Mr. BLAKE. Then they can be altered for all time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think notice having been given, it is for the House to say whether they shall suspend the Rule or not.

Mr. BLAKE. And I suppose you rule accordingly, and that the motion is in order, and that, notwithstanding my declaring myself against the motion, I am still obliged to serve.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think a member can absolve himself from serving on a Committee by declaring himself against any particular part of a motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I declare myself against the principle and substance of the matter to be committed.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course if the hon. gentleman makes that declaration he need not serve.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then if the hon. gentleman does not choose to serve, we can strike out his name and put on another.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. All of us agree to the same declaration, and we intend to abide by it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not hear anyone object but the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We all object.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think some of the hon. gentlemen who have just risen had better have waited until they were asked to serve.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Do I understand that the point of order has been decided?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Rule is decidedly that any hon. member who declares against the principle or substance of a Bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, cannot be nominated on a Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Because I have a perfect recollection that when the hon. gentleman opposite, some years ago, moved for a Committee to consider the Insolvency Laws, he announced publicly that he would put my name on the Committee, only that he knew I was opposed to the Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Quite right.

Mr. MACKENZIE. On the same principle, every one on this side is opposed to the striking of the Committee for this purpose—that is the principal object, not the ulterior object—and the formation of the Committee in toto.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that the principle here is the prevention of the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think the principle involved is the formation of this Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. I decide that the motion being for the suspension of the whole Rule the hon. member cannot raise the objection he has raised, and refuse to serve on the ground he has stated.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I made up my mind long ago to declare myself against the motion, for while I would be willing to help the Government on any measure of this kind, I shall not serve on the Committee unless I am forced to do so by the Rules of the House, because I am entirely opposed to referring this matter to a Committee. I am entirely opposed to the hon. gentleman's motion, and I do not want to serve on this Committee. It is very evident from the beginning that this motion is a sham motion. Not only does the hon. gentleman not want to take the responsibility of bringing this measure before the House, but he will not have it brought at all. We shall never see this measure this Session; the Committee will have the matter in hand for three or four or six weeks, and will not make a report. The hon. gentleman proposes to put upon the Journals of the House a bad precedent, which should not be there. (Translation). I said a minute ago, in English, that I considered the measure now proposed to us was altogether opposed to my own ideas, and that I can in no way accede to the principles involved therein. On the contrary, I am opposed in all possible ways to the subject matter as well as its form and all it contains. I do not want to render myself an accomplice of a precedent, of a snare, are prepared beforehand for my downfall, but which, thank God, I was fortunate enough to see before treading upon it. I said just now that I wanted to follow, without wavering, the maxim laid down by a Tory of the purest water, the very chief of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in England, who refused to assume the responsibility of rendering the Government any service as a Government, but would let that Government bear the whole responsibility of their actions. It is for a similar reason that I this day enter my protest in the most formal manner against this mode of procedure. This procedure is such, Mr. Speaker; that I feel grieved to see it adopted by a man who has, for such a length of time, been actively engaged in politics. That hon. gentleman has occupied a seat in this House for nearly half a century, and I am induced to believe that as he grows older the strength of his youth is weakening, and he has not the same liberal tendencies as heretofore; on the contrary, the more he advances in years, the more his Conservative principles affirm themselves, and this, I believe, to the detriment of the best interests of the country. I forgot just now to read a very interesting Rule of this House that we all should know. I would like to refer to the forms of procedure in this House, and in order to refresh the memory of certain hon. members, I will read the Rule which forbids that any member of this House be interrupted while speaking, unless in cases provided by rule 15, as follows:—

“No Member may speak twice to a Question, except in explanation of a material part of his speech, in which he may have been misconceived, but then he is not to introduce new matter. A reply is allowed to a Member who has made a substantive motion to the House, but not to any Member who has moved an Order of the day, or an Instruction to a Committee.”

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude, and I protest, as I have just said, against my name being put on that Committee.

Motion (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I give notice that on Monday next I shall move:

That as Messrs. Ross (Middlesex), Blake, Burpee (St. John), Laurier, Casgrain, and Robertson (Shelburne), have declared that they decline to sit on the Select Committee on the paragraph of the Speech from the Throne read to-day, Messrs. Shakespeare, Bowell, Burns, Gigault, Landry and Allison be appointed members of the same, and that the 78th Rule of this House be suspended for that purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10.20 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 19th March, 1883.

LOYAL ORANGE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of British America.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Mr. COURSOL moved, in amendment, that the Bill now before the House be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. SMALL. This is a very unusual proceeding. The hon. gentleman is not aware what the nature of the Bill is.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I may just say that I think this is the fourteenth Session I have been in this House, and this is the first time, to my knowledge, when a motion like the one moved by the hon. member for Montreal East has been made by any hon. member on either side of the House. It seems to me a very strange proceeding, considering that the hon. gentleman, who has made the motion, does not even know the contents of the Bill. Is it honest? Is it fair? Is it intelligent? Is it impartial? Is it the kind of treatment that I should receive from that hon. gentleman, or from his fellow countrymen? I think it is not. I think it is treatment which a free, intelligent and enlightened people will not put up with. It is tyrannical, unjust, and unmanly. I think there are enough real, true, genuine, honest-minded men in the House of Commons to-day, elected by the independent electors of this great Dominion of Canada, to give us at least the second reading of the Bill. Let the Bill be printed and distributed to members so that they may be informed of its contents. If there is anything in the Bill against the individual or the State—if there is anything in it that should not be presented to this House, I shall have no objection to the hon. gentleman finding fault with it, and speaking against it, and working against it. I ask him if there has been anything which he has introduced into the House during the last fourteen years connected with any society to which he belongs, or with the church of his choice, that I or any man stood up to say a word against. On the contrary, I have, on all occasions, and under all circumstances, thrown down the olive branch in this House, in order that we might have peace and prosperity in this country. Such being my record, I come here with a Bill asking for what? Asking that a society of which I am a humble member shall have the right to buy and hold its own property, and put buildings upon it, and sell it if we wish. I ask this free and independent Parliament if that Bill is to be crushed out? Are we not to be allowed to buy, and pay for, and hold our own property? Are we not to be allowed to hire mechanics to erect buildings, or to sell those buildings if necessary, and divide the proceeds among the orphans or the widows of the society to which we belong? If we are not a loyal society—crush us out. If we are not a moral society—crush us out. If we are not a body of upright conscientious men, who uphold what we believe to be right—crush us out. I trust, however, that we shall have fair play, for that is all we ask for; we ask for no favors. We do not ask that this House should relieve any body of men from paying taxes. We are willing to pay taxes. We are willing to adhere to every law passed by this House or the Imperial Parliament. I am sorry that an hon. gentleman, whom I have always respected so highly, should feel that he owes it as a duty to any class of the community to prevent the Bill from being printed or circulated. I trust that the debate, if we are going to have one, will be carried on in a courteous manner, and that there will be found honest members enough in this House to vote against this discourteous, unnecessary, and unmanly motion. I hope there is independence enough in this House to give us fair play—British fair play. Crush a man! Hang him without trial! Crush him out at once! I say it is a shame for any man claiming to be a courteous Frenchman to do it. But I believe we will have an independent and honest vote on this question.

Mr. COURSOL. Mr. Speaker, I never, in the course of my life, did anything unmanly. I never allowed a man to tell me I was doing an unmanly act, and if an expression like that were used outside of this House, I would resent it. But, Sir, I have used the privilege I possess as a member of this House. I have used my own discretion in endeavoring to defeat a measure which I think ought to be defeated. In adopting the course I have adopted, I have done so for the purpose of preventing a discussion which must necessarily be acrimonious, must necessarily tend to excite violent passions. I have lived, Sir, in the largest city of the Dominion since I have been born; I have lived amongst people of different religions, and amongst the brethren of the hon. gentleman, on friendly terms; I have occupied public positions; I have administered justice to the best of my ability, and I defy any man to say that I ever did one unmanly act, or one that has placed a stain upon my reputation. In making this motion, I desired to prevent a discussion upon this measure, feeling, as I do, that it is unconstitutional, that it is not required for the country, that it is for the incorporation of a secret society, which we have no right to incorporate. If it is only a benefit society, let the hon. gentleman go to the Province of Ontario, or any other Province, and get it incorporated. We have a right to prevent the incorporation of societies in the Province of Quebec which are illegal by the law of that Province. I have no desire, God knows, to create any ill-feeling. I have only done my duty. I have made this motion with my eyes open, and I hope the hon. gentleman will submit to the vote of this House without any discussion. If he believes that he is right, and that he can carry a majority of this House for his Bill, this is the time to do it; let the House defeat my motion, and then the Bill can be discussed. But, if this motion is defeated, and the discussion is allowed to take place, we know, from the very words which have fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman himself, what kind of a discussion we shall have. Will it conduce to the benefit of the country at large? Will it heal the wounds that rankle in the breasts of men from their religious opinions? I think it would be far better to avoid such discussions altogether. For my part I never discuss religious opinions. I respect the religious opinions of every man; but there are certain fixed principles which I cannot depart from, and when these principles come up I am bound to do my duty, and I believe I have done so in this instance.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I wish to say a few words on the motion made by the hon. member for Montreal East. If the object of the hon. gentleman was to prevent discussion on this question, I think he has taken the wrong method of doing it. If the Orange Bill is not passed by this House, I am certain that a large proportion of the population of the country will feel that a great injustice has been done to them; but if it is not even allowed to be introduced, they will feel that they have been subjected to a double injustice. I believe the feeling of fair play is too strong in the House of Commons of Canada to prevent this Bill being brought in and discussed on its merits. If it is wrong, let the majority vote against it; but the House has not yet had an opportunity of knowing whether it is wrong or not. The motion of the hon. member for Montreal East does a great wrong to an organization that is loyal to the British Empire. It is loyal not only in Canada, but in every portion of the Empire; and I think it is the duty of the House to allow the Bill to go to its second reading, and then to proceed on its merits.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It must be allowed that the motion of the hon. member for Montreal East is a very unusual one at this stage. When a Bill is thrown out at its first reading, there must be something so monstrous, so iniquitous, so shocking about it, that Parliament will not take the opportunity of discussing or considering it. My hon. friend says that his object in moving this amendment, is that there should not be a discussion now. I do not think that course would be consistent with the dignity or propriety of Parliament. We ought not to vote upon a matter without discussion. We ought to understand what we are doing; and if this Bill is so objectionable that it ought to be thrown out at the very first reading, the objections should be stated. Surely when a body such as that which now comes here and asks for the mere permission to hold and convey property, they are entitled, at least, to a respectful hearing. If there is any objection to their application on the ground that it is not within our constitutional powers to pass such an Act—which my hon. friend said was his reason for moving this amendment—that is a matter which ought to be discussed. We ought to have an opportunity of hearing or knowing from the

hon. members of the House who are cognizant with the subject, whether it comes within the functions of Parliament or not, and not kick out the Bill without knowing what is in it. I would ask the hon. member for Montreal East if he has read this Bill, and knows what its provisions are, or whether he simply makes this motion because he imagines and believes it contains provisions which it would be improper for him to support. If he does not, why should he move that it be kicked out of the House immediately after its introduction. If he does, he ought to state his objections, and the House ought to have an opportunity of discussing them. The very absence of discussion and the motion he has introduced will have the effect of producing a most acrimonious discussion and ill will, more especially in the Province of Ontario. It would be far better the Bill should be discussed on its merits, and then, if the House thinks that the Bill should not be passed, be rejected, and not be treated in the discourteous and unheard of manner in which my hon. friend would treat it by his motion. I ask my hon. friend, and those who are of his opinion, to deal with others as they would be dealt with. When a Bill of this kind is introduced in the interests of a large portion of the community, who may differ from my hon. friend in their religious opinion, the same consideration should be shown that I think the members in this House who differ from my hon. friend in religious opinion, are always prepared to give those questions and Bills affecting the religious institutions and affairs of the church to which he belongs, when brought before this House. I am not aware that any hon. member of this House who may belong to the Orange Association—and I believe there are some—have ever stood up and voted against any Bill to incorporate any Catholic institution to give them all the powers of holding property they ask for, simply because they were Catholic. If this House has not treated him and his co-religionists in that way, why should he turn around and treat us so? I beg the hon. gentleman to reflect before pressing his motion, which will introduce much bad feeling in the House amongst his own friends, and allow the Bill to go to a second reading, and be fairly discussed on its merits.

Mr. CURRAN. I rise to say a few words on this subject, not for the purpose of discussing the Orange question—as we may call it—because, in the interests of peace and harmony, and to avoid saying anything which would hurt the feelings of any one in the community, it was generally understood no discussion should take place at this stage of the proceedings. I think, however, very much more courtesy has been shown on this occasion in this Parliament than was shown on the last occasion, when this matter came up before the Legislature of the United Canadas. Then, the Bill was opposed on its first reading. For peace and courtesy sake, in order to avoid the appearance of any ill-will, the first reading of this Bill was allowed to pass. One of the hon. members here said that this petition had not been received; that the Bill had not been received; that its first reading had not been allowed. That is not the case. This House has allowed all that. Contrary to the proceedings on a former occasion, the first reading has been allowed, and now this motion is put, distinctly for the purpose of avoiding any acrimonious discussion. We have been told here that no Bill was ever thrown out of this House, simply because it applied for the incorporation of any Catholic association. No Bill will ever be thrown out of this House simply because it applies for the incorporation of a Protestant association—not, at all events, with my vote. Nor, if my voice can prevent it, will any Bill be thrown out in an unceremonious manner, as they call it, simply because it is a Protestant Bill. This is a question of the incorporation of the Orange Society, and the word "Orange" explains the whole matter. It is one which belongs to history. If this House, with its knowledge of history; with what it knows of the effects of Orangeism, is really prepared to pronounce upon this question without any further debate, then, in the name of peace and harmony, let us divide the House without any discussion. When the time for the discussion of the merits of this question shall have come, if it should ever come—and I hope it may not—I shall be prepared to give my opinion on the law and facts of the matter. In the meantime, I approve of the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. SCRIVER. During the fourteen or fifteen years in which I have had the honor of occupying a seat in this House, I recollect only one or two occasions when a step similar to that taken by the hon. member for Montreal East, has been taken in this House. I recollect no occasion upon which a motion similar to that made by my hon. friend has been carried here. I remember a few years ago, upon the introduction of a Bill providing for the abolition of the Supreme Court, the introduction of the Bill was resisted and a vote taken. I recollect very well the discussion which then took place. The position taken by the hon. leader of the House was to the effect that it was not the practice in this House to discuss Bills upon their introduction; and that it was only treating any hon. member who chose to introduce a Bill, with the courtesy due to him as a member of this House, that the Bill should take its first reading. The hon. member who has just sat down has said that that courtesy has been carried as far as it could be consistently, by those who sympathize with him in those views, by allowing the Bill to be introduced and its first reading taken; and he held that now was the proper time to resist any further progress. I appeal to the common sense of hon. members if the effect of the amendment of the hon. member for Montreal East is not the same as an opposition to the introduction of the Bill. The proper time, in all Parliamentary practice, for the discussion of the principles involved in any Bill, is upon the second reading. I am opposed to this motion, because I think it would be discourteous to an hon. member of this House, who has long sat here and conducted himself in such a way as to win the respect and esteem of all those who have sat here with him. I oppose it, also, because I think it would not be fair and just to a large section of our community to refuse this Bill the opportunity of coming up for a second reading. In so doing, I express no opinion whatever, for I think the proper time has not come for an expression of opinion as to the merits of the Bill. If the Bill is suffered to go to its second reading, I shall then take occasion, and consider it my duty, to make known my opinions, and to act upon them with reference to this measure. But, in the meantime, I appeal to the hon. members of this House to do no more than what I consider an act of simple courtesy and simple justice, and defeat the motion in amendment of the hon. member for Montreal East.

Mr. BURNS. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of the motion for the second reading of this Bill have argued as if the principles involved in it were a new principle, or at all events an unknown principle. It is not necessary for me, I am sure, to remind this House that the merits of Bills of this character have been discussed again and again, in almost every Province of the Dominion—I think in every Province of the Dominion. In some Provinces Bills of a similar character have been passed and become law. As I understand it, this Bill has emanated from Ontario, and I take it that it is not within the domain of this Parliament to deal with a measure of this kind. We are here as conservators of the peace and harmony of the Dominion; we are here to do what we can to promote good feeling between the different classes of people. With a view of carrying out that view, the opponents of the measure have thought that the better course to pursue would be to deal with the Bill in what might be called a summary manner. If the principles of the Bill were new, if they were unknown, then the mover of this motion in amendment might be called discourteous; but, under these circumstances, I do not think he is open to that charge. He has shown a desire to respect the feelings of the majority of this House who wish to avoid discussion. I think I am warranted in making that statement; at all events I am warranted in making the statement that the body in this House who are opposed to that Bill are a unit in their own desire to prevent a discussion. If it were necessary to go into a discussion, facts might be adduced and argument offered to show why this Bill should not be passed, but the time for that has not yet arrived. The hon. gentleman who moved this Bill has said that it does not aim at any individual. No, Mr. Speaker, it does not aim at any individual; but under cover of a desire to be enabled to hold property, I think it aims at a particular denomination in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BURNS. Well, if I may be allowed to support the statement I have made, I shall do so with a great deal of hesitation. I could go into facts to show that I make no idle statement. A gentleman on my left thinks I had better not go into the facts, and perhaps I had better not. One statement the hon. gentleman has made calls for some remarks from me. He spoke of that association as being an ultra-loyal association. Well, is it necessary that an association should be established and maintained in Canada of an ultra-loyal character? Is it necessary that a society of that kind, having loyalty as its flag, should have an existence in Canada? I do not think it is. I am not going to argue now whether they can claim the merit of being ultra-loyal. History proves that there are other denominations in this Dominion which have shown their loyalty over and over again, whenever required. Reference has also been made to the fact, that whenever a Bill to incorporate a religious society pertaining to the Roman Catholic Church, has been introduced into this House, it has not received the treatment this Bill is receiving. But, as has been said by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), this is not a religious society; if it were it would receive the same treatment that is given to every Bill having for its object the incorporation of a religious society. When a Bill is introduced into this House referring to any Protestant or Catholic society, no question is raised as to whether it should become law. It is taken for granted that it should become law. I simply rose for the purpose of refuting the charge that those who are opposed to the Bill are treating the promoters of it with any discourtesy, and I do now formally repel that charge.

Mr. AUGER. Of course, I am a stranger to the Orange Society—I know nothing of it except from report; but I shall vote for the motion for the second reading of this Bill, reserving my rights, after having studied the Bill now before the House, to vote against it at another stage.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am not an Orangeman, never was an Orangeman, and I feel pretty sure that I shall never become one. But, Sir, I believe in British fair play. What are the facts of the case? Here are a large class of our fellow subjects who have all the same rights that we have, and who come here asking us for an Act of incorporation. Now, Sir, if I understand anything about the matter, the right of petition is one secured to every British subject. They have a right to come here and ask that their views be carried out in the shape of legislation, if we see fit to do so. What is the request made us in this case? We are asked that the House should not be allowed even to consider the matter which is asked for in this petition. The motion of the hon. member for Montreal East goes even further, and declares that the House shall not be allowed to know what the petition contains. Most of the members of this House have never seen the Bill. Now, I do not mean to say that I am going to vote for it; but I do want to see this House give the petitioners the courtesy and the same fair play which are extended to every other class of subjects—allow the motion for another stage to carry, and then consider it on its merits.

Mr. HAWKINS. As a new member of this House, I beg to crave its indulgence for a few minutes. If I could have chosen, I would have selected some other subject and some other occasion upon which to address this honorable House; but I cannot sit here in my capacity as a member of this House and give a silent vote upon this question. Should I support the resolution of the hon. member from Montreal East, undoubtedly I should want the reasons to go to the country why I had taken so unusual a course, why I had supported a resolution to kick the measure out of the House, to refuse to receive it into consideration, to refuse even to know what is asked for in this Bill. Although only a very short time a member of this House, I have already seen resolutions introduced for the incorporation of different societies—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAWKINS. I do not know who the hon. member is who says "hear, hear," but before I have done, perhaps, I will make him say "hear, hear" in earnest. Mr. Speaker, I have seen measures introduced for the incorporation of religious bodies with which I am connected, and of which I am a member. I have seen them receive due consideration, their merits examined, and the Bills sent to Committees to be reported upon. I have also seen the same course adopted in respect of measures introduced for collegiate and other purposes respecting other creeds in the community; but it remained for me, coming from the great Province of Ontario, a Roman Catholic, and a representative from the most Protestant riding in the Province, to hear this proposition treated in a manner that I have not heard advocated or proposed with respect to any other measure laid before this honorable House. The other evening, when a resolution was introduced into this House to decide the King's County (P. E. I.) Election case, by what I would consider a prejudging of the case—not upon its merits, but according to the party feelings of hon. members—I, for one, felt perfectly justified in voting against the resolution that proceeded from the other side of the House, because I believed the matter should be referred to a Committee, and should be reported upon by a Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is not in order in referring to a past debate.

Mr. HAWKINS. Upon the same grounds, in respect to this question, I desire to know what the promoters of the Bill ask from this House, what powers the Bill seeks to confer on those who ask for it; and if I find, upon examination, that their objects are not compatible with the public welfare; if I find upon examination and discussion, when the merits of this question have been gone into, that it is something contrary to the public interests, contrary to the interests of society at large, then, in my capacity as a member of this House, I am determined to vote against it, and vote to throw it out. But we have been told that it was thought, and it was decided, inadvisable that there should be any discussion upon this question. May I be allowed to ask who those hon. members are, and upon whose counsels it has been determined, that a matter brought before this House for its serious, earnest and impartial consideration, should be burked in the manner which we have heard proposed in respect to this measure? I say, coming as I do from the great Province of Ontario, and being widely familiar with the feelings of that great body of which I have the honor of being a humble member, that I do not believe my constituents, either Catholic or Protestant, nor the Catholics of the Province at large, would justify me in voting to treat this question in the discourteous manner, as I conceive it to be, which has been proposed on the floor of this House. Now, whatever may have been the history of the association that went under a similar name in other lands, I am satisfied that in this country, at this time of day, there is no man who will stand up in this House and attempt to prove that the organization seeking incorporation at our hands is disloyal. Neither will any man stand up in this House and successfully prove that the association is illiberal in its treatment of the body to which I belong. Why, Mr. Speaker, there would be no members in this House hailing from the Province of Ontario of the Roman Catholic persuasion, were it not for the principles of broad liberality which prevail everywhere in the Province of Ontario among the members of this association. I do not say this Bill should pass, I do not say it is in the public interest that this measure should pass as it stands, nor do I believe we have a knowledge of what the particulars of the case are. All I know is this: that a great body of loyal citizens scattered through every Province of this great Dominion, numbering in the Province of Ontario hundreds of thousands, have approached the foot of the Throne and this House in a spirit of respectful consideration, and have asked the incorporation of their society. I conceive this House will not be treating this question in the same spirit of liberality and of toleration that it is accustomed to treat all matters coming within its cognizance, should the amendment be carried. I believe at this day no attempt should be made to prevent the discussion of this question. Why, are we, hailing from the Province of Ontario, to be told that the Orange question should not be discussed, or that it is something not proper to be examined on its merits? The Government of our Province have forced it upon us as a leading issue during the past ten years; and not only so, but the Liberal Administration of Ontario, when this question was laid before the Ontario Legislature, voted in a majority for the incorporation of the society, and the Bill passed the House by a very large majority. Although great complaints are made with respect to the interference by this Government in questions of a Provincial character, this question was relegated to Ottawa, but it was afterwards referred back, it being within the purview of the Local Legislature. There the matter has remained from that day to this. In Nova Scotia, I am informed by my Catholic compatriots, the passage of the Orange Incorporation Bill has been accepted in that Province as a peace offering, and it has been the means of setting aside the Old Country troubles and bitternesses which should never have found a foothold in this country. I am told further, by hon. members from the Province of New Brunswick, that the passage of the Orange Incorporation Bill in that Province has had the effect of almost extinguishing the Orange Order; that since this bone of contention was removed, and since members of the organization have been able to feel there was no barrier to their receiving that measure of consideration at the hands of the legislators of the Province, which was meted out to all other bodies in the Province, the result has been to render Orange incorporation, from a Catholic point of view, entirely and completely harmless. The result, as to Orange incorporation itself, from a Catholic stand-point has been entirely and completely satisfactory. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the Province of Ontario—and I do not pretend to speak with regard to any other Province—sending as it does upwards of ninety members to this House of Commons, we know that according to the general Act of incorporation, all such societies may go and receive incorporation. We know that the officers of the Orange lodges in the Province of Ontario may go and get incorporation under it, upon the payment of a very small sum of money.

Mr. CURRAN. Why don't they go there?

Mr. HAWKINS.

Mr. HAWKINS. An hon. gentleman says, why don't they go there? Now, further on in my remarks I may explain that matter. They have gone there, and they have been received in a manner which was very hypocritical. A measure was passed in the Legislature of the Province of Ontario; but owing to certain reasons, an explanation of which should come from the other side of the House, that measure was never placed on the Statute-book. Well, Mr. Speaker, the principle of the Bill has been conceded by the Government of Ontario; and I, as a Roman Catholic, wish to know why I should raise my voice and vote against this measure? Why, after the principle has been conceded, after our people have known and lived side by side with this institution during the past forty years, after the general feeling of the Catholics of the Province of Ontario has come to be a feeling of indifference—for that is the correct word, and the feeling of the Catholics of the Province of Ontario is a feeling of total indifference regarding the matter, during the past ten years, during which it has been made the chief question, the chief bone of contention, and the chief reason why the electors should go to the polls and should vote in favor of a political party—I should oppose this Bill? And why is this the case? Because of what? Because a large body of gentlemen in the Province of Ontario, numbering hundreds of thousands, seek incorporation! And what do they seek at the hands of this House, and of the country? Why, I am told, all that they ask is the right to hold their own property—

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). That is all.

Mr. HAWKINS. And to own that which belongs to them—

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). That is all.

Mr. HAWKINS. And the right to be taken out of the position, out of the state of affairs which, a few years ago in the city of Kingston, resulted in the loss of $20,000 of their means and of their property. How was this? Because they were obliged to hold their property through trustees, and, through the failure of the trustees, that property was lost to the association. Now, I am at a loss—a total loss, Mr. Speaker—to know how, in this Canada of ours, numbering very nearly half, as it does, of Roman Catholics, we can be placed in jeopardy or incur danger of any kind, by simply allowing this association to hold and own its own property. I am at a total loss to know why I, as a member of this House, should lift up my hand and vote to throw this measure out without knowing what it asks for, or without knowing the necessities of those who are petitioning this House for incorporation, simply because of the prejudices of some gentlemen, not against the principles of this measure, not against the Act of incorporation, but simply against the word "Orange" itself. Why, Mr. Speaker, when I sit down to my breakfast every morning, they place before me a dish with oranges in it; and I think it would be just as reasonable if I turned round to the waiter and said: "How dare you place that objectionable word, that objectionable color before me?"—as that hon. gentlemen, representatives of the people of Canada, in this the nineteenth century, should get up in this House and say, as they have actually said here to-day, "We do not object to the principle involved in this Bill; we do not object to the incorporation asked for at the hands of this Society; we do not object to the idea that they should hold and own their own property; but we do object to the word 'Orange!' We have an everlasting quarrel with that word; we have an everlasting quarrel with that color." Why, Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive that this House will accept of the proposition that has been offered here, and that this measure will be thrown out in the manner which has been proposed. I cannot conceive, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. gentlemen believed that this was to be the final settlement of this question, that they should act in the manner proposed. I cannot conceive that hon. gentlemen will come to the conclusion that, if this were the last time and the only occasion upon which this question could be submitted to the House, they could stand up in their places and treat it in this way; and, Mr. Speaker, my experience, as a candidate for the Local Legislature ten years ago, and as a candidate for this House in 1878 and again as a candidate for a seat in this House in 1882, convinces me that this is one of the issues, and one of the questions of the day; that it must be met with, it must be dealt with on its merits, and that it must be so decided; and consequently I prefer here in my place to-day to say I shall vote for the printing and fixing of a day for the second reading of this Bill, in order that it may come before the House; in order that we may have a thorough and complete examination of the whole question, of the objects of these gentlemen, and of the reasons, why it should be submitted to this House of Parliament. After that, after being cognisant of all the facts, after having weighed the question, after we have found what its effects will be on society, and upon the interests of the country—then, Mr. Speaker, we can rise in our places and give an intelligent, and impartial, and an unbiassed vote upon this question. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say before sitting down, I apologise to the House for taking up so much of its time, but feeling as I do, coming from the Province of Ontario, and having had as great, if not greater opportunities of knowing the views and the wishes and the feelings of the Catholics of that great Province, I could not have sat here and given a silent vote on this question; therefore I shall vote to give this Bill the same treatment and the same measure of due consideration and justice which is meted out to every other body in the community.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel like the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that I cannot give a silent vote on this question; still at the same time, I shall make my remarks exceedingly brief, as I do not intend to enter into its discussion just now; but I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be exceedingly uncourteous and unfair to throw out this Bill without knowing what is in it. This Bill has only now been introduced into the House; and to give a vote to throw it out, without so much as ever looking into it, without so much as admitting a discussion of it, I think would be to say the least unwise. It may be all very well for hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec to treat such a Bill in this cavalier manner, but let me tell these hon. gentlemen that the Orangemen of Ontario form a very large and influential body of the people. They form a great proportion of the people of that Province; we cannot ignore their existence, for they are everywhere, and to throw out the Bill in this way, without even admitting it to discussion, I can assure hon. gentlemen would produce very bad feeling in Ontario. I ask the hon. gentleman who last addressed this House, and who has said that there are ninety members here from the Province of Ontario, what is the reason that there are so few Catholics among these members? Why are not they represented according to their population? Simply from vexatious things of this kind; simply that a feeling of irritation is kept up by one party refusing to the other the fair play and justice to which they are entitled. The principle upon which I act is equal rights to all, and I say it would be extremely uncourteous not to admit this Bill to discussion, and shall therefore oppose the motion to crush it in this unceremonious way.

Mr. BOWELL. I think it would be well before the motion is put that hon. gentlemen should understand precisely what the motion is. From the remarks which have fallen from some other hon. gentlemen, it would seem that they are under the impression that they are about to vote for or against the second reading.

Mr. IVES. No, no.

Mr. BOWELL. There are some who evidently think so or they would not have made the remarks which they have made. It may be that the hon. gentleman from Richmond and Wolfe thinks he concentrates in himself all the knowledge of all the members; I am only referring to those who have already addressed the House, some of whom objected to affirming the principles of the Bill on the second reading. The motion is not upon the second reading of the Bill. The first reading of the Bill has been accepted, and the hon. member for East Hastings asks that a day shall be set in the future for the second reading, and the amendment is that it shall not be read upon that particular day, whatever day it may be, but that it shall receive the second reading six months hence. The hon. member for Centre Montreal stated that this was the course pursued when the Bill was introduced in 1856. The hon. gentleman is not, I think, strictly correct in that remark. The introduction of the Bill was made by the then member for North Hastings. It was read the first time, and a motion for the six months' hoist was proposed when the second reading was moved. The discourtesy with which an hon. gentleman claims the Bill is being treated is from the fact that the House is asked to refuse to allow the Bill to be considered at some future period. Now, whatever may be the opinion of the majority or the minority upon the merits of the Bill, which is a question to be discussed hereafter, I think it would only be a matter of courtesy that a day should be fixed for the second reading, and then when we come to discuss the principle of the Bill—though I understand for I have not read it all, that it is simply intended to give power to hold certain property and erect buildings upon it—we can discuss the whole question. If it be beyond our constitutional powers let the Private Bills Committee treat it precisely as they would treat other Bills—throw out those clauses which are considered unconstitutional, and which belong exclusively to Local Legislatures. It seems to me that would be—I will not say the more courteous, but certainly the more usual course to be taken in questions of this kind. There are other reasons which may induce many hon. members to vote against the Bill. I will not discuss these reasons just now, but I am satisfied of this, and I make the assertion with a thorough knowledge of what I am speaking—that it will not be to the detriment of the Orange institution if the principle upon which it is based is to have a full, clear and calm discussion such as I think the House could give it if necessary. The hon. member for Gloucester says it is well known what the principles of the Order are. I will not discuss that question, but I direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell, who has spoken of the Order as he has found it in Ontario, both as a private individual and during his political career. I am glad to know, whatever may have been the divisions between certain classes of society in the past, that so far as their intercourse, private, social and political, in Ontario is concerned, both sides have learned the principle of live and let live; and I think I can appeal on behalf of the Orange body, to my Roman Catholic fellow citizens of Ontario, to say whether in our municipal council and in our daily intercourse—political, social and municipal—they have not been met fairly and honestly upon general questions, apart, of course, from those questions in which it might be believed, that the beliefs of that portion of the Protestant community might not be considered in jeopardy. I find no fault with those who differ from us, for in this free country under the British Constitution we can happily all think and speak as we believe on religious matters; and so long as one does not interfere with the other we need have little fear of any collision taking place. I am not going into a defence of the principles of the Orange Order, but I can only say to the honorable member for Gloucester that if he takes the trouble to read the constitution of the Order—that which is essential to the initiation of an Orangeman—he would find that with the exception of its being an organization of Protestants, he would say of it as was said to me by a prominent gentleman in the House, high in his church, that he thought that it was an association of ultramontane Protestants. I suppose that it will be granted that the Protestant proportions of the community have as good a right to be ultramontane Protestants as the Catholics have to be ultramontane Catholics; and if it be now absolutely necessary that there should be a super-loyal or ultra-loyal society in this country, bound to maintain the connection between this country and the British Crown, and to be ready on all occasions to defend Her Majesty against either internal or external attacks, certainly a society of that kind, so long as it adheres to those principles, cannot, by any possibility, do anyone any harm. I take it for granted that every man who values the connection between this and the Mother Country, who values the British Constitution, and believes that it contains within itself the greatest amount of liberty which a free people can desire, that no one else should govern the British portion of this continent except those who are loyal to the British Crown, and if it is to be an objection to this society that it is a loyal association, then let us know it. I do not pretend to say that there are not others equally as loyal as they, but I think that it is no objection to any society, whether Catholic or Protestant, that it should be called a loyal institution. I hope the House will agree to fix a day for the consideration of this question, and that is really all we have before us at present. If on any future occasion the Bill is proceeded with, I, as a member of that society, shall be prepared to discuss its precepts and principles, and I think it can be shown that they are such as very few members of any church or religious body in this country will object to. But in the meantime we have simply to say whether we will allow this Bill to be set down for a second reading. That is the only question we have to decide at the present moment.

Mr. IVES. The hon. Minister of Customs did me the honor to mention my name in the course of his remarks. I would like to explain the quandary in which I find myself placed. I had decided to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Montreal East, because I thought this question should be treated differently from ordinary questions that come before the House. I do not consider that any discourtesy is done by moving the six months' hoist at this stage. This is not an ordinary question. It is a matter about which the members of the House and the people of this city have been talking for weeks, and everybody understands it. Hon. members may, therefore, vote for the six months' hoist with perfect propriety, and without any discourtesy to the promoters of the Bill. That was my opinion before the hon. Minister of Customs spoke; but when I find a member of the Government, and that particular member who is supposed to represent the Battle of the Boyne and its associations, telling us that it is discourteous to do so, and very severely rebuking us if we dissent, I would like really to know what to do. For my part I am in a quandary, and I would like to ask whether the hon. Minister of Customs is speaking for the Government, for himself, or for the Orange Order.

Mr. BOWELL. I speak exclusively for myself and upon my own responsibility, and for no one else.

Mr. BEATY. I only rise to ask that the House give this Bill ordinary fair play. I am quite sure that a motion for the six months' hoist is a very unusual one to make on the question of fixing a day for the second reading of a Bill. It is quite true that, from the discussion to-day, we have learned something of the purport of this Bill; but I do not know what the Bill is, except that it is an Act of Incorporation, to enable this body to hold and deal with land. What effect that could have on the country or on the general interests of the people I am not prepared to say until I see the Bill. I ask that the Bill be printed and circulated; then any hon. gentleman who does not wish to support it will be at liberty to vote against it. I appeal to the hon. member for Montreal East, under the circumstances, to withdraw his motion and let a day be fixed for the second reading. Then the people interested will feel that some justice and fair play has been done them.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say half a dozen words. I give the hon. member from Montreal East perfect credit for good faith in the course he has taken. I am perfectly satisfied that when he rose he rose to do that which he believed was conducive to peace and goodwill; but I wish to tell him that every Orangeman in Ontario and throughout the Dominion will consider his motion not as an attempt to prevent discussion, but as an attempt to stifle this Bill: and I ask him whether he thinks that impression going abroad will tend to the promotion of peace and goodwill throughout the Dominion.

Amendment (Mr. Coursol), six months' hoist, negatived on the following division:—

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 88) to unite the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company, and the Nelson Valley Railway and Transportation Company, into one Company, under the name of the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway Steamship Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the consideration of Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the University of Saskatchewan, and to authorize the establishment of Colleges within the limits of the Diocese of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BLAKE. Pursuant to a notice I gave in reference to this Bill, I propose to move an amendment to it. It is of considerable consequence we should lay down a rule in reference to the holding of land in mortmain in the North-West Territories. I see no objection to institutions of this kind acquiring for their own use and purposes all the real property they can make use of, nor do I see any serious objection to their acquiring, by way of endowment, purchase, devise, or gift, or otherwise, real estate. On the contrary, in that country of which, as I said the other evening, real estate is the currency, it seems to me highly reasonable they should get, from the benevolently disposed, lands which will be ultimately of importance by way of accumulating an endowment fund; but I see serious objections to the dispositions of this Bill as reported from the Private Bills Committee. The Bill provides that the University may hold property in mortmain provided the revenue shall not exceed $50,000 calculated at 4 per cent; or a capital value of $1,250,000. There is no provision for the attainment of this capital value from anybody except the institution itself; and I think it would not be taking an illiberal view to say that it would be a very long time before the corporators would come to the conclusion that they had more than $1,250,000 worth of real estate. That mode of restricting the holding of real estate does not appear to me the proper logical and reasonable mode. The true method to avert the evil we want to avert, viz.: the holding, for too long a time, in mortmain, land in the North-West, is that which has been adopted by the several Provinces—to prescribe the time in which land acquired as endowment, not wanted for their own purposes, shall be disposed of. In Ontario, twelve or fourteen years ago, we made a limitation of seven years. Corporations are allowed, of all descriptions of this character, to acquire by gift, devise, or purchase, real estate, but there is that limitation upon them—unless it is wanted for their own use and occupation, they must dispose of it in one way or another within seven years. Now, some friends have suggested that that period may perhaps be too short for the North-West. I do not wholly concur in that view myself, but I was not unwilling to treat the subject as liberally as was possible, and I adopted the suggestion of ten years. It seems to me that ten years is quite enough in laying down a general principle of acting with reference to these institutions, which we believe and hope will be numerous in that vast territory, before it becomes divided into separate Provinces. I, therefore, move:

That the Bill be recommitted with instructions to add a proviso that the corporation shall, within ten years after its acquisition of any real estate, dispose of such real estate as is not required for the use and occupation or other like purposes of the corporation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply wish to say that the Bill which has been placed in my hands, when brought before the Committee, contained no restrictions whatever as regards limitation of extent of territory which this corporation might hold. It struck me that this was rather a dangerous power to give a corporation of this kind, particularly in a new country, and that it was desirable that a limitation of some kind should be placed upon it. I suggested some amendments to the Committee, limiting the time which the real estate could be held under this Bill; but the Committee seem to think it desirable that no limitation whatever as to time should be made. Of course, if a general principle is to be laid down, and the House is to adopt the amendment of my hon. friend from West Durham, I am sure I am perfectly willing to accept it.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

Bill amended and reported, and read the third time, and passed.

CREDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE moved the addition of the following clause:—

In case any person liable to pay or entitled to redeem any mortgage heretofore executed to the said company, at any time before the period at which the same is payable, tenders or pays to the company any part of the principal money and interest to the time of payment on such part, together with three months further interest in lieu of notice, no further interest shall be chargeable, payable or recoverable, at any time thereafter, on the principal money or interest so paid or tendered.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved the introduction of the clause providing that the company shall transmit a statement of its affairs annually to the hon. Finance Minister.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. It has been represented to me, since the last discussion that the effect of the Quebec Act is to allow 1 per cent. per annum to be allowed to be charged for administration; and the practical result of our administration, as the Bill now stands, will be that this corporation will be entitled to charge 8 per cent. plus 1 per cent. for administration expenses, that is 9 per cent. If that be so, the result will be to place this company in a better position than other companies, and to bring about the result that was not intended by Parliament.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Borrowers might accept or reject offers made by this company; they were, of course, not bound to accept them.

Bill reported.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Manitoba and North-Western Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Sutherland, Selkirk.)

THE ACADIA POWDER COMPANY.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company.

Mr. WELDON. I think that a special report was made with regard to this Bill by the Standing Committee on Private Bills, in which the question of the jurisdiction of this House in this matter was reserved. No objection is, I may explain, offered to the Bill on its merits; the question, is, whether a company incorporated under a Local Act, as this has been, can be entertained by this House. I understand that this company was originally incorporated with a capital of $150,000, the shares being $1,000 each; and under the Act 43 Vic., the capital was reduced to $100,000 with power to increase it to $200,000; and these Acts remain in force. This has been a manufacturing company, and a certain section of their Act of incorporation gives them power to manufacture, sell, and extend their business throughout the Dominion; and the question raised is, whether this is a matter of contract, and as they have received their powers under Acts of the Local Legislature, whether this Parliament can deal with a company of this kind. This is a very important question, and I am sorry that my hon. friend from Bellechasse, who raised it, is not in his seat. There is another point to be observed. Under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, which was passed in 1869, the Government is empowered to issue letters patent to any company making application within certain limitation. That Act was very carefully considered when it was adopted by Parliament, and amendments to it have rarely been made since that time. We generally find that when a company does not incorporate under that Act, they propose that certain sections of the Act shall not apply in their case. It seems to me that this is a bad precedent for the House to establish, because the result of the continued application will be to render the Act inoperative. In justice to the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, I say that there are very good reasons in this case why section 18 of the Joint Stock Companies' Bill should not apply. There is another difficulty which I desire to point out. The Bill as amended provides that the increase of the capital of the Company should only be by a two-thirds vote, the Committee having suggested that amendment in accordance with the principle laid down by Parliament. Now, the Nova Scotia Act provides for an increase of $200,000 simply by a majority, and difficulty may arise from a conflict with these two Acts. So far as the merits of the Bill are concerned, I have no objection to it, the only question to my mind being, first, the power of this Parliament, and, second, the propriety of acting under the Joint Stock Companies' Act.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. The question which the hon. gentleman has raised came up for consideration before the Private Bills Committee, and finally a conclusion was arrived at that the question might be considered by the House if the House deemed it desirable. The question itself is not at all a new one. The jurisdiction of this Parliament in matters of this kind has frequently been raised in other Sessions and very often discussed. During the last Session of this House a very full discussion of the matter took place upon the Act to incorporate an Electric Light Company. As far back as 1862 the members of this company took the benefit of the Joint Stock Companies' Act in Nova Scotia, with a double liability, which Act requires that not less than twenty-five shall subscribe a certain amount of capital, and pay in 25 per cent. thereof, and they have operated their business successfully ever since. In 1869, they came to the

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Legislature of Nova Scotia and obtained an Act of incorporation from the local Parliament of that year. In that Act the provision to which the hon. gentleman has referred was included, in increasing the capital stock of the company and giving them power to increase it still further to the amount of $200,000, making it, in all, $300,000. The Act for which application is now made is for the purpose of extending the operations of the company through the other Provinces outside of Nova Scotia; and just as the Electric Light Company desired, and as other companies desire special Acts—as, for example, the Pictou Coal and Iron Company in 1875, and the Consolidated Iron Company in 1874—this company desires that they may have power to operate throughout the whole Dominion. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that the last clause of the Bill, as reported by the Committee, was one which was very fully discussed there, and that I cited a number of precedents showing that section eighteen of the Joint Stock Companies' Act, which requires the companies to pay up 10 per cent. yearly until the whole capital is paid up, was excepted. The principle upon which the exception was made was that the company having proven that it was a bonâ fide concern, and having shown that special reasons existed for the exception, was entitled to the benefit of that consideration; and I showed that this company occupied a position far stronger in that respect than any of the others I mentioned because they were all untried experiments. The position of the Acadia Powder Company is far stronger. They have operated successfully ever since 1863; they first took advantage of the Joint Stock Companies' Act; there were twenty-five men of capital, who undertook to subscribe 25 per cent. of the stock; and the Act to which the hon. gentlemen referred will show further that, in 1869, when they applied to Parliament for a charter, their assets in cash and land amounted to $50,000. Since that date there has been a further payment of capital, though I have not been informed of the amount.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Last Session a question like this arose in the Committee. A very strong opinion was expressed at that time by the legal members of the Committee as well as by the hon. leader of the Government. Under these circumstances, I would move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported; Committee to sit again.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA.

Mr. TASSÉ (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to propose the second reading of the Bill for the establishment of the Royal Society of Canada. As the preamble sets forth, this Society has for its object, to stimulate literary and scientific development in this country, to publish memoirs judged worthy of its adoption, to offer prizes for competition, and to create a museum of archives, ethnology, archæology and natural history. This is an undertaking as comprehensive as it is noble, which appeals for our best sympathy and encouragement. It will, in the first instance, justify the title assumed by this society. Presumptuous though it may appear for mere colonists, as we are generally called, I am proud to say that it has received the cordial approbation of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, who, we are happy to realize, at all times manifests the most lively interest for the development of literature, arts and sciences, not only in the United Kingdom, but wherever Her Imperial Sceptre extends—over Her vast domains on which the sun never sets. Far is it indeed from our aspirations to rival the famous Royal Society of England; but we wish to follow in its footsteps, inspired by its example, by its glorious traditions, and lay the foundation for a grand and powerful literary institution in this great land of Canada. We are all aware that we are indebted to the enlightened foresight of His Excellency the Governor General, for the initiative in the foundation of this society. The Marquis of Lorne has not been satisfied merely to zealously discharge the duties imposed on him; to travel over and study with care our country, an immense country, as extensive as Europe, to exalt its importance, its resources and its future, in terms which have reechoed in the Mother Country, and which, in a word, have become our best emigration agent—if I may be permitted an expression which expresses so well the practical result of his speeches—but it has been his aim also to leave behind him the souvenir of a Mæcenæ, of a patron of letters, of science and art. This rôle of patron of the arts, becomes the more so that the Marquis of Lorne, inasmuch as he wields with as much distinction the pen, as his noble wife does the brush. Already he has done much for art in concert with Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise in establishing an academy, an exposition of art, and in taking under his protection young artists. He now desires to complete his work in founding a literary and scientific society, recruited from the ranks of our most distinguished literary and scientific men. The society embraces four subjects: 1st, French literature, history and archæology; 2nd, English literature, history and archæology; 3rd, The sciences of mathematics, chemistry and physics; 4th, The science of geology and biology. The number of members must be necessarily limited. Each section will comprise twenty, or eighty in all. It is impossible to examine this list without being agreeably surprised that in a young country like Canada, which is naturally absorbed in material pre-occupations, we have been able to find so many who have been deemed worthy of the choice of His Excellency. We may be surprised at the absence of certain names which do not appear for one reason or another. Some have even manifested for this degree of honor, the supreme contempt which Piron exhibited for the French Academy, when he wrote his celebrated epigram:

Not even Academician.”

Others may console themselves for not seeing their names among the members of this society by the recollection of Molière, the great comedian, who not being able to secure admission to the Academy, inspired one of the Forty immortels to write the following verse, which alone was worthy of a seat:

“Nothing is wanting for his glory. Ours is incomplete without him.”

I observed a moment ago that the members of the society would be recruited from the different parts of the country, including Newfoundland. Thus the Royal Society of Canada has annexed by a literary chain the Island of Newfoundland, awaiting in the meantime for the distinguished leader of the Government to annex politically this Island, which alone is wanting to complete the glory of the great Confederation of the Provinces of British North America. Mr. Speaker, most useful and advantageous results will follow from those co-workers of thought, who heretofore have scarcely known one another. After having abolished the Custom House barriers between the Provinces, after having concluded a political union between them, which I trust will be indissoluble, it was desirable that this political federation should be crowned with an intellectual, a scientific and literary federation. It was, in a word, the crowning of the great structure erected by the statesmen where genius accomplished the work of Confederation. A long time has elapsed—it was in 1826—another Governor, Lord Dalhousie, established in the ancient city of Quebec a society which was called the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec. A very modest society, it is true, but one which has rendered very important services, by the numerous memoirs which it has published on many subjects of the greatest importance, and yet which were least known in our history. It was this same Governor who erected a common monument to Wolfe and Montcalm, to remind the descendants of these two great warriors, who both died on the field of honor, that they can find in their past history that which will make them join in a common sentiment of respect and admiration for the examples of courage, honor and heroism, of which they can never be too proud. The Marquis of Lorne was not disposed to appear less enlightened and generous towards us, because the Royal Society of Canada, as the sections of which it is composed indicate, is not a society consecrated entirely to the language of Shakespeare and Byron. It contains an exclusively distinct section for French literature. Something over forty years ago another predecessor of His Excellency, of whose record we have no happy recollections, for he wished the annihilation of our race, passed a very severe judgment against us in a celebrated memoir: “Canadians are without a history and a literature.” Evidently Lord Durham had not read our history, for it is one of the richest, one of the most affecting epochs of which any race in the world can boast. Already has it inspired foreign writers—Longfellow and Parkman—with imperishable pages. As for our literature, there was justification for Lord Durham’s utterances. It had not been called into life. The breath of persecution and political contests kept its light under the bushel. But what progress under the new era!—under the era of liberty! What a rich literary growth! We have now universities, seminaries, colleges, convents, which are veritable sanctuaries of science and literature, frequented not only by our own children, but by hundreds of young gentlemen belonging to the best American families, who come to pay a brilliant and solemn tribute to the superiority of teaching which they receive from among us. We have orators, historians, poets, writers of fiction, and journalists, who have won reputation even in Europe, and whose works were reproduced, or favorably noted in the best reviews of France. What, therefore, would be the surprise of this presumptuous Lord Durham, if he could come forth from the tomb, where he was prematurely consigned by the misfortune of his mission to Canada, to see how completely passing events have falsified his anticipations of the future of our race, which, thank God, is still flourishing stronger and more powerful than ever. The eulogy of the French Academy, of these forty immortals of this great institution, the only one which is much thought of in the Mother Country—this eulogy is now unnecessary to make. We have its testimony to establish the importance of the Royal Society of Canada. We can judge of the very flattering and sympathetic terms in which it hails its foundation, if I may be permitted to read a letter addressed by the permanent Secretary of the French Academy to the Hon. Mr. Chauveau, former member of Parliament, and Vice President of the Royal Society of Canada. Here is the letter:

“I am in receipt, with the letter which you did me the honor of writing to me the third of this month, of the report which it contains of the inaugural meeting of the Royal Society of Canada, and I hastened to lay it in its entirety before the Academy at its last assembly. In organizing as you say in imitation of our French Institute, and in imitation of the Royal Society of England, the Canadian Academy has given to friendly nations a testimony of good will and affectionate esteem. The Academy thanks you for having informed it of your organization, and for having done so with so much cordiality, and in language so elevated, so pure, and so French. The old Academy of France delights to extend its right hand of fellowship to the new born Royal Society of Canada, and wishing that it may, after three hundred years of existence, be as flourishing as her elder sister has the happiness to be to-day. The speeches delivered at the second inaugural session have been greatly appreciated by my fellow members, who all applauded their eloquence. Particularly impressed with the sympathy which your illustrious patron desires to prove and express for France, the Academy wishes you to convey to His Excellency the expression of its respectful gratitude.

"Accept also, Mr. Vice-President, our most sincere thanks, and permit me to add thereto the assurance of my highest consideration and entire devotion.

"CAMILLE DOUGET."

In order to enable the society to accomplish its work with success, that is to say, to open its courses, give prizes, publish its memoirs, establish a museum, it will be necessary, at all times, to come to its assistance, in appropriating each year a certain sum for the above object. I trust, therefore, that the Government, over which presides so intelligent a man, a man who has always proved himself a friend of literature, of science and art in Canada, will deem it his duty to ask an appropriation, in order to enable the Royal Society of Canada to accomplish, in the most effectual manner possible, the important mission which has devolved upon it. Persuaded that the Parliament which represents the collective wisdom and enlightenment of the country, will not hesitate to sanction it. We are aware that in the United States the Smithsonian Institute expends each year considerable sums of money to distribute its publications, so useful in nearly all branches of human knowledge, but we must not forget that this institution was largely endorsed by its founder a rich Englishman, James Smithson, who bequeathed it half a million of dollars. In many other countries where Smithson is yet unborn, and unfortunately there are very few of them in this country, the Governments have not hesitated to subsidize institutions of this kind. Each year, Mr. Speaker, we expend millions upon millions to construct railroads, to pierce tunnels, open canals, dredge rivers or harbors, in a word to increase the facilities of commerce and industry. I applaud all these expenditures, all these improvements, they are of a nature to increase a hundred-fold the wealth of the country, to facilitate inter-communication among the people, and to assign us a rank more and more important among nations. But, Mr. Speaker, proud as I am of material progress, we must not let ourselves be entirely absorbed by finance, by matter, by baser metal alone, with many others I will exclaim sursum corda. Let us also think of the pre-occupations, of the glory, of the utility of things in the mental order. In looking at matters in a practical light let us not forget that a simple scientific invention might change the economic condition of the world. Let us not forget that science alone can enable us to discover, to explore all the vast treasures which are concealed in the lands of our vast country. Let us not forget that science and literature united can do much to attract towards us public attention, to attract to our shores the vast flood of European immigration in search of homes, of bread and liberty. Let us not forget, either, that the most illustrious people have not been the richest or the most populous, but those who have been the most eminent for works of genius, those who have left behind them literary monuments more durable than the pyramids themselves, more lasting than brass are perennis. As I have the honor of sitting beside three gentlemen who bear the poetic names of Homer, Shakespeare and Burns, it will suffice for me to remark that the three great poets from which they, I hope, descend in a direct line, have done more to immortalize Greece, England and Scotland than their most eminent statesmen and distinguished warriors. A noble Frenchman, a sincere friend of our country, has delineated our true course, with a remarkable sagacity in the prophetic book which he has published in our behalf. Whilst, said he, in the United States, the public mind is engrossed in commerce, in industry, in its adoration of the golden calf, it belongs to Canada to appropriate with disinterestedness and a noble pride the intellectual, the scientific side of American life in giving preference to the cultivation of sentiment of thought and the beautiful. This is truly the mission of the Royal Society of Canada, it is a noble and enlightened mission, worthy of our aspirations, of our most cordial endorsement. It is, therefore, with confidence that I ask its incorporation, persuaded that there will be only one vote in this Chamber, to adopt it, and to thank His Excellency for having adorned the country with a society so useful and so important.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I am indebted to the kindness of the promoters of this Bill for the honor of being called upon to second the motion, proposed by the senior member for the city of Ottawa. The occasion of asking this House to consider the subject of incorporating a society bearing the name of the Royal Society of Canada is, I trust, an occasion of considerable interest to every member of this House. We have, Sir, been favored by those who have occupied vice-regal positions in this country with a large degree of attention to literary affairs. Besides performing the ordinary duties of their administration, our Governors General have repeatedly called the attention of Canadians to the importance of cultivating a literary taste, and developing a further acquaintance with those scientific pursuits, which would not only inform us as to the nature and extent of the natural resources of our own country, but enable us to keep pace with the progress of knowledge in other countries. It remained to His Excellency the Marquis of Lorne to suggest to us the formation of a society bearing a close analogy to the Royal Society of England, and having for its distinctive purpose the pursuit of scientific investigations, particularly in connection with Canadian affairs. You will see, by the preamble of this Bill, that its first object is "to encourage studies and investigations in literature and science." Sir, we appreciate the kindness of His Excellency in thus assisting us in our earliest endeavors to establish the literature of this country upon a purely scientific basis. Brought up as he was, in literary circles in the Old Country, in the air of Oxford and London, we can well understand how anxious he was that we, in Canada, less favored than the old land with such advantages, should at an early period in our history attend to those scientific pursuits which reflect such honor and credit on his native country. And, Sir, allow me to say, as a Canadian, that I believe the field to which he has directed our attention is an exceedingly interesting one. The geology of Canada must of itself, be a source of great interest to every Canadian. Having here the oldest geological formation in the world, formations which are identified with Canadian names, it is certainly of interest to us that we should still further pursue our investigations, and ascertain the true position and nature of these formations. Not only are such investigations interesting to Canadians from a purely scientific point of view, but also from a utilitarian point of view. Those formations indicate to a certain extent the mineral resources which contribute so largely to the wealth and prosperity of the country; and it is well for us that we should patiently and carefully examine them, in order to ascertain their extent and locality. Not only our geological formations, but everything of a scientific nature, will probably come under the purview of this society—the zoology, the history, the archæology, of Canada. Everything in connection with those scientific enquiries which reflect so largely the intelligence of a nation must be of interest to us; and it will certainly form no unimportant era in our history, if, as the result of the formation of this society, we receive broader views of these matters, and the people of this country become more intelligent and better informed with regard to them. But much as we shall value and appreciate the investigations of this society in these fields, to my mind the second purpose of the society, that is, to enquire into the history of Canada, and further elucidate those great events in our history which are of so much importance to us, must chiefly attract public attention. It is generally supposed that the history of Canada is a very uneventful one. Our historians so far have furnished very meagre details of the history of our country. I doubt very much whether we have yet a really readable history of Canada. We have no Macaulay, no Collier, no Greene, no Freeman, to tell us, in interesting periods, the story of the leading events in our history.

Mr. LAURIER. We have a Garneau.

Mr. ROSS. Yes, we have a Garneau, who has dealt in great minuteness of detail, with the French period in Canada; but, with that exception, no man has written the history of Canada in such a way as to excite the interest and pride of Canada's sons. This is a great loss to Canada; and if this Society did nothing more than secure for us, in an interesting and readable form, the story of the events of Canadian history, it would confer upon us a great boon. The researches of La Verandrye, the discoveries of Champlain, and the explorations of Cartier and others, who endured toil and fatigue in Canada's early days—these, in themselves, form a very interesting chapter—nay, many interesting chapters—in the history of Canada; and this society will be doing us a great service, if upon these points it adds in any degree to our knowledge. Such historical researches have also a practical value. We are all aware of how difficult it is for us to learn the true boundaries of the Province of Ontario—and why? Mainly because certain missing links in the past history of the country could not be discovered. Certain proclamations, certain commissions to Governors, and certain maps were missing; and if this Society should supply these missing links by its researches in the libraries of the world, where they are perhaps to be found, its existence would be a very great boon to the country. Besides the bare information which we should obtain from these enquiries, there is a heroic effect which I think would be produced by a properly written history of Canada. The great struggle of the taking of Quebec has never been described—as I think it might be—as the battle of Waterloo was described by Allison, the great writer of the History of Europe—as the battles for English liberty were described by Macaulay. The great struggle of 1812, when Canadians defended their hearths and homes against our American neighbors, and the struggles of later years, when the invader was vigorously and courageously repulsed—these are yet to be written to show Canadians that their forefathers had courageous hearts and strong arms to defend their homes, and those institutions which were established when Quebec was captured in 1759. But this Society proposes also to enter the domain of literature. One of its primary objects, I believe, will be to cultivate a higher literary taste among Canadians. I think this is exceedingly desirable. I am pleased, as a member of this House, as a Canadian, as a citizen of a country whose future we need not fear, whose prospects are brightening every day, to know that an attempt is being made to cultivate a higher literary taste among our people. The literature of a people reflects their characteristics. Every reader of English literature knows that in every period of English literature the prominent author of that period reflects its national characteristics. The readers of "Lalla Rookh" know that Moore, in that beautiful poem, merely represented the voluptuous tastes and habits of Oriental life. The readers of Burns know that every line of his poems reflects the purity and sincerity of Scottish life, and the heroism and chivalry of Scotland's bravest sons. The reader of Cowper knows that, in his sweet domestic lines, he reads the characteristics, the habits and the happiness of England's cottage home; and the readers of Addison know that his works reflect the polish of the English Courts during the time in which he wrote. In the literature of France we have reflected the characteristics of the national life of each period. Where shall we find reflected the characteristics of Canadian life? Where are our Washington Irvings, our Burns, our Cowpers, our Shakespeares? Where are those men with literary taste, and leisure, and disposition, to trace upon the pages of our literature the characteristics of our humble life, and of our efforts to establish ourselves as a new nationality? If this Society will cultivate this taste, if it will foster a deeper love for that "well of English undefiled," if it will cultivate a disposition on the part of our young people, either to peruse the literature of other countries, or to establish a standard of literary taste for Canada, it will do well; and those who may live to see the results, if they be such as I hope they may, will rejoice to know that we have had a Governor General, whose anxiety in this respect crystalized itself in the form of the Bill now before you. Yet, there is something more to be done. Although in some respects Canada has produced some few literary men—we have had a Haliburton and a Dr. Wilson in literature, and such men as Sir William Logan and Dr. Dawson in science—yet the scientific and literary tastes of our people are, indeed, too poorly cultivated. We have a population of over 4,000,000, yet how few men distinguished in literary, historical, or scientific pursuits can be named as Canadians. This should not be. It is exceedingly desirable that a higher literary taste should be cultivated, and I am pleased to be able to support a Bill which not only aims at cultivating a literary taste, but proposes to offer rewards, where rewards are merited, to any individual whose literary or scientific standing entitles him to that distinction. The rewards of literary pursuits in Canada are exceedingly small, and our constituency of readers very limited, much more so than in England or the United States. But besides being limited in numbers, their tastes are cultivated to a very limited extent. Though the constituency of readers be limited, a better cultivation would enlarge its extent and produce better results. As long as we lack the cultivation, we need not wonder at barren results. I trust in future years to see, as the result of the establishment of this Society, greater attention paid to scientific research, and to the history and archæology of this country. It is the attempt made to cultivate in Canada a literary taste, which will give to Canadians a distinct literary individuality. I have, therefore, great pleasure in supporting this motion.

Bill read the second time.

EMIGRANT SHEDS AND IMPROVEMENTS AT REGINA.

Mr. ORTON enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the erection of emigrant sheds, and for the improvement of roads and erection of bridges at Regina?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not yet decided where the emigrant sheds will be placed in that region. There will be one at Qu'Appelle.

MAIL ROUTE VIA REGINA.

Mr. ORTON enquired, Whether the mail route to Prince Albert and Edmonton will be via Regina?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is very likely. A more suitable route is now under consideration.

REGINA PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. ORTON enquired, Whether Regina is to be made a port of entry?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be made a port of entry.

BREAKWATER AT PETITE RIVIÈRE, N.S.

Mr. KEEFLER enquired, Does the Government propose to proceed, during the present season, with the erection of a breakwater at Petite Rivière, N.S., for which provision was made by the vote of $5,000 in the Supplementary Estimates at the last Session of Parliament.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

SIR ALEXANDER GALT.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether Sir Alexander Galt has at any time proposed to resign his present office? Whether it is understood that he intends to resign? And if so, at what time?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Sir Alexander Galt, for personal reasons, proffered his resignation. At the request of the Government he holds office until some time in the spring.

CANAL FROM POINT DES CASCADES TO LAKE ST. FRANCIS.

Mr. DE BEAUJEU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed, during the present year, with the deepening of the canal on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, from Point des Cascades to Lake St. Francis, and whether the Engineer has completed the plans required for this work, and stated the cost thereof?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not the intention of the Government to proceed with that work during the present year; and as the Chief Engineer of Canals has not completed the plans required for the work, it is impossible to state the cost.

INDEX OF CONFEDERATION DEBATES.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be prepared, printed and distributed to persons authorized to receive the Dominion Statutes, an alphabetical and detailed index of the various subjects treated in the Debates on the Confederation of the Provinces of British North America?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This suggestion has been made for the first time on this question. There is a full index attached to the volume of Debates on Confederation which was published at the time. The Government will consider whether there is any necessity to issue a second index for the use of members.

BREAKWATER AT RED POINT, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIES, in the absence of Mr. McINTYRE, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a breakwater at Red Point, Lot 47, King's County, Prince Edward Island, next summer, or at any future time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have the honor to inform the hon. gentleman that we have no information about this proposed work.

MAIL CARRIAGE IN PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, ONTARIO.

Mr. PLATT moved for copies of Orders in Council, Departmental Orders, and reports, correspondence, petitions, complaints, recommendations and reports from Postmasters, and others, in relation to the change of mail carriage since September 1st, 1882, from railway to horse carriage, in Prince Edward County; together with statement in detail of the routes, mail accommodation, cost of service and time of transit of mail matter under the former and by the present plan.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. KEFFLER.

VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

Mr. WALLACE (York), in moving for copies of all correspondence relating to the application of John Stewart, of Woodbridge, one of the volunteers of 1837-38, for assistance, either by land grant or otherwise, for his services in the defence of his country during those years, said: In calling the attention of the House and Government to the case of John Stewart, I also wish to call their attention to the general question involved in this case, and to ask whether the Government intend to make any provision for these volunteers during the troubles of 1837-38. The Mr. Stewart to whom my motion refers served in the Niagara Peninsula and at Detroit. During his service he lost an arm, and, of course, has since been placed at a disadvantage in earning his livelihood. He is now over seventy years of age, and as he has no near relatives, he is to-day helpless and depending on his friends. I think it is the duty of our Government to look after such cases as this. No country is too poor to care for those who have served it in the field, and no Government can afford to ignore their claims. The British Government provides for its disabled defenders, hospitals and places of refuge, and provides large grants for those who have served their country during a certain number of years. In the United States they have provided for those soldiers who served during the four years of their war, and the last American Congress voted $187,000,000 for the assistance of those who were either disabled, or wounded, or in any way injured in that great conflict. I think the time has now arrived when this Government should take up the cases of our own volunteers in those troublous times. Nearly forty-five years have now elapsed since then, and I think it is the duty of the Government at once to take the necessary steps to come to the relief of the survivors. I suppose there are some hundreds of them throughout the country—men who fought and upheld the honor of the British flag when it was assailed by foes within and from without. I think the Government ought to provide for them either by liberal grants of lands in the North-West, or by yearly grants of money to assist those who are so sadly in need of assistance. We find that the Government is recommending a pension to those who have occupied positions in the Public Service of this country, and the late Clerk of this House is now receiving nearly $2,400 per annum. One twentieth of that sum would make these poor fellows happy, and I think the Government should lose no more time in rewarding those deserving men who fought the battles of their country in years gone by.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House must be obliged to my hon. friend for having called attention to this matter. The papers will be brought down—if there are any papers. Most likely they will be confined to the application for assistance of the Government mentioned in this motion, and an acknowledgment of its receipt. These applications have been made ever since 1837, and they have never been granted. Before the Union of the Provinces, there was a certain allowance made for those who suffered personally in consequence of military services. After that we had the Rebellion Losses Bill discussed in both Upper and Lower Canada. I think that now, for any service rendered in 1837 in Upper Canada, application must be made to the Provincial Government of Ontario; and I may also say that for services rendered in the Province of Quebec, application must be made to the Local Legislature.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AGAINST THE DOMINION.

Mr. VANASSE moved for copies of correspondence, from 1st July, 1867, to this date, between the Dominion Government and the several Provincial Governments of the Dominion, respecting the claims of each of the said Provincial Governments against the Dominion, for the repayment of sums expended by the Provinces on account of the Dominion for the Administration of Justice, in the several Provinces; that is to say, for the arrest, trial, conviction and maintenance of persons guilty of violating the Criminal Law; 2nd, Statement in detail of the claims settled, the date of settlement, the sums paid and the names of the Provinces to which the payments were made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to grant this motion; but the return asked for will be a very voluminous document, inasmuch as there has been correspondence from 1866 to 1867 between the Governments of the various Provinces and the Dominion Government for a readjustment of certain claims in connection with the administration of criminal justice. It will take some time to prepare this return, but it will be an important one, and the Government do not object to it.

Motion agreed to.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), in moving for all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, or any Board of Trade in Canada or the United States, upon the question of Reciprocal Trade relations between the two countries on the general basis of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, said: Mr. Speaker, I have two objects in moving the resolution which I have placed in your hands. We were told previous to the General Election of 1878, when the National Policy was under discussion, that if the fiscal policy were changed, and a retaliatory policy, such as we have now, were adopted, the probabilities were that we would force the Americans at an early day into a renewal of a Reciprocity Treaty such as existed in 1854. You are aware, Sir, when the policy of the present Government was under discussion, hon. gentlemen opposite, being then in Opposition, the famous resolution on which they went to the country in 1878 contained the following clause:—

"That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy which will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will tend greatly to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

This was part of that famous resolution, and on the basis of that resolution, or with that resolution as a text, the country was informed that the old fiscal policy of Canada was inimical to a renewal of reciprocal trade relations with the United States, that so long as we permitted the Americans to send their products into the Canadian market free, there was no object in their asking for reciprocal trade relations, but if we erected a Chinese wall on our frontier similar to the Chinese wall which they had erected, then we would have something to give them in exchange for more liberal trade relations. This view was propounded, not only in the resolution of the present leader of the Government, but in his speech on that resolution in which he made use of the following words:—

"I am confident that one great object in having something like a retaliatory policy will be, that if you are to have reciprocity in trade you will only get it in that way."

This sentiment was reiterated by his associates, it was echoed by the press, and it was expressed on every platform, in Ontario particularly, and, the country was prepared to suppose, nay to believe, that if hon. gentlemen opposite changed places with the then Government of the day, the necessary consequence of the change would be first, a protective tariff, which we have; and, second, a renewal of the old Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, or a treaty in somewhat similar terms. We are now in the fifth year of this policy, and I am anxious at least, as one member of the House, to ascertain how far the predictions of those hon. gentlemen have been fulfilled. I am anxious to know now far they have had correspondence with the Government of the United States or with any other party with a view to prepare the way for this reciprocity treaty, which was then stated would be such a great boon to the people of Canada. In this view I am further encouraged by the statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget Speech of 1881. He said:

"More than that: When the Tariff was brought down in 1879, it was stated distinctly that the Government was exceedingly anxious, if possible, to renew the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and as an expression of the feeling of this House, they gave the Government power to reduce pro rata the duty that we now collect upon the products, such as coal, lumber and grain and everything of that kind, in precisely the same proportion that the Government of the United States, or Congress, would think proper to reduce their duties, and even, if desirable, to remove them altogether. Well, Sir, we know that during the last Session of Congress, and they have been renewed this Session, there were petitions asking the appointment of a Commission to confer with the Canadian Government in reference to this matter. We do not know whether anything will grow out of that movement or not. It may result in an approach being made to our Government by the United States authorities."

Whether an approach has been made by our Government to that of the United States or not remains yet to be discovered. One would suppose from the authoritative character of the statement made in the Budget Speech that the hon. Finance Minister was speaking with knowledge of certain facts respecting this question. He has not placed the House in possession of such facts yet. I trust when this resolution is adopted these facts will be brought to our notice, and we will then see how far the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, towards securing reciprocity of trade, have been successful through the National Policy. But I have a second object in moving this resolution, and it is to call attention to the desirability of having reciprocal trade relations with the United States. Our commercial relations at the present time deserve our earnest attention. We have been for years expending large sums for the development of our internal trade. We have provided for our shipping one of the largest and most extensive systems of inland navigation to be found in the world. We have spent more than forty millions on our canals. We are building a transcontinental railway, to carry the expected trade of Japan by the shortest possible route to Europe. We have expended on this railway millions of money. We have provided facilities for our lumbermen in the way of booms and slides at an expense of $1,651,000, which we expect will enable them to reach the markets in the easiest and cheapest way. We have provided for the protection of our shipping, along the islands, bars and shoals, and dangerous points on the sea coast—on both sea coasts, I might say—lighthouses at an expense of $2,671,000. We have subsidized a line of steamers to open up trade with South America. We have also subsidized steamships to develop the trade between the Maritime Provinces and Liverpool; and for years we have subsidized the Allan line of steamers in developing direct trade between Canada and Europe; and, in various ways, we have spent enormous sums of money in developing our resources. Moreover five years ago we changed our whole fiscal policy, setting aside the traditions and teachings of England and of her political economists—Adam Smith, and Gladstone, and others. We have abandoned their teachings and adopted the protective policy of the United States with the purpose of developing the trade and the commerce of Canada. We have expended on immigration since Confederation the enormous sum of $3,100,000, all to increase and develop the trade of this country; and to provide a population to consume the surplus productions of our country. Sir, this enormous expenditure requires—if we are to keep pace with our necessities, a still further development of our trade. We are warned at the present moment, notwithstanding the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite, with regard to a liberal home market, notwithstanding immigration and our internal facilities for trade and commerce that the home market does not develop as rapidly, or rather does not consume proportionately as much of our surplus produce, as we would have a right to expect. The population of the country since Confederation has increased only 30 per cent.; but our exports and trade, show an increase of over 80 per cent., proving that the home market consumes a smaller proportion of our produce, and that the surplus of our products has increased much faster than the consuming population of the country. As evidence that this is the case, if you examine into the details of these exports this fact will appear much clearer. For instance, in the year 1868, we exported to the value of only $1,446,000 of minerals, while last year we exported of them over $3,000,000 in value, showing in this particular an increase of over 100 per cent. Our fisheries exports have increased 125 per cent. In connection with the produce of our forests our exports have increased 30 per cent. The exports of animals have increased 200 per cent.; of agriculture, 150 per cent.; of manufactures, 70 per cent.; whereas as I said before, our population has increased only 30 per cent., and of this vast sum of our products, our consumption is not extending rapidly; and we must find some outlet suitable to absorb the surplus productions which we have to export. The North-West, a grain country, is being rapidly settled; but it will produce much more than its population can consume, and must find a foreign market for its surplus. It is said, that it has 150,000,000 acres—and the figure is even put at 200,000,000—but taking the estimate as 25,000,000, it will be quite apparent that the addition of 25,000,000 acres to our present area of cultivated lands, will largely increase our surplus produce, for which it will be necessary to find an outlet in foreign countries. Having then considered the nature and extent of our wealth, it might be convenient to state that of our present trade, over 90 per cent. is carried on between Great Britain and the United States, but a small portion of our trade being carried on with other countries. For instance, I find that last year Great Britain took from us exports to the value of $95,571,802, and the United States, $96,229,763. Whereas our trade with France amounted to only $2,922,931; with Germany, to $1,633,118; with South America, to $2,314,779, and with China and Japan, to $1,635,717; the balance being distributed among India, the West Indies (British and French) and other countries. The great proportion of our present trade is carried on, as I have already said, with Great Britain and the United States. It is our duty to be very careful in paying attention to the successful development of this commerce. In looking at the foreign markets, available for Canadian produce, I will first take up the subject of lumber, in relation to which we are met with competitors from the States of Northern Europe; for animals and their products, we have strong competitors in Central Europe and the United States; for grain and farm produce, we have competitors also from Russia, Prussia and Hungary, and India now, as well; and some of these countries compete with us at the present time most successfully. So then, we find while the opportunities for developing our trade with those countries, are limited, if we turn to the United States, the position is somewhat different. Our surplus produce, is just what their people require. This becomes very clear, if we examine into the nature of our exports. Last year out of our total exports from Ontario, $37,067,000, that country took $29,007,000, or 80 per cent.; from Quebec, of a total of $38,195,000, they took $6,288,000, or 16 per cent.;

from Nova Scotia, out of a total of $9,210,000, they took $3,076,000, or 33 per cent.; from New Brunswick, of a total of $7,474,000, they took $2,798,000, or 33 per cent.; from British Columbia, of a total of $3,149,000, they took $1,573,671, or 50 per cent.; and from Prince Edward Island, of a total of $1,887,146, they took $628,183, or 33 per cent.; from Manitoba, of a total of $646,119, they took $102,402, or 16 per cent. So it will be seen that the increase in the facilities for extending our trade with the United States, in order to promote the absorption of our surplus products by that country, and that every effort we may make to remove disadvantages which hinder our admission into that market, must be in the interest of the Canadian producer. The raw material, which we have to sell is precisely the raw kind of material, which the Americans want to buy. They want to buy the produce of our mines and fisheries, of our forests, and of our agriculturists. In fact, last year, the Americans bought from us 60 per cent. of the entire agricultural exports of the Dominion of Canada; they bought 30 per cent. of the entire exports of our forests; and 30 per cent. of our entire export of animals. We have then here a very clear indication, where our real market is to be found; and if I choose to go further into the details, from an agricultural point of view, we will find that they strongly confirm this opinion. For instance, last year, our total exports of horses numbered 20,920, of which, they took 20,636; of our cattle we exported 62,108, and they purchased 15,914; of swine we exported 3,263, and they purchased 3,043; of sheep we exported 311,669 and they purchased 233,642; of poultry we exported $149,804, and they purchased $145,507; of eggs we exported 10,499,000 dozen, and they purchased 10,115,000 dozen; of wool we exported 1,053,000 pounds, and they purchased 931,000 pounds. They purchased nearly all our barley with the exception of about 70,000 bushels; they purchased our entire surplus of beans, one-half our oats, all our rye, except a few bushels, and nearly all the potatoes that Canada exported. Last year we exported 3,860,000 bushels, and they purchased 2,578,000 bushels; so that hon. members will see that the Canadian producer has largely to look to the American markets for the sale of his produce. But when the Canadian buyer goes to the markets of the world, he finds in many instances that the American market is the best in which he can buy, and we purchase from the Americans nearly as much as we sell to them. You will see then that the only direction in which trade can be most successfully cultivated, and cultivated most profitably to ourselves, will be in the direction of trade relations with the United States. In advocating those views we are encouraged by the fact that the old Reciprocity Treaty was very successful. The trade between the American States and Canada in 1853, previous to the adoption of that Treaty, amounted to $17,000,000, but in 1862 that trade had developed under the Treaty to $82,000,000—an increase of $65,000,000 in those ten years, so the fact that the Reciprocity Treaty produced these marvellous results is an additional encouragement to us—looking at it from our own point of view—to endeavor to cultivate those trade relations which produce such satisfactory results. In the same way the Treaty largely developed the trade of the Maritime Provinces. In 1853 their trade with the United States amounted to $6,671,177. In 1864 that trade had developed to $20,277,615. Their best market, the market most coveted and relied upon by them, was the American market. It may be said that with the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty trade in Canada has not declined. True it has not materially declined. Our trade in the United States has vastly increased since the repeal of that Treaty, but it has increased in spite of the difficulties and obstacles thrown in our way, and largely because we are able to find markets for our surplus produce elsewhere. That a Treaty like this would benefit Canadian trade has already been proved by the existence of the old Reciprocity Treaty between England and France. Under the Cobden Treaty the trade of Great Britain with France developed from £16,000,000 in 1859, to £45,000,000 in 1877, and the trade of France with England increased from £9,000,000 in 1859, to £25,000,000 in 1877. It may be asked why was the old Treaty repealed? The repeal was the act of the Americans themselves, for which we are not responsible. We are told, in a Report made to Congress by Mr. Derby when Mr. Seward was Secretary, what the causes of this repeal were. I will read his words:

"The notice for appeal was given at a time when our country was deeply offended with Great Britain. In our great struggle for existence she had given her sympathy to our foes. She had denounced slavery, but established a slave Empire; she had built cruisers to destroy our shipping, and clippers to evade our Customs; there had been difficulties on the frontier, and these may have accelerated the fall of the Treaty—but the Treaty itself had serious defects. It was based upon the assumption that the two countries had made equal progress in the arts. It was well adapted to the Provinces, for they were devoted to the field, forest, sea, and mines. But the United States had devoted nearly one-third of their energies and capital to manufactures, and consumed at home the principal part of their raw material."

We have in this Official Report, no doubt, the cause of the repeal of that Treaty—a repeal perhaps not entirely unfortunate, but one which diverted Canadian trade from its old channels, and necessitated our seeking other channels in which to find a similar trade. Still times have changed; since the Treaty was repealed, now nearly twenty years ago, a friendlier spirit has grown up between the two countries, and, I think, it is our duty to show a willingness on our part, if not for the renewal of that Treaty, for the negotiation of another Treaty equally favorable to this country. Since the Treaty was repealed, we have no doubt prospered, and we are perhaps in a better position to negotiate for a Treaty than ever. We have almost assumed the proportions of a nationality. Confederation has been established on a firm basis. We have seven several distinct and separate Provinces combined in a confederacy which extends from one ocean to another. The area of our country now is almost equal to that of the United States. We have now more shipping; we have built many miles of railway; our population has increased; our resources are much greater; and we are in a position to approach the people of the United States in a manly and honorable way, and deal with them as one nation should with another. I would regret if in any attempt to open negotiations with the United States Canada should show a craven or a subservient position. We are not in a position to be crushed with any efforts which the Americans may make to destroy our trade, and we know, and perhaps their best thinkers know, that a Reciprocity Treaty such as our old one would conduce to the benefit and prosperity of the two countries. It is only in a dignified and manly spirit that I hope this Government or any Government would approach the people of the United States to open negotiations for a renewal of that Treaty. We are in a stronger position nationally to deal with the United States than ever before. Not only so but there is the fact that no more opportune time than the present could be found in the history of the two countries in which to open such negotiations. The arrangements which were made under the Washington Treaty will shortly expire, and we will then be in a position, as we were in 1854, to offer our fisheries as a consideration in any renewal of the Treaty. We have besides in the United States a much more friendly disposition towards Canada and England than existed in 1854. The jealousy of England which created that feeling does not exist now. That desire to coerce or crush out the Canadian nationality, which grew out of the Munroe Doctrine and produced an aggressive effect in this country, does not exist now, and to-day we have the national power, the area, the resources, the stamina and will-power which would enable us to treat with the Americans on a national basis.

