read the second time.

Mr. CURRAN. I feel, Sir, very fully indeed, the responsibility that weighs upon me, not only as a representative of the people, occupying a seat in this Parliament, but as a citizen of the Dominion, in rising to oppose the second reading of this Bill, which has been proposed by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. Those who have witnessed what has taken place, not only here but elsewhere—those who have heard the conversations that have been going on, and have followed the tone of the press since this matter was first mooted, must be, and are, aware that a very deep feeling exists in the minds of a large section of our people with reference to this Bill. Previous to opening our proceedings to-day, we called down upon our deliberations the blessings of Heaven. We asked for light, we asked for purity of heart, and patriotic aspirations; and I, for one, trust that, in the few observations I will have to make during the course of this debate, my mind may be inspired with, and my heart moved by, patriotic aspirations, and that no word may issue from my lips to which the most fastidious, or those most inclined to take offence, may take exception. I look upon this question as one of the most momentous that has yet appeared on the tapis of Canadian politics, because if this motion should be passed, if this Bill should become law, if this House is going to sanction the incorporation of the Orange Association, with its history from 1795 down to the present day, not only in Ireland but in this country and all over the world, wherever it has existed, if we are going to plant the Orange flag upon the tower of this Dominion, what will be the result upon the immigration to this country? We have three millions four hundred thousand miles of territory but sparsely populated, and if you put this weapon into the hands of the American immigration agents, what Catholic will come to reside in this country where these old quarrels are to be revived; what Protestant, who is looking for a future home, will come to this country when the old battles, quarrels, and bitterness of 200 years past are to be planted and nurtured? I trust, having said this much in the interest of our country generally—and this is the strongest expression I am going to use in the whole course of my remarks—I may be permitted to say one word with regard to what is usually urged with reference to this organization: that it is a Protestant institution. I have the advantage of having been born and brought up in the great metropolitan city of Montreal. There Protestants and Catholics live side by side. There we have Protestant charity and Catholic charity; Protestant benevolence and Catholic benevolence working side by side. There we see the Protestant Orphan Asylum and the Catholic Orphan Asylum, the Protestant House of Industry, and the Catholic House of Industry; the noble institutions of each rivalling the other in all good works for the relief of suffering humanity, for the relief of those who have been deprived by Divine Providence of any of their faculties. We see there the name of a distinguished Protestant connected with the foundation of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, to which he donated a large portion of his fortune; then, too, on the other hand, we see a similar institution for the care of those of our creed who are similarly afflicted. This is what I call Protestant and Catholic benevolence working side by side in praiseworthy rivalry; but I have never yet seen there the party asylum for the care of the widow or the orphan left destitute through mischievous party processions and party organizations. Lord John Russell, as you will see in the Mirror of Parliament, said during that great debate which occupied the attention of the House of Commons, and with which every hon. member of this House is cognizant, that:

“He would not enter into that enquiry in the spirit of an impression that Orangemen and Protestantism are synonymous terms, he should be sorry to pass so sweeping a condemnation on the Protestants of Ireland.”

Here I draw the line of demarcation. There is no Protestant institution in this country for charitable or philanthropic purposes that would not receive my vote and concurrence as heartily as any Catholic institution of a similar kind; but I oppose this Bill on the ground of history, because we have no right in this Parliament to pass such a law, because it is contrary to the Treaty of Paris and the laws of Lower Canada, because it is an infringement on the rights of the other Provinces, and a violation of the British North America Act. These propositions I think I can prove without the slightest difficulty. My proposition is that the Parliament of Great Britain—were we still governed by that body—could not pass this Act of incorporation, because in so doing they would violate the Treaty of Paris; and this Parliament, therefore, with its delegated authority, cannot entertain such a Bill. I shall prove, by testimony which cannot be contradicted, that the main feature of this organization is Protestant ascendancy. The first witness I shall call to prove the statement I have made, is a man whose veracity no one can question, who has filled the highest offices in this country, who has been a member of successive Governments, both in the old Provinces of Canada and this Dominion, who has occupied the position of representative of Her Majesty as Governor of an important colony and a member of the Privy Council of the Dominion of Canada—I allude to Sir Francis Hincks. In his sworn testimony before the Superior Court, in the city of Montreal, in the case of Grant vs. Beaudry, Sir Francis Hincks said:

“When a large majority of the people are Protestant the Roman Catholics do not like to see these processions, but they submit to it; and in places where they are in a large majority they do not submit to it, for the simple reason that it cannot be supposed that Catholics like to have an institution paraded where the first principle of the thing is Protestant ascendancy.”

Now, Sir, not to detain this honorable House longer than is necessary, I shall proceed to my quotations and curtail my remarks as much as possible. I next refer, to establish this statement that the fundamental principle of the Orange Association is Protestant ascendancy, not to a Catholic work, but to a work entitled “Chambers’ Encyclopedia,” a Scotch work, edited by Protestants, and here is what they say:

“Orangemen.—One of the unhappy designations which contributed for nearly a century to create and keep alive religious and political divisions of the worst character through the British Empire, and especially in Ireland. The Orange organization had its origin in the animosities which had subsisted between Protestants and Catholics in Ireland, from the Reformation downwards, but which reached their full development after the revolution of 1686, and the wholesale confiscation of Catholic property by which that event was followed. From that time the Catholics of Ireland may be said legally to have lost all social, political and religious status in Ireland. Some demands which were made in the latter part of the 18th century to ameliorate their condition, excited, especially in the North, the alarm of the Protestant party who regarded the traditional Protestant ascendancy as in danger.”

This book goes on to show—as I don’t care to read the whole article—that the Peep-O’Day Boys, having become incorporated with the Orange Boys, subsequently the Orangemen, that the establishment of Protestant ascendancy was the main feature of the Orange organization. That organization is identical with the Orange organization here, it was transplanted here; and the organization here receives representatives from the parent organization across the Atlantic. Therefore, I say that we have strong Protestant authority to show that the main principle of this organization is Protestant ascendancy. I might refer to other works, such as the Dictionnaire de la Conversation, a very popular French work, where the same principles are enunciated. It is far from being a Catholic work, yet we find there, laid down by the eminent writers, that the principle of Protestant ascendancy is the main feature of this Orange organization. I could refer to the Edinburgh Review, but I do not think it necessary when I can take the very words of the organization itself. In the thirtieth volume of the Mirror of Parliament, in the debate on the investigation of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Orange Order, as regards its establishment in the army, the Orange Order having presented an address to the Duke of Cumberland, we find them saying:

“That with an uninterrupted enjoyment of health Your Royal Highness’ active and valuable life may be prolonged to watch over the destinies of the nation with the same vigilance you have so fearlessly manifested throughout your enviable career to the support of Protestant ascendancy.

"(Signed) W. BLANNERHASSETT FAIRMAN, D.G.M.
"Metropolitan District.

"W. L. THOMPSON,
"Secretary."

Now, Sir, there is an authentic document by the Order itself, setting forth its principles. But, Sir, lest there should be any doubt upon the mind of anybody, I will read, with your permission, the closing sentences of a speech by Mr. Finch, an hon. member of Parliament, a prominent Orangeman, who spoke on that memorable occasion. He said, on page 2415 of the thirtieth volume already referred to:

"In conclusion I warn the House against outraging the feelings of the Orangemen of Ireland. On too many occasions of late they have been offended*** the mode in which the Catholic Relief Bill was passed grievously wounded their feelings. The transfer of the Parliamentary grant from the Kildare Peace Society to the national system of education has been resented by them. The suppression of the Protestant Bishoprics, was followed as it was by the unchristian triumph of Dr. McHale, has greatly irritated them. The title measure of the last and the present Session which received the sanction of the last and the present House of Commons are considered by them to be a violation of the Treaty of Union, and to be at variance with the coronation oath.*** The steed, when goaded and maddened, disdains restraint."

Now, Sir, I contend that the incorporation of any society having for its object the ascendancy of one creed over another, is in direct violation of the Treaty of Paris, which guarantees perfect freedom of religion to the Catholic subjects of His Majesty of France who were then transferred to His Majesty of England. I say that it is incompatible that there should be Protestant ascendancy and Catholic liberty; and I contend that to incorporate this association would be a violation of the 27th article laid down in the Treaty of Capitulation and the Treaty of Paris that followed it. But, Sir, we have still more. The 32nd article of Capitulation reads as follows:—

"The communities of Nuns shall be preserved in their constitution and privileges. They shall continue to observe their rules, and they shall be exempt from lodging any military, and it shall be forbid to molest them in their religious exercises, or to molest or to enter their monasteries."

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRAN. I am glad the hon. gentleman says "hear, hear;" but that was not the "hear, hear" that was uttered when the Provincial Grand Lodge of Western Ontario met, when they laid down their platform, and where, after setting forth other resolutions which have not the ring of benevolence about them, I can assure you, as far as I can see, which have nothing in all their long programme to show that there is either to the right or to the left one attempt at philanthropy in the organization. In the 5th article laid down by the Provincial Grand Lodge of Western Ontario, we find it stated that:

"The opening of all public institutions in the land, religious or otherwise, to public inspection by Government officials, shall form part of the programme of this institution."

I say if that forms part of the programme of this institution, and it does, here is their document, which is published in the Toronto Mail of February 18th, 1876, and I challenge contradiction upon this point: I say if that be the case this Act cannot pass, that it would be a violation of Article 32 of the Capitulation which I have already quoted to this House. Now, Sir, having disposed of that branch of my argument, I proceed to the second point, which is this: That such an Act could not be passed by this Parliament, even admitting that the incorporation of such a society could be had under authority of this Parliament, without violating the laws of the Province of Quebec, where this institution is illegal and has been declared illegal by the highest tribunal in that Province. I have already referred briefly to this case of Grant vs. Beaudry. In that case—and the evidence is all here before me—it was established that this society, instead of being a benevolent association, is a secret, oath-bound, political-religious association, and I have the evidence before me both for the plaintiff and defendant, to which hon. members may refer, or hon. members may procure a copy by applying either to the Supreme Court of the Dominion, or to the Court of Quebec Bench in the Province of Quebec. By Chap. 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of the Province of Quebec, all secret oath-bound societies are declared illegal—all confederacies and combinations that are oath-bound, with one exception, which is found in section 9. That section reads as follows:—

"And whereas certain societies have long been accustomed to be holden in this Province, under the denomination of lodges of Freemasons, the meetings whereof have been in great measure directed to charitable purposes;—nothing in this Act shall extend to the meetings of any such society or lodge holden under the said denomination and in conformity to the rules prevailing among the said societies of Freemasons; provided such society or lodge has been constituted by or under the authority of warrants in that behalf granted by or derived from any Grand Master or Grand Lodge in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

This was thoroughly understood by the Masonic body to extend only to such societies as held their charter from a Grand Master or a Grand Lodge in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. But this association struck out into a Canadian branch; and when it constituted itself into a separate organization, it took particular care, in order to give the organization, legality to have this Statute amended by 29 Vict., chap. 46 of the Statutes of Lower Canada, which added after the words "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," the words "or any Grand Lodge of Canada." But it is altogether needless that I should undertake to argue whether this society is legal or not from the books that are before me, or that I should dissect that chapter of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, because I have here at the present moment the Legal News of Lower Canada which contains the judgment of the hon. Justice Ramsay, concurred in by the Chief Justice, Hon. Sir A. A. Dorion, and Mr. Justice Cross, and I need only say that the hon. Judge, whose words I am about to read, is a Judge esteemed as one of the most eminent jurists in the Province of Quebec, or any other Province of the Dominion. Speaking on this very point raised in the Grant-Beaudry case, the hon. Justice says:

"On the interpretation of the Act as given by me on the occasion referred to, I see nothing to alter, and if I do not repeat textually what I then said, it is because I think I can make the matter more clear if I apply that interpretation to the points raised in discussion before this court."

"Our ordinance of the 2nd Vic. is borrowed from three acts of the reign of George III.—37, Cap. 123; 39, Cap. 79; and 52, Cap. 16. Though borrowed from these Statutes, there are differences on which it is not necessary to enlarge. The words of our Statutes are perfectly clear, and they extend to every society and association whatever, 'the members whereof shall, according to the rules thereof or to any provisions or any agreement for that purpose, be required to keep secret the acts and proceedings of such society or association.' It is impossible to deny, and it is not denied, that these words cover every association bound to secrecy by an engagement purporting to be an oath, or otherwise. But it is sought to limit their scope in practice by invoking the preamble. But the preamble does not, as was pretended, limit the enactment following; it gives the reasons, two in number, for these enactments. It says, in effect, that there are seditious and traitorous combinations, and there are societies and associations of a new and dangerous character, 'inconsistent with the public tranquility and with the existence of regular government,' therefore all secret societies are forbidden. This is not such an unreasonable conclusion as to entitle us to say that the legislative will was other than the words of the law imports. So far as cases on the English Statute can be authority, they seem to uphold the view now taken. (See R. V. Lovelass, 6 C. & P. 596, and R. V. Dixon, 6 C. & P. 601.)

"We next come to the question of whether the Orange Association comes within the terms of the law. Its members are sworn, and they are therefore under the most formal engagement to obey its rules, and one of these rules, No. 15, makes secrecy a distinctive part of the organization. It seems to me to be unnecessary to pursue the enquiry farther. It is no answer for the violation of a direct prohibition of the law to say, 'Our motives were good; we are really organized in support of the Government.'

"Having arrived at this conclusion, our duty ceases. We have no special mission to point out to our fellow-subjects the expediency of this or that line of conduct; we have not to warn them of the absurdity of a contest, on the real merits of which both parties are thoroughly agreed. The one are Jacobites by their sympathies, the other are Orangemen; but it is more than likely both would fight to the death against a despotic form of government. This is a truth which will be fully recognized some day or other; but in the meantime I notice it without the slightest hope of it being accepted, for we are much more guided by our feelings than by our reason. But the feeling as to the color of a ribbon or a flower is only a prejudice, a vulgar prejudice, not really entertained by anyone of education. Some people in a higher position may affect to sympathize with such follies, but in reality they only laugh in their sleeve at such of their dupes as believe in them."

Having thus referred briefly to that branch of the law of Lower Canada, I now come to another point, and I would wish to draw the attention of this honorable House to it, the more especially so as the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of this Bill has referred to the Province to which I am about to allude—the Province of Prince Edward Island. In that Province, in 1863, a law on this subject was passed. It received a majority of votes, but the Governor in Council, on receipt of a petition, undertook to send that Bill to the foot of the Throne in order to ascertain whether Her Majesty would sanction it or not. With the permission of the House I will read the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle:

"DOWNING STREET, 21st September, 1863.

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following Act of the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, passed with a suspending clause on 22nd April, 1863, and transmitted to me with other Acts in your Despatch No. 65, of the 5th ultimo (No. 1,136) Chapter 7, An Act to incorporate the Grand Lodge of Prince Edward Island and subordinate Lodges in connection therewith.

"I have had under my consideration as well the Act itself as two petitions against, forwarded respectively with your despatches No. 43, of the 27th April last, and No. 66 of the 5th ult., the latter of which is stated to have been signed by upwards of 11,000 persons. I deeply regret that the Legislature of Prince Edward Island should have given its sanction to a class of institutions which all experience has shown to be calculated, if not actually intended, to embitter religious and political differences, and which thus must be detrimental to the best interests of any colony in which they exist.

"Holding these views respecting the measure, I have felt it impossible to advise Her Majesty the Queen to giving Her Royal approbation of it, without which I am glad to observe it will not take effect.

"The Act will therefore remain inoperative.

"I have, &c.

"(Signed) NEWCASTLE."

"LIEUT.-GOVERNOR DUNDAS."

Now, Sir, this document having reached Prince Edward Island, for a certain number of years the Orange body remained quiet. They again, in 1878, sought an Act of incorporation, despite the express wish of Her Majesty, as contained in that document. But although they once more succeeded in obtaining the votes of the House, the Act was referred to His Excellency the Governor-General of the Dominion, who again returned it, telling them that it was their own business to decide as to their Provincial matters. On another occasion, however, they came to the charge, and, in 1881, in Prince Edward Island another Bill was presented, another attempt was made; it was again carried, but when it was submitted to the Lieut.-Governor in Council, the present Lieut.-Governor of the Island vetoed the Bill, and that is now upon record; and yet we are asked here in this House to pass this Act without even a repealing clause over the Statutes of the Province of Quebec, over the decisions of the highest court in that Province, over the despatch of Her Majesty's Minister refusing Her sanction and regretting that such a society should have sought incorporation, or that such incorporation should have been granted by a majority of votes, despite the action of 1878, and despite the Lieut.-Governor who vetoed that Bill in the Province of Prince Edward Island only about eighteen months ago. I shall next deal with the third point of my argument. Admitting this society to be a benevolent society—and really the hon. member in saying so must take this Parliament for a lot of Rip Van Winkles asleep for the last twenty or fifty years for that matter—this Parliament has no authority, has no right to deal with the incorporation of a benevolent society. If we deal with the benevolent societies, if we really are going to come down to the incorporation of benevolent societies, why we may as well, with one stroke of the pen, do away with the Local Legislatures altogether. Every hon. member who has taken an interest in our legislation has admitted that on all sides encroachments have been made, and are daily being made, into the rights of the Provincial Legislatures; and if we undertake to incorporate a benevolent society, we may as well do away with the Local Legislatures altogether, because this is the very last thing we can touch; and when we have come down to benevolent societies, there is no necessity for Local Legislatures at all. I happen to have here before me a work edited by Mr. Doutre, the eminent Queen's Counsel of the Province of Quebec, and who, by the way, was the counsel of the Orange Association, who managed their cases, and who fought their battles in the courts all through; and I shall do no more than simply refer the hon. members of this House to the speech of Lord Carnarvon, delivered on the occasion of the passing of the British North America Act, wherein he lays down in language that is perfectly unmistakable what are the different attributes of the Dominion and Local Legislatures. I will spare the House from the reading of that speech, which is, no doubt, very familiar to all those who have taken an interest in this subject; but when we come to look at this work, we find quoted here a statement of the hon. Judges, delivered in the cases which came before the highest courts in the Province, and in the other Provinces as well, which, I think, under the provisions of the British North America Act, relative to civil rights and the rights of property, show that even if this were a benevolent society—even if there were no other object, even if there were no other result, than that mentioned by the hon. gentleman here in his speech, to-day, to give these lodges, to give this institution, the right to hold property and the right to own real estate—that such a right must be applied for to the Provincial Legislatures of the different Provinces of the Dominion. I shall read the words of the Hon. Sir A. A. Dorion, the Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec, in rendering his judgment in the most important case of Dobier and the Board of Temporalities, &c.:

"The British North America Act was passed for the purpose of allowing each Province to regulate its own internal affairs, including civil rights and incorporations for Provincial objects, without interference on the part of the other representatives of the other Provinces through the Dominion Parliament."

Now, mark this, Mr. Speaker:

"It would be a mere evasion of the plain tenor and object of the Act to say that the Dominion Parliament could interfere in matters purely Provincial, merely because two or more Local Legislatures had adopted the same legislation, or what would be more obnoxious, because they had refused to do so. It has been held, and I believe without a dissenting voice, that the Dominion Parliament could not grant to the Orange Society an Act of incorporation with franchises applying to the whole Dominion; and that the Local Legislatures could alone create such a corporation for their several Provinces respectively; and Bills have been accordingly introduced for that purpose, and discussed in the Local Legislature of Ontario during several successive Sessions. This shows that what are civil rights and provincial objects is not to be determined by the extent of territory to which interested parties may wish to apply legislative action, but by the character of such rights and objects."

I think that this establishes the doctrine pretty clearly, and the same principle has been applied in the various reported cases, and nowhere more so and in no case more pointed than in the case of the Queen vs. Mohr, quoted in this House a few days ago, and this principle has been sanctioned by judgments over and over again in the other Provinces as well. I shall not detain this House at very great length in discussing this subject farther. I shall content myself by reading a few of the statements of the most eminent public men in the British Empire on this subject. I have taken these extracts from the debates as reported in the Mirror of Parliament, and the first I shall read is that of Lord John Russell. He said:

"If in the course of the observations I should feel it my duty to make to the House, I should pronounce my opinion unfavorable to the Orange institution, it cannot be imputed to me that I do so from any bias of opinion particularly adverse to those societies, because while a member of this House and the Government I have ever been an enemy to all associations of this kind, and have not hesitated in being a party to laws repugnant, even as I am free to confess, to the spirit of the Constitution, with a view to put down associations that I have thought dangerous to that Constitution and injurious to the authority of the Crown."

Sir Robert Peel, another eminent statesman, said:

"I trust that all parties will agree that no separate interests can be served by the continuance of those societies, but that peace and tranquillity will be advanced by their abandonment."

Mr. Hume speaks as follows, of various disturbing societies, among which he includes the Orangemen:—

"The country has thus been torn in pieces by intestine strife. I find that amongst other associations and societies of this kind there have been the Levellers, the Ribbonmen, the United Irishmen, the White Feet, the Black Feet, the Peep-O'Day Boys, and the Orangemen."

He says again:

"The existence of a body on the one side invariably leading to the establishment of a rival party on the other."

In closing his speech he said:

"I cannot too strongly express my conviction of the fact that these Orange societies are illegal, but in their very nature they are most mischievous as tending to disorganize society."

Lord Palmerston, when waited upon by a deputation of prominent persons belonging to the order of Orangemen, said:

"I am clearly of opinion that it would be far better for us to look to the future than to the past; and what, let me ask, is the object, and what are the prospective advantages of this Orange Association? Is it an organization which belongs to the age in which we live? Is it not rather one that is suited to the Middle Ages—those periods of society when anarchy prevailed, and when one body of people were in the habit of arming themselves to resist some outrage or violence committed by another, and this because they felt that they could not depend upon the Government of the country for adequate protection or security? But this state of things no longer exists; and not being an Orangeman myself, I confess I am at a loss to understand the use of the association in the present age."

And what was the reply of His Majesty to the Address presented to him on the conclusion of that celebrated investigation, during the course of which most of the quotations I have made were delivered. He said:

"I willingly assent to the prayer of my faithful Commons for the effectual discouragement of Orange lodges, and generally of all political societies, excluding persons of a different religious faith, using secret signs and symbols, and acting by means of associated branches."

"It is my firm intention to discourage all such societies in my dominions, and I rely with confidence in the fidelity of my loyal subjects to support me in the determination."

Now, Sir, I wish to ask this honorable House what would be the inevitable result of the incorporation of this society, if we have the power to do so, and we make this association legal in the Province of Quebec. I have not, in the course of my remarks, alluded to the history of this institution, nor to the various occurrences—to use the mildest term that comes to my mind now—which have characterized its history in Ireland, England, the United States, and this country. I say that I am not standing here merely for the purpose of raising an alarm when I tell you what I believe will be result if this society is made a legal one throughout the Province of Quebec. I refer hon. gentlemen to the Toronto Mail of the 13th July, 1852—and that is not ancient history—and there, Sir, it is stated that in the Queen's Park London East Orangemen assembled in solemn conclave, and declared that they had unanimously resolved to celebrate the next 12th of July in Montreal, and that the Ontario Orangemen will march despite all opposition. This, Sir, is what we are promised. We are notified of it in advance, and this notification being given, what will be the result of these men coming, not only armed themselves, but joined by other armed men from Buffalo and elsewhere who were appealed to on a former occasion which I do not refer to here. Why, Sir, you will have the whole Province of Quebec—every Irish Catholic of Montreal, every French Canadian Catholic—in arms. You will have the people of Quebec coming to assist the people of Montreal, and men from New York coming to confront the men from Buffalo; and then, Sir, the carnage of the battle of the Boyne will be repeated over again. That will be the result, and hon. gentlemen will be obliged to admit, though they seem to think this a laughing matter to-day, they will be obliged to wring their hands as they did on a former occasion, and to say that they have no power to restrain their followers. I ask in what country is it sought to establish this Protestant ascendancy? Here where we are all living together in peace and harmony. Look at those Ministerial benches. Is Protestantism in danger there? We have the Premier, Postmaster General, and the Minister of Finance of this Dominion, to protect Protestant rights, and if that is not sufficient protection, we have my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, the Past Grand Master of the Orange Order, to assist them. We have my honored and honorable friend the Minister of Inland Revenue to protect us, and, fortunately, we have the successor of the late Sir George Cartier—and who fills his mantle worthily—I say we have him the hon. Minister of Public Works and his colleagues to represent the interest not only of their own fellow countrymen, but of every man who wishes to do what is right and just through the length and breadth of this Dominion. Is this state of peace and harmony going to be disturbed? Are we going to have it marred? Are we going to have this great Confederation, which was founded and brought to its present position of progress and prosperity by the great statesman who sits at the head of this Government—are we going to have the work of his lifetime torn down by a measure merely for the satisfaction of this organization? I say no, Sir, this thing shall not be tolerated. I feel that I can appeal here to those who have read the history of the land in which this organization took its root, and where the great national poet in the anguish of his heart, seeing the horrors that had for years and years been engendered by this and similar societies, exclaimed:

"Erin! thy silent tear never shall cease;
Erin! thy languid smile ne'er shall increase,
Till, like the rainbow's light,
Thy various tints unite
And form in Heaven's sight
One arch of peace."

These are the words of our national poet, wrung from him by the sad picture revealed to his poetic eye by the history of his country; and I ask, is it in this land, where Jacques Cartier came and planted the Cross of Christ, and before it had offered up the sacrifice of the Mass—is it in this land, where the heroic De Brabant and his fellow-laborers, the followers of Lyola, consecrated the soil with their martyr blood—is it in this land, where that long line of Irish Priests and Prelates, long before the days of Bishop Phalen and Archbishop Connolly, who did so much to build up Confederation, down to the days of that intellectual Hercules and patriot Priest, Father Dowd—is it in this land, where these men have expended their labors, as many are now doing, to promote the highest welfare of the country—is it in this land, where the Oblats de Marie Immaculée to-day are doing the noble work the missionaries did in the early times, in carrying to the Indian tribes of our great North-West the faith and the civilization of Christianity, to enlighten their minds, to make them amenable to the laws, and to render possible the carrying out of the policy of our Government, that humane policy which is our boast as compared with the policy of other countries—is it in this land of Canada that we are going to plant that tree of bitterness and dissension which has proven so baneful to other peoples? No, Sir, I have greater faith in—I have a more exalted hope for my country. I believe there is a nobler destiny for us than to be cut up into sections and factions, and to be reduced to the desolation of those unhappy countries where factions have wrangled and fought. I trust, Sir, that the day is not far distant—I trust rather that that great day is here—when we may indulge in larger hopes for our country, when the Orange and the Green, the Rouge and the Blue, may all mingle together in celestial harmony, to contribute to the general prosperity of the country, each in its own way. They may not all follow the same political plans; they may not all have the same political ideas. But this is a free and progressive land. We look forward hopefully to its great future; and if we want to make it prosperous and happy, if we want to make it a land where men will come to establish their homes, we must make it a land of peace and harmony, where these disturbing associations will not be allowed to exist; and therefore, Sir, in order to prevent the consummation of the disasters which I should anticipate from the passing of this Bill, I have now the honor to propose, seconded by my hon. friend Mr. Hackett:

That this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker: One would think from the speech of the hon. gentleman to which we have just listened, that this Bill was for the establishment of the Orange organization in Canada. The mistake into which the hon. gentleman has fallen is this: There are at this moment upwards of 200,000 Orangemen in this Dominion. They have their lodges, they hold their meetings, they distribute their benevolences, they have their processions whenever they choose to have them—in the Province of Ontario at any rate; and this Bill is simply desired for the purpose of enabling them to do that which every other organization in Canada which seeks incorporation can do—that is, hold their property by a legal tenure. There is nothing in the Bill to establish Orangeism; there is nothing in the Bill to promote Protestant ascendancy. There is simply an opportunity given to a number of people—if this Bill should pass—who choose to think that they enjoy themselves by being Orangemen, who choose to believe that it is their right to meet together in their lodges if they think proper—there is simply given to them the liberty of holding their property in the usual way. Sir, the hon. gentleman talked of this Bill as an attempt to plant the Orange flag over the Dominion of Canada, and he argued—hon. gentlemen, whatever their opinion of his general view may be, must admit with some difficulty—that this Bill was opposed to the Treaty of Paris, because Orangeism has for its basis the establishment of Protestant ascendancy. Why, Sir, every Protestant church, in the services which it holds, is an assertion in favor of Protestant ascendancy, if it could be had; every Roman Catholic church, in which masses are held and sermons preached, is an assertion of the principle, if it could be accomplished, of Roman Catholic ascendancy. But, although Protestant and Catholic alike seek to establish the ascendancy of his own particular faith, believing that the ascendancy of that faith will be the best for the interests of the country at large, no one pretends to say that either the one or the other is to be stigmatized in the terms the hon. gentleman has applied to the Orange Association, because of his desire to secure that ascendancy. Sir, there is no interference here with any Treaty of Paris. Except in the Province of Quebec, the Orange organization has already a legal existence in Canada, and even in that Province its legality is still an open question. The expression of opinion from a learned Judge, read by the hon. gentleman, was a mere abiter dictum; and, if I mistake not, the Judge who made it, received from the Judges of the Supreme Court a remonstrance on the practice of undertaking to decide the legality of an institution when the question of its legality was not directly before him. This society is legal in every Province besides the Province of Quebec, even in the view of the hon. gentleman, and this Bill does no more to determine this legality than has been done already. If, when a body comes here to be incorporated, we are to consider the principles or methods of that body, and are to refuse incorporation upon such considerations, I venture to say that there would be some extraordinary results from the Parliament of Canada being bound by such a principle of action. In the times past that principle was attempted to be set up. I remember the first Session of the Canadian Parliament which I ever looked upon from the reporters' gallery in 1852, a gentleman, who was afterwards the strong and vigorous leader of the Liberal party, opposed the incorporation of all religious societies because he was opposed to their methods and principles. We know that for years after 1852, down at any rate to 1858, at almost every Session of Parliament, the Legislative Assembly was divided on the incorporation of religious associations or organizations, simply on the ground that there were those who did not believe in their methods or principles, and were determined to refuse them incorporation. But on looking over the division lists, you will find that almost every man who represented a constituency in which the Orange party may be said to have had the control, voted in favor of these corporations, because Orangemen were willing to give to others the same privileges that they asked for themselves. In 1863, when Mr. Scott introduced his Separate School Bill during Mr. Sandfield Macdonald's Administration, we know that when the Liberals of Upper Canada opposed that Bill, and were prepared to refuse to the Roman Catholics of Upper Canada those amendments which would enable them properly to work their schools, twenty-two Conservative members from the Province of Upper Canada, members of the Opposition from constituencies in which they depended on the Orange vote for election—including the Grand Master and a past Grand Master of the Orange Association, forgetting the advantage they might derive through the embarrassment the defeat of this measure would cause the Government—gave their votes in favor of enabling the Roman Catholics to carry on their separate schools as they might desire. That was their policy then; and I venture to say that if you trace the records of the history of this country, if you will take the constituencies in which the Orange element is predominant, and note the views of the representatives of those constituencies in Parliament, you will find that, so far from Orangeism having had any evil effect upon the religious liberties of the people of Canada, it has had just the reverse effect; you will find that whenever the Roman Catholics came for anything to Parliament, the representatives of Orange constituencies, whatever side of the House they might happen to sit on, were for the time being prepared to give them what they required. What do the Orangemen ask to-day? Simply that they may be incorporated. They ask for no special legal recognition; they ask not that you may establish Orangeism, for it is established already, and we cannot injure it if we would. But they simply ask that they may have the liberty to hold their property as others do in this country. The hon. gentleman says we have no right to pass this Bill here. I think it is a pity he did not confine his argument to that contention. It would have been better for the discussion in this House, for the peace and harmony, not only here, but throughout the country, if he had. Not being a lawyer, I am not going to discuss that point, but will simply say that this organization which is seeking incorporation here has jurisdiction all over the Dominion, and cannot be incorporated in any particular Province, but must come here if it is to be incorporated at all; and having come here, it would be much better were the petitioners allowed to feel that they had not appealed in vain to the liberality of a Parliament in which there is, at any rate, a large number of those who are indebted to them for sympathy and assistance in times past in the legislation affecting religious associations. The hon. gentleman ventures to think that if this Bill passes Orangeism will increase. I can tell him that if he will look at history he will see that Orangeism owes its strength in Canada to-day to the opposition it has on various occasions encountered. The unfortunate Gavazzi riot in Montreal did more to promote Orangeism in Canada than any other one event in connection with our public affairs. The objections to this Bill instead of lessening the influence of Orangeism, will bring to the order generous-minded men who will not submit without, at any rate, some form of protest, that one class should be selected for special ostracism on the part of Parliament. If this order be an evil order, if it be something we do not desire to promote in Canada, the only way in which its influence can be lessened is by taking from it every sense of grievance and wrong. You cannot better promote any body, any peculiar set of opinions, than by placing them under the ban of Parliament, of political ostracism, and that is what is proposed to be done with this Bill. I sincerely hope the Bill will pass. My only regret is that it did not come up for a second reading in the ordinary course; I regret that any special significance has been attached to it at all. It would have been infinitely better, once introduced, to have treated it like any other measure. I am satisfied of this, that our Roman Catholic fellow subjects need fear nothing as the result of the incorporation of the Orange Association; and as to the fear expressed by the hon. gentleman that the passage of this Bill may result in an attempt to have an Orange procession in Montreal, I can only say that were a procession there—which I think an unwise proceeding, and one greatly to be regretted—it would be perfectly harmless, and produce none of the results which my hon. friend predicts, if he and his friends will only consent to remain at their usual business for the day, and not attempt to interfere with the procession. If that policy were adopted in Montreal, as it is in Toronto and elsewhere, we should have no bad results, even from such processions, regrettable as they are in communities like Montreal, where the majority are Roman Catholics, and where they are likely to be considered offensive by the majority. It is for the Orangemen to consider whether they will hold their processions or not; but I think their opponents, if they do not approve of them, have simply to abstain from interfering, and this idea of a procession will soon pass away. I trust this Bill will pass to its second reading, and become the law of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. COURSOL. I have to thank the hon. member for Hastings for the manner in which he apologised for the expression he used on the occasion of the first reading of this Bill. I am perfectly convinced, and I may say I was prepared to hear from the hon. member, that he had no intention then either to insult this House, or any of its members, especially one with whom he has been on friendly terms for the last five years. Having said so much, I feel I cannot give a silent vote on this question, having moved the six months' hoist on the appearance of this Bill before the House. In doing so at the first reading, I used the right which I hold as a member, and I had before me the precedent of the vote in 1858 on the first reading of a similar Bill. A division then took place, there was a tie, and the Speaker voted in favor of the reception of the Bill. Precisely at the same stage that we are now, another division took place, and the Bill was rejected by a majority of five votes, if my memory serves me right. On that occasion the leaders of the party were divided, the leading statesmen of the country differed, and those hon. members who have read the speeches on that occasion will find that very able arguments were used on both sides. It is true the late lamented leader of the Province of Quebec, Sir George Cartier, voted on both divisions in favor of the Bill, but he was only followed by three French Canadians; and I am perfectly convinced that if Sir George Cartier were present with us now, he would not give a similar vote. At that time Sir George Cartier did not know the strength of the feeling in the Province of Quebec against such a Bill, and if the public voice had been consulted, there would have been, I believe, a unanimous condemnation of the vote in that Province against such a vote. Some of the leading statesmen of that day voted against the Bill, among whom were the Hon. L. T. Drummond, the Hon. Sandfield Macdonald and the Hon. Mr. (now Sir) Hector Langevin, with nearly all the French Canadian members. They did so on the same ground that I am taking at present. I do not oppose this Bill—and I say it sincerely—from any sentiment of animosity to Orangemen; I oppose it on the broad ground that the association is illegal in the Province of Quebec, and that this Parliament has no right to impose a Bill of this description upon that Province. It is not asked for, it is not required, and it would not be useful in that Province. This Parliament has a right to incorporate societies for the benefit of the community at large, and they have done so on many occasions; but if you incorporate this association you will be legalizing and sanctioning the principle of secret societies. I believe that a majority of the country is against the principle of incorporating secret societies. Why should we incorporate secret societies in this country of ours, where all the leading statesmen, where every member in this House, is doing its best to promote harmony and good feeling in order to make a great country that we may all be proud of? We are now on the eve of accomplishing that great task. Our laws are well administered, we are able to maintain the public peace, we cordially support the dignity of the Crown and the supremacy of the flag which floats over this Dominion; and what need have we of secret societies? They are not wanted in the Province from which I come, they are not desired by the great mass of the Catholics of this country, nor are they favored by the majority of its people, and why should they be imposed upon us? I would ask those hon. gentlemen who are promoting this Bill whether they would accept without remonstrance, a measure that they did not like to have imposed upon them? It is a measure which we cannot accept on general grounds. First, it is illegal; and, second, the Province of Ontario has no right to impose it on the other Provinces. If the Orangemen of Canada want to be incorporated as a benevolent society—and I am far from saying that they wish to do it for any other object; I am glad to know that such is their intention and I am perfectly sure that they do as much good to each other as they can—let them incorporate themselves as a benevolent society, but don't let them impose their society upon the other Provinces. They may have such a law in the Province of Ontario; they already have it in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and why should they not be incorporated in the Province of Ontario where, we are told by the last speaker, there are 200,000 Orangemen? Why, I ask those gentlemen, should they force it upon us in the Province of Quebec? They must know, the leading men of the country must know, and the right hon. leader of our party knows right well that the Province of Quebec cannot accept such a law, and the Catholics cannot endorse a secret society. I speak for myself, and I believe I express the opinions of others, when I say that the passage of this Bill would be putting on the Statute-book of the Dominion a standing denial of the rights of our Province. It would be embodying in our Statutes a standing insult to the Catholics of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Now, why should we do that? Is it a matter of necessity? Is it in the interest of our country? Is it necessary to the defence of our flag? Why, Sir, if we have to defend our flag, and if the flag were in danger, the Orangemen of Canada would, no doubt, do their duty nobly; but, Sir, the French and Irish Canadian Catholics of this Dominion would equally well do their duty. They have proved it on many occasions, and they are ready to do so to-morrow. Therefore, on the score of loyalty we do not want any secret organization. We do not want any faction secretly organized to defend the flag of the country. We can face the enemy in the open light of day. We do not require to be sworn in order to be ready to meet the enemy face to face. When the occasion arises we will have but one motto; "Go ahead!" and to adopt my friend's suggestion near me, "No surrender." Sir, secret societies are the great curse of the world at the present day in every civilized country. The late Emperor of Russia was blown into the skies by a torpedo set by secret societies; every sovereign in the world is trembling on account of their machinations, and even the safety of our beloved Sovereign Queen Victoria is menaced by evil disposed persons who are organized into secret societies. What they have done in the past they will do even to a greater extent in the future. Look at Italy with her Carbonari, at France, at Germany, at Russia, at England—all honeycombed with secret societies; and now hon. gentlemen want to legalize them in this land of ours. I say, no! I hope that the hon. member who is moving this Bill will himself see the impropriety of applying for an Act of incorporation here. As I said before, I do not speak in a spirit of nationality, I do not speak in a spirit of party. I speak only as a Canadian, having the welfare of his country at heart. I wish from the bottom of my heart that a measure of this description should not be forced upon us in the Province of Quebec. The Orangemen may obtain the law they desire from the Legislature of Ontario, and I am sure that before long they will be able to get from that Legislature the incorporation which they are seeking for; if they are as strong as they are represented to be, but it is improper that they should force on this Parliament this Bill at the present time. If I had entered into the history of that body I might have proved—but it has been so often stated as to be unnecessary—that this society cannot legally be incorporated in the Province of Quebec being as it is a secret society by the Dominion Parliament; and I believe it will be neither an act of prudence nor of justice to the Province of Quebec if this Parliament force upon it a law which the people of that Province do not wish to have placed on the Statute-book. Holding these views, I will vote against the motion for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I am somewhat surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol). The principal objection he has urged against the incorporation of the Orange body appears to be that it is a secret society, and he is opposed to all secret societies. If the hon. gentleman was as sincere as he professes to be, why should he not have offered the same opposition to the Bill incorporating the Dominion Grange in 1880. The Bill passed this House without the hon. gentleman having offered the same strenuous opposition to the Bill which he now offers to the measure for Orange incorporation. When this same society applies for some change and amendment to their Act, which they will probably do at this present Session, I venture to predict that the hon. gentleman will not offer the same opposition which he is now offering against the Orange Bill.

Mr. COURSOL. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that I would not offer similar opposition to the Grange Association. I never knew that association was a secret one.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that it is a secret association, that it has pass words, tylers at the door, &c.; and there is a Bill going through Parliament now giving that society additional legislation, and I venture to predict that the hon. gentleman will not divide the House on that Bill, and not oppose it as he is opposing the Orange Bill. I listened with a good deal of surprise to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). That hon. gentleman has adduced a number of reasons why this Bill should not pass, why the Orangemen of the Dominion should not be incorporated, and he has referred very lengthily to the history of the enquiry in 1835 by the British Parliament into the state of the Orange Society in Great Britain and Ireland. He has read to this House extracts from many of the speeches delivered there, but if he were as desirous as he professes to be to deal impartially and fairly with the question, he would have read a few lines further on, and would have quoted the impartial criticism of the compiler of the British Annual Register of 1836, and would have read the following—and this was written after the recommendation for the disbanding of the Orange Association of Great Britain:

"The Orange Societies immediately acquiesced, some of them with more cheerfulness, others of them with less, and all of them with regret. People asked, would a similar regard to expression of opinion by the Commons and the Crown have been manifested by those mischievous associations which the Popish demagogue employed to extend their own political power and the influence of their church, and which had set even Acts of Parliament at defiance."

We find from all the testimony we have in regard to the history of the Orange Association, that Orangemen are law-abiding citizens. Notwithstanding the opinion expressed of a Committee of the English House of Commons, I say that Orangemen to-day, not only in Canada, but in the British Isles, particularly in Ireland, and in all the colonies, are loyal to the Crown under any and all circumstances. The Commission which was appointed to enquire into the state of Orangeism in the British Isles was a partisan commission. Its members started out with the pre-conceived idea that it was an illegal association, and should be wiped out. It made a most searching enquiry. Members of the Orange order assisted the Commission, and offered every facility for obtaining information as to the constitution, principles, acts and proceedings of the association; and notwithstanding the opinion of a Parliamentary Committee read to-day, that the Orange Association was illegal in Great Britain, we have the still higher authority of Sergeant Kerr that the Orange Association is not an illegal association. In giving his opinion, he says:

"I have perused the copy of the rules and regulations which accompany this case, with reference to the terms and provisions of the Statutes, particularly thirty George III, chapter seventy-nine, and fifty-seven George III, chapter nineteen, and I am of opinion that the establishment of the proposed society cannot be deemed to be in violation of any of the Statutes referred to, or of the provisions and restrictions intended to be introduced by the several enactments contained in them."

He also states:

"The preamble also recites that such societies have deluded ignorant and unwary persons into the commission of acts highly criminal, while no criminality whatever was at any time attempted or affected by the Orange Association."

We find that even under most exasperating circumstances, the Commission failed to find that Orangemen had aided, abetted or assisted in any criminal action whatever, and this Commission be it remembered was a partisan Commission got up with the preconceived idea of condemning the association, yet its members were unable to place a finger on any act of criminal or improper conduct on the part of the Orange Association. The Commission reported at great length, and one of its predictions was as follows:—

"When your Committee look at the political tendency of the measures of the Orange Society in England and in Ireland, and particularly to the language contained in addresses to the public and in the correspondence with the grand officers of the institution, and consider the possible use that might be made of such an organized power its suppression becomes in their opinion imperatively necessary."

The Orange Association since that period, about forty-six years ago, has gone on prospering. It has increased in numbers, influence and power not only in the British Isles, but in all British colonies, and I defy any hon. gentleman to point out any of the evils predicted there as following the success of the Orange Association. The great truth begins now to be understood, that Orangeism is distinguished from societies to which in former years it was compared by its abstinence from crime and disorder, and its happy influence on the country. Wherever the original institution prevails in strength, peace and prosperity abide under its protection—our gracious Sovereign is honored, her laws are obeyed, her subjects of all denominations have protection for life, liberty and possessions. Wherever the laws are trampled, or the Throne conspired against, life and property insecure—there Orangeism is feeble and unknown. These are momentous truths. The hon. member from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has asked the House what would be the effect of passing the Orange Bill so far as immigration is concerned. We have at the present time Orange Acts in force in several Provinces in the Dominion. We have not heard a word to the effect that such are prejudicial to the interests of the Province as regards immigration, and, in my opinion, the passage of this Bill would have a most beneficial influence upon our immigration prospects. It would show that the people of the Dominion are tolerant of every class and every religion, that they have no bitter prejudices against any man whatever his nationality and religion, and that he will not be interfered with in the exercise of his rights and privileges. I say that nothing will promote, in my opinion, immigration to this country of those who love freedom, more than the passage of the Loyal Orange Incorporation Bill. We are told that in Montreal it would be the means of exciting disturbances, and of disturbing the harmony which now exists. The hon. gentleman says that at present Protestants and Catholics live peacefully side by side. Well, it was not always so. It is like the story of the lion and the lamb, living side by side, but the lamb was inside of the lion. He also tells us that it is contrary to the Treaty of Paris to pass this Bill; and he would lead you to believe that by this means the Loyal Grand Lodge of Canada would obtain the government of the country; but they ask for nothing of the kind. They make the simplest request which any body can present to this House—for the power of holding their own property in a legal way. We ask for no more rights or interests in the government of the country than we have to-day. We now exercise our rights like any other citizens. We ask for no more; and this Act of incorporation will give us no more. The hon. gentleman also referred to the fact that the Orange Association was illegal in the Province of Quebec. Well, that matter is before the courts to-day, under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada; and, I think, that for a lawyer to give an ex cathedra opinion on a subject now sub judice was highly improper. If it be found that not only the Orange Association, but also all secret associations except the Freemasons are illegal bodies in the Province of Quebec, I think that this Parliament will lose no time—if the Supreme Court so decides—in removing disabilities, if such exist; and I am sure that the great majority of the people of Canada will at once vote for and sanction the abolition of such disabilities. He also tells us that the Duke of Newcastle vetoed the Bill incorporating the Grand Lodge of Prince Edward Island. We all know what the Duke of Newcastle did, and the insult he put on a large portion of the people of Canada when he came here; and also the snub he received from the Queen herself, subsequently, in connection with the same affair. He was a gentleman who acted unfairly towards the people of Canada, and he was a gentleman who has lost the esteem, and respect, and confidence of the great portion of the people of Canada by his interference and injudicious conduct when he was in this country. I will not occupy the time of the House any further than to say that the Orangemen are here, and they will remain here, whether they receive this Act of incorporation or not. Probably the refusal of it will make the body more numerous and more powerful than they are to-day. The moment that you refuse to grant to a certain portion of the people what they consider as their right and something to which they are entitled, such an act attracts many others towards them; and I think that if these hon. gentlemen wish to increase the power and influence of the Orange Association, they will do nothing that will accomplish this result more quickly than by following out the course which they are now pursuing. I hope that the majority of the hon. members of this House will rise above sectional and partisan feelings, and will view this matter in a fair light, and give to the Orangemen of the Dominion of Canada the rights to which they are fairly and justly entitled.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). With reference to the matter now before the House, I desire to say a few words in common with the hon. member for Cardwell. I regret very much that the hon. member for Montreal Centre did not confine his argument to the constitutional aspect of the case. I shall not discuss the case of Grant vs. Beaudry, for I have not given that case very careful consideration, but my impression is very strong that this case does not go the length the hon. gentleman would have us believe. I support the measure now before the House, and believe that the principle of toleration is the only question involved in the discussion. I have no doubt but that if any body of Catholics were to come to this House with a measure, asking for certain privileges, and having the same object in view, from a Roman Catholic standpoint, that the hon. member for West Hasting has in view by his Bill from a Protestant standpoint, every Protestant in this House, and every Orangeman in this House would support the measure which these Roman Catholics required; and it is on the principle of equal rights to all, on the broad principle of toleration, which I trust that we, as the representatives of the people may never forget, and on this principle alone I support the Bill now before the House. I have all my life so far lived, and it is not a very long life yet, in a mixed community made up of Roman Catholics and Protestants, who live together in peace and harmony, exercising the same rights of citizenship. I live within a few yards of the oldest Orange Lodge in the Dominion of Canada, and right above the office where I transact my business meets a Roman Catholic Association; but I have yet to witness the first aggressive act on the part of Orangemen in that community. I believe that the Orange Society is not an aggressive body, but a defensive association, based upon certain great principles which cannot be harmful, and must, if adhered to, produce good in the community. I speak not as an Orangeman, for I am not a member of any lodge, but from my own observation and the best information I can obtain concerning the Order. I think further, that the history of our Province of Ontario, will bear me out in the statement I have just made; that Orangeism is a defensive and not an aggressive association. If any body of men, be they Roman Catholics or Protestants, have a right to unite together in a society whether the feature of secrecy be observed or not, for defensive and not for aggressive purposes, I hold that such a society cannot be illegal by the mere fact of such union, nor so long as they abstain from any violation of the law. I regret very much that the hon. member for Montreal West, has seen fit to class the Orange Society, an order which has been noted all the world over wherever they have existed as a loyal association, on a par with the treasonable societies he mentioned, and which unfortunately do exist in some of the old lands, and possibly in some of the new countries. In expressing the hope that the measure now before the House will receive the sanction of Parliament, I would urge the attention of hon. gentlemen to one feature which seems so far to have been overlooked. It is this, Sir, that by passing this measure, Orangemen do not ask hon. gentlemen in this House to grant legislative approbation of the principles upon which their order is based, they simply ask for the privilege of holding their property in the manner most convenient to themselves and as other corporations hold it; and every lawyer in this House knows, and must admit, that the method of holding property through the intervention of trustees is inconvenient, cumbrous and expensive. Why should these men, who have never yet, so far as I have ever read in the history of the British Empire, committed a disloyal act towards their Sovereign, not be allowed to hold their property like other corporations—like the Dominion Grange, for instance, which has been referred to by one hon. gentleman? Why should they be denied privileges freely accorded to others? On the principle of fair play, of toleration, of extending to others the same privileges which I myself would wish to enjoy, I support this Bill. I hold that there is something above party in the position we are to take in this matter. I have no desire to say one word which would offend the religious prejudices or the religious opinions of any person, and I trust I have said nothing which would in any sense arouse anything like a sectarian feeling, a thing I would regret to do upon any occasion.

Mr. McNEILL. I am anxious to say a few words on this subject, because I have been brought up in that part of the Empire where Orangeism had its birth. I was born in the county of Antrim, in the North of Ireland; and I spent the greater part of my boyhood there; and every year until I came out to Canada, I spent several months in that neighborhood. It is, I think, known to everyone who knows anything of the matter, that it is perhaps above all other districts in Ireland, the one which is more than any other the centre of the Orange organization. I was brought up to believe that the Orange order was an order which, at all events, was not a beneficial order—that it was in point of fact a mischievous order—an order which, if it did anything at all, was only useful to keep alive old sectarian traditions, which would be far better buried out of sight. Those were the views which I entertained, and which were entertained by every member of my family. But, Sir, I returned to the Mother Country in 1880, and I spent the winter of that year in the north of Ireland, and I recollect very well what the circumstances of that country were. I recollect very well the astonishment with which every one received the letter which the Earl of Beaconsfield addressed to the Duke of Marlborough. That letter fell on the minds of the people in the north of Ireland, who, like myself, believed that the Orange body was a mischievous association, like a bolt out of the blue. In that letter Earl Beaconsfield pointed out—he astonished the civilized world by pointing out, and deliberately propounding, the proposition that the Empire was threatened with a conspiracy which had for his object the dissolution of the Union and the disintegration of the Empire itself. The civilized world laughed at the letter to the Duke of Marlborough, the civilized world knew a great deal better; it said that this communication was an astute party move on the part of that old Asiatic politician, but the civilized world came to learn differently. There were only the misguided Orangemen who believed in the truth of that statement—the Orangemen we had laughed at all our lives—they believed that statement of the Earl because they knew it to be true, and circumstances that arose afterwards were sufficient to justify the assertions which the Earl of Beaconsfield made. I recollect very well during that winter the sensation of horror with which we opened our morning and evening papers. I recollect well how we scanned the list of the atrocities which were perpetrated, not knowing but that some of our own friends in other parts of the Island might be the victims. I do not wish to say a word to hurt the feelings of any man; I will say more, that while I abominate these outrages, I have a warm feeling of sympathy with the unfortunate peasantry of Ireland. I can well sympathize with these men who in a half starving condition, warm-hearted and enthusiastic men were goaded on by agitators on the one hand and deceived by a miserable radical Government on the other—a Government that deliberately, month after month, refused, notwithstanding the urgent remonstrances of the law-abiding citizens of the country, to undeceive these men who led them to believe that it was possible for them to obtain what the Government knew well they never could grant—I say under these circumstances I sympathize with those men. But when the country was convulsed, when it was given over, bound hand and foot to anarchy (because the only men who were subject to the law and controlled by the law were the law-abiding citizens of Ireland) when the country was given over bound hand and foot to anarchy, when the very fabric of society seemed to be tottering to its fall, when Mr. Gladstone himself said that it seemed doubtful for a moment whether the forces of order or disorder would prevail—where did men look for relief? Where did they find loyal men—men that neither threat nor bribe could seduce from their allegiance? They found them wherever an Orange lodge held a meeting in Ireland. The result was that hundreds of men who had formerly like myself ridiculed this association enrolled themselves in its ranks. That was the reason why I joined that association; because I felt as others did, that this association had been, in a day of great and trying need, a benefit to the best interests of the British Empire.

After Recess.

Mr. McNEILL. When you left the Chair at six o'clock I was endeavoring to state some of the reasons which induced me and others who like myself had disapproved of the Orange association, to lay aside the prejudice which we entertained and to join that body. We became convinced that underneath the superficial blemishes which we had always blamed there lay a sub-stratum of noble, and true, and stable feeling which must commend itself to every loyal subject of the Queen. But, Sir, I should be sorry indeed if the idea went abroad, which has, I believe to a large extent been believed, that the Orange Order was one which was actuated by a feeling of dislike, a feeling of aversion—a feeling almost of hatred toward our Roman Catholic countrymen. For my own part, Sir, had this been true, had the Orange Order been such an Order as it has been described to be in this respect, it would have been impossible for me to have anything to do with it, for from my earliest childhood I have been on the closest intimacy with Roman Catholics. My earliest recollections are recollections of tireless and devoted care and affection which I experienced from Roman Catholics, and therefore it would have been absolutely impossible for me to have joined any association which had any ill-feeling towards those who had allways had such a warm feeling towards myself. Nothing can be more untrue, nothing can be more mistaken than the idea that members of the Orange Association are actuated by feelings of ill-will towards our Roman Catholic fellow countrymen. Sir, the raison d'être of the Orange Order is not hatred of Roman Catholicism, or hatred of our Roman Catholic fellow countrymen, but love and loyalty to the British Throne. That is the cause which has given Orangeism its strength, and that is the reason why it has extended so greatly, and become so much more powerful during the last few years. There have been certain objections alleged against the association which I would like to say one or two words about. In the first place, it is said that we are introducing here into Canada dissensions which have unfortunately existed in Ireland, and which it is very much better should not exist here. It is said that the Orange Order is the symbol of those unfortunate dissensions in Ireland, and that to assist this Bill would be in point of fact to promote here what has been alleged to be such a great evil in that country. The observations that I had desired to make on that head, have been so admirably made already by my hon. friend from Cardwell, that I shall pass them by altogether. It does seem to me that it is not a question of the introduction of Orangeism into the country at all; but we have to consider the fact that the Orange body is here hundreds of thousands strong; and we have to consider that that body asks for certain rights, and we have to decide whether or not we are prepared to grant them. Now, the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), has alleged that one of the effects of granting incorporation to the Orange Association in Canada would be the growth of intense bitterness between the different sections of society in this country. With very great respect for him, I venture to maintain that the very opposite would be the case; I venture to maintain that if there be anything more likely than another to soothe any such animosities, which may unhappily exist in any part of the country, it would be to grant these people the simple common right which they as British subjects claim. The right they ask is a right which is possessed by the humblest subject of the Queen, the right to hold property in their own name; and I cannot conceive how it would promote ill-will or ill-feeling in the breast of anyone that this common, simple, humble right should be afforded to the Loyal Orange Association in Canada. This right is in fact recognized by law in the Province of Ontario, but it is a right which we are prevented exercising, because the bringing of it into operation is attended with such peculiar expense. Therefore all that is asked, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, is simply the power to put into operation this admitted legal right—a request which I think ought certainly to commend itself to the sense of justice in the breast of every man present, and the granting of which, I venture to think, ought not to conflict with any sentiments or any principles cherished by any hon. member of this House. With reference to the Province of Quebec, it is said that this Act would be illegal—that we are asking our friends from Quebec to vote for the incorporation of an institution that would be illegal in that Province. Well, Sir, in reply to that I have only to make one observation, either that allegation is true or it is untrue. If the institution be not illegal, of course the objection falls to the ground. If, on the other hand, it be illegal according to the general law of the Province of Quebec, then I venture to say that this private Act will not in any way override that law, and will simply amount to a dead letter there, and will, therefore, if that argument is sound, have no effect whatever in that Province, and will not affect our French-Canadian friends in any way. But, Sir, I have no desire to weary the House with further observation. I would only say that I can scarcely think that one other objection which is sometimes made against this association is a well founded objection: that is, that it is a purely Protestant Association. Now, I am sure that all our friends, whether they are Catholic or Protestant, will feel that at all events the Protestant and Catholic alike ought to be allowed liberty of conscience; and I do think that it smacks to a certain extent of illiberality to object to an association simply because its members are men, who, while they are bound together to carry out one common political object, at the same time entertain one common religious faith. I do not think there is anything that ought to be objectionable to anyone in such an association as that. But, Sir, our attention has been directed to the fact that this association has a political object. My hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) brought that forward as a grand charge against the Orange body, and I observed, that when he did so my hon. friend from Huron applauded the remark. Now, Sir, with your permission, I will venture to state what the object of that association is, it is that every man belonging to it shall to the utmost of his power endeavor to preserve to us and to our children after us, intact, that matchless Empire of which it is our glory and our privilege to form so important a part—our British Empire. I say, Sir, it is our Empire, because we have our share in it just as much as our friends in England, Ireland or Scotland have—I say, we have a greater share. We may not to day have so great an influence; but how much greater is it to-day than it was twenty, ten, aye, five years ago. It is, Sir, an ever-increasing influence and an ever-growing power; and I venture to say that the day is rapidly approaching when this noble Dominion of Canada will exercise an influence in the Councils of the Empire which will be indeed a potent influence. I know not how it will be brought about; I care not by what machinery it is achieved; but this I do know, that I have a rooted and an abiding faith in the self-governing and conservative instincts of the Anglo-Saxon race, and I believe there is in store for this mighty British Empire a somewhat nobler destiny than a destiny of dismemberment. I believe that when the time is ripe, when the hour is struck, the Empire of England will prove worthy her ancient renown, and will produce men worthy to grapple with that great problem. I believe as the years roll on, we shall find these living links of loyalty and love that bind the colonies to the Mother Country drawn ever closer and closer still, closer to that Old Mother Land that guards in her bosom the bones of our forefathers. I believe that the time is coming, and I believe it is near at hand, when that matchless Empire that was won for us by the prowess of our forefathers, shall, by the wisdom of their descendants be amalgamated, and consolidated. Then, as to-day, and through the ages to come, one world-pervading Empire, flying one world-respected flag—the old, old banner of Britain, in whose folds liberty has built her home, under the shadow of which there dwells the purest and most perfect freedom to be found on earth. These are the sentiments and views, this is the political object which the Loyal Orange Association desires to promote; and I hope that these sentiments are not so disgraceful, that this object is not so repugnant to the sentiments of this House, as that I or that anyone else should be ashamed to claim connection with that association. Sir, I do not believe this right we ask can be denied. I do not believe that our Reform friends opposite will be so unjust as to deny it to us; I do not believe that our French-Canadian friends, whom we have so loyally supported, will be so unkind as to deny it to us; I do not believe that this House, the Commons of Canada, will deny to us this common, simple, humble right to hold our own property in our name, merely because we happen to be a purely Protestant organization.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but after what has been heard on both sides I may be allowed to say a few words, and I may say at the beginning that, perhaps, I will not please any party in this House. As a matter of policy perhaps it would have been better to allow this Bill to pass merely unnoticed, because I am sure that if incorporation were granted we would have heard most likely the last of it; but now that the debate has taken some proportions, and has become magnified to a larger extent than it ought, we should reduce it to its true value. The member for Montreal is, I think, right in assuming that this Parliament has no right, no jurisdiction in this matter, and I would have liked to have seen the whole argument on both sides based only on that ground. My hon. friend from Montreal Centre, who made a very good and powerful speech, had certainly very good and strong reasons in his favor; but his speech, I may tell him, will do probably more to create hatred in this Dominion than the passage of the Bill itself. I would like to see explained the true sentiment of what we call the Province of Quebec representation. There is a very great anomaly between what they say and what they do. I find at present they are all arrayed against Orangeism and Freemasonry. Still the fact stared us in the face that for years past the right hon. leader of the Government has been one of the highest representatives of the lodge of Freemasonry in this country. The hon. Minister of Customs is also one of the highest, if not the highest dignitary of the other association. How is it our friends from Quebec are the strong supporters of these two representatives of these two associations. Moreover, I think the right hon. Premier, before the last Election, promised his support, as it were, to Orangeism; yet that did not prevent any of my friends from the Province of Quebec from continuing their allegiance to their leaders. It is true they have become recalcitrant at present, to a certain extent, but it is rather late, and they ought to be more consequent in their views. We have heard of the sentiment of loyalty expressed by the hon. member for North Bruce. Well, I am surprised at the naiveté with which my hon. friend expresses this proposition. I have not read very much of the history of Orangeism—it never interested me very much—but I may say my historical information goes far enough back to attribute the sorrowful position of Ireland to-day in a great measure to Orangeism, and if that has been its effect there, then there is much to be said against it here. I will read an extract from a Belfast paper.

Mr. McNEILL. Name the paper.

Mr. CASGRAIN. A paper published in Belfast. It is not concocted for the occasion, and will show you the amount of loyalty which this association permits itself to indulge in. The following is the extract:—

"A GRAND ORANGE SPEECH:—The annual meeting of the Stalybridge Constitutional Association took place, says a Belfast newspaper, on Saturday. At the close of the proceedings, M. Booth Mason, in seconding a vote of thanks to the Mayor, said:—I have on my Orange scarf (cheers) because I am the Deputy Grand Master of the Orange Association of England (cheers) and because it represents a good principle. It represents civil and religious liberty. (Loud cheers.) It represents an open Bible. (Cheers.) It represents the spreading of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. Oh, brethren, shall I tell you something. (Hear, hear, cries of 'yes.') Two or three years ago I sent to the New York State 50 Orange warrants, and you will find in their lodge rooms—you will find 50 papers signed with the name of Booth Mason. (Cheers.) We have 300,000 armed Orangemen in Canada."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have two arms each of them.

"We have 250,000 in Ireland (cheers) and there is not one of the Queen's ships that sails out of Portsmouth but does not contain a band of Orangemen. (Cheers.) What, then, can we fear from Gladstone, that infernal Jesuit? (Loud cheers and laughter.) I defy thee—(cheers)—oh, Pope of Rome, thou unconfined fiend of hell, the Lord God shall shortly consume thee. (Cheers and laughter.) Oh, House of Lords—Must I say it—I will say it—(laughter)—thou shalt perish. (Laughter.) Shall I say something more? I will say it. Oh, Prince of Wales, thou wilt never be King of England. (Laughter and confusion.)"

Now, Sir, they say, like the old nigger: "Them's my sentiments." I take that to be a true index of, perhaps not the lodges of the present, but of what the Orange lodges were formerly. Their loyalty consists, not so much to their own Church, but it is the avowed destruction of the Church of Rome. I desire to record my vote against this Bill. It would have been much better if this Bill had been allowed to pass silently, but the effect of this discussion will have an effect the very reverse of what we expect, that is to say, we will make what are called political martyrs. We will excite the ire of these Orangemen. They are a powerful body, and whatever the result of this debate be, I hope they will have good sense enough to submit to it, as I hope the Roman Catholics will have sense enough to submit to it peaceably also. The hon. member for Montreal Centre said if this Bill passed, we would have another battle of the Boyne. On the contrary, the church I belong to does not dictate to us any such line of conduct, but it teaches us, in the spirit of the New Testament, that when we are smitten on one cheek we are to turn the other. If this Bill passes, I hope my Catholic brethren will rather submit to it than have another battle of the Boyne. These are my sentiments.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Mr. Speaker: I would not venture to take part in the present debate, knowing as I do my utter inability to discuss the subject now before the House in a manner either satisfactory to myself, to interest the members of this House, or to the advantage of the Orange Association whose cause I wish to advocate; but, Mr. Speaker, I feel it would be a dereliction of duty on my part to give a silent vote on a question of such vital importance and such intense interest to a great majority of the electors of the county I have the honor to represent in this House. During the debate on the introduction of this Bill, it was claimed by my friend, the hon. member for Bothwell, that he represented the ultra-Protestant county of the Province of Ontario; but without wishing to detract from the honor claimed by that hon. gentleman for his county, or from their liberality in electing him to represent them, I have yet to learn that there is a constituency in the Dominion that can claim precedence to the South Riding of Simcoe, boasting as it does of its fifty six Orange lodges. I have listened with a good deal of attention to the arguments used by the legal gentlemen who have attempted to prove to this House by special pleading that the Orange Association is not entitled to receive that measure of justice from this House which has been accorded to other associations during the present and during the last Session of the last Parliament. These arguments have failed to convince me and will have still less effect in convincing the hundreds of thousands of Orangemen throughout this Dominion that their claim is not a just one and that they are not entitled to what has been granted to other associations throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. I regret to say that I have a profound contempt for law as interpreted by lawyers when advanced by them. In corroboration of an opinion previously expressed I am of opinion that such laws are only intended to make litigation and to complicate the laws, so that it will require the services of the compilers to explain them. If the incorporation of the Orange Association is at a future time found to be illegal, owing to the disabilities under which some members of the Order labor in some of the Provinces, it will be an easy matter at a future time to do what is done with very many other Acts—from the Tariff downwards—to so amend it as to meet the exigencies of the hour and I am of opinion that if such an iniquitous Act does exist in the Province of Quebec the sooner it is amended the better. [*The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) said: what will be the effect of this Bill on the immigration to this country? Well, Sir, I consider that the effect of this Bill will be a most beneficial one, for the simple reason that it will assist in doing away with the evil effects which have been created in the Old Country, and it will prevent a class of immigrants coming to this country which I, for one, do not wish to see here, and I think it will save us a good deal of trouble in the future, and a good deal of expense.] I would ask these gentlemen for an instant to divest themselves of their legal minds and to view this Bill from an impartial and judicial stand-point, and I will attempt to give some of the reasons why I consider the Orange Association entitled to incorporation. The Orange Association do not wish to come to this House in the character of suppliants, nor do I wish to prostrate myself to beg for them. We come simply to ask for what we consider we have a right to demand. We do not ask for unusual favors, for extraordinary powers, we simply ask, we simply demand, rights which have been granted to other associations in this and in the last Parliament. During the last Session of the last Parliament an Act was passed incorporating the Sisters of Charity in the North-West Territories, empowering them &c., &c. Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that in the Orange Association we have men equally modest, equally virtuous, and equally religious as the Sisters of Charity, and, therefore, equally entitled to the consideration of this House. Their vows are not more secret. During the present Parliament an Act has been passed incorporating the Oblate Fathers of the North-West Territories, and not one of the supporters of the present Bill endeavored to place any obstacle in the way of its becoming law; and I again contend that the Orange Association are equally entitled to incorporation—being equally religious and equally desirous of serving God according to the dictates of their conscience. Exception was taken on the introduction of this Bill to the association calling themselves the Loyal Orange Association by the hon. member for Gloucester. Now, I consider that exception was not well taken, and consider they have a perfect right to any name they see fit to assume. They have ever been on the side of law and order, and their proudest boast has ever been that they will preserve the integrity of the Empire of which they are sworn supporters. I should think, Mr. Speaker, that at the present moment when we read of secret societies banded together for the purpose of murder, arson and dynamite plots, that the people of this country would feel an inward satisfaction at the incorporation of a society formed for loyal purposes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know why special privileges are granted to other associations which are denied to a Protestant association; in what way are they entitled to the consideration of this House more than we are? Are they not wedded to their own belief? Are they not aggressive? Are they not intolerant? The very fact of their denying to us what we have chiefly accorded to them is a proof that they are unwilling to grant to us, their fellow-subjects, rights which we have given them and which we could have withheld if we had seen fit to do so. Why should the Orange Society of all others be the one selected for a sacrifice? The only logical conclusion we can come to is, that its opponents are bigots and disloyal men who would pass resolutions of sympathy with rebels and assassins, but have not a word of encouragement for men who have ever stood by the Empire in its darkest hours, who combine only against her enemies, and by the opposition now shown to the passage of this Bill will prove to the world that they are still the noble sons of noble sires. It must not be supposed that by defeating this Bill at the present crisis that it will be finally disposed of as we shall continue to agitate to obtain our rights, and if unable to get what is justly due to us from this House, we will elect a Parliament from which we can obtain justice. We will give up the old party names of Liberal and Conservative and elect men to this House who are sufficiently liberal to grant us Orange incorporation.