We have besides a large mutual intercourse, we have railway connections between the two countries which, under the bonding system, places Canada frequently in business relations with the United States. All these circumstances, in my judgment, converge towards a justification for a renewal of that Treaty. By the opening of American markets to our natural products, by the facilities which those markets would afford for the sale of our products, by the exchange of our products with those of the United States, without the expense of long ocean freights, and by such advantages as we possessed under the old Treaty, I fancy the trade of Canada would develop much more rapidly and more profitably than it does now when we send our produce in such abundance across the Atlantic. I have much pleasure in moving this resolution, for the two objects stated, and I trust that if the Government has any information on this subject, we shall have it at an early day.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman desired to have reciprocity between this country and the United States reestablished, I am bound to say that I do not think he has taken the best course to accomplish that object. For many years past, as this House is aware, this subject has occupied the attention of important commercial bodies in the United States, as well as the attention of public men on both sides of the line. Since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, we have taken frequent measures with a view of securing a renewal of that Treaty. The circumstances which led to the withdrawal of an important public man from the Government of this country at one time, arose from the efforts of the party then in power to secure a renewal of the Treaty. Subsequent efforts were made from time to time, and it is well known that almost immediately after the accession to power of the Liberal party in 1873, the late Mr. George Brown was sent to Washington to negotiate with the same purpose in view. The treatment that his efforts met with at the hands of our friends on the other side of the line, is fresh in everybody's memory. We know, Sir, that, although that Treaty, according to the estimate of some people—I am not going to discuss it here—surrendered everything, was, in fact, a complete capitulation of the interests of Canada to those of the United States, it was not accorded even a hearing in the Senate of the United States, but was rejected with all the ignominy that could possibly be applied to a document of that kind. Since that time, it is well known, an important trade body in the United States—the National Board of Trade—has, at almost every recurring annual meeting, passed resolutions in favor of closer reciprocal trade relations between the two countries; but it has always taken this ground, that it is for the people of the United States to make the first advance, in view of all that the Canadian Government and people had done in that direction. It does seem to me, therefore, that at this time—when, probably, from the fact of the abrogation of the Washington Treaty, we shall soon be compelled to consider the question of our relations with our neighbors on the other side of the line—such a speech as that to which we have just listened, is a most inopportune utterance to be made on the floor of the Canadian Parliament. What is the meaning of that speech? What is its obvious conclusion? It is this: that the future prosperity of this country is largely dependent upon the action of our friends on the other side of the line—that they have it in their power, if they choose to exercise it, to cripple the future development of Canada, by simply refusing us the trade relations which the hon. gentleman expresses so much anxiety to obtain. He commenced his speech by reading the resolution passed in 1877 or 1878, in favor of a change in the fiscal policy of this country. He read from that resolution the statement that the policy of Canada should be a policy which would, while protecting the industries of this country, naturally lead to closer reciprocal trade relations with the United States. Well, Sir, what is the policy we have adopted? In the very Tariff Bill which was passed in 1879, which constitutes the fiscal policy of this country, there is a standing offer to our friends on the other side of the line to come into reciprocal trade relations, so far as the natural productions of the two countries are concerned. That Act, which is the basis of our present fiscal policy, actually contains a provision that as soon as the United States will remove the duty from any of the natural productions of this country, the Government of Canada, by an Order-in-Council, without waiting for the action of Parliament, will be in a position to remit the duty upon similar articles on our side. Surely, Sir, no more practical or substantial evidence could be given of the willingness of Canada, a willingness which has been exemplified on all proper occasions, to enter into closer trade relations with our neighbors. The hon. gentleman has gone over a number of figures, in which he undertakes to show that our true market is largely in the United States for our natural productions, and he intimates that if they would take off the duty, we should be able to largely increase our sales to that people. Well, Sir, for one who has listened for a number of Sessions to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite upon the question of the commercial policy of the country, who has frequently heard upon platforms and upon the floor of Parliament that it is the consumer who pays the duty, that it is a matter of no consequence to the man who sells whether there is a duty or not in the country to which he exports, that in fact all the duties we impose on the natural productions of the country have been so much taxes imposed on the people of this country, it seems surprising to hear that it is of any consequence whether our neighbors take off the duties or not. According to hon. gentlemen opposite, they pay the duties themselves; they are the people who are suffering, not we; and therefore we may look with perfect indifference to any action which the United States may take in regard to this question. But, Sir, we are not without hope, judging by the events of the last few years, that the policy which this country has adopted will verify the predictions made in the resolution of 1878, upon which that policy was based. It is quite true that for four years we heard from hon. gentlemen opposite that that policy was merely a temporary policy; we heard that as soon as the people of this country had an opportunity of expressing their opinion, they would condemn it; every speech made by hon. gentlemen opposite informed our friends on the other side that they would soon again be in the position that they were in when hon. gentlemen were on this side of the House, that is, that they would have our markets free, while we, on entering their markets, would have to pay tribute. I can understand the American people—shrewd and intelligent as they are, having regard to the hopes held out to them by hon. gentlemen opposite that this policy was not to be a permanent one, that the moment the people had an opportunity to express their opinion, they would express it adversely to that policy, I can quite understand that their game would be the waiting game, because they would believe that they would soon obtain the advantage of the opening of the Canadian markets without any concession on their part, by the return to power of hon. gentlemen opposite. Fortunately the people have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion. They have had, not the bald promise of the resolution of 1878, but they have had the Tariff itself; they have had the Act of Parliament and four years experience of that Act, and when the time of trial came, when they had the opportunity of expressing their opinion, what was the answer they gave? The answer is given in the fact that although ninety-two new members have taken their place this Session on the floor of this House the relative strength of parties has scarcely been perceptibly changed. From almost every Province of the Dominion certainly from all the large

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Provinces—majorities have been returned to support the policy of the Government. We may fairly assume that the practical influence of that result has made itself felt on the trade policy of our neighbors. We know that at the Convention held the other day at Detroit, a very substantial declaration was made in favor of reciprocal trade relations with this country, and in the discussions preceding the recent Tariff legislation in the United States, very strong arguments were used from quarters from which, before, we would not have expected those arguments, in favor of the remission of duties on a number of articles upon which duty is now charged when going into the United States, as for instance, on lumber. It is quite clear from the discussion there, that the people of the United States, at any rate, do not believe that the consumer, in all cases, pays the duty; because they believe that, after all, if the lumber went into the country free, instead of its being any cheaper to them, the chances were, it would cost exactly the same. Upon that ground the agitation in favor of the remission of the duty was defeated. We have seen already that, in the matter of the 10 per cent. differential duty on tea, which was adopted by the United States—which was the permanent policy of the United States in relation to this country—that differential duty has been abolished by the late legislation there. The tendency of discussion, therefore, and the legislation which has just taken place in the United States, point to the fact that, by means of the policy adopted in this country, and which enables us to offer something to our friends on the other side, when we come to deal with them for the renewal of reciprocal trade relations, we will be able shortly, I believe, to have the opportunity at any rate, of a fair and reasonable discussion of those relations between the two countries, which will end to the mutual advantage of both. This country does not, however, depend for its success on a Reciprocity Treaty. It can go on without one. Those who have watched the discussions which have taken place on this subject know that the policy of the United States in relation to it has been largely political. We know what took place at the Convention in Detroit in 1865, when the question of the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty was under discussion. We know that one of the strong motives for the refusal of the people of the United States to renew it, was, as far as we could gather from what took place at the Convention, the fact that they believed the commercial success of Canada depended entirely on the continuance of a Treaty of that kind. We have continued to prosper since without it. The hon. gentleman himself admits that new markets have been opened to us, although he tells us that the United States being the nearest to us are our best markets. That may be true. The nearer the markets, the better for the country that sends its produce to them. Yet, during the past three or four years, the course of our trade has been in the direction of showing that we are opening up new markets of greater value to us than those of the United States. By the continuance of the policy we have adopted, by the opening up of relations with other countries than the United States, I believe in the future we will create a much greater trade and more commercial advantage than any ordinary reciprocity treaty with our friends on the other side could give us. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman pronounce that eulogy on the policy of Canada. I was glad to hear him refer to the expenditures we have made, to the great developments which have taken place in our canal system and railways, and all our material interests; but, I could not help thinking how little his remarks to-day corresponded with those we have heard in the past from the same hon. gentleman, when, for the purpose of exciting the feelings of the people against the Conservative party he ignored altogether this magnificent development of our material resources, and talked of the increase of our public expenditure with the view of creating the impression that there had been a wasteful extravagance on the part of the Government. We can very well put against the past utterances of the hon. gentleman in relation to our public expenditure, the magnificent eulogy he has passed to-day on the policy we have adopted—a policy for which hon. gentlemen on this side are to be given the credit, and which hon. gentlemen opposite did but very little to to assist or promote. I believe the true policy of this country is to go on as we have been doing in the past. If the opportunity occurs to have reciprocity with the United States on fair terms, we will accept that reciprocity; but nothing but evil will occur to this country if we go hat in hand to our neighbors to tell them our prosperity depends on their opening up their markets to us. Our true plan is to maintain our own dignity and policy, and by so doing, the prosperity which has marked our progress during the last four years, will, I believe with the caution now observed by merchants all through the country, continue to mark our progress in the future, and we will be able to live independent of any policy the United States may pursue, being always ready to meet them on fair terms for the adoption of such reciprocal trade relations as may be mutually advantageous to the two countries.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this motion is adopted I ask the indulgence of this House for a few minutes while I reply to one or two points made by my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White). He characterized the speech made by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) as being inopportune. He charged that hon. gentleman with the desire of betraying our dependence upon the United States. I think this charge entirely unjust. I think that the speech of my hon. friend from West Middlesex is one that cannot be characterized, justly, as being inopportune. No intelligent man can place anything but a high estimate on the importance of trade relations between the two countries, situated as Canada and the United States are geographically, with their boundary lines extending across this continent and their commercial interests so closely blended together. Any hon. gentleman of this House who rises in his place for the purpose of suggesting any measure that may tend to produce more intimate commercial relations between these two countries, certainly cannot be characterized as having acted in a manner inopportune or inappropriate. The hon. member for Cardwell took occasion in the course of his speech to say some thing about the Treaty negotiated in 1874 by the Hon. George Brown, and although he did not directly assert that that Treaty surrendered everything to the United States, yet I inferred from his language that he had not at that time taken a favorable view of that Treaty. I am well aware that the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs did oppose that Treaty. Well, Sir, as the question of the character of that Treaty has been raised, in my opinion had it been ratified it would have proved a very great boon to the community. I believe that that Treaty was fully as well calculated to conduce to the prosperity of Canada as was the Treaty of 1854. I believe that the criticisms upon that Treaty made at the time it was under discussion in this House, were most unfair to the negotiator of it and most unfair to the character of the Treaty itself. It was a Treaty which went further, as a matter of course, than to provide for reciprocal trade in the natural products of the two countries; and I may say, that, in my opinion, it is perfectly hopeless to dream of obtaining a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States in the future which is confined in its operations to the interchange of the natural products of the soil of the two countries. Such a Treaty will, as the Treaty of 1854 did, work almost exclusively to the advantage of Canada. The United States, even under its present circumstances, as was shown by the hon. gentleman, is the market of Canada for a very large proportion of our agricultural products. Canada, on the contrary, does not afford a market for the natural productions of the United States, with the single exception of Indian corn and a limited amount of pork—consequently, a Treaty of that kind we cannot hope to obtain, and if we ever do negotiate a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States it must be of the character of the Treaty negotiated by the Hon. George Brown, in 1874, which, as I see by the schedules before me, provided for the free interchange of a very large amount of manufactured articles. The hon. member for Cardwell states that our Tariff makes a standing offer for reciprocal trade relations between the two countries, confined to their natural products. Certainly it does. It makes a standing offer that never would be accepted, that never would be entertained; and if we ever hope to obtain such relations with the United States, we must make overtures quite different from those now upon our Statute-book. If this is the state of the case, some negotiations must be carried on, and I, for my part, can see no infringement of dignity on the part of Canada, to attempt to initiate these negotiations. I believe that we, at least, could not step out of our line of duty, and would do nothing that was an infringement of our dignity, if we were to indicate to the United States at this time that we were prepared to entertain negotiations for reciprocal trade relations, and were anxious to enter upon those negotiations. The hon. gentleman, of course, as was perfectly legitimate, in the course of his speech, brings the National Policy into question, and he lauds the operation of that policy. It is quite evident from the drift of his remarks that he entertains the opinion that the National Policy is a very good substitute indeed for the Reciprocity Treaty, if it is not superior in its operation to any Reciprocity Treaty that this country could negotiate with the United States; and I am of opinion that in reality when you get at the real sentiments of the advocates of the National Policy, a majority of them believe that, rather than sacrifice any of the features of that policy, we had better do without reciprocal trade relations with the country to the south of us. Well, as to the operations of the National Policy. I do not believe that any intelligent man in this House can say that that policy has yet received a fair trial; I do not believe it can be asserted that the fruits that policy was expected to produce has yet been produced. Of course, since its adoption, a period of great commercial prosperity has characterized not only this country, but all the commercial nations of the world, and it was only natural that Canada should share in the prosperity of the United States, Great Britain and other countries. But I must assert that the National Policy has not received a fair trial, and I believe that when the result of the operation of that policy is finally reached, it will be found to be a very poor substitute for reciprocal trade relations with that country which affords us a natural market for at least two-thirds of the products of our forests, mines and soil; but I only rose, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of vindicating—although that was not necessary—my hon. friend from West Middlesex from the charge of having made a speech that was inopportune and unworthy the dignity of a member of this House. Another charge made against my hon. friend was, that he had, during an election contest and previous to the election itself, brought charges against this Government with regard to the increased expenditure, which his speech militated against. Well, Sir, he did bring charges against the increased expenditure of this Government, and these charges are just. The increased expenditure of this Government has been unduly great and extravagant; and at the proper time that gentleman will be prepared to show again, as he has shown heretofore, that this increased expenditure was unduly and unjustifiably great. I hope that the motion will be allowed. I do not think that by this motion we are really going to the United States with hat in hand, as the hon. member for Cardwell represented. I do not think that we are doing an act unworthy of our dignity as representatives of the people of Canada. I believe the time has come for, at least indicating to the United States that we are prepared to treat again for some measure of reciprocity satisfactory to both countries; and if that overture is not entertained, we certainly shall have done nothing that is unworthy of our dignity, and nothing that is not in the interest of our country.

Mr. BOURBEAU (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I hope the Government will act in this matter as it has always acted: with great prudence. I believe that the present Government cannot be accused of not having made any necessary effort to procure for the country the commercial advantages which we possess. It is admitted that the Reciprocity Treaty made in 1854 between the Government of the United States and Canada produced good results, and facilitated our export of a great quantity of products to the United States, exchanging our products for theirs. But, as the hon. member from Middlesex has admitted, if the Treaty was not renewed in 1864, it was entirely the fault of the American Government, who deemed it unwise that this Treaty should be renewed. We are aware that they were compelled to adopt a National Policy, to repair the enormous losses incident to the war of secession. It was necessary for them to adopt a policy of protection to increase their revenue, which imposed on us immense losses in the export of the products of Canada to the United States, owing to the immense duties which the American Government imposed on Canadian products. The American Government, which profited by the heavy duties which it derived from Canada, had every interest not to encourage a Reciprocity Treaty between the two countries, because in view of the protective tariff which they had adopted everything turned to their advantage. One duty, therefore, remained for the Government of Canada to discharge, that was to adopt the same policy which the Americans had inaugurated. In 1877 the hon. leader of the present Government, who was then leader of the Opposition proposed to the Administration of the day to adopt a National Policy such as the American Government adopted in 1864. Is this not, Mr. Speaker, the way to induce the American Government to come to an understanding with us in the matter of a Reciprocity Treaty? Nevertheless I find among the Votes and Proceedings of the House that the hon. member from Middlesex was one of those who voted against the motion of the then leader of the Opposition. In 1878 the General Elections took place, and what was the programme of the party which sustains to-day the leader of the Government? That programme has been, that since the Government of the United States has been unwilling to enter into a Reciprocity Treaty with us, it was necessary for us to adopt a policy of Protection in order to convince the American Government that we protested against the duties imposed on our products exported to the United States. The electors of Canada have responded to the appeal of the candidates who had adopted this programme, and they reelected a great majority of these candidates. In 1879, after the General Elections, after the leader of the present Government had been called on to form an Administration, we adopted the National Policy. The hon. member from Middlesex did not see fit to vote for that policy, he did everything he could to oppose it; and the hon. member was not alone in his opposition to that policy, every member on the same side of the House followed that line of conduct. What has been the result of the adoption of this National Policy by the present Government? The result, Mr. Speaker, has been that petitions have been circulated in various parts of the United States and especially in the Eastern States; requisitions bearing a long list of signatures have been addressed to the Government of the United States asking them to propose a Treaty of Reciprocity to the Government of Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, proves that the present Government acted with wisdom, that the Government of Canada has made all the overtures necessary to protest against the policy of the United States, which crushed our exports by the high duties imposed upon them entering the American Republic. If, therefore, the policy adopted by the Government has been so efficacious that it has forced the people of the United States to forward such petitions as I have before alluded to, I think the Government should be left unhampered as to the advisability of seizing a favorable opportunity for negotiating a Treaty of Reciprocity with the United States. For my part I will be glad to see such a Treaty; I think it would be advantageous for Canada. But it must be approached with pence; and I believe that to obtain this Treaty, we must wait till the Government of the United States realizes that it is to their advantage, also, that this Treaty should be made. The hon. member for Middlesex has quoted certain statistics. He spoke of importation and exportation. This is not the first time that these statistics have been given to us. I remember that, last year, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) delivered an address in the same sense. He also cited statistics to prove that our exports had diminished since the adoption of the National Policy. I believe that those who sit on this side of the House have perfectly answered these statistics and these assertions. It is useless for me to occupy any longer the attention of the House to review subjects which have been fully discussed, and which are well understood by the members of this House and by the public generally. In taking my seat I deem it my duty to protest against the proposition of the hon. member from Middlesex.

Mr. McNEILL: I desire simply to reply to a statement made by the last speaker, which should not be allowed to go uncontradicted, as it is of importance. He has asserted that this wave of prosperity of which he boasts, has swept over all countries. I wish to call attention to the fact that there is one great country which affords a striking exception to that rule, and which is also a marked exception in its trade policy, I mean England. That country which has followed the policy of one-sided Free Trade, has not benefitted by this wave of prosperity which the hon. gentlemen says has benefitted all countries.

PORTAGE ISLAND.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Government and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, either with the British Government, or the Admiralty Department of that Government in reference to the transfer of Portage Island at the entrance of the Miramichi River, to the Government of Canada, together with all Reports and Orders in Council in reference to that subject, and all correspondence bearing thereupon. He said: I may state to the House, in a few words, the position of this question. In the early settlement of New Brunswick, when the territorial possessions of the Crown were handed over to that Province, Portage Island, at the mouth of Miramichi Bay and at the entrance to the river, was set aside on the charts as an Admiralty Reserve. The Island was leased to a number of settlers on the mainland for the hay which grew upon it, and for those privileges a small rental was paid. The Provincial Government from that time up 1863 or 1864 held possession of the Island, received the rent, which went into the Treasury of the Province, and the settlers, mostly French Acadians, settled on the mainland, were quite satisfied with the state of things which then existed. The Governor of the Province of that day, Mr. Gordon, desired, through some representations, that the Island should be transferred to the Admiralty Department, and it was accordingly so transferred, the Admiralty administering the affairs of the Island, and collecting the rents through their local agent. That condition of things continued until 1873 or 1874, during the time I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The administration of the Island did not give satisfaction. The agent of the Admiralty at Halifax did not administer its affairs either to inspire them with confidence in the permanency of the arrangement, or give that satisfaction to which the people thought they were entitled. I brought the matter under the consideration of the Government of that day, and communication was opened with the Admiralty at Halifax, or with the British Government—for I am now speaking from memory, and am under correction if I inaccurately state the facts—for the purpose of having the Island again placed in the hands of the Dominion Government. The result of those negotiations was that the British Government consented to the transfer. The legal agent of the Crown at St. John, acting for the Department of Justice, was instructed to prepare the necessary papers. They were prepared, I believe, but whether they were ever signed, from that day to this I have been unable to find out. My object in bringing the matter before the House, and in moving for this correspondence, is to call public attention, and the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the position in which that property now stands; and I may say to him that it will give satisfaction to the people who occupy the Island—no person lives on it, although it is a very large Island, and is occupied, as I have stated, almost entirely by Acadian settlers on the mainland—if the Island can be transferred to the Dominion Government, so that the people may continue to pay their rents, which they have formerly paid, but which through some inaccuracy or neglect have not been regularly collected or paid, or regularly accounted for. The settlers, in order to secure permanency of occupancy, wish to be placed on a better footing; and I call the attention of the House to the position in which the matter now stands, with a view to bring it under the notice of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the purpose of pressing on it the necessity of completing the negotiations which were commenced, and which have been sanctioned, by the Admiralty. I have no doubt the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will do what is necessary in this matter. Almost all the people interested are poor, and they desire that the Island should revert to the Dominion Government in order that their permanency of occupation may be fully established.

REGINA.

Mr. CASEY moved, for—

Copies of Orders in Council locating the seat of Government of the North-West Territories, and headquarters of the Mounted Police at Regina, and directing the removal of the Lieutenant-Governor and other officials from Battleford to Regina, and of the Mounted Police from Fort Welsh to Regina, with statement of expenses connected with such removal.

Copies of all reports and correspondence from the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Territories, or other parties, on which the decision to remove the seat of Government to Regina was based; also of all correspondence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or other parties, in reference to the precise location of the proposed town site of Regina, and to any alteration of such location from that first proposed; also, of all correspondence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or other parties in reference to the interest of the Government in any lots in the said town site, or any arrangement between them and said Company, in regard to the division of proceeds of sales of such lots.

Copies of Orders in Council or other authority directing the construction at Regina of a Lieutenant-Governor's residence, Police Barracks and other Public Buildings, with copies of all advertisements for tenders, tenders and contracts for the construction of the same, and statement of all sums expended up to date on account of such construction.

Plan of township in which Regina is situated, showing owner of each section, or part thereof as far as ascertainable, and also which sections or parts thereof are included in the town site as at first proposed and as finally settled; with the location of the different Public Buildings and of the Railway Station.

Statement of value of Public Buildings and furniture lately in use in Battleford and at Fort Walsh, and now disused, with amount, if any, realized from sales thereof.

I wish to give some reasons for asking that these returns shall be brought down. It is obvious that the locating of a point of such great importance, as the capital of the North-West Territory, and the future capital of a new Province, is a matter on which the public should acquire information. But, Sir, in this case, there is a special reason for asking the grounds which induced the Government to select this particular location: for the simple reason that those grounds are not obvious to any ordinary observer. It was, of course, necessary that the capital of the North-West Territories should be removed from Battleford, to some point rather more central, to the settlement which would likely spring up along the railway, and having railway facilities; but it was also naturally supposed that the Government would search for such a location as would be adapted by nature for the site of a large and populous city. Now, that is exactly what it seems to most explorers, that Regina is not; and it is for this reason, I say, we must ask for the reasons why the Government selected this place. It cannot have been because there is no wood within about twenty miles of the town site; it can have scarcely been because it is found impossible to procure good well water by digging at that place; and it can scarcely have been either on account of the presence of that classical stream Pile of Bones Creek, which was reported last summer, in August, when I was in the neighborhood, to be almost completely dry. It cannot have been altogether either on account of the good soil at that point. The soil is fairly fertile, as almost all the soils of the North-West are, where they are fit for cultivation at all; but it is a very tough clay, difficult to work, and is even more tenacious and muddy, during the wet season of the year, than is the celebrated soil of Winnipeg—and in every way, in fact, it is an unpleasant soil on which to build a city. It cannot have been for these reasons; and we must then suppose that the Government have had reasons laid before them, which are not known to the public or to this House, for locating the capital of the North-West Territories at this particular spot. It will naturally be supposed that before making this important location, they had got the report of experts, of surveyors, of special explorers, of Hudson Bay traders, and of everybody, who knew anything about the country, as to the most desirable site for this capital; and it will be reasonable to suppose that they selected the point, marked out by all these experts, as being the most desirable one for the future city. Of course, it may be objected that this most desirable point has not happened to be on the projected line of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but we are not to forget, Sir, that this railway is a great national enterprise, paid for entirely by the people of this country and built as a national work for the benefit of the people of this country. We are not to forget that the Government has retained a certain control over the location of this road—and I believe that the location of this road is subject to the approval of the Governor in Council—and we should naturally suppose then, Sir, that if this desirable site, which the Government had found out by thorough exploration, did not happen to be in the exact line projected in their own interests by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that the Government would, at least, bring such influence to bear upon the Company as to induce them to take their railway to the place where they desired that the capital of the North-West Territories should be. We will be glad to be informed by the right hon. gentleman, and the documents which he will doubtless bring down, as to whether such steps were taken, and whether a careful attempt was made to find out the most desirable site; and as to whether subsequently any influence was brought to bear on the Railway Company to induce them to take their road through that particular place, if it was not on the proposed line. But, Sir, rumor has stated, I do not know how correctly, or else there would be no necessity for making this motion, that the selection of this site was not made by the Government here, after it had collected all possible evidence as to where it should be. Rumor has it that this selection was left in the hands of the Lieut.-Governor of the North-West Territories, a person who, of course, from his official position might be supposed to know something of what was required in a seat of Government; and rumor also has said, that this gentleman, who otherwise, no doubt, was competent to judge, was interested in certain parcels of land in the neighborhood in which it was supposed that this site would probably be chosen—that he had invested in one particular section, comprised in or adjoining the present town site of Regina. Of course, I do not know how correct that rumor is; but I find a very strong article in the Government organ at Winnipeg, which makes this charge more strongly than, perhaps, I should care to do myself. In referring to certain complaints made from the district of Assiniboia, the editor goes on to say:

"There is no denying it that Mr. Dewdney is unpopular throughout Assiniboia. It is out of the question, of course, for a man in his position to please everybody; and his acts will always be misconstrued by those dissatisfied with them. It is greatly to be regretted, however, that Mr. Dewdney should have afforded ground for the suspicion cast about almost everything he does. He had no right whatever, as the chief officer of the North-West Territories, to enter into speculations or become a stockholder in any of the multitudinous and rival land companies. He may say that he is or was interested in Section 26 at Regina, and that he holds shares in the Bell Farm, not as Lieut.-Governor, but as plain Mr. Dewdney. It is impossible, however, to distinguish between the two entities, more especially as Lieut.-Governor Dewdney and Mr. Dewdney have a common pocket.

"Lieut.-Governors in the North-West have unhappily come to be regarded in the light that high and low offices in India were regarded in the days of Olive and Hastings. Mr. Morris amassed a fortune in a few years, and Mr. Cauchon, of course, did likewise. It may be that those gentlemen did not abuse their positions or use to their own gain and profit the valuable information that came to them officially. But the fact remains that they came here poor and went away rich, and people will persist in connecting office with money-making as cause and effect. If Mr. Dewdney has made up his mind to follow the bad example thus set him, he may rely upon it that before his term expires he will land in a heap of trouble."

Now, Sir, these are the charges made, not by an Opposition organ, not by a paper partial to this side of the House, but by the Government organ at Winnipeg—by the Winnipeg Times, a paper which, as will be seen by the latter part of the quotation, is not particularly favorable to the Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba, who was appointed by gentlemen now sitting on this side of the House. This testimony is not that of a party enemy, but of a friend, who intimates, whether rightly or wrongly, that grave irregularities took place with regard to the selection of this site; and that Lieut.-Governor Dewdney was allowed to speculate in virtue of his position, and in virtue of the information and power in his possession as Lieut.-Governor. Of course, Sir, these are charges which the Government cannot allow to pass quietly, with respect either to themselves or to the gentleman in question—Lieut.-Governor Dewdney. If these charges are false and without foundation, they should be disproved at once; and nothing can be easier than to do so, by bringing down all the documents, reports and plans, &c., which will show us that Lieut.-Governor Dewdney had nothing to do with the selection of this town site. If it be shown by the correspondence asked for, that the decision was carried out entirely independent of the opinion of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney, of course this will at once, clear away the aspersions cast on his character; and more than that, the Government here will be freed from the charge of carelessness, and of connivance at his speculation, with which it is charged. Sir, I hope it will be found, for the sake of the Government, and of the Lieut.-Governor, and of our politics generally, that in deciding such an important question as this, the Government did not place Lieut.-Governor Dewdney in such an embarrassing and false position, as to ask for his advice about a matter in which he was personally interested; for I believe there is no doubt as to the fact that he is or was personally interested in land, which has since greatly enhanced in value, in the location of this town site. With regard to some other points, on which I am asking information, I may say one of them relates to the change in the town site from the place which was originally proposed for it. If I recollect aright it was at first given out that the proposed town site would be comprised of four sections lying a little further west than those finally adopted, but it was latterly moved away from the river to a distance of one mile, so as to include or adjoin this Section 26, about which so much has been said. Now, it is not to be supposed that the location or change of location took place without the consent of the Government, and I would like to know the reasons which actuated them in giving it. Again I have asked for information as to the negotiations between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other parties interested in the town site of Regina, as to the division of the lots there, or the division of the profits arising from the sale of these lots. It has been stated by the correspondent of one of our papers, that the sale of lots in Regina was affected virtually by means of a lottery; that the lots were sold in blocks of twenty, by putting the numbers of twenty lots in envelopes promiscuously. The buyer who put down the money for twenty lots was allowed to take one of the envelopes, and this envelope might hold numbers nearly all of which were central lots, or a majority might be outside lots, or there might be a pretty fair division of both. In fact the purchaser was simply betting on the chance of getting more than he was paying for, and taking the chance of his getting less than he was paying for. This correspondent, who appears to be well informed, says that since the sales were made, Mr. Scarthe who is agent for the company commonly known as the Duke of Manchester Company, has offered to sell the remaining lots at a discount of 50 per cent., and has blocked a second sale of lots bought by speculators in the first instance. If this is true it is scandalous, and if untrue it should be disproven at once: I say that if true it is scandalous, because it would make the Government of the country a party to a transaction similar to that which took place in London not long ago in regard to which the press animadverted so strongly, and with regard to which cases are now in the court. It would make the Government parties to a lottery which might or might not be a swindle, according to how it was managed. It will be very easy to prove or disprove the truth of these statements when the documents are brought down. I have further asked by whose orders the different officials were moved from Battleford to Regina, and from Fort Walsh to Regina. It has been stated that the removals were made on the order of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney only, and that the expenditure incurred for building the Governor's residence, and other public buildings at Regina, was also incurred on his sole authority. I have also asked for advertisements for tenders with regard to these buildings, simply that we may see whether the usual check has been kept on the public expenditure in these respects. I hope that the correspondence will not be found to be as long proportionately as the motion, but that it may be brought down early enough in the Session to allow us to consider it, and to enable us, if possible, to clear the parties concerned from the no doubt undeserved aspersions which have been cast upon them.

Mr. ORTON. I cannot allow to pass without reply the unwarrantable and highly mischievous remarks of the hon. gentleman. He made wholesale charges with regard to the location of the Capital of Assiniboia, stating in the first place that it could not be chosen on account of the insufficiency of water. I had the pleasure of visiting that country and spending some three or four weeks at Regina. I travelled through a large portion of the country surrounding it, and I can state of my own knowledge that the Pile of Bones Creek contains, and last summer did contain at the lowest time of the water, that is in October and the beginning of November, ample water to supply a population of 50,000 inhabitants at least. I took the trouble to ascertain from an engineer who was in charge of the laying out of that city what its capabilities were in regard to water, and he said he made a rough calculation, and with a proper reservoir built on Pile of Bones Creek he had little doubt that there would be ample water for a very large city; and from the amount of water which is passing down that stream every twenty-four hours, I feel pretty confident that he was right.

Mr. CHARLTON. How many cubic feet per minute passed down the stream?

Mr. ORTON. A rough calculation was made showing that, during twenty-four hours, 1,500,000 gallons of water passed down the stream during the lowest period of last season. But, independently of Pile of Bones Creek, it is not true that water cannot be obtained by sinking wells. A number of wells have been sunk. The railway company have found any amount of water at a depth of 200 feet. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I know it to be a fact. Water of excellent quality has also been found at several other places near Regina. Five miles off, is Burning Creek, a stream from which any amount of excellent water may be obtained if Pile of Bones Creek is not sufficient. Besides there is the Qu'Appelle River, which is only distant sixteen or seventeen miles from the city. So, I think, that the charge made with regard to the scarcity of water is without foundation. With regard to wood, I saw wood delivered in Regina during the time I was there last fall, at from $7 to $8 per cord. The wood is poplar, it is true, but it is good dry wood, such as they use in that country. As far as the fuel supply is concerned, however, not only Regina and its neighborhood, but the larger portion of the whole North-West, will have to depend in the future upon coal, and it is a well ascertained fact that coal exists to an almost unlimited extent in our great North-West. I have been informed, on good authority, that coal of a quality equal if not superior to that on Vancouver Island, and in many respects superior to the Nova Scotia coal, exists in almost unlimited quantities between the Rocky Mountains and Regina; so that there is no possibility of the want of fuel being a serious drawback to the selection of Regina as the capital of Assiniboia. With regard to the land in that neighborhood, I have travelled over a considerable portion of Manitoba and the North-West, and I challenge contradiction when I say that Regina is situated in the largest and most extensive tract of the richest agricultural land of the whole North-West, and I believe it will prove to be the most productive for the growth of cereals. With regard to the charge against the Lieut.-Governor of the North-West having an interest in Regina, all I can say is that I know nothing personally with reference to that subject, but I do know that the section of land in which he is said to have some interest is not less than a mile and a half from Regina proper, and I do not think there is the slightest possibility of that section becoming for many years a portion of the city. The city of Regina I think is excellently situated. I had an opportunity of visiting Qu'Appelle, formerly called Troy, as well as Fort Qu'Appelle. I must say that I very much admired the situation of Fort Qu'Appelle, which lies in the Valley of the Qu'Appelle, with banks on each side, at least 300 feet high. The difficulty there, is that the site is too small for a large city or a considerable sized town, and very great engineering difficulties would prevent proper railway accommodation being furnished at that point, in consequence of the high banks and the deep valley. Another point is that it was important to have the capital on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the fact that the Government owned half the site made it important that it should be fixed where it was. I do not think a more suitable point could possibly have been found for the capital of that fine Province. Moose Jaw is close to the limit of the good land. It is true there is good land beyond it, but it ceases to appear eight or ten miles beyond. The wisdom of the selection is shown by the one fact, that there is not a quarter section within fifteen miles of Regina that is not occupied by a settler. There are a great many old country people there, as well as people from Ontario, and some who came from inferior land in the Province of Manitoba. So that the country surrounding Regina, will at once be settled by a more dense population than any other part of the North-West is to-day. The land is not in the hands of speculators, but every quarter section is occupied by a settler. With regard to the Lieut.-Governor, I believe he is a highly popular gentleman in the North-West, and his action in this matter I shall leave to be dealt with by the Government.

Mr. TUPPER. There is just one remark of the hon. gentleman's that I would like to correct. I think he is mistaken in reference to the character of the coal in the North-West. I have had occasion myself to read some very interesting reports of that country, and although the coal deserves all the praise that any man investing in that article would desire, it does not possess the reputation of being superior to the Nova Scotia coal, but it has the reputation of being nearly equal to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not at all object to the length of the hon. gentleman's motion, and I shall prove that, in the most practical way possible, by adding to it a little before I sit down. The hon. gentleman has a right, certainly, to put all these questions and get all this information, and shall get it by-and-by, as soon as it can be brought down. I regret, however, that the hon. gentleman should deal in rumor when the character of a public officer is concerned. He says there is a rumor that the Lieut.-Governor chose the site, that he had sordid and interested motives in choosing those sections, and the hon. gentleman read a newspaper extract; and in order to attack the present Lieut.-Governor, he does not hesitate to sacrifice an old political friend of his own, Mr. Cauchon. It will be my duty to defend those three gentlemen. Mr. Morris was sent up by a former Government of which I was the head. He was a colleague of mine, and all will admit a man of standing and consideration in the country. As Lieut.-Governor he went to Winnipeg, and had nothing to do with the granting of land, any more than the hon. gentleman himself—perhaps did not take such a lively interest in the lands of the North-West as the hon. gentleman, but he committed the great sin of purchasing an eligible piece of property in the city of Winnipeg. He bought it not from the Government but from a private individual, and he had right to do so. He built some houses on it, and with the marvellous progress of Winnipeg, made I believe a large profit from the sale of lots on the land he purchased. All that was perfectly legitimate. So were the purchases of Mr. Cauchon, who was the Lieut.-Governor sent up by hon. gentlemen opposite when in power. He exercised his right of buying from individuals and I hope his expectations may be realized. So with regard to Mr. Dewdney: he went up as Land Commissioner under the first Lieut.-Governor, and had nothing to do with lands in the North-West. He was sent up to look after the Indians on their reserves, to be at the head of that branch of the Public Service. We have Indian Agents who are quite separate from the land officers, who have no more to do with the lands than the hon. gentleman himself. All they have to do is to see that the Indians are settled on the reserves, are peaceable, and, as far as possible, educated, and brought within the influence of civilization. About a year ago the Hudson Bay Company put some sections into the market. A friend of Mr. Dewdney's bought some of them, and asked him to take an interest in some of the lots. He did so, a year before Regina was thought of at all. He did not conceal that. He told me at once that he had invested some money in Hudson Bay property, and I told him I hoped that he had made a good speculation. That is not the sole interest Mr. Dewdney had. He has an interest in a section at Qu'Appelle, and one at Regina, and, I believe, in a Hudson Bay lot further west. He has never denied having this interest, and had a right to buy a Hudson Bay Company's lot. The hon. gentleman says he ought not to have been consulted. Why? I am responsible for the selection of Regina. I asked Mr. Dewdney his opinion, having the highest opinion of his probity, ability and judgment. I asked him, as I had asked a great many others—

Mr. CASEY. What did the hon. gentleman ask Mr. Dewdney to do?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I consulted him, not only about Regina, but about the laying out of town sites, all the way from Qu'Appelle to Fort Calgary. I took all the evidence I could. I talked to everybody about the best places to choose sites. Those who were members of the last Parliament, may remember that the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition, very properly said, in discussing this question, that while we gave homesteads to actual settlers, we had no right to make them millionaires, and that it was the duty of the Government to reserve town sites so that the proceeds would go into the Public Treasury to recoup the Treasury of Canada for the enormous expense incurred in opening up and settling the country. That was a very sensible remark. It was announcing a policy which the Government had resolved to carry out and were carrying out. The moment the line of the Pacific Railway was established, a belt of one section deep on each side, was reserved so that the Government might see where the tendency of the population was to rest, and where there was speedy prospect of a town being established, so that the homesteaders, who were given, as a present, 160 acres of land to farm on, should not become millionaires by putting the whole of the money into their pocket. Besides that, the Government tried to find out where were the points along the line where towns would most likely spring up. In a country of that kind which is a level prairie, unless where there are streams of water, one place is as good as another and it is a mere accident where towns will grow. In fact the casual settlement of some respectable men and a post office being established, or a decent hotel at any one point, might form the nucleus of a town. But those points where there was any water were certainly the most likely places for the growth of towns. Consequently the Government reserved, not only the belt of a section on each side of the road from one end to the other, but also certain points. They selected the Pile of Bones Creek, where the land is as good as my hon. friend has described it, and where the water was in such a considerable body as to make it a desirable point for a town. They also selected Moose Jaw Creek, Medicine Hat, Calgary, Maple Creek, and other places, likely sites for towns, so that the proceeds of the sale of lots might come into the Treasury. There was great disappointment, among a large body of individuals, that Troy (Qu'Appelle), was not selected as the chief town. Why, Sir, because it is a very pretty place. It has been graphically described by my hon. friend who sits behind me, the consequence was that pretty much all the land was taken up by squatters. Some of them, I must say, squatted rather fraudulently, not with a bona fide desire to become settlers, but rather with the view—in their mind legitimate enough—that if they could get a lot they could make a profit by breaking up their homestead, or the preemption, into town lots. Government desired to select those places where the largest quantity of land in eligible places was free from settlers, where, without moving or incommoding any settlers who had gone up there, they might have land in the market. Pile of Bones was chosen for that. Well, one of their reasons, as the hon. gentleman pointed out, why this place was selected was, that it was in the immediate line of the railway. Now it was all important in the altered circumstances of the country that the Mounted Police should be gathered in from the various outlying stations where they had been scattered in the early settlement of the country. They were scattered all over in small bands. Perhaps that was requisite some years ago, but now that the railway is running through the country it was thought all important that the headquarters should be on the immediate line of the railway, and from that point, as the railway went east and west, they could be, in case of exigency, in case of disturbances among the Indians, of troubles between the whites and the red men—that they could be sent off from the central point, east and west, on the railway, and then going off on the prairies to the place where there was danger of conflict. The Commissioner of Mounted Police was sent to look for a good place, and he selected as being most eligible, a place in the immediate vicinity of Pile of Bones Creek, where there was a fine tract of land for a farm which they must have for their horses—for forage is enormously expensive there—and they selected that. That was the first idea of our having a town there. Then it was quite clear that, in order to make this town profitable, there should be some arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. If they were starting a town on their own suggestion and the Government were starting a town on their own suggestion, one might kill the other, and it is quite clear to everyone that it is the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to select sites for towns where towns are likely to grow, where the land will become valuable. For they have to make their money—and the hon. gentlemen opposite say they are going to make enormous sums of money out of the sales of those lands; at all events, it is clearly their interest to choose the very best sites. Well, Mr. Speaker, we consulted the Company. We knew that their interest was perhaps greater than ours, and that we were perfectly safe if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government agreed as to where the eligible sites would be. Well, the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did agree that this was an eligible site for a town; and if you look at the map which has been laid before the House, you will see that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has selected the town of Regina as one of the places from which there may be a leading branch running to the North-West from Regina on towards Saskatchewan. The fact of its being the point of junction between a railway connecting the Saskatchewan and one running to the north at Regina, was sufficient to make it a large town of itself. But then it is true you cannot have everything. There is not water enough. We would rather have had that river considerably larger, but the streams there are not large. But a town was certain to grow there, it was eligible, it was in the centre of Assiniboia, and as my hon. friend has stated behind me, there are only one or two places elsewhere. They might have gone to Qu'Appelle, but the land was taken up, and, I think, the Government exercised, in the interest of the Treasury, in the interests of the Province, a wise discretion in not choosing a place where a very small portion of the proceeds from the sales of land would go to the Public Treasury, but would go into the pockets of the people who happened to squat there. There were only two places—Regina and Moose Jaw Creek. Moose Jaw Creek is too far West, it is not so near the centre of Assiniboia.

Mr. CASEY. How much further?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About forty miles. But while it is true that the land lying to the west of Moose Jaw Creek is fit for settlement and is not the desert that it has been described—because we all remember the descriptions given in this House of that land being absolutely sterile, of no value whatever. It does not bear that character. It is good and fair land, and I believe it will be the seat of a large population. Yet from eight to ten miles west of Moose Jaw Creek the land becomes of a lighter description, and of the appearance, to persons who are not experts, of being sterile. It is inferior land to that which surrounds Regina, but there will be a large town growing up at Moose Jaw Creek. Forty miles is a considerable distance in a rich country like that, and the Government have reserved a large tract of land at Moose Jaw Creek for the same purpose that they have done so at Regina. Moreover, at the crossing of the Saskatchewan, the coal crops out, the rich coal which I must almost tell my hon. friend from Pictou is equal to Nova Scotia coal, and it is in unlimited quantities. Now, Sir, I think it is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should attack a town which is just about begun. It is the unfortunate duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to attack the character of that country as a whole, it has been the style of hon. gentlemen opposite to abuse that country, and we have had it compared and said to be inferior to Kansas, inferior to Texas, inferior to every other country in the world. They have a habit of running down their own country, trying to depreciate the soil. Instead of giving a fair chance to the city of Regina and assisting the Government to sell their lands at a fair price, they publish to the world that any man who goes there is a fool, that it is not fit for a town, that there is no coal, no fuel, no water nor earth, but mud and scrubs. That is the description the hon. gentlemen give to that country. That is their idea of patriotism. This is not the first time that kind of patriotism has been exhibited by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could certainly have no object in making the fortune of Mr. Dewdney, or conniving or colluding with him in making an improper site. They want to make money out of it, they are going to make money out of it; and the Government were so sure that they were the most likely men to make money out of it, that they simply said to them: Now, here, join us in choosing a good place. That place was chosen, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company agreed that was a good place, and they have agreed to make that a starting point for the railway running to the north. They know what they are about. They intend to make money out of their lots, and the Government have said to the Canadian Pacific Railway: Now, you can manage it better than the Government can, because your fortunes are concerned in it; we will put the land up to a given area; we will be a partnership; you take charge of it, and sell the lots, and return to the Treasury half the amount of the sales. That is the arrangement made, and I think we could not have a better agent than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because they get half of the proceeds of every lot they sell, the money received going into their own pockets, and adding to their revenues. As to the shifting of the site, I know nothing of it.

Mr. CASEY. In regard to this arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, does the hon. gentleman mean that the Company keeps half of the profits from the sale of lots in the Government part of the town, for the trouble of management?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see that every alternate section is ours, and every alternate section theirs. It is put into hodge-podge, they manage the whole thing and they pay us half. That is the agreement, and I think it is a very good one; it costs us nothing and the Company are very glad to do it. As to putting up buildings there, I believe the Government have bought two or three ready-made wooden houses, and have sent them there where they have been erected, some of these houses having been constructed in Montreal, and others here. Lieut.-Governor Dewdney went to the enormous expense of adding two together, and that, I believe, is the Lieut.-Governor's palace. The Government do not intend to go to any expense there on buildings of a permanent character, until the cost of building is infinitely reduced. When the railway is finished, when lumber can be bought along the line cheaper, and when brick is made, and I am glad to say that in that region there is, I am told, first-rate brick clay, at a cheap rate, the Government will proceed to put up a brick Post office instead of a wooden one, and they may even venture on the extravagance of erecting a brick Custom House, because we are going to have a Custom House there, and if the Governor behaves himself very well we may change his two wooden ready-made houses into a brick one. That is simply the whole story. The hon. gentleman has said something about a lottery. I have read it in the newspapers. If anything of that kind has been done by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I think they have acted very improperly, and must take the consequences of such an improper mode of disposing of the lots. All they were instructed and authorized to do was to take the management of the whole town, to lay it out according to the experience of those in charge, and the Company have very experienced officers, such as Mr. VanHorn, who occupied a high position on the Northern Pacific, and who knows exactly what is required, and what is the most profitable and effective way to lay out a town. The town has been laid out with ovals, squares and other open places for public use, and no doubt it will form a good town. Notwithstanding the bad character which the hon. member for Elgin has given it, if you walk along some distance and look over your shoulder, you will see that three or four houses have gone up while you have passed along. I can bring down all the papers asked for; but I protest against attacks being made upon the characters of public servants. They are in a certain degree defenceless. They are necessarily under the guardianship and protection of the House, and they should not be attacked upon rumors, and certainly not on a casual remark of the press. The hon. gentleman should know the great power he possesses as a representative of the people, and the great responsibility that rests on him in making statements against officials behind their backs, and who, being defenceless, have the right to throw themselves upon the generosity and the justice of the representatives of the people. Attacks should not be made on them unless an hon. member has so far verified the rumors that he makes himself responsible for the attack. The hon. member for Elgin has admitted that, under present circumstances, Battleford was not a proper place for the seat of Government. What the future great towns will be in the great North-West no one can foresee. We can easily see where towns of reasonable and considerable size will grow up, but where the great cities will be established we must leave that to futurity. The hon. gentleman admits, however, that with a line of railway running through the country, Battleford is too far north. I believe Battleford has a future too, and I would be the last to disparage it. I believe that from its position it will be a considerable town. From the fact that there is no approach to it except by the slow and tedious navigation of the Saskatchewan, and that it is so far distant from the reach of immigrants, its progress has not been so great as was anticipated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by the hon. member for East York, who selected it, when Premier; but that it will have a future, and be a town, I have not any doubt in the world. Meanwhile, however, it was quite clear that the Provisional Districts which have been established—and I think were divided with a good deal of skill—if I may venture to say so, will be several Provinces, each with its own capital, as Manitoba has its capital at Winnipeg. I believe Regina will be a fine town, a very fine town, and will make a very creditable and respectable capital for Assiniboia. The other Provinces, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, will have their capitals by-and-bye; there will be plenty of towns there, and this one of Regina will not be one of the most insignificant. I beg to move the following addition to the hon. gentleman's motion, which, no doubt, he will accept, and I will see that it does not postpone the bringing down of the papers:—

Copies of Orders in Council locating the Head Quarters of the Mounted Police at Fort Ellice.

Copies of Orders in Council locating the Head Quarters of the Mounted Police at Fort Pelly.

Copies of Orders in Council, or other authority, directing the construction at Fort Pelly of Police Barracks, and other public buildings, with copies of all advertisements for tenders, tenders and contracts for the construction of the same, and Statement of all sums expended up to date, on account of such construction.

Copies of Orders in Council locating the seat of Government of the North-West Territories and Head Quarters of the Mounted Police at Battleford, and directing the removal of the Lieutenant-Governor, and other officials, and of the Mounted Police from Fort Pelly to Battleford, with Statement of expenses connected with such removal.

Copies of Orders in Council, or other authority, directing the construction at Battleford of a Lieutenant-Governor's residence, Police Barracks and other public buildings, with copies of all advertisements for tenders, tenders and contracts for the construction of the same, and Statement of all sums expended up to date, on account of such construction.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think the right hon. gentleman has any substantial ground of complaint against the manner in which my hon. friend presented his case to-night. I do not think the hon. gentleman could fairly charge him with unfairness in basing his charges on alleged rumors. My hon. friend did not found them on alleged rumor, in so far as the conduct of the Lieut.-Governor of the North-West Territories is concerned. It is quite clear there must be something wrong, either in the mode the Lieut.-Governor administered public affairs there, or in regard to the instructions received by him from headquarters; otherwise it is impossible to understand the tone and attitude of the organ of the Government in Winnipeg on this subject. Now if the hon. gentleman rested his case on some rumor of the Opposition press, or on some statements made by those who do not support the Government, the hon. gentleman might fairly charge him with unfairness to the Lieut.-Governor; but here, Sir, is an editorial in an organ of the Government at Winnipeg, drawing the attention of the Government to the complaints, whether well founded or not I am not prepared to say, but to complaints, at all events, that exist and are widespread in that region against the conduct of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney; and I say it was the duty of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) to have drawn the attention of the Government to this matter under the circumstances. Now the First Minister knows perfectly well, or ought to know from the public press, that during the last few days, a public meeting was held in one of the centres of population within the Province of Assiniboia, at which meeting, permit me to say, Sir, every man present, out of seventy-five, were supporters of the Government, save three; and at that meeting, Sir, resolutions were passed, complaining of the conduct of the Lieut.-Governor, and telling the hon. gentleman, that if he were appointed Lieut.-Governor of Assiniboia, he would be treated as Mr. McDougall was treated when appointed Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba, and that his entrance into the Province would be resisted perforce; and stating further, that the time for grumbling had now passed, and the time for action arrived. Now when one sees statements of that kind in the public press, which supports hon. gentlemen, and finds such motions and resolutions carried at a public meeting of the supporters of the Government, one cannot close one's eyes to the fact that some well-grounded cause of complaint must exist. I am not complaining of the Lieut.-Governor, I know nothing about him except when he was in Parliament, and I always then found him to be a respectable and intelligent gentleman. I am only mentioning that those things have taken place within the last few days in the Provinces of Manitoba and Assiniboia, and that they justify the motion now before the House. The Times goes still further, and insists that hon. gentlemen opposite must institute enquiries into the conduct of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney with regard to a matter so notorious and so public. If the statements are true, and they appear in the press of the hon. gentleman, and are endorsed by the hon. gentleman's friends, then I say my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) was perfectly justified in the course he has taken. Now, what I understood the hon. gentleman to complain of, with respect to the selection of Regina as the capital of Assiniboia, was that the selection of it was left in the hands of the Lieut.-Governor. Now, nobody complains of the Lieut.-Governor going to the North-West Territories, and investing his spare funds in purchasing there real estate, as long as he does not use his position, and information acquired in his official position, for the purpose of benefitting himself. I do not complain of it at all; but the ground of complaint against Lieut.-Governor Dewdney was that he had purchased a section (No. 26) in Township 18 or 19, Range 25, from the Hudson Bay Company, in connection with others; and the hon. the First Minister admits that this man who had purchased a section there, was the man who was authorized by them to select a site for the capital of the new Province of Assiniboia. Now, I say that if the hon. gentleman wanted an impartial and a fair selection, it is not exactly the thing to appoint for that purpose a man who is directly interested in the selection of the town site at Regina. For aught I know and say, at the present time it may have been the very best selection that could be made; but you cannot expect to get a fair, impartial, and intelligent judgment from a man who is himself personally interested in it. We know perfectly well there were rival towns, Qu'Appelle, South Qu'Appelle, Moose Jaw, and Regina, which was then called Pile of Bones; and to select a man interested in Pile of Bones to decide between these rival claimants for the capital of Assiniboia, does not appear to me, at all events, the proper thing. I am not going to say much about Regina, although I was there for a couple of days last summer; but if there is a river there, or a stream, out of which you can get water for a population of 50,000, all I can say is that I did not see it, although it may have been there. I do not mean to say that the country around Regina is not a fair country, or that there is not water enough at this place to accommodate a population of 3,000 or 4,000; but I am told—and I have it from a person living there—that this winter they have been paying 75 cents a barrel for water, and that Pile of Bones Creek is now frozen to the bottom! Of course, that may be so; and still there may be an abundance of water within easy reach. As to Qu'Appelle, of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, Fort Qu'Appelle and Moose Jaw, I can say as to those places that prettier town sites I do not think to-day exist beneath the sun; and I am quite sure that if the hon. the First Minister had devoted a few weeks to a visit to that interesting region of our Dominion, he would agree with me that either Qu'Appelle or Moose Jaw is infinitely superior, in so far as the eye is capable of enabling one to form an opinion on that subject, to Regina. At Moose Jaw or Qu'Appelle the hon. gentleman would find a river, and at the latter place four lakes, two on one side and two on the other side of the town site. There is there plenty of water and it is of a very good quality. The hon. gentleman knows that at Moose Jaw there is Moose Jaw River, a rapid running stream of clear water; and he knows that at Moose Jaw there is also Thunder Creek which empties into Moose Jaw, and has a very considerable volume of water. I venture to say that it is, at least, five or ten times as large as the stream Pile of Bones. The hon. gentleman knows that the land in the vicinity of Moose Jaw is, as I believe, without exception, the finest twenty in the whole of the North-West region; although at miles west of it, it is not of so good a quality; yet, to the south and north of Moose Jaw and for fifty miles north of Moose Jaw, there is not finer land in the universe, and to the south of it as well; and although the land twenty miles west is not so good, still the land in the neighborhood is of first-class quality. Moose Jaw is only thirty-five miles from Regina; and if it had advantages—which I am not saying it had—but am only pointing out what appeared to me, from my observation, to have been the case—the distance in a large Province like Assiniboia, of thirty-five miles, could make very little difference in the selection of a capital. Now, I believe, that Regina will of necessity be an important place; it cannot help but be so. St. Petersburg was made an important place by force of circumstances, and the energy and perseverance of the Emperor; and so the hon. gentleman can make Regina an important city. I would be very sorry to say anything that could detract from the importance of Regina; but I do not think the hon. gentleman was quite fair in throwing across to this side of the House, whenever we speak on subjects of this kind, the charge of always depreciating the merits of that country. I do not think that there is any warrant for that, judging from what has been said in my hearing. As far as I am concerned, I believe, as to the neighborhood of Regina, that the land is fair; but I know that it is equally good at Moose Jaw and Qu'Appelle. As to timber: there was none that I could see within a range of eight or ten miles of Regina—and in that respect, perhaps Moose Jaw was not much better; so taking it altogether, the selection may be a fair one, although I think that Moose Jaw will, from its position, be an important place. I would be very sorry to say a word offensive of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney, which I would not utter were he in my presence; and I should perhaps say more, if he were, than I will now, because he is not here, and is not in a position to justify and defend himself. The hon. gentleman must however know perfectly well that there is widespread dissatisfaction in the North-West with reference to Mr. Dewdney. The instance I have given the hon. gentleman is clear evidence of this fact. The hon. gentleman must also know perfectly well, that there is very considerable dissatisfaction and discontent among the Indian tribes up there; and he must know perfectly well that the camp located at Broadview, last summer, was almost in a state of rebellion. He knows also, perfectly well, that Piepot's band was almost in a state of actual rebellion; and, as everybody who knows anything about the situation there can tell the hon. gentleman, perhaps better than I can, Piepots and his band were, last summer, grumbling and complaining loudly of the way in which they were used by the officials of the Government there; and when brought face to face with the Lieut.-Governor, this band charged him with misrepresentations and misconduct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now, I must really ask the hon. gentleman, in all fairness, if he wishes to bring the conduct of either the Government, or of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney, into question as to the management of Indians, to give notice to that effect, for this has nothing to do with Regina, which is under discussion.

Mr. CAMERON. I only mention this because the hon. gentleman must know of it, for these complaints were sent to the Department. If that is so, then I say the hon. gentleman's motion is quite correct, and he is not open to the charge of having done anything improper as regards either Regina or the conduct of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney. I have nothing more to say, but I thought it my duty to say this much as to opinions I formed of Regina as the capital of the North-West, and as to the conduct of the Lieut.-Governor. This much I may say further that I quite approve of the policy of the Government with respect to taking advantage of these town sites for the purpose of putting the proceeds of the sale of Government lands there into the Dominion Treasury. I can see no reason why either the Syndicate, or the Duke of Manchester Company, or private individuals should get the benefit of the sale of these sites. I believe that their policy is correct. They have my approval, if that amounts to anything, and if necessary they will have my vote in support of the principle that, in opening up that country where enormous sums of money are being expended, the Public Treasury should reap the benefit of the sale of these town sites. With respect to speculators, the hon. gentleman says that the reason why one particular place was not selected was because the whole place was occupied by fraudulent speculators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If I used the word fraudulent I used too strong a word. I meant merely to say persons who have no intention themselves of cultivating the soil.

Mr. CAMERON. I understood when the hon. gentleman used the word he used it in that sense. The hon. gentleman knows that within a radius of six or seven miles of the town of Regina there is not one actual settler. I know that when I was there last summer there were seven lawyer's clerks, ten ex-bank clerks, and a dozen other business men and numberless speculators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You are quite right; that is certainly the case.

Mr. CAMERON. I am satisfied that there is not within six miles of the place one single individual who went there bona fide as a settler, with the intention of making his living off the soil, and I have no hesitation in saying that if you allow the speculators to take possession of that country you are doing it a grievous wrong.

Mr. SPROULE. If you look at the arguments which have been brought forward on this question, I think it becomes perfectly plain that the conduct of Lieut.-Governor Dewdney was perfectly disinterested if he had no investments there.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). But he has.

Mr. SPROULE. I have it from himself that he has not. It appears that there were a number of sections of Hudson Bay lots in which he took one-twelfth interest, these lots being scattered over the country. Now, if he had used his position to have the seat of Government fixed upon his own property, then it would be reasonable to suppose that he was working in his own interest; but the very fact that his investment is upon Section 26, while Regina is upon Sections 19 and 13, is the strongest evidence that it would be no advantage to him to have it placed there. His land is outside the town, and we all know that land outside of a city like Ottawa, for instance, is worth no more close to the city than if it were five or six miles off. I was informed by Mr. Dewdney, when I was in Regina last fall, that he had no investments in Regina at all, except such as any private individual might have by taking advantage of the sale of lots. In reference to the selection of the town site it certainly does seem strange to the people of Ontario, that a selection should be made of a place at which there is no large body of water, such as the Ottawa River here for instance. It is not common in a prairie country to find large towns springing up as in one, for example, on the banks of large streams, for the reason that in such a country you cannot carry on manufacturing, and what then, what is the special advantage of a large body of water? The best water found in prairie countries for domestic purposes is that obtained from artesian wells. Why was it, when it was found in Winnipeg that, in some particular places, there were artesian wells, the people sought to obtain that property? Simply because the water there was comparatively pure as compared with surface water. In the Western States and Territories the best supplies of water are obtained from artesian wells. The surface water contains alkali, which is not only unpleasant to the taste but unhealthy, and the deeper we go down in the ground the better is the quality of the water. One of the important considerations in making a selection of a town site is to have proper drainage—a matter much more important than to have a large supply of water, because if you cannot keep up navigation the water supply is of no great importance, whereas if you lack proper drainage one of the most essential requisites for a town is lacking. As to the method of selling the lots. When I was there, one of the arguments used was that all the shrewd business men of the country had endorsed the principle upon which these lots were sold. The man who was in charge of the business said to me: "I have no doubt you are acquainted with Mr. Cameron. I have an order from him for an investment of $5,000 in these lots." It struck me that the plan of selling these lots was very fair, and while it may partake of the character of a lottery, comparatively speaking, it was no lottery. There were some lots in the centre of the town, others at a distance of three-quarters of a mile—some near the railway and others in the outskirts. While, between these classes, there were lots of various values. The plan was to put twenty of these numbers in an envelope at an average price of $250—a plan which it seems to me had a good effect in preventing large speculators from buying up valuable lots in the centre of the town, and thus preventing the town from growing. This was done so as to enable every person to get a share in the site of the town, and to obtain valuable lots as well as those not so valuable. The system, therefore, struck me as being a very fair one, as it gave every person an opportunity of obtaining lots at the lowest figure. The hon. First Minister said that two parties were interested in the sale of these lots. So far as I remember, the Duke of Manchester's Company had one-third interest, the Railway Company one-third, and the Government one-third.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; the Government have one-half and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have the other half. What arrangement they chose to make in the way of underselling to the Duke of Manchester, I do not know; that is no affair of ours.

Mr. SPROULE. I was informed that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had entered into a private agreement with the Duke of Manchester's Company. So far as the location is concerned, I can only say that there is an agricultural country for forty miles around Regina, which is as good as can be found in any part of the North-West. As for water, there is not much anywhere in Southern Manitoba, or between Winnipeg and Brandon; but the fact that they have lately obtained good water by sinking artesian wells, and that there is no absence of facilities for drainage, shows that the selection is a very good one. As to the Lieut.-Governor having an interest in it, I think no better evidence that he has no interest could be given than the fact that the town is on Section 19, while the section in which he is said to be interested is Section 26, and it must be a long time before he would be able to realize upon any investment there.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to say a few words in criticism of the reply made by the right hon. the First Minister. In the first place, I repudiate the statement that I wish to run down that part of the country. What I wish to do is exactly what I did do—point out that there were no salient features which the public could discern, making out Regina as a place preeminently fitted for a great city. That is admitted by every one, and has been, to some extent, admitted by the right hon. gentleman himself, who regarded the Pile of Bones Creek, as the only thing which marked it out as the site of a considerable town and the seat of Government; but the fact of there being a creek there at all, is disputed by the hon. member for East Huron, while the hon. member for East Grey says rivers are of no importance in the North-West, because no one drinks the water.

Mr. SPROULE. No; I said they are not considered of the same importance as they are in Ontario.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has gone farther than I think I could have done, because he says the people of Winnipeg do not drink river water. I am bound to say that a good many people I saw in Winnipeg did not drink water from any source, yet, people there do drink river water, and the water works of Winnipeg draw their supply from the River Assiniboine. It stands to reason that the water supply of a new town like Regina must come from shallow wells, or from some neighboring creek or lake. It cannot depend on artesian wells, which may do very well for large cities which can afford them, but it is absurd to talk of every person in a small town like Regina putting down an artesian well. The right hon. member chose to attack me because he said I had attacked the character of the Lieut.-Governor, whose rights, and character, and position this House was bound to respect and guard in so marked and peculiar a manner. I think, Sir, I did not do anything that might be construed into an attack upon Governor Dewdney. I quoted the remarks of the Government organ in Winnipeg, which is supposed to be inspired from Ottawa, and all who know the gentleman who owns and edits that paper will believe that he is in sympathy with the Government here; and these attacks on Mr. Dewdney have gone abroad with all the force that is attached to them by people who regard them as indicating the feeling in Ottawa with regard to that gentleman. I have simply given the hon. gentleman an opportunity of disproving these charges. He says the papers will disprove them. I hope that is so; but I think Governor Dewdney is hardly fortunate in the defence made for him to-night by the right hon. the First Minister, for he tells us that he knew, before the selection, that Mr. Dewdney was interested—for Mr. Dewdney told him—in Hudson Bay Company's sections, not only at Regina, but at Qu'Appelle, and at various points along the line of railway. With that knowledge, he says that he subsequently consulted Mr. Dewdney with regard to the selection of Regina, and also of other town sites as far west as Calgary. Knowing that Mr. Dewdney was so interested, he did what he knew he should not have done—he placed Mr. Dewdney in an awkward and embarrassing position by asking him where he should fix the seat of Government in the North-West Territories. Well, Sir, those who met Mr. Dewdney last summer came away with the impression not that the Government consulted him in the selection, but that it was entirely in his own hands, and in those of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Of course we hope the documents will show that that was not the case, but that he was merely asked in a casual way where the capital should be, and his opinion had no real weight in influencing the decision of the Government. But if they show that he was asked to make a report upon the subject, and that the report favored this selection, the facts will require very serious consideration, and will certainly receive it from the country at large, if not from this House. The hon. member for East Grey corrected the right hon. the First Minister, and informed him that Lieut.-Governor Dewdney had no property near Regina.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has one-twelfth interest in Section 26.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for East Grey locates Section 26 a little farther from Regina than does the hon.

member for Centre Wellington. According to my reading of the map, Regina is nearer 26 than the hon. gentleman believes it is, and as a necessity has added greatly to the value of that lot. The hon. gentleman says he did not choose Qu'Appelle because there were a large number of squatters settled there, but as the hon. member for Huron has pointed out the land around Regina is all covered with squatters of the most pronounced type, men who do nothing but sit in their tents and smoke their pipes all summer, and make no pretence of cultivating the land.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Those are not squatters they are speculators.

Mr. CASEY. Those are the people who are squatting on the land.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How would you turn them out? Would you send an army to dispossess them?

Mr. CASEY. How is the hon. gentleman going to turn the squatters off the Qu'Appelle Valley Farming Company's land? It appears the edict has gone forth that they must go. The hon. gentleman may send his Mounted Police to do the work, or Mr. Dewdney may be able to effect their removal by the mere exercise of his authority, without the support of an army, although they are bona fide settlers—emigrants who had settled there before the Qu'Appelle Valley Farming Company received its grant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no such order gone forth.

Mr. CASEY. It was spoken of in the Winnipeg papers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government will not have the power to take a man by the neck and turn him off. If the hon. gentleman selects a piece of land, he must be removed by legal procedure.

Mr. CASEY. An official of the Government informed those settlers that they must quit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He gave them notice to quit. That is a legal process.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to learn there is no power to turn these people off, and I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman is not going to turn them off. The greatest injustice would be perpetrated if legal measures were taken to deprive these people of their lands. But if legal measures could be taken in their case, they could be taken also in the case of the squatters at Regina. You should not make fish of one and flesh of the other. I need not go into the discussion of all the other possible sites for a capital. Moose Jaw has had its advantages pointed out, and I am told there is a place south of South Qu'Appelle where there is a beautiful lake quite sufficient to supply with water a city of any size, and I have been told of numerous places throughout the country, fit for the capital, vastly superior to Regina. If the Government had the country thoroughly explored with the view of selecting town sites, and compelled the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to divert the road to suit those places, many advantages would be gained, but no doubt it is impossible for the Government to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to do anything. For their own reasons this Company changed the line of the road from the route carefully selected by Government engineers, and are taking the railway through a tract of country which does not offer so many suitable town sites. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had followed the original course, and struck the Saskatchewan Valley at some point, the line would run through a much more fertile country, containing a number of places suitable for town sites. As to Mr. Dewdney's house in Regina, which the hon. gentleman said is a couple of ready-made wooden houses, I am not aware that Mr. Dewdney has much opportunity at present to use it. But, at Winnipeg, last August, I saw a completed plan of the residence to be made of brick, with coach houses and stables, and was informed by the architect that he had orders to put this house under contract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have the plans. They were sent to me, but the buildings will not be built for some time.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose not, for the bricks are not made yet. The hon. gentleman must not give us the idea that the residence of the Lieut.-Governor is a wooden building. Naturally the Lieut.-Governor should have a house consistent with the architect's description. With regard to attacking a public servant, I did not attack Mr. Dewdney, but I think the Government's conduct has been blameworthy on this particular occasion. It is absurd in the right hon. gentleman to attack anybody for criticising the actions of a Lieut.-Governor when he has done, himself, all in his power to remove any prestige connected with the office by the course he and his followers took with regard to the late Lieut.-Governor of Quebec. If the reverence he thinks ought to hedge in a Lieut.-Governor has disappeared, it is due to the violent attacks made by himself on that gentleman.

Motion agreed to.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the right hon. gentleman inform us when we are to have the Estimates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Next Wednesday. And I would also say that I had given notice that when the House adjourned on Wednesday next, I would move that it stands adjourned until Tuesday of next week at 8 o'clock. But Tuesday will be a Government day, and as not much business will be initiated, it has been pressed upon me that it would be better to adjourn until Wednesday at 3 o'clock and I give notice of motion to that effect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12:15 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 20th March, 1883.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving that, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, Bill (No. 15) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879, be withdrawn, said: The reason for this motion is, that when the Bill referred to came before the Committee, the hon. Minister of Railways intimated his intention to introduce a General Railway Bill, which would substantially embody the provisions of this Bill. Under these circumstances, I assented to the Committee reporting in the sense in which they have done; and, in accordance with that report, I beg leave to withdraw the Bill.

Bill withdrawn.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 46) further to amend an Act intituled: An Act relating to Banks and Banking, and the several Acts amending the same.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Is it the intention to have these lists of shareholders printed?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is.

On the third clause,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The blank will be filled in $100 penalty for over circulation not exceeding $20,000.

Mr. FAIRBANK. We have banks with paid-up capitals from $200,000 to $12,000,000. That an over issue of notes of $100,000 by the small banks would be a much more serious matter as related to capital than with a large bank, as in the one case it would be 50 per cent. of capital, and the other less than 1 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The over circulation is made in the cases of large banks with many agencies through anxiety of agents to keep out full circulation, but in the cases of smaller banks no increase has been found. It was thought proper to impose a penalty to cause greater care to be taken.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is the penalty to be imposed on the directors personally, or the unfortunate shareholders? The former are the men responsible not the latter, and they should pay the penalty.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The shareholders participate in the benefit derived from the excess of circulation, and in most cases the directors are not responsible, as the excess often occurs through the agencies.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). How does the hon. member propose to recover this penalty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is the general law by which penalties are recoverable.

Mr. ROSS. Does it apply to this case?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; there are no special provisions. I propose that the penalty for excess of circulation of over $20,000 and under $100,000, be $1,000. In England, the penalty is equal to the amount of excess, but it is not considered desirable to adopt such a stringent measure here. We have to make the penalty something equivalent to the inducement to banks to increase their circulation.

On the fourth clause,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY proposed that the blank be filled in by $250.

On the seventh clause,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY proposed that the blank be filled in by $50.

On the eighth clause,

Mr. FAIRBANK. I would ask the hon. Minister to allow the bankers to continue to use these designations by adding the words "not incorporated," placing these words upon their signs and upon their stationery. The hon. Minister's only object is to prevent the public being misled, and the addition of these words must certainly do that. It is unjust to deprive individuals of names they have acquired in violation of no law, and which are valuable to them. I would urge at least that existing companies be allowed to continue the use of their business names with the addition named, and thus save their property in the name. To a man starting a new business, these names are of no value.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

The value consists in the established business. I would suggest, at least, that all existing institutions be allowed to retain their business names on that condition, so as to save their properties.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think we can make any exception between existing companies and those that may be hereafter established. There is another point. Gentlemen have come here and pointed out that they did not wish the Act to go into effect until they had had an opportunity of using up their stationery, letter heads, &c. They did not wish it to appear that they had been driven to give up their name for fear it might awaken suspicions among the public as to their financial standing. Therefore, it is proposed that this Act go into operation on the 1st of October next.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I do not see what objection there can be to allowing men, who have transacted business under a certain name for many years, to retain it under the conditions proposed. It is quite a different thing with a man who establishes a new business, and who, knowing the law, will not adopt any name contrary to the Act.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think the proposition can be justified, because, if it is needed to use these names, the provision should be made applicable to every one in order to remove the difficulty.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am unable to see why the hon. Finance Minister should not accept the suggestion, if the public can be protected against any misapprehension as to the nature of the banking company they are dealing with. It is not necessary for an individual, or a company, to be incorporated in order to become a banking institution. There is great force in the objection raised by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Fairbank), that this clause is interfering with private rights. Certainly many institutions have grown up under a name that has become valuable to them, and if henceforth they appear before the public with the words "not incorporated" on their letters, the public are thereby warned with whom they are dealing. It is straining a point to say that a banking association shall not be allowed to call itself what it really is, simply because it has not secured a charter.

Mr. O'BRIEN. In the constituency I represent, all its banking business is done by a private individual, under the name of the "Muskoka Banking Company." By his intelligence and enterprise, that individual has built up his business, and it is wrong to compel him to give up that name; it implies a stigma upon him. There is no safety in the name itself, of course. An instance happened in the county where I live, where a man was carrying on banking in his own name and giving a high rate of interest. He finally failed, and involved hundreds of people in serious loss. I hope the suggestion will be adopted, that a man may not be compelled to give up the name under which he has done business in perfect good faith.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I must confess there is much less objection to the proposition that has just been made by several members than there was to the first motion. Of course, the real object is to protect the public from deception, and perhaps that may be done by banking firms stating to the public that they are not incorporated. But it must be general in its application.

Bill amended and reported.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills (from the Senate) were introduced, and severally read the first time:—

Bill (No. 90) to amend the Canada Civil Service Act 1882.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Bill (No. 91) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Superannuation of the Civil Service of Canada.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Bill (No. 92) to amend the Post Office Act of 1875.—(Mr. Carling.)

Bill (No. 93) respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY AND SEDUCTION.

The Order of the Day, for taking into consideration Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of Adultery, Seduction, &c., being read.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, the most essential provision of the Bill to provide for the punishment of adultery and seduction and like offences, was struck out in Committee of the Whole. A division was taken upon that motion; but of course, being in Committee, the ayes and nays were not recorded. I feel quite confident that the public will be curious to know what the sentiment of this House with regard to that matter is, and I would fain see that division recorded, so that the country may know what hon. members of this House favor a moral reform of this kind, and what hon. members are not in favor of it; and I shall take the step necessary, Sir, to convey that information to the public. I believe that the House, having had time to reconsider this question, many hon. members who recorded their votes for striking out the first clause, will, upon mature consideration, come to the conclusion that the essential portion of the Bill had better be preserved. We have just treated with a Bill which creates a new class of offences. This Bill was introduced by the hon. Minister of Finance, and it provides severe penalties for using a name, which, in my opinion, could properly be used, and which might mislead people to deposit money where that money would not be in as safe custody as if it were in the hands of a chartered bank. Well, Sir, I would ask the hon. gentleman if he considers it a greater offence to induce a man to deposit money, where it may possibly be lost, than to deprive a woman of her virtue, and lead a woman to ruin by using false pretences and making false promises. I believe, Sir, if that is an offence worthy of being dealt with as an offence, this other is infinitely more worthy of being so treated; the one is trivial compared with the other. No greater offence can be committed than that of seducing a female; and, Sir, I find, in the law, which is the foundation of all modern law—in the old Roman code—that the crime of seduction was dealt with with greater severity than is the case in any modern code. The punishment in the old Roman code for the defilement of the marriage bed was death; and the seduction of an innocent female, or a widow of virtuous character, led to the confiscation of one-half of the offender's estate if the man who perpetrated the crime was of honorable condition; and if of low condition, the punishment was corporal punishment and imprisonment. This law stood on the Statute-books for centuries in the old Roman code, which is the foundation of all modern law. There is under the old canon law of France a provision by which the seducer was compelled either to marry the female, or to settle on her a dowry. By the law of Prussia, the seducer is punished with imprisonment to-day; and, in France, it is the practice of the courts holding jurisdiction as Assize courts, to direct that a person guilty of seduction shall be compelled to settle an annuity on the victim. Having cited all the laws bearing on the fact that this offence is treated as a crime, I may also state that in nearly all the commonwealths to the south of us, this offence is treated as a crime. Under the old Roman code, in Prussia, and practically in France and other countries, great care is taken to protect female virtue, and enactments exist with regard to the rights of minors, affiliation, damages, &c. I believe, that having pointed out that the law exists in all these cases, and adding the additional information that, in England, a Joint Committee of the Lords and House of Commons have recommended that seduction be made a crime—and beyond doubt, it will be made a crime in England very soon—I believe, for all these reasons which I now place before the House, that this House cannot properly refuse to reenact this first clause. I am anxious, Sir, to see the Dominion of Canada have the honor of being the first British colony to take this step in the right direction with regard to this offence; and I move, Sir, that the consideration of this Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to add the following as the first clause:—

Any man who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned: Provided, in the case of an unmarried man, that subsequent marriage of the parties, or a bonâ fide offer of marriage on the part of the defendant, may be pleaded in bar of a conviction.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Surely the Government are not going to allow this motion to pass without making some observations upon it. The question is one of considerable importance, and it is amazing to see that the Government, who are responsible for legislation of this kind, in fact for all kinds of legislation, are about to allow to pass, without a single observation, a motion which proposes to refer the Bill back to Committee for the purpose of inserting the clause which was struck out before. I do not think that is the way in which a Bill of this kind should be treated. I do not speak now of the impropriety or the propriety in inserting the clause in question; but we surely have a right to expect that the Attorney General of the Dominion, or his representative in this House if there be such an individual, should express his views upon the subject, in order that members may be better able to form a judgment upon the propriety or impropriety of a clause of this kind. Yet, Sir, you were about to call for a vote and the Government are silent; they are dumb, they open not their mouths, and the House, as a whole, as well as their own followers, are utterly uninformed as to what course they intend to pursue with reference to this Bill. I suppose they will regard it as they have regarded nearly every other question—call it an open question, and one half the Government vote one way and the other half will vote the other way. The other evening, when this Bill was under discussion, the hon. the First Minister opposed this clause upon three grounds. First, because of the lamentable result which, according to his view, would follow its adoption—that lamentable result being the blackmailing of innocent men. His second argument was that this provision of the law was an innovation—a new principle in the laws of both England and Canada; and his third, and, from his point of view, the most important argument, was that such a clause would drive the young men out of the country. Now, as to the blackmailing argument, I do not see that it is sound or valid. If it were, we would not be able to make any changes in the Criminal Law, because every such law that we pass is liable to be abused, and there may be more or less blackmailing. It is known that we have now no Statute which makes this offence a criminal one, but there are numberless other offences against females which have become crystallized into Acts of Parliament. We have the crime of rape—forcible connection with a woman against her will—and everybody knows that the argument of the hon. First Minister would be stronger as applied to that crime, than to the one which the hon. gentleman proposes to create under this Bill. Yet we all know very well that that argument is not sufficient to induce Parliament to repeal the law with respect to that crime, or to prevent Parliament from making it a criminal offence in the first place. There is another crime on the Statute-book which illustrates the same thing. Every lawyer knows that having connection with a girl under ten years of age was, and I believe is yet, a capital felony. Now, we can conceive that in a case of that kind the parents of a child of such tender age might very readily suggest a charge against any individual for the express purpose of levying blackmail. But that consideration did not prevent the Legislature from treating it as a crime. A similar offence perpetrated against a girl between the age of ten and twelve years is a misdemeanor, but the fact that blackmailing might be practiced in such cases did not prevent the Legislature from making it a criminal offence. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they are prepared to strike out that clause merely upon the ground that there may occasionally be cases of blackmailing. I say that there is nothing in the argument which the hon. gentleman used for the purpose of defeating this clause, because, if there were, he could apply it to almost every one of our Criminal Laws. His next argument is that this is an innovation—a new principle in our laws. But that argument is also without reasonable foundation—if it did prevail there are scores of offences which would go unpunished altogether. If such a principle as that were to be observed no new offence could ever be added to the category of crimes. If we are to make no changes in our law, if we are not to gather wisdom from the passing years, if we are not to legislate to make new offences, the sooner we know it the better; but if we are to have that liberty, there is no reason why this offence should not be made a criminal offence. The fact that this is an innovation—that it has not hitherto been the law of this colony, is no reason why it should not be made the law now, if we think, in our judgment, that cases are arising every day in which it becomes necessary that the strong arm of the law should interfere for the punishment of the offenders. But I deny that this is a new principle in our law, or in the law of England. Everybody knows that having illicit connection with the first person in the realm is a capital felony; everybody knows that having illicit connection with the second female of the realm is made a capital felony. We know that a Commission was appointed by the Imperial Government to investigate and codify the Criminal Law, and that Commission recommended that Parliament should pass an Act providing that the seduction of a girl under twenty-one years of age, should be a misdemeanor, punishable by two years in prison with or without hard labor. The principle is one which is recognized in England and is recognized in Canada, and my hon. friend simply proposes by this Bill to carry it one step further. The English Statute to which I have referred is 24 and 25 Vic., chap. 100, section 49, which read as follows:—

“Whosoever shall, by false pretences, false representations, or other fraudulent means, procure any woman or girl under twenty-one, to have illicit carnal connection with any man, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereto shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor.”

That is the law of England to day. What is the clause which the hon. gentleman proposes to add? It is practically the very clause I have read, only he does not limit the operation of the clause to females under twenty-one years of age, and I take it that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred coming under his Bill they would be such cases as are specified in the English Act. My hon. friend's Bill provides that if a person under promise of marriage accomplishes his purpose, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to imprisonment. The English law is that if the same purpose is accomplished by fraud, or false pretences—not under promise of marriage, as in the Bill before the House—he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be imprisoned for two years, with or without hard labor. I say that this is practically the principle of my hon. friend's Bill. The offence is not made a criminal offence unless the defendant or prisoner accomplishes his purpose under promise of marriage, which he fails to keep—in other words, by misrepresentation or false representation, fraud or deceit, and therefore it comes within the class of case provided for by the English law. We have a Statute in Canada which was intended to be, but is not, a transcript of the English law. In 32 and 33 Vic., chap. 20, section 50, it is provided that:

“Whosoever, by false pretences, false representations, or other fraudulent means, procures any woman or girl under the age of twenty-one years, to have illicit carnal connection with any man other than the procurer, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to be imprisoned in any gaol or place of confinement, other than a penitentiary, for any term for less than three years, with or without hard labor.”

That is the law now, and my hon. friend's proposition is not an innovation. Surely, if a man is guilty of the offence covered by the English and Canadian Acts, and liable to be imprisoned for two years, because he is the instrument by whom some unfortunate female is made the victim of some third person's lust, there is no reason why the man who himself commits the offence should not be punished. The clause which my hon. friend proposes to add to the Bill practically provides that if a man by fraud accomplishes his purpose, he shall be guilty. The law as it now stands provides that if a man by fraud induces somebody else to commit the offence, he shall be guilty. Now, if it is a crime in the one case, it appears to me to be a greater crime in the other. The hon. gentleman's third ground of objection I shall say nothing about, except this—that if we are to lose the vigorous, healthy, active young men of this country, because they commit crimes of this kind, I say let them go. One regrets to see the large exodus from this country. That emigration I object to; but I think the class of men affected by this Bill, and who emigrate, are a class of men who leave their country for their country's good, and I do not think this clause should be rejected because some men might find themselves in the position of being convicted under it, and to escape conviction leave the country. It appears to me that there is no weight, no force, no logic, and no argument in any of the propositions the hon. gentleman lays down, and, therefore, I shall support my hon. friend's motion to go again into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). It is not extraordinary that I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. I hold that the arguments already adduced against the proposed provision are unanswerable. After thirty-five years' experience at the bar, I think I can say that in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred of seduction brought before the courts, the innocent female always blamed the man, and said the act was committed under a promise of marriage. This clause not only declares that a man who shall “seduce and have illicit connection with an unmarried female of previous chaste character shall be guilty of a misdemeanor,” but it holds out an inducement to disreputable women by providing that “in the case of an unmarried man, a subsequent marriage of the parties, or a bona fide offer of marriage on the part of the defendant, may be pleaded in bar of a conviction.” To the woman who is not sufficiently careful of her own virtue, this provision holds out a direct inducement to charge a man with having seduced her, because, in order to get out of it, he is obliged to make an offer of marriage or pay a sum of money. I submit that that is a most dangerous kind of legislation. Although this matter has only been before this House for two or three weeks, it was discussed very fully and very ably in the last Parliament by the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill. Yet we do not find that the public press have taken up his views to advocate them. On the contrary, when they have noticed the subject at all, I find that they do not agree with the hon. gentleman. I have before me a paper published in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, the Hamilton Times of the 16th March, which is edited by an able man, who understands, I suppose, how these things work in the country, and it says of this Bill :

"Mr. Charlton's Bill making seduction a crime punishable by fine or imprisonment has been passed through Committee with some amendment. Sir John Macdonald objected to one clause on the ground that it would be an encouragement to designing women, lost to shame, to compel men to marry them, or to extort blackmail. A marriage under compulsion would undoubtedly tend to misery. Sir John's objection on this head was, in our opinion, well taken. Nor should our law be such that a man is punished and a woman rewarded for crime in which both are participants. At present prosecutions for seduction are conducted, and damages are awarded, under a legal fiction, the parent or guardian being empowered to sue for loss of service. If damages are to be awarded at all, the law setting forth the ground of damage should be plain. The legal fiction should be abandoned. But we are not favorably inclined to the enactment of a law which relieves a woman from the guardianship of her own virtue by substituting a recompense for its loss. Parental training in the right path and the fear of the social consequences of indiscretion should do more to strengthen woman's refusal than dread of fine and imprisonment can do to prevent man's solicitation. Mr. Charlton's motives are excellent, but we doubt if he has selected the best remedy for the evil he desires to suppress."

I think there is wisdom in every word and line of that article, and I have seen nothing in the papers in the opposite direction. The hon. member for Huron speaks of the crime of rape. It is well known that any person making a charge of rape is obliged to surround her evidence with such circumstances as to satisfy the court and jury that she is telling the truth. Many a woman appears before a justice of the peace and charges a man with having committed a rape upon her; but when it is found that she made no great resistance, or, immediately after the act was committed, confided the fact to her parents or some of her friends, these circumstances very materially affect the truth of her evidence. The case cited by the hon. gentleman of a girl ten years of age is not a parallel case. It is incredible that a child under that age could suggest such a thing unless it took place; and I never heard of a father or mother making such a charge, for the sake of blackmail, as would bring their daughter's misfortune to light. This question was fully discussed when the matter was last before the House, and this motion should not be carried.

Mr. FOSTER. There may be some peculiar and occult reason why a matter like this should be discussed entirely by lawyers, but I think it is also a question for good common sense; and that is why, though not a lawyer and not able, therefore, to talk about the nice points which come up in the statutes, I feel I would not be doing my duty did I not say a few words on this subject. I am in favor of having the first clause added to the Bill, if possible, with the proviso struck out. I am not very much in favor of that proviso, but rather than lose the clause I would retain the proviso. I have listened attentively to all the arguments which have been brought up against this clause, and I confess now, as I did the other night, I have not heard any sufficient argument to make me vote against it. One argument used the other evening was this: that you cannot make men virtuous by Acts of Parliament. I apprehend the object of this Act is not to make men virtuous, but to punish those who are not virtuous—who are immoral in one of the worst ways in which a man can be immoral. While I am not in favor of passing a law which would say to a man: you must have virtuous thoughts or you shall be punished, I am in favor of passing laws that will allow a man to be punished who has not the fear of God before him. An hon. friend stated he did not think this clause would promote the cause of virtue or morality among women. That is a manlike, but not a very manly, argument. This is not to promote the cause of virtue and morality among women, but to keep down immorality amongst men. I say what I always believe to be true, and what I cannot help but believe to be true—that if men were as virtuous in the main as women are we should have much less of that class of crime to deplore, and much less reason for this clause. We must not, it is said, pass this law because somebody will be blackmailed. I appeal to lawyers of ten, twenty or thirty years standing to say what, in all the cases brought before them, has been the proportion of cases of successful blackmail. Can they point to one of a hundred in which an innocent person has come to grief in which the sham has not been exposed. That is the common sense view. It is my opinion, founded on observation, that in the long run, blackmail cases come to the ground and the innocent stand out clear. This clause ought to be enacted for three reasons. First as a new act of justice. A man persuades another that a certain kind of money is good and induces him to take it. You can put that man in the felon's cell, because he has defrauded his brother man of $50, $20 or $10. You take a man on the train who plays three-card monte, and though he does not do it without the connivance of the victim, yet, because it is a fraud, you punish him. But were a man under promise of marriage, one of the most sacred promises that can be given, robs a woman of her virtue, we are told we must not make that a criminal offence and punish him, for fear some poor fragile lord of creation may be blackmailed. As a matter of fair, even justice, this being one of the worst kinds of fraud, the man who commits it should be punished. There is another reason for leaving in this clause. That is because it will be a protection. I know, and we all know, there are men in this country who glory in this kind of thing. They are few, but still there are some. The only means by which you can deter a man like that is to hold up the loaded whip before his face and eyes. What does he care for public sentiment? He snaps his fingers at it. What does he care for damages? He has plenty of money, and a thousand dollars or so are nothing to him. We have, therefore, to resort to imprisonment and the felon's penalty as a deterrent for such class of men. For the protection of female virtue we ought to put a penalty against such persons. I read, the other day, of an actual occurrence in one of our Provinces within the last two months, which will serve as an illustration of the evil sought to be guarded against. A father has brought up his child, a young girl, who knows very little of the world, who was innocent. Some "oiled and cur'd Assyrian bull, smelling of musk and of insolence," comes down into the rural neighborhood, and by chance shines on the horizon of the innocent and guileless girl. He pays her attention, gets into her good graces, makes her believe he loves her, promises marriage, and under that promise robs her of her virtue. A few months pass. There is the dreary tale of abortion. A coffin is sent with the remains. Do you mean to tell me that that father ought not to have some weapon placed in his hand by which he could place such a villain as that into a felon's cell? I have one other simple consideration to adduce, and that is if we refuse to pass this clause we will put a premium on lawless acts in such a case as I have spoken of, because the sentiment of justice is in every man's heart; and the father or the brother who loves a daughter or a sister in that way feel that punishment should be given and justice should be done. He turns to the Statute book and finds nothing there. He then takes the revolver, and the bullet does its deadly work. We ought not to give a man any excuse for that; but the public laws of the country should give him an instrument by which he could protect the ones dear to him when they are threatened in this way.

House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CHARLTON moved to insert the following clause as section one of the Bill :—

Any man who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of misdemeanor and shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned; provided that in the case of an unmarried man a bonâ fide offer of marriage may be pleaded in bar of a conviction.

Mr. McCARTHY moved, in amendment, that after the word "provided" inclusive, be omitted.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Bill reported.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that the Bill be now taken into consideration.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria). When the Bill was under discussion the other day, I suggested that what was then the fourth clause, should be amended in this sense: that the corroborative evidence that is requisite in order to prove the offence, should be corroborative evidence applying to the whole offence. As the clause now stands, if the witness was corroborated on only one part of her testimony that would be held to be sufficient, and would open the door to very grave improprieties. I, therefore, move that the Bill be referred back to Committee with instructions to add these words at the end of the fourth clause, "proving the offence to have been committed."

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it would be a monstrous provision to enact that the evidence of the female should amount to nothing in these cases. The Bill provides that the evidence of the female shall be corroborated by other material evidence, and that the evidence of the defendant may be tendered and taken in his own behalf. To enact that the evidence of the female shall amount to nothing, and that the offence shall be proven without reference to her evidence, is simply to enact that the provisions of this Bill shall be inoperative.

Mr. BLAKE. I really think the meaning of this is hardly what my hon. friend who moved it supposes it to be—at least, it goes a great deal further than he stated to the House he wished. As I understand it, his object was to make it clear that the corroborative evidence should have regard to two particular circumstances, and not only one circumstance, which combined constitute the evidence, namely, the seduction, and the fact that it was under promise of marriage. What he proposes is, that there should be corroborative evidence proving the offence to have been committed, that is to say, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has remarked, that there should be evidence irrespective of the evidence of the female altogether, which was proof of everything.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). As the case now stands, it would be sufficient if there were corroboration in any part of the case which was material to the whole. I do not think it is desirable that the law should be so altered. I am quite prepared to accept the corroboration as stated by the hon. member for West Durham, that it should prove the entire offence, but if it does not cover all that constituted the offence under the indictment, the female's evidence should not be sufficient to secure a conviction.

Mr. CHARLTON. The case may be very properly left to the court, there is the law and there is the evident intention of the law. The evident intention of the law further is that the man accused shall have every safeguard thrown around him; his own evidence will be accepted and the evidence of the female must be corroborated, and let the court state what is the proper amount of corroborative evidence that should be furnished. There are a thousand circumstances which we cannot conceive here. We cannot define the measure of corroborative evidence that should be required, we can only state broadly that corroborative testimony must be furnished.

Mr. McCARTHY. This House should enact what they desire to be carried out, and not leave the matter to the courts. It might be reasonably urged that the proof of promise of marriage alone would be the corroboration intended by the fourth clause; but certainly that would not be reasonable. It may not have been that the offence committed was induced by promise of marriage. It may be that the parties were engaged and that afterwards, perhaps as much by one as the other, the offence was committed.

Mr. CHARLTON. Clause 5 provided that—

"The evidence of the complainant shall be admissible, but shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain a conviction unless the name is corroborated by other material evidence."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Would it not be better to allow the amendment to stand as a notice, so that hon. members might understand what they were voting on. This is a very important feature of the Bill, and we should have an opportunity of knowing the terms of the amendment. Having voted already on the question I should like to give the Bill full effect and not seek to destroy it by a side issue. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. IVES. The hon. member for Cardwell, who, I believe, voted with us in the last division, does not desire, I think, to place the Bill in such a position that it cannot be further considered this Session, and that practically would be the effect, if his motion were carried, because the Bill would go at the foot of Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would remain in the same position on the paper.

Mr. IVES. The Bill died from the same disease last year.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have no disposition whatever to defeat the Bill by a side wind; on the contrary I am anxious, as it has reached this stage, that the Bill should pass. But it is desirable that the House should have the terms of the amendment before it in order that it could vote intelligently.

Motion (Mr. White, Cardwell) agreed to; and debate adjourned.

FRAUD IN RELATION TO CONTRACTS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill reported.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 69) further to amend The Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: When I introduced this Bill, I explained to the House that my object was to impose on railway companies the duty of erecting fences, or rather of being liable for any damages arising through the non-erection of fences, whether they had received notice to provide fences from the adjoining proprietors or not. I may say, Sir, that my first inclination was to restore the condition of things which existed before 1868, and which still exist in the Province of Ontario; that railway companies should be required to erect and maintain fences, where they expropriate or take lands for the use of the railway, whether such notice as I have mentioned, was given or not, but when I considered the fact, that a great many railways pass through large tracts of land where the erection of fences is not necessary, I came to the conclusion that I would only ask the House to declare, that, in cases where damages occurred to adjoining proprietors through the non-erection of fences by railway companies, which had taken land there for the use of the railways, they should be liable for such damages as might have occurred. I need not point out to you, Sir, or to the House, the fact, that few of the owners of land expropriated or taken for railway purposes, are aware that it is necessary to give to the railway companies notice to erect fences; I know one or two cases—and perhaps there have been others—and one decision at all events in my own county, where in view of the fact that the proprietors had not given notice for the erection of fences, the railway company was held not to be liable for damages which occurred through the running of their trains. It seems to me it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to declare that railway companies should be relieved of what I conceive to be their plain and manifest duty when they take and expropriate lands through a settled country for the use of the company. It is their manifest duty to guard against cattle, horses and other animals straying upon their lines. The object of this Bill is to declare that, in cases where damages are sustained by adjoining proprietors, the railway company shall be held liable therefor.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does it not seem proper that, if the Government have a Bill to amend and consolidate the Railway Act under consideration, these small measures should be embraced in that Bill, instead of encumbering the Statute book with three or four Acts.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, we have adopted this rule, since the beginning of the Session, that such Bills should pass their second reading, and then be sent to the Railway Committee, where, if they relate to a matter, which the Government intend to include in their Bill they can be ordered to stand over or be withdrawn, their provisions being inserted in the Government measure. In this case, that course had better be adopted, as has been the case with two or three other Bills which have been before the House.

Bill read the second time.

PUNISHMENT OF WIFE-BEATING.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in the absence of Mr. Wood (Brockville), moved the second reading of Bill (No. 81) to amend the Criminal Law and to make special provision for the punishment of persons convicted of wife-beating. He said: This Bill is very short and simple; but it makes a very material difference with reference to the Criminal Law, its object being to make punishable by fine and imprisonment, persons guilty of wife-beating, the punishment being that of being whipped, and I suggest that it be read the second time, and referred to a Select Committee composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Tupper (Pictou), Davies, Wood (Brockville), Weldon, Cameron (Victoria, Ont.), Cameron (Huron), Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Amyot, Casgrain, and the mover.

Bill read the second time; and referred to Select Committee.

LEASES OR LICENSES TO FISH.

Mr. WELDON, in moving for a Return of leases or licenses to fish on rivers in the Provinces of New Brunswick, granted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and the annual rent received on each; the number of leases or licenses cancelled or surrendered, and showing up to what date the annual rents have been paid, said: This matter is one which at the present time is in a very unsatisfactory state. Under the Fisheries Act power was given to the Minister of Marine to grant licenses to fish where the exclusive right to fish did not exist by law before that time. Under that law and shortly after the Act was put in operation the Minister of Marine issued a number of licenses, assuming the right to lease the privilege of fishing in the various rivers of New Brunswick and Quebec, which rivers and portions of rivers were licensed to parties who paid an annual rental to the Government. Shortly thereafter disputes arose between the parties who held land along these rivers—which were of course above the tidal waters, not navigable streams. These disputes between the riparian proprietors and the lessees formally came before the Supreme Court of Canada, which decided that the leases were not tenable. The result has been that the lessees have been put to great trouble and expense, injunctions having in some cases been obtained from the Supreme Court of the Province, restraining them from fishing in these waters. An Order in Council was passed on the 14th day of June, 1879, which was no doubt intended to do away with the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court. It provided, in effect, that no person should exercise the right of fishing in these waters unless he obtained a license from the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Some of these parties, pending the decision of the whole question by the Supreme Court, applied to the Department of Marine and Fisheries for licenses, holding that while they enjoyed the rights as riparian proprietors to fish on their own lands, they were at the same time willing to comply with the regulations of the Department and take out licenses. In some cases parties were required to give information as to their title to their lands, and refusal to give this information was followed by a refusal of a license. Attempts were made to enforce the Order in Council in a very arbitrary manner, and though I do not blame the Minister I think the conduct of his subordinates should be censured. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick that the Order in Council is illegal; although the appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, that appeal I understand has not been pressed. The result has been, that in a few cases actions have been brought through which the Dominion Government has had to pay a sum of about $5,700, on account of the efforts of their Fishery Inspectors to enforce the order. The lessees were obliged to go on paying the rent—if not to May 1st, 1883, at least to May 1st, 1882. I think it is the duty of the Government to take steps in the direction of a satisfactory settlement of the whole question. The trouble appears to have been that these regulations were imposed not for the protection of the salmon fisheries, but merely for the purpose of obtaining revenue, and the result has been, I fear, in some cases the destruction of the salmon fisheries on some of the rivers.

Mr. McLELAN. I shall have great pleasure in bringing down the correspondence to which the motion refers. I may say without entering into details that I hope soon to prepare a scheme by which these fisheries will be properly protected.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Motion for the following return was agreed to:—

Return of number of Cadets that have graduated at the Royal Military College since its establishment; the number who have obtained commissions in the Imperial service; the number who have been appointed to the permanent militia corps; also, names of any officers appointed to "A" and "B" batteries of artillery since February 6th, 1880, who have not graduated at the Royal Military College, and of those appointed who graduated at the College.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5:45 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 21st March, 1883.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. ABBOTT moved that the time for the reception of the reports from the Committee on Private Bills, be extended to a period of four weeks from this date, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LORNE.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion, for the year ending 30th June, 1884; and, in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 1st March, 1883.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the said Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

TEMPORALITIES FUND OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CANADA IN CONNECTION WITH THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving that Bill (No. 30) to amend the Act of the Dominion of Canada, 45 Vic, chap. 124, respecting the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, be withdrawn, said: I explained, upon the second reading of the Bill, that the losses sustained by the fund had left the board unable to meet the charges upon it. The Bill introduced was designed to enable the board, by making deductions on certain classes of the payments called for, to meet their obligations. There were four classes of payments. There were the payments to the original beneficiaries who created the fund, and who are known as the original commutants. There were twenty-nine of these. There were, next, payments to those called privileged ministers, of whom there were nine, each receiving $400, and there were two retired ministers receiving the same sum. These constituted the second class of persons receiving payments. The third class of payments was an amount of $2,000 annually to Queen's College; and the fourth class was to those known as beneficiaries, ninety-two in number, each receiving $200 a year. The proposal of the framers of the Bill was to reduce the allowance to the beneficiaries 25 per cent., and the allowance to privileged ministers and retiring ministers 25 per cent. It was supposed that this proposal met with the approval of all those interested in the four different classes of payments. It was found, however, on the introduction of the Bill, that the proposal did not meet with universal approval. The privileged ministers claimed that their rights have been secured by the Synod in the order of seniority. They claimed that first of all the duty of the board was to preserve the rights of the original commutants and save sufficient capital to pay that class. Next to the beneficiaries came privileged ministers and the payment to Queen's College; and next retired ministers, seventy-five of whom were added at the time of the union. Delegates from the different bodies met here, and a conference was held last night. An attempt was made to reconcile differences of opinion and interests, in order that a Bill satisfactory to all might be introduced. We got so far as to obtain the consent of the gentlemen representing the commuting ministers, to allow the two retired ministers and three of the privileged ministers on the retired list to enjoy their full allowances; but they resisted any demand for the six remaining privileged ministers to receive their full allowances; and as it became evidently impossible to reconcile the differences of opinion, it was thought best that Parliament should not be called on to settle their differences, that there should not be an unseemly wrangle before the Private Bills Committee, but that the Bill should be withdrawn, in the hope that, in the course of twelve months, this matter, which imperatively calls for legislation, would be so arranged as to reconcile all differences of opinion, and secure the introduction of a Bill acceptable to all classes receiving payments from the fund. It is for this reason that I, as promoter of this Bill, ask to be permitted to withdraw it.

Bill withdrawn.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, at three o'clock p.m.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret the hon. gentleman has proposed so long an adjournment. I have always felt that the Easter adjournment, circumstanced as we are, should be made very brief indeed. Some hon. members are able to avail themselves of the Recess to go home; but a very considerable number are quite unable to avail themselves of the adjournment for that purpose, and to those therefore, the increased length of the Session has no corresponding advantage whatever. My own impression therefore, is, that the Easter adjournment should be for the shortest possible space of time. I make this observation with added force on this occasion, because we have arrived at a very advanced period of the Session, and the present condition of the public business is wholly unprecedented. The business is further behind than I recollect at any similar period during previous Sessions. Government measures of a debatable character are not at all advanced; the Estimates have only been brought down to-day, and this adjournment will cause the financial statement to be at least a week later. It is obvious, if the Session is to terminate in the ordinary time, we shall be required to pay very severely for the idle hours which we have been called upon to spend during the last six weeks, therefore there ought to have been a short adjournment, in order that we might, as early as possible, commence the serious business of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Speaker, the adjournment is for a little longer time than has usually been the custom. We have usually adjourned from Thursday until the following Tuesday, but there has been a strong expression of opinion, not on the floor of the House, but from a large section of the members, to the effect that, really on Thursday they felt they ought not to be called upon to sit; and then those who leave the city cannot get back here until Tuesday night, and it is quite obvious—Tuesday being a Government day—that it would be absurd to commence the discussion of any Government measure at eight o'clock in the evening; therefore we have postponed the assembling for business one day longer—until Wednesday at three o'clock, which is not losing any time under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think, Sir, the usual practice has been to take simply Friday and Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. And then, if I recollect rightly, we met on Monday evening at that; but we are now taking three additional days, I suppose, because we are so tired out with the last six weeks' work, and we must have a long rest.

Motion agreed to.

JAMES H. JACQUES.

Mr. IRVINE enquired, Whether James H. Jacques, of the Town of Woodstock, New Brunswick, has been appointed to any position in the Civil Service; and if so, what is the position to which he has been appointed, the duties of such position, the salary attached thereto, and the date of his appointment?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Speaker, James H. Jacques was appointed by Order in Council on the 27th of June, 1882, in the place of W. T. Drysdale, resigned, as preventive officer and clerk in Her Majesty's Customs at Woodstock, New Brunswick, and his duties are those of a clerk and preventive officer in the Customs service; salary, $500 per annum.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. IRVINE moved the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Weights and Measures Act of 1879, by providing that the weight equivalent to a bushel of the following articles should be those hereinafter set forth:—

Oats.....Thirty-two pounds.
Timothy seed.....Forty-five pounds.

He said: I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while I discuss a matter of considerable importance. When the Weights and Measures Act of 1879 was brought before the Parliament of that day, it was evidently given very little consideration, if I may judge from the report of the discussion which then took place on the propositions of the Government, as it appears in Hansard. I may state that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue of that day, Mr. Baby, when the Act was passing through the House, used these words:

"By the 18th section, heaped measures were prohibited. This was taken from the English Act now in force, which enacted that when a bushel was sold it should not be heaped. It would be, as said in French—mésure rasée, and would be a protection to the farmer."

I would infer from that remark that the custom heretofore was to heap the measure, and that the 18th clause of the Act declares that the measure should not be heaped. This is what the clause says:

"In using a Dominion measure of capacity, the same shall not be heaped, but either shall be stricken with a round stick or roller, straight and of the same diameter from end to end, or if the article sold cannot from its size or shape be conveniently stricken, shall be filled in all parts as nearly to the level of the brim as the size and shape of the article will admit."

The only voice raised in the Parliament of that day was that of Mr. Houde, who called the attention of the hon. Minister to the question in the following words:—

"Mr. Houde said that he would take the liberty of drawing the attention of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue to the fact that there were a good many farmers and traders who thought that it would be better to put the bushel of oats at 32 lbs. instead of 34 lbs."

The hon. Minister, in reply to Mr. Houde, said:

"Now as to the weights of different grains and vegetables, we would say that they had been in existence for the last twenty-five years. If the hon. gentleman would refer to the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, he would therein find the same provisions. When the hon. the ex-Minister of Public Works introduced this law a few years ago, no objection was then raised to the weight of grain and vegetables as then fixed by law. He could not, therefore, venture to meddle with them, at least for the present."

Seeing how little discussion took place at that time, I think it may not be out of place for me to give my opinion as a practical man, allowing, at the same time, any other hon. gentlemen to take the same way of ascertaining the truth of my statement as I adopted myself, namely, by actual knowledge and measurement. I say that when 48 lbs. was placed as the equivalent of a bushel of timothy seed, a mistake was made, because no bushel will hold more than 45 lbs. Then, as to oats, though that cereal varies very much if we take the quality ordinarily raised in the country, 34 lbs. cannot be put into the ordinary Winchester bushel, which is the standard we use as well as the Americans. In the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota, Illinois, and several other States, 32 lbs. of oats is made the equivalent of a bushel measure; but in the Parliament of Canada, with very little consideration or discussion, it was declared that 34 lbs. is the proper equivalent. I say the bulk of the testimony in the States bordering on our country is in favor of the 32 lbs. standard, and it rests with those who declare to the contrary to show why our standards should differ from the one so generally adopted by the Americans. I call upon the lumbermen of Ontario and New Brunswick, to state why they should ask the farmers of those Provinces to give them 34 lbs. in every bushel of oats, while the Americans are satisfied with 32 lbs. And I call upon the millers of Canada to give a reason for the difference. Perhaps we have not far to look for the reason. The reason given by our people is, that very few of the laboring class, or the farmers, ever enter the Canadian Parliament, and that while they have men who claim to represent the poor, in reality there are few or none of their own class to stand up for the rights of laboring men, of whom I am one myself, and for whom I have a great respect. In the United States, this matter is one which is settled by the State Legislatures; and it is not uncommon for laboring men and farmers to have seats in these Legislatures, where they can protect their own interests. As the matter is one which has never been brought up before, I do not think I need apologise very much for taking the part of my brethren. The first reason for which I ask this change to be made is, that it is a matter of right and justice; and the second is, that it is a matter of convenience. When we take up our newspapers to read the prices in New York or Boston, we should know that the bushel means exactly the same quantity in both countries, so that we could make comparisons between them. I am a practical farmer and laboring man myself, and I am proud of the fact; but personally I do not care what the standard is, because, like many other farmers, I do not raise grain to sell. I turn it into pork, butter, cheese, or horses, so that I buy far more grain than I sell. I appeal to this House on behalf of the poor farmer, who has no capital to purchase stock, and who cannot wait for years for a return from his crops, but who is obliged to sell his grain the moment he gets it out of the ground. I maintain that such men have not that representation or consideration in this House that they should have. In their interest, this Parliament should take into consideration this simple question: why the Canadian farmer is required to give 34 lbs. to the bushel, while Americans are willing to do with 32 lbs.? It appears, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that we export 4,000,000 bushels of grain per annum, 2,000,000 bushels or more of which go to the United States; and I think that is a strong reason why the measures in the two countries should be uniform. I thank the House for the attention it has given me.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This motion, as I understand it, applies only to two articles, oats and timothy seed. By the Act passed in 1879, the weight of a bushel of oats is fixed at 34 lbs., and that of a bushel of timothy seed, I think, at 48 lbs. The hon. member says that that law was passed without much consideration by Parliament, because there was very little debate, and he thinks it should now be amended. For my part, I think it will require some stronger arguments than the hon. gentleman has used to show any necessity for altering the law. This is the first time since 1879 that I have heard of any dissatisfaction existing in the country with regard to these two measures. It is very well for the hon. member to pose here as the special representative of the poor man; but I think his argument is a little inconsistent. If he is really serious, and wishes to do the poor man a service, I think it must be some consolation to him to know that if the farmer who has to sell his grain gives two pounds more than he ought, the poor man who has to buy gets two pounds more. The hon. gentleman cannot argue in both ways; he must take one side or the other. If he argues in the interest of the farmers, he must show that they have been injured by this Act; but up to the present time no indication has been given that any dissatisfaction exists; no petition has been presented to this House, no complaint has been made to my Department, or to the Government. Therefore, I think the proposition of the hon. gentleman to amend the law is hardly justifiable.

Mr. PICKARD. As the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Irvine) called upon the lumbermen to speak now, and give the reasons why they exact 34 lbs. to the bushel, I wish to say that I bought several thousand bushels of oats from the hon. member's county this winter, and I never exacted 34 lbs. to the bushel, but bought them by the 100—three bushels to the 100. When I buy 4,000 pounds I know that I get 120 bushels—that any boy can calculate by multiplying by three; but it would not be quite so easy to divide the 4,000 lbs. by thirty-two. I never heard of a farmer in his county making any complaint.

Mr. POPE. I have had something to do with oats as a lumberman, and I have also had something to do with raising them; and I also had something to do with the law as it stands, before the remarks the hon. gentleman has read from Hansard were at all applicable to it. Every single item in this Bill was discussed here very fully, not in 1879, because the Bill of that year was only for consolidating the laws, it being understood that they were right and just laws. The hon. gentleman claims to be the defender of the poor man. What in the world has the poor man to do with this question? If he sells a bushels of oats that weighs 32 lbs., he gets the value of 32 lbs. for it; while if he sells a bushel of oats that weighs 34 lbs., he gets the value of that amount. It is nonsense to say that this question has not been fully and fairly discussed in this House. There have been other farmers here besides the hon. member. The people are accustomed to the present measures, and it is difficult for me to understand why the hon. gentleman wants to change that which is the custom of the country, and which the people are fully acquainted with. I do not see the slightest reason for changing the law.

Mr. IRVINE. I have no doubt this motion will be lost, but something may be lost and found again. I was very sorry that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue raised such a childish question as his distinction between the farmer and laboring man. When I used the latter term I did so with reference to farmers alone, to distinguish between rich and poor farmers. The former do not depend on the sale of their grain, for they purchase more than they raise and use it in stock raising; but the poor farmer, not having his farm well stocked, must sell his grain, and if he is not properly called a laboring man I do not know what he is.

Mr. PICKARD. It would be better if the hon. member from Carleton would cast his oats to the wind, then he would have no trouble in getting 34 lbs. in the bushel.

Mr. TAYLOR. So far as I am concerned, I have never heard a complaint from any of the farmers on this subject. If a change were made it should be an absolute one, prescribing a uniform standard throughout the Dominion. In Ontario, a bushel of peas weighs 60 lbs.; in Montreal it must weigh 66 lbs. A bushel of oats in Ontario weighs 34 lbs., in Montreal 32 lbs. Why my hon. friend should propose the change he does I cannot understand. I hear of no complaints, and I buy all kinds of grain by the standard in use in Ontario. I have bought oats 40 lbs. to the bushel, and barley 53 lbs. to the bushel, but have paid according to the weight. If any change be proposed, it should be that grain be purchased by the 100 lbs. Every year I buy 200,000 or 300,000 bushels of grain, and have never heard any complaint either from farmers or merchants.

Mr. SPROULE. Having been connected for some years past with a large number of Agricultural Societies, I have frequently had occasion to see grain weighed and measured. In Ontario good oats will weigh 36 lbs. to the bushel. I do not wonder that the Americans should adopt a standard of 32 lbs., because when the western oats come in they scarcely ever weigh over 32 lbs. to the bushel, Canadian oats will weigh 35 lbs. per bushel. If the grain has come to proper maturity and is well filled, it will keep pretty close to the present standard, and I see no injustice in retaining it.

Motion negatived.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. BEATY, in moving that a Message be sent to the Senate requesting their Honors to unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee for the purpose of revising the Rules relating to the duties of the Committee of Standing Orders in each House, and specially whether one Joint Committee of both Houses should not be named to do the work of the said Committee for both Houses; and also, informing their Honors that Messrs. Daly, Casgrain, Gunn, Dawson and the mover, will act as members of such Committee on the part of this House, said: The suggestion was made to the Committee whether the present notice requiring two months is not too long, causing unnecessary and great expense to parties seeking legislation, and whether the time could not be limited, say to one month. Some went even further, and questioned whether only one publication should not be made in the Official Gazette, with regard to Private Bills, as this ought to be only a matter of record, not being generally read, as the literature of the Gazette is not of that attractive character which commands persual generally throughout the country, while more strictness should be required with reference to publication in the local papers. It was also urged that the time within which petitions for Private Bills should be presented to the House should be limited to twenty days, and the presentation of Bills to thirty days; and that these times should be fixed periods, not to be departed from unless with the sanction, or under the direction, of the House, and not by the Committee. The appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses was thought to be very important, for the purpose of passing on the preliminary notices, and the Bills in the first instance, as the double work of the two Committees was quite unnecessary. These matters were not merely informally discussed or talked of, but suggested. The idea was, that we should appoint a Committee to meet a Committee of the Senate on the subject. The object is also to bring under the consideration of the Joint Committee the question whether our Joint Committee for both Houses should not take these preliminary notices into consideration and determine them without having two Committees to hear the evidence on Private Bills which are introduced into this House. The Senate Committee have already suggested the names, and, I believe the Senate has also appointed a Committee for the purpose of meeting a Committee of this House, the object generally being to reduce the length of time for which notices are required for Private Bills, and reduce the expense. The facilities for communication through the country are so great that it is thought unnecessary to continue a special publication of this kind for two months; and that it would be more advantageous to parties interested in Private Bills to adhere strictly to the notices in local papers.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see any serious objection to the appointment of the Committee, but I do see objection to the general line which the hon. gentleman has chalked out as to the mode of dealing with the periods during which Private Bills may be presented. I agree that the time might be shorter. My own idea would be to provide minimum time before the Session of Parliament commences. I believe at the present time it is two months, but I think my hon. friend from Hochelaga, the other day, said that the difficulty was that the Gazette summoning Parliament for the despatch of business, is issued within a shorter period than two months from the date of summons, and therefore, if those who were interested in Private Bills waited for that particular Gazette to give notice, of course, they could not present their Bills for a considerable time after the commencement of the Session. I do not think that is a very good excuse, because we know, as a rule, when Parliament is to meet, and it is quite competent for those who are promoting Bills, to give their notice in November or October if they like, instead of waiting for that particular Gazette. Still, I do think we would expedite the presentation of Bills if we made the regular period to be counted from the day on which Parliament met for the despatch of business; and if instead of saying two months from the period at which the petition is presented, we said one month or five weeks from the meeting of Parliament, that would obviate the necessity of this prolongation the hon. gentleman refers to. What is the reason why those who want Private Bill legislation in this House cannot follow our Rules, and have their petitions presented within ten days from the opening of the Session? There is no reason in the vast bulk of cases. In any exceptional case in which the emergency has arisen, we have always readily opened the door and allowed any petitioner to show us why he did not come in earlier. But the vast bulk of these cases are either Bills for the incorporation of companies, or Bills for the amendment of charters, the causes of which, or the views that lead to which, have arisen in ample time for the promoters to give notice within the regular period, and to have their Bills ready. Now, we provide that there should be sent in a draft of a Bill with the cost of printing, in order that they may be printed before we come here at all, and that we may be ready at once to go on with that Bill. We know that that is not done. We know that our laxity results in those Bills not being prepared, and they are hurriedly prepared here, frequently by members of Parliament who are called upon to discharge these extraneous duties which do not properly devolve upon them. I say, then, that it would be a very unfortunate thing if we were now to declare that the time for the presentation of petitions for Private Bills should be enlarged to twenty days. On the contrary, let us shorten the period, but let us prescribe that that shortened period should be given so long before the Session as that the petition may be presented within a very short delay after the opening of the Session. Look at your Bills Committee as it stands to-day. Look at the Order paper of the Railway Committee. I do not know how many there are, but there are two disposed of, and I suppose there are thirty or forty more to be disposed of in the stress and strain of the Session which is now coming on. There are heavy orders before the Banking Committee, and before the Private Bills Committee, and, to-day, we have passed a resolution extending the time for the reception of the reports of Committees, four weeks, so that the bulk of the reports will be coming in three or four weeks from this time. How much consideration will be given to them after that period arrives? An hon. member has more than once said that it is the bad Bills that come late. It is true that these objectionable Bills come in late, and there is this reason why they should come in late: early in the Session the Bills Committee have begun to scrutinize the legislation and to get it into some sort of shape. We spend two hours in the beginning of the Session on a Private Bill, whereas towards the end of the Session the practice is to run these Bills through in ten minutes. There may be a discussion about the preamble, but once that question is settled all the details of the Bill, towards the latter end of the Session, are hurried through rapidly without our having given it sufficient attention. A man may come up next Session and show us a clause in a Bill that looks very objectionable, and he will quote that very clause as a precedent for a precisely similar clause in another Bill. We then find that the first Bill was hurried through Committee without consideration, and that precedent is invoked for further objectionable legislation. I do hope that it will be one of the objects of this Joint Committee to insure, by extreme rigidity, to be departed from only upon special ground and excuse, that this cardinal rule shall be adhered to which provides that petitions for Private Bills and the Bills themselves should be got before us at the earliest practical moment after the Session commences.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend, if there has been any report on this subject from the Committee on Standing Orders?

Mr. BEATY. The Committee, instead of making a report, suggest that the motion should be made in this way. They simply suggest the names of persons to go on the Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham, as to the necessity of our standing by our rules more strictly than we have hitherto done. He has always made most praiseworthy efforts in this direction, and has been trying to bring on the Private Bills business of Parliament at the time when we can give it proper consideration. For some reason or other we have failed in attaining the object which was attempted by the alteration of the rules. The truth of the matter is this: that the great cause of delay is simply the laziness and inattention of the solicitors of the various incorporated companies who are employed by the promoters of private bills to bring them before Parliament. They are too lazy, or too procrastinating rather, to have those measures prepared within the regular period. They trust to the good nature of Parliament to enlarge the time for consideration of petitions and for the presentation of Private Bills, and the consequence is that which the hon. gentleman stated. Bills which require careful consideration and which invite distrust are purposely delayed, I fear, by the promoters, and when I use the word "promoters," I do not mean the members introducing the Bills, or having charge of them, but parties outside, whose interests are concerned in having the Bills become law. Those promoters, I say, I fear frequently retard the Bills, and allow them to lag in the House in order to be rushed through at the end of the Session, when the House, after being exhausted in discussing public matters, is unwilling to be delayed by the consideration of Private Bills. I do not know a remedy for that evil, except a firm resolution on the part of the House to resist any such attempt. As the hon. gentleman has truly said, when an exceptional case arises, when there is a sudden call for the passage of a Private Bill, when it can be explained to the House that the ordinary notice could not be given, that the regular period of publication could not be had, the House is always most favorable, indeed too favorable, in considering such exceptional cases. Everybody knows that Parliament will always meet at the end of January or beginning of February, and every one knows perfectly well when notice should be published both in the Gazette and local newspapers, and when that is not done the parties are to blame and they really should be punished. We might have been discussing all the Private Bill legislation during the last four or five weeks; if the Bills had been printed and in the hands of members they might have been considered and passed, and the House would have been profitably employed in considering those measures. I rather dislike the form in which the motion has been drawn, inasmuch as it begs the question. It sets out "That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting their Honors to unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee for the purpose of revising the Rules relating to the duties of the Committee on Standing Orders in this House." But the House has not yet come to the conclusion that the Rules require revision. In the first place an expression of opinion must be received to that effect. They have been formally settled after most careful consideration. There was a special Committee of which I was a member, and of which the hon. member for West Durham was a member, on the subject, and the Rules as revised are not in full force. Then, with all due respect to the Committee named by the mover, to revise the Rules, I think the hon. gentleman ought to reconsider the names. They ought to be composed of members possessing great Parliamentary experience, and those who have paid attention to the construction of the Rules of the House, and the principles on which they have been framed, and to such only should be committed the power of dealing with a subject of this kind. After a report from the Joint Committee has been presented, it will be very difficult for the House to express an opinion at variance with the Committee's conclusions. For these reasons, I would suggest to the hon. member that we should allow the debate to be adjourned for the purpose of allowing him an opportunity to remodel the resolution.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

TIMBER OF INDIAN LANDS IN ONTARIO.

Mr. McNEILL, in moving for a return of all documents and correspondence relating to the granting of licenses to cut timber, whether pine or any other description of timber whatever, on Indian Lands, within the Province of Ontario, from 1875 up to the present time, said: In making this motion, I venture to claim, for a few minutes, the indulgence of the House while I offer one or two observations explanatory of the reasons which have induced me to ask for these papers. I am sure in doing so I will meet with the indulgence of hon. members, for I have already experienced great kindness at their hands. The circumstances to which I wish to draw their attention are circumstances of great importance, not only to a considerable number of my own constituents, but to all settlers upon Indian lands throughout this Province, upon which large timber licenses prevail. I have said that this measure is of great importance to settlers, and it is of special importance to many of my own constituents; and the remarks I am about to make will be confined to those matters which affect my own constituents. It is a matter of so much importance that it really amounts to this—whether many of those people are to support themselves in comparative comfort, or whether they are, on the contrary, to be subjected to a long struggle with poverty of a very oppressive description. The circumstances connected with this matter are somewhat remarkable. I may say with regard to settlers on the Saugeen Peninsula, which I have the honor to represent in this House, that they have the misfortune to be very poor people, and I think that is a reason which only makes it more appropriate that their interests should be considered by this House, and by a Government which, in the policy it has adopted, has done so much to benefit the poor man in this country. The lands of these people are, unfortunately, of a very poor description in some parts; they are of a very variable character, and the land there is in its quality very dissimilar. In some parts of a lot you will find very good land, and in other parts of the same lot, land which is valuable only for the lumber which grows upon it. Owing to this circumstance my predecessor (Mr. Sproat) called the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that these lands had been in the first instance valued too highly, and requested him to take into consideration the circumstances of these poor people, and have a revaluation made; and in accordance with that recommendation the right hon. gentleman did take the matter into consideration and ordered a revaluation of the lands to be made by a gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with the state of that country, and was thoroughly competent to carry out that revaluation. This revaluation was made; but unfortunately no steps could be taken to put it in force, as the Government of the right hon. gentleman was defeated, and the Government of the hon. member for East York took its place. I say "unfortunately," Mr. Speaker, because it was most certainly unfortunate for my constituents. When the Government of the hon. member for East York came into power, Mr. Gillies, who recently represented North Bruce, in this House, experienced, I understand, a good deal of trouble in inducing that Government to carry out this policy. I think I may say so, as I have heard him state so on the public platform, and take a great deal of credit to himself for the hard work he had been obliged to undergo in order to induce hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out the policy of the right hon. gentleman, and reduce the price of the lands of these poor settlers in the Saugeen Peninsula. However, Sir, eventually, and I think this was in 1875, Mr. Gillies succeeded in inducing that Government to carry out that policy, and the price of these lands in the Saugeen Peninsula was reduced. A number of the settlers there were then in great hopes that now a good time was in store for them, but, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately they were woefully mistaken. If any hon. gentleman, who has had experience in farming matters, has been kind enough to follow me in the observations which I have made, he will understand that it was of the greatest possible importance—that, in fact, it was a matter of vital importance to these poor people—that they should be allowed the privilege of cutting the timber on their lands. Poor men—very poor men—who enter upon bush lots, are obliged, in the first instance, for the first years of their occupation, to look very largely to the timber growing on their lots for their support. It is by the sale of this timber that they are enabled to support their families in great measure, nay, almost entirely. It is by the sale of the timber that they are enabled to provide themselves with flour, and to pay their store bills, small as these are generally, to provide themselves with oxen to work their lands, or to pay for the oxen which they have obtained on credit, or to pay for the oxen which they have not obtained at all; for, Sir, it is too true, that many of these poor people have gone into that country unprovided with oxen and unprovided with horses, and have by labor in the logging fallow, which it is absolutely painful to contemplate, endeavored to keep over their heads a house, and secure food for their families. Well, Sir, prior to the accession to power of hon. gentlemen opposite, these settlers in the Saugeen Peninsula had the right to cut and sell the timber upon their lots; and as I have said, this right was of vital importance to them. One of the complaints which they made at that time, was that the dues which they were obliged to pay to the Department were too high. These dues were charges or tolls on their timber; and these tolls or dues were paid into the Department, and the settlers were credited with that amount by the Department, these dues ceasing to be payable when the patents for their lots were issued. Well, Sir, I ought to have said that there existed over the Saugeen Peninsula at this time, or over a great part of it, a license to cut timber. It was a license granted to Cook & Company, but it lapsed, however, upon lots which were taken up for actual settlement. If I have made myself clear, it will be seen, that in 1875, when the policy of the right hon. gentleman had been carried out, and when the value of these lands had been reduced, the settlers were very much benefited. This policy was further carried out in this respect—that fifteen acres of each lot were reserved to the settler, upon which he could cut timber without having to pay any of these dues at all. Therefore you will perceive that at this time the position of the settlers in the Saugeen Peninsula, had been very much improved; but, Sir, a most extraordinary circumstance occurred soon afterwards. In 1877, this circumstance happened. In that year, an Order in Council was passed, which permitted lumbermen to come upon the lands of actual settlers, for three years after they had entered into possession, and to cut down timber upon them—and the most valuable part of the timber, the pine, before the very eyes of the settlers, and to carry it off. In this way, if I have made myself clear, was taken away the principal means, by which the settler could support himself and his family during the first years of his occupation. This enabled the lumbermen, for three years after the settlers came into possession and entered upon their lots, to carry off, in fact, their means of subsistence. I have heard, since I took my seat here, remarks made about the poor man. This was, however, legislation for the poor man with a vengeance. We have heard wonderful diatribes from the hon. gentlemen opposite, as to the amount of interest which they took in the poor man. They have constituted themselves into apostles, so to speak, or a sort of charitable-political-poor-man's indignation society; and we have had wonderful pictures portrayed of the policy of the right hon. gentleman, and of his cruelty to the poor man, who was almost perishing of cold, and was deprived of his food and clothing by the policy of the right hon. gentleman. Well, Sir, this is the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they obtained the reins of power, legislated for the poor man. That was the theory with regard to the poor man, but it was a theory which certainly does not seem to have been put in practice in this case. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are generally regarded—on our side of the House, at least—as being theoretical rather than practical politicians, and so far as the people in the Saugeen Peninsula are concerned, they have found that out to their cost. It may be asked, and very naturally asked, how did it come about that such an extraordinary enactment as this should be put in force by hon. gentlemen opposite. The answer to this question is really the most extraordinary part of this extraordinary story. If I am not misinformed, there has been a Streams Bill introduced in the Provincial Legislature of Ontario. Most of us on this side of the House have heard of such a measure; and we know that it was introduced simply for the public good. We know that it was introduced simply for the purpose of preventing a lumberman from carrying on his operations in such a manner as would interfere with the public weal. We know, too, that it was not introduced at all for the benefit of any political supporter of that Government; and we know that one of the items in the political creed of hon. gentlemen opposite is, that they should not follow too closely in the wake of the Provincial Government—that they should not by any means hunt in couples with that Government; and it may be that the reason hon. gentlemen opposite introduced the extraordinary provision to which I have referred was just to show their perfect independence of that Government, and proceeded in this matter on a principle diametrically opposite to that, which, as they alleged, actuated Mr. Mowat in passing the Streams Bill. It would be a very strange thing if it were to prove that this measure was introduced at the instance of a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite then sitting in this House, for the benefit of a friend of hon. gentlemen out of doors; and unless I am misinformed such will prove to be the fact when these papers are brought down. If I am not much misinformed it will be found that this measure was introduced at the instance of an hon. gentleman, a supporter of the Government of the hon. member for East York, in favor of a lumbering firm in Manitoulin. At all events, we shall see when the papers come down. I am informed that it was proposed in a letter of April, 1877, and was carried out by Order in Council in November of that year. I know, at any rate, that my constituents are groaning under the affliction at the present time. There was a flimsy plea and flimsy excuse, as I understand, put forward for the passing of this Order in Council, and it was that by the passing of such a measure a larger amount of funds would be received by the Indian Department for the benefit of the Indians. I say that was a flimsy excuse and a flimsy plea, for it is quite evident that such an enactment as that would have the effect of preventing settlement upon those lands. It has had that effect in the Saugeen Peninsula, and would also have the effect of preventing settlers who did so upon those lands from paying for their lots, because they would be unable to sell the timber. If it was desirable that additional tolls should be paid for the timber upon such lands, then, I say, that upon such lands as were sufficiently valuable to excuse that imposition, the settler should be the person allowed to cut the timber, and that the lumberman should not be allowed to come forward and carry off his means of subsistence. So far as the Saugeen Peninsula was concerned, such a provision would have been most unjust and would simply have taken away what those poor men ought to have had, but would have been princely generosity as compared with the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. In conclusion I would just say that these lumbermen, not content with this additional privilege, for which they paid nothing at all—this privilege of being permitted to cut timber for three years on the lands of the settlers—claimed to be allowed to cut, not only the pine but the cedar which grew on those lots. The right hon. gentleman has stepped in for the benefit of the settler and has, I am glad to say, put an end to that pretension, and I hope he will see his way, as I understand he does, to put an end to this most cruel and oppressive enactment altogether. These men who are settling in the Saugeen Peninsula, and the men who wish to settle on our Indian Lands throughout the Province are people of our own. They are inhabitants of the Province of Ontario, and they do not want to be driven out of this Province either to the North-West or to the United States. I think they have the first claim upon these lands. They are better able to take advantage of them and turn them to the best account than settlers would be coming from the Mother Country, or from the continent of Europe, who know nothing whatever about bush work. Therefore, I say, I sincerely hope the right hon. gentleman will endeavor, as soon as possible, to give these poor people the full use and advantage of those lands to which they are really the natural heirs. Before sitting down, I wish to say that I would like to amend the motion by inserting after the word "from" the word "January;" and I would also like to ask, in addition to the correspondence, for the Orders in Council.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If there are Orders in Council, they can be got by an Address instead of by an Order of the House. The Clerk will alter the motion accordingly. I do not at all object to bringing down these papers and informing the House how far the wrongs mentioned by the hon. gentleman in his very clear and able speech, have been inflicted on these people, and how they can be remedied. Of course, until these papers come down it will be more than useless to discuss whether the policy has been wrong, and if so, how far it can be remedied and the settlers in the Saugeen district relieved from the injustice of which the hon. gentleman complains so strongly. It is no part of my duty, at present at all events, to impugn the policy or the actions of the Government in 1874 or 1875, with respect to the licenses which have been issued for the cutting of timber on lands sold to settlers. The land is very poor in many places, but exceedingly valuable for its timber, and, all things being equal, the settlers would have the first right to the timber. A deputation from the settlers of the Saugeen district came down some time ago, and I think the conclusion came to was, that the licenses should extend only to pine, and that spruce, cedar, and other woods, should fairly belong to the settlers. Some of the licenses varied in their terms from others, but as a rule the privilege conferred by the licenses was to cut merchantable pine. This matter is now before the Government, having been brought before my Department by the hon. gentleman. I cannot go quite so far as my hon. friend, in saying that the Government have made up their minds that these licenses should be revoked. That is a matter which has to be very gravely considered. While every protection should be given to the settlers on these different lands, still the vested rights of parties who have licenses and who have invested considerable sums of money in getting out timber and bringing it to market, must be fairly considered and protected. The matter is now engaging my attention, and I hope in a few days to be able to come to some conclusion, which, perhaps, may be sent down to the House, together with the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved. I wish to be distinctly understood as expressing no opinion, either adverse to the licenses, or to the claims set up so forcibly by my hon. friend on the part of the settlers.

Mr. DAWSON. There is a large extent of Indian land in the district that I have the honor to represent, the District of Algoma, and the settlers there feel the same hardship that my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeil), has spoken of, that the wood is being taken from their very doors. I know of other cases in which pretended settlers buy large tracts of land, not Indian land, solely with the view of cutting the timber, which is unfair both to the lumberman who holds a license, and to the honest settlers. But in the case of the Indian lands, which are comparatively small in extent, the lumbermen go to the settlers doors, and cut not only pine, but cedar and hardwood. Licenses are given even for cutting cordwood on the Island of Manitoulin. These things are felt to be great hardships, and I think some change should be made by which the wood would be left to the settler, who, I feel confident, would be willing to pay a little more for his land in order to be so protected. His wood gives him employment in the winter, and enables him to have something to sell, and I think, considering all the hardships and privations which he has to put up with in that new country, he should be allowed to have his timber. There is no doubt that it has been an advantage to him to get his land at a low price. Much of the land in Manitoulin Island, which was purchased at 50 cents an acre, is now worth $50 an acre, owing to the exertions of the settlers. In other parts of Algoma, beyond the range of the Indian lands, the Ontario Government reserves all the pine, but no other timber, and even that provision is felt to be a hardship. The timber is being rapidly cut down on the vast tracts of timber land in the district of Algoma. Giving the Government of Ontario credit for all its expenditures on colonization roads and otherwise, and charging them with all the timber cut, there would be a balance of some $1,150,000 left from dues collected from that vast region. Why does the present Government of Ontario want the great disputed territory? Simply that it may sweep off the forests, which, it claims, contain $120,000,000 worth of wood. I have always held to the principle that the natural resources of these wild districts are the just inheritance of the people who go to settle in them, and I say that any policy that would derive a revenue from the timber that grows in the disputed territory, and spend that revenue elsewhere, would be a false and bad policy. The true policy is to spend the proceeds from timber in the district where it is cut, so as to provide for its wants in the future. I have much pleasure in seconding my hon. friend's motion.

Mr. ALLEN. There are no settlements in the Dominion which require more sympathy than those referred to by my hon. friend from North Bruce. These lands, the most miserable in our western country, were sold at an unfortunate time for the settlers—immediately after the Russian war, when the prices of lands were inflated. The people did not know what they were purchasing, and I know instances of settlers buying lands at $4, $6 and $7 per acre, which to-day are not worth 50 cts. per acre. I believe the Government acted very wisely in charging stumpage or a duty of $2 per 1,000 feet, and applying the amount towards the liquidation of these purchases, in many cases, farmers having received the full payment of their lands through these dues. If these dues had not been collected, lumbermen would have purchased the lands and taken the timber, and in the end have had the lands for less than they paid in stumpage dues. I do not wish to say anything against either side of this House, but, I hope sincerely the Government will take into consideration the position of these unfortunate settlers, and relieve them of their difficulties. They are in debt without the means to pay it. As regards the quality of their lands, a man might walk 500 yards over some farms and not touch anything but rocks. I hope the Government will make arrangements by which the settlers will be relieved of their indebtedness on these unfortunate lands—both the price and the interest.

Mr. McCALLUM. I have received some letters from the County of Bruce, with reference to this subject. I would say that though lumbermen may be very desirable citizens, settlers are of still greater consequence to us. What the latter complain of is, that when they settle on a lot of land, the lumbermen may come in, take away the timber, pull down their fences and destroy their crops, and nothing can be done to them. I have the honor to support a Government, which I believe will not continue a policy under which a lumberman may obtain a license to cut for three years all the timber on a settler's lot. When I was informed of this abuse, I really could not believe it. I am sure it is the intention of the Government to treat all the settlers fairly, and will remove the present grievances. The sooner this Order in Council is annulled the better. We are expending a large amount to bring emigrants into this country, and it is necessary we should endeavor to retain those we have here.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONS ENTERING MANITOBA BY RAIL.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of the number of persons entering Manitoba by rail during each month of the last calendar year; and of the number of persons leaving Manitoba by rail during each such month; also, for all correspondence, reports, data and statements on which are based the estimates made by Government of the number of immigrants who have settled in each Province of Canada and in the North-West Territories during the year; and of the number of Canadians who have left each Province or Territory or the Dominion during the year, said: I moved last Session for a return similar to this, and my hon. friend assented with his willingness, but he did not, with his usual businesslike promptitude, bring down those returns. I hope my hon. friend will this year bring down the information. Several statements have appeared at different times in the press, and we have the semi-official statement made by the hon. member for Pictou, in the debate on the Address, as to the immigration into the North-West. The hon. gentleman gave us the total number, which must, of course, be based on the aggregates in each Province, and, therefore, we must have the number settled in each. It is material we should have all the data upon which the estimates are based.

Mr. POPE. I shall be very glad to bring down the information required, but as all information of this kind will come down in my report which will be ready a few days after, if not before we meet here again, I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow this motion to stand until he sees my report, and knows what he will then want. I can say to the hon. gentleman that, so far as the immigrants coming into the country are concerned—into the North-West—their numbers are ascertained by actual count, by the reports from the ships, by the returns of the agents in Quebec and Ontario. Every immigrant from the United States having goods to enter, enters them at the Custom Houses, and the returns from the Customs' offices show the actual number of settlers from the United States. There can be no mistake about that. Those people coming from the United States this year, and so entering their goods, amounted to over 30,000. Now, Sir, I can quite understand that hon. gentlemen opposite will doubt the correctness of any report we may make, but it must be remembered that there are corroborative circumstances. We must remember that people will be governed by their interests wherever they go. Now, why is it that we have 30,000 people coming into Canada this year from the United States, when two or three years ago we only had 8,000? Can the hon. gentleman think of any reason? Here are my reasons. The largest number of these people came back to the Province of Quebec from the manufacturing centres of New England. When they went away we had no manufactures or employment to give them, but now we have, and that is the reason why 20,000 Canadians returned to Canada this year. They are now coming back here because they can find labor at home. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will hardly credit me when I tell them that over 50,000 people settled in Manitoba during the past year. They say that these people have gone to the United States, and that just as many are going now as ever. Now, I put it to the common sense of hon. gentlemen, and ask them if there is not another reason why the artisan and the laborer are now coming back to this country from the United States, and why our own people are not going to the Western States? The reason is that we have a great West of our own that we are opening up, and the numbers going to the West of the United States are very much less than formerly. This year, how many do you think have gone to Manitoba and to our North-West? Something like 69,000, and of these about 34,000 went from Ontario. Of course, I cannot give the exact numbers, I give them approximately, but from the best data I can get, and I say that 34,000 of those people went from the Province of Ontario. Then I deduct from that number 17½ per cent.—which was the ratio adopted at one time for those who remained in the North-West when the emigration was much smaller than it is now—and that was supposed fairly to represent the proportion of those who returned to Ontario that had left that Province. I believe it is a fair proportion now, and according to it we find that over 34,000 of the people who settled in Manitoba and the North-West went from Ontario. I am repeating this for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire to stop the crying aloud of those hon. gentlemen that we are losing people from Ontario—for that has been the burden of some of the speeches of my hon. friends opposite. Now I believe that, instead of Ontario losing she is actually gaining. I have excellent data for believing that over 50,000 immigrants went into the Province of Ontario during the last year, and as 34,000 left that Province, that would give a surplus of over 15,000 as representing Ontario's gain during the year. My method of proceeding to ascertain these numbers is to count every man that comes across the border. But if the hon. gentleman asks me to give him definite and positive figures, I say I cannot do so. I consider all the circumstances, and draw my conclusions from those circumstances. In regard to the hon. gentleman's motion, everything there is bearing on the question will be brought down by the time the House resumes work after Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall now be able to contrast the hon. gentleman's speech with his return when it comes down. The hon. gentleman ought to remember the old French proverb that qui s'excuse s'accuse. I did not accuse him of making any misstatements about immigration. I did not say a word about the figures, as to whether they were right or wrong. I wanted to get the facts, the data, the materials, upon which these statements were made. I did not combat them. I am prepared to deal with them when they come down—when I have ascertained what they are. But the hon. gentleman was ready to be attacked; he thought these figures required defence, and he proceeded to lug in, the N.P., and the number of men that came into Quebec, &c. Sir, that is premature. When we get the facts and get the hon. gentleman's data we will be able to deal with them. In the meantime, he has given us some idea of what his motive is for forming a judgment, and what his principles of action are. He says that some time ago when the emigration into Manitoba was very small, it was easy to ascertain, and he did ascertain, that 17½ per cent. of those who went in came out again, and he believes that is the proper estimate to make to-day. He says he is not certain, but he is satisfied, that the same proportion will hold, and he has adopted the proportion of the early and small emigration as applicable to the much larger emigration of to-day. He may be wrong, but I want to see what the data are upon which the hon. gentleman makes out that 17½ per cent. is the proper deduction for those who have not permanently settled there. The hon. gentleman says that 34,000 went in from Ontario, and he estimates that 31,000 remained. But he will find, I think, if he makes a very small sum in arithmetic, that the deduction is about 9 per cent. instead of 17½. It would require about 38,000, according to his own calculations, to remain, in order to make 17½ per cent.

Mr. POPE. There were 38,000 who went in.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said 34,000.

Mr. POPE. Then, I made a mistake in the figures.

Mr. CASEY. There is one item in regard to emigration to Manitoba which, perhaps, did not exist when the hon. gentleman established his 17½ per cent. rate, but which does exist now, that is, the dissatisfaction produced in the minds of people who have settled there, especially during the past season, by the difficulties they have met with in obtaining homestead entries, or in some cases in obtaining any land at all upon which they could settle. I know of many instances, in one district especially, that south of the Pacific Railway and beyond the western boundary of Manitoba, where hundreds, I might say thousands of settlers were disgusted at the manner in which they were treated by the Government. They went there, some early, others in the middle, and others rather late in the summer, but at no time could they obtain any certain assurance as to whether it would be possible for them to secure homesteads of land which had been surveyed and advertised in the public press as being open for settlement. Three times in the course of last season those lands were shut up from settlement by orders received from here, and three times they were opened. Every time they were opened, there was a rush of settlers there, but by the time they arrived and selected lands they were told that the lands were closed to settlement, and they could not obtain homesteads there. Some of those parties stuck to their lands and ultimately succeeded in getting their entries. Among them was a gentleman I know personally, highly connected in England, who had gone out there with his sons to take up land near Moose Mountain. He passed through the processes of being told that he could obtain entries and that he could not, but he stuck to the land he had selected, and late in the fall he got his entry. But that gentleman, who was at first enthusiastic about the North-

Mr. POPE.

West, has since written advising his friends to go to Dakota, or some other Western State, instead of Manitoba where such annoyance and uncertainty prevailed about getting land. This is not an ordinary case. This gentleman is a man of standing and influence in his own country, and would probably have been the means of bringing hundreds of settlers to the country. I met in my travels across the prairie scores of other prospective settlers returning in disgust from the finest districts in the whole territory, stating that there was fine land there, and land which suited them in every particular, but on arriving at the place they found it was either locked up or granted to some of the large companies which have obtained immense tracts of land outside of the railway belt. This state of things will tend greatly to increase the number of persons leaving Manitoba. And while I am speaking on this point, I wish to urge strongly upon the Government—not from any spirit of fault-finding, but with an earnest desire to induce them to make better arrangements for the future, and in the honest belief that if the First Minister saw the disadvantage of the present system he would change it—the necessity of having something settled and fixed in the rules respecting the taking up of land. When we publish to the world that large tracts are open for settlement, we should see that there are land offices in those neighborhoods, and as many land offices as possible, so as to afford the greatest convenience to settlers, and they should be kept continuously open, at least during the whole of the season during which the publication is first made. If it is desired to close the offices, that should be done during the winter, and ample notice given to intending settlers; but it is a simple fraud that either European immigrants, or people from the older Provinces of Canada who go in to take up land, should be told, after they have selected a location, that they cannot make an entry. That has, however, been the practice for years in regard to lands in the North-West. I am sure if the First Minister knew how the policy is regarded there, and the anathemas hurled at the land office by settlers who find it impossible to obtain homesteads, he would look into the matter more closely and adopt a system which would have the advantage of dealing fairly with those whom we are trying to induce to settle in that country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see that the remarks made by the hon. gentleman are quite relevant to the discussion going on at this moment; but the hon. gentleman has got the North-West strongly impressed on his mind, and brings it into everything. He resembles a character described by Charles Dickens, who brought in Charles I on every possible occasion. I dispute the accuracy of his facts, and I say they are not facts. In all surveyed portions open for settlement, homesteads can be had. There is a large body of men in Manitoba and the North-West who pose as settlers, who claim the rights of settlers and who are the men who make the noise. They are men who go there for the purpose of speculating, who are not bona fide settlers—men who go out there, some of them being Members of Parliament—and endeavor to secure lands claimed and owned by settlers, and who place men as squatters on lots, on the understanding that they are to be paid a certain commission, the speculator securing the land. The whole effort of the Government has been to prevent these land-sharks, whether Members of Parliament or not, from going into the North-West and trying to keep out would-be settlers from Europe and the older Provinces of Canada, and to protect them from those combinations of men who are really preventing the settlement of the country. I say so distinctly. With respect to bona fide settlers who go into the North-West, a great many of them wander all over that vast territory. They go on unsurveyed land where they cannot make an entry, because they can only make an entry for land after it has been surveyed. There have been certain reservations made; coal and mineral lands have been reserved; railway lands have been conveyed absolutely to the Canadian Pacific Railway under the arrangement. Then there are railway lands for sale, and out of the profits from them the enormous expenditure to which the country has been put to in building the Pacific Railway is to be returned to the Public Treasury. There are school lands, Hudson Bay Company's lands, reservations made for Indians, reservations made of probable town sites, reservations made under the Act of Parliament, passed in the first place by the hon. gentlemen opposite when in power, and continued by the present Government, of mill sites and property of extraordinary value, which are reserved for the purpose of recouping the Treasury for the drain made upon it to secure the settlement of the country. Every effort has been made to facilitate the settler in finding his land. Of course, the system has been experimental in the first instance. Since 1871, when we secured possession of that country, the number of officials sent up there has been by slow degrees increasing. The number grew under hon. gentlemen opposite with the development of the country; it is now growing still further owing to the increasing development of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has declared there should be more land offices. The Government are endeavoring to open offices in all districts where surveys have been made, and where the country is open for settlement. We do not wish to have an unnecessary army of agents or officers there; and it is the interest of the Government—it is the desire of the Government—to have as many and as efficient officers there as the demands of immigration will require. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the immigration has been very large—has been exceedingly large during this last year; and the immigrants have scattered all over that country. They have not kept within the surveyed districts; but have, and it is their right, roamed over the whole of that country—gone everywhere. People going to look for places suitable for settlement, and to make a home for themselves and for their families, have a right to indulge their own fancies and their own tastes; and a great many go off to sections of the country which cannot possibly be surveyed in one year, or in two years, or in three years. From the foot of the Rocky Mountains to Red River, immigrants are scattered all over the land. There is no one district in which these immigrants are not found; and it would be impossible, without undergoing enormous expense, to provide the whole of the machinery, over every part of that vast section of this continent, by means of which entries could be given, or to make surveys wherever immigrants may choose to go according to their tastes, according to their caprices, according to their fancies. The surveys which were finished last season were very large—about 300 townships having been surveyed, and more blocked out; and the Government will ask Parliament this Session for a larger amount for the purpose of surveying more extensive sections of the country. Instead of finding them, as has hitherto been the case, a necessity along the line of the Pacific Railway, we will have surveys made in the various districts over that part of the continent which seem from the flow of immigration to be ready for immediate settlement. The surveys are to be undertaken at Edmonton, at Calgary, all over the Belly River section, and in the whole of the coal district; and the Government will be very glad, and my Department will be very glad, to get surveys made by as many competent surveyors as they can find for that purpose. Every competent surveyor, who will undertake to go up there, can obtain ready employment in this regard from the Government. There is a difficulty—or rather it is not a difficulty—but there is a complaint proffered that patents do not issue so rapidly as they ought. Well, it has been a slow process, as I have had occasion to say before. Hitherto the issue of the patents has been a slow process, owing to the sanctity which the British Constitution has always thrown around the application of the Great Seal to any document, be it big or be it little. The Bill, which I am happy to state is printed in French, at least, and which I shall ask the House to consider when we meet after Recess, will provide very largely for the removal of that source of complaint; but I will say this—that the delays in Canada in the issue of patents, have not at all been equal to the delays that have taken place in the United States. The law, as it now stands, provides that wherever the local agent gives a certificate of three years settlement and the right to have a patent issued, the patent shall issue. Well, experience, I am sorry to say, shows that this is a very unsafe principle of action. Certificates have been given improperly; certificates have been given to speculators improperly; and certificates have been given to agents, who are the servants of speculators, improperly; consequently the Government have been obliged, through their officers, to cancel some of those grants for patents, on the ground of fraud. This has operated hardly in some instances, that is to say, innocent people have bought some of these grants in good faith that the party selling had acquired the right to their patents; and complaints arising from this cause have operated to a very considerable extent, as a charge against the land system; but still, Sir, it must be done. If there has been fraud practised, and a man has no right to a patent, he cannot sell more than he has himself; and however important it may be in the interest of the purchaser, still the rights of the Crown must be protected and the law must be carried out. In the Bill which is before the House, there is provided this one additional protection: that when the local land agent has given a certificate, that the homesteader has acquired the right to the deed, and all the evidence is forwarded, and when they have received the revision, approval and sanction of the Land Commissioner, who is stationed at Winnipeg, then the certificate given by the local land agent, with the approbation of the Land Board of Winnipeg, shall have all the effect of a patent. That evil will, consequently, be very much removed, if this Bill receives the sanction of this House. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is the interest as well as the duty of the Government, to satisfy the needs of the large rush of immigrants and settlers who are going into that country; and I believe that, on the whole, the settlers, the bona fide settlers, who have gone into that country, are well satisfied with the way in which they have been treated in entering it. I also believe that very much of the increased immigration which is that going into the North-West this year, will be caused by the favorable accounts sent home to England, and sent home to Europe, by settlers who have already gone there, and that these favorable accounts will be the chief reason for the increase in the immigration of the year 1883 over the immigration of the year 1882.

MR. CASEY. I merely wish to refer to a matter personal to myself. The hon. gentleman disputes the accuracy of my statement. I can merely say that it is based on the statements of men who I have every reason to believe are bona fide settlers, and who have gone up there from Ontario for the purpose of settling; on the statements of land guides, and of land agents, who affirmed that the offices were closed at certain times. This will be settled by the answer to the return which my hon. friend from North Norfolk moved for, asking for the Orders in Council with regard to these matters; and I think it will be found, as I have stated, that land offices were closed three times during the last season. Of course, I only mention these things, not for the purpose of injuring the country—because I have every reason to wish the country well—but to have these grievances redressed if possible.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6:05 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 28th March, 1883.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER introduced Bill (No. 94) to amend an Act respecting the offices of Receiver-General and Minister of Public Works, as to the powers of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The object of this Bill is simply to remove a defect in the existing law. It was intended by that measure, as the House knows, to transfer to the Minister of Railways and Canals all duties pertaining to the railways and canals, and that, wherever the term "Minister of Public Works" appeared in any former Act, it should read, after the passage of the Bill, "Minister of Railways and Canals." But it was found when the question came up, that the words "railways and canals under the control of the Government" had been introduced, in fact, limiting the powers of the Minister of Railways and Canals to deal with matters of that kind, unless they were under the control of the Government. The object of this Bill is to remove that defect in the former Act, and provide that in relation to everything touching railways and canals, where the term "Minister of Public Works" appears in former Acts, it shall read "Minister of Railways and Canals."

Bill read the first time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills (from the Senate) were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 95) further to amend the Interpretation Act.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

COMPILATION OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved the following resolution:—

That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, as near the close of each financial year as possible, to publish a digest of all the Departmental reports containing such information in regard to the financial condition of the country, its commerce, shipping, imports, exports and population, and such other statistics as may, in the judgment of the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Statistics, be in the public interest.

He said: We publish annually, at very considerable expense, a great number of Departmental reports, some of which are admirably prepared, and all of which contain a variety of information exceedingly useful. These Departmental reports and the other printing connected with Parliament, cost us, last year, some $135,000. This is a very large sum to spend on printing in connection with this House, when we consider the extent to which the information contained in these reports is distributed among the public. Take, for instance, our Trade and Navigation Returns, which contain a mass of very valuable information—they alone cost, last year, the sum of $5,360, each copy costing about $2.50. The difficulties in distributing that information to any great extent are considerable, and the number is so limited that it is quite certain that but a small portion of the community are placed in possession of these returns, and consequently but a small portion of the people have access to the information which they contain. In the same way

Public Accounts and other Departmental reports are so limited in number—(although they cost a very large amount of money—that the information which they contain is very indifferently distributed. The idea which I have in the resolution placed before the Chair is, to have a digest of these reports prepared from year to year as nearly after the close of the financial year as possible. If this were done and the digested information distributed to members of the House, and to the public generally, the main facts which these reports contain would be in possession of members, perhaps before the House met, and could be published at such a small cost as would enable us to distribute them much more freely than is done at present. Besides, the difficulty of getting at the information contained in those reports is very great. Although the arrangement could not very well be improved on, I do not know that I could offer any suggestion on that point, yet it requires considerable experience in the study of those reports to enable, even members of this House, to reach the information which they contain. A condensed report of the information in these reports would give the main facts in connection with the public affairs of this country in a much more convenient and useful shape to the public. Besides, these reports are of no use whatever, or scarcely any, for purpose of comparison. When we want to ascertain the progress of the commerce of this country we have to fortify ourselves with all the Trade and Navigation Returns from Confederation. True, there are some comparative statements in the returns every year. But they are incomplete. Generally it is a comparison of two years—this year and last year. In some instances they date back to Confederation, but in very important particulars these are very defective; and we require, in order to ascertain the progress of the commerce of this country for the last thirteen or fourteen years, to look through all the returns for that period. This is inconvenient, not only to members of this House, but to others who might wish to inform themselves on this subject. In the same way, if we wish to find the cost of our railways year by year, or the progress of our post office system, or other matters in connection with the affairs of this country—the militia, or immigration—we have to take down the returns of the respective Departments and look through each year by year; and in this respect, perhaps, the most faulty of all our Departmental reports—if I may call it a report—is the Census Return. In each return we have, of course, the Census of the decade which it is supposed to cover, but there are no comparative statements to enable us to arrive readily at the increase of our population, or the resources of the country. I think this is a great inconvenience and loss, not only to members of this House, but to journalists and others. The advantages of the system which I propose are briefly these: In the first place, we would be enabled, if such a system as I have indicated were undertaken, to publish most valuable statistics at less expense. A small edition of some of these expensive returns might be issued, and a large edition of the digest could also be published, and in that way it could be more generally distributed among the people. In the next place, this digest to which I call your attention, would give more information than the Departmental reports. It would be less in detail and more general. If a journalist, for instance, wishes to make a comparative statement showing the progress of the country, its commerce, shipping, expenditure of population, he has to refer to his library, and, at very great difficulty, get the information which is sought. A compendium, such as I refer to, would place this information readily at his disposal, and, I venture to say, if it were more easily got at much more valuable information of this kind would be distributed among the community. We find here, in connection with the labors of the Session, a very great difficulty often in making those comparative statements which are required for purposes of debate. Nothing would be so valuable to members as a well prepared and carefully compiled statement; which is now only obtained by the members of this House after a laborious search through volume after volume of the Trade and Navigation Returns. These returns could be prepared in the shape indicated, and then a conclusion would be more easily arrived at, and much more valuable information would be given. If we want to send abroad, to other countries, a comparative statement of Canadian trade, and of our commerce and shipping since Confederation, we find that we have no valuable documents, no digest, which we can mail to any person in England who wishes to secure such information for immigration or other purposes; and to obtain a statement of this character, we must search through a long series of Sessional Papers; and a small compendium, such as I have indicated, if put in possession of those connected with the political affairs of the country, would be exceedingly valuable. Now, why do I urge this matter upon the attention of the House? I urged it last year; and I have repeatedly done so, for the reasons which I have already given, and for another reason. We find that our constituency of readers for such a report as this, is too small to enable us to hope that the deficiency will be filled by private enterprise, as is the case where such information is published in connection with the Library at Washington, and where the constituency of readers is very large, so that a book like that pays the enterprise of a private publisher. In England, also, the Statesmen's Year Book is issued by private enterprise; but, in Canada, we have no such a constituency of readers, and I doubt very much whether private enterprise would go to the labor and expense connected with the preparation of such a work as this. I hope, though I do not see the hon. Minister of Agriculture in his place, that the other hon. members of the Government present will see the importance of preparing such a compendium as that to which I have called attention, because the labor it would occasion cannot be very great—an intelligent clerk, connected with the Department of Agriculture, could do the work very readily—and it would not entail much expense; and the expense of preparing this work, would, moreover, be more than met by the saving made in connection with the publication of the Departmental reports; and while it would be valuable to the House, and the country generally, it would in itself compensate largely for the cost of the undertaking. I hope, Sir, that the Government will entertain my proposition favorably; and that next year, when we meet again, we will have a compendium prepared in such a way as I have generally indicated, giving us all this information ready for the use of members and for distribution among the public. We receive frequently here, letters from constituents, asking for Departmental reports and Blue-books, and, as I have said before, the number is so limited that the demand cannot be met; but a large edition such as called for, and prepared in the way indicated, could be prepared, and it would enable us to place in the hands of our constituents this valuable information; and it would be valuable, not only to them, but it would also educate the country regarding the resources and progress of Canada. I hope that the House will entertain favorably the resolution which I propose.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that a compendium—as my hon. friend terms that information—compiled from the different Departmental reports, would be of great service, particularly to members of the House during the sitting of Parliament; but I question very much whether the expense to which he has referred would be as limited as the hon. gentleman thinks it would be. I am quite satisfied that to prepare the statement asked for in his motion, so far as the Customs Department is concerned, would entail the necessity of a duplicate staff. You will readily understand that to compile the statement requested it would be necessary to have full returns from each port in the different Provinces of the Dominion, and from those returns that compilation would have to be made. Now, when I tell you that to compile the Trade and Navigation Returns for publication the general work of the office has to be allowed to remain in abeyance nearly three months, and then brought up afterwards, the House will understand what would be required, if we were, at the end of every year, to commence again and go through the different reports of each Department in order to compile the statement required in this motion. Having discussed this matter with the Commissioner, and with those who are more particularly acquainted with the work that would be imposed on the Department, I have the very best authority for saying that it would require nearly double the staff we have at present; and so far as the comparative statement to which my hon. friend has referred is concerned, I think that the Trade and Navigation Returns provide them for the House and for the country, and, as a rule, they are published in newspapers for the information of the world. You will find the trade imports and exports compiled in them for the last ten years, each upon a separate sheet, so that you can refer to them at any particular moment. It is true there is no compilation which would enable my hon. friend to make the comparison of the imports of any particular article upon which to enable him to base an argument either for or against any proposition he might bring before the House.

Mr. ROSS. The imports for consumption only date back to 1876.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. ROSS. And it is the same with the exports.

Mr. BOWELL. You will find that next year the 1876 line will be dropped, and the current year added; and in this way a year is dropped every year. There would be very little difficulty, I admit, in adding year after year, or allowing, rather, that particular line to remain in the general statement, if that would be of any particular advantage.

Mr. ROSS. I hope the hon. Minister will excuse me, but I thought that would be the case. I took up the report the other day to get information in the usual way, but I found that it is not the case, although the report of the hon. Minister of Customs covers a greater number of years than any previous report. But the line is dropped as the hon. Minister says.

Mr. BOWELL. I admit that the statement is not carried back to give the totals from Confederation except in some cases.

Mr. ROSS. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. But the total imports and exports are given.

Mr. ROSS. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. And the expense attending the collection of revenue per head for each of the Provinces, and a variety of other totals, such as the total value of imports, the total sum of collections, all running back in this particular—and all the duties collected, for instance—this only goes back to 1876; but the practice has been for each year since Confederation—as my hon. friend will learn by looking at the returns—that one year is dropped; and the year 1876 will be dropped in the next annual returns.

Mr. ROSS. That is not the practice.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman looks at the report he will find that it is.

Mr. ROSS. I did so.

Mr. BOWELL. The report comes down only to 1876 in this respect. My own impression is that for general statistics this volume might be materially reduced in size. If the House and country would be satisfied with a general statement of the business of the country so far as it affects the whole Dominion, in the same manner as they publish them in the United States, it would relieve the Department of a very great deal of trouble and save a great deal of expense, to which my hon. friend has referred, in the publication of these reports; but it has been the practice in the past to publish, and I presume that the representatives of each Province are anxious to know what the amount of trade carried on with foreign countries, by each particular Province, is. As we are now a Dominion, it seems to me that it would be just as well to eliminate from the Trade Returns all statistics which may be considered of a Provincial, rather than of a Dominion character; and if that were done it would reduce the expenditure, not only in the Departments, but in the matter of printing. I do not think it would be possible to meet the views of hon. members in regard to the number of the different Departmental reports that would be required. You will remember that for a number of years double the present number of these reports were furnished to each member. The Printing Committee and those charged with the distribution of Parliamentary and Departmental papers, came to the conclusion that it would be just as well to furnish each member with only two copies of the Departmental reports, instead of four or six; and after some discussion, the report in which that recommendation was made, was accepted and adopted by the House. We all know that there are constant applications for Departmental reports by those who take an interest in the trade of the country, and in addition to them, by members who are desirous of furnishing their constituents with these reports. That, however, entailed a very great expense, and after mature deliberation on the part of the Committee, as well as by the House of Commons, it was decided that, as it would be impossible for the Government or the House to furnish a sufficient quantity to satisfy the demands of each constituency, the number printed for distribution should be reduced, and that each member should receive only the limited number that he receives at present. I think the hon. gentleman will, on reflection, see the propriety of withdrawing the motion he has made, unless the House is prepared—speaking for my own Department—to increase the expenditure of the Civil Service from 25 to 50 per cent. Unless that is done the House should, in my opinion, reject the proposition which is now before it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The question before the House is an important one if the objects in view can only be accomplished at a reasonable expense. We had some communication with a gentleman who was here in Ottawa about a year ago, and who is head of the Statistical Department of England, as to the system in force there for the collection and compilation of statistics. This matter has been engaging the attention of the Government since that time, with a view of considering a possibility of establishing a Statistical Bureau which would furnish periodical—say monthly or quarterly—statements in reference to the trade of the country and other matters, such as those which are published in the United States and England. Some enquiries were made as to the cost which would be involved in carrying on such a bureau, and it was found that it would be somewhat expensive; but the Government have not abandoned the idea of endeavoring to introduce that system. In my judgment the proposition of the hon. gentleman is not a practical one, while the other would be practical, and would perhaps accomplish the objects which he has in view more effectually than his own proposition. His proposition is, that after the reports of the Departments are prepared, a digest of them should be compiled by the Department of Agriculture. It is well known to hon. gentlemen who have been in the Government that, though the fiscal year closes on the 30th of June, it is very seldom that we are able to have the reports ready to submit to Parliament before the first or the middle of January, and sometimes the first of February. The preparation of such a digest as the hon. gentleman suggests would require so much time, I fear, that we could scarcely have it ready before the rising of the House. I know it would be a relief to me, as a member of this House, if I could have a few hundreds of these documents to send to my constituents; and though hon. gentlemen may have the same feeling, I doubt if they feel it so strongly as those coming from the Maritime Provinces, because in those Provinces we used to have the Debates of the Legislature published, and it was a very pleasant thing for each member to get 500 copies of these reports to distribute among his constituents. To-day, I have applications from constituents to have copies of the Hansard sent to them; they would like to receive them but they would cost too much money. The hon. gentleman will see that the preparation of this digest after the reports are completed would cause a good deal of delay. At present, members of the press, who are an intelligent body of men, get hold of these reports as soon as they are brought down, and it is wonderful what a complete digest they make of them in one night and telegraph to their papers for publication in the morning. It is marvellous to find, the next morning after these reports are laid before the House, how much of their contents are given to the Dominion through the various newspapers. We hope that the object of the hon. gentleman's motion will be attained less expensively by the establishment of a bureau, such as I have mentioned, which should publish monthly, or quarterly, as may be most desirable, the information it may collect. With reference to the financial condition of the country, I know, from experience, that the returns are not in from Manitoba and British Columbia, by which we can form an accurate opinion, or give a correct statement of the receipts and expenditures for the year, and such a statement is often asked for at the close of the fiscal year. As a matter of fact, we cannot obtain before the month of September those returns which enable us to prepare a statement for the press, showing what the gross receipts and the gross expenditures have been for the year, and what the surplus is likely to be; and even then it is subject to correction before the Public Accounts are settled. The reports of a Bureau of Statistics would be in the hands of members before Parliament meets; they would give them some idea of the trade and commerce of the country; and, as I think such a system would be more satisfactory, and would be far less expensive than the one proposed by the hon. gentleman, I hope he will withdraw his motion on the assurance that the Government is considering the matter, and that probably by next Session we may have a system matured, and be able to come to Parliament with the means needed to establish and carry on such a bureau.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sure that hon. members on this side of the House who are interested in the collection and publication of statistics will have heard with a great degree of pleasure the statement made by the hon. Finance Minister with regard to the intention of the Government. I certainly hope the hon. gentleman will bear the matter in mind, and will, as speedily as possible, establish a Bureau of Statistics. No doubt it can be established at a moderate expense, and the proposition foreshadowing to us the publication of quarterly reports will meet the wants of those who desire to ascertain at the earliest possible moment the condition of trade and other matters connected with the public affairs of the country. I hope those quarterly reports can be prepared as the hon. gentleman suggests, so as to be laid before the public with tolerable punctuality. That is the method adopted in the United States. A Bureau of Statistics was established there some time ago; a gentleman specially adapted to the business was installed as chief, and the bureau issue quarterly reports, which give a compendium of the statistics of the country. With the example of the United States and England, we can readily adopt a system here adapted to our peculiar wants, and which shall put an end to the difficulties which now exist with regard to obtaining information which we all desire to obtain, but for which we have to wait so long, that often it is valueless when we do obtain it. I am very happy to hear that the hon. Minister has taken this matter into consideration. I hope he will not lose sight of it, and I am sure this House will not grudge any expense that may be necessary to establish so useful an institution.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). After receiving assurances from the Government that this matter is receiving their attention, and indulging the hope that some action will be taken at an early day, I have no objection to withdraw the resolution. I am not at all alarmed at the expense that would be incurred in carrying out the proposition. I think the hon. Minister of Customs rather tried to frighten us by referring to the additional expense that the preparation of this digest would entail upon his Department. If, as the hon. Finance Minister says, the members of the press can make a very fair digest of these reports in one night, I do not think it would be necessary for him to duplicate his staff for the whole year. The hon. Minister of Customs must have a very poor staff if they stand so poor a comparison with the members of the press; he, as an old pressman, knows what the press can do. We want something more than these quarterly returns. We want returns that will indicate the financial condition of the country, and the digest should cover the Department of Customs, the Department of Agriculture, the Census, the Post Office Department, the Militia, and, in fact, all the Departments of the Government. The main expense will be, I believe, in the preparation of the report in the first year, for it would only be necessary to correct it for each subsequent year. I hope we shall have all these statistics at an early day; and, under these circumstances, I withdraw the resolution.

Resolution withdrawn.

THE SUPERANNUATION FUND.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe that a measure has been introduced into the Senate to consolidate and amend the laws relating to superannuation, and I think it is proper that we should be furnished with some information as to the general results of the superannuation system, in greater detail than it is given to us in the Public Accounts. When the system was first proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, they proposed a scale of payment, which was afterwards reduced by nearly one-half, upon the theory that it was larger than would be required to carry out the system. Its practical working has been such, however, that there is now a loss of something like $100,000 a year. I think the receipts are $26,000 a year, and the payments about $146,000. The number of cases in which a discretionary power is conferred upon the Administration is very great, and the number of persons who have been superannuated, and the expenditure to which the country is committed in connection therewith, are very large. It is important to know what proportion of persons actually benefit by the system. Of course, the superannuation system is an insurance system, and amongst the risks which those who are subjected to it assume, is the risk of their dying in the service, and thus paying without receiving any benefit. The statements which I propose to ask the House to order for each year, are: (1) The number of persons on the list for the year as entitled to the benefit of the Act; (2) The number superannuated during the year under the Act; (3) The number retired during the year on a gratuity under the Act; (4) The total amount paid into the fund from the beginning by those who were during the year superannuated or retired on a gratuity; (5) The number of persons on the list for the year who died in the service; (6) The total amount paid into the fund from the beginning by those who during the year died in the service. My motion refers to two classes—those who have availed of the Act, and those who have not; and it proposes to ascertain what the contributions relatively, of these two classes, are.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There can be no objection whatever to furnishing the information asked for. I recollect perfectly well the discussion that took place when the proposition was made for a reduction of the percentage. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not give sufficient consideration to the fact that the superannuation of officers was something like the operation of a life insurance company. During the first years of its existence, the payments are small compared with the amount after the company has been in operation a long time. During the first years of the operation of superannuation, the amount paid in by the employés exceeded that paid out. Many hon. members were therefore very favorable to a reduction of the percentage, and by almost unanimous consent it was reduced. However, it has turned out, that instead of the percentage meeting the payments, there is a large deficit every year, the details of which will be given in the return asked for.

Mr. BLAKE suggested that the following words be added to the motion:—"distinguishing between those whose superannuations were occasioned by reason of abolition of office."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. VANASSE moved for a statement showing:—

- 1st. The names of all Railway Companies that have made application to the Government or Parliament of Canada for subsidies or grants in money, in land or otherwise, from 1874 up to this date;
- 2nd. The names of all Railway Companies to which have been granted and paid subsidies or grants in money, land or otherwise, by the Dominion Government, from 1874 to this date;
- 3rd. The sums paid to each of the said Railway Companies from 1874 to this date;
- 4th. The length of the said Railways;
- 5th. The name of the Province or Provinces traversed by the said Railways;
- 6th. The original amount of the mortgage held by the Dominion of Canada on the properties of the Northern Railway Company of Canada;
- 7th. Copy of the Order in Council effecting the discharge of the said mortgage in favor of the said Company, the date of the said discharge, and the amount of interest accrued on the said mortgage at the date of discharge;
- 8th. The amounts paid by the Government of Canada from 1874 to this date, for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway in the city of Halifax.

Mr. BLAKE suggested that "1867 be substituted for 1874."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all correspondence not yet laid before it, between the Governments of Canada and British Columbia on the subject of the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway.—(Mr. Gordon.)

Copies of correspondence between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or his Deputy and any person or persons concerned in the employment of the Government steamer Newfield in aiding the wrecked steamship Moravian; also, a statement of the number of days during which the said Newfield was employed; the remuneration agreed upon, and the amount received by the Government for said services.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Copies of all correspondence, petitions and reports in the possession of the Government relating to mail service between Barkerville and Forks of Quesnelle, in the Province of British Columbia, since the year 1878.—(Mr. Reid.)