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker: When this Bill was introduced into this House, and when it was proposed to throw it out without giving it a hearing, and without hon. members learning what the provisions of the Bill were, I, for one, felt it to be my duty, and felt it to be due to the electors who sent me here, to rise in my place and object to that proceeding. I demanded on that occasion a hearing for the promoter of this Bill. I went further at that time: I said I was ignorant of the contents of that Bill, that I was unaware what they were asking at the hands of Parliament. Since that time, Mr. Speaker, I have informed myself, and I now know the full scope of the Bill, and what it asks from Parliament. Is it not extraordinary that, while the right hon. leader of the Government, the hon. Finance Minister, the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. leader of the Opposition, all voted that the Bill should go to a second reading, no word of reproach has been cast on any of those hon. gentlemen, and no imputations have been attempted to be cast on their conduct by the press; but because I am a Roman Catholic, and because I saw fit to refuse to throw the measure out without a hearing, how have I been received by the Liberal press of the country? The Globe, the London Advertiser, and the Hamilton Times have all made animadversions against me for the course I saw fit to take. I say, if I was worthy of blame for having taken that course, so also were other hon. members, and a majority voted that the Bill should go to the second reading. With what state of affairs are we now confronted? Did not the Orange Association exist over the whole of British America long before Confederation? Is not the Grand Lodge of the Orangemen of British North America now in existence in all Provinces of the Dominion, and is it not a body exercising its functions in regard to that Order for every one of the Provinces? Such was the position at the time of Confederation, and it is the position to-day. I freely confess that if any act or vote of mine were likely to bring this institution into existence, if I felt we were going to give it a status which it had not already in the country, I do not think I would cast my vote in favor of the Bill. But I find this association in existence in every Province in the Dominion. In the Province from which I come it has not only an existence, but a very vigorous and strong existence, and a membership numbering hundreds of thousands. In the Maritime Provinces it has also a numerous membership, as also in the Province of Quebec. The association has property in all these Provinces. I know in Ontario it possesses a very large property, and since the first reading of this Bill I have received letters from Orangemen in different parts of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAWKINS. An hon. member says "hear, hear." Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope the relation between Orangemen and Catholics will long continue to be of such a nature that we can have communication with each other. What did those gentlemen say? They said they had many lodges in different portions of the country which long since would have passed into the possession of private individuals, and would have become dwelling-houses, if the association had had the right to deal with them and dispose of them. It is quite true, in many other places they may desire to acquire more property, and to hold the property in such a manner as to sue and be sued. But if hon. members will read the Bill through they will find nothing to cause apprehension of danger, or infringement, in the slightest degree, of the rights or privileges of any class of the community. Those newspapers which have been attacking me solely because I, a Roman Catholic, felt I was justified in casting my vote in this House according to my conscience, will be surprised to learn that, no longer since than 22nd and 23rd of September last, one of the largest bodies of Roman Catholic representatives ever convened in Ontario met in Toronto, and after having deliberated on this subject for upwards of six hours, decided we would have an interview with the First Minister, and Mr. Meredith, as leader of the Opposition in the Ontario House; and a committee of upwards of forty was appointed to wait on those hon. gentlemen at the Queen's Hotel, and did wait on them, and I was chairman of the convention and of that committee. And we were instructed without a dissenting voice upon the part of nearly a hundred representative Catholic gentlemen, from nearly every riding in Ontario, to say that it was our advice that this question should be settled; that it was our opinion, that the passage of the Orange Bill would be the means of bringing peace and harmony to the Province of Ontario; and that we, in our representative capacity gave it as our opinion—and there were there Members of Parliament, members of the Local Legislature, and representatives as I have said, of our body from Ottawa to Sarnia, and also from the southern boundary northward—and this was their unanimous advice tendered to the leaders of our party, that the Orange question should be settled, that it had long enough been the cause of discord and trouble in the courts; and that the settlement of that question, and according to this association the right to deal with its own property in the manner in which they might see fit, could be of no possible concern, could be no possible injury to any other body or class of the community. Yet, I, the chairman of that convention, the spokesman of that committee, appointed to wait upon the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, in the capacity he then was, of leader of the Opposition, have been stigmatized and asked to give my authority for having refused to give this measure the six months' hoist, when it was brought up in this House. Mr. Speaker, there is my authority. I had the right to speak as I did speak, as representing one of the most influential bodies of Catholic Conservatives ever convened in the Province of Ontario. Well, the position appears to me to be this: this association is in existence; this association has increased and multiplied its membership from the time that this question began to be agitated in this country; this association would have ceased long ago to agitate, and would have retired within their lodges, would have retired within their circle, but for the fact that, not only the members of the Orange Association, but the Protestant people of Ontario at large have felt, and feel now, that a great injustice had been done them in the denial to them of the right which is conceded to every other class of the community; and, as I said, the principle of incorporation was fully conceded in the Province of Ontario. At one time the Liberals took up this question in the Local House and settled it, and if they had had the courage of their convictions and of their opinions, it would have been heard of no more during the last nine or ten years. But for political reasons, in order that they might keep it up as a means of agitation, and in order that the cause of peace and harmony might be disturbed by this sectarian question—for I hold that it is no more and no less than a mere sectarian question—they have kept it open to the present day. With regard to the advisability of bringing it to this House, or of waiting to submit it in the Local Legislature of Ontario, I pass no opinion; but the member for Montreal Centre, and every speaker who spoke against the Bill, said that it should be relegated to the Legislature of Ontario, and that the Bill of incorporation would be had there. Now, as a resident of Ontario, and a member hailing from that great Province in which nearly one-half of the people of this Dominion is situated, I think that the difference between voting for Orange incorporation in the Legislature in Toronto, and voting for it here on the floor of the Dominion Parliament is very small; therefore I feel, for one, that I am perfectly justified in believing that to give this association the right to deal with its property, and to dispose of its property in the places where it is not used, and of acquiring property in other places where they require it, the right of holding their moneys in the name of their own association and of not being liable to loss and litigation through having held it in the way they do hold it now, is something which this House ought to concede. I know, for I have been for many years, at least during ten years, quite familiar on this subject, with the feeling of the Catholics of the Province of Ontario, and if there were that opposition of which we have heard, and that opposition to the measure which two or three sectarian papers have said there is existing in the Province of Ontario, would we not have had this House flooded with petitions against the passage of the Bill, but on the contrary we hear scarcely any opposition to the passage of the Bill. I can very well understand that the members hailing from the Province of Quebec feel somewhat opposed to it on account of their strong opposition to secret societies in every form, but I am bound to tell those members that I also, as a Roman Catholic, know my duties as such. I know that no Roman Catholic may or can be consistently a member of any secret organization; but I challenge any member on this floor, I challenge any co-religionist in the country, to point out, or show, that this obligation goes any further. I challenge them to show that it is incumbent on any Roman Catholic to persist in the state of affairs which is bringing a dangerous agitation in the country, which is fostering a state of agitation in the Province of Ontario, that must inevitably range the Protestant section of that Province sooner or later against their fellow Catholics in the same Province and in other Provinces of the Dominion. Now, as I said the other day, I believe that the passage of this Bill will be accepted as a peace offering; and that it can be of no possible injury to any class in the community; and that, moreover, I have a firm and abiding faith in that great church, in that great society of which I have the honor of being a member. I believe that wherein all the efforts of the German Empire, as wielded by the great Bismarck, having failed to affect the position and the standing of that great church in Germany, and although all the machinery of Government, all the aid of the State was brought to bear, still we find the church came out of the conflict triumphant over all its enemies. In Russia, we see the same thing come to pass. Notwithstanding all the machinations of the Government, and all the attempts to crush out that church in Poland, and to banish and close the churches, we see that glorious institution triumphant and going upward and onward in its great mission. Again in England—hon. members have pictured to us here to-day the state of affairs in England 100 and 200 years ago—well, at that time, what was the position of the church in England? The bishops were proscribed; it was illegal to perform the offices of the church in England or in Ireland; but the world has become more enlightened, has become liberalized, and we find the Catholic Church to-day in England, in as healthy and as prosperous a state as it is in any other part of the world. In the United States, where every association, where every society is allowed to band together and hold their property, a similar state of affairs prevails; and in speaking of the United States, I am only sorry that there is not more power in that country to restrict and restrain those men who are disturbing the peace of the British Empire at the present day; and I will ask from one certain paper in this Dominion which stigmatizes me as being a sympathizer with Orangemen—whether it is more honorable, more worthy of me, as being a Canadian, to be in sympathy, as they say I am, with a body of loyal citizens of this country, or to be in sympathy with those men who have brought much shame and disgrace upon Ireland. I ask that paper to state which of these is the more honorable or dishonorable position to occupy. I have nearly concluded my remarks. I did not intend to say so much when I took the floor, but I felt I was liable to be misrepresented and I only pleaded in favor of giving the Bill a hearing, and I only voted as my right hon. leader voted, as the Minister of Railways voted, as the Postmaster-General voted, as the leader of the Opposition and many others of the most intelligent members of this House voted, yet of all these I was the only member who was singled out for attack for having voted for the Bill, and, again, as being an inconsistent Catholic for having done so. I have now expressed my views, and I could quote from speeches of mine which I have delivered in different parts of Ontario during the last ten years and in which I have openly, strongly and manfully advocated the speedy settlement of this question in order that we might have happiness and harmony in this country, and in order, that these Old Country bitternesses might disappear, and that Canadians might join heartily in building up and fostering the welfare of this great Dominion, and forgetting, laying aside, and burying forever the differences out of which the hostility to this mere simple act of justice has arisen.

Mr. BURNS. I had not intended to offer any remarks to the House, but I desire to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Hawkins). That hon. gentleman, in the observations which he has made to night, has thrown out a distinct challenge which I, for one, am disposed to take up, not for the purpose of protracting the debate, but simply in order to refute a statement which he has made. He has stated to the House that the Catholic Church does not do any more than prohibit her members from belonging to secret societies, and he says he challenges any Roman Catholic to deny the assertion. I, as a Roman Catholic, deny it. I assert that the Roman Catholic Church condemns secret societies in toto. I add to that assertion the observation that the eulogium which the hon. gentleman has made on the Catholic Church does not in any way cover up, in my mind, the attack he has made on the Church of which he says he is a member, in saying that that Church does not condemn secret societies.

Mr. SPROULE. On looking over the Bill which is before the House asking for the incorporation of the Orange body, I find that there is very little in it to be considered. The first thing which is asked is that the association may be enabled to own its own property. I recognize that it is the right of a Government to secure not only to individuals but also to incorporations, to people who band themselves for any legitimate pursuit whether it be manufacturing, or the promotion of any religious opinions, or any benevolent purpose, or any other charitable institutions—I say, I apprehend it is the right of the Government to secure to these parties, whether individually or collectively, the right to use and to hold their own properties. There is no doubt that there is a great deal of sentiment in connection with this question. The history of the institution in the past has done more to prejudice the people against it at the present time than anything else; but if members were to look around and see what the society is really like they would find that it is a progressive society, that it has comparatively lost its original identity, and is to-day more in harmony with the spirit of the age. It has materially changed in that respect in this country. It is composed of very large numbers of men that are acknowledged at least to be respectable members of society. They ask the right to hold their own property, to contract debts, to have the privilege of suing others, or to be sued themselves. They ask that when this property is of no more use to them they shall have the privilege of disposing of it and of distributing the proceeds in any way they may see fit. I think no man can see anything wrong in that. Looking back over the history of this Parliament and other Parliaments in this country from the earliest inception of Government, I have not been able to recognize any period when so large a number of men acknowledged to be respectable members of society came before a Government, asking a Bill of incorporation for any reasonable purpose, and had that right denied them. We have incorporated religious associations, enabling them to hold and dispose of their property—benevolent societies, and we believe it is right that they should be incorporated, because they are doing a good work. We have incorporated charitable institutions, and they are all tending, as this one is, in the direction of harmony with the spirit of the age, the spirit of progress, of benevolence and of good. In the opposition taken to this Bill there are several principles involved—one is that it would not be in harmony with the law of the Province of Quebec. So far as the constitutionality of the Bill is concerned, I cannot say anything, because I do not consider I am capable of judging it in that respect; but if the Bill is constitutional, then I think in some other way it should be our duty to remove that disability which rests on the association, and of harmonizing the laws in this respect. Another principle is that secret societies should be condemned, and those hon. gentlemen who hold these views are legitimately entitled to hold and express them. There is no doubt they have good reasons for the ground they take, but they will concede to others the same right to hold other views. My own opinion is that so long as a society appears to be for the promotion of the welfare of humanity, so long as it has for its object the aim of this society, that is, to concede to all classes religious liberty and toleration, then we should not condemn it. So long as it has not a tendency to undermine the foundation of society, so long as it is not treasonable or prejudicial to the welfare of the country, then I think it should be regarded as a fair and legitimate society in any one of the Provinces. We find that in Ontario at the present time almost every society is admitted whether it is secret or otherwise, but we do not find any bad results from the existence of these societies. We have the Freemasons, the Oddfellows, the Orange Association, the United Order of Ancient Workmen, and the Good Templars, and fifty others, all of which are composed, perhaps, of some of the most respectable members of society; as a whole, they are acknowledged to be good members of society. Now, I say, that so long as a society has for its object the promotion of the welfare of humanity; so long as it does not interfere with the Government of the country; so long as it does not tend to break down the institutions that go to make up the civilization of the country, then we should not pass any sweeping condemnation of it. With reference to the Orange Association, it is said that it has a tendency towards the exaltation of the Protestant religion. I can only say that, from my knowledge of it, I do not understand it. I understand that it is the imperative duty of Orangemen, if one Catholic lives amongst 10,000 of them, to accord to that man the greatest freedom to pursue his own religion, and that no matter what a man's religion may be, whether he is a Roman Catholic or a Jew, so long as his profession is a religious one they have the right to protect him no matter from whom aggression may come. It may be said that the Orangemen themselves are aggressive. I am led to understand differently. I understand that one of the imperative rules of the Order is that its members are to be slow to take offence, that they are to give no offence. Another rule is that he must be a good member of society, because he must live in accordance with the laws of the land. He must, so far as possible, live in conformity with the laws of the religious denomination by which he is governed, and while he does this, I do not think we should pass any sweeping condemnation upon him. But I believe the prejudice that exists to-day against the Orange Order is more in consequence of the history of the past than because of any of its actions in the present day. I think that in those parts of the country where Orangemen are most numerous and best known, people have the best opportunity of judging of them; and in those parts of Ontario where they are very numerous, we cannot find any testimony against their respectability, their submission to law as citizens, or any conduct on their part which might be detrimental to the interests of the State. This being the case, and in consideration of their large number, and of the small requirements asked in this Act, I think it will be only fair in this House to concede the measure, and instead of making them stronger I think the result will be to make them weaker. I know of many of these Orangemen who have their lodges invested in trustees, and who would be willing to dispose of that property and send in their charter, but they cannot do so. It must be held by trustees, and if these trustees make away with that property they have no redress. It appears to me that they are something in the position of an insolvent without any law to enable him to wind up his affairs. They only ask what is reasonable, they only ask to have applied to them the golden rule of doing to others as you would have others do to you.

Mr. HACKETT. It was not my intention, when this question was introduced, to make any remarks upon it; but as the discussion has gone on and taken a wide range, I consider that I would not be fulfilling my duty by giving a silent vote. It has been said by the promoter of this Bill that the Orange Association is a charitable institution, and that the Orange Order is a tolerant order. Now, I am disposed to think that such is not the fact, judging by the rules of the organization, which I have in my hand, in the shape of a small book called "The Constitution and Laws of the Loyal Orange Association of British America." By the book, I find that a member of that society, although at the time he joins it may be a good Protestant, may be expelled in disgrace from the Order for the slightest reason. One of the reasons given for expulsion is marrying a Roman Catholic or Papist. I do not think a charitable or tolerant institution would do that. Another reason given for expulsion is any member sending his children to a Roman Catholic School. I say that any organization that acts in this manner is intolerant and uncharitable to the last degree. I listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Hawkins). He states that he is a Roman Catholic and that as such he is inclined to give his support to this Bill. I may say that I am a Roman Catholic as well as the hon. gentleman; but I look upon this Orange Society as one aggressive to Roman Catholicism. I look upon it as being opposed to Catholicism, and, such being the fact, I, as a Roman Catholic, would be derelict in my duty if I did not oppose any measure directed against the religion which I believe to be the true guide to salvation. I am conscientious in the matter, as I believe the hon. gentleman who brought up this Bill to be conscientious. The hon. member for Cardwell said that it would be better for Orangemen to be allowed to walk on the 12th of July, and that Catholics should remain indoors, and no bitterness would result. I think it is a most astounding proposition to make, that Catholics, on the 12th of July, should suspend all their business operations in order to allow men to go through the streets, simply because they are Orangemen. The hon. gentleman is, of course, educated up to these views, but I look upon them as being narrow-minded and intolerant. Why do Orangemen march on the 12th of July? Why do they think it necessary to go out, on that day, with yellow ribbons, yellow flags, and yellow regalia, and flaunt them in the faces of Roman Catholics? Why does the hon. gentleman think it necessary that, in this free country, they should be allowed to do it? They simply do it for the purpose of reminding me that my forefathers were defeated, some two hundred years ago, by their forefathers, on the banks of the Boyne. They do it for the purpose of reminding me that a solemn treaty, entered into by the Irish people who were conquered at that time by the Prince whom the Orangemen immortalized, was violated before the ink was dry on the paper; that the Roman Catholic people of Ireland, of whom I am a descendant, were used in a manner which, at this day and this age, would not be allowed. These are the facts, and the hon. gentleman need not attempt to deny them; and when we see these processions marching before our faces, we cannot be blind to the fact that they are intended to remind us that we must bow in submission as our forefathers did two hundred years ago. That is one reason why I refuse to vote for the incorporation of this association. There is no reason why in free Canada we should perpetuate the religious animosities of our forefathers. There is no reason why we should take an oath of ultra-loyalty. All that is required of a good citizen is, that he should obey the laws and take the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) made a very unwarranted attack upon Roman Catholics. In replying to the hon. member for Montreal Centre, with regard to a certain class of immigrants being turned away from our shores, he said it would be better if they were. Now, I think that was a gratuitous insult to the Irish Roman Catholics, whom the hon. gentleman must have meant. I do not see why he should insult these people. The Roman Catholic people have always, as far as I have known, been, with very few exceptions, loyal to the British flag in every part of the world where they have been called to fight for that flag. They have done their duty on the plains of India, in America, on the burning sands of Africa, and no later than last year on the plains of Tel el Keber. Irish Catholics have always done their duty whenever required, and the stream of blood shed in defence of the British flag has always been increased by the pure blood of the Irish Catholic. The insult offered to the Roman Catholics of Canada and the world by the hon. member for South Simcoe is one that casts discredit only on its author. While I think the hon. member for Montreal Centre entered very largely into the constitutional question in regard to this Bill, I think it will prove of interest to state that in the Province of Prince Edward Island we had a good deal of discussion over these questions, and I am sorry we did not follow this evening the rule followed in that Legislature on that occasion, when I had the honor of a seat in our Local House. Both parties agreed that it would be better to take a silent vote on the Bill, so that no ill-feeling might be created, as both Catholics and Protestants lived side by side on the Island, and had always entertained the best of good feeling towards each other. For my part, I have always found in my intercourse with Orangemen that they were as honest and as generous in their dealings as any other people. I do not believe that Orangemen individually are intolerant, but that the Orange body as a society is an intolerant and uncontrollable association. We voted against the Bill, but it was carried, and was reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. It was sent up to Ottawa in 1878, when the hon. member for East York was at the head of the Government, but was not dealt with until the present Government came into power. That Bill was sent back to the Lieut.-Governor of Prince Edward Island, with the following despatch:—

"RESERVED BILL.

"In addition to the above Acts, a Bill was passed entitled—'An Act to incorporate the Provincial Grand Lodge of Prince Edward Island and the subordinate lodges in connection therewith,' which was reserved by His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor for the signification of His Excellency's pleasure thereon.

"In 1873 two Bills were passed by the Legislature of Ontario entitled—'An Act to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of Western Ontario,' and 'An Act to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of Eastern Ontario,' which were reserved by the Lieutenant-Governor for the signification of His Excellency's pleasure thereon. Upon these Bills the then Minister of Justice, Sir John A. Macdonald, reported as follows:—

"That these Acts purport to incorporate two Provincial Associations. That the only object of these Associations appearing on the face of the Acts is the holding of property real and personal.

"That this being a Provincial object the Acts are within the competence and jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. Such being the case, in the opinion of the undersigned, the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario ought not to have reserved these Acts for Your Excellency's assent, but should have given his assent to them as Lieutenant-Governor."

Referring to the two Acts and the reserved Bill of Prince Edward Island the despatch concludes as follows:—

"If the Acts should again be passed the Lieutenant-Governor should consider himself bound to deal with them at once, and not ask Your Excellency to intervene in matters of Provincial concern, and solely and entirely within the jurisdiction and competence of the Legislature of the Province."

This shows very clearly that these Acts come under the competence and jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, and that the gentlemen seeking incorporation should apply to them. In Prince Edward Island, the Bill was again revived in 1881, and the Lieut.-Governor of the Province vetoed the Bill, so that the question, as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, is looked upon as settled, because this action will always stand as a precedent. Therefore, this question is settled for all time to come in our Province, and I know that a great deal of ill-feeling and disturbance would be created there if this Bill becomes law.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am not a believer, Sir, in the fallacy that the discussion of questions distasteful to one nationality or another, one creed or another, should, as a matter of convenient policy, be avoided in this House. I believe this to be the proper place, this the High Court, to which all classes of Her Majesty's subjects should feel safe in appealing, and thus appealing, rely upon being justly and impartially dealt with. Within these walls, Sir, I take it, we have virtually entered into a solemn compact to cultivate mutual forbearance, mutual toleration, and if the mixed population of this Dominion is to continue to live in peace, and the great future we have marked out is to prove other than a dream of enthusiasm—all classes, all creeds, all sections, must adopt the golden maxim of doing as they would be done by. Questions such as these must be settled from a higher level than that upon which political problems are sometimes solved; questions involving the rights of minorities, the duties of majorities, and those higher incidents of statecraft which tend to impart vigor and give permanence to the principles and designs of responsible government. For, if we are not able to withstand the promptings of prejudice, if powerless to school ourselves in the true elements of self-government, we are not worthy of being entrusted with the discharge of higher legislative responsibilities. When the Bill now before the House was introduced by the hon. member for East Hastings many who extract a modicum of interest from speculating on the effect a question of this nature might produce in the ranks of both political parties, not unnaturally expressed grave apprehensions that the discussion would re-open old sores, resurrect old issues, and engender bitterness, discord and personal acrimony. Happily, Sir, so far, there has not been the most remote manifestation of ill-feeling, and no better proof has been furnished for many years within the House of Commons that the people's representatives properly estimate their duties and appreciate the blessings of the Constitution under which they live. All profess, I think, to recognize the individual and collective rights guaranteed under that Constitution. All creeds claim, and reasonably claim, the enjoyment of certain well-defined privileges, and whilst making no scrutiny into the inner lives or religious convictions of those from whom they may differ, each reasonably expects to experience like consideration. By such reciprocal relations alone can perfect harmony be maintained, and by such reciprocal relations alone can we hope to avoid those national breakers that in the past have wrecked so many communities and destroyed so many States, where the hand had done its work whilst the heart failed to throb responsive to the advanced intelligence of the age. Convinced that where the masses are educated and possess ready access to centres of knowledge, where the press is daily within the reach of all, and public opinion restrains anything approaching either injustice or license, I feel, Sir, that an attempt to curtail the liberty of conscience or legitimate freedom of action enjoyed, or sought to be enjoyed, by any portion of the commonwealth would be a most questionable, in fact, a most pernicious experiment. Realizing this, my duty is clear, namely, on all occasions to advocate the same powers, the same rights, the same liberties for a body of my Protestant fellow-countrymen, that I am willing to extend to those belonging to other religious denominations. I am not, Sir, a member of the Order petitioning for incorporation, and if the request was that we should sanction, by Act of Parliament, the inauguration in Canada of processions commemorative of any unpleasant reminiscence of a bygone age, I would not vote for it. Those who now ask for power to hold land and to dispose of the same, to own banners and have a corporate right thereto, to sue and be sued, have for many years enjoyed the privilege of marching in procession and of meeting in lodges. It is one thing to confer certain rights, either by custom or legislation, but quite another to deprive the holders of them, unless it be clearly demonstrated that they have abused their privileges and done violence, under cloak of those rights, to both social and constitutional usage. A similar argument, alluded to this afternoon by the hon. member for Cardwell, was held to be good when the country was agitated about Separate Schools, and heated debates thereon took place in the old Canada Assembly. An effort was then made to repeal the 19th clause of the School Act, but the leader of the Government of that day—the same hon. gentleman who, although a quarter of a century has elapsed, still guides the destinies of a greater Canada—fought the battle against all odds in favor of maintaining Separate Schools, and was assisted whilst so doing by every leading member of the Orange Order in the Province of Upper Canada. I cannot forget these things, and as an unprejudiced observer, I cannot fail to remember that those who comprise the Order now applying for consideration, have at all times, since responsible Government, been exponents of and believers in the extension of equal rights to all loyal and law-abiding people, irrespective of class, creed or nationality. In a circular signed by Thomas Keyes, Grand Secretary of the Orange Association of British North America, dated March 30th, the following explanations are made with reference to the Bill now before Parliament. I quote, in brief, the salient clauses of this document:

"1. Nearly all the primary or private lodges of the association own property upon which have been erected halls or lodge rooms for their purposes, but such property is held without any legal tenure. The value of this property in the aggregate amounts to many hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is vested in trustees, who are in no way responsible at law to the association, and we are liable to suffer in the future—as we have in the past—serious losses from this cause.

"2. The Bill now before Parliament asks for no more than what has been heretofore conceded to religious and benevolent associations and other bodies—that is, the right to hold in our own name our own property; and does not accord the association any other legal status.

"3. Bills have been passed by five of the Provincial Legislatures incorporating our association; but, through no fault of ours, in three of these Provinces—Ontario, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island—the Bills have never become law. Under these circumstances, and in order to settle the question, we have appealed to the Parliament of Canada, for the passage of a General Act of incorporation for our society for the Dominion."

The proposition then, Sir, that we are called upon to discuss is, whether a society holding hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property shall be allowed to control such a property, instead of being forced to vest it in various trustees, thereby jeopardizing the funds of the institution, such funds being intended for and devoted to benevolent purposes. The proposition is not whether a certain order, calling itself an Orange Institution shall be permitted to march in procession to the sound of the fife and drum, discoursing music distasteful to a great many people who do not possess a sufficiently cultivated ear to appreciate that sort of harmonious luxury. With two branches of the subject, namely, the existence of the associations and their regalia processions, we have nothing to do; and as I said before, we are called upon to decide whether or not an association with ramifications throughout every city, town, village, and hamlet in the Dominion should have rights always accorded every other society that has heretofore applied for incorporation. I am convinced, Sir, that if the aim is to promote the vitality or to strengthen the roll of any institution of the kind, the surest way to accomplish this would be to refuse to countenance its existence. Give any large body of people a legislative grievance, and you beget for it widespread public sympathy. I found this assertion upon facts and figures, quite as correct as they must be convincing and significant. In 1841 the Legislature proscribed Orange regalia and declared Orange processions illegal. What was the result? From that day, within a short time, there was an increase of 50 per cent. in their numbers. In 1858 incorporation was refused, although all but fifteen of the members from Upper Canada voted for it. In 1873, although the Bill passed in the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, it was reserved for the signification of His Excellency the Governor General's pleasure, and since 1858 the numbers have doubled. Now, in 1883, the Dominion Parliament is asked to adjudicate upon it. I, therefore, contend that if those who are opposed to the Orange Association desire to lessen its influence or remove it from the arena of burning issues—the wise policy would be to grant without dissent, what the promoters ask, and to-day we find them asking the Dominion Parliament to grant them an Act of incorporation. If the House will bear with me I will refer hon. gentlemen to the opinions of some of the members of the Government of Ontario, or their leading supporters, when that Bill was before them. Nothing can be found in the history of this Order in Ontario to show that they are not in accord with the fair and impartial spirit of the people of the Province toward the religious minority. Mr. Bsthune, who was the member for Stormont in the Ontario Legislature, said :

"The Orange organizations could now hold property by trustees and could bring actions in courts of law; and the only desire the members of that body had in desiring that motion passed was that they might have power to hold the land on which their lodges stood and to purchase as a corporate body the banners they carried in their processions. He did not see that to pass this Bill would be an insult to Roman Catholics, who knew that the Orange organizations existed already. He believed that if the House refused to grant an Act of incorporation the effect would be to swell the ranks of the Orange institutions."

The hon. Mr. Mowat then, as at present, Premier of Ontario, then said :

"For his part he must say that he thought the opposition to this Bill attached too much importance to its effect. Orange bodies were, he said, legal bodies now; the Bill did not legalize them; Orangemen would not be one whit stronger if the Bill passed, or one whit weaker if it was thrown out. All that was asked was an additional convenience in doing what they could legally do now, and he did not see how that could be refused by any legislative body. With reference to the secrecy of the Orange body, to which the hon. member for Grenville had such strong objection, he himself could not see that was any objection which could make the House reject the Bill. He could see no harm in signs and passwords by which the members of the same body might know one another. Respecting the charge that it was a party organization, he quoted several cases in which this was disproved by the fact that the body was divided, some of the members taking one and some the other side in politics. Then, Orangemen attached a great amount of importance to loyalty, but our religion also taught us to be loyal to our rulers. There were quite as strong Protestants out of the Orange association as there was in it, and apart from the future which was always mixed up in such matters as that before the House, there was no ground for refusing the incorporation asked for."

Mr. Fairbairn, a leading supporter of Mr. Mowat at that time, said :

"He did not believe that the Orange body was a political organization, or its members would not be so divided. Formerly the Orangemen were nearly all Conservatives, but now many of them are beginning to look favorably upon the Reform party. Referring to the refusal of the old Parliament of Canada to incorporate the Orange organization, he said that it was the composition of the House at that time which had prevented the passage of the measure. The Friendly Societies Act in England, which allowed of the incorporation of any secret societies, was a precedent for the passage of these two Bills."

The Orange Order, in the minds of many, is associated with the Battle of the Boyne, and these appear to believe that as now existing it existed two hundred years ago. I think

hon. gentlemen who have paid any attention to the subject must be aware that not for one hundred years after that historical event did Orangeism come into public notice, the memory of William of Orange being commemorated in the constitution of the modern association as the friend and patron of Protestantism. We are all aware of the troublous times of 1795-98 in Ireland, and of the melancholy events that transpired there during that period of British history. Those now known in Ireland as Orangemen were first called "Break o'day" men in contra-distinction to other societies of various creeds and classes that then existed; they were styled Orangemen because of adopting a small ribbon badge, said to be similar to that worn by the Prince of Orange one hundred years before. But when hon. gentlemen say that this body in commemorating Protestantism stopped at nothing, in persecuting every Catholic in Ireland, I must endeavor to place the matter fairly before the House and can only do this by reference to the sworn evidence given before an Imperial Parliamentary Committee, in 1835, many years after the events of 1795-98. In the first place the declaration of the Grand Lodge of Ireland, 1798, when the first Grand Lodge was formed, distinctly recorded the following solemn pledge:—

"We further declare that we are exclusively a Protestant Association; yet, detesting as we do any intolerant spirit, we solemnly pledge ourselves to each other, that we will not persecute, injure or upbraid any person on account of his religious opinions, but that we will, on the contrary, be aiding and assisting to every loyal subject of every religious description in protecting him from violence and oppression."

Again,—I now quote from the declaration of the Orangemen of Down, in 1813 :

"We solemnly declare in the presence of Almighty God, that the idea of injuring any man on account of his religion never entered our heads; we regard every loyal subject as our friend, be his religion what it may; we have no enemies but the enemies of our country. To this declaration we now once more solemnly subscribe. Our principles are unalterably the same, and deeply do we deplore the attempts now so conspicuously made to raise the cry of religious war in this land."

A copy of the qualification necessary for an Orangeman was also handed into the Parliamentary Committee. It provides for a member of the Order being attentive to his religious duties, sober and tolerant, true to Protestant principles, and a devoted adherent to the Crown based upon Protestant succession. As a further proof of loyalty to Ireland, as well as the Crown, I find it recorded that eighty three years ago, at a full meeting of some of the lodges in Dublin, Orangemen joined in protesting with Irish Catholics against the Union with England, in these words :

"We consider the friends of that abominable measure a Union with Great Britain as the greatest enemies of Our Gracious Sovereign; a measure which would destroy our existence as a nation; and eventually involve the rights, liberties and even the lives of the people of Ireland."

Again :

"As freeholders, as Irishmen in all the several relations in which we are placed, we consider the extinction of our separate Legislature as the extinction of the Irish nation."

And yet we are told that these men hate and despise those who are not of their religion. Here we find that eighty-three years ago they were protesting, as thousands of Irishmen to-day are protesting, against being deprived of their Legislature and the right to rule over their home affairs. In Canada the declarations and obligations are very similar to those adopted in Ireland when the first lodges were formed, only modified in order that they may be adapted to existing circumstances, but in no one particular can I find a declaration on their part that they are the enemies of Roman Catholics. The obligation they take is almost similar to the Queen's Coronation Oath—and is not one that could reasonably be objected to. But there is another important phase of this subject that I think the House, in its wisdom, should take cognizance of; that is, the protection each Province has against being forced by a Dominion Statute to accept legislation affecting its Provincial autonomy or the constructive rights and privileges of Provincial legislation. In the appeal of the case of the Citizens' and Queen Insurance Company vs. Parsons, which came before the Privy Council, in 1881, Sir Barnes Peacock, Sir Montague Smith, Sir Robert Collier, Sir Richard Couch and Sir Arthur Hobhouse being present, the question of Provincial, in contradistinction to Dominion Jurisdiction in Canada, will be found fully elaborated. I wish to call the attention of the House to the following, bearing out as it does my contention that it is fully within the jurisdiction of any Province opposed to the powers given to a corporation to restrict, prohibit or curtail these privileges. Their Lordships said :

"Suppose the Dominion Parliament were to incorporate a company with power among other things to purchase and hold lands throughout Canada in mortmain; it could scarcely be contended, if such a company were to carry on business in a Province where a law against holding lands in mortmain prevailed (each Province having exclusive legislative power over property and civil rights in the Province), that it could hold land in that Province in contravention of the Provincial Legislation; and if a company were incorporated for the sole purpose of purchasing and holding land in the Dominion, it might happen that it could do no business in any part of it, by reason of all the Provinces having passed mortmain Acts, though the corporation would still exist and preserve its status as a corporate body."

Now, the Province of Ontario, in 1873, declared in the Legislature, by a majority of eight or ten, that it was advisable to give the present petitioners corporate powers. For reasons I am not going to discuss here the Act was not sanctioned. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have given these powers, and Manitoba and Prince Edward Island have also passed Bills granting similar powers. I believe a majority of the representatives from Ontario in this House are prepared to grant the prayer of the petitioners—hence it would seem very unjust that the privilege of holding lands and owning property should be denied, when it can only be done by the votes of those in whose Province the Provincial Acts are now in force, or by the votes of gentlemen whose Provinces, if they object, have full power to so legislate as to suspend the operation of the Dominion Act in such Province. I think the judgment of the learned gentlemen from which I quoted unmistakably establishes this, and being granted it should certainly exercise great influence in determining the action of this House with reference to the measure now under consideration. In alluding, Sir, to details connected with this question, I am actuated by no unworthy motive. I have no advantage to gain, no personal interest to serve; nor do I desire to say aught that would disturb the feelings or wound the sensibilities of any class throughout the Dominion. Representing, as I do, a constituency, one-half of which is composed of Catholics, had I consulted my own interests I might have been tempted to adopt a different policy; but, Sir, if my election as a member of this House depends upon the facility with which I adapt my views towards gratifying the peculiar prejudices of either Protestants or Catholics, then I do not desire to sit in Parliament, high and honorable though the position may be. No man can be the true friend of any class, who, for the advancement of political ends, encourages a war of creeds or a war of nationalities; and no man can be fair to one if he consents to be unjust or indifferent to the other. The lesson of toleration and forbearance must be learned, and its precepts respected by all of us, if we desire to be impartial judges or wise custodians of legislation; and this we know, that the tangible progress of a people towards advanced civilization is ever marked by the decline of passion and prejudice; for where passion exists, there can be little room for reason; and where prejudice holds sway, toleration becomes the mere shadow of a god-like attribute—the clay imitation of a marble statue. I have said, Sir, that one-half of the constituency I represent is peopled by those who do not confess the Protestant faith, and knowing me as they do I feel confident they are convinced I would not support this Bill for one moment if their interests were jeopardized. I ask the question: Have the Orangemen sought to injure or oppress the Catholics of Canada? Have they abused, maligned or refused to admit them into possession of rights and privileges enjoyed by other classes throughout the Dominion? The answer must be—they have not. I ask, then, will this special Act increase the number of Orangemen? Will a refusal to yield it abolish the Order? Will granting it clothe them with dangerous powers, powers inimical to the well understood principles of constitutional government? Certainly not. Then, I say, in the interests of peace, of unity, of concord, let the petitioners have what they ask and put an end to ceaseless clamor and agitation. O'Connell spoke wisely when, addressing the Orangemen of Dublin, he said: "I would gladly wear the Orange regalia, if by so doing I could promote the peace, happiness and prosperity of my beloved country." And those who know what peace, happiness and contentment we enjoy in Canada can well afford to do what some may consider a little wrong in order that what is considered by many a great right may be secured to a large body of our fellow-subjects. In Canada we enjoy all the blessings vouchsafed to the most favored nations; the portals of learning, the avenues to the highest positions in the land, are open to all. Every man is the arbitrator of his own fortune, and may gain, as many have done in the past, the highest positions in the gift of either the Crown or people. As to whether he wears a green or orange ribbon is a matter for his own conscience—for colors are not made the standard by which men are measured when aspiring to serve their country. The liberty to speak, to think, to act according to the dictates of conscience, are held to be inalienable rights, and when a man tells me he does not believe in secret societies, I respect his convictions. But that is no reason why he should stigmatize those who do. I believe that a refusal to grant what is asked will create a grievance that will make more Orangemen year after year than any other policy that could possibly be adopted. Sir, as a Canadian, I hold in high respect the rights, privileges and even the prejudices of all who call Canada their home; but I believe experience has taught the lesson that in a country like this, mutual concessions are the best safeguards against national or sectarian feuds. The nearer we approach perfection in true liberality, the nearer we approach perfection in self-government, and no man who utilises a question such as that now under discussion, for the purpose of promoting political objects, can possibly aspire to the honor of being considered a friend to his country or a leader of his countrymen. Those who came across the Atlantic with their roses, their shamrocks and their thistles, came to build up a great nation on this portion of the American Continent, came, too, to assist in grafting upon our system of government all the best portions of the British Constitution, came to lay the foundation of what is not only a dependency, but must rapidly become a powerful ally of the Mother Country. By reciprocal toleration and forbearance alone can this be done; by reciprocal toleration alone can that mission be accomplished. Let us then stand upon one common platform, each plank a maxim from the divine law of human brotherhood, and each man striving in his own way to solve the problem of national progress. Then our children and children's children will cherish the memory of those whose self-denial and patriotism laid the foundation of a Western Empire—an Empire peopled by one of the greatest confederation of freemen the world has ever known. They will say: our fathers were great warriors, for they warred against and vanquished the promptings of passion and prejudice; they warred against and vanquished the legions of discord and anarchy, and placed high above everything else the divine attributes of conciliation, forbearance and social order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker: I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than three or four minutes, and I do so to give a reason for the vote I am about to give. It is something new to me—I think it is something new to hon. members on both sides of the House, from the Maritime Provinces—to find such a vein of feeling excited by the introduction of so simple a Bill as that now before the House. We, down by the sea, have not been accustomed to any such prejudices being aroused as we find in this House to-night, since the Bill has been under discussion. We cannot understand it; it is new to us. In Nova Scotia, when I had a seat in that Legislature, a Bill of this kind was introduced and passed without the slightest discussion, no hon. member thinking it worth while to refer to it. The Archbishop of Halifax of that day laughed at the idea of a Catholic rising in his place in the House and opposing the Bill, because it happened to have the word Orange in it. He said: "Let them have it and it will never be heard of again." The result justified that sagacious prelate's predictions, and we have never heard anything more about it. No one ever thinks of turning up the measure, which is simply an incorporation Bill, the same as many other Bills. I should have thought, from hearing the discussion, that this was a dynamite Bill, or that some one was going to kill somebody. I was astonished, on entering the House, to find the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) in a perfect paroxysm of apparent passion; I believe it was more feigned than real. I left the House on Saturday morning at about two o'clock, having heard an hon. gentleman in a very moderate tone of voice pleasantly discuss the question of the importation of agricultural implements into Manitoba. Matters were then very quiet, and yet, entering the House to-day, I found the hon. member for Montreal Centre swaying himself backward and forward in a perfect paroxysm of passion, denouncing somebody. I looked and asked: "What is the matter?" to my hon. friend on my left. He said, "I don't know." I said: "What is up? is anybody killed?" It is this Bill—yes. I took it up and read it. There was nothing about Orangemen in it, except that the word Orangemen was mentioned. I found it was simply an incorporation Bill, to enable a lot of people, numbering somewhere, I believe, about 250,000 of the inhabitants of Canada to hold their property, no longer by invoking the aid of trustees, but directly the same as anybody else; that is all that there is in this Bill; and why was the time of the House taken up by references to the Battle of the Boyne, and the old fights in the old times when people acted very badly indeed, both Protestants and Catholics; when they fought and wrangled like dogs and cats for nothing—some of them. Why were we treated to fields to be made sanguinary by the blood of Catholics and of Protestants in the streets of Montreal, on the next 12th of July? Why, there was a picture drawn that made a modest, retiring man like myself feel that I would hardly dare enter Montreal in future, for I do not know when these things may break out and somebody be killed. I looked and saw that this Bill enabled these people to hold property, which they hold now, but only to hold it differently. If this Bill were to perpetuate Orangism, and if there were any single prejudice existing by any line of it, I could understand members rising and objecting to its passage; but I cannot understand why any person who has studied history, and more, why any loyal member of this House, why any hon. member having a seat here in Parliament, knowing that this is no place for airing private prejudices, and that it is not the spot where we are to show what we like and dislike from private sources, from our own private feelings, but that we are here for mutual consultation and reference with regard to the subjects before us—should vote against this Bill. Suppose there was a Bill here to incorporate St. Patrick's Society, would any person, any Orangeman, or any Protestant in this House, jump to his feet and say this means the perpetuation of Catholicism in Canada, that these people had no right to exercise their functions and to march in procession on the 17th of March, if you like, and to hold all the property they wanted to have, or all they can find? Why, nobody would ever think of such a thing. I also heard the hon. member for Prince County, (Mr. Hackett). He seemed to think that this was a question of Orangism vs. Catholicism. He went into history, too, and had a lot of books before him; but hon. members have mistaken entirely the drift of this question, and I intend, for my part, to vote as I voted before, and give these people the right to hold their property if they want to, and I am quite sure that if this House is the place where civil rights are obtained, and where we can meet for mutual consultation, and to give those civil rights where they do not contravene anything in the spirit or letter of the Constitution—we ought to do so. I do not believe that this question originally—to tell the honest truth about it, and not to go into history here for hours and to thus occupy the time of the House—was a question of Catholic vs. Protestant at the time of the Revolution of 1688. I have not read history that way, but something like this: that a King by the name of James the Second, I believe, undertook to subvert the Constitution he was sworn to maintain; and that men were found who would not allow him to do so; and those who gave him the most strenuous opposition were the Catholics themselves of England. That is what I learn. I also learn that an Admiral, a Catholic Admiral, when told that when the French ships of Cousin Louis were to come near his ships he was to lower the old flag, and allow the Frenchmen to overrun his vessel—he was a Catholic and an Admiral—he heard them for awhile, and when the plot was made known, that he was to lower the old flag under which he had sailed, Catholic as he was, he brought his hand down on the table, his old patriotism getting the better of any religious prejudices, and exclaimed—"If I meet them, by God, I shall fight." And I say, that this was not a religious question; it was a patriotic question whether the throne of England was to become a dependency of the French Crown; and we find that a daughter of James the Second was the wife of William, who happened to give the name to this Bill, because he was Prince of Orange, an asthmatic, pale, man, whose body did not betoken the spirit within him. This Prince landed in England, with the experience before him, that the Duke of Monmouth, a nephew of James the Second, had been caught in a corn field, and suffered death for his attempt, at the hands of his uncle; but he landed with his wife; and it was the Catholics of England, who, finding that James had, as no king of England had ever before dared to do, violated his oath, helped William the Prince of Orange; who else could never have accomplished the revolution. Then why should the members for Montreal Centre and Prince County (P.E.I.) fight all these battles over again,—and "thrice he routed his foes, and thrice he slew the slain." Why should they fight these battles over again, not from a historical stand-point, but from prejudices which have crept in since. This Bill does not curtail anything, or add to anything; and I am quite sure, that if we are here to give this Bill the same consideration which we grant to any other Bill, we will pass it, and not work ourselves into a paroxysm of passion, either feigned or otherwise; and protest that this Bill means blood and thunder and murder, and everything else—for it does not. It is no more harmful than any other Bill which has come before the House, and we from the Maritime Provinces can vote for it—although I do not believe that there is a single Orangeman in the county I have the honor to represent; and I shall not stultify myself, having voted for a similar Bill down there with good results, because a few persons, with the experience of green on one shoulder, and orange on the other, had hit each other and knocked each other down in Montreal or somewhere else—by voting against this Bill. If these people get into such a state of mind as this, not because of any of the real merits of the matter, but from mere sentiment, like the two boys quarrelling, when one puts a chip on one of his shoulders, and the other knocks it off; this is no reason for our acting foolishly. We men, with heads on our shoulders, should allow our judgments to rule, and not our passions and prejudices. I did not intend to make a speech; but I thought it only due to the House and the constituency I represent, to give the reasons why I vote for the Bill, and why I think that people called Orangemen are entitled to own their own property in their own way.

Mr. BEATY. I am gratified that the Bill has reached its present state, and I trust it will receive the second reading at the hands of the House. I voted against the motion made at a previous stage for the six months' hoist, because I thought it due to the House and the country, and especially to the number of petitioners who applied for the Bill, that it should receive the second reading, so that we should know the character of the measure itself. We now have the Bill before the House, and we find that it is a very innocent Bill, that it is a matter of no great consequence except to those who seek the incorporation; that, in fact, it only seeks to give to them the same power of dealing with their property that many institutions of the country, religious and otherwise, enjoy. I am sorry to observe that sectarian issues have been imported into this discussion. My view of the functions and the work of this House is, that it should not legislate for or against religion; and so far as I can observe with reference to this particular Bill, it does not legislate for religion in any particular sense, nor against it. I am quite persuaded that this Bill does not withdraw from any other class of the community any of the religious rights they now possess, or those civil liberties which we so abundantly enjoy in this free country. In that view of the case I propose to support the Bill. The Parliament of old Canada declared in connection with the Clerical Reserves that there should be no semblance of union between Church and State in this country; and I think that declaration should be upheld so far as any legislation which comes before this House is concerned. When we observe this other fact, that this legislation is demanded by about 1,500 lodges in all Canada, representing it may be 200,000 or 250,000 active members, having sympathizers, or adherents they may be called, representing as many more, we find we have an aggregate represented of about half a million of people; and when we add to that number those who sympathize with them in this matter we have no less than one million of people of the most intelligent and industrious citizens of this country asking that this Bill shall become law. Under these circumstances, it is very important that we should not act in such a manner as to awaken an agitation amongst so many people in this country. What has been the course of legislation in reference to matters which have agitated the Provinces in their past history? In former times we have even heard, in Nova Scotia, the expression that the flag should be hauled down, yet concessions were made to that Province under which that agitation happily ceased, so that to-day I suppose there are no more loyal and patriotic men than the hon. gentlemen who come from Nova Scotia. At another time it was said, with reference to British Columbia, that she would secede from the Dominion. Yet, by conceding to that Province great privileges in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and otherwise, we find that all agitation has ceased. Now, if we have made concessions for the purpose why of settling questions of this character, should we not make concessions when we come to the question which will raise party and religious rancour in the country, and which, if these concessions are not made, will produce bigotry and prejudice to an extent which has not been felt before. Under these circumstances I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, who may feel disposed to vote against this measure, to consider well the course they are taking, and to come to the consideration of this question with their minds relieved from all sectarian prejudices, or of any religious aspect which the question may have assumed during this debate. I ask them to treat it as it ought to be treated, as a measure dealing with property, and giving to a large class of Her Majesty's loyal, industrious and intelligent citizens, those rights which other classes enjoy in this country. Since Confederation, as before, there have been many Acts passed sometimes in every Session giving rights to religious incorporations to hold property and in reference to all matters which pertain to their religion. It may be said that corporations connected with the Roman Catholic Church are not necessarily a part of that church; it may be that they are aids or auxiliaries for the purpose of promoting certain measures connected with the policy of the church, but however that may be, this House has over and over again legislated to give these corporate rights—as indeed, we are doing this very Session, and nobody has raised his hand against these measures, because they were in the directions of allowing the exercise of those religious rights which I trust no man will be deprived of in this country no matter what name he bears, or what tenets he holds. It is of the first importance in the interests of freedom and religion, in the interests of this free country to which we are seeking to attract immigration from all parts of the world, that it should go forth to any class of people that Canada is a country whose Legislature proscribes men who hold any particular views. With reference to a matter which does not affect the private interests of individuals, it is important that we should be able to tell immigrants, as I have frequently told the citizens of other countries, that we enjoy here greater liberty than in any other part of the world. When I meet our American cousins who talk about the liberty they possess under the soaring eagle, I always claim that we possess here greater liberty than they can under their peculiar Constitution. I think we should not say to any class of the community who does not assail the State or the Government or the Constitution of the country, which does not assail that civil and religious liberty which we so abundantly possess, that they are to be proscribed or prevented from obtaining those rights which have been so largely given to all classes of the community, no matter under what name they come here. I do not suppose if any Oddfellows Society were to come here that there would not be a sufficient number of a certain class of Oddfellows in this House to give an overwhelming majority in favor of a Bill of incorporation. And so with every other class of quasi-religious or benevolent institutions. The Orange Society, as I understand, is a benevolent institution; I am not a member of it, so I cannot speak with authority, but I understand that that is the case. It may be said that it is a quasi-religious institution, but even if it is so, why deprive it of the rights which we allow to others. I say that the sectarian element, and so far as the incorporation of this body is concerned, the religious element should be eliminated from the consideration of the question, and that it should be considered simply as a question of property, and as a question of giving this body facilities with regard to their actions which are given to other bodies of a similar kind. I do not propose to detain the House at this late hour, and after so much discussion, but I thought it well after the observations which have been made on both sides with reference to the religious character of this incorporation, if it has any religion about it, that an attempt should be made to bring the discussion back to its proper channel. I deemed it proper that this aspect of the question should not be pressed on the attention of the House, for this is not a national question, it is not a question of French or English, of Roman Catholic or Protestant, but simply a question of ordinary civil rights and of putting this society in such a position that they can exercise those rights as other bodies exercise them. I do not fear, if this Bill should pass, that the pillars of the Constitution will be carried away. I do not fear that the bulwarks of liberty shall be thrown down, or that the foundations of civil and religious liberty shall be uprooted. I do not fear anything of this kind. The world will grow, this country will prosper, I think it will prosper more largely and more widely if to-night we pronounce that we are willing to concede to every man equal rights and equal justice, and to maintain the great principles of liberty, equality and fraternity.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length on the matter now occupying the attention of this House; but in the course of the debate certain statements have been made which I feel it my duty to deal with. At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I must show cause why the name of a man whom we all respect, which name has been mentioned this afternoon, ought not to be mingled with this discussion. I allude to Sir George Etienne Cartier. It has been said that in 1858 this same identical question of the incorporation of a secret society, a question which we are now considering, had been laid before the House, and that Sir George Etienne Cartier, with some of the friends who then supported him, voted in favor of the incorporation of the Orange society. Sir, I now hold in my hands the Journals of the House of that time, and I find that on the 5th May, 1858, the first reading of the Bill to incorporate the Orange Association, was moved. This first reading was put to a vote, with the following result, as reported by the Journals of that time:—

"The House resumed the adjourned Debate on the question which was this day proposed, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of Canada.

"And the question being put, the House divided; and the names being called for, they were taken down as follow:—"

So that it was on the first reading of that Bill that the division took place, and on that occasion the hon. Sir George Etienne Cartier took the very same position as that taken recently, not on the first reading, but on a motion to appoint a day for the second reading, both by the hon. First Minister and the hon. leader of the Opposition. On that occasion the vote stood fifty-one in favor and fifty-one against. The question was settled by the casting vote of the Speaker; and the same day:

"Mr. Benjamin moved, seconded by Mr. Playfair, and the question being proposed, that the Bill be read a second time on Thursday, the 13th instant: The Hon. Mr. Cauchon moved in amendment to the question, seconded by Mr. Ross, that the words on 'Thursday, the 13th instant' be left out, and the words, 'this day six months' inserted instead thereof. And the question on the amendment being put the House divided; and the names being called for, they were taken down as follow:—"

Hence the second vote on that question was taken on the proposition to appoint a further day for the second reading itself. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it has always been admitted, and that it is a principle generally recognized, that the principle of a Bill is asserted only when such Bill has passed victoriously through the ordeal of its second reading, and if at that time some hon. members were not even willing to vote in favor of the first reading, it must be inferred that they certainly had some reasons which dictated such a conduct on their part, and made them follow the course they have followed. But on that occasion, as he would have done on that which occurred within a few days past, Sir George Etienne Cartier took a position for which we cannot blame him, for he never was called upon to pronounce himself on the real principle of such legislation, and if he was in the House to-day, I believe he would take on the present question just the position which we intend to take ourselves. This point being made clear, I propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with another remark which has just been made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Hawkins). The hon. gentleman has pretended that while as Roman Catholics we cannot belong to any secret society, yet we are not forbidden to vote in favor of their incorporation. I am very far from holding the views of the hon. gentleman. If, Mr. Speaker, we cast our eyes on the different societies now existing on the surface of the earth, what do we see? We see that there exist two great societies of a superior rank, on which all the others depend: the civil society and the religious society; the civil society, which is called the State, and the religious society, which is called the church. Mr. Speaker, in every society—and this is the enunciation of a principle universally recognized—the power must be ordained according to the purpose of the society, and the purpose of the society gives, so to speak, the measure of the extent of such power. What is meant here by power is the rights, taken as a whole, which are possessed by the society, whether those rights emanate from the society itself as an intrinsic source of power, or whether they are the result of certain agreements as extrinsic sources of power. By virtue of its nature, that is to say, of its intrinsic source, every society has a right to claim all that may be necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose towards which it aims. In the religious society, this purpose is the spiritual welfare of its members and nothing else, while the only purpose of the civil society is the temporal welfare of its members and nothing else. Now, given the existence of these two societies, they may have different connections, for the reason that the civil society offers in its composition a variety which must necessarily influence the nature of its connections with the church. Of course it will be readily understood that a Catholic state cannot have with the church relations of the same nature as those which a heretic state or an infidel state might have. Leaving aside, the civil society composed from a religious stand-point: 1st, of infidel members, a society which is independent from the power of the church; 2nd, of schismatical or heretical members, a society which is separated from the church but recognizes its power, we need only to examine the civil society, bearing always in mind that it is composed from a religious stand-point; 3rd, of Catholic members, a society united to the church and recognizing its power. Judged from this stand-point, the civil community is composed of members of whom none are at variance with the church, that is to say, we, as Catholics and as members of this House, belong to two different communities, one of which aims at a much higher and much more extended purpose than the other. If these two powers are united, all will be for the best, but if they are at variance which of the two must predominate on the other? That is the real question. Well, Sir, inasmuch as the spiritual welfare is far superior to the temporal welfare, inasmuch as the soul is far superior to the body, in the same degree must the religious community predominate on the civil community; and from this stand-point, Mr. Speaker, I think that we Roman Catholics ought to follow the teachings of the religious society to which we belong. Well, what are those teachings?

Mr. LAURIER. How about the Protestants?

Mr. LANDRY. I think that judged from this stand-point a Protestant is not a different being from a Roman Catholic. A Protestant belongs to both the civil and religious communities; and if the teachings of the religious community command him to do certain things, and if he is sincere, he must needs follow the teachings of the religious community in preference to those of the civil community, when the teachings of these two communities are not at variance. I am not discussing the question from the stand-point of any particular church, but from the stand-point of the religious community, taken in the broadest and most liberal sense of the word. Now, if as Catholics we have received the teachings of the church, it is our duty to follow them. If the Church has the right to command, it is our duty to obey. I hold in my hand a letter from His Holiness Leo XII, condemning secret societies. In this letter bearing date the 13th of March, 1825, the third year of his pontificate, I find the following:—

"Consequently after having taken the advice of our venerable brethren the cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, of our own impulse, of our unerring science, and after mature thought, we forbid for ever and under the penalties stated in the various Bulls from our predecessors which are herewith enclosed, and which we now confirm, we forbid, say we, all secret associations, both those that are now organized and those who may be organized in the future, and those who would conceive against the Church or any legitimate authority the schemes on which we have just called attention.

"Wherefore we commend to each and every Christian, whatever may be their rank, dignity or profession, priest or layman, regular or secular, without it being necessary that their particular names should be mentioned here, and by virtue of the Holy Obedience, never to allow themselves, under any pretence whatever to enter into the aforesaid societies, to take part in them, to favor them."

And further he adds:

"Or to aid or abet them in any manner whatever; on the contrary, let them hold themselves carefully aloof from the societies, their gatherings, meetings or assemblies under pain of excommunication which will reach whoever violates this order, even by the fact that he shall have violated it, and from which excommunication it will be impossible for him to be ever relieved, except by us or our successors, unless he is in danger of death."

Here we have, Mr. Speaker, what has been ordained by the head of the religious community to which we belong. Not only does he forbid us to belong to any secret society, but he also even forbids us to do anything whatever which spread their influence, or favor the extension. Now, the question before us is not only whether the Bill laid before the House contains, or does not contain the word "Orange," that is a question of a secondary nature altogether. The true question for us is to know whether the society now seeking incorporation, is, or is not, a secret society. Well everybody knows that for whom incorporation is presently sought, is really and truly a secret society, and for this reason it is our duty to vote against that now made before the House, and it is from this stand-point, Mr. Speaker, that we intend to act when giving the vote which we shall presently be called upon to give. Mr. Speaker, the society now asking for an Act of incorporation is either good or bad. If it is a good society—and the argument I use here applies equally well to any secret society—where is the need of secrecy? Why should it compel its members to swear to do right? The name of the St. Patrick's Society has just been mentioned, and it has been said that if that society asked for an Act of incorporation their demand would be granted. Yes, it would be granted, the same as it would be granted to either the St. George's, or St. Andrew's Societies, or to any other society of that kind. And why? Simply because these societies do not fear to float their respective flags to the breeze in broad daylight, and that their members have no need of an oath to do right. If they wish to do right, they have no need of an oath to carry out their intention. The oath which binds to secrecy the members of any society whatever, shows, or at least seems to show, that their aim is not the best that might be desired. It is for that reason that those societies are forbidden by the church. Now, for us, there is the constitutional question, which is a second reason, but a very strong reason why we cannot approve of the measure now before the House. The incorporation which is sought to-day is nothing else but the regulating of the civil rights of a society, and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think that this matter is outside of our jurisdiction. It ought to be left to the Local Legislatures. The objection that has been raised in the course of the debate by some hon. members has not, so far, been overthrown by the hon. members who are to-day fighting in favor of the measure; and until this argument has been successfully answered, I think that all who take an interest in Provincial autonomy ought to follow on this question, the course which their love for their own Provinces will dictate to them. I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) waxing pathetic on the subject, and stating that the Conservatives of to-day are not sincere in their support of Sir John A. Macdonald. Well, if in the past they have sustained this man, who, in his heart, may be a member of that association, and that is the only charge made by the hon. member for L'Islet, I can tell him with pleasure, that if we support the present Leader of the Conservative Administration, it is not because he belongs to that society, but because he belongs to a party far superior to that of which the hon. member for L'Islet is a member. And for this reason, Mr. Speaker: As long as our leader will govern the country with as much wisdom as he now does, as long as he will work for the welfare of the country, as long as he will respect our principles, as long as he will be supported in his Administration by those in which we have confidence, we will always be ready to follow in his footsteps. And whatever may be the position of the right hon. First Minister on this matter, I hope that our intercourse will be just as pleasant as heretofore, and it is to be hoped that in the future, as in the past, we may be justified in continuing to give him as hearty and as enthusiastic a support as that which we have always given him.

Mr. DUPONT (Translation). Mr. Speaker, my intention is not to take up much of the time of the House; I merely desire to point out one or two contradictions, which have occurred in the discussion which took place this evening. I have remarked that my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Hawkins) has eulogized in glowing terms the tolerance of the Orange Lodges. He almost humbled himself to the ground before this extraordinary tolerance of the Orange Society. However, I was still more greatly astonished, when I heard the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt), a moment after, giving a proof of this great tolerance, by telling the hon. member for Bothwell that it was not desirable we should have men of his race in this country. Mr. Speaker, it was certainly giving to the hon. member for Bothwell an immediate reward that he richly deserved, I think I am bound to say, for the extraordinary praises, the extravagant eulogium which he had lavished on the Orange Lodges of the Province of Ontario. I have observed, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members who are now discussing the measure before the House, have taken it out altogether of its proper bounds. Allusion has been made to hon. members from the Province of Quebec, as being opposed to this measure through religious fanaticism, and in consequence of their religious creed. Mr. Speaker, I think I must say that that is not the motive which inspired the opposition now made by the hon. members of the Province of Quebec, to the measure now submitted to our consideration. We are opposed to this measure because it is one of the many infringements which are constantly and daily made on our local rights, privileges and prerogatives. That, Mr. Speaker, is the true motive of our present opposition. I have remarked that every hon. member who has spoken to-night before this House in favor of this Bill went into ecstasies, and told us: "We are asking for a very simple thing; we are simply and merely claiming civil rights for this society to the incorporation of which you object." Mr. Speaker, it is written in black and white in our Constitution that civil rights are under the control of Local Legislatures; but, although I feel that the following reason is not one for which we are opposed to the measure now before the House, I must say, however, that in my humble opinion, the incorporation of such a society is not desirable in the Dominion of Canada. I remember having read that the Duke of Wellington assembled one day in his sumptuous mansion all the distinguished generals that England could furnish, all the eminent statesmen, all that she could muster of brave soldiers. After giving them a grand banquet, the noble Duke, being on the decline of his career, addressing his guests, told them he would ask them to join him in rendering a last service to his country. And, Mr. Speaker, what was this service? It was to put an end to the deplorable habit to which military men were then addicted, and which consisted in fighting duels. Heartily did the worthy and noble English society respond to so patriotic an appeal on the part of the Duke of Wellington, and, from that day, it is reported that duelling ceased to be honored in the English army. And why? Because all the upper class of the realm had joined hands to brand this fatal habit, which caused the English soldiers to kill one another, to shed their blood in domestic quarrels, for motives having their source in a false sense of honor, to so shed blood which should only have been shed on the battle-fields for the defence of the country. Mr. Speaker, it behooves us now to put an end to a certain kind of duel. The duel of to-day, I have no hesitation in saying, is the antagonism existing between the Irish Catholics and the Irish Orangemen, and I ask if the statesmen of this country would not do well to imitate the noble example given by the Duke of Wellington, to put an end in this country to these broils of another age, these dissensions which can only weaken the union, the harmony and good understanding which ought to exist between all members of society in the Dominion of Canada. I think that every statesman in the country, I think that all who wish heartily to see it thrive and prosper, ought to join hands to put an end to those dissensions which may bring a contest between two sections of the nation, fighting one against the other, and intent on fighting one another, as has been the case on certain occasions in this country on account of the Orange celebration. As a proof that our secret societies can always lead to evil, Mr. Speaker, have we not seen one of the most distinguished members of this House fall a victim to secret societies while going home from a sitting of this House? Well, what has been done in the past may be repeated in the future. I willingly believe that the Orangemen of the Dominion of Canada are loyal subjects, but in that organization there may be men with exaggerated ideas, and who can say where exaggeration may lead to. On certain occasions all the people are excited when quarrels exist between two factions of the population. Well, Sir, to prevent these misfortunes, to prevent all these difficulties, I think we ought not to favor the incorporation of those societies.

Mr. FARROW. I do not intend at this late hour to occupy much of the time of the House, but I cannot refrain from expressing my thoughts on this subject. I must say that certain things that have been said to-night were wise and some otherwise. For instance, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hackett) said that Orangemen were bound not to send their children to Roman Catholic schools. Now, the hon. gentleman is a Roman Catholic, I am a Protestant; and I will guarantee this: that there are ten Protestant young ladies in Roman Catholic schools to every one Roman Catholic young lady in a Protestant school. The hon. gentleman would condemn the Orangemen because that is in their obligation. There is not a society in Canada more guarded about the education of their children than the Roman Catholics, and I think I shall be pardoned when I say that the Roman Catholics have used a great deal of liberality towards Protestants in this respect. They have actually given inducements to Protestants to send their children to their select schools, by providing an education for one-fourth—nay, one-half—less than Protestants give the same education for. Now we have our own views about that. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island should be the last man to bring that charge against the Orangemen. I have tried to conjure up in my mind what might be the reason why we are denied this little privilege of holding a little lot of property to erect a building of our own upon. I said to myself: is it because the Orange Society is a benevolent society? Well, I came to the conclusion that it could not be that, because the Roman Catholic Church is a benevolent church. I believe the people of that church look after their own poor; I believe they are a humane people—I give them credit for it. Then I asked myself: is it because it is a religious order? I came to the conclusion that that could not be the reason, because I believe there is no class of people in this Dominion that are more religious and more observant of the rites of their church than the Roman Catholics, and I give them credit for it. I was struck with astonishment a few Sessions ago when one of the members on the other side—I think it was the hon. Mr. Anglin—told us in the House of an institution in the Lower Provinces where lepers are confined, and he told us that these poor creatures went into that lazar house never expecting to come out again, and who were the teachers that went there to provide the inmates with religious instruction? I must say—and it struck me very forcibly at the time that it was not Protestant, but Roman Catholic priests. They went into that dead house voluntarily expecting to take the contagion, and there lived and there died. I thought it was a noble deed, and I am sure that the old saying of Scripture was verified: "I was sick and ye visited me." Well, I came to the conclusion that this society was not refused incorporation because it is benevolent or religious. I thought it might be because it is a secret society. Well, partly it is a secret society, and partly it is not. There is no other society that I know of that is so open. It has very few secrets. It is less secret than any temperance organization, than the Grangers, than the Ancient Order of United Workmen, or any other secret society that I know of in Ontario, because its obligations are known to every one before he takes them. They are published broadcast. But the hon. member for Montreal set me at rest to-day. He gave me the reason why this Bill is opposed. He showed that the Orange Order meant Protestant ascendancy. Now, he is greatly mistaken. If he had made that charge against any Protestant Church—the Church of England, the Presbyterian Church, the Methodist Church or the Baptist Church—there might have been some truth in it. But when I tell you that no person can go into an Orange Lodge until he is a Protestant—they do not initiate Roman Catholics into the Order—how could it be Protestant ascendancy? Now, this is what I find, that my hon. friend says they are jealous of Protestant ascendancy—I do not know whether he speaks the minds of Roman Catholics or not. Then he makes a charge, as a representative man, against all the Protestant Churches of this and other lands. Now, that is a serious charge. How do the Protestant Churches grow? Do they grow by persecuting people? How have they grown? I tell you, and every Protestant knows, that they adopt the method of peace. They proclaim to the world the glad tidings that were first proclaimed by angels to men: "Behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy." That is the weapon they use. "Search the Scriptures," that is another weapon; and I mean to say that if they are jealous because Protestantism is growing in this land, we cannot help that. If the people will become Protestant we cannot help that. But I may say, I am satisfied with these explanations. I find that since about three and a half centuries ago, Protestantism has grown. There are about 1,300,000 people on this earth; about 195,000 are Roman Catholics, and 95,000,000 Protestants. Only consider, there were but few Protestants at the time of the Reformation, and that Protestantism has grown from a mere nothing in numbers to 95,000,000 in three and a half centuries—about 27,500,000 per century—and I do not wonder at my hon. friend from Montreal Centre getting alarmed. I suppose my hon. friend from Montreal Centre has been looking over the world, and he finds Protestantism has been growing in Ireland, for that is a fact; and in France, for that is a fact; and in Austria, for that is a fact; and in Italy, and that is a fact; and probably he is getting alarmed about it. We cannot help that, and what has this little Orange Bill to do with it. Has it come to this pass in Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada, that we Protestants shall give everything to our friends and receive nothing in return? I have been about twelve years on the floor of this House, and can testify that our Roman Catholic friends have brought up Bill after Bill in this House, and I have voted for them every time. I voted for the Sisters of Charity in the North-West last Session; I voted for the Oblate Fathers to own $1,250,000 of real property, or an annual revenue of $50,000 a year, the other day, and for the Christian Brothers who have been incorporated. Should they bring up any further Bills we would be liberal enough to support them; but we cannot be always giving and never receiving. We have certain rights which must be respected. Now, I can conceive what a beautiful influence there is going on on the other side, among our friends of peace and progress—I mean the Protestant ones—they are glorying about this little thing that is coming up in the House. Let them glory. Let them laugh inwardly. They want to say, those great Liberals to-night, that they have always been liberal. I do not blame Roman Catholics very much, they do not know what the Order is, as probably this is the first time, so to speak, they have been on a commission on it, but there are hon. gentlemen opposite, and some on this side who know all about it, but for a little political purpose and clap-trap, they are going to vote to-night against this little Bill of justice to the Orangemen of Ontario. I will read you a little extract from a Liberal paper, the Hamilton Tribune, on this subject:

"The course pursued by several of the Liberal leaders and members at Ottawa in voting against the Orange Incorporation Bill is unworthy the traditions and principles of a great Liberal party. As for the Globe, we suppose in its change of management it changed all its principles, and starts out to establish a new record. It formerly supported Orange incorporation, but now it justifies the action of the pseudo Liberals who voted against it. This comes of being a mere party hack."

Now, that is pretty hard from one of their own. I think further comment is unnecessary. I suppose they think they are doing a great thing to-night, but I must tell them, I believe a great opportunity has been given them to show their liberality, and if they will not accept that they will be the losers politically. I believe, if this matter of justice was granted to the Orangemen of this Dominion, it would quiet them for all time to come. But when this vote is taken to-night, and the Orangemen see that they are being denied this simple act of justice, what will be the effect? I believe this will be the effect, that Orangeism will grow. I believe the lodges will multiply, and I think it is a pity that this act of justice should be denied them. I think it would be far better to let them have this simple act of justice, and that we should all live peaceably and happily together. I come from a mixed community; I have mingled much with my Roman Catholic friends, and I am sure that a great many of them care nothing about this incorporation at all. There may be a few of them that object to it, but the great mass of the Roman Catholic population in my riding do not care one fig whether the Orangemen get incorporated or not, but they do wish to see this question settled definitely. I am sorry this discussion has taken place, and I think in the long run it will do harm, because there have been things said that will be treasured up in memory, and will yield their fruit in after days.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I wish to make a few remarks before the vote is taken. There has been a good deal of discussion on this Bill, but on the whole I am pleased that it has been so moderate. I trust that after the battle is over we will all be good friends. I think some things have been said that had better not have been said, and I think if the hon. member for Montreal Centre had been a little more moderate in his remarks all the others would have followed suit, and the Orangemen would have brought their Bill before this House, and the vote would have been taken without any party feeling sore for the remarks made by others. I would first say, that so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal Centre are concerned, he had no right to hurl them against Orangemen, at least of central Ontario. When I was Grand Master of the Province during the troubles in the city of Montreal, I did what I could to prevent them, and I succeeded in dissuading all but one lodge under my jurisdiction from going to Montreal, because I felt it was unwise and imprudent. If we get this Act of incorporation, I can assure that hon. gentleman and every other hon. gentleman in this House, that no Orangeman from Ontario will go to the city of Montreal to disturb the peace or hurt the feelings, or injure any party that resides there. We are anxious to forget what happened in the city of Montreal; we want to let it pass away from our minds altogether. We believe the Chief Magistrate of that city did not do his duty in the way he should. I think if he had pursued the same course as the Chief Magistrate of the city of Toronto, when the pilgrims made their pilgrimage through the streets, and when parties attacked them, and both Grand Masters along with the Mayor and the late John Hilliard Cameron, successfully protected them from attack—if the Mayor of Montreal had pursued a similar course, I believe to-day that the proud city of Montreal would bear a better name than it does. But I do not wish to recall those old matters, for, so far as I am concerned, I do not wish to hurt the feelings of any one. I would only say that whether I succeed or not with this Bill I shall always feel gratified to the Liberal members of this House, for the noble, kind and friendly support they have given it. We have brought before this House a request to be allowed to hold property upon which we pay taxes, to own the buildings for which we pay rent and to sell them when we no longer need them, and we want to know if in this great country that we are all so proud of, the freest country under the sun—if we are going to be denied that right by this Parliament, we want to know it, and if they do deny it to us there is one thing sure—our institution will not suffer, I do not believe, much by it. We have asked for nothing that is unreasonable, or unfair, or unjust; we have asked for that which is fair, just, proper and honest, and I am satisfied the great Protestant heart of this country is with us and think even-handed justice should be given to us. Now, there is another matter about this little Bill—as it has been called by some hon. gentlemen. An hon. gentleman who holds a high position in the Councils of this country, who occupies a very prominent position, said to me, when I asked him to support this Bill: "White we will give you the Bill, only take out that word Orange." Give up our name, Mr. Speaker! Why does not the Dominion of Canada give up its name? Why does not Queen Victoria give up her name? Why does not every great corporation in this country give up its name? Mr. Speaker, we will not take the Bill without the name. We hold the name dear to us, and under it we have prospered, and by it we will prosper if we never get an Act of incorporation. Now, I have nothing further to add. I am glad, I say, that this discussion has gone on so well, and so little has been said, and I thank those hon. gentlemen who have allowed us to come before this Parliament; and I shall be very grateful to any hon. gentleman in this House, no matter what his religious opinions, no matter what his political opinions are, if he will support this Bill; and I honestly declare that any influence I have, be it much or little, shall be accorded to him irrespective of the political party he belongs to. I trust that we will have a vote, and after the vote is over I hope the Orangemen of this country will discharge their duty as men of intelligence, men of truth, men of honesty, men of integrity, and that they will see where they can remedy this evil, and I trust they will do it. Perhaps we may have to wait a few years to get this Act of incorporation, but we will get it by-and-bye. Why, Sir, will we get it? Because the time is not far distant when the women of this country will have a vote, and they know in their heart that so far as this Act is concerned it will be a benefit to the country, for we shall establish at once a fund for widows and orphans, and the ladies of this country will give us their support. I am glad the hon. First Minister has introduced a Bill which will give the right of suffrage to a good many women, and if the Bill does not become law they will be able to elect good, true and conscientious men to this House who will give us an Act of incorporation.

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES ON GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE HURON.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved for copies of all correspondence and petitions addressed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, relative to the protection of the fisheries on the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, since the 1st of January last. He said: In moving this motion I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine to the unprotected condition of the fisheries on Georgian Bay, and the ineffectual way in which the system of protection is carried out. I know that correspondence has taken place between the Department and persons who have had opportunities of observing how these fisheries are looked after; but I wish to call the attention of the Minister specially to this fact, that the whole system of protecting the fisheries in Georgian Bay, as well as in the inland waters generally, is altogether inefficient for the reason that the Government employ persons to look after them who never take the trouble to go on the water and look after the men who are engaged in the trade. For Georgian Bay and the whole coast extending nearly 200 miles from Collingwood towards Killarney there are, I think, three inspectors, not one of whom ever thinks it his business to go on the water or visit the grounds where fishing is carried on. The consequence is not only that a number of persons fish who have no licenses to do so, but also nets are used of illegal mesh, and fish killed at seasons when they should not be killed. I think the simple and proper manner to protect the fisheries would be for the Government to appoint one or two persons who should make it their business during the whole season to spend their time on the water looking after those engaged in the trade. By that means we would ascertain that only persons fished who took out licenses, and also that fish were not killed at spawning season, and at other times when they should not be interfered with. I think it will strike anyone as very absurd that, on a long stretch of coast like that round Georgian Bay, where the law declares that certain persons only shall fish, and fish only at certain times of the year, yet there is no person whose business it is to enforce the law and see that it is carried out. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that he should adopt the plan urged upon him some years ago by a person acquainted with the business, that instead of having three or four men at different points, who never set a foot in a boat or go on the water, he should employ one or two vessels—even a Mackinaw boat would be better than nothing—to go up and down the lakes and visit the fishing grounds and see the law is enforced. If the hon. Minister would adopt that plan he would find that very satisfactory results would flow from it. To give a little idea of the value of the fisheries and the very small cost to the Government, I would simply mention that the fishery on Georgian Bay returns a yield on an average of over $70,000 a year, and that is merely from the number of vessels kept under license, and of which return is made to the Government. If the matter was properly looked into it would be found that two or three times that quantity was taken, of which no return was made, and the whole sum which the Department spends in looking after this fishery is very little over one per cent. of the whole amount derived. There is another very great evil—that the saw-mill owners along the Georgian Bay, not only destroy the fish, but also the harbors and navigable waters, by saw-dust being allowed to accumulate in the streams. It is no wonder that the mill owners on the Georgian Bay should be offenders in this respect, when we know that on the Ottawa, under the very walls of this House, the mill owners commit the same offence. It is most extraordinary that the Government are not able to enforce the law with respect to a matter of this importance. The Ottawa River in many places is not navigable where large vessels formerly passed up, and this is owing to saw-dust being allowed to accumulate. Parry Sound harbor is at this moment so obstructed with saw-dust that in parts of it a vessel cannot take out a load. The same state of things prevails on the Severn and the Muskosh, with other navigable streams entering the Georgian Bay, and all owing to saw-dust being allowed to accumulate. The Government, therefore, loses in a variety of ways, one being in revenue from the number of persons engaged in fishing without paying the required license. It also loses through the illegal destruction of fish, and from the manner in which the rivers and harbors are obstructed. In fact, it seems to me that there never was a people under the sun so utterly reckless and careless about their resources as are the people of Canada; not only do they allow their timber to be wasted and taken out of the country, but they actually allow the manufacture of the lumber to kill off the fish in our lakes and streams. In Parry Sound, where formerly valuable fish were to be found, you have to go twenty miles out to find fish; and this is all due to the manner in which, under the very eyes of the inspector appointed, I believe, by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, mill owners are allowed to put saw-dust in the streams, and not only obstruct the harbor, but destroy the fish. If the Government, instead of paying half-a-dozen landmen to go across the Bay in open boats, employed one or two persons, competent to take a boat and go up and down, an end would be put to this state of things. I used to think that the Militia Department was the most beggarly and starved Department in the whole Government, but now I think that the Fishery

Mr. O'BRIEN.

Department is the worst. Certainly the Minister has allowed his Department to be managed on very economical principles; and, unfortunately, mischief has been done in a variety of ways that can never be remedied. While we have, in this miserable way saved money, we have lost a large portion of our natural resources. We have a very expensive establishment at Newcastle for the raising of young fish; and we are asked to send applications to the Government to send fish to various portions of the coast. Now, what an absurdity it would be for me to ask to have salmon, or trout, or whitefish fry sent to the waters and along the shores of the Georgian Bay, when I know that they will be destroyed, before they attain legitimate size, by saw-dust, and killed out of season by people who ought to pay for licenses to the Government, but who not only do not pay for licenses, but make no returns whatever. The two things are perfectly inconsistent. What is the use of having establishments to breed fish to fill up waters which will be at once depleted. In the first place, we should carry out the existing laws for the protection of fish, and I would suggest to the Minister of Marine that he should take the first opportunity to revise the fishing regulations, and especially those under which the fishery inspectors are appointed; and while doing so to get a report of the coast and ascertain where there might be a certain portion of it set aside for breeding purposes, and no one to be allowed to fish there at all. Off certain portions of the coast here and there a few miles distant, suitable localities could be set apart where no one would be allowed to fish, to the very great advantage of the whole fishing interest; but it is useless to do so, unless the hon. gentleman adopts a more rigid and effective system of inspection. The first thing to do is to appoint men—even suppose he has to pay something like a reasonable salary—who will spend their time on the waters, attend to the fisheries and inspect the nets, a matter of very considerable importance, and see that no man fishes who has not a license; and above all things see that fish are not killed out of season and that saw-dust is not allowed to be put in the lakes to destroy them. When he has accomplished all that, which it is a very easy matter to accomplish, if he will only employ the right persons to see that the law is enforced, then it will be time enough to breed fish to put into the inland waters; but until he does that, the other is a great waste of time. I hope that the hon. Minister of Marine will take this matter into consideration, and consider particularly the fact that owing to the want of an efficient system of inspection, great loss arises, not only to the Government, but also to the country. The expense of the whole thing could not be very serious, if even he takes the money he pays out now and pays one or two persons, to gain the object in view. Then, if a man were compelled to have a boat and to be on the water—if a man hires a boat now it is as much as he can do to get the money for it out of the Department of Marine, for it is the greatest difficulty in the world to get legitimate expenses paid—a different and more efficient state of affairs would exist. Now, so far from our fishery officers being encouraged to do their duty, this is actually prevented, because they know that if they go to any expense they will have the greatest possible difficulty in getting reimbursed. I say that this is not the way in which this great industry should be treated. On Georgian Bay alone 10 vessels and 107 boats are employed, valued at about $3,000, and over 200 men are engaged in these fisheries, and this is not a way to treat an important interest like that; and yet this is but one sample of the way in which the fisheries generally are conducted. On Lake Simcoe, where I live, some years ago we had a very efficient officer, who had charge of the whole lakes, and I think this was when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. In enforcing the law, he found it necessary to fine some individuals on the east side of the Lake, represented then by a gentleman not now in the House. This gentleman did not like it, and thought it very hard that an officer should come into his constituency and fine his constituents: consequently he had a fishery officer appointed himself to take the east side of the Lake, and this person took very good care not to fine the friends of that member. Then the late member for South Simcoe, a Conservative, finding that his friends were being prosecuted by this zealous and efficient officer, who then had them in charge, wanted to get somebody appointed who would look after his interests and allow saw-dust to kill the trout in all the brooks; and so our fishing interests in the Lake and on those waters were allowed to a very great extent to be sacrificed, because hon. members of this House had more regard for the interests, or the feelings certainly, of their constituents than for the interests entrusted to them; and hence they adopted these means to defeat the ends of the law. It was just as bad on the one side as on the other. This is one of those things which this House and the Government should set their faces against; and although in this case it was a matter of comparatively small importance, it is a sample of the way in which the fishery inspection is carried out. It is most absurd to appoint to do these duties, landsmen who do not know one end of a boat from the other. If the Minister does his duty as he ought, he will consider the large interests involved, and employ efficient men, and not make it difficult to get a boat, but compel them to have boats, and repair in them to certain portions of the coast at certain seasons. I think that thus the Government will benefit, and a very important interest, which is also at stake in the matter, will be largely served and the fisheries protected; and then, and not until then, will it be worth while to send fry into waters which are now ready for use.

Mr. McLELAN. The correspondence will be brought down. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman attach much importance to the fisheries of Georgian Bay, and I hope that he will give the Department the benefit of his local knowledge, and that if we call upon him to recommend any overseers or inspectors in that district he will name men possessing the qualifications which he says these men should have. I think he is allowing for one man almost too much work—200 miles of the Bay or district. It seems to me that while a man is at one end of the Bay, there would be poaching at the other end, &c., and I think that more than one man must be employed to make the system efficient. I may state to the hon. gentleman that this matter is under the serious and earnest consideration of the Department. With the hope of removing the evils complained of in that district with respect to the saw-dust in the Ottawa, I may say that some years ago it was considered that the manufacturing industry was more important just here than was the fishing industry; and, therefore, Ottawa River was exempted from the operations of the Fishery Act, and this accounts for the fact that there is so much sawdust in this river.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for a return of all accidents and casualties which have occurred on the several railways in Canada for the past three years, ending 31st December, 1882, involving either loss of life or injury to persons or property, with a separate statement of each railway, showing the full extent and particulars of such casualties, the point at which they occurred, the causes and nature thereof, and in cases of fatal accidents whether or not a coroner's inquest was held, with the several verdicts returned thereon, with a copy of the by-laws, rules and regulations of each of the said railway companies, as required by the 55th Section of the Railway Act of 1879. The above returns to include similar returns of the Government Railways. He said: I ask for this return in order that I may obtain information with regard to all Government and corporation roads, for the purpose of making comparisons with returns ordered by the House giving similar information with reference to the Grand Trunk. I find that the number of fatal accident on that road last year was 57; seriously injured, 201; slight accidents, 48, or in all, 306. I find that in no less than 33 cases no inquest was held. The number of these casualties have been so great that the latter is one of vital importance to the country, and one to which our attention might probably be directed with a view of lessening these accidents.

Motion agreed to.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move that as the time for receiving the reports on Private Bills will expire to-morrow, the same be extended for a further period of eight days from such date.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 109) to amend an Act for the final settlement of claims to lands in Manitoba by occupancy under the Act 33 Vict., chap. 3.—(Mr. Royal.)

ROADS AND ROAD ALLOWANCES IN MANITOBA.

Mr. ROYAL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) to amend the Act respecting roads and road allowances in Manitoba, (from the Senate.)

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. ROYAL. An Act was passed by the Dominion Government some years ago at the request of the Manitoba Government to have the old trails in the Province of Manitoba surveyed by the Department. The property of those roads was vested in the Crown, and any change in those roads was to be made by the Local Government, the municipal system not being at that time fully in existence. Since that time the municipal system has been organized all over the Province, and whenever a Municipal Council wants to change the location of a trail or road they have to apply to the Governor in Council here in Ottawa. The object of this measure is to vest that authority in the Legislature of Manitoba instead of the Governor in Council.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. MITCHELL.

- 3 Resolved.—That it is expedient to provide by law that the export of Deer, Wild Turkeys and Quail in the carcase, be prohibited; and that a penalty be imposed for every breach of such prohibition.
- Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.
- (In the Committee.)
- On item 1, acetic acid,
- Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The duty on acetic acid is now 12 cts. per Imperial gallon, and I propose to make it 15 cts. This is an article whose value entirely depends on its strength. In some cases it has been introduced very strong indeed, and being diluted with water it is brought into competition with the vinegar made in this country as well as imported vinegar. In the United States the duty is collected according to the strength, and they have instruments for testing; but as that involves a good deal of expense and the employment of men qualified for that particular duty, we thought it better to add 3 cts. per gallon without making any distinction as to strength.
- Mr. BLAKE. This is a further protection to the vinegar makers.
- Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It applies to both the home-made and the imported vinegar.
- Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What will this duty amount to ad valorem?
- Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That will depend, of course, entirely on the strength.

On item 2, sulphuric, nitric acids combined, and all mixed acids,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The duty on sulphuric acid is specific, and as a rule the rate of duty ad valorem is higher than on nitric or muriatic acids, and the result has been that parties have sometimes been in the habit of importing sulphuric mixed with nitric or muriatic at the 20 per cent. duty. This, of course, interferes with the duty now imposed on sulphuric acid, and we propose to equalize the matter by putting on a duty of 25 per cent. on all mixed acids.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that for protective or revenue purposes?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is to prevent fraud upon the revenue to a certain extent, because by mixing they import the article at a lower rate.

On item 3, playing cards,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is not for the purpose of getting a revenue, but we think they can be manufactured in the country.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman proposes to encourage the manufacture of playing cards. You expect the duty to be prohibitory?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have no objection if it is.

Mr. BLAKE. About what rate ad valorem is equivalent to 6 cts. per pack?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Some are imported very cheap, and being merely water colors, if handled for fifteen or twenty minutes they show their inferior quality. On the better description this rate would be equal to about 35 per cent.

On item 4, printed music,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The present rate, 6 cts. a lb., is very low, and the manufacturers of sheet music in the country think they should have some protection, and therefore, we propose to increase the rate from 6 cts. to 10 cts. a lb. We think we might also get more revenue from this duty.

Mr. BLAKE. At what rate is it now coming in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Sometimes as low as 5 per cent.

On item 5, braces or suspenders,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The article from which suspenders are manufactured, pays 25 per cent. duty, and the duty on the manufactured article has been also 25 per cent. It is proposed to give the manufacturer 5 per cent. protection by increasing the rate on the manufactured article to 30 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the raw material made in the country?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. I may state that the Government not knowing that the article was made in the country, proposed to reduce the duty; but, on enquiry, we found that machinery has recently been imported, and that raw material is now being manufactured, and therefore we propose to increase the duty on the manufactured article rather than reduce that on the raw material.

Mr. BLAKE. At present the manufacturer of the raw material is taking the benefit of the whole duty.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The manufacturer of the raw material is taking all the benefit he can get out of it. He has to pay his proportion of the duty on the article he imports, but there is no reason why he should not be protected.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not making any suggestion, I am merely asking the operation of these various duties.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will there be any perceptible difference in the revenue from those five items?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We do not anticipate anything very perceptible; there may be a slight increase.

On items 6 to 12, carriages,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As I stated the other night, with reference to carriages and the other articles named in the items from 6 to 12, it is proposed to substitute a duty of 35 per cent. for the combined specific and ad valorem duty. On item 13, railway cars and other carriages, it is proposed to impose a duty of 30 per cent.; and on items 14 to 19, childrens' carriages of all kinds, 35 per cent.; on agricultural implements, we propose to place 35 per cent.; and I may state here, before we pass this resolution, that the Government have given very serious consideration to the representations that were made as to the effect this proposal was likely to have, especially on Manitoba and the North-West. We have had communications from the manufacturers of the Dominion, showing what they would be prepared to supply during the year, and they have assured us that there will be no increase in the price of the articles manufactured in the Dominion. We have also made the necessary enquiries to ascertain whether it is probable that the volume of these goods manufactured in Canada and ready for delivery within the next three or four months would meet the requirements of the Dominion. The Government, while anxious to give every encouragement possible to the industries of the country, do not wish to cripple or embarrass any portion of the Dominion, and therefore we propose that these resolutions, changing the duty from 25 to 35 per cent. on carriages and on agricultural implements of every kind, will not go into effect until the 10th May next. That, we think, will give ample time to the people of Manitoba and other parts of the Dominion to import such ploughs and similar articles as they cannot obtain in the Dominion. But with the protection of 35 per cent., we have no doubt that our own people will be able to manufacture for the next year, for that and every other part of the Dominion, without any necessity of going abroad for a single article, and at prices as low as have prevailed in the past.

Mr. BLAKE. What additional revenue do you expect to get on items 6 to 8?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We do not expect to get any. The effect, no doubt, will be to increase the manufacture at home, and leave the revenue about the same.

Mr. BLAKE. How will it increase the manufacture?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There will be less imported than formerly, but at a higher rate of duty.

Mr. BLAKE. Has there been much importation of carriages during the last year?

Mr. BOWELL. A good many of an inferior and some of a superior quality. There has been a considerable importation, especially of buggies from the Western States, attempted to be entered at a very low figure, and of a very inferior quality. The importation has been chiefly to Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the general price at which they have been entered for duty?

Mr. BOWELL. Low-priced buggies and one and two-seated carriages have been imported principally from Cincinnati, as low as $45 to $150. In every case where the entries have been made at low rates they have been appraised and the rates in all cases raised. The $45 vehicle has been raised as high as $65, sometimes $75; and the $75 ones as high as $125. Sometimes a penalty of double duty has been imposed in addition.

On item 13, railway cars, sleighs, &c.

Mr. BLAKE. Does this apply to all kinds of railway cars?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Were railway cars imported to any great extent?

Mr. BOWELL. No; except by the Pacific Railway Company, when they could not get supplied in Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. I have heard of three tenders asked for, I think by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also by another Canadian Company, from Canadian and American manufacturers, and in one or two instances the Americans obtained the contracts.

Mr. BOWELL. The company complained they could not get them made in the Dominion in time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I remember a large number of cars imported chiefly by the Canadian Pacific Railway because they could not be supplied in the country at the time—1,800 to 2,000 cars. No doubt, from the extension of the capacity of one or two of our establishments we will be able to supply all that may be required in future.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Did the Government import any?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot say, but if any were it was because they could not be got here in time.

On items 14 to 19, children's carriages of all kinds,

In answer to Mr. Ross (Middlesex),

Mr. BOWELL. In the amended resolution a portion of these articles are now made 35 per cent., and it was necessary to repeat the words in the old Tariff, so as to state definitely what duty the other articles not mentioned in the first resolution would bear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why have the specific duties been departed from? Why has the hon. Minister changed his mind on these carriages?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In fixing the specific and ad valorem duties the Customs Department were requested to take the average rate, 35 per cent.; but when they were requested to give us different rates and different prices we found this varied so much that in some cases it gave more protection than was necessary, while, in other classes of goods, it made them a little lower than 35 per cent. Therefore, finding there were such discrepancies in it, and that that particular class of carriages was brought in here undervalued, it was considered better to adopt a uniform rate, 35 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman for South Grenville (Mr. Banson), who congratulated the hon. Minister on his extensive adoption of specific duties, not now expressing his regrets that no sooner has this good come than it vanishes. It seems to me that the statement of the hon. Minister is one that he ought to have blushed at, instead of smiling, in making it. He tells us that he ordered the Customs Department to make a statement, and a whole list of specific and ad valorem duties was brought down, and upon the values being moved for he finds the whole thing does not work, that in point of fact the values cannot be produced to the House, and he is obliged to abandon the whole plan. He admits that it will produce the result of exorbitant protection in some cases, and too little protection in others; so he has to come back to the old defective plan, in the view of the hon. member for South Grenville, of an ad valorem duty.

In answer to Mr. PATERSON (Brant),

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. A man might import a thousand wheels, and he might desire to enter them as wooden manufactures; therefore, we thought best to specify that parts of furniture shall be charged at the same rate.

In answer to Mr. BURPEE (St. John),

Mr. BOWELL. There are a large number of articles that are not mentioned in the Tariff, which bear a duty of 20 per cent.; and in making the changes now proposed by the hon. Finance Minister, it is proposed to specify certain articles which have heretofore come in as unenumerated, in order to make the protection complete to the manufacturer. Under the old Tariff that is now in operation, it says: "Carriages, railway cars and wheel-barrows, &c., 30 per cent." Now, it goes on to specify in the proposition before the House, that certain parts of carriages which have heretofore come in at a lower rate of duty, shall bear the same duty as if the article was complete in itself. This was formerly the case with steam engines. People used to bring them in in parts, and then put them together, and by that means avoided paying the full duty.

In answer to Mr. MITCHELL,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hubs and wheels are not affected by this at all; they are specified in the Tariff, and we do not touch them. But what we are driving at is this: That unless parts of carriages are stated at the same duty as the carriage when brought in complete—they would bring in parts of these carriages, and desire to enter them at a lower rate of duty, and then put them up here—and this is to prevent any operation of that kind.

On item 21, cotton duck,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It has been found, during the last year or two, that a large portion of the cotton duck imported into Canada has been for ships' purposes, and has paid a duty of 5 per cent. The Customs authorities ascertained from the limited quantity imported for other purposes, except ships' purposes, that large importations have taken place under the latter head paying 5 per cent., whereas the material was really used for other purposes, and thus the revenue was defrauded. I think in one case 80,000 yards of duck were brought in that way, and it could not be shown that more than 10,000 yards were used for ships' purposes. It is proposed that all duck shall pay the duty now collected when imported for any other purpose than for ships' purposes. That duty varies from 17½ to 25 per cent., and it is proposed if a merchant imports a quantity of duck for ships' purposes, for the sails of vessels engaged in the fisheries, and the various purposes mentioned under the Act, that upon sufficient evidence being produced to the Customs Department that, say a 1,000 yards, had been used for ships' purposes, he shall be refunded the duty paid, less 5 per cent. It is intended that parties shall occupy the same position as before, duck for ships' purposes being charged only 5 per cent.; but it is intended to make all parties pay the duty in the first place, and to provide for the difficulties of duty being returned to parties entitled to it.

Mr. BLAKE. The intention is, that they shall pay 5 per cent. on this article?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will see in a moment that this wording does not at all accomplish that intention. The average duty paid on these articles is from 17½ to 25 per cent.; and we assume the duty to be 20 per cent., that would be on $100 worth of goods, $20. It is proposed that the whole duty should be returned less 5 per cent. thereof, which would be $1; and, therefore, it is here proposed that of the duty of $20, 1 per cent. should be the duty collected for revenue.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, no. We may be wrong; but I think that the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. BLAKE. It is perfectly clear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Suppose they paid 17½ per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Very well.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then, on $100 worth, we would receive back $12 50.

Mr. BLAKE. That is what the hon. gentleman intends; but will he allow me to ask him, what 5 per cent. of the amount paid means? The amount so paid is the duty, and that means one-twentieth of that duty; and if the duty be $20, one-twentieth of that would be $1, or 1 per cent; so the hon. gentleman's object is not accomplished by the clause.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think that the hon. gentleman is right, the wording does not cover certainly the instructions given.

Mr. BOWELL. It is right enough. If $20 be paid and 5 per cent. be retained, the payer will be in precisely the same position in which he is now.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not know that it was necessary to repeat the explanation to convince the hon. Minister of Customs. I convinced the hon. Minister of Finance, who, perhaps, will convince his colleague.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume that the object of the Government is merely to retain enough to pay the actual expenses to which they are put in receiving entries and looking after the business.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is to collect 5 per cent. duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not understand it so. Is it to collect 5 per cent. duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. If so the resolution is wrong; but if it be merely to give back to the people engaged in the shipping business of the country the duty paid on canvas used on ships, retaining 5 per cent. of the duty paid, then the resolution is perfectly correct. The hon. gentleman does not want to collect duty on the articles at all. It is now free.

Mr. BLAKE. It pays 5 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. This then does not cover the ground.

Mr. BLAKE. As I understand it, this is only another mode of getting the 5 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not conveyed by the resolution. I suppose that the hon. gentleman wanted to place the shipping interests, in which his constituents are engaged, on more favorable terms than to-day exist; but as there is some little doubt as to the terms of the resolution, I think it should be left as it is, and therefore give the shipping interests of the country the benefit of free canvas for their ships, less 5 per cent. to cover Government expenses in looking after the business and returning the duty. That is the way I read the resolution, and I take it that this is the intention of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then all I can say is, that the Government is not as liberal as they ought to be. I must say that the hon. gentleman had better not alter the resolution, as it will satisfy the shipping interests of the country just as it stands, while nobody will be very much harmed by it. I wish to point out another defect in this particular resolution. My experience with the Department of Customs, during the last season, has taught me that a very strict rule has been laid down in relation to canvas for ships' purposes. One would naturally suppose that canvas for ships' purposes would be admitted free. True, this is the case for sails; but a liberal interpretation of the term, looking at the spirit that inspired its admission at a low rate of duty, would have been different to the present practice; and so certainly a great many shipmasters and owners, and collectors of Customs, construed the law, giving a low rate of duty to canvas actually entering into sails. For instance, in fitting out a new ship, a man wants a-half dozen or one dozen tarpaulins, to cover hatches, where masts enter the deck, and boats; but the Minister of Customs, under his reading of the law—and I do not say he is wrong—will not allow the reduced rate on canvas used on ships purely for sails. It seems to me that this was not the spirit in which this Protectionist Government—a system I approve of—inspired that clause; and I think that the Act ought to be amended in such a way as to allow all canvas going into ships for all purposes, as well as sails, to be free.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman as usual reads me a lecture as to what he considers to be my duty, and the unnecessarily strict manner in which I interpret the Tariff. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to read the law, he will see that it is as explicit as language can make it. The hon. Minister of Customs could not by any possibility, unless he violated the law, put any other interpretation upon it. There is no such thing as latitude in the matter. It reads thus: "Cotton duck or canvas of hemp or flax and sail twine, when to be used for boats and ship sails 5 per cent." And all any Minister can do in collecting the revenue is to act in accordance with the provisions of the Act. I have never put any other construction upon this language; and the House will see at once that there is no power given to the Minister to allow duck to be imported and then manufactured into tarpaulins or put to any use other than as provided by law. I am not discussing, nor do I propose to discuss, the propriety of extending it so that it may be used for the purposes to which the hon. gentleman alludes. The difficulty we have found in carrying this out has been that merchants have imported it in large quantities at 5 per cent., and then used it for all kinds of purposes—not merely for tarpaulins, but for coverings, awnings, tents, and various other uses to which canvas of that kind can be put. If the hon. gentleman will read the Tariff he will see that no other possible construction can be put upon it other than the one I have referred to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Minister of Customs has chosen to misrepresent me in regard to the statement I have made. He said I chose to read him a lecture about his duties; I did nothing of the kind. I told the hon. gentleman that I did not know that he was wrong in doing as he had done; but I pointed out a particular difficulty in relation to this matter, for the purpose of having the Government amend the Act; and I said that, if they intended to encourage the building of new ships, or the promotion of commerce in old ships, as was originally intended, that the clause did not carry out that intention. Because there is an omission in the Act to which I called attention, I am to be snubbed by the hon. Minister of Customs, and told that I have been reading him a lecture. I want him to understand that I know what I am talking about. The words of the Act confine it strictly to ships' sails, and though I did not find fault with his interpretation of the letter of the Act, I said that its object and spirit, and the policy of the Government in bringing it into force, was to give free canvas, or canvas at a cheap rate for the purposes of shipping; and I said now, when they are consolidating and amending the Act, they should allow all canvas for ships to come in at that low rate. Does the hon. gentleman know so little of the navigation of the country as not to be aware that, in addition to having her sails complete, every vessel has to take several bales of canvas with her, for various purposes which may be required on board. A sail may be blown away or split in two, so that they require canvas for these purposes as well as for tarpaulins for covering boats, as well as for the safety and comfort of those on board. Yet, when I call attention to this omission, the hon. gentleman tells me I was reading him a lecture, when I was doing nothing of the kind.

Mr. VALIN. A ship on going out gets we will say a suit of sails, amounting to about 4,000 yards, but they require about 2,000 yards in addition to be put on board to be used during the voyage for repairs and other purposes. I think it will be in the interest of ship-owners that drawbacks should be given on sails used on a single voyage; and I hope the Government will allow the drawback to be made for that purpose.

Mr. COCKBURN. Very considerable quantities of duck are used in our inland marine, not merely for the purpose of sails, but for other purposes, such as decks and so forth; and I hope the hon. Minister of Customs, or the hon. Minister of Finance, will see his way clear to include duck used for such purposes. I know of several cases where parties have imported this heavier duck with the expectation that they would get it in at the low rate, but they found that the high rate was charged.

Mr. VALIN. I wish to say that I intended my former remarks only to apply to cotton ducks, as I believe that there is no hemp manufactory in the country in which sails are made for sea-going vessels.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I would like to ask the Government if this rule is to apply to the importation of tents to the North-West, a large number of which are brought into that country by immigrants, especially during their first year. No less than 7,000 were estimated to have been under canvas at Winnipeg last year.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have not contemplated making any alteration in the duty, except so far as to prevent improper importation under the present Tariff. There is no desire, or intention, on the part of the Government, to interfere with the industry to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I may say, also, that the clause has been very fairly and liberally interpreted with regard to duck for sails, or repairing. I remember that a deputation composed of representatives of nearly all the Provinces asked that this duty should be reduced to 5 per cent., because it affected the boats of the fishermen and the whole shipping interest; and we said that for these purposes the duty should be reduced to 5 per cent. But the trouble is, that parties have represented the article to be for shipping purposes, and have used it in other ways. The hon. gentleman's proposition is a fair one to put before the House; but, as I said before, we have not contemplated any change, except for the purpose of seeing that the low rate of duty applies only to the branch of industry to which Parliament intended it should apply. My hon. friend says that our object was simply to take off 5 per cent. of duty, but we tell him that that was not our object. Our object was to give back all the duty paid, less 5 per cent. of the amount of duty paid in.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend has not touched the point I make. There is a large quantity of canvas for shipping purposes besides for sails, such as around the mast for awnings, &c., and I presume that your object was to give the same advantage for canvas used in that way as that used in sails; and what I propose is that the word "sails" should be altered to "shipping purposes."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the wording of that resolution was suggested by the deputation that waited on the Government on this subject, representing every Province in the Dominion interested in shipping; and they represented largely the fishing and other interests as well. This is the first time that my attention has been called to any difference of opinion as to canvas for shipping purposes. It may be a question, therefore, whether it is proper to alter the wording of the resolution; but I may mention to my hon. friend that there is a drawback given to cover any duty imposed on articles that enter into the construction of ships. I will look into the matter before we pass the resolutions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I have not yet heard what the hon. Minister has to say with reference to tents for the North-West. I think the covering of human beings is of as much importance as the shipping interest; and I hope the hon. Minister will consider the question, which is of great importance to the people of the North-West.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will consider it.

Mr. HESSON. I have some knowledge of the particular interest, and I can state that the duty has not increased the price of the article in Canada. On the contrary, I am able to purchase to-day from any wholesale house in Canada at lower prices than I have been able for the last twenty-five years. Therefore, I can state, from my own experience, that the imposition of the duty has not increased the price of the article to the consumer in this country. It is the same with nearly all the cottons I could name; we are getting a better article at a lower price. Good canvas ducking, quite heavy enough for tents, which was formerly 14 cts., can now be got for 11½ cts.

Mr. BLAKE. But such is the perversity of human nature that many people have gone and purchased the foreign article and entered it low, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman. I desire to know whether, when the hon. gentleman brought forth his proposition for a drawback on the materials used in ships, he did not take into consideration all these elements in which he thought the duty would increase the price, and whether he did not consider that 20 per cent. was not a fair basis on which to place them all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We did. We thought it was just possible that, under this class of ducking, we might pay back more money than we received, as the price of the article varies very materially. Therefore, the object was to pay back just 5 per cent. of the duty paid, and place it in the same position it was in before.

Mr. BLAKE. But the point I make is this: While canvas, whether cotton or duck, used for sails came in free, 5 per cent. ad valorem was charged on canvas required for other shipping purposes; but when the hon. gentleman brought down his proposal to give a drawback of 20 per cent. no doubt he took into account that he paid back 5 per cent. on the canvas used for sails. So the practical result of the proposal made by the hon. member for Northumberland would be to increase the bounty.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That may or may not be the case; but that is one reason why we should take time to consider the question of making a difference between canvas used for sails, and that for other shipping purposes.

Mr. VALIN. I understand that the drawback of 75 cts. a ton is to enable our shippers to compete with others. I do not suppose that 75 cts. per ton is a very big bounty; but in the meantime it enables ship-builders to go on building their ships, as we know the iron they import from the Old Country costs a good deal more to them than formerly.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That was not the object. In 1879 a duty was imposed on iron and other articles that entered into the construction of ships, and it was to leave the ship-builders in as good, if not a better, position than they were in before 1879, that the 75 cts. per ton was allowed. This, it was supposed, would cover the additional duty. We may come at the same result by giving back the 5 per cent. on the value of the article used in the ship-building. That would leave the case exactly where it is.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. Finance Minister intends to punish the fisherman. I fail to see how he benefits them. We can see how the importer may be benefited by the reduction of 5 per cent., but the fishermen do not import very large quantities of duck for the purposes of sails for their boats. They purchase from the importers, and it is the importers this Bill will benefit—not the fishermen.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not see that at all. These men who own fishing vessels will take care to get back the duty.

Mr. WELDON. In the case of small purchases made by fishermen, such as the purchase of a fore-sail or a main-sail, it would be impossible to get back the 20 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If a man sells a fisherman a suit of sails, he will give them at a certain price on obtaining a certificate that the duck is to be used for fishing purposes. The same would apply in the case of a man who only buys one sail. If one importer would not allow the drawback his rival would.

Mr. KINNEY. I understand this is to leave the fisherman in the same position he was in before. The only difference is that the importer pays 20 or 25 per cent. to the Government, and leaves it there until he sells to the consumer. It is no injury to the fisherman. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member from Northumberland, every ship that fits up with new sails will have about 200 yards left to carry away for repairs, which, on a ship of 1,000 tons, would amount in duty to about one-quarter of a cent per ton. Under the present Tariff the ship-owner is left where he was before. The element of duties not being used for other things than sails was not taken into consideration the time the Government gave the 75 cts. per ton bounty. They gave it because they considered the ship was an export, and refunded the ship-builder the amount of duty he paid. I have bought and sold canvas for a number of years, and have never seen the law quoted as it has been to-day.

Mr. VALIN. An ordinary suit of sails would amount to from 4,000 to 6,000 yards. On long voyages we would require the equivalent of half of that for repairs and additional sails. Now, I could send a telegram to New York and order cotton duck there, and get 27½ per cent. discount; but I want to protect the Canadian manufacturer in this country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that these drawbacks will be paid simply on the importer producing a certificate from the person purchasing from him, and on that certificate drawbacks will be granted? I find it a difficult matter, indeed, to get the honest drawbacks. In the case of large manufacturing firms making considerable exportation to foreign countries, I find the Customs regulations are such that they cannot comply with them, and they cannot get the drawbacks at all.

Mr. BOWELL. I think my hon. friend has been trying to get a little more than what he calls the honest drawback. In some demands he has made he has asked for a rebate of duty on pig iron manufactured in Nova Scotia; but, to my mind, that is not a rebate, or a drawback. That is one of the troubles. I do not think that any manufacturer can possibly swear that he has paid a duty upon Nova Scotia pig iron that goes into the manufacture of different implements he may be making in this country. I know there are other difficulties that have presented themselves, and which probably might be relaxed to a certain extent, providing we can arrive at some scheme by which the revenue could be protected, and I think I shall be enabled to do that. I trust, in a short time, to be able to meet the demands of my hon. friend from Brant, without going so far as to give what he calls a drawback, but which I would term a bounty, upon articles manufactured in this country, and that go into the manufacture of the article upon which he wants a drawback.

Mr. WATSON. I think it is just as necessary to allow people going to the North-West to have canvas with a rebate on it as it is for fishermen to have sails, because it is just as important to encourage people going to the North-West as it is to encourage fishermen. Immense quantities of canvas are used in the North-West, and the Government ought to include canvas used for that purpose as well as sails. In the city of Winnipeg there are several large factories making tents all the year round. In that city there are regular boarding-houses built of this canvas, and in some parts of the country there are small towns built almost entirely of canvas.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). A large number of tents have been imported into Manitoba that are valued as high as $1,000 each, and the price ranges all the way downwards. I do not see why ship-builders should be singled out for this favor any more than the settlers in the North-West.

Mr. BOWELL. When this concession was made in the interest of shipping that quality of duck was not manufactured in this country. The duck that is exempt, that is mentioned here, is not the kind of canvas that is used for tent purposes; it is a different kind of material altogether. We had specimens of it the other day, and it is much heavier and more expensive than the canvas duck used for tents. More than that, sail duck has never been made in Canada until quite recently. They are just now putting up a mill for the manufacture of sail duck at Hamilton, and it was in order to protect the revenue as well as the manufacturer that a change was made in the Tariff, giving the drawback rather than permitting it to be admitted at 5 per cent. Now, the duck out of which tents are made both in the North-West and in the East, is a different kind of duck. I am quite satisfied the manufacturers of that material in this country will be able to supply the whole demand. To adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from Selkirk would simply mean to destroy that very great industry that is now being built up in this country, and I do not believe it would be of any great advantage to the people themselves.

Mr. WATSON. Will this apply only to sails or to tarpaulin?

Mr. BOWELL. To sails. The hon. Minister of Finance has stated that he will consider the question of extending the provision.

Mr. WATSON. A great quantity of tarpaulin is used on flat boats in our country.

Mr. PICKARD. Will this apply to a vessel renewing her rigging every three or four years? Will the vessel obtain a rebate on the second suit of sails?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; and on repairs.

On item 24, cordage,

Mr. KIRK. I desire to enquire whether this resolution is intended to apply to our ship-building and fishing industries. According to the way in which it reads, I think it does: "Cordage of all kinds, 20 per cent." I take it that that means cordage of all kinds, and for all purposes. It appears to me that this is an additional tax on the fishermen, and a very heavy one. Under the Revenue Tariff, fishermen and ship-builders were only charged 5 per cent. on the cordage used on ships, and that used by fishermen in their calling; this taxation policy, however, increased that to 10 per cent., a 100 per cent. additional; and now it is proposed to increase it another 10 per cent., being equal to a 100 per cent. more. This amounts to a heavy impost on the fishermen, who are supposed to be least able to pay of any class in the community, and the duty principally falls on the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. I notice that, last year, when the duty was 10 per cent., they paid something like $12,000; this year, with the duty double, the amount will reach $24,000. That, I think, will be rather burdensome upon the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces; and I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will see his way clear to allow the fishermen to have their cordage imported at a less rate of duty.

Mr. WELDON. There is a drawback of 10 per cent. allowed on new vessels, and I have made a calculation as to whether that will cover the amount of duty on the cordage used on a vessel. I believe it will amount to an additional tax of 5 or 6 per cent., and that only one-third of the actual duty paid will be recouped by the bounty. I will give particulars of the case of a new ship of 1,000 tons burden. The amount of manilla rope required was 31,746 lbs, valued by the Customs at 13½ cts. per lb. The extra duty of 10 per cent. would amount to $428.57. There was also required 4,813 lbs. of hemp rope, valued at 9 cts. per lb. the extra duty on which would amount to $52.21, making a total extra duty of $480.88. The drawback would be only $160, exactly one-third. The present drawback of 75 cts. is not considered sufficient, and they claim it should be $1 or $1.25, to repay them; and yet we find additional burdens imposed. Another important point is in regard to cordage, related to the coasting vessels trading between the Provinces and the United States. This additional duty imposed on them will cause them to become a heavier burden on ship-owners, because they will have to pay an additional amount when the ship's rigging is renewed, and they will not be entitled to any drawback. The coasting vessels require the running rigging renewed every two or three years. I am informed with respect to the sale of cordage and rope in the Maritime Provinces, and more particularly in the large cities to which the coasters mainly come, that one-half of the cordage imported is for new ships, and one-half to renew rigging. If these vessels find they can obtain rigging cheaper in foreign ports, they will make their repairs there instead of coming to the home port, the result of which will be to seriously reduce the business of the ship-chandler. We are thus affecting the ship-builder's interests by not giving him a sufficient drawback to pay him; we are imposing on the ship-owner an increased duty at the very time when it is most important that the ship-owner should receive every consideration, in view of the keen competition in which our vessels are engaged with foreign crafts, and more particularly with iron ships, and the ship-chandler is also injuriously affected. I submit to the hon. Finance Minister, who comes from a Province which is largely interested in ships, whether, under the peculiar position in which that interest is now placed, and the decline which has taken place during the last few years, owing to some extent to the heavy duties imposed, and to a large extent from the competition of iron vessels, whether we should not give the industry fair play, so that our ship-builder may continue to launch the best and cheapest craft in the world. I submit that an effort should be made to relieve, not only the ship-builders, but the ship-owners. Already the principle has been, to a certain extent, admitted with respect to canvas duck, and I submit that it should be made applicable to vessels trading with the United States and West Indies, and that such craft should be placed in the same position with respect to running rigging and cordage, as they will be in regard to canvas. The only attempt at relief is to put forward this proposition, and this is the only relief offered to the industries which, as I have pointed out, are affected by this proposed change.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have had a good many discussions in this House during the last four years as to the position which the ship-builders occupy with reference to the Tariff, and the bounty given, and drawback. The hon. gentleman has called my attention to some of the arguments used on those occasions, by the remarks which have just fallen from him. I think I have answered it; but I may repeat it here, as there are a great many new members in the House; but I have already answered the statement made by the hon member, and others on the opposite side of the House, as to the increased charge placed on our shipping by the increased duty connected with the drawback which we give. My answer is this: that the ship-building interest is in a better condition to-day than in 1878. I assert, and I give in evidence here, that this is the case; that when we put this new duty into operation, we asked the ship-builders of the Dominion of Canada to send in a statement of the duties they had paid under the new Tariff in excess of what they paid in 1877 and 1878, and out of eighteen applications—or twenty-eight, I forget which—submitted to the Minister of Customs for drawbacks on the duty paid, only one came to 75 cts. of what is now paid. Specifying the articles on which they paid an increase of duty, but one—and that was a small vessel, and it was not allowed—came to 75 cts.; but after considering the whole question, we were disposed to deal liberally with the matter, and we fixed 65 to 75 cts. I assert, however, that to day, in my opinion, and from my observation and my communication with them, the ship-builders are perfectly well satisfied that they are now in a better position than they were in 1878. The hon. gentleman takes exception to the proposition under consideration, and says, that 10 per cent. will not cover it; but in the bounty, or drawback, which we give, the hon. Minister of Customs does not ask, when a builder sends in a certificate concerning the building of a 1,000 ton ship, what duty he paid, but simply pays over $750; and in many of these cases on 1,000 and 500 ton vessels, they have not paid a cent of duty on cordage, which is made in the Dominion and sold at prices less, in many instances, than they would be with the duty imposed—and this will be so now. Were we to give back in every case the whole of the amount of the duty paid and articles imported, then we would be giving more than the ship-builder would be contributing towards it; because a large portion of the cordage he can get in the Dominion. Many ship-builders of Nova Scotia use, and have used, entirely cordage made in the Dominion, but they still have 65 or 75 cts. drawback which covers any addition—if they have to pay any addition—that they have to pay in duties, judging from their own statements and the claims they have made, only came up to 75 cts. I will now take up the hon. gentleman's proposition. I am told by a gentleman, who knows something about this industry, that it is ample, taking all things into consideration, and that 10 cts. will cover it. We think so; but in matters of that kind, I may say—and we have thought it proper—to the House, that we considered it a fair return in consideration for the additional duty imposed. Suppose that it amounted to more, as the hon. gentleman states, and that they do not pay duty on the whole, but an increased duty, that will probably be, we think, 10 cts. a ton. Some ships are built with cordage coming from England; parties interested in them on the other side ordering the cordage there. Others say they prefer the English cordage. Very well, let them import it, and if they pay an additional duty, the idea of the Government is to give 10 cts. drawback; and if the vessels are built in Nova Scotia, &c., with cordage made in the Dominion of Canada, the hon. Minister of Customs—because it is exceedingly difficult to trace the whole thing out—does not ask what duty has been paid, but simply gives the 75 cts. a ton. The hon. gentleman says—and there is something in the statement—that old vessels and small vessels got 10 cts. a ton; but if they require renewed cordage, they take the ships out of our ports, go to sea, and proceed to Liverpool, &c., and we may never see them again; and when they reach Liverpool they get additional supplies there. Vessels sailing between St. John and Liverpool, as a rule, obtain their additional supplies of cordage and everything of that kind at the latter port. What is the fact? In the first place, we found that a large portion of the cordage imported into the Dominion ostensibly for ships' purposes, was used for other purposes, causing a loss to the revenue and the manufacturers of this country, to whom we desired to give some protection by placing 20 per cent. duty on this article so imported. We discovered that an extensive fraud was being committed, and we found it consequently necessary to ask Parliament not to impose two rates, but to give new ships 10 cts. a ton, or whatever was fair or right in the matter, and give an addition to the drawback. I think we can show that a large portion of the cordage used by our fishermen and small vessels, and coasters, can be bought, under the operation of this law, as cheaply as was the case before. The manufacturers say that they do not want to increase the price, and will not do so; but increased manufacturing power, and an extended market, which they are prepared to supply at present prices, as long as the low material, manilla and hemp, costs the same as now. This being the case, our coasting vessels can buy this article as cheaply as before; and new ships, who bring out cordage, partly or wholly from England, will have a drawback, and the Government consider that they place them in the same position which they now occupy. The Government would gladly have left the matter as it is at present; but when we find this article imported and used for other purposes than Parliament designed, the imposition of 10 per cent. seems to be the only remedy, which means that we are to have a uniform rate of duty, and to give, as far as possible and practicable, to the shipping industries of the country, a drawback which would make an equivalent.

Mr. VALIN. As to cordage for vessels, I think that the cordage now manufactured in this country is quite sufficient for the requirements of our ship-builders. As a builder I have always bought, in my own county, most of the cordage I use, and I am glad to say that this Government, by giving 75 cts. a ton, has done a great deal to encourage the ship-building industry. I must say the contrary, however, regarding hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1875, 1876 and 1877, we applied, for the same aid which this Government has given to ship-builders. What was the consequence? We know that when we applied to hon. gentlemen opposite for similar assistance to the ship-building trade of Quebec they refused to give it, though they knew that we had to import a great many things, and pay duty on them in those days, and this is one of the reasons why the population of Quebec was reduced from 72,000 to 56,000. Last year a member of the Opposition spoke about our grumbling because we had not received a grant from this Government; and, after his long argument, I asked him what had the Government which he supported given to us when they were in power? He said he could not say. The fact was that they did not give us anything. We now get 75 cts. a ton, which enables us to keep our yards open and increase our business. When only one or two vessels are built at a certain place, the attention of ship-owners on the other side is not attracted; but if we build as many as thirty or forty vessels, we secure customers from outside and keep our own population in Canada. I speak especially of the city of Quebec, but I have now no doubt the same is true of the lower ports.

Mr. BLAKE. I am glad to learn from the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin) that the ship-building trade of Quebec is in a comparatively prosperous condition; but I cannot agree with him in the fairness of one argument he has used. He says that the unprosperous condition under the former Government was due to the circumstance that they did not grant the advantage which has been granted by the present Government. Now, there were certain slight duties on articles used in ships, and the present Government, in increasing the general Tariff, increased amongst others, the duties on articles used in ships; and they should

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

—as the hon. Finance Minister has told the hon. gentleman, though he did not hear it—to the ship-builders to know the extent to which their burdens have been increased by the new duties, and they proposed a drawback which the House granted, equivalent to the increase, thus placing the ship-builders in exactly the same position they were in before.

Mr. BURNS. Under the regulations which are proposed the shipping industry gets a rebate, or bonus, of a certain amount per ton; but no such concession has been made to the fishing industry. Some hon. gentlemen have remarked that there is now manufactured in the Dominion quite enough cordage, and of a good enough quality, for the purpose of shipping, and impliedly for the purposes of fishing boats. I take exception to that remark, so far as it applies to fishing boats, because there is a certain description of hawsers called "roads" in fishing parlance, which are not made in the Dominion, so far as I know, and as they have to be imported, I would urge upon the hon. Finance Minister that he should allow a drawback upon these goods. If that cannot be done, I would suggest that the hon. Finance Minister should not have this item go into effect until the cordage I have described for the season's trade has been imported, as parties have ordered their supplies in ignorance of the proposed change.

Mr. McLELAN. I wish to point out that everything in the way of cordage and cable is now manufactured at Halifax, and of such good quality that the manufacturers are sending samples to the International Fishery Exhibition to compete with the manufacturers of the world, and with good hope of success.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). It is manufactured in other places besides Halifax. I wish, however, to point out to hon. gentlemen that they have been arguing all afternoon, as well as on previous occasions, that the additional duty did not increase the cost—that goods are cheaper now than they were before. Now, however, we hear them contending that a drawback should be granted to offset these duties, and this shows that the amount raised on account of this duty, last year amounting to $15,000 or $16,000, is paid by the consumers of the country. I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister if he has not finally settled on 10 cts. per ton as the rate, whether he does not consider that 20 cts. per ton is the figure which will make it equal to what it was before? At all events, I am advised by large ship-builders in New Brunswick that 20 cts. is nearer the proper rate. As regards the drawback of 75 cts. per ton, I know that several in the hon. gentleman's constituency do not consider this to be the full amount, and I think representations have been made to him to that effect.

Mr. WELDON. As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin), I wish to state, with regard to New Brunswick, that it was sworn to in a case in which I was professionally engaged, that ships could be repaired as cheaply in Liverpool as in Quebec in 1880. Quebec certainly has not been benefited by these increased duties. As has been pointed out already, the drawback of 75 cts. a ton was put on to cover the increased duties imposed by the new Tariff. My hon. colleague knows that the shippers of St. John do not consider that 75 cts. is sufficient; but that question is not now under discussion. The ships that are our pride wherever they sail, would, if properly protected, and not handicapped by heavy duties, be able to compete with the fleets of any country. The duty of 10 cts. a ton is put on new ships; but the hon. Finance Minister has not met the argument with regard to the repairs of vessels. If the principle of paying back part of the duty be adopted with regard to the sails of ships, why should not the same principle be applied to cordage? The hon. Finance Minister says that he fears frauds on the revenue. Is the hands of the hon. Minister of Customs shortened? Must the honest trader be punished in order to get at the dishonest trader? I do not wish to decry our Canadian manufacturers; but it is well known that many of our ship-owners—some of them ardent supporters of the hon. gentleman—are, to-day, using American cordage, because of its superior quality, notwithstanding its higher price over the Canadian article. We know that when a man sends his ship to sea with inferior material in its construction, he runs the risk of sending its crew to eternity; and it is of the greatest importance that everything about a ship, from the keel to the truck, should be of the very best quality. Our ship-building and ship-owning industry should be placed in a position, not only to compete with the fleets of other countries, but to ensure the safety of the ships and their crews; and the use of a good article benefits the ship-owner by lowering his rate of insurance. But I wish to claim a reduction of the duties on account of repairs. I differ from the hon. Finance Minister when he contends that the duty will not increase the price. Our vessels are largely engaged in the coasting trade, and I cannot help believing that one result of this duty will be to send our coasters to foreign ports for the purpose of getting their rigging repaired. In that way it will destroy the trade of the ship-chandler, because one-half of the cordage imported is used in the repairing of the rigging of our small vessels. You either draw the ship-chandler away, or compel him to pay a higher price; and you apply a different principle to the case of cordage to what you apply to the case of canvas. If this duty must be put on, all I ask is that the same principle should be applied to cordage as to canvas. In that way, to a large extent, the shipping interest would be relieved of the burden.

Mr. VAIL. I do not object to this change so much from the ship-owner's point of view as from the fisherman's point of view. It seems to me that this is a specially hard case for the fishermen. I was under the impression, when the alteration was made, that it was for the purpose of increasing the business of this manufactory in Halifax. Perhaps it is right that it should be protected to a certain extent. I do not object to that, but I do object to the Government giving a bounty to the fishermen with one hand, and taking it away with the other, for the benefit of this particular industry; and when we consider that the fishermen use a great deal of cordage, that they anchor their vessels with manilla cordage, we must see that this duty is a wrong to them. It is true that the ship-builders get a drawback of so much per ton; but I think the same principle should be applied to the fishermen. I am surprised that the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Kinney) did not refer to that when he spoke of the increase in the duty on canvas. It seems that this question is hardly to be considered from the fishermen's point of view; but I think a change should be made now which will enable the fisherman to buy his cordage wherever it is manufactured. It is all very well to say that this increase of duty will not increase the price—that the article is manufactured in the country. But why is the duty put on if that be the case? I have no objection to the manufacturer in Halifax receiving a certain amount of protection—I think he has as much right to it as any other man in the Dominion; but ship-owners, as a rule, are in a position to protect themselves, and to look after their own interests, while fishermen are not, because they buy in such small quantities that they are not considered by the sailmakers. I think the fishing interest is one which, above all others, should be protected in Nova Scotia.

Mr. DALY. I think it is the wrong position to say that this duty is put on for the benefit of a single industry in Halifax. That ropewalk has been in existence for many years, and it has been able to provide an article of cordage of the very best quality, and at a price low enough to enable it to compete with the imported article. Therefore, I must say that the charge that this alteration has made to benefit a particular industry in the city I have the honor to represent, is not worthy of repetition. But I sympathize with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk), who spoke on behalf of the fishermen. We know that nets, twines, seines and other articles used by fishermen are at present on the Free List; and I think an extension of the same principle to cordage would be a very proper and just concession to that valuable industry, which is already receiving some protection in the way of a bounty. If the increased duty on cordage is insisted upon, it may perhaps increase the cost of that article to the fishermen, though I do not think it will do so to the extent hon. gentlemen opposite seem to apprehend.

Mr. MITCHELL. In reference to the remarks of several hon. gentlemen who find fault with the altered system in relation to their duties, I feel, in justice to the hon. Minister of Finance, bound to express my approval of the course taken by him in changing the system from allowing parties to enter the goods for ships' purposes at the reduced rate to that of making them pay the duty in full, receiving a rebate when proved that the goods have been used for this purpose. In the former case every dishonest trader could enter goods as for ships' purposes, and it was only by setting detectives over him that the Government could find out that the entries were false. By this law we recognize the principle of relieving our shipping industry, and avoid an indiscriminate reduction.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon. Minister was asked to explain why it is that he makes this particular proposal in this particular shape, it turns out that it is for somewhat the same reasons that the change is made with respect to cotton duck. But as to large ships to which the drawback applies, we learn, of course, that the drawback is necessary; that in that case, although to a large extent they are supplied with articles at a fair rate, yet the drawback is necessary in order that they may obtain the goods as cheaply as they would get them on a 10 per cent. duty. But when the hon. Minister is called upon to explain what the relief is which he proposes to give to the other classes which also bear largely of cordage, but are not relieved at all by this 10 cts. per ton arrangement, which is to be compensation in case of ships, he tells the fisherman: "Oh, you will not suffer, because you will get the article just as cheap as you would if the duty were not 20 per cent. You got your cordage at 10 per cent. duty, now you are going to get it at 20 per cent. duty, with a remission, which will take place. By virtue of the changed arrangements in the case of ships, you will get it as cheap as formerly." If so, there is no reason for the tonnage bounty which the hon. gentleman proposes in the case of ships. But the hon. gentleman does not seem to deal with these two interests on the same line of argument or reason; nor have I heard any answer from him as to the question raised by the hon. member for St. John with reference to the cost of repairs and renewals of cordage on the ships. There ought to be a drawback on these, on the same principle. In order to enable the fitting of the ships to be carried on here without disadvantage, some analogous provision should be made which would put that portion of the trade in the same position, else the result indicated by the hon. member for St. John will inevitably happen: that the refitting of trading vessels with new cordage will take place in foreign ports, so that neither the Canadian manufacturer nor the Canadian ship-chandler will be benefited.

Mr. FORTIN. The question before the House is a very important one, that of the duty on cordage used for fishing vessels and boats. We should first enquire whether the fishing business is a very paying one just now, and whether we have any great rivals on the foreign markets, where nearly all our fish have to be sold. If you wish to foster an industry, you must see that all the tools used by the workers in that industry are bought as cheap as possible in our country, or when they come from a foreign country. What are the tools of the fisherman? They are the boat with its sails and rigging and hawser, and a very important part of the equipment of the boat is the hawser, because on its strength depends the safety of the boat and crew. Let me tell this House, that during a great tempest, in the month of August, 1853, which caused the deaths of one hundred fishermen, mostly all fathers of families, the only man of a fleet who saved himself by his boat owed his safety to his hawser, which was new and very strong, and by means of it he was able to ride during the gale on the banks. If we increase the duties on the articles we have to import, like canvas and rope, which cannot yet be made in this country cheap enough, and the hawsers which must be of the best material, Russian or French hemps, and of the best finish—and I do not believe we can make that in this country as cheap as we can buy it in a foreign country—the fish that we offer for sale on foreign markets will have cost us more than formerly; and as the Government cannot control that market as they can the Canadian market, it will follow that, if our fishermen cannot make their fish cheap enough they will not be able to sell them in foreign markets. For the last few years, on account of the competition with the Norwegians and Newfoundlanders, and the latter, in matters of trade, are foreigners to our people, our fishermen have not made so much money as formerly. Perhaps some will tell me the trade last season has been brisk and prosperous; but the reason of this is, the failure of the cod fishery in Norway, which produced, instead of about a 1,000,000 quintals in the year 1880, a little more than 600,000, or a falling of 250,000 quintals. Consequently, the market being deprived of the fish of Norway, the price rose immediately, and we could sell our fish at the highest price we have ever sold it. In ordinary times we stand in competition on foreign markets with fish from Norway and Newfoundland, countries where they have only a Revenue Tariff, and consequently where the people live cheaper than in this country, and where they can produce articles of export cheaper than we do. Now, as I told the hon. Premier last summer, I did not support Protection alone, but I went for the National Policy, which is more than Protection. The National Policy means protection to the manufacturers of this country by means of fiscal duties; but when our market is abroad you have to adopt Free Trade; you have to allow all the utensils and tools used in any particular industry to come in as cheap as possible, so that our people, being able to work as cheap as in other countries, we have the same chance as in other countries. Hon. gentlemen must not infer that I am a free-trader; I am a protectionist, and I am so because I learn, in studying the history of England, that she acquired her eminence as a manufacturing country by means of Protection, and when she had nothing more to protect she became a free-trader. We have a great deal to protect with regard to our fishing industry. Our market is chiefly foreign, and, therefore, beyond the control of the Government, except in so far as it can make reciprocal arrangements with other countries by means of which we can get the duty on fish diminished, and thereby get an advantage over competitors. That is the advantage of making treaties with other nations. When we are able to give advantages to any country to which we send our fish by admitting their goods here, either free or with a small duty, we shall be able to sell them our fish with profit to ourselves. This is a very important question. For several years our fishing trade has not been as good as it was before. There are many reasons for it. This country does not constitute as good a home market for our fish as formerly for the reason that as regards fresh fish we are supplied with American fish. All the fish that is consumed on the tables of the rich, fresh cod fish, fresh haddock, fresh halibut and oysters, come from the States. We are not yet organized to supply our own market with fresh fish, although I think that could be done. Formerly no fish but Canadian fish were consumed here. I remember the time when neither fresh fish, salt fish, nor oysters, came from the States, but that time has gone. We now receive from the States nearly $1,000,000 worth of fresh fish and oysters. In conclusion, I wish to say that we must recognize the fact that our fishermen must have boats, sails and all appliances as cheaply as possible, otherwise they will not be able to compete with other nations. I believe the Government should find some way of protecting the rope manufacture, and still allow the cordage used by the fishermen to be free as formerly. I hope the Government will give them the same advantage as formerly.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. leader of the Opposition thought that he had discovered an inconsistency in my statement—and he is very ready, if any hon. member on this side is inconsistent, to point it out. But I do not think he made out a case, as far as I am concerned. In the first place, he says I stated that as the price had increased on ships' cordage, it would be necessary to give them a compensation of 10 cts. a ton, but that on other vessels the duty would not be increased.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the duty was to be increased, but the price would not be increased.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But in the imposition of an increased duty upon cordage for ships' purposes, we would increase the price; therefore, it was to be compensated by 10 cts a ton, and that, therefore, it was a recognition that it would increase the price. I was speaking of fishing and coasting vessels, for which cordage would be supplied as cheaply as before, therefore there would be no increase. My statement was this: There are parties building ships who trade entirely in the English market, the vessels being partly owned on the other side. They may, perhaps, construct ships in a part of the Dominion where circumstances lead to a direct trade between them and the parties in the Old Country, whereby they arrange as part of the contract that the cordage shall be obtained from the other side, from a belief that a certain class of cordage is better than that made in the Dominion; though our manufacturers, in many cases, supply every pound of cordage. Still there is a probability, I think, under the increased duty, that certain builders of ships will pay an additional sum; but as a general rule cordage that is used by coasting vessels and fishermen will be supplied by the manufacturer of cordage in this country, who will supply it just as cheaply as before, and therefore, they will not pay additional duty. Under these circumstances, I think my statement is quite consistent. Now, with reference to my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), who may be considered as the representative of the fishermen of the Dominion in this House. I have listened to him with great attention. I would remind him that through his instrumentality several important advantages have been given to the fishermen. Through his instrumentality fishermen have secured great advantages in protection in the St. Lawrence. In the Bay of Fundy, in the approaches to our islands and coasts, they have been given the advantage of cable and telegraph. Two or three Sessions ago that hon. member was chairman of a Committee who waited upon the Government, and asked, in the interests of the fishermen, that the duty on sail duck should be 5 per cent., and it was so ordered. Nearly every article used by the fishermen, lines, twines and machinery, are admitted either free, or at 5 per cent., except cordage, which is 10 per cent. More than that, to show the interest the Government take in this matter, we have, during the last year or two, paid a subsidy of $50,000 for a steamer to run to Brazil. That steamer serves the fishing interest, and we contributed that sum the more freely because we considered it would assist the fishermen to convey their products to a good market. In order to have the advantage of the Spanish market for our fishermen, the High Commissioner proposed to the Spanish Government that we would remove the duty of 30 per cent. from their wine if they would admit our fish free. Such is our interest in this question that we are proposing to give a subsidy in order to bring about direct trade between Canada and France. Every step is being taken by the Government in the direction of recognizing the importance of this particular industry, and while the circumstances were such, that the Government were obliged to levy an additional rate on cordage, I am prepared to give the assurance that the cordage usually used by the fishermen will be sold to them, of our own manufacture, at the same price as they have paid in the past. Under these circumstances, I fail to see how the fishermen will suffer from the proposition now under consideration. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) declare that the home market is not so good as it was formerly for our fish. I cannot understand that such can be the case. The hon. gentleman states that fresh codfish is brought in from the United States. That is the case to some extent, but there is no reason why our fishermen should not supply the whole of the codfish required in Canada. It is quite true that, under the arrangement made with the United States, fishermen have the benefit of the American market, and the United States fishermen have the benefit of our market; but there is no comparison between the quantity and value of the fish that goes from Canada to the United States and that which comes from the United States here; and I was surprised at the hon. gentleman's statement—because he generally speaks with a knowledge of the subject—especially in view of the high prices received for our fish. Because our fish now enter the United States market free, my impression is that we are paying more for them than if that market was not open to us. I call attention to all that has been done and is likely to be done, for our fishing interest. I state it here, and I am anticipating a resolution which will be moved, that we are prepared to give up a large amount of duty on sugar and molasses if we can obtain a better market for our fisheries. Under these circumstances, the hon. member for Gaspé, and those who represent fishing interests, considering these facts, and considering the bounty given, amounting to $150,000, they can have no reason to complain, because ample evidence has been afforded that the desire of the Government is to foster, protect, and encourage and develop this particular industry to its fullest extent.

On item 25, glazed and unglazed pipes,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The object of this change is to make a distinction as regards duty between glazed and unglazed pipes, which at present pay 20 per cent. It is now proposed that the unglazed shall be charged 20 per cent. and the glazed 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Why?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The latter is much more expensive. The raw material has to be imported, as it has not yet been found in Canada; and this change is in order to encourage the manufacture of the glazed description of tile here.

Mr. BLAKE. Is there any extensive manufacture of glazed tile now in Canada?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are manufacturing it extensively at St. Johns.

Mr. BLAKE. Do you expect much revenue from this change?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; we do not expect any revenue; perhaps there may be some loss.

On item 27, fruits, dried,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is an article not manufactured in this country, and it is an item upon which we can relieve taxation. The duty is now 25 per cent., and it is proposed to reduce it to 20 per cent.

On item 28, fruits in air-tight cans,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I stated in my Budget Speech that it has frequently occurred, during the last year or two, that canned fruits have been entered in different parts of the Dominion as unsweetened, in order to be admitted at 2 cts. per lb.; and it has been found frequently, on examination, that it has been sweetened fruit; and, under these circumstances, it was thought desirable that canned fruit, whether sweetened or unsweetened, should be charged 3 cts. per lb.

On item 29, show cases,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is an article which is now being generally manufactured in Canada. The materials of which the show cases are made are largely glass, and silvered glass, or materials that pay a pretty high rate of duty, and these form the raw material of the manufacture. Application was made for a very considerable addition to the duty, and that a specific duty of a high figure should be charged upon the more expensive show cases; but as it was found that the larger portion coming in from abroad, are valued at about $30 or $35 each, it was proposed to give them some little additional encouragement by adding $2 to each show case, making the duty probably 40 per cent., and in some cases 42, owing to the larger size occasionally imported. The great bulk of them are, however, entered at about $30 per ordinary show case; therefore it is proposed to add $2 to each of them and 35 per cent., which is $2 above the present duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do they pay full duty on the glass in the show cases?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. The glass is imported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They pay duty on the glass imported.

On item 29, furniture, &c.,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is for the purpose of preparing for resolution No. 31. Furniture, wooden, now pays 35 per cent.; iron bedsteads have been classed under manufactures of iron; and, therefore, it is proposed, by section 31, to place iron bedsteads under the head of furniture.

Mr. BLAKE. Its practical relation is to get the duty on bedsteads up to 35 per cent.?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Are these manufactured now in this country?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not very extensively; but they will be manufactured here extensively, if this proposition prevails.

Mr. BLAKE. What duty do they now pay?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. 30 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Where is it that we are to have the blessing of having bedsteads made in this country, if this takes place?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may state at once that they will be made in Montreal, and probably all over the country; but I know they will be made extensively in Montreal.

On item 32, iron and manufactures of iron,

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose this is because so much is brought in under the low grade of steel, which was formerly made of iron?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is difficult now to tell the difference between steel and iron.

Mr. BLAKE. More steel than iron is now used.

Mr. MITCHELL. With relation to iron and steel bridges, on which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is entitled to a drawback, has any arrangement yet been reached as to the distinction between iron and steel bridges?

Mr. BOWELL. I think the question is as to whether the Order in Council, which provides for making certain allowances on iron bridges manufactured in this country, applies to bridges made out of steel. My recollection is that the Order in Council was intended to apply to both, provided that the steel was imported and paid duty; but there are some classes of steel which are free, and difficulty has arisen in carrying out the order—departmentally I am now speaking—as to allowing the bonus—for that is really what it is—on that class of bridges, until the fact has been established that the steel out of which they were made actually paid duty. I promised my hon. friend some time ago, at the very first possible opportunity, to bring that question before the Treasury Board and have it finally settled.

On item 33, leather,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not exactly know how lamb and sheep got in here; but it is owing, perhaps, to a misunderstanding of instructions as to the framing of the resolution. It was intended to apply, however, simply to buck and antelope, a description of skins split by machinery. The demand in this country for that particular kind of leather will not warrant its manufacture here. It is a thin and soft leather—a thin leather used expressly, and solely I may say, in the manufacture of gloves; and as we are not likely, from the limited quantity manufactured, to introduce the machinery, which is very expensive in its nature, into the Dominion of Canada, it was considered desirable to give the manufacturers in this industry the benefit of a lower rate of duty by 5 per cent. than they had before on this particular class of goods. It was intended to cover lamb and sheep, and, therefore, it is proposed to be amended in the terms which have just been read, and, as will be seen, No. 34 will be dropped altogether as it will not then be necessary.

Mr. VAIL. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to one industry to which I think he should do something. In 1877 there were three large tanneries in Digby, in full blast, but they were closed immediately after this Tariff went into force, and they have remained closed ever since.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman has not told us why they were closed, but we find that there are a good many industries that flourish in some hands, but fail in others. Some men have not the same energy, the same enterprise, or the same intellect that others have, so that this will always be the case. I have heard no complaint from the tanners, except that they are asking us for an export duty of tanned bark, so that it may not be exported out of the country. My experience has been that if, as in this case, neither manufacturers nor consumers are complaining, you can come to the conclusion that the matter is pretty evenly balanced, and that all classes are well content.

Mr. VAIL. The worst of it is that the people who were formerly employed in these tanneries have all gone out of the country, in spite of the promise of the hon. gentleman that his policy would keep Canadians in the country and bring back those who had left.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how it is if more leather is not being manufactured in the Dominion of Canada than before, that there has been such a large increase in the importation of hides.

Mr. KIRK. The country will be glad to hear that something besides protection is required to make an industry prosperous.

On item 36, marble,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In 1879 there were two reasons why we imposed 10 per cent. duty on large blocks of marble. One was, that it was not quite certain whether, if we encouraged manufactures largely in the Dominion we should have sufficient revenue. It was stated, on the other hand, that there were deposits of marble in different parts of the Dominion which possibly might be developed into an important industry, so we considered that it would be safe and fair on both of these considerations to impose 10 per cent. as this marble was considered a raw material by some manufacturers. After four years experience we find that we do not require this duty for revenue purposes, and as the marble quarries have not been developed it is proposed that these blocks shall be admitted free. As will be seen by the next resolution marble sawn on two sides will be reduced from 15 to 10 per cent. If these resolutions are adopted the duty will stand in this way: marble in blocks over fifteen cubic feet, free; sawn in slabs on two sides, 10 per cent.; sawn in shape for monuments, &c., 20 per cent.; finished marble, 30 per cent.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). Why do you limit the size of the block marble?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are in the habit of bringing in a very expensive article of Italian marble in small packages, and they are bringing it in in blocks sometimes undressed and sometimes shaped, in which case it pays 20 per cent. This being an expensive article, and only used by the very rich, we thought it well not to disturb that duty. Then the hon. gentleman will notice that marble is brought into this country and sawn here, in which case it pays 10 per cent.

Mr. GILLMOR. There is an industry in the village in which I live, not a marble industry, but one which enters into competition with marble, namely, red granite, which is now coming into general use. Those who are engaged in that industry are in favor of Protection; but this Tariff will allow the marble to come in and interfere with the development of this branch of manufacture. It is really a struggling industry, and a great deal of money has been lost in attempting to develop it; and as it is the hon. gentleman's policy to protect all industries, this one should receive consideration as well as the others.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, because I recollected that in his able and earnest speeches on this subject he has laid down the doctrine that a free and perfect interchange is the best policy. If it were possible for any people to get along without taxation, or the imposition of duties, this might be a desirable thing. With regard to this particular industry, I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that it is finished marble with which this granite would compete, and that the duty upon it is the same as before, 30 per cent.

On item 38, carbolic and heavy oil,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. By the Tariff at present carbolic oil, if used for pavements, for wood for building or for railway ties, is admitted at a lower rate of duty; but if a man imported carbolic oil for the purpose of preparing lumber for a water-proof roof, he has to pay the full rate of duty. We saw no reason why such a distinction should be made, and the proposition is that, for whatever purpose the article is imported, it shall pay the same rate of duty.

Mr. BLAKE. The item is carbolic or heavy oil.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This change is merely for the purpose of fixing what has been the ruling of the Department for the last fourteen years.

Mr. BLAKE. When the phrase "carbolic or heavy oil" is accompanied with a description of the purposes for which it is used, one can understand what it means, but when the phrase is used without that description, you get a very wide idea of the meaning of heavy oil. You may be adding confusion to confusion.

Mr. BOWELL. It is the same phrase as was used in the old Tariff. The only reason for the change is that difficulties have sometimes arisen by the oil being imported for other purposes than those specified in the Tariff. It was then claimed to come under the enumerated articles at 20 per cent., and it is to prevent these difficulties that carbolic or heavy oil, for whatever purpose it may be used, is to be admitted at the uniform rate of 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I can understand "carbolic oil," but it is the phrase "heavy oil," without the addendum in the old Tariff sufficiently definite in meaning as not to be confounded with other articles.

Mr. BOWELL. I am speaking under correction, but I think so. This wording is that of the Commissioner whose duty is to look after the working of the minutiae of the Tariff.

On items 39, 40 and 41, lubricating oils,

Mr. BOWELL. Lubricating oils at present, when not otherwise specified, pay 25 per cent., and petroleum and the products of petroleum pay 7½ cts. per imperial gallon. An article which has been imported as lubricating oil has been found by the Department to be nothing more nor less than a pure petroleum of a heavy gravity, and we have ruled that it shall pay the duty of 7½ cts. a gallon, particularly as it has been entered at 3, 4 and 5 cts. per gallon. A dispute arose on the question, and a suit was threatened against the Department; but the matter was submitted to the hon. Minister of Justice, and he decided that the ruling was correct. It was thought better, however, in order that there should be no difficulty in future, that all classes of lubricating oils, composed wholly or in part of petroleum, and costing not less than 30 cts. per gallon, should pay 25 per cent. ad valorem, and that all costing less than that should pay 7½ cts. per gallon. Other kinds of lubricating oil, no matter how produced, or of what quality, are to pay 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BLAKE. According to the hon. gentleman's statement, the duty he proposes will be a duty varying from 100 to 200 per cent. It is the petroleum duty applied to the cheapest kind of lubricating oil.

Mr. BOWELL. Difficulties have arisen in insisting upon an amended entry. The importers have entered this oil at the lowest possible price, and we have had great difficulty in finding its fair value, particularly when entered for an ad valorem duty.

On item 42, paper hangings or wall paper, &c.,

Mr. BLAKE. Are they going to be made here?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are being made here now.

Mr. BLAKE. What do they pay now?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. 25 per cent. duty; this is 30 per cent.

On item 43, union collar cloth paper,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is really the raw material not likely to be made here; and we have reduced it to the manufacturers of paper collars, 5 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the duty on paper collars?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. We are making our own paper collars now?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

On item 44, spices,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is for a two-fold object. This is one of the items on which we could reduce taxation. The change in the United States Tariff, recently made on unground spices, would result, if not met, in our receiving spices adulterated and of an inferior character.

On item 45, tobacco and snuff,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is a reduction on the imports of 5 cts. a lb. leaving the manufactured tobacco and snuff in the Dominion in a better position than before by 3 cts. a lb.

Mr. PATERSON. What will be the effect on the Revenue?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The duty is 25 cts. now and 12½ per cent. It is proposed to reduce the specific duty to 20 cts., leaving the 12½ per cent. unchanged, or a decrease of 5 cts. a lb. $10,000 will be about the reduction in the revenue.