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 7) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

PREVENTION OF FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved the third reading of Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving expenditure of public moneys.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved, in amendment, that the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to insert the following clause:—

Clause 4. Whosoever, for the purpose of assisting in any election to the Parliament of Canada, while performing any such contract or awaiting payment in respect of any such contract, subscribes, furnishes, gives, or promises to give or furnish any sum of money or consideration whatsoever, either directly or indirectly by himself or by the agency of another person on his behalf, to any person whomsoever, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be liable, at the discretion of the court, to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars, together with imprisonment for a term of not less than one month and not more than twelve months; and in default of payment of the penalty so incurred, the offender shall be imprisoned for a further term of twelve months, unless such penalty be sooner paid.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The amendment which it is proposed to add to the Bill formed part of the Bill as it came first from the Committee to which it was referred in the first instance. It is true that at the next Session, in the second instance, the Committee to which it was referred thought proper to expunge that clause; but I apprehend that whatever deference we owe to a report of a Committee, this clause of the Bill is a very essential part of it—in fact, I think it is the most essential part of it. It is well known according to all past experience in political life, that contractors have been the greatest providers of electioneering funds, and no one supposes that their political sympathies is so strong that they will give their money without expecting to get a full return for it. That is human nature. That has been our experience in the past, and I think it is a thing against which we ought to provide in the future. I need not—and I have abstained from it all along, in discussing this matter—refer to any particular fact which calls for the enactment of such a clause. I think it is in the interest of the public that when very large sums of money are subscribed in order to change the sense of the electorate, the most stringent law possible should be passed in order to prevent such subscriptions being made by contractors. It is true there might be great difficulty in finding out the culprits; but at the same time they would be warned in advance; they would know that the law exists, and that if they were detected not only would they suffer the penalty of a fine, but they would suffer the further punishment of imprisonment, the fear of which will deter any man from committing the offence who has any respect for his reputation. Now, I need not tell you that this evil does not exist in Canada alone; it exists to an immense extent on the other side of the line, so much so that Congress has been obliged to pass an Act containing a provision precisely similar to the one now proposed. The Act was passed in the last preceding Session of Congress, and I have here the clause to which I refer which was kindly sent me by Senator Pendleton, the author of the Bill, and I will now read it:

“Section 4.—That any person having a contract with the United States or any office thereof, or who shall have had such a contract within three months thereafter, who shall pay or contribute, either directly or indirectly, any money, property or other valuable thing for any political purpose, shall be deemed to have forfeited all rights, and the same shall thereby be rendered null and void; and all officers of the Government are hereby prohibited from executing any contract with any person so offending; and that any person having any preceding claim against the United States, or any Departmental officer of the Government thereof, who shall pay or contribute any money, property or other valuable thing for a political purpose, shall thereby forfeit said claim and all rights to recover or receive anything on the same.”

Now, Sir, the penalty for breach of the law is imprisonment—that is the difference I make; and it is in order to deter persons from committing an act which they know to be immoral and wrong, an act which is wrong in itself on account of its tendency, the harm it produces among the electorate, and wrong also before God, as to the man who gives the money and the man who receives it. Now, why should we not enact that law? We have had the experience of the past; why should we not to-day stop it? Is there any man in this House that is not ready to admit that the large sums of money given by contractors are intended for a bad purpose? When I introduced this Bill at first it was pooh-poohed, and the organ of hon. gentlemen on the other side, the Mail, said it was an insult to the House. Now, it was never my intention to do or say anything which would be insulting to the House, or any of its members; but I feel that I am discharging a duty which I owe to myself as a member of Parliament, and to the country. I have, myself, seen money passing from the hands of contractors to swell election funds, so I do not speak of something with which I am not acquainted. I speak of facts which I have witnessed; and I dare say there are few members of this House who have not seen the same thing, and many of them have, no doubt, derived advantage from it. For my part I have not, and I do not consider it an advantage to receive such assistance. Thank God I have never had a cent from any election fund since I have had a seat in Parliament, nor do I want any in the future. When I first brought this measure before the House, the Mail published a paragraph on the 4th of March, 1882, which will show in what spirit the Bill was received by my hon. friends on the opposite side, because, I suppose their organ was saying what was the feeling of their party:

“The defeat of Mr. Casgrain's Bill concerning contracts was a very just end for it. It was, in fact, one of three introduced last Session by Messrs. Blake, Cartwright and Casgrain, not for the purpose of protecting the public interest or improving the law, but for the almost openly avowed purpose of insulting the majority of the House. In fact the three Bills were Parliamentary impertinences, and two or three having been swept out of the House, the third was rightly swept after them.”

Now, I do not think the two Committees of this House to whom this Bill was referred were at all insulted by it; on the contrary, they approved of it. The first Committee passed this Bill as I proposed it, with merely some trivial change, and the second did not condemn it. I have received some anonymous letters—I suppose from contractors—saying I was a stupid jackass for bringing in such a Bill as that. I do not care what they may say; I am here to discharge a public duty, and I shall not shirk it even though I stand with only a seconder, because I believe it is right. It may not pass this Session, or next year, but as sure as I stand here it will be the law of the land before long. It will become a necessity, and the country will demand it. Either that clause is good, or it is not. An objection has been raised that it is depriving contractors of the right to use their money as others do and interferes with the liberty of the subject. Mr. Speaker, that I do not point at. These contractors, by law, cannot become Members of Parliament. They are debarred from entering this House while they are public contractors, and if they are so debarred—properly, they ought also to be prevented from making Members of Parliament by means of the money which they draw from the Public Treasury, and which would be employed to corrupt the electorate of this Dominion. That is the only objection to the Bill—the liberty of the subject to subscribe to an election fund. I have neither seen or heard any other objection, and I do not think that this one will have much weight with the public. I believe, on the contrary, that they desire to have such a measure as this enacted, and I hope that it will receive the sanction of a majority of this House.

An hon. MEMBER. What are the counties that have been corrupted? Name them.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). How many do you wish me to name? When you will have electors who will not be corrupted by contractors, you will have members of Parliament who will do well their duty, as they do it to-day; you will have representatives whose election will not be due to corruption and to money, in most cases, taken from the public chest. I leave this Bill in the hands of the House, and I hope that it will meet with their approval.

Mr. VALIN (Translation). I would like the hon. member to give us a French translation of his speech. He has only given some words of it in French, from which I judge he is afraid that contractors, with the Government, will subscribe money to make opposition to him in the county of l'Islet. Nevertheless, I do not believe there is any necessity for that. I do not believe that the hon. member is too popular in his county, and I am of opinion that a man, who would enter the contest against him, even without the aid of these contractors, could make a very serious opposition to the hon. gentleman. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman will tell us in French what he has said in English.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). As my learned friend understands English as well as French, and as he has perfectly understood me, he will excuse me from making the translation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In view of the decision of the amendments made by the Committee to this Bill, the hon. gentleman must feel very strongly on this point to persist in it. One can quite understand why he feels so strongly on this point, because he evidently shows that he is behind the scenes, for he says, he himself has seen money pass—

Mr. CASGRAIN. In the County of L'Islet in 1872.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And he must be in the confidence of the contractors.

Mr. CASGRAIN. They were against me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Contractors are very astute men, and they know when and where, and with whom, and how they deal. My hon. friend thinks so, and he himself says so—it was done in his own presence; for he, being behind the scenes, saw the contractors pay the money. Well, my hon. friend's experience is otherwise than mine. I have never seen contractors hand over money; but I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman must be logical. A contractor must either be treated like others of Her Majesty's subjects who have votes, or he must be severed from them. If a contractor has a vote, and is allowed to vote, he must have all the privileges that any other voters have.

Mr. CASGRAIN. They cannot be members.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, as to the votes, this must be so; if he has a right to vote, he has as much a right to express his opinions as has the hon. gentleman, or any other elector, and he has a right to aid in elections as much as has any other person. It seems to me to be quite a confusion of right and wrong, to say that a man, because he happens to undertake to perform a work for the public, of which he is one, should be deprived of his right as an elector, which every other person has throughout the country who is an elector; but if he acts, just as the hon. gentleman has a right to act, or any other elector, and in any way whatever assists his political party in a legal way, in a legitimate way, in an honest way—as is allowed by the hon. gentleman himself, and which the hon. gentleman has, no doubt, exercised again and again—by subscribing to assist his party, as we all have done in order to assist our party and support our principles—as we have a right to do, if the money is not applied to or used in an improper, illegitimate or illegal purpose—he not only will be punished but he is to be marked—cave canem—as a wild beast, being guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to a penalty of $1,000, together with imprisonment. He must go to gaol, to be imprisoned for a term not less than one month, and not more than twelve months. If he subscribes, he being a contractor, or if he has performed a contract, and the Government refuses to pay him money, and if it actually improperly refuses to pay him money, if he thinks proper to subscribe to the starting of a newspaper to carry out his principles at an election, why he is liable under this clause; and, Mr. Speaker, under this clause, if a man subscribes, although he has done his work, and he is refused his pay, the Government keeping him out of it because he is politically opposed to them—and if this man tries to upset that unjust Government and subscribes to put that Government out—if he gives a farthing in any way to oust that Government—that iniquitous Government—he is liable to go to gaol, as having committed a great crime, for a year; because it is no matter to which side he subscribes, whether he supports or is against the Government, he is equally liable to go to gaol and to a heavy penalty. This is the case if “he promises to give or furnish any sum of money or any consideration whomsoever,”—who “consideration whomsoever” is I do not know; I am not acquainted with the gentleman.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The word should be “whatsoever.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know the gentleman, but if he promises to give any consideration “whomsoever,” this is so, what does the hon. gentleman mean by “consideration?”

Mr. CASGRAIN. The hon. gentleman will see it is a typographical error, “whatsoever” and “whomsoever” are transposed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, I see. The hon. gentleman will find it is decided in the cases that if a contractor has performed a contract, and if all that remains to be done is to get his pay, and there is a dispute between the Government and himself—why the cases all go to show—that he then ceases to be a contractor, and can run to be a Member of Parliament; but by this Bill he could not then assist at an election, or carry on his own election. But he has now a right to offer as a Member of Parliament, and go to any expenditure he chooses for legal purposes, by way of public pamphlets or otherwise, employing paid agents, &c.; but if he pays any money whatsoever, while in that position, while he is suffering an injustice in not getting his pay, under this Bill he loses his rights. All the cases go to show that he can run as a Member of Parliament, but under this Bill he cannot provide any money whatever for the purpose of assisting at any election—even at his own election—he cannot advance a farthing. The hon. gentleman will see that the result is a confusion between right and wrong, and that it interferes with the liberty of the subject. If a man has the right to vote he ought to have the right to do as other voters do. If a man cannot even while suffering under a wrong, subscribe a farthing to assist to put down a wrong, or remove a corrupt or incapable Government, he is guilty of an offence under this Bill, and this is made a misdemeanor, too; it is made a crime; it is made a heinous crime, and must be punished, not as in the case of the committal of other misdemeanors, by fine or imprisonment, but by fine and imprisonment, he must go to gaol. If he gives five shillings, or if he subscribes against a Government candidate, he can be sent to gaol. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman in his evident praiseworthy anxiety to clear the political atmosphere, has gone much further than any man of common sense, who is not actuated by these high motives which move the hon. gentleman, would care to go. I think that the hon. gentleman has made very considerable progress in carrying out his views, which he has pressed with very praiseworthy ability and perseverance, in getting his Bill so far advanced, as to have come from the Special Committee; and the hon. gentleman, it seems to me, is casting only a very strong suspicion on, and weakens the chance of obtaining the third reading of his Bill by pressing this resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker: We have heard from the hon. gentleman a good deal of verbal criticism with reference to this clause, which is, perhaps, hardly in place. The hon. gentleman announces his opinion on general grounds against this clause at an early stage of the Bill; and he declared, on the first reading of the Bill, I think, or on the second, that this clause must go out, because it is opposed to the liberty of the subject, that is to say the liberty of the contracting subject. He struck a Committee, and this Committee extraordinary to say, followed out his views; and the clause has gone out. We are not here, Sir, to engage in the discussion of "whatsoever," and "whomsoever," and other objections of equal force and weight as to the principle of the clause, which the hon. gentleman has presented to the House. We are now engaged merely in considering the principle of the clause; and when the Bill goes back to the Committee, my hon. friend can arrange the verbal objections to which the hon. gentleman has resorted; and if there are any other defects, as suggested, if the clause goes in some particulars too far, it is quite open to the House to correct any minor defect. We are considering in this vote, the general principle of the clause merely, whether it shall go back to the Committee or not; and it will be in the power of the Committee to deal with any objections, and the precise mode of doing so can be disposed of by the Committee. Now, the hon. gentleman's objection on principle, is that my hon. friend is not logical, and that the Bill interferes with the liberty of the subject. The hon. gentleman is fortunate in a long political experience, such as he has had, for he declares that he has never seen contractors offering any money. Well, I suppose not. Perhaps he did not look. But, I suppose he has heard of it; I suppose he knows of it; and I suppose he cannot but be aware that it has been done; and he cannot but be aware that it has been done with that view—a patriotic view in the interests of the country—with the expectation of being reimbursed, and reimbursed tenfold. It is the relation which the contractor held with regard to the Government of the country, that renders it necessary that restrictions should be placed upon him. That such restrictions should be placed upon him is established by laws now on the Statute-book, because those laws on the Statute-book forbid him to become a Member of Parliament, and voids his seat, if after becoming a Member of Parliament, he enters into these relations with the Government? Why is that? Because it is known that he cannot be indifferent under these circumstances—because it is believed that he will not be independent under these circumstances—because it is believed that his relation to the Government will be one of subserviency on his part, and the relation of the Government to him will be one of paying a price for his support on their part. All these considerations have resulted in our passing, time and again, laws to preclude contractors from being Members of Parliament, and now we are face to face with another proposition in the same direction and based upon the same recognition of the weakness of humanity. The hon. gentleman talks about the rights of the subject, but we have now to consider their frailties—I say we are face to face with another proposition. If a contractor pays a sum of money towards election expenses, he does it, as a rule, because he expects to be reimbursed by an abundant consideration on the part of the Government which he helps in the contest, and, therefore, there is not merely an improper inducement on his part, but there is also this circumstance—that the public is sure to suffer. It is certain that for every dollar he pays he expects to receive a great deal; that for what bread he casts on the water he expects to get back a great deal more after many days; that what money he gives he expects to receive again with usury. These things are certain; they are obvious; they are palpable; and the hon. gentleman proposes that we should agree to the principle of a step which shall remove all those evils, and shall render it contrary to the law that a man standing in any such relations as those to a Government shall subscribe towards an election fund. The hon. gentleman suggests that if the contractor has performed his contract he may have a right to stand. It is a question for discussion in Committee whether that particular portion of the clause should remain or not, and it is immaterial to consider in this debate whether that particular portion of the clause is sound, because we are not restricted to the precise words of the clause as it stands. The hon. gentleman says that this clause would make the man a criminal—that he must actually go to gaol. Only the other day certain men were made criminals if they used the words "banking institutions" on their signs without adding to these words "not incorporated." There was not a great degree of levity manifested as to the right of the subject on that occasion, when the disgrace of making men misdemeanant was imposed for such an offence; but I should like to know whether more harm is done to the body politic by the mischief sought to be remedied by the present Bill than by the acts which were made misdemeanors the other day by the Banking Bill of the hon. Finance Minister. The question is, whether an evil which exists shall be remedied, or whether it shall remain; that is the question of principle involved in the amendment, and I propose to divide with the mover of the amendment on this occasion.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think those who are opposed to the amendment, will be gratified to learn that it finds no defender in the hon. member for West Durham. This Bill was introduced some time ago; this particular clause was in the Bill as introduced; but the Committee to which the Bill was referred, after full consideration, has reported it to the House without that clause. Some days have elapsed; and, it seems to me, it would only have been respectful to the House to have presented, for our acceptance, an amendment which would at any rate meet with some degree of support from the hon. leader of the Opposition. We find that this particular amendment as it stands to-day, and as it is proposed by the amendment to be replaced in the Bill, is so drawn, and contains such provisions that the hon. leader of the Opposition is not prepared to defend it. On the contrary, he says when it goes to the Committee, all its objectionable features may be removed. It seems to me, with reference to this question of contractors, that there are contractors and contractors. There are persons who are in expectation of getting contracts. What will you do with them? We have heard of cases—perhaps they are rare—of this kind: a prominent man in a particular constituency, belongs to one particular party, but when an election takes place, by some strange influence he is found supporting the candidate on the other side. We find a little while afterwards that a letter is written by that particular candidate to the Premier of the day, whom he is supporting—a letter cautiously and properly written—simply indicating that "my friend Moore" is desirous of getting a contract; that he has told him that the Minister will not for a single moment do anything but what is perfectly right. We find that the Minister does not do anything but what is perfectly right; but in some extraordinary way we find that another gentleman, a contractor, though he is strongly recommended even by the friends of the then Minister of Public Works, does not get the contract, but that it is given to the person who changed his politics in the election—the expectant contractor who has contributed time at any rate, and possibly money to the election of a prominent gentleman, and whose influence probably resulted in that gentleman being elected to Parliament—for his majority was only seven—gets the contract at a sum very considerably larger than the other contractor had offered to do the work for. What are you going to do with cases of that kind? It seems to me that if you are going to purify the political atmosphere you must deal with the expectant as well as the actual contractor. There is another method in which such a contractor may exert his political influence in favor of his political friend. He may go on for three or four years contributing to the churches of his neighborhood—a very proper thing to do; but we have seen extraordinary sums, so far as the evidence of the courts disclose, given to churches by gentlemen, and we have seen as the result of those contributions that many of the people connected with those churches are found voting with the gentlemen who had contributed so liberally to their funds. Now, that is not a contribution for election purposes—I should be sorry to believe that generous contributions of that kind had anything to do with the elections; but curiously enough we have seen by the experience of hon. gentlemen in running election contests, that contributions of that kind do have their influence. Now, is a contractor to be deprived of the privilege of using his influence in that way, because it is found that his successive contributions to a number of important objects in the constituency have acquired for him an influence which enables him to give important aid to the candidate of his party? How are we to deal with cases of that kind? It seems to me that we cannot deal with them in any reasonable way, and that there will always be many means by which persons disposed to act corruptly may act corruptly. The hon. gentleman who is the author of this Bill, and who, though not the mover of the amendment, has advocated its introduction, admits that it would be difficult to bring home cases of this kind to any contractor. If such cases are brought home, the law, as it now stands, makes ample provision for dealing with them. If it is found on trial of an Election Petition that a contractor has contributed improperly or corruptly to the elections, that fact can be brought out under the Election Law just as well as it can be under any other process. You can put a contractor in the witness box, at an election trial, and get out of himself how much he contributed. If the hon. gentleman intends to make him chargeable with a misdemeanor of this kind, I hope he does not propose to make him go into the box and give evidence in connection with the charge against himself. If an election case reveals the fact that a contractor has contributed largely to the election of a candidate, the public are warned of that fact, and the relations of the Government to that contractor become matters of such public interest and public enquiry that there is not the slightest danger of any injury resulting therefrom. The hon. gentleman was good enough to refer us to the law in the United States on this subject. Well, Sir, I do not know anything about these matters, because I have not been at Congress or in the lobby there; but if my information is correct, he should have gone to some other quarter for an authority as to a law that is to prevent the improper use of money by contractors. It is a notorious fact that contractors in the States obtain their contracts, and hold them, by means of contributions to party funds, both in the different States and at Washington. Everybody knows that. It is the common talk of the lobby. In fact, the influences of the lobby were found to be so strong, that Congress had to adopt a rule prohibiting strangers from going within the precincts of the House except by a direct vote of the House. But that did not prevent the contractors from going into the lobby. They are still there, and it is notorious that they have always, in spite of the law the hon. gentleman refers to, contributed large funds to political purposes. For my part, I cannot see the difference between the hon. leader of the Opposition to-day contributing a large sum of money to the party funds in a General Election when he himself is to be the First Minister if he succeeds, and a contractor giving a sum of money to a party fund whose relations to the Government subsequently are to be a matter of public discussion, of close scrutiny by Parliament, and therefore of such a public character that there is little danger likely to result. I regard the amendment as one that ought not to disgrace our Statute-book, and I do not hesitate to vote against it.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I am a little surprised at the tone of the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell. He endeavored to resuscitate what was, in the Elections of 1878, by a certain class of gentlemen who arrogated to themselves a great deal of the political purity of the country, considered to be a gross scandal; and, instead of simply pointing to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), as being responsible for the letter which he wrote regarding his "friend Moore," and stating his meaning plainly and manfully, he endeavored to indicate the drift of his remarks by innuendo. His conduct surprises me in a gentleman who is so strong a supporter of that party, who were connected with scandals which were ventilated before Committees of this House, and the evidence of which was made public. If we chose to make reprisals on the hon. gentleman, and bring before the House the recollection of old memories, we might ask him if he ever heard of a contractor, or anybody in the place of a contractor, to whom somebody telegraphed in the following terms:—"My dear Abbott,—Send me another ten thousand; it will be the last time of calling; do not fail me; answer to-day." I suppose the hon. gentleman has forgotten all this—not merely a kindly letter, not a word of which could be construed into an improper act, but a plain request for something tangible for the use of an hon. gentleman, and which he stated in evidence was to be applied to certain purposes. That is the kind of argument we got from the hon. gentleman opposite. My hon. friend here proposes a Bill designed to purify the political atmosphere of this country. The hon. gentleman admits that the atmosphere is not pure, and instead of discussing the measure on its merits, what does he do? He apologises for the contractors; he enters upon their defence. They must not be put into the box and be examined, forsooth! They are the men who furnish the oil—shall I say?—for the machine. No; but they furnish the motive power for elections, as many of us know. I know of elections in which the money of contractors was the most powerful factor in influencing the votes of the people. I know of elections held, not only in Ontario, but in Quebec, in which the influence of the contractors was immense. My hon. friend proposes to correct that, and the hon. member for Cardwell and the hon. First Minister get up as apologists of the contractors, knowing that, if they were deprived of the power which these contractors exercise on their behalf, and, perhaps if everything were known, exercised in the Ontario Elections, they would be considerably weakened in popular support. Are these the hon. gentlemen who are sworn to stand up in the defence of the political influence of the community and the purity of elections, and who raise such pleas as these, in order, forsooth, that their friends, and, perhaps, their assistants, for all I know, may be protected? The hon. gentleman refers to the legislation at Washington. We are aware of the revelations in connection with the Star Route frauds, and we know the way the money was applied. Are we going to have the same system introduced into Canada? We have had enough of it in other forms, and this honest attempt of my hon. friend to correct abuses of that kind is one that should receive the support of every hon. member of this House. I am afraid the apologies these hon. gentlemen are making will be construed into sympathy with the contractors in their attempts to debase the electorate. I have great pleasure in supporting this resolution; and I hope the House will see that rigid measures are adopted for correcting all attempts to corrupt the electors, and for maintaining the purity of our elections for all time to come.

Mr. VALIN. I am glad the hon. member referred to the corruption of contractors in Quebec. I remember that, as the hon. member for L'Islet remarked, there are some members here who should not be here, because they were elected by contractors' money. The hon. gentleman should have given names. I saw lots of people repairing the walls of the city of Quebec who were paid by the Government contractor, if not by the Government themselves, and engaged with the special agreement that they would support the candidate of the Government of the day. I have seen contractors paying money to carters on the condition that they would vote for the Government candidate, or else other carters would be employed. There was also a large sum of money that I know of—I could give the amount—spent at Point Levis to elect the Government candidate there. I do not see why the hon. member for L'Islet comes now with such a Bill before the House. He should have had it passed at the time I refer to, when he was also a member of this House. Then would have been the proper time; and then, under it, the city of Quebec would have been put in gaol. I am opposed to this amendment because I do not think it comes in a proper time.

Mr. MOFFAT. The hon. member for West Middlesex has chosen to act the part of a resurrectionist by reviving slanders against the party in power; but many slanders could be revived against the party that had power previous to 1878, that were more glaring than anything that could be said against the Conservative party. I know perfectly well of one instance when the then First Minister, standing upon the square here, said to a claimant against the Government: "Your county never gives us a vote, and that is the reason I will not entertain an examination into your claim." I would like to know if that was not a glaring fraud perpetrated on the country, more glaring even than the Pacific Scandal.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY, SEDUCTION, &amp;c.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved that Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of adultery, seduction, and like offences, be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to add to clause four the following words:—"Proving the offence to have been committed."

Mr. CHARLTON. This would simply make the Bill a mockery. The clause reads as follows:—

In any case arising under section one, two or three of this Act, the testimony of the female in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain a conviction unless the same is corroborated by other material evidence.

The amendment proposed would simply amount to annulling the evidence of the woman by making the corroborative evidence positive. It would render the Bill inoperative. There is not a Statute in any one of the twenty-two American States dealing with this matter which contains any such provision as the one suggested. The Bill as it stands contains a safeguard with respect to the person charged with the offences that is found in none of these Statutes, namely: that the defendant shall be a witness in his own behalf. The rights of the community have been as carefully guarded as possible, and if the House wish to defeat the Bill, it would be more honorable to do so squarely than in a roundabout fashion.

Mr. BLAKE. I must concur in the observations of my hon. friend from North Norfolk. The clause goes far beyond what was stated by the hon. member for Victoria to be his object. He said the offence consisted of two ingredients: the seduction and the promise of marriage, and that the corroborative evidence might only relate to one of the two. But what he proposes is a clause which provides, in fact, that the whole case must be completely proved, irrespective of the evidence of the woman. That I understand to be the meaning of corroborative evidence proving the offence to have been committed. There is, therefore, to be evidence that shall be provable adequately for the conviction, proving the offence to be committed independent of the woman's evidence at all. That seems to me to be highly objectionable, to be more than is required in any of those cases, that I am aware of, in which there has been a requirement of corroborative evidence at all. It is contrary to what we understand the meaning of corroborative evidence to be. Corroborative evidence is strengthening evidence; evidence which strengthens the principal testimony, additional evidence in the same direction; but by the definition which the hon. member proposes to make in this amendment, it is quite clear that although it is called corroborative in the active part of the clause, it must be in its nature such as would be adequate to establish the commission of the offence, independent altogether of the evidence of which it is corroborative.

Mr. GAMERON (North Victoria). I do not agree with the observations of my hon. friend from West Durham as to the effect of my amendment; but if it were correct that the adoption of the amendment would require the essential part of the offence to be proved by evidence other than that of the principal female witness, I think it would be an amendment that ought to be adopted by the House. I think it is not desirable that we should put the principal person accused at the mercy of any woman, herself as guilty as he is in an essential part of the offence, and have her evidence alone sufficient to convict him. The words of the Bill are simply that the evidence of the woman should be corroborated by other material evidence. Now, I say that that is altogether too vague. Any Judge would be bound to rule, that any corroboration upon any point, however insignificant it might be, but which was yet material to the entire charge, was sufficient to satisfy the words of the Statute. For instance, the parties were seen together, on a particular occasion on which the woman alleged the offence to have been committed, in the neighborhood in which she said it occurred—that would be corroborative evidence of a material circumstance, but it would not be evidence that, in my opinion, ought to be sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the woman so as to secure a conviction upon it. I think the Bill, without the safeguard of the words which I have moved to add, would be open to most dangerous abuse. I think that probably it is a Bill that, if it becomes law, will be abused in any case; but certainly without that safeguard it would be likely to be far more seriously abused than it would be with these words added. I must press the amendment I have moved.

Mr. CAMERON (West Huron). I think, with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that the language made use of by the hon. member for North Norfolk in his Bill, with respect to corroborative evidence, is too vague; but then the hon. gentleman's proposition is a little too strong. Now, to establish a case under the provision of the Bill, two elements must clearly appear for the prosecution—it must be shown that there is a promise to marry, and it must be shown that there was a seduction following the promise to marry. Now, according to the proposition of the hon. member, the woman's evidence, as pointed out by the hon. member for West Durham, goes for nothing, and the case must be proved as if the woman had not gone into the witness box at all. Now, if that is so, it is absurd to call it corroborative evidence; it is new evidence altogether, a new case altogether, depending on evidence entirely distinct from that of the female. If the hon. member had put this proposition to the House, that upon the two material elements of the prosecution there should be corroborative evidence, I would support it. I would support a clause that would read thus:

"In every case arising under Sections 1, 2 and 3 of this Act the testimony of the female respecting whom the offence is alleged to have been committed shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain a conviction, unless the same is corroborated by other material evidence with respect to the said promise of marriage and the seduction aforesaid."

Now, I think that covers the whole case—covers the points of my hon. friend, at all events, as I understood them from his observation—and it will not leave the prosecution entirely dependent upon testimony outside that of the woman. There is no reason in the world why the woman's testimony should not go for something; the defendant is allowed to give evidence, and certainly the evidence of the female in the case ought to be taken as well as his. I will support the proposition if it goes back to the Committee of the Whole, that the evidence of the woman must be corroborated with respect to the material points necessary to make out the successful prosecution; but I shall oppose the proposition to practically eject altogether the evidence of the female.

After Recess.

CRÉDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved the third reading of Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.

Mr. AUGER. I have the honor to move that this Bill be read the third time this day six months. Mr. Speaker, while discussing this Bill the other evening, the hon. member for Bellechasse asked whether we opposed this Bill because it concerned a French company and lent French money. This is not the case; and I do not desire in the least degree to act unfair towards this company. If it merely desired to be placed on the same footing with other organizations of the same character, we would not have objected, or now object, to this measure. This company came to this country in 1880, and applied for an Act of incorporation to the Quebec Legislature, and obtained all they requested. They represented that they could lend money at 6 per cent. on certain conditions, and were incorporated. Later, they secured an Act of incorporation from this House, and extended their privileges over the whole of the Dominion, by which they could charge 6 per cent., including management. I had the honor the other day to show this House that there were two serious objections to this Bill; and its promoters acknowledged their correctness by having it sent back to the Committee of the Whole and amended. It was then suggested that more was required; but the promoters of the Bill refused to assent to any other further amendment. They now wish to be placed on the same footing with other loan companies, and to this I do not object, but they should not receive more privileges. Under this Bill they wish to repeal 44 Vic., chap. 58, which will throw them back on the Quebec Act of incorporation; and they desire to obtain the right to charge 8 per cent. But, under the Quebec Act, they can charge at least 1 per cent. above the 8 per cent. per annum on the principal loaned, which makes an additional per centum and more, because, if for instance, a man borrows $1,000 repayable in $100 per year instalments, he pays 8 per cent. on the principal from time to time due and 1 per cent. additional, not on the amount due as lessened by his payments of $100 per annum, but always on the entire principal, $1,000, until the last instalment is paid. Consequently, under this Bill they could charge 8 per cent., and 1 per cent. for charges of administration, making 9 per cent. for the first year, and 10 per cent. for the second year; while, for the last year, when only $100 remained unpaid, he would pay 8 per cent., and 1 per cent. on the $1,000, making 18 per cent., of which 10 per cent. would be for charges of management. It would be bad enough if the 1 per cent. related merely to the amounts remaining due, but it really refers to the whole of the sum borrowed; and this is more than other loan companies have the right to charge. It may be said that this can be accomplished by private contract; but what is done under private agreement, and under the law, are very different things. When a man signs a contract, he knows what he signs, but when a man enters into an agreement guaranteed by law it can be enforced in the courts, and the additional 1 per cent. so collected. I think that this is unfair to the public. I have no personal interest in this matter. I have never borrowed any money from this company, and I shall never do so; nor do I believe that any of my constituents have ever obtained any money from them. I am only acting in the interest of the general public and for the public good. Why should we, who live in the Province of Quebec, be selected for this sort of treatment? Why is not a law proposed in this respect to apply generally to the whole of the Dominion? If this company wishes so to be incorporated let them relinquish their Quebec charter, and then come before this House for an Act of incorporation, in the same manner as do other like organizations, and to that I will willingly assent. But no; they want that this Parliament should give them the right to charge the same rate of interest as other companies, and, at the same time, allow them the right to fall back on the Quebec charter, which gives them the right to charge 1 per cent. for cost of management. This is a privilege to which they make no reference. They said they have renounced the 127th section of the Act; but every one knows they have renounced nothing at all. Let the company renounce the whole of their special privileges, and come here and obtain incorporation on the same footing as other companies. For these reasons, I beg to move that the Bill be read the third time this day six months.

Mr. CATUDAL (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this motion pass and give my vote without explaining to the House the reasons which actuate me in so doing. If we examine the position of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien, we observe that this company first applied to the Legislature of Quebec, from which it received important privileges. These privileges were conceded with the express understanding that its rate of interest should not exceed 6 per cent. per annum. By a subsequent Act this company renounced the concession under clause 127 of its Act of incorporation, obtained in the Quebec Legislature. This concession consisted in the agreement of the Legislature of Quebec to renounce the right to grant an Act of incorporation for the period of fifty years to any Credit Foncier association which had any representation in France. In consideration of renouncing this concession, the company asks from this Parliament the repeal of what it first prayed for, and also the privilege of charging any rate of interest it might be disposed to ask, provided it did not exceed 8 per cent. per annum. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, it is for this House to consider whether the renunciation of this privilege and advantage is a sufficient compensation to the public for these obtained here and granted to companies of this kind, according to the charter of the Province of Quebec, as the hon. member from Shefford (Mr. Auger) has a moment ago shown. We perceive that this company has secured important concessions, some of which are contained in Section 68, viz.:

- "The annuity, whether of long or short term loans, stipulated in the contract of loan, comprehends:
- "1. The interest.
  - "2. The instalment determined by the rate of interest and the length of the loan.
  - "3. An annual charge for cost of administration, which must not exceed 1 per cent. on the borrowed capital."

The last paragraph contains powers which have already been refused to this company, by this Parliament, and the charter which it obtained in the Province of Ontario does not give it any privileges. The Credit Foncier Association of Lower Canada has not this right. The Trust and Loan Company also has not got it. Why, Mr. Speaker, place the farmers of the Province of Quebec, who may have recourse to this company to borrow, under more disadvantageous conditions than those of the Province of Ontario? For instance, if a farmer of the Province of Quebec borrows $1,000, interest at 8 per cent. per annum, such as this Bill authorizes, payable in instalments of $100 per annum with interest, how much will he have to pay? The first year he will have to pay $100 principal and $80 of interest, and 1 per cent. for cost of administration, which will make 9 per cent. per annum. The second year he will have to pay $100 principal besides $72 interest and $10 for cost of administration, which will bring his money to 9.11 per cent. per annum. The third year to 9.25 per cent. per annum. The fourth year to 9.43 per cent. per annum. The fifth year to 9.67 per cent. per annum. The sixth year to 10 per cent. per annum. The seventh year to 10.50 per cent. per annum. The eighth year 11.33 per cent. per annum. The ninth year 13 per cent. per annum, and the tenth year 18 per cent. per annum, which makes an annual rate for the ten years of 10 per cent. per annum. Now, no other company in the country having this privilege, why give it to this company? It is said that the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien has never charged over 6 per cent. per annum. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that up to this date it never has charged more than 6 per cent. per annum of interest. But the reason is a very plain one; it had not the right or privilege to do it. It has the right, according to the charter obtained here, to charge 1 per cent. for cost of administration on the amount loaned, but the interest and the cost of administration must not exceed 6 per cent. per annum. This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason and there is no other. Now, section 70 says:

"Every semi-annual instalment remaining unpaid when it falls due, ipso facto bears interest for the benefit of the society without notice, at the same rate as the principal loaned. It is the same for all costs of collection, liquidated or taxed, incurred by the society to obtain payment of its loan, and from the date on which these expenses have been incurred. In case of default of payment of the semi-annual instalments all the principal becomes due without further notice."

Well as to the interest on the costs of the collection which the society may be obliged to make, to recover payment of its moneys, this is a privilege which I do not think any other society possesses. The Trust and Loan Company has not this right. The Credit Foncier of Lower Canada has not got it. The charter obtained by the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien in the Province of Quebec, and from this Parliament does not give it this right either; it only enjoys it by virtue of the Act of the Quebec Legislature. Now, as to default in the semi-annual instalments, if a debtor even for a day neglects to make his payment, the company has the right to call in the amount of the entire loan. This is a privilege which it only obtained by agreeing not to charge more than 6 per cent. per annum, and which it should renounce before asking to charge the rate of interest contained in the Bill. The 72nd section of the Quebec Act contains the following provisions:—

“The borrower is required to advise the society within one month of the sale or partial sale, which he may have made of his property.

“In default of this notice within the time aforesaid the Society can call in the balance of the principal.”

It has a right also to the indemnity determined by the last clause of section 71. If a debtor of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadian neglects to inform the society of the sale of mortgaged goods, which he may have made, the latter according to its charter obtained in Quebec, can exact the payment of the amount of the principal which it has loaned, and also impose a penalty of 3 per cent. on the capital repaid. This is a right which has not been given to the Credit Foncier of Lower Canada nor in the Province of Ontario to the Trust and Loan Company. The Federal Act and the Act of the Province of Ontario, does not give this right to the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien. The clause in the Quebec Act says:

“The borrower must also announce within the aforesaid interval, the deteriorations which the real estate may have experienced. The society, if the deteriorations endanger its interests, can exact the repayment of the balance of the loan. In default of notice the repayment is subject to the indemnity authorized by the last clause of section seventy-one. When the borrower advises as to deterioration, the repayment is exacted without penalty.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, we see the privileges which this company possesses. You borrow from it, and if the property which you have mortgaged is deteriorated to any extent, and that these deteriorations are not made known, the company can exact the repayment of the money which it has loaned you, and 3 per cent. besides on the repaid capital. No other company has this right or privilege. For these considerations, in view of the very exceptional privileges which this company possess, and especially the right to impose an indemnity of 1 per cent. per annum for cost of administration, I think it my duty to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Shefford, and give it the six months' hoist.

Mr. BLAKE. On the last occasion when this Bill was before the House I drew the attention of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) to a matter which is deserving of his attention and that of the House. I am not in favor of limiting the rate of interest; it is not the way to make money cheap. But this House has acted with respect to these companies for the last three or four years on a certain principle, and when companies have asked for incorporation it has been granted them latterly on condition that the rate of interest which they were allowed to exact should be 8 per cent. The Trust and Loan Company and other companies were dealt with in that way. This company “the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien,” under the existing law, has the power to charge 6 per cent. only. It came here last Session asking for relief, which was refused it because it had a special privilege, and it was thought that it should not come here and ask to be placed on the common ground. This Session it comes here having asked the privilege to be removed, and now seeks to be placed on the common ground. I supposed when we were voting on the question, as to whether the rate of interest should be 8 or 7 per cent., that we were voting on the question as to whether the company should be placed on the common ground or not. And I saw no reason why, if it was the will of the House that companies should be given power to charge up to a certain rate, which had been fixed at 8 per cent., this company should not have the power to charge 8 per cent. also; and I was therefore perfectly ready to vote against the rate being fixed at 7 per cent. It is quite clear, because the hon. member for Hochelaga has allowed two hon. members to state the proposition and has not disallowed it, that under the Local Act this company possesses a special power to charge 1 per cent. to borrowers for what they call expenses of administration. If you add that 1 per cent. to 8 per cent., which they are allowed to charge, if the rule is followed, the company would really be allowed to charge 9 per cent. interest; nay, it would amount to much more, because the charge for administration is an annual one, and would continue, notwithstanding portions of the loan had been repaid. But, irrespective of that point, it is clear that while we are asked to place the company on the ordinary footing, and that they should have the right to charge 8 per cent., the effect of the privilege by which they are enabled to charge 1 per cent. for administration, would be, as I have said, to place the rate of interest at 9 per cent. I cannot understand any reason why the House should be asked to grant this exceptional privilege, unless it is prepared to say, that all other companies may charge 9 per cent. If there is to be a general Interest Law, fixing the rate at 9 per cent., or 8 per cent., very well; but, is Parliament to deal one Session with companies and compel them to charge not higher than 8 per cent., and the next Session allow similar companies to charge 9 per cent.? I suggested this difficulty to my hon. friend from Hochelaga, and I had hoped he would have proposed to have corrected it, so as to make it clear that this company shall be placed on the common plan. I still hope he will do so, because I cannot consent to support the Bill as it at present stands, so as to practically allow the company to charge 9 per cent., unless we are prepared to reverse our decisions of former Sessions, and allow all loan companies to charge 9 per cent.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I should have been very happy to have voted for my hon. friend's Bill, but as it now stands I shall be compelled to vote against it, unless he is willing to further amend it. Last Session, when this company came to Parliament for new powers, its application was rejected on the ground that it was in the possession of special privileges which had been granted it by a charter of the Province of Quebec; and we then said that, if the company renounced its privileges, we would be ready to place it on the same footing as other loan companies. This Bill has been amended somewhat in that direction; but still it contains one feature to which I have great objection, and this feature is that to which reference has been made—the fact that it contains a clause of the original charter, which gives the company the right to charge 1 per cent. annually for cost of management. If you add that to 8 per cent. interest, it makes the rate practically 9 per cent., and I do not believe any company holding a charter from this Parliament possessed that power. If the hon. member for Hochelaga will amend the Bill so as to place this company on the same footing as other loan companies, and not give it any special privilege, I am willing to vote for it; if he does not do so, I shall be compelled to vote against it on the grounds I have stated.

Mr. OUIMET. I think the hon. member for Shefford is quite correct in the remarks he has addressed to the House, and, in accordance with the practice of the House, in fixing a certain rate of interest to be charged by every loan company which applies here for power. I will endeavor to meet with his suggestion, and satisfy him by moving the following amendment to the amendment, which I think will meet his demand:—

That this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the second clause of the Bill by adding the following words:—“Including the annual allowance for the cost of management.”

That is to say, the clause would read “not exceeding 8 per cent., including the annual allowance for the cost of management.” This amendment will meet the view of the hon. member for Shefford, unless his object is to defeat the Bill. If such is his object, I think this House is not ready to enter upon legislation which is not in accordance with that passed in reference to other companies. I suppose this company is entitled to enjoy all the privileges which are accorded other companies, and I do not suppose that the hon. member would refuse to this particular company privileges, which after all, according to the principles of his party and his leader, are not obnoxious to the people, since the rate of interest is not what fixes the price of money in this country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Many of our Ontario companies charge 7 or 8 per cent. per annum to the borrower, and they charge 1 per cent. for the cost of administration, or for making the loan. And I would like to ask the hon. member for West Durham whether the Quebec Act allows the company to charge a certain amount over and above the rate of the loan, or simply 1 per cent. on the amount of the loan.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe it is 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. But do you know?

Mr. BLAKE. I say I believe it is 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then we will send it back to the Committee to be investigated.

Mr. BLAKE. Speak for yourself.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I am not surprised at the position taken by the hon. member for Shefford, as we know that his object from the beginning was to defeat the Bill if possible, and to refuse to this institution the fair treatment we had a right to expect in this House, after having so far yielded to the opinions expressed here last Session. But I did not expect that the French Liberals of the Province of Quebec would go so far as to declare themselves as a party against the institution itself. It is very evident, having refused to accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet), that their only object in pressing the six months' hoist was to defeat the Bill, and deprive the Province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada at large, of the benefits which must be derived from the successful maintenance of that institution among us. It is all very well to say that by reason of that single clause the people from the Province of Quebec would be in an inferior position compared with the people from the other Provinces. That condition, like others, would have been regulated as every loan and every money negotiation is regulated; that is to say, if the conditions imposed by the Credit Foncier are unsatisfactory, if the lender could obtain better terms elsewhere, he would be fully at liberty to go where he could get better conditions. That remedy is always open to the borrower. But, Sir, I would probably have yielded to the demands of these hon. gentlemen if I had the same faith that they were sincere; but their conduct to-night convinces me that I did right in refusing to them what I am ready to concede to hon. members whom I know to be favorable to the Bill, and to be actuated by a desire to conserve the best interests of the company, as well as those who may come in contact with them. I am ready to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Laval.

Mr. Ouimet.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I think the hon. gentleman is wrong in charging the French Liberals with a disposition to defeat his Bill. He has no right to say so when he has heard some of us, at least, give reasons for opposing the Bill, and point out in what respect we desire it amended. I had just expressed an opinion about the Bill; and certainly, if the hon. gentleman understood me, he could not have charged the whole of the French Liberals with being hostile to the measure. I said I would be happy to vote for the Bill, and I was perfectly sincere in saying so, but I wanted it amended so as to be acceptable to the public. The company say that they seek power to place themselves on conditions of equality with other companies, and they had their charter, which was obtained from the Legislature of Quebec, amended in such a way as to place them on a footing of equality with other companies. I am not hostile to that company—quite the contrary, but I do not wish it to possess powers which other companies do not enjoy. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman the clause in the original charter which I wished amended, so that I might vote for the Bill; but the amendment of the hon. member for Laval will meet my views in that respect, and I am ready to accept it if it can be included in the Bill. I repeat, therefore, that the hon. gentleman was wrong in endeavoring to make a little political capital out of the course pursued by the French Liberals of Quebec.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) has accused the Liberal members from Quebec of opposing the Bill, and the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) has successfully disposed of that statement. I think, however, that hon. gentlemen in this part of the House, who have opposed the Bill, may claim credit for what they have accomplished in the amendments which have already been added to the Bill. When this Bill first came before the House, it was very objectionable in many of its characteristics, and if many of its objectionable features have been removed, the fact is due to the efforts of the hon. member for Shefford and other hon. members on this side of the House. A few days ago, in Committee of the Whole, the hon. member for West Durham suggested just such an amendment as is proposed to-night, and the hon. member for Hochelaga refused to accept it.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The amendment of the hon. member for West Durham was one which had already been adopted by the Legislature of Quebec, so that there was no need of it here.

Mr. FISHER. I believe the suggestion made then was the same as that made to-night, and the hon. member for Hochelaga distinctly refused to accept it without communicating with his friends, and, after doing so, refused to accept it. If this Bill has been amended in several of its objectionable features, it is not due to the promoters of the Bill. If hon. members on this side of the House wished to defeat this Bill, I think they would have fair grounds for doing so. When this company obtained their charter from the Legislature of Quebec, I understand that they only intended to charge 6 per cent. interest, and the prominence which they obtained at that time throughout the country was an advertisement which was of incalculable advantage to them; and any gentleman who knows the rural population, knows that, after they have borrowed from one corporation, they are disinclined to change and borrow from another, so that, although it is now proposed to do away with the advantage which this corporation possesses over other lending corporations, they will still enjoy the benefit of that advertisement and continue to occupy a very large field. This is not the only objection to this Bill. If you study it, you will find that it gives to the company power, in case of any delay in payment, to call in their loans. If this Bill is passed, we know perfectly well that these men will have very great inducements to call in their loans in the Province of Quebec, which they may do on the slightest pretext whatever. I venture to say that in less than twelve months from this day the larger proportion of the money lent will be withdrawn, and lent again at 8 or 9 per cent., instead of at present at 6 per cent., including the cost of management. This is a very serious matter indeed to the agricultural community throughout the country; and I think any member of this House who represents an agricultural constituency may very well oppose, in their interest, the passage of this Bill in its present form. Hon. gentlemen have suggested that this company should be placed on the same footing as other companies. If they would consent to that, they would remove one of the strongest objections we have to the Bill. Although the monopoly clause has been given up, there are other advantages which this company possesses over other companies. I have no hesitation in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. MÉTHOT. I wish to ask only one question of the hon. member who has just sat down. What are the other advantages which the Crédit Foncier possesses over other companies? I must say, also, that I do not think it fair for the hon. member to say that this company will charge 9 per cent. when the promoter of the Bill has just agreed to limit them to 8 per cent.

Mr. AUGER. I repel the accusation that I oppose this Bill on party grounds. I am not here, Sir, as a Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AUGER. I am not, also, here as a Conservative. I want hon. gentlemen to understand that I was elected as an Independent member to support good measures, and I am ready and willing at any time to support any measure that comes from the other side if it is a good measure in my judgment. I am here as an Independent member, and whenever either side of the House brings forward a measure that is for the benefit of my country and deserves my support, you will always find me there if I am alive and well. You will always find me ready to do my duty, and I will not be deterred from doing it because this is a French company. I am reminded of the story of a foolish boy whose father used to horsewhip him almost every day. Some of his companions asked him: "Why don't you behave yourself and save the horsewhipping?" The boy answered: "It doesn't hurt; it is the same whip." So it does not matter if this company is a French company; it must be put on the same footing as other companies. If these hon. gentlemen are not able to frame their own Bills, why did they not come to me, and although I am a layman I might have been able to put them right? But I have to get them right inch by inch. The other day, when the hon. member for West Durham proposed this amendment, it was not accepted, because they thought they could force the Bill through the House without it; and it is only to-day, when they find the sentiment of the House against them, that they are willing to accept it. But there are other objections to this Bill. There is a clause which gives the company the right to force a borrower to insure his building and deposit his policy with the company. If the man is burnt out they may draw the money and keep it, and if the property is diminished in value they can claim the whole amount of the loan. They will say you must pay the whole money or we will sue you. The farmer will say I cannot do it. Then they will say: "Give us 8 per cent. and we will let you off." Have the other companies the same privilege? No. The Crédit Foncier du Canada has not that privilege. This company have the insurance in their hands. They draw the money; but there is one clause that says if the debtor builds within the year the company is bound to pay the money back to him. Suppose a man burns his house, the company draws the money and keeps it. He can go to any one and say build me a house. When the house is built he can go to law, claim his money and get it back, and thus get his building. But with this company it is not so. They keep the money, and if the property decreases in value they foreclose him. They say pay us 2 per cent. more. Hon. gentlemen say that the hon. member for Shefford is opposed to French money coming into the country. There is none coming in. The money is here. They brought it here. They only asked to change this law when they almost failed in France, and had no more money to bring in. Every hon. member remembers the difficulties La Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas fell into a little more than a year ago. This company have lent all their money, and now they want to force those who borrowed it to pay 2 per cent. more. Why was it, last Session, the motion made by my hon friend from St. John (Mr. Bourassa) for six months' hoist, was carried by seventy majority? Did not those that raise the French cry now vote for that motion?

Mr. MÉTHOT. Because the interest was not limited.

Mr. AUGER. I think it was because the elections were coming on, and they dared not go before the public with that measure. But now they think they will be in for five years, and can explain their vote at the end of that time easier than they could after two or three months. I want hon. gentlemen to understand that I am not here as a Frenchman, but as a Canadian in the true sense of the word, and will not support anything French simply because it is French. I will support anything just, and oppose anything wrong whether it comes from Ireland, France or China. I think these hon. gentlemen are wrong in raising the French cry. If these men want to be placed on the same footing as others, let them withdraw their Quebec Act, and I will vote to give them the same privileges as the trust and loan and other companies. This House is taken by surprise. There are about ninety new members here who know nothing about this case, and they come before us with this little Bill. I am not a legislator, and never supposed a man could come before this House with such a Bill and have it passed. Did they bring before this House their rights in Quebec? Did they say we want the Dominion Act repealed? I have to show up this question piecemeal, and it is only when forced by the sentiment of the House that they are willing to amend their Act. That is not the way to legislate. They have no money coming in now, and will not have any for a year. Their money is loaned for a long time. Let them wait for another year if they cannot withdraw the Quebec Act this year, and then let them ask to be placed on the same footing as other companies. They will then find me ready to support them.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Last year, when I had the honor of presenting to this House a Bill on behalf of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadian, asking for certain special privileges, the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by some hon. gentlemen on this side, were, in the first place, that this company enjoyed a great monopoly for fifty years, and, in the second place, that they asked the unlimited power to charge what rate they pleased. The Crédit Foncier took steps to meet those objections by renouncing the monopoly and by asking for the limited power of charging interest at a rate not to exceed 8 per cent. We thought we had thus met the views of hon. members. The only objection raised by the hon. member for East Hastings was that the company was instituted for the purpose of lending money at 6 per cent., and the question of monopoly was raised on the other side. Why so many new objections now after we have met the only two raised. The monopoly has been abandoned and a limited rate of interest asked for. Is that an extraordinary privilege to grant? How many loan companies have been incorporated by this Parliament with the power of lending money, not at 6, 7, 8 or 9 per cent., but at any rate which may be stipulated between the parties? I believe an hon. member quoted not less than fifteen or twenty charters granted by this Parliament giving unlimited power to companies to charge interest at any rate. This institution has rendered great services not only to the Province of Quebec, but to the whole Dominion. From the moment it came into operation, the rate of interest all over the Dominion became reduced from 10 to 6 per cent. We do not want to go as high as 10 per cent. We lend money at 6 per cent. as long as we can get it in France for 5 per cent., and want to be in a position to lend at 7 or 8 per cent. when money in France cannot be obtained under 6 or 7 per cent., and every one familiar with the French money market knows that a year ago it was impossible to get money there under those rates. How can you expect French capitalists to lend money here at 6 or 7 per cent. when they can get that much for it at home. The objection has been made that if this amendment is granted, the Crédit Foncier will, before a year, request all their debtors to refund their mortgages. I am surprised that an objection of that kind should be made. The hon. member should know that in the mortgages of the Crédit Foncier there is a clause, as there is in all deeds or mortgages between loan societies and their borrowers, which says that the money so borrowed shall be repaid in certain instalments, and as long as those instalments are met the debtor is entirely independent and free from the Crédit Foncier.

Mr. FISHER. As long as they are met.

Mr. GIROUARD. But you find that privilege in the special charter of the Crédit Foncier, and I would ask the hon. member who, if he is a lawyer, is a man of common sense, whether it is not permitted to himself, when he lends money—I would not say to one of his constituents, I suppose that would not be politic—but when he lends money to any man, whether he has not a right to say: If you do not pay your instalments, principal and interest within the time fixed, I shall have to request you to pay the whole amount? That is quite regular, and that is the privilege that is asked for by the Crédit Foncier. It is a privilege that exists in common law, and there is no necessity to put it in the charter. It is the same thing with the insurance license: there is a clause which permits the Crédit Foncier to take the amount of insurance which has been effected on the property, as security for the loan. If this is an exorbitant thing it is a thing which has been done in every deed of mortgage, and I would ask every hon. gentleman whether that is not the case. What is there extraordinary in that? Really, I am surprised to hear the objections that have been made to 6 per cent. I think the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has met any objection which has been made by his amendment to the effect that only 8 per cent. would be required including the cost of administration.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not exactly so. The amendment says that 1 per cent. shall cover the cost of administration, but the Bill says that in no case shall the whole exceed 8 per cent.

Mr. GIROUARD. I hope the Bill will be allowed to go to its third reading, subject to the amendment which has been accepted by the promoter of the Bill. I cannot understand why, after all the discussion that took place last year on this Bill, it should not be allowed to go through without opposition. One of the great advantages offered by the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien, is not an advantage to be derived from its charter, although it is mentioned in the charter—which is, that nearly all the moneys which are borrowed are payable by single instalments. That power is given by the charter. Ordinary loan companies may loan their money in that way if they like. In this country the system prevailing is to loan money for a certain fixed period, the interest being payable every year, but in the Crédit Foncier it is payable to the capital account, and the interest is payable by a sinking fund of 7 per cent. per annum, and when the interest is 6 per cent. it takes thirty-five years to pay the whole capital and interest. The company has loaned in this country about one million and a quarter, most of it loaned in that way. The loans are all on long terms, and I have known many of them extending to even fifty years. The promoters of the Crédit Foncier are exceedingly anxious to continue their operations, provided they are placed in a position to get the necessary funds from the French market. To show their anxiety, I may mention here as a fact, because it is within my personal knowledge, that they refused an offer to buy all their mortgages after the Bill was defeated last year. I may say that I made the offer myself to pay them half a million within six months and the balance within a year, but the offer was refused. They are very anxious to continue their operations, and surely no man in the House can say that the terms of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien are ruinous to the country. They ask 8 per cent., and I can quote you fifty loan companies in the country who loan at 9, 10, 11 and 12 per cent.—in fact they can charge any rate they please.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier certainly did not quite understand the points I wished to make in regard to the loan being drawn. Although I am not a lawyer, and not a money lender, I am quite well aware that in the majority of cases when the conditions of the loan are not fulfilled, the lender has a perfect right to close the mortgage. This company is now loaning money at six per cent., and with certain conditions which I know perfectly well the rural population very often find it difficult to fulfil; and when we allow that company to charge an extra 2 per cent., it is a temptation to them to foreclose those mortgages, which I do not believe the majority of money lenders can resist. I do not believe the Crédit Foncier will resist that temptation, and I believe the result I pointed out a few minutes ago will be really brought about.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Last Session I objected to a change in the law, for the reason that, if we allow the Crédit Foncier to loan money at 8 per cent., we would cause all other companies, now loaning at 6 and 7 per cent., to run them up to 8 per cent. Parties who borrow money have to pay for registration and valuation. If we allow this company to charge 8 per cent., then all the parties who borrowed that million and a quarter dollars at 6 per cent. will have to pay 2 per cent. extra, and will therefore suffer an injustice. We make the borrowers pay the solicitors' fees, the valuation fees, and the registration. The hon. gentleman is a rich lawyer and thinks that is all right, but if he was a borrower he would think differently. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman in this House, where is the farmer that can afford to pay more than 6 per cent. interest on his loans? All other companies in this Dominion are kept down to 6 per cent., because the Crédit Foncier have their charter limiting their rate of interest to 6 per cent. Previous to their obtaining the charter, money could not be procured from any company at less than 8 per cent. The hon. gentleman says himself that he offered to buy out the company; he wanted to get clear of the Crédit Foncier, but we want to keep them here. The best evidence we want that the company has sufficient privileges already, is that they do not withdraw their loans. They borrowed this money in France, as it is admitted by the promoter of this Bill, at 4 per cent., and is not 2 per cent. enough for bringing it out to this country, after paying all expenses connected with it? But that will not satisfy them. The countrymen of the hon. gentleman, and the parties in the other Provinces, were told they could have this money as long as they required it; that the loan would be renewed whenever it was due, and that they could have the money for 6 per cent. as long as they wished to keep it. But now their money is gone; money in France is not so plentiful, and they want to make up their losses by charging the people higher rates. This company has been made to do more than one kind of service, and I contend that this House will do a great injury to those parties who have borrowed money for 6 per cent. if they grant this request. It will be deceiving the borrowers; nobody can deny that statement. If we keep the company limited to 6 per cent. we shall keep this $1,250,000 in the country. Other companies will have to keep the interest where it is. I admit this is a serious question; it is a difficult thing to keep interest within bounds, but the very moment we open the door when will it be closed again? Will another company come to this country and ask charters from the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures to enable them to loan money at 6 per cent. Never during the time we shall occupy seats in this House. Hon. members, representing rural and agricultural districts, will do a great injustice if they vote to increase the rate of interest from 6 to 8 per cent., to withdraw a million and a quarter of dollars bearing 6 per cent. to be re-loaned at 8 per cent., and their votes will come up again in judgment against them. Why? It would amount to taking the very heart's blood out of the industrious people of the country, the agricultural class. I say positively that I regret there are not more members in this House sent here to support them and advocate their interests. Some say this is a political matter. I think politics have nothing to do with it, because it is a question affecting the people in every section of the country. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, a gentleman belonging to the French population, was one of the strongest advocates of this company, who endorsed its claims with all the eloquence in his power, pointing out what they were doing for this country and for the interests of agriculturists in offering to loan money at 6 per cent.; yet he now comes here, two years afterwards, and declares the company cannot afford to do business at 6 per cent., but must have 8 per cent., and he beseeched and threatened the House with a view to effect this change. This is a bad system to introduce, and I hope this Bill will not be given the third reading, and that the rate of interest, 6 per cent., will not be changed.

Mr. AUGER called attention to the fact that the hour assigned to Private Bills had passed.

Mr. SPEAKER. My attention having been called to this fact, I must now call Public Bills in order.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY, SEDUCTION, &c.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cameron (Victoria), that the Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of Adultery, Seduction, and like offences be not now considered, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to amend the same.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY, for Mr. CAMERON (Victoria), moved that the following words be added at the end of clause 4: "Proving the offence to have been committed."

Mr. CHARLTON. The wish and temper of the House have been particularly manifested on this matter, and I have no desire to attempt to accomplish what is impossible under the circumstances. The charge made against this clause was that this clause was altogether too vague in the matter of corroborative testimony. I had some conversation with the hon. gentleman who moved this amendment, after the Speaker left the Chair—I regret he is not here to-night—and I understood he would be satisfied with the clause which I am about to submit as a substitute for clause four. The clause which I propose is as follows:—

"Provided that the evidence of the female in respect of whom the alleged offence is allowed to have been committed shall be corroborated by some other material evidence in support of the alleged promise of marriage, seduction, inveiglement, or enticement."

It removes the objection that corroborative evidence on some immaterial point would be held to be corroborative evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it is almost impossible for the House to decide hurriedly on the amendment. We cannot at the moment see what will be the bearing and effect of it. I am very strongly in favor of the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Victoria, which, I believe, will meet the justice of the case.

Mr. WELDON. The same objection which the hon. member for North Victoria took, applies to the amendment just moved: it might extend so far as to destroy the evidence of the female. When the law respecting actions for breach of promise of marriage in England was changed so as to allow the plaintiff to be called as a witness, similar language was introduced to that now suggested. Now, I think that is the language of the English Act; and in this Act it would seem also to be conveyed in the words "promise of marriage and seduction," in the first section; in the second section the seduction in the case of the tutor, or teacher; and in the third clause, in the enticement of a female. It seems to me, that these words convey the exact idea of the hon. member for North Victoria, as to finding corroborative evidence regarding the material facts necessary to prove cases brought; and it is the language of the English Act as I have pointed out.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me exceedingly dangerous for us now to meddle with this matter. The Committee will remember that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) gave notice of this amendment, so that the House might consider the facts; and for that purpose, the debate was adjourned. But now, after notice has been given, and the matter is to come up again, the House is asked deliberately to vote for an amendment which ought to be made in the sense which the hon. member for North Victoria proposed; and to make this alteration now, it seems to me, would be in violence of what we voted necessary the other day—that we should have opportunity to consider the whole subject. In the hasty glance which I have been able to give to the matter, it strikes me that the amendment suggested is not at all such as this House desires should be made. The amendment says:

That is exactly what we thought as to the other evidence; but that is not what we thought ought to be corroborated. It relates to an immaterial part of the offence, and is not what ought to be corroborated; and yet the hon. gentleman now suggests that this is a matter which is material, and which alone should be corroborated. Other words follow; but still they do not follow, as I understand they should follow, in this clause, but are made applicable to the different sections. There are three or four sections—one, two, and three of the Bill—and these three sections were all intended to be met.

Mr. CHARLTON. Seduction and promise of marriage are the offences provided against in section 1, seduction in section 2, and enticement in section 3; and all these separate and several offences are to be supported by corroborative evidence as to each one of them, so that the charge of indefiniteness cannot be raised against the measure; for the nature of the corroborative evidence is clearly defined and specified as to the several charges, which form the charges of misdemeanor in this Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. member is right—and I do not pretend to say he is wrong from the hasty glance which I have had the opportunity of giving to the measure—what difference exists between his amendment and the amendment of the hon. member for North Victoria?

Mr. CHARLTON. The latter amendment states that the corroborative evidence should be positive, and that the offence shall be proven by this corroborative evidence, leaving the evidence of the woman out of the question. It goes on to provide that this corroborative shall be positive evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And corroborative ought to be positive evidence.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the difficulty raised by my hon. friend from Simcoe, might be met by a slight change in the construction of the proposed clause; all that is necessary, is to provide in the first clause of the Bill, that the evidence shall be corroborated as to either promise or seduction, instead of which, my hon. friend from Victoria wishes—and I understood that this was the sense of the House this afternoon—that the evidence of the woman should be materially corroborated—both two things without which, there would be no special offence. Well, that verbal criticism may perhaps be correct; but, it may be entirely got rid of by this slight alteration: That the corroborative evidence shall be in support of the promise and seduction, in reference to the offence specified in the first clause; the seduction, in reference to the offence specified in the second clause; and to enticement, specified in the third clause; thus requiring for both, material corroborative evidence for the offence mentioned in the first clause; and corroborative evidence for the other two offences. This will meet the difficulty, in reference to the motion of the hon. member for North Victoria, and I think that my hon. friend will see the force of it. He says that the corroborative evidence should be adequate to the offence, and puts it whether the evidence of the female primarily, should be accepted altogether in proof of the offence. This would seem to me entirely inconsistent with the motion of corroborative evidence, and I agree that the corroborative evidence should be material, and materially support the two conclusions, namely, the promise and the seduction.

Mr. McCARTHY. The suggestion made by the hon. member meets certainly the views I had on the subject. I thought and think still, that both matters ought to be corroborated, and if this were made as precise as the hon. member suggests, it would meet the views I had, but whether it will meet the views of the House is another thing. I do not know what in this respect are the views of the hon. member for Victoria, or what the House thought ought to be corroborated independent of the evidence of the female; but as far as I am concerned, I will be satisfied with the suggestion just made. I think that the proposition of the hon. member who has charge of the Bill is rather indefinite.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with the hon. gentleman; but that would be placed beyond cavil with that slight alteration.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will be very happy to meet the suggestion.

Mr. WELDON. The object is to obtain material evidence in support of the original offence; and I think that the suggestion made will cover the grounds intended.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the following amendment:—

Provided that the evidence of the female in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed shall be corroborated as to the first section to both the promise of marriage and to seduction, and as to the second section hereof as to the seduction, and as to the third section hereof as to the inveiglement or enticement, by some material evidence.

Bill reported.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 14) respecting carriers by land.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the eleventh clause,

Mr. COUGHLIN moved the insertion of the following proviso, in place of all the words "after parcels or not":—

"And no special contract shall be valid which exempts the carrier from liability in the receiving, forwarding or delivering of any such articles, animals, goods or chattels as are hereinbefore mentioned, for any loss or damage occasioned thereto by the neglect or default of any such carrier or his or its servants.

He said: The clause at present reads thus:

"Except as hereinbefore provided, no carrier shall limit the Common Law liability of such carrier, for the loss of or any injury done to any horses, cattle or other animals, or to any articles, goods or things, whether contained in packages or parcels, or not, in the receiving, forwarding or delivering thereof occasioned by the neglect or default of such carrier, or his or its servants, by any special contract, unless the same shall be signed by the owner or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods or things respecting for carriage."

The special contracts, as you are aware, are contained in bills of lading, which all railways use. In one of these documents the following clause, regarding live stock, occurs:—

"The owner of animals undertakes all risk of loss, injury, damage and other contingencies in loading, unloading, transportation, conveyance or otherwise, howsoever, no matter how caused."

If loss is occasioned by the fault of the railway company by the cars getting off the track, by collision, by the doors of a car getting loose, or by anything for which the railway company is responsible, the shipper has no defence after he signs this bill, and the railway companies will not accept any freight from any shipper unless he signs this bill. I want to hold railway companies responsible for all the goods they carry, and for all loss or damage which is occasioned by their fault or neglect, and I hope the House will sustain me in this amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the object my hon. friend has in view is not to be attained by the method he proposes; if his amendment is adopted it will only make the clause absurd. The way to obtain his object would be to strike out all the words after the words "parcels or not;" but I do not think the sense of the Committee is in favor of that. My notion is that the railway company should have power to make a reasonable and a just contract, but that no such contract should be binding unless it is signed by the consignor. I acknowledge that the railway companies may say, "If you do not agree to our terms, we will not carry for you at all;" but the next clause says that no such contract shall be binding unless it is just and reasonable.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I cannot accept my hon. friend's proposition. He would leave it to a Judge to say what is just and reasonable; but I want Parliament to say that the railway companies shall not have power to make these contracts.

Mr. BLAKE. A little difficulty might arise from the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, apart from that stated by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Companies sometimes have two systems for carrying live stock—one under which they take the ordinary risk and charge ordinary rates; the other under which they carry at a very much lower rate and the shipper takes all the risk. If this clause were amended, the company might be deprived of this right to make special contracts.

Mr. WELDON. We ought not to deprive the company of this right to make a special contract altogether. In the next section we find that the Court has power to declare what is just and reasonable, and if the party were forced into a special contract that was unjust or unreasonable, the Court would not sustain it.

Mr. McCALLUM. In many parts of this country the companies will refuse to carry cattle unless the shipper signs a clean bill of lading, so that he has no recourse.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). This clause 11 does not provide any protection.

Mr. McCARTHY. The twelfth clause gives protection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Many parties sign the bills of lading as they sign insurance policies, without reading all the clauses. In the bill of lading I hold in my hand there are 21 clauses, and the seventeenth clause has three sub-sections, one of which throws all responsibility for damages and accident, loading or unloading, and during carriage on the shipper, even though these accidents may be caused by the negligence or default of the company's servant, and the shipper must sign this bill of lading or the company will not take his stock. There should be some remedy. It would not be reasonable to prevent companies making special contracts, but they should be compelled to have their bills of lading printed in such a way as to direct attention to all the clauses.

Mr. McCARTHY. The eleventh section is simply intended to provide that no special contract shall have any effect, or be binding unless the shipper signs it. The next section establishes that even if he does sign it, and it is not just or reasonable, it is not binding. This is taken from the Act enforced in England since 1854 and which seems to have worked well there, and would not affect the case mentioned by the hon. member for West Durham, because the conditions in it would be just and reasonable.

Mr. ORTON. We all know that railways almost force shippers to sign certain bills of lading if they wish to have their goods carried. My hon. friend from North Middlesex desires simply to do away with special rates. We have always looked upon the hon. member for Simeoe as the champion against any discrimination in rates and I regret he opposes this clause.

On the thirteenth clause,

Mr. McCARTHY moved to add the words "or as to tolls." Bill reported.

PROMISSORY NOTES AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. WELDON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled: "An Act to repeal the duty on promissory notes and bills of exchange," and to declare the law relating to stamps on promissory notes and bills of exchange.

Bill read the second time; and referred to a Select Committee composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Jamieson, Weldon and Wells.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:10 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 29th March, 1883.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 96) respecting booms and other works constructed in navigable waters, whether under the authority of Provincial Acts, or otherwise. (From the Senate).—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Bill (No. 98) for the better prevention of fraud in connection with the sale of Patent Rights.—(Mr. Mulock.)

RED POINT (P.E.I.) BREAKWATER.

Mr. McINTYRE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct a breakwater at Red Point, Lot 46, King's County, Prince Edward Island, next summer, or at any future time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the Department has not the information necessary to direct the building of a breakwater at this place.

SELKIRK PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make Selkirk a port of entry?

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the intention of the Government, at present, to establish Selkirk as a port of entry for Customs purposes.

COTTON WOOD CANON, B. C.

Mr. REID enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to improve the navigation of Cotton Wood Canon on the Upper Fraser River, British Columbia, and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter, Mr. Speaker, is still under the consideration of the Government.

ST. JEAN PORT JOLI PIER.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to ask for a revote, the same as last year, for the addition to the Pier of St. Jean Port Joli, county of L'Islet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the intention is not to drop this vote, but to go on with the work.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION, ADULTERY, &c.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the consideration and third reading of Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of adultery, seduction and like offences, as amended in Committee of the Whole.

Bill considered, read the third time, title amended, and passed.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 6) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanor shall be competent as witnesses; with which are consolidated Bill (No. 2) to amend an Act respecting procedure in criminal cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law; Bill (No. 4) to amend the law of evidence in criminal cases, and Bill (No. 30) to amend the Criminal Law, and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed holes cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented water, said: I may, perhaps, explain, before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the Bill, as amended by the Select Committee, to which this Bill and three other Bills were referred. You will find, in reference to the first section of the Bill, it provides that in all cases of misdemeanor, the defendant, a prisoner, and his wife, are made competent witnesses to give evidence on the investigation and trial. Now, this is not an unusual provision in our law, as you well know. The law now provides that, in cases of assault and battery, a defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and the Bill of the hon. member for Norfolk, which creates a new class of crime, just passed provides that a defendant shall be a competent witness in such cases. The principle is not a new principle, either in Canada or England. The right of defendants to give evidence in their own behalf is recognized in England in some cases of misdemeanors, and you will recollect that by the Plimsol Act of 1871, which made it a misdemeanor to send an unseaworthy ship to sea, thereby endangering the lives of seamen, defendants were made competent witnesses. The same principle has been recognized in Canada, in cases of assault and battery, and this Bill proposes to extend the privilege with one step farther. The position of a defendant is guarded and protected in the second clause of the Bill, which provides that, where a defendant does not see fit to go into the witness box in his own behalf, neither the counsel nor the Judge shall make comments on this fact. The third clause provides that if a person is charged in the indictment with a higher offence than misdemeanor, and it turns out on the part of the prosecution, that nothing more than a misdemeanor is established, the defendant shall then also be a competent witness in his own behalf. There is another clause or two which have relation to evidence in criminal cases, but of a different character to the evidence I have just commented on. It is known, Sir, in the Province of Ontario and elsewhere, that there are certain individuals who, although they do not decline to take an oath, yet upon whose consciences an oath administered in the usual way is not binding. We know that, in Toronto, and I believe elsewhere, the evidence of persons of this class has been rejected upon the ground that they had no faith in the solemnity of an oath upon the Bible as administered in courts of justice. Now, it is not desirable that evidence of this character should be excluded altogether, although such persons may have some peculiar notions with respect to a future state of rewards and punishments, yet in other respects they are intelligent and respectable, whose solemn affirmations may be as reliable as the oath of most men. At all events, we are in this position: that if they do not declare the truth on their affirmation, they are liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment in this world at any rate. We provide, by section four of the Bill, that the class of persons called Agnostics shall be competent as witnesses upon their making a solemn affirmation and declaration that the evidence they are to give in court shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and that, in case they do not tell the truth, they are liable to be prosecuted to the same extent, and in the same manner, as if they had taken the oath in the ordinary way. This principle has been recognized in Ontario, and it is the law in England at the present time. The Legislature of the Province of Ontario, the Session before last, passed an Act making these persons competent witnesses upon their taking a declaration such as I have mentioned; and, in England, these persons are competent to give evidence in the same way, both in civil and criminal cases. Now, there is no reason why the law which prevails in the Province of Ontario, and in the Empire, should not prevail in the Dominion. Another clause was added by the Committee at the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's, (P.E.I.) It makes provision that the Statutes of any of the Provinces of the Dominion be evidence upon their mere production. Now these Statutes require to be proved in order that they may be accepted as evidence; and this clause provides that the production of these Statutes shall be evidence of their having been properly passed, just as our own Statutes are recognized, upon their production, by the Judges in the courts. Clause eight embraces the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). It provides that cutting holes in the ice in certain public places, and leaving the apertures unguarded, or unprotected, shall be a misdemeanor, subjecting the person committing the offence to imprisonment. It is an important clause, and one which, I think, should be passed by the House. We know that in many public places holes are made in the ice, and lives are lost by the carelessness or recklessness of the persons making these openings. It was thought advisable by the Committee that such carelessness should be made a criminal offence, and they have so provided in this Bill. There is another clause in the Bill which the Committee, after a good deal of deliberation, saw fit to introduce. You, Sir, no doubt know that, in our Province, at all events, there has been a doubt in cases of capital felony, whether or not when the jury retire they are entitled, as a matter of right, to have light, heat, and nourishment. I know that some of the Judges on the trial of felonies decline, after the charge of the Judge has been made, and the jury have retired to consider their verdict, to allow them either food, heat, or light, and, in some instances, they have been kept in their rooms for a whole night without either. It was thought that there should be no doubt left upon the subject; and that Judges should henceforth be at liberty to provide these comforts and conveniences for juries if necessary. I believe the law of England is such that juries have a right to be provided with these comforts; but in Canada, as I have pointed out, the Judges hold different views on the subject. The Committee thought that that point should be put beyond doubt, and that juries who are discharging important duties in the interests of the country and the Crown, should not be subjected to all kinds of inconveniences and deprivations, simply because they happened to be empanelled on the trial of a capital felony. These are the principal clauses of the Bill submitted by the Committee, after a good deal of care and deliberation, and I trust they will meet the approval of the House. I move that you now leave the Chair.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to make one observation. I did not understand, when we referred a number of the Bills to the same gentleman, that it was the intention thereby to indicate that the opinion of the House was, that they should all be consolidated. It seems to me that it would be inconvenient that measures with reference to the Criminal Law—the different categories of the Criminal Law—should be consolidated. Of course, the great bulk of the provisions of this Bill deal with matters of procedure, and it might be very well that they should be brought together, but there is also a clause making a new offence—I mean the clause with reference of leaving unguarded holes in the ice—and it seems to me that it would be more convenient when a new offence is created that it should be kept separate from clauses which deal merely with questions of evidence and procedure. I throw out the suggestion as one which seems of some consequence in the framing of our Statutes, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will consider whether or not the particular clause to which I have referred should be made a separate Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that cognate subjects should, as far as possible, be dealt with by one Bill, and that they should not be mixed up as they are in this Bill with heterogeneous matter. Though this Bill applies to the Criminal Law generally, still, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, the eighth clause has nothing to do with procedure or evidence, but creates a new offence. I do not think, however, that it would be well to strike it out at present, from the fact I hope by next Session there will be a consolidation of the Criminal Law, which will include, of course, the proper sub-division of the various branches of the Criminal Law under appropriate heads; otherwise, I should object to this clause being put in the Bill, as it might better be made a separate Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I may state that on this subject there was a difference of opinion in the Committee, and the ground on which the clause in question was inserted in the Bill was the understanding that there would shortly be a consolidation of the Criminal Law.

Mr. BOSSÉ. This Bill, although apparently inoffensive, is really an exceedingly comprehensive measure. It touches the very root and foundation of our laws. The first clause contains a distinction which I for one have not been able to make. I am at a loss to understand why a man would be a competent witness for himself upon his indictment for a misdemeanor, and not be competent for himself upon an indictment for felony. Where the line should be drawn I am at a loss to conceive. Is it thought that his slight interest at stake in an indictment for a misdemeanor would not induce him to perjure himself, whereas his larger interest at stake in an indictment for a felony might induce him to do so? If we admit that distinction, we must see that the clause is a bad one, because it acknowledges the principle that a man might or might not perjure himself, according to the nature of the offence with which he is charged, and according to the gravity of the condemnation to which he might be subjected. In other words, we might say that what might be believed coming from the accused on one occasion, might not be believed coming from him on another occasion, and therefore his evidence would very nearly go for naught. But that clause contains another provision which, I believe, would be subversive of all the rules of morality. It is here provided that the wife can be a witness for her husband, and the husband for the wife. Now, we all know that, as a rule, accusations of misdemeanors fall upon persons belonging to the laboring class. In most cases a conviction for such an offence means poverty for the accused. The wife, standing in the witness box to be heard as a witness for her husband, knows very well that, if a conviction follows, as a result of that conviction some weeks, perhaps some months, of imprisonment will be the lot of her husband, and she sees poverty and starvation staring her in the face. She will, therefore, be placed between her love for her husband, and added to that, poverty and starvation for both herself and her children, on the one hand, and her oath on the other. What will be the result? Does anybody believe that the wife will fairly state the facts with her knowledge with these three evils—to her husband, to herself and to her children—staring her in the face? I say that the evidence of a person placed in such depressing circumstances could not be relied upon, and, in order to obtain it we have the spectacle of that woman placed in that position, contrary to public morals and public decency. The evil is more than that, an acquittal might follow as the result of the perjury of the wife, or a conviction might follow as the result of her telling the truth. In the latter case, what would be the feelings of that man on regaining his liberty and returning to his home. The result of his wife's conduct would be for him ignominy and shame, and rest, peace and love would be destroyed in the household. But if we look at this clause, we shall find it contradictory in its views. On the other hand, it says that the wife may give evidence for the husband, or the husband for the wife, but that they cannot give evidence against each other; then we read:

"But every such witness called and giving evidence on behalf of the accused shall be liable to be cross-examined like any other witness on any matter though not arising out of his examination-in-chief: Provided, that so far as the cross-examination relates to the credit of the accused, the Justice or Justices, or the court, may limit such cross-examinations to such extent as it thinks proper, although the proposed cross-examination might be permissible in the case of any other witness."

What would the evidence in cross-examination be but evidence against the accused? What would be the duty of the Judge under such circumstances? It is easy to see that this portion of the clause could not be put into effect, and this fact shows how impossible it is, with any propriety, to allow a husband or wife to give evidence for the other. Objectionable as this clause is, there are other clauses in the Bill which appears to me to be still more objectionable. I call attention to clauses four and five. I may as well state, at the outset, that I believe them to be, in some respects, unconstitutional. It has been ruled that, in all matters over which this Parliament has jurisdiction, it has power to legislate on questions of proof; but I do not think that we can treat questions of proof as principal matter, and make laws as we do here, and I take it that these clauses are ultra vires. You will also find that articles 255, 256 and 257 of the Quebec Code of Procedure contains special provisions which would be entirely done away with if this law were adopted. I take it also that this section five is useless, because all the ground covered by it is covered by the general Common Law as well as the Statutory Law of the Dominion. In the twentieth volume of the Upper Canada Queen's Bench Reports, I find reported on page 95, the case of the Queen vs. Wah Pah Mag, in which I was told that, without the necessity of any other law, the laws now in force admit of the oath of an Indian being taken in the form prescribed by whatever religion he professes, or by his own conscience, if he believes in God, without having recourse to any particular form of oath. These two sections, therefore, would interfere with our special law in the Province of Quebec, and would be, as far as section five is concerned, useless in the Province of Ontario. Even concurring in the merits of the two clauses, I consider them subversive of law, subversive of respect for the Constitution and respect for the deity. Everywhere, and up to very lately in England, it has been found that whenever men had to decide questions connected with money, honor, or life, it was impossible to leave the decision of those questions embarrassed or biased by predictions, or by the love, hatred, and all the passions of man. It was found that a greater and higher control was necessary, that man, as man, without referring to the Almighty, was too feeble a creature to be trusted in cases where his good or evil passions were brought into play, and something more than his mere affirmation was required in questions of honor, life, or death. At all times, all nations have had recourse to the same guarantee whenever any charge, or duty, or public office of any kind had to be entered upon by any man. Everywhere the oath was administered in order to secure, as much as possible, the honesty and purity of the office. We must bear in mind that the Bill, as it is brought in, may induce us into error. The clause of which I am speaking, clause four, does not refer to particular forms of oath, but goes to the negation of the oath. Except of late years, that negation, never entered into the mind of legislators. In some countries one form was adopted, in others, other forms, according to creed, manners, customs; and though some of those forms might appear ridiculous to us they were far from being so among those who used them. For instance, a Chinaman would take an oath by breaking a saucer, and saying he wishes his soul would be broken in the same way if he should speak falsely. In India, a native takes an oath by touching the foot of a Brahmin, and in some parts by placing his hands on the water of the sacred Ganges. A Jew will take an oath on the Pentateuch with his head covered; in Alsace, he takes it by placing his hand in that of the Judge. Everywhere you will find the same idea of the interposition of the deity, either expressed or implied—the Deus testis and the Deus vindex: in the former, calling God to witness to the truth; and, in the latter case, expressing readiness to submit to all the punishments, in this and in the future life, inflicted for perjury. Are we to abandon now this safeguard which has been everywhere found necessary? Let us reflect coolly before doing so. Let us not, for the mere sake of the word progress, adopt a clause for which we may soon have cause to repent. In 1839, a Bill of similar purport was adopted in England. Had the experience of that Bill been a good one, I would not be prepared to oppose the clause, but we find such has not been the case. Taylor on Evidence, alluding to this matter, says:

"The policy of thus relaxing, in favor of atheists, one of the fundamental safeguards of truth, and of encouraging the public avowal, if not the collusive assumption, of infidelity and irreligion, may admit of a serious doubt; and the more so, as the cases in which any inconvenience could arise from the old law, are unquestionably of very rare occurrence."

In a foot-note, he says:

"The author, during the twenty-five years he has been a Judge of County Courts, has heard the oath administered to at least 250,000 witnesses, yet he cannot recall to mind a single instance where any atheistical objection to being sworn has been raised before him."

This has been the experience of one of the most experienced men of England on the state of things which then was found sufficient to induce the House of Parliament to adopt this law. In this country we have not even the same reason. I am proud to say that, in the course of twenty-four years' practice at the Bar, I have not once found it necessary to have recourse to a law of this character. Not once in my district has there been found any necessity for it. I say, Sir, that there is no reason for such a Bill. It is not right to say in matters of this kind, as I heard it stated in this House the other day, that we ought to be proud to be in advance of other nations in these respects. I say that only extreme, only the direct, necessity ought to bring us to this. We have not yet a Bradlaugh in this House, and I hope we never will have one. But, Mr. Speaker, there is an additional and much more powerful reason than those I have mentioned, which ought to induce us to reject this clause of the Bill. We have all learned at school, we all know, that there can exist no atheist in good faith. There is no man, with the ordinary gift of common sense and reason, who will refuse, who can refuse, to believe in the existence of the Almighty. If he does profess to disbelieve in the Almighty, there is only one conclusion to come to—he is either a crank, or a hypocrite. No man, I repeat, gifted with the ordinary quantum of common sense, can honestly say that there is no God. Therefore, if such a man is put into the witness box in a court of justice, what have we got to think of him? Either that his judgment will be biassed by some defect of his mind, or that he is so much governed by his passions as to be a hypocrite. What credence can we put in his evidence? Can we take the evidence of such a man in questions of life or death? Dare we put the honor and fortune of our fellow men in the hands of such an individual? I say that no juryman will believe him. Every juryman in the box will say that he is either a crank or a hypocrite, and will refuse to accept his evidence. If such will be the result, why should we place on the Statute-book the declaration that in this, our Dominion, we recognize atheism as existing among us? If we must recognize atheism as existing in this country, why should we give it special privileges, and allow a man who has the audacity to say that there is no God, a privilege that no other man in this country can enjoy? Why should we put upon our Statute-book an invitation to the poor, miserable creatures who make such a profession of faith, to come here and receive from our Legislature that welcome which other nations refuse them? Are we going to say that those who are spurned by all reasonable men, shall be recognized in our laws as having the right to testify in courts on an equal—aye, and on a more than equal—footing with their fellow-men? Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain from calling your attention to the fact that we are asked to legislate in direct contradiction to the prayer which we offer at the beginning of each sitting. We pray that religion and piety may exist in the Dominion of Canada, and in all Her Majesty's possessions. Is it in the name of that prayer; is it in accordance with that prayer, that we are going to declare that atheism must be recognized in our laws? We have repeated that divine prayer: "Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name." Is this the way in which we are going to hallow that name? Is it by consecrating impiety and atheism, and recognizing them as standing institutions of our country, that we are going to testify, as legislators, that we do hallow the name of God, and respect and revere it? I hope that I have said enough to show that we ought not to adopt the clause to which I have referred. Wherever a similar law has been adopted it has done no good, and has been shown not to have been necessary. As to section five, I consider it not only harmful, but useless, because it adds nothing to the law we now have, and is bad for another reason. It is there stated that:

"5. If any person, called as a witness in any court of criminal jurisdiction or in any civil proceedings, in respect of which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction in this behalf, or required or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition in the course of any such proceedings, shall refuse or be unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn, or shall declare that an oath is not binding on his conscience, it shall be lawful for the court, or Judge, or other presiding officer or person qualified to take affidavits or depositions, upon being satisfied of the sincerity of such objection, to permit such person, instead of being sworn, to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration in the words following, that is to say:—

"I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare, that the taking of an oath is 'according to my religious belief, or not binding on my conscience, as the case may be,' and I do also solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare that, &c."