Mr. BLAKE. Why the reduction from the 1st of May next?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Because the Excise duty is reduced from the 1st of May.

Mr. PATERSON. This is one of the items in which this line is adopted which has been very detrimental to trade. Some time ago it was said—I do not know how correctly—that the duty would be reduced, and consequently the tobacco trade was paralyzed awaiting this reduction. Not long ago the hon. Minister of Railways said that under constitutional Government changes in the Tariff should be made with the greatest secrecy, to prevent trade being disturbed. There seems to be a total departure from that principle.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I quite agree that it is desirable a change in duties should be first made known in Parliament, except, as in the case of 1878, when the Elections turned on the question as to whether the duties should be raised on articles made in the country or not, and after the Elections everybody knew the duties would be increased and prudent traders imported accordingly. With regard to tobacco, it was known that one of the means of reducing the revenue of the United States to be adopted by Congress was to reduce the revenue on tobacco, either to reduce it to 8 cts. a lb. or to take it off altogether, and we had to await their action so that we might reduce our duties proportionally, otherwise our manufactories would be ruined, and, besides, our revenue would not be increased through the smuggling of American tobacco. I think it would have been a hard matter, indeed, to say to those men throughout the country that the people shall not have time to consume a portion of this tobacco before we make a reduction, and that they shall lose on the whole of it. The only question was whether we should put it in force the 1st of May or the 1st of June. We know there is a stagnation in business, that men who manufacture tobacco cannot get much sale just now. It was a necessity on the part of the Government, for we would much rather have taken the duty off other things than to take 8 cts. a lb. off tobacco. We have decided to take the 1st of May, so that the tobacco that has paid duty may be consumed by that time. We put it at that period for the protection of men who have it in stock.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I understand the hon. First Minister aright, he holds that this principle of secrecy is simply to be maintained when it is proposed to advance the duties, not when they are to be reduced.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; I say most emphatically that in that case it is of the utmost importance. But with reference to reduction, I said nothing of the kind, because the hon. member knows that I stated the Session before last, in reference to tea, that we were going to take off the duty, because no revenue could be expected, and that was stated everywhere in the country. There are circumstances where it is right to notify the people of the reduction of duty, so that they may govern themselves accordingly, but in an increase it is just the opposite.

Mr. PATERSON. I understand the hon. Minister to say that when he proposed an increase of duty, secrecy should be maintained.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. Then how is he carrying out that principle, when nine months before the time he places in his resolutions a proposition to increase the duties on one line of goods  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.? How is he maintaining this principle, which ought to be inviolable, when he proposes an increase of 10 per cent. on all agricultural implements in the way he has done?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the Government had decided upon increasing the duty, it would have informed the whole Dominion. There are circumstances, as in the case of taking the duty off tea, or increasing it on any article, as in the case of printed goods next January. That is because parties commencing industries of this kind would not be ready until next January. We do not say it to one or two individuals, but to everybody. Therefore, if the term secrecy is concerned, if it is for the purpose of revenue, it would not be judicious to make that announcement; but where the revenue is not concerned, then we are in a position to give everybody the same information.

Mr. PATERSON. Then, this is not revenue?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. It is not revenue for the next twelve months, nearly fifteen months.

Mr. PATERSON. The effect will evidently be largely to increase the exportation of prints prior to the 1st of July, resulting in a glutted market and an evil to the importers. It will also result in having the country so glutted with this particular line of goods that the parties to be benefited by it cannot be for months and months after the institution is opened. The hon. member now acknowledges openly that in the imposition of this extra duty he is not doing it for want of revenue at all, but simply to protect this one print manufactory.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I state distinctly that by this proposition I do not expect an increase of revenue for the next fiscal year, because parties are already supplied up to the 1st of June. I do not think it likely that merchants will import prints for more than one season, because the style is constantly changing and the goods become valueless if kept for more than a year or two. After considering all these circumstances the Government considered that it would be better to name a specific date.

On item 46, spirits of turpentine,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is simply a reduction of the tax. The article is not produced here, but it enters very largely into use among builders, painters and others, and it is proposed to reduce the duty from 20 per cent. to 10 per cent. ad valorem.

On item 47, vegetables,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This extends the duty now imposed on tomatoes to all kinds of vegetables, and places it at 2 cts. per can not exceeding a pound. It is hoped that this will reduce the cost to the consumer, and will increase the demand for the producer.

On item 48, vinegar,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The change proposed is not so much for the purpose of revenue as to promote domestic manufacture. The Excise duty is 4 cts. per gallon, imperial measure, and the duty on the imported article is 12 cts. per imperial gallon, which it is proposed to increase to 15 cts. It is pretty clear that a sound, healthy article can be produced here, and this change is to enable our own manufacturers to secure, to a large extent, the Canadian market.

On item 49, wools and woollens,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Under the present Tariff worsted yarns under No. 30 pay 20 per cent.; over that  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb., and 20 per cent. Now yarns of almost every description and number are made in Canada. It is said we do not manufacture them of quite so fine a quality as they do in England, but as they are now manufactured here, and the necessity for the exception has been removed, it is proposed that all worsted yarns shall pay  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb. and 20 per cent. It is proposed that socks and stockings of the classes now knitted in Canada, shall no longer be charged  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. and 20 per cent., but shall pay the same duty as manufactured clothing. Woollen goods of which clothing is made pays  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. a lb. and 20 per cent.; the clothing when made 10 cts. a lb. and 25 per cent. This places socks and stockings in the category of clothing, which will be 10 cts. per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem. This is the object, and we place woollen yarns under a uniform duty of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb. and 20 per cent.

Mr. ALLEN. This is a very unfair way of dealing with these goods. The poor man, who purchases cheaper goods than the rich man, pays more duty. Take, for instance, the item of heavy beaver for workmen's overcoats and poor women's heavy coats for the winter, the specific duty on this amounts in some cases to 35 per cent.; while on the finer goods, black broadcloths and goods of that description imported for gentlemen, who are well able to pay the duty, is only 24 per cent. In many cases the poor man, however, pays from 48 to 55 per cent. Some of the heavier goods are purchased in England at from 60 to 90 cts. a yard; but, taking the average at 75 cts., these goods weigh, perhaps, from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to  $2\frac{3}{4}$  lbs. a yard, and thus pay nearly 18 per cent. specific duty, while black broadcloths, costing \$5, or 20s. sterling, a yard, do not weigh more than 2 lbs. a yard, and only pay 14 per cent. of a specific duty on what costs \$10. This is very unfair, and the farmers and workmen of this country say that it is unfair; and I hope that the Government will consider the position of the workmen in comparison with the rich and wealthy, and place them in a position at least of equality with the latter. These are facts, I know. This is my own business. I have been in it for the last quarter of a century; I know exactly what I am speaking about; and I hope the Government will take it into consideration and do something to alleviate the position of the poor man.

Mr. HESSON. The anxiety of my hon. friend is quite uncalled for. I do not think the poor man needs his sympathy at all, in the matter of shoddy cloth brought from the Old Country. It would be a mercy to the poor men of Canada to shut it out altogether, and I can assure my hon. friend, from my own experience—and I presume that he has had the same experience—that you cannot sell that kind of goods to the poor man, who buys good Canadian stock which does not pay one cent of duty. You can buy shoddy cloth 2½ lbs. to the yard, and keep it for two or three years; but then you cannot sell it at all; while a piece of Canadian tweed sells almost immediately. The hon. gentleman supposes that the poor man pays an extraordinary rate of duty compared with the rich man; but as a matter of fact we sell more Scotch tweeds to the rich man than to the poor, and these tweeds pay a heavy duty, which is perfectly right on the principle that we hope to encourage the manufacture in this country of an equally good class of goods, eventually. Besides, the poor man to-day is getting better and cheaper cloth—and the hon. gentleman knows it—than he did before the introduction of the National Policy, and it is home-made cloth. The same thing applies to socks. The hon. gentleman complains, and the question is raised on that issue; but what is my hon. friend's experience in this regard? Who buys home-made socks? Why, the workmen and the laboring men of Canada. Do they pay any tax? No; the raw material, which we cannot sell in a foreign market—it is shut out of the American market by a heavy duty—is manufactured at home, and no duty is paid on it. We have home made clothing which gives work to the farmer's wife and daughter, and to the poor man's wife and daughter as well; and we get the best article that can be made. I can say, that the more this policy prevents the importation of shoddy goods, so much the better. The same thing applies to socks at $1 a dozen—laboring men's socks. No better article can be made and brought into the country. Canadian tweeds are cheaper to-day than my hon. friend ever handled them for before the National Policy was introduced, and the poor man is perfectly satisfied. Instead of cheap shoddy, 2 lbs. to the yard, double width, which falls to pieces inside of 6 months—this is my experience, and I venture to say that it is the hon. gentleman's experience—the poor man gets better goods now, and does not pay more taxes to-day than he did formerly, because he does not buy the poor shoddy goods. As to clothing made here, there is no taxation on that either. I remember that a few years ago, a large importing house in the city of Hamilton, did a large business in imported shoddy goods, until it was prevented by the trade, and the exposure of the worthlessness of this class of stock. People were compelled from time to time to refuse to accept these goods; and the result was that this house had to abandon the importation of that class of goods altogether. The sooner we get rid of the importation of shoddy cloths, for which my hon. friend pleads here to-day, the better it will be for the poor man.

Mr. ALLEN. We all agree that clothing is cheaper than it has been, but what is the reason? Before the inauguration of the National Policy wool was 35 cts. a pound, while last year thousands and thousands of pounds were sold at 18 cts.; that is the reason, and that is no excuse for the unfair duty levied on clothing. Besides, have we not shoddy cloths made in this country, and they are protected?

Mr. McMULLEN. I would say in reply to the member for North Perth, that as far as concerns my section of the country, he is mistaken; a very large percentage of the overcoats worn by the farmers and their sons in winter are there made all of the very heavy shoddy cloth imported from England, and referred to by the hon. member for North Grey. I do not know about Stratford, but I know that in the northern counties in winter almost every farmer and every farmer's son wears the heavy pilot and tweed cloth coats, of which the cloth is imported, the very same of which the member for Grey speaks. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hesson) talks of Canadian tweeds and of their manufacture into clothing. I have no doubt that these are worn for ordinary clothing; but the heavy winter overcoats are made out of this very shoddy cloth; and the duty imposed on it bears hard on the poor man.

Mr. HESSON. There never was a time when Canadian overcoats, made of good Canadian tweeds, were more commonly worn than is now the case, and I know this from my own experience, and the more that this becomes the custom day after day, and the more it is encouraged the better it will be for the poor man. The less of shoddy goods that are imported the better it will be for the country.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman contradict the statement as to the price of wool?

Mr. HESSON. I was speaking of the shoddy industry, and of the importation of these goods into this country.

Mr. BLAKE. But as to wool?

Mr. HESSON. We are not talking about wool. As to the class of goods referred to by the leader of the Opposition he knows perfectly well that the poor man's clothing is very cheap, and if shoddy cloths were shut out altogether from the country the poor man would not be a sufferer.

On item 23, printed and dyed cottons, &c.,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The item as proposed to be amended will stand: Provided that printed or dyed cottons, except jeans, coutilles, cambries, silicias and casbans, shall, on and after the first day of January, 1884, be charged with a duty of 27½ per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman give us some further explanations, as this is one of the most important changes in the Tariff.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It will be remembered that, in 1879, when the Government introduced the policy which has been accepted by the House, it was stated, when we came to the article of cotton prints, it was proposed that no change should be made in the duty on that article; that while other cotton goods were placed under a specific or an ad valorem, or in other words, a protective duty, we asked that no change should be made in regard to them, except from 17½ to 20 per cent. As they were not made in the country, we did not ask the House to increase the duty on those articles to any greater extent. At the time that we were submitting the resolutions of 1879 to the House, we stated that there were many articles upon which we had not changed the duty except by increasing it from 17½ to 20 per cent. for the purpose of revenue, and that the policy of the Government was to protect manufactures when they were introduced into the country. We told Parliament that we would ask the House to give them that protection when the capitalists and manufacturers of the country were in a position to manufacture. Under these circumstances, down to the present time, there has been no application made to Parliament by the Government to change the duty on these prints. Two years ago, some gentlemen interested in the establishment of a cotton factory in Toronto, proposed to erect a factory with a capital of £300,000, and it was stated that English capitalists would put in £100,000, provided they ascertained that it would be a profitable investment. They communicated with the Government, and I say frankly that we had at the time grave doubts whether this article could be successfully manufactured in the Dominion of Canada. We thought that, considering the skill which is necessary in the designing of prints; considering the capital which it is necessary to introduce in an enterprise of that kind; considering the great variety of prints which is necessary to suit the tastes and wants of the people of Canada, it was doubtful whether such an enterprise would succeed, and therefore we did not give them much encouragement at that time. The result was that we did not hear any more of it for some time. A year afterwards some gentlemen put themselves in communication with members of the Government and with myself as Finance Minister, and they stated that if we gave them some protection, the same protection as other cotton goods had, they would undertake to establish within a year an industry of this kind in Montreal. Entertaining as we did, some doubts about the success of that enterprise, we did not agree at that time to ask Parliament for any consideration in this matter. Last spring, after Parliament rose, some gentlemen who are interested in an enterprise of this kind, and who are now erecting buildings for the purpose, waited upon the Government and stated their case. They stated that they were prepared to place $1,000,000 of capital in this enterprise to begin with. When we pointed out the difficulties they had to encounter, they said that their intentions were to use the rollers which were first used in the printing of cotton in the factories of the Old Country, and that they would bring them out and manufacture prints here in great varieties, and that they were in a position to make the enterprise pay. These gentlemen having stated this, the Government felt that they should say to them that, if they entered into this enterprise with $1,000,000 of capital, and that others were likely to follow, they would come to Parliament and ask that they should receive the same protection, or nearly the same protection, which was given to other cotton industries. This industry has been established under those auspices. We are in hopes that before long the factory which it was proposed to proceed with in Montreal two years ago, will come into operation, and under this system, which removes the difficulty which presented itself to the minds of the Government as to the designing of these prints—one factory being in a position to turn out these cottons by the 1st of January. Under these circumstances, the Government, in accordance with their policy of 1879—the policy which they followed up since—have decided to come to Parliament and ask the consideration of the House for this industry. We believe that we have sufficient competition to keep the prices, so far as grey cottons are concerned, so that they will be as low before the end of 1883, and lower, than they ever were before.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course the considerations which apply to these two classes are very different—the consideration which applies to the possibility of establishing the manufacture of dyed or printed cottons; and any remarks which I shall address to the Committee shall be addressed to those classes to which the hon. gentleman has confined his observations, namely, printed cottons. He says that on two distinct occasions applications were made to the Government unsuccessfully, to induce them to raise the duty—to raise the duty, because they had announced that to be their policy—unsuccessfully, because they were not convinced that the enterprise was a feasible one in this country. The reason they could not be convinced was because they feared that the attempt would fail to produce a variety of patterns of prints which are required to suit the tastes of the people. They were satisfied that the people would require a vast variety of prints. I was informed the other day that one single importing house has received no less than 1,500 different patterns of prints at one time. Well, the gentlemen with the large capital, with English capital, it is true, to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, were not able, by any reasonable argument they could use, to remove this difficulty; but now, it seems, it is removed, and by what means? The hon. gentleman stated—what I was informed, but which I hardly believed—by the projectors of the new Bill. The ladies of Canada, it appears, are to be dressed in prints at least one year behind the world's fashions. The hon. gentleman stated awhile ago that the importers of prints would not buy prints more than six months in advance, because of the changes in the fashions; yet he tells us that the print factory which is established in Canada has begun with the used up print patterns of the world.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Immediately after they have used them.

Mr. BLAKE. Immediately after the production is going on, and our ladies are to be, as it is said they used to be, with reference to the Paris fashions, a year behindhand. The hon. gentleman must not forget that he is making these ladies a more important factor than they have been. He must remember that he is little likely to get the votes of ladies whom he is compelling to wear the cast-off patterns of last year. It is the print pattern which makes it attractive, but I think it will be found that the same circumstances which will limit the patterns will largely enhance the cost of the article. What was the difficulty with our cotton factories in their early condition? It was that they were attempting to make too great a variety of goods; it was that they had not mastered the great secret of running for a long time on one line; and you must have a large consumption to do that. The hon. gentleman says that the over-importation, which, he thinks, will take place, will only last until the middle of next year. Will he tell us what revenue he expects to derive in 1883-84 under the operation of the enhanced duties?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not expect any increase. I stated that before. The hon. gentleman is, of course, very anxious to alarm us—

Mr. BLAKE. No; I do not wish to alarm you.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As to the effect the increase is to have on the ladies, especially under the change in the Election Law. It is very remarkable, notwithstanding the appeals made during the last three years to the poor man and to the farmers, with reference to the taxes imposed on the coarse goods they use, that when the time came in June last we did not find them condemning this policy, but sustaining it; and the ladies will vote for this policy, because I believe they are patriotic, and will vote to sustain the industries of the country, even if it costs them a cent or two more, in a cotton dress.

Mr. COLBY. I have no doubt the ladies of Canada would have been more grateful to the hon. leader of the Opposition had he manifested his solicitude for them at a time when such solicitude would have seemed disinterested, but after the announcement that they are to be included in the Franchise Bill, they will hardly give him credit for disinterestedness. I do not share the apprehension which the hon. leader of the Opposition has expressed, and which it seems the hon. Finance Minister himself at some time entertained, with regard to the success of dyeing and printing cotton cloths in Canada. I think we have all been a little too timid with regard to the future. Every hon. gentleman in this House must recollect the time when capitalists looked with a good deal of apprehension upon the establishment of an ordinary cotton manufactory. Doubts were expressed as to whether our people were sufficiently numerous to sustain it, and yet to-day we have 400,000 spindles operating, and, I believe, they are not sufficient for the requirements of the country. We all recollect the time when it was doubtful whether woollen mills could be sustained in Canada. It was urged that it would be impossible for Canada to compete with the skill, and the cheap labor, and the capital of Europe; and yet, to-day, it is the proud boast of our manufacturers that Canadian woollen goods are not surpassed by any goods of their kind in the world. We have succeeded, notwithstanding these misgivings regarding cotton and woollen goods, beyond our most sanguine hopes and expectations. A few years ago it was thought that we clumsy Canadians could not manufacture agricultural implements that would compare with those manufactured in the United States, and yet to-day Canadian agricultural implements are unsurpassed in quality and are cheaper than the same class of goods could be obtained from the United States, if there was no duty upon them at all. So, I say that, as success has crowned every effort we have made to establish manufactures, we have reason to infer from the experience of the past that we have been unduly timid—that we have not properly appreciated the possibilities of our industrial growth. Now, with regard to the establishment of a successful dyeing and print works in Canada, I believe all that is required to make it a success is the requisite capital and skill. I have some knowledge of the enterprise to which the hon. Finance Minister has referred, and I can assure this House that I have the best reason for believing that, so far as capital is concerned, there will be no difficulty whatever, after having read such a magnificent subscription list as that which I saw the other day, containing the names of prominent financial men in Canada, such as Mr. Allan Gilmour, Mr. J. G. Ross, and a number of the prominent manufacturing men in Montreal—men who will carry out anything they undertake. I maintain that in Canada we can build a cotton mill as cheap, if not cheaper, than it can be built elsewhere on this continent. The material for the construction of the mill is cheaper here than it is in the United States; the labor for the construction is cheaper here; the labor for operating the mill is as cheap, if not cheaper, than in the United States, and we have here abundant water power, and you cannot over-estimate the importance of water power as an economical factor. In the very mill it is proposed to establish here, to which reference has been made by the hon. Finance Minister, it has been estimated that a saving of $50,000 per annum would be made by the use of the immense water power at our disposal as compared with the cost of steam. With these favorable conditions we have every reason to anticipate success, provided ordinary prudent business management is brought to bear; and I may say this enterprise has associated with it the name of Mr. Ward, of Montreal, one of its promoters, a gentleman who has been connected with every successful cotton enterprise started in Canada, and who is as sound politically from the standpoint of the hon. gentlemen opposite as he is sound financially, and who will be of great use to us in carrying out this important enterprise. We have the capital, and with the capital we can purchase, for skill is a purchasable commodity, the best skill in Europe or the United States; we can purchase the best machinery, and we can lay the foundation of a successful enterprise. Now, what stands in the way of our doing so? It is said a large variety of patterns are required. We know there are no limits to the demands of taste and wealth in any direction, whether in the direction of cottons or silks. But we know that those staple articles which are used by the masses of the people of this country, are not those changeable fashions which vary every year. We know that certain lines of staple goods, for instance, regatta shirtings, common prints and durable cloths, are worn, with very little change of pattern, year after year by the farmers and working people of this country. These staple articles which are mostly used, can be produced in this manufactory from the ordinary plates, which are stereotyped, and can be purchased at cheap rates. The reference made by the hon. Finance Minister is simply to another class of patterns that are transient. These patterns can be obtained from other factories, for it must be remembered that in the United States the markets and seasons are earlier than ours, and it is but a trifling matter to remove from some factory in the United States or England, rollers which have served their purpose there and may be used here. This is the exception, not the rule. Now, I believe that if print manufactories can be carried on successfully in Mexico—and there are six print establishments in Mexico—if they can be carried on successfully in Switzerland with half our population, and in Norway and Sweden, as I believe it is in all these countries, with a lesser population than ours, it may be carried on by the enterprise and skill of the people of Canada, with our increasing population and bright prospects for the future. The enterprise adverted to is of no insignificant character. It is estimated the production of the mill would be one-sixth of the entire present production of cotton goods in the Dominion. It will contain 60,000 spindles, give employment to 1,000 or 1,200 operatives, and turn out at least $1,500,000 worth of goods annually, while the production will be capable of being expanded to meet the increasing demands of the country. Now, I can quite understand how this enterprise can be criticized from a Free Trade stand-point, as well as the whole protective policy which has been twice sanctioned by the people, and which this Government has been sent here with instructions to carry out. I can understand hon. gentlemen opposite criticizing it honestly from their standpoint, but from our standpoint, that of the majority of the people, as declared at two recent elections, no fault can be found with the policy proposed by the hon. Finance Minister, which is simply the complement of the policy he has been carrying out since he came into office. I believe we ought not to be too timid in these matters. I believe that as a great and a growing people, we should not content ourselves with remaining in the old ruts and working on the lowest plane, but should aspire to do something higher and better, and encourage as far as we can that species of manufacturing which involves four processes, such as manufacturing cotton goods, and bleaching, and dyeing and printing, and not limit ourselves to the one process of manufacturing plain cotton. I believe we should strive to make within ourselves, in carrying out this policy upon which the country is launched, all those things which can be properly manufactured here. I have no misgivings with regard to the future of this enterprise. I will say, moreover, that the gentlemen who are risking their large capital in this enterprise have done so with full deliberation. They are experienced men of business; they are men experienced in the manufacture of cotton goods; who have realized their fortunes by their industry; they have studied this problem with more care and forethought than it is possible for us to give it; they are willing to risk their capital in the enterprise, and they say to the Government of the day: "We ask for no special protection, and we are willing to embark our means in this enterprise, if protected to the extent of 27½ per cent., which is less than the average protection given to the manufacturers of plain cottons. We laid the proposition before the Government—a proposition by men who mean business when they come to the Government—and the Government had no alternative from its stand-point. Having reference to their pledges to the people to carry out a policy which would encourage new enterprises, the Government could not go back upon its record without stultifying itself, without confessing that their policy was a delusion; they could not do otherwise, than to grant the reasonable request made by these capitalists, and to come down with the proposition laid before you to-day. An hon. gentleman sitting opposite me, speaking on this matter the other evening, said that nothing would make the National Policy so unpopular, as to show these worthless Canadian goods to the people. Now, I am sorry that hon. gentleman cannot discuss these questions without condemning in advance the products of the industry and skill of the Canadian people. If a person uniformly makes that presentation of the case, perhaps some few people may be deluded by the fallacy. But that hon. gentleman, who I believe is a trader, should honestly say to his lady customers, as he displays a stylish piece of imported print: "There is a particular article which is not manufactured in Canada, a peculiarly nice article which is to be imported from some other country, paying a duty of 27½ per cent., instead of a duty of 20 per cent. It is true you pay a higher duty, but you are assisting to build up an important industry in this country, you are assisting in giving employment to a great many people who otherwise would be obliged to leave this country to find employment elsewhere. More than that, the very money you pay into the Treasury enables the Finance Minister to relieve you from duties upon other things which are equally necessities of life—upon your tea, your coffee, and other articles which are as much necessities of life, and enter as much into common consumption as the prints and the calicoes." The good lady who has to purchase these articles, if she be an intelligent and patriotic lady, and if she have a proper appreciation of her indebtedness to that party who have invested her with the franchise, will purchase the goods cheerfully, and vote for the National Policy.

Mr. BLAKE. I see the hon. gentleman finds it necessary to increase the duty on dyed goods as well as prints. I was told by one of the proprietors of the Hochelaga mills that 25 per cent. would be ample.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When this subject was under the consideration of the Government last spring they came to the Government in reference to printed goods, and it was then stated that if the Government asked Parliament to impose a duty of 27½ per cent. on the printed goods, a like duty would be imposed upon the dyed goods, but as it does not cover the whole of them they will not get over 20 per cent upon those that are named in this list.

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps the hon. member for Stanstead, being interested in this project, could give us some idea as to how many mills, like the one he has described to us, our market might find employment for.

Mr. COLBY. I will give the hon. gentleman the benefit of all the information I have on the subject. I heard the opinion expressed by a gentleman well informed on this subject that this particular mill, as projected now, that will be in operation on the 1st of May next, would furnish about one-fourth of the goods that will be needed in this country. Provisions are made for a great enlargement of the mill at a future time.

Mr. BLAKE. How many yards is it calculated to manufacture.

Mr. COLBY. I could not say how many yards. 60,000 spindles will be running which will turn out $1,500,000 worth per year.

Mr. BOWELL. If that statement be correct, this mill will be able to supply the demand. The hon. gentleman will understand that it would be impossible, unless we printed a couple of volumes of Trade and Navigation Reports to indicate the quantity of every particular article; but I find that, of white or dyed cotton, jeans, coutilles, cambrics, silicias, casbans and printed calicoes paying 20 per cent., there were imported $1,431,381 worth (the number of yards is not given) on which a duty was paid of $283,730. There are a number of other articles under cotton manufactures, but I take the articles which are intended to be included in the proposition now before the House as coming within these classes.

Mr. BLAKE. The information I have, which, I believe, came from a gentleman interested in this very mill, is, that he thought the estimate for this class of goods, that is the printed and dyed goods, had been very much underrated, and, if I remember correctly, but I will not speak with positiveness, he spoke of 40,000,000 or 45,000,000 of yards as being the consumption. This mill would, at that rate, supply about one-third of the consumption.

Mr. COLBY. It would supply about one-third or one-fourth at the close of this year. But as I have stated the whole establishment is arranged with a view to a very large extension, and provision has been made for a great excess of water power over what will be originally required.

Mr. COLBY.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If there is only going to be one mill how are we going to get cheap goods? If there were half a dozen mills I could understand how home competition would ultimately bring down the price, but the fact that one mill is going to supply the whole country is to create a monopoly at once.

Mr. COLBY. The hon. gentlemen might have accepted the statements made by the leader of the Opposition and myself as being derived from gentlemen who profess to have some knowledge of the subject, and who have investigated, and their information has not been obtained through the Trade and Navigation Returns, but through business channels. I do not think those Returns give any information with respect to the quantity imported. I believe 60,000 spindles will produce one-half, one-third, or one-quarter of the estimated consumption.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to a matter of very considerable importance. In a former Session the duty on cheese cloth was increased, and it was also provided that a drawback should be allowed upon all cotton used by cheese makers in the Dominion and exported. The regulations in connection with this drawback are such that they cannot possibly be complied with. No doubt the Minister of Customs knows the difficulty experienced in trying to obtain the drawback on this cotton after it has been exported. A large quantity was exported and sold by the proprietors of three factories, it having been announced that the drawback would be allowed. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to make regulations whereby the manufacturers would receive what I consider to be only justice to them, now that the cheese makers have used the cotton expecting a drawback to be allowed.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think the regulations are such as to preclude the possibility of makers receiving the drawback if they would only take a little trouble when they import to keep an account of the amount of duty paid. They have been repeatedly told that if they would establish the fact that the cheese cloth has been imported and duty paid, and had been used for the purpose intended, and had been exported, the drawback would be allowed. It seems to me that it would be easy enough if the parties importing would take the trouble to keep an entry in a book, and when they sold it for cheese purposes they should obtain from the cheese maker the fact that it was sold for exportation and had been exported. With a business so enormous as the cheese industry has grown to be in this country, not only for home consumption but for export, unless there were some prescribed rule which should guide the Department in making the rebate, it would be found that a large amount of the cheese cloth consumed in this country would receive the drawback. That is not the principle on which drawback is paid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I quite agree that if the drawback were allowed on the information stated by the hon. Minister, the makers would be perfectly satisfied. But the authorities had demanded more, and had required the export entry for every piece of cotton exported with every particular cheese. The hon. Minister knows it is impossible that this can be furnished. But to say that they can provide a separate export entry for every cheese exported from the country, he knows is simply impossible.

Mr. BOWELL. I can assure my hon. friend that no such demand was ever made on any cheese-maker or importer of cheese cloth. They are asked to do nothing more and nothing less than what I have already stated. We have asked them for a statement of the export entry of the whole, but not for every cheese. If a factory makes 1,000 boxes of cheese during the year, they know exactly how much cloth has been consumed in putting up this cheese, and if they show an export entry for the 1,000 boxes of cheese, then the requirements of the Department are complied with; but the difficulty has been, that those who demand a drawback have asked the Department, in too many cases, simply to take their word that they imported so many yards of cloth and exported it, without producing any evidence of either fact; and I am sure that the hon. gentleman would not expect any Department to pay away the public funds unless it had some evidence to justify the payment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I am perfectly satisfied that such evidence should be furnished, and I know that the parties in my own part of the country who are asking for a drawback, will be perfectly willing to supply the evidence which he has stated will be required; and I hope that when the matter comes up for discussion before him and the Department again, he will take the same liberal view which he has announced to this House.

Mr. BOWELL. I always did take that view.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister what percentage of profit he anticipates that the owners of this mill will make out of this investment. I fancy that this must have been calculated in order to arrive at 27½ per cent. protection, and in order to ascertain whether this is just between the manufacturer and the consumer, I hope that the hon. Finance Minister has carefully estimated the cost of the mill, and of manufacturing of this kind, so as to hold the balance fairly between the classes mentioned. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has stated that there are great advantages to be got in the way of water power, and of bringing old machinery from England, etc., but we want to know what percentage of profit is likely to be realized out of the investment. The hon. gentleman did say that he intended to give them about the same profit which other cotton factories now operated here secure; and if so, the stock of this mill will increase very rapidly in value. There is no stock in cotton mills in this country which has not increased 100 per cent. during the last two or three years, besides paying very large dividends. If this mill is to reap the same profit, I think it is very little wonder that gentlemen are found willing to invest their money in it; and I hope that the Finance Minister has given this matter his careful consideration, because it is his duty, while these people are pressing upon him for advantages in the way of protective duties, to see that too heavy a burden is not laid on the consumers. I know that a man largely interested in a cotton factory in Canada told me, prior to the introduction of the National Policy, that if the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, then in power, would grant him ¼ cent a yard additional duty on the cotton manufactured in his mill, this would be worth $25,000 a year to him in additional profit. I know that under the operation of the National Policy, he is getting 13 cts. a yard; and if a quarter of a yard was worth $25,000 a year, one cent a yard will be worth $100,000 a year. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that the gentleman who has addressed the Committee, has advocated that this mill should receive the protection asked. He says, that they are going to manufacture about one-fourth of the entire cotton used in this country; and in this event the owners of this mill will pocket 25 per cent. of the 7½ cts. increased duty imposed on cotton; the hon. Finance Minister will get 75 per cent. of additional duty, and this is the division which will take place. I hope that the hon. Finance Minister has looked into the matter carefully in order to protect the interests of the consumer.

Mr. COLBY. I would say for the hon. gentleman's information, and of every other member of the House, that I think there is at present some stock to be obtained at par. I do not think the stock book is entirely closed.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The hon. member for North Perth has repeated here the statement, which a good many hon. members have spread throughout the country, that the stocks of cotton companies pay very high profits. I read in to-day's paper, that the Dundas Cotton Mill stock is quoted at from 90 to 95; and the Canada Cotton Company at from 110 to 115.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much is it watered?

Mr. BOWELL. Has it been watered?

Mr. BLAKE. The Dundas mill stock has been watered enormously.

Mr. WALLACE. I would also ask these gentlemen to look at loan companies, which run very little risk, and loan money on real estate to the extent of one-third of its value, so that by no possible combination of circumstances can they lose on their investments if they exercise any kind of care at all. We find that the Canada Farm and Loan Company is quoted in the same paper at 225½ bid, or 2¼ or 2½ times more than the cotton mill stock in which investors run great risks.

An hon. MEMBER. Is it watered?

Mr. WALLACE. And probably, as an hon. gentleman says, the loan company's stock is watered too. I think myself, that if great profits are made out of these investments, the matter will speedily correct itself. If that hon. gentleman can make so much more money by investing in cotton mills than in other enterprises, he will do so; and the thing will eventually be brought to its proper level; but we find that to-day cotton mill stock and stock in various manufacturing enterprises are not nearly so high as loan company stock.

Mr. BENSON. I had no intention of speaking this evening, but perhaps I shall be able to add my little mite to this discussion. I believe we cannot be too thankful to any party or parties who establish a new manufactory in this country. Pioneers always have a very hard road to travel, and no one but those who have gone through the ordeal can form any conception of the troubles, vexations and disappointments which surrounded the path of those who begin a new industry. As to the sugar refineries, I remember that old Mr. Redpath told me that for years and years he made no money except what he made by judicious purchases. I can say the same thing, and I know of no industry which at the onset paid those who began it. For years and years they yield no profit at all. There is one other important point which we ought to bear in mind with respect to manufacturers: that they have a greater stake in the country than almost any other member of the community. A manufacturer is anchored here; he cannot get away. I remember that a very wealthy old manufacturer—a calico printer—in England, who was advised by his friends to go out of business, said: "There is no escape for the manufacturer but bankruptcy or the grave." In his case it came true in both respects, for hard times came upon him, he lost his money, and the loss of his money brought down his grey hairs in sorrow to the grave. But the important point is, that his works go on and do good to thousands. Though the Reform press has often pointed to Peter Redpath, because he lives in the Old Country, the works go on here, and are doing good for hundreds of miles around. Perhaps here I may be allowed to digress. It has often been stated in the Reform press that Mr. Peter Redpath lived in the Old Country. So he does; though not at Camden House, the old home of the Empress of the French, but at Manor House, and care has always been taken by these newspapers to conceal the fact, that out of five partners in the Redpath firm four live in this country and spend their money here. Mrs. John Redpath lives in Montreal; so does Mr. G. A. Drummond; so does Mr. John James Redpath; so does Mr. Frank Redpath; and though Mr. Peter Redpath lives in England, he is a better Canadian than ninety-nine out of a hundred of those usurers and money-lenders who used to flood the country before the National Policy. He interests himself in the Montreal General Hospital; he has spent more than $100,000 in building a wing to McGill College; he has given that College a library, and every one of his contributions to charitable purposes—and their number is legion—is still continued as though he lived amongst us. There is another thing which I wish to point out, and that is, that everything which is manufactured in the country is cheaper to the consumer—that is, after it begins to be manufactured in a large way. We all know that when the sugar factory was stopped we had worse sugar and dearer than before. I do not wish to speak egotistically, but illustratively, when I say that in 1858, when I came to Canada, I paid 50 cts. a bushel for corn while starch cost the consumer 25 cts. per lb. This year corn costs 90 cts., and the price of starch to the consumer is only 12½ cts. In other words, the raw material has nearly doubled, while the manufactured article is only one-half what it was before. So it is with every branch of manufacture; if we only encourage manufacturers to settle in the country the price of their goods will be cheaper to the consumer.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to make one observation, and that is, that I think there is great exaggeration as to the profits which are obtained by the manufacturers in this industry. In the next place, I say that if there are profits to be obtained from such an industry, I for one should prefer to see those profits go into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers rather than into the pockets of the American manufacturers, and I think the sentiment of the country is with me in that respect. I shall relate to the House one incident which fell under my own observation. I was going from Toronto last year, and while in the train I was conversing with a gentleman sitting beside me as to the prospects of the approaching General Elections. This gentleman mentioned that a number of leading Reformers in the country were likely to join the Conservative party. There was a gentleman sitting immediately behind us who at this point struck into the conversation, and said he wished it to be understood that he was not one of that number, though his name had been mentioned as one Reformer who was likely to leave his party. I turned round and entered into conversation with him. I found that he was a cotton manufacturer, and, though I am not authorized to give his name, I think my own bare statement will be accepted by the House. I asked him to give me some information with regard to his own industry, and he said he would be glad to answer any reasonable question. I asked if he had been benefitted by the National Policy, and he said he had; and I asked him further, whether the price of cottons which he manufactured were to-day any greater to the consumer than before the introduction of the National Policy. He said they were not. He said they were not only not dearer, but that to the extent of the difference between 25 and 24 cts. they were cheaper—that is to say, that cotton which was sold at 25 cts. before the introduction of the National Policy, he was then selling at 24 cts. I said: "Tell me whether the cotton you are manufacturing to-day, if it were in competition with American cotton under Sir Richard Cartwright's Tariff, would be cheaper than the cotton they supplied from America would be to-day." He said it was as cheap or cheaper. I asked him why? He said there were two reasons: first, that labor was cheaper, and the second, that he had peculiar facilities for manufacturing. Those were the facts which he gave me with regard to his own industry. I will give the remainder of the conversation as it occurred. I asked what was the effect of this Tariff upon his coal? He said he considered that the National Policy had injured him so far as coal was concerned; the price was greater than before the introduction of the National Policy. These are the facts which were mentioned to me by this gentleman, who was, and so far as I know, is to-day a supporter of the Reform party, and a friend of the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. I wish to call attention at this moment to what I have observed with regard to discussions of the National Policy, ever since I came into this House, and that is, that there is a cool assumption on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that the imposition of a duty on goods means simply an increase of price to that extent to the consumer. I have listened attentively to the speeches of hon. gentlemen in the hope that they might attempt to substantiate that proposition by argument, but I have observed nothing but a calm assumption of that position. The facts that I have mentioned with regard to this matter show that this is not the case. I may mention another circumstance which fell under my own observation and which bears out the same statement. I was desirous of purchasing some fruit trees, and a gentleman came to me representing a nursery in Ontario, and offered me some fruit trees for sale. I found that these fruit trees were cheaper than they had ever been offered to me before. This was two years ago. I remarked that I was surprised to find that although there was a Tariff of 30 per cent. on trees he was offering to sell me fruit trees cheaper than they had ever been offered to me before. The man was the representative of one of the most respectable nurserymen in Ontario, Mr. Caldwell, of Galt. He told me I might go down to his nursery and select my own trees. There was a duty, I think, of 30 per cent. on fruit trees, and yet these fruit trees were being supplied at a cheaper rate than they had been before the duty was put on. According to hon. gentlemen opposite they ought to have been dearer. There are trees still imported from the United States that have to pay 30 per cent., and then to be sold as cheaply as those grown in Canada. This 30 per cent., therefore, goes to swell the surplus.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not wish to dispute the hon. gentleman's statement, but I would ask him, when he next meets that importer, who bought his cottons prior to the introduction of the National Policy, and paid 25 cts. a yard for them, and is now paying 24 cts., what kind of cotton it was.

Mr. McNEILL. He said the cotton he formerly sold for 25 cts., he was now supplying for 24 cts. I do not know whether he sold it by the yard or by the thread, or how it was.

Mr. HESSON. I have no doubt it was cotton warp.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I would like to say a single word. We have heard a good deal about the pioneer manufacturers; but I want to say that there has been another class of pioneers that have suffered hardships that the pioneer manufacturers know nothing of. Forty years ago I went up the Ottawa. At that time we had to carry all our flour and our goods on our backs; we had not money enough to buy teams and we endured privations and hardships that manufacturers have never endured. After we got started, the manufacturers came in and prospered. I was surprised to hear an hon. gentleman state that there was a time when we could hardly expect to establish manufactories in Canada. My mind went back to the Centennial at Philadelphia, when we had not the policy that we have now, and if I am not mistaken, our agricultural implement manufacturers carried off the prize at that exhibition for the best collection of agricultural implements exhibited there. It has been stated time and again that goods are sold as cheap as they were before the National policy was in existence. If that is so, where has the hon. Finance Minister obtained his large surplus of $6,300,000? Did it come out of the pockets of the manufacturer or merchant? I was in the Old Country last summer, with a friend of mine who bought varieties of almost all the cotton and woollen goods consumed in Canada; and after he came home he showed me his invoice and the returns from the Custom House, and the woollen goods paid an average duty of 34 per cent., sometimes as high as 46 and 47 per cent., and the cotton goods 30 per cent. on some classes and 20 per cent. on other classes. Now, I ask, is not this 20 per cent. a sufficient bonus to enable any manufacturer to establish any industry in Canada? And when I say 20 per cent. it really amounts to 25 or 26 per cent. of advantage to the individual who manufactures in Canada, because he saves carriage, insurance and the merchant's profit. Now, I would like the hon. Minister of Finance to inform me whether this large surplus has come out of the pockets of the consumers of Canada or out of the pockets of the manufacturers of the Old Country. This is a question which I would like him to answer fairly and honestly. There is another question which occurs to me at present. Is every industry that has been started in Canada to get an increased duty under the present Tariff? As yet, we see no signs of any reduction on duty for the benefit of the consumer. I heard it stated the other night that the farmer manufactured his own cloth. There was a time when he did so; there was a time when you would find a spinning wheel in every farmer's house you entered. But that time has passed; improvements have been going on in all classes of machinery for the production of cloth; female labor has become scarce, and it will no longer pay the farmer to manufacture his own goods, and he goes into the market and purchases all he wants. It is he and the great consuming public on whom is being imposed this increase of duty. I would ask if all the industries in the country are to obtain increases in the Tariff and there are to be no reductions?

Mr. HAY. I think I can tell as much about cotton tickings and duckings as any other gentleman in the House. I can assure hon. gentlemen that cotton goods of all kinds are cheaper now than they were in 1878. They are all cheaper.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion on the Tariff, and I have been a good deal amused at the statements of those who oppose the National Policy. I observe that they invariably hold that when goods are exported from Canada, the producer or the manufacturer pays the duty. They complain of the difficulty of exporting goods from Canada to the United States in the face of a hostile Tariff, and the conclusion to my mind is irresistible, that the producer or the manufacturer, who exports to the United States, bears at least a share of the taxation imposed on goods going into that country. Hon. gentlemen opposite assume that the poor man always pays the duty when the article is imported into Canada. If the Canadian manufacturer and producer must pay duties imposed by foreign countries on goods manufactured and produced here, why cannot they perceive, by the same reasoning, that the producer and manufacturer of other countries, who have to find a market in Canada, must also contribute a portion of the duty on the articles consumed in this country. In the eastern part of the Dominion we have realized this fact in our transactions with a colony not very far distant, where we are obliged to seek a market for our products. I have in my hand an account sales of farm products sent from that part of the Dominion to Newfoundland, which is, in fact, the only market we have for the products of the soil. It is the account sales of shipment ex H. H. McCurdy from Cape Breton, on account of Mr. McNeil, on 27th August, 1875:

W. H. Mare, 15 tubs butter, 569 lbs., 1s.
Id., 4 mos. ....		30 16 5
Charges—Freight .....	11 3
Duty 28s. 6d., discount 12s. 4d. ....	2 00 10
Advertg., etc. ....	3 9
Commission .....	1 10 10
Net proceeds. ....	26 9 9
		30 16 5

That is what is the fact, that the poor farmers in Nova Scotia, in this instance at least, has to pay the duty imposed on his goods in Newfoundland. I might cite dozens of such account sales which prove this conclusively, and in the same way there are many staple articles manufactured in England and the United States, which sell in Nova Scotia, at least, at the exact figure to-day at which they were sold there under our 10 per cent. duty, notwithstanding this increase of Tariff. In such cases I would ask any hon. gentleman who understands business, whether it is not the manufacturer rather than the consumer, who pays the duty. A few years ago we were greatly alarmed in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, lest, on account of the encouragement given to the refining of sugar in Canada, we should have to pay an enormous price for our sugar. We were willing to believe that a poor man in the eastern part of Nova Scotia could not use sugar at all; but under the fostering care of the National Policy, increasing the number of sugar refineries, we find we can purchase refined sugar at a lower figure than the ordinary raw sugar could have been purchased at ten years ago, and at a lower figure than we paid for it under the 10 per cent. tariff. And this is owing to the encouragement given to sugar refining in this country by the National Policy. This brings us down to the question under discussion. A few years ago the same objection was made to the protection of cotton manufactures in the Dominion, and hon. gentlemen asked how could that tend to cheapen the products of the factories, because they would exact enormous profits. But a large increase took place in the number of factories, and as competition always lessens prices, we are able, I am happy to say, to obtain, in the eastern counties of this Dominion, cotton cheaper now than we ever could since the country was settled. Then with reference to prints, the same results will follow for the same reason, and I have no doubt a number of print factories will be established, once this one is fairly under way, and we will have cheaper prints both in Cape Breton and British Columbia, than we ever had before. So it is with all lines of goods, by increasing the supply you reduce the price. While hon. gentlemen opposite proclaimed the enormous profits which will be made by the manufacturers in all lines of goods in Canada, so surely will they encourage the manufacture of these articles in the Dominion, and in increasing the supply, a reduced price must inevitably follow.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the hon. member for South Huron, to whom this $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 surplus, which is in the hands of the Finance Minister, belongs? Is it to the manufacturer? or is it to the Finance Minister? or is it to the people of this country? I claim that it belongs to the people of this country. That is the practical way to look at it. If this Tariff has produced more revenue than is required to carry on the Government, the excess belongs to the people, and we have to raise so much less next year. It is immaterial which political party may be in power, they will require so much money to run the Government with, and that amount has got to be collected by revenue. So long as that amount is equally distributed, it is immaterial to the farmers or any other class of the community on what articles they pay it. If we have a surplus it is better than having a deficit; if we raise less taxes than we require to spend in a year, we must in some way make up the deficiency in the following year.

Mr. FARROW. The hon. member for South Huron comes from the same county that I do, and I find it very strange that when we both buy our goods almost at the same stores, they should charge him more than they charge me. I would like to ask the hon. member a square question. When he bought goods during the Mackenzie regime, did he not have to pay more for a pair of boots than he has had to pay during the last three years just past? Did he or his wife pay more for a yard of factory cotton? or for a yard of ticking? or for a yard of coarse cloth or flannel? The other night the hon. gentleman said there was no duty on agricultural implements during the Mackenzie regime, whereas every person in this House knows that there was a duty of 17½ per cent. His speech is in the Globe and in the Hansard, that there was no duty at all on agricultural implements under the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. McMILLAN. I examined the Tariff and I found that American manufacturers could send their implements into Canada free of duty.

Mr. FARROW. I trust the hon. gentleman will look again. Now, I will tell him where the surplus comes from. During the time that his beau ideal of a Government was in power, they lost about $700,000 a year in managing the Intercolonial, while our people saved that money. Does he not know—if he does not, I do—that throughout Canada, during those years of gloom, of blackness, of darkness, of despair almost, that even people who were very well off were not able to buy those fancy articles of luxury? How many silk dresses were purchased then? How many gold watches were purchased then? Scarcely any at all, compared to what have been bought during these late years. The people had not the means to buy these luxuries. But during the last three or four years, they have had their pockets so full of money, and they have gone largely into these luxuries, and they have yielded a handsome revenue. Are we to be sorry about that? I say it is a matter for us all to rejoice about. But there is another thing. Did not that starvation policy of the Mackenzie Government encourage the Yankees to bring in their grain to compete with our grain? We put a duty on their grain, and that is where another part of the surplus comes from. If I had time I could go on and show you pretty near the whole of it in savings in economies. Does he want to know now where the surplus comes from? It comes from good management; it comes from the exercise of economy; it comes from a good Government in contrast with that Government. The Oppositionists are unpatriotic; they were most patriotic when they were on this side of the House; they could lavish money in every direction; but ever since they have gone into Opposition they have been unpatriotic. Oh! they say, these manufacturers in Canada are making fortunes. Look at that cotton mill that is making 50 or 60 per cent. profits—whereas the par value of the stocks do not rank as high as bank stocks. They are low compared with bank stocks; they are low compared with other stocks in this country, but still they say: Oh! look at these men who are pocketing your money. They want us to send those profits over into a foreign country, preferring that the shekels should go to the Yankees rather than to our own people. By the action the Opposition are taking, they are placing themselves still lower in the estimation of the people.

Mr. AUGER. I do not rise to make a long speech, but simply to say that I have learned a good deal during the progress of this debate, and I have almost become a convert to the National Policy. If the National Policy has brought into the Treasury $6,000,000, if it has made the goods which the people buy cheaper, and at the same time benefits the manufacturer, as the hon. Finance Minister has said, I would advise the hon. gentleman to stick the duty on. At the same time I would ask him not to stick on the duties quite so much on what the farmers and the poor people buy, but on what the rich people purchase. If it is a benefit to poor people to tax what they have to buy, I think the honorable gentleman has done them good enough, and I think he had better now turn his attention to the rich and give them some benefit.

On item 51, dress or costume cloths,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This change has been made with a view of obviating the difficulty which has occurred in the past in collecting the duty on costume cloths and woollen cloths, of which costume cloths form a very large part. It has been the practice in some ports to charge 20 per cent., while in other ports 7½ cts. per lb. and 20 per cent. was collected by the Customs officer. We therefore consulted the importers who had great experience in the matter with a view to devising some means by which a uniformity could be obtained. It was considered that by naming the width less than 25 inches, and the weight as not over 3½ ounces per square yard, the difficulty would be obviated for the future, leaving the class of goods manufactured in Canada paying a duty of 7½ cts. per lb. and 20 per cent., and goods, not including winceys, under 25 inches wide, and weighing not over three and a half ounces at 20 per cent.
Mr. FARROW.

On items 56 to 72, agricultural implements,

Mr. ROYAL. I was very glad to hear this afternoon a statement made by the hon. Finance Minister to the effect that this resolution, and other resolutions bearing on the same subject, would only go into effect on 10th May next. I would submit that, if the extension was to the month of June, say the first week or the 10th, this measure would be complete. As the House is aware, great delays take place, especially in the spring time, on the railway entering Manitoba. Last year, freight was delayed on that road as much as three months, and, no doubt, if orders were sent from Winnipeg, and other places in the Province, to the United States, the freight might, by floods or freight blockade, such as took place last year, be so long delayed as to render inoperative the measure announced by the hon. Finance Minister. I hope, in view of this fact, and the circumstance that the Board of Trade of Winnipeg have made additional representations, that the Finance Minister will take the matter into further consideration, and consent to give a fuller measure of justice than the one he has announced.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have considered the matter very carefully, looking to the interests of Manitoba and the important industry for which we desire to procure a market. We have not arrived at the duty named without having given the matter considerable thought. I may say that a party who is somewhat interested in the matter, but still a gentleman well able to judge as to what would be necessary to give parties a reasonable time to bring in the foreign articles, named thirty days as being the time to enable them to introduce a sufficient quantity of American implements with our own, to supply the demand. The hon. member has referred to the difficulties experienced last year. That arose, in a great measure, from the overflowing of the country, which was very exceptional in its character. I know that more than a week ago twenty cars of agricultural implements were entered. Now, some delay must take place, and the result shows that they have taken advantage of it—and very properly—and imported very largely. They have been making hay while the sun shines, and, therefore, they have already a pretty good supply, and if we give them until the 10th of May I have no doubt that they will be found to have very largely imported, which will be sufficient with the implements manufactured and ready to be sent there now by our own manufacturers. The Massie Manufacturing Company, of Toronto, inform me that they will be able this season alone to send there 3,000 mowing machines, 2,200 reapers and 1,000 binders and 4,000 horse rakes, valued at over $1,000,000, which they have either now on hand or ready finished. Then A. Harris, Son & Co., known to hon. gentleman opposite, I think, will have 1,000 binders, 1,500 mowers and 1,500 reapers, besides other implements, and three or four establishments in other localities will be able to place there, before they are required, 4,000 binders, while the London companies will supply 700 self-binders, 500 mowers, 500 hay rakes, 700 waggons and 75 threshing machines, besides ploughs and portable threshing engines. Taking the data we have, and estimating what the requirements there will be, the Government is satisfied, that by the 10th of May, with the facilities of which they have already availed themselves, and are doing so to-day, our friends the agriculturists of Manitoba and the North-West will have no difficulty in securing a sufficient supply during the present year. Under these circumstances, having examined the matter carefully and obtained information from all quarters, and especially from those interested in foreign implements, we thought that the 10th of May would be a liberal arrangement for our friends in the North-West. We will go back to resolutions six to twelve, which will be made to take effect on the 10th of May; resolutions fourteen to nineteen will also take effect on the 10th of May.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the fact that British Columbia cannot avail herself of the time limit and benefit of the low Tariff. It would be impossible, with present communications, for dealers in that line to communicate with manufacturers and obtain their supplies. While I have had the honor of being in this House I have had letters eighteen days en route to this point; and I can assure you that if Manitoba feels the pressure of this advance in the duty, the people of the Pacific Province feel it in a greater degree, because they cannot fully avail themselves of Canadian manufactures at present. Efforts, it is true, were made in this direction during the past year, and quite a number of Canadian machines have been taken in there; but the facilities are not yet complete. The people there, however, desire to cultivate the trade with the old Provinces to the greatest possible degree; they are bearing every burden placed upon them—and you are aware that the burdens put on our people have been very heavy during the past three or four years. They are submitting patiently, in view of the early construction of the trans-continental railway. The burden with respect to tin has been removed, but the burden with respect to blasting powder bears very heavily on our people. I have letters by the last mail with respect to agricultural implements, asking whether there is to be no reduction from the late Tariff; and I do not know how they will feel when they learn that that Tariff has been increased 10 per cent. I am sure, however, that they will consider it very oppressive under the circumstances; but they would not complain had they easy access to the manufactures of Canada. They are endeavoring by every possible means to trade with Canada in clothing and all other articles manufactured in Canada. I hope that the hon. Minister of Finance will see some mode of enabling the people of British Columbia to have time enough to obtain their machinery for the present year before this Tariff goes into effect.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. With reference to powder we made exceptional legislation for British Columbia. We reduced the duty, when it was imported into that Province; but I am happy to know that a large quantity of Canadian powder has, nevertheless, been sent to that country; and as far as the returns are concerned, I should be very sorry if the agricultural implement duty bore very heavily upon the people there; but I find that the whole duty collected on the implements last year—and this shows that they brought a good many from Canada, which number, I hope, will be increased this year—was only $239, and the total value of machinery $1,000. I cannot quite see, however, why by telegraph, if they want foreign implements, they cannot secure them by the 10th of May. I trust that, as a very large number of Canadian agricultural implements will be made this year, they will be able to supply British Columbia without increased cost during the coming year.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like, if the Finance Minister could see his way clear, to add to this item the words "carriage harness." We have an industry in Gananoque employing between 80 and 100 hands, manufacturing those goods which in the United States are manufactured altogether by prison labor with which we have to compete. The goods of American manufacture are now being imported to our detriment.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am afraid that if we include this article we would have the harness makers coming to us and saying that we gave 35 per cent. to the hames and only 30 per cent. to the harness. The hon. gentleman has called our attention to this matter and we have had it under consideration, but we have not thought it advisable to include this article.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may say that the value of these hames is only $1 per set of harness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I have already spoken on the subject of the duty on agricultural implements, and will therefore be brief in my remarks. I regret, as I am sure the people of Manitoba and the North-West will regret, that the hon. Finance Minister has not changed his views in regard to that duty. I had hoped that he would have come to the conclusion that he had made a mistake in increasing the duty. I am satisfied that neither he nor any other man can justify this duty to the people of the North-West. The fact that he has admitted that he did not investigate this matter, but that he consented to the wish of agricultural implement makers, is evidence that he did not consider the matter as he should have done. It is stated that these men have pledged themselves that if the duty is increased, the prices will remain the same. I would like to ask any business man, if he supposes that the price of agricultural implements in the North-West, or any other implements, will be regulated by anything else than the law of supply and demand? If these articles are scarce, the price is bound to go up. I do not care what representations have been made to the hon. Finance Minister. He has given sufficient time to these implement dealers to import these articles, and why should he now put on the duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. So that our own people may be in time for next year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). The hon. gentleman seems to take the position of good lord, good devil. He says that the implement makers will be able to get ready for next year. We are perfectly satisfied to pay our share, but to increase that duty by 10 per cent. I consider a great hardship to the settlers of that country. I was surprised to find the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), who must know that the feeling of every man in the country is opposed to the duty being increased, has not ventured to raise his voice against it. It is said that no less than twenty car loads of American goods have come into the country within the last few days, and that is an evidence of the hardship which this entails. I am informed that one firm will have to pay no less than $100,000 in duties which would not have been required but for the increase, and that they have been obliged to raise this money at 12 per cent., and of course they will have to levy this on the consumers. It is all very fine to say that the consumers will not have to pay the duty, but I am satisfied as the people are, that they will have to pay the duty, and I say it is unfair in the face of the statement made by the Finance Minister, that he is able to reduce the taxation by $1,500,000 that he should now proceed to increase the taxation of the people of the North-West. There is not a single newspaper in the North-West, irrespective of party, but what demands that this duty should not be increased, and I say that when the people are so unanimous in their opinions they are entitled to more consideration than they are receiving at the hands of the Finance Minister. I would like to ask him one question, and that is, if the list of articles he has received from the manufacturers of implements in Ontario is for the North-West trade or the whole Dominion?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The whole Dominion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I would like to know what proportion is expected to be sent to the North-West, for I know that, in the one article of ploughs, not more than one-third of the number required in Manitoba can, by any possibility, be manufactured in Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). How many are required in the North-West?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). 12,000 or 15,000.

Mr. FERGUSON. One firm that I know of makes 12,000 or 15,000 of all kinds, breakers included.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). What is the name of the firm?

Mr. FERGUSON. Crosson & Wood.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). All that they were prepared to furnish was 800 ploughs.

Mr. FERGUSON. One firm?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). One firm would take all they could supply. The firm required 5,000 ploughs, and the factory the hon. gentleman mentions would only agree to furnish 800, and the balance had to be purchased in the United States. Consequently we are obliged to pay the extra duty of 10 per cent. on what cannot be manufactured in Ontario the present year. I say, it is manifestly unfair and unjust to the people of that country. Let the hon. Finance Minister pile on the agony on the people of the North-West; but a cloud is now forming, and when it bursts, there will be a voice from across Lake Superior that will make the dry bones of the Government rattle. The people of the North-West have stood this thing long enough. During the excitement in real estate, every man was making money trading in lots, and had little time to look into these questions; but now, when they have to turn their attention to the tilling of the soil, a dollar looks larger than it formerly did. The Government, before putting on a duty of this kind, should have consulted the representatives of the people from Manitoba. I can assure the hon. Finance Minister that the Government never did a more unpopular thing than to increase the duty on agricultural implements. At the present rate of duties, a settler will have to pay on a small outfit from $150 to $200 of duty; that is to say, he will have to pay that much more on implements in Manitoba than he would on the other side of the line. These arguments are being used against us by Americans every day, and they will be intensified by the additional duty which the hon. Finance Minister intends to put on.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In the argument that took place the other day, a contrast was drawn between the position of the people of Manitoba and those in the United States, and the hon. gentlemen, made a violent speech on that occasion, as he has done this evening, and put into the mouths of the people on the other side statements calculated to induce them to remain there rather than to come to this side. Would it not have been well for the hon. gentleman to point out that the people of Manitoba are not assessed $1 for the railways constructed for them, while in the United States the people are assessed by local rates. He might have stated that there the State taxation is very heavy, while we contribute very largely from the Dominion Treasury for the support of Manitoba and other Provinces. It is very well to make a great outcry, and great dissatisfaction. If I recollect rightly the hon. gentleman wanted the duty taken off duck.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I did not say anything of the kind. I wished to have the same drawback on canvas used for tents as given on canvas used for ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk).

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman would have the same drawback allowed on the lumber used to cover the settlers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I am quite willing, if you take the duty off everything else.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I have a telegram here from A. Harris, Son & Co. (limited), of Brantford, which is as follows:—

"We are building for this season, 1,000 binders, 1,500 mowers, and 1,500 reapers. We are importing none. We did import 40 binders last season, but can now meet the demand. We guarantee our machines better than American, and prices as low. Have bought 2,000 Canadian ploughs for Manitoba trade. Canadian manufactures in all lines can meet the demand in the North-West, but if driven out now will lose that trade. Aurora produces 5,000 ploughs; Smith's Falls, 2,000; Brantford, 2,000; and 4,000 binders are being built in Canada for next season."

Notwithstanding this the Government came to the conclusion that it was the safest plan to allow ploughs to be imported from the United States, until the 10th of May, to make up any deficiency that might exist. But it is impossible to do anything that will please the hon. member. Notwithstanding all we have heard about the ruin and destitution that would occur, the country is prosperous, and the same thing will occur in Manitoba. At the present moment there may be excitement. It is easy to get up an excitement, and make people alarmed; but, inasmuch as we have proved, and the electors have said that we were right, so in Manitoba, when next year we shall be able to manufacture these implements for them as cheaply as they can get them from the United States, the people will be satisfied, and the hon. gentleman will be able to make no political capital out of the matter. Time will cure the present excitement, and the hon. gentleman will find that instead of creating a feeling against the Government—a Government that has assumed towards Manitoba and the North-West, a paternal attitude, that has made sacrifices and is prepared to make more sacrifices for that country—the hon. gentleman will fail, as the attempt failed a few months ago, to create rebellion in that country against the Administration. When the people come to their sober senses, it will be found that the excitement and the dread that exists is without foundation; then we shall find doubt and difficulty removed, and we shall find the same contentment prevailing there as we found prevailing last June in all the Provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. ROYAL. The hon. Finance Minister has answered very fully the harangue of the hon. member for Selkirk. When the hon. member stated that the people were too busy buying and selling lots to take an interest in the political issues of the day, I supposed that was the reason why the hon. member was returned, because I remember that in his long address to his constituents, not a single word can be found with reference to the Reform party. It is true, he and the hon. member for Marquette, are the only two members from Manitoba who were sent here as Oppositionists. The hon. member for Selkirk ran on the railway ticket. He was then a Vice-President of the Manitoba South-Western Railway, and it was because he promised every farmer there that he would have a small branch built to his door, that he was returned. With regard to the sound the electors of Manitoba gave during the last campaign, I say that out of the five members elected two were elected out-and-out Conservatives in favor of the National Policy, and of the two so returned one was elected by acclamation, a Conservative, the only election by acclamation in Manitoba, and that in one of the oldest counties. The other was the hon. member for Selkirk, where there was a triangular contest, and my hon. friend, Capt. Scott, had to fight against a half-breed Conservative and a Reformer. My hon. friend defeated them both, and the fight was squarely upon party issues. So much for Winnipeg. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) never said a word about politics. Mr. Ross was simply returned for Mr. Ross. He sits here, and if he has any political sympathies, I believe he has shown this Session that he is entirely with us. So much for the Dominion Elections. The people then had some time to reflect. They had finished buying and selling lots. The local elections came on, and what was the result? The issues were entirely Dominion issues, yet the Premier of Manitoba was supported by two-thirds of the members then returned, and if that is to be taken as the opinion of the country I do not see how the hon. gentleman can take upon himself to speak here on behalf, not only of Manitoba, but of the North-West Territories as well. This question has, of course, created a little excitement in Manitoba, as the hon. Finance Minister stated a moment ago. It is very easy to get up an excitement, especially in this matter, but I believe the people of Manitoba are just as patriotic and conservative, and just as much in favor of the National Policy as the people of the other Provinces. When the statement of the hon. Finance Minister will have been discussed and read in the Province of Manitoba, I believe there will be but one voice to argue that this policy is the right one, and even the taxation contemplated by the hon. Finance Minister will meet with the favor of public opinion in Manitoba, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman may say. The object of the increased taxation is to keep the western market for the eastern products. If the hon. gentleman had been able to show that this increase was increasing the price of agricultural implements, he would, perhaps, have made a point, but in that he failed. Where he succeeded least was in his predictions in regard to the future. While I believe it to be easy to be a prophet, especially now, and the hon. gentleman is a Wiggins in a political sense, I do not believe the hon. gentleman has succeeded. He has failed and always will fail to show that the National Policy has had the result of increasing the prices of agricultural implements in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman has run down—and in that he is an adept—our own manufactures. Some other gentlemen ran down our own country a year or two ago, in favor of Texas or some other lost State, but now I have to regret that one of my colleagues from Manitoba says here that the manufactures of the Eastern Provinces are not the articles a Western consumer will buy. Supposing that were true, he should have patriotism enough not to say it publicly. Our factories have had enough to contend with from the start, without having to meet the statement throughout the country that their goods are inferior to those of the Americans, while the contrary proposition is true. The opinion of Manitoba is entirely that the policy of the Government is a good one. From the National Policy and the establishment of the Canadian Pacific Railway she has derived great benefit. We have increased wonderfully in the space of only one year. And that the people of Manitoba will be so blind as to adopt the hon. gentleman's policy I cannot for a moment imagine, and I have as much authority to speak for that country as the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). With reference to this plough question, I have an interest—not a pecuniary one—in it. I have my information from the officers of the establishment that the sale of 800 ploughs was a wholesale transaction, and this firm has branches at Emerson, Winnipeg, Rat Portage and Regina. They are also prepared to ship a large number of rakes and mowing machines, a number of which they sent last year, and they had to refuse many orders as the demands of the home market were beyond what they could supply. As to the report in that country that one of the difficulties felt by the implement makers was to find shelter for them during the winter, as to the effect of the increase of 10 per cent. in price of the manufactured machine, I will give you the evidence of Mr. Frost himself, the largest manufacturer, I think, east of Toronto. The figures are taken from his own books and are to the effect that, in 1875, he employed 136 hands; in 1878 they were reduced to 82; in February, 1882, he employed 230. In 1875 the wages averaged from $1.25 to $2; in 1878, from 85 cts. to $1; in February, 1882, from $1.25 to $2.50, and a few special hands $3. The output was treble, and he stated in my presence, and in the presence of 500 electors, that he produced a better machine and had not taxed the consumers one cent.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister seems quite satisfied in his own mind that there is no real excitement in Manitoba or anywhere else in regard to the tax on agricultural implements—at least, he said the excitement did not amount to anything, and he felt perfectly safe in regard to it. But I have seldom seen him so excited in regard to the criticism on any measure he has proposed to the House, as he was by the criticisms of the hon. member for Selkirk. If the agitation is so hollow as he seems to think it is, strange that he should have got so excited about it. Now, with regard to the remedy that is proposed. There must have been some excitement, there must have been some pressure brought to bear upon him, or he would not have changed his original propositions. He has postponed bringing the tax into operation; it is clear that in the first instance he must have consulted with the producers of those articles and accepted their views and proposed the tax. In the second instance, he says himself that he consulted with the importers and dealers of these articles and accepted their suggestions, and has consequently postponed the date; and he proposes that as a remedy for the evils complained of. Now, we are compelled to think that it might have been a good idea if he had gone a step further and called in a third class of advisers, and tried to obtain the opinions of those who bought those machines. This does not seem to have occurred to him; it seldom does seem to occur to him to consult the consumer when he is arranging the Tariff. But the change he has proposed is an arrangement proposed after consultation with, and in the interest of, the importer and dealer of the machines, and not in the interest of the buyer. It first gives them that much time to import their machines under the old Tariff, and then they have the rest of the summer to dispose of them for the price that will be obtained under the new Tariff; while the farmer who uses that machine will have to pay just as much for it after the 10th May as if the postponement were not made. The hon. Minister has taken great pains to prove that there is a sufficient supply of implements made in Ontario to fill the whole market.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. I said it was doubtful about that. It was the result of inquiry from all quarters.

Mr. CASEY. He says there will be enough in another year, and he points to the large number of machines made this year as a mitigation of the tax on farmers. It does not seem to occur to him that it makes no difference to the consumer of this article with regard to the price, whether it comes from Ontario or from the States. The hon. Minister knows business men too well to suppose that an Ontario manufacturer will sell reaping machines for less in Manitoba than the price at which they could be imported from the United States, with the duty added. It will make no difference to the consumer whether the machine comes from Ontario or the States. Therefore, it does not relieve the consumer in the slightest degree to prove that sufficient machines will be made in Ontario this year to supply the Manitoba demand. The burthen of the Manitoba farmers will be the same; the grievance will remain the same. In regard to the quality of the implements, my hon. friend from Provencher has struck upon a new vein of patriotism. He says that even if the Canadian machines were not as good as those imported from abroad, it is wrong to say so in public.

Mr. ROYAL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said he was wrong in running down the manufacturers of our own country in favor of American manufacturers; that the Canadian manufacturers had a good deal to contend with, and that it was not befitting any hon. gentleman to stand up here and denounce our own manufacturers.

Mr. CASEY. If I misunderstood the hon. gentleman I am sorry. I know that line of argument is very common amongst the supporters of the Tariff now in force, and I certainly understood him to use it; that it is unpatriotic to point out that the purchaser is fleeced by anybody but himself; that even if it were so, it is a shame to tell outsiders of it. If there is anything rotten in the State of Denmark we should not tell anybody of it, but keep dark, and grin and bear it as long as we can. The hon. gentleman, on a former occasion, objected to the high duty on lumber, which he spoke of as a grievance to the settlers of Manitoba. It does seem strange that he considers the duty on lumber a burthen, and does not consider the duty on ploughs a burthen. The hon. member for Selkirk is more consistent. He considers the duty on ploughs and reaping machines a burthen, but he does not refuse to admit that the same rules should be applied all round. Since I began to speak my attention has been called to an article in the Winnipeg Daily Times, the Conservative organ, which hardly goes to bear out the hon. Finance Minister's idea that there is no excitement on the subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say there is no excitement. I said the excitement might exist to day, as it did on former occasions, but that it did not continue when the facts were known.

Mr. CASEY. The organ of the Government in Winnipeg seems to have a different idea. Under date of April 12th, that paper says:—

"The Finance Minister has among other things placed upon the free list pearls, rubies, attar of roses, sausage skins (not cleaned) and sawdust. The free admission of these articles, notably of sawdust, will no doubt tend to extend old, and build up new industries in eastern Canada. But the North-West is not deeply interested in these changes. It would have been much more satisfactory to us if Sir Leonard had taken off the duty on provisions, lumber, coal and agricultural implements."

The hon. Finance Minister may feel quite comfortable over the agitation at the present time, but the views held by his representative in the press at Winnipeg are more likely to prevail in that country than those which the hon. Minister holds. Although the hon. member for Provencher believes he speaks the opinion of the people of Manitoba as much as does the hon. member for Selkirk, the people did not say so at the last election, when they did not return a majority of members in sympathy with the former, but a majority in sympathy with the latter. But we cannot consider this question as affecting Manitoba alone, but as also affecting the other Provinces. As a representative of an agricultural constituency which contains a large implement factory, and speaking not only for the farmers but for the manufacturers, I have to protest against this tax which, although it must bear most severely on Manitoba, will be felt least also in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. I believe that the persistent attempts of the Government to lay burdens on farmers while they remove them from other classes of the community, will be resented in a very short time in a manner distasteful to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I must ask permission to answer one or two personal remarks. The hon. Finance Minister has acknowledged there is excitement in Manitoba.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I say there may be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am sure if the hon. gentleman was in my place, and received daily the telegrams and letters I receive respecting this question, he would conceive it to be his duty, as it is mine, to enter his protest against the increased duty. I have said nothing about the National Policy; I did not speak on the Tariff in general terms; I simply confined myself to the duty on agricultural implements. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), instead of replying to my remarks on this question, travelled outside of the record and made a personal attack on myself. I do not know what he expects to gain by that. He certainly has not proved to his constituents and his friends that he has been true to their interests on the present occasion. He has been, as I understand, in the corridors and outside of the House, talking against the increased duty as much as I have been, and I also understand he has gone with deputations to induce the hon. Minister to change his opinions in this respect; but he has not the moral courage to stand up on the floor of the house and to utter the same sentiments. He is muzzled in his speech in this House, and I am glad I have, at all events, forced him to acknowledge that he is afraid, because not one word has been uttered by him to-night against the increased duty on agricultural implements, although out of the House he has been loud in his protestations against it.

Mr. ROYAL. This is a statement which I deny flatly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not true that you called on the hon. Minister of Finance in company with Mr. Westbourne to protest against it?