This clause is not only bad for the reason I have stated, but it is too general. If we are to pass any clause of that kind, we ought to say that every person brought up as a witness, if he professes to believe in God—because the presumption is that every man brought up in a Christian country does believe in God—if he has any scruple in taking the oath, if the form which is offered to him is not the form prescribed by his own religion or creed, then he will be allowed to take the oath according to his own particular religion or creed. I believe that would add nothing to our present jurisprudence; but if it is desired to pass it, let us pass it in that way, that each man shall be allowed to take the oath according to the form of his own religion and creed. No legislation can interfere in matters of religion. Every form of religion is recognized by our law, and no Government and Legislature can interfere between God and a man's conscience. If a man's conscience tells him that he cannot take the form of oath which is tendered to him, or cannot make the affirmation which is tendered to him, let him take one which his conscience will approve. Let him follow his own conscience according to his own creed, and then we will have a sufficient guarantee, a guarantee recognized by every nation, that the man is a fit and proper witness.

Mr. LAURIER. If I have any fault to find with the first section of this Bill, it will be for reasons totally different from those which have just been urged by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre. He objects to the accused in all cases of misdemeanor being allowed to testify in his own favor. In my judgment, the clause is not only a good one, but I see no reason at all why the same provision should not be extended to cases of felony. I see no reason why a person accused of felony should not be allowed to testify in his own behalf, as well as a person accused of simple misdemeanor. It has been proposed to make it a principle of our law—to give all parties accused of misdemeanor the option of testifying in their own behalf, and of giving their version of the facts. Not only is clause eight a good one, not only is the principle a good one, but I think it is within the knowledge of almost every one, that our courts of justice, on many occasions, will, to some extent, connive at what is not in the law of the present day, and allow the prisoner to testify in his own behalf. We have all heard of a case tried recently in Ottawa where the Judge, to some extent, allowed the prisoner to testify in his own favor. It was a case of murder. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was defending the prisoner—I am sorry he is not now in his seat, so that if I misrepresent the case he could correct me—and according to the report of the case which I read, that gentleman, while addressing the jury, was allowed to read a letter or statement in writing, wherein the prisoner gave his version of the facts, and the Judge said it was for the jury to believe those facts, or not to believe them. If this be true, that was, in my opinion, admitting the prisoner to testify in his own favor, and to admit the prisoner to testify in the very worst sense, because the Crown had no opportunity to cross-examine the prisoner on his own statement. If the proviso embodied in this Bill had been law the prisoner might have taken his choice of walking into the box and giving his own version of the facts, and the Crown would have had the privilege of cross-examining him, with a view to eliciting the truth, as the Crown believed it to be. So I do not agree with the hon. member for Quebec Centre, who urges that this section should be struck out of the Bill. If it be defective in some manner it is because it does not go far enough. Of course, this is a new feature, and as a new feature it is liable to be misconstrued; but the hon. gentleman will remember—and I am sure the hon. Premier will remember—the storm of opposition raised, in the Province of Quebec, when Sir George Cartier, twenty years ago, introduced a new principle in our Civil Law, that a party could be compelled, by the adverse party, to enter the box and be examined as a witness. I remember distinctly at that time some of the most eminent Judges on the Bench said it was an invitation to parties to commit perjury. Our experience, however, has been such, that at this moment scarcely a case has been tried in that Province where both parties are not examined by the adverse parties. A case always commences with the examination of the party who is put in the box by the adverse party. The law has worked well, and that the same provision applied generally will work well, is clear. The only point in which I take objection is the last proviso in the first section, which runs as follows:—

“ Provided, that so far as the cross-examination relates to the credit of the accused, the Justice or Justices of the court may limit such cross-examination to such extent as it thinks proper, although the proposed cross-examination might be permissible in the case of any other witness.”

I do not see any reason why more favors should be extended to the accused than to another witness. If a witness is placed in the box, not of his own motion, but by process of court and against his will, he can be examined and forced to answer any questions put to him, however objectionable they may be. The operation of the law may be a hard one, and perhaps it is; but, if the principle is too hard in its operation, it must be struck out of the general law as it now is. On the other hand, if it is reasonable that, under the law of the land, witnesses can be cross-examined on any subject, I see no reason why the same rule should not apply to an accused. There is a further reason. In this case the accused is a voluntary witness and enters the box of his own motion, and there is no reason that I can see, why more favors should be shown to him than to any witness compelled by process of court to enter the box. As to the other clauses of which the hon. member for Quebec Centre has spoken, I have nothing to say. If they are objectionable, they can be eliminated in Committee of the Whole; but the Bill is a good one, and the principle should be affirmed.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not agree with the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) in his reply to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Bossé) when he states that the very able argument made by the latter hon. member against the first two or three clauses of this Bill, simply goes to show that the Bill does not go far enough. The point in which this Bill differs from the legislation of a similar nature attempted in England, is that the Bill which was criticised there as being a compromise of the original question involved, applied to all indictable offences. This original has for some years occupied much attention in Great Britain and other countries; it has been discussed at great length, and the arguments, pro and con, have been fully placed before the people. But when the question first came before the people of England, it was in a totally different shape to that which it has assumed here. At first it was proposed that the prisoner should be permitted to make his statement, and, finally, the Committee which was appointed by the House of Commons to consider the Criminal Code Bill, reported to the effect that the prisoner should have the option of testifying in his own favor on oath. That was regarded as an unsatisfactory compromise of the question there. The Right Hon. John McLaren, Lord Advocate, in a very able address, delivered in Scotland on the work of that Committee, so criticised that part of the report; and I think, when we find in Canada a Bill introduced in this shape, differing from the Bill discussed in England which applies to all indictable offences, that instead of weakening the argument of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, it goes to prove that the principle taken all-in-all is a dangerous one. Feeling, as I do, that the principle of the first three clauses of the Bill is a dangerous one, and as it concerns a most important question connected with the Government of the country, the administration of the Criminal Law, I consider it necessary to point out what I have ascertained as regards this Bill, and the history of the advocacy which a short time ago prevailed in England on this subject. A very eminent man, whose name is quite familiar to hon. members of this House, now a Judge of one of the English Courts, Sir Fitzjames Stephens, when he began the work of codifying the Criminal Laws of England, introduced, in 1879, in the House of Commons, a Bill for that purpose. That Bill was then referred to a Committee of the House of Commons, and finally a Commission, towards the end of the Session, I think, was appointed, consisting of very eminent men, Sir Fitzjames Stephens was one of them, and the others Judges, who went over an immense amount of material, and over this question from beginning to end. A draft Bill was submitted by that Committee, containing no less than 500 different sections, though the Bill originally consisted of a much less number. Now, it has been stated, and I think very fairly, in connection with this Bill, that it was proved to the country at large, from the researches of these gentlemen, that the last part of this Bill, relating to procedure in criminal cases, had been hurried through and ill considered. The Lord Chief Justice of England, in June, 1879, in criticising the measure, began, and continued in subsequent letters, remarks in this connection, stating that the immense amount of the duties of the gentlemen engaged on the work, and the short time bestowed upon it, was apparent from defects in many parts of the Bill, and more particularly in the latter part of it, relating to procedure. The Commission itself was divided.

The question in England at that time, discussed as it had been by the magazines of the day, and on the floor of Parliament, was not in such a shape that this Committee dared to undertake to state, as their opinion, being the result of their labors—like other men of other countries, and in the country to which they belonged—that this reform should take place. If it will not trouble the House, I would like to read from that report, because it is, at the very basis of the discussion to-day, the remarks that the Commission which was appointed for that purpose made in reference to this feature of the Criminal Code of the Bill—and the feature of the Bill which is now before this House :

"We have passed over section 523, which enables the accused to offer himself as a witness. The Bill contained a clause (section 368) enabling the accused to make an unsworn statement on his own behalf, subjecting him to cross-examination of a restricted character. For this we have substituted"—

I may here say that the substituted section corresponds with the principle of the section before us, excepting that it applied, as I stated before, to all indictable offences, and was not confined to misdemeanors.

"Section 523, which renders the accused, and the husband or wife of the accused, competent witnesses for the defence. As regards the policy of a change in the law, so important, we are divided in opinion. The considerations in favor of and against the change have been frequently discussed, and are well known. On the whole, we are of opinion that if the accused is to be admitted to give evidence on his own behalf, he should do so on the same conditions as other witnesses, subject to some special protection in regard to cross-examination."

Now, as I stated before, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, shortly after this report was made, published a review of the subject, and thus criticised this part of that report:

"The code prepared by the Criminal Law Commissioners offers what to my thinking is an unsatisfactory compromise of the question. The proposal is that the accused person should be entitled to tender himself for examination, and should be subject to cross-examination by the prosecution, but that the prosecution should not be entitled to examine the accused in the first instance. This was, in effect, giving an option to the prisoner—not only as to whether he should answer the questions, but as to whether any question shall be put to him. I see no reason why the feelings of an accused person should be consulted to this extent."

Well, after that, when the matter came before the public, it met with very hostile criticism. Lord Justice Brett very virulently opposed any change of the kind as a most dangerous innovation. In a charge to a grand jury at one of the Assizes, he came out very strongly indeed against the principle of that portion of the Bill in toto; and other eminent men have also discussed this subject at great length; and, finally, what was the result? In June, 1880, as the result of the labors of these eminent men, Attorney-General Sir John Holker introduced a Bill, and if this is examined, it will be seen that the Attorney-General omitted entirely this clause, which evoked such an interesting and hostile discussion in the country. Well, as we are all aware, the labors of the House of Commons were then very onerous with regard to other important matters, and the whole subject of the Criminal Code was necessarily dropped at that Session. Later on, as late as 1882, a Bill was introduced by the Attorney-General of the day, who, in discussing the question, and in going over the whole matter previous to the introduction of the Bill, omitted all reference to the question which we are now considering, and he neither explains why he did not include it in the Bill, nor did he take up the question and offer it for discussion on the floor of the House then; but he brought in a large Bill on criminal procedure, which, he said, was based upon the report to which I have referred, and from which he had largely drawn most of its clauses. But it will be found, as I have stated, he said the then feeling in England was not ripe for such an extraordinary change in the Criminal Laws of the realm. Now, I do not wish to occupy the time of the House in discussing the pros and the cons of this question. As I have already stated to the House, it is a question which I am aware has been most ably discussed on both sides, and it is a question which has necessarily occasioned able arguments on both sides. We know that very important States in the American Union have adopted this change, this reform, years ago; but I think that they were in a different situation, as regards ideas of law, though they still retain the Common Law of England, than we are, or the people of England are, for, if both before and since Confederation these British Colonies have most zealously adhered to anything in connection with Great Britain, it is in reference to criminal legislation; and I think we frequently hear the strongest arguments that can fortify any proposal in this House, and notably in regard to the reform proposed in this Bill, with respect to people who cannot conscientiously take an ordinary oath, are based upon some Bill introduced in the Imperial House of Commons—and rightly, too; because the whole world can regard with pride, not only the criminal legislation of that kingdom, but also the effective and efficient manner in which it is carried out, not only in ordinary times, but also in the different crises which there occur—such, for instance, as the manner in which the laws are administered in England to-day—and the extraordinary manner in which crime is not only investigated, but the fair and impartial manner in which criminals are tried, and the speedy justice which is administered in every criminal court of that kingdom. It is a matter of just pride, not only to the Englishmen at home, but to the Britishers here, that the Criminal Laws of that country stand so well in comparison with the laws of other countries. We will compare them in connection with the general view of this question. Taking the experience of the American States, is there a man in this House, is there a man who wishes to advocate the passage of such a measure as this, who would compare for one moment the experience of the criminal courts of the American States, which have adopted this law, with the manner in which the Criminal Laws are administered at home? I venture to say that no man standing here would point with any confidence to the history, under this law in any State of the Union, and challenge comparison with that of Great Britain; and in those respects, the laws, as I say, are widely different. At the root of it all comes the difference between the criminal legislation of the continent and that of Great Britain. Years ago, the system of torture in Great Britain in criminal matters, which for a long time disgraced the European continent, existed; it consisted in torturing prisoners, and under it innocent people were often compelled to convict themselves by a long and persistent procedure. If one wanted to go very fully into this matter, he could mention cases such as where a prisoner—in France—not many years ago, under that barbarous system, was, day after day, and night after night, questioned and cross-questioned, and told time and time again, in the most emphatic manner,—it was stated, and repeated, and persisted in, that she was guilty of the offence; they were simply working upon her feelings—mesmerising if you like—persistently arguing with her, and charging her with the crime, and to get rid of the worry and the trouble to which she was subjected she confessed that she had committed the crime. After the law had been carried into execution it was discovered that she was entirely innocent of the crime and unconnected with it in any respect whatever. This, it will be said, is an extreme case, but the principle is the same—the principle of putting a man, often a weak, ignorant, and illiterate man, in the box, and allowing an able Attorney-General, experienced in cross-examination, who, no matter how impartial he may be and how properly he may administer his duties, is nearly always of the opinion, from constant practice in prosecuting, that any man who is put in the criminal docket is a guilty man. I say that I defy an innocent person, and particularly an ignorant or illiterate person, to undergo such an ordeal for several hours without breaking down in some parts of his story. The very failure to tell a narrative correctly from beginning to end several times over, is liable, in the opinion of certain people, and according to the criticisms of able counsel, to put such a prisoner in an improper and sometimes unfortunate position before a jury. It has often been a matter of comment in papers and magazines, which have discussed this subject, that it is a most difficult thing for an honest and innocent man, with the fullest intention of telling the truth, to relate a narrative two or three times over, and make it exactly the same each time. Embellishments are often made; matters which the person telling the story considers of small importance, are frequently changed, and finally, if the story is told four or five times over, many important differences will occur. Any person who is at all familiar with the practices of the courts of law, will see that the weakness of human nature is taken great advantage of in these courts; the witness is compelled time and again, and no matter how long the interval which may have elapsed between the different examinations, to tell the story over and over again for the purpose of seeing how his different accounts of the same incident compare. Are we to place prisoners under this law—prisoners around whom so many protections are thrown by the laws of our country, and the laws of the Mother Country—in such a position as that? The hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill will, perhaps, tell me that he has made provision for that by the clause to which reference has already been made, and which gives the prisoner an option—he will say that this clause will protect an innocent man whose counsel thinks him too weak, or too illiterate, to stand a cross-examination, innocent though he be. In answer to that argument, I would point to the experience which was had under this very law in the State of Maine, where this clause was held and proved to amount to nothing. Judge Appleton, in giving his opinion on the question when it was brought before the Supreme Court on a writ of error, stated, that whether the Legislature had enacted that clause or not, made little difference, as it amounted to nothing in effect; and he held that it was no misdirection on the part of a Judge in Nisi Prius, to instruct the jury that the fact that the prisoner did not go into court and tell the whole story, was a strong feature in proving his guilt. Whether the law was so or not, or whether he was right or not, I say that ten men out of twelve on a jury, who see a prisoner who is charged with a crime, stand in the dock day after day during his trial without opening his lips in reference to the testimony, would infer that his silence was an admission of guilt—they would infer that there was something wrong; and yet that prisoner might simply be obeying the instructions of his counsel, who, not with a fear of any admissions of guilt, but believing that it would be injudicious and unadvisable to put a man of his temperament or education in such a position of peril, advised him not to give his evidence. The result would be a miscarriage of justice. I say, further, that the old theory or maxim, that no one is bound to criminate himself, is a healthy one, and the moment this question is brought up these legal reformers will have to step into another department. They will have to pay attention to civil matters, where no effort has been made in the direction of change in this respect; for if this new principle is right, then the old maxim to which I have referred, and under which our laws are administered in the courts every day, is wrong. I contend that the very fact that able men such as Stephens himself—a man of high and admitted influence in England, to day—have failed in all their attempts to induce the British House of Commons at this period of their history to make a reform of this kind, augurs very badly for the principle of this Bill, and that such a result must have been attained from the experience of countries which are now working under measures similar to this. I think I have already stated, that a very strong argument against this Bill is the one in connection with the encouragement of the crime of perjury. It is well to bear this in mind, for there will no doubt be great inducements, especially to the hardened and clever villain, to take advantage of this Bill. It is often said that it is a difficult thing to tell what is not true in such a way as to bring conviction to the minds of a jury. But, under such a measure as this, there will be given an opportunity for the clever, cunning, and experienced criminal to take the stand and by making one simple statement avoid the danger which he would incur by telling a long narrative. Thus, instructed by his counsel, giving the finishing touch to the fiery eloquence of that counsel—sometimes not much better than himself—and giving him the opportunity of making a simple contradiction of the most important evidence adduced by the prosecution. Any gentleman who is at all conversant with the administration of criminal justice even in Massachusetts will admit that such things frequently occur. This was notably the case in the Piper trial, in which the prisoner was proven guilty of a shocking murder by evidence which I consider was clear and unmistakable. The press of the city of Boston, in which the trial took place, commented very strongly on the subject and contended that there was not the slightest room for doubt as to the guilt of the prisoner. But this man Piper was so astute and conducted himself with such a degree of cunning that the first jury before whom he was tried disagreed upon their verdict. That was the argument of the prisoner's counsel, and so well did he succeed that, as was afterwards shown, the prisoner almost escaped. If we can mention cases of that kind it is not hard to believe that there would be many other far more alarming cases happen in our midst. For my part, I cannot bring to bear on this subject the great experience of the hon. member for Quebec Centre; but the short experience I have had in another Province has induced me, perhaps at too great length, to occupy the attention of the House in defending the maintenance of the present law in this respect, and in opposing this clause of the Bill. In conclusion I may explain that I formed one of the Special Committee to which was referred the Bill (No. 6) which contained this clause. I was not then aware that it was irregular to serve upon a Committee on a Bill to the principle of which one was opposed. In regard to the other clauses of the Bill I am highly in favor of every one of them.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I desire to say a few words in reference to that part of this Bill which formed the Bill which I introduced into the House. I refer to clauses four, five and six. With regard to the first three clauses of this Bill, I agree with almost everything that has been said, and said so well, by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper). I also was a member of that Committee, having been appointed to it in my absence, and my own Bill was referred to the same Committee. I have very great doubt as to the advisability of enacting the first three sections of this Bill. The remarks of the hon. member for Quebec Centre are to my mind very forcible. I cannot understand, if a person is qualified to give evidence on his own behalf in a case of misdemeanor, why he should not be equally qualified to give evidence in a case of felony. I know that some of the County Judges of Ontario are in favor of a law of this kind; but after a good many years experience at the bar, I cannot say that I have come to the conclusion that it would be desirable to amend the law in the direction of the first three clauses of this Bill. With regard to the other clauses, which have been so strongly opposed by the hon. member for Quebec Centre, I wish to state, first of all, that although the Bill originally containing them was introduced by me last Session, and again this Session, I did not do so because I have the slightest sympathy with those people who profess not to believe in the existence of a God. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have no sympathy whatever with these people. I think they are to be commiserated with because they cannot make up their minds, as the great body of Christian people do, that there is a personal God. But it appears to me that that is not the question before the House, and that it is not involved in the principle of this Bill. This Bill is not in the interest of agnostics, so called; it is in the interest of public justice. It is of the first importance that every person who is charged with a crime should have the benefit of all the evidence that can be brought in his favor, while on the other hand the prosecution should have the same advantage. It is fortunate for the hon. member for Quebec Centre that he lives in a part of the country where, in the course of twenty five years experience at the bar, he has not met with more than one or two cases of witnesses being disqualified because they could not take the oath. My experience, I regret to say, has not been of that character. My experience is that many men are disqualified from giving evidence because they have conscientious scruples against taking the oath, and are unable to say that they are satisfied of the existence of a Supreme Being. There are many men, too, who are not so unscrupulous that, whether they believe in the existence of a God or not, they will declare that they have doubts, in order to avoid giving evidence. But the conscientious, truthful man, who occupies a respectable position in society, who proves himself, in all his actions in life, to be an honest, straightforward man—and who goes into the box, and says that he has doubts or scruples, and cannot take the oath—I say that man acts as praiseworthy a part as any man can. It requires a good deal of moral courage for a man of such a character to go into the witness box, and openly in Court declare that he has doubts about the existence of a Supreme Being. The statement of such a man is as likely to be truthful as that of any other witness. Now we know in the course of civil and criminal cases that often a person happens to be the only witness to a transaction. The counsel opposed to the side on which that witness is called, may know he has doubts as to the existence of a Supreme Being, and for the purpose of getting rid of his evidence will make the objection. The evidence is ruled out under the law as it now stands. In the Province of Ontario, on the civil side, a man of that kind is competent to be a witness. He is also competent to be a witness in England, since 1869, when a law was passed to allow of his evidence being taken. Although the learned authority—Taylor on Evidence—from which my hon. friend from Quebec Centre has quoted, may, with scores of lawyers, and a few Judges, be opposed to the principle, yet we do not find there has been, on that account, any effort whatever on the part of the Parliament or people of England, to repeal or modify that law. On the contrary, it has been found to be a beneficial law. Now, this Act merely declares that:

"4. If any person called to give evidence in any criminal proceeding, or in any civil proceeding, in respect of which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction in this behalf, objects to take an oath or is objected to as incompetent to take an oath, such person shall, if the presiding Judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect on his conscience, make the following solemn promise, affirmation and declaration:

"I solemnly promise, affirm and declare that the evidence to be given by me shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Mr. BOSSÉ. "So help me God."

Mr. ROBERTSON. My hon. friend on my left says: "So help me God." It is not necessary, to make a man tell the truth, to say that at all. Any man who is qualified to be a witness can tell the truth just as well by making that declaration as if he called God to witness at the end of every sentence. Therefore, while I sympathize with the sentiments uttered by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre, yet this law goes far in this way: that although a man may not believe, he can swear by God, yet he has the fact placed before him that if, under a solemn declaration to tell the truth, he tells what is not true, he is liable to the pains and penalties of perjury. And I believe that in many cases such considerations as those govern a man more than the consideration of a hereafter. That is my experience as a counsel of some thirty years standing. I do not see why persons qualified, as they must be, before they can take this oath or affirmation, should be excluded from giving evidence. This matter has not been brought before the House unadvisedly. In many cases in our courts in Ontario, the Judges themselves have regretted that there was not such a law upon the Statute-book—that persons were excluded from giving evidence because they had those doubts. I cannot understand why they should be excluded. It is not very long ago since the Mennonists, a Christian people, were not allowed to give evidence because they could not conscientiously take an oath; but in 1809 the law was amended so as to allow them to affirm. In 1829 the law was extended to the Moravians, who up to that time, were not qualified on the same ground to be witnesses. It is not very long ago since the parties in civil cases could not be witnesses if they had any interest in the result, but that has all been done away with. It was extended by degrees in this way: First the plaintiff had the right to call the defendant or the defendant the plaintiff, but neither could call himself. Now, however, either party can be a witness for or against himself, and is compelled to give evidence. Even then the law was not extended to all cases, because in some cases, which it is not necessary here to mention, a plaintiff or defendant could not be a witness on his or her own behalf. In the last year or two that law has been extended, and now all persons in civil proceedings are compelled to give evidence for or against himself. This being the case I came to the conclusion that this was a proper law to introduce. When I first introduced the Bill I had an idea that perhaps—as the Bill passed in England it did not apply to Scotland—it would be well not to apply this law to the Province of Quebec, but after consideration I proposed to extend the law to the whole Dominion as it was desirable we should have throughout one Code of Criminal Law. I am satisfied my hon. friend from Quebec Centre is wrong in the conclusion he has come to as to the impropriety of a law of this kind. However he has a right to his opinions which he has expressed so eloquently, but I see no reason whatever, so far as that part of the Bill is concerned, why it should not become law.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Mr. CURRAN moved that the Committee do now rise.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

SPEEDY TRIAL OF INDICTMENTS AGAINST CORPORATIONS.

Mr. WELDON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 83) to amend the Acts respecting procedure in criminal cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law, said: The object of the Bill is to provide a speedy mode of trying indictments against corporations. At present the system is such that we have to proceed by certiorari, in the Court of Queen's Bench or the Supreme Court, and then call upon the accused to file their plea, when the case is sent back to be tried at subsequent Assizes. The result is that the delay frequently causes a failure of justice. By the mode suggested in this Bill, parties can be compelled to appear at the assizes, of course being subject to the same rule as other defendants, where in the interests of justice, or in order to enable them to make a proper defence, a postponement can be had. The Bill has been suggested to me by one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, a case having occurred there where a great failure of justice took place in consequence of delay. The Bill has been submitted to the Minister of Justice for his approval.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cordially agree with the hon. gentleman that this is a very good Bill. It will prevent a failure of justice in many cases, and will prevent vexatious delay in proceedings by corporations who do not choose to resist, perhaps, well-founded claims.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to enact a law similar in principle to the law now in force in Australia, and entitled the 'Influx of Chinese Restriction Act, 1881.'

He said: This subject which has been before the House on several occasions, and to many hon. members it is not new, and hence I think it will be useless for me to speak at any length, feeling, at the same time, confident that a question of this kind will be favorably received by members of this House. In rising to move this resolution, I do so with a feeling of great responsibility. I regret very much that the circumstances and conditions existing in British Columbia, render it necessary to enact a law making provision for the protection of our people against the encroachment of Chinese; but, Sir, the necessity for immediate legislation is both pressing and imperative. In my humble endeavor to place a few facts before the House, I ask the favorable indulgence of hon. members. The Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, recognizing the evil consequences resulting from the continued immigration of Chinese, has repeatedly pressed on the Government of Canada to take some steps to mitigate the intolerable mischief which the Chinese have done, and are doing, to the people and Province of British Columbia. Public meetings have been held for this purpose, and the people there are as one man in their desire to prevent any more Chinese entering the Province. So united are they upon the question that no candidate, either for this House or the Local House, would have any chance of success if he expressed dissent from that desire. I have no doubt that some hon. members will ask, "Why are you British Columbians opposed to the Chinese coming into your midst?" I might be permitted to state that we are opposed to those people coming there, in the first place, because they come there as slaves, and are treated as such while there. The Chinese are brought there and sold in droves like sheep, and it is really amusing, and at the same time appalling to notice the manoeuvres of the Chinese bosses when these immigrants arrive at our shores. When a ship reaches the port of Victoria, for instance, with 500, 600 or 800 Chinese on board, as was the case during last summer, and when they are landed on the wharf, they are led away in groups by the different Chinese firms to whom they are consigned, and are taken to the Chinese Department, in Chinatown, there, and the name of every man is enrolled on the books of those establishments. They are taken care of by the different Chinese firms, and afterwards are sold to the highest bidder. That is done in this way: white men, employers of labor, knowing that a large number of Chinese have arrived, proceed to those establishments to ascertain for what amount they can obtain 50, 100 or 150 Chinese. "How much will you give," asks John. The white man will offer so much. The Chinese firm say they can get so-and-so; and so the bargaining goes on, the man offering the highest price securing the men. To make the matter worse, Chinese women are brought there and sold for base purposes. And this is all done in British Columbia, under the British flag. Slavery of the most direful character is being carried on there to-day, surrounded by a Christian community and Christian institutions, and this slavery is demoralizing and contaminating the youth of our land. We are opposed to the Chinese because we find it impossible to compete with them. It has been found to be impracticable in all departments of labor and industry involving manual labor for a white man to compete with a Chinaman, especially in those light situations which have hitherto been filled by women and young people. Why, Sir, we have only to cast our eyes over to the State of California, and we know, from what we have heard—and possibly some of us know it from personal observation—that thousands of white men have had to leave that State, many of them with their families; and they were compelled to leave it because they found it impossible to compete with the Chinese. What did Mr. Sergeant say in a speech which he delivered before the Senate of the United States in 1878:

"A Chinaman will live on wages that will not support a white man and his family, being well provided himself on a handful of rice, and a little refuse pork, and desiccated fish, costing only a few cents a day: He becomes rich accordingly, to his own standard, on wages which would beggar a white man's family."

Now, Sir, that statement is perfectly correct. In British Columbia, to-day, a Chinaman can live like a prince on twenty-five cents a day; and a white man cannot live for less than one dollar a day. A Chinaman has only himself to support, but a white man has himself and his wife, and very often children. The grand object and move of the Chinaman is always to offer his services at a lower rate than white men are getting, in order to drive the latter from the field; but directly he succeeds in this, he immediately demands a higher rate of wages. We have had a little experience, Mr. Speaker, in British Columbia, with regard to competition between white men and the Chinese. I know of instances myself, where white men were engaged in certain callings, previous to such a large influx of Chinese, who were doing well, and making comfortable livings; but after so many Chinese arrived, and went into the same kind of businesses, these men found it impossible to produce the same article which the Chinamen were producing, for one-half of what they were willing to accept. The result was that these white men were obliged to abandon their callings, and leave the country. We have also had experience, Mr. Speaker, as to what these people will do when they are masters of the situation. Only a few years ago, a difficulty arose between the Chinese and their employers; and on the sound of the gong in Chinatown, every Chinaman who heard that sound, and who was at work, dropped his tools and ceased labor. Messengers were sent throughout the city to the hotels, private houses, and boot factories, to state that the Chinese were wanted in Chinatown; and every man employed in these places, as well as in the barber shops, restaurants, &c., had to go at a moment's notice, at the risk of his life, if he delayed doing so. The result, Mr. Speaker, was that our boot factories were closed, and those who employed these people in their private houses had to do the work themselves, for which I was not sorry. The hotels, &c., were treated in the same way; and the Chinese did not return to their situations until the matter was settled in their favor. This shows what these people will do, when they are masters of the situation; and to encourage any number of them, Mr. Speaker, to come into any community is simply to impoverish and demoralize it. Only a short time before I left for this city a ship left the port of Victoria for China with 500 Chinese on board; and I ascertained on the best authority that they carried away with them $500,000. This has been carried on to such an extent that we find that fully one-half of the total earnings made in the mines, and on the railway, and in private houses leaves the Province every year in the possession of Chinamen, there to remain for ever. Now, Sir, it would not matter so much if the places of those who departed were not supplied by other Chinamen; but this is not the case, and these 500 Chinamen will live in China like princes all the days of their lives, on the amount of money which they have thus saved, while their places are filled by 500, 600 or 700 more slaves from China. They are coming and going all the time, drawing the life-blood out of the Province, and depriving our people of their just rights; and I say it is no wonder that our people there have raised their voices against this invasion, and very justly so too, because they have too good grounds for so doing with regard to this evil. Now, Sir, apply this principle and condition of things to the Province of Ontario, and the other Provinces, and I venture to assert that a remedy for it would be demanded and found in less than forty-eight hours. I fear, Sir, that unless some restrictions are placed upon the continued influx of Chinese into that Province, the day is not far distant when they will monopolize the entire industrial field. We have already in British Columbia, some 13,000 or 14,000 Chinese. It is useless to disguise the fact, that unless some measure is adopted immediately to prevent it, they will soon outnumber us; and I am sure, that every hon. gentleman in this House will admit, that such a state of affairs is not at all desirable. But, Sir, this evil will not end in British Columbia. The other Provinces will very soon smart under the demoralizing effects of slave labor. When the Canadian Pacific Railway is pushed through to British Columbia, what will be the result? Why, these Chinese will find their way into Ontario and the other Provinces of the Dominion, and what will be the practical result of their presence in these Provinces? Why, Sir, the white girls and boys, and the white men, who are employed in our factories to-day, will be supplanted by Chinese. I was in the little town of Gananoque a short time ago, and I was delighted to find the numerous factories there in full blast; and it struck me very forcibly what a grand thing it was that all those factories should be carried on by white labor, and what a curse it would be, to that little town if the Chinese were permitted to take the place of those operators. In Montreal, which I visited the other day, I was pleased to notice the number of large manufacturing establishments there giving employment to from 400 to 1,600 hands. Just imagine what a terrible curse it would be, and what poverty would result, in that city, if these operatives were supplanted by Chinese labor.

After Recess.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. When the House rose, I was referring to the effects which would follow if the Chinese were allowed to come into the various Provinces of the Dominion, and take the place of those who are employed in our factories. But not only would they replace those people, but the persons who have helped to build up this country—those who came into the Dominion when it was a wilderness, and went into the bush and cut down trees, cleared the forest, and levelled the hills, and made the wilderness blossom as the rose—would have to follow the example of the factory operators. I repeat, that it is impossible for white people to compete with the Chinese. There was a time when the question was one in which only the laboring man was interested, but it is beginning to take a different shape entirely. In British Columbia, the manufacturers, as well as the laboring classes, are beginning to feel the evil effects of the influx of the Chinese, as the latter can manufacture their own goods more cheaply than the white manufacturers. Many persons of that class, who, a short time ago, were in favor of admitting the Chinese into British Columbia, now express themselves decidedly opposed to their admission for the simple reason that they find that the Chinese are able to produce many articles at a much cheaper rate than the white manufacturers. As soon as the Pacific Railway is finished through to British Columbia, not only will the Chinese come here themselves, but they will be in a position to bring their manufactured goods into Ontario and the other Provinces of the Dominion, because they can manufacture them at a cheaper rate than the local manufacturers. We are told that it is economical to employ the Chinese in preference to white men; but I am not one of those who believe that doctrine. I believe that one white man is as good as half-a-dozen Chinese any time. I am sure that to-day the contractor for the Pacific Railway in British Columbia would not employ the Chinese to the extent he does if he had white men there to do his work. I know we find men in certain positions in society, men who do not come into contact with Chinese influence, or Chinese labor, who repeatedly speak in favor of employing them. But as a rule they are not practical men. They are men who, in many instances, occupy public positions, and draw large salaries without doing much for them. Now, Sir, I wish to read a short extract, in reference to this matter, from an interview which a newspaper reporter had with a gentleman who has built more railroads than any other man in the same length of time. His name is Mr. Clark. He says:

"It is stated, sir, that you are about to undertake the final completion of the line (the Northern Pacific) between the Eastern and Western ends.

"I may or may not. It is a question of time and labor. I can engage to complete the road before the close of July next, but I must introduce white in the place of Chinese labor.

"Then you will not use Chinese labor on the eastern end of the Northern Pacific?

"No; we have not, and if we had, I am of opinion that there would have been at least another year's delay in the completion of a through line between Portland and Chicago. I have no faith in Chinese labor. * * I have no hesitation in saying that Chinese day labor is a failure."

After referring to a number of roads which he has built, he goes on:

"I have no hesitation in making the assertion that the work has been done much cheaper, much better, more quickly, and more substantially, than it could have been done with Chinese labor."

That is the opinion of a practical man, who has employed both white labor and Chinese labor, and I prefer taking the testimony of such a man to that of men who have had no experience whatever in the business. From a sanitary point of view, the Chinese are a great drawback to the community in which they live, especially where they are found in large numbers as they are in the city of Victoria. I know it will be said that we ought to pass sanitary measures compelling them to live properly. Well, I can say that we have done so; but people who have had no dealings with the Chinese can form no conception of the trouble and expense which they cause to corporations that try to make them comply with the regulations. If they are prosecuted, sometimes lawyers will take up their cases—and they are excellent clients for the lawyers. They pay good fees; they have plenty of money, and they do not mind the money so long as they win the case. We have a by-law in Victoria to regulate the sanitary condition of these people, and extra men have been employed in order to try and compel them to live as they ought to live. It is also found to be very difficult to get any taxes from them. I have no hesitation in saying that out of the 13,000 or 14,000 Chinese we have in British Columbia, not more than 9,000 pay their share of taxes. Not only do they not pay their taxes, but we have frequently to employ extra men in order to secure what we do get from them. During the construction of the Pacific Railroad in British Columbia, a year ago, the Superintendent of Police and three or four deputies were ordered to go up the railroad for the purpose of assisting to collect the revenue taxes from the Chinese who were working on the road. Now, it is certainly very unfair that the Government should be obliged to go to so much more trouble and expense to get their taxes from that class of people than from any other portion of the population. I have no doubt hon. gentlemen will wonder at this; but persons who have not resided among these people, and seen their tactics and their wily ways, cannot possibly understand this question thoroughly. As an evidence of the unanimity of feeling that prevails in British Columbia upon this subject, I may mention that a few days ago a resolution was unanimously passed in the Local Legislature, which is now assembled, urging the Dominion Government to take some steps towards restricting the immigration of Chinese to that Province. Some years ago, during the Walkem Administration, an Order was passed that no Chinese should be employed in any way by the Local Governments, and from that day to the present I do not believe that a solitary Chinaman has drawn one dollar from that Government. In the Municipal Council of the city of Victoria, seven years ago, I think, I introduced a resolution that no Chinese should be employed in corporation works. That resolution was carried, and not one dollar has been paid by the corporation of Victoria to a Chinaman from that day to the present. So that we have done probably all that we can do towards remedying this evil. But there is a step further we want to go, and which it is impossible for the Local Government, but is in the power of this House to take—that is, to place some restriction on the continued immigration of Chinese to our Province. The State of California, as you are aware, has passed a Bill prohibiting Chinese from going in there during the next ten years. We all know the difficulties and heartburnings that the people of that State have had to contend with, owing to the large influx of Chinese, before they finally succeeded in passing the Bill. And now, what is the result? Why, Sir, that British Columbia is to-day the dumping place of the Pacific coast—the place where the Chinese are dumped. Hence the great necessity for taking some step in the direction proposed in this Bill. It will be argued, I know, that it will be time enough to place some restriction on the Chinese when the road will be finished; but that would be like shutting the stable door after the horse is gone. That would be working backwards. I maintain there is no necessity to wait for the completion of the road. There are men coming to-day into that Province, and more will come in, if an effort is not made to prevent a further influx of Chinese. There need not be any hesitation on that point. The Bill I propose to introduce does not propose to interfere with those Chinese who are in the country to-day. We are willing they should remain there; but I think every hon. member will admit that 14,000 Chinese in a Province so limited in population as ours, is quite sufficient for some time to come. The idea that the Chinese are going to leave and will become fewer in number, is a fallacy, because there are large numbers in China only waiting for an opportunity to come over into Canada. Hence these people will not leave, and any that may leave will be replaced. During last summer, close upon 8,000 came into the port of Victoria. Is it not, then, high time some restriction should be placed on their coming. Supposing, what is very likely, that 8,000 more should come in during the coming summer, what are we to do with them? The question is a serious one, one that affects the vital interests of the whole Dominion. This is not a question which I bring before the House just for the sake of doing so, but one in which I feel interested myself; and I think that every man, especially one who has a family growing up, must feel a deep interest in this question as to what is to become of the young people that are growing up in the country. In Australia, three colonies passed measures restricting the immigration of Chinese, and those laws are still in force. Hence I think we cannot be far wrong in passing a measure similar to that passed in New South Wales, Australia. I will just refer to one or two provisions of that measure for the purpose of showing its nature and extent. One provides that on the arrival of any ship at any port in this colony, the master shall deliver to the collector the names of the passengers, and of the places whence they come. The Bill also provides that no vessel shall bring a greater number of Chinese than in the proportion of one to 100 tons of tonnage. Should the captain fail to report, he is subject to a fine of £10; and a penalty is also attached should he bring a greater number of Chinese than allowed by law. There is also a provision that:

“Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, any Chinese arriving in the colony who produces evidence to the Collector of Customs, or other duly authorized officer, that he is a British subject, shall be wholly exempt from the operation of this Act, and a certificate of the Governor of any British Colony, or of a British Consul, shall be sufficient evidence of the claim of such Chinese to exemption under this section.”

Thus this does not interfere with British subjects. This law also provides:

“The provisions of this Act shall not be applicable to any Chinese duly accredited to this colony by the Government of China, or by or under the authority of the Imperial Government on any special mission.”

It further provides:

“The penalties and restrictions imposed by this Act shall not, nor shall any of them, be held to be applicable in respect of any Chinese being one of the crew of any vessel arriving in any port in New South Wales, and who shall not be discharged therefrom, or land, except in the performance of his duties in connection with such vessel.”

I maintain that we have a duty to perform in this matter, and which we owe to our country and our families, that is to place some restriction to those people coming in. After the assurance of the hon. First Minister a few days ago, I feel that this question will be favorably received by this House, and I am sure by the country at large. Not only in British Columbia, but in Ontario and Quebec, I find that the people are in favor of a restrictive measure; and hence I feel such a measure would be in the interest of the whole of this vast Dominion of which we are so proud. I think we should take a step this night towards wiping out this incubus upon our Province, and thus keep within our borders a class of people who are calculated to sympathize with us in our trial through life, who will help to build up our country, who will contribute to our public institutions and to our churches; whilst the Asiatics never contribute a solitary dollar to those purposes—with a few exceptions. How are we to prosper, how are we to succeed, if these people are to come in and take our places? For these reasons I would ask this honorable House to adopt this resolution, and vote in favor of restrictive measures upon these people.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B.C.) In rising to second this resolution, I do so with mingled feelings of pleasure and regret—pleasure at having the opportunity of seconding a resolution of this nature, which I know is in the interest of the whole of British Columbia, and with regret that this subject has not been successfully approached in this House before. I would have been very much better pleased if all the seats in this House had been filled on this occasion, so that all the hon. members might have heard the elaborate argument of my hon. colleague from Victoria. He has the advantage of a closer acquaintance with the Chinese than I possess. At the same time, I must say that I do not entirely agree with my hon. friend in his statement about the Chinese being sold like so many slaves in the market to the highest bidder, or that the women of that class are sold in Victoria for, as he expresses it, base purposes. However, as I said before, he knows more about the habits of these people than I do. But, as regards Chinese labor, I can safely assert that the greater number of my constituents are in favor of restricted measures being adopted in this House. I am perfectly well aware of the fact that two years ago the Local Government did introduce a measure for imposing a tax of, I think, $50 a head upon every Chinaman landed in British Columbia. This measure was disallowed by the Dominion Government for reasons which we are all well aware of; and I know very well that it is difficult to introduce a measure which will pass this House in the first place, and which will then receive the sanction of the Imperial Government, as such a measure might affect, directly or indirectly, matters connected with an Imperial Treaty. My hon. colleague mentioned the fact that at the sound of the gong the Chinamen all stopped work and rallied round their chop-sticks. That is quite true. I happen to have labored under the disadvantage, according to his view, of having had one or two of these individuals in my house, and I must say I should have found it difficult to get along without them. I find them very useful in certain positions, and we need some class of labor of that sort in British Columbia, as it is somewhat disagreeable to have to get up early in the morning and light the fire and black one's own boots. We are led to believe that during the present Session of Parliament a large sum of money—large in the opinion of persons in this part of the country, but not considered large in the gold mining country from where I come—will be voted for the purpose of promoting immigration to our shores; and I hope the Government will be successful in securing, not only agriculturists and mechanics, but respectable young women, who will give themselves to house work. In the meantime, I must say that I would like to see restriction upon Chinese immigration limited so as to admit a certain number for domestic purposes. The law which my hon. friend quotes as in force in Australia certainly is one which would admit of a sufficient number being imported from year to year for domestic purposes. According to the Australian law, a vessel of a 1,000 tons would be entitled to bring ten Chinese passengers, and ten Chinese passengers would be quite sufficient to come out at one time. But in British Columbia, last April and May, in the course of six weeks, nine vessels arrived, averaging from 450 to 750 Chinamen passengers, making a total of 7,772 for those two months, besides individual arrivals on the mail steamers. Of course, these largely go on to the railway. We are told that all efforts to secure to white labor a reasonable compensation have failed, but I think that is hardly correct. I think any number of men can be obtained at reasonable figures if proper means were taken—if a proper and comprehensive scheme of immigration was devised to get European immigrants to go there. My hon. colleague has adverted to the subject of the immorality of the Chinese. I may say that I know very little about that; what I do know is from hearsay, and I trust my hon. friend has been speaking from hearsay on that particular subject. There is no doubt that their morals are very loose. That may be inferred from the fact that out of 450 Chinamen who arrived there at one time, there were only two or three females with them. I would leave the House to draw their own conclusions as to the consequence of so great a disparity between the sexes. On the whole, I agree with my hon. friend in his demand for restrictive measures upon the influx of Chinese into British Columbia. Of course, in the eastern Provinces you do not find the disability under which we labor in that respect. It is also a well-known fact that a Chinaman in the eastern Provinces of the Dominion is looked upon as a curiosity. In our Province, more particularly in the district which I have the honor to represent, there are as many Chinese as there are Indians, and the two together exceed the number of whites. The Chinese are increasing rapidly, and there is a necessity for the enactment of a measure such as we are now hoping this House will favorably consider. My colleague has almost exhausted the subject, so that there is very little left for me to say, except to state that I thoroughly endorse the major part of his speech, and think a restrictive Bill should be introduced, which will not only lessen the number of Chinese coming into Victoria, but prevent their coming into any part of British Columbia.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I wish to make an explanation. My colleague seems to throw some doubt on the remark I made in respect to men being sold. That is perfectly true. My colleague may not know it, but I know it. I know that when large numbers of these people come to British Columbia, they are taken in hand by Chinese firms, their names enrolled in the books, and provision made for them in every particular; and when white men, who are employers of labor, go to these firms and ask for a certain number of Chinese, the employers who offer the largest amount of money secure the men.

Mr. BAKER. They get their services, not the men.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. They get the men; they are sold at a certain figure. I am now speaking of what I have seen with my own eyes, because I had more to do with Chinese in that country than any other man. I acted as Chinese tax collector in that Province, and it was my business to go into every nook and corner where those people were to be found; and the hon. Premier of the British Columbia Government gave me credit, on the floor of that House, for having been the best collector that could possibly be found. With respect to these men who were bought: they are sold to men who employ them in tanneries and other establishments, and when pay-day comes round the Chinaman who sold the person goes to the establishment and collects the wages. I have been there to collect the tax when a member of a Chinese firm was there to collect the Chinaman's wages; and it takes about fifty times more trouble to collect from Chinamen than from white men, for they always keep you waiting. With respect to women, I do not want to say much about them. Women are sold for base purposes; and if a woman does not grant intimate terms to her master, she is very soon slighted. That is a fact, and I say such a state of things should not exist in any Christian community.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have listened very attentively to the speech of the hon. mover of the motion, and, from his standpoint, being in favor of Protection and, being in favor of the proverb that "Canada should be for the Canadians," I think the hon. gentleman is quite consistent. Besides, he is not in favor of free goods. Being neither in favor of free goods nor of free labor, he is, I say, consistent in seeking to shut out the Chinese. I think the real reason why they do not want the Chinese in British Columbia is, because they interfere with the labor market and afford cheap labor. The hon. mover of the resolution has stated that no candidate need present himself in a constituency in British Columbia who was not opposed to the free importation of Chinese. But I think there are other parts of this Dominion that are interested in this matter as well as British Columbia. We have commenced to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. I remember the arguments adduced in favor of that work being undertaken; it was going to open the door to China, it was going to bring Canada 2,000 miles nearer to China than at present, and commerce was going to bridge the northern Pacific and open the door to China. That is the reason why we are spending one hundred millions of dollars. And in order to get the road built we have been under the necessity of importing Chinese to do the work; and, notwithstanding all the boasted superiority of Canadians and British Columbians, if there are any dangerous places in the canons of the Fraser, or any mud-holes, you will find the Chinese in those dangerous and uncomfortable positions. They are trying to build the railway which we are undertaking to construct under the compact made with British Columbia, and which will cost Canada more than a hundred millions of dollars. This is a big subject. On the other side of the Pacific there are five hundred millions of Chinese. On this side there is Canada, one half of the continent of North America, a land broad and expansive, and yet undeveloped. We want labor, and free labor; and I have not heard a sentiment expressed by the hon. mover of the resolution which goes to show that the introduction of Chinese will be an injury to Canada. With respect to British Columbia, I can understand why certain persons there are opposed to this class of labor, but I believe the interests of Canada will not be promoted by the passage of such a Bill as is now proposed. In China, there are, as I have mentioned, five hundred millions of the human race, who are crowded together, and are starving for want of food. It does not cost our Minister of Agriculture millions of dollars to bring them into Canada. They come at their own expense, they work at cheap rates, and they can live for twenty-five cents a day, while it will cost the white man a dollar. What wrong is done by these men eating rice and sleeping on boards? What crime is there in wearing cheap clothing? There is nothing wrong in these things. The Chinese are disciples of Confucius, but they are not destitute of ability and of inventive power. The Chinese, long before the Europeans, invented the mariners' compass, the art of printing, gunpowder, and the manufacture of the finest silk and porcelain. They are not destitute of ability, but they are capable of improvement. You would understand, from the hon. mover of this resolution, that the disciples of Confucius were going to take the lead. Our institutions are based on Christian principles. We have the leader that we are proud of, and thankful for—our leader; and the institutions which are founded under him are bound to triumph, and Chinamen will become Christians, rather than the Christians will become Chinese. My hon. friend says that they are corrupt. He says nothing about the bad practices of the men; but that the women are bought and sold for base purposes. I do not know anything about that, but whenever there is a bargain, it takes two to make it; and if these women are sold for base purposes in British Columbia, they are sold to Christians who are baser than are the Chinese themselves. I know of no reason for their being kept out of the country, because they corrupt Christians, British Columbians and Canadians. I do not think so badly of Canadians.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The hon. gentleman is in error. What I stated was that Chinese women were sold to Chinese, not to white people.

Mr. GILLMOR. They need not bring them to British Columbia to sell them. I think that if they are introduced in any quantity, they are brought there to be sold to British Columbians and not to the Chinese. Mr. Speaker, I think that this immigration has been of great advantage to the Province, and in the building of the Pacific Railway, furnishing valuable labor. I know that this interferes with white labor; but if these men do the work cheaper than the white men, those acquainted with the customs of Canada can get lands in the North-West where we have millions of acres, in the cultivation of which they can be employed. The country cannot be injured through Chinamen laboring at a less price than white men will; this can never injure Canada. They also make good domestic servants; and they are ingenious. The hon. gentleman told us about the sounding of the gong in California, and of their rushing from their workshops and employments; but this was because of the risk they ran of the destruction of their settlements and neighborhoods by the hoodlums and rough-scuffs of California, who were going to burn them out. What was the result? One settlement at San Francisco was burned to the ground, and the Chinamen left homeless, by this very class of persons, because they worked a little cheaper. The city of Chinatown, with 60,000 Chinamen, was threatened, too, to be razed to the ground if Chinese labor came into competition with white labor. He says that they leave British Columbia and take away vast sums of money—$500,000—in one ship; but why should they not leave it when they are treated as they have been on the Pacific coast, and as they are threatening to treat them now in British Columbia. But treat them as we profess to treat our fellow-men, and as they ought to be treated; set before them an example worthy of imitation, and you will bring the Chinese to your principles. We are now spending millions to enlighten and Christianise those in foreign lands; and we go to China with its teeming millions in this relation, and I say it would be unfortunate and inexpedient, and not good policy, to prevent them coming here. If they will come upon our soil why they are the very best domestic servants. I know how they are treated in California. For instance, they do excellent work in laundries, &c.; they take good care of linen—but how do they treat them? A white man who, with a horse and wagon, delivers linen through the city of San Francisco pays a tax of $1 a year; but the poor Chinaman who delivers it with a basket pays $10 a year for his license. They are treated in this way; but we want their services; they are of great benefit as servants; and their labor is valuable in building railroads. We cannot do a better thing than get them to come here. Why, only a few days since we thought the land in the North-West was almost valueless; $1 an acre was a high value; but they come here, and work cheaply, build our railroads in our vast North-West, and the land becomes worth $4, $5 and $6 per acre. Thousands of Chinamen can come to Canada and do no harm. I tell you we will make Canadians of them, and I trust Christians of them, and they will be valuable in our community. We cannot admit that the disciples of Confucius can change our practices and bring us to their way of thinking; let the elephant take foliage from the oak, and the foliage becomes elephant; the elephant does not become foliage. I think it is a vast advantage to have these people come to Canada, and I do not think that they should be excluded from our shores. I would not expend a great deal of money to get them. I would give no money—nothing to induce them to come; but if they come free of cost and charge to us, and do our work on railroads, and as domestic servants, and in manufacturing, if you please, I do not object. The hon. gentleman treats this as a crime against them; but if they manufacture more cheaply than white men, is there anything wrong in that? I think it a great advantage, if they can teach us how to manufacture cheaper; and it cannot hurt British Columbia to have cheap goods. I think, judging from the revenue, that, now they have there very dear goods, and cheapness will be a vast advantage and a great thing for British Columbia. This Province has been settled for forty or fifty years, and what is the result in regard to population? With all their vast resources—the gold mountains and all their undeveloped resources of that vast country, to get to which we are expending a hundred millions of dollars—they have 25,000 or 30,000 Indians, and from 8,000 to 10,000 white men. If the Chinese are educated and given a good example by white men, paid for their labor, and taught morality and religion, they will become good subjects. There is no doubt about that. Mr. Speaker, I think that no such measure should be introduced. It would be premature entirely to legislate now in this matter; and I am satisfied that the Government will not undertake to do anything so injurious to the country. They are bothered now, because Mr. Onderdonk did not give white men $2 and $3 a day, and he could not get them at that; but the Chinese do that work for less. Some may stop about Victoria, but they do not do so unless they get something to do. They are employed, and does this injure the people who want them—to have cheap labor and domestic servants cheaply—for they would not employ Chinamen if they did not get service for the wages paid? I will not trespass longer on the patience of the House; but really, I think that we have listened long enough to this sort of thing from British Columbia. The more that come in the better, and we want them to come and stay; we will give them something to do. Let some of them come here. We want them in this country, we are expending millions to bring immigrants here. I do not know what sort of citizens these people from China make; but I think, judging from their past history, if they come here and become acclimatised and accustomed to our society, they will fall into our ways. They are an ingenious and imitative people; and I do not think that they will do us any harm.

Mr. GORDON. After the speech of my hon. friend from Victoria, I think that it is almost unnecessary for me to make any remarks on the important question before the House. I fully concur, Sir, in his statement with regard to the undesirability of Chinamen as residents, and their unsuitability to a country either like British Columbia or any other part of this Dominion. Now, Sir, there are more ways of looking at these people than as merely furnishing cheap labor; there are other duties appertaining to citizenship which every man is supposed to perform. In the State of California at the time that they took action in the matter, the Chinese were as one to six of the whole population of the State. In that State, as in every State that is well governed, if governed at all, a certain amount of taxation has to be raised in order to meet the ordinary requirements of the Government. But it was found that while the Chinese formed one-sixth of the whole population they contributed to the revenues of that State only one-four hundredth part of the ordinary taxation; and I am certain that what has been proved in California can be doubly proved by a proper investigation in British Columbia. In British Columbia, they form nearly one-half the whole population, and I do not believe they contribute any larger proportion to the revenue of that Province than to the revenues of California. Not only so, but, as in California, it is proved by the records of every court of that State that there is more money expended in the punishment of the Chinese as a class, than upon all the other people put together. They form a large proportion of the inmates of the penitentiaries, they swing from the rope oftener than other classes, and yet it is more difficult to convict them. Their system of connivance, at perjury and of combination, is such that the keenest policemen in the service are thwarted at every turn. I am not surprised at hearing an advocate of the Chinamen on the other side of the House. Like many other questions, this is one of which I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman is ignorant. He has not dwelt in their midst; he has not seen them as the people of British Columbia see them. If he were a resident of that Province he would know that during twenty years they have worn the same Chinese garb which they brought from China, made upon the same pattern—manufactured in China and imported from China. He would see that they wear the same pigtailed which they brought from China, and he would find within the shadows of our churches the lowest dens that humanity can contemplate. Would he like to see the same state of affairs in his own native town? And if he found it there and advocated such a state of affairs, would he ever be able to get a seat in this House? It is only by seeing it as it exists that any man can comprehend the condition in which those people live. I have some hesitation in feeling any repugnance to any portion of the human race; it is contrary to my natural feelings. But twenty years experience has led me to overcome my natural feelings in many respects. Their influence as a people upon British Columbia has been this: that while they fill the avenues of trade they are a bar to other immigrants. What class of labor can compete with the Chinese? How many men would you have in the North-West to-day if the immigrants going into that country were confronted by 20,000 or 30,000 Chinamen? What would be the value of real estate in Winnipeg to-day if that country were filled by Chinamen, even if they were employed in building the railway? You would have had the same depressed condition in that country as we have in British Columbia, notwithstanding the building of the railway. The hon. gentleman cannot resist the temptation of making a thrust at British Columbia on account of the immense expenditure which has been made in order to reach her shores. If that hon. gentleman has studied the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway since 1856 he would have come to the conclusion that that railway is not being built for British Columbia but for the consolidation of the Dominion of Canada. He would have learned that the system of canals by which our country is intersected was established for the same purpose, and that we are paying interest on debts which were incurred by the construction of the canals, and we will do so for a long time to come. The same may be said with regard to the Intercolonial and other Railways. Yet who would dare reproach Ontario, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, for these expenditures? These expenditures were incurred and wisely incurred; and the statesmen who inaugurated them have reason to feel proud that these expenditures were made in order to build up a great Dominion extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean? I cannot but feel that it is a dangerous thing to ask this House to exclude from our territories, which are to be consolidated and built up, any class of the human race; but in the present case, I feel no diffidence whatever in declaring it to be my conviction that it is to the interest of the Dominion of Canada as a whole, to the interests of her people and her institutions, that a class of people so low, so far down in the scale of civilization as the Chinese are, should be excluded, or at least partially excluded from our country. The reasons for which I wish exclusion I have already given to a certain extent. But there are other reasons. We find that they come in hordes—mostly single men—under some species of slavery which no ingenuity of man can find out unless by Chinamen themselves. Whenever a Chinaman takes advantage of the freedom which exists under the folds of the British flag, he is by some means put an end to; and I say it is past finding out what means they take to accomplish this purpose. It was the case in California that $800 was offered for the destruction of one man who dared to go against the secret councils of the Chinese as they are organized in that State. The same state of things exists in British Columbia to-day. I read, to-day, a despatch from British Columbia in the Toronto Mail, stating that a Canadian had been beaten to death with shovels by the Chinamen employed on the Canadian Pacific Railway. As a general thing Canadians are not bad masters. They manage to govern those employed under them without being murdered; but in that case, as in every case where Chinamen get the power, they use it in the most diabolical manner. The character and habits of the women they bring to the country are so revolting that delicacy forbids any description of them before this House; and the dens which the Chinese inhabit with these women are such that no hon. gentleman could contemplate them. The lowest Indian that ever inhabited the Province of Ontario, were as much superior to them as the ordinary white population were superior to the Indians. I do not know that I can add anything further to the statements so exhaustively made by my hon. friend, except that the people of British Columbia look for relief to this Parliament, and to the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, who so wisely, several years ago, when he was Minister of Justice, prevented them from becoming voters in the Province of British Columbia. I am sure that if he had not taken that step, my hon. friend would never have sat in this House. I have no doubt that the wise foresight which the right hon. gentleman then exercised, and which has always marked his dealings with the Dominion of Canada in promoting the development of its political power, will be used on this occasion to secure British Columbia, and the whole Dominion, the advantage that I know will be recognized.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. members from British Columbia, with regard to the condition of affairs existing in that Province. I am very glad this question has again come before this House; and I hope it will receive most thorough and careful consideration, in order that anything that can be done in the interests of so distant and so worthy a Province as British Columbia, may be done. It may not be that this House will at this time so thoroughly settle this question that it will not arise again, but it is quite possible for us to take the first steps in that direction. I have sympathy, I say, with British Columbia, and I have no sympathy with the idea that, because it is a distant Province, therefore we, who come from other parts of the Dominion, should pay little or no heed to what British Columbia says. I believe we are one Dominion. If we are not one to such an extent now as we ought to be, it will be the effort of my life, and I am sure it will be the effort of the young men who have come to this Parliament for the first time, to leave nothing undone to make the sentiment of unity in this country a continually growing and a continually welding power. It is not for Ontario, or for Quebec, or for any of the other of these great Provinces, to dismiss with a wave of the hand, a complaint or grievance that comes up from a distant Province of this Dominion. I also agree that it is not the right thing for us to continually point towards British Columbia, and say that it is costing us a great deal of money, that we are building the railway, and so forth. We are building that road for the whole Dominion, and for British Columbia as an important part of it. There are certain considerations which dispose me, and I am sure other hon. members of this House, to listen respectfully to what British Columbia says. In the first place, we find that the Legislature of that Province has decided, almost unanimously, if not unanimously, to petition this Parliament in favor of some measure of relief with reference to the Chinese within its borders. We find that the delegations of members who come to this House year after year, are almost, if not wholly, a unit in asking for the same thing. I think, therefore, that some grievance must exist, and that it merits consideration at our hands. There is another circumstance which I think will dispose this House to attempt to remove this grievance. The Australian colonies have felt the same difficulty, and they have met it in a certain way; and that is a fair precedent for us. Then we have the example of the United States, which a year or two ago, after a thorough and careful consideration of the question, passed a Bill excluding the Chinese from the United States for ten years. All these facts show that there is something vital in this question, and it will not be proper or Parliamentary for us to dismiss it as something with which we have nothing to do. But I desire to point out to this House that, although there may be a grievance, it is quite possible that an indiscriminate restriction might not be the proper policy for this country to adopt. We must recollect that we are legislating in the light of open day, that we are legislating for the whole Dominion, that we are legislating as one amongst great countries and great Parliamentary bodies, and that we are about to adopt a policy which will be historic in this country. I think every hon. member of this House will agree with me that what Canada needs to-day is development, and this resolves itself in my mind largely into a question of immigration, and the kind of immigrants we will have. There lie our immense resources at the sea; there lies our great mineral wealth, culminating as an hon. member says, in those mountains of gold in British Columbia; there are greater, and better than all, those immense acres in the West, every one of them filled with the potency of life, and ready to yield its wealth at the touch of labor. And I think every one will agree with me that the machinery of this development is of two kinds—first, capital; and, second, labor. These two things together will develop this country of ours, and make it one of the greatest countries on this earth. Capital and labor are joined with each other; the one depends on the other. Capital will go where it finds labor to use it as an instrument. Labor will come where it finds capital to set it at work and pay it its wage. If capital is cheap, other things being equal, labor will be the more abundant, because more capital will be expended in the development of a country's resources; and if labor is cheap, other things being equal, capital will get a greater return for its outlay, and its expenditure receive greater impetus. There is another question to be considered in this connection. I think this House will agree with me when I say that the opening up of internal communication and the bringing in of immigrants from other countries, are the two prime interests of this country, and the two best means that can be adopted to promote this bringing in of capital and setting to work of labor. I acknowledge that not many years ago, as I was seated in the gallery of this House, when the measure was brought in to build a line of railway from one end of this country to the other, involving the expenditure of a large amount of money, I, at first sight, drew back and wondered whether this country could afford that expenditure, and whether the policy was a wise one; but when I began to think, when I heard the matter discussed—saw in my imagination what is now almost a reality—a broad line of communication stretching across this continent, along which capital and labor poured in, I felt it to be one of the wisest and best strokes of policy that any Government ever inaugurated for the country. I found it was not an extravagant expenditure, but that, looking into the future, it was the best and wisest expenditure we could make. I think I have come pretty near to what I consider the line we should draw in this matter of immigration—what should be the class of immigration we should have. If the hon. Minister of Agriculture were standing before three great classes of laborers, brought for his inspection, so that he might decide which of the three was fitted to be introduced into the country, I would bring up one of the class as a representative and say: "This man is very industrious; he works hard and constantly, but he is ignorant and not very honest." The hon. Minister of Agriculture would say to him: "Stand aside till I see the others." I would then bring up a representative of the second class, and say: "This man represents a class who are strong in labor, industrious and intelligent, but not very good and honest in character." Again, the hon. Minister would say: "Stand aside until I hear from the third." If I could bring up the third, and say: "Here is a man, the representative of a class of immigrants who is not only industrious, intelligent and strong, but is good, honest and true. The class which he represented would, I think, be the one chosen by the hon. Minister as the most proper to settle in the country. That is where I would draw the line—if we are to draw any line—not a line of race, creed or color, but a line which would take in these three great distinctions. While I would sift out the idle, ignorant and immoral, I would bring in as far as possible, the industrious, the intelligent and the honest. I think that is a better line to draw than to say that after these centuries of progress and refinement, during which the tendency has always been to break down the Chinese walls of exclusion and weld divided humanity into one common whole, we should go back to abandoned prejudices and raise again barriers of color, race and creed. If there are intelligent, moral and industrious Chinamen, why in the name of goodness should a wall be raised to exclude them from this country? If we can prove that the Chinese emigrants, as a class, are in preponderating numbers, idle, ignorant or immoral, let us draw the line there and keep them out. But if there is one single man who is honest, industrious and intelligent, let him come into Canada, work as cheaply as he likes, enjoy the fruits of his labor and pass his life here. The United States have given us one of the best testimonies we can possibly have. I have a very little book here, only 1,280 pages, and as I am a rapid reader it will not take me very long to go through with it, and the evidence is in some respects very contradictory. In 1876 the United States appointed a Commission, consisting of three representatives of the Senate and three from the House of Representatives, to investigate this question of Chinese immigration into their country. They went to San Francisco and examined some 138 witnesses of all creeds and classes—men who gave them not simply hearsay statements, but their own opinions and experience and information relative to the Chinese. Their evidence is contained in this book, but I will simply give what I think are the conclusions to be deduced from that evidence. After having given it a very careful perusal, I think this House will consider I am justified in taking up their time for a very short space while I explain those conclusions. The preponderating evidence of those 138 persons is that the Chinese are industrious. There is no doubt about that. They give their employers every ounce of muscle and nerve and value for the wages paid them. There is, therefore, no reason to exclude them on the ground of want of industry. Again, this testimony goes to prove that although a good many are immoral and have not the best characters, yet in a business point of view the Chinese merchants and the Chinese laborers of the better class, are, beyond doubt, honest in their dealings. There is testimony after testimony of those who have had large and varied dealings with these people, to show that they are honest in their dealings. They keep a contract, they give the work which they promise to give satisfactorily, more so it is said than many laborers from other countries, who are in California and work upon the slope. The collected evidence goes to show also that the crowded state in which they live is a great evil that ought to be remedied, but the other fact is just as plain that there is scarcely a nationality which throws its hordes of immigrants in greater or less numbers into any of the American or Canadian cities, of some of whom the same thing cannot be said. There is also the evidence that while in San Francisco and the larger towns they live together in masses, and in filthy abodes, out in the country they are as well separated and as cleanly as any other nationality. The evidence in this book also goes to show that the mass of the farmers in California were in favor of the retention of Chinese labor, while the mass of the artisans in the cities and larger towns were directly opposed to it. It is also shown in this book that the Chinese, by their cheaper labor, by the labor for which they give good value, have been instrumental in building railways which otherwise would not have been built, in reclaiming marsh land which otherwise would not have been reclaimed, in taking up the fag ends of labor which white people would not take up, and thereby contributing to the resources of the States. Now, I think, these are the fair conclusions. They go to show that there is a mass of filth and corruption, mainly in the larger cities, where they congregate, and are driven to congregate, because of the want of community between them and the white people; but that, taken over the country and the smaller places, the Chinese laborers live fairly well, are cleanly, intelligent and industrious. Now, Mr. Speaker, pardon me for a moment, while I draw the conclusion, that as the Chinese as a whole cannot be shown to be idle and ignorant, but that as a large proportion are shown to be good and law-abiding citizens, it is not proper for us to raise this Chinese wail of exclusion, and say to those who are sober and industrious that they shall not come to our country. What can we do? Is there no other way of meeting the evil than by excluding them altogether? Something has been said with reference to crime amongst the Chinese. The unvarying testimony given before this Commission, by the witnesses examined, was that the proportion of crime amongst the Chinese, is infinitely less than that amongst the white people. We must remember that the Chinese in California and British Columbia are nearly all men, that they do not live in families. That is certainly an objection to them. In considering the ratio of crime between Chinese and white people, we must remember that the latter have families; there are children, older boys and girls and women amongst them who are less given to criminality, and when we consider this difference it will be found that the crime amongst white people is comparatively much greater than it is amongst the Chinese. What, then, are we to do? It does seem to me something might be done in this respect. Let the people of British Columbia mitigate this evil by internal methods. If the Chinese crowd together too much in large centres, let a law be passed which will limit the number living in a certain quarter. If they violate the laws of health, do you mean to say that the Province of British Columbia, aided, if necessary, by the resources of this Dominion, cannot compel them to obey sanitary laws? If there are immoral places established by Chinese, do you mean to say the resources of British Columbia, aided, if necessary, by the resources of the Dominion, cannot clear those places away? Let these internal remedies be applied by the Province itself, aided, if necessary, by this Dominion for a few years, and if they do not secure the alleviation of these evils I shall sadly have miscalculated the power of these remedial agents. Then I think something else like this might be done. I am young in this matter, there are older heads here, who know more about the legal intricacies involved; but it does seem to me that if a bad class of people come here amongst these Chinese they might be weeded out. It is said they are slaves. I do not think that would hold from the evidence taken before the Commission. They come out under contract, agreeing to pay their passages when they come to this country, and their passages are the first lien upon the wages they earn here. That is about the kind of slave labor they perform according to the evidence taken before this Commission. Might there not be some supervision exercised over the class of immigrants who come out from China by having immigration inspectors at the ports of embarkation in China, which, I believe, are but few, which inspectors shall make some sort of arrangement with the companies who bring them out, and so exercise a supervision under which only the better class will be allowed to come? Mr. Speaker, I do wish that something might be done to settle this question permanently, and to alleviate what, I believe, is a grievance to the people of British Columbia, and which, in its present form, is weighing somewhat heavily upon the peace and prosperity of that country.

Mr. TUPPER. Since this debate has commenced I have been strongly impressed with the idea that the people of British Columbia are laboring under a grievance. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has made a very forcible speech, and we all know that when he speaks upon any subject he displays a thorough knowledge of the subject to an extraordinary degree. I am well aware that in speaking upon a subject that has been so well considered by other hon. gentlemen I should be careful in the statements and arguments I make. But I come from a county that is largely interested in the question of labor, a county, perhaps, boasting of greater resources than British Columbia, and, therefore, I may well say something when the labor question comes before this House. I am confident that any question affecting the interests of British Columbia will always engage the calm and dispassionate consideration of this House. We ought to consider this question altogether aside from sentiment, though I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that it does seem an extraordinary proposition that we should prohibit any member of the human family from coming into this country. I believe, therefore, that opponents of the resolution to-day occupy a certain vantage ground in this discussion, and at the first blush, members who had not considered every phase of this question carefully would be induced to declare that they would welcome with open arms immigration from any country in the world, no matter what the effect would be, so long as it should reduce the price of labor. But, perhaps, influenced a great deal by considerations that prevail in the county which I have the honor to represent, I look upon labor in a different light altogether; I value the laborers and value their work, and feeling that I consider any competition that is unfair ought to be and should be retarded. I feel, moreover, that if half the members who to-night are opposed to any resolution of this kind could only experience what appears to be the uniform experience of every member who comes from British Columbia, if they could feel in the slightest degree the terrible effect of this, what I might call horrible immigration, the expressions of opinion would be far more pronounced in favor of the resolution than against it. As I listened to much of the discussion to-night, I thought that although the representation of the Province of British Columbia has, to a degree, changed, yet the views of that Province in regard to this question have always remained the same; and I tried to bring the argument home and place the circumstances stated in the county which I represent, and I felt that in such a case there would not only be a strong argument in favor of this resolution, but I believe a reasonable argument, for I believe that the tendency of such an immigration must necessarily be to cheapen and degrade labor, and to lower labor all through the country is entirely a wrong and erroneous principle to prevail in the councils of the nation. I believe that firmly, and believing that firmly, I favor a very careful and calm consideration of the resolution which has been moved by one of the British Columbia representatives. I believe also that there must be a great deal more than is contained in that book, the contents of which remained sealed, even to-night, though the book has been produced, and that the mere production from the desk of the hon. member of that book had an unfair influence on the discussion of the question. We have not considered it if Congress has considered it. If an examination of the question is contained in that book, it does not follow that Congress has exhausted the subject. The circumstances of the countries may be different. Whether they are so or not, the principles adduced as embodied in legislation in the colony of Australia would far outweigh the mere production of a volume. I think the very fact that the hon. gentleman should have facetiously alluded to a book so ponderous as that, as a small volume on the topic under discussion, should prove to the House that the uncontradicted statements of representatives from a region, that alone can understand the influence, and I believe thoroughly, the baneful influence of such an immigration should lead members of this House to give their support, not perhaps to the resolution before the House, but to give a strong influence towards a very careful and dispassionate consideration of the subject, because we know this, that notwithstanding the conclusion which may have been arrived at in other countries, the very fact that every representative from the only Province which has felt the influence of this immigration has felt it to be his duty to occupy the time of the House in asking that that baneful influence should be retarded and stopped. Feeling great regard for capital and knowing what would be the opinion if the laborers in Pictou had to meet the competition of labor which can be obtained for twenty-five cents a day, I hold that Parliament should forget for the moment that only a few members represent the Pacific Province, and should consider very carefully the principle involved in this discussion. I disagree, therefore, entirely with the hon. member who just preceded me in taking such a strong ground as he has done against this resolution—I admit at once he has done so ably—and I hold that this is a matter which should not be lightly treated, but given great consideration.

Mr. RYKERT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid on the Table:—

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ending 30th June last.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 30th March, 1883.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS' BILL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That 900 copies of the Statements made before the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines of this House, for and against the Bill No. 3 for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, for the use of Members, and Rule 94 suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PROCEDURE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, in some mysterious manner, incomprehensible to the majority of the members of this House, I think Bill No. 6 disappeared from the Order Paper to-day, and is not on the Orders of the Day. Its disappearance, I think, was unknown to a large number of the members who were not in the House yesterday, and I think that the causes of disappearance were not known to a great many members who were in the House; and, in order that it may again appear on the Orders of the Day, and in pursuance of the practice in the Imperial Parliament, and in our own House of Commons, I beg to move:

That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Monday next, to consider further of Bills (No. 6) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanor, shall be competent as witnesses; (No. 2) to amend an Act respecting procedure in Criminal Cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law; (No. 4) to amend the law of evidence in Criminal Cases, and (No. 30) to amend the Criminal Law, and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed holes, cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented water (all consolidated into one Bill) as amended by the Select Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker: Is not a notice of motion required in this case?

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I see, by Rule No. 31, that

"Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, Resolution, or Address, for the appointment of any Committee, or for the putting of a question; but this Rule shall not apply to Bills after their introduction or to Private Bills."

Well, is it not the fact that, after the action of the Committee yesterday, these Bills disappeared altogether from the Notice Paper; and therefore that there is no Bill before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. This Bill has been introduced.

Mr. BLAKE. And read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. And read the second time before the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was referred by the House to the Committee of the Whole, and has not the Committee, by its action, arrested the Bill altogether?

Mr. SPEAKER. According to English practice, the way to bring a Bill again before the House—as the Committee cannot kill a Bill which is before the House—in the event of a Bill being dropped from the Order Paper, it is competent, on a subsequent day, without notice, to move to fix a day when the Bill shall again be considered.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course I put the question—as this is the first time that a motion of this kind has been made, at all events during this Parliament because I thought it proper that we ought to have a ruling about it, in order that we might govern ourselves in future similar cases.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Mr. Speaker: Are we to understand that the Committee having made no report to the House, the House can take possession again of this Bill, and dispose of it as if it had not been sent to the Committee of the Whole, and that Committee had made a report? If the Committee has made no report, I think that it is yet in possession of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAKE. No. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to get it back into Committee of the Whole, without this procedure; but the hon. gentleman does not want to get it back there, and he thinks that it is there yet.