Mr. ROYAL. I am not going to be cathechised. Whatever I state out of the House is a private conversation and not to be used here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am perfectly willing to leave the hon. gentleman to a reconciliation of these statements. They do not concern me. I simply mention them to show the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman in making one statement in the corridors and another on the floor of the House. The hon. gentleman travelled outside of the record to show that my position is not in harmony with the views of the people of the North West, that I assumed too much when I said that I voiced the opinion of the people of the North-West when I opposed the Government's proposition. I refer, in confirmation of my position, to the entire press of Manitoba, and to nearly every person who has come down from that country. I am here to do my duty, and so far as the interests of Manitoba are concerned, I will do my duty and seek to carry out the instructions of my constituents, and in view of the strong feeling existing in that country, I earnestly protest against an increased duty on agricultural implements. The hon. member for Provencher went on to show that, notwithstanding the election in June, when the people calmed down, they sustained the Norquay Government at the local elections. All I can say is that the hon. member opposed Mr. Norquay to my certain knowledge, and how he can bring the result of the local elections to bear in favor of his argument is very strange. I know for a fact also that he opposed the Provincial Secretary—

Mr. ROYAL. I am very sorry to have again to say that the hon. gentleman's statement is not exactly in accordance with the truth. There was an election in St. Boniface when Mr. La Rivière, to whom the hon. gentleman makes reference, was a candidate. His opponent was an old Reformer, and I worked for Mr. La Rivière and voted for him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not wish to say anything more about the matter. I have got him down now to a denial of my statement, which is all I want. Those who worked in the contest, know as well as I do, what the hon. gentleman did. I regret very much that the hon. member for Provencher has seen fit to go back on his professions in regard to the duty on agricultural implements. If he has done what he conceives to be right no fault can be found with him. I have adopted the course which I think is correct; I have entered my protest; although I do not suppose what I have said will have any effect, it is my duty to do what I conceive to be right.

Mr. BOWELL. You stirred up the dry bones.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As you did at Brandon. When the hon. gentleman wishes to stir up the dry bones he is at liberty to come to my constituency at any time, as his last visit was successful in electing me by 450 majority.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am considerably interested in the manufacture and also in the sending to the North-West of farming implements, and the only thing I regret in connection with this matter is that the hon. Finance Minister has seen proper to delay the receiving of these articles into the North-West from the United States until the 10th of May. Almost every dealer in these articles in the North-West at present has gone from the immediate locality or neighborhood of my constituency, and the persons or agents who have the most to do with the opinions of the hon. member for Selkirk, were sent up there from the immediate neighborhood of London three or four years ago, and through the instrumentality of the manufacturers of London and its neighborhood, they have been enabled to realize a very considerable amount of money; but within the last year or two so great was the competition among Canadian manufacturers in that country that they do not seem to have been able to make such large profits as they had heretofore done, and therefore they made up their minds to take a new departure. I speak of what I know when I say that there is no agricultural implements of any kind, that goes from this part of Ontario into the Province of Manitoba, but what is sold for less to-day and for a less price, than has been the case during the last three or four years. I furthermore say that even if not one solitary article goes from the United States into Manitoba, during the next year, I have not a doubt that the competition will be so great from the Province of Ontario, that the farmers of that country will not have cause to complain, but will have cause to be delighted owing to the fact that the duties will reduce prices from 5 to 10 per cent. compared with what they are to-day. With reference to these gentlemen, I will name them—because I am positive that they are the parties who have coached my hon. friend from Selkirk, and given him the principal portion of the information that he possesses—they are the firm of Westbrook & Fairchild—Westbrook came down here a few days ago and made certain representations, which were misrepresentations. He announced to the people of this locality, I do not mean the Finance Minister, but those of us who are interested in the manufacture of these articles, that certain manufacturers and importers had bought large quantities of these articles, having an idea that this duty was going to be increased; and brought them in from the United States, preparatory to receiving the benefits of the increased duty. He was asked to name the parties, but the only persons who imported, or were importing, to any very considerable extent, were Westbrook & Fairchild themselves. It has been said, that we in Ontario, could not manufacture sufficiently for the use of the Province of Manitoba. I can say this, that that very firm came down at the time when importers in that country usually give their orders and make their purchases; they came to the Fair at the city of London, and they could have got every article they wanted manufactured there, and in certain other localities in Ontario; but they thought they would try to injure the manufacturers of the Province of Ontario, by putting into competition with them such manufacturers as John Deer of Chicago, Thompson & Son, the South Bay Chilled Iron Works, and establishments of that kind; and they being an old and established firm in that part of the country, trusted that they could induce the farming community to believe that the American manufacturers were so much better than the Canadian, that they could introduce those articles and keep them there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). Will the hon. gentleman name the firm who offered to supply Westbrook & Fairchild, in London, with all they wanted.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; I may say it was not one firm solely, but John Elliott & Co., the Globe Foundry, Stuart & McPherson, and a dozen others. This fact must not be forgotten, that at that very time, while the Fair was in progress, there were there Haggert & Co., of St. Thomas, Harris & Co., and others from all over the country, and he could have got every article he wanted to supply the whole North-West in the city of London.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What firm offered to make harvesters?

Mr. McMILLAN. If he had given his order at that time, John Elliott & Co. would have done so, but he chose to delay it for a considerable time later, when Elliott & Co. had made other arrangements, and when he came back Elliott stated: "I am not prepared to do it now; I have made other arrangements; but if you had given your order at the proper time they would have been prepared."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What about the Globe Foundry offer?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am thoroughly conversant with that, and I know that they are making self-binders, and a very considerable number of them. They did not send any to the North-West until last year, but I know that they made contracts to send some to the North-West this year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Was not that offer based on the condition that Westbrook & Fairchild would take $30,000 stock in the Globe Company?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not Westbrook & Fairchild's solicitor, or the solicitor for the Globe Foundry; but if it is from Westbrook that you get your information on this point, and it is as credible as the other remarks he made, I would have very considerable doubt as to whether that proposition was made to him or not, because I have known that gentleman for many years myself. Apart from that it is stated that our agricultural implements are very considerably inferior to the American; and yet the hon. member for South Huron, who has taken such a very considerable interest in the manufacturing interests of this country, and also in the Tariff, announced to us that when he went to the Centennial our articles beat everything else there, and yet we are told by the hon. member for Selkirk that they are inferior articles; and I cannot allow that remark to pass. I think that Brandon is in the hon. gentleman's constituency, and when he announced that these articles were inferior, the other night, amongst others which he particularized was the article of ploughs, and I would just ask the hon. gentleman whether he happens to know these names: Robert Brant, Adam Switzer, John Chittick, Joseph Brant, James Stevens and many others, because I know that they live in his constituency.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know them.

Mr. McMILLAN. I dare say not; and I am quite certain he does not know they voted for him; but, be that as it may, these gentlemen reside in the immediate neighborhood of Brandon, and have been there for a very considerable period, and this is what they state in reference to ploughs:

"We, the undersigned, after a fair and impartial trial of different ploughs, have come to the conclusion that the Norwegian, manufactured by Geo. Jackson, of London, Ont., is the best, and have taken them in preference to any other we have tried.

"(Signed) ROBERT BRANT, ADAM SWITZER, JOHN CHITTIK, JOSEPH BRANT, JAMES STEVENS, ROBERT STEVENS, NELSON ORR, ALEX. MCKENZIE, AND MANY OTHERS."

This was given at Brandon on the 2nd of June, 1882, and I may say to the hon. gentleman, for his information, that within the last few days several of these men have called at the establishment in the city of London, renewed their orders, and taken their ploughs with them. Now, Sir, at the same time I cannot be very harsh with hon. gentleman opposite, when we consider that the Ministry which I have the honor of supporting not only last year but this year took a good deal of trouble in advertising the manufacture of John Deer & Co. I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to it last year when the Indian supplies were being advertised. I was perfectly aware at the time that we were as capable of manufacturing these articles as Deer's establishment, but notwithstanding this it was stated that these ploughs must be as good as Deer's. I then thought that this would not be repeated, but the other day, on taking up the list of Indian supplies, I found that not only must they be as good as Deer's manufacture, but that they must actually be of the manufacture of John Deer & Co. of Chicago. I dare say that this is an oversight on the part of the Finance Minister, but I hope it will not occur again. The Finance Minister has come to the conclusion that it is desirable to extend this to the tenth day of May. No doubt his information is better than mine, or he would not have arrived at that conclusion. I am glad that the duty has been increased, not that the farmer of Manitoba will pay one cent more for his goods, but that it will prevent the manufacturers who have been sending in their goods there at prices less than those at which they sell them in their own country—prices which they have entered at the Customs at Emerson at from $2.50 to $3 less than their own price list. I know this to be a fact, and I sent it to the Customs Department. I had hopes that at the time this state of things would be remedied to a certain extent, and now, at all events, I hope things will be put in such a shape that no such advantage will be taken again.

Mr. BOWELL. I have one or two facts which I would like to offer to the Committee. I can only say to my hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. McMillan) that what he has said is quite true, and that this is only another mode by which the American manufacturers attempted by fraud, and in other ways to get their goods into the country without paying the proper duty. It is true that some of them entered ploughs at Winnipeg, and Emerson, at $6 each, when the price they received in Wisconsin was from $9 to $9.50. I now speak of cases which came under my own notice by the manufacturers coming to Ottawa, in the endeavor to induce the Department to prevent the confiscation and fines which we had imposed on them. All that could be done was done, and that was to raise the value to $9 per plough, and add the 50 per cent. of the duty to the 25, making in all 37½ per cent. This same thing is continually being done. One word in reply to my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Sutherland). I do not desire, nor do I intend to enter into the causes which led to his election for the division of the Province which he represents. He intimated that my presence in Brandon resulted in getting him a certain number of votes. I am inclined to think that the reasons which induced the people to vote for him were those which were laid before the Committee by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). He had the advantage of having a certain railway and all its interests at his command at that time, with a Yankee General dispensing that which he knows so well how to dispense, riding from one man's door to another, and displaying little maps showing a line of railway to each man's farm; were it not for this kind of influence, it is not likely that the hon. gentleman would have been here to-night, or telling us as he told the people of Brandon that he would stir us up with a forty-foot pole. He commenced to-night by stating that there was a great war cloud coming down over Lake Superior and that it would rattle up the old bones of the older Provinces. While I admire a man for speaking up for the place from which he gets his living, and where he gets his wealth; yet the hon. gentleman should remember that while attempting to decy the interests of the manufacturers of this section of the country, he is doing a wrong to the Dominion and a wrong to himself individually, and a wrong to his own Province. I have a statement in my hands, made not, I believe, by a member of the Conservative party, but by a gentleman whom the hon. member from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) knows better than I do, but a gentleman who is a very responsible person, and who knows of what he speaks. This estimate is with regard to this question of binders. He writes me that Harris & Son of Brantford are making 1,000 binders this year, 500 of which are to go to the North-West. The Massey Manufacturing Company are also making 1,000, of which 500 will go to the North-West. Elliot is making 500; the Globe Company, 400; Watson, of Ayr, 200; Gurney, of Dundas, 200; and the Chatham Company, of Chatham, 200. These are the firms manufacturing this one article. What I desire more particularly to bring before the Committee, is this one fact, that this writer says that the makers will supply the North-West first, as they will be more likely to require a larger number, and he adds that they can increase the number to be sent to Manitoba to 2,000 if required. He adds further that the Canadian binders are equal in every respect to the American, and that they are in some cases better. Harris & Son of Brantford, sold for $1,600 all their patterns in 1883, to one of the largest American makers, and they are making 5,000 of these machines. It strikes me that the American manufacturers with their large territory, and with the inventive genius of their people, would not come to Canada and buy the patterns of these binders and take them to the United States and manufacture them there, if they were inferior to those which we have been manufacturing and sending to Manitoba.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). What kind were they?

Mr. BOWELL. They were the Harris self-binder. The Canadian makers, in 1882, imported some American binders after their own were sold, but the Canadian machine invariably pleased the farmer best. Now, here is another fact showing what encouraging the establishment of these manufactures in this country has done for other factories. He says:

"The Canadian makers of self-binders are already keeping two factories, one at Montreal and one at Halifax, running on making binder twine. The value of this article made in Canada this season will exceed $150,000. They have thus established a new industry, employing largely, labor and capital."

This shows how, by the encouragement of one class of manufactures, it bring other industries in its train. The statements made with regard to other manufactures are of a similar character. The hon. gentleman also says that he is willing that the duty should be taken off lumber; but he did not volunteer that statement, it was only drawn out of him when he was asked if he would include lumber with the articles from which he wanted the duties to be removed. I tell him that is not the opinion of lumbermen in Winnipeg. I hold in my hand a letter on this question, written by a gentleman in Winnipeg. He says:

"It is very hard to find out the exact amount of money invested in this industry; but the total amount must run away up into the millions, saying nothing of the numerous manufactures on Lake Winnipeg and elsewhere in the North-West. This is also a very difficult matter to estimate. It is, moreover, a matter of no consequence now, as the previous years are no criterion as to the quantity that could be manufactured in our own Province. This year's produce will be ample to supply the demand. Therefore there will be no necessity for our people to import lumber from Minnesota."

Now, here is a statement in which, I am quite satisfied, the hon. member for Selkirk would place as much credence as I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is quite correct.

Mr. BOWELL. This statement is from a gentleman who is deeply interested in the lumber trade, and he is not a friend of the Government; he is not what is called a Conservative; he is a gentleman in whom, I think, the hon. member for Selkirk would have as much confidence as I. And I think the hon. member himself would be one of the very first, if he spoke his honest sentiments, to object to the removal of the duty on lumber, for the simple reason that large sums of money have been invested in the purchase of logs in the American market to supply the settlers of the North-West; and also because, as this gentleman says, there will be ample supply in Manitoba for the wants of that country this year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Quite true.

Mr. BOWELL. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman assents, and, if that is true with reference to lumber, why is it not true with reference to other manufactured articles in Canada, or which may be established in that country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are no others.

Mr. BOWELL. There may not have been in the past; but, as the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. McMillan) says, the manufacturers of agricultural implements are not only prepared to supply the market this year, but are prepared to supply them as cheap or cheaper than they have been supplied in that country in the past. With the experience we have had of the result of the National Policy with reference to other articles, and with such testimonials as we are able to adduce, we may conclude that there is no cause for the fear that the people of Manitoba are going to be over-taxed. Nor do I believe that the temporary excitement which bubbles up on every occasion in that country will last for a long time. We know that we had an incipient rebellion there for a short time recently, and that the present Premier was momentarily led away by the excitement. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Provencher should have set his face against the course pursued by Mr. Norquay at the outset, and that after the Premier adopted a more reasonable course, he should have assisted him in the election. If I had been there and Mr. Norquay advocating the views he first held I would have done precisely as many others did, denounce the position he took and his speech in Emerson. But when he got as far north as Selkirk and became more reasonable and made a more statesmanlike speech the people began to rally around him, and those who were anxious to see the country prosperous, those who believed that the policy of the Dominion Government was not only advantageous in its character but would result in the more rapid development of that country, gave him their support. The railway policy of the Government will tend to this end more than anything else. I was rather pleased to hear the remark—I do not know anything of that matter personally—of the hon. gentleman. It struck me if he had given the true reasons why the hon. member for Provencher had said anything against the Premier of Manitoba at that time, he would have justified that hon. gentleman's course; and when the hon. Premier came back into line the hon. member for Provencher gave him his consistent support in his constituency—a border constituency—thus acting in accord with the principles which have always actuated him here as well as at home. From my experience in the North-West—although I think the speech I made availed but very little to defeat my hon. friend opposite—I had good reasons for believing that the National Policy was not objectionable to the people there, and my hon. friend from Marquette was not elected on the question of the National Policy at all. At a meeting held at Portage la Prairie, his spokesman, Mr. Martin—a gentleman subsequently elected to a seat in the Local Legislature—said the National Policy was accepted by the people of Manitoba, but that the hon. gentleman was running the election on the sole question of disallowance, and as Mr. Martin was the spokesman of the hon. gentleman I took it for granted that he knew what he was talking about. The people of that constituency had their eyes open and saw the results that would flow from continuing the trade over our own road, and had the hon. gentleman opposed that policy he would have stood very little chance of being elected.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Lisgar has entered into a calculation to show how much the poor farmer of Manitoba must lose by the operation of this Tariff, and calculates the loss at $150 to $175. I have now a hand-book got out by the Government for the purpose of giving information to immigrants, and in this the calculation is made that only $600 is required to supply the immigrant with all that is necessary to carry on his operations. Only two or three of these articles would be affected by this additional Tariff. A wagon, $80, and a plough and harrow, $45, yet the hon. gentleman states that 10 per cent. would impose a tax of $150 to $175. If 10 per cent. were imposed on $150 and if every outfit would cost $1,500—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The entire 35 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. gentleman to refer only to the increased Tariff, but even at the entire rate of 35 per cent. the farmer would be very rich who would require to pay $150 duty.

Mr. FISHER. I waited until the Manitoba side of this question had been freely discussed before I attempted to draw the attention of the Finance Minister to another portion of this Province of equal consequence to other sections of the country. In the general resolutions are included the articles sixty-nine to seventy-two, which comprise the ordinary hand tools used by the farmers throughout the country. In these items the old Tariff imposed a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, which is now increased to 35 per cent. This is a matter which affect my own constituency and the other constituencies in the Eastern Townships of Quebec adjoining mine, and I believe it also affects materially the constituencies in the Lower Provinces. As I understand the hon. Finance Minister, he has increased these duties on agricultural implements at the demand of the manufacturers so that they may obtain control of the Manitoba market, and also of the other markets of the country to which they have not yet had access. As a matter of fact, in the Eastern Townships from which I come, the farmers, as a rule, obtain about half of the farm tools they use from the United States. If the hon. Finance Minister will look at the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last year, he will find that the Province of Quebec has imported under this item goods to the extent of $18,000; Nova Scotia, $9,000; New Brunswick, $4,700; Prince Edward Island, $1,100; in all, I think, about $32,000 worth of this class of implements. From the tone of the hon. Finance Minister's remarks, it is evident the prices of these articles will be increased to the extent of the increase in duty. I think that though this may be in the interest of agricultural implement makers, by enabling them to obtain entire control of the manufacturing market, it is an injustice to the farmers of the Eastern Townships and of the Lower Provinces generally. I allude particularly to the hand tools because, as a general rule, we do obtain our larger tools such as mowing machines, from Ontario. But I find that what hand tools we had used, which were brought from Ontario, cost us as much extra as the duties imposed on American tools. This being the case I have no hesitation in believing that since the increase of 5 per cent. on this class of implements, the farmers of the Eastern Provinces will, within a short time from the date when this new resolution takes effect, have to pay just so much more for the tools we use. This is a view of the question which, perhaps, has escaped the Finance Minister. It may be that he has not taken into consideration the interest of the farming community generally, but simply representations from the agricultural implement makers upon which he has based his new resolutions. What those representations are we do not know, but, judging from the tenure of his remarks, they are to the effect that those manufacturers wish to obtain entire control of the market so as to be able to charge just so much more for the tools they make. I think the farming interests are quite as important as those of manufacturers, and ought to be considered. I would like the Finance Minister to state the reasons for including these hand tools in the item, as well as the larger tools about which the discussion has entirely turned.

Mr. COCHRANE. As a farmer I have been very much surprised in listening to the arguments offered here to-night, and on previous occasions, against the Tariff. One would think we were listening to members of a Local Legislature discussing the National Policy from a Provincial point of view. Now, the reason the National Policy recommends itself to the intelligence of the country is that it is not narrow in its scope but embraces the whole Dominion. This whole Tariff policy was fully laid before the electors of my constituency, and they pronounced in its favor. I think the National Policy has been a benefit to the farmer, and I can show from a farmer's point of view the reason why. I consider it a fact that when we can raise or produce anything in this country as cheap as they can in any other country, then if it is introduced into this country the producer pays the duty; but if we cannot produce it as cheaply then we pay the duty. I do not think, in discussing the National Policy from a Manitoba point of view, that ploughs and lumber are parallel cases. We can produce ploughs, harrows and machinery as cheap in this country as in any other country, and therefore when they come into this country the producer pays the duty, but we cannot produce lumber and take it into Manitoba as cheap as they can take it in from the States, therefore the people of Manitoba pay the duty on lumber. But I look forward to a time when we are going to manufacture lumber as cheap as they do in the United States, and supply it to Manitoba. The hon. member for West Elgin sympathizes with the farming community, as did also the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Now, I do not think either of them are farmers.

Mr. BLAKE. They are both farmers.

Mr. COCHRANE. Will either of these gentlemen tell me that machinery is higher because a duty is placed on it? They know very well it is not. If there is a duty of $20 on a waggon, would that make any difference to the price of the waggon in Ontario? No; from the fact that our manufacturers can produce it as cheap as they can in any other country, therefore, it is the producer that pays the duty and not the consumer. So with machines. I know that we can buy machinery cheaper in Ontario to-day than we ever could before, although the duty is higher. It has been said that the duty on iron and steel would have the effect of raising the prices of machinery; that is not the case, for we can get better machines to-day for the same money than ever before. So with reference to small hand machines—the fact that we can produce them as cheap as in the United States proves that the producer pays the duty and not the consumer. As this is the first time I have spoken in this House, I may be excused for digressing to another subject. The question has been asked, What is the reason that there is a surplus of $6,000,000 in the Treasury? Now, the opinion has got abroad among the electors of this country that the hon. Finance Minister has got $6,000,000 locked up in the treasury at Ottawa, and they say it is not right. I understand, not that he has got $6,000,000 locked up in a chest, but that he has that sum over and above the ordinary expenses of the country, and which he can use to carry on the public works of the country. I think it is hardly fair for hon. gentlemen opposite to put the matter before the country in such a shape. One hon. gentleman claimed that the 17½ per cent. Tariff of the late Administration, if it had been continued, would have produced as much money as the present Tariff, and he proved to his own satisfaction that if the same rate of taxation had been continued we would have had the same amount of money and the same result. I cannot see it in the same light. I might pay as a consumer the same amount of money under a 17½ per cent. Tariff, but I would lose the benefit, and the country would lose the benefit of having manufactures in our midst which a higher Tariff has secured us. I would have to pay just as much money in a year as at present, but I would have to send all that money out of the country for foreign goods, and we would have no manufactures in this country. That is just the reason why we have this $6,000,000 of surplus—not because we pay more on everything we consume, but because we consume a great deal more. We have a greater population to consume what we produce, and to consume the dutiable goods that yield a revenue. Take, for instance, the article of furniture which the Tariff prohibits to a large extent from coming into the country. I obtained this information from a manufacturer, because he was taking four loads of furniture to a house in that riding. He said he was employing about 100 hands more than before the National Policy was introduced; the reason given being the fact that dealers imported a class of goods before that time which they could not buy now, and bring them in profitably. He said that the goods would not cost the consumers any more, and at the same time employment was given to about 100 men in Belleville; his name was Tickle. That is the reason the hon. Minister of Finance had six million dollars of surplus. These men were formerly employed in the United States, while now they are employed in Belleville and are using dutiable goods; and so it is with respect to the cotton mills and other industries throughout the country. There is, however, a larger question before us. When Mr. Tickle employed 100 men, he, at the same time, used the raw material in this country. "What," I asked him "would be the value of 1,000 feet of basswood manufactured into furniture and brought into Canada—would the value be $500?" This gentleman replies: "In some cases it would be a great deal more." Thus when the Americans purchased for $10 a thousand feet of basswood and they put labor on it—and labor is wealth—they sold the product for $50, and the lowest estimate of the American profit was $10. If we had not established manufactures, the Americans would have been manufacturing our raw material, and we would have been compelled to pay, not for the raw material, but for the manufactured goods. That affords the reason why we have surpluses at the present time. I am here because the farmers of East Northumberland thought the policy of the present Government was a wise policy, and all the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite have failed to convince the farmers that the National Policy has been ruinous to their interest, and so long as they continue to pursue that line of argument they will remain in Opposition.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman has stated that I am not a farmer. I represent an agricultural constituency, and I was elected largely because I was a farmer. My hon. friend says I am a gentleman farmer. I hope I am a gentleman, and I know I am a farmer; but the term gentleman farmer hardly applies to me in the sense in which the hon. gentleman has used it. Leaving the personal question alone, the hon. gentleman has stated that the farmers were not interested in this particular item. Does he not know that the farmers of Quebec and the other Provinces have to use their tools, and that they will be called on to pay the increased duty. Is it not true that they will have to pay so much more in consequence of that increased duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FISHER. Then what advantage will the agricultural implement and tool maker of Ontario derive from this increase of duty? If they do not require increased protection to enable them to obtain control of the market, why do they ask protection?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. To give them the market.

Mr. FISHER. I can tell the hon. Finance Minister that the agricultural implement makers of the United States will continue to send those same tools into Canada, and the agricultural implement makers of Ontario will charge just as much as the duty will allow them to charge. When the duty is increased the agricultural implement makers will keep up the price just to the point when we cannot import tools from abroad cheaper. Notwithstanding the fact that the duty on tools will be increased to 30 per cent., the farmers of the Eastern Townships will still prefer to obtain them from the United States instead of Ontario. They have done so, and will continue to do so, because they prefer American tools. I do not in any way desire to reflect on the agricultural implement makers of Ontario, but I tell the hon. Minister that the effect of his policy has been to make manufacturing more difficult. They have not a very large market to supply, and consequently they have to use the materials which the hon. Minister has taxed; and if the hon. gentleman wishes to enable the Ontario implement makers to obtain more control what he should do should be to reduce the duty on material used in manufacturing and not on the tools which the farmers import. That is the true way in which the industry can be developed—and I am as much interested in the prosperity of the tool business as hon. gentlemen opposite, for our manufacturers will then be able to control the market more effectively than by increasing the duty placed on the imported articles. The hon. Minister of Finance introduced his Tariff in 1879, and gave implement makers a protective duty of 30 per cent., which was going to secure for them the whole market. However, to-day Ontario manufacturers ask for an increased protection. The whole difficulty in regard to the National Policy is that when you create a manufacturing industry by protection, in a short time the makers will ask for increased protection. They will now obtain 30 per cent., in a year they will obtain 40 per cent., in a few years 50 per cent., and the farmers will be called upon to pay increased prices.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Brome has referred to spades, shovels, &c. In Gananoque we have, perhaps, the largest industry in Canada engaged in the manufacture of these goods. It has been in existence there about thirty years. I have resided there during that time and during the greater proportion of the time I have been a purchaser of these goods from the manufacturer, having been in the retail business, and since I went out of business my brothers are in it. I know, as a fact, that these goods to which I have referred are selling cheaper to-day than during the last twenty-five or thirty years, and a great deal cheaper than from 1873 to 1878. I know that a great many more are being manufactured, that a great many are being shipped to Australia, and that this line of goods manufactured in Gananoque will compare favorably, and is preferable to some lines of goods manufactured in the United States, where a great many are manufactured by prison labor and are inferior to our Gananoque goods.

Mr. BLAKE. Plough makers use steel plates to cut the pattern, mould boards and land sides, etc., and these hitherto were admitted free of duty, and plates of steel for saw makers and imported steel for saws are admitted free. I observe that in the hon. member's amendment of the free list, to which I only refer to exemplify my enquiry, he inserts, expressly, plates cut for the use of saw makers; but I do not observe any such position with reference to plates of steel for the use of the makers of ploughs, and I am at a loss to know at what duty and under what provision these portions of ploughs will be admitted, unless they are admitted as parts of ploughs.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As far as that is concerned, it will come under the head of $5 a ton, not being a finished article or part of the plough sent in in parts. It is really in its raw state; it was admitted free in the past, but now it comes under the head of $5 a ton.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain why that particular thing to be made part of a plough, which seems to me to be as nearly as possible analogous to the plate of steel used by the saw maker, which is expressly admitted free—is not put on the same category?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Sheet steel is not made, and is not likely to be made here; but as that article was placed on the free list before, it can be done by Order-in-Council, if it is considered desirable under the General Act; but at the same time it is not contemplated to insert it in this at all.

Mr. BLAKE. This is so far satisfactory. That duty will not be onerous.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman knows that there is a very large importation of these commodities.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And this is the importation of the raw material of the plough makers of the country.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to see the hon. Finance Minister extend the time, with regard to agricultural implements, beyond the 10th of May.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is disposed of.

Mr. WATSON. I may say that this night has been well spent in arguing the pros and cons of this question. With regard to Mr. Sutherland, of Selkirk, I believe that the Manitoba market has got a boom on it to-night, and besides all the statements made, and the information received as to the number of implements which Canadian manufacturers can ship this season, it is admitted that they cannot supply the demand, but I think that this augurs well for the North-West this season. We had the Ministers of Militia and Customs in Marquette as well as in Selkirk. I was not present when they spoke, but I do not think that they said a great deal in my favor in Marquette, but the Minister of Customs has stated that the question of the Tariff was not one of the important questions in our election, but I do not presume he understands that I was sent here to represent the feelings of a class of people who are perfectly satisfied with this Government. We had certain grievances, we have them yet, and if that hon. gentleman did Mr. Sutherland no harm in Selkirk, I think that he did me a little good in Portage la Prairie. I do not think that the Minister of Customs enlightened the electors there very greatly on that occasion. I was not present, but judging from all the reports, he occupied three-quarters of his speech in personal abuse of Mr. Martin. If the grievances of Manitoba had been ventilated in this House some time ago, so many would not still exist, in my opinion; it has been represented that everything is all right in the North-West; but at all events, the facts should be stated. We are not here for the purpose of being blind-folded. We want merely to get at the facts. If the Canada manufacturers can manufacture enough machinery for the North-West, all right; but why, then, do they want protection? and if they can supply them as cheaply as before, why, then, do they want the duty increased? and if the Canada machines are better than the American, why are they afraid of competition, especially in view of the fact, that the American have sold at a higher rate than the Canada machines? I would like to have seen the hon. Finance Minister give this matter more consideration. We have certain grievances which I think we will see ventilated. An hon. gentleman opposite says he believes that four-fifths of our people are Conservatives; then why did they not send four-fifths of their representation in this House Conservatives?

An hon. MEMBER. Owing to side issues.

Mr. WATSON. It may be said that this was due to side issues; and a great many it may be added, have been introduced here to-night; but something has been stated by the hon. Minister of Customs here to-night, which, as far as our country is concerned, in the future he may wish to have been unsaid.

On item 85, coal dust,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My attention has been called to this matter by a dealer in coal. He suggested that it would be necessary to define this coal dust more closely, else great difficulty would be experienced in dealing with it. In the American tariff it is limited to such as would pass through a half-inch screen.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is a matter which the Department will arrange, if necessary.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman state at what point he expects this coal dust to be imported, and for what manufacturers?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Largely by the salt manufacturers in the west, who use it as their fuel. They pay about $1 or $1.20 per ton, and they find that the 50 or 60 per cent. is really 50 or 60 per cent. on the cost of the article.

Mr. BLAKE. They found that the duty was added to the cost?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no competition in this case, as our coal does not go up there at all.

On item 88, India rubber clothing,

Mr. BLAKE. What is the object of this increase?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Sometimes an India rubber coat is made of two materials with the rubber between by which it becomes water proof, and the question has arisen whether it should pay duty as India rubber, or cotton goods, or woollen goods, and this rate has been fixed to avoid these difficulties.

Mr. BLAKE. Are these goods manufactured here?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are, though it is desirable to make this change even if they were not.

On item 89, jellies and jams,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The average duty now paid on these goods is 5½ cts. per lb., and it is proposed to make it 5 cts. per lb. on account of the difficulty which is experienced in valuing these articles in different parts of the country.

On item 96, pumps, iron, &c.,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is in the direction squarely of protection. The pump makers have now 25 per cent., and they will now have practically about 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has not prosecuted enquiries with regard to the duties on this article such as he has made in regard to others, for he would have found that he has been grossly misinformed about them. I have a statement in my hands with an invoice showing that these goods pay under this specific and ad valorem duty as follows: No. 0, which is a well known number, pays 63 per cent.; No. 1, 60 per cent.; No. 2, 55 per cent. No. 02, 2-inch bore, pays 83 cts. as they cost $1.26. No. 1, 2½-inch bore, net price $1.44 at the 50 and 25 rate, 86 cts. No. 2, net $1.62, at the 50 and 25 rate, 90 cts., or 55 per cent. These figures show that in this regard the hon. gentleman has been misled, and that what is apparently 35 per cent. is nearly 63 to 65 per cent.

Mr. WATSON.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes in this respect, and amend the resolution by making it an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent.

On item 99, steel,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Under the Tariff, as it stands now, steel is free until the first of July next, and it is to remain free until that time. But as it will shortly be manufactured both in Glasgow, N.S., and in London, Ont., it is proposed to impose a duty of $5.00 a ton on the class of steel which they will be able to manufacture.

Resolutions to be reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; (and at 2:05 a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 18th April, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the notice required by the 60th Rule of the House to be given prior to the consideration of Private Bills be reduced to twenty-four hours for the remainder of the Session, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. COLBY moved that the 51st Rule of the House be suspended so far as regards the petition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. COLBY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) to authorize the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada to extend their traffic arrangements with the North Shore Railway to fifty years from the date thereof.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if this Bill is in accordance with the General Railway Act, or if it is a new policy; also if the Government has consented to the adoption of this policy.

Mr. COLBY. In reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, I would say that if the General Railway Act had made this provision, it would not have been necessary to introduce this Bill. As to the views of the Government, I am not in a position to inform the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. I asked if this Bill was in accordance with the General Railway Act. If the hon. gentleman is not in a position to answer on behalf of the Government, I suppose I have only anticipated history a little, because I have no doubt, from his ability, his cleverness, and his well-known devotion and fidelity to the party he will shortly be a member of the Cabinet, and I am sure this House will be pleased if he is.

Mr. COLBY moved that Rule No. 43 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the first time.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. COLBY, in moving that Rule No. 43 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the second time, said: I do this simply for the convenience of the Railway Committee. The business is now somewhat slight before that Committee, and in order that it may not be necessary to call the Committee specially together for this Bill, I would ask that the Bill be read the second time, that it may go before the Committee on Friday.

Bill read the second time.

NORTH WESTERN BANK.

Mr. BEATY in introducing Bill (No. 112) to amend the Act to incorporate the North-Western Bank (from the Senate) moved that Rule 43 be suspended.

Bill read the first and the second times.

THE PENITENTIARIES BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 111) to amend and consolidate the laws relating to Penitentiaries.

Bill read the first time.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps it would be convenient to discuss the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on Friday.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow it to stand until Monday, as it involves an important question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD Monday, then.

BOUNTY ON PIG IRON.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House, on Thursday next, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law that a bounty of $1.50 per ton be paid on all pig iron manufactured in Canada from Canad an ore, between the first day of July, 1883, and the thirteenth day of June, 1886, inclusive, and that a bounty of $1 per ton be paid in like manner on the same manufactured between the first day of July, 1886, and the thirteenth day of June, 1889, inclusive.

He said: The assent of the Crown has been given to this resolution.

Motion agreed to.

PAY OF OFFICERS AND MEN OF THE ACTIVE MILITIA.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to our Debates. It is very proper that our Debates should be reported, but it is also proper that they should be reported correctly. In the discussion which took place the day before yesterday, which I followed closely, one of the speakers—whom I am sorry not to see in his seat at the present moment, the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt)—said, in the course of his speech, and in fact it was the most salient part of his speech, that a certain class of immigrants were coming here that he did not want to see here. Now, Sir, this part of his speech ought to go to the country as it went to this House, especially as his words created at the time rather a sensation in this House. I read carefully the report of the hon. member's speech on page 14 of the Debates of the 16th of April, and I do not find that that passage of his speech is reported at all, although, strange to say, I find that it is reported in the Mail, the Citizen, the Globe, and other newspapers. In order to give the House the very words used, I shall read them as they are reported in these papers. The Citizen's report is as follows:—

"The hon. member considered that the Bill would do good in preventing the immigration to this country, of a class he did not desire to see here."

The report of the Globe says:—

"It will keep out a large class of immigrants, whom I, for one, do not wish to see here."

The Mail reports:—

"And will prevent a class of immigrants coming to this country, which I, for one, do not wish to see here."

I would not have attached any importance to this omission from the hon. member's speech, if the words omitted did not bear practically and exactly upon the point at issue, by showing the animus of the feeling of the discussion, and that is the reason why I desire to draw your attention to it, in order that this part of the speech of the hon. gentleman should be inserted in the Debates. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not here. I tried to find him out, because I never like to speak of any person when he is not present; but as this is the only occasion I have to bring the matter before the House, I am obliged to do so during the hon. gentleman's absence. In conclusion, I will not go further than to give caution to the hon. members of this House, that their utterances must be reported in the Hansard as they are uttered in this House; and that each hon. member is responsible for what he says on the floor of this House.

Mr. BOWELL. I am sorry that the hon. member for South Simcoe is not in the House. But I know he came to me and pointed out the language attributed to him in the press, and said it was not strictly correct—that if he had used such language it was not his intention to do so. He explained to me what he did say, and I trust the opportunity will be given the hon. gentleman, when present, to make his own explanation. I merely make this statement, not in justification of anything he did say, but simply that the House may know he came to myself and had a conversation with me in reference to the matter, in which he said the language attributed to him was not strictly correct.

Mr. IVES. I believe it is generally understood that the class the hon. member referred to, were the Chinese, and I believe there are other hon. members who agree with the hon. member for Simcoe, in not desiring that a very large number of Chinese should come in.

Mr. TYRWHITT. In regard to the omission of that portion of my speech, which does not appear in the Hansard, the only portion which does not appear, was a retort to a remark of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. As well as I can remember, the remark was that should the Orange banner be hoisted in this city it would prevent immigration. My retort was, it would prevent a class of immigration which I, for one, did not wish to see here. As what I said has been misconstrued, as I was evidently misunderstood by the hon. member for Prince County, (Mr. Hackett), I took the earliest opportunity of explaining to that hon. member my meaning, which was that I made reference to political offenders and fugitives from justice.

Mr. BLAKE. The difficulty in this case is, that the hon. member who introduced this subject has called attention to the fact of the omission from what he supposed to be a correct report of our Debates, of an important statement in the speech of the hon. member for South Simcoe. It is remarked on all hands that that omission has taken place. I think the attention of the House has been properly directed to that circumstance, and the attention of the Committee on the publication of the Debates ought forthwith to be directed to it. It is worse than useless we should have a publication, bearing the stamp of authority, issued as a correct report of our Debates, from which important passages in the speeches of hon. members are either deliberately or accidentally omitted.

Mr. PICKARD. I would ask the hon. member for L'Islet, whether he believed the document he read here was strictly true, which was said to be published in Belfast, and whether it was not read here on the floor of this House for an effect politically in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have just asked the hon. member for South Simcoe, whether he had any communication with the reporters in regard to the withdrawal of the words referred to, and the hon. gentleman states he had not. The rule is that everything said on the floor of this House shall go into the reports next day, and hon. members are permitted to revise, but not alter their speeches, with a view of correcting what is manifestly a misinterpretation. Since the debate has occurred, I have received a note from the chief reporter, and it may be as well to let the House know the explanation he gives in regard to this omission. He explains that at times the reporters fail to hear, and rather than insert what is erroneous, omit the passage altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. We all heard it.

Mr. WHITE. I am not at this moment excusing the reporter. His duty is to report every word uttered; and the object in adopting the present system, under which the printed copy comes to us without revision, is that hon. members may not have an opportunity to change their speeches before the first publication. I think, on the whole, we have no reason to complain of the conduct of the reporters in this regard; the only drawback being that occasionally a reporter may misunderstand an argument, either from over-fatigue, or any other cause, and report it, therefore, incorrectly. That does not often occur, and when it does, the speaker has an opportunity of setting it right in the revised edition; but he has not the right to suppose anything he may have said.

Mr. RYKERT. I may draw attention to another very important omission made a few nights ago, in the case of the hon. member for Middlesex, who made the stupid blunder of confusing the names of Xerxes and Canute, in an absurd remark about whipping the sea—a blunder which was noticed by the whole House. But instead of the remark appearing in the Hansard as uttered, as I supposed it would, it was changed, and the absurd blunder which nobody could justify, more especially when committed by the hon. member for Middlesex, who was a school-teacher, does not appear in the Hansard, as it should. That was altered the next day in the Hansard, and the proper correction was made in the first copy that was brought down to the House. Now, if that had been reported as it ought to have been reported, the country could have seen exactly how correct the hon. gentleman was in his quotation.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I would like simply to say—as attention has been called to me—that I am exceedingly obliged to the reporter who corrected what was a slip of my own at the time; and I am exceedingly thankful to learn that there are literary gentlemen in the House of the high culture and attainments of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who can detect those literary blunders. It is unfortunate for me; but, perhaps, it is something that other hon. gentlemen have not found out, in their own experience. I do make mistakes. There are other hon. gentlemen who, though they make mistakes, have not the penetration nor the perception to discover them until they had been pointed out across the floor of the House. I acknowledge my ignorance, and I confess to the hon. member for Lincoln that for once, in my experience, he knows as much about these literary matters as I do, and as every other hon. member in the House does, and as the reporters at the desk do. I stand corrected, and I hope not to deserve another such rebuke from him for a long time to come.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I think the hon. gentleman who brought this matter before the House need not fear if there is any reference at all to Irish Roman Catholics. I do not think, Sir, from my knowledge of that class of the community, that they are at all afraid of an Orange flag. They see lots of them, they know what they are; and I can tell the hon. gentleman another thing: that, so far as Irish Roman Catholics are concerned, they would rather have an Irish Orangeman for a neighbor than a Frenchman—it looks much better. The Irish Roman Catholics can take care of themselves, and Irishmen generally can take care of themselves, and the hon. members for Quebec need give themselves no trouble about us.

CUSTOMS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Customs.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 81,

Mr. BOWELL. It does not read correctly. I desire to have it read in this way:

“Except only in case where it is otherwise provided herein, or by regulation of the Governor in Council, no entry shall be deemed perfect unless an invoice of the goods entered, duly certified in writing thereon as correct by the person, firm or corporation from whom they are purchased, has been produced to the collector, and duly attested as required by this Act."

It is only a change of the reading.

On section 82,

Mr. BOWELL. We have left out the form of oaths, and simply retain that portion of the old law which gave power to the Governor in Council to amend and substitute any new affirmation that may be required in order to carry out the law.

On section 86,

Mr. MITCHELL. This seems to me an extraordinary clause, it reads as follows:—

"No evidence of the value of any goods imported into Canada, or taken out of warehouses for consumption therein, at the place whence and the time when they are to be deemed to have been exported to Canada, contradictory to or at variance with the value stated in the invoice produced to the Collector, with the additions (if any) made to such value by the Bill of entry, shall be received in any court in Canada, on the part of any party except the Crown."

It appears to me that if the matter goes to court, evidence should be received on both sides. I suppose this clause is from the old Act, nevertheless it is of an extraordinary character.

Mr. BOWELL. It is from the old law exactly. It makes the invoice the evidence of the value of the goods.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a very extraordinary provision to be in any law. If a case was taken into court by the Crown, evidence as to the value of the goods shall be given simply at the option of the Crown.

Mr. BOWELL. The meaning of the clause is very clear. It prevents the giving of evidence of the value of goods at the time of exportation other than that which is contained in the invoice, except on the part of the Crown. That would be quite consistent with the law as it existed prior to the change in 1851, which prevented the possibility of reducing the face of the invoice for duty; but as we have amended that law by allowing deductions to be made from the face of the invoice in case of reduction in the value of the article at the time of exportation, there is no reason why evidence should not be produced to show that fact as well as evidence on the part of the Crown that the goods have risen in value. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland, and will consider his suggestion.

Mr. VALIN. Trouble has arisen in Quebec in regard to appraisers. There is one officer there who has been there for many years, and is efficient. But there is now an officer who does not understand the value of goods. Much complaint arises from that fact. The Government should see to it that they have proper appraisers appointed at the Port of Quebec.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). If the goods remain in warehouse, and the value of the goods should rise, it is not exactly fair to keep the value the same as when warehoused.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. member for St. John will look at the clause, he will see that it does not propose to change the value of the goods for duty when in warehouse, the clause reads that:

"No evidence of the value of any goods, at the time they are exported to Canada, though they may be warehoused, shall be considered when he makes the entry on which he has to pay duty."

However, the law provided that if an article was purchased six months before it is exported from any country, and if its value should go up, the value for duty should be considered as the value at the time of exportation. The clause is quite consistent with the old law; but as that law has been amended, it strikes me that the objection taken by the hon. member for Northumberland is a good one.

On section 89,

Mr. BOWELL. This is a change to meet the difficulty we have found when importers of goods, who desire to have them improperly entered, handing certificates over to brokers who know nothing of the transaction. Those brokers would make the necessary affidavits or affirmations, as the case may be, and there was no provision in the law to reach cases when such entries had been improperly made. This clause will meet, to a very great extent, the cases to which I have referred.

On section 90,

Mr. BOWELL. This carries out more clearly the points to which I have referred:

"Such declaration—"

This is the declaration made for entry.

"Shall be kept by the collector, &c. And if there be any—"

This is added:

"Wilfully false statement in such declaration."

The next five or six lines are new.

"The goods shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture in the same manner and with the same effect as if such false statement were contained in the oath, and in the person making such false statement shall be subject to the same penalties, forfeitures and criminal punishments as if he had himself taken the oath and had made such false statement therein; but such written declaration may be dispensed with under the order of the Governor in Council, where it may be deemed advisable, in the interests of commerce, to dispense therewith."

The House will see the object of making this addition to the clause, which is to provide for the very case to which I have called the attention of the Committee: that where a merchant deliberately makes and signs a false certificate, and hands it to an agent or broker, on which the entry is made, he shall be deemed as guilty as if he made the entry himself and had taken the obligations. I will give an illustration: A short time ago an importation of what purported to be vinegar from Germany was entered at the Custom House at Montreal, the importer signed a certificate as to the correctness of the invoice, the broker made the necessary affidavit, and the entry was made. On examination, however, we found that some 400 of these demijohns contained spirits, about £5 above proof. We consulted the law officers of the Crown, and found that it was doubtful whether we had power to punish the importers for signing a false certificate; and in this event we now make the importer just as guilty as if he had gone to the Custom House himself and made the declaration.

On section 91,

Mr. BOWELL. We simply give to the Governor in Council power to prescribe the forms of oath at various times. The same power was contained in the late law; but, as I explained a few moments ago, we have omitted the obligations from the Act, and given the general power to the Governor in Council to adopt any form of declaration.

On section 93,

Mr. BOWELL. The only addition is the word "any" added in the second line, and "the next preceding section" in the thirteenth line.

On section 95,

Mr. BOWELL. The last four lines are new. The Committee will see, I think, the justice and propriety of making this addition. It is often complained that some officers in the Customs exhibit the invoices of one merchant to another; and in order to prevent this—although there is a general order against it, there was no law—we have therefore added these words:

"But in no case shall an invoice be shown to or a copy thereof given to any person other than the said importer, or an officer of Customs, except upon the order or subpoena of a proper court."

To prevent the possibility of a merchant's business being shown or exhibited to competitors, or to any one else in the same line.

Mr. BURPEE. Does this apply to the appraiser's room, as well as to the Custom House itself. Invoices lie day after day in the appraiser's office quite open and exposed, if anyone is disposed to see them.

Mr. BOWELL. The object is to prevent particularly the appraiser, under whose supervision all these invoices come, from exhibiting them or showing them to rival importers, or to any importer, or to any one outside of the Custom House. The collector, or any person assisting him, is of course entitled to examine them, as he very often does; but the only application it will have, is to prevent any Customs officer, or those in the Customs Department here, when the invoices are put on record, from showing these invoices to any person outside of the Customs Department, except on the subpoena of any court.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The fee—50 cts.—is too large, I think; it was in the old law, and I think it might well be reduced.

Mr. BOWELL. That depends in a great measure on the length of the invoice.

On section 99,

Mr. BOWELL. This is section three of the amendment of 1831, and the only addition is, to the word "experienced," "persons" are added.

Mr. BURPEE. Instead of "merchants?"

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; very often intricate pieces of machinery have to be appraised, and merchants really are not the men best qualified to judge of their value, or of their mechanism.

On section 102,

Mr. BOWELL. The old Act read somewhat in this way:

"If in any case the true value of the goods is finally determined to exceed by 20 per cent."

To the words: "Value for duty of any goods as finally determined," we have added: "Under this Act as determined in any action or proceeding to recover unpaid duties." Making it plainer and giving it a wider scope; there is no real material change.

On section 105,

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that the question as to the policy of this 105th section, is what ought to be considered by this House. I suppose it is a copy of the old Act; but yet it is a question whether the policy of giving to the officers of Customs a share in the seizures is really sound policy or not. My own mind has been very much changed on that point of late years, and I am rather inclined to think that the tendency of Customs officers, as far as my observation has gone of late years, has been rather to place difficulties in the way of commercial men with a view of getting benefit out of it for themselves. I might say that instances have come under my own notice where such a suspicion has been excited, but whether it was in reality the motive for the seizures, or whether it was simply a desire to perform their duty as public officers, I am not prepared to say. I think, however, it may well be a question for consideration whether the policy of encouraging officers to make seizures by giving them a share of the results of those seizures does not lead to greater abuses than all the losses which might occur by allowing them to do their work simply as a matter of duty.

Mr. BOWELL. The point raised by the hon. gentleman is one which is worthy of a good deal of consideration, though it does not properly come up under this clause, which only applies to cases where the goods have been taken by the Customs Department, on the ground of under valuation. There is a clause which enables the Government to take any goods which may be imported, and which may be considered under-valued by paying 10 per cent. in addition to the value and the costs.

Mr. MITCHELL. The principle is the same. The principle is that of allowing a public servant, who is paid a salary for the work he is required to do, to receive any portion of any fines or surpluses, whether they result from under-valuation, or attempts to defraud by a false entry.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I agree with the hon. gentleman for Northumberland, and although the matter is one which does not really come up in this clause, the principle is involved here. I think it would be well for the hon. Minister to consider whether it would not be well to abolish this system. There is no doubt the system was adopted for a good purpose, but at the same time, it sometimes works badly and unfairly. If any officer gets his salary, and it is sufficient to keep him, I think that is all he should have.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest to the hon. Minister, that he should consider whether it would not be better to place these surplus fines into a general fund, from which such officers as show special diligence and fidelity in the performance of their duty, should receive rewards at certain periods. I think that would remove any inducement to make special seizures for the purpose of obtaining rewards, and would enable the authorities in the Customs Department to reward officers who display special vigilance.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not agree with the hon. member for Northumberland as to the propriety of putting in the hands of the Minister of Customs any such discretionary power. I do not think it would be a prudent or proper thing to do. With regard to the principle involved in that clause, I may say that I also differ with the hon. gentleman. I believe this provision is a great incentive to energy and activity on the part of Collectors of Customs, especially in the rural districts. Unless some incentive of this kind is held out, the great majority of these officers will content themselves with attending to the duties of their offices during prescribed hours. They will not go out of their way, as it is very desirable they should do, to endeavor to try to put a stop to illegal traffic. Many instances have fallen under my own observation in which I have no doubt the belief on the part of the officer that he was to receive some reward for the extra services he performed, such as being out at night watching the roads on the opposite side of the frontier, had a great deal to do with his vigilance, and from which the best results have been attained. I think it would be a great mistake for the Department to do away with that regulation.

Mr. VALIN. I know that, in Quebec, some of these men often make these seizures as a matter of speculation, because they get their share of the profits. I know also that there are some cases in which the appraisers are to blame. There is one case in particular which I referred to the hon. Minister in which some old onion seed was bought at a price much less than new seed could be purchased for, but the appraiser did not know the difference. The question was reported to the Customs Department, and we had a great deal of trouble settling it. This shows the necessity for the appraisers being competent men. I know of cases where people go into the country and buy one-quarter of a pound of tobacco from an honest farmer, simply for the purpose of having him fined, so as to get their share.

Mr. BOWELL. My own opinion, after two or three years' experience, is exactly in accord with the sentiments which have just been uttered by the hon. member for Hunt- ington (Mr. Scriver). If there be no incentive given to the officer to look sharply after improper importations which are taking place, you may depend upon it, he will simply remain in his office, do his duty, and not go beyond it. He knows that he is put on a permanent list, as it is called, and so long as he performs his duty in his office you cannot find fault with him. There are many of these officers, particularly on the frontier, who will go out half a night when they think any smuggling is going on, and we have reason to believe that they do it on account of the prospect of reward if they make any seizures. Then as to under-valuation in the Customs Department, by collectors and appraisers, we have found that when the divisions of fines and penalties, which have been imposed by the Department for infractions of the law, have been distributed at once, they have acted as an incentive to the officer to be much more vigilant than he otherwise would have been. It is true that in some cases they will overstep the mark, as in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin), in which the officer did not draw a distinction between new onion seed and old seed, the party purchasing running the risk of their being of no value at all. The same thing probably occurs in other branches of trade; but, on the whole, I think it would be a blow at the efficiency of the service, if you were to deprive them of the rewards which follow diligence in the performance of business. I am also strongly in accord with the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) on the question of making a general fund and placing it at the disposal of any Minister for what might be termed meritorious reward. I am afraid that the pressure which would be brought upon a Minister, and particularly on one like myself who has no great strength of mind, no power of resistance when political pressure is brought to bear, or pressure which is not political, would be such that we would be apt to give way, and perhaps distribute the money improperly. That is what I fear. My hon. friend behind me says he does not think I would; but perhaps there are others who would.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No one ever accused you of that yet.

Mr. BOWELL. I am very glad of that; but there might be others less tender-hearted than I am, who would not yield to the pressure to which I have referred. If the hon. member for Northumberland weighs this matter well, he will come to the conclusion that, though there may be abuses and hardships, yet, to remove this provision would not only cause the revenue to suffer, but there would be no check on the dishonest importer, and the honest trader would suffer in proportion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not wish to make any question of it. I merely call the attention of the House to the matter of policy that is worth consideration. I admit that the objection taken by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), has a great deal in it. The case is entirely different along an extended portion where the facilities of smuggling are very great, and where men will not lie out all night under the bushes, and watch persons smuggling, unless they have some inducement. But I refer particularly to the cities and towns, and I trust that the hon. Minister will take the matter into consideration.

On section 107,

Mr. BOWELL. Clauses 107, 108 and 109, are the same as clause 50 of the old law.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to call the hon. Minister's attention to the fact that peculiar hardships to importers may arise under clause 107. It says:

"If any goods are found in any package which are not mentioned in the invoice or entry, such goods shall be seized and absolutely forfeited."

Now, I can easily imagine a case in which a small package of goods may accidentally, without any intention of defrauding the revenue, be brought in, and not included in the invoice. If it is discovered by the officer, the goods are absolutely forfeited. You go to a hard, cast-iron Minister, who says: "There is the law, Mr. Mitchell; I am administering the law; I have got no discretion in this matter; I am bound to carry out the law; I can receive no affidavit or evidence of any extenuating or explanatory circumstances; these goods are in the package; it is immaterial whether they were put there accidentally or not; and the law says I shall forfeit them absolutely." I would suggest to the hon. Minister whether he should not take discretionary power to relieve the importer when he thinks the circumstances of the case warrant it.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I think that the hon. Minister should have a certain discretion in a matter of this kind, and not merely point to the law, and say: "I am bound to carry out this law no matter how innocently these enclosures got into the packages of goods." I can hardly agree, however, with the remarks of my hon. friend with regard to the hon. Minister, whom I do not look upon as a sort of Custom House griffin, who puts over his door the words: "Who enters here leaves hope behind." I think he wishes to carry out the law strictly; but I do think, when a case arises in which the parties manifestly do not intend to smuggle, but bring the goods in by mistake or inadvertence, that he is prepared to give the fullest consideration to the circumstances. But I think the law might be amended with a great deal of benefit to everybody, by giving the Ministry not only the implied power, but the direct power under the law to look into the affidavits, instead of taking the report of the officers and saying: "under that report I must carry out the letter of the law."

Mr. BURPEE. I can understand very well the objection raised to that section by the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and I think that the hon. Minister of Customs has power at present to consider all these hard cases. But if you leave these open for reconsideration, I am afraid there will be a vast amount of enclosure which will give a great deal of trouble. This is one of the sections which requires to be worked very strictly, and I am not satisfied in my own mind whether it should be altered or not.

Mr. BOWELL. I confess that when I first undertook to administer this law the provision of this clause seemed very hard, and I thought that some discretion might be given to the Minister in cases of the kind mentioned. But when you reflect that the 106th clause provides for the examination of only one package in every ten, that to leave it optional with the Minister to give up these enclosures, would be opening the door to a great deal of fraud. If a man desires to be dishonest, he, by having only one package in every ten examined, has nine chances to one of getting clear; and in order to prevent that kind of fraud on the revenue, I have no doubt the original framers of the law found it necessary to provide for an absolute forfeiture. The clause provides only for the forfeiture of the goods enclosed, but a subsequent clause provides that if there is evidence to show that there was an intention on the part of the importer, or those who sent the goods, to defraud the revenue, the whole package shall be forfeited. In order to warn packers, particularly in Europe, I instructed the Commissioner to have some hundreds of clause 50 printed, with a circular, calling the attention of every importer and every exporter to the provisions of the law. That Act was denounced by some of the Opposition press as an inquisitorial interference by the Customs Department with the importers. I was under the impression that I was doing a kindness to those who might accidentally put an enclosure in a package, without the intention of committing a fraud. In all cases of enclosures, some kind of an excuse is given. I am bound to say that in many cases the excuses are very plausible, but if you desire to stop the practice altogether you must make the forfeiture absolute. In cases where we have found merchants who, upon the discovery of enclosures in packages that have not been examined, reporting the fact to the Customs Department, and paying the duty, there has been a relaxation in the enforcement of the law, although I am not sure the Minister has the power to do so; but in the administration of the law that has been the principle on which we have acted. In cases where enclosures have been found, and no evidence to show that the enclosures were unintentional, other than the statement made by the person who sent or received it, the law is imperative. I would much rather that no discretion of this kind be left to any hon. Minister any more than that there should be discretion in the distribution of the fines and penalties, as suggested. I am satisfied that while there may be a few cases of what might be called hardship, it would be opening the door for a fearful amount of wrong which might be perpetrated by those who desire to take advantage of it.

On section 108,

Mr. BOWELL. Change "and" to "or."

On section 111,

Mr. BOWELL. This provides that if there are reasons to believe that there are any improper enclosures, or anything else, in packages delivered without examination, the Collector of Customs may require such package to be returned to the Custom House and be examined.

On section 112,

Mr. BOWELL. This is sub-section fifty-one with the words in the two next preceding sections added to make it applicable to 110 and 111.

On section 115,

Mr. BOWELL. We leave out the language in the old clause declaring what are warehousing ports; and simply use the words warehousing ports already established, and give power to establish others.

On section 121,

Mr. BOWELL. That is a new clause, providing for the requirements as to the transfer of goods in bond. The Committee will find that while the clause is new it is in substance a part of sub-section two of section fifty-six and makes no material change.

On section 122,

Mr. BOWELL. This is a part of sub-section three of clause sixty one of the old law with the few words added in the first six lines: "When any such transfer being made of goods in warehouse legally affected as before provided the proper officer may admit new security." We had no power under the old law to do this.

On section 124,

Mr. BOWELL. If you will look at sub-section four, of section fifty-six of the old law, you will find this is nearly the same, changing the words which provides that in cases where packages have to be sold and the duties are not paid, the goods, if they do not bring their value and the duty, shall be destroyed. The principle is this: That if a person imports goods and refuses to take them out of the warehouse, and they have to be sold, they shall not be placed in the market at less value than the same goods upon which the duty has been paid, and thus come into competition with the regularly imported goods. It is provided, as in the old law, that in such cases the goods shall be destroyed.

On section 130,

Mr. BOWELL. There are one or two verbal changes in the four last lines which are of some importance, as the question of grinding in bond is one that has somewhat agitated the country in the past. Doubtless many hon. gentlemen will remember that in former discussions on this subject the permission to substitute other grain for that imported for exportation, was strongly objected to in the carrying out of the system of grinding in bond. The old law provides that not only can there be an equivalent to wheat exported, but an equivalent of corn. You could import American hogs, slaughter and sell them in Canada, and export Canadian pork, equivalent to that which was imported, and clear your bond. That was objected to on the part of the farming community, and there was no little comment and condemnation in reference to this matter. In changing the Order in Council we omitted the word "equivalent" and made it the product of the article which was brought into the country. I have so changed this law, and I point it out to the Committee so that they may know what they are called upon to approve; that we make it absolutely necessary, without any discretion on the part of the Governor in Council, or the Minister, to permit the equivalent of any article which may be imported into Canada for manufacture and for export. You will find that on reading the last four lines, it says: "But the said regulations should not extend to the substitution of other beef, pork, flour or meal, for the produce of such imported cattle or swine, wheat, maize or other grain." It is taking power from the Governor in Council to permit an equivalent of the articles which have been exported, to be exported and clear the bond.

Mr. BURPEE. Formerly there were regulations by the Governor in Council allowing so much to be exported at the time the hog was imported as equivalent—I forget the exact weight, but it was not the full weight of the hog imported that was allowed to be exported. This, of course, takes it out of the hands of the Governor in Council.

Mr. BOWELL. No; quite the contrary. It only takes out of the hands of the Governor in Council, and of the Minister, the power of saying that you may export an equivalent of Canadian pork for American, which had been imported for slaughter and for exportation. If my recollection serves me aright, if they exported 70 per cent. of the live weight—or 63 $\frac{1}{2}$ , somewhere between the two, the bond would be cancelled.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The object of this is simply to take away from the Governor in Council a power which he has hitherto exercised, of allowing the export to be an equivalent instead of the actual product. I think it is a mistake to make that a statutory enactment. I can understand how cases may arise in the transportation business, when it might be desirable and sound policy to permit the exportation of the equivalent instead of the actual product. As we have it now, it is left to the Governor in Council, and I am not aware that there is any agitation outside in favor of a change. I am bound to say that in a matter of this kind, it would be very much better to have some elasticity so that the Governor in Council could make any regulation that circumstances at the time might require. To make a statutory enactment of what has hitherto been considered quite sufficient as a regulation, I think to be a mistake.

Mr. BOWELL. I think that is just what we want to prevent. This Committee, and the country, know tolerably well the difficulties that have arisen in the substitution of Canadian wheat for American wheat, and in the substitution for exportation of Canadian flour for American flour; and in many cases, as the old members will remember, we have compelled the payment of a large amount of duty for the violation of this very principle. If there be any case in which an equivalent of the article imported could be substituted for exportation, I would be glad to know it. If it be the opinion of the House that the miller should import American wheat, grind it into flour, then sell that in a Canadian market and export Canadian flour, the product of Canadian wheat, then the House should say so. But I think it is better to prevent difficulties in the future by placing upon the Statute-book the declaration that the product only of that which has been imported and manufactured in bond for exportation should be accepted as a conciliation of the bond.

On section 140,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause extends the right to all classes of fishing vessels to take goods out of bond without payment of duty, and consume the same during their fishing operations; there is an additional clause providing against the re-entering of the goods and the placing of them in general consumption without duty being paid thereon. There is another clause providing for the re-warehousing of the goods which may have been taken from fishing vessels and storing them in warehouses until they go on another voyage. Hon. gentlemen acquainted with the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces will see that it is an extension of the privilege to all classes of fishing vessels, instead of confining the privilege to fishing vessels of fifty tons, as provided by the old law.

On section 142,

Mr. BOWELL. We have found cases of this kind. An American vessel, for instance, will take its clearance, and remain in port for some little time after, then take in tow a schooner, laden or light, as the case may be. That will be an indirect violation of the coasting laws. We have had cases in which penalties have been imposed by collectors, but on reference to the Act we had to refund the fines which had been so imposed. This clause provided for cases of that kind.

On section 153,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause is a slight change from the old law, and relates to the punishment of smuggling. It provides that such parties, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $200; it also provides for imprisonment for a term not less than one month, nor more than one year, and that both fine and imprisonment may be imposed at the discretion of the court. The old law provided for a penalty not to exceed $200 and imprisonment for one year. I think too much discretion should not be left in the hands of some of the magistrates. In one case where there was absolute proof of an attempt to bribe an officer, the magistrate, acting under his discretionary power, fined the offender one dollar and sent him to prison for ten minutes; and that, too, in the case where the proposition was made—and it was proved before the court—to an officer to divide the profits with the smuggler, if the officer, would permit undervaluation, or the entry of the goods without payment of duty, I can account for this action on no other ground than that there is a general opinion among certain persons that to cheat the Customs and the Government is no sin.

On section 156,

Mr. BOWELL. Under the old law, if five persons were found together, and one of them had any smuggled goods on his person, the other four, even though they had no knowledge of the fact, were punishable. Or, if several gentlemen met a gentleman at a railway depot, and the visitor had a smuggled watch in his possession, all of them would be liable to punishment. We have inserted in this clause the words "having knowledge of the fact."

Mr. BURPEE. I see.

Mr. BOWELL. The old law read in this way, and my hon. friend had the honor of placing it on the Statute-book:

"If any five or more persons in company, are found together, and they or any of them have any goods liable to forfeiture under this Act, every such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punishable accordingly."

Rather an extraordinary clause.

On section 160,

Mr. BOWELL. This is a new clause:

"If any person by any contrivance gains access to bonded goods in a railway car, or to goods in a railway car, upon which goods the Customs duties have not been paid, or delivers such bonded or other goods without the express permission of the proper officer of Customs, such persons shall for every such offence be liable to be imprisoned for any period not less than one month nor more than one year."

This is to provide for cases of railway bonded cars, which are not provided for in the old Act. The old Act provided, that if a bonded warehouse be entered illegally or improperly other than by the officer having the key of the bonded warehouse, the proprietor is subject to a fine. It was thought, in the framing of this clause, that this principle should not apply to the railway managers or the owners of conveyances of that kind; but that the person who committed the offence should be the person punished, as this would relieve the Department of the unpleasant duty of stopping railway cars, and entering actions against the railway or other corporations, by making the man who committed the offence the party who should suffer.

On section 176,

Mr. BOWELL. This clause is an important addition to the Act. This is a clause to which I would particularly invite the attention of the Committee. It is well known that there are, on the frontier, many buildings, one portion of which is in the United States and the other portion is in Canada, and that an illicit trade and traffic is carried on in the building. There is not any authority or power in the Customs Law of Canada to interfere with those buildings. In the United States Customs Act provision is made with regard to these buildings, and the clause in this Bill is a modification of the law as it now stands on the Statute-book of the United States. Section 3, 107, of the United States Act is as follows:—

"If any store, warehouse, or other building shall be upon or near the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable merchandise is deposited or has been placed therein, or carried through or into the same without payment of the duty, and in violation of the law, and the collector, deputy collector, naval officer or surveyor of customs, shall make oath before any magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has reason to believe and does believe, that such offence has been therein committed, such officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto; and if any such merchandise shall be found therein, the same, together with such building shall be seized, forfeited and disposed of according to law, and the building shall be forthwith taken down or removed."

Section 3, 108, of the same Act provides that:

Any person who shall have received or deposited in such building upon the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, or carry through the same, any merchandise, or shall have aided therein, in violation of law, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment of not more than two years, or both.

I might mention that the question has repeatedly been brought to the notice of the Government by United States Customs officers, and by others who are interested in the maintenance of the Customs Laws of that country. And I have inserted this clause for the approval or disapproval of the Committee.

"If any building be upon or near the boundary line between Canada and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable goods are deposited or have been placed therein, or carried through or into the same, without payment of duties and in violation of law, and if the collector or proper officer of Customs make oath before any Justice of the Peace that he has reason to believe as aforesaid, such collector or officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto, so far as the same may be within the limits of Canada, and if any such goods be found therein, the same shall be seized and forfeited, and the building, or so much of the same as may be situated within the limits of Canada shall be forthwith taken down or removed."

I cannot, of course, say whether the Committee will think proper to adopt the clause; but I do know that, in administering this law, that where we have a warehouse on the United States side of the line, and a retail department of their business in Canada, we find that Canadians go in to purchase at the retail store, and if they have not the goods they want, they go round to the other door, and that by this means an illicit trade is being carried on continually in those sections of the country. I have noticed in visiting this part of the country where such buildings stand that they are built across the line being partially on one side and partially on the other; and then business is carried on in these buildings. It is almost impossible to prevent that kind of illicit trade going on. I have somewhat modified the American law, and have placed this clause in the Bill for the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. COLBY. I think there can be no objection to the clause so far as it applies to the right of search; but I would state, for the information of the hon. Minister of Customs a fact of which he may not be aware. At the time of the running of the boundary line in connection with the Ashburton Treaty many changes were made on the former frontier. Farms were divided and portions of farms which formerly were in Canada were thrown into the United States, and portion of others from the United States into Canada. The inconvenience caused in this way was rectified in many instances by an interchange of land. There were buildings on the frontier similarly affected. In my own township I recollect three buildings each of which had been used as a retail store, and the running of this line was found quite as inconvenient to the proprietors of those buildings as to the Department of Customs. One of them was abandoned voluntarily by the proprietor; another, a wooden building, was removed entirely into Canada as it was mostly on that side; but the third, which is a permanent granite building, is there now and cannot be removed. It cannot be used properly for any other purpose, and I am sure the Government, if under any pretext they desire to appropriate that building, would feel called upon to indemnify the proprietor, as it was through no fault of his it was situated as the running of the boundary line has defined it.

Mr. BOWELL. What is it used for now?

Mr. COLBY. It is used for a store.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Conducted on strictly temperance principles, I suppose?

Mr. COLBY. I believe so; but I have not been in the cellar recently. There might be, in cases of that kind, occasion for special vigilance on the part of the local officers. There might be occasion for a visitation of that store, and the operation of the inquisitorial part of this clause, to which I do not object; but I apprehend that the hon. Minister would hardly go the length of confiscating that property and rendering it valueless to the owner, without compensation. I speak of buildings of which I have a knowledge, but I have no doubt that along the frontier there may be others of the same description. I am sure that the hon. Minister is not more than half serious in making the proposition, judging by his manner in presenting it.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I think the wording of the first line should be altered. In the cases to which the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) has referred, the buildings were on the boundary line; but I think it would be stretching the law too far to include the buildings "near" the boundary line.

Mr. BOWELL. We will strike out the words "or near."

Mr. SCRIVER. I am glad some effort is being made by the hon. Minister of Customs to reach what is certainly a very great evil on the frontier. I know of no such instance in my own county as those to which the hon. gentleman has referred; but I know that along the frontier for some fifty or sixty miles there are stores which are supposed to be across the line, or about one-half in New York and one-half in the Province of Quebec. In the majority of instances they are places where intoxicating drinks are sold without a license, and they are the cause of great demoralization as well as of great injury to the revenue, by goods being taken from one side to the other without a payment of duty. It is, I acknowledge, a very difficult question. Some years ago I myself called the attention of the then Minister of Justice to the subject, and suggested to him the propriety of having some correspondence with the authorities at Washington, with the view of reaching this evil, if possible. One manner of reaching it, that suggested itself to my mind, was that an arrangement should be entered into between the two Governments—the Dominion Government and the United States Government—participated in by the State Government in the one case, and by the Provincial Government in the other, under which a portion of territory might be reserved, or so affected as to prevent these buildings being erected upon it. Of course, the difficulty of the United States Government and the Dominion Government taking action, would be the danger of interfering with Provincial rights under the constitutions of the respective countries. I am a little afraid, however, that the action proposed by the hon. Minister of Customs will not reach the difficulty. I would not myself object to granting the inquisitorial power which is granted by this Act; I think that may have some effect; but I do not know how the law could be practically carried out. I would ask the hon. Minister of Customs, for instance, if it should be thought desirable, under this Act, to cut a building in two, and take the half in Canada away.

Mr. BOWELL. That is the provision of the clause.

Mr. SCRIVER. And if it becomes law, I would ask whether the hon. Minister thinks it practicable, or profitable, to enforce such a law.

Mr. BOWELL. The American law provides for pulling down the whole building.

Mr. SCRIVER. But I think that amounts to nothing, so far as the part in Canada is concerned.

Mr. COLBY. You must not go away from the boundary line the breadth of a hair.

Mr. SCRIVER. But seriously, I am very much pleased to learn that the attention of the Department has been called to this question, and that the Department is disposed to make some effort to abate what is really a very great evil; and I would commend the Department for attempting to lessen the evils existing under the present system.

Mr. COLBY. I have personal knowledge of a long stretch of the frontier, and I know of only the single instance to which I have referred of a house being built on the boundary line. I happen to know, also, that the occupant of that store is specially and particularly watched by the officers on both sides of the line; and his facilities for smuggling are therefore actually less than those of any other man in the neighborhood, if he were disposed to do it.

Mr. BOWELL. The difficulty of carrying out the law suggested itself when we were framing the clause. I admit that the case put by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) is a very forcible one, and that it is not the fault of the owner of that building that the line was so run, under the Ashburton Treaty, as to cut his house in two. But if he imports improperly he should be punished.

Mr. COLBY. The proprietor of the building is not a trader. It is a store, not for illicit purposes, but for proper purposes.