Motion (Mr. Cameron, Huron) negatived on the following division:—

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker: I desire, Sir, before you leave the Chair, to make the financial statement; and, at the same time, to call the attention of the House to the resolutions the Government propose to move when in Committee with reference to the changes in the Tariff. At the last Session of Parliament, on the sixteenth day after the opening of the Session, I was in a position to make the financial statement of the Government. Circumstances have occurred to delay the statement on this occasion, and there has been some criticism in the House, and out of it, on account of this delay. I desire, in the first place, Sir, to make a few remarks with reference to the circumstances that have caused this delay; and I believe, when they are stated to the House, hon. members will fully understand the necessity for it, and approve of the course the Government have taken. It will be remembered, Sir, that, at the last Session of Parliament, the Government asked this House to reduce the taxation to the extent of $1,000,000 or $1,250,000 for the then current year. After looking carefully over the receipts, and the probable expenditure for the current year, the Government thought they might safely ask Parliament, at this Session, to reduce the taxation another $1,000,000 or $1,250,000. That having been decided upon, it, of course, became a question as to the articles on which this reduction should be made. We found the Congress of the United States in session, with various propositions before them for the reduction of the Customs duties and the Inland Revenue taxation, varying from $50,000,000 to $120,000,000, according to the action of Congress on these resolutions. One proposition alone was, that tobacco should be reduced from 16 cts. to 8 cts. a lb.; another proposition was that it should be removed entirely. If either of these propositions carried, it would become necessary for the Parliament of Canada, for the purpose of preventing illicit trade, protecting the honest trader, and protecting our own manufacturing industries, that our duties should be reduced in proportion to the reduction made in the United States. Therefore, if the proposition to reduce the duty 8 cts. per lb. on tobacco were adopted, it would necessitate a reduction in Canada which would involve $750,000; if it was removed altogether it would necessitate the reduction of $1,250,000, or, perhaps, $1,500,000; and, under these circumstances, it became necessary that we should wait until we saw what the nature of the legislation of the United States with reference to the Customs and Excise Revenues had been before we were prepared to submit to Parliament our proposition. It was not until the night of the 3rd March that these questions were decided, and, though we had asked for the earliest possible information as to the nature of the changes that took place, it was the 16th March before we received a certified copy; and then it became our duty to examine it carefully, as it was quite apparent, with a reduction of the duties on tobacco, that, from that article alone, we would lose a very large amount of revenue. This necessitated a change of proposed reduction of duty on articles imported through the Customs. Well, Sir, under any circumstances, Tuesday would have been the earliest possible day we could have submitted our propositions to the House, and it having been decided that we should separate for the Easter holidays on the following evening, it would have been most inconvenient to present the financial statement, and then have the discussion to stand over for a week or ten days. Under these circumstances, the Government thought it best to allow the financial statement to remain until the re-assembling of Parliament, and take the first Government day to submit it to the House. With this explanation, Sir, I believe the delay will be justified, and I trust that the country will not suffer materially. We are not in the position we were last year. We then proposed to take the duty off one or two articles of importance, and it would not have been fair to the trade of the country had they not been decided at once. The propositions which the Government have to make now are not to go into immediate effect, and therefore it is of less importance. But, Sir, I now proceed to the discharge of the important duties devolving upon me; and while I feel that the Government have material of the most satisfactory character to submit to the consideration of the House, I do not feel that I have that physical vigor that will enable me to do justice to the subject as I would desire to do, and as I am sure the House would expect me to do. In the first place, I would call the attention of the House to a declaration I made in the opening of my speech at the last Session of Parliament. It was this: that at no period in the history of Canada had Government met Parliament with its finances in a better position than it was on that day. Further, at no period in the history of Canada did the credit of Canada stand as high as it did on that day, and at no period in the history of the Dominion was it more prosperous than on that day; and I am happy, Sir, in believing that the House and the country will endorse me when I say that the remarks made on that occasion may be repeated with all truth to day. I do not desire, Sir, to occupy any more of the time of the House than is absolutely necessary in presenting our case, and in dealing with the income and expenditure of the last year. My remarks will be brief, inasmuch as the Public Accounts have been placed in the hands of the members who are familiar, not only with the figures, but with the financial position of the Dominion, and which was referred to in such eloquent terms by the mover and seconder of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. I may, Sir, however, restate them here in order that we may refresh our memories with reference to the position that we occupy. First, Sir, let me say that the Consolidated Revenue of last year amounted to $33,383,600, and the expenditure to $27,067,000, leaving a surplus of $6,316,600—the largest surplus that has ever been declared in Canada. Add to that $1,744,000 received as subsidies of land in the North-West, making altogether a surplus of over $8,000,000 for the last year. Well, Sir, during the same period there was expended on Capital Account, for the Canadian Pacific and Intercolonial Railways, for the enlargement of the Canals, and on the Surveys in the North-West, $7,400,000, leaving a handsome surplus over and above all the expenses of Capital Account during the last year; and when we take into consideration the Sinking Fund, which forms a fund for the reduction of the debt, the net debt for the Dominion, notwithstanding the expenditure of $7,340,000 on Capital Account, was $1,750,000 less, and the interest paid for the year, $15,000 less than it was the year previous. Now, Sir, we not only spent $7,340,000 on Capital Account, but we redeemed maturing liabilities, during that period, of $4,000,000. We had paid in from the surplus earnings of the people of the Dominion five millions nine hundred and twenty odd thousand dollars, from which the amount I have stated was paid, leaving nearly $2,000,000 towards the expenditure of the current year. Under these circumstances, our financial position was an easy one. We were not forced into any market for a loan, but met a large expenditure and redemption of debt with the surplus, and the deposits of the people in the savings banks. I need not dwell longer upon this general statement, with reference to the financial operations of the year; but I desire to call the attention of the House, for a few moments, to one point, which may be referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite when they deal with my statement. During the last year the expenditure was $1,500,000 more than it was the year before

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. $25,500,000 was the expenditure the year before last; last year it was $27,000,000. Now, Sir, I hear an hon. member opposite say "hear, hear," and therefore I desire to go into details with reference to the increased expenditure, to show that, while it amounted to $1,500,000 more last year than the year before, it did not mean more than $500,000 of taxation to the people of the country. I have here, Sir, a statement of the increased expenditure during last year, and it will be satisfactory to hon. members, I have no doubt, to have their attention called to the different items of this increase, and to the circumstances which caused them. The first item is $146,650 increase of interest. Now, Sir, we did not have to pay during the year $146,650 more for net interest than in the previous year. That amount is simply the difference between the receipts on the interest account, and the payments on the same, as I explained at the outset. The net interest paid was $15,000 less than the year before, but owing to the increased deposits in the savings banks, the Canadian Pacific Railway having also deposited with us under their contract a large sum on which interest had to be paid, the amount paid out in interest was larger than it would otherwise have been; but the Government did not allow the money so deposited to lie idle. They deposited it in the banks and obtained 4 per cent. interest upon it; and while the payments were increased, the receipts were increased in like proportion. Therefore, that $146,000 of increased interest was not a tax upon the people. We paid that additional for the money deposited with us and received it in return, leaving $15,000 less paid during the year than in the year before. That, I trust, is satisfactory so far as that item is concerned. The next item is Sinking Fund, which was increased by $39,993. That item goes on increasing year by year, and is applied to the reduction of the debt. That is surely not a payment that can be complained of. It increases under the arrangement by which our loans are obtained, and is paid in for the extinction of maturing liabilities. Then we have $75,481 increase of subsidies paid to the Provinces, which have not yet reached a population of 400,000, and are entitled to 80 cts. per head of the population, until they reach that point. The Government, surely, cannot be blamed for paying that. The next increase is $30,072 for Civil Service. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that might have been avoided; but when we consider the fact, that under our Civil Service Act, the civil servants are entitled to $50 a year increase, we see that that would consume half the amount; and as we are increasing so rapidly in population, and in the development of the resources of the North-West, the enlargement of our staff is necessary, particularly in connection with post offices and post office savings banks, so this increase of expenditure cannot be looked upon as unreasonable. On the Census there was an expenditure of $125,637. That is a service the Government had to perform; and I do not hesitate to say that the hon. Minister who has it in charge has performed it, during the last year, upon terms much more economical than in 1871. Then for the Militia there was an increase of $105,811. There may be some questions among hon. members of this House as to the expediency of increasing that expenditure; but for several years previous to 1879 it was reduced, and it was decided, last year, to increase it, and Parliament will probably be asked for a still further increase for this service. Though questions may be raised as to the expediency of this step, yet I believe that, considering the magnitude of our country and the position we occupy as a Dominion, and considering the diminution of this expenditure during four or five years previous to 1879, Parliament and the country will justify the expenditure. Then Public Works shows an increase of $284,674. For two or three years past we have not expended so much on this branch as in 1874, 1875, and 1876. The expenditure for public buildings, post offices, custom houses, &c., in various parts of the Dominion has been considered by both parties the duty of the Government, when the state of the public funds would permit it. With reference to Indians, on which service there has been an increase of $378,317, I admit that the expenditure has been large. But I would ask whether any hon. member of this House would prefer the state of affairs we now see in the neighboring Republic, or have the Government deal honestly and liberally with the Indians, in order that we may avoid these difficulties. Therefore, Sir, though it may be regretted by every hon. member of this House on both sides, that it becomes necessary that increased expenditure should take place, I am satisfied not one will object as it is necessary to the development of the North-West. In the Post Office Department there has been an increase of $103,909, to which is to be added $30,000 or $40,000 for expenditure properly belonging to last year. This would increase it to $150,000, against which we have an increase of revenue of $200,000;—the difference between the receipts and the expenditures for the last year in the Post Office Department. Notwithstanding our expenditure in the North-West, which I will not call extravagant, but expensive, it was less last year than it has been in any year since 1874-75. Then, with reference to Public Works and Canals, the increased expenditure was $189,847; but I have the satisfaction of being able to state that there was also increased business on the road, and that that increased business gave us increased revenue, from which came that $189,000. It, therefore, involves no taxation upon the people, and it shows that our railways are doing more work, giving us greater returns, and costing us nothing more than before. Out of $1,500,000 of increased expenditure, I have named articles covering $1,484,000; and I am sure the House will say, under these circumstances, that there is a very small portion of that $1,500,000 of additional expenditure to be added as taxation upon the people, and that the circumstances connected with it are of the most satisfactory character. Now, Sir, I pass to another consideration in connection with this expenditure. It is a common thing for our friends of the Opposition to point to this increased expenditure without giving the explanation regarding it. But I want to emphasize my explanation by this declaration: though the expenditure was $1,500,000 more last year than it was the year previous, if we had simply collected what was necessary for the expenditure, and nothing more, the sum that the people would have been taxed, would have been 13 cts. a head less than would have been taxed for the expenditure between 1874 and 1878 had the late Government collected sufficient to pay the expenditure. I want that to be distinctly understood, because it is the measure of the taxation upon the people. As we find our receipts from our railways and post offices and other sources increase, so, of course, the expenditure must increase in the same proportion; but, unless that increase causes an increase in taxation, the people will not object, but will rather be satisfied to know that our country is prospering, and that the public works are in such a satisfactory condition. Now, Sir, I come to the receipts and the expenditure of the current year as under the amended estimate. The amended estimate, based upon the data we have at present, that is after eight months of the year have expired, is that we will receive from Customs, $22,750,000; from Excise, $5,900,000; from the Post Office, $1,600,000; from Public Works, including Railways, $3,000,000; from Interest on investments, $800,000; from other sources, $800,000—making a total receipt for Consolidated Revenue for the present year, of $34,850,000. The expenditure on Consolidated Revenue will be $28,850,000, leaving a surplus for the current year of $6,000,000. Now, Sir, we also estimate that we will receive from our lands in the North-West as large a sum during the fiscal year as during last year, $1,750,000, making, altogether, a surplus during the current year of $7,750,000. We will probably receive from savings bank deposits during the year, $5,250,000. Now, what have we to meet? We have a probable expenditure on the Pacific Railway, on the Intercolonial Railway, on our Canals, and on the Surveys in the North-West, of $12,500,000 this year. We have to redeem maturing liabilities—and at this moment they are nearly all redeemed—to the extent of $7,000,000. With the surplus that is estimated, with the proceeds of the lands, with the money that we receive as deposits of the people in the savings banks, and the balance in our hands, deposited in the banks on the 1st of July last, added to these sums, we will have ample to pay all. If, under any circumstances, anything should occur to diminish the deposits in the savings bank, which is very doubtful, judging from the amount we have received, a loan of two or three million of dollars in Canada would be taken up readily—because there are enquiries in every direction for our securities. So that, under existing circumstances, we will not require to go abroad for one dollar, but will be able to meet everything in the way we propose. Sir, there is a very considerable increase for the current year. The increase was $1,500,000 last year, and I doubt not that by the time the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, and some important undertakings provided for, that the expenditure this year will be $1,800,000 more than last year. Now, let us see Sir, what the items are that compose that $1,800,000. I will state the most of them to the House. There is an increase of $500,000 to the expenses of the railway during the current year—$500,000 the hon. Minister asks over and above the sum voted the last Session of Parliament. That would be a very important item if we had nothing on the other side; but it is quite clear that the revenue will increase over and above the estimated increased expenditure of $500,000 during the present year—that is, the expense of working it will increase, owing to the increased business, but the increased revenue will be ample to meet it. This is what we are able to state from the results of the eight months that have already expired. Under these circumstances, it will be readily seen that the $500,000, though it adds to the gross expenditure, adds not $1 to the taxation of the people. Then with reference to the Indians, $200,000 is asked for in order to meet the expenses I have referred to. We hope by-and-by, with our large Indian reserves, with the instructions that are being given our Indians in agricultural pursuits, they may be induced to settle down and cultivate the lands, and cease to be, to a great extent, a charge upon the Dominion of Canada. But, as I stated with reference to the expenditure of the past year, it becomes a question whether we shall expose ourselves to the difficulties to which I have referred or whether we shall humanely spend an additional sum of money for this purpose, and avoid the difficulties which we might, without such expenditure, anticipate. Then there are $32,000 this year additional for the service of Immigration. I think probably that may amount, with the Supplementary Estimates, which are to come down, to $50,000; but, when we look at the prospects ahead, when we consider the indications that are already given, that we are to have, during this spring, a very large immigration indeed, and that the sum expended on immigration last year, as compared with the number of immigrants that came into the country, was very small, and that the expenditure this year, as compared with the number of immigrants that arrived in the country, will be only one-third of what it was in former years—there is not an hon. member in this House on either side, who will object to an additional expenditure of $50,000, if it results in bringing men and women into the country to settle here and make it their home. Then, in reference to Canals and Telegraphs, we shall have expended $50,000 extra this year. That has been found necessary with reference to the repairs of canals and the extension of our telegraph system—telegraphs on the coast, telegraphs in the North-West, telegraphs in British Columbia; and as the means of communication by telegraph becomes an absolute necessity in these days for the economical management of our commerce, no hon. member, I am sure, will object to an increased expenditure in that direction. Then we have, in the current year, $150,000 which was appropriated by Parliament last Session, for a bounty to the fishermen. That, of course, was voted by the House and accepted, and it is considered, I am satisfied, a wise, a judicious, and a just contribution to the fishermen of the country. Then we have $130,000 spent for the Census, over and above the expenditure last year. The expenditure last year was $100,000 and upwards, and the expenditure this year is $130,000 in excess of that. There can be no objection to that, knowing that it is being economically expended. Then we have, for the North-West Mounted Police, an increase of $123,000. The right hon. the leader of the Government stated in the House last Session, the reason why it became necessary to increase that force. Parliament sustained it, and this increased expenditure is the result of the action of Parliament. Then, with reference to the Post Office, $100,000 will be the increase during the present year, and we expect an equivalent in the shape of additional income from it. Then we have General Election expenses, $175,000. That might have been postponed, Mr. Speaker, for another year, but I think the majority in this House will say it was money judiciously expended. Then there are the subsidies to Provinces. That is the result of the action of Parliament, and became necessary under its action. There is $150,000 increased expenditure on Public Works. I venture to say that there is scarcely an hon. member of this House but will sustain the Government in that expenditure, unless, perhaps, he thinks his locality is neglected in its apportionment. When I made the statement that, whenever the means of the country would justify it, these buildings were to be erected, I observed that there was a very general response. These items amount to $1,665,000 of the $1,850,000 which it is supposed will be the increased expenditure of the present year, and but a limited portion of that will be in the shape of taxation on the people. Taking the expenditure of this year based upon the Estimates I have just stated, and taking the population as a basis, the sum the people require to be taxed to meet it, is but 1 ct. per head in excess of the average from 1874 to 1873, and that notwithstanding we have spent $30,000,000 on railways and other public works since 1878. So much with reference to the increase and expenditure of last year and this year. I desire now to come, before I refer to the next financial year, to a few points that I think, after consideration, I will be justified in calling the attention of the House to. It has been the policy of the Government, ever since 1879, to present, in the financial statement to Parliament, the facts which, in their judgment, justify the policy known as the National Policy. From 1879 down to the last Session, and including last Session, we laid before Parliament facts that, in our judgment, could not be gainsaid, to show that the policy was a sound policy and a policy in the interests of the country. To show, at the same time, that the fears that were expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite were groundless with reference to its effect, I might on this occasion rest the cause of the Government upon the verdict of June last; but I think it is better to go on year after year, not relying upon that verdict, but, as the evidence accumulates, laying it before the House in order that the public may have it and understand it, and in order that they may become even firmer, if need be, in their faith in the policy than they showed themselves to be in June last. Under these circumstances, I desire to submit a few facts for the consideration of the House which, in my judgment, justify that policy. Although I may be travelling over to some extent the ground I have gone over on former Sessions, still there is an accumulation of evidence. I may not occupy so much time as last Session, when, because I made my speech a little longer than usual, hon. gentlemen said: "We are going to have an Election." I do not desire now to go into the details so minutely, but I desire to point out some of the leading facts, and, as the hon. leader suggests, get ready for another Election. I will take up a few statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1879 against this policy. One of them was that it would make the rich man richer, and the poor man poorer; that it really was a system of taxation that was to bear especially upon the poor man, but the rich were to be benefited by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear." I will only state one or two facts. I have stated them before, but they are made stronger year by year. What are they? What is the evidence that is unmistakable as to the position of the poor man, the working man, taking the masses of the people who have necessarily to work for their living? What is the result? From 1874 to 1878 inclusive they only increased their deposits in the savings banks by \$2,300,000, in 1875 and 1876 they were absolutely less than the previous years, and, in 1877, were increased, by the fact that a disastrous fire took place in the city of St. John, and the parties who obtained their insurances could not get 3 per cent.—no, nor 2 per cent.—in the banks of New Brunswick, and so deposited them in the savings banks as they could do then without limit. The large portion—I may say the whole—of the increase of 1877 was due to policy holders, who had received their insurances placing them there, not requiring them immediately. But including the increased deposits of 1877 and 1878, the increase in five years was only \$2,300,000, or practically about the interest that was added to the principal, whereas during the last four years they have deposited, in excess of the sums withdrawn, \$13,000,000. And, what is more, the deposits in the banks, which were \$66,406,516 in 1873, were \$96,879,544, on the 31st December, 1882—an increase of \$30,473,028 in four years. Now, here we have \$43,000,000 increased deposits, and is not that a proof that the masses of the people of this country are in a better position than they were before, when, in five years, they could only lay by, including interest, \$2,300,000 in five years? I think it is needless for me to say any more to establish that the country is better off now than it was then; that men are earning better wages than they were then receiving, and that they are employed wherever they require employment. Their surplus earnings are shown by the returns of the banks, and their purchasing power by the quantities of goods they have used in this country, both imported and manufactured; this should be a sufficient answer to the fears expressed by the hon. gentlemen at that time. Now, Sir, that was one fear they expressed; what were some of the others? Why? That trade with Great Britain, under this policy, would diminish, and trade with the United States would increase; and we were charged with being disloyal, because we introduced a policy which would inevitably produce that effect. That was stated here distinctly on the floor of this House, and given as one reason why this policy should be rejected. What are the facts? They are simply these: that last year the imports from Great Britain were \$13,000,000 more than they were in 1878, while the imports from the United States were between \$300,000 and \$400,000 less than they were during the same period. Now, Sir, there is another important feature connected with this matter. I think my hon. friend from Lambton undertook to represent, after the first year's operation of our policy, that the duties on English goods had increased in a greater ratio than the duties imported from the United States. I have the imports of last year before me, and what do I find? I find that the duties on goods imported from Great Britain have increased  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. as compared with the year 1878, while the duties on goods imported from the United States have increased  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and it must be borne in mind that of the goods imported by us from the United States, a very considerable portion now consists of raw cotton—and that there has been a very large increase in that article—200 per cent. or something of that kind—and that we in 1878 imported a large portion of our sugar from the United States, which likewise tended to increase the rate duty. Now, the nature of and limited value of these importations from the United States clearly shows that, so far as the present Tariff is concerned, it is indirectly in the interests of the British manufacturers, as compared with the manufacturing industry of the United States; and, therefore, the fears of my hon. friends, upon this subject, may also be dispelled. Confident as we were that this policy would, to a large extent, establish an equilibrium between our imports and exports, fear was expressed that our expectations would not be realized. And the hon. leader of the Opposition, in the remarks that he made on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, drew attention to the absence of any reference to this subject in that Speech. Well, let me say for his information—he may, however, in looking over the papers, have ascertained it already—let me say to him, and to this House, that the present Tariff has had, very largely, the effect we anticipated. From the year 1867 to 1871-72, being the first four years of the Union, the difference between the exports and imports averaged \$12,250,000 per year; during the second four years, it averaged \$36,000,000 per year; in the third four years, it averaged \$15,000,000 per year, and during the last four years, that is from 1878 to 1882, the average was \$8,333,333. It will, therefore, be seen that our policy has had very considerable effect in establishing an equilibrium between income and expenditure. Now, Sir, there has been some anxiety manifested in the country, and I think it was also manifested by the hon. leader of the Opposition, with reference to the effect that must necessarily be produced if our exports are not equal to our imports. I think I gathered from him that he had grave doubts as to the early future of our country if that state of things continued. If I am correct in my recollection of the views he expressed upon that occasion, he differs from some of the hon. gentlemen who sit near him, because I have heard them state in this House that the greater the difference between imports and exports, the greater evidence was there of the increased wealth of the country. From the discussion that has taken place upon this subject, it will not be expected that the Government should entertain that view. The opinion has been expressed through the press that, owing to our increased imports, a commercial crisis is not far off. I have thought it my duty, occupying the position I do, to enquire into this matter, and to see whether during the last four years there has been any evidence of the approach of such a crisis, arising from this cause—that is in the demand for exchange or in the facilities or means of paying for these imports. Now, Sir, we had to provide during the last four years, not only \$33,000,000, but we had to provide for exchange to the amount of \$32,000,000, interest on debt and sinking fund—these items amount to an average of about \$8,000,000 a year—and, of course, it is quite proper for us to consider whether or not we are in a position, and have been in a position, for the last four years, without creating embarrassment with reference to exchange in making payments on the other side of the Atlantic. Are we in a position, and have we been in a position to meet this amount without any difficulty whatever? I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that we have been able to do it without embarrassment or difficulty. You add the \$32,000,000 transmitted during the four years to the \$33,000,000, the difference between the imports and exports, and you have \$65,000,000. How has that been met? There are certain data of a reliable character that we have, and from it I am satisfied that this amount has been met without any difficulty whatever. In the first place, the Government of Canada have floated loans to the extent of \$8,000,000 in excess of payments that at the time had to be made on the other side of the Atlantic. That \$8,000,000, of course, was available for exchange, or was brought into the country in gold; then, in addition to that, we had \$4,500,000 paid as the Fishery Award: that is \$12,500,000. We had, belonging to the Dominion of Canada, about \$30,000,000 worth of shipping engaged in foreign trade. It is but a low estimate to suppose that \$30,000,000 yielded 10 per cent. to the owners. Every man who is interested in shipping will say that that is a ruinous return, considering the depreciation in the value of the vessel; but taking that as the basis, it shows a return in the shape of exchange payments made for freight earned abroad, of \$3,000,000 a year. In four years that amounts to \$12,000,000. Then, during the four years, we exported in lumber, grain, and other products of Canada, \$350,000,000 worth. There has been expended in the disbursements, 5 per cent. on the value of the cargo, that amounts to \$17,500,000. Then, Sir, there has been about \$1,500,000 received on insurance—on vessels which have been lost during that period. Then we have sales of Provincial Government bonds, and capital stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that was paid by persons residing outside of the Dominion of Canada, making altogether about \$15,000,000. It was stated, either by the mover or the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech, that the money brought into the country by immigrants during the last year amounted to \$10,000,000; but I take a low estimate, and I will fix that item at \$10,000,000 for the four years. Having provided for the payment of interest and sinking fund, and the exchange necessary to pay for the difference between imports and exports—we have, on these items alone, \$3,000,000 or \$4,000,000 in excess of the sum necessary. Under these circumstances, I think our fears as to the future may also be quieted, provided we can keep, as we hope to keep, by this policy, the ratio between imports and exports nearer than they were from 1871 to 1878, or even from 1867 to 1871, or from 1874-75 down to 1879. This, I say, will be the case if we can keep the proportion where it is; and I do not hesitate to say that I, for one, do not look upon a very large increase of imports as an unmixed blessing. If the people are in a position to consume the goods which come into the country—if they have the purchasing power, it is an evidence of their wealth. But my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition called the attention of the House to a remark which I made to a personal friend—a merchant of St. John—and I suppose I repeated it in public afterwards—to the effect that if I were his age, and engaged in business, I would put on the whole of the canvas I could carry for ten years, and then take in sail. I believe, from the fact that we are opening up and developing the great North-West country, from the fact that the population coming into the country at the present time are bringing in a large amount of money for investment, from the fact that, last year, we had of the value of imports over \$1,000,000 of settlers' effects—and which will be increasing, and which, of course, does not create any difficulty financially—from the fact of the large expenditures in the North-West, I hold that the return of the pendulum—which always does come back—will be deferred, and that we have seven years of prosperity before the country. If, Sir, our business men are not carried away by this success and prosperity—if they do not import over and above what the requirements of the country absolutely demand, if they do not, in their anxiety to do business, trust men who will fail and not pay them—then, Sir, I say there will be no difficulty whatever, in my judgment, for the next seven years, with reference to the commercial condition of the country. So I hold that the fear which was entertained and declared that we would not be able to establish the equilibrium between the exports and imports must to a certain extent have been dispelled, because there were \$8,333,000 as compared with \$12,000,000 for the first four years; \$36,000,000 the second, and \$15,000,000 the third, which shows, that with the prosperous times of last year, and the large importation which took place, the balance was only \$8,333,000 against us. Therefore, their fears on this point ought also to be dispelled. Then, Sir, it was stated, that this policy being at variance with the policy of the Mother Country, it would create a bad feeling there, and the result would be that Great Britain would be anxious to throw us off in her indignation. Not only so, but it was said that it would affect our credit abroad. Well, Sir, has it affected our credit? I cannot see that it has. Year by year our position is becoming better. As I stated on a former occasion, in 1879, our securities were 4 or 5 per cent. below those of New South Wales, which stood at the very top of the list. To-day, we are 2 per cent. above them. We are further in advance than we were twelve months ago. Hon. gentlemen may say that this is caused by the cheapness of the money, but that would not account for the difference between the two cases. Let me give some of the reasons why our securities stand where they do to-day. This policy of the Government which is securing a handsome surplus from year to year, has, in the first place, given confidence to the investors, and what has it done besides? Where would our securities have been to-day, if, considering that during the last four years we have spent \$36,000,000 on Capital Account, and that during the same period we have redeemed \$20,000,000 of debentures and other securities falling due—if, instead of having the surpluses we have had—if, instead of having increased the earnings of the people placed at the disposal of the Government—if, instead of having \$1,750,000 paid in yearly from the proceeds of our lands—if, instead of this state of things we had had deficits, and our savings bank depositors nearly stationary, we would have been compelled to go to the English market for \$10,000,000 a year, and ask the capitalists of that country to take our securities for that amount—I ask where would our securities have stood in that case? We would have stood as to New South Wales, as we did before. Whereas, to-day, we occupy the proud position of being at the head of all colonial securities in the English market. We are likely to stand there, because, apart from our maturing liabilities—\$25,000,000 in 1885, and \$10,000,000 which we have taken up and will be taking up, the next three, or four, or five years—if we can have a surplus of three or four millions a year, and saving deposits of a like sum, we will not from this day to the finishing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, require to go to the English market, except to replace those liabilities which mature; under those circumstances, hon. gentlemen can easily understand that our securities will continue to maintain a good position. But if we had not a surplus, if we had not this money paid in by our people out of their savings and had to go to England to ask for these loans we would soon see the effect. Our credit has not been injured; and every hon. gentleman knows that our position to-day—in the estimation of our fellow countrymen in the fatherland—stands higher than it ever stood before. Then, Sir, there was another fear expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. It was said that the imposition of a duty upon agricultural products, necessitating their being bonded in their passage through Canada, would interfere with our trade—that is, it would diminish the value of the foreign exports, and this it was not desirable to do. One hon. gentleman, who is not now in this House, pointed out how large a sum of money was paid to the railways and forwarding companies for the transmission of American products to the ports of the Dominion of Canada for shipment, and he made out apparently a strong case. His arguments would have had a great effect if his conclusions had been justified by the facts. But it was found that measures were taken by the hon. Minister of Customs, by which very little difficulty occurred in the transmission of the products of the United States through Canada. It was found that there was a large increase in 1878-79, and 1879-80, but in 1881 a falling off, as compared with 1879-80, and hon. gentlemen opposite called the attention of the House to that fact. I understand that a very large falling off in the exports of the natural products of this continent, both in the United States and in Canada, occurred. But I may state here that, during the past year, there has been an increase of nearly \$1,000,000 in the exports of American products from the Port of Montreal alone, and the quantity would have been much larger had it not been for the failure of the corn crop, which affected the exports from the American ports as well. The falling off in the exports from Canadian ports has been in the same proportion as the falling off at American ports; but had it not been for the failure of the Indian corn crop, the exports would have been as large as they were in any year from 1879 to the present—except one. It is quite clear, however, that up to the present time there has not been a falling off, but an increase; but that increase has not been as large during the last year or two as it was for the two years previous. The Government have always been exceedingly anxious to encourage this trade. They would have hesitated a long time before taking any steps that would diminish the volume of trade going from the ports of the Dominion. Our whole policy, the policy of both Governments since 1867, has been to do everything that the means of the country would justify to afford increased facilities to the shipping coming to and going from Canadian ports. Since Confederation \$1,200,000 have been expended in establishing lighthouses, fog-whistles, &c., in order to give additional security to our shipping; and the expenditure for the maintenance of these has increased \$250,000 a year since Confederation. These figures show that every Government, and every Parliament, have been fully alive to the importance of this matter; and it is probable that before Parliament rises there will be an application to the House for further aid in this direction, in order that we may secure a larger proportion of the export trade of the United States, if it is possible to secure it. There can be no doubt as to the policy of the Government on this question, when it is remembered that it has been the policy of the Government, in legislating for the Canadian Pacific Railway, to direct the trade of the great West, during the summer, through Montreal and Quebec, and during the winter, through the open ports of the Dominion. The House may rest assured that no step will be taken by the Government that will in any way diminish the extent of the exports of the United States, or of our own country, from our own ports. Then, again, Sir, it was said that this Tariff would not prove to be a Protective Tariff; and that if it did prove to be a Protective Tariff, it would not be a Revenue Tariff; that we were on the horns of a dilemma, and must fail one way or the other. Is it necessary for me, Sir, to produce any data to show that it has been a Protective Tariff? Well, I think I will, because before this discussion closes, I have no doubt that, because the increased purchasing power of the people of Canada has been such that they have gone on largely increasing the consumption of imported and Canadian manufactured goods, some hon. gentleman opposite may argue that this is an evidence that this Tariff has failed to be a Protective Tariff. I have a few figures which I think it is important to give, in addition to the evidence that must have come to the attention of every hon. gentleman, no matter where he has gone throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. If his eyes were open, he must have seen new industries arising, large extensions being made to existing industries, and a largely increased population engaged in them. In 1877-78, the quantity of wool imported into Canada for manufacturing purposes, was 6,230,081 lbs., against 9,646,684 lbs., in 1881-82, an increase of 50 per cent., besides an increased consumption of our own wool. The raw cotton imported, in 1877-78, amounted to 7,243,413 lbs., against 19,342,059 lbs., or an increase of over 175 per cent. Nothing can show more accurately the increased manufacture of cotton goods, than the extent of the imports of raw material, because we produce no raw cotton in the country. With reference to hides. In 1877-78, the value of the imports was \$1,207,300, while, in 1881-82, the value was \$2,200,000, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. Then the consumption of coal is a very good test of the extension of machinery driven by steam. In 1877-78, the consumption of coal, not including British Columbia, was 1,665,401 tons, and, in 1881-82, 2,525,297 tons, an increase of 859,896 tons. That shows the extent of the demand for the article that is necessary to create the power to drive the machinery of our various industries in Canada. Then we have another test. Go where you will, my experience has been that the manufacturers of machinery are full of orders—so full, in fact, that they are unable to supply their customers, who are, therefore, obliged to order from the United States in some cases. Wherever we go, we find the manufacturers smiling, and looking perfectly satisfied with what they have to do. In 1877-78, the value of the machinery imported into Canada was \$283,633, while, in 1881-82, it was increased to \$2,194,446, an increase of nearly 700 per cent., besides the greatly increased quantity of machinery manufactured in the country—which gives unmistakable evidence as to the increase of our manufacturing industries. As to our friends fears about the progress of our manufacturing industries, I think that fact ought to be sufficient to quiet them. It was also alleged that the Tariff would increase the price of coal, and would not promote the development of the coal beds of

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Canada. In 1879, I stated that the opinion of the Government was that in four or five years the quantity of the coal raised in Canada would increase 400,000 tons. Within four years it has increased between 500,000 and 600,000 tons. It is, therefore, evident that this policy is developing the coal beds of the Dominion. I may state that the indications are, in Nova Scotia alone, at two points within a short distance of the coal mines, the consumption of coal this year by two manufactories will be 70,000 tons in excess of that of last year. I think this is pretty good evidence that, as far as the development of this particular industry is concerned, the policy has been a success. Then, again, there was another industry the Government stated it was their policy to encourage—the reestablishment of the refining of sugar here, and the restoration of our sugar trade with the countries of produce. We had lost our direct trade with the sugar producing countries to such an extent that, in 1877-78, but 6 per cent. of the sugar consumed in the Dominion came direct from those countries. That has been changed. Last year 87 per cent. of the quantity consumed came direct from the sugar producing countries. That shows pretty clearly, I think, that we have reestablished our trade with the West Indies. It was said, however, that this policy would put millions into the pockets of a few rich men, the sugar refiners, and give employment to a limited number, but would cost the people in the increased price of sugar so much money that it would be better for them to pay the board of the men who were to be engaged in those refineries rather than depart from the old system. Now, I have in my possession a carefully prepared statement of the value of refined sugar in New York and the Dominion, at stated periods in every month during the last year; and, according to that statement the consumers of Canada had their refined sugar—this table applies particularly to granulated sugar, but it is still stronger with reference to the other sugar—at a saving to them of 67 cts. per 100 lbs. during the last year. If that be the case, and if but 100,000,000 lbs. of refined sugar were consumed in the Dominion, that would represent a saving of $670,000. It may be quite true there was some deficit in the revenue as the result of this; but take a-half off the amount and put it into the revenue, and you have still a very large and handsome sum saved by the people of Canada. In addition to the building up of this important industry, and the reestablishment of our trade with the sugar producing countries, we give employment directly and indirectly to thousands of people besides fostering an industry which the Government and Parliament thought it was highly desirable should be restored. The results, in my opinion, are so satisfactory that hon. gentlemen opposite who opposed this policy will have now to abandon their objections.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the hon. gentleman give the figures in New York and Montreal?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I shall be very happy to do so. I was not in this House in 1874, but I read the Budget Debate. The then Finance Minister expressed regret that there was no ex-Finance Minister to reply to his Budget Speech. Considering the reply he obtained from a gentleman who was not an ex-Finance Minister, I will not venture to say anything of the kind on this occasion, because I may find that I may meet a more formidable opponent than I did formerly. I am sure I will meet a much more courteous one, as I understand the hon. gentleman who has just put me this question is to reply. I will give the hon. gentleman the figures he has asked for. It was said that our Tariff, if it was successful as a Protective Tariff, would not give a revenue. Well, the trouble is now, that, in their estimation, it produces too much revenue. I have a few facts to give to the House which are very remarkable and important, as far as the producing power of the Tariff is concerned. I have jotted down here a few of the articles, some fifteen or eighteen items, on which we received, during the last year, an increased revenue of $6,689,000, as compared with 1877-78. They are worth giving to the House. On wines we received, last year, as compared with 1877-78, an increased revenue of $195,977; on spirits, Customs and Excise, $1,237,635. I am happy to say that this is not altogether an increase in the consumption, but an increased duty tended to produce this result; otherwise we might view it with more regret. On tobacco and cigars, Customs and Excise, the increase has been $364,000; on silks, satins and fancy goods, $731,000; machinery, $498,000; on products of the farm, the increased revenue, as the result of this policy, on agricultural products brought from the United States, is $532,000; fruit, green, $57,000; dried fruit, $91,000; from linen, on which the increase of duty was but 2½ per cent., we have received an increase, revenue of $152,000 over 1878, showing, in a marked manner, the increased purchasing power on the part of the people; furs of manufactured, $63,000; jewellery, $68,000; watches, $74,000; manufactures gold and silver, $53,000; glass, plate and plated manufactures, $143,000. Here is the astounding fact that, notwithstanding the increased manufactures of cotton in the Dominion, and that the quantity of raw cotton thus consumed here was increased by 200 per cent., imports were greater last year than in 1878, of the description of cotton not made in the country; and the amount of duty collected was $1,230,000 over that collected in 1877-78, notwithstanding the vast increase in our cotton mills. On the finer descriptions of woollen goods, the increased revenue is $1,189,000, making an aggregate increase of $6,689,000. Of this a large portion has been on articles which are certainly not the necessities, but the luxuries of life, which people consume when they have the means to do so. We, therefore, see how it is that this Tariff, which has given increased employment to an increased number of men and women in the country, has really produced a largely increased revenue, owing, to a very great extent, to the present prosperous and happy condition of the people. May I say that there has never been a period in the history of this country, when taxation was paid more cheerfully by the people, than the present. We do not hear any grumbling about the rate of taxation; on the contrary, as long as men are prospering, as long as they have money in their pockets, as long as they have plenty of employment—and it is the duty of every Government and the representatives of the people to see that the masses, as far as possible, have these—they are in a contented condition. Sir, this, to my judgment, establishes pretty clearly that the Tariff has proved itself not only protective, but beyond doubt, a revenue-producing Tariff. Our friends on the opposite side say: a Tariff producing more than is absolutely necessary. I think I have answered the several objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1878. A great many more objections were made, and a great many more might be answered, but I will satisfy myself with these for the present. Now, Sir, I desire to call the attention of the House, before I take up the expenditure of 1883-84, to the changes that are proposed in the Tariff to be submitted in Committee. I may say that these propositions are submitted with the view, in the first place, of relieving the country of $1,000,000 or $1,250,000 of taxation; and, in the second place, they are submitted so as to give, wherever we can, what we felt we could not safely give in 1879, because the Tariff was then to some extent an experiment. Articles that were raw material to a manufacturer, in some cases, was subjected to a duty of 10 per cent., though it was not produced in the country. We did so because we were not quite sure that the operation of the Tariff would give us all the revenue we desired. But finding that it gave us more than we wanted, we proposed, last Session, and now we continue that policy, to take off the 10 per cent. duty—or duties analogous to that—and on goods that are not manufactured in the country, and we give the raw material to the manufacturer free, in order that he may have the benefits and advantages of this. We would have taken that course in 1879, had we felt quite certain as to the effect to be produced. But more than that, we find that our enterprising neighbors to the south of us have made up their minds that, if such a thing is possible, they will have for their manufactures the market of Canada at any price. Circulars are being distributed with reference to certain articles, and we find by them that if they could choose certain manufactures and obtain our market for a year or two they could have the market for themselves, and they are making an effort to get it. Therefore, it is that wherever we find from past experience that the competition is sufficient among our own manufacturers to give us an article as cheap or cheaper than it was before, we propose to ask Parliament that the market shall be largely retained to these manufacturers. We have taken some time to consider certain cases, and we can afford to wait a year in order to ascertain results with reference to some of the industries, and in regard to these we are not prepared to ask the House to make a change at present; but in others, where we are satisfied that we have produced articles in the past at a lower price, or at as low a price, as they were produced before this Tariff came into operation, we propose to ask Parliament to protect these men from the sharp competition from outside. I take up the Free List in the first place. We propose to add to the Free List, agates, rubies, pearls, sapphires, emeralds, garnets, opals, not polished. Aniline dyes are now on the Free List, but we propose to make a change, and it is this: That all aniline dyes in packages over 5 lbs. shall be free. A large quantity of this article is imported into Canada in small packages, and we are adopting precisely the same principle with reference to this article that we did with reference to garden seeds put up in small packages. Under this arrangement the paper comes in free, and the labor also is untaxed; we propose that all packages of less than 5 lbs. shall be subjected to 10 per cent. duty. Celluloid in sheets, lumps or blocks, dry colors, metallic oxides, cobalt, zinc and tin, are also added to the Free List. Diamond drills for prospecting for minerals: these are frequently brought into the country and have been subjected to a duty. They were brought in by men who were prospecting for minerals, and, therefore, for the purpose of developing the mineral resources of the country, and we ask Parliament to declare that they shall hereafter be free. Dye, jet black, feathers, plush of silk or cotton, that formerly paid 10 per cent., are put on the Free List. Kainite or German potash salts for fertilizing: these are used in our manufactures, and have been paying 20 per cent., and it is proposed to admit them free. To lumber or timber—add gumwood; this description of wood is now imported from the United States by our sewing machine manufacturers, and as it cannot be had in the Dominion, we propose to put it on the Free List. Then, as this is a paternal Government, and a Government that looks after the smallest interest of the country, we propose that sawdust shall be free—sawdust of certain wood, of walnut and various other woods, because sawdust now pays 20 per cent. duty as unenumerated article. It is used in the manufacture of various articles, being mixed with some other material, and is to some of our manufacturers an article of importance, and, therefore, we propose to make it free. Hickory sawn, in shape for spokes for wheels, but not further manufactured, and natural mineral waters, to be free. Then, in regard to settlers' effects. Formerly a settler coming into the country paid duty on musical instruments, sewing machines, live stock, carts and other vehicles. It is now proposed that all these articles when brought in by a settler and having been in use one year shall be free. Asphaltum, which paid 10 per cent., to be free. Now I come to a proposal that has elicited as much attention outside of Parliament as almost any subject that has been referred to in the last four years—that is the question of duty on books. A very strong pressure has been brought to bear on the Government to admit books for scientific institutions, for free libraries, and for educational institutions, free. The proposition was, that all books not made in Canada, nor likely to be made here, should be admitted free. The Government found it was not possible to adopt that proposition, because it could not be expected that the thousands of collectors all through the country, should know whether the books imported were made in the country, or likely to be made here, and it was impossible, therefore, to impose upon them this duty, intelligent and capable men as they undoubtedly are. We could not say that all books should be admitted free, because the manufacture of books and the printing industry of the country are important interests. We stated distinctly when we imposed a duty of 15 per cent., as against 5 per cent., that it was for the purpose of encouraging those industries in the Dominion, and, after giving the matter a good deal of consideration, we did not see that we could agree to the proposals made; but it was a question with the Government how far we could deal with the subject practically, in order that their wishes might be met in part, if not in whole. Under these circumstances, we decided to submit the proposition which I shall have the honor to present to the House. Free libraries asked to have their books free, this granted, individuals, who did not live in the neighborhood of free libraries, would, of course, feel it a great injustice to be compelled to pay 15 per cent. duty. We felt that we could not ask exceptional legislation, otherwise there would be a grievance. And, therefore, we propose—and it will involve the loss of $50,000—that books bound, printed over seven years, or printed by any Government or scientific association and not for trade, shall be free. This will cover, perhaps, half the import of books, the duty collected last year being about $100,000. It will cover books in the dead languages, reference books for libraries, a large portion of the books required for educational institutions; but when people wish to obtain the novels of the present day they will be required to pay 15 per cent.; and this will retain in the hands of the book publishers of Canada the publication of such books as they have been publishing. A gentleman said to me the other day: "If you lay down the principle that books not published in Canada shall be admitted free, what would I, an author, do? I would go to the United States and have my books published there, and bring them in duty free. I would thereby have both markets, and there would be no inducement for me to have my books published in Canada, but, on the contrary, there would be an inducement to go to the United States and publish them there."

Mr. MACKENZIE. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that all educational books would be admitted free.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. Books of every description printed over seven years.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that books used in educational institutions would be admitted free.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; that was objected to. Chronometers and compasses for ships, free. Copper in sheets, formerly 10 per cent., free. A good many manufacturers use it very largely; we imposed a duty of 10 per cent. in 1879, but it is now proposed to admit it free. Iron and steel, old and scrap, free. Iron beams, sheets or plates, and knees for iron or composite ships, free. We are now building in Canada, and we will probably build more extensively in the future, composite ships with iron frames, iron beams, and sheathed with wood, and the iron that is imported for the purpose—because vessels so brought into the country would, if British vessels, under the Merchant Shipping Act, come in free—will be admitted free of duty. This is intended as an encouragement to the ship-building industry, and it is proposed to extend the time over which such articles will be admitted free for a period of three years, because we believe the time is coming when we will have sufficiently developed our iron industries so as to produce our own beams, sheets, and knees for iron vessels. I may say, while speaking on the article of iron, that it has been one of the most difficult questions with which the Government has had to grapple, because iron used in the larger portion of the manufactures of the Dominion, to-day, is a raw material; but the Government consider it so important an industry to develop that they are resolved to develop it if this can possibly be effected by any legislation or moderate encouragement, inasmuch as the value of iron when manufactured is mainly in labor, the labor of the country. From the time of mining the ore, excavating the coal, converting the coal into coke, until the operations are completed, its value, to a very large extent, lies in the labor employed, and it is therefore an industry of the greatest importance. The Government will submit a resolution to the Committee, that on and after the first of July next, and for three years, $1.50 per ton will be paid on all pig iron produced in Canada during three years, and $1 per ton during the next three years, as a bounty for the encouragement and development of this industry. Iodine, crude, is to be free. Marble in blocks, fifteen cubic feet and over, now paying 10 per cent., will be free; and sawn slabs, now paying 15 per cent., will be 10 per cent.: sawn slabs in the ordinary form, that is, sawn on both sides. Otto of roses will be free. Platinum wire will be free. Seeds, anise, coriander, fennel and fennugreek, will be free. Spurs and stiltis for earthenware makers; sausage skins or casings not cleaned; valerian root; wire of brass or copper, round or flat, will be free. Wire of iron or steel, galvanized or tinned, fifteen gauge, and smaller, will be free. There are industries in Canada at the present time engaged in the manufacture of iron cordage and rope. Cordage for ship purposes at present is free. The result is that while a duty of 15 per cent. is exacted on that description of wire, manufacturers were handicapped; and it is proposed, inasmuch as we are not likely to produce the finer wire of fifteen gauge and smaller, to admit wire used for the manufacture of sieves, and other work of that kind, duty free. Steel railway bars or rails, fish-plates and sheets for the manufacture of saws are all admitted free until the close of this Session; but as I have a proposition on this subject to submit further on I need simply say now that it is intended that from the close of the Session and afterwards that steel railway bars or rails, fish plates and steel for the manufacture of saws, shall be free. I now come to the articles the duty on which we propose to decrease. The first is buckram, which enters largely into certain manufactures, and now paying a duty of 20 per cent., we propose to reduce the duty to 10 per cent. Button covers 10 per cent. This will aid industries of the kind which are established here, the cover for the buttons being made 10 instead of 20 per cent. Coal dust to be 20 per cent. ad valorem, instead of specific. This article has been brought into Western Canada and used by manufacturers. Under the present Tariff, 50 cts. and 63 cts. a ton have been collected; if hard coal, the duty was 50 cts.; and if bituminous, it was 60 cts. This was a very large ad valorem duty on this article, which is used in certain industries in that section; and, therefore, it is proposed to change this duty to 20 per cent. ad valorem. Dried fruit, now 25 per cent., to be 20 per cent. Lamp black and ivory black, now 20 per cent., to be 10 per cent.

Lead, nitrate and acetate, now 20 per cent., to be 5 per cent., the same as dried white and dried red lead. Leather: lamb, sheep, buck, deer, elk, and antelope, dressed and colored or not, reduced from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent. This description of leather is used by glove makers. Kid, tanned, dressed and colored or not is now 15 per cent. This is also used in the same manufacture. Liquorice paste, now 20 per cent., to be 15 per cent. Marble in blocks, fifteen cubic feet and over, free, and under fifteen cubic feet, 10 per cent. Slabs, sawn on two sides, now 15 per cent., to be 10 per cent. Oil and enamelled cloth for trunk and valise makers, now 30 per cent., to be 15 per cent. Paper, union collar, cloth, now 10 per cent., to be 5 per cent. Precious stones: opates, emeralds garnets and opals, polished, to be 10 per cent. Spices, except nutmegs and mace unground, now 20 per cent., to be 10 per cent.; ground spices remain as at present. Tobacco and snuff, specific duty, reduced from 25 cts. to 20 cts. per lb. I may state here, that owing to the fact that the United States have reduced the Excise duty on tobacco and snuff, from 16 cts. to 8 cts. per lb., the Government found it an absolute necessity, for many reasons—though there are other articles on which they would rather relieve the people from taxation—to reduce our duty on tobacco made from foreign leaf, from 20 cts. to 12 cts., and from Canadian leaf, from 8 cts. to 2 cts. And as the amount obtained from Canadian tobacco is small, we propose to make the rules and regulations such as will be acceptable to those who are tobacco growers. Spirits of turpentine, now 20 per cent. to pay 10 per cent. It is proposed to make the duty on bells—except on bells imported for church purposes, which are free—30 per cent. Sometimes they are made of brass, and at other times of other material, and the rate of duty was fixed according to the material of which they were made; and, therefore, in order to obviate the difficulties which have arisen in the past, it is proposed that all bells, except church bells, shall pay a uniform duty of 30 per cent. Cloth of other materials than cotten or woollen, made uniform, 30 per cent. For the same reason, we find it necessary to deal with these articles to which I have just referred. Sometimes a difficulty arose with reference to the material of which a cloth was made. If part cotton and part wool, and in some cases, part rubber, a great deal of difficulty has arisen in the Department; and, in order to obviate this, a specific duty of 30 per cent. is imposed. Either sulphuric or nitric, 20 per cent. The question has arisen, whether these articles are subject to spirit duty, or non-enumerated; and in order to set this question at rest, it is proposed to make the duty 20 per cent. Clothing made waterproof, now, according to material of cloth—now 35 per cent. Jellies and jams, now as confectionery, 6 cts. per lb., specific. A difficulty has occurred in past as to the value of these articles, and it is proposed after a careful examination, to fix the duty at 6 cts. per lb., specific. Magic lanterns and optical instruments, now according to material, to be 25 per cent. The same difficulty has arisen, as to the material of which these articles were made, and it is, therefore, proposed to make the rate of duty clear, no matter what material is used in their manufacture. Nickel anodes to be 10 per cent., same as now charged. This is to settle a question which has arisen as to their class. Lubricating oils, the wording of the Tariff is changed. To avoid difficulties, the wording of the Tariff is now so made as to settle the rate of duty; but there is no change as to the rate which has been collected by the Department in the past. Vaseline and similar preparations of petroleum, in bulk 5 cts., and in bottle, &c., 6 cts. per lb. This is a case of the same kind.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the proposition about lubricating oils?

Sir LEONARD TILLY. It is simply to settle the question which has been raised; but the same rate of duty is now to be collected.

Mr. BLAKE. What duty do you fix?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It remains just as it was.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman does not state what he proposes to do?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is 25 per cent. Then pocket-books and purses. There has been a question whether or not they are under the heading: trunks and valises made of leather; and to settle this, they are added to that list, in order that the duty may be definitely fixed. I now submit an important proposition in reference to woollen cloth, which is to be charged as woollen clothing; dress and costume cloths, under 25 inches wide, and not weighing more than three ounces per square yard, to be 20 per cent. I call the attention of the House to this matter, because I think it is important. A great deal of difficulty has occurred all over the country in establishing a uniform rate of duty on certain classes of goods. In one locality, 7½ cts. per lb. and 20 per cent. would be collected, and, in another, 20 per cent., and this rate is fixed for the purpose of defining clearly the duties which are imposed upon these articles; and therefore the Department have fixed it in this way: that the article being 25 inches in width or less, and not weighing over 3 oz. per square yard, shall pay 20 per cent., while that which is wider—the class of goods manufactured in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and heavier—shall pay a higher rate of duty. This is a definite description by which our officers everywhere will be able to collect a uniform rate of duty. This is a matter of considerable importance, as hon. members who are in business will readily understand, and I am sure that the hon. Minister of Customs has experienced a great deal of difficulty in connection with this subject.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the present rate of duty is maintained with reference to wider and heavier goods?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; wider and heavier goods pay the present rate of duty; only narrow goods, under 25 inches wide, and light goods, pay 20 per cent. Recently the Government have had deputations waiting upon them, asking their co-operation in the protection of the game of the country, and the Government will ask Parliament to prohibit, for reasons which will be stated, the export of deer, wild turkey, and quail. In Ontario, so far as deer are concerned, and that is the Province most interested, Americans go in there and slaughter deer right and left, and if not checked will soon exterminate them. The Ontario Legislature have prohibited their export, but, at all events, it is more properly within the authority of the Dominion Parliament to deal with the prohibition of exports, and so it is proposed for the time being at least, to prohibit the exportation of deer, teal and wild turkey, and to impose a penalty in case of violation. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the items in which we propose an increase of duty. Acetic acid is a material which varies very much in strength, and in the United States a duty is imposed in accordance with the strength; but it is not imported in sufficient quantities to justify the Government in applying that expensive test. It is proposed to increase the duty from 12 cts. to 15 cts. The manufacturers of vinegar assert that this article, imported in strong condition, being reduced, enables the parties importing it to undersell them. As to other acids, the importers sometimes mix them, and in the same way they are in the habit of mixing sulphuric acid with others, which are admitted at 20 per cent., in order to evade the higher rate of duty imposed on sulphuric. Mixed acids are to pay 25 per cent. instead of 20 per cent. Absinthe is another article which is imported into Canada; I suppose it is to be found in the list of unenumerated spirits, but it is an article deleterious in its effects, and it is proposed to impose upon it a duty of $2 per gallon. Aniline dyes, of less than 5 lb. packages, are to pay a duty of 10 per cent.;

agricultural implements and machines to pay a specific and ad valorem duty equal to 35 per cent., and upon portable machines, spades, hoes, and forks the same duty will be imposed. A careful examination has been made of the value of these goods, and we came to the conclusion that a specific and ad valorem duty equivalent to 35 per cent. should be imposed. This is one of the articles to which I referred in my remarks with reference to the policy of the Government in changing the Tariff. If you take up the list of the American houses in Winnipeg, you will find that they offer their agricultural implements at precisely the same prices as our manufacturers have been selling them for, and in some cases men who were agents for our manufacturers in the North-West, have become agents for American manufacturers, and a fair inference is that they allow them a larger margin than our own people allow them. The result is, that unless some steps are taken, the Americans will drive our people out of that market, and they will then increase the price of the implement to the consumer. Our people show that their prices are as low as those of the United States implements, and we ask Parliament to say—inasmuch as the people of Canada, who manufacture these implements, can produce them as cheaply and sell them at from 10 to 15 per cent. less than in 1878, and are prepared to supply them as cheap as the Americans—that they shall not be deprived of our own market, and therefore we ask for this increase in the Tariff.

Mr. BLAKE. What are the proportions between the specific and ad valorem duties?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We propose to make it 35 per cent. It is now 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. How much is specific?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. About one-half, I think.

Mr. BLAKE. What are the proportions of specific and ad valorem duties?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. About half each, I think. The same principle of specific and ad valorem duties is applied, as the House will see as I proceed, to carriages. In many cases inferior goods are sent into Canada, their defects being covered with putty and varnish, and under-valued and inferior; and the Government has decided that the only way to reach such cases is to impose a specific and ad valorem duty. Bed comforters and quilts, now paying 20 per cent., it is proposed shall pay 27½ per cent.; boot and shoe laces are to pay 30 per cent. instead of 20 per cent.—they are now manufactured in the Dominion, and can be furnished as cheaply as the imported if the manufacturer can secure the market. Braces and suspenders, now paying 25 per cent. are to pay 30 per cent.; playing cards, now 35 per cent., 6 cts. per pack; carriages, now 30 per cent., are to pay a specific and ad valorem duty equal to 35 per cent. on the same principle as that applied to agricultural implements.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it about equally divided?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, I think it is 15 or 20 ad valorem, and the balance is specific. Children's carriages are to pay the same. Cordage of all kinds, 20 per cent. Cordage for shipping purposes at present pays 10 per cent. and all other cordage 20 per cent.; and what is the result? The result is that nearly all the cordage imported into Canada is for shipping purposes. It is now proposed that all cordage shall pay 20 per cent. Ten cents per ton will be added to the drawback paid to the builders of new ships in the Dominion. This change is made in order to give the manufacturers of cordage in Canada a fair chance, which they have not now. Cotton, printed or dyed, now 20 per cent., after the 1st January next will pay 27½ per cent. There are establishments for the manufacture of these goods being built in Canada. When the Tariff was changed in 1879, we imposed only a Revenue Tariff duty. Whenever capitalists were in a position to manufacture it in Canada

we stated, it would be placed on the same footing as other protected goods; but as they will not be ready to manufacture before the 1st of January, it is proposed that the new duty shall not go into force until that date. Jewel, watch, and similar cases, lined with satin or silk, now 25 per cent. are to pay 30 per cent. The material now pays 30 per cent., and it is proposed to place the manufacturers of the cases in a better position by making the duty on the manufactured article 30 per cent. Cane or ruttan, split, to be 25 per cent.; it is now 20 per cent. There is an establishment for the manufacture of ruttan goods at Woodstock. They furnish the split cane to furniture manufacturers, and they furnish it of as good quality and as cheaply as the imported article. This industry is capable of being made one of the most flourishing in the country, and it is desirable to give them some protection.

After Recess.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When the Speaker left the Chair I was calling attention to the proposed increases in the Tariff. I think the last article I referred to was split cane. It is proposed to increase the duty on cane from 20 to 25 per cent. It is also proposed to change the duty on fruit in air-tight cans. There is a different duty imposed upon fruit which is sweetened and fruit which is not sweetened in the Tariff as it stands at present; but there have been so many attempts to enter sweetened fruit at the low rate of duty, that I propose to place the same duty upon all fruit in cans—3 cts per 1 lb. can. Iron bedsteads, I propose shall now be classed as furniture and be placed at 35 per cent. On show cases, now paying 35 per cent., a specific duty of $2 is to be added. Hair cloth, now paying 20 per cent., is to pay 30 per cent. A first-class article is now being manufactured in that line in the Dominion, and is sold at a price as low as it can be imported for and less; and the parties who manufacture it simply ask that they may have the market. Jute carpeting, matting or mats, now 20 per cent., are to be 25 per cent. ad val. rem. Lamp wicks, now 20 per cent., are to be 30 per cent. Music, printed, now paying 6 cts. per lb., I propose shall pay 10 cts. per lb. Fancy paper, now paying 25 per cent., is to pay 30 per cent., the same as wall paper. Iron pumps in addition to the 25 per cent. duty now paid, to pay 50 cts. each specific duty. Steel in ingots, bars, sheets, coils, I propose shall pay $5 per ton, on and after 1st of July next, when steel will be manufactured in Canada. Files, now 30 per cent., are to pay a specific duty: under 9 inches in length, 5 cts per lb.; 9 inches and over 3 cts. per lb. Tin crystals are to pay 20 per cent. Vinegar, now 12 cts. per gallon, is to be 15 cts. per Imperial gallon. Vegetables, that is, tomatoes, including corn and peas in cans, are to pay 2 cts. per lb. can. Tomatoes have been charged 2 cts. per can of a pound, but it is proposed to include peas and other vegetables at the same rate as tomatoes. I referred, a short time ago, to the proposed reduction of the Excise duty on tobacco. I now desire to refer to the proposed Excise duty on cigars. At present it is 40 cts. per lb. It is proposed that, between this and 1st of July next, the Excise duty on cigars, manufactured from imported tobacco, shall be 30 cts. per lb., and that after 1st July, when the stamps have been prepared and the arrangements made in the Department for the change, it shall be $3 per thousand. That will make a difference after July—the Customs duty remaining as it is—in favor of the manufacturers of $1.80 per thousand. On cigars made from home-grown tobacco, the Excise duty will be $1.50 per thousand, after July 1st, but it will remain at 15 cts. per lb. in the meantime. This covers very generally the articles, except one I do not recollect having referred to, but which I am quite sure is in the resolution, cotton duck. Cotton duck for ship sails and for fishing vessels and boats now pays 5 per cent. A large portion of the cotton duck imported during the past year or two has been imported for these purposes, but it has been found that much of it—in one case 70,000 yards—though imported for sails of vessels, has been used for tent purposes in the North-West. As we were losing revenue by it, and as the manufacturers were interfered with in this respect, it is proposed to make no exception, but to return 20 per cent. duty to the importers when they show that the duck thus imported was used for ships' purposes and for sails, which means, of course, that the manufacturer is in a better position than he was, and importers are all in a like position. I may state that within the last three or four weeks a very influential deputation waited upon the Government with reference to the extension of our trade with the West Indies. It was suggested that the Government should take steps to see if some arrangement could not be made, especially with the sugar producing countries, and especially with the West India Colonies, where they produce sugar and other products imported into the Dominion of Canada, by which we could increase the exchange of the natural products and manufacture of the Dominion of Canada for the products of the West Indies. The deputation was informed by the Government that their proposition was perfectly in accord with their policy, that they were in a position to ask the House, providing such arrangements could be made, to reduce the duty upon sugar from all countries that would give us an equivalent by the reduction of the duty on the manufactures and products of Canada. Instead of asking Parliament, at the present time to reduce the duty upon sugar or molasses, we propose to continue the enquiries we entered upon some time since, with the view of extending trade with the West India Colonies. We have, in the past, experienced considerable difficulties, because these colonies have very little revenue to spare. We find them anxious that we should give favorable consideration to their productions, but when we ask for a reduction of the duty on Canadian products, they hesitate, because they find it difficult to surrender the necessary revenue. In reference to Cuba, we proposed to the Spanish Government, through the High Commissioner in London, to ask Parliament for a subsidy for a steamer to ply between Canada and Cuba under the French flag, we paying the subsidy, if the products of Canada would be admitted on the terms which are extended to imports under the Spanish flag. That proposition, after some consideration, was refused. Other propositions have been before the Spanish Government for some time, and down to the present time they have not been successful, although, unlike the proposition in reference to subsidizing a steamer under the French flag, they have not refused them, and they are still under consideration. I can say, on behalf of the Government, that it is their intention during the Recess to enter into negotiation with the West India Islands, and other sugar producing and coffee producing countries, to see whether any arrangement can be made by which we would be justified in submitting to Parliament, when we next assemble, a reduction of the duty on sugar and molasses, on receiving as an equivalent for it a reduction of duty on the natural products and manufactures of Canada. In addition to that, we have been endeavoring to negotiate arrangements with France, by which the products of Canada may be admitted on more favorable terms than they are at present. Down to the present time, while the negotiations are not broken off but are still continued, we have not been successful; and I desire here and at this time to state, on behalf of the Government that, if we fail to make satisfactory arrangements with Governments that do not place the products—the natural products and manufactures—of Canada on equal terms with those of any other country, we will ask Parliament at the next Session to impose a duty of 10 per cent. additional on their products until they grant us such terms. This is the policy of the Government with reference to these questions, and I trust that the changes that are now proposed—though we have not been able to grant all that was asked—will meet the appropriation of the House and the country. Still we feel that in the resolutions that we now lay on the Table of the House we are continuing the policy that is calculated to strengthen the manufacturing and other industrial interests of the Dominion of Canada. I now, Sir, turn from the subject of the Tariff to the probable income and expenditure for the next fiscal year. It is estimated that the revenue for the next fiscal year will be: from Customs, $21,500,000, that is less than is estimated for the present year, occasioned in part by the changes in the Tariff, of $1,000,000 to $1,200,000, certainly $1,000,000, from Customs and Excise. The revenue from Excise we estimate at $5,400,000, which is $500,000 less than is estimated for the present year. The reduction would be greater, but we will lose some $300,000 Excise duty in the present year, because it has been well known by the manufacturers and retailers of tobacco that the Congress of the United States proposed to reduce the duty there, and they knew perfectly well the duty must be reduced here, and, therefore, purchasers have not bought more than was absolutely necessary, and those who have had stocks on hand have not desired to increase them. Therefore we will lose, no doubt, $300,000 or $400,000 on tobacco during the coming year. Post office receipts we estimate at $1,750,000; revenue from public works, $3,000,000; interest on investments, $800,000, and from other sources, $300,000 more, making the total revenue $33,250,000. The Estimates that are now before the House are nearly $30,000,000, and it will be found that Supplementary Estimates will be brought down, rendering necessary, I am satisfied, an additional expenditure, but I think we may fairly estimate the surplus at $3,000,000 for next year. The estimated expenditure for next year, as compared with the estimated expenditure for the present year, shows an increase of over $1,000,000. The increases are stated as follows:—Post office, $220,000. A very large increase is required next year for the following reason: the business has grown to such a volume, that under the arrangement that was made with the Grand Trunk Railway, by which the Post Office Department had the use of half a car for postal purposes, the business could not be transacted in half a car, and we were compelled to make arrangements for a whole car, and this additional outlay on the Grand Trunk Railway alone involved an increased expenditure of $25,000. Then the increased business on the Intercolonial Railway was such that the Department demanded that the road be placed on the same footing as other lines, that they were entitled to the same compensation for carrying the mail as other lines, and demanded that the appropriation for the postal service should be increased. Of course, as the Intercolonial Railway is a Government road, it is taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other, but it was thought to be a proper arrangement, and this increase amounts to $33,000. In the North-West the proposed increased expenditure for next year amounts to something like $57,000, so there is nearly $120,000 from these three items alone. Then we have proposals to establish new offices; the fact is we find every day and every week applications from the older Provinces asking for increased accommodation, and as the revenue is increasing in about the same proportion as the expenditure, we trust that the revenue from this source, though it will not quite cover $220,000—because the sum paid to the railways is in excess of former payments and for it there is no return—will largely come back to the Treasury. The expenses are regulated by the receipts, to a considerable extent, because nearly all the postmasters, except those in the cities receive 40 per cent. on their receipts as salary, and as the receipts increase, the salaries increase, as also do the charges on the Department. The increase in the Civil Service Estimates, as hon. gentlemen will notice by the Estimates on the Table of the House, is $130,000—a larger amount than in any year for some time back. I may mention that of that sum, $32,000 was formerly paid out for salaries to officers in that service. Then in the vote for the Geological Survey—it having been in the Department of the Postmaster-General, alone are nineteen or twenty-one men, I forget which, who were employed as packers, and paid out of contingencies, but who have been transferred under the Act to the Civil Service expenditure, making in that item an addition of something like $13,000. In the Department of the Interior, the work has grown so rapidly, and is becoming so enormous, that the expenditure, in order to keep up with the requirements of the vast settlement in that country, in the way of the survey, sale and allotments of land, has necessarily been largely increased, the amount in that Department being altogether $130,000. The hon. Minister of Agriculture asks for next year $200,000 more than was voted for the present year. The largely increased immigration, and the amount given in aid of immigration by the Department of Agriculture will not, I think, be objected to by Parliament or the country, if the results prove to be such as are anticipated. The Public Works expenditure it is proposed to increase by $265,000. As we have the means, there is a demand for an increased number of these public buildings, and in many cases it will be found that the rent now paid for buildings used by the Customs and Excise Departments; by the Weights and Measures offices, and by the Post Office Department, will only be about equivalent to the interest of the proposed expenditure for those purposes. The increase in mail subsidies will be $48,000. This is to meet the expenditure—provided arrangements are made, and they are now in course of completion—for two lines of steamers, each running monthly—which, of course, under this arrangement will make a fortnightly service—from Germany and Belgium to Canada, for the purpose of encouraging and extending the trade and emigration between Canada and those countries. Then there is an increase in lighthouse and coast service of $22,000. This is in the direction of practically cheapening freight, and increasing the value of all articles exported, and decreasing the cost of articles imported into the Dominion. The increase in Customs expenditure is $45,000, of which $25,000 is in Manitoba and the North-West. This increase will be readily understood by hon. gentlemen when I tell them that the probabilities are, that this year Manitoba will be the third port in the Dominion, so far as revenue is concerned, so that the increased expenditure cannot be avoided, the increased work rendering it imperative. The same thing may be said with regard to Excise. The increase on public works and canals is $26,000; Dominion lands $30,000; and there will be a probable expenditure for militia purposes, under the Bill now before the House, to the extent of about $150,000. To these sums will have to be added—if Parliament sustains the proposition—the bonus to be paid to the iron manufacturers during next year. Under these circumstances, Sir, while nominally there appears to be a large increased expenditure, there will be practically, even in the next year, a very considerable return from the Departments where that money is expended. And I may add this—that, although I stated that last year the taxation requisite to meet the expenditure of the Dominion was 13 cts. a head less than the average of 1874–78, and for the current year 1 cent. more, the increase now proposed will, if you take the average of the three years, leave the taxation just about what it was from 1874 to 1878, notwithstanding the fact, as I stated before, that at the close of this year we shall have expended $11,000,000 on the Pacific Railway, on the enlargement of our canals, on the extension and equipment of the Intercolonial Railway, and on the surveys of the North-West. Under these circumstances, Sir, I think the country will not object to the increased expenditure, when they find that the taxation is not increased. Now, Sir, having proceeded thus far, may I be permitted to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the verdict of June last. It was a very marked verdict. It was marked, Sir, because of the statement by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the country was misled, in 1878, when the Tariff resolutions were submitted by the Government. It was alleged that the statements made throughout the country in the Elections of 1878 were not justified by the Tariff that was brought down. It was known that a general policy had been propounded by the right hon. leader of the Government, then the leader of the Opposition, with reference to protection to the industries of the country. It was known that in the Elections of 1878 that general policy was presented to the country. But when we came here in 1879, and in subsequent years, and put that policy into the form of a resolution for the consideration of Parliament, then we found hon. gentlemen rising in the House and charging individual members, and the Government as a whole, with having failed to carry out what they had pledged themselves to carry out before the Elections of 1878. Well, Sir, we have the satisfaction of knowing that after that policy had been put into form, after it had been adopted by Parliament, after it had been in operation for three years, and the people were appealed to with reference to its details, two-thirds of the people's representatives are now in this House to sustain that policy. There is the still more significant fact, Sir, that eight gentlemen who sat on that side of the House, and who had been members of the Free Trade Government previous to 1878, with the Free Trade ex-Speaker, lost their elections. That verdict was very marked, also, because we were told in the late Parliament that this policy would have the effect of driving out of the Union the smaller Provinces. Has it driven out the smaller Provinces? What is the verdict? Two-thirds of the members elected in June last from the smaller Provinces are sent here to support this policy. And I think hon. members who were members of the late House will pardon me if I say that I feel a special pride and satisfaction in standing here to-night as the representative of New Brunswick; because those who were here during the last three or four years know how often I was taunted with the statement that I misrepresented my native Province. Unfortunately, we had but few supporters here after 1878 sustaining this policy; but at the General Elections of 1882, what was the verdict? Though I was specially charged with misrepresenting what the policy of the Government would be, a majority has been sent from my Province to sustain this policy. Sir, the majority of the vote was larger for the policy than the representation in the House. That is another important fact. I took the liberty to say to the hon. leader of the Opposition, last Session and the Session before: "If you expect ever to come to this side of the House, you must accept the National Policy." Now, I hold that the verdict given in June last was most emphatic, and proves the truth of my statement, that hon. gentlemen opposite must accept the National Policy before they can hope to come on this side of the House. The fiat has gone forth, and it will be perpetual. And it is this: that the hand must perish that attempts to remove one single stone from the foundation, or one single arch from the superstructure of the national edifice whose foundation was so carefully laid and superstructure so skillfully superintended by the right hon. gentleman whose name I need not mention in this House. I said, in 1830 and 1831, that whenever an Election came, this policy would be sustained, that after it had been five years on the Statute-book; and after having been perfected from time to time, it would never be repealed.

Under these circumstances, I desire to lay upon the Table of the House the resolutions that, when we are in Committee, I propose to move in confirmation and perfection of that policy.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We have had again the pleasure of listening to the financial statement from the hon. Finance Minister of the Dominion. It is a statement of a great deal of importance to every hon. member of this House, as, no doubt, it is to every citizen of the country who takes any interest in the affairs of State. I have listened, in common with others, as carefully as I could to the remarks that have fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman who administers our finances. It is impossible, of course, to remember all the points, to recollect all the statements, much less to carry in one's mind or jot down as they are uttered all the figures and tables of figures that may be given; but I think I have been able to gather, from the statements that have fallen from the hon. gentleman's lips, enough to enable me to, at any rate, follow in some measure the line of his argument, and to notice at some length some of the statements he has made and the deductions he has drawn therefrom. No doubt the debate will go on, and many other hon. members will take part in it, and it will be quite possible for them, when the figures we have listened to are in print and in the possession of hon. members, to carefully scan them and see whether the interpretation placed upon them by the hon. Finance Minister can be fully borne out. This task I leave in the hands of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who, I am sure will be able to deal intelligently with the subject. Following then the line adopted by the hon. Finance Minister, I am brought first to consider the question of administration with reference to the public expenditure. The hon. gentleman knew that the Public Accounts were in the hands of members; he knew they showed that there had been a very great increase of expenditure; and he did what it was only natural he should do, he sought to break the force of that fact by attempting to explain and justify each item, in order, if possible, to save himself, and the Administration of which he is one of the able members, from blame and censure in that regard. Nor am I disposed to say that he altogether failed in showing that in some of this increased expenditure there is a corresponding benefit derived from the receipts of different Departments in which this increased expenditure is made; nor do I desire, though the hon. gentleman seemed to think it was part of our policy to withhold this information from the public, to withhold it from them. I am quite willing that the people of this country should understand, that while we have increased the expenditure upon our railways and canals, we have also increased the revenue therefrom, and that that should be taken into account. But, Sir, the point I think the country is interested in is this: that in all these explanations, in all these justifications, the people are sometimes apt to be bewildered and to say: "Why can't you Members of Parliament, in dealing with figures, give us some figures that may be taken and accepted as correct—without explanation, without justification, without explaining away. Why not give us figures upon which we can all agree?" Now, Sir, I think that this is the duty of the Government, and I think that it is my duty, addressing myself now to the task of attempting to reply, though it may be but feebly, to the utterances of the hon. Finance Minister. And if I do that, I will have but little difficulty in convincing the people that the hon. gentlemen opposite who, when in Opposition for five years, charged upon the Administration of that day, gross extravagance, because the public expenditure had been increased, are themselves guilty of still greater extravagance. I will be able to charge back upon those hon. gentlemen, and it will not be for them to resent anything in this direction, they themselves having adopted that line of criticism when they occupied this side of the House. The figures I propose to take are those of the official documents furnished by the Government to the House; the figures I shall adduce, will be figures not cooked in any manner by myself, but those placed in our hands by the Government of the day. And am I not fair in doing so? While I admit the hon. Finance Minister has a right to make explanations as to the increase in various directions, he will not forget that the same state of things prevailed under the Mackenzie Administration—that if there is justification now, there was justification then; that if there is an increased expenditure and an increased revenue now, there was an increased revenue following an increased expenditure then. Therefore, for the purposes of comparison—and it is by comparison we learn—all the specious arguments of the hon. gentleman must be cast aside, and we must take the figures as they are furnished to us in the Public Accounts, and judging from them we must determine what the record of this Government has been. I do not desire to go too far back in the history of the country; I, therefore, make brief mention of the fact that, while the present Government were in power seven years prior to the Mackenzie Administration, they justified the charge that we have to make upon this occasion upon them—that they increased at an enormous rate, and with prodigious speed, the public expenditure; that in their seven years they ran it up from $13,000,000 to $23,000,000; that they ran the controllable expenditure from $3,000,000 to $8,000,000. Then they were succeeded by an Administration, who, for five years, conducted the affairs of this country, and I propose now to look at the record of that Government and to compare it, not with the record of this Government in the seven years preceding, for that is past and gone, but to compare it with the record of this Government for the five years that have succeeded the period, taking the Estimates for the coming year 1883-84. What are the facts, Sir? When the Mackenzie Administration came into power the expenditure was $23,316,316. They remained in power five years, and when they went out of power it had increased to $24,455,381, or an increase of $1,139,065 during the five years. Now, Sir, we are taking the Estimates that have been placed upon the Table for the year 1883-84, and what do they show? Simply an increase of a little over $1,000,000 as the Mackenzie Administration showed? No, Sir, but it exhibits an increase of $5,734,619. These are the bare facts. Looking at them we can readily understand how desirable it was on the part of the hon. Finance Minister, that he should attempt some explanation to account for this rapid increase, which explanation is of no avail, inasmuch as the mitigating circumstances mentioned by him operated under the Mackenzie Administration as well as under his. The expenditure when those gentlemen who denounced the Mackenzie Administration for their extravagance went out of power, was $24,455,381; to-day, by the Estimates placed upon the Table of the House, the hon. Finance Minister asks us to give him $30,250,000 to carry on the affairs of the country. Sir, there is another test with reference to the economical management of the affairs by the Government, and that is the ordinary expenses of the Government—the controllable expenditure; that expenditure, which a gentleman who is now a member of the Government, during the time of the Mackenzie Administration, declared was as much under the control and the management of the Ministry of the day as were their household expenses. When the hon. member for East York took possession of the Government he found the controllable expenditure was $8,324,076. He administered the public affairs for five years, and when he left office he left the controllable expenditure at $6,941,577. Instead of increasing the controllable expenditure, he succeeded in decreasing it by $1,382,499. But, Sir, what is the record of the hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to this controllable expenditure since they have attained power? Taking their expenditure for a like period of five years, including their Estimates for 1883-84, what do we find? When they came into office the controllable expenditure was $6,941,577; they ask us this year to give them $10,073,015; in other words, in their five years, instead of decreasing it, as the Mackenzie Administration did nearly $1,500,000, they have increased it $3,131,438. There, Sir, is a plain financial statement of figures that no man who is desirous of discussing the question can get behind, for they stand for comparison by the people of this country and the hon. members of this House to look into for themselves, and to judge with reference to the protestations of economical management on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. If we were to look into them in detail what would we find? We would find that in all the departments of the Government there is a very greatly increased expenditure. Take the item of Civil Government. In the year 1878-79—for I take the year 1879, though the Mackenzie Administration were in power but a part of that year; but I desire to take all the hon. gentleman can fairly charge upon them—$861,170 sufficed for the purpose of Civil Government. This year we are asked to give the hon. gentlemen opposite $1,109,100 for the same purpose, or an increase of $247,930. When we were in power the hon. gentlemen opposite were fond of charging us with employing a larger staff of men than was requisite, but they have increased it to a wonderful extent. Then 302 men, at a cost of $343,510, sufficed to run all the Departments. Now they come down, and, by their Estimates, ask to employ 499 men at a cost of $538,989; they ask us to give them 197 more servants in the different Departments than the Mackenzie Administration had, at an increased cost of $195,479. They ask us to increase the staff 65 per cent., and the pay 57 per cent. Thus we have some idea of how matters go. If we were to take a peep into contingencies of Civil Government, into the little odds and ends jotted down for this and that purpose, we would find that extravagance has run riot in the Departments in regard to contingent expenses. Little expenses are jotted down under convenient heads, but they are specified sometimes, and we are able to form a judgment respecting them. In looking into contingencies I find hon. Ministers, now occupying the Treasury benches, spending thousands of dollars for traveling expenses, where hundreds sufficed under the Mackenzie Administration. I find considerable sums set down in items of that kind; and if I were to go through the various Departments and specify items, hon. members would be inclined to laugh and wonder whether some of the items charged were really correct or not. I find an increase in the Militia Department $1,106 in contingencies alone. I find placed down for cab hire alone, $550. I am not objecting to the hon. Minister of Militia engaging a cab once in a while, or even oftener; but I do object to the demoralizing effect of the hon. Minister of Militia—a man who should be trained to war—riding about in a cushioned carriage. I would recommend, not with the view of taking away from the ease which I desire the hon. gentleman to enjoy, but, in order that there may be no demoralizing influence on the force, that he should put down instead of “cab hire,” “war steeds,” so that the Militia might think that the hon. Minister was engaged in practising with his war charger, in order the more effectually to show an example of bravery and efficiency to the troops under him. Let me now come down to the Secretary of States’ Department, which shows an increase of $924. The item of cab hire figures there to the extent of $331. And so we might go on through the Department of the Interior, which, however, I will not touch upon, because, no doubt, the hon. First Minister, having had his attention called to the matter, will see that economy is practised in the future, as he was careful to press upon my friend the member for East York when he occupied the position of Head of a Department. And so we might go through the Department of Public Works, where a certain Mr. Mackay is mentioned in the Auditor General’s Report as having been paid $1,109, the Auditor General remarking that he had not been able to get an exact copy of the account and full details. Thus we find, all through the Departments, increase of staff, increase of cost, increase in contingent expenses; and the Government are running the mad race they ran when in power before, and are expending, I repeat, thousands, where hundreds served for the same purpose when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. We next come to the question of Immigration and Quarantine. $212,224 answered for that service during the Mackenzie Administration, while hon. gentlemen opposite are asking this year for the like purpose, $570,487, or, in addition to what was expended at that time, $358,263, an increase of expenditure under that head amounting to nearly 150 per cent. We are entitled to some explanation in regard to this increase, and the House did not receive it from the hon. Finance Minister. Hon. members who were in this House at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway bargain was submitted, will remember how the hon. the First Minister insisted that the bargain should be completed soon, because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were then about initiating an extensive system of immigration in concert with the Dominion Government; and it was of the utmost necessity that the bargain should be consummated quickly, in order that they might be enabled to go over to the Old Country and perfect a system of immigration, and let this country have the benefit of it. That bargain was consummated. I think the terms were extravagant, that the company obtained terms altogether too liberal from the people of this Dominion. But what have they done with respect to this matter of immigration? How comes it that we are asked to devote $358,263 more to promote immigration than before this company was formed, when we were told expressly that one of the great benefits conferred by the company was to be that they would reduce the cost of immigration, they acting as immigration agents in bringing men here. I have not seen the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I therefore make this remark subject to correction, but I have been informed that in the report of that company there does not appear the expenditure of a single dollar for immigration purposes. And yet the Government of Canada proposes to expend 150 per cent. more for immigration purposes than it did before that company was formed. For whose benefit? If the lands in the North-West had been ours, if colonization companies had not been so largely increased, and if the lands had not been locked up in the hands of those companies, and the railway company, then I could understand that we might derive some benefit from that expenditure; but the land being tied up in every shape and form, I fear the money voted for the purpose will be used far more for the purpose of enhancing and benefiting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company than for benefiting the country whose money is being used for that purpose. We pass on to consider the question of Pensions and Superannuations. $221,326 answered for that service under the late Government, but $293,385 are now asked for, being an increase of $72,059. Public Works were managed for $1,013,593, but $2,447,940 are asked, being an increase of $1,434,347. Under the head of Miscellaneous, $101,602 proved sufficient in 1875, but we are now asked to vote $194,950. Indian grants involved an expenditure of $489,327 in 1879, we are now asked to vote $875,949. Here I must say that the remarks of the hon. the Finance Minister in regard to that point carried a good deal of weight. If this money is required to be expended on the Indians, fault cannot fairly be found with the Government in adopting the plan of conciliating the Indians. The expenditure for Mounted Police has increased from $344,823 to $416,000, being an increase of $71,177. This outlay for the Mounted Police, if required in order to preserve the peace and well-being of the country, is an item to which I will not take very great exception; but I take the opportunity to point out that hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition, found fault with expenditures in the very Departments in which increases are now observable. We find that $719,711 answered for the Customs Department in 1878-79, but now we are asked to vote for this service $779,450, or an increase of $59,729. Permit me here to say, I think that this is an expenditure which may fairly be justified, and I am not prepared to find fault with it. I am free to admit that the administration of this Department by the hon. Minister, who presides over it, has been remarkably economical, and it is but fair to give him credit for it; but I do not wish him to assume that I consider he has discharged his duty in all respects, because I have to find fault with some matters with reference to the administration of his Department; but he has kept closer to the line which he laid down for himself, than other hon. members of the Government who sit beside him have done. I wish I could say the same thing with reference to the Excise Department with which I have to find fault. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition, denounced the extravagance of the Mackenzie Government, on account of the great cost attending its administration; but whereas that Government asked for $211,064 for this Department in the year 1879, we are now asked to vote $258,380 to do the same work, or $77,316 more to do the work for the year 1884, than was necessary in 1879. Well, Sir, it cannot be alleged, as the hon. Minister of Customs might allege in his case, that there is an increase in the revenue from this Department, and a greater volume of merchandise handled, or greater traffic to be looked after; for we find that the revenue from Excise, in 1879, was $5,390,763, while this year the hon. the Minister of Finance estimates receipts of $5,400,000 from this source, being almost precisely the same as they were in the year 1879, and yet we are asked to expend $77,316, or 33½ per cent. more for collecting this revenue than was demanded during the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, when they were denounced for their extravagance. In reference to it, Sir, I trust that the hon. Minister who presides over this Department, will give his attention to it, instead of devoting his time, which a Minister of the Crown should give to the duties of his Department, to other matters—now that the Ontario Elections are over—elections which did not concern that hon. gentleman in the slightest degree. I hope he will find it convenient to discharge the duties of his office, which should not suffer from his taking part in a Local Election in a Province to which he does not belong; and will see to it, that he rectifies the gross extravagance which pervades his Department, shown by the immense sum asked for it by the Government. With reference to the Post Office Department, we find that we are asked to vote $453,887 more than was required in 1879. This item, I shall not criticise very closely, because I think that the hon. Finance Minister gave a reason—and a good reason, I will even go the length of saying—for this increase in this Department. We must expect it, while we are opening up a new country as we are doing in the immense North-West, and while providing necessary postal facilities, we must make up our minds to the fact that we must have an increased expenditure in this Department; and we will rejoice if the hon. gentleman is able next year, as he was to-day, to say that the increase in the revenue from this source was greater during the coming year than was the case during the past year. I think that the next point alluded to by the hon. the Finance Minister was the result of the working of the Tariff as between Great Britain and the United States; and he took credit to himself, while speaking on this subject, that the position which he had taken when it was discussed with a good deal of vigor in 1879, was fully justified by the returns; and that the position which was taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House was not borne out by the facts. With an ingenuity that rather characterizes him—and which he is willing to ascribe to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when it suits him to do so—he took certain years which made out apparently a case for himself; but I would ask him to take the bearing of the trade between Great Britain and the United States as it now exists. Why did not the hon. gentleman make a comparison in this respect between the years 1881 and 1882—years just following each other. Let us not go back five or six years to see whether the Tariff works as he represents. What are the facts with reference to these two years? Have the imports from Great Britain increased in greater ratio than the imports from the United States. No; but quite the reverse. Instead of the position of the hon. gentleman being borne out by the facts, the position of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is fully borne out. What are the figures which are furnished by the hon. Minister of Customs himself, and therefore thoroughly reliable. In 1882, there entered into consumption, of imports from Great Britain, $50,597,341 worth; and, in 1881, the imports from the same country amounted in value to $43,583,808; or we had an increase in the imports from Great Britain of goods entering into consumption in the year 1882, over the year 1881, of $7,014,533. Well, then, we had entered for consumption, in imports from United States in the year 1882, $48,289,052 worth; and, in 1881, we had from them but $36,704,112 worth; or we had an increase, in the imports from the United States, in 1882 over 1881, of $11,584,940, against an increase in imports from Great Britain of $7,014,533; and yet the hon. Finance Minister thinks that his position is borne out by the facts, and that the operation of the Tariff is such that the imports from Great Britain have increased, while the imports from the United States have decreased. Well, Sir, with reference to the duties paid on these goods, what are the facts? With regard to the $50,000,000 and over imported from Great Britain in 1882, we collected a duty of $10,011,811, which is as near as may be 20 per cent.; and, in 1881, on $43,583,808 of imports from that country, the duty collected amounted to $8,772,949, or the same average duty of 20 per cent. Now, what was the amount of the duty collected on the goods imported from the United States? On the $48,289,052 worth of goods imported from the United States in 1882, the duty collected was $7,082,722, or only 15 per cent., as against 20 per cent. on British goods.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; hear, hear. The hon. Finance Minister says, "hear, hear," but he will not deny that I have stated the figures correctly.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; but the fact is misleading, Mr. Speaker, because he required to look at the rate of duty collected in 1878 in order to reach a correct conclusion as to the effect of the Tariff.

Mr. PATERSON. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the conclusion is very misleading if applied to the conclusions drawn by the hon. Finance Minister; but it is anything but misleading when applied to the point which I am making. I have shown, I think, that the duty paid on British imports exceeded 20 per cent. in the years 1881 and 1882, while the duty on the United States imports in each case was 15 per cent.; and I pointed out that from the year 1881 to 1882 the imports from Great Britain increased but $7,000,000, while the imports during the same period from the United States increased over $11,000,000. Therefore these figures effectually disprove the position taken by the hon. Finance Minister, and fully establish what was contended for by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, let me say here, if it will be any comfort to the hon. gentleman—and in this matter I speak entirely for myself—that I do not attach, and never did attach, as much importance to the question of the imports from Great Britain and the United States respectively, that some hon. gentlemen have attached to it. True, I recognize the fact that in England we borrow our money, that her flag floats over us, that her Army and Navy are pledged to defend us, and therefore it was not exactly a thing that might be called very loyal to Great Britain to put on a Tariff that would legislate specially against her. I have gone that far in sentiment, but we all know that in matters of trade there is very little sentiment; and while we are willing to give what advantages we might fairly accord to Great Britain, we also recognize that while she is one of our great customers, while we like to interchange our commodities with her, we should never lose sight of the fact that the great Republic to the south of us is a nation against which we should not stir up feelings of strife. I am one of those who believe that it is not in the interests of Canada that harsh words should be uttered against that nation. When I find them taking $40,000,000 worth of our products, and giving us gold, or what is equivalent to gold in return, I value their trade as I value the trade of any other country, and, therefore, I say that I have not attached the importance to this question that some hon. gentlemen seem to have attached to it. I merely allude to this fact because the hon. Finance Minister thought it necessary to establish every position he had ever taken in the past with reference to Tariff changes, and sought to prove himself in the right in regard to them, and in consequence that those who differed from him were in the wrong. The next point touched upon by the hon. Finance Minister was one with regard to which I confess I felt a little sympathy for him; for even party warfare in the House of Commons, and the desire to get the better of an opponent, cannot prevent a little feeling of sympathy sometimes arising in one's breast when we find that opponent in too tight a place for his comfort. In such a tight place, I may venture to say, without offending the feelings of the hon. gentlemen, was the hon. Finance Minister when he touched upon that subject which is known by the name of the Balance of Trade. That was a subject upon which we have had very strong arguments from the hon. Finance Minister. That was a subject of which hon. gentlemen opposite were fully cognizant, a subject which they had grasped in its details, a subject as to which they had laid down a cast-iron rule, a subject which they had mastered thoroughly and entirely. The position which they took upon that question they held to be unassailable in its nature, and the arguments adduced from this side were arguments which they considered could not bear investigation. The hon. Minister of Customs in the year 1880, when the hon. gentleman succeeded for one year in reducing the imports below the exports, placed, or caused to be placed, in the Report of the Commissioner of Customs to the Minister of Customs, in the preface to the Trade and Navigation Returns, in a very conspicuous position the statement that at last they had accomplished what they had claimed they would accomplish; that they had equalized the imports with the exports, and, therefore, that prosperity had dawned upon the country, and that they had then achieved that which it was the duty of statesmen to achieve. When I made a motion in the House with reference to another subject, the Minister of Customs, in replying, said, that all it was necessary to do in answer to my argument was simply to point me to the fact that the Commissioner had stated, in the preface to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that we had equalized the imports and the exports. Next year the balance of trade was $7,000,000 against us. The Commissioner of Customs alludes to that fact in a very gingerly manner in the preface to the Returns. Next year the balance of trade against us had swollen to $17,000,000, but the Commissioner of Customs forgot to report that fact altogether. Now, let us look at what the hon. Finance Minister himself said with reference to this matter. That hon. gentleman, in speaking at the Grand Conservative Convention, in Toronto, on 24th November, 1881, is reported to have used language which I shall quote from the Mail newspaper; a newspaper that gives a very correct report of the hon. gentlemen opposite—reports quite as correct as it sometimes gives to hon. gentlemen on this side, without my attributing to them any design to misrepresent. What I mean to state is, that the reports given by that paper of speeches made by a distinguished gentleman like the hon. Finance Minister, are verbatim, and, therefore, the Mail's report may be accepted as the language used by him. The hon. gentleman said:

“During the last two years we have nearly equalized the exports with our imports. Whatever Free Traders may say our people cannot understand the theory that the larger the excess of our imports over our exports the more prosperous is the country. We say that as with the individual so with the nation, and that if he expends more than he receives, poverty stares him in the face. If, on the other hand, his receipts exceed his expenditure his condition is hopeful. The latter is the position of the Dominion if we take into account our receipts for freights.”

That statement was received, as every utterance of the hon. gentleman would be received in a gathering of such intelligent men as would constitute a Conservative Convention, with enthusiastic cheers. Now, let us look into this question of the balance of trade. The hon. gentleman recognizes that to day that balance is against us, but he seeks to minimize the fact by taking the last four years, and he says it is only $8,000,000 a year against us. That does not show our position, for this year the balance is against us to the extent of more than double $8,000,000, and it is to that fact that we must address ourselves, for if the hon. gentleman succeeded in gaining an equilibrium three years ago and has lost it now, according to his own language, poverty stares us in the face. How an hon. gentleman who took the position which he took, can, in the face of an adverse balance of trade, last year amounting to $17,000,000, rise in his place and say this year, as he did last, that never in the history of the country were we so prosperous as we are to-day, is something which the hon. gentleman has not explained. With reference to the annual balance of trade, in the fifteen years since Confederation there has been an annual balance of $18,858,526 against us; in the seven years they were in power before, the annual balance of trade against us was $22,123,745. In the five years of the Mackenzie Administration it was $21,022,215; while, in 1881-82, the adverse balance is $17,282,297; and in the six months which have elapsed, between July last and the 1st of January, 1883, the balance of trade was $10,799,358 against us. It is going on increasing at an enormous rate. If poverty stared us in the face before, poverty is now knocking at our very doors, and yet the hon. Finance Minister tells us that we stand to-day in a happier and more prosperous position than before. How to reconcile these things is not for me to say; that is a task which devolves upon the hon. gentleman, and it is one to which I wish to direct his attention. What has been the course of our trade during the six months that have elapsed since the Trade and Navigation Returns were completed in June last. I have the figures here, and they show very badly from the stand-point of the hon. Finance Minister. In the six months ending December 31st, 1882, as compared with the six months ending December 31st, 1881, our imports increased by $9,546,436. That, according to the hon. Finance Minister, indicates the ruin of the country; because when he introduced his Tariff, and time and again afterwards, he stated that it was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the country, that we should decrease our imports. Had we covered them with corresponding exports the case would not be a matter for regret; but what are the facts? During the same six months our exports, instead of increasing, decreased $3,709,249. All these figures show that, according to the theory of the hon. Finance Minister, everything is working wrong. These figures will require a better explanation than they have yet received at the hands of that hon. gentleman, before we shall be able to accept unreservedly his statement that at no period in the history of Canada was the country more prosperous than it is now. With reference to this question of the balance of trade, the hon. Finance Minister went into an explanation to show that the balance of trade, as it appears in our Trade and Navigation Returns, is after all not the correct balance of trade. I quite agree with some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman on that point; but what is true now was true in 1879, when his contention was, that the balance of trade which appeared in our Trade and Navigation Returns was the one that must be taken; and if the explanations that he gave this afternoon as to the influence of certain items upon this question are to be taken now with reference to the balance of trade, they must also be taken with reference to the period of the Mackenzie Administration. When we find that in the case of Britain, the balance of trade against her amounts to hundreds of millions in the course of a few years, we can readily understand that she cannot possibly be that much poorer than she was before. How can it be explained, then, that England goes on increasing in wealth with this balance of trade against her? The hon. the Finance Minister touched one of the great secrets of the question when he said that Britain has to do the work of carrying the commerce of the world. The wealth that she earns on the sea as the carrier of the trade of all nations, enters materially into this question; and as the hon. Finance Minister said, our balance of trade is overcome partly by the fact that about $30,000,000 is engaged in shipping, which, he estimated, at 10 per cent. would give us $3,000,000 per annum to be applied to the reduction of the balance of trade against us. Then he said that the trade carried by our ships amounted to $350,000,000, which, at 5 per cent., would give $17,500,000 that should be applied to reduce the balance of trade against us. The hon. gentleman may be correct in part; but I think, in giving our own carrying trade the benefit of the whole of that amount, he lost sight of the fact that we carried only one-fourth of it ourselves.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say it was the freight carried, but disbursements at the port where the loading took place.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is the same thing.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, scarcely the same thing. I do not wish to misquote the hon. gentleman, but he will find that his statement will not be borne out fully, although there is something in it. But I say that the hon. the Finance Minister's position, which he took so definitely and so positively, that an adverse balance of trade is an indication of poverty, in which opinion he was joined by the hon. members who surround him, cannot be borne out by any facts which he chooses to bring, and must be given up as an utterly untenable position, and that the statement made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that the balance of trade is subject to explanations and variations from outside causes, is right and correct, and that an apparent balance of trade against us, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, does not of necessity mean that the country is poorer by the excess of imports over exports. I agree with the hon. Finance Minister in the opinion that it is not desirable that there should be too great an importation of goods. I think we are threatened, and will be to a greater extent before long, with an over-importation of goods from other countries. But there is the fact to be borne in mind—that the hon. Finance Minister gave us to understand that the increase in our importations was largely in fancy goods. Now,

I maintain that it is possible for a country to import more than it exports and be financially embarrassed without being any poorer. If a farmer spends $200 more than he makes in any one year, you would say that he was $200 poorer; but if he applies that money to the erection of a barn, or to anything else that would come back to him in increased profit in years to come, it might be said that he is hard-up, but not poorer. He has his money in a different shape. So the country that imports that which is necessary to develop the country and to get out its hidden wealth, though it may for a time be short of money, it cannot be said to be poorer, because what it has spent will come back to it in increased profit in years to come. But the hon. Finance Minister tells us that this is not the kind of goods we are bringing in at all, but perishable commodities, the consumption of which actually leaves us poorer by the amount expended in that direction. Instead of it being a matter of congratulation to the people of this country to be told that the excess of imports consists of fancy goods, it is a matter to be regretted, because it can be of no lasting benefit to the country. Now, permit me to notice, in a brief way, the claim of the hon. Finance Minister with reference to the effect of his Tariff, as shown in the prosperity that prevails in the country. Allow me to say at the outset, that I am willing to admit—nay more, I am glad to admit—that during the year 1882, the Province, at any rate, from which I come, and of which I know the most, has been in what may be termed a prosperous condition. It must be a source of great satisfaction to any citizen to know that the country in which he dwells is thriving and prosperous; and when I scrutinize the statements of the hon. Finance Minister, when I take exception to some of them and endeavor to prove that he has misstated altogether the causes of that prosperity, I do so in order that the people may understand its real cause, and knowing the cause, bend their energies in that direction. The hon. Finance Minister has done what I am sorry to see him do. I had thought that he would have modified his language somewhat, and depart a little from the line of boasting which has been indulged in during previous years by himself and his colleagues. Last year, in the Speech from the Throne, that was put into the mouth of His Excellency by hon. gentlemen opposite, there was a clause which I considered to be eminently appropriate. Having referred to the many blessings, commercial and others, that we enjoyed, the Speech said, we cannot be too thankful to the Giver of all good for these blessings. I would say, without desiring to treat the matter with the slightest irreverence, that I consider that paragraph as an acknowledgment on the part of the Government of the good Providence, which overrules the destinies of men, having been extended towards us; but as I listened to the same hon. gentleman, who now claims all the credit for our prosperity, I wondered whether the Government meant in that paragraph to substitute some other one for the One that I understood to be referred to under the title of "The Giver of all good." I believe that in this land we have been blessed by a beneficent Providence, but I notice that even the acknowledgment of this Providence has been omitted this year by hon. gentlemen opposite in the Speech from the Throne. Willing to attribute the blessings last year, in word, to Him, they are unprepared to do even that this year; and the hon. Finance Minister comes down and says: "See our prosperity and behold the giver of it. If you do not believe," he says, "that I am the giver of prosperity, look at your earnings as shown by the deposits in the savings banks; that will tell the tale. See your extra deposits in the chartered banks; see the price of your bonds in the London market. I am the giver and I am the man that raised the price of your bonds in the London market. It is I," he says, "that has done all this." It is not necessary to follow the hon. gentleman in his argument to prove that we are enjoying prosperity. We admit that. Still he will allow me to draw his attention to the fact that he takes a strange way of proving, by figures, that we are enjoying prosperity. Take, for instance, the deposits in the savings banks. The hon. gentleman claims they are proof positive that the laboring classes are better off now than in previous years; but he fails to recognize the fact that those deposits are affected by many other influences than the savings of the people. Deposits are often withdrawn from one investment and placed in another. Changing circumstances and events may lead to larger deposits at certain times than at others. Sums of $2,900 may be placed in one deposit in those banks, and such deposits are not made by the laboring classes. In order to show how fallacious are the data on which the hon. Minister endeavors to prove positively that the savings of the working classes are abundant compared with previous years, let us look at the deposits in the savings banks of the different Provinces. They show an increase in the year 1879 over 1878 of $710,670. But here is the fact to which I call the attention of the hon. Finance Minister. Of that increase, $383,953 is in Quebec and Ontario, and the balance, $338,482, in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. In those three small Provinces, therefore, the increase was almost as large as that in the two great Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with four times the population of the other three; or, in other words, that the working men in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island were four times better off than the same class in Ontario and Quebec. Now, every man knows that such could not be the case, and to show that an argument is founded on such data proves its fallacy. In 1880, there was an increase over 1879 in the deposits in the savings banks and post offices of $1,845,273. Of that increase, the amount in Ontario and Quebec was $877,873, and in the three Maritime Provinces, $819,599. Then again, the Maritime Provinces, with one-fourth the population of the other two, deposited almost the same amount of money in those institutions. Is it possible that the people of those three small Provinces could have saved as much in that year as a population four times greater in number in the other two Provinces? The thing is absurd, and hence the data of the hon. Finance Minister were of the most fallacious description. Take the following year. The increase was $4,783,716, of which $2,485,836 was in Ontario and Quebec, and $1,998,114 in the Maritime Provinces, very nearly as much as in Ontario and Quebec. Again I ask the question, did the working men of the Maritime Provinces save four times as much as their fellow laborers in Ontario and Quebec? No one will allege that such was the case. Take last year. The increase was $5,931,989, of which Ontario and Quebec had $3,364,181, and the Maritime Province $1,921,205, a little greater difference than in the other years. But if we were to follow that out and accept what the hon. gentleman furnishes us, we would have to say that the laboring men of the Maritime Provinces last year saved three times as much as their fellow laborers in Ontario and Quebec. Since 1878, the total increase has been $13,271,648, of which $7,111,843 was in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and $5,077,400 in the Maritime Provinces. That being the case, how is it possible for the hon. Finance Minister to allege that the savings in the Post Office Savings Bank demonstrate beyond a peradventure that they are the savings of the working people exclusively, and point incontrovertibly to the fact that they are that much better off? If they prove that, according to the figures that are given, the working men and mechanics of the Maritime Provinces have, during the past four years, earned and saved four times as much as those of Ontario and Quebec, Sir, it is only necessary to mention the matter in order that the House and the country may see how entirely fallacious is the statement he has made. Then I come to notice another point—not alluded to by the hon. Finance Minister himself, but I have heard hon. gentlemen on the same side make use of the statement, that whether this prosperity was dependent upon or produced by 'the Tariff, the prosperity and the introduction of the Tariff were coincident. I desire now most emphatically to say that that statement is entirely erroneous and without the shadow of a foundation. I am making this statement in the presence of an hon. gentleman who hastens to note it down, and I hope he will take particular notice of it, and disprove it if he can. I repeat that this prosperity was not coincident with the introduction of the Tariff. How shall I establish this fact? Well, Sir, I will take that which is taken by the hon. Finance Minister himself as an indication of the prosperity of the country—the value of stocks, which we are often pointed to now as having risen greatly in value. I will look at the value of stocks in 1878, on the 12th of September, five days before the Mackenzie Administration were defeated at the polls, and then I will take the value of the same stocks one year after that, the 11th of September, 1879, months and months after the Tariff had been put into operation, the effect of which, it was claimed by the hon. First Minister, would be to restore confidence at once. I think, Sir, if I prove that stocks were lower one year after the Mackenzie Administration were dispossessed of power, I shall establish beyond controversy that the introduction of the Tariff and prosperity were not coincident. Take Bank of Commerce stock. On September 12th, 1878, it was 113½; one year after the hon. gentleman acceded to power, and months and months after their National Policy was in operation, it was down to 112½. Federal stock fell from 104½ to 98; Bank of Hamilton fell from 99 to 97½; Imperial from 103 to 95; Montreal, 170½ to 130; Dominion, 117 to 110½; Toronto, 138 to 111; Canada Permanent Loan 181 to 172; Canadian Government 6 per cent. debentures, 101½ to 100; Dominion 6 per cent., 101½ to 100; County debentures that were 102 went down to 101½. These figures are taken from sources that cannot be controverted, and they show that one year after the Tariff was introduced stocks which are taken by the hon. Finance Minister as the sure index of prosperity in a country, had fallen to a lower point than they had touched when the Mackenzie Administration went out of power. Next, we are told by the hon. the Finance Minister that our stocks have gone up in the London markets, that our stocks that were quoted at 93 have gone up to 104 or 105, an increase of 12 per cent. I rejoice in the fact. I am as glad as the hon. Minister can be that our stocks have gone up in the money market; but I hope the hon. Finance Minister will not think I am seeking to rob him of his glory when I say that I do not attribute the advance in our bank stocks to the fact that he presides over the Finance Department. I recognize the fact that the English money market is open to the nations of the world, and while I rejoice that our securities have gone up, I cannot ignore the fact that our neighbors across the line are equally prosperous in this respect; that their 4 per cent. issue redeemable about the same time as our own have advanced 20 per cent. Stocks have gone up all over the world, and the hon. Finance Minister in availing himself of the glut in the money market at the present time to reduce the loan 1 per cent. is but humbly following the example that has been set him by every agriculturist in western Ontario who has been unfortunate enough to have a mortgage on his farm the past few years. They are taking in their mortgages at 8 per cent., and are renewing them with mortgages at 6 per cent. The hon. gentleman deserves the same credit for saving 1 per cent. that we are willing to give to those farmers who have managed their own affairs as I have indicated. Our bonds have gone up in the London money market, not because we have the hon. gentleman at the head of the Finance Department, but because the monied men of the Old Country have money to spare. Looking abroad they have seen what I have seen, and what every Canadian may see, that we have in this country, resources that may be made available, that are being developed, and that bespeak for us the position of a prosperous and thrifty nation. We have the reputation of a people who regard our national honor, among whom the thought of repudiation is never entertained. Money lenders recognize the fact that in our fields and forests, in our mines and deep seas, we have the sources of great wealth, that we have a people of indomitable energy, willing to develop all our resources; and they recognize the fact that the money we borrow from them is in safe hands, and we may rest assured that in the future, as in the past, Canada will receive full value for any bonds she may desire to float in the London market. We can all rejoice in this matter, though we, on this side of the House, are unable, though we might be willing, to give credit to the hon. the Finance Minister for placing the country in the position in which it is. It was assumed, and it was stated by the hon. Minister—not to-day, because it did not suit his purpose, but in the course of the Tariff debates we had in previous years—that the fact of decreased importations was proof that the country was prospering, because it could not prosper with large importations. The hon. gentleman pointed out that the decreased importations of 1880 proved that we had given the home market to our Canadian manufacturers and they were developing their industries, which was the cause of the great prosperity we enjoyed. But this year the hon. gentleman's calculations are entirely incorrect with respect to this point, for we find in the importations of manufactured goods of almost all kinds an enormous increase. Take books: there is an increase of 21 per cent. I speak of last year over 1878, the final year of the Mackenzie Administration, when according to hon. gentlemen opposite the country was being ruined because our friends would not raise a high wall in order to shut out foreign importations, which, according to those hon. gentlemen were ruining the home industries of the country. Of brass and manufactures thereof there were 221 per cent. more; carriages, including railway cars and rolling stock, 251 per cent.; carpets, 63 per cent.; clocks that we determined under this Tariff of ours to give a monopoly to one firm which manufactured them, 78 per cent. more than in 1878. Copper and the manufactures thereof, 591 per cent. increase; cottons, 51 per cent.; earthenware and china-ware, 34 per cent.; though we have placed a duty of 30 per cent. on that article which, together with the cost of carriage, it might be supposed would amount to a prohibitory duty. Furs and the manufactures thereof, 171 per cent. increase. Glass and glass-ware 32 per cent., notwithstanding we gave such great additional protection; hats and caps, 20 per cent.; iron and steel and the manufactures thereof, 88 per cent.; leather and the manufactures of leather, 58 per cent.; marble and the manufactures of marble, 120 per cent.; oil cloth, 93 per cent.; paper and the manufactures of paper, 113½ per cent.; silk and its manufactures, 116 per cent.; soap, 17 per cent.; stone and its manufactures, 193 per cent.; tobacco and cigars, 23 per cent.; wood and its manufactures, 72 per cent. No wonder the hon. Finance Minister did not venture on the same line of argument to-night, as on previous occasions, when the imports had somewhat decreased; because we now find an increase in the ratio I have described in all those lines over 1878, the year when hon. gentlemen, now occupying the Treasury benches, denounced hon. gentlemen on this side, because they did not enact a Tariff to shut out foreign goods which were coming in at that time. If prosperity was to be secured, as the hon. gentleman said, by shutting out the foreign manufactures he has proved, or I have proved, by the increased importations from figures furnished by hon. Ministers themselves, that, instead of enjoying prosperity now, we are in this respect, as in regard to the balance of trade, in the position of having poverty staring us in the face. I will tell you now, and it is my bounden duty to tell you, what I conceive to be the true cause of our prosperity. Having assailed the position of the hon. Finance Minister, he might say: "You are very good at tearing down,"—if he would pay me that compliment—"but you had better give us your theory and tell us whence our prosperity comes; you have admitted that prosperity exists, why is it?" I will give it to the House, and in doing so I ask the careful consideration of hon. members as to whether it is possible, from the figures which I shall submit, to arrive at any other conclusion as to the secret and the source of the great prosperity that the hon. Finance Minister and his friends behind him, and myself and the friends behind me, rejoice at in common. I have already pointed out the fact that good times and the introduction of the Tariff were not coincident.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By the fact of the falling in banks stocks.

Mr. PATERSON. By the falling in bank stocks, says the hon. the First Minister. I do not wish to trouble the House, but if the hon. Minister desires it I can, within one minute, give him a table, taken from the Mail, showing that this was not only the case with respect to bank stocks, but with regard to all kinds of farm produce one year after the Mackenzie Administration left office. Does the hon. gentlemen desire this table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If you please.

Mr. PATERSON. But the hon. gentleman will not deny it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must hear it first before I can deny it.

Mr. PATERSON. But the hon. gentleman will allow me to go on with my argument, while an hon. member beside me will turn up the book, so that I can give the hon. gentleman what he desires. I have not my own speeches so ready to refer to as some hon. members; I speak of what I know, and perhaps hon. gentlemen will wait a little before they begin to laugh. He should laugh who wins. I was saying in 1879 we had not good times. I have proved it by the statement I have given of bank stocks; I intend to give the hon. the First Minister what he desired in regard to that matter. I have it now, I am glad to say. I will let the hon. gentleman have the benefit of the figures, and he will correct my statements if he sees fit to do so. They are contained in a statement I gave to the House last year. I suppose what I said last year, having the eternal principle of truth as its underlying foundation, will be as good this year as last, because it will not be, like the hon. Finance Minister's statement of to-day, a retraction of what he said a year ago. My statement was as follows:—

	12th Sept., 1878.	11th Sept., 1879.
Fall Wheat, No. 1 .....	$1 06 to $1 07	$1 02 to $1 04
do No. 2 .....	1 02 to 1 03	1 00 to 1 02
Spring Wheat, No. 1 .....	1 02 to 0 09	0 98 to 1 00
do No. 2 .....	0 97 to 0 98	0 96 to 0 97
Oats .....	0 28 to 0 30	0 31 to 0 32
Barley, No. 1 .....	1 00 to 1 05	0 60 to 0 00
Pease .....	0 63 to 0 70	0 63 to 0 65

Butter fell from 12½ to 10 cts.; cheese from 9½ to 5 cts.; dried apples, mess pork, hams, lard, eggs, and hops fell; and wool fell from 24 to 20 cts. I hope the hon. gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. FARROW. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that oats fell from 28 to 30 cts.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I may have made a mistake in reading the figures. If I did in the way the hon. gentleman says, it will prove the fairness I exhibit. He has picked out an article, which, it is true, I may have misquoted; but I think I have shown sufficient to establish to the satisfaction of the First Minister what he demanded, as he wanted something more than bank stocks; and I have proved what I said in respect of every line of produce which the farmer has to sell. Now, Sir, that being the case, I will point out the true reason why we had not good times in 1879. And why was it? Simply because of the products of the field, of the forest, and of the mine, we were then able to export less in value than was the case in previous years. You will find, taking the year 1879, that we exported only $60,000,000 worth of goods, the products of Canada. Now, Sir, what has been the result since the year 1879—the first year under the new Tariff, a year of the greatest hardships, of the most failures, of the lowest prices in bank stocks, of the lowest prices in produce? Why, Sir, I find that, in 1879, we exported $60,089,578 worth; in 1880, $70,096,191, worth; in 1881, $80,921,379 worth; and, in 1882, $90,042,711 worth. In other words, Sir, we exported $10,000,000 in 1880 more than in 1879, $10,000,000 extra in gold was circulated in this country in 1880 than was the case in 1879, and this very considerably lessened the pressure and tightness which was then upon us. In 1881 we had $20,831,801 more in circulation than we had in 1879; $20,000,000 more of gold brought into the country in addition to the $10,000,000 circulated the previous year; and this still further mitigated the stringency which was then upon us. In 1882, the year just past, the increase was $29,953,133, another $30,000,000 placed upon the top of the $30,000,000 of the two previous years, or $60,000,000, in these three years, more of gold than was brought back into the country in 1879, and circulated amongst us. It requires no prophet, it requires no Finance Minister, but only a man of ordinary ability to know, that such a state of things must produce prosperity in any country; and in that fact lies the secret and the source of all the prosperity we have. But, Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt, when speaking with reference to these matters, that, if the Finance Minister can show that he has been the means of producing these extra products, and of raising the prices in foreign markets, and that he has brought back that money into this country—then we must give credit to the Tariff for it. I will ask him whether he takes credit for the increase in the products of the forest during these years. I will ask the hon. Minister of Finance whether this was caused by the Tariff. Did the Tariff raise the price of lumber in England and in the United States? Sir, he will not even dare to do that, I venture to say, though he does, in my judgment, venture a long way. That, Sir, is a matter beyond him. He admitted once, that the lumber trade was a thing which he could not touch, except to injure it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, oh.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, Sir, he admitted last year in his speech that he could do very little to benefit it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh.

Mr. PATERSON. This being the case, he will not claim that he could raise the price of lumber in Albany or in other foreign markets. Well, Sir, as to lumber and the products of the forest, we exported, in the year 1880, over 1879, $3,593,018 worth; in the next year, $11,698,553 worth; and, in 1882, $10,729,596 worth; in these three years which have passed since the first year that these hon. gentlemen acceded to office there were brought into this country as the result of the higher prices of lumber which we exported—higher prices which the hon. Finance Minister was totally powerless to affect in the slightest degree—$26,021,197 more than in the year 1879. As to animals and their products, the hon. gentleman will not claim that the Tariff has been the means of giving to us more cattle in the land than we had before. The hon. gentleman will not venture to do that; and yet, in the matter of animals and their products, which the Tariff was totally powerless to effect in the slightest degree, what are the facts? We exported, and brought back, of foreign gold into this country from that source, in 1880 over 1879, $3,506,973; in the succeeding year, $7,259,615 more; and in the next year, $6,354,155 more; or $17,120,743 more of gold was brought into Canada in the three past years, than was the case in 1879, as the result of the sale of animals and their products. Sir, the hon. Finance Minister did not raise the price of cheese and butter in Liverpool; this is a matter outside of and beyond him—it is the work of the grand, eternal and unalterable law of nature, the law of supply and demand. It was due to the scarcity in foreign markets. We had the articles to sell, the price went up, and the result was that increased wealth was given to us. Then take, Sir, agricultural products, and what do I find? Why, in the year 1880, over 1879, we exported of these products $2,665,864 worth; in the next year, $16,398,613; and last year $11,407,243; or, in those three years, as the result of the increased sales and of higher prices, we brought back of gold into this country $15,712,975 worth more than in 1879. Well, Sir, will the hon. gentleman claim, will he dare to say, that he was the cause of the rain falling and the sun shining on our fields; that he was the cause of the abundant harvests of 1881 and 1882? No, Sir, he will not venture to do so. Will he then seek to claim that he stands in the room of Providence and caused the rain to fall and deluge the fields of England and Ireland and Scotland, rotting the crops in their fields, producing a scarcity there, and increasing the prices of the articles which we have to sell. Sir, he will not dare to say he was the cause of Providence smiling on us in this land, by which we were enabled to show that we had these $15,712,975 as the result of it. Sir, add up these three items, and the result of the sale of the products of the forest, of animals and their products, and of agricultural produce, and you have in these three years, $58,854,915 out of the total increase of $60,791,547. Sir, I give that to you, and I give it to the House unhesitatingly, as the source and the secret of the prosperity which this country enjoys, and which I trust it may enjoy for some time to come. Last year when I had spoken in reference to a motion, in which I used figures which pointed in this direction at that time, so far as they went, and the hon. gentleman alluding to that point, gave utterance to words which will be found on page 80 of last year's Hansard. He said:—

"I have made up a statement to show that the present state of the country cannot be the result of largely increased exports of the products of Canada."

And then he quoted a table. It is an extraordinary thing that a Finance Minister should venture on a statement of that kind—that he should say that $60,000,000 extra gold could come into the country, and the country not be made more prosperous thereby, was something I could not comprehend. The hon. gentleman took the table of 1874, 75-76-77-78, and dividing the amount by the five years, he said we had an average export of $68,576,901, and then taking 1879-80-81 and dividing them by three years, he said we had an average export of $70,369,049, or a difference of $1,792,148, and he held he had therefore established his point conclusively. I am rather afraid, Sir, that the hon. gentleman was guilty on that occasion of doing what he would fain have charged upon us this afternoon—of using figures calculated to mislead. He took the year 1879 as one of his years—that lean year, that year of $60,000,000 exports, and, of course, thereby reduced the average annual export.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Why should we not?

Mr. PATERSON. Because of what I have laid down now—that the argument was as to the cause of the prosperity; and I have established beyond a doubt that in 1879 you had not the prosperity though you were occupying the Treasury Benches, but that you had a depression greater than ever before, and therefore, the hon. gentleman had no right to take that year. Let me give the hon. gentleman this table, and if he had even taken that table, and added in the year 1879, and taken those four years, he would have an average annual increase over the five years which he gave, of $6,710,564; but if he leaves out the year 1879, as he is bound to do in making a fair calculation taking the three succeeding years, he will find that the average annual increase over the years 1874 to 1878 will be $11,766,526, and, therefore, the statement he made that the increased prosperity could not be due to the largely increased exports, would fall to the ground. To say that a country is not richer which sends out a larger volume of exports and brings back gold for them is to make a proposition which, I think, will not commend itself to the intelligent understanding of any hon. member in this House or out of it. Last year the hon. gentleman took credit to himself for the prosperity among the farmers, because he said he had enhanced the value of what they had to sell. Last year, the hon. gentleman told us that when the people asked for a change in the Tariff, it was given to them, and he said the people of the country paid into the Treasury more than he expected, because he had found employment for them at higher wages. He said that men who were working half time are now working full time; farmers who found sales difficult and prices low, are getting high prices, and ready cash. And then he congratulated himself again that he was the man who had done it. For this occasion I will hold him to it, that he was able to do it, and that he had done it. But I ask him now, having that power which he claims to have exercised, and for the exercise of which he must be held responsible, why, during the past year he has allowed the magnificent crop of 1882, greater in its proportions than Canada ever had before, to decline in price nearly one-quarter of its value, thereby taking $8,000,000 out of the farmers of Canada? Why did he allow fall wheat to be sold for 24 cts. less than in the ruinous years when the hon. member for East York led the Government? He has allowed fall wheat to fall 24 cts. per bushel from last year; spring wheat, 31 cts.; peas, 6 cts.; barley, 14 cts.; oats he has kept where they were; butter he has kept where it was; pork he has allowed to fall 26 cts. per hundred weight; wool 4 cts. per lb. Why has he allowed all this? He cannot say, "Why ask a silly question?" though I admit that it would be a silly question if asked of any man except the man who declared in this House that he had the power to do these things, and that he had done them. I tell him that from this time forward he will be watched in this House and in the county. He claimed that he had the power to make good times, and that he had made good times. He has claimed credit for the opening of every factory, and at his door will be laid the blame of the closing of every factory. He has claimed credit for the enhanced price of wheat, and at his door will be laid the blame for the low price of wheat. As I heard the hon. gentleman hesitate to-day, I had a strong suspicion that he recognized the fact that the state of affairs was about to be changed, notwithstanding his seven years prediction. I believe that he saw in the failures which are taking place, not by ones or twos, but by scores, in the neighboring cities, that the tide is turning. We heard him to-day using the term cycles of depression, but that is a word which we should not hear from the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman told the people that if they would only put him in power he would banish these cycles and give them perpetual prosperity. I hold him to that statement, and I charge him with being derelict in his duty in having allowed the price of farmers' produce to fall for months. If he does not waken up soon the lumbermen of New Brunswick will find themselves in a difficult position, because there are indications that the market for the products of the forests are going down in England, and that if he does not wave his wand and keep up the prices heavy losses will fall upon men who work in the forests of his native Province. I tell him that if he does not see that the crop of the Mother Country is blighted again this year, there is danger that prices here will go down again. The hon. gentleman will say, admitting that they have gone down a little, "One thing I deserve credit for, and that is, that I promised that I would make the farmers prosperous, because I would give them a home market for their perishable commodities—eggs, butter, and cheese, and other articles which cannot well be exported." Let us see, by the figures given by the hon. Minister of Customs, how much of the perishable products of the farm he has found a home market for by his Tariff. If we take horned cattle, we shall find that he has allowed 32,188 head of horned cattle of the value of $2,103,996, to leave the country during the past year, more than went in 1878, because they could not find a market at home. In swine, sixty-two head had to leave the country more than left in the last year of the Mackenzie Government. In sheep there were 68,680 more exported, at a value of $529,620; in poultry $82,356 worth more. We all remember the hon. Finance Minister telling us last year how in going through the country he was met by the delighted farmers, who said to him: "You have conferred blessings on us; well do we remember the days of Mackenzie, when we came and exposed our chickens for sale in the rain and could not sell them." Yet we find that $82,356 worth more had to find a market outside of the country than in the last year of the Mackenzie Government. In butter, 2,155,213 lbs. more, valued at $553,919, had to find a foreign market. In cheese, 12,752,955 lbs. more, valued at $1,503,347, had to be sent away. No less than 5,226,162 dozens of eggs, valued at $997,135, were exported last year more than were exported in 1878. Surely the manufactories that were opened ought to have consumed all the eggs; they are certainly a perishable article. The hon. gentleman will not claim that his Tariff has caused the hens to produce more eggs. In hides and skins, $6,171 worth more were exported last year than in 1878; in meats of all kinds, including bacon, beef, &c., $125,808 lbs. more, valued at $129,625; in green fruits, a very perishable article, which it was said would be bought from the farmers by the manufacturers at higher prices than they could get abroad, 159,313 barrels more were exported, valued at $391,131, than in 1878. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will claim that he made the fruit trees bear more.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No insects on them this year.

Mr. PATERSON. Then, the hon. gentleman has developed into something more than a financier; he has developed into an insect-killer. In potatoes, which are an exceedingly perishable article, and which are very bulky for exporting, 2,737,933 bushels, valued at $1,907,635, had to find a market abroad more than did so in 1878; and in other vegetables, $169,419 worth more had to be exported. Last year the hon. Finance Minister took credit to himself for having provided a home market for what the farmer had to sell; but he has wisely abandoned that position this year. That calculation was like many others of his calculations. He took the year 1877, because it was, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the only famine year we had—the only year in which we did not grow as much wheat as the necessities of the country demanded, and had to import foreign wheat; and he tried to show that he had greatly enlarged the farmers' home market. Suppose he had done so, of what benefit would that be to the country? If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to go into the calculation he will find that when he claims to have benefited the farmers by forcing a certain portion of the people to use Canadian wheat, when their interest would be to take American wheat, his claim is not just; for he would find that although he has imposed a burden upon the people of the Maritime Provinces, he has not benefited the farmers or the millers of Ontario. If we look at the figures of last year, we shall see how this matter stands. In 1882, we imported 2,931,220 bushels of wheat, valued at $3,358,571, and we exported of the non-produce of Canada, 2,588,498 bushels, leaving as the consumption of foreign wheat 342,722 bushels. But what did that foreign wheat cost per bushel? It cost $1.14½ per bushel. But we exported of the produce of Canada in the same year 3,845,035 bushels, valued at $5,180,335. What, then, did the farmer get for the wheat he exported to a foreign country? He got $1.34½ per bushel. Yet the hon. Finance Minister claims that he has conferred a great benefit on the Western farmer because he has secured for him a home market in which the price averages $1.14½. I think the Western farmer would say he did not care for the Eastern Provinces when he could get $1.34½ in a foreign market. Take flour, the average price of which imported in the Eastern Provinces was $5.40, but which when exported to a foreign market netted $5.85. Do the millers or the farmers of the West want a market for flour at $5.40 in the Dominion when they can get $5.85 in a foreign country? What do they care where it goes provided they get a good price. And the effect has been that in many parts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the consumers had to pay 50 cts. per barrel duty without benefiting in any way the Western agriculturist because he could export it at a higher price. The hon. gentleman has boasted that he had a surplus, and he has one. I come now to consider that question of surplus, and in doing so I call attention to the fact that this question was debated during the reign of the Mackenzie Administration, which was not a reign wholly of deficits as the hon. Minister of Railways would fain have us believe. At any rate the then hon. Finance Minister claimed at one time that he had a surplus. What was the language of the hon. Minister of Railways with reference to that surplus. I invite the particular attention of the House to this, because it was alluded to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and because the force of his utterances was sought to be broken by the right hon. First Minister on behalf of the hon. Minister of Railways, but with the effect, through his not understanding the position, of placing the hon. Minister of Railways in a worse position than before. In 1875, he said [Hansard, 1875, page 176]:

"Then there is the question of sugar * * * There never was a time when the hon. Finance Minister had it in his power to deal with this question in a manner more just to the people than at present. He says we have a surplus of half a million. I say the Government have no right to have a surplus. If they have, they should endeavor to get rid of it, and the best way to do so is that pursued by us and by the Government of Great Britain—by lightening the taxes on the people, and when I tell you the article of sugar pays in this country 50 per cent. on its cost, while in England the Government have swept the tax away altogether, I think this House will agree with me that the time was most opportune to have used this surplus—not in adjusting the Tariff for sugars as the hon. gentlemen proposed last year, but by such a decrease of duty upon the lower grades of sugar as might accomplish the object the hon. gentleman had in view when bringing the Tariff before the House, and which would be received as a boon by the poorer classes of the country."

This is a most emphatic declaration on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways, who was then exercising the duties which would have been performed, no doubt, by the hon. Finance Minister, had he then been in the House; and I am bound to say that he performed them with great ability.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

We have further the utterances of the hon. Finance Minister on this question of surplus and the duty of the Government in dealing with it. He said, in 1881 [pages 1,020 and 1,021 of Hansard]:

"Hon. gentlemen may ask if with the estimated surplus for the present year of $2,000,000 and the estimated surplus next year of $1,000,000, we propose in the resolutions we are about to lay on the Table any great reduction in the Tariff."

After stating it was not his intention, owing to inability, to estimate exactly what effect the increased home production would have, and also the hope of Reciprocity, he further says:

"We thought it would not be injurious to be able to show in two or three years that we had a surplus of two and a half or three millions. * * * If there is no chance of our natural productions having a free market in the United States, if we find that in addition to the $300,000 required for interest on our expenditure in the construction of the Pacific Railway, we have a handsome surplus, I need not tell the hon. gentleman that we shall be only too glad to relieve the people of taxation, whether to the extent of half a million or a million of dollars. But at present we feel that it would be unwise and undesirable to do that."

We have, therefore, first the opinion of the hon. Minister of Railways that a Government has no right to have a surplus, or if they have it is their bounden duty to get rid of it by lightening the taxes. Then we have the hon. Finance Minister saying that he did not know exactly what the effect of the American Tariff legislation would be on our revenue, but that if at the end of three years we had a surplus of $3,000,000 he would only be too glad to relieve the people of taxation of half a million or a million dollars. Now, with a surplus of $4,000,000 in 1881, over $6,000,000 last year, and about $6,000,000 this year, or about $16,000,000 in the three years, instead of this estimated surplus of $3,000,000, he purposes to lighten the burdens of the people only by the paltry reduction he proposed to make should we have a surplus of $3,000,000. If it were wrong to have a surplus at all, how can the hon. Minister justify himself for having taken out of the pockets of the people $16,000,000 of money which ought to be circulating among the people, and locking it up in the coffers of this country or expending it on public works which the Government were pledged to construct, without increasing the taxation of the country—for the construction of which they were to borrow money and pay out of the sale of lands? To-day he proposes no lessening of the burden of taxation except the paltry relief of $1,500,000 of duty, and of that $500,000 comes off the article of tobacco, a luxury which people were willing should bear an increase if necessary. He proposes no relief on sugar, no lessening of the taxation on the other necessities of life. While reducing the duty on tobacco he is enhancing the taxes on other articles of prime necessity. Hon. gentlemen opposite should decide whether the position now taken by the hon. Finance Minister is the right one or whether that taken by the hon. Minister of Railways, that a Government has no right to a surplus, is the right one. I agree to a great extent with the hon. Minister of Railways. When the Government find they have beyond doubt a surplus, when they can calculate to a certainty on having one, it is their bounden duty to reduce taxation. It is no part of the duty of a Finance Minister to extract more money out of the pockets of the people than is absolutely wanted to carry on public affairs. He has done his best, I admit, in the estimate he has made to make the expenditure keep up with the taxation of the people—I admit that—running it up at the rate of a million a year. His duty is plain, the hon. Minister of Railways being his judge, his own words telling him in 1881, that he has no right to come down here proposing no greater reduction in taxation than $1,500,000 when he has $16,000,000 of a surplus. He claims it as an evidence of statesmanship that he has succeeded in taking $16,000,000 out of the pockets of the people more than was needed. Is it statesmanship in England, where they have statesmen to administer their affairs? Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom was to have a surplus, in proportion to their revenue, equal to that which the hon. gentleman has boasted of to-night, he would have a surplus of $2,000,000. Fancy what would be said of a Chancellor of the Exchequer in England if he could not estimate the requirements of the public service nearer than $2,000,000. He would be ridiculed as unable to grasp the financial condition of the country. The Finance Minister will reply to me: I estimated the surplus at $3,000,000. Even then he was mistaken in his estimate of the revenue. After five years experience the hon. gentleman is astray in his calculation with reference to the effect of this Tariff, $3,316,000. That would be equivalent to a miscalculation on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England of $46,000,000. Fancy a Chancellor of the Exchequer in England making a mistake like that. Sir, the Finance Minister has to learn, and he has to be told, that Finance Ministers are judged by their ability to estimate closely what the revenue and expenditure are likely to be, that they may ask from the people no more than what is required to carry on the public service. He has completely failed in this respect, for he has asked for $3,316,000 over and above $3,000,000 surplus he estimated last year. We remember the denunciation heaped upon the late Minister of Finance because, during his administration, he had been unable to keep the expenditure of the country within the bounds of the revenue—he who had to administer the affairs of the country with one-third less taxation than at the present time. He was, at any rate, able in five years to show a deficit of not more than $5,000,000, or only $1,000,000 a year. The present Finance Minister in his calculation is, in three years, $16,000,000 wrong, or over $5,000,000 a year. Sir, this surplus business is quite understood by the people of this country. If the surplus was paid by the Minister himself, if he had some means of taking it out of his own pocket and putting it into the Public Treasury, or if the combined supporters of the Ministry had some means of putting that money into the Treasury, then we would hail them as benefactors of their country. But when the hon. Finance Minister has put his hand into your pocket, and my pocket, and the pockets of the people of this country, and taken therefrom this $16,000,000, then we claim that he has not accomplished any very great feat, though backed in his act by the Parliament of this country. I say that he has proved himself unable to estimate aright the resources of this country, he has been unable to grasp the tax-paying power of the people, and he is still going on in the same way, for he tells us that in the current year he expects another $6,000,000; and I suppose that for the year that is to follow we may calculate upon a little surplus. In this matter of a surplus it is time the hon. gentleman should act upon the advice of the hon. Minister of Railways, and lighten the burdens that are laid upon the people of this country. I tell the hon. Minister of Finance that I believe, before the seven years he has talked about rolls round, he will find things in this country very much changed—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Blue ruin predicted.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, no. I think that it is quite possible that blue ruin may overtake the hon. gentleman's political fortunes, but I do not think that utter ruin will come to the country, because I think the country will exist in spite of all the hon. gentleman can do to ruin it. But it is quite possible there may be relief in the near future. I am not one of those—and no hon. gentleman in this House can make the charge against me—who take too dark a view of the affairs of the country. I was one of the first to acknowledge the time when prosperity began to dawn upon us. I am fain to admit it to-day. My opinions are not worth a great deal, but what I am saying now is backed up by men who are quite as good financiers as the hon. gentleman himself; and I mean no disparagement to him when I say that a former Finance Minister, once a colleague of the present First Minister in, looking abroad over the commercial condition of the country, has seen fit more than once in his paper to raise a warning voice. Other commercial journals point in that direction. It is not a prediction that I make alone. Let me read to him what one of his own organs says, a paper that supports the hon. gentleman opposite at least three days in the week, let me read from the Montreal Gazette of March 8th, the following editorial:—

“The disturbing elements which for some time past have existed in the commercial atmosphere have not yet been dissipated, and it is feared that further disturbances as a result of over-trading are inevitable before business regains its wonted health and vigor. Not in Canada alone, however, is this unsettled condition of affairs discernible, as the depression is certainly more marked in the United States than here, and has become sufficiently developed in Great Britain to draw forth comments upon it from the press. Some of our leading merchants are of the opinion that references to trade difficulties should be avoided as much as possible in commercial articles, on the ground that they tend to create unnecessary distrust. In this view of the subject, however, we cannot concur, for the reason that the more the question of commercial depression is publicly discussed and understood, the more speedy and effectual is likely to be the application of the remedy. It has come to be a recognized axiom, that cycles of depression follow periods of prosperity as surely as night follows day, although we maintain that the former sequence is not as necessary to trade as the latter is to nature.”

Then he goes on and instances cases in support of his statement. Now, I hold that is very wrong language on the part of the editor of the Montreal Gazette. That is blue ruin, and I would suggest that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) should write to the editor of the Montreal Gazette, protesting against it. The thing is an outrage. That paper is guilty of infidelity to the hon. Finance Minister. Why, Sir, here we find the very expressions in a good Tory newspaper that we used to hear in the time of the Mackenzie Administration. Here we find a paper that is known to the hon. member for Cardwell, a strong supporter of the hon. Finance Minister, talking about cycles of depression. Has he forgotten that the hon. Finance Minister still lives? Has he forgotten who administers our affairs? Has he forgotten that cycles may come and cycles may go, but that applies to lands where they have not such a Finance Minister as we have, for here there are no disturbing influences in the commercial atmosphere? How dare he make these utterances in view of the failures that are taking place. I read a speech delivered by the hon. member for Cardwell very nearly, if not on the same day, delivered in a neighboring county where the hon. gentleman held forth with all the eloquence he possessed, and told the people how blest we are in having the present Finance Minister, and that with the Tariff in force and the present Ministers in office we were on the way to perpetual prosperity. But even the Finance Minister has declared to-night a want of faith in himself. He believed that for seven years we would have prosperity. Does he intend to die in seven years, or to leave us in seven years; I pray him not. If he can maintain this buoyancy in the commercial atmosphere and stave off this blue ruin, why should he only do it for seven years; why should he not live and serve his country and not voluntarily retire? Canada has placed him in that high position, and it will expect him to remain and give effect to all his prophecies, and that for all time to come, because he says the present Tariff is to remain in force for all time to come. Neither wages, nor the price of wheat must decline for all time to come; there is a little fall for the time being, but the hon. Minister will regulate that. For all time to come our factories must have their home market. I recognize the fact that, while I believe Canada is prosperous to-day, and has another good year before her, long before the seven years which the hon. gentleman has mentioned have elapsed, the country will be in the midst of one of those eras of depression which the Montreal Gazette truly says, come round in cycles; that one year after you find depression existing in the United States, look out for depression in Canada, and I, faithless in the power of the Finance Minister, would be glad if he had the power to save us from that which will inevitably come. The large expenditure of foreign capital in the Prairie Province may for the time tide us over, but depend upon it that when the Pacific Railway is completed and trains are running through, when our exports decline and a poor harvest comes, and there is a lowering of the United States lumber market and decline in the price of our products in England, then there will be a stringency in this country again; and let me tell the hon. Finance Minister that, though he rejoices to-day, and says the people to-day pay their taxes willingly, yet at the rate he is spending the public money now, taxes will have to be kept up with diminished imports, and the people having to pay 35 per cent. on many of the necessaries of life, instead of 17½ per cent., will turn round on the hon. Finance Minister and say that their burdens are greater than they can bear, and he will be unable to give relief, because the country has entered upon an era of extravagance, and expenditure can be more easily increased than retrenched; and therefore it is that I look forward to that time, and am willing to see the hon. gentleman sitting in his place and take all the pleasure that he can derive—and he seems to derive much pleasure from the fact—that he sits surrounded with two supporters at his back to every one in the Opposition. This country will, as I have said, pass through a period of stringency and trade depression as well as of prosperity, and I venture to prophecy that in a few years from now, the hon. Minister, if he still retains his position as Minister of Finance, will find that he will be compelled to offer apologies; he will explain how this factory and that factory was closed; how wages in this department were lowered, and how it occurs that the exports have declined. I believe this, and I am confirmed in my view by writers in commercial journals, equally well informed with the hon. Finance Minister. And then we, on this side of the House, will have the satisfaction of knowing that though we may have had to wait a few years, till a period of trial came round, yet it was bound to come at last. We will know that the principles laid down on this side of the House, and acted on, were the correct principles, and that hon. gentlemen opposite, who attempted to give the people relief by means of bogus medicines, would be declared by the people themselves, to have been administering quack medicines. They would ask the advice of physicians who practise according to well understood remedies, and when that time came, the hon. Minister would find, that having had his day of rejoicing and exaltation, that his utterances would fall back on himself, and that he had proved powerless to accomplish the good he declared he would be able to accomplish through the agency of the Tariff. I have not gone into a discussion of Free Trade and the present Tariff. Free Trade has never been an issue in this country. It has always been held that we should afford protection, while raising the necessary revenue, and I have pointed out time and again that under the late Administration the manufactures had attained a proud and prominent position, as far back as 1876, when the products of the manufactories of Canada, placed side by side with the manufactured products of other nations, challenged the admiration of the people who beheld them. I have pointed out that the display of Canadian manufactures at the Centennial Exhibition, followed by the exhibitions at Paris and Melbourne, aided by a grant made by the Government, opened up a foreign trade to this country, that in 1878 had expanded to $4,000,000. What have hon. gentlemen opposite done to promote our manufacturing industries? Some few lines have been benefited, and I am willing they should be benefited. But what has been the effect on the manufacturing industry as a whole? The export trade has not been developed. It fell nearly $1,000,000 during the first year that hon. gentlemen were in office; it fell $1,000,000 another year, and an aggregate of $2,750,000 less of manufactured goods were sent from this country during the last three years than during the last year of the Mackenzie Administration. And yet they claim that they alone developed manufactures. Hon. gentlemen opposite can take whatever credit they can find from the claim that they benefited some industries; but it must be remembered that they handicapped others, and those the largest and most important in the country. Among those handicapped were the manufacturers of agricultural implements, and to-day the hon. Minister proposes that an extra duty be levied upon that industry, to be borne by whom? By the people of Manitoba. Poor Manitoba. The figures given to us by the Minister of Customs himself reveals this fact: that while the other Provinces of this Dominion pay an average of $5 per head of taxation, Manitoba pays $16, and it is on the imports directly into Manitoba, while the duties on the goods they purchase in Montreal and Toronto have to be added to it. In addition they pay enormous freight rates, monopoly rates forced upon them, fastened upon them by hon. gentlemen opposite, so that every man in Manitoba with five of a family faces the fact, that he will have directly and indirectly a taxation of about $200 a year to bear. Sir, I think that this is a matter which deserves the attention of this House and country—that in this fair land of ours from which we had hoped for great things, under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, they are making it intolerable for the people of that country. I am not so much surprised that the agricultural implement manufacturers are seeking more protection, because the Government by heaping taxes on their raw material, compels them to ask for high prices, and again, because the Government, instead of retaining the Thunder Bay Branch, built with the money of the people of Canada, and which, when in our own hands, would have enabled us to lay down a car load of freight for $40, or on regular mileage rates for $43, have handed all the outlets and the inlets into that country into the hands of the Syndicate, who charge these same men $176 to lay down a car of freight for the same distance. That, Sir, handicaps these agricultural implement makers, who have to pay extortionate freight rates; and who, in buying their raw material, have duties heaped upon them by the hon. Finance Minister; and they say: Why, we cannot hold our own unless more protection is given; and if the hon. gentleman grants their request he imposes on the people of that Province additional taxation. Sir, there is a blight on that land in the presence of these hon. gentlemen, and I will not allow them to charge on me disloyal utterances because I speak out openly in this House with reference to this matter. I will not permit them to charge me with running down the country. I am not doing so. No man in this House desires to see progress and prosperity in this country more than I do; with the feelings of a young Canadian I desire, above all things, to see great national progress in this country to which I owe my birth; and I looked forward hopefully to the opening and development of the North-West, which has all the resources required to make a great nation, and it is because I am a patriot to that country, and because I am a patriot to my country, that I speak out plainly. I am not disloyal to my country when I speak in this way, and I am not running it down. It is a magnificent country, and it has an enterprising people in it; but they are chained down hand and foot by the Government of the day. I am, however, opposed to the Government of the day, and herein lies my disloyalty. I am disloyal only to their policy which has fastened these fetters on what ought to be a free nation. The Finance Minister boasts of his majority in the House. We recognize the fact, that though but 70, while they are 140, and you, Sir, the impartial one, whom we have in this House; and that though it be the state of parties in this House, it is not the state of parties in the country; and even were it so, no man is to be blamed for holding views different from his fellow men; and we will maintain in all their force, and propound with all the possible vigor of which we are capable, the principles that we think ought to guide us in administering the affairs of this country. I have only one thing to say, and I would not have alluded to it, had it not been for the boasting of the hon. Finance Minister. He might, under the circumstances—remembering by what means his majority was attained—have, at any rate, felt that it was not necessary to allude in such jubilant terms to the fact, that they are 140 to our 70. Not that we care for that, for 70 believing themselves to be in the right, may stand in the face of not 140 but of 740; and when that hon. gentleman knows the means by which they obtained power; when he remembers that he himself was a party to the conception, and the introduction, and the passing of a Bill through this House, by which the late Finance Minister, a man whose abilities the country might have had the advantage of at this time, who had been received in a constituency by the unanimous nomination of his party, in a constituency in which that nomination meant his election to this House—he might well have refrained from making such a boast. The hon. gentleman was a party to the introduction of a Bill to wipe out the ex-Finance Minister's constituency at the expense of depriving him of a seat in this House; when he in common with other hon. gentlemen opposite, day after day, week after week, month after month, manifested that noble, that brave and that chivalrous disposition which enabled them to retire into the secret recesses of a room, and there in darkness to take their maps and change constituencies so as to strike at the members of the Opposition, tearing townships from counties and casting townships into other counties, disfiguring, marring, and blotting the whole map of Ontario, by legislative enactment, in order to lessen the chances of many of their opponents in this House. That hon. gentleman professes to have some regard for his character; to have some of the elements of fair play in him; and when he remembers that he was a party to this, that he sat here and plotted in secret in common with others of his party, and carried through this House a Bill in an underhand way, and by this means succeeded in capturing the Province of Ontario, he might have refrained from his boasting. Sir, if it be any pleasure to one of his noble and chivalrous nature, to see that he was successful in accomplishing what he sought—to diminish the number of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—the pleasure is his; and, Sir, we on this side of the House would rather remain here from now until doomsday, a small minority, than ever be guilty of doing that upon which we could not reflect without feeling that we had committed an act which could not commend itself to any man possessed of a noble, brave, and chivalrous nature. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have detained the House at such length. I have spoken with some vigor and force on the subjects which I have touched; but I have endeavored not to trespass beyond the bounds of Parliamentary debate. Differing from the hon. Finance Minister, I have endeavored to give the reasons for my views; and whether I have done so ably or not, the House, at any rate, will be able to see the line of reasoning which I have endeavored to adopt; and if that line of reasoning will commend itself to any independent members of this House and lead them to review the opinions of both political parties and take into more earnest consideration heretofore all the great questions of the day—not one, but than the great questions of the day; and if it should be the means of influencing them to cast their votes in the direction which I conceive to be the right one, then, Sir, I will feel more than repaid for any efforts that I have made in thus placing my views before you.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, has devoted a large portion of the time which he has occupied in replying to the Budget Speeches of last year and of the year before. Sir, those Budget Speeches were before the people of the country in June last; the replies of those hon. gentlemen to those Budget Speeches were also before the country, and in the face of arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite, the people of Canada—not the people of Ontario alone, but the people of the whole Dominion—returned to this House a majority to support the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches. The hon. member has been good enough to say that we should not boast of that triumph, because of the fact that it was achieved, as he alleges, in some parts, at any rate, by what was commonly known as the Gerrymandering Act. I did not understand the hon. Minister of Finance, when he referred to the fact that eight ex-Ministers, who were in office during those five years that the opposite party were in power, had fallen victims to the popular indignation at the last election—I say I did not understand him to refer to the triumph in the Province of Ontario alone. The fact is that of those eight hon. gentlemen only one can, with any show of reason or truth, be said to have fallen a victim to what is called the Gerrymandering Act. The late member for Bothwell is now, it may be, occupying a position which is not an uncongenial or unpleasant one; it is one which, in some respects, has its advantages over the position of a member of this House—that of an editor of a leading newspaper in Ontario. He occupies that position to-day, it may, perhaps, be said, because of the change in the boundaries of his late constituency, but certainly the ex-Finance Minister cannot claim that to be his case. If the constituency which he formerly represented was changed, the changed constituency is in this House represented by an hon. gentleman who is in sympathy with him, and who supports the party with which he was connected; and the other constituency, into which portions of his constituency went, returned a member to this House by the enormous majority of somewhere about 800. The late Finance Minister himself chose a place in which to try conclusions with the Conservative party, and in choosing that place he chose one in which, judging by the preceding election, there was fair reason to expect that he might have some chance of success. What was the result? He was beaten by a majority of 157, and the township which was added by the Act of last Session to the constituency, only gave a Conservative majority of somewhere about thirty. How was it with another gentleman in this Province? How was it with an hon. ex-Governor of the Province of Ontario, Mr. Macdonald, who ran in Glengarry and was so gallantly beaten by the hon. gentleman who sits behind me? How was it with the late hon. member for Shefford, whose constituency was not gerrymandered? How was it with the late hon. and gallant knight of Westmoreland, whose place was taken by the hon. gentleman whom we are all so delighted to see in this House? How was it with the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lafamme, in whose constituency there was no change of boundaries? How was it with Mr. Laird who ran in Prince Edward Island, and who was so unpopular that, if I mistake not, he almost prevented his own colleague in finding a place in this House? How was it with Mr. Jones who ran for Halifax, and who, I am glad to know, was defeated by the hon. gentleman who sits behind me? How was it with the ex-Speaker of the House who failed to get the votes of one-fourth of the constituency which formerly supported him? What influence had the Gerrymandering Act on those constituencies? If it had any influence whatever, it should have had an influence in their favor. If it was an Act which deserved the name of an infamous Act—and I have heard that term applied to it in western constituencies—the argument was good in every part of the Dominion, that the party guilty of passing such an Act were unworthy of public confidence; yet that measure, used along with other measures passed by this Government, and denounced with equal vehemence when they were before Parliament, and for which they were responsible in all those constituencies, failed to bring back these leading men to the other side of the House. As we gaze on it from this side and miss the faces of those who used to do loyal battle for their party in debate, we experience a feeling of absolute commiseration at the poverty of the Opposition in this House. Sir, the truth is, that the people of Canada, in June last, gave their verdict for the same reason that they gave it in September, 1878. They had had experience of the Liberal party in power. They found that that party in power had failed to carry out even the pledges they made in Opposition, and they found that, more serious than that, they had failed to appreciate the wants of the people; they had ignored the condition of affairs in which the country stood, and, unwilling to trust them again, they preferred, even if the statements made by the hon. gentleman opposite as to the mal-administration of the Government were true, to trust the destinies of this country to the Conservative party whose administration they had had experience of for nearly twenty years, rather than run the risk at a time like that of placing the affairs of the country in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. There never was in any country a triumph so signal, so significant, as that which came to the Conservative party in June last; and hon. gentlemen opposite, if they realize the real sense of the country, if they could learn to forget a little or learn to remember a little, would not come back to this House the first Session of a new Parliament with the worn-out speeches which had been delivered in the old Parliament, which had been before the country at the time of the elections, and the verdict of the people upon which had been one of unqualified condemnation. I propose to review very briefly some of the points to which the hon. gentleman has referred in his speech. He commenced by referring to the finances, and he told us the old story that the Conservative party had increased the expenditure of this country from $13,000,000 in 1868 to $23,000,000 in 1874. Well, we have heard that before, and it has had no effect upon the country. The hon. gentleman himself does not believe that there is any force in the statement as a condemnation of any party in this country. He knows that in 1868 we were four Provinces, and that in 1874 there were seven Provinces. He knows that in 1868 we were entering upon Confederation, that we had not yet commenced to expend money upon the development of this country. He knows that in 1873 and 1874 we were in the full career of development; that we had purchased the North-West, that we had almost built the Intercolonial Railway, that we were commencing to enter upon expenditures in connection with the North-West, and he knows that there is no fair comparison between the periods of 1867 and 1874. But, Sir, he fell into the further error of misstating the expenditure on Consolidated Revenue account, at any rate, in 1873-4. I will not here revive the old controversies of the last Parliament. I will not discuss beyond the mere statement of the fact which was so ably discussed at that period, that the expenditure of 1873-4, instead of being over $23,000,000 was $23,300,000, and that hon. gentlemen opposite actually cooked the Public Accounts—I use the word advisedly—in order that they might be able at the end of their period to present a misleading statement, with a view of making out as good a case as possible for themselves. By placing sums spent on Capital Account, to the account of Consolidated Revenue, by including Customs refunds and a number of other items, they added nearly $1,000,000 that certainly did not belong to the expenditure of that year; and they succeeded in raising the yearly expenditure from $22,300,000, to some $23,316,000. But it is when we come to deal with the details of these expenditures, that we see the difference between the two parties. It is quite true that hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, only increased the general expenditure from $22,300,000 to $24,456,000. But how was it done? Will any one tell me that a decrease in the expenditure on Public Works is a matter of economy? The hon. gentleman who has just sat down boasted that public works were managed for a certain sum of money. I do not know whether he is aware that the expenditure under Public Works, has nothing whatever to do with the management of public works. It is expenditure on Capital Account for the construction of public works; and the only difference between the two parties in that respect is this, that at one period, with an overflowing Treasury, the Conservative party were enabled to do what, happily, they have been able to do ever since, viz.: expend public money on the public works of the country, whereas hon. gentlemen opposite, with annual deficits, were obliged to stop such expenditure. And now they claim credit for so doing, as if it was an evidence of economical administration. So with other expenditures, such as Immigration and Quarantine, Militia, &c. But hon. gentlemen opposite claim to have succeeded in decreasing the ordinary expenditure during the five years that they were in power. If you examine the cost of collecting the revenue, which must be to a considerable extent included in the controllable expenditure, you will find that, instead of being decreased during that period, it was very largely increased. Between 1879 and 1882, the expenditure was increased considerable. I am not going to trouble the House by reading over the items of that increase, which are connected largely with Public Works, Dominion Lands, the Census, &c. But when we come to comparison between the Administrations of the two parties, we find the following to be the result:—

Public Works.....	$ 1,863,149	$ 2,711,134
Customs.....	12,900,659	21,581,570

Total.....	$5,396,177	$5,878,565

That is, Sir, the income during those years increased no less than $10,438,462, or 49½ per cent., while the cost of collection increased only $482,383, or a fraction under 9 per cent. Now, Sir, if you compare this with the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, you will find the following result:—

REVENUE.
Public Works.....	$ 1,509,915	$ 1,863,149

That is, while the revenue decreased $1,242,994, or 5½ per cent., the cost of collection increased $753,994, or 16½ per cent. That is the answer I give to the hon. gentleman when he undertakes to compare the expenditure from 1874 to 1879 with that from 1879 to 1882. Then, Sir, I take some details. I take the expenditures in relation with the management of the Government railways. I have no doubt that when the hon. Minister of Railways comes to deal with this subject he will do so very fully, but I will be pardoned for stating one or two facts in connection with it. I find that the mileage of the Intercolonial open in 1879 was 720 miles, and in 1882, 840 miles, an increase of 120 miles. I find that the train mileage run was 2,111,426 in 1879, and 3,195,566 in 1882, or an increase of 1,084,140. I find that the passengers carried numbered 640,101 in 1879, and 779,994 in 1882, an increase of 139,893; that the tons of freight carried in 1879 amounted to 510,861, and in 1882 to 838,956, an increase of 328,095 tons. One would naturally imagine that, under these circumstances, with greater mileage to work, with a greater carriage of passengers and freight, and consequent larger expenditure, the increased expense ought to be very great. Yet what are the facts? The revenue in 1879 was $1,294,099; and in 1882 it was $2,079,262—an increase in 1882 of $785,163 over 1879. Everyone who knows anything of railways, knows that the increase in expenditure and revenue always bear some relation to each other. Yet in this case, we find that although labor was undoubtedly higher in 1882 than in 1879, and the revenue was so much greater, there was substantially no increase in the cost of working the road. In 1879 the cost was $2,010,183, and in 1882, $2,069,657, an increase of only $59,474 in expenditure for the production of that enormously increased revenue and business. I find further that the deficit in 1879 in the working of the railroad was $726,084, while in 1882 its working showed a surplus of $9,605. The cost per mile of running a train on the Intercolonial was, in 1879, 95.50, in 1862, 64.74 cts., a decrease of 30.73 cts. I ask whether, under these circumstances, we may not fairly say that in relation to this, our greatest enterprise, upon which the largest expenditure may be made without any special oversight or attention of the public or Parliament, that it is an evidence of the careful administration which has characterized the conduct of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches. Take the matter of Customs as another illustration, and what do we find? The hon. member for West Middlesex, in the debate on the Tariff in 1879, stated this among other objections:

"The Finance Minister, in bringing down the Budget, said it would be necessary to employ a number of experts to examine the goods imported into this country, so that their value might be appraised and the country saved from being defrauded. This meant a positive increase in the collection of Customs hereafter. It meant his hon. friend would have to dismiss a number of Custom House officers and appoint others who had had a peculiar training in order to do this business. It meant more than that, an increase of the number of Custom House officers of the present grade. When a bale of goods came to the Custom House consisting of cottons, silks, velveteens, etc., in order to calculate the Customs dues, they would be compelled to measure every article. Then the invoice would have to be looked into in order to levy the ad valorem. Thus there would be a large increase in the labors of the Custom House officers. A large increase would be necessitated in the Custom House staff, and for that reason he objected to the Tariff as being expensive."

What has been the result? The cost of collections in 1874, when hon. gentlemen opposite took office, was 4.55 per cent.; in 1878 it had increased to 5.56, an increase of 1.01 per cent. In 1882 the cost of collecting the revenue was 3.32 per cent., or a decrease from that of 1879 of 2.24 per cent. But percentages, of course, are sometimes misleading. They may mean a good deal, or nothing. I will, however, take the actual figures. In 1874 the receipts were $14,325,192, and the cost of collecting those receipts, $658,299. In 1879 the receipts were $12,900,659, and the cost of collecting, $719,711, or a decrease in the revenue of $1,424,533, and an increase in the cost of collecting that decreased revenue of $61,412—that is, 10 per cent. of a decrease in the receipts, and 10½ per cent. of an increase in the cost of collection. In 1882 the receipts were $21,581,570, and the cost of collecting, $723,913, showing an increased revenue over 1879 of $8,680,911, and an increased cost of collecting of $4,202—or 67 per cent. increased revenue at an increased cost of collecting under ½ of 1 per cent. I think we may fairly offset that against the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the difference between the two parties in the management of our public affairs. I will take another Department, in relation to which hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to charge inconsistency against the Conservative party. When hon. gentlemen were in office they were charged with having unnecessarily increased the Post Office expenditure. They have since charged us with inconsistency because it has also been increased by this Government. But what are the facts? During Mr. Mackenzie's term of office, the revenue from Post Offices in 1874 was $1,476,207, and in 1879, $1,534,363, an increase in the latter year of $58,156, a fraction under 4 per cent. On the other hand, the expenditure increased from $1,695,480, in 1874, to $2,167,266 in 1879, an increase of $471,786, or about 28 per cent. That is to say, while the revenue increase was under 4 per cent. the cost of collecting it had increased 28 per cent. What has been the fact since? In 1882 the revenue was $2,022,996, or an increased revenue over 1879 of $188,633, 31½ per cent. In 1882 the expenditure, $2,459,356, or an increase of $292,090 over the expenditure of 1879, giving a percentage of increase of 13½ per cent.; thus while the revenue increases 31½ per cent., the cost of collecting it only increased 13½ per cent. When we look at this matter in another light, we find this to be the result: the average cost per Post Office in 1874 was $326, in 1879, $386.59, and in 1882, $398. That is to say, an increase of $60 per Post Office between 1874 and 1879, and of only $12 between 1879 and 1882. Then, if you take the mileage travelled you will find that the increase is more than accounted for. The mileage of travel in 1874—and that is a very good indication of the expenditure of the Post Office, because it is one of the methods by which you can show how postal facilities have been increased to the people of this country—you will find that the mileage in that year was 13,929,180, and the cost 11 cts. per mile. In 1879 it was 16,156,034, or 13½ cts. per mile, being an increase of 2½ cts. per mile. In 1882 the mileage had increased to 18,091,996, or 13½ cts. per mile, so that there was no perceptible increase in the mileage cost of working the Post Office between 1879 and 1882. But if you look at what has been done, the kind of mileage that has been covered, you will see that there might reasonably have been a considerable increase. In Manitoba and the North-West Territories, in 1874, the Post Office mileage covered was only 79,567; in 1879 it was 149,843, while in 1882 it had increased to 738,206, so that with all that enormous development of the postal facilities in the North-West, the cost per mile of working the Post Office has not increased during the time the hon. gentleman on this side have had charge of the Department, while during the time the hon. gentleman opposite had charge of it the mileage cost increased 2½ cts. per mile. Then, another way of dealing with the matter is to look at the cost per letter. I find that in 1874 the cost per letter was 4 cts.; in 1877 the hon. gentleman opposite managed still to increase it to a fraction over 4 cts.; while in 1882 the cost per letter had been decreased to a fraction under 3½ cts. per letter; so that in every way in which we look at the administration of the Post Office Department we find that we were right in charging extravagance against the hon. gentleman for the increase between 1874 and 1879, and that this Government is not fairly open to the same charge for the increase since they came into office. Now, Sir, in relation to our financial condition, I may further refer to the state of our Public Debt, and I think it is worth while looking at it in order that people may see what is the position which this country is occupying at the present moment. This is of great importance, because it will be remembered that in the debates in this House, in 1880, when the Government proposed to assume the task of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. member for West Durham, pointed out the serious evil that must result to this country, if there was a great increase in the Public Debt. He pointed to the fact that emigrants from the other side, choosing a country to come to, finding in the United States a country where there was an annually decreasing debt, and finding in Canada, a country where there was an annually increasing debt, would naturally seek the United States rather than Canada. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, I think it must be a matter of sincere congratulation to us all, that we appear reasonably, at any rate, to have reached a period when there would be no further material increase to our Public Debt in connection with the enterprises upon which we have now entered. In 1867, the net debt was $75,728,841; in 1874, it was $108,344,964, or an apparent increase during that period of $32,616,323. But of this increase to which we are often referred as an evidence of Conservative extravagance, there were no less than $20,452,340 for debts allowed to the Provinces, that is to say, for the entry of Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island into Confederation, and for the assumption of the debts of Ontario and Quebec, amounting, with the equivalents to the other Provinces, to $13,859,079, making an actual increase in the burden of the country of $12,163,983, or an average for seven years of $1,751,993. In 1879, $34,645,223 had been added to the debt, being an average annual increase of $6,929,045, making the net debt at that time, when hon. gentlemen opposite left office, $142,990,187. In 1882, $10,671,463 had been added, making an average increase during the time that the present Government has been in office, of $3,555,055, as there will be no increase during the next year—that fact has been announced by the Finance Minister—but, on the contrary, as there is a fair prospect of a small decrease, we may take $2,667,866 as the average increase under Conservative rule. Now, if we leave out this $20,452,340 of debts allowed to the Provinces, the net increase has been $57,680,667. We have to show for that, in four articles alone, these sums: On canals we have spent $12,671,125; Canadian Pacific Railway, $26,046,339; Intercolonial Railway, $26,464,017; North-West, $2,920,000, making altogether, $68,101,481; or we have in these four items alone an excess of $10,420,812 over the entire addition to the debt during the period since Confederation. I think that is a fact which we may fairly present to the public, and especially to the emigrating public in whose interest the warning was given by the hon. member for West Durham. We may fairly present it as a fact to reassure them to come to this country. Now, we have this other fact by way of contrast between the hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen on this side. During the time that the Conservative party were in office down to 1874, considerably over $10,000,000 were expended on Capital Account, in excess of the additions to the public debt. From 1874 to 1879, $5,723,083 were added to the debt more than were expended on Capital Account; so that while the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, they were expending money every year obtained from loans, and therefore from additions to the Public Debt for the ordinary administration of the affairs of the country. We may well say to them that they could hardly have gone on increasing the expenditure upon public works—at a time when they were only able to carry on the affairs of the country—in spite of two increases in the Tariff, from one of which they estimated an increase of $3,000,000, and from another of which they estimated an increase of $1,600,000—by increasing the debt $6,723,083 more than they expended on Capital Account. What has been the result since? I find from 1880 to 1882 there has been expended on Capital Account, $15,535,034 more than has been added to the Public Debt. I think we may fairly congratulate ourselves upon this fact, a reassuring one to the immigrant who is comparing the condition of this country with that of the United States before selecting his residence. Looking at the future I think we may fairly say, in spite of the warning of the hon. member for Brant, that we will have an annual surplus during the next five years of about $3,000,000. I do not believe we can have very much less than that, even assuming what the Montreal Gazette says is correct, that we are on the eve of a period of depression as compared with the inflation of last year, in view of the development of the North-West. That will give us $15,000,000 in money during the next five years to expend on Capital Account. In 1885 we shall have $32,467,169 of 5 per cents. maturing, and to redeem. Redeeming them at 4 per cents., even at par, and we may be able to go a little better than that, it will be equal to a new loan of $8,000,000, without adding a single dollar to the interest-charge on the Public Debt of this country, and after all the interest-charge is the measure of the burden on the people. Those two items, amounting to $23,000,000, will be applicable to Capital Account without adding to the interest-charge, which, as I have said, is the measure of the burden of the debt. Then we shall have the receipts from Public Lands. The hon. First Minister declared, in 1880, that we would receive by 1890, $38,593,000, that being on the basis of an annual increase of immigration into the country of 5,000 souls, and from securities, being money secured by land, $32,712,000. I am aware that statement was challenged. The hon. member for West Durham, in referring to it, said:

“The hon. gentleman expects to receive in the fourth year $1,870,000; in the following year, $2,622,000; in the next year, $3,230,000; in the next year, $4,112,090; in the next year, $5,058,000; in the next year, $5,833,000; in the next year, $6,877,000; while the last year of this series of rapid progression is to yield, $7,562,000, to be received in cash from sales in the North-West lands—an aggregate of $38,593,000 apart from the sums not yet due of $32,712,000. Now, I venture to say, if every one of the other calculations be realized, if the hon. gentleman gets into that country the amount of emigration he expects, and at the time he expects, if he makes sales to the numbers and at the prices he expects, these calculations as to the dates and the amounts of his receipts will under no circumstances be realized. Under no circumstances will he receive these sums or anything like them, at these times or anything like them.”

Now, in this, as in almost everything else, time appears to be the great enemy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the great friend to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. What do we find? We are only in the second year, not the fourth. That speech was made by the hon. member in 1880, and at the end of 1882 we had, by the Public Accounts, acknowledged receipts from public lands of $1,744,456; that is to say, we have received in the second year within $125,544 of the sum estimated by the right hon. gentleman for the fourth year. I think we may fairly say, under those circumstances, we have reason to believe now, in view of what has actually taken place, that the estimate given us by the right hon. Minister of the Interior in 1880, will be fully realized as time goes on, and giving the opportunity for its realization, under those circumstances we will be in this position by 1890, or perhaps before that. In five years from to-day, in all likelihood: the Pacific Railway will be completed from ocean to ocean; immigrants will be able to take the cars at Halifax and go to Vancouver Island, or rather to Port Moody, without changing cars or leaving British territory. We will not only have the railway built, but we will have the work accomplished without any increase being made to our public debt. We will have to complete the improvements now contemplated on our canals, and I hope we will be able to dredge and improve the channels of our rivers. We will be able to light and to greatly improve the great waterways of the North West, and I sincerely trust that this is a work which will be undertaken by the present Administration. We will be able, I hope, and I trust the policy of the Government will yet be to do so, to remove the tonnage dues from all vessels from the time they enter the Gulf till they reach Lake Superior, if they can go as far, so as to have free navigation over our magnificent water system from one end to the other and we will be able to accomplish all that without adding a single dollar to the public debt; but, on the contrary, I believe, while making annual payments in reduction of that debt, as they are doing to-day in the United States. I think, under those circumstances, we may fairly claim that the policy of this Government, not only in regard to what is called the National Policy, but their policy in regard to the material development of the country, is in every respect one which merits the approbation of the people, and justifies the verdict which the people gave in June last. So much for the question of expenditure; and I come now for a moment or two to touch on the question of the National Policy, about which so much has been said. I find that the hon. member who preceded me is not very strong in his position on this question. I can remember very well that figurative speech of his in which he pointed out the great advantages which would result to the people from an increase in the duties on tobaccos and cigars. And one can readily understand a gentleman whose opinions as expressed originally in this House, and as we all hope he still entertains them, whose honest opinions are to the effect that the true policy for this country is a policy of protection to native industry—how difficult it must be for him to take the position and to play the rôle which was imposed on him to-night, in the absence of another hon. gentleman who certainly had no difficulty in relation to circumstances of that kind to embarrass him. What has been the position of this country with respect to general trade? There has been an extraordinary revival of trade. No one doubts that. The hon. member for Brant admits that the country has been very prosperous. It is true; but he could not forbear saying that things were changing and that we were going to everlasting smash. He remembered some failures, and rubbing his hands, as hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of doing, he declared with delight, "this is sweetness indeed, another failure." The hon. gentleman declared we were on the eve of another period of depression, that there was a crisis coming at last—and, indeed, he seemed most cheerful when he came to that part of his speech. There was no chance for them so long as the country was prosperous; the people would never trust them so long as the country was prosperous; but if times become depressed, and the people do not care much who governs the country, possibly they may have a chance, but so long as the people feel an interest in and a hope for the country's success and prosperity, hon. gentlemen opposite feel they have no chance to take seats on this side of the House. What has been our position with respect to general trade? That there is an extraordinary development, every one will admit. I have a statement here, but I will not detain the House with details of exports and imports. I find by it that the imports have increased from $81,964,427 to $119,419,500. But, Sir, the argument is used by the hon. gentleman that the fact of our increased imports into this country is proof that the policy of Protection has not succeeded. He tells us that if Protection had succeeded, and if we were manufacturing more goods in this country, we ought, in the nature of things, to have imported less goods; and I am bound to say that, as a general proposition, made without enquiry, and without serious thought, it seems to be a reasonable statement, and it is a statement which was made a good deal of, I know, on the public platform. Now, Sir, what is the fact? We can take, in this matter, the position of the United States. Hon.

gentlemen opposite, when we used to discuss the question of a National Policy, or Protection, on the floor of Parliament, referred us to the United States. They told us that the depression which was pointed out here, was due to the depression on the other side, and when prosperity was pointed to here, that it was due to revived prosperity on the other side. We are now told that depression is threatened in the United States, and that we are certain to have the same condition of things here. They all said, during the discussions of 1878, that during 1877 there was great depression in the United States; we were pointed to their industries standing idle, to the people who were idle, to the tramps who were going about that country unable to find employment, and to the fact that so large a number of different kinds of industries had absolutely failed and closed their doors. Well, Sir, in 1877 the imports into the United States, less coin and bullion, amounted to $451,315,992. Now, Sir, in 1882, the hon. gentleman will tell us that the United States were prosperous, that we had our prosperity because of their prosperity, that their industries were all reopened—as was indeed the fact—that there was abundant employment given, that every department of the manufactures of the United States, had assumed a very much better position, and yet, in spite of that, the imports into that country in 1882 had increased to $724,639,574, or an increase of $273,323,582 between the time when many of their manufactories were closed and the period when all those manufactories were opened and working. Let me give you some details with relation to that increase. I will take cotton, for instance. In 1877, cotton goods were imported into the United States to the value of $18,923,614, and in 1882, these imports had increased to $31,285,306. Woollen goods—a large article of American manufacture—were imported in 1877 to the value of $31,955,244—in round figures, $32,000,000—and in 1882, this had increased to $47,618,182. Silks, in 1877, were imported to the value of $21,830,159, and in 1882, this had increased to $38,328,251, so that in these industries, which had been suffering, and were suffering very seriously in 1877, and which were prosperous in 1882, the imports from foreign countries of articles similar to those manufactured in these factories had very largely increased. Now, Sir, an analysis of the imports into Canada—I admit that they have largely increased—shows as strongly as anything can show, how great has been the development of the manufacturing industries of this country. Let me point out some facts in regard to it. The total increase in the imports in 1878, was $26,337,713; and the increase in raw material which goes into the manufactures of the country, and the increase of which is in fact a pretty certain test by which you may judge of the increased prosperity of the manufactures of Canada—was as follows: Steel rails, which are raw material in the sense of going into our railways, increased from $1,049,107 to $3,531,330; coal, which is perhaps more applicable, because it is used in driving machinery in our mills, increased from $3,054,846 to $5,118,616; hides and pelts, from $1,207,304 to $2,215,419; wool, from $1,106,210 to $1,843,857; raw cotton from $774,703 to $2,286,534; leaf tobacco, from $703,581 to $1,334,110. There are a number of others, which I will give in bulk: raw furs; hemp, undressed; raw silk; india rubber, raw; rosewood, mahogany, &c.; rags; machinery; used in our mills and factories, increased from $516,035 to $2,284,723, and that in spite of the fact that the manufacturers of Canada who manufacture machinery for mills, are more than employed, and are unable to fill the orders which are pressing upon them; broom corn and pig iron, making the total imports of these raw materials for 1878, $3,929,163, against $22,091,211 in 1882, or an increase in imports of raw material of $2,162,018. Then I take luxuries and goods which are not made in Canada, and the increased importation of which may be said to be simply evidence of the increased power of consumption of our people, and of their increased prosperity; and I find this—I will give simply the articles and the general result:—flowers and feathers, laces, braids, &c., cassimeres, coatings, doeskins and meltons, carpets, tea, cottons unenumerated, dried fruits, linen, silks, satins and velvets—we manufacture some silks but it is not yet a large industry in this country—and we find that these imports increased from $10,886,266 in 1878 to $20,284,686 in 1882, or an increase in these articles of luxury, or articles not made in this country, of $9,398,420. Then, Sir, in other increases, I find that settlers' effects increased from $803,506 to $1,557,246; and coin and bullion, which go into the Trade Returns, from $803,726 to $1,503,743; and articles of public use, such as are used by the Government and the Governor General, from $239,744 to $597,669, making a total of from $1,846,976 to $3,856,658, or an increase altogether, on these items, of $1,811,688. Now, Sir, let me recapitulate: the increase in raw material was $12,162,048, in luxuries and articles not produced in this country, $9,398,420; and in special classes, $1,811,682; or altogether in these three articles of goods, an increase in the imports of 1882 over 1878, of $23,372,150, or within $3,000,000 of the entire increase in our imports of 1882 over those of 1878. I think I may fairly say, therefore, that as to raw material the increase is an evidence of the increased industrial prosperity of the country: as to luxuries, and articles not manufactured in the country, evidence of increased prosperity and of the increased power of purchasing by the people of this country: and as to those other articles, especially such articles as settlers' effects, evidence of the increased number of people coming into Canada and the increased wealth of those people; and when we come to analyze this increase, there is nothing in it which justifies the statement of the hon. gentleman opposite, that the increased importation indicates a decrease in the manufacturing power of the country. Now, Sir, coming to some details with regard to our trade, and to the direct effect of the National Policy upon it, I shall refer to a few articles. Take first my favorite subject of sugar—a sweet subject, and one which I like to dwell upon. I notice that the hon. member for Brant, although the hon. Finance Minister gave him the figures, made no reference to this subject in his reply, but it is worth while giving the figures in relation to that article. The imports from the British and Spanish West Indies in 1874, when we had refineries in Canada—before the unfortunate policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in not meeting the concealed bounty given by the Americans to their sugar refineries, which destroyed the refineries in Canada—the imports from these Islands to Canada were 40,000,000 lbs., while in 1878 our imports had decreased to 7,000,000 lbs. In 1878 our imports from Great Britain were 53,238,162 lbs., or 49 per cent. of our entire imports of sugar. In 1882 our imports had decreased to 3,239,080 lbs. or 3 per cent. of our entire imports. From the United States we imported in 1878, 45,195,334 lbs., or 41 per cent. of our entire imports. In 1882 we imported from the United States 7,695,441 lbs., or 6 per cent. of our imports. From the British West India Islands, in 1878, we imported 4 per cent. of our entire importations, and in 1882 26 per cent. From the Spanish West India Islands, in 1878, we imported 6 per cent., and in 1882, 36 per cent. From Brazil we imported nothing in 1878, the trade from South America having entirely disappeared, while last year 29 per cent. of our entire imports came from Brazil. Under these circumstances, I think we may fairly say that, so far as the effect of this policy on the West India and the South American trade is concerned, it has been eminently successful, and that is one way, at any rate, in which it has had an effect on the prosperity and development of the trade in Canada. Then, Sir, let us take the change in the character of the sugar. In 1878 we imported over 95,000,000 lbs. of refined sugar; last year we imported only about 6,000,000 lbs. Of partly refined we imported in 1878, 14,801,108 lbs.; last year we imported 55,383,936 lbs. Of raw sugar we imported in 1878, a little over 1,000,000 lbs.; last year we imported 73,635,927 lbs. Then, Sir, as to the number of sea-going vessels employed in this trade, for that is another way in which the influence of this policy upon the trade of the country is shown. In 1878 the number of vessels engaged from the British West Indies was 238 with a tonnage of 22,137; in 1882 the number had increased to 273 vessels with a tonnage of 37,697. From the Spanish West Indies in 1878, 57 vessels were engaged, with a tonnage of 6,571; in 1882 the number had increased to 137 vessels with a tonnage of 23,470. From Brazil we had three ships in 1878, with a tonnage of 1,518, while last year we had thirty-seven vessels with a tonnage of 17,696. So it will be seen that in these respects there has been a very important development of our shipping interest as a direct result of the National Policy. I am aware that it is said that we have lost very seriously in revenue by the adoption of this policy, and that result used to be predicted by the late hon. Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) when he was a member of the House. Now, we will take the year 1878 as a basis, because the year 1879 was not a fair year. Every one knew that the policy was going to be changed; it had been announced as part of the policy of the Conservative party that they would encourage sugar refining in Canada, and, therefore, there was a large importation of refined sugar just before the adoption of the Tariff. Taking the year 1878, we find that the duties on sugar amounted to $2,595,074. In 1882 they were $2,528,384, or a loss to the revenue in consequence of this policy, between the years 1878 and 1882, of $66,690. How have we been compensated for that loss? We have it in the price of the sugar to the consumer. We used to be told that the effect of the policy would be to increase the price, but we have not heard much of that lately. The figures given by the hon. the Finance Minister to-night show that we have actually saved 67 cts. per 100 lbs., and I will give the figures to show how that is made up. The average price in New York last year, taking certain periods of every month, was $9.35 per 100 lbs., less the drawback, $3.15, making the net cost for export $6.20. The railway charges and freight to Canada have generally been assumed at 30 cts; the old Tariff gave 25 per cent. and 1 ct. per lb., making $2.55. To this we add 50 cts. as charges and commissions, and that has been arrived at by taking the prices in New York during the time we had no refineries, and taking the prices in Canada for the same year, and the same periods in each month, and we find that the difference between the price which we should apparently pay, adding the duty and these other charges, and the price we actually pay, amounted to 50 cts. per 100 lbs. Adding that, and we find that the average under the old Tariff would have been $9.55 per 100 lbs., while the actual price during that period was $8.88, or a saving to the people of this country in this item of 67 cts. per 100 lbs. In 1878, the imports above 13 Dutch standard, amounted to 95,154,570 lbs., so that the saving of 67 cts. per 100 lbs. was an actual saving to the people of this country of $637,535, while the actual loss to the revenue was only $66,690. In addition to that, we had the advantage of the employment of labor in the refineries, of a market for coal, of the employment for our shipping, of the employment of coopers, of the consumption of raw material in connection with cooperage, and of the other incidents in connection with that industry. At the present time we have five sugar refineries operating in Canada, and I am very glad to know that the refineries of Halifax are competing with those of Montreal for the trade of the far West. That is a fact which every one should be pleased to hear, because it proves that Halifax is peculiarly well situated, by its nearness to the coal supply and to the countries which produce the raw sugar, for the prosecution of industries of that kind. Take next the item of tea. I find that with regard to it the same prosperity and progress is going on. Under the discriminating duty in 1873-4, before the Sir Francis Hincks Act was repealed by the Tariff Act of 1874, we imported 15.85 per cent. of our teas from the United States. The direct imports from China and Japan were 50.08 per cent., an increase in the two years under the duty of 20 per cent., that is, from 30.03 per cent. In 1878, the imports from the United States had increased to 55 per cent., and those from China and Japan had decreased to 18 per cent. under the influence of the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then, Sir, we have these other results of the discriminating duties imposed in 1879. The imports of green and Japan tea were as follows :—

	lbs.	per cent.	lbs.	per cent.
Great Britain .....	1,254,154	19	1,734,930	17

China .....	129,480	3	891,787	8
Japan .....	1,101,928	16	4,643,386	43

	1878.		1882.
	lbs.	per cent.	lbs.	per cent.
Great Britain .....	3,426,536	62	4,897,005	78

Japan .....	40	.....	71,588	1

I think, Sir, that these statements are sufficient to show that the policy adopted by this Government gave the tea trade, that is, the distributing trade in tea, to the merchants of Canada instead of to those of the United States, and encouraged a direct trade with the countries of production. Then, Sir, I take another article, upon which I think we may fairly say the National Policy has had a direct influence, that is the article of cotton. The following statement of the different classes of cotton imports from Great Britain will show the change which has taken place :—

	1878.		1882.
	$		$
Bleached and unbleached .....	431,807		483,738
Printed, painted, colored, jeans, denims and drillings .....	2,009,373		593,823

Total .....	$4,368,273		$7,650,119

In spite of augmented consumption of all classes of goods and the fact that the gross importation of cottons from Great Britain in 1882 exceeded in value that of 1878 by $3,281,846, or 77 per cent., the importation of ordinary grey and white cottons actually decreased in 1880 and 1881, and last year was only 12 per cent. greater than in 1878; that is, while the whole importation from Great Britain increased 77 per cent., the particular class of goods that we manufacture in Canada increased only 12 per cent. Now, our imports from United States in the same year were as follows :—

Bleached or unbleached .....	539,773		534,810

Total .....	$2,491,458		$1,987,455

The import of cottons from the United States in 1878 was 36 per cent. of the whole import. In 1882 the import from the United States was only 20 per cent. of the whole. The increase in home manufactured goods may be inferred from the fact that the importation of raw cotton increased from 7,243,413 lbs. in 1878 to 18,127,322 lbs. in 1882. If anything more can be offered to show how important has been the development of these great enterprises in Canada, I think it will be found in the evidences, which anyone can find for himself at any one of the places where cotton industries have been established, by contrasting their condition to-day with what it was in 1878. If you go to the Hadon cotton factory, the merchants at Montreal, or to the cotton factories in Cornwall, in Hamilton, or in the Maritime Provinces, you will find everywhere the same evidences of thrift and prosperity, the direct result of the National Policy, and indicating how successful that policy has been in building up this important industry in Canada. In the woollen trade the same happy condition of things exists. The following statements will show the imports in 1878, 1881 and 1882 from the United States and Great Britain respectively :—

That is to say, comparing 1882 with 1878, the value of the import of woollen goods from the United States has decreased 57 per cent., while the value of the imports from Great Britain has increased 14 per cent. Yet this is the policy which we are told has had the effect of injuring our trade with Great Britain and of benefiting our friends on the other side of the line. But, Sir, in spite of greatly improved trade, the imports of woollen goods all over have increased only $785,907, or about 9 per cent., while the imports of raw wool have gone on steadily increasing. In 1878, we imported 6,230,084 lbs.; in 1880, 7,870,118 lbs.; in 1881, 8,040,287 lbs.; and in 1882, 9,682,757 lbs. And this increase has been entirely in the finer grades, because we imported from Africa in 1878, 306,450 lbs., and in 1882, 1,361,246 lbs.; and from Great Britain in 1878, 265,212 lbs., and in 1882, 2,160,630 lbs.; while the import of Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Southdown combing wools, and other like combing wools, such as are grown in Canada, was last year only 36,073 lbs. altogether. So that we have had a largely increased importation of those wools which we do not grow in Canada, while the entire importation of wools that come into competition with Canadian wools was only 36,000 lbs. altogether. Now, I come to another question of importance, which relates to the development of one of the great natural resources of this country; I refer to the coal trade. The hon. Finance Minister, when he introduced his Tariff in 1879, referring to the coal trade made this estimate, which at the time was considered extravagant, but, in the light of what has since occurred, was an exceedingly modest estimate, said :

"In the estimates of the Government out of 800,000 or 900,000 tons now imported, probably there will still be 350,000 tons of anthracite, and probably 150,000 tons of bituminous still imported, giving to the Nova Scotia coal the balance of 400,000 tons, with, of course, an additional supply, if, as we expect our policy is successful, in consequence of an increased demand for coal to supply the growing manufactures of the country."