Mr. BOWELL. I would suggest that the Committee accept the modification of the clause proposed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee), and strike out the words "or near the boundary line," and strike out after the word "forfeited," the words: "and the building, or so much of the same as may be situated within the limits of Canada, shall be forthwith taken down or removed," and substitute these words: "and any merchant or person who shall be guilty of a violation of the provision of this clause, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200, or more than $1,000. We would thus be punishing the merchant and not the owner of the property. In case this change is made, the words "or near the boundary line," might be left in.

Mr. BURPEE. If you really want to put a stop to this evil, you should not allow any person to do business in a building on the boundary line. It might be used for other purposes, and the person who occupies it does so because it is a matter of convenience. These buildings should be torn down.

Mr. COLBY. Surely my hon. friend would not suggest that that should be done without indemnity. That building was built in good faith, and by the Ashburton Treaty the line runs through it. Surely that property could not be destroyed without adequate compensation being given. It cannot be used for any other purpose than it is used for now; and if it is contrary to the interest of the Dominion, or of the United States, that it should be used for the purpose for which it was constructed, it should be expropriated and the owner indemnified. Do not place him in the position of losing his property when he is in no way responsible for the condition of affairs under which it is objected to. I am wholly in accord with the hon. member for St. John in that opinion, if we could practically carry it out. If we were to declare by law that no business of that kind should be carried on in a building such as that to which he has referred, the question of indemnity would at once come in. Perhaps the better way would be if the Committee would accept the suggestion I have made. We make these clauses only applicable to the more grave cases of smuggling carried on in a building that crosses the line.

On section 177,

Mr. BOWELL. This just changes the mode of obtaining a writ of assistance by an officer of Customs. Under the old law it had to be obtained from the Admiralty Court and other courts only which applied to the Province in which granted. This gives the power to the Exchequer Court to grant writs of assistance which shall have authority over the Dominion.

On section 180,

Mr. BOWELL. This is to provide for the searching of people who walk across the line, and may have their pockets full of smuggled goods.

On section 182,

Mr. BOWELL. The changes are not material; simply the words "or property or vehicle," are added. These words are fully explained in the interpretation clause.

On section 183,

Mr. BOWELL. The same words are added.

On section 186,

Mr. BOWELL. The word "vehicle" is added.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Great North Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria,

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited)—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

THE GRANGE TRUST (LIMITED).

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell), in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Grange Trust, limited, said: I have just heard, from two or three of my hon. friends, that there is an impression that the Bill has something to do with a secret society. I may say that the Grangers are one body; they were incorporated here two years ago; and I did not know, until a debate occurred the other day in this House, that they are a secret society, but I believe they are. This is an entirely different thing. It is an ordinary loan company which has simply taken this name, and is incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Act of the Province of Ontario, and it desires to extend its powers to the rest of the Dominion. It has passed through the Banking and Commerce Committee with a great deal of care, having been referred to a Special Committee, and received the approval in its present form of the hon. Finance Minister.

Mr. ROSS. I do not propose to oppose the Bill; but I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in many of its provisions it seems to be beyond our powers, and comes more properly within the sphere of local legislation. I think it is high time that some system were devised by which some control should be had over all Bills, especially Private Bills, about which there may be a doubt as to the competency of this Parliament to deal with them. I would suggest to all the hon. members of this House, that if we devised some means of controlling these Bills it should be of great service, not only to the community in general, but to the parties who seek incorporation. We render them no service in incorporating them illegally, and if the question were raised in a court of justice as to the constitutionality of their powers they would run considerable risk of seeing their charter repealed.

Bill considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. BERGERON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 105) for granting certain powers to the Canadian Electric Light Company, said: The company seeking the passage of this Bill do not want new powers; all the powers required have been already granted them by the Local Legislature of Quebec. The only reason that brings them here is to have certain questions regarding navigable streams settled by this Parliament. The right to dam navigable rivers was granted them by the Local Legislature. It appears, however, that there is a conflict between local and federal jurisdiction respecting navigable rivers, and the company have taken the same steps as did the Richelieu Hydraulic Company and Lachine Hydraulic Company, which came here and asked Parliament to say which were non-navigable and which were navigable rivers. There is a provision in this Bill which says that if at any time the company want to dam a navigable river they must deposit plans in the office of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and do nothing until permission has been given them by the Governor in Council. This is the whole intention of the Bill, of which I now move the second reading.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it a fact that this is one of the particular powers asked for by the company last year, and which was struck out of the Bill?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think so. I think this is the first time the Bill has been introduced here. The company was incorporated in the Province of Quebec last year.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The company applied to this Parliament last year for legislation, and some of the provisions in the Bill were struck out when it came before the Private Bills Committee; and this very power which the company now seek to obtain was one of the powers refused them last Session. I am not disposed, however, to oppose the reference of the Bill to the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. BERGERON. The company was incorporated by the Quebec Legislature in 1881. I do not think they came here last year. This Bill is, however, printed, and can be sent to the Private Bills Committee, and when it comes up for the third reading the House can pass it, or not.

Bill read the second time.

CUSTOMS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Customs.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 204,

Mr. BOWELL. This merely relates to deposits. The latter portion is as follows:—

“And any sum or sums of money so deposited shall be immediately deposited in some bank appointed for that purpose by competent authority, to credit of Receiver-General of Canada, there to remain until forfeited in due course of law or released by order of the Minister of Customs; and in case such seized articles are condemned, the money deposited shall be forfeited.”

It has been the practice of some officers, who have imposed fines, to keep the money themselves in their own pockets, and, in some cases, it has been lost; and this clause provides that it shall be deposited to the credit of the Receiver-General.

On section 242,

Mr. PATERSON (Biant). As this clause does not give the hon. Minister power enough to make regulations such as will enable many manufacturers who are exporting to foreign countries to get the benefit of this drawback, I would suggest that he take power enough in this clause to deal with the cases he has found a difficulty to deal with. That might be done by adding after the word “drawback,” in the last line but one, the words: “or a certain specific sum in lieu thereof.”

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to that.

On section 87,

Mr. BURPEE. This clause reads towards the end “where the goods are shipped or before a Notary Public, and at any other place before a British or foreign consul.” I propose to change that by making it read: “before a British consul, or, if there be no British consul, before a foreign consul.” My object is to insist on the oath being taken before the British consul when there is one.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 89) respecting certificates to masters and mates of inland and coasting ships.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. On a previous occasion I drew the attention of the hon. Minister to the effect this Bill would have on the persons employed in the coasting trade. I may say that since the Bill was introduced, I have received communications from New Brunswick from a number of parties that have fortified the position I then took. I think there can be no objection to the hon. Minister increasing his proposed limit to vessels of 150 tons instead of 100 tons. Vessels employed in the coasting trade, as I pointed out on a previous occasion, are usually navigated by persons who are not strictly speaking seamen; that is, they have not gone through a course of training in navigation, but are nevertheless quite capable of performing entire voyages from the Bay of Fundy to the coast of the United States down as far as Baltimore. Now, many of these persons are owners or part owners of schooners; they are men who were probably farmers or fishermen, but by navigating these vessels they have obtained a practical knowledge of the coast, a practical knowledge of the trade. They are perfectly familiar with the coast and harbors, and any person who will take the trouble to examine the coast from St. Croix to New York will see that it is lined with harbors, and those parties are conversant with all the harbors, with tides, are familiar with the fogs, and, in fact, are more capable, from actual experience, of navigating those vessels than men who have been trained in a nautical school. It was contended that the wood boats, which are peculiar to the St. John river, and the schooners employed in the coasting trade, were under 100 tons. I hoped, before this Bill was brought up, to have had the exact number that are over 100 tons. I believe a very large proportion of the vessels now employed are above that tonnage, and the result will be that a great many persons who are perfectly competent, and who would be more trusted by the managing owners of the vessels than men who have passed an examination, will be thrown out of employment, and serious injury will be done to the trade before competent men can be found to take their places. As I said before, they are perfectly familiar with the tides, current and fogs along the coast, and as a general rule these coasters go along in perfect safety on account of the experience of the men who navigate them. Many of these men come from the counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, and others have for the most part been engaged in farming or fishing, and they have subsequently engaged in navigating these schooners in the carrying trade between the United States and the Maritime Provinces; and, from a long experience, they become even more competent than those who are reported to be able to take ships across the Atlantic. These vessels are sometimes sent across the Atlantic and to the West Indies, and then a different master is placed in them; but for the coasting trade these men are employed, and have been found most efficient. Besides, they carry on trade to the advantage of themselves and their co-owners. It is a very important trade, and it is well known that the coasting trade between the Provinces and the United States is very large indeed, and employs a large number of small vessels ranging from 60 to nearly 200 tons. A large number of them are above 100 tons, and really if the principle which the hon. gentlemen lays down applies to vessels of 100 tons, it is equally applicable to vessels under 100 tons. Now, the qualifications required in masters and mates for the purpose of navigating vessels across the Atlantic are totally different from those required in the schooners which are trading between our coasts and the United States. I do think that if this Bill is passed in its present shape, it will work serious injury to that trade—a trade on which a large number of people of our Province are dependent, not only those of the Bay of Fundy, but a large number engaged on the River St. John. The wood boats are of a peculiar class, and are used on the River St. John from their adaptability to carry large cargoes of lumber, for which they are largely used during the summer months. I find, from reports I have received from men who are conversant with this trade in the city of St. John, that if this Bill passes in its present shape, it will be a serious injury to them, and will largely cripple the trade that is going on. It will throw a large number of men out of employment who are perfectly competent, and there will be great difficulty in getting men to replace them. If they are obliged to take a higher class of men who are employed in the foreign trade, they will necessarily be obliged to pay higher wages. Therefore, I ask the hon. Minister, so far as the coasting trade is concerned, to increase the limit.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. member has stated that the coasting trade is one of very great importance. So it is, and, therefore, there is more necessity that the men who command the vessels engaged in that trade should possess the qualifications necessary to discharge their duties. In every other occupation of life, especially where the safety of life and property is involved, we call upon men, who are to occupy such positions, to show that they have the qualifications required to discharge the duties devolving upon them. It is not intended by this Bill that all the men shall have qualifications to take a ship across the ocean. All we ask in the Bill is, that it shall be ascertained that they possess the necessary qualifications to discharge the special duties devolving upon them. If they coast between St. John and Boston, or St. John and New York, they shall possess qualifications necessary to take charge of vessels upon such voyages, that they shall have the skill necessary to protect the lives of men and the property under their control. So it is, if they are engaged in the river trade. All that would be necessary in that case is that they shall have the knowledge of a pilot. In regard to the lakes, certain other qualifications will be required, and certificates will specify the competency of the men for the particular trade in which they are engaged. As regards the coasting trade, the hon. member for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon) has stated that there are a great many excellent men engaged in the coasting trade, and that the trade has been very successful. But if we look at the wreck register for the last twelve years we will find there has been an alarming loss of life and property to schooners and the smaller class of sailing craft. For a period of twelve years, from 1870 to 1882, there were 2,122 schooners engaged in the inland and coasting trade, wrecked or lost.

Mr. WELDON. How many in the coasting trade?

Mr. McLELAN. 1,804 suffered wreck or mishap. The hon. gentleman will see, with this large number of wrecks occurring in this comparative short period, the necessity of having men in command who possess the necessary qualifications. I think it is incumbent on the House to take such steps to guard against men commanding vessels and risking life and property without having the necessary qualifications. The hon. gentleman has said there are many good men; and it is not proposed to deprive them of their profession as masters and mates. Instructions were given to the draughtsman, that in preparing the Bill he should provide for certificates of proficiency and service as masters and mates; and I have ascertained that this has not been done, more especially in the English print of the Bill, but that some alteration is made in the French; and, in order to make the matter clear, I propose to insert the following clause as clause six:

"Certificates of service for ships trading on the inland waters of Canada or on coasting voyages, differing in form from certificates of competency, may be granted as follows:—

"1. Every person who, before the first day of January, A. D., 1882, served as master on a ship trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, or a British subject serving in foreign vessels in like trade, and who has produced satisfactory evidence at such examination of his sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct on board ship, shall be entitled to a certificate of service as master for ships trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, on payment of a fee of $4.

"2. Every person who, before the first day of January, 1882, served as mate in a ship trading on the inland waters of Canada, or a British subject serving in foreign vessels of like trade, and who has produced satisfactory evidence in manner aforesaid of his sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct on board ship, shall be entitled to a certificate of service as first or only mate for ships trading on the inland waters of Canada, or upon coasting voyages, on payment of a fee of $2."

That provides that all men, who, before the 1st of January, 1882, were masters and mates of vessels, and are able to show evidence of good conduct, shall receive certificates of service; just as now, there are a large number of men navigating ships abroad who have certificates of service, obtained in a similar way, because previous to 1871 they were masters and mates, and were continued. I think this clause, and the explanation I have given, will meet all the objections raised by the hon. member for the city and county of St. John. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blako) spoke the other night of the qualifications necessary. It is rather difficult for me to say what nautical men would lay down as necessary qualifications; but I suppose the first step would be to limit the age so as to insure that the officer possessed mature judgment. In examinations for competency the age would be fixed at about 22 or 23 years; he will be examined, among other subjects, in the various resources for the protection of the vessel and passengers in case of wreck; the shipping, managing and discharge of crew; the entries to be made in the official log book, and with the soundings and leading lights on the route he is going to use; and with the harbors of refuge, and anchorage thereon; and in addition, he shall have some knowledge of the machinery of the vessel, and shall understand measurements, and be thoroughly conversant with the rules of the road. This knowledge of the use and management of the hawser and rocket in the case of the stranding of a vessel; how to manage a vessel in stormy weather, to make and take in and reef sails, &c., he is only to possess the necessary qualifications and knowledge for the special service on which he is employed; and if he is off the coast, from St. John to Boston or New York—to which the hon. member for St. John referred—he should possess more knowledge of seamanship than if he was only navigating the river St. John.

Mr. COCKBURN. I do not rise to object to the general provisions of the Bill, I may say that some of the explanations given by the hon. member, which are not contained in the Bill, are satisfactory to my mind. I wish it to be clearly impressed on the hon. gentleman that as he proposes to extend the provisions of the act to inland waters, and all vessels, tugs, &c.; that it is necessary to guard against injustice to vested interests, and parties who are already entrusted with the command of vessels. I trust that in the clause he proposes to add he will make one provision for the different grades of examination; for instance, we have men well qualified to manage vessels, who have not had a scientific training, and the advantages of education, and who, perhaps, cannot now acquire knowledge of the management of vessels on scientific principles. We have a large class of men in the inland waters who have had the best sort of training for the routes on which they are, from experience and good sound sense. I trust, therefore, that in framing the regulations for the guidance of examiners, full provision will be made for persons of the class to which I refer. I think that the fee of $8 is pretty large, and it is more than engineers on steamers have to pay; and I do not see why masters and mates should pay a higher fee than engineers, who when their fee was raised to $5 complained very loudly. With still greater reason will complaint be made if this fee is raised to $8; the engineer's fee was formerly, for the renewal of certificates, $2, and $5 for a raise or promotion. I have no objection to the Bill if the provision I speak of is intended to secure the rights of these men who have risen from before the mast. I have in my mind vast numbers of them, and it is the interests chiefly of this class that I seek to impress on the attention of the hon. Minister and of the House. Of course, different qualifications are required on the larger lakes and on the Atlantic; but I speak particularly of the inland routes, where these parties do not require such qualifications.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I am not opposed to the principle of the Bill now before the House, because I believe we should give to insurers and forwarders a guarantee that the men who pilot their vessels on the rivers and lakes should be duly qualified for this business. But I deem it my duty to oppose this part of the Bill which refers to the examinations required from captains and mates, and as to the tonnage of the vessels. I hoped when the Bill was introduced that the hon. Minister would modify it, and that he would exempt vessels under 200 tons from the effects of this law. I mean then that the law should only apply to vessels of over 200 tons. It is a well-known fact to all engaged in navigation that the St. Lawrence route from Quebec to Montreal has been rendered easy by the large number of buoys placed on the river in dangerous parts and by the great number of lighthouses located on each side of the river. With a little experience under a captain or pilot, a person can easily, and without danger steer a vessel under 130 tons. It may be expected, that if the route is easy, the examinations will be so likewise, and, consequently, that there can be no objection to the law which exacts these examinations. To illustrate, it seems to me, for instance, an inconvenience which should not exist, and yet which must exist under the present law, viz.: when men duly qualified in every respect will be systematically rejected by the board of examiners for the slightest reason or most trivial pretext, to prevent competition and diminish the number of captains, as is the custom at nearly every board of examiners, whether for pilotage or for some other reason. Serious abuses will result from this law, which will compel its repeal hereafter if the hon. Minister does not withdraw it now. I observe also that the hon. Minister obliges such candidates to pay $3 for captains' certificates and $5 for mates'. This sum would be small for pilots, whose salaries are high; but it will be a heavy charge if we only consider the small revenues derived from ordinary navigation. For several years back one might suppose that the special object of legislation was not only to favor large ships, but also to make disappear the market navigation on which so many families in the Province of Quebec are dependent. It is a fact that at the port of Montreal the duties imposed on small vessels pays for the dredging of Lake St. Peter and other lakes which are of no use to them, and which are even a burden on them in reducing their revenues. By a clause of chap. 43, 45 Vic., they are deprived of the free passage of the St. Lawrence channel. But that is not all. The House, to-day, is asked to pass a law which will prove a considerable burden to ordinary navigation, and which will have a tendency to materially injure it. I see that the hon. member from Montmagny (Mr. Landry) approves of what I say. I am convinced he has sufficient influence in the House to assist me in the demand I am now preferring. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, deem it my duty to oppose the purport of this Bill which has relation to tonnage, and I ask the hon. Minister of Marine to substitute the words 260 tons for the words 100 tons.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow the observations of the hon. member from Portneuf to pass unanswered, inasmuch as my hon. colleague the Minister of Marine understands English better than French. I will, therefore, make a few remarks on the observations which he has just made to the House and which have reference to vessels of over 200 tons, in reference to which the hon. member has just spoken. If I am correctly informed, the difference or the exception which is made by the Bill introduced by the Minister of Marine is for vessels of 100 tons, not for 200-ton vessels. But I am informed that those of 100 tons are equal in capacity to those of 175 tons, and that consequently it suffices to exempt the small vessels, which must necessarily be so by the law introduced by the hon. Minister. I am convinced that the hon. member from Portneuf, after having duly weighed the observations which I am making, will see that the exemption of 100-ton vessels will be sufficient to safeguard the craft navigation. Moreover, he is in error if he supposes that the sum of $3, which is required of captains, and the sum of $5 from mates, is to be an annual payment; it is a final one. When the captain or mate has obtained his certificate, it will serve him for life. Consequently, the objection raised by the hon. member has not much force; as after all this is but a small sum of money, and, moreover, it will enable a captain or mate of a vessel to obtain a certificate which will last him for life without obliging him to undergo any further examination. The other objection has reference to the channels. The Bill which was introduced, and which is now law, was modified in deference to the Harbor Commission in Montreal. I believe that the hon. member was not in the House at that epoch. By that law it is declared that certain parts of the channel between Montreal and Quebec would be exclusively reserved for large sailing vessels and steamships, and that in the five or six dangerous points the smaller vessels, as well as the rafts, would be obliged to take the side channel in order to leave the principal channel for the larger vessels, as the channel is narrow at these places. When a sea-going vessel or large steamboat, or a large sailing vessel, passes in this channel—and many pass every day—it would be dangerous for navigation to permit on such occasions rafts of timber or small vessels to place themselves in the same route with the large vessels. But the Legislature had the foresight to say, that if, by the force of the current or other circumstances independent of the will of the captain or mate, or by reason of a tempest, the small vessels or rafts were driven into the channel, they would not be visited with any punishment and the law would not affect them. These small vessels as well as the rafts can pass by the principal channel, as well as the large vessels, and I am convinced that in practice, when no large steamships or sailing vessels are in sight that the small vessels or those who are running rafts of timber will always find that the current is strong enough to force them to pass in the deep channel, so that in reality the hon. member will see that no inconveniences are to be apprehended. No petition has been presented to Parliament or to the Government on this question. I hope, therefore that after the explanations which I have just made, that the hon. member will not insist on the amendments which he suggests.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation). In view of the fact that I represent a county in which there are a large number of seamen, I made enquiries relative to the Bill now before the House. After having obtained the necessary information I must say I entirely concur in the views of the hon. member from Portneuf (Mr. De St. Georges), and I think that the Bill will meet with the approbation of mariners and of the members of this House if the hon. Minister of Marine will substitute the words 200 tons for the words 100 tons. The hon. Minister of Public Works said that vessels reported at 100 tons really represented 175 tons. Everyone knows that; but 175 tons is not sufficient, and the law must necessarily be changed on this point. As for the fee to be paid on passing the examinations, I think it would be very desirable to reduce it if possible. The hon. Minister of Public Works has misunderstood the hon. member from Portneuf, when he supposed he was speaking of an annual fee of $8. The hon. member said it was a final payment, but that this fee was too high, especially if it applied to vessels of less than 100 tons. I think, however, that this fee of $8 might be retained if it is not to apply to captains of vessels of 200 tons, and if, notwithstanding the law is adopted as it stands, it would be right to reduce the amount which those who pass examinations for pilots or mates have to pass. I have no further observations to make in reference to the Bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). One of the objections which I have to this Bill, relates to the fee of $5, which it is proposed to place on the certificates, which these men are to receive, if they have been captains before the 1st of January, 1883. I think that this fee should be merely nominal, not more than $1, as I see no reason why they should be taxed for their certificates. Again, the hon. Minister may be aware, that as far as the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned, an effort is now being made to invest a large amount of capital in the fishing industry; and some vessels of a large size are to be employed in it; an effort is also being made to secure the services of Nova Scotians, who for years past have been engaged, as the hon. gentleman knows, most successfully on the Nova Scotian coast and on the banks of Newfoundland, but as masters of American fishing vessels. I wish, if possible, to have added a clause providing that men who are Nova Scotians or Canadians and the masters of American fishing vessels prior to this date, shall be included in the exceptions. I think that this would be an inducement to them perhaps to take command of our vessels; and many of these men are well qualified, although not able to pass the somewhat rigid examination which the hon. gentleman proposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. When this Bill was introduced and the explanations were made by the hon. Minister, I pointed out the difficulty which would arise if my hon. friend did not add an amendment by which a class of persons who had been in the service for some time, and were not the masters and mates of vessels of the class to which the Bill referred, and who could not undergo examination owing, perhaps, to the want of scientific information, should be excepted; and I am glad to say that the hon. gentleman has adopted my suggestion and provided for this class. To my mind, that was the only real difficulty in connection with the Bill. The hon. gentleman from St. John has spoken of another, the limitation of size; but I think that if the hon. gentleman relaxes it to 150 instead of 200 tons—which would not quite come to what the hon. gentleman wishes—this would fully cover what the hon. Minister aims at; by introducing this measure, which is a good one; there is no question about that, and the moment that the hon. member adopted the suggestions of myself and of other members of the House, he added very much to the popularity which the Bill will create, and to the justice which it will impart to a class of men who otherwise would not be benefitted by it. As regards the fees, I must say, I think that the objection taken as to the extent of the fees has some foundation. The class of people who would be covered by these certificates appears to me one which, particularly, ought not to pay the amount of fees provided. I would suggest whether it would not be well to consider these two points, first the limitation of tonnage to the extent of 150 instead of 100 tons, and the reducing of the fees to such an extent as might relieve that class of people. They are a class who suffer a great deal, work hard, generally have large families and are not specially protected by the National Policy; and I think, that taking all these circumstances into consideration, and looking at the way in which this Bill has been received by the House, and the general feeling of satisfaction shown on account of the remedy which is proposed by it to protect this country, and the greater security which it is going to extend to that class of people, the hon. gentleman would do well to accept the suggestions made with the view of trying to give this Bill greater popularity even than it will possess, if it be passed, as it is. I have nothing further to say, save that I hope that the hon. Minister will accept the suggestions made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I will be pleased to see the measure pass, as I trust it will, with those amendments.

Mr. DAWSON. I agree with the remarks of preceding speakers with regard to this Bill, and more especially with those of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on the other side of the House, that it is a step in the right direction, and I shall have great pleasure in supporting it. There is no part of the country where such a Bill as this is more needed than in the very extensive district which I represent, where there is such a large extent of inland navigation. My purpose in rising was to ask the Minister whether it is his intention to bring down a supplementary measure to this with reference to the navigation of our inland waters?

Mr. GILLMOR. From my experience of the coasting trade I am inclined to believe that many of the vessels which suffer from these casualties are less than 100 tons. I am well acquainted with the masters, mates and crews of such vessels, and I have never heard any expression of opinion from them that such a Bill was necessary; but, of course, if it is going to have the effect of protecting life and property it would be for the public benefit, and I should be sorry to oppose its passage. It will, however, be attended with a good deal of expense, because, although the fee is fixed at $5, the real expense will be in many cases $20 and more. This board of examiners, I presume, will sit in St. John, and those who apply for certificates will have to lose their time, and pay travelling and other expenses. I am somewhat surprised at the number of casualties which the hon. Minister of Marine reported; but I am sure he has looked into the matter, and he feels it to be in the public interest that the Bill should be passed. I had thought that the owners of vessels and the commanders and crews were pretty good judges of these things, and I cannot see that this Bill is going to be much of an improvement. The board of examiners will require, of course, to be as well acquainted with the qualifications necessary as those who are to be examined, and I am not quite satisfied that the public interests will be very much served in this matter or that the Bill will be received with very much favor. The owners of vessels are usually well acquainted with the qualifications of the master and the men, while the men are equally familiar with the qualifications of the master and the mate, and as passengers rarely go by these boats this would seem to be a sufficient guarantee of safety, because the crews will not venture their lives unless they are satisfied with the qualifications of the officers. However, it is possible that the examinations will result in making the men more particular in the discharge of their duties. I would, however, call the hon. Minister's attention to the size of the vessel, because I do not believe that there are 10 per cent. of the coasting vessels which are as large as 125 tons. I hope that he will also make the fee as moderate as possible, as it seems to be a pretty large one.

Mr. LISTER. Representing as I do a county in which there are a great many seafaring men, I take the liberty of expressing my views on the Bill. My hon. friend from Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) must remember that there are other places in which sailors live, besides the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and my own opinion is that the Bill, with the amendment which has just been proposed, will meet with a very hearty approval by late captains and sailors. I would, however, repeat what has already been stated by others, that I think that the fee exacted for these certificates is far too large. The men who will be affected by this Bill are not, as a rule, too well paid. They are subject to a great many exposures; they usually have large families to keep, and they are only employed during portions of the year. I think the fee that this Bill proposed to exact from those men is rather high, and I do hope that the hon. Minister, in the interest of sailors on the inland waters of this country, will find himself able to reduce the fee to a nominal sum. I would also call his attention to another thing. I believe the tonnage of vessels is limited to 100 tons; vessels under that tonnage are not required to have a master holding a certificate. That regulation may answer on the sea coast, but on the inland waters, the captain of a vessel of 50 tons and upwards should be obliged to hold a certificate. Vessels of 100 tons and upwards are used largely on our inland waters for carrying passengers; and for the protection of the lives of the people who may travel on these vessels, I think the hon. Minister might see his way to adopt this suggestion. I believe the Bill, even in its present shape, will meet with general approval among the captains and sailors on the inland waters of the country. It is a measure they have long been asking for, and during the short time I have had the honor of a seat in this House, I have received repeated communications from people interested in shipping asking me to urge upon the Government the passage of such a Bill.

Mr. BAKER. I have listened with much interest to the various observations that have been made on this subject. This being a subject of which I know something, having been nineteen years at sea myself, and having passed all the examinations required at Trinity House for a master mariner, it may be that I know what master mariners and ship owners require, and I must say that I am exceedingly pleased that this Bill has been introduced by the hon. Minister of Marine. I do think the time has arrived when not only passenger traffic should be looked after, but also when provision should be made for the protection of those masters who have taken the trouble to pass examinations and to otherwise fit themselves in their younger days for their positions. Objection has been taken to the amount of the examination fee. I do not think it is any too high. If any man is anxious to pass an examination and obtain a certificate, he knows it is attended with a certain amount of expense, and if he is really serious in passing the examination to fit himself for a better sphere in life, he will be very willing not only to take the trouble necessary to pass the examination, but to pay the fee attached thereto. Objection has also been taken to the tonnage, that the limit of 100 tons is too high. Now, I know that as much care and caution are required to navigate a vessel of small tonnage as one of large tonnage; in fact, the facilities for navigation on board a large vessel are greater than those on board a small one. But after the assurances of the hon. Minister of Marine that the rights of both masters and mates will be protected I have no objection to offer to any clause in the Bill. I would suggest, however, that when the code of rules and regulations for the guidance of the examiners shall be framed, provision should be made that only British subjects shall be allowed to hold these certificates, the same as is now in force with reference to pilots for the Dominion; and also that great care should be exercised in the selection of the Board of Examiners. With these few remarks, I have very great pleasure in assisting the passage of this Bill.

Mr. PLATT. The Bill under the consideration of the House has very much in it to commend itself to the public. It has been very truly said that the effect of the explanations and the additional clause has been to remove the objections that some Members made to the Bill when it was introduced. I am not sure, however, that the mariners of the lakes will be entirely satisfied with the Bill, unless it more definitely lays down the character of the examinations, and pays some regard to the character of examiners themselves. I suppose this is a matter that must be left in the hands of the Department; but the greatest fear that I have heard expressed by the masters and sailors of vessels on our inland waters is, that the examiners may be taken from the Maritime Provinces, and may not be fully acquainted with the navigation of vessels on the inland waters. I trust that the regulations to be made by the hon. Minister of Marine, with reference to the examinations, will have a tendency to relieve their anxiety in this respect. There is also some anxiety as to whether the certificate will be granted for particular lakes or particular routes. As I understand the hon. Minister, such is his intention. We know that the greatest number of disasters which have occurred to vessels in inland waters have not occurred to those that sail upon a single lake. The smaller class of vessels that sail on Lake Ontario are not very often visited with disasters. The records of Lake Ontario, at any rate, will show that by far the largest number of disasters occur to vessels which come from the upper lakes—vessels that come from Chicago, and are commanded by masters who know nothing of Lake Ontario; and the mariners on that lake, think that no vessel, clearing from the port of Chicago or some other port on the upper lakes should be allowed to pass through Lake Ontario without taking on board a pilot or master who knows that particular lake. Then there is a large class of sailors who know Lake Ontario very well, and who are sometimes called to take a vessel through to Chicago. With regard to the limit of tonnage which the hon. Minister has fixed, there seems to be a difference of opinion. Either myself or the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) fails to comprehend the import of this Bill. I think it would be much more satisfactory to the sailors of the inland waters to have the limit increased to 125 or 150 tons, rather than decreased. With regard to passengers, I am not aware that sailing vessels of any description on the inland waters are in the habit of carrying passengers, and there is no objection taken to the Bill in so far as it affects the carrying of passengers by steamers. So far as this inland trade is concerned vessels below 100 tons, and a great many below 150 tons, confine their voyages to a single lake and have captains who thoroughly understand the navigation of those particular lakes. I am satisfied that, inasmuch as lives of passengers are not endangered by those small sailing crafts engaged on particular lakes, there is not the same necessity that these captains should have registered masters' certificates as there is with reference to the larger crafts. I entirely agree with the recommendation from hon. members on both sides that the hon. Minister should see his way to reduce, if not to abolish the fees of $5 and $8 imposed on masters and mates who come up for examination. I do not see why these men, who wish to carry on a particular branch, should be charged a fee for procuring a certificate. Another objection is that the examination will be a written one. There are men on those lakes who know perfectly well every shoal and rock, who have for years navigated these lakes successfully and on an oral examination would be able to give most satisfactory proof of their competency, but who would be incompetent to stand a lengthy written examination. I hope the hon. Minister will see that the written examination will be very elementary in character, and I trust he will see his way clear to make the amendment suggested.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I have only a few remarks to make on the subject now under discussion in the House. I have no intention of extolling the merits of the Bill now under consideration. The general approval expressed in reference to the law, renders it unnecessary for me to make anything like a careful study of the measure. But as my name was introduced a few moments ago into the discussion, I think it my duty under the circumstances to raise my voice and ask for a class of individuals whom this projected law concerns, a protection which I do not find in the law as now presented. It is proposed to-day to subject to examination an entire class who have certain acquired rights, or at least if they are not to be subjected to examination, it is indispensable that these captains of vessels apply to the hon. Minister of Marine and obtain from his Department a certificate for which they will have to pay the sum of $5 or $8 as the case may be. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the Government should go so far. I can understand that the Government may desire to improve the qualifications of captains, that is all right; but I do not think, under the present circumstances, that he ought to ask these old mariners who have passed their lives on the St. Lawrence, who understand all the dangers and risks of navigation—he should not require them to pay a fee of $5 or $8 as a guarantee that they shall remember these things for the future. The skill of these mariners is well known. They have sailed on the river a long time; they know to perfection every shoal, and on this account they should not be obliged to pay anything for a certificate. Let the law apply to those who in the future may wish to embrace this avocation. I am ready to admit this, but let us not exact from the captains a certificate which will have the effect of extorting from them $8 or $5. What will be the result if this law is adopted? Many of these captains might be unwilling to pass these examinations, and if they continue to navigate they may, later on, be exposed to pay heavy fines. I know that this is not a very strong reason to offer to the present law, but I point it out as one of the inconveniences which may result from it. I believe that the best suggestion which can be made, or if the expression may be more agreeable, that the best justice which we can ask from the Government, is not to declare by this law that those who have for a long time been engaged in navigation, should not be subjected to what I may call such Draconian restrictions. I therefore think that the Government might issue certificates to all captains who have served two or three years without compelling them to pay a fee. The Government might limit a time, and when that time has expired, captains of vessels who would not wish to avail themselves of the previous disposition of the Government, that then the Government might impose a fine for the granting of captains' certificates.

Mr. PAINT. I am glad the hon. Minister of Marine has introduced this Bill. As regards the fees of masters and mates, I consider they might be placed at $3 and $6. If it be considered necessary that the age of the master commencing should be recognized to be not less than twenty-two years, it is, I think, more requisite it should be limited to say sixty or sixty-five years, as many vessels are lost through the incapacity of an aged master; and many of these men go to sea when they are far advanced in years. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Shelburne say there was a prospect of a large increase in the shipping in that direction. The other day when I asked the hon. gentleman in regard to this matter, his memory failed him. He replied to me that there were possibly two vessels being built along the coast in the county of Shelburne, and I think he included Yarmouth. After a while he said there might be three, and after a little while more, he said there might be four or five. I telegraphed and made other special enquiries, and found there were ten being built at Yarmouth, fifteen at Shelburne, and thirty in Lunenburg. The hon. member was afraid the bounty might exert some good in that direction. I assure you the bounty has benefited that industry very much. I trust that the recommendation of the hon. member for Victoria will be adopted, that is, that the certificates be granted only to British subjects.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). The hon. gentleman certainly misunderstood me. I have no recollection of his having put any such enquiries to me, and am prepared to give him the fullest information in my possession in connection with that matter. I will say there are at least sixty vessels being built between Westport and Lunenburg, but I take a different view from the hon. gentleman as to the cause of this activity, and attribute it to the very prosperous fishing season of last year. The bounty has had no effect at all. There is only one county in which it has yet been paid.

Mr. PAINT. More than one.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Only within a day or two, then. There is hardly a member from Nova Scotia who does not receive letters from fishermen asking when the bounty will be paid. The bounty is only a small matter and has no effect at all on the trade.

Mr. PAINT. It is the $2 per ton I contend that has stimulated this industry.

Mr. FORTIN. If I understand this Act thoroughly fishing vessels are included in it. I do not object to that, but it seems pretty hard that the captain of a fishing vessel, who has been coasting and carrying on his trade for thirty or forty years and is perfect in his calling, should have to come for examination before persons who may not be as well up in the business as he. I object to that, but I believe that young sailors should pass an examination to obtain certificates as mates and after several years service pass an examination to obtain masters' certificates, and should pay fees, but I think those which the Government exact are too high on account of the small salaries these men earn. It would be hard to exact, from old captains and skippers, who have been twenty or thirty years at sea and know every part of our coast, a certificate as to capacity; a certificate as to character would be all right, but they should not be made to pay fees. I am in favor of the Bill as regards young men, because it will have the effect of training up a class of men who would be useful in any country and would be especially useful in this. Of course the class of men that are going to be subjected to this examination are not scientific men, and they do not need to be, because the men who navigate our gulfs and lakes are simply pilots. When a pilot, who navigates from land to land, approaches the land he must trust his eye more than his compass and more than his calculations. I have only to say that I approve the Bill except that I find that the fees are too high.

Mr. McLELAN. I am pleased to find that the Bill meets with such general approval by the House. It is evident that the country demanded some such Bill as I am now attempting to have passed. If the Bill has any fault, it is that the class of schooners of 100 tons is too large. The hon. gentleman from Queens, New Brunswick, has said that there are a very large proportion of schooners employed in the coasting trade, and as I have shown that the casualties are largely in excess in the coasting trade, and that a large proportion of schooners are less than 100 tons. But, looking at the Dominion, and the trade and variety of interests concerned, we thought 100 tons was as low as it was advisable to go at first. If the House would fix that limit, when we get this in operation, and get that class of vessels supplied with masters and mates, then perhaps the public would call upon us to go still lower and provide less tonnage. I mentioned to the House, I think, that for twelve years there have been 2,122 casualties to schooners alone, and there have been 735 lives lost from schooners, without taking steamers or the larger class of coasting vessels; and I think, that when we look at these results, we are called upon to see if we cannot render life and property a little more secure by having competent men to man these vessels. In using the word navigation, I do not mean scientific navigation, but only that the men shall be fit for seamanship, and for the particular service in which they are engaged. Now, as to the fees I may first state this: for some eight or ten years the fees exacted for sea-going certificates were $10 and $5. The expense connected with the board of examination and the granting of these certificates exceeded the fees collected by $2,000 a year. It is not a very serious loss for the service rendered, but still it is thought that the fees should bear some proportion to the expense. The hon. member for Gaspé says that we ought to elevate the standard of the men commanding these vessels; but I think, if you granted them a certificate either of service or of competency, without any charge at all, they would look upon it as something of no great value. I have named here for a certificate of competency, $8 and $4. For a certificate of service I said $5 and $2, but some hon. gentleman seemed to think it too high, and we might make it $4 for masters and $2 for mates. The same hon. gentleman has referred to the engineers and the complaints they make. The engineers pay very frequently, but a master gets his certificate once and it is for life; it is his certificate of competency as long as his age does not exceed the limit fixed. I do not think a fee is very important to the Bill, but I think it is unwise to make the fee too small, as the master would then consider his certificate of competency of no great value; at the same time, the fee should be moderate and should bear some proportion to the expense.

Bill read the second time; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. McISAAC. Do I understand the certificate of service is obtained in the same way as in the Act of 1870?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes; there will be no more difficulty in obtaining it than before.

Mr. KEEFLER. I should like it to be provided that parties would be examined in the counties or districts where they reside and should not be obliged to go to Halifax or St. John.

Mr. McLELAN. That is a matter of detail which it is impossible to place in the Bill. At present candidates for examination generally attend at Halifax, St. John or Yarmouth, at all of which places there are schools where they attend previous to the examination. But as this is not a scientific examination the regulations will be made to meet as far as possible the convenience of the masters and mates who are candidates.

Mr. KEEFLER. They are poor men and cannot afford to go to Halifax for five or six weeks.

Mr. WELDON. How are the examiners to be appointed? Will there be one board for the Maritime Provinces, or will there be local boards?

Mr. McLELAN. That matter has not been very seriously considered, but a number of men will be required to meet the requirements.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). As the hon. Minister is aware, a large number of Nova Scotians now command American vessels sailing from Gloucester. They are absent for three or four months and spend the balance of the year in Nova Scotia. If any of these men, who have served as masters on board of American vessels, desire to return and be employed on Canadian vessels, will they be placed on the same footing?

Mr. McLELAN. I think if Nova Scotians have served on foreign vessels and have certificates showing their positions, they would be entitled to the same privileges here.

Mr. VAIL. But the Bill says they must be domiciled in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLELAN. Service on board of a ship is included in the word "domiciled."

Mr. PAINT. Many of these men have obtained American citizenship, and they now come back to Nova Scotia in consequence of the good times created by the Tariff.

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. BLAKE. If the very reasonable suggestion made by my hon. friend is not carried into effect there will be a barrier placed in the way of Nova Scotians and New Brunswickers, who have served on American vessels, coming back and serving on Canadian registered vessels. I think the clause is too restricted, and that some provision should be inserted to meet this case.

Mr. McISAAC. I desire to enquire whether it will be necessary that the experience shall have been obtained on a vessel of the same tonnage as the class to which this Bill applies.

Mr. McLELAN. I think not.

Mr. FORTIN. Yes; you want to examine captains and mates of coasting and fishing vessels. You know very well that a sailor who is trained on sea-going vessels and at sea on foreign voyages, is not fit to be a coaster, nor the skipper of a fishing vessel. This is a trade by itself, which is learned near the shore, amid the most difficult navigation in the world. He must know perfectly the coast, and the currents, and the capes, and the tides, and everything of that nature; and, consequently, the examination of the captain of a coasting and fishing vessel should be totally different from that of a sea-going captain, who is not fit to be the captain of a fishing vessel or coaster. The examination of the former should be peculiar, and not scientific at all. He should know the chart, how to calculate distances, and the compass, and the currents of the seasons in which he sails, and the capes and the tides; and when these men know that, they are able to command a fishing vessel or coaster.

Mr. WELDON. I would suggest this change: "British subjects, whether they have served in ships, British or foreign, in like trades."

Mr. BAKER. I do not presume to debate the legal aspect of the clause, but I wish to see provision made where-by Americans cannot come in and get command of our vessels.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The proposal is not that Americans should come in and get command of our vessels, but to allow a large number of our people, who have gone to the United States and become masters of vessels there, and are extremely competent to discharge the duties which it is proposed to render more perfect by the administration of this Act, to return to this, their own country, and command our vessels instead of devoting their lives and services to the service of another country. The object is not to shut them out from returning, but to offer every possible inducement to prevail on them to come back to this country, and I think that this object is worthy of every possible consideration.

Mr. WELDON. I suggest that the following words be inserted:—"persons serving in ships so registered, and British subjects serving in foreign ships in like trades."

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to get some idea from the hon. gentleman, as to the number of persons to be appointed under this clause, and as to the probable charge, upon the public, which he anticipates will be occasioned by it. Of course, I am aware, that this will be to some extent conjectural, but he has not brought down this Bill, I imagine, without having some idea as to the extent what this charge will be.

Mr. McLELAN. It will be impossible now to define how many persons are to be employed, and how many examinations will be held, until it is thoroughly understood where may be the most convenient places and times to have these examinations, and where the homes of the captains in the winter season may be—which has not yet been ascertained;—so it is impossible to fix any number of places, at which the examinations may be held;—but it is proposed to do this with the least inconvenience and expense to the captains. If it will be necessary to provide two or three or half a dozen new places for these examinations, why, we shall do it, rather than subject captains to the inconvenience and expense of travelling long distances. Owing to the extent of the Dominion, it is impossible to make a conjecture at present how many will be necessary to accomplish this work.

Mr. WELDON. The different classes of men will require different examiners?

Mr. McLELAN. I think I stated the other night, that the general outline of the plan would be to appoint a certain number of men with general qualifications and general knowledge, who will go into the district and select a man familiar with that particular trade and with its requirements, and to sit on the board of examination; and also with some knowledge of the men who are to be examined. I think that this is the most convenient mode that can be adopted.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, if the Bill was in accordance with the hon. gentleman's resolution, it would rather occasion a crush of work at first for the examiners, inasmuch as all at present engaged in the trade would be subject to examination; but this will not now be the case. The hon. gentleman proposes, as I understand it, to insert an addition to the sixth clause, which provides in more detail for obtaining certificates of service without any examination at all on the production of certain certificates; that is what I understand, and if that be correct, it seems to me a little out of place to provide, as he does in this clause, for the obtaining of these certificates from these examiners, at an examination to be held at those times and places. These certificates of service are to be obtained upon certain proofs no doubt, but these proofs are to be in writing, and inasmuch as we are subjecting for the public good those engaged in carrying on this trade without any certificates, to a certain amount of inconvenience, the hon. gentleman will agree that the fair mode to adopt in order to apply whatever test may be prescribed, would be to adopt the one involving the least amount of inconvenience. I should say that if the full regulations giving the form of certificate were widely disseminated by being sent, say, to the officers of the Department in the various Provinces, it would be more convenient than that some specific time should be named of comparatively short duration within which the examination should take place on the spot. Ample time would thus be given so that there would be no difficulty about their being able to obtain their certificates.

Mr. McLELAN. I may say that after having amended this Bill in a particular way, I came to the conclusion, after hearing the opinions of hon. gentlemen, that I had better frame a clause specially providing for these cases, so that there might be no misunderstanding.

On section 4,

Mr. McLELAN. I propose to make the fee for a certificate as mate $4, instead of $5.

Mr. WELDON. Considering the low wages which these men are paid as compared with masters, I should think that $2 would be sufficient.

Mr. KEEFLER. I would suggest that the certificates of competency of masters and mates should be $4 and $2 respectively.

HARBOR ACCOMMODATION FOR THE CITY OF TORONTO.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 106) to increase the harbor accommodation of the city of Toronto, to extend the Esplanade, and to provide for the control of the use thereof by railway companies. He said: I would ask that this Bill be now read a second time and sent to the Railway Committee, so that ample time may be given to the city of Toronto and those interested in the Bill to come before the Committee, and discuss it there. It has been represented to the Government that this is a matter of great importance to the city and harbor of Toronto, as well as to those who advocate the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. If we accede to the hon. gentleman's motion it is with the view and on the understanding that adequate notice, a special notice, be given to the private individuals and the great corporations who are affected, and I think those who are promoting this Bill ought to see that a direct notice is given to the railway companies.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is to give full notice to the parties interested, especially the railway companies and the city of Toronto. I think if this Bill was taken up on Tuesday next it would give ample time for the parties interested to come before the Committee and present their views.

Bill read the second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 19th April, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

TIMBER AND LUMBER TRANSMISSION.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to make more ample provision respecting the regulation and collection of tolls and dues for the use of Government works constructed to facilitate the transmission of timber and lumber down rivers and streams; to authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations in that behalf, to require the verification of statements respecting such matters by oath, and to impose penalties for infractions of such regulations; and to provide that timber and lumber and the products thereof shall be liable for such tolls and dues, and may be followed until the same are paid."

Motion agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BERGIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to the following paragraph, which appeared in the Toronto Globe of yesterday:

"Mr. Bergin, of Cornwall, was exceedingly anxious to avoid voting, and, at the last moment, wanted to pair with a gentleman who intended to vote, and did vote, for a six months' hoist."

The facts are the reverse entirely. The hon. gentleman for South Victoria met me in the lobby, and said he was desirous of going away on the ten o'clock train, and that if a vote was not arrived at before that hour he would like to pair with me, and I declined. Shortly afterwards I saw the hon. member for Durham, the whip of our party, and I asked him if our hon. friend for South Victoria had succeeded in obtaining a pair, and he said he had not. He said: "I have another gentleman who wants to pair, the hon. member for Selkirk," and he asked me to pair with him. That I also refused. Before the vote came on I was asked if a pair could be got for the hon. member for West Hastings, who is known to be in bad health, and not able to sit on a long debate. I said I thought there was a gentleman who would pair with him, and I sent a messenger to that gentleman, but the messenger could not find him. When the hon. gentleman came in I tried to catch his eye, but failed. I afterwards sent for him, and he said he was going to vote against the Bill. There could be no intention consequently of my wanting to pair with a man who was going to vote on the same side as myself, the more particularly as this was a vote which I would not on any account avoid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I expressed no wish to pair with anybody.

Mr. BERGIN. Well, it was the hon. member for Lisgar; I made a mistake.

BOUNTY ON PIG IRON.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on a certain proposed resolution (April 18th) respecting the bounty on pig iron.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY, in moving that the resolution be adopted, said: I may call the attention of the House to the fact we'll known to hon. members on both sides, that, for the last two Sessions, there has been strong pressure brought to bear on the Government to consider the advisability of providing some additional protection or encouragement to develop the iron industries of Canada. It is well known that in all parts of the Dominion we have ore of the richest quality. We quite recognise the importance of developing that important industry, important perhaps beyond many others, because the product, when finished and ready for market, represents, in almost its whole value, labor. The Government promised the gentlemen who waited on them the Session before the last Session, that they would give this matter the most careful consideration, and see whether we could not meet them in such a way as to give sufficient encouragement for the development of this industry. One of the difficulties we had to meet in dealing with this question, is that if we increased materially the duty on pig-iron, it being a raw material that formed the basis of a great many manufactures in Canada, the result would be, as we are not at present producing all we require, that to some extent the increase in price would require a change in the duties on the articles manufactured from pig or bar iron. Under these circumstances it was thought desirable we should ask the House to give, for a period of six years, the bounty now proposed, of $1.50 per ton for the first three years, and $1 per ton for the following three years. As far as I can gather, we have, at present, three iron manufactories in the Dominion—I do not speak of rolling mills, but of those who manufacture pig iron. The most important one is that of Londonderry, Nova Scotia; there is also one at Three Rivers, and one at Woodstock, New Brunswick. I do not know the exact production of these three, but probably it would be under 20,000 tons during the last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How much do we import?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. During the last year we imported altogether 63,431 tons; of charcoal iron, 6,837 tons, and of all other descriptions, 56,594 tons. It is expected that during the next year, from July, 1883, to July, 1884, there will probably be 40,000 tons manufactured. An additional furnace will be at work at the Londonderry works, and an additional impetus will be given to the existing industries of Three Rivers and Woodstock. It can scarcely be expected that, in the next twelve months the output will have reached the full extent anticipated from the extension of the works, as it will take twelve months before the new furnace can be thoroughly finished and in operation. New industries will, no doubt, be started during the next year, but during the next year the manufacture will probably be confined to the then existing establishment, and will amount to about 35,000 or 40,000 tons.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Does the hon. gentleman intend to pay the bounties on the furnaces already existing?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Certainly. It would not be fair to give the bounty only to the new industries that may be established, and not to those which are already established, and on which a large amount of capital has been expended with very little return. Therefore, it is proposed that $1.50 shall be paid, amounting, probably, to $50,000 during the next fiscal year.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman state the production at Three Rivers and at Woodstock?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know, but they are in a position to manufacture a very considerable quantity. Of course, it pays them to do so.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon. gentleman makes an estimate of 40,000 tons for next year, what proportion does he expect to be made at Londonderry and other places?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. With additional furnaces they will make a double quantity, about 30,000 tons. Londonderry may produce 20,000 tons, and the other places 10,000, or 15,000 tons. This is an estimate. We know that a limited quantity has been produced there so far. They may multiply it even beyond our estimates, still it is a fair estimate to make that they will produce that quantity.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says he knows it is a limited quantity, but he does not know what the limit is. It is absolutely a guess that he makes.

Mr. MITCHELL. At Three Rivers they employ thirty or forty men, and have taken a contract to manufacture 10,000 cart wheels; it must, therefore, be a considerable industry.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Minister stated last Session, or the Session before, that applications were made, and a promise was given by the Government to take these interests into consideration. I observe lately that an application has been made from some other source—I think a person named Scales—for additional assistance. Would the hon. gentleman say whereabouts it was that the applicants to whom he made the promise that he has mentioned this afternoon, propose to establish further industries—what part of the country?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In the neighborhood of Ottawa was one proposition made to us some time since, and the other in the rear of Belleville. Mr. Scales has been here within a day or two, but he is merely representing a proposition made three months ago by men who are manufacturing iron opposite Cincinnati. An answer was sent to them sometime ago. Mr. Scales was in town the other day, and called upon me, and I said it was utterly out of the question to meet their views, as the Government had submitted to Parliament what they thought was quite sufficient to encourage the development of the industry. I have been told—I do not know how true it is—by a person who is interested in the deposits in the neighborhood of Ottawa, that Mr. Haycock, who is now in England, has made some arrangements lately for the purpose of putting up works here, since notice was given of this resolution, and he is raising capital for the purpose.

Mr. BLAKE. Then Londonderry will be able to produce 30,000 tons, with the new protection?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I should think so.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said he calculated the product last year at 20,000 tons, and the import at 63,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Which would make 63,000 tons for consumption; and that would include charcoal and the other pig?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. With that there were 7,000 tons of charcoal imported, and he calculated, I presume, about 5,000 tons of charcoal made.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand from his calculations that about 12,000 tons of charcoal were consumed in the country, and about 71,000 tons of the other pig iron. Then he calculates that Londonderry will make 30,000 tons, which, with the other pig iron, will be very nearly half the whole consumption in the county of that description of pig iron. How many new industries, under these circumstances, does he expect will be obtained?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When you get pig iron, you don't use it all as pig, for the purpose of stoves, &c., but they convert it into plates, bars, &c. Therefore, it is not confined simply to the 81,000 tons used in the shape of pig-iron; but when it is once manufactured, and in pig, then no doubt, it will be manufactured into bars, round and square, into sheets and various other things for mercantile purposes; and, under these circumstances, it will not be confined to the 81,000 tons of pig iron. It is intended to extend this to bar iron and all that kind of thing, but the bounty will be paid on pig iron which is produced, and then they convert it into other things.

Mr. BLAKE. I asked the hon. gentleman how many new industries for the production of pig he expected would be established?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We do not know that. The consumption is increasing largely, and I think I may safely say that 150,000 tons may be very shortly required, providing they convert it as they will into bars, nail-plates, and other purposes—perhaps 200,000 tons. That is my calculation. But it is impossible for any person to estimate what the results of industries of this kind will be when they are thoroughly developed.

Mr. BLAKE. No; but when it is proposed, out of the taxes of this country, that there shall be paid $1.50 a ton for the product, it is of some degree of interest to know what the charge on the public revenue is likely to be. No Finance Minister who knows his business as the hon. gentleman does, would have brought down a proposition of this kind without having made a calculation with the same degree of precision and information which he had with reference to the product at Three Rivers, as to what the probable charge upon the revenue would be. The hon. gentleman has just stated that 150,000 tons will be shortly made, or that the quantity might run up to 225,000 tons. I ventured to ask the hon. gentleman what his expectations were, and he has told the House, in reply, that it is impossible to calculate what the whole extent of the output will be. The hon. gentleman rightly observed that the product would probably not be limited by the estimated amount of pig iron produced in the country, because there is a large quantity of pig iron produced by the Londonderry Company, and I understand a very large portion is converted by themselves into bar. Is that so?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They convert a portion of their product into bar, and sell it in that condition. The quantity of bar iron imported last year was 44,472 tons; and, therefore, taking the whole quantity imported and manufactured during the last year, it would amount to 125,000 tons of pig, bar, square and round.

Mr. BLAKE. That is on the supposition that we manufacture here all the pig, and make all the bar iron we use?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is taking the pig and square and round bar, because that is likely what they would first manufacture. No doubt we may make nail-plates and other plates, but the leading articles will be pig and square and round bar. I have looked into that matter to see exactly what will likely be required, and I find that 125,000 tons was required last year.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the hon. gentleman stated that he would not expect for some years the production to overtake the demand, and, therefore, the price will be increased; and that is given as a reason why he proposes to give an additional bounty, instead of a duty, in order not further to burden the various manufacturers dependent on the supply of pig and bar as the raw material. For the purposes of this discussion, it is conceded that at this time the duty on pig operates to increase the price of the imported article.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As regards pig we have never said anything else.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that now. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) called the hon. Minister's attention recently to a circular sent out by manufacturers of merchant bar iron. I suppose the hon. gentleman has seen it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I will read the circular which has been distributed in print. It is signed "Ontario Rolling Mills Company, Hamilton, Ontario; Scovil and Purdy, St. John, N.B., manufacturers of merchant bar iron," and it is as follows:—

"We call your attention to the proposed re-adjustment of the Tariff, and beg to submit for your information that, before Confederation, the Tariff on bar iron in Ontario was 30 per cent., with no duty on the raw material, and that the Tariff on bar iron under the National Policy is 17½ per cent., less one to two dollars duty on scrap, &c., leaving a protection of about 12¼ per cent. only until the present re-adjustment, an inadequate amount to compete with foreign iron of general merchant sizes as used by the public. Under this policy, only three Canadian mills attempted to compete with England, &c., in general merchant iron; two of these mills use scrap iron exclusively, and the other one uses pig iron, which they make from the ore. It is now proposed to give the pig iron makers a bonus of $1.50 per ton on all the iron made for a certain time. This bonus is equal to nearly $1.87 per ton on bar iron, as it will take nearly 1¼ tons of pig iron to make a ton of merchant bar iron, and it is intended to give us this third concern the benefit of this, to the exclusion of the other two, who have been as well endeavoring to meet the same unremunerative markets with the expectation and promises of Tariff assistance as soon as the National Policy was, after consideration accepted by the Canadian people in the last General Elections. We ask you as legislators to see to it that this injustice is not done us, and to see that the other establishments who have been endeavoring to compete with the imported merchant bar, receive an equivalent to the bonus, as well as the makers of merchant bar iron made from the pig metal, thus putting us all on the same footing. We would further call your attention to the fact that it is just as important to encourage and build up the manufacture of bar iron for general purposes as it is to encourage the manufacture of pig iron alone, as a very large part of the market for pig iron should be from these bar iron makers, and is everywhere else, and will be in Canada if you will see this matter righted and justice done. We would also refer you to the Tariffs of other countries to show that the more advanced an article is in manufacture (that is, that the more labor spent on it) the more should be the Tariff, to be in proportion to the cost of the raw material. This will not be the case as it is now proposed with iron in Canada, as pig iron is to have a bonus of $1.50 per ton, with the present duty of $2, equal to $3.50 per ton in all,—on say a valuation of $15—would be equal to nearly 22 per cent., while bar iron, costing more than twice as much for actual labor spent, has only 17½ per cent. All bar makers outside of the furnace owners, under the proposed Tariff, must go out of the business if you don't see this matter righted. We trust you will see the injustice of the proposed adjustment, and amend the Tariff clause to include a bonus or equivalent on 'general merchant bar sizes of iron made from other raw material than pig iron in Canada, and competing in the same markets.'"

I think the duty on scrap is proposed to be taken off, so the observation on that point does not apply to the present proposal.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I had neither read that circular, nor heard it read before. What is their proposition? It is this: That by giving $1.50 as bounty to the producers of pig iron, it enables them to compete more successfully with the men who manufacture bar iron out of scrap. If there is anything in it, it is that the result of giving this bounty will be to enable parties who manufacture iron in pig and then in roll, to sell it $1.50 cheaper than the manufacturers of bar. That is the only point in that circular. The hon. gentleman sees it, and knows it. It places the men who have rolling mills in a less favorable position than before. Why? Because these men having the bounty can undersell them. If the hon. gentleman is in a position to give a bounty of $1.50 on iron manufactured from scrap, he will be very much more liberal to this industry than the Government. What difference does this proposition make? It is simply that the producer of iron from the ore, who smelts it and converts it into pig iron, receiving a bounty of $1.50 per ton for the pig, can sell his bar iron cheaper than he could do if he did not receive such bounty. Many of the rolling mills do not complain. I know that one of the firms signing this circular asked that we should impose an export duty upon scrap iron because it is bought by our American neighbors and taken out of the country. The other party whose name is attached to the circular urged that the Government should place a very considerable duty, nearly double what at present prevails, on iron made from scrap and rolled into bar and sheet iron.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows how this thing has worked under the duty of $3 with respect to the Londonderry Company as compared with the bar iron makers; the hon. gentleman's proposal will aggravate the present state of things. An advantage as against the other manufacturers of bar iron in the country, made not for sale, but principally in their own works made from raw material with a duty of $2 a ton to be then converted into bar iron. Now, in addition to the duty of $2, a bonus of $1.50 a ton is given; so if, taking the Londonderry Company, they make 30,000 tons, and use the bulk of it in making bar iron, they will have an advantage of $3.50 a ton over those who are obliged to import, whether of scrap or other iron, &c., and they will have a certain protection over the importers of scrap. Scrap iron is free, and they will have a benefit of $1.50 a ton over the importers of scrap, and of pig iron $2, making an advantage of $3.50 over those who import pig iron for the purpose of manufacturing bar iron; that will be with relation to those engaged in the production of the raw material for bar iron as opposed to those engaged in the conversion of the raw material, pig iron or other iron, into bar iron. It has so worked, to the extent of the duty, in past times. It has been different from the case, if simply the Londonderry Company, or some other company, manufacturing pig iron, sold it in the general market. I know that they sell a considerable quantity of pig iron in the general market, or if not in the general market to particular industries, and I believe that the bulk, or a very large portion of their trade, has been in finished articles; and I suppose that it will be now still made in the finished article, in which, too, they obviously gain an advantage. If the same course is to be pursued with other companies as the hon. gentleman suggests—and obviously that is his expectation, because the country is not limited to the supposed production of pig iron, to the importation and present production of pig iron, because there was bar, and that would be produced by companies who also convert it—it is quite clear that the extent of the bonus and duty given, will involve a very considerable enhancement of the cost of bar iron, paid partly by the consumers of bar iron, so far as this duty is concerned, and partly by the whole public, in so far as the bounty is concerned; as far as I can understand it, that will be the result. Then I was anxious to ascertain from the hon. gentleman what was the number of companies that produce pig iron, which he expected would be inaugurated by this system; and he has not, of course, been able to give us a good statement of that at all; but suggested two, as I understood him, at Ottawa, and one at Belleville. May I ask him whether either of these companies, or have any persons, who have applied to him on this subject, ever made suggestions as to the difficulty created by the coal duty in the prosecution of this industry.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; they have. They stated that as one of the difficulties they had to contend with—I now refer to Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The western part of it. Now, let me follow up the statements made by the hon. member. He says that the duty of $2 per ton on pig iron produced in this country operated to the disadvantage of the rolling mills. If this statement be correct—and I know that this is the allegation made by some parties now under this proposition—then I would have to take back very largely the statement I made, that up to the present time the imposition of $2 on pig iron was an increase of expense, because if it has the effect that the hon. gentlemen alleges, and decreases the profit of the rolling mills, then they must have sold the iron produced from pig, when manufactured, at a less price, than they otherwise would have done, in order to so affect the rolling mills—there is no question about that. If as the hon. gentleman says this has a very damaging effect on the rolling mills, the only effect will be the reduction of price by the party manufacturing, who made pig and put it into bar iron. If that was not the case, and he simply had a profit of $2, then the man who made iron out of scrap was not injured, because he gets the benefit of the increased price. Let me say this with reference to the position of the man, or company, that manufactures from scrap, at present, as compared with what it was in 1878. Then scrap was free as it is to-day, and bar paid 5 per cent.; and the rolling mills had only 5 per cent. protection. Now, scrap is free, and the products of the rolling mills have 17½ per cent. protection; that is the difference between the two; and I do not hesitate to say that the other rolling mills in the country are perfectly satisfied with this state of the case. I have heard nothing against—on the contrary, as far as the Montreal rolling mills are concerned, they approve; and the only difficulty at Hamilton, is, they say, because in the city of Montreal scrap iron is not subject to the same competition as there, where they are near Buffalo, which has large iron works that buy scrap, and consequently they found a difficulty in getting raw material, which is scrap iron; but my hon. friend will see that if there is anything in this argument at all, and in the statements made here, it is clear that this duty of $2 imposed on pig, and the bounty to be paid, will reduce the price of the article produced in these industries.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Otherwise it could not touch the manufacturing industries.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the fact. The hon. gentleman may say "hear, hear," but he knows, and feels that, if his position is correct, this must be the result.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the hon. gentleman thinks so, why does he not impose a larger duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think so, and I have not said so; but that is the argument put forward by hon. gentlemen who come down here, and by the hon. gentleman who has espoused their cause. They really state that the effect will be to cheapen the article. I need not enlarge on this subject. Our object was to establish sufficiently the industries of the country, since we have plenty of ore to produce all the iron we want. No industry named, or scarcely none, in fitting an article for market, employs so much labor from the time of the excavation and removal of the ore to the place where it is burned, to the time of finishing the product. Take the coal necessary out of the mine, this is converted into coke, in order that you may put the ore in a condition for smelting; and the whole of the operations of smelting, rolling, and everything connected with it is work from the beginning to the end; and, therefore, if there is an industry in this country which really I think—and I am sure that this is the feeling of the House—can be developed by us to produce here this article without materially increasing the price, this is one; and even if for six years it did increase the price for the purpose of developing and placing this industry in a firm position, this would be advisable. And as competition is so great, and prices so very low, I feel that the true policy—and the Government so recognizes it, and I am expressing their opinions on this subject here to-day—even if it costs us something more for the iron for a short time than otherwise would be the case—is to aid this industry in the manner we propose.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Londonderry Works, and to the benefits which they are to receive from this bounty of $50 a ton. We will suppose that it does amount to a considerable sum; but the hon. gentleman should know that the Government is receiving from that company's operations, through the Intercolonial Railway, about three times as much in freight traffic as the whole of this bounty can amount to per year. There is another point: The operations of this company have been going on for some years in the smelting and manufacture of pig iron, and a portion of it has been converted into bar; but it does not compete with the other rolling mills in this country, because they manufacture a different quality of iron, which does not compete at all; but the Londonderry Mills roll from scrap as well as from pig, and that quality, perhaps, does come into competition with other rolling mills. And what they manufacture there from their own pig iron is of such a superior quality that it does not interfere at all with the other rolling mills which roll from imported scrap iron, or scrap iron obtained in the country. The hon. gentleman said they are in a position to roll cheaper, but they would gain just as much if they sold every ton of pig iron they could make and receive the bounty, as if they were to manufacture it into bar iron. But there cannot be any competition with the quality of iron manufactured with their pig iron.

Mr. BLAKE. What are the freights of this Londonderry company over the Intercolonial?

Mr. McLELAN. My information is they exceeded $100,000 during last year, and as they are running two furnaces instead of one, there will be an increase in the quantity of fuel required for the increased output. It will probably bring it up to about $150,000 for the ensuing year. For fuel alone they will require 130,000 tons.

Mr. BLAKE. In the first place, I do not think that the assertion of the hon. gentleman, that the freights of this company are such a great advantage to the Intercolonial, is quite correct. So far as I can judge, the freight rates are extremely low. I notice that the Intercolonial Railway does not pay its way, and I have no doubt that the coal freights for the Londonderry company has something to do with that fact. In the second place, if you take the $2 duty and the $1.50 bounty, on 30,000 tons, we have $105,600.

Mr. McLELAN. We are speaking of the bounty alone.

Mr. BLAKE. But I am speaking of both, because the hon. gentleman has piled Pelion on Ossa by giving them the advantage of both bounty and duty. It would not do to put the duty at $3.50, because that would not reduce the price of the raw material to other consumers, so instead of giving them the advantage in that way, the public are to pay about $1.50, and the consumers—who are the public—are to pay the other $2. That will make an advantage of $105,000 to this company against an estimate of $150,000 for freights in the coming year, which is not quite in the ratio of three to one, though I admit that the hon. gentleman's calculation is different from mine, inasmuch as he takes the bounty only; but I say that the advantage to the Intercolonial is, perhaps, more than questionable, having regard to the rates. But we have departed a little from the point to which I directed the hon. gentleman's attention. He said he acknowledged that some of the persons with whom he had been in communication before the Session, with regard to the expense of coal, made a difficulty. These persons were short-sighted enough to believe that the duty on coal had enhanced the price.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They alleged that.

Mr. BLAKE. And they are the persons upon whose representations the hon. gentleman is acting.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We do not accept all their representations.

Mr. BLAKE. No; some of them are heretical, and some are orthodox. They are heretics when they say that the coal duty does increase the price, though they are orthodox in other respects. But they propose, as a means of encouraging the industry that the duty should be reduced or abolished.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; that proposition has been made by several manufacturing industries.

Mr. BLAKE. And by these?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. By two of the parties who are applying.

Mr. BLAKE. And they argue that the duty on coal was about equivalent, or more than equivalent to the proposed bounty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; because they did not know what the bounty was.

Mr. BLAKE. They wanted a larger bounty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Some of them did.

Mr. BLAKE. How much?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Some mentioned $5 to $7 a ton, and some who had worked under the American Tariff wanted $20 a ton.

Mr. BLAKE. Persons who had been accustomed to the high Tariff of the United States and understood all about the duties of the hon. gentleman's system wanted $20 a ton, but the people from England made a more moderate demand. Is that what we are to understand?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were not from England, they were Americans and Canadians together who named from $5 to $7. They would have been satisfied with $5.

Mr. BLAKE. Was that with the coal duty on?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Was it inclusive of the existing duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; it was a specific duty.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman did not see his way clear to go that far.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not quite.

Mr. BLAKE. And so he goes about half; there were no English capitalists.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are English capitalists connected with the Ottawa operations, but the others at Belleville and Port Dover were Americans and Canadians.

Mr. BLAKE. Are these the persons to whom the hon. gentleman referred last Session, when he said he had been in communication with some capitalists who were prepared to invest millions in the country?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; some of the Americans connected with these operations.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, the statement at that time was not that they would manufacture in case the Tariff, as it stood, was maintained, but in case further encouragement was given to the extent of $5 to $7 per ton.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were to get further encouragement.

Mr. BLAKE. Then I say that the hon. gentleman was very unfortunate in the mode in which he communicated the proposals of these manufacturers on that occasion, and there are other hon. gentlemen of the Administration who also were unfortunate in that respect. What was stated to this House and to this country before the last Election was, that there were millions of capital awaiting investment in the country if the permanence of the Tariff as it stood was secured; what was true was, that there were persons who said they would invest millions provided the Tariff was altered further to their advantage; and they demanded, as a condition to that investment, a specific sum of from $5 to $7, while the hon. gentleman proposes only an aggregate advantage of $3.50. So the condition upon which they were to come here was a condition which the hon. gentleman had not decided to give; which he never decided to give; which these people never thought they would get at all, and it was not a condition of the maintenance of the existing Tariff.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The position was this: These gentlemen came here and asked us what the opinion of the Government was with reference to the permanence of this policy. They said they knew the policy was one to protect the industries of the country as they were being developed. The answer the Government gave was, that there was no question about the permanence of this policy. The reply we met with was: "We are led to think differently." The Globe, the paper most read in the United States, says that whenever the people shall have an opportunity of expressing their opinion of the policy, it will be repealed; if we are satisfied that the policy of the Government is a permanent policy, then we are satisfied to come in and invest our capital.

Mr. BLAKE. Provided—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; those parties put the proposal in general terms. In discussing the subject, these men said: "We understand that your policy is that when capitalists are ready to come in and develop the industries of the country, you will give them protection." We said: "Yes; we judge, by thirty-five bye-elections which have gone in favor of the Government, that the policy will be sustained; and we say to you that if that policy is sustained, such a duty will be imposed on iron as will be justifiable, and as will be sufficient to encourage the development of our iron resources." We promised that the matter would receive our consideration and our encouragement, and that promise we are fulfilling by asking Parliament to grant this encouragement, and I have no doubt what the result will be.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; but what the hon. gentleman told Parliament and the country was that there were millions of capital waiting to come in, only if the capitalists were assured that the Tariff would be permanent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; it was not. Let the hon. gentleman look at Hansard, and he will find no such statement.

Mr. BLAKE. One of us at a time. If the hon. gentleman had told us that the conditions were the imposition of further duties, and the granting of further bounties, then he would have told us what the exact state of the case was; and if he had gone further, and said: "We offer you the investment of millions of capital on these conditions, and we propose an Act of Parliament for the imposition of these duties, and the granting of these bounties; and we will take the sense of the people on this proposition," then he would have stated the facts as he intended them to be. But he did not tell Parliament, or the country, that the condition on which these persons was to come in was the adoption of large bounties for the manufacture of pig iron. If he did, let him point to the paragraph, or the phrase in which he announced that condition. He did not say that it was only on condition of large additional duties—aye, very much larger than what he now proposes, viz.: a specific duty of from $5 to $7 a ton—that he would attract these millions, which he told us could be attracted if the Tariff was maintained. What he now says is, that they could have been obtained if the Tariff was advanced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the hon. Finance Minister, in the statement he made last Session, stated that those millions that were about to be brought into the country, were to be brought in alone in connection with the iron industry?

Mr. BLAKE. No; I do not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, then, I fail to see the object of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not hear the beginning of this discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, perhaps I was unfortunate; but I gather that the hon. gentleman is charging the hon. Finance Minister with want of candor to the House in his statement previous to the Election.

Mr. BLAKE. I am.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Because he said that the confirmation of the National Policy by the country, would, he believed, result in bringing millions of capital into the country for the development of Canadian industries. The hon. gentleman finds a foundation for want of candor on the part of my hon. friend, by saying that if additional protection were given to the iron industry, capitalists would be prepared to engage in that industry. The two statements are quite correct, and they do not conflict one with the other. My hon. friend stated his belief that the confirmation of the National Policy by the people would remove the doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite had for four years been thrown upon its permanency. From day to day they confidently stated, that the moment the people got the opportunity, they would sweep away the policy, and the Administration with it. That was the cry from the first moment the National Policy was placed before this House and before the country. That cry was taken up outside by the Opposition press, and was echoed and re-echoed, not only in this country, but all over the world; and people who did not understand the hollowness of the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, as we understood them, attached too much importance to them, and believed them. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, felt, under the circumstances, that the best service he could perform to the country was to set that question at rest, and he took the only way in which he believed he could silence these hon. gentlemen. But it appears that even in that he was mistaken; for, although we went to the country, and the overwhelming voice of the people re-affirmed their confidence in this policy, and their desire that it should be maintained, yet we are told that it only rests on a foundation of sand. The statements of the hon. Finance Minister were well founded. He merely expressed his belief—his confidence—that the confirmation of the National Policy by the people of Canada after four years experience, would lead to the bringing of millions of additional capital into this country to develop its resources. Were his statements well founded or not? Sir, there is not an hon. gentleman in this House to-day who does not know that the decision of the people of this country to maintain this policy in all its integrity would be to bring in additional millions; and those additional millions are coming in to-day, as the hon. gentleman knows. Industry after industry is being established, capitalist after capitalist is coming in. I can myself name one concern which is bringing in a million of British capital to establish an industry, not a dollar of which would have been seen in this country if my hon. friend's confident predictions had not proven to be well-founded, and the people had not at the polls confirmed the policy of the Administration. I had not the good fortune to hear the opening remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite, but I judge that he wants to narrow the question down to statements made with reference to the iron industry. Why, Sir, there was no want of candor. My hon. friend stated that the iron industry was one that the Government judged to be of great importance, for the reason that the wealth created by the development of this kind of industry, is almost wholly devoted to payment for labor. Thus it became an industry almost above all others that deserved the fostering care of the Government, if, by public aid, parties could be induced to bring in their capital and develop the enormous resources which Providence has given us in the vast deposits of iron ore that exist in the different parts of the Dominion. My hon. friend stated that the Government were considering that question. But he stated with great candor to this House that it was believed, if sufficient protection were given to that industry, a great amount of capital would be brought in and applied specially to its development. Having carefully considered the question, my hon. friend came to the conclusion, and the Government adopted his conclusion, that we would be justified in giving, in the best and least objectionable way, that protection to the iron industry which is found to be necessary in order to be able to give it full and ample development. A great amount of capital has been brought into this country in the development of the iron industry as it is, and a great struggle has been carried on to maintain it, and the amount of protection offered of $2 per ton has not been sufficient to encourage additional capital being brought into the country, or even scarcely to maintain the industries already started. Under these circumstances, the policy propounded by my hon. friend, with the same confidence as that with which he propounded the National Policy will be attended, I believe, with equally good results. I know of no measure, after the most careful investigation of this question, that can be adopted—no single point to which my hon. friend can turn his attention as inviting and developing industry, which will give a greater amount of employment, in proportion to the industry itself, to the people of this country, than the protection proposed to be given to the development of our iron industry. I have no doubt my hon. friend will receive the same support from this House in this measure that he has received in the great change in our fiscal policy which, four years ago, he submitted to this House. I have no doubt the result will be equally satisfactory, and that the voice of the sovereign people of this country will, when the opportunity comes, endorse this policy just as emphatically as, on a recent occasion, they endorsed the National Policy.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sure we are all glad to hear the old voice singing the old tune, delivered with some of that old time vigor, not to say vehemence and breadth of expression, with which those who have sat here some time are familiar. I told the hon. gentleman, when he began, he could not have been here at the beginning of the debate, or he would have omitted some things that he said, because it will be remembered by those who were present then, that I enquired of the hon. gentleman at the commencement whether his statement as to his having been in communication with parties who were proposing to invest millions in the country if the policy were maintained, applied to the proposal on the subject of the iron question, and he answered: "Yes, it did." I did not hear him say exclusively, but that it did apply to that.

An hon. MEMBER. That is the whole case.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not the whole case. No doubt the hon. member for Colchester, (Mr. McLellan) who represents the iron works, conceived it was the whole case; but the hon. member for Halifax ought to have taken a broader view, even though Colchester does lie in the limits of Nova Scotia. The whole case is, that, having in his eye, thought and mind the persons who were proposing to invest millions in the iron industry, the hon. gentleman said maintenance is the condition; but now we find it is not maintenance, but the aggravation and the extension of the policy in a manner that he does not venture to propose to the House to-day that that was the reason of the transaction. There is another point. We have been more than once reminded, and reminded with propriety—although those who reminded us ought to have had their mouths closed by the observations they have made—that persons who have engaged in commercial or manufacturing enterprises must be competent for the task, and that no Government, no Parliament, no Tariff even, can protect from disaster those who do not bring to the accomplishment of their proposed ventures, those qualities of mind, and that vigor, experience, determination and good judgment, which are essential to the execution of them. The Government has said: "We do not pretend to be able to keep every man from failing, to give every man success; all that we give is a fair chance, and the rest depends entirely upon energy, discernment and good judgment." Now, what will the hon. Minister of Railways think when I tell him that amongst those things that were developed in the discussion before he came here, the men whom it is proposed to introduce into this country to develop this general enterprise, which he says has required and will require so much on the part of those who develop it to succeed—that the men whose application has received the favorable consideration of the hon. Minister, are so short sighted, so dull, understand so little the true bearings and conditions of this country, that they actually believe, in what they call their minds, that the duty on coal increases the cost.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will narrow the question down to the iron question, and stand upon that alone. When we are dealing with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, we are dealing with a man of no ordinary ability, and whose professional position places him where he can cross-question a witness, and if possible get that witness to state what is not the truth. Members of the legal profession understand that perfectly well, and that hon. gentleman put into my mouth what I never said, and asked this House to condemn me. He said I came down here and said to the House that these men who were anxious to bring in their capital, said: "If you continue the present duty on iron we will come in with our millions."

Mr. BLAKE. To maintain the policy.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I ask the hon. gentleman to point to any statement of mine to that effect; it would be utterly inconsistent with the facts of the case. The hon. gentleman knows well that an application had been sent to the Government signed by forty members of the House to increase the duty on iron. What answer did I make? Did I say, as I would have said were the statement of the hon. gentleman true: "You cannot have a cent more." No; but I said that the Government, as anxious as we were to develop this industry, would give it between this and the next meeting of Parliament, the most careful consideration. That was the answer. If he had said these capitalists were prepared to come in here under the present duty, it would have been inconsistent for me, in the same breath, to say that the Government would give the most serious consideration to this question. The hon. gentleman wishes to put me in the position of having made a false statement. The policy of this Government is a Protective policy. We have said we are determined to make it a success. We must, in order to meet the prejudices, to a certain extent, at any rate, of pre-formed opinions, introduce it with the small edge of the wedge first; and as we are able to show the people that by the imposition of additional duties, by the competition that will grow, as the result of that, they obtain the articles they consume as cheap as before, the people then will say: "Go on extending and widening that policy." We might have said to the people of the country: "We have carried the policy in the Tariff as it stands;" but we do not say that, we say that the country has endorsed this policy; we do not say they have endorsed the policy just as it is—though we might have said so—but that the country has declared it is right, and in the general interest, to give Protection to the industries of the country. And if our present Protection is not found sufficient, we have said, and I say it here, it will be the policy of the Government, where it does not lead to sufficient competition, to give the people an article at a low price, to give more Protection, because we will have this market for our people if we can. In this case it is likely. $2 a ton costs the country something, but they all contribute to it, it will be taken out of the general Treasury. But if we can put thousands of men to work in mining our ores, in the development of our coal, and in converting it into coke and the smelting of this iron, we create a large industry in the country, we give employment to the people, who will eventually get their steak as cheaply as before. That is the policy of the Government, and this is the outcome of that proposition. I have pointed out clearly to the House that it would have been inconsistent—and I never could have said what I have been charged with—I assured the forty members of this House, who put the question to us, that we would give the subject our most careful consideration, and see what additional Protection we would give.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman complains of having words put in his mouth. Now, I observed carefully the words used by the hon. member for West Durham, and they were "to maintain the policy," I am positive these were the words.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The last term he used was "to maintain the position." But the hon. member went further; he drove it home, and he said I had stated that we would extend it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. In no Ministerial manifesto that I saw, nor in the words put into the mouth of the Governor General, nor in the Ministerial address to the electors, have I seen it announced that it was the intention of the Government to increase this rate of taxation. No indication has been given that the present rate would not be sufficient, and the hon. gentleman and his colleagues in that respect carried the country by false pretences.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon. gentleman spoke about millions which were about to be invested, as he had received assurances on certain conditions, he did not say what industry those millions were to be invested in. He said he had application from capitalists involving the investment of millions if the Government was consistent in this policy—I cannot give the exact words—but it was a policy of maintenance. That is plain, because the first question I asked the hon. gentleman was this: when the hon. gentleman made a statement about millions was he referring amongst other things to iron? I did not know that he was referring to iron; he did not tell the House to what he was referring on that occasion, and I had to ask him.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I made a special statement about iron.

Mr. BLAKE. In answer to the late hon. member for King's, when he read the memorial of the forty members, he made a statement that was indefinite. That is the habit of the Government. If we ask whether a bridge is to be built at Oromocto? it is under consideration whether; a law is to be produced? that question is not yet decided. The hon. gentleman made an answer of that kind on that occasion. He declaimed about millions, but he did not refer to iron in terms, or to any other particular industry; he, therefore, did not connect that investment in his statement to the House and public with iron. I was obliged to ask him, was he referring to iron? He says, to-day, that he was referring to iron, at any rate, amongst others. And his reply to me was, that if I was referring to iron alone, he did not say so; but what he did say was, that promises or representations were made as to an investment of millions, dependent—I will not be tied down to a word, for I do not remember the exact words—but dependent, not upon an increased Tariff, but the maintenance of the policy of the Government as it was then in operation, and upon which they went to the people. But now we understand the whole thing. The hon. gentleman, in denying the accusation of want of candor, has himself condemned himself in that regard. What does he say? He says: "We have to go on by degrees, we have to introduce the thin end of the wedge." They get the thin end of the wedge in—the hon. Minister of Railways knows all about the thin end of the wedge—they have got the thin end of the wedge in, and he says now we will drive it home.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that while we have been driving it home in one direction, we have been withdrawing it in another. We have been taking it off tea, coffee, tobacco, tin, and a variety of other articles; we took off the stamp tax; and we have been able to do it because we have been driving it home in other directions. I thought I was going to make the case the strongest possible by confining it to iron, and hon. members who were in the House last Session will recollect that I made that statement. I made it last year, when this capitalist came to me and represented to me that he was concerned about the permanency of this Tariff; he was afraid it would not be permanent. He mentioned the hostility of the Globe, which was the paper most read in the United States, and its prediction that if a new Government came into power the Tariff would be changed. I repeated this conversation in the House, and I am confident the substance will be found recorded in the Hansard. Therefore, I say that our present proposition is perfectly consistent, for we have never declared or intimated that we would not go a step beyond the present rates whenever the public interest seemed to require it. Those forty members know that the Government gave them encouragement to expect it, and that was not a hole-and-corner matter. The hon. member knew that statement was made here, and when he asked me if it was not the case, I said that the most careful consideration would be given to the subject.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. member for West Durham has endeavored in several speeches he has made to this Committee with a great many words, and I must say with words that seem to me to contain a great deal of sophistry, to convict the hon. Finance Minister of want of candor, of inconsistency, in some statement he has made in the House upon the question of the introduction of foreign capital into Canada. I have listened attentively to what the hon. gentleman opposite has said, but I have failed even to follow his line of argument, no doubt owing to my own obtuseness, or perhaps to the very great number of words in which he wrapped up his argument, and at all events I have failed to see the point of the argument which he has adduced. He accused the hon. Finance Minister of want of consistency, because he asserted on some former occasion that the Tariff was to be permanent in all its details, and that it would be the means of introducing foreign capital. I am quite sure the hon. Finance Minister never said one word to intimate that the Tariff was to be permanent in all its details, or anything beyond the fact that the policy of Protection was to be maintained. It has always been intimated that the Tariff was to be a flexible Tariff—it was necessary that it should be so, and that it should accommodate itself to the variations and wants of the trade; and I am sure that every supporter of the Government on the platform and elsewhere, at the last Election, declared that such was the policy of the Government on that subject. Then as to the want of candor, I fail to see wherein it consisted. What has all this wordy discussion amounted to? What we want to know is whether it is desirable to endorse the proposals of the Government and to vote for the increase by way of bounty of the protection given to manufacturers of pig iron. That is the point before us. To speak on what was asserted on former occasions, or to play on words as to whether this was said or not, is wasting the time of the House. So far as regards the advantage and necessity of the proposed increase, I am prepared to support it, and I would not be doing my duty to my constituents if I did not support it, not only by my vote, but also by my voice. Since the introduction of the policy of Protection the iron interest in my own constituency has been investigated by capitalists, all, or nearly all, Americans, who came there and examined the iron deposits, and considered the subject of erecting smelting works. They have exported, and are exporting some of the ore in a crude state; but they saw an opportunity of manufacturing iron on the spot, which we all know is infinitely more advantageous to the country and to the particular district in which it is carried on, than is the exportation of the crude ore. Before the last Election they were considering the subject. They, however, read the Globe, and they asked the question whether this policy was to be permanent or not. They understood that the permanency of the policy depended on whether the Government continued in power after the Elections. They made representations to the Government, and hon. members who are interested in developing the iron interests, made representations either verbally or in writing—I made them both in writing and verbally—that $2 a ton on pig iron is not adequate to induce the introduction of foreign capital for the manufacture of pig iron in Canada. The Government said they would consider those representations, as the hon. member for West Durham sneeringly said, they would consider a question regarding a remote harbor in Nova Scotia; they declared it was an important subject, and one which required due regard to be paid to every interest, the interest of the consumer as well as of the manufacturer. It being understood that the Government had these representations under consideration, the Americans continued to turn their attention to the subject; and during my election I met American gentlemen who proposed to put up smelting works in my county; and they assured me that unless the present Government were returned they would not put one dollar into the enterprise, and they awaited the result of those Elections before they continued their preparations and invested any considerable amount of money. They commenced preparations beforehand, believing the Government would be sustained; but at the same time they said: "We are doing this in the expectation that the Government will perceive that $5 per ton is not sufficient protection, and either, by way of additional duty or bounty, will increase the protection given to manufacturers of iron; and if they do so we will go into it heartily, and place a large amount of capital in the manufacture of pig iron." And they have done so. They have put up smelting works there and given employment to a large number of people. They have bought all the cordwood they could obtain—because they are going to make charcoal iron—from the halfstarving settlers on the rocky lands in the northern part of my county, which wood they could not dispose of, and which they would have had to burn in order to cultivate the soil. They are buying all the cordwood they can team to the works. This enterprise has introduced labor in every direction. A large village has sprung up at the place, and farmers can sell their potatoes, vegetables and poultry to the men who are there now, whereas formerly there was no market. It has introduced quite an era of prosperity into what otherwise was a very poor district, and likely never to go ahead and prosper. I say, therefore, it is the duty of the House to lay aside special pleadings as to whether the hon. gentleman made certain statements on former occasions, or whether their words can be twisted in this direction or that, and to consider the important question before the House, whether the passage of this resolution is calculated to advance the best interests of the country at large.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think either the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), or the hon. Finance Minister, is warranted in charging the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) with want of candor. I would ask the hon. Finance Minister if he is prepared to assert that there was anything in his language in relation to the iron industry which could warrant the country in believing that he intended to increase the duty 50 per cent., and that he would make a flank movement as he has done in this case, and place the duty in the form of a bonus, and tax the country for the benefit of the iron interest. I maintain that the people were not informed as to the policy and intention of the Government when they went to the polls at the last Election. I maintain that the people were deceived, and that the Government did not prepare the people for the announcement of the policy now made in connection with the iron industry. We have every reason to believe, from the assertions made by the hon. Finance Minister, that this is but the entering wedge, and that he may, even yet, advance the duty on pig iron to $7 per ton, as he tells us manufacturers desire him to do. That hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks a few moments ago, drew the very glowing picture of the benefits which the granting of bonuses were going to confer on the country; that the result would be to put thousands of men at mining ore and producing iron—I took down the hon. gentleman's own words, and these are his exact words. I understand that the importations of pig iron, not manufactured, last year, amounted to 63,000 tons. The utmost he can hope to accomplish is to produce in Canada the whole quantity of iron imported from abroad. How many thousands of men will be employed, supposing the product is 63,000 tons?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are 1,100 people employed by the Londonderry works, which produced 15,000 tons last year.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see, by referring to the United States statistics, that the average production of pig iron is 112 tons per man in the blast furnaces. According to that proposition, an output of 62,000 tons would give employment to 552 men, and the men employed in mining coal and other work might be as many more. The utmost number, therefore, that could be employed would be 1,500. And the country at large is to be taxed to the amount of $94,500, in order that we may employ 1,500 men. The hon. gentleman can easily figure out how much per head this country will have to pay for that privilege. The assertion made by him that the granting of this bounty would be the means of giving employment to thousands of additional men is a specimen of the broad, unwarranted assertions made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the advantages their policy will confer on the country. When you come to analyze their statements and promises you find they will not bear the construction placed upon them, that the country has been deceived, and that it has been led to expect greater advantages from this policy than it actually receives. It is a fair specimen of the extravagant assertion and extravagant promises made by the advocates of this policy, as to the advantages which the country is to realize from the adoption of the policy which they propose.

Mr. McLELAN. The specimen which the hon. gentleman has given us is just a fair one of the course which they have pursued all through, since this policy has been started. He makes the calculation that 1,500 men will produce all the pig iron required in this country. I remember what 500 men can produce; but the employment of 500 men is a trifling matter, he will say. The hon. gentleman forgets that, in the manufacture and production of pig iron, other industries depend upon it, and will be enlarged, as stated by the hon. Finance Minister. The Londonderry works have produced 1,500 tons during the past year; and the industries connected with it, and the works depending upon it, and which are in operation there, have employed at least 1,100 men; and their disbursements during the last year, when they produced 1,500 tons of pig iron, have been over $500,000 to the labor of the country. Some hon. gentlemen have referred to the fact that, in their district, the markets were improved; and I say that, in the neighborhood of this industry, the Londonderry furnaces, one of the best markets for agricultural produce in the Province of Nova Scotia is to be found. The men there employed receive high wages; and they must have the best of everything that the farmers can produce, and they pay for it the best prices, which is one of the advantages realized. I remember that the hon. gentleman made the same calculation with respect to the sugar industry; that a few men would produce—or wash as they call it—all the sugar required in the Dominion of Canada; and he took the ground that it would be better for the people of this country to place these men on the pension list and pay them off; so they would go on with one industry after another until they would wipe out every industry we have, and have foreigners produce these articles, putting our workingmen on the pension list. The hon. member for West Durham paid me the compliment of calling me the representative of the Londonderry Iron Works here. I take it as a compliment that he should call me the representative of one of the greatest industries in the Dominion of Canada—an industry which, as I said before, has employed 1,100 men during the past year, when it only produced half of what it will produce in the coming year, and disbursed for labor over $500,000—I say it is a compliment, and I feel a pride in representing one of the industries of our own country; but I should be ashamed, if I misrepresented that industry in this House, or elsewhere, and declared that the products and manufactures of this industry were inferior to those manufactured in the neighboring country. I should be ashamed, too, if I were the representative of American industries in this House, and if I endeavored to persuade the people of Canada that it were better to let our own people go idle, and employ the manufacturers of the United States and other countries in furnishing the goods required by our people. The hon. member from North Norfolk speaks of the increased taxation under the proposition, and under the policy propounded by the hon. Finance Minister this Session; but there is no increased taxation placed on the country. It was never supposed, it was never intended, and the country never supposed for a moment, that the Tariff of last year would be unchangeable, no matter what the verdict of the people would be; that there is no increased taxation on this article or in the policy brought down this Session. I can tell the hon. gentleman what would bring increased taxation: to carry out his policy, and to have the people of this country idle. There is no greater taxation that can be placed on a country, than to have idleness among the people, and the employed. You give the people of a country, and the laboring men of a country, employment, and pay them good wages, as is the case at the London Iron Works—and I trust that many more men will be employed in the iron industries which will be developed under this system—and you remove taxation from that country practically. The greatest taxation which you can place on a country is to let the laboring class go idle.

Mr. WRIGHT. On behalf of the inhabitants of the great county which I have the honor to represent, I beg to thank the hon. the Finance Minister for introducing these resolutions. I was among the forty gentlemen who urged upon the Government the propriety of protecting this great iron industry. As the hon. Finance Minister has told us, he could then give us no promise in that direction, but he promised to consider the matter. He has considered the matter, and we have the result of that consideration here to-day. I entirely disagree with my hon. friend from North Norfolk with regard to the effect which this will have upon our country and upon our population. I knew that in my own county it will give employment to thousands. Within five miles of the very place where we now sit we have immense deposits of the richest iron ore, and every possible facilities for manufacturing it; and I can say myself, that many gentlemen have passed my house, and have come to it, since this motion was spoken of, with the view of investigating into and examining our iron mines in that region; and I have no doubt that they will make a move in the direction of the erection of furnaces; and a great industry in that way will be developed, benefiting our people immensely, and affording a local market, while additional benefits will be conferred on our people. I would say another word with regard to this policy: It will have a special effect on the people of the Province of Quebec, which has great facilities for manufacturing immense deposits of iron ore, valuable water powers, and an intelligent, docile, and an industrious people; and I think, moreover, that it will have a most beneficial effect on every great interest in our country. In my own county, as I have said, within five miles of this place, we have millions of tons of iron ore, some of which have been taken away; and regret to see it passing by our door and taken to the United States. The effect of this policy will be to build up our own furnaces, to create a market for our produce, and to advance the great iron industries in our midst; therefore I have no hesitation in heartily endorsing, as I do, this policy, and, as one of the members of this House, and also on behalf of the 50,000 people whom I represent, in thanking the hon. Minister for introducing these resolutions.

Mr. VALIN. I am surprised to see so lengthy a discussion, which—as these debates always do—amounts to the same thing. We are always accused of taxing the people, and principally in connection with the proposition of the hon. Finance Minister to give a bounty of $1.50 to the pig iron industry; but we say that it will give employment to a great many of our people. With regard to coal, I am astonished that no representative from the Lower Provinces has risen to state what they should know better than I do, and that is this: Since the National Policy has been in operation, we have developed the coal mines of those Provinces. Before this policy come into force, very few steamers were engaged in carrying this coal to our ports; but since its inauguration this state of affairs has been changed. Last year no less than twenty steamers were engaged in carrying coal from Sydney and Pictou to Montreal direct. What an immense quantity of coal was last year brought into the upper Provinces from those mines; and what a great number of people have been employed in this relation compared with what used to be the case. While a great deal of money has been paid out to the laborers of the mines and to the sailors on the coal vessels, we have encouraged our industries by smelting iron in this country, by which the consumption of coal will also be increased. We have also to remember that this policy has increased the construction and extension of railways in this country. At the last General Election it was sung out on every platform that the price of iron had been increased as well as the price of nearly every other article consumed by the people. On several occasions in my own riding I asked blacksmiths how much they now paid for their iron, and they told me 80 cts. I asked them how much they paid for it before the inauguration of the National Policy, and they said $1, so there is a reduction of 20 cts. on that article. We never saw coal so high in Quebec as it was last fall; but that does not interfere with the importation of coal, because we enlarge our industry, and, therefore, the consumption is enlarged. It is said that this policy has put taxes upon the people; but in 1878 we had the same cry, and at that time the people were starving in Montreal and Quebec because they had nothing to do. By this policy we have given them something to do, and something to earn, and the result is that the mass of the people are more wealthy and more happy.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to prolong the debate of this question, but I wish to make one observation. It seems to me that if we intend to establish manufactures of iron in this country at all, the sooner we commence the better; and I think that perhaps a statement of the effects of the policy which has been pursued in the United States—a policy similar to that proposed by the hon. Finance Minister—might be interesting to the House. In 1870 there were only 10,000 tons of Bessemer steel produced in the United States; in 1877 the amount had risen to 757,000 tons. During the period between 1863 and 1873 prices fell from $158 per ton to $42 per ton, the decline in price being continuous between those two dates. Comparing the years 1880 with 1870, I find that the production has grown in Great Britain in those years to the extent of 17 per cent., while in the United States it has doubled. At the present day the United States produce a greater amount of Bessemer steel than any other country in the world. This has been the result of the adoption in the United States of the policy which it is proposed to be adopted here; and I do not think anyone will consider that such results as I have mentioned would be very injurious to this country. There has been a continuous decline in the price of iron products in the United States. The price of the best refined rolled iron in Philadelphia, in 1844, was $85.62 per ton; in 1850, $59 per ton; in 1877, $52 per ton; while, in 1878, it went down to $45 per ton. So the result has been that the people of the United States have now got this manufacture in their own hands, while, at the same time, they are getting their iron enormously cheaper than before. I think if the adoption of this policy will produce similar results in this country, it will not be displeasing to the country, or to this House.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I should have added nothing to the debate which has taken place, had it not been for some remarks made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It seems to me that we have heard enough about the country being deceived at the last General Election. The changes have been rung upon that subject sufficiently, and I can scarcely think that hon. gentlemen opposite are helping their cause, or assisting the interests of the people, or enabling them to live any better or happier, by continually dwelling on the theme that the country is going to the dogs, or that the people have been deceived. For hon. gentlemen opposite I entertain personally very kind feelings—they are naturally of a kindly disposition; but when they touch upon matters political you would think they were a lot of hired mourners, and that everything looked at through their glasses was of a most dolorous and unhappy character. We have heard that in old times it was the custom to hire mutes at funerals, or rather to hire persons who were, some supposed to be mutes, but when they got home after the funeral, or went to their cafés, they ate and drank and were cheerful like other men. In this House, to-day, we have a compact serried mass of gentlemen sitting to the left of the Speaker whose business seems to be that of professional mourners, hired for the occasion; and the one who succeeds in putting on the most dolorous look is regarded as the head boy of his class. They are most ably led; but is it not about time that they forsook this kind of warfare, and joined in helping to carry on the business of the country. If they have any objections to the Tariff, or to governmental action in any respect, let them make that objection, but let them not be continually placing on record in Hansard, and in the public newspapers, that this country is a splendid place to stay away from. I should judge that they were in the habit of reading the most lugubrious literature.

An hon. MEMBER. The lamentations of Jeromiah.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Yes, perhaps the lamentations of Jeromiah; but it occurs to me that they must also have been reading "The Raven," for with these hon. gentlemen,

"The raven, never flitting,
Still is sitting, still is sitting
On the pallid bust of Pallas,
Just above their chamber door;
And his eyes have all the seeming
Of a demon that is dreaming,
And the lamp light o'er him streaming
Throws his shadow on the floor;
And their soul, from out that shadow
That lies floating on the floor,
Shall be lifted—never more!"

I went into the Library the other day to ask for Byron's Poems, but I found that the volume containing the poem of "Darkness" had been taken out by an hon. gentleman who is a member of the Opposition. This hon. gentleman did not speak, but I have no doubt

"He had a dream which was not all a dream:
The bright sun was extinguished, and the stars
Did wander darkling in the eternal space," &c.

The hon. gentleman did not exactly recite these lines, but one of them recited Sidney Smith on taxation—or rather, he did not recite it, but wrote it on foolscap, and read it. When I heard it, I woke up, and I thought he was talking about a new man named Smith; and I found that it was something every schoolboy knows, and that almost every gentleman in this House must have learned when he was at school. My hon. friends opposite seemed to be acquainted with all that class of literature which would tend to make them unhappy, although a more natural, a more kind, a more cheerful, or a more generous lot of men in private life could hardly be found. But why do they not carry those feelings into Parliament? Why is it that they are always drilled here to put on the habits of mourners, and to take a black cast of everything? Not one of them has a cheerful word in this House. How do they expect to get into power? By telling the people that they are blind, and sick and lame? If you are always telling a man that he is sick, it will not be very long before he is so. Go to any man and tell him: "Your eyes are looking bad; you must be sick." "No," he says, "I feel well enough." Another comes up to him, and says: "Your skin is yellow; you have got the jaundice." "No," he says, "I feel pretty well." Another comes along, and says: "You are looking awful bad." In half an hour you will have that man in bed. Imagine a man sitting down at table with hon. gentlemen opposite in the same mood that they display in this House; they would make any man dyspeptic. I ask hon. gentlemen in all seriousness to give up this kind of thing. Nothing corrupts good manners so much as evil communications, and nothing makes a man more wedded to a thing than continual iteration. If you meet those hon. gentlemen in the corridors, or in the streets, away goes their mourning; it seems to be professional all the time. Either fence them up or else let them stop this kind of work; let them criticise honestly and fairly any Government measure, but let them do it in a Parliamentary way, or a way in which they would teach their children to do it. If any of their children came up to them and whined as they do here, they would box their ears. They have fallen into this bad habit almost imperceptibly. After they go back to their families, I venture to say that for the first three or four weeks, their children hardly know them; they go home after their business here, totally demoralized, totally changed, like the chameleon. The hon. member for West Durham says we are all going to the dogs, that the country is at sea. When hon. gentlemen opposite heard that the Elections were coming off on the 20th June last, they seemed to be convinced that such was the case. They cried out: "You have deceived the country." The hon. member for West Durham issued his address, a most able and eloquent one, in which he gave the people much more than he gave them on the stump. Look at it now; it is like a lawyer looking at his brief after he has lost his case in which the Judge was against him, and the jury did not believe a word he said. Well, here is the hon. gentleman's address. I do not bring it up to hurt the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite, or to wound their mournful minds; I do not do it for that; I only do it because it is my duty to do it. The hon. gentleman closes his address in these words:

"But if in the main you value the principles and approve the policy I announce; if you are prepared to condemn the fraud which would cheat our people of a fair representation, the wrong which would deprive us of our Provincial rights, the injustice that would repudiate an international award, the crime which has placed our future in the North-West in the hands of a great monopoly, the additions, in breach of solemn pledge to taxation, to expenditure and public charge."

The very thing that is being discussed now. The people heard this indictment and pronounced that there was nothing in it—that the Government did not break their pledges; but hon. gentlemen opposite again say that the country has been deceived—the same thing over and over again. I wonder that they do not soon get tired of it. Imagine a man looking at his own face in a glass five hundred times in half an hour and not getting tired of it. I will tell you how they made the mistake. They got in, and that is why they say these things. What about the poor fellows who were defeated. They said to themselves: "If I had not told the people such stuff as this; if I had not talked as I did, and had looked a little more cheerful, I might have got in." These men did not get in, and the men who got in think they got in because of their complaints and their gloominess. They did not; they got in in spite of it. Now, I want to say one thing in regard to the hon. member for West Durham, the able leader of the Opposition. I did think that, considering the history of the past, he might have spared the bitter sneer—in which he is so apt, and in which he rivals all competitors—in regard to the Province of Nova Scotia, one county of which I have the honor to represent, and in which Province I have the honor to have been born—a Province whose members, every one of them, on either side of the House love; and we did not come into this House to be sneered at even by so able a man as the hon. leader of the Opposition. We came into this Confederation to help to cement British constitutions on this side of the Atlantic; we came in, as we deemed, at the request of Her Majesty the Queen, who, through her Ministers and her proper officers, had signified her willingness and her desire that there should be a confederation of these Provinces, and that under the British Crown they should be thereby strengthened instead of being segregated and isolated as they were. We have continually heard a sneer from the hon. gentleman against that Province. Let him read his speeches on the subject of the better terms—we had not a Hansard then, but they are fully detailed in the newspapers of the day—and he now sneers at the hon. Minister who represents the county of Colchester, because it is a part of Nova Scotia. He did not go on to say what we all knew he meant.

Mr. BLAKE. What?

Mr. WOODWORTH. What? That Colchester happens to be a part of Nova Scotia, and there is no reason why it should be benefited by this duty on pig iron. I will not go into the Library and copy Sidney Smith; I will not say that it is the act of a coward who raises his hand to strike, but has not the courage to give the blow; but I will say that the inuendo was that the hon. member came from a small Province, while the hon. leader of the Opposition was from a great Province.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I tell you we from that Province are as capable of taking the meaning of a slur, or a sneer, as the hon. gentleman himself; and I tell the hon. gentleman that until he gets rid of that sectional feeling, that until he gets rid of the feeling that one Province is to be arrayed against another, and that, when it suits him, hidden prejudices should be brought out; until he gets rid of that desire to turn one brother against another, he need never expect to sit on this side of this House and lead the Government of this country.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not want to.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I will say of the hon. gentleman, as a person said of a certain animal that attacked an engine. A bull came down from the hill and rushed against an engine, and a Yankee present, said: "I admire your pluck, but I don't think much of your judgment." Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk, although one of the most pleasant and cheerful gentlemen, personally, in the House, a gentleman who would be the last to enter a coterie of professional mourners, indulged in a similar strain, and repeated the same thing over and over again, like the story of old Mother Mory:

"I will tell you a story of old Mother Mory,
Now my story is begun;
I will tell you another of Jack, her brother,
And now my story is done."

He said the people were deceived because there was a bounty to be given to the manufacturer of pig iron. Well, we had heard all about this before. The hon. Finance Minister has explained that the country is not being deceived, that he has not deceived the people either by word or implication; and the word of the hon. Finance Minister in this House and country is equal to that of any hon. gentleman. The hon. Finance Minister also defied hon. gentlemen opposite to show him a word in any of his speeches to bear out the assertion of the hon. leader of the Opposition; and that hon. gentleman, subtle lawyer that he is, could not turn to any such words in the pages of Hansard, but said that he had forgotten the words and could not tell exactly what they were. Although he has one of the most profound memories of any gentleman in Canada; although his friends claim that he remembers anything he reads, yet he could not, after having made the charge, substantiate it by evidence. Nor would the hon. member for North Norfolk quote the words. The hon. member for North Norfolk was strangely unhappy in this matter, for, after all, if the people are deceived that would help him. If we are to judge by the statement of the party organs that support him, anything this Government can do to drive this country into such a state of distress and dissatisfaction that the people will not endure the present Ministry any longer, is certainly an advantage to his cause. When this House was adjusting the different counties of Ontario, so as to give a basis of 21,000 of a population to each member, the North Norfolk Reformer, which is said to be the organ of the hon. gentleman, said that when this thing was done the people of Ontario would become exasperated and they would do—what? The Reformers would thus deal with matter:

“Though the Gerrymandering Bill is the most contemptible and cowardly act of a life, stained by all that is mean, despicable, base and fraudulent—

(What a lovely combination of adjectives)

—we will regard it as a blessing if it culminated in placing our beloved Ontario in the great sisterhood of the United States of America.”

That is a loyal sentiment. It commences with this mournful ditty in that lachrymose style for which hon. gentlemen opposite are famous, who lead in the chorus, and then it falls into its natural vent, and congratulates the people of Ontario that this Bill will have the effect of driving them into the sisterhood of the United States. Why the hon. member for North Norfolk, and every hon. member on that side of this House, who is concerned in keeping up a paper like that, should denounce that article, as loyal, honorable men would. They cannot afford to wink at it, for it has gone to the public and has been read far and wide. I do not know that the paper expresses the opinion of hon. members opposite, as a whole, or that it expresses the opinion of even one of them; but all I know is that it has gone to the public, that it has been read by the people of the United States, and, as far as it is concerned, shows them that we are a discontented people, that we do not like Canada and our own institutions, and are only too happy to cut the Gordian knot that ties us to the Mother Country, and go over to the United States.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What about pig iron?

Mr. WOODWORTH. Well, the hon. gentleman heard so much about pig iron that he did not rise from his seat to say a word about it. Hon. gentlemen opposite called up spirits from the vast deep, but they could not lay them again. They had called up too many. They had called up such an array of evidence and facts that even the hon. member for L'Islet, who was always ready in his calm, dispassionate, and most able manner, and who is most gentlemanly in his bearing, could not say a word, after the speeches of the hon. Finance Minister, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the hon. Minister of Railways, who spoke in his old style, as has been said by the hon. leader of the Opposition, in his trenchant style, that those hon. gentlemen have heard before, and whose words had the effect of the command of Joshua when he ordered the sun to stand still—they obeyed. I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the House with what has been gone over and over again, as the guns of hon. member opposite have been already spiked, so that they represent, as I think Disraeli once said, extinct volcanoes.

Mr. CHARLTON. As reference has been made to me by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I will say with reference to his remarks that it would have been a gratification to some of us on this side of the House who were engaged in discussing the resolution before the House, if he had said a few words about pig iron. He reminds me of the story of the two Irishmen who were in a hotel that caught fire, and who escaped in haste without taking time to clothe themselves properly. One of them put on his pantaloons with the wrong side to the back and saved himself by jumping out of the window. The other wishing to ascertain the condition of his friend, asked him: “Are you killed?” The other answered: “No, but I am fatally twisted.” Such was the character of the hon. gentleman's speech. It was utterly illogical and had nothing to do with the question before the House, and in a Parliamentary sense the hon. gentleman fatally twisted himself. The hon. gentleman, by innuendo, referred to me as being an annexationist. It happens that I was born in the United States. As I said before, I disclaim any responsibility for that circumstance. I was not even consulted in reference to the matter. I must say that, although it was a very important event in my life, I have no recollection of it, and consequently I do not know that I ought to be held responsible for it.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The paper supported you in that Election.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am coming to that point. I have lived in Canada some thirty-five years, and I have attempted to discharge my duties as a subject and a citizen, and I suppose I ought to be considered long enough a resident of the country to become naturalized by this time. I think, I have never given utterance to annexationist sentiments in my life, and I am thoroughly loyal—though I say it myself—to the institutions of this country. I disclaim and repudiate the insinuation made by the hon. gentleman, an insinuation he has no reason to make, no ground to make—a base, slanderous and cowardly insinuation. When I first ran an election in this country, in 1872, an attempt was made by the party that hon. gentleman belongs to, to injure me by insinuations of this kind, but the attempt never has been made in that county since—it did not pay. Now, with reference to this newspaper. It is not published in my riding. I am not responsible for the sentiments of that editor, or any other editor in this country. That utterance was made a short time before the last Election, and I disclaimed any responsibility for them, or any sympathy for them, or any sympathy with those utterances, as I do to-day; and the attempt of the hon. gentleman to impose this matter—a purely personal matter, and a base charge at that—with this discussion against me, is one that I am sure will not raise the hon. gentleman's character very much in the estimation of this House.

Resolution to be reported.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

REMUNERATION OF THE ACTIVE MILITIA.

Mr. CARON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions (April 18th) respecting the pay of officers and men of the Active Militia for each day's drill of three hours, under section 45 of Bill (No. 31) to consolidate and amend the laws affecting the Militia of Canada.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CARON. The resolutions I now have the honor of submitting to the consideration of the Committee, propose to fix the pay of the Militia force of Canada according to rank. The change I now propose to introduce applies only to the city corps. Under Orders in Council from 1868 the rural corps who have been serving in the different camps of exercise have been paid according to rank; and hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with the force will understand me when I say that there is no reason why the city corps, who spend so much time and money in keeping up the Militia force in the large centres in a state of efficiency, should not be paid according to rank as the rural corps were paid. The schedule which I now ask the Committee to approve fixes the pay according to the scale adopted by the British Government for the army. It will be seen, by referring to the schedule, that the pay is not at all extravagant. It must be remembered that we keep up in Canada what I consider to be a most efficient force. I consider the Militia force of Canada is a credit to this country, and would be, as I have already had occasion to remark, a credit to any country; and the pay we now propose to give them by a statutory enactment, is the same that is given the rural corps when serving in their camps of instruction. Considering the number of days during which our citizen soldiers are called upon to drill, I consider that pay is really not extravagant, and that it is merely meeting the requirements of the force. I may state, and all gentlemen connected with the force are aware of the fact, that this pay does not at all cover the expenses which officers in both city and rural corps are called upon to meet. We all know that officers going to camp are called upon to provide out of their own pocket, for the efficiency not only of their bands, but also for the maintenance of the efficiency of the various battalions, and they will be still called upon to contribute a great deal to keep the Militia force of Canada in the state of efficiency in which it is to-day. Hon. members will see, on looking at the resolutions, that a lieutenant-colonel only receives $4.87; major, $3.90; paymaster, $3.05; adjutant, with rank of lieutenant, $2.44; adjutant, with rank of 2nd lieutenant, $2.13; surgeon, $3.65; assistant surgeon, $2.43; quartermaster, $1.94; captain, $2.82; lieutenant, $1.53; 2nd lieutenant, $1.28; sergeant-major, $1; quartermaster-sergeant, 90 cts.; paymaster's clerk, 90 cts.; orderly room clerk, 90 cts.; hospital sergeant, 90 cts.; pay sergeant, 89 cts.; sergeant, 75 cts.; corporal, 60 cts.; bugler, 50 cts.; private, 50 cts.; for each horse taking part in such drill, $1. The pay of the Quartermaster-General at headquarters, shall be at the rate of $2,600 per annum. While my Bill was met, as I believe all important measures should be met, by the criticism of hon. members who have had much experience in regard to the Militia force, I consider it was criticised in a very friendly spirit. My reason for introducing it is that I believe it is necessary to place the whole Militia force of Canada in that state of efficiency which it should and would occupy under the new regulations. Some discussion took place when the Bill was introduced, and at its second reading in regard to the appointment of a Quartermaster-General. It is not the intention at present to increase the expense of the Department by adding an additional officer to those we possess to-day. But hon. gentlemen will see that the amount specified to be paid as salary to the Quartermaster-General is exactly the sum which has always been voted for the Adjutant-General. In introducing this measure, it was necessary to provide for the possibility of the Department changing the Adjutant-General, or replacing him, although we would not like to do so, and never would do so, so long as I preside over the Department, for I would like neither the Department nor the country to be deprived of the services of the Adjutant-General, who has taken a deep interest in Militia matters, and who is known to be a most efficient officer; still, if it was considered desirable for the efficiency of the service to give him a different designation and to have him called Quartermaster-General instead of Adjutant-General, we would have, under the provisions of this Act, power to do so. I think those who have studied the matter will know that if a case of emergency arises the most important officer in the organization of the Militia force is the Quartermaster-General, and it might happen, from various reasons which it is not requisite to-night to discuss, to have a different name given to the efficient officer whom the Department possesses to-day. That is the reason why I have inserted this provision, and hon. gentlemen, as I have already pointed out, will observe that the salary is exactly the same as that which is annually voted for the Adjutant-General. So far as regards the clause:

"That the officers and men of the Marine Militia, and the officers of the Reserve Militia, when called out and drilled, under sections forty-six and forty-seven of the said Bill (No. 31) shall receive for each day's drill the pay of their respective ranks, according to the foregoing schedule."

I may state to hon. gentlemen, and they know as well as I can explain it, that this branch of the Militia is only paid in case of emergency; and in such cases, when all the different sections of the force are called out for active service, it is only right they should be placed on a footing of equality, and all be paid according to rank. There is, in paying the force according to rank, more than the question of money involved; there is the question of paying a man for the responsibility which he is called upon to assume. If a lieutenant-colonel, who is in command of a battalion, receives, as under the old regulations, $1 per day, as does every other officer, such a condition of things tends to sap the very foundation of the whole structure of the Militia force, in so far that the officer is not paid for the responsibility which he is called upon to assume. In regard to the reserve force, we have carried out the same principle, for the purpose of making it one system, applicable to the whole Militia force, because it is admitted that we have only one force in Canada. We have no distinction between classes, we have not got one body which is superior to another, they all belong to the active Militia force of Canada, and for the purpose of instructing the men who take an interest in the force, the rank and file, the non-commissioned officers and officers, we have been endeavoring to give them means of instruction by this Bill which they did not formerly possess; and when hon. gentlemen look into this Bill, as I have no doubt they have, it will meet their approval. I have received letters from the great Province of Ontario, from Quebec and other Provinces, all suggesting changes and amendments which it will be my duty to submit to this Committee when we come to the different sections. I must say that all the amendments suggested are altogether in the sense of the measure as it was originally proposed; but they are not of any great importance, except as coming from gentlemen who take any interest in the Militia force, and who have taken the trouble to read and study the Bill; and they made suggestions which I consider my duty, as taking a deep interest in the future of the force, and as head of the Department, to submit to the House. These are resolutions which provide for the pay according to rank; and this Bill, as I have already stated, accords the pay which has always been given to the rural corps and to the force which drills in camps of instruction instead of at headquarters; and there is no reason why this should not be extended to the other corps. The sum required to defray this expenditure will amount to between $10,000 and $12,000 per annum; but I must state that in according this privilege to the city corps, we grant it to corps who perform many more days' drill than do the rural corps. In cities, as hon. gentlemen who live in large cities know, during winter, when young men who are engaged in banking or commercial business can get away from their business earlier than during the summer months, when business requires more of their attention, take advantage of this fact to improve their knowledge of drill, and the efficiency of the force, owing to these extra drills, for which they receive no pay at all, is greatly increased; and I thought it only right to recognise what these men have done, by placing them exactly on the same footing with other corps, which, not in cities, but in country towns, and in various parishes, as in the Province of Quebec, are called upon to drill in camps. I think that these resolutions will meet with the approbation and approval of the House; and I am perfectly certain that the hon. gentlemen who have looked into them will see that the expenditure now proposed is in the right direction. I have heard hon. gentlemen propose—and rightly possibly from their stand-point—that the pay of the men should be increased, and I have heard hon. gentlemen propose an increase of 10 cts. a day. Now, I have taken particular trouble to ascertain exactly how the militiamen—or military men, if I may so call them—of Canada have been paid; and I can say that even 60 cts. instead of 50 cts. a day would not at all remunerate them for the time they lose in going into camp. I know and have met men in the various camps which it has been my privilege to visit, who were paying, over and above the 50 cts. they received, $1 a day, and sometimes more, to men to take their places on farms, or in the various establishments and factories where they were employed. I consider that the militiamen of Canada do not seek a complete remuneration for the time spent in learning their drill, and in picking up the information which is absolutely requisite to establish a force that can be called upon at any moment to protect the country, or to take that position which an efficient Militia force should occupy; but they consider that the Government, in giving this 50 cts. a day, does so merely to defray their expenses, and we have never found any difficulty in getting men to take this view of the question to fill up the ranks, when this was requested. All the battalions in the various branches of the service, the different batteries, the troops of cavalry, and batteries of artillery, always find the men required to fill up their ranks. If the 10 cts. additional a day were added to the present expenditure, hon. gentlemen will understand, that for 20,000 men, this would make an increase of $2,000 per diem, and for twelve days drill, of $24,000 per annum. I believe that the Militia force of Canada will consider that in view of the improvements which we are now introducing, and the various changes which we are making in the old Militia Act of Canada, we are sincerely desirous of giving to it the greatest possible efficiency; and I know, and believe, and am certain, that the Militia force of Canada will be perfectly ready to allow us to proceed gradually, and not to bring down, as yet, too large a budget for the Militia Department, which would be considered to be too large or too great for the resources or requirements of the country. I feel that, as the Bill now stands, it will give to the Militia force of Canada the greatest possible efficiency, and that those who have taken an interest in the matter and looked into it will be satisfied with it. We have our difficulties, of course, in a country like Canada. We cannot expect, and do not require,—and I as head of the Department would be very sorry indeed to organize—anything bearing the expense of a standing army, as some papers have alleged—and in such a way indeed, as I thought that the facts of the case did not at all warrant. The whole standing army of Canada will consist of 750 men, which cannot be considered as a menace in any respect. If this is a standing army, it is a standing army simply in the sense of being the means of educating our militiamen who have been clamoring for the opportunity of gaining that knowledge and experience in Militia matters which would qualify them to pass their examinations and obtain their commissions. We have already in the case of "A" and "B" Batteries applied that system to the artillery, and the effect has been to distribute all over the country a large number of trained and experienced men, who, in case of an emergency, would be ready to take charge of the force. All we have done in this Bill is to apply to the infantry the system which has worked so well with the artillery. I leave it to the Committee to decide whether this is not a Bill which will meet the requirements of the force, and place it in a state of efficiency which it has not possessed heretofore.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask the hon. Minister two or three questions. To the schedule itself I offer no objection, as I believe it is about as fair as we might expect. I would ask if the hon. gentleman meant when he stated that this would apply to the city corps, that there would be any longer period than the twelve days annual drill. What have the city corps been getting in the past?

Mr. CARON. This applies to every day during which the Militia would be called out in active service. Of course, it would apply only to the twelve days drill in the case of the city corps; but when applied to active service this schedule will regulate the pay which will be given on every occasion when a rural and city corps are called out.

Mr. THOMPSON. But if the city corps drill at headquarters will they get it?

Mr. CARON. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then with reference to the last item on the list, will that apply to field officers' horses?

Mr. CARON. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. I understood the hon. gentleman to state in the former discussion on the Bill, that the men were to be rewarded by medal or otherwise for long service?

Mr. CARON. If the hon. gentleman so understood me I have only to say that I did not intend to make a remark in the sense in which he understood me. I have no doubt that in the future such a policy may be arrived at, but there is no intention of making any change in that regard by the Bill which is now before the House.

Mr. LISTER. When this Bill was before the House the other day, I took the liberty of suggesting certain amendments to the hon. Minister of Militia. I also adverted to the fact that, in my opinion, the men of the force were inadequately paid. The hon. gentleman does not appear to have regarded these suggestions, and he appears to think that the men are sufficiently well paid. I beg further to call his attention to the fact that in 1878, when the last Government was in power, the pay of the men was 60 cts. per day, and since the accession of the present Administration to power the allowance has been reduced to 50 cts. I entirely approve of the advance which has been made in putting the city force on the same footing as the other as regards pay, but I think that the motives which induced the hon. Minister to increase their pay might have been extended to the rank and file of the force. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says that the men are willing to serve at 50 cts. per day, and in support of my statement I call attention to the fact that in many of the counties of Ontario the pay of the volunteers has been supplemented by grants from the county councils, showing that the pay they receive is not considered satisfactory. If the force is as efficient as the hon. Minister of Militia says it is, it is to a large extent due to the liberality of the county councils throughout the Provinces. I think some inducement should be held out to the volunteers to remain in the service and to make themselves efficient soldiers; and I would suggest to him that the pay of the volunteers should be increased gradually from year to year. For the first year's service they might receive 50 cts. per day, and each year thereafter an increase of 10 cts. per day until the expiration of five years when their pay would be $1 per day, which would be no more than they are entitled to. As I stated the other day, in 1878 the volunteers of this country were led to believe that if hon. gentlemen opposite who were then in Opposition attained to the Treasury benches, they would consider what they regarded a grievance on the part of the volunteers and would remove that grievance by increasing their pay. These promises, although not made by Ministers themselves, were made by candidates who were supporters of the Ministry; and I feel it is the duty of this Government to carry out the pledges they made to these volunteers. I feel that the Government has done an injustice to the volunteer force of the country, and this measure, so far as the pay of the volunteers is concerned, will be received with anything but satisfaction. I do not propose to offer an amendment; if the hon. Minister finds, notwithstanding the boasted surplus of the hon. Minister of Finance, that he cannot afford a simple act of justice to these men, I shall not offer any amendment. But year after year, when this matter comes up, it will be my duty, as a representative of the people, to call the attention of the Government to it; and I hope that in the course of a few years they will see their way to do this simple act of justice. You must remember that the ranks of the volunteers are increased by mechanics, clerks, bank clerks, and people occupying commercial positions throughout the country, and that while they are away, they are losing time and money, and they ought to be compensated to a reasonable extent; but 50 cts. a day I consider entirely inadequate to the services these men have to perform.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The hon. Minister, the other night, I believe, questioned my right as a civilian to criticise his Militia Bill. Of course, I acknowledge the charge; I am a civilian, but I think I am within my right as a member of this House to criticise any measure which is proposed by the Government or by any member of the House. I think I am quite within my right as a civilian to criticise a Bill, when the hon. Minister of Militia considers it his right as a civilian to introduce a Bill. I agree very cordially with the Minister in the proposition he makes to pay the city corps for drill. In that respect, I think the Bill is a decided improvement on the old measure. I think that we have not, perhaps, paid sufficient attention to these clerks and others who have ample time on their hands, and who might be physically improved by joining the Militia, and who would be quite an acquisition to its ranks. I am not going to find fault with the hon. Minister's policy so far as it extends increased advantages to the force; I think that any steps he takes in that direction is a commendable one; but he proposes by this measure two or three changes which I think are entirely uncalled for. I see by the Estimates that he proposes to add an additional officer to the staff—an Inspector of Artillery at a salary of $2,300. The duties of that officer were previously performed by the officers of "A" and "B" Batteries.

Mr. CARON. Will my hon. friend allow me to state that I am not creating a new office at all. The pay which this Inspector of Artillery has hitherto received out of the vote for "A" and "B" batteries is simply transferred from that vote and made a separate item. He has been transferred to headquarters, and we did not consider it right to have his salary charged against the vote for "A" and "B" batteries.

Mr. ROSS. I am satisfied with the explanation. Then there is an appropriation for a Quartermaster-General; and the hon. Minister has not explained to me satisfactorily what his duties are, and what necessity there is for such an officer at all. I am afraid that if we give him power to appoint an officer of this kind, who seems to me to be a supernumerary, the position will soon be filled, although the duties may not begin for several years. I hope the hon. Minister will dispense with that part of his resolution relating to this officer.

Mr. SPROULE. I must say, with reference to the increases proposed this year, that I for one entirely dissent from them. For several years past we have been increasing our Militia expenditure, and if the amount proposed under this Bill is added to the $773,000 which is expended for Militia and Defence, it will bring the total expenditure up to a very large sum. There is an increase over last year of something over $26,000. I think there is a great feeling in the country that we are spending a larger amount of this money for artificial show than for useful service. I think that when there are no appearances of danger in the country we should keep these military expenditures as low as possible. I think that the Military College which was left us as a legacy by the last Government, like the Supreme Court, was saddled on the country, and we receive very little benefit from it. I do not think that because that was introduced under any previous Government, that is any strong argument why it should be continued to-day. It may be that in the towns and cities this expenditure is endorsed, but I believe we get very little return for it. If we make the very increase in the expenditure this year which this Bill calls for, the people will begin to believe there is extravagance in this line not commendable under present circumstances. I believe the most of this money is eaten up in the large cities and towns, and the volunteers in the country receive little or no remuneration at all. In all fairness the volunteers of the country, ought, if any increase is to be made, to receive this increase, and all this money should not be spent in the cities to keep what may be called an artificial show of a staff of men.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the hon. gentleman who spoke last has not read the Estimates, or he would not say what he has said. If he will look at the expenditure, he will find that the staff costs only $30,000, out of the $773,000, and if he considers that a large proportion, he cannot know much about the subject. With regard to the Quartermaster-General, I think it is right the Government should have power to make the appointment, in case of any trouble, and we must take the pledge of the hon. Minister, that he will not make the appointment unless it becomes absolutely necessary. I thoroughly agree with the proposition, that the officers of county corps should receive the same pay as those of the city corps, and also with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lambton, that an increase should be given to the term of service; and I hope the hon. Minister will take that into consideration. He might even say that all the men who enlist for a second term of three years should receive increased pay. That would not be much additional expense, and would be felt as a great advantage. I would also ask the hon. Minister if he would act on the suggestion I made the other day, to increase the pay of officers commanding field batteries over that of a regimental captain. An officer having charge of so much Government property and commanding 70 or 80 men should at least have the pay of the major of an infantry battalion. All this outcry against the expense of the Militia sounds childish when we consider the small amount we expend on the service. Why, the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada expended a larger amount. Here the expenditure now is less than 25 cents per head of the population; in the United States the standing army costs $1 per head and the several States spend more on their State militia, than we; the expenditure of the British Government on its army amounts to $4 per head of its population. With our surplus of $7,000,000 and a revenue of $30,000,000 to $40,000,000, to say we should expend less is to say we are to be different from any other civilized country on the face of the earth.

Mr. VAIL. Do I understand correctly that $8,000 to $10,000 would be the additional expense?

Mr. CARON. Yes.

Mr. VAIL. Really I do not know that there is any objection to it if the country can afford it. But I remember, when hon. gentlemen opposite sat on this side of the House they never lost an opportunity of finding fault with us on account of our expensive staff, and they said that any increased expenditure should be in the direction of payment to the men. Now, it so happens this is entirely on the staff and the men are to be neglected altogether. I think the amount the officers receive is entirely out of proportion with that of the men. I think the least the Government should do, if they are going to carry out this principle and the country is in a position to afford it, will be to increase the pay of the privates as well as the officers. It is quite true it is a very trifling amount, but when we consider that the officer heretofore has been doing duty for $1 per day and is now to get $4.87 per day, giving him $60 instead of $12, the addition is considerable, and if he should be called out for an additional number of days it will amount in the aggregate to a large sum. I do not wish it to be considered that I am finding fault, because I know these gentlemen have done a great deal of work in the interests of the country for a small amount of pay. True, they have more honor and credit, and the hon. Minister of Militia the other day paid them a high compliment in his speech when introducing the Bill. I think they might be allowed to continue to do a little more work in the interests of the country for the honor and receive the same pay as the men in the ranks are only to receive 50 cts. a day. If the hon. Minister can do so, I hope when he gets through the Estimates he will make up his mind to add $20,000 to the Militia grant and divide it among the men as well. It is very easy for the hon. Minister to make himself popular by being able to increase the pay of all the officers and the officers connected with the Department. I could have done so when we were in power, but we were restricted for money and had to curtail in every respect, and I find the expenditure the last year I had the honor of filling the position the hon. gentleman now holds was $550,000 compared with $751,000 last year, and this year there is an additional expenditure. If the country can afford it, well and good; but let us understand, at all events, who is to receive the money, if it is to go into the pockets of the officers and not of the men.

Mr. THOMPSON. I look upon this question possibly in a different light from some hon. gentlemen. I do not consider it a political question, but rather one of a national nature, one in which we are called upon to furnish means for the defence of our country in case of need. The pay that is allowed to the officers seems to be large, yet it must be borne in mind that a large amount is expended by them in keeping up the force. While thankful for the increase of 10 cts. per day to the men, I would impress upon the Minister, if possible, to increase that, and we can do so by reducing the number of men that are to be drilled annually, and in that way we would have a more effective force. As regards the promises made previous to the Elections, referred to by my hon. friend from West Lambton, Tory promises are not always to be relied upon; and in questions of this kind, I fancy they have gone as far, probably, as our friends did when they were in power. But two wrongs do not make a right. We are discussing the Militia question, and we want to make it as effective as possible, and with due regard to some encouragement to the men who form the rank and file of the various corps. When we are called upon to go to camp every second year, it is sometimes with great difficulty that rural battalions are filled. I venture to say that some of these men, if they were called upon for active service, or to be inspected, many of them would be ordered to withdraw from the ranks on account of their physical inability. If you want an effective force it ought to be reduced, and drilled annually and paid better. I trust the hon. Minister will give this matter every consideration and try to extend to the rank and file of the volunteer force, that justice to which they are entitled.

Mr. OUIMET. I agree with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson), that this Parliament ought not to begrudge to the Militia the very small amount we pay them. I say small amount, because if you add to the three quarters of a million the expenses of the Department it brings the amount to nearly $800,000, and of that sum only about $25,000 goes to the Militia. I look upon the Militia of a country, not precisely as a necessity, because I do not think our Militia are likely to be called upon to defend our country against an invading force for many years to come; but I look upon the Militia as a national institution the promotion of which is the best means of creating among our population a national feeling, a real Canadian feeling. When several regiments meet together in a review I think the men are proud of themselves, it makes emulation among them, and it is flattering to them to realize that they constitute an ornament and a protection to the nation, I congratulate the Minister of Militia on the few thousands he spends to have reviews of the city corps. City corps cannot be treated in the same way as rural corps. A city corps cannot, as a rule, go into camp, because the men who compose a city corps cannot leave their employment for a fortnight without exposing themselves to severe loss. They give a good deal of time for the annual drills and to prepare themselves for the reviews on our national fête days. We have seen them parading on the last reviews, and I think they did credit to themselves and to the Militia force. I know the rural corps are deserving of great credit too, but they are not so readily available as the city corps. For instance, if the Militia were to be called out in a case of emergency, as in a case of riot, it would be very easy in twenty-four hours to gather at least 1,500 or 2,000 men of our city corps, while it would take several days to assemble a rural corps, whose companies are generally spread over a large territory. I would, therefore, be disposed to agree with hon. members who have recommended that an increase of pay should be given to the volunteers for each additional year of service. I think this expense would be quite justifiable, and while we are voting this money, I am surprised to see that there was no increase of pay granted to Deputy Adjutants-General. These officers receive only $1,200 a year, while it is proposed to give first-class clerks in the Department over $2,000. I would ask the hon. Minister of Militia if he considers that a Deputy Adjutant-General, who has occupied a high rank in the regular army, should not receive as much as these clerks in the Departments. I do not mean to depreciate the services rendered by these clerks, but I mean to say that Deputy Adjutants-General, who are presumed to be qualified for the position, ought to earn enough to keep their families alive, because I really think that $1,200 for a man in the position that a Deputy Adjutant-General is supposed to occupy in a city, is too small a sum for his services. I am really sorry that in this schedule no increase of salary has been provided for these officers, nor for the Brigade Majors. I do not think that our constituents will ever blame us for encouraging the Militia, as a rule. I would be in favor of encouraging it more than we have done in the past. For my part, I would be disposed to curtail the amount that is allowed our standing army or nucleus of an army, and to increase the pay to the militiamen.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Laval, in advocating an increase to the men in the city, says they cannot leave their work, and because they are holding important positions. Every man who is following his daily avocation holds, what is to him, an important position. I do not think that is any argument at all. There is one peculiarity in reference to the demand for increased pay to the officers, and that is that almost every member in this House who supports it appears to be an officer himself. It is only like men speaking for themselves. I believe that the men who must be depended upon, speaking generally, come from the rural districts, and that they make up the great force of an army. I am not one of those who believe that they cannot be brought into the field on short notice. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has stated that city corps can be brought into the field in twenty-four hours. Our experience at the time of the Fenian raid was that it did not take several days to place the country corps in the field, but that many of them were in the field within twenty-four hours, and indeed as soon as city corps. In regard to the increase in salary I must say again, notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that it is much more important to pay the privates than the officers, for every increase appears to be in the direction of the latter, and as going towards city corps, and to make up the artificiality of military life as a nation. I hold that we have a right to criticise this Bill because we, in the rural districts, will, in a large measure, have to pay the money, and this Bill will leave another law on the Statute-book which will cause increases from year to year, and which will be defended on the ground that the Bill at the time was acknowledged to be a right and proper one. The Bill appears to create other officers, whose pay some will consider extravagant, and in that and other ways, a large additional amount will be needed every year to pay the demands for that service. The hon. member for Muskoka said that, considering the importance of our country and its population, we are paying a very small sum for defensive purposes. This is a very young country, and there are no signs of danger; and if we take $773,000 for the Militia Department, $416,000 for the Mounted Police, and if we add the increase which will naturally occur under this Act, amounting to $125,000 or $150,000, these items amount to a very considerable sum. It is time we should consider if this expenditure is to go on increasing from year to year, what we are to receive for it, especially if there is not some curtailment, especially at a time when there is very little evidence of an increased demand for such a standing army.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. member for Laval has referred to the salaries paid to Deputy Adjutants-General, viz.: $1,200. It must be remembered that they are granted $500 as allowances, which increases the amount to $1,700.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman could live on that or not.

Mr. BAIN. I agree a good deal with the expressions which have fallen from the hon. member for Grey, when he says that we have many officers here to see that they get justice in any readjustment made by this Bill. I do not intend to say one word in regard to the officers, but the readjustment is not made in a direction which will be likely to satisfy the rank and file of the Militia service of this country. I remember that before I entered Parliamentary life, while I was doing municipal service, the difficulty that surrounded the Militia service, and that the county council granted an additional allowance of 25 cts. per day while they were in camp. That county council has found it necessary to continue that practice since. Hon. gentlemen talk about the inconvenience of young men in cities obtaining absence for a period of two weeks to go into camp, but young men in the country find it just as inconvenient to leave their employment, and in not a few cases they have had to pay more to have their places supplied than the whole amount received, without considering any expenditure in camp. I think the young men of the country will not value any concession made in the interests of companies organized in cities, and I confess I sympathize in the feeling which will grow up with our young men that the additional expenditure on the Militia force is being a good deal made in the direction of display, tinsel and feathers, and not towards the substantial improvement of what really must be the backbone of the Militia service if it is ever going to amount to anything. Hon. gentlemen opposite are asking much about the character of the force, and it is only just that they should show more liberality to the men who have really done the work.

Mr. WRIGHT. I, too, have dwelt in Arcadia, and have the honor of holding a commission in Her Majesty's service, and it is very pleasing to find military men take the proper part which they should do in a discussion of this kind, and that laymen, gentlemen who are fond of taunting us with being laymen, as regards other matters, occupy their appropriate position. I am quite certain every one was very much gratified at the statement made in the Speech from the Throne, in which His Excellency assured us, after a somewhat protracted tour through the United States, he found that the people of that country entertained the kindest and most friendly feeling towards us, and that the military manœuvres of the hon. Minister had not excited too serious an alarm in the minds of that great people, and in fact that the entente cordiale between the two great nations had been practically restored. That is a very gratifying assurance, coming as it does from so high, distinguished and well-informed a source. But I think we must all be glad in the main with this Bill of the hon. Minister of Militia. The very able gentleman who preceded me adopted what may be termed the Fabian policy. He instilled a more vigorous sentiment into the minds of the people. In fact, he attended the great camps and military manœuvres, and by his excellent speeches, by the singular ability which characterized all these speeches, he appealed, in the best possible manner, to every generous, kindly and manly sentiment in the hearts of the people. He made use of the great song of the French:

"Aux armes citoyens, Formez vos bataillons."

Every nation represents an idea. We, in this country, with 4,000,000 of people, represent the Monarchical idea, and our neighbors, with 40,000,000, represent the Democratic idea. We had, of course, to form a military establishment, which was done by our predecessors in office in the shape of the Kingston College, and to carry out the military idea as is done in every free nation; and though we are only 4,000,000, we are determined to hold—I say honestly and earnestly—this lone outpost of the British Empire against all arms, and I think that the hon. gentleman has done much by his policy to introduce very fine and frank and manly sentiments in the hearts of our people. I, myself, have watched with great pleasure the strategical ability of the hon. Minister in forming great camps along the frontier. We have been told by gentlemen connected with the navy, that we are the fourth navy power in the world, and if in addition to the Canadian navy, we are backed up by the navy of England and our own force, it will be a hard thing if we cannot struggle against almost any odds. I have a little complaint of my own to make. Some years ago I called upon the hon. gentleman with a view to the organization of a regiment of militia in my own county, that great county in which all the men are brave and all the women are beautiful. We appeal to the fair sex always, and because they are now to exercise a beneficial influence on the destinies of the Militia. We were promised by the hon. Minister that he would give our representations every consideration; but I regret to say, that owing to circumstances over which he doubtless had no control, they have not received the consideration which we expected; and so I now formally make my complaint before the House, and I hope that this great wrong will be remedied. We have three or four companies in our county, kept up under singular and disadvantageous circumstances; they are isolated companies, who hold their meetings, I may say, in the very heart of the primeval forest. They hold themselves together by mutual ties, send men to Wimbledon, and in every way conduct themselves in such a way as to be a credit to the Militia force of the country; and I have felt it only fair, representing as I do such a great part of the Province of Quebec, to state that I think that their wants should be considered. I remember, many years ago, when Sir George E. Cartier was Minister of Militia, his asking me if I could bring down a couple of companies to Ottawa, and in twenty-four hours or so I succeeded in procuring the very best men in the county, the very flower of the county, to come out, and in three days the battalion drill they displayed was an example—as was stated by members of Parliament at that time, to myself—to any of the older corps of the Dominion. I may state that these young men in this military organization which I speak of are nearly all temperance men. They belong, as I said on another occasion in answer to the hon. Speaker, to the Tilley wing of the great Conservative party. They are all temperance men, and the result is that they keep up their organization under singularly favorable and excellent conditions. They are always ready when they are called upon by the civil power, and I think, under the circumstances, my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, can hardly resist the appeal which I have made to him. I think in that regard to this Bill, that in the main its provisions are excellent. I believe, with many gentlemen who have spoken, that not enough consideration is given to the rank and file. I, for one, have the greatest respect for the Militia force and the officers who command it. I do not believe that a more able, a more gentlemanly, and a more efficient body of men is to be anywhere found than are the Militia officers of Canada. I am satisfied of this after a very close connection with, and a very careful scrutiny of the acts of these men. They make great sacrifices in my own county; four or five officers there have been practically ruined in keeping up the corps; and I think that, under the circumstances, the officers should be relieved, as far as possible, from expenditure in connection with the Militia force, and that the rank and file should be given, if possible, increased pay. I have no hesitation in saying that, in the main, I am in favor of the provisions of the Bill of the hon. Minister of Militia.

Mr. CARON. I wish to say a very few words in answer to the remarks which have been made by several hon. gentlemen who have criticized this measure. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) states that the county councils have considered it right and proper to give pay over and above the pay which the Department grants to the men. I can only congratulate the hon. gentleman and the country upon the fact that we have patriotic county councils who understand the usefulness of the Militia force to such an extent as to contribute out of their own pockets, to increase the pay of the volunteers. I can only repeat what I have already stated, that I would like and wish to see the rank and file paid more than they now receive; but it must be considered—and if hon. gentlemen will look into the question, they will find—that the Militia force of Canada is better paid than is the case in any other country in the world. I admit, however, and I know, that the pay is no remuneration in a country like this, where men find a ready market for whatever they can produce, in the way of labor, or, if agriculturists, in the way of farm products. I can understand it is very difficult indeed for any Government to lay down a schedule of pay which would meet exactly the loss of time that the men have to make; and it is a proud thing for Canada to be able to say that when the Militia force of Canada is required to drill, or is called out on active service, they do not consider the question of pay, and the men are always ready to go to the front and do their duty. I can say, after looking into this matter very closely, that we have never had any complaint from any of the militiamen as to the pay of the rank and file; and that the money—and the hon. gentleman, and officers who are now in the force, will know whether I am right in making this statement—and the increased pay given to the officers all goes into the pockets of the rank and file, for the purpose of keeping up in a state of efficiency the bands, and of allowing the men to go, on occasions like the Queen's Birthday or Dominion Day, from one city to another, to keep alive the feeling of brotherhood which should exist, in any such force, in any country; and I say that this money, which we are now giving to the city corps, in thus simply extending to the city corps the privileges which have been accorded to the rural corps, all goes into the pockets of the rank and file indirectly, and they all so understand it, and are willing so to consider it. The hon. member for Lambton also stated that, out of the great surplus which, through the hon. Minister of Finance, we have been able to announce to the country, we should give increased pay to the rank and file. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House accuse me of extravagance, and state that the money which was expended for the Militia force was uselessly expended; but I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen to remember that when this force was called upon to fight the battles of their country they did so in a way that would have been creditable to any force in any country, and I believe that the people of Canada will not refuse to contribute the amount of money which we are expending on the Militia, because I believe that the Militia of Canada is giving more than value for the amount which we expend upon them. I would not be expressing my own views as Minister of Militia, having had the opportunity of looking into the records of that force, if I did not state that the Militia force, for the amount of money which Canada has expended upon it, has been a force which has rendered services which Canada never can repay. It is not the insignificant sum of 50 cts. per day which will induce men to come out and fight the battles which they have been called upon to fight, but it is the feeling that in doing so they are doing their duty to their country and their flag which induces the men to leave their ordinary avocation or business in life, and put in twelve days' drill in camp for the purpose of being ready in case of emergency. My hon. friend the member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) for once has been perfectly satisfied. The hon. gentleman, I am happy to say, takes a great interest in Militia matters, and I have explained to him that this Inspector of Artillery was not at all an increase so far as the present intentions of the Government are concerned. The hon. gentleman will find out that it is right and proper, in framing a measure of this kind, to provide for the possibility of appointing such an officer, though, as he will see when the Estimates come down, we did not provide for his appointment at present, though it was right in framing a Bill of this kind that we should give every possible security as to the intentions of the Government, and for that reason we fixed his salary at the same amount which is paid to the Adjutant-General. It may be necessary at one time or another to provide work for that officer, but unless it becomes necessary no expenditure will be incurred on that account. As to the position of the Quartermaster-General, I must refer the hon. gentleman to the explanations which I have been called upon to give, in which he will see that the position and duties of that officer had been perfectly defined. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproulo) has stated that the expenditure upon the staff is too great. I would ask the hon. gentleman to look into this expenditure, and consider if he thinks that expenditure too great when he takes into account the efficiency of these men, and their ability in every way to occupy the responsible positions which they are called upon to fill. I can also point my hon. friend to the reduction which has taken place in the expenditure upon the staff since I have had the honor of presiding over the Militia Department, and he will see that that expenditure has been reduced to the extent of $11,100 per annum. These gentlemen give up their time, they have had to leave their own business or vocation, and they have adopted the military profession, which, in a country like Canada, is not a paying profession; they have done their duty well, and I believe that the staff of Canada is less paid than that of any staff of equal efficiency in any other country. I quite agree with the hon. member for Laval (Mr.

Quimet) when he says that we are not remunerating these men sufficiently for the services they render. I hope at a later day that the Government will be in a position to increase their pay to a figure commensurate to the services they render. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has also drawn my attention to the pay of officers commanding batteries. In England, as is well known, the officer in command of these batteries is a major instead of a captain, and receives pay according to his rank, which is the system we are endeavoring to put in force here by the resolutions which have been submitted to Parliament. I intend to consider this question, which would involve a very small expenditure, for I think there is no branch of the service which has developed more ardor in their work, or displayed better training than the batteries we have in Canada. We have batteries in Quebec, Montreal and other places which would not be a disparagement to the regular force, but the officers in command of such batteries are only captains now, and it may be possible to accord to them the rank which is recommended by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who knows a great deal about the force, and has taken a great deal of pains in the consideration of this Bill. My predecessor in the office of Minister of Militia does not take very strong objection to the increase of pay of the officers of city corps. He said that under his regime the expenditure was only $554,000. I cannot congratulate my hon. predecessor on that reduced expenditure. When I came into the Department I found that the hon. gentleman had allowed the Militia expenditure to be continually reduced; and I found that the stores had suffered, that every branch in the Department had suffered in consequence. Whether the hon. gentleman did not take any very deep interest in the Department over which he presided, or whether he was not allowed to carry out his views, he allowed the expenditure of every Department to increase, but that of the Department of Militia and Defence, which decreased continually. The hon. gentleman says that 60 cts. a day was granted to the rank and file by the late Government; but he must remember that this was for six days' drill, instead of for twelve, as at present, and that out of the 60 cts. the men had to provide their rations. To-day we give them 50 cts. and provide their rations as well.

Mr. VAIL. They had twelve days, and they got 60 cts. a day, and had their rations besides.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is wrong and I am right. Now, I think the hon. gentleman will see that we are, at least, as liberal as he was when he presided over the Department, and I think the force will admit that they are as well, or better treated than they were under hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) has stated that Tory promises are not always kept. Well, I have always tried to bring the Militia force of Canada to as high a state of efficiency as the requirements and circumstances of the country would admit, and I am glad to see that in one instance, at any rate, these Tories have kept their promises, and I would not wish for any better testimony than the testimony of the hon. gentleman, because I know that he has taken a great deal of interest in the Militia force of Canada, and I take his expression as that of a man who knows thoroughly the subject of which he speaks. My hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has spoken of reducing the force. Well, that is a question requiring a great deal of consideration. Considering the population of the country, the force, as it now exists, is really no larger than it should be. It may be possible to reduce it gradually by weeding out any company or battery, or any other branch of the service that is not thoroughly efficient, and then it may be possible for us to grant to the efficient force greater advantages than they receive at present. My hon. friend, the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that the gentlemen who spoke upon this measure were all officers. Well, I believe there are no more competent authorities to speak upon a question of this kind than the men who have given their time, their trouble and their money to it.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. Minister misunderstood me. I said that the men who were defending the increase of pay to the officers were all officers themselves.

Mr. CARON. Well, the hon. gentleman will see that there can be no more competent authorities on that point than the officers; and they have decided that the pay which is granted to the officers under this measure is not excessive. Still I am glad to see that my hon. friend, in other respects, approves of the measure, except that he would prefer to have the expenditure distributed in a different way from that proposed in the measure. Before sitting down, I must refer to what my hon. friend the member for the county of Ottawa has expressed in the eloquent language in which he always clothes his utterances. The hon. gentleman could not avoid, although he was very kind in the manner in which he spoke, saying he had a grievance. Well, I believe, it is almost an advantage to have a grievance. No man is perfectly happy without a grievance—

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). We are very happy.

Mr. CARON. Because life becomes very monotonous unless one has a grievance. Knowing that my hon. friend is so happy I would not like to remove that grievance for the present in case it should interfere with his equanimity and his perfect happiness. My hon. friend said, as we all know, that when under the administration of my illustrious predecessor, Sir George Cartier, he was called upon to raise two companies to come down to Ottawa, he found two who were ready at a moment's notice. We all know that the King of the Gatineau is omnipotent in his county and can always get, not only the Militia force but every other force in his constituency, out at a moment's notice, to obey his call. I can tell the hon. gentleman, that anxious as I am not to remove absolutely the grievance he has submitted to this Committee, I will try to reduce it by one-half. It may be possible for me, if the Bill and the resolution are carried, to re-distribute the force in such a way that one company may be added to the force in his county, which I know will be a valuable addition to the Militia of this country.

Mr. VAIL. I speak under correction, but the only difference it seems to me that there is between the city corps and those turned out for camp drill, is, that the city corps are drilled at their own headquarters during twelve days. In all cases they receive 50 cts. a day; in some cases the Government, by Order in Council, gave them an additional 10 cts. a day. Of course, when drilled at headquarters they received no rations.

Mr. AUGER. The hon. Minister finds the best way to have the money reach the pockets of the rank and file is to pay the officers. I differ entirely from the hon. gentleman. At home where I come from, the money that is paid the officers never reaches the rank and file. If the hon. gentleman intends the rank and file to get the money, his best way is to pay it to them. I think the proposal to pay the men 60 cts. instead of 50 cts. a day is a good one. The hon. Minister seems to think that the rank and file live by their patriotic feeling. If that is so it must be an insult to the officers to say that they cannot do the same. It would be more patriotic on the part of the officers to give an example to the rank and file, by receiving less themselves and giving more to the men.

Mr. WRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Militia was kind enough to promise that an additional company would be added to the Militia force of my county. I thank him for that as a small favor. Considering that that county is perhaps the largest in the Dominion, containing 50,000 inhabitants, and considering the particular position they are in with regard to the Militia organization, he might very kindly and gracefully have conceded what I ask, the formation of a regiment, so that the men from there would not be obliged to drill in Ottawa as at present. This county occupies an exceptional position in not having a local organization, such as you can find almost everywhere in smaller constituencies in other parts of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has been pleased to allude to me in kindly, pleasant, and humorous terms, and I reply that if I am King of the Gatineau I can assure the hon. gentleman he occupies a very high place in my estimation. At the last meeting of Parliament I suggested the name of the hon. gentleman, as an organizer of victory, should be changed to that of Carnot that he might rank with the Moltkes and the other great military men of the day. I have borne cheerful testimony to the benefits he has conferred on our military organizations, for which I have the greatest respect. I never see one of our military men without instinctively taking off my hat. Those men have sacrificed everything, notably the rank and file, for the benefit of their country during the time of trouble, the time of the Fenian raids, and we were then very proud of them. But when the time comes when we do not require their services we are apt to laugh at and stigmatize them as being rather disposed to fuss and feathers. I would not insinuate that the hon. Minister of Militia went too far in this respect. I believe the æsthetic idea is a very important one. We had the apostle of æstheticism, Oscar Wilde, here last year, and the idea of the beautiful, among others, to develop humanity is most important, and in certain matters connected with military affairs there must be more or less of that influence. The red coat is very pleasant to look at and has figured in every battle-field. An hon. gentleman says that it is going to be done away with. Although we may be happy with our grievances—my hon. friend near me says they are very happy (the Opposition), for they have lots of grievances—and although mine are to be lessened by one-half, I hope the hon. Minister of Militia will see that it would be well to keep up the rank and file, notably among the men of the backwoods. I do not wish to say a word in disparagement of the force in the cities, for I have seen the gallant Irishmen, Frenchmen, and Englishmen of Montreal, at the time of the Fenian raid, march out—march out, amidst the waving of handkerchiefs of the ladies and the cheers of the population, to defend our country! With regard to my own county, it has always been its fate, that the hon. Ministers of Militia were not prepared—perhaps because they thought the fighting element might not be susceptible of being kept within discipline—to give them a chance of going to the front. I hope the hon. Minister of Militia, as a simple measure of justice, will see his way clear to grant us the organization of a regiment for the County of Ottawa.

Resolution reported.

Mr. CARON moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 31) to consolidate and amend the laws affecting the Militia of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CARON. I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to clause 17, sub-section 3—"Whenever the exigencies of the service required, Her Majesty may raise and maintain a torpedo corps." I wish to substitute the words, "a corps of submarine miners," instead of "torpedo corps," as the former designation is the one used in England.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What would the hon. Minister of Militia consider such an exigency as would justify the organization of torpedo corps?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman knows so well, when and why torpedo corps are required, that I could hardly give him any explanation that would enlighten him.

Mr. ROSS. Nothing short of a threatened invasion I suppose.

Mr. CARON. Of course. The hon. gentleman will understand the peculiar geographical circumstances of the country, our large extent of sea-board, and numerous harbors which we have to protect, and the most inexpensive mode of protecting the sea-board is by torpedo corps organized for that purpose.

On section 18,

Mr. CARON. The form of oath does not cover the whole ground. I wish to introduce the words "The commanding officer of the troop, battery, company or battalion." It is merely to apply the same thing to the whole force.

On section 21,

Mr. CARON. This clause was not passed, owing to objections by some hon. gentlemen. The Military Schools which we are creating, are for the purpose of introducing that branch of the service, and we consider that it is indispensable so far as that branch of the service is concerned. When the discussion first took place, these clauses were not passed because hon. gentlemen stated that it was a matter that required to be brought down by resolution. After looking into the matter, I believe that hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is not a question involving the expenditure of public money. What I am now asking, is authority to create the schools. When the Estimates are brought down, the items of expenditure for the establishment of these schools will be inserted, but if the House does not agree to those items in the Estimates, of course the project cannot be carried out.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot accede to the view put forward by the hon. Minister. It is true we are not asked to vote the money on this occasion, but we are asked to place on the Statute-book a law authorizing the adoption of a particular policy, the policy of adding to the two batteries another battery of artillery, a troop of cavalry and three troops of infantry, making together a force not exceeding 750 men. We are entitled to receive from the hon. gentleman full explanations of what the carrying out of this policy will involve, and amongst other points what it will involve financially. It is true the hon. gentleman is not asking us to vote the money, but he is asking us to agree that these forces shall be created, and of course we know that this policy cannot be carried out without money being voted, and if we assent to the creation of this force, we cannot refuse the amount which may be placed in the Estimates when they come to be considered. The precise details of the outlay may form a subject for discussion on the Estimates, but some information as to the cost, as to the proposed location of the troops, and matters of that nature should be furnished on this occasion when the Committee are considering the proposed change, modification or extension of the policy which has hitherto prevailed with respect to a permanent active force.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in stating that all information should be given at this stage, and I have always been willing, and am still willing, to afford him all information that can be given upon the policy of the Government as to the establishment of the different schools of infantry and artillery.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask where the new battery is to be stationed?

Mr. CARON. I was going to explain. The intention of the Government is to make the whole of British Columbia one arm of the service, and to place there a battery of artillery which will be a school of instruction also, and which will be more useful in that Province than any other arm of the service. As hon. members are aware, British Columbia is at this time without a permanent Adjutant-General. Accordingly, we have sent, from one of our training schools of artillery, Major Holmes, who—and I can say this without being charged with flattery—is one of the best officers we have trained in our military schools, and he is to act for the present as Deputy Adjutant-General. When the regular battery is organized and stationed at Victoria or some other place, the Commandant of that school of artillery will become Deputy Adjutant-General, who will, practically, take charge of the whole district. We consider the question from a military stand-point, and after consulting professional officers who know the circumstances and requirements of the Province, we decided to turn the whole force into an artillery force, and the intention is to make it "C" Battery, as we have "A" and "B" Batteries at present. In regard to the infantry schools, one will be stationed in the Maritime Provinces, another in the Province of Quebec, probably at Montreal, the third in Toronto or some place in Ontario, but from the fact of our having military property and barracks in Toronto which can be fitted up for the accommodation of the force without any large expenditure, and because it is a central point, the school of infantry will be located there. With respect to the troop of cavalry I may say that the intention is to add to the permanent "A" and "B" Batteries a troop of cavalry which will be divided between those batteries; that is to say, we will add a number of horses to the batteries in Quebec and Kingston. We consider, in order to meet the requirements of the the service, that such is indispensable. If it is really our intention to keep up a permanent force we must have staff officers and cavalry officers, of course, drilled in that branch of the service, it will involve a very small addition to the expenditure, and we could not carry out the purpose which we have in view without having those two batteries already organized and by having a troop of cavalry added, one-half to "A" Battery and the other half to "B" Battery. The object contemplated is to afford all necessary training required for that branch of the service. As regards "B" Battery, or any other battery stationed at Kingston, the horses will be utilized for the purpose of giving drill instruction in that branch of the service to the cadets of the Royal Military College. It has been stated by the Commander of the Royal Military College, and by the officers of "B" Battery, that the battery horses were worked much more than they should be, in order that drill instruction might be given to the college cadets. Hence it is, we believe, and have thought, that by adding a limited expenditure of money to the expenditure applied by Parliament for Militia purposes, we could get this additional troop, or half a troop, at Quebec and at Kingston, and give all the instruction we require, and that this would help considerably towards the instruction which, under the curriculum followed in the Royal Military College, is expected to be given to the cadets.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The hon. gentleman has not stated what he expects all this to cost. "A" and "B" Batteries cost between them about $120,000, or say $60,000 each, on an average; and to establish a battery in British Columbia will cost, I will assume, about as much as one of these, or $60,000.

Mr. BLAKE. It will be more expensive in British Columbia.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). It is more expensive to do anything West than in these other Provinces. I think I am safe in assuming the cost to be $60,000.

Mr. BLAKE. It will be more.

Mr. CARON.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Say $80,000; and the companies of infantry, which the hon. gentleman proposes to establish, will cost as much as a battery, or $50,000 apiece.

Mr. CARON. They will not cost as much as a battery.

Mr. ROSS. Say $10,000 each, and we are near $200,000 now for the whole. Then there is this double-barrelled troop of cavalry which it is proposed to establish—one-half at Kingston and one-half at Quebec—and this certainly will cost a considerable sum of money. The hon. gentleman must add thus, at least, a fixed charge in the neighborhood of $200,000 for this little addition to the service, which I think is not absolutely necessary by any means. I think that the hon. gentleman should consider before he asks the Committee to adopt this part of the Bill. It is really a very serious thing to add $200,000 to the fixed charges, when there is for it no absolute necessity. We are in no danger of war. The hon. gentleman does not fear an invasion from any quarter. We seem to be at peace with all men, and we are already spending large sums of money in giving instruction to the men. I do not propose at this stage to offer any further objection to the clause, but I wish the hon. gentleman to think the matter over seriously before he asks the House to consent to a proposition which will involve such a large expenditure.

Mr. CARON. I can see that the hon. gentleman has been giving his attention to these figures.

Mr. ROSS. As always.

Mr. CARON. He is so near my calculations that I would almost imagine that we had consulted together about this expenditure. This will really not cost more than about $200,000; and I think that the hon. gentleman must be congratulated upon the fact that he has, without any previous information, got so close to the amount which will be required to give to the force that efficiency which I consider to be really indispensable.

Mr. BLAKE. I am glad that the hon. gentleman is so near the hon. Minister's calculation, but I would like to get a little more information about them. I dare say my hon. friend is right as to the battery in British Columbia. I suppose that it will be placed at Victoria. I presume that the hon. Minister agrees that this will cost more money than it would here. No?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right as far as the cost of living is concerned. We all know that is more expensive. The amount of money I am asking Parliament to vote for that battery is exactly the same which we pay for the batteries in Quebec and Kingston.

Mr. BLAKE. Then when we reach that point we ascertain, that if it does cost more to maintain a battery at Victoria, B.C., the hon. gentleman's estimate of $200,000 will likely be inadequate, unless he overruns on some other portions of this large military force. I can hardly conceive from the accounts which we have always received as to expenditure in British Columbia, it can be otherwise than correct to say, as I stated a moment ago, that it will cost more for a battery there. The hon. Minister agrees that the expense of living is more. I fancy also that wages are higher; and unless the hon. gentleman, perhaps, gives extra pay he will have to submit to occasional departures—I will not call them desertions—from his battery. Then, when we get to the troop of cavalry the hon. gentleman says that it is to be divided, and proposes to add fifteen horses to each of the batteries, A and B.

Mr. CARON. A troop consists of thirty-four.

Mr. BLAKE. This will not be a full troop, then.

Mr. CARON. Yes; it is a full troop for cavalry.

Mr. BLAKE. An ordinary troop, I understand, is fifty.

Mr. CARON. Not in Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. But the regular army? My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Vail) shows me that nine troops of cavalry which turned out last year averaged forty-six, from which I presume that a full troop is fifty. The hon. gentleman will find it in his report, on page 24.

Mr. CARON. They may have turned out an average of forty-six, but this was then over-strength. The hon. gentleman will find that by referring to the regulations that our troop consists of thirty-four or thirty-five. I refer to regular troops in the service. In very many instances, not only as far as cavalry is concerned, but in other branches of the service, there may be cases where an over-strength in the battalion or company, or whatever it may be, occurs; and it may be that in this particular instance they may have turned out over-strength.

Mr. BLAKE. It does not appear that this was a particular instance, but nine separate troops turned out with a number very nearly as much again as the hon. gentleman says is the strength. However, I do not dispute these things with the hon. gentleman, because I confess I do not have a great knowledge about them.

Mr. CARON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. Of course, I have not the figures before me; but the hon. gentleman may not find forty-six horses in a troop of cavalry. If the hon. gentleman from Digby, who also seems to have studied this subject, would tell me exactly what information he wants to get about this troop of cavalry, I will be perfectly willing to supply it; but the hon. gentleman will see that in a troop of cavalry, as in a battery, all the men are not mounted.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. CARON. A certain number of men, besides the mounted men, is required. Of course, I am merely speaking without any reference to any statement made by the hon. gentleman; but I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will not find troops of forty-six mounted men. The regulation number is thirty-five. Of course, it is difficult to explain how this increase may have occurred; but the regulation strength is thirty-four.

Mr. BLAKE. That is a statement of the financial part of the question. I observe that in Military District No. 7, in Quebec, two troops of cavalry numbered ninety-six; and a little below, a cavalry troop is mentioned, numbering eighty-one; but the number of horses is not stated here, and I do not know if it is stated elsewhere. I have not looked, but these are the numbers. The material point is what the strength of this particular troop is to be. The hon. gentleman states thirty-four, as I understand him, officers and men; would the hon. gentleman state what he expects the cost to be.

Mr. CARON. That troop which we mean to establish, and composed as I have stated, will cost about $26,000.

Mr. BLAKE. And these companies, what are they estimated at?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman must consider that they have only 100 men each, instead of 150.

Mr. BLAKE. And the infantry?

Mr. CARON. There will be 100 in each, or 300 men in all.

Mr. BLAKE. And the cost?

Mr. CARON. Each infantry school will cost $44,300, including a number of officers and non-commissioned officers that will be trained yearly in these schools. The number of officers will be forty, and non-commissioned officers eighty.

Mr. BLAKE. Are those included in the 300 men?

Mr. CARON. No, these are outside.

Mr. BLAKE. This is considerably below what the infantry is estimated to cost in the British service?

Mr. CARON. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Although it includes the expenses of this training? Will the hon. gentleman give the particulars of this expenditure?

Mr. CARON. The captain who will be in command will be paid at the rate of $1,460 per annum; two lieutenants will, together, receive $1,460; four sergeants, $1,314; four corporals, $1,022; ninety-two men, $16,201.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the rate of pay?

Mr. CARON. 50 cts. per diem, rations for 100 men, $4,500; uniform, boots, kitted, greatcoats, &c., $3,500. Barrack furniture, medicine, transports, fuel, light, and contingencies, $7,533; making $37,000 for the permanent establishment. Over and above that we have the forty officers and the eighty non-commissioned officers for each, involving an expenditure of $7,300, making altogether $44,300, as I have already stated.

Mr. BLAKE. That will be a total expense of $240,000.

Mr. CARON. No, $203,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I make that sum from the items.

Mr. CARON. If the hon. gentleman will trust me until I bring down the Estimates I will give him the full particulars, but he may rest assured that $203,000 will be the amount asked for.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I wish to propose an addition to clause 28, which provides that the Major-General must be an officer in Her Majesty's regular army. I would propose, after the word "army," to insert the words, "or in the active Militia force of Canada." This would make the clause so elastic that, in the event of the Minister finding in our active Militia force a suitable officer to take the position, he would have power to make such an appointment. I think the hon. Minister will agree with the view that it is well to hold out to the force in Canada the highest prizes in the service—that, while we are prepared to admit that the officers who have heretofore filled the position of Major-General have discharged their duties ably and well, it is possible in the future, with the extensive machinery the hon. gentleman is providing for the military education of the people, that he may find in the ranks a gentleman suitable for that position. I hope he will accept this suggestion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I sincerely hope the hon. Minister will not accept the amendment proposed. If the hon. gentleman consults the officers of the force, especially those in command of battalions, he will not find one who does not prefer the Major-General to be an officer of the Imperial army, and should know more than any of us can have any possibility of learning. We do not want an officer at the head of this force to have any political character; there is enough politics in the force now. If the Major-General were one of ourselves, who has never seen any but Canadian service, he would certainly occupy a different position from a man in the regular army. I speak from my own personal experience, and I hope that the clause will be left as it is. I would like to take this opportunity of saying that the effect upon the force of last year's inspection and supervision by the gentleman who now commands it, was most satisfactory, and that the camps of 1882 were much superior to those of any previous year. I make that statement because I think it is due to the officer that it should be made in the most public way, and by some one who knows something about it.

Mr. CARON. The hon. member will remember that the only clauses held over were those relating to the expenditure of public money. This clause was discussed before, and was adopted. Consequently we cannot go into a discussion of the matter at this moment.

Bill reported.

Mr. CARON moved that the Bill, as amended, be now taken into consideration.

Mr. ROSS. I have to propose an amendment. The House is aware that although canteens are established under the Queen's Regulations and Orders, and that notwithstanding the general impression that malt liquors are not sold there, they are sold to a great extent, and in order to prevent the demoralization of the force and to prevent our young men falling into the way of temptation, I think an effort should be made to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor in camp. I am not prepared to say that anything serious has arisen on this score, but I think it is highly desirable to remove all danger. The matter was brought up the other night by one of the members from British Columbia and the hon. member for West Durham read from the Queen's Regulations to the effect that no spirituous liquors should be sold at the home stations. I think that regulation does not go far enough, and beg to propose in amendment:

That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole in order to amend the same, by inserting after the word "army" in line two, section sixty-four, the following words:—"but nothing in the said Regulations and Orders, so far as they relate to the establishment of canteens, shall render lawful the sale of beer or malt liquors of any kind whatever."

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman must understand that it is in the interest of commanding officers to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in camp. In the camps held last summer the orders were that no intoxicating liquor would be allowed in the different canteens. We cannot go beyond that. We have no control more than giving instructions to the commanding officers. I think the amendment is a step in the right direction, but I do not think we could legislate in a Bill of this kind upon that question in the manner the hon. gentleman now suggests.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not agree with the view of the hon. gentleman. The Queen's Regulations prohibits in the home canteen the sale of hard spirituous liquors, but not the sale of malt liquors. The Bill proposes the Queen's Regulations shall apply. The Regulations permit the sale of malt liquors, and that is proposed to be our regulation. Now, all that my hon. friend proposes is to recognize the provision which exists under the Queen's Regulations. That seems to me to be quite reasonable. The Queen's Regulations permits the one but prohibits the other; we want to prohibit the sale of both malt and spirituous liquors.

Mr. CARON. I did not say that malt liquors would be prohibited; I said that spirituous liquors would be, and the experience of the camps in the different Provinces has shown that no spirituous liquors were sold. I think we cannot introduce the amendment the hon. gentleman proposes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the second reading of the first resolution (April 13th).

Mr. BLAKE. I would like some explanations as to the hon. gentleman's policy on the item of books—a little more in detail than he gave in his Budget Speech, and with reference to several suggestions which have just been made. For my part, I feel some difficulty in understanding what the interpretation of the clause is: "books bound, which shall have been printed more than seven years." Whether the hon. gentleman means the first publication of the particular book, or whether it is the specific book which has been printed more than seven years? I suppose what the hon. gentleman meant was a book of which any edition has been printed more than seven years. I doubt, however, whether that is distinctly carried out by the clause. Objections have been taken by the trade to this provision. It is said, as the hon. gentleman is, no doubt, aware, that it is a very ordinary practice now to print books without any date at all, and that the ascertainment of the date, even of the particular volume, may be a question of uncertainty in the case of a particular book which is imported. But beyond that, if it is intended, as I presume it is, that the question to be considered shall be, when was any edition of that book first published? That, of course, is not made to appear upon an old or recent edition of the book, and therefore, evidence has to be resorted to; one has to ascertain from other sources whether this is a book that is more than seven years old, or a later one. It is suggested that in many of the outports much greater difficulties have existed in this regard than in some larger places where there are skilled persons, having an extensive knowledge of books, who would be accessible, and that the result might be to lead to an undue advantage to importers who enter their books in some of these outports than in other places. It is also suggested that it will involve a considerable amount of difficulty and trouble with reference to invoiced books which come out together, some being subject to the 15 per cent. duty, and some being free, and the discrimination that will have to be resorted to, will produce additional difficulties to the trade. I have received statements from persons engaged in the trade, setting forth these difficulties, and stating that it will be found difficult for Customs officials to decide as to how long books have been published, and the majority of these officials will be guided by booksellers.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am quite prepared to admit there will be some difficulty in carrying this arrangement into effect on the part of the Customs Department, and probably in some places, for a short time on the part of importers. But there appeared to be such an expression of public opinion in favor of a reduction of the duty on a certain class of books, such as books imported for certain public institutions, that the Government were exceedingly anxious to meet their views as far as possible. Under these circumstances it became a question of what steps could be taken to give them relief. If we could have said that all books should be free, that, of course, would have settled the question, but we were not in a position to say so, and therefore, we took the next best means to give them as liberal an arrangement as possible. In the United States books that have been published over twenty years are free; therefore we decided that it would meet very largely the case under consideration to say seven years, and the Government would then take means to ascertain, although it is surrounded with some difficulty, which books were subject to the duty and which books were not. Now, the hon. gentleman asks a question whether it is intended to apply to the book published seven years ago or to a book published twenty years ago, but printed only six years ago. Say originally it was published twenty years ago and now printed but six years, that will be subject to the duty. All books, no matter when they were first published, if they are printed within seven years, are subject to the duty. The point is the printing of them. Then another difficulty arises from the fact that all books do not bear the date upon which they are printed. The hon. member says there may be great difficulties in distinguishing 15 per cent. books from free books coming out that may be invoiced before the passage of this. The agent of the party will be asked to state on the invoice, that the books have been printed seven years, and the entry will be made accordingly. It will undoubtedly involve labor on the Customs Department, but the Government thought it better to throw that labor on the Department, than to deny to persons applying the advantages they sought. We used the word "bound," because if the work was printed in sheets it would be easy to take off the title page and insert such a date as 1878, but when books are bound that cannot be easily effected, because a title-page so inserted would easily be detected in the case of bound books, and would be evidence of fraud on the part of the importer. If books are received at the Customs Department without dates being on them, it will be necessary for the party shipping them to adduce evidence that they were printed before the date in question, and if the date cannot be given, the books will be subjected to the usual duty. But in a very short time order will be obtained, and books printed many years ago, fifteen, twenty or thirty, at all events, editions printed more than seven years ago, will have the benefit of free entry.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me very greatly if he thought I was willing that he should keep his Tariff on books where it is. Not so. I am exceedingly anxious to see a still greater modification of the duty on books; but I was simply referring to the fiscal point of view, and how his proposal would operate. He has given me an admission of a result which I rather expected would flow from this system. He has frankly admitted that the working of the clause will be attended with some difficulty and inconvenience, and probably trouble to importers and the Customs Department, and, of course, trouble to the importers means cost to the public or reduced profits to the importers themselves. The Canadians are not to be entitled to receive the good editions, they will obtain the second-hand books, and the hon. gentleman declares that the cheap editions will be brought into the country. No doubt he is right. It will be the earlier and older editions—those more than seven years old—that will be called for by us, and the old books will be sent from the Old World into the new, because of the operation of this tax. I have always felt that the tax which the hon. gentleman imposed on books was one of the most objectionable character to be found in the whole of the Tariff of 1879, and I have long been anxious for an opportunity to address a few words to the House and the hon. Minister on the subject of that tax. I cannot but feel that we are not doing justice to ourselves in this country in impeding the widest possible diffusion of a taste for literature and knowledge to be acquired by our people. There are three interests to consider in reference to this tax: Those of the public, as readers of books, those of the writers of books, and those who print and publish the books in the country. When you talk of protecting the trade of the production of books, you must remember there are two sets interested in the production of books in this country: those who make the books in the sense of writing them, and those who engage in the trade of putting them into print and having them published; and I maintain the interest of the general public, as readers, and of the whole community, is damaged by the book tax, and that the interest of the writer of books in the country is also damaged by the book tax. Whatever may be the effect upon publishers of books in the country, we never have had, in any part of Canada, that I am aware of, in any degree of vigor or general use, the system which, with good or ill effects, has prevailed so long, and still so widely prevails, in Britain—the system of circulating libraries. We know the book trade there, although it is beginning to change, under circumstances which, it seems to me, intensifies the evil of a heavy tax upon books here, up to, at all events, a recent time, almost entirely, and I might say even to-day, consists not in buying but in using the large appliances of the reading and circulating libraries which exist there. We know one of the practical results of that system has been to limit the circulation of books, which has caused very high prices to be charged, the cheapness of books depending so much on the largeness of the edition, so that those who did wish to acquire and own a book permanently have had to pay a very much larger price under a system of proprietorship instead of that of hiring. That does not exist with us here. There is a movement in my own Province which has extended so far to at least two cities, to establish free libraries, and it is intended to add, at all events in Toronto, the feature of a circulating and lending library. There are in several other centres of the country libraries which are circulating or free, or public libraries, of more or less importance, notably one established in the town of Portland by the hon. gentleman who sits at my right, an example of munificence, of which I could wish there were more examples in Canada. We have in Canada comparatively few centres which could maintain such libraries, and very few in which we have such libraries, and the bulk of the population must depend, for a long time to come, on the system of purchasing instead of the system of buying or hiring books. We as a people—I do not know whether the Finance Minister agrees in this view—are a democratic people. The principles of popular government are very deeply rooted and cherished by our people, and I am glad to know the root they have taken is one likely to be enduring, and the principles of democratic and popular government are likely to be more widely and extensively applied as years roll on than they have been in the past. It is the first essential of such a system of widely diffused popular Government; in fact the more widely it is diffused the more liberal the institutions, the more direct and extended the share which the people at large take in moulding their own future; the more fully they are permitted to assert the right to govern themselves the more important it is that there shall be spread among them a diffused intelligence, knowledge and apprehension, a quick and intelligent sentiment with respect to public affairs. It is one of the tasks which those who have to guide the concerns of a democratic people, have to address themselves to, to secure as far as possible, at any rate to do nothing that may hinder, popular education or elementary education, it is true, but also the education amongst adults, the widespread, widely diffused education, which is a work that does not end, and may be said hardly to begin, with the attaining of manhood, by the diffusion of literature. I say the more widely spread our popular institutions, the more it becomes the sacred duty of those who have the conducting of the affairs of the country, to see that the literature is widely spread. Well, now, I maintain, that under these circumstances, a serious increase in the cost of books is a thing that ought to be avoided. I maintain, that the Parliament of the country, that the Government of the country should do as little as it possibly can to interfere with the acquisition by individual citizens of the country of these means of knowledge, of improvement, of the widening of the circle of intelligent consideration of the public affairs, and the additional tax of the present Tariff, and so far as it is to apply, continue to apply to the imports of books, is very considerable—15 per cent; and of course we know that by the time the book gets into the hands of the consumer, this is equal to somewhere about 22 per cent.; that is what it means, and it means an addition, therefore, of about that much to the cost of the book. These, I may say, Sir, are the necessities of our moral and intellectual life, necessary to the higher life of the people, necessary to that life in that which a physical and material abundance furnishes after all, a very poor and imperfect existence indeed. Now, the hon. gentleman's proposal is, that the people of Canada, the people of this new country, and in this era of intellectual life and activity, when knowledge is overspreading the country; when new inventions crowd upon us with the utmost rapidity; when fresh notions and discoveries press upon us every day; when the printing press is doing a work greater than it has ever done before incalculably, the hon. gentleman's proposal, that is, that as far as Government hindrances will enable him to do it, we shall be seven years behind the rest of the world. The hon. gentleman says: "Providing your book has been printed seven years ago, you may get it in free, but if it sins by having been printed within seven years, I shall charge a tax, the financial effect of which is to add to the bookseller's advance, with the duty, a cost of somewhere about 22 per cent. to the cost of the work." Now, Sir, this is an era, as I have said, not merely of the publication of numerous books, but also there is a revolution in the system of publication, and the system of cheap editions, which existed to a considerable extent in the United States some time ago, has there assumed most marvellous proportions. The enterprise which has been displayed, and the proof of the possibility of production, added to the almost nominal cost of the books, if only a wide-reading public could be procured, is wonderful, and it has followed in England also; and I find very cheap editions of many standard works, and many new works also, published in England. Now, the circumstance, Sir, the fact, that we are getting, that we can get books very cheaply, may be argued by hon. gentlemen as a reason why, after all, it is not a great imposition to have to add 22 per cent. practically to the cost of them; but, Sir, I want that we should be as well off as the rest of the world in this regard. I want those advantages, which the practical application of this idea within the last few years has produced for America, and largely for England, should not be limited to the other side of the line that separates us from the Republic; and I want to point out to the hon. gentleman that the widely extended application of this principle places the Canadian publisher in a position which renders it practically impossible for him to compete in many instances except at a largely enhanced price, because he must have, even at the best, a very limited circulation; he must have a very limited circulation for his books if the production is confined to Canada; upon the extent of the circulation is dependent, I may almost say, the whole of the cost, and the condition of things is such that it is impossible for him, without getting the circulation, practically to produce the works as cheaply as it is done abroad. Shall we, then, in view of that state of things, not merely arrange in reference to the publication here of some works which are peculiarly suited to our country, for which, as in the case of the school literature of Ontario, a very large circulation may be obtained. The production of such may be procured at a moderate rate; but shall we proceed for all time to come, to place a tax, to maintain a tax, the result of which, as I have stated, is to add not far from 14 per cent. to the cost of the book on all late literature, and on all late editions of old literature. Editions are coming out. I will give another example of competition in this matter. Take the classics. Take the ancient standard works, the classics; I do not mean in the languages of Rome and Athens only, but take the classics, the standard works of English and French literature. Of these gems of the world, new editions are being published, annotated, it is true, with fresh information as to the authors, with fresh suggestions as to passages which have puzzled and excited the curiosity and wonder and admiration of the world for a long time: I know not whether the circumstance that a new edition comes out—no, I do know now, that circumstances ought not to deprive us of the benefit of a new edition. We are not to know, what the latest discoveries, the latest suggestions are with reference to these great standards. If some new views are found with reference to Homer, or Shakespeare, or Milton, or Dante, or Esculapius, or Euripides, or any of the great men of the world in literature, a new edition is published, but the scholar, the investigator is told: My good man, seven years; you must go back seven years and find whatever is to be found seven years old, and you can have that free, but if you want a book which contains the latest information on this subject, the latest suggestions, you must pay your tax of 15 per cent., which means to you 22 per cent. Now the hon. gentleman made us a mention of novels in his Budget Speech, and he said he did not see much objection to novels being published in Canada. Neither do I, Sir. I am not going to pass any wholesale condemnation on novels. There are works of fiction, which I believe form part of a liberal education, which ought to be widely read, ought to be read by any who professes to call himself a cultivated or educated man; but had he imposed the tax on the season novels which appear, I should not object for my part, not merely to 15, but 30, 40 or 50 per cent. while the hon. gentleman in one clause of the Tariff resolutions proposes to prohibit the export of turkey, quail, and deer in the carcase. I should not object, in a word, if he prohibited altogether the importation, or even the publication in Canada of some of these novels, if the prohibition of publication were not inconsistent with the fundamental principles on that subject, but upon the mere question of the season novel I care little whether the Canadian publisher publishes it or the foreign edition comes in. But that is not the main question. There are Canadian publishers, if you will, that publish that class of works which may be published and get to a wide circulation; but for the sake of protecting them with reference to that particular kind of publication which they do publish, and which is the one thing which the hon. gentleman mentioned as being published by him, why impose a tax on all the standard works to which I have referred, of which it is not likely that one in one hundred, or perhaps one in one thousand will ever be published here, but on which we must all pay a tax who desire to have them? It does not seem to me that the circumstance that our people may be well told that the season novel is a luxury and they must buy it from the home publisher or pay 15 per cent. duty, is a reason why those who want more wholesome literature which they cannot get here should also pay 15 per cent. Our publications in the country, through the state of circumstances to which I have referred, as to the extent of their circulation, must be comparatively narrow. It is only within a very limited range that we can hope that they could at all compete, and for that we are called upon to retain this tax upon all that is fresh and new in the world of literature, and upon all the fresh discoveries, suggestions, annotations and editions of all that is old and well known in the world of literature. That is the view which the hon. Minister takes, and that is the view from which I venture very respectfully to dissent. But there is another view which I think it is important to present to the House upon this matter. The view with reference to the producer of books, not the publisher of them, has been stated better than I can state it by an accomplished gentleman of my acquaintance who, not long since, wrote a paper which has been published over his name in a Montreal newspaper. I refer to Prof. Murray, and I shall trouble the House with his references on that subject:

"Among the alterations in the Tariff introduced by the present Government has been a very serious increase of the import duty on books—an increase to three times its former rate. No other article that I can remember underwent such a serious addition to its cost; and, therefore, as nearly all the books that are read must be imported, it is no wonder that educated men in general, and especially those whose professional wants demand a large supply of books, should have complained all along about the injustice of this unusual burden. Their complaints have at last assumed form in petitions to the Legislature for the repeal or reduction of the tax on books. It would be little less than a useless impertinence to ask the present hon. Minister of Finance to make an alteration in the Tariff which would involve a reversal of his whole fiscal policy; and no sane man can expect the existing House of Commons to sanction a measure entirely hostile to the system which they have been elected to support. But the repeal of the duty on books would not involve any abandonment of the policy to which the present Government and House of Commons are committed. On the contrary, while freedom in the book trade should commend itself to the opponents of the popular policy, it ought, for many reasons, to be demanded by the supporters of that policy themselves. Occasionally extremes meet; and for once Protectionist and Free-trader may combine in demanding from the Legislature a very simple concession of justice. This must be evident from two facts. In the first place, not only do the producers of books not require this duty for their protection; but, in the second place, the duty has the very opposite effect to that of encouraging the producer.

"The first of these assertions is based on the fact, that, without any protective duty, book-makers are already, in one respect at least, more effectively protected than any other class of producers. The law of copyright absolutely prohibits the importation of any foreign reprint of a book produced in Canada. This law is now so liberal, if not to Canadian authors, at least to the men interested in the mechanical work of book manufacture, that the works of British and foreign authors may be reprinted in Canada, and the reprinter is absolutely protected against the importation of foreign reprints. I am informed that Canadian editions of Tennyson's and Swinburne's works, which few men with any care for their eyesight would choose to read, have closed our markets against all the beautiful American editions of these poets, even though the poets receive a handsome royalty from the American publishers for the privilege of republishing, and from the Canadian importers a duty of 12½ per cent for the privilege of importing their works. The Canadian printer who is still unsatisfied with all this protection, must be extremely voracious in his demands.

"But the truth is that there is no other intelligible demand that can, in the circumstances, be made. It is conceivable, indeed, that, when a book is produced by a Canadian author, the tariff may be intended to compel Canadians to read his book by putting a high duty on all foreign books upon the same subject. If this was the object of the tariff, if it was designed to make it difficult for us to become acquainted with foreign literature or science, in order that we might restrict our literary and scientific tastes to the productions of Canadian authorship, it would be an interesting fact to know. But it would be unfair to suspect our legislators or publishers of such vandalic obscurantism; and, as for Canadian authors, the first has yet to be discovered, who, except, perhaps, by way of a jest at a protective tariff, has proposed to compel men to read his works by excluding the works of foreigners.

"Unfortunately the duty on books, so far from encouraging the sale of a Canadian author's works among his countrymen, has usually the very opposite effect. A Canadian author, be he French or English, has the good fortune to use a language which is spoken by many millions of people outside of his own country; and, whether for the sake of pecuniary remuneration, or fame, or intellectual influence, it would be folly to seek his readers, either solely or even primarily, within the limits of the Dominion. Consequently, every Canadian author of any note has found it an obvious requirement of prudence, if not of necessity, to publish his works in England or the United States, and even his occasional essays find the most desirable channel for their publication in the widely circulated periodicals of these two countries. The result, therefore, of the present tariff on books to the Canadian author is, that any work of his, which addresses itself to the great English-speaking communities of the world, or any magazine with an article of his seeking the same vast audience, is met at the frontier by a regulation imposing a fine on every one of his countrymen who wishes to read his productions. The only way in which this barrier can at present be broken down between the Canadian author and his readers in Canada is by restricting his literary production to works of such insignificant value or of such narrow interest, that it is not worth while to seek for them a circulation beyond the limits of the Dominion.

"Is it, therefore, an unfounded charge against the duty on books, that, so far from attaining the end of a protective tariff by encouraging native industry, it is a serious discouragement to one form, at least, of production which has always been regarded as the most unmistakable sign of a people's civilization? To a certain extent, indeed, the duty hampers every important industry in the country. There is scarcely a single occupation in life which is not instructed by a more or less valuable literature that is constantly increasing; and most of the agricultural, mining, manufacturing and commercial industries are the subject, not only of independent works appearing from time to time, but also of periodicals explaining the perpetual improvements in processes and machinery, by which the cost of production is diminished or the value of products is enhanced. The effect, therefore, of the duty on books is to discourage every producer in the country from keeping abreast of the new inventions by which his industry might be improved. But the men and women, on whom this duty falls with special severity, are those who are engaged in literary, or scientific, or educational pursuits,—forms of industry which, even in an economical point of view, ought to rank among the most valuable occupations in a country.

"It thus appears that the duty on books can be viewed in no other light than as a tax for revenue purposes; and, without urging that books are among the last articles that should be selected for taxation in a civilized country, it is satisfactory to know that the present state of the revenue puts the Government in a position to repeal this tax without any inconvenience. It is not yet a year since the Government, in answer to an appeal of the mercantile classes, abolished the stamp duties, even though these duties form a mode of taxation which may be justified as falling upon those who are well able to pay it, and falling upon them generally in proportion to their ability. Is it too much to ask that the Government shall now listen to the cry that is coming to them from every humble country parsonage, from every poorly remunerated teacher, from every retired student of literature and science, from all those classes, in short, which, while doing valuable service to the community, are seldom in a position to bear any unusual burden of taxation?"

That is the special view of the author and the literary man; and it seems to me from both the points of view to which I have referred, that it would be better to revert to the former policy on the subject of books, and impose a general tax of 5 per cent. which, as far as I can learn, would produce upon the whole the same revenue which the hon. gentleman will obtain from his tax of 15 per cent. on the foreign editions. I would prefer to see them free—as free as the air we breathe, but if there must be a tax on them, public convenience, the convenience of the importer, and the convenience of everybody in obtaining the late editions at the same rate as the earlier, so far as the Customs Department is concerned, and the convenience of the Customs as a fiscal Department, would all be served by reverting to a uniform duty of 5 per cent. instead of what the hon. gentleman proposes. I have made these observations because I feel that the case is a special one. As I have said, books are one of the influences on the more important part of the existence of our whole people, the moral and intellectual life, and it does seem to me to be a matter that ought to receive the earnest and serious consideration of every man who indulges for this country those high aspirations which we hear so often repeated in this Chamber.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the address, the very eloquent address, which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has made a very powerful and a very feeling appeal to the Government to remove the duty on books. Now, Sir, while I was listening to the hon. member appealing to the Government to remove the duty entirely, I asked myself, why was it that when the hon. gentleman himself was a member of the Government, he did not secure its removal. I saw that he guarded himself with regard to the proposition of 5 per cent., but he was most emphatic—was he not?—in his declaration that he would be delighted to have the duty removed altogether. I thought it was strange, if the hon. member felt so deeply, as his speech indicated, that when the late Minister of Finance was preparing his Tariff changes, he did not go to him and say, "Sir, this is a most important question; it is at the bottom of the moral and intellectual life of the people of this country; these are articles from which we ought not to obtain any revenue at all." I can imagine, if he had appealed to his late colleagues in such a speech as he has just delivered, it would have been irresistible, and the late Minister of Finance would have come down with a proposition to remove the duty entirely. Well, there is some difference in being a member of a Government and a member of an Opposition, I do not say that the hon. gentleman did not feel as strongly then as now; but, at any rate, he did not impress his colleagues with the opinion that the duty should be removed entirely. "Well," he asks, "shall we be seven years behind the rest of the world?" No; and we are not. I have heard my hon. friend speak in glowing terms of our neighbors to the south of us—they were an enlightened, an intelligent, a progressive people, and still we are thirteen years ahead of the United States. We are simply asking that the duty shall be collected on books that have not been printed seven years; they demand that duty shall be collected on books not printed twenty years.

Mr. BLAKE. They have a circulation forty times as great.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We are not behind them. I think there might be a good deal said on the subject of this duty for revenue purposes alone. The necessities of life, whatever they may be, are as important to the people as books. All Governments have, from time to time, imposed duties on articles which are necessary to sustain life. I know it is important to do all we can for the moral improvement of the people. When I spoke of novels I had not reference alone to novels—and I agree with the hon. gentleman that there are a large proportion of novels and other publications in Canada to-day which the morals of the people would be much better without. That is one of the reasons why we are justified in asking Parliament to keep the duty of 15 per cent. on these articles which are not necessary to the moral or intellectual welfare of the people. The article which the hon. gentleman read was written I suppose, two years ago when the duty was changed from 6 cts. per lb. to 15 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. This article was published on the 2nd of March, 1883.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then it is not correct, and only shows that the writer did not know what he was writing on. It is not applicable to the present state of the case.

Mr. BLAKE. It was written before the Government had announced the change in the duty, and before the hon. gentleman made his financial statement.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, we have met the writer of that article half-way. We have given to the poor teacher to whom he referred his books of reference and his Greek and Latin books, with all the new discoveries to which the hon. gentleman referred.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. There are new editions of the classics published every day.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have largely met the case presented by the writer of that article. We have not gone the whole length for the reason that we are not prepared to strike down an industry in the country from which thousands are obtaining a livelihood to-day. We are not prepared to put them back in a position where they cannot compete with foreigners in their own country. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that nearly all the books published in England are found in the circulating libraries. The reason of that is that the author puts such extraordinary prices on them—a guinea or half a guinea—that they are beyond the reach of the masses of the people. You do not find in that country the cheap editions that you find in the United States and Canada, though there is a movement there in that direction now. Therefore the masses have access to those books to which the masses in England have not access, except through these libraries. When it was proposed to the public that all books not published in the Dominion, nor likely to be published, should be free, I pointed out the difficulty of administering a law of this kind. I asked how should the different Custom House officers know whether the book was published, or likely to be published in this country, or not. A member of the deputation said: "We can give a list of the books, and they can be put in the hands of every officer." I asked what about those likely to be published? That question could not be very well answered. I have a list which embraces a large portion of the books published—between 600 and 700 in number.

Mr. BLAKE. In how many years?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That would have to be posted. What is the fact? The time was when American printers stole the brains of English authors, and published their works broadcast in the United States, and sent them over here. Our position is that we are stealing the brains of American authors, and publishing their works, not only in Canada, but they are finding their way largely into the United States. We have various publishing establishments in this country. It is just a question, therefore, whether we shall say all these establishments shall be closed, or that, in order to meet, as far as possible, the educational institutions of the country, and libraries of reference, that publish these standard books, encyclopædias and others, they shall have all those published seven years ago free, relieving them from duty on one-half of the publication. It is better that we should take the necessary revenue out of the light literature, which is one-half of the whole revenue collected. I think the proposition is a fair and liberal one.

Mr. FISHER. This is a question of such general interest to the whole community, as the hon. Finance Minister has said in his Budget Speech, that I regret it has only been discussed on this side of the House. I was in hopes that a question of such general interest as this would not assume a party form, but that, on the contrary, hon. gentlemen, supporters of the Administration, who, no doubt, feel the wants of the country, would have taken upon themselves to urge upon the hon. Finance Minister some further concession towards the popular demand than he has here granted; but, unfortunately, the matter seems to have been left entirely in the hands of the Opposition, and I feel bound not to let it pass without saying a few words. The hon. Finance Minister has intimated to us that the question was not one of revenue, that he did not retain the duty on books for seven years after publication for the purpose of collecting revenue, but almost entirely with the view of protecting the publishers of this country. In alluding to what the hon. member for West Durham has said, the hon. gentleman taunted the late Government with not having given us free books.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not taunt him.

M. FISHER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I suppose he only taunted the hon. member for West Durham for not having urged this on the late Government. But at the time the late Government were in power the finances of the Government were in a different position from that in which they are now. Hon. gentlemen opposite take great pleasure in telling us that at this time the country was passing through a period of deficits, and that since they have come into power we have had a succession of glorious surpluses. These facts are true, but although these hon. gentlemen seem to take pleasure in my saying so, they cannot make any capital out of it, because I am prepared to say here, as I have said many times in the country, that those surpluses are not due to the National Policy, and that the policy of the hon. member for East York and his friends was not the cause of the deficits that took place during his administration. However, this is beside the question. I simply wish to note the fact that under the Mackenzie Administration the country was not in possession of surpluses, and that there was quite sufficient reason for a slight duty being put on books. Fortunately for hon. gentlemen opposite, and the country at large, we have to day such surpluses that we can afford to give up this slight duty on books; but instead of doing that the Government increase the 5 per cent. rate to 15 per cent. on imported books. Last year the Government acquired about $90,000 revenue from this source, and I understood the hon. Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech the other day, to predict for this year a surplus of about $6,000,000. It seems to me, therefore, the small amount of revenue obtained from this source might well be spared out of our promised surplus for the year to come. In making this concession to us the hon. gentleman says he has given us half we asked; in other words we must be thankful for this half loaf, which is better than no bread. I venture, however, to differ entirely from the hon. gentleman in his estimate of the change. I believe that, instead of getting a half loaf, we are getting only a few crumbs, perhaps a crust which the hon. gentleman has taken care to dry for seven years before we get the benefit of it. He has acknowledged that there will be great difficulty in regard to the collection of the duty on account of that restriction of seven years, as the hon. member for West Durham has shown, a great many of the standard works are reissued, republished, and reannotated year after year. I have made some enquiries and I find from the booksellers of the country that not only are books republished and reissued, with the latest improvements, additions and annotations, but more than that I find that books are kept by the publishers in England, printed and unbound, and they, as the market admits, year after year, put them together with new title pages bearing the date of the issue; in other words that no books of value are printed with a title page seven years old. Owing to this the increase of revenue will not be one-half as estimated by the hon. Finance Minister, but hardly anything at all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The books are all right if printed seven years ago in the sheet.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. Minister mean to say that books which have been printed and published seven years ago, but which have a date on the title page within seven years, shall be entered free?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Printed seven years ago, though it is in sheets waiting to be ordered. If it is printed seven years ago and bound, it will be admitted free.

Mr. FISHER. I find from the book trade that the title pages are made when the book is issued to the country. The old title page is hardly likely to be placed upon a number of these books. They are prepared, not for the Canadian market, but the great market of the world, and when the Canadian bookseller sends to Europe for an invoice of books, the publisher there can hardly prepare a special title page for the Canadian market. But more than this: The hon. gentleman has spoken of school books which teachers have to use so largely, and which, unfortunately, their small salaries hardly enable them to buy. These school books are constantly being issued in new editions of important books. A good many school books are being published in Canada, and I believe it is hardly desirable that our Canadian school teachers should use our own books because they give fuller and more correct information of our own country than books published in England or the United States. But the School Commissioners in different parts of the country are empowered to select these books and to ordain that school teachers shall use Canadian books in preference to foreign books. Therefore, I do not see that this duty is needed in order to keep out foreign school books for the benefit of our Canadian schools of a similar class. I find, too, in the book trade that when a book is ordered, especially an expensive book, the latest edition is always asked for, and I do not believe the public will be content to wait for books until they are seven years old. Fortunately, in this country, we have a reading public, who desire to obtain the best and newest information upon all subjects connected with their business and trade, and they will always ask for the latest editions. Another class of works which would be entirely shut out by the proposition of the hon. Finance Minister, is the magazines, which, of course, from their periodical publication, cannot possibly come in free at any time, and this is a class of works which has lately assumed great importance, and which is much read by the mass of the community. The hon. gentleman almost told us that books were a luxury, as he told us that the necessaries of life ought to be taxed in a different way from books, and ought to come in free in a different way from books. Sir, I believe books are a necessity in this age. Especially in a community such as ours, where we have free schools, where almost every parent reads, I believe books are a necessity. But I regret to have to say, that it is not the richest class of our community who make the most use of books. The class who use books most, and who take the most advantage of free books, is a class of people comparatively poor, who really have to use books—not as a luxury, but as a necessity of their self-improvement; while the rich, if they use books at all, use them as a luxury. The hon. gentleman said that the United States were thirteen years behind us in this matter. I suppose he meant that in the United States books twenty years old were admitted free, whereas he is now going to allow us to admit books seven years old free. The circumstances are very different. In the United States they are able to reprint books to such an extent as even to rival English publications, and their publishers are able to make a living where our own starve, owing to their immensely greater reading constituency. The consequence is, that in the United States, even though foreign books were shut out, the people would have a full supply of the best literature. This brings me to the point of our supply of native Canadian literature. The hon. gentleman tells us that he has done this for the purpose of protecting our publishers, and in order to do that he has increased the duty on books from 5 to 15 per cent. I have in my hand a list of the books reprinted in this country since Confederation. The hon. gentleman's policy was inaugurated in 1879, and I find that in the first year of Confederation the books, reprinted in this country increased in number from one in 1869 to twenty-two in 1878, in an almost regular progression. I find that from 1878 to 1882 the number of books reprinted in this country has regularly decreased, being twenty-two in 1878, fourteen in 1879, nine in 1880, five in 1881, and only three in 1882.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Where does the hon. gentleman get his information?

Mr. FISHER. From the Copyright Department in Ottawa.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Copyright is another question altogether.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that books have been reprinted in this country which have not been copyrighted?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; many of them are reprints of American authors, for instance, thousands and millions of them. Go to Toronto and you will get there very different statistics.

Mr. FISHER. These are copyrights, no doubt, but they are copyrights in both cases—copyrights since 1869 up to the time of the introduction of the hon. gentleman's policy, and since that time. But, Sir, this is a question that does not merely concern copyrights; it concerns also the question of protection to the publishers. By this increased duty the hon. gentleman claimed that he has protected the publishers, and the book-makers as to their material especially. I find that when the policy of the hon. gentleman was first introduced, a specific duty was put upon books, and in connection with that I have in my hand a memorandum which was issued by one of the publishing and book-selling firms of this country, in which a strong argument was made in favor of a specific duty. I am not prepared for an instant to support that argument, but at the same time a good deal of what this gentleman says—and I think the hon. gentleman will acknowledge the authority as being a good one on the question—is very pertinent to our present enquiry. What this gentleman says when he is condemning an ad valorem duty in favor of a specific duty must necessarily be true, as also what he says in favor of an ad valorem duty as against free books. This gentleman says that in consequence of the duty upon books being always a duty upon the paper, there is a great anomaly, and that in consequence of this duty upon paper to protect our publishers a duty ought also to be placed higher than that on the printed paper. That is quite true and it shows the difficulty by which this question is surrounded. If we wish to put a duty on books for the sake of protection, we find a beautiful illustration of the advantages of that protective system which has been introduced by the hon. Finance Minister and his colleagues. In consequence of the increased duty on paper, publishers turn to the Government and ask for an increased duty on books. In consequence of the raw material of the publisher being thus taxed they are obliged to ask for protection for themselves. The consequence is that the book-sellers, who import the books or buy them, have to pay more for them, and the whole public at large is the sufferer from that policy. In consequence of taxation of the raw material of one individual the raw material of another individual has to be taxed, the result being that the consumer in the end has to pay the whole. I will not detain the House longer upon this question, but I think there can be no doubt that the public at large, when the changes in the Tariff were to be submitted by the hon. Finance Minister, indulged the hope that some greater measure of improvement would be meted out to them; they have obtained, as the hon. Finance Minister says, a portion, and the hon. gentleman says one-half of what they asked. I have endeavored to show that they have not obtained half, but only a very small portion, and in that they will be very much disappointed and will hold the hon. Finance Minister responsible for the disappointment.

Mr. HALL. I had the honor to be one of the deputation from the universities which waited on the hon. Finance Minister in regard to the remission of the duty on books. I am free to say that at the outset I held, in a considerable degree, the sentiments which have been expressed by hon. members on the Opposition side of the House: that there should be an entire remission of the duty if it was possible to accomplish it. We were told at the outset that the Government did not care for the imposition of the duty on books for the sake of revenue, which, of course, gave us a great deal of confidence in presenting our case. We were instructed to ask, first, for the entire remission of the duty. If that could not be obtained we were requested to ask that books should be allowed to be brought in free, if for the use of universities and schools, or for their libraries, and if that would not be conceded we were instructed to ask that at least two volumes of each work for the use of universities or free libraries, might be admitted free. A little reflection and investigation into the circumstances of the case, I think, satisfied a large majority of the deputation that their demands were unreasonable, that they were inconsistent with the protectionist policy of the country with which a large portion of the deputation were in sympathy, and that it would not be right that there should be an entire remission of the duty. It was very plain to us on reflection that the book-publishing trade would be driven out of the country, that with the reasonable duty and protection which exists, of 20 per cent. in favor of paper makers, if books were admitted free there would be an actual premium offered to parties to go out of the country, publish their works and bring them back into the Dominion. It was very plain, therefore, that the effect of the entire remission of the duty would be disastrous to the interests of the publishers in Canada, and we were, therefore, prepared to accept any reasonable compromise. I am free to admit, after an investigation of the case, that I am satisfied that the policy of the Government, which they changed to that which has been last in force, was probably the best, that is, a specific duty instead of an ad valorem one. It had the effect of imposing the duty on the material itself which went into the books and not on the mind of the author embodied in it, and I think that is the correct principle, though it is plain to see there are difficulties surrounding it. It does not follow that because there are difficulties about the enforcing of that, or our present system it is one which should be objected to, nor is it a fair comparison to say that because the republication of foreign books had diminished or almost ceased that the protection granted by the policy of the Government is not working advantageously for the interests of the country. It has effected the discontinuance of the republication of foreign books perhaps to some extent, but it has encouraged our authors to write and publish here. I know that to be the case in connection with many school books, mathematical works, algebras and arithmetics, which were largely brought into the country at one time; and with the protection now existing, there is encouragement to our authors to write such books, and the result is that the necessity of republishing foreign books of that kind does not exist to the same extent. I would say, however, that the compromise and concession made by the Government was felt by that deputation, or at least by a majority of its members, to be a reasonable and satisfactory one. There is a simple addition which I would be very glad to see made. I have called the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to it, and I would be very glad if he could carry it into effect—it is the addition of books in foreign languages to the Free List. There is no possibility of these being republished here, and therefore the admission of this class of books would be a great advantage to universities, schools and public libraries, as well as to students who have not much money to spare. It would, moreover, reach another class who are fairly deserving of consideration. There is in the Province of Ontario—and this matter was called to the attention of the deputation—a large class of the German population who are a reading, intelligent and literary class, who are entirely dependent for their own literature on works brought in from Germany and the United States. I am told there is not a single German publication in this country, nor is there likely to be. It seems a great hardship therefore that this class of the population who wish to improve their minds, and are inclined to do so by reading and study, should be compelled to pay a duty of this kind when Government admit they do not care for the duty so far as revenue is concerned. I should be exceedingly glad if the hon. Finance Minister would add to the Free List, books published in foreign languages, which would include the German language; it would not apply to the French, which is not a foreign language, but it would cover Greek and Latin books as well as German. With that concession, I am sure the decision of the hon. Finance Minister will be accepted throughout the country as being a fair concession to the literary interests which were represented before him, and will be a sufficient protection also to the publishers of the country whose interests in common with those of other manufacturers he watches wisely and well.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think we must assume from the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, that a duty on books is absolutely necessary. The hon. member for West Durham spoke of a class of literature on which he believed it would be not only advantageous to impose a high duty, but to exclude altogether if that were possible; and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), described school books, and books of that kind, the duty on which tends to the production of the publications in the country itself. I desire, however, to say that I think the hon. Finance Minister will yet have to come back to the wise policy, as it seems to me, which he adopted in 1879. There is no doubt whatever, that 15 per cent. on a certain class of books is a very high duty; there is a large class of books which it is utterly impossible to hope can ever be printed in Canada—when I say ever, I mean within a reasonable time—a class where the value of the book is in its matter; and it is quite impossible that these can be reproduced with any advantage to publishers in Canada, for the reason that the market for them is so limited. I will give simply one illustration. Our own librarian wrote a book on Parliamentary Government. He went to the United States, I believe, and had it published. The importation of that book, under this duty of 15 per cent., involved the payment of a duty of 45 cts.; but if we had the duty as fixed in 1879, the specific duty of 6 cts. a lb., the charge for duty would have been about 15 cts. instead of 45 cts., rather under 5 per cent. than over it on that book, as it would be about 5 per cent. on books of that class generally. The hon.

member for West Durham read a very eloquent appeal, written, I think, by the Rev. Prof. Murray of McGill University, in favor of free books; but the Rev. Professor has attended a meeting held in the city of Montreal since that time, which was presided over by Dr. Dawson, the Principal of McGill, at which, while an opinion was expressed that books should be free, recognizing the difficulty of that request being conceded, they urged that the policy of the Government should be to impose duty by weight, a policy which would have the effect to a large extent, of putting a heavier duty on that class of literature to which the hon. member for West Durham referred, and of protecting the publishers of a class of literature, which can be reproduced in this country itself; while permitting the importation of higher class literature at a very low rate of duty. On the class of books that can fairly be reproduced in Canada, the specific rate of 6 cts. a lb. would be quite as effective of protection, if not more effective, than the present Tariff, while it would be a very moderate tax, an exceedingly low tax on books which we cannot hope to reproduce here, and which are required by scholars and literary men. The hon. member for Brome referred to the fact that rich men, as a rule, are not men who read a great deal, they are too busily engaged in trade as he said; and that there is another class, the middle class, who have more leisure. My own impression is that the middle class have no more leisure; but there is no doubt about this, that the literary class of the country are not a moneyed class; they are not given to money making; they are devoted to study, and the results are given to the world, the advantages of which are felt greatly by this community. They are men with just enough to live on, nothing more; and a heavy tax to them is a matter of very serious consequence. The difference between 45 cts. and 15 cts., as a duty upon a book, becomes to them a matter of very serious consequence, because they are compelled, by the very position in which they stand, to count the cost of everything they purchase, and count it very closely. If the principle were adopted of a specific duty, I am quite satisfied that this class of persons, a class who deserve the greatest possible sympathy and encouragement from the Parliament and people of this country, would be well satisfied with an arrangement. Then there is another advantage, which, as it seems to me, might be derived from the adoption of the principle of a specific duty on books, by weight, and that is, in the importation of single books through the Post Office. As the case stands to-day, a book imported has to be sent to the Customs. Notice is given to the person to whom it is addressed, and he has to go to the Custom House and make an entry, though I believe a not very formal entry is required; but some process has to be gone through to get the book out. I know the jealousy that exists between different Departments of a Government. This is one of those things that one outside cannot quite understand the reason for; but it exists nevertheless; and it may be that some difficulty might be met in getting the Department of the Postmaster-General and that of the Minister of Customs to agree to a process by which there would be Customs stamps, so that when a book came to the Post Office, and the importer went to get it, he would simply have to purchase the necessary number of stamps, the book being thrown into the scale to ascertain the duty, and put them on, and these stamps would be accounted for to the Customs Department. I think that this process might be adopted, although, as I said before, I know that a difficulty exists, especially on the part of deputy heads, who sometimes seem to consider that this country was made for the magnifying of their special office; and that difficulty is very considerable.

Hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Order.

Mr. WHITE. Unfortunately, there is too much truth in what I have just said. I merely rose for the purpose of urging very strongly that the hon. Finance Minister would, not at this time—because I know it cannot be done now—but still to urge strongly that he should return to the policy which he adopted in 1879. I know that there were some binders who thought it affected their trade, and some book publishers who thought it affected their trade; but I am quite satisfied that, having regard to the interests of the great mass of the community, the policy of a specific duty by weight would be the true policy. At that time, if I remember rightly, a duty was imposed on magazines and periodicals and a great deal of feeling was shown in the country just after it had been imposed. People who had been in the habit of getting magazines free, went to the Post Office to get them, and found them weighed, and that there was a duty to pay on them—a duty which seemed to be pretty heavy. That difficulty does not exist now. Magazines are free; and, I believe, by a change in the Tariff to-day, even weekly periodicals are made free, so that there is no difficulty now arising in that way. The duty will simply be on books in the true sense of the word; and I think that, if we were to adopt a specific duty, we would really accomplish the object which everyone admits is desirable, of excluding to some extent, or at any rate, of not encouraging, a class of literature, cheap literature, which I think it would be very much better for the people if they did not get, while it would give the higher class of literature to the scholars and literary men of the country at a comparatively low rate of duty.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I notice that the strongest objection that the hon. Minister of Finance makes to remitting the duty on books, is, that by so doing, it would stop the publication of books in Canada. Now, I think that if the hon. gentleman will enquire into this matter he will find that the only books published in Canada to any considerable extent at all, are school books, authorized first by the Council of Public Instruction, or which are expected to be so authorized. The books published in Toronto, or the greater portion of them, I know, I have reason to believe, in fact, I may almost say I know, consist of that class of publications. There is another class, however, published to some considerable extent recently, and that is the class which are sold by subscription. For instance, the biography of the right hon. gentleman is being published in that way, and sold by subscription, and we had recently a variety of works published in the same way. Now, if you exclude all other publications except those two, or the two kinds named, you will have almost, in those two classes, a complete list of the publications—the major portion of the publications—of the Dominion of Canada at the present moment. We have no publication of English poets, or English technical works; all the books that you will find on the book-shelves of the book-stores of Canada, consist of such works as I have already indicated. We have a few histories of Canada published, the production of native authors, but no publication of foreign works, to any appreciable extent, except such as may be used in the Public Schools.

Mr. BOWELL. What class of books are published by Rose & Co., and Belford & Co.?

Mr. ROSS. Rose & Co. publish the Rose-Belford Library. These are reprints, I believe, of American books. That is the extent of their publication in that line, but the Rose-Belford Co. are now confining themselves almost entirely to such books as I have named, which are being sold by subscription. I have in my possession now some books which have been published recently, and which occupy a large portion of their press. For instance, there is "Lord Dufferin's Administration in Canada;" the "Scot in America," and I do not know whether the "Irishman in America" was published by that firm or not; but, at all events, these books are sold by subscription to a constituency which is guaranteed in advance, so that that class of books would not be interfered with by the remission of a large portion of the heavy tax which we ask to be remitted. Now, the class of readers which will be affected most seriously by this tax will be professional men, teachers and others, and men of other callings such as these. Every work required by the teacher for professional purposes is a foreign publication. Go in' o the Model Schools of Ontario, and, with one small exception, there is not a single publication used in these Model Schools but what is an American publication. The books authorized for use in the Model Schools of that Province—and we require about 2,000 annually—are of foreign publication, and these are all most valuable, and have been published very recently, because of the great advances which have lately been made from a scientific stand-point. Take, for instance, Professor Bain's "Science of Teaching," a most valuable work which every teacher should read, and which has recently been published. It comes under the tax which the hon. gentleman has imposed. Some of the most advanced algebraic and other mathematical works, some of the classics, and particularly some of the French books used in the High Schools of the Province, are foreign publications. There is one enterprising firm in Toronto which has done much to put Canadian publications in the hands of Canadian readers, but the professional works which advanced teachers require to use are all foreign publications, and upon such books the burden of this duty will fall most heavily. Take next the Schools of Art and Design in the Province of Ontario; nearly all the technical works which are required to be used in them are foreign books. I cannot think of a single publication of that kind used in these schools which is published in Canada. Even the primary or elementary books with which the student begins his education are published by Walter Smith, of Boston. The hon. gentleman will see that this heavy tax falls upon those who are pushing their way to the front, in order to train themselves for professional and useful pursuits in life. If the hon. gentleman is going to interfere with the development and intelligence of the people, he is striking a blow at one of the most important industries—shall I call it?—in the Dominion of Canada. Let me ask the hon. gentleman to take a simple proof of the effects of his Tariff. Let him go into the store of any book-seller in Ottawa and look over his shelves, and he will find that any literary or scientific work of any value is almost invariably an English or some foreign publication. He will scarcely find one of the poets published in Canada, or the writings of any of the English literary or scientific men. Take Macaulay's "Essays and Reviews," for instance. That, of course, is not a work which has been issued within seven years, but it may have been rendered much more valuable by recent annotations. He will find that those books which are new and fresh are not Canadian, but foreign publications, and certainly we want the newest and freshest we can get. These books all come under the hon. gentleman's heavy tax, and surely he ought to allow the utmost facility for the cultivation and development of the literary taste of young Canadians. It is certainly desirable, as was said when we were incorporating the Royal Historical Society, that we should endeavor to turn our attention somewhat in the direction of literary pursuits. The hon. gentleman cites the case of the United States as one in point, but, as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) says, the two cases are not parallel. They have 50,000,000 of people, and any publisher is almost perfectly safe in publishing any work he may select with such a constituency of readers to appeal to.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is your principle generally.

Mr. ROSS. It is a sound principle. It is the same principle that other manufacturers act upon. The publisher, like any other manufacturer, makes a book to sell it, and unless he can sell it he will not publish it. Some of these American firms are very enterprising—the Harpers, for instance Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

who publish the Half-Hour Series, and the Franklin Square Library, which are composed of the works of the best minds in England and Scotland. The 15 per cent. tax will be a heavy burden so far as these books are concerned. They are books which any ordinary reader can purchase for a small cost but for this duty. The hon. gentleman has put an obstacle in the way of the circulation of the healthiest kind of literature. He says there is an advantage in his high tax, because it keeps out cheap novels, and questionable literature, but I do not see why the innocent should suffer with the guilty. It is true, that perhaps this duty does tend to keep out a questionable class of literature, but it at the same time keeps out the antidote; it keeps out the most valuable books of the best minds of English and foreign literature. One reason why the dime novel is published, and purchased, is because it costs a dime.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. And because it is a novel.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Yes; but the best antidote against the dime novel is to cultivate the purchase of the best kind of books at the same price. Some of the Franklin Square books can be bought for 10 cts. or 15 cts.

Mr. BOWELL. How does this duty affect them injuriously?

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What we propose is that the duty should be remitted.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not the question I asked.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The duty will amount to just three-quarters of a cent on a dime book.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). We should endeavor to circulate books which are valuable, profitable, and instructive, and thus educate the public to reject the dime novel by cultivating a taste for better books. I regret that while the hon. gentleman has a large surplus; while he feels that the revenue is buoyant, he is not disposed to assist the great educational interests of this country, or elevate the educational and literary taste of the people to a higher plane, by placing within their reach every facility for the cultivation of higher and better literary tastes.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman seems anxious to give the scholars of this country their literature as cheaply as possible. He is a member of the Literary Board of Ontario, which endorses a system a hundred times more injurious to the scholars of that Province, and imposes twenty times more duty upon their books than the present duty does. The Educational Department of Ontario, which is controlled by the friends of the hon. member for West Middlesex, imposes restrictions in this way. They will allow no books to be sold that do not belong to the Educational Series; they put their own price on these, change them as often as they like and compel the book-sellers to charge their price, and will not allow them to reduce the price.

Mr. ROSS. Not at all; nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. They will not allow them to do it. These books cannot be got at the cheapest possible price by the class who need them most, that is, the teachers in the schools. I know, as one who has been engaged in selling books, that the country has been put to a very heavy expense in obtaining school books, because scarcely is one book authorized when there is an order issued for it to be changed.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). That is not so.

Mr. SPROULE. It is so. We have had stock on the shelves that we had for less than a month, when we had to send for another stock. And these books had to be sold at 1$, that used to be sold at 25 cts. and 30 cts. The Department will not allow them to be sold for less. If these are not unreasonable restrictions, I do not know what are; and when the hon. gentleman is inclined to complain of restrictions placed on books by this small Tariff, I think that he would have greater reason to complain of the restrictions imposed from day to day, by the Education Department of Ontario—restrictions which it is not in the power of the people there to remedy in any way.

The first, second and third resolutions were severally concurred in; and it was resolved that the following take effect on and after the 20th of April, 1883:—The first resolution, and in the second resolution, items 1 to 5 inclusive, 13, 20 to 22 inclusive, 24 to 44 inclusive, 45a to 55 inclusive, 79 to 98 inclusive, and 100 to 102 inclusive.