Now, what are the facts? The hon. Finance Minister was speaking of the imports of 1878. In that year the quantity of anthracite coal imported was 406,979 tons, and of bituminous, 456,090 tons, a total of 863,061 tons. Taking however, 1878-79, there was in that year a still smaller quantity imported, indicating that our industries were gradually falling away. In 1878-79 the importation of anthracite coal was only 322,528 tons; of bituminous, 355,347 tons, a total of 677,875 tons. In Nova Scotia the total output in 1879, according to the report of the Inspector of Mines, was 788,271 tons, so that the native production and the imports in that year amounted together to 1,466,146 tons; that is to say, that the whole consumption of coal in Canada, for that year, amounted to that quantity. Now, what do we find? We find that the total output of our Nova Scotia coal mines alone in 1882, amounted to 1,365,811 tons, or to within 100,000 tons of the output combined, and importation for 1879. We have, therefore, an increase in the output from Nova Scotia alone, of 576,510 tons. But not only is there that large increase in the output in Nova Scotia, but we find the importation has largely increased. We find that the Nova Scotia miners, with all the development given to their industry, are unable to meet the wants of Canada in consequence of our increased manufacturing industries and our increased prosperity. Last year we imported from the United States: anthracite, 682,933 tons, and bituminous coal, 708,446 tons, making a total of 1,391,373 tons. Now, the effect of the competition of our Nova Scotia coal upon the price of bituminous coal is somewhat remarkable. The average price in 1878, according to the entries in the Customs was $3.88½, and the average price of bituminous coal was $3.45½. In 1882 the average price of anthracite coal was $4.24, entered at the Custom House—not the cost to the people of this country in consequence of any duty or anything of that kind—and of bituminous coal $3.45½. The difference was this, that the price of anthracite in 1882 over that in 1879 was 35½ cts., and the price of bituminous in 1882, as compared with 1879, showed a decrease of 37½ cts., and that in spite of the fact—which I obtained from the editor of a mining journal in New York, one of the best authorities going—that last year the price of bituminous coal, free on board, was actually higher at New York than the price of anthracite coal. I quote this fact given by the editor of this mining journal, in answer to a letter addressed to him asking for the average cost of bituminous coal at this time as well as in 1879. He was not able to give the particular figures, but stated the fact I have just mentioned. He says :

"The reports of the coal companies for the year 1882 are not yet at hand to give you the cost at mines for an authority. The average price obtained f.o.b. at New York or anthracite has been close to $4, which is considered a very satisfactory result. The coal companies aim to make the principle profit on the carriage not on the sale of the coal. From what we learn during the year in the bituminous market, the average selling price f.o.b., New York, has been about $4.15 to $4.25."

So that while bituminous coal in the United States, free on board, has been higher this last year than anthracite coal, the cost of the same coal in Canada, in consequence of its coming within the area of competition with Nova Scotia coal, has been 37½ cts. per ton less than that of anthracite. There is another fact in regard to this coal trade, which is worth looking at, as showing the consequence of the development of that industry. The average sales of Nova Scotia coal for the ten years up to 1879 inclusive were 699,104 tons, while the average sales in the three years 1880, 1881, 1882 were 1,079,951 tons, showing an increase average sale of 340,847 tons. We often hear reference made to the subject of Reciprocity and the loss to this country by the abrogation of that Treaty. It is well known that the American market was open to the coal of Nova Scotia during the period of Reciprocity, and it is worth while to look at what the effect of that was upon the production in that Province. The sales during the eleven years of Reciprocity averaged 389,796 tons, of which average sales the United States took 236,829 tons, leaving for the Dominion 152,967 tons. It is true that the reports of sales to the United States are stated by the Inspector of Mines to be unreliable. They are taken from the report of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, and are said to be understated, but that does not affect the general output from Nova Scotia. In 1881 the sales were 1,035,014 tons; in 1882, 1,250,179 tons, an increase of 215,165 tons. The home sales in 1881 were 268,628 tons; in 1882, 458,952 tons, an increase of 190,324 tons. In 1881 the coal sent to the Upper Provinces amounted to 268,628 tons; in 1882 it increased to 383,031 tons, or an increased sale to the Upper Provinces of 114,403 tons. So that Quebec and Ontario furnished, last year, as large a market for the coal of Nova Scotia as the entire output during the years we had Reciprocity with the enormous American market open for the encouragement of that enterprise. I think, that under those circumstances we may fairly say that the National Policy has had a most important influence in developing this particular branch of Canadian trade. Then I come to the question of agricultural protection about which we hear so much. The hon. member for Brant took a good deal of amusement from this subject, and I am bound to say the amusement was mutual—we enjoyed it on this side quite as much as he did. It was the old story we had heard before on the platforms all through Ontario during the last election, and I presume the hon. gentlemen in the other Provinces have heard it there as well. We know it is not a dangerous kind of talk, that it does not hurt us very much. But what do we find with regard to the effect of agricultural protection? First, as to the question of price. I think hon. gentlemen will admit that the nearer you can find a market, for what you have to sell to the place of production, the better for the producer. I think everybody will admit that as an invariable proposition. It is quite true that, in relation, for instance, to wheat and the larger exported grains, the price is fixed in Liverpool, but it is also true that that market price in Liverpool is fixed by the extent of the export to Liverpool. If you can succeed in consuming any large proportion of an article in this country—take wheat as an illustration in Canada—instead of sending it to the other side, you decrease to that extent the amount that goes to Liverpool, and you affect the market, at any rate, to the extent of that decrease. So that, although it is quite true to say that the price, as a general proposition, is fixed in Liverpool, the price in Liverpool is really fixed by the amount the wheat-producing countries have to send to Liverpool. Now, we find that, in 1878, we imported 5,635,411 bushels of wheat, while we exported 4,115,708, there being a net import of 1,519,703 against a net import in 1882 of 342,722. It is quite clear that, allowing nothing for the increased power of consumption of the people, which we find in every other department where we can gauge it, we had in Canada, at any rate, a market to the extent of that difference for the wheat grown in the country. In the article of corn we find the net imports into Canada were 3,400,562 bushels, which decreased last year to 1,638,180. Peas, the net import was 9,584, bushels, which decreased in 1882 to 3,638. Oats, an article that farmers are advantaged in having a home market for, in 1878 the net imports were 2,071,513 bushels, while last year they had decreased to 71,111, practically disappearing altogether. Of barley, the net imports in 1878 were 26,204 bushels, decreased in 1882 to 9,491. Rye decreased from 110,228 bushels to 1,447. Flour, barrels, decreased from 311,706 in 1878 to 163,335 in 1882. Oatmeal, barrels, decreased from 3,005 to 2,783. Now, these were undoubtedly results of the policy which imposes a duty on agricultural imports to this country, and maintaining a Canadian market for our agricultural productions. Converting flour into wheat, we have this as a general result:—Wheat, bushels, 1,923,836; corn, 1,712,382; oats, 2,000,402; barley, 16,713; altogether, 5,653,333 bushels less imported from the United States than were imported in 1878. Then, at the very least, and, I believe, to a very much larger extent, in consequence of the increased power of consumption on the part of the people, we have a home market as a result of the policy that was adopted, to the extent of the figures I have given. During the discussions which have recently taken place, a good deal has been said in regard to malt, and we are told that the Government of Canada have very seriously injured the barley interest of this country. Yet, what do we find with regard to this? It is true the United States Government have recently made some changes, and the fact that they have made these changes shows that this small country, as it used to be called—this country of 5,000,000 competing with a country of 50,000,000—has become sufficiently important to have its influence upon the United States, and to send the trade interested to Washington to get remedial legislation. The action of the Government of the United States was to change their tariff from 20 per cent. to 20 cts. per bushel. The average cost, I believe, is 80 cts. per bushel for malt.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is over 90 at present.

Mr. WHITE. The duty has been increased, therefore, from 16 to 20 per cent., while the duty on barley has been reduced from 15 to 10 cts. Our duty has not in any way been changed. The imports from the United States, in 1878, were 101,940 lbs., which paid 2 cts. per lb. in 1880. The imports, in 1882, were 341,020 lbs., which paid less than one-half a cent per lb.; so that there has been no such change in the policy of this country as to justify that change on the other side. All that has been done on the other side is this: they find that our malt makers were competing in a way to injure their trade, and they did what hon. gentlemen here, who admire them in every other respect, seem not to admire them in this respect of their tariff policy—they went to Washington, and endeavored to get a change. What has been the progress of our exports of malt to the United States? In 1877, we exported 11,577,814 lbs., and they have gone up, in 1882, to 40,055,907 lbs.; and I do not believe, in spite of the changes made by the Government of the United States, that there is going to be any material effect upon our exports of malt. Now, Sir, I propose to deal with the question of our trade relations with England and the United States. The charge made against this policy is that it has been injurious to England. My hon. friend who preceded me, undertook to prove, from the fact that the importations from the United States and from England were more nearly alike this year than they had been last year, that the tendency was in the direction of our having increased imports from the United States, and decreased imports from England. Well, we have, after all, only to do with the Trade Returns we have before us; when the time comes to deal with the Trade Returns of the future, no doubt we will be able to deal with them and show substantially the same results as those which have been shown by this policy since it was adopted. But what was the effect of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? The imports from Great Britain in 1873 were of the value of $68,522,776; in 1878 they had decreased to $37,431,180, being a decrease of $31,091,596 during the period hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, without their putting a hand forward to stop this terrible decrease in the imports from the Mother Land. The imports from the United States, in 1873, were $47,735,678, and in 1878, in spite of the general depression which obtained in Canada, and the reduction in our aggregate imports, the imports from the United States actually increased to $48,631,739, or an increase of $896,061. Since that time what has been the result? The imports from Great Britain, in 1878, were $37,431,180; in 1882, $50,597,341, an increase of $13,166,161. The imports from the United States, in 1878, were $48,631,739; in 1882, $48,289,052, or a decrease of $142,687. So that, while under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, trade with England gradually fell off, while that with the United States held its own and actually increased in spite of the general depression and general falling off in trade, under the policy pursued by this Administration our trade with England has steadily increased and that with the United States, according to the last returns, has somewhat decreased, so far as imports are concerned. It is said, however, that the duty upon dutiable goods is higher from Great Britain than from the United States, and it is charged on that account that this policy is inimical to trade with the Mother Country. On the total imports of free and dutiable goods from Great Britain the duty was 20½ per cent. last year. On the whole imports from the United States the duty reached 23¼ per cent.; but if you take simply the dutiable goods, hon. gentlemen opposite appear to have the argument on their side, without examination. I find that the duty on dutiable goods alone from Great Britain, in 1882, was 24¼ per cent., while from the United States it was only 21½ per cent., a difference appearing against Great Britain of very nearly 3 per cent. For purposes of comparison it is absolutely necessary, however, to take from the imports of the United States that class of goods which form no part of our imports from England—I refer to breadstuffs and coal from both countries. We imported a very small quantity of coal from Great Britain last year, so small a quantity that the importation has almost disappeared; but among the breadstuffs imported from the United States I include barley, beans, corn, pease, wheat, cornmeal, oatmeal, wheat flour, and besides these there is anthracite coal, bituminous coal and coke; and I find the value of these articles placed at $12,219,932, paying $978,370 duty. Deducting these from the aggregate dutiable imports from the United States, leaves $20,721,129 of imports corresponding with those from Great Britain, paying $6,095,544, or an average of 29 per cent. So if we exclude from the importations from the United States the importations of breadstuffs and coal, and exclude from the imports from Great Britain coal, we find that on goods imported from the United States, which may be said to be manufactured goods, the average duty is 29 per cent., as against 24¼ per cent. on those from Great Britain. Under these circumstances we may fairly hold that, so far as trade with England, under the different tariffs is concerned, we need not fear scrutiny. Next I come to the vexed question of the balance of trade. On this subject, as on others, the hon. member for Brant had his amusement. So far as this subject is concerned, the position which we take on this side of the House is this: that the tendency of the policy of this Government must be to bring nearer together imports and exports, and ultimately make our exports exceed our imports. We find that has been the result in the United States by a similar policy and by a similar process of western development. In former years the balance of trade as it is called was against them, in late years it has been enormously in their favor, and the same causes which have produced those results there must produce the same results here. It is true, in the meantime, in a time of prosperity such as we have had, our imports may be larger than our exports, and I have no hesitation in saying if that should continue it would be a matter of grave apprehension as to what the effect might be. Whether the theory of the balance of trade be absolutely correct or not, I am not going to discuss here, but there is this to be said about it, that the country is most prosperous and most wealthy—leaving out, of course, the accumulated wealth of countries like England, for I am speaking now of the newer countries whose wealth consists in what is produced by themselves—which exports more than it imports, and is able to pay, and more than pay, for its imports from its exports. I have no hesitation in saying that if, I believe, the same process was going to go on for years, namely, larger imports than exports, I think it would be a matter of serious apprehension, and I am glad a newspaper in Montreal, with which I have some remote connection, but for which, unfortunately, I do not now write a great deal, and I did not write that particular article which the hon. gentleman did that journal the honor to quote, although I agree with it and do not repudiate it in any way—I am glad to find a newspaper conservative, not in the party sense alone, but in the interests of the country, did utter words of warning when there was a tendency to over-importation on the part of merchants. I believe the effect of those words of warning, not from that paper alone, for I should be sorry to arrogate to one newspaper so great an influence, was to cause many merchants to countermand orders given to buyers. If we maintain our imports we are doing well, because the country is prosperous, and under ordinary circumstances we would largely increase them. But with respect to the balance of trade, what is our position? In 1878 our total imports were $93,081,787, our exports were $79,333,667, leaving a trade balance against us of $13,758,110. In 1882 our imports were $112,419,500, our exports were $102,137,203, leaving a balance of trade against us of $17,282,297. But, Sir, if you take out of our imports in both years, the imports of raw material—I do not mean to say for a moment, recollect, that this changes the general question, it simply modifies it—which come into this country, and upon which labor is expended in this country, and which go therefore to build up wealth in the country itself, you will find that the position in which we stand to-day, is infinitely better than the position in which we stood in 1878. I find, for instance, that the imports of raw material, of precisely the same classes, which I have already had the honor to submit to the House—in 1878, were $9,929,153, and deducting this, the balance of trade against us was $3,828,927. The raw material imported last year was $2,091,211, which deducted from our imports, leaves a balance in our favor of $4,308,614, against $3,828,947 against us in 1878. Now, I think, that we may fairly say, that, taking the argument which the hon. gentleman himself uses, in which he points out the fact of the importation of luxuries which came in, and were consumed, and which added practically nothing to the wealth of the country, and dealing with it, and pointing to the fact that, in this particular case, this large importation was an importation of articles which form the basis of the industries of the country, and which, when they went to the consumer, probably were worth three times what they are here; and comparing this with what would have been the effect if we had not had that Tariff, if we had not had this protection, if we had not had this importation of raw material, and if our importation of raw material had remained as it was before, and gone on with this period of inflation which brought on the better times to which hon. gentlemen opposite refer, we may pertinently ask, what would have been the position of this country to-day? Our imports would certainly have increased, and the importation of that class of consumable goods, which come in, which are consumed at once and disappear and add nothing to the wealth of the country, would have been far greater; and instead of $17,000,000 the balance against us would probably have been three or four times that amount. Instead of that, by the policy which has been adopted, although the balance is against us—and I believe it will not long remain against us—it has more than been met by the fact that our imports in excess of our exports, are more than balanced by the raw material that forms the basis of the industries of this country. Then, Sir, I take the effect of the National Policy on our relations with Manitoba and the North-West. The hon. gentleman was good enough to say, that the people of that country were ground down by this Tariff; that they were suffering terribly from the effects of it; but, does the hon. gentleman know this—or has he troubled himself to enquire into it—that the imports into that country in 1878 paid an average duty of 19 per cent., while the imports into that country last year, paid an average duty of 19½ per cent., so that this enormous tariff, which he tells us is grinding down the people of that country, has added one-half per cent to the duty upon the exports going into that country? The imports into Manitoba and the North-West, in 1878, were $1,283,414, paying a duty of $242,698, and last year, $5,657,506, paying a duty of $1,106,356; the average duty, as I have said, was only one-half per cent. more than it was in 1878. Now, Sir, if you look at the imports into that country as evidence of its wealth, you will find that in 1878, they were $1,171,107 for Manitoba, and $112,307 for the North-West Territories, while in 1882, the imports were $1,223,856 for Manitoba, and $433,650 for the North-West Territories. If you look at the character of these imports, you will find this—that in 1878, they imported of refined sugar from the United States to the extent of 828,012 lbs., while last year they only imported, in spite of their greater population, and the larger consuming power of the people, from the United States 39,626 lbs., or in round figures, 40,000 lbs., so that there was an increase of no less than 787,000 lbs. of sugar brought into that country, which was supplied from the refineries of Canada, some of which, I believe, came from such remote refineries as those of Halifax. Then, if you look further, you will find that of carriages they imported, in 1878, $23,135 worth, and in 1882, only $11,624; of ready-made clothing, $57,523 worth, and in 1882, $31,371; of mowing, reaping, and threshing machines, in 1878, $10,857 worth, and in 1882, only $71 worth—this represents, I suppose, one mower. The importation of axes, hoes, rakes, forks and shovels, increased only $301 since 1878, although the purchase of these articles by the people of the North-West, during the last five years, must have increased almost a hundredfold. Now that has been the result of this policy in building up our trade in the North-West; in giving to us, the older Provinces, the markets of the North-West, and in giving us those markets without imposing any increased cost on the people of the North-West, because it is a well-known fact, established by the fact of the relative duty which I have just cited, and in every other way you may choose to enquire into this question, that the people of the North-West can obtain from Canada these articles as cheaply, with an ordinary and moderate duty added, as they can be obtained for in any other part of the world. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I ought to detain the House any longer, for I find, that I have already spoken a good deal longer than I expected to; but I may say, in conclusion, this: the hon. gentleman who has preceded me has referred to the fact that we are on the eve of a state of depression. I venture, Sir, to think that there will be no depression in Canada, in view of the fact that the merchants of Canada, to-day, realize the fact that there is a possibility of danger arising from over-importation. It is true that we have had some failures, but if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to enquire into those failures, he will find this to be the fact; that, in almost every case, they have been the result of the employment of money outside of the legitimate business of those interested, prompted perhaps it may be by the great inflation outside, and temptations to invest in consequence of the enormous boom in Manitoba and the North-West. He will find, Sir, that at all times, under all policies—and no one has ever pretended that the case would be different—that men will be tempted to take from their business what properly belongs to it, in their hurry to make themselves rich, which is, unfortunately, characteristic of the age in which we live; and that these results will produce, no matter what the general prosperity may be, no matter what the policy will be, failure and disaster in individual cases. But, Mr. Speaker, what we complained of, in relation to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, was this: that, at a time when they saw industries being closed; that, at a time when they saw commerce paralyzed; that, at a time when the causes of these results were apparent to every man; that at the time when merchants came from every part of this Dominion and interviewed the Finance Minister of the day, and gave him data upon which he could go if he had been willing to accept their opinion, and if it were not for the unfortunate character he had, of believing that he alone understood commercial matters, and that those engaged in commerce knew nothing about them; that, at the time when this condition of things existed, they took the ground that it was not for the Government or for Parliament to interfere in the slightest degree to remove those evils or mitigate those disasters. What we said at that time was that while the Government were not responsible for all the disasters which had come upon the country, they were responsible for not taking all reasonable methods of removing those evils, so far as their removal was within the power of Legislative action. That was said by Conservative speakers in this House, and on Conservative platforms in the country. The hon. gentleman has stated that the prosperity which this country is enjoying was not in consequence of the National Policy, because bank stocks were lower in 1879 than they were in 1878. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that that was a fair statement to make to this House? Does not the hon. gentleman know that in 1879 we had a most disastrous bank failure in the city of Montreal—the failure of the Consolidated Bank—resulting not from any condition of things arising out of the National Policy, but resulting from a condition of things which had been going on for years, as the investigation proved, and which must always prove disastrous to any banking institution which adopted them. He must know that in the presence of that crisis brought about by this failure, bank stocks did go down; but does he pretend to say that the National Policy had anything to do with producing that effect? Policies of this kind are put upon the Statute-book, but the mere enactment of such policies does not immediately produce the beneficial changes expected from them. These are produced by subsequent events; they are produced by the gradual, steady, developing effects which follow the operation of these Tariffs; and we may fairly say, so far as the National Policy is concerned, that the Conservative party has reason to look back upon the last four years with considerable pride. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite were so confident of the feeling of the people of this country that, at the recent elections which took place in the Province of Ontario, they implored the people everywhere not to believe that the National Policy had anything to do with the contest; they warned every man who ventured to speak upon that subject, that he was speaking of a matter which was not in issue in the election; that the Government did not intend to interfere in any respect with the operation of the National Policy. Yet even in that Province of Ontario, which they have always claimed was a Liberal Province, under, not the Gerrymandering Act of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but under an arrangement of the constituencies made by their own friends, so strong was the feeling of the people of that Province that the possibility of the existence of that Government was a menace to the continuance of that policy resulted in the fact that the popular vote and almost the representative vote of the people went with the Conservative party, in spite of the fact that hon. gentlemen warned the people not to be alarmed about the National Policy—that it was safe, at any rate, and that no one was going to interfere with it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to commence the new Parliament by a new attack on that policy. They have chosen to come here and in the first speech made on that subject they have revived all the old arguments which they ought by this time to be ashamed of, in order, if they can, to create a public impression against that policy. These hon. gentlemen are not wise; they have learned nothing by the lessons of the past. We, on this side, can afford to smile while they denounce the National Policy. Every word they utter against it, every suggestion they make that it is not in the interests of this country, is a warning to the people of Canada that they are not to be trusted; and I venture to say that when the calm, deliberate, clear speech of the hon. Finance Minister delivered to-night, in which he not only explained the financial position of this country, not only vindicated the policy of which he may well be proud of being the author, in this House, but in which he indicated by the changes he has suggested that that policy is the fixed, irrevocable policy of the Conservative party—when that speech goes to the country to-morrow, when the people of Canada from one end to the other read and ponder over it, and when they read the speech of the hon. gentleman who has taken the position of financial exponent for the Opposition, and find in it all the old attacks—find in it all the old well-beaten paths trodden over again in the effort to diminish the influence of the Conservative party, they will be confirmed in the feeling they have already, and which they so strongly manifested in June last, and will declare that these men who can learn nothing by the experience of the past, are not the men who should be entrusted in any way with the administration of the affairs of a great country like this.

Mr. HESSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:25 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 2nd April, 1883.

ASSETS OF INSOLVENT TRADERS.

Mr. CURRAN introduced Bill (No. 99) to provide for the distribution of the assets of insolvent traders.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give an explanation of the principles of his measure.

Mr. CURRAN. I would much prefer that my hon. friend would wait until the Bill is printed. I may say that the Bill is one which was prepared by the Montreal Board of Trade after great care and deliberation, and that it makes several very important changes in the law, and that it, to some extent, resembles an Insolvent Act. One of its provisions is that the person who shall take charge of an estate of an insolvent shall be a guardian. In all places where the number of inhabitants does not exceed 20,000, the sheriff of the locality shall be the guardian, in other places he shall be appointed by the Board of Trade. In no case, however, shall the guardian be the liquidator of the estate, but he is to retain possession of the estate for a certain time until the creditors have met and have appointed a liquidator; but the liquidator shall not be the guardian, or anyone connected with him, directly or indirectly. The general principles of the Bill, with regard to the distribution of estates, are pretty much the same as might be expected in a measure of this kind, except that the procedure is somewhat different. The Bill is a long one, and I have not had time to master all its details; but coming, as it does, from a body like the Board of Trade of Montreal, I think it is, at all events, entitled to the consideration of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Is there any provision for compulsory liquidations, or any provision for discharge?

Mr. CURRAN. There is provision for compulsory insolvency, but no provision for discharge.

LES RÉVÉRENDIS PÈRES OBLATS DU NORD-OUEST.

Mr. ROYAL moved the third reading of Bill (No. 19) to incorporate Les Révérends Pères Oblats de Marie Immaculée des Territoires du Nord-Ouest.

Mr. BLAKE. In accordance with the notice which I gave on the action of the House with reference to the Bill for the incorporation of the University of Saskatchewan, I move:

That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by adding thereto the following words:—"Provided that the said corporation shall within ten years after its acquisition of any real estate, depart with so much of such real estate as is not required for the actual use and occupation or other like purposes of the corporation."

Mr. ROYAL. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wants to assimilate this Bill to the Bill relating to the University of Saskatchewan; but I really fail to see the proviso. I would be extremely obliged to the hon. gentleman if he would state the object of this proviso, because I believe it is simply covered by the other provision of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret the hon. member was not in his place on several previous occasions on which I explained the purpose of this provision. But I may say, for the information of my hon. friend, that the purpose is to avoid the possibility of corporations in the North-West Territories holding in perpetuity in mortmain large quantities of land not required for their own actual use. There is no desire to prevent corporations of this description obtaining endowments of real estate. It is natural and reasonable that in that country, the principal portion of whose wealth is now, and for a long time will be, land, should be free to obtain gifts and donations of land; but it is quite consistent with that freedom that they should be required within a reasonable time to dispose of the land so held. As I have already stated, this question came up in the Province of Ontario about fourteen years ago, and the general rule then laid down, and invariably acted upon, so far as I know, with reference to all corporations seeking endowment in land, was that the extent to which they obtained land should not be limited; but that the period during which they held land, not for their own occupation, should be limited to seven years. Some friends suggested to me that I might, without being unreasonable, propose a more liberal period, and in compliance with their recommendation, though with some hesitation, I did propose ten years instead of seven. The hon. member will observe that both in this Bill and that relating to the University of Saskatchewan, the limitations inserted by the Private Bills Committee were limitations in point of value, and were to the effect that these corporations should not hold more land than would be equivalent to $50,000 a year at 4 per cent. on the value of the land. But there was no provision for ascertaining the value of the land, and my suggestion was that it would be a very long time before the corporations would come to the conclusion that its present value would produce more than it did when it first came into their possession. The true policy is, that they shall not be limited to the quantity of land, but that it shall not be allowed to stagnate in their hands; but that they shall not hold it for more than ten years, unless it is for their own occupation. I do not wish to assimilate this Bill to the University of Saskatchewan Bill. The principles of the two are different; but the question whether we shall allow the holding of land in mortmain in perpetuity applies to both, and they should be treated alike.

Mr. ROYAL. With due deference to the hon. gentleman, my humble opinion is that this Bill should properly be brought before the Council of the North-West Territory, and not before this House. But as that Council has not had any meetings for over two years, persons seeking incorporation have to come before this House at a great deal of trouble and expense. Now, it is to be expected that before ten years the North-West Territories will be divided into several Provinces, with organized Legislatures; and it will be the duty of persons seeking corporate powers like these to go to those Legislatures. I believe it will be in the power of those Legislatures to adopt any principle with regard to mortmain that they think proper, and it must not be lost sight of that we are legislating here in the place of those Local Parliaments. No doubt it is the tendency of this Parliament to encroach too largely upon matters which belong exclusively to Local Legislatures; and this Act of incorporation of the Saskatchewan University and several other Bills from the North-West make our functions purely local ones. I believe this tendency ought to be discouraged, at least by this House. However, the adoption of my hon. friend's amendment would only leave this corporate body under the necessity of coming again before the Local Legislature, when constituted and organized in the North-West Territory, either to amend this proviso if adopted by this House, or get some other legislation that will enact their requirements. As seen by the preamble, the object of incorporation is defined, and in clauses three and four the corporation binds itself to acquire no property, real and personal, except for its uses and purposes. By clause eleven, the corporation will, at all times, be subject to make, when required, a full return of their property to the Governor in Council. This does away with the proviso to the extent that ought to be desired by hon. members of this House. It makes the proviso useless. However, as in the other case, the proviso of the hon. gentleman has been adopted, it is useless for me to oppose it very strongly. I will content myself with expressing once more my regret that the Council of the North-West Territories has not been clothed with the necessary power to dispose of such cases of legislation. It is most unfair to subject those persons seeking corporate powers to come over 2,000 miles, in some cases, for a deed of incorporation. The expense resulting to them, and the impossibility of our understanding their requirements, make our legislation in such matters very undesirable. As the proviso has already been adopted in another Bill of incorporation, it would be useless for me to oppose it. But I must again express my regret that we have to deal with such legislation.

Motion agreed to; Bill considered in Committee, amended, reported, and read the third time and passed.

CRÉDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

The House resumed the further consideration of Mr. Desjardins's proposed motion for the third reading of Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien, the motion of Mr. Auger in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Ouimet in amendment to the proposed amendment.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole. Bill amended and reported.

Mr. AUGER. As this Bill has been amended twice, I ask that the third reading be postponed till to-morrow, in order that the amendments may be printed, and that the members of the House may see what they are. The amendments are more than the original Bill.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The Bill has not been remodelled at all. The only amendment of any importance is that which has just been adopted, and I see no reason for postponing the third reading unless it is to delay the Bill. I move that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. BLAKE. It is very unusual, when a Bill has been amended in Committee, to take the third reading the same day when any hon. member objects. I suppose there are perhaps eight Private Bills still to come on, and there cannot be the slightest danger that the third reading of this Bill can be imperilled. It is the usual course of the House when an hon. member suggests a postponement of the third reading, to allow it to be postponed. I do not say that these are two distinct stages, but they are two steps in the progress of the Bill; and I think that, for the future, we had better agree that they shall succeed one another on the same day, even though there may have been an amendment in Committee.

Mr. BLANCHET. It is not usual to have a Bill reprinted at every one of its different stages, except when it is remodelled. The Rule applies only to readings of Bills. It has been so decided by Speaker Anglin; and during my time it was usual to go into Committee to report the Bill, and read it the third time the same day. The Rules of the House, and with its practice, apply only to one reading a day.

Mr. BLAKE. I distinctly stated that I considered this but two steps—not two stages. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it is perfectly within the Rule, and within the practice, when there has been a new amendment made in Committee. But it is not in accordance with the general principle, I think, to take the Bill from the Committee of the Whole, and read it immediately when an hon. member has objected.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In certain cases it is quite true that the House has ordered a Bill to stand over to the next stage for the third reading after an amendment has been made, but that is not the general practice. Repeatedly Bills, after having gone into Committee of the Whole, and been reported to the House, have been re-committed once or twice, and have even then been read the third time the same day. Of course, I do not suppose there is the slightest danger that this Bill will be delayed more than twenty-four hours by the course that is suggested, and I think the promoter of the Bill would do well to consent to leave the third reading for to-morrow. Some fifty or sixty hon. gentlemen have Private Bills before the House, and they will all be interested in getting this Bill removed from the paper to-morrow, and, as the hon. member for Shefford insists upon it, I would suggest that the third reading be taken to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIES. There are a number of hon. members in this House, who, I may state, will feel it their duty to oppose the third reading, unless some provision is made by which the interest of actual borrowers of the company may not be prejudiced. I am satisfied that this Bill will alter entirely the relations that exist between the borrowers and this company. It will offer a premium to this company to charge 2 per cent. more, and I think it an unfair and an unjust thing. I think the promoter of the Bill would do well to introduce some clause which would prevent this injustice, otherwise I shall have to vote against the Bill. Common sense teaches us that if we give this company the privilege of charging 8 per cent., when they have three or four hundred thousand dollars out at 6 per cent., they will increase their rate of interest. If the promoter of the Bill can show me some method by which those who have borrowed four, five or six years ago can be protected in the contracts they have made, I shall vote for the Bill; if not, I shall feel it my duty to oppose it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can consistently act as he has just stated, because, after all, the bargains made or contracts entered into between the company and borrowers cannot be interfered with, any more than any other contract with individuals can be interfered with.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. What I wished to say was, that this Bill offered inducements to the company to force the conditions of the contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The case stands thus: the borrower had borrowed money from the company at 6 per cent., and a contract has been entered into between the company and the borrower. So long as the borrower fulfils the conditions of the contract, the company cannot foreclose and go back on the contract. Will the hon. gentleman ask Parliament that, although as regards future loans, it is proposed to give this company only the same privileges that had been granted to other loan companies? We shall take advantage of that fact to this extent—that when borrowers at 6 per cent. shall not fulfil the conditions of their contracts, the company shall not have the right to foreclose, but shall be compelled to continue the loans. Such action would be very unjust. We cannot take the position of interfering between the company and borrowers. Parliament has given the company the right to loan money at a certain rate. It has taken advantage of that right, and borrowers have entered into contract with it. So long as the borrowers fulfil the conditions of the contract, they cannot be broken. But how can the hon. gentleman prevent the company from foreclosing if borrowers do not fulfil the conditions of their contract? Will he declare, by this Bill, that, although the borrowers do not fulfil the conditions, the company cannot foreclose, but shall be obliged to continue the loans without having the advantage of the clauses in the contract now existing? Surely the hon. gentleman cannot take that ground, for it is a ground that is untenable. When it was proposed to place this company on the same footing as all loan companies, it was objected that, if Parliament gave it the right to loan money at 8 per cent., there were other charges made by the company which would increase the rate to 9 or 10 per cent. So soon as this point was brought before the notice of the promoters of the Bill, he agreed that the whole amount to be paid by the borrower in future should not exceed 8 per cent., thereby placing it on precisely the same footing as other companies, and it would be very unfair now to interfere between the present borrowers and the company.

Mr. BRECKEN. A large sum of money has been invested in Prince Edward Island by the company, and, I suppose, the objection raised by my hon. colleague (Mr. Davies) is, that when power is given to this company to increase the rate of interest, it will naturally become very sharp with borrowers who do not pay their interest according to the conditions of the mortgage, because it will be to the interest of the company to foreclose under power of sale. That very likely will be the effect of it; but I agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works, that it would be novel legislation to place a clause in the Bill to protect men who do not perform the conditions of their contracts. I take it that the borrowers—for I wish to see the borrowers protected as much as does my hon. colleague—will occupy precisely the same position as do borrowers when a change takes place in the money market, and there is a rise in the value of money. We know that it is sometimes difficult to obtain more than 6 per cent. on good investments in real estate, and perhaps twelve months afterwards 7 or 8 per cent. can easily be obtained. Lenders of money are then very sharp, and when borrowers for a term of years do not perform the conditions of their contracts, they foreclose. I agree that if the terms of the contracts, which are usually for ten years, are performed by borrowers, it will not be within the power of the company to make any demands upon them; so I do not understand how the suggestion of my hon. colleague could be carried out, for it would be legislating to protect a borrower who failed to fulfil the terms of his contract.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I think the explanations offered by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Brecken), are sufficient answers to the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I think no one can contend that the Bill, as offered, can have any retroactive effect as regards loans already made. To accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), would be to offer a premium to those borrowers who neglect to fulfil the conditions of their contract, and I do not know how the hon. gentleman can really propose an amendment in that direction. It is impossible that this House should accept it unless it seeks to interfere between the company and its borrowers. I see no reason why there should be further delay in passing the Bill, which has been discussed in all its phases, every reasonable amendment offered having been accepted; and I do not think either the public, or the House, would be benefited by a further delay of twenty-four hours. So I must insist on the third reading of the Bill, if I am entitled to it.

Mr. ORTON. I think, perhaps, a plan could be devised by which borrowers should be notified of the new powers obtained by the company, whereby they would be empowered to charge 8 per cent. on new loans. I have no doubt that the effect of giving this enlarged power to the company will be to cause them to try to induce borrowers at 6 per cent. to allow their interest to become overdue, after which the company would say: "We will foreclose the mortgage, but if you borrow money at 8 per cent. we will not proceed against your estate."

Mr. MACKENZIE. The only objection to the Bill is, that there is any limitation, which I think will be useless. Now, I do not see how such a provision as is suggested, could possibly be framed; and, in the next place, I do not think there is any danger of such a thing happening, as my hon. friend from Queen's thinks may happen. We know that all last year the rate of interest earned by companies in the west, at Toronto, did not exceed  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the average, simply because money was plentiful. It is somewhat scarcer now, owing to the operation of the National Policy, and prices are dearer; but money can be got without any difficulty at under 8 per cent., even now, I think; and in any case, I am not able myself to support any proposition which would impose any restriction on the dealing in any commodity; and money, in my opinion, is simply a commodity.

Mr. AUGER. I have the honor to move that this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read this day six months.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Last year I voted against this Bill, when introduced by my friends of the Credit
Mr. BRECKEN.

Foncier, on the ground that they had obtained certain special privileges in their charter, on the promise being given to the people of this country that they would loan money at 6 per cent. They have since, however, abandoned those special privileges, and they come to us now as any other loan company would, for the purpose of obtaining power to loan at the same rate as do other companies, at the lowest rate in fact charged by any company. I think it proper to point out the fact, that, as I understand it, this is not an increase from 6 to 8 per cent., but really from 7 to 8.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand it, the power that they had before, was to charge 6 per cent. and 1 per cent. commission.

Mr. BLAKE. When they charge 1 per cent. for administration, it was specially provided by our Act that it should be included in the 6 per cent.

Mr. WHITE. By the Act of last Session?

Mr. BLAKE. No; but by the Dominion Act which is repealed by this Bill.

Mr. WHITE. If this be the case, I do not see any special necessity for putting in the amendment which was proposed the other night.

Mr. BLAKE. Because that would have given them 9 per cent.

Mr. WHITE. Because it would simply be the old Act after all.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE. And they would be exactly in the same position, if by our legislation they could not charge a commission.

Mr. BLAKE. But they could charge a commission.

Mr. WHITE. They will simply have their position changed; and are to be able to charge 8 per cent. instead of 6 per cent. with all their conditions exactly in the same way as before. Whether this be the case or not, this fact is to be borne in mind, and I make this statement simply because of my vote last Session—that this company now stood in exactly the same position as does any other company. When particular loans expire which they have given, if money is worth more than 6 per cent. in the country, probably they will seek to foreclose mortgages, and re-loan to the parties, if they were willing to take money from them, at 8 per cent.; but if, on the other hand, money is not worth 8 per cent., they will probably go on like other companies, at less than 8 per cent., and the loans will continue in the same way; but, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as they come here simply like any other company, having given up their special privileges, and the privilege of charging anything for administration, I think we cannot do otherwise than put them in the same position as are other companies which loan money in the country.

Mr. DAVIES. I find that I was misunderstood by the hon. member for East York, in the explanation which I gave. I do not oppose the Bill because the company seeks to charge 8 per cent., or because this is too high, or too low a rate. I quite agree with him in the principle he has laid down—that no limitation should be put upon the rate charged. The point we make is this: Years ago we passed a Bill allowing them to charge 6 per cent., and say a party has borrowed from them $1,000 at that rate. At the time he made the contract, he knew very well that if he broke it, they had no inducement to foreclose the mortgage, because they could not re-loan the money at a higher rate than 6 per cent.; but now we come in while contracts are pending, and remove this distinction, allowing the company, if they foreclose, to charge 2 per cent. more, and offering a plain inducement of 2 per cent. to the company to foreclose every existing mortgage; that is the ground on which I protest.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

KINGSTON AND PEMBROKE RAILWAY.

Mr. GUNN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 36) to amend the Act incorporating the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company, and the Act amending the same.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. GUNN moved to strike out the following words commencing in 19th line, 1st clause: "Said point to be at the village of Renfrew, or the village of Cobden, or at some point between Renfrew and Cobden."

Mr. HAGGART. Before that amendment is put, I wish to offer on it a few observations. This point was well considered in the Committee, and the reasons for framing the clause as it is were then very fully given. The town and county of Renfrew has given a bonus of $3,000, and exemption from taxes for twenty years, to the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company, on condition of its coming to the village of Renfrew; and by this clause, which is proposed in amendment to the Bill as it came from the Committee, the company would be enabled to avoid the village of Renfrew altogether, and leave it, as it were, off the main line. What the people of Renfrew want is, that the conditions which were embodied in the by-law shall be carried out in meaning, if not in letter—that is, that the main line of the road shall go to the village of Renfrew. That is the conditions upon which they gave the bonus and exempted them from taxation for the next twenty years. That clause was embodied in the charter of the company in the Railway Committee, and now the proposition of the promoter of the Bill is, that it be struck out, thus enabling the railroad company to adopt any line they choose. I believe the principle to be a correct one, that the line of any roads to which we grant charters should be defined, and that no company should be enabled to offer inducements to different villages for the purpose of obtaining bonuses from them. The House should insist that the contract which was entered into with the village of Renfrew should be carried out as to the main line, and if they wish to go to Eganville they have the option of doing so.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This bonus which was given to the Kingston and Pembroke Railway, was given on condition that the line should be built to the village of Renfrew, before, I think, the 31st of December, 1883, and they were to put up certain station buildings and shops in the village. No bonus was to be paid until these conditions were performed. At that time, the branch to Eganville was not thought of—in fact it was not thought of until three months after the bonus was voted. If the Committee will notice the terms of the amendment which was made in the Railway Committee, they will see that the hon. gentleman is altogether in error, because it refers only to the branch line—not to the main line which may go to Renfrew, or may not. That is a question which does not come into consideration so far as the amendment is concerned. The Railway Committee did not say that this branch line should start from Renfrew, or from Cobden, which is fourteen miles distant from Renfrew; and this shows that the Committee did not think of the question of bonus when they inserted that provision. When the condition was inserted in the Bill, there was no evidence given as to whether it was a convenient starting point or not; and it depends on the reports of the Engineers where the branch line shall start from. It may start from Renfrew, or from Cobden, or from some place between those two points, and why should the House insert a condition which may compel the company to build a branch line there, or four or five miles longer than is necessary? I do not think the people of Renfrew have any legitimate excuse for asking Parliament to start the line at some particular place, as that is a matter which depends on the reports of the Engineers.

Mr. BLAKE. I am unable to agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) proposed the limitation in the Railway Committee. The promoter of the Bill accepted that limitation there, and there was consequently very little discussion in the Committee, simply because there was no conflict there. Had not the promoter of the Bill accepted the suggestion, we would no doubt have had a discussion of the local questions involved, and all the materials brought before us upon which any particular claims of the village of Renfrew may rest. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Lanark as to the general view that we are too vague altogether in reference to the routes of railways of which we authorize the construction. There is no very close restriction imposed by this amendment, because there are fourteen miles within which the company may start the branch line to Eganville; but if that arrangement is not feasible the Railway Committee is the proper place to settle the question. We cannot here go into the evidence as to whether a particular line is the proper one or not, or as to what contract, if any, was entered into with the village of Renfrew. For two reasons, I think, if any change is to be made, the proper course is to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee: first, because there was a unanimous agreement as to this particular matter; and, second, because it would be objectionable to leave the route wholly undefined, as it is proposed to be done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for West Durham is a good one. It is quite true that the Bill was not amended in the Committee, and it is also true, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that this fact was not the result of any discussion, but of an agreement made between the parties; and if there be any misapprehension the best plan would be to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee, where the question may be fully considered and dealt with satisfactorily.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not intend to suggest the reference back; but I say, if this Committee is disposed to make the amendment, the reference should be made as a preliminary course.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What influenced me in the Committee was the impression I derived, from a very brief interchange of observation, that the terms upon which the subsidy had been obtained from the village of Renfrew were being violated. Consequently, so far as I am concerned, I concurred in the present amendment. It is now stated that this was a misapprehension—that the bonus was voted three months before this question of a branch line came up at all. I think, therefore, the wiser course, would be to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee.

Mr. HAGGART. The proposition as to the main line was that it should go to the village of Renfrew. They intend to run their line, then, from some point on the main line to Lake Nipissing. I suppose power will be asked for, at some future day, to extend the road from Eganville to Nipissing. Then it will no longer be a branch, but part of the main line, and there will be two or three miles of road running to the town of Renfrew. Will not Renfrew then be on the branch, and Eganville on the main line, no matter what name you may call it?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think the proposition that this Bill should be referred back to the Railway Committee is a very proper one. Those who were present at the discussion of the Bill before that Committee, will remember that the hon. gentleman in charge of it consented to the insertion of these words in this clause; and I have not yet heard any reason from that hon. gentleman why the words should now be struck out. It is true, as suggested by the hon. member for South Lanark, and by the hon. member for West Durham, that we do grant powers to railway companies which are too extensive in regard to the building of branches from the main line. The hon. the Speaker stated that the company who had put their money into the railway had a right to say what point they would select as their point of divergence; but the hon. gentleman will remember that the Kingston and Pembroke Company were authorized to build a road from Kingston to Pembroke, and that the Ontario Legislature largely subsidized that road. If the

Mr. BLAKE.

Bill be allowed to pass in its present shape, there is no guarantee that the point of divergence on the main line may not be at some point south or east of Renfrew, or that the road will ever reach the point which its original charter intended, but that the line may go to Eganville, and thence to the Georgian Bay. I think the Bill should go back to the Railway Committee, and that the people of the town of Renfrew should have an opportunity of giving such evidence in favor of the point of divergence being at Renfrew, or at some point westward.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I suppose the hon. gentleman will propose, if the company do not carry out their original agreement, that the Government should pay back the bonus.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have no objection.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I think the proposition that the Bill should go back to the Railway Committee is a proper one. For my part, I should like to see the provisions of this bonus by-law; but this is not the place to enquire into that question. I do not think that we should dictate to a railway company the route they should select, so long as we define the points. We define here Eganville as a point to which a branch shall be built from the main line. We cannot suppose that the company will build any other than the shortest and the most advantageous line, as they are building it with their own money. I do not quite see the force of the observations of the hon. member for South Lanark as to the right of the town of Renfrew to dictate to the company where they shall build their branch. I can understand that the town has the right to see that the condition of their by-laws are fulfilled; but I do not see that it has prescribed anything with reference to this proposed branch. But I think the Railway Committee is the proper place for these suggestions to be considered.

Mr. GUNN moved that the Bill be referred back to the Railway Committee.

Motion agreed to; and Bill reported, and referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

THE ACADIA POWDER COMPANY.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company.

Motion agreed to; and Bill considered in Committee and reported.

Mr. TUPPER moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE asked that the third reading be postponed, as the Private Bills Committee had sent this Bill back with the report that it had not dealt with the question of jurisdiction; and the hon. member for Bellechasse, who had taken the most interest in Committee, was not in his seat.

Motion withdrawn.

PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERS' WIDOWS' AND ORPHANS' FUND.

Mr. RICHEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 63) to amalgamate the Presbyterian Ministers', Widows' and Orphans' Fund, in connection with the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, and the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Presbyterian Church in the Maritime Provinces, in connection with the Church of Scotland, and to create a corporation to administer such funds.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. RICHEY. In reference to the first clause it has been discovered, since the Bill was reported, that certain words were omitted from the printed copies, which were in the original draft. I now move to substitute a clause of which I have given notice for that which stands as the first clause. The only alteration is to insert the usual words which were omitted: "For giving succession and the common seal, and power to sue and be sued."

Bill reported.

BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee, and reported:—

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, for Manitoba and the North-West.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

THE DOMINION PHOSPHATE AND MINING COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Dominion Phosphate and Mining Company.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me rather strange, that although this company is to commence with a paid-up stock of only $75,000, it may be allowed to increase to $1,000,000.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I suppose the company expects to begin business in a small way and extend it. No doubt the development of phosphates in that region is capable of great extension. The sum of $75,000 may be sufficient to commence with, and if they extend their operations no doubt they would need a much larger capital.

On the third clause,

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that the eighth sub-section is an unusual and exceptional provision. I do not see why we should make special provision for the winding up of this particular company, when we have a general law providing for the winding up of all companies.

Mr. CAMERON. The reason is this: Supposing it invests its capital in a phosphate mine, and after four or five years that mine becomes exhausted, and they are not disposed to go on with their operations any further, surely there ought to be some provision to facilitate their winding up without compelling them to go to the expensive process of winding up by special application for an Act of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. That would apply to any company engaged in any mining enterprise at all. We ought to consider the principles upon which we arrange for powers to wind up a company, which involve not only the question of a company's internal affairs, and how its assets shall be distributed, but also the question of its liabilities to the public. I am not aware that we have heretofore provided, in any Private Bill, for the winding up of the corporation. I believe we have left it either to the general law, or to such special laws as have been passed from time to time for the winding up of corporations.

Mr. CAMERON. The protection given to the public in the winding up of this company is very ample. It requires to be advertised for three months that the creditors may come in, and requires the consent of two-thirds in value of the stockholders. Surely there is no possibility of wrong being done.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. To say that unless the creditors have a notice in the Canada Gazette, or some other paper, for three months, and unless they shall hear of this affair, or happen to see the newspaper, and put in their claim, the whole assets of the company may be taken and divided between the shareholders, is not only wrong for those who happen not to have heard it, but it seems to me to be a most extraordinary and unsafe provision. Those companies are not capable of being dissolved except by some process of law; but in this Bill it is arranged that this company shall be wound up and its assets divided, even although the creditors may not have seen the notice in the newspapers and in the Official Gazette.

Mr. CAMERON. There is a clause in the Bill providing that, after notices have been given "thereupon or after such date, upon the said secretary or managing director filing a certificate, verified by his oath or solemn affirmation with the Secretary of State in Canada, representing that the company is not indebted nor under any contracts or obligations future or present, with or towards any person or persons whatsoever." I think that this provision affords ample protection to the public.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is, whether this House is prepared to adopt a proposition to insert in Bills for incorporation of such companies a clause empowering the company upon giving notice in a newspaper and in the Official Gazette. If so, let us understand it; and a general law should be passed providing that all companies of this description may be wound up in this way. But it seems to be a very novel, and, so far as I know, an unprecedented application, and it should not be applied to one company unless applied to all. I move that sub-section eight of clause three be struck out.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I was not present on the Private Bills Committee when this Bill passed through. I am not aware whether any official reasons were given for the insertion of this clause beyond those I have stated, but I fail to see any objection to this clause being incorporated in the Bill. I do not know whether the Government have any objection to it or not. The duration of business will, in all probability, be limited.

Mr. IVES. When this Bill was discussed in the Private Bills Committee an objection similar to that raised by the hon. member for West Durham was made to this clause. I am not aware that any special reasons were urged why the clause should be inserted; but it was contended that this provision was similar to a provision in the General Act, and that there was no reason why it should not be inserted, and as a majority of the Committee favored the clause it was adopted.

Mr. BLAKE. If no special reason was represented to the Private Bills Committee I wholly fail to see why this House should pass a special law for the winding up of this particular company.

Mr. HALL. I was not on the Private Bills Committee when this Bill was before it, and there may have been reasons given why special advantage should be extended to this company. Although some of the incorporators are foreigners they are not strangers to the country. They have been largely engaged in developing the mining interests of the Eastern Townships, and they have carried on business very successfully and very satisfactorily. They came to the relief of our mining industries at a time of general depression, and they have restored those interests to successful operation. They now seek to extend their operation in this vicinity by developing the phosphate interests of the Ottawa Valley. This company is different to an ordinary one seeking incorporation; it is not like a company incorporated for manufacturing purposes, the extent of whose operations you can tell in advance. This is in the nature of an experiment, and, with gentlemen of means and standing who have been so successful in the past at the head of the company, there seems to be no impropriety in providing that they shall have the power to wind up the affairs of the company under the regulations laid down in the Bill. After giving notices it is provided that the managing directors shall declare under oath that the company is not indebted, nor under any contracts or obligations. Under these circumstances, and in view of the record of the incorporators in this country, it seems to me exception might be made in their favor, and opportunity given them to wind up the company as provided in the Bill, if it should not be found successful.

Mr. BLAKE. It is utterly impossible to adopt a particular law for one company, because of the special responsibilities of the incorporators, and not extend it to other companies. We assume that all incorporators are honest and responsible persons. There is no provision against transfer of stock, and therefore the company may be wound up by different persons from the original incorporators. I have looked at the Joint Stock Companies' Act of 1869, and I find no such provision as was mentioned by the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It was the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) who said he understood that the provision was similar to one contained in the General Act. No reason has been adduced why the House should not provide in a Bill of this kind for the winding up of the company if they see fit, so long as care is taken that the public interest shall not be prejudiced, more particularly as the company is of that character which will, in all probability, cause the company to cease to exist after a few years, which is not the case with some other companies. A banking company, or a manufacturing company, do not contemplate being wound up; but where the company is incorporated and depends for its existence on the extent to which phosphates are discovered, and the market available for the product and other causes of that character, it seems only reasonable that we should give it the power to wind up when its business ceases to be profitable. The fact that it has not been the practice to insert provisions of this kind in such Bills, is not a sufficient reason why we should not insert such a provision now, if it is fair and reasonable. This provision answers that description, and should be inserted. I am informed that this provision for winding up is copied verbatim from a General Act passed by the Ontario Legislature last Session; and that is no doubt the Act to which the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe referred. Now this company, apparently, would prefer to be wound up voluntarily before it might become insolvent if its business ceased to be profitable; and I think that this would be much more desirable, than for it to go on and carry on business when its business ceased to pay, and then be compelled to come and petition for winding up powers. In clause five, I move to insert after the first line, the words "and general meetings of the company," and strike out "and of its Directors." The company is quite content that its headquarters should be in Canada, and that its general meetings should always be held here; but it does not wish to be so tied down, that the meetings of the directors shall necessarily take place here. I believe that the parties who propose to incorporate this company are all, or mostly all, Americans; the capital is to come from the United States, and they wish to have the power to hold meetings of the directors out of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. That is a general question. The Private Bills Committee, I think, amended the Bill so as to provide that the meeting of the company, as well as its headquarters, should be located in Canada; and it is for the Committee to decide the general question, as to how far they should be altered.

Mr. HALL.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If all the meetings had to be held in Canada, it would involve four or five gentlemen coming, perhaps, from New York or some other point in the United States, at an expense of $50 to $60 each, once a month, or whenever it might be necessary to attend a meeting, with reference to the current business of the company, which could be as well transacted there.

Mr. JAMIESON. I was, I think, the member of the Private Bills Committee who objected to the provision that the head office of the company might be located either in the United States or in Canada. There was also considerable discussion with reference to the provision that the majority of the directors might be resident out of Canada; and it seemed to be the desire of the Committee to allow the majority of the directors to be aliens, while the head office, at all events, should be placed in the Dominion; but I do not see that there can be any reasonable objection to allowing the directors to hold meetings on the part of the company out of Canada. Of course it is the policy of the Government to bring as much capital as possible into the country, and I do not think that any obstacles should be thrown in the way of parties residing out of the Dominion who desire to employ capital in Canada. This should be encouraged, and, in my opinion, the proposition of the hon. member from Victoria is a very proper one.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Probably the sense of the House will be met by striking out the words "and of its directors," so that all the meetings of the shareholders shall be held in Canada, at the head office of the company. I will, consequently, simply move that the words in the second line, "of its directors," be struck out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that this would meet the objection, as it will permit them to hold their unofficial meetings where it may be most convenient to themselves.

Mr. BLAKE. The meetings of the company occur perhaps once a year, but the meetings of directors, who have extensive powers like these, will conduct the whole business. I only desire to know if this rule of allowing them to be held out of the country is the one which is to be adopted by the Government, or concurred in by the Committee in like cases.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not see why, in cases like this, where a capital is foreign, the directors should not be allowed to manage their business in the country in which they reside. The result of being too stringent in this respect would be to drive foreign money out of the country.

Mr. CARON. Though the feeling of the Committee appeared to be that the general meetings should be held in Canada, I did not understand that the same rule was to be applied to monthly or weekly meetings of the directors for the purpose of transacting ordinary business. To apply such a rule would be to impose a great deal of inconvenience and expense upon the directors.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 10) to provide for the amalgamation of the Bank of Nova Scotia with the Union Bank of Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada, limited.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 23) further to reduce the capital stock of the Quebec Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 93) respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE asked for explanations.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said he was unable to give any information, as he simply moved on behalf of Mr. Cameron. His object was to bar the Bill brought before the Railway Committee, and he did not bind himself to support or oppose its provisions, not having yet examined the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that the second reading should be proposed of an amendment of this importance to the public without any explanation of it being given. I do not know whether the attention of Government has been called to this measure, but having regard to the fact that the public interest is very deeply concerned it is only reasonable to expect they should have looked at the provisions of this Bill. I do not feel disposed to let it go to the Railway Committee of without pointing out to the House what seem to me very objectionable provisions. The legislation in reference to the Northern Railway Company's securities is of an old date and has been almost continuous. Before Confederation the bonded debt, which amounted to a very large sum of money, and stood first, was postponed once or twice, until, at the time of Confederation, it stood second or third in rank—the first rank being the first preference bonds amounting to £650,000 sterling and the second rank the second preference bonds amounting to £283,900 sterling. By an Act passed in the first Session of the first Canadian Parliament, third preference bonds were authorized of £50,000 sterling in A's, and £100,000 sterling in B's. One-half the latter were issued to the Government, so that the Government, by the arrangement then made, became the holder of £50,000 in the second preference bonds which are dealt with by this Bill, and £50,000 in the third preference bonds. There was an Act passed in 1871 and an Act passed in 1872, both authorizing the leasing of certain railways, and in each case authorizing a guarantee of the land of these railways and security so arranged for as stood of a higher rank; so that in 1872 the position of the Government was that it held £50,000 of the second preference bonds, and £50,000 of the third class bonds, and a lien of some millions of dollars below that. There was a proposal made in 1872 for a settlement of the Northern Railway debts for £100,000, which was not accepted; and subsequently, in 1875, the hon. member for East York made another proposal that the debt should be settled for £100,000 in cash, and certain arrears of interest, and the Government should retain the two sets of securities for the arrears of interest, I think, making about double the former proposal. That proposal was agreed to. In the same year, 1875, a general Northern Railway Act was passed, consolidating their legislation and providing for their securities in a very ample manner. By that Act power was given to the Northern Railway Company, upon the maturity of any of their bonds of any rank, to issue new bonds to the amount that would be necessary for the redemption of the bonds which were maturing, and to place them in the same rank. Such a power they now have. Now, they are not satisfied, it seems, with that power, and the second preference bonds being about to mature, they are asking that we should pass a law to allow them to issue perpetually terminable bonds of the same rank as the second preference, not merely of the amount that is necessary to redeem the second preferences, but to such an amount as that the interest charged shall be no greater than the interest charged upon the present set of preferences—in a word, they are expecting, and rightly, no doubt, from the improved condition of the country, the market, and perhaps the improved condition of the railway, that they will be able, if we allow them to issue second preference securities, to issue them at a lower rate of interest than 6 per cent, the result of which will be that they will get a larger amount of capital than is necessary to redeem the expiring bonds. If they were to make an issue at 5 instead of 6 per cent., for the amount of interest which they ask authority to emit, they would procure a capital of £340,680 instead of £282,900, which is the amount of the second preference bonds, making an excess of £56,780, which they would have for other purposes. Now, the practical result of that is as if a farmer mortgaged his farm to somebody for $5,000 at 10 per cent., and then made you a second mortgage for $2,500 at 10 per cent. When the first mortgage matures, if he came and said to you: I can borrow money cheaper than at 10 per cent., I can borrow it at 6 per cent., and so I want to borrow $3,000 at 6 per cent, and put it before your mortgage for $2,500. You will be all the better off because the interest charged would be only $4.80 instead of $5. That is what we practically propose. We propose a Bill to give them the power to increase the capital charged ahead of the third preference bonds A and B, and the preference stock amounting to several hundred thousand dollars which has been issued under the legislation of 1875. Now, not merely are the private investors in the preference bonds A and B, and in the preference stock, interested in this mode of legislation, but the public also, for the public is a holder of £50,000 of these third preference B's. But I object to the proposal which they, having ample power under the 31st sec. of the Act of 1875, to emit bonds of the same rank and standing as the third preference bonds as is necessary to redeem the second preference bonds, that they should now come here and ask this Legislature to allow them to emit as much bonds as will involve an annual charge of £17,380—or whatever the interest is—in order that they may raise enough to redeem the second preference bonds, and also some more money for the general purposes of the road. I say that would be an improper interference with the rights of the private holders of the subsequent securities, and a detrimental interference with the rights of this country. Supposing, ultimately, when the new bonds matured, that they could not raise money to redeem them at the rate of 5 per cent.—which they may expect to emit them at now, they would have to provide for a new issue, with a nominal amount of the proposed present issue, of some £340,000. I see that the hon. gentleman catches the idea. I am only anxious it should be clearly stated now. Well, Sir, the Bill also proposes a clause which, I think, demands very earnest enquiry. I do not thoroughly understand the gist of it; but it seems to me to be dangerous. As I have said, former legislation authorizes the leasing of certain railways and the guaranteeing of an obligation to pay the rents, but these rents were a certain proportion of the gross earnings of the railways. Another clause in the Bill is that the railways should have power to guarantee the debts of the leased railways to an amount represented by the rent. That makes a positive and absolute charge higher up than some of its outstanding securities, not dependent on the traffic of this railway, but positive and absolute, and, therefore, it may be, a larger charge than the increased charge, to the prejudice of the security holders. Then the Bill contains another extraordinary clause, which seems designed to give absolute and unlimited power to this railway company to expropriate such lands as the directors deem necessary for the purposes of the railway, going beyond their own Act and going beyond the Consolidated Railway Act. It could not be more liberal if you were dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway—and I need not say more than that. Now, Sir, considering that the president of this company is a member of the Government, and that one of its directors is a brother of another member of the Government, I should have supposed the Government would know something about this Bill, but it seems to me that with all these peculiar advantages they have had for obtaining information as to the character of this legislation, they have not yet acquired from their colleagues any of these details. I would refer them to the hon. Minister of Justice and to the hon. Frank Smith, and I hope that with their assistance they may be able to amend some of the objectionable features of this legislation before it goes much further.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that my attention has been specially directed to the point which the leader of the Opposition has just referred to, and that was the power given the company of expropriation which as he has said, was a very unlimited power; and it was proposed, when the Bill went to the Committee, to deal with that subject.

Bill read the second time.

DUTY ON LAND PLASTER.

Mr. WHEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce or repeal the duty on land plaster imported from the United States for fertilizing purposes, during the present Session?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not the intention of the Government to change the duty.

HIGH COMMISSIONER IN ENGLAND.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether an understanding has been reached that Sir Charles Tupper is to succeed Sir Alexander Galt?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only answer I can properly give to that is, that no offer has been made to my hon. friend who sits near me, and, consequently, there has been no acceptance.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. GORDON enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to make provision for a more extended geological survey of Vancouver Island, the present year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand from the director of the Geological Survey, Prof. Selwyn, it is the intention, as far as possible, to use the chief force on the mainland; but, perhaps, he may be able to send some persons this year to the Island.

PIER AT WESTPORT, N.S.

Mr. VAIL enquired, Whether any portion of the $2,000 provided in the Supplementary Estimates of last year for a public pier at Westport, Digby County, has been expended; if not, when is it intended the work shall be commenced, and whether the Government intend to provide an additional sum for this important work in the Supplementary Estimates of the present year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is true that last Session Parliament voted $2,000, but its expenditure was allowed to stand, as further enquiry was necessary, and that has not yet been made.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND QUEBEC CITY.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give to the city of Quebec, the capital of the Province of that name, the advantage of having an office of the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the Intercolonial Railway had an agent already in the capital of the Province of Quebec, near the St. Louis Hotel, and it is not proposed to appoint any other officer at present.

FERRY BOATS ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have come to an understanding with the proprietors of the North Shore Railway, in relation to the construction of ferry boats to ply between the eastern terminus of that road and the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway; and if so, what that understanding is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government have not come to any understanding with the proprietors of the North Shore Railway in relation to the construction of ferry boats to ply between the northern terminus of that road and the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway as yet.

PASSENGER ACCOMMODATION AT "THE CROSSING."

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have come to any understanding with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and with the Quebec Central Railway Company for the joint construction, at the locality called "The Crossing," of a station to be used by the three companies; and if so, what the understanding is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No understanding has yet been arrived at.

IMPROVEMENTS AT PORT ALBERT HARBOR.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for a return of a copy of all reports, plans, and surveys made by the Government Engineers of Port Albert Harbor, in the County of Huron—and a copy of the estimate of the costs of extending the piers at said harbor—and of all correspondence between the Port Albert Pier Company and the Government, respecting said harbor, said: I beg to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to this matter. He knows something of it, and that the work is of very considerable importance. This harbor is situated on the east shore of Lake Huron, and a very considerable amount of trade is done at Port Albert. The hon. gentleman some years ago expended, and properly expended, a very considerable sum of money on works there. Last year $2,200 were expended and some useful and valuable work was done; and so much alive did the hon. gentleman appear to be to the necessity of continuing and completing the work, that he sent an engineer from the Department there during last summer or fall, and had a survey made of the harbor, and an estimate prepared of the additional work required for the purpose of making really useful the works already constructed. I believe the surveyor made the survey, and that such survey and specifications, together with estimates of costs, are now in the Department. I trust the hon. Minister will find it consistent with his position to carry out the suggestions made by the engineer, Mr. Grey, to expend a still larger sum of money there, otherwise I fear very much the works already constructed there would be of little value. I am told that the cost would not be very much to make the work perfect and suitable for the trade. I observe there is nothing in the Estimates for this work, but I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to place some amount therein to complete it.

Mr. FARROW. I am very glad the hon. member for West Huron has moved for these papers, and spoken so favorably with respect to Port Albert Harbor. It is known to this House that since 1872, I have paid all the attention within my power to having something done to the harbor, and my efforts have not been in vain in the past. In 1873, I think I was the means of obtaining a grant from the hon. Minister, who now so ably presides over the Public Works Department, of the sum of $4,000, which was very thankfully received by myself, and more thankfully received by the people of Port Albert. They feel to this day very grateful to the Minister, and I am glad to know that he is inclined at all times to listen to our representations for help in that quarter. While on my feet, I may state that after we went out of power in 1873, very frequently I went to the then Premier and Minister of Public Works, in this relation; but I could get nothing from him, and I may add that my hon. friend from West Huron, who was in the House at the time, never came to my assistance on those occasions. I will not, however, treat him in the same spirit, but will second his endeavors, and do all I can to aid him in this direction. My hon. friend now represents this particular part of Huron, but formerly I did so, and, I may say, I feel a deep interest in all that pertains to Port Albert Harbor, and I am very glad to state that the hon. Minister of Public Works has given me, in this connection, great encouragement. He has a sum of money unexpended, and he will use it for dredging, &c.; indeed he manifests a very liberal spirit, and I hope he will see his way clear, if not this Session, at all events, during another year, to give us about $6,000, in order to make a complete job of it. What we want is this—we may as well not be mealy-mouthed about it, and if we ask for a pretty large sum, we may get one-half—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then you had better ask for twelve.

Mr. FARROW. Well, I would ask for $12,000 if I thought I would get $6,000, but the harbor is not in a satisfactory condition at the present time. It is a natural harbor and it has been of great use to the people in the neighborhood, who are very far from our railway. This small harbor is of great advantage to the people for the shipment of grain, timber, cord-wood, bark, staves and a great many other commodities. What is required is an extension of the pier about 300 feet into the lake. This, with some dredging, will make it a very fine harbor. When this is done we will not trouble the Government in this relation for a great many years, and I have no doubt that our prosperity will continue during the coming year. The hon. Minister of Public Works will see his way clear to granting us $5,000 or $6,000, or probably more if we need it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will bring down the papers asked for with great pleasure. I must say, I have always taken a great deal of interest in this work during the last ten or eleven years. True, there was a slight interregnum of five years, during which it appears that this, my pet work was neglected, but, I suppose, that the intention was to enable me to do more for this locality than would otherwise be possible. The surveys and examinations which were lately made, have not yet been examined by me; but, I hope to be able to do this during the present week. And, although I cannot promise the hon. gentleman any vote now, nevertheless, I shall look into the matter, and see whether I will be justified in submitting any proposition to my colleagues before the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

Motion agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE ST. JEAN PORT JOLI WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) in moving for a return, to supplement the return to an Order of the House of the 21st of February, asking for a copy of all correspondence, &c., relative to the construction of an extension of the St. Jean Port Joli Wharf, in the County of L'Islet, in giving the date of the memorandum which is found at the end of these documents, and the time when it was submitted to the hon. Minister of Public Works, by Henry F. Perley, Chief Engineer, said: Mr. Speaker. In making this motion, I wish to give and obtain a few words of explanation concerning the papers produced relative to the St. Jean Port Joli Wharf. I hold in my hand this correspondence; attached to these papers is a document, which is the report of Mr. Perley, engineer, stating that it was when the contract, or when the application for the contract had been submitted to the hon. Minister of Public Works, that it was discovered, as is set forth in the memorandum, that the work was to be given by contract and not by tender. There is no date to this memorandum; it does not appear, moreover, at what time the engineer submitted this memorandum; there is a strange omission in the correspondence exchanged between the Department and certain persons in the county of L'Islet. I have taken a great deal of interest in the construction of the St. Jean Port Joli Wharf, at each Session since 1878. I asked that the works commenced on this wharf should be continued, because these works were not only of local, but of general utility for the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, especially at that point called "La Traverse," and that it afforded means for having a port of refuge or a shelter for vessels in distress, especially towards the end of the season of navigation. We must remember that there were some years ago a large number of vessels in distress on the shore beyond La Traverse—among others, the Roma, the Nola, &c. This was the reason which called for the construction of this wharf. In 1876 I earnestly interested myself, as did also the municipality in this neighborhood, which was so much in need of the wharf as a local amelioration, in order to induce the then hon. First Minister, the present hon. member for East York, to make an appropriation for this work. I had much difficulty in obtaining it, and it was only by proving to him in a clear and practical manner that it was not only a local benefit, but a necessity in the general interests of commerce and navigation, that he consented to make an appropriation of $2,000 to assist the construction of the wharf. The municipality itself furnished the sum of $2,000. It was to this sum and the subsidy of the Government that we owe the construction of the wharf as it exists at present. This wharf was constructed in the best manner as regards the solidity of the work, and in a most exceptionally economical manner, and the result is that the construction of the wharf only cost $1.25 to $1.26 per cubic yard, whilst the estimates made in the Department of Public Works, and by other engineers and architects, give a minimum of $2, and sometimes as high as $2.50, and even $3; so that with the subsidy from the Government and the $2,000 voted by the municipality, we succeeded in making a very useful work for the municipality and for the general commerce. Now, as I just remarked, I at several preceding Sessions made a demand for an additional grant in order to enlarge this wharf, and notwithstanding my importunity, notwithstanding all the zeal I could bring to bear on the subject, I could not succeed in obtaining it. It is true that, personally, I had no claims for favors from the Government. But the county which I represent, and whose interests ought to be considered, should have received this grant. Finally the justice of the demand was recognized, perhaps owing to the incident of the General Elections which took place on the 20th of June last, and the sum of $4,700 was placed in the Estimates for this extension. This coincidence, the benevolence of the Government finding itself on the eve of the elections, had the effect of awakening a little public opinion on this subsidy, in a most opportune time. I have in my hands the correspondence of Mr. Charles Marcotte, member of the Provincial Assembly, who laid before the Government the necessity of spending a few hundred dollars for the L'Islet wharf; he asks at the same time, that the works on the St. Jean Port Joli wharf be undertaken as soon as possible. In order that this correspondence may be better understood, perhaps, it would be better for me to read the letter of Mr. Charles Marcotte as it is not long. It is dated on the 19th May, 1882:

"SIR H. LANGEVIN, K.C.B.,
"Ottawa.

"SIR,—I am instructed by Mr. Taché of the Department of Agriculture, I think, to request you to permit Prosper Plourde, of L'Islet, to make a little improvement to the wharf of L'Islet, the expense not exceeding one hundred dollars. This improvement consists in replacing planks, building ladders, &c. It is necessary that Mr. Prosper Plourde be appointed guardian of the wharf.

"This gentleman is willing to undertake charge of the work without remuneration, in order to permit of free use of the wharf, as ordinarily the wharf is covered with plank and timbers, and it is impossible to drive a conveyance on it."

Here is the most important part of the letter:

"It is necessary that the work on the St. Jean Port Joli Wharf be done by day work, and that Mr. Alphonse Gingras, of St. Jean Port Joli, be the overseer."

This is important, for, as this is dated the 19th May, Mr. Gingras was one of the candidates who had to be induced to withdraw from the contest. I think the hon. Minister of Public Works knows something about it. This Mr. Gingras was appointed, and his mouth was closed.

Mr. LANDRY. With a plank.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, with a plank. A short time afterwards, that is to say, on the 27th May, 1882, a hurried reply was sent to Mr. Charles Marcotte:

"I am instructed to inform you that, pursuant to the request contained in the letter of the 19th May, the Engineer-in-Chief of the Department is authorized to expend the sum of $100 for repairs on the wharf at L'Islet, and also to commence the works at St. Jean Port Joli. Mr. Prosper Plourde, of L'Islet, and Mr. Alphonse Gingras, of St. Jean Port Joli, will superintend these works in their respective municipalities."

Thus as soon as the demand was made, the answer was sent, and the request acceded to. All this took place before the 20th June. At this same date the Secretary of the Public Works Department writes to Mr. Perley:

"The hon. the Minister authorizes you to cause the works of the St. Jean Port Joli pier proceeded with under the vote of the last Session, and Alphonse Gingras of that place to superintend their execution. Payments in connection with these works cannot be made until after the 1st July, 1882."

After this letter was despatched the election of the 20th June, in the county of L'Islet, took place, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works attached an extreme importance to the works. He even came in advance to visit the St. Jean Port Joli wharf, and promised what would be done. Naturally, after the official promise of the Minister, it was expected that the work would be done. But on the 3rd July, Mr. Gingras, who was some time previous appointed, complains that the order to commence work has not arrived. Here is what he says:

"I am impatiently awaiting your orders to commence the works on the St. Jean Port Joli wharf. All the men requisite to perform the work have been engaged, and are only awaiting my instructions to put them to work. I am surprised to see that Mr. G. P. Bender has not yet received the necessary orders to commence the work. A reply instructing me to commence the work is anxiously looked for.

"Yours very devotedly,

"ALPHONSE GINGRAS."

Matters rested there until I demanded an answer, at the commencement of the Session, from the Government through the Minister of Public Works, if it was really the intention of the Government to extend the wharf in question? The first answer which I received was the customary one. "The matter is under consideration." I persevere a little, however, when I undertake anything which concerns my county. I approached the subject a second time, and I asked the Government if it was their intention to again appropriate the sum previously voted? This time I learned it was the intention of the Government to avail themselves of the vote in question and go on with the work. I must interpret this formal declaration in the most favorable light, and I interpret it in that light accordingly. Now, in the public interest and in the interest of my county especially, I would like to know after the first promise made to me, what was the date of that memorandum, and at what time it was placed before the hon. Ministers; because, it appears to me there was, if I may so express it, a change of opinion. It was decided at one time, to proceed with the works at once, to build them by day work, to employ a certain superintendent, but, as soon as the elections were over, a different conclusion was come to. Was it deception? Will the country believe it has been deceived? At least many believe they have been duped. It will be well, if the Government can give an explanation which will justify their conduct subsequent to the election. I attach a great deal of importance to this wharf on account of its public utility. I desire to invite the attention of the Government, and especially of the hon. Minister of Public Works, to the construction of these works in proper season. When these works were first commenced, I took care myself to see that they were commenced as soon as possible in the season, in order to avoid the necessity of working in the autumn season when the weather is cold and the days short. We succeeded in finishing the first wharf in good season, and the consequence was that it was built very much cheaper than if it had been built at a time when the workmen would lose a great deal of time. The hon. Minister of Public Works will permit me to observe that if the credit is not again voted, it will be necessary to use the money already voted before the end of the fiscal year, that is, before the 1st of July. Again, if the contracts are not given immediately, if notices are not given in order to attain the object the Government has in view—the speedy completion of the work—the 1st of July will soon pass; we will not then be able to spend the moneys which have not been voted anew, and it will be necessary to await a new vote from the House. At present, whatever may have been the motives which have changed the intentions of the Government, and have induced them to postpone the completion of these works, although the Government may have been disappointed in not being able to carry the election in the county of L'Islet as easily as they expected, it is not because my humble self is here that the county should suffer, and I expect from the Government, notwithstanding they have an opponent in me, that they will render justice to the county of L'Islet. I rely on the French Canadian patriotism of the hon. Minister of Public Works to do justice to my county as to all others.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Mr. Speaker: I will only say a few words in answer to the hon. member from L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain). The hon. member represents in this House a county which adjoins my own, and the extraordinary affection he manifests towards his constituents, he extends to a certain extent to mine. Not long ago it occurred to him to make an excursion into my territory, to hunt in my lands, and to hold up for public execration one of my principal supporters—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). Name him.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). The hon. member for L'Islet would like to know his name; he has already forgotten it, but I will be able to remind him of it in a moment, because I have on the Orders of the Day, a motion to that effect. Three sentiments, it seems to me, animate the soul of the hon. member from L'Islet—a sentiment of grief, a sentiment of pleasure, and a sentiment of vain curiosity. All these sentiments, Mr. Speaker, are at war with one another, and have produced the speech which this House has just listened to. The hon. member complains that last year we ignored a gentleman who was opposed to him. It appears we did not remove enough of such gentlemen, for if the hon. member occupies a seat in this House, it is owing to the fact that he had two Conservative candidates against him.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). The other candidate was not a Conservative.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). The hon. member says that I am mistaken, that the third candidate was not a Conservative. Then in that case was not the hon. member responsible for his candidature, and will not the reports current in the county find an echo in the words of the hon. member? The hon. member complains that the works on the St. Jean Port Joli wharf were not undertaken, when the county was unrepresented, or rather when the county was literally overrun with the numerous candidates who solicited its support. But the hon. member again destroys the effect of this complaint when he adds in his peroration that he would like to have the works done in a convenient season, when the days are longest, when nothing is to be feared from cold weather. Thus it is precisely because this time had not come or was past, that the Government was prevented—probably by the report itself of Mr. Perley—and this explains why the Government, in acting as it did, met the views of the hon. member from L'Islet. Consequently, the latter made a mistake in allowing this expression to pierce his oration. The second sentiment which the hon. member gave expression to was one of joy that the works were again to be resumed. He thinks that this is due to his efforts; perhaps he does not know that from all parts of the county, from the leaders whom he opposed, have come demands that the money voted last year should be expended this year, and at such times as the hon. member speaks of, and soon enough to avoid the inconveniences which he particularized a moment ago. The third sentiment which seems to explain the two preceding ones, is that curiosity which is only natural on the part of the hon. member. I do not know whether it is opportune and healthy, and whether it possesses all the advantages of the climate of the county which my hon. friend represents. But this curiosity has entered this House; it is necessary to satisfy it, and it is all about a missing date. If the hon. member had simply asked the Government at what date the letter of Mr. Perley was written, he would have been answered immediately, whilst now with his motion, everything leads us to believe that it is not the date at all that he wants, but something which he could not establish in his own county when he was there. He invokes the patriotism of the Government to undertake these works, and not the patriotism of the Government alone, but the French Canadian patriotism of the Government. Such an expression surprises me, and I can find no argument in reply to the enthusiastic appeal of the hon. member. The still greater reason of public interest which the hon. member seems to invoke is that this light is opposite La Traverse. He has not told us, Mr. Speaker, what traverse: I suspect that his life has been dotted with traverses, and that he experienced many of them in his late election. He wants this wharf to put an end to all his traverses. In this light I think it would be very patriotic on the part of the Government to comply with his appeal, not reiterated will I say, because the voice of the hon. member is seldom heard, when it is a question of working for the interests of his county. This is the first time that we have had the pleasure of hearing him express himself with the patriotic French Canadian accent. In the matter of the public interest, Mr. Speaker, I think that the county of Montmagny offers greater advantages; and if the hon. member looks at the question from this stand-point, I have no doubt that the Government, in causing a profound exploration to be made, will arrive at the conclusion that the basin of Montmagny will better realize the object desired by the hon. member, and I believe that if the Government wishes to commit itself to an excess of French Canadian patriotism—if I may be permitted to use the expression of the hon. member from L'Islet, it will do so in favor of the county of Montmagny.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). Mr. Speaker: In reply to the hon. member from L'Islet, I may observe that I have no objection to give the date of the memorandum which ends the return which was presented the other day; but as for giving him the date at which it was submitted to the hon. Minister of Public Works, I must ask the hon. member to excuse me from doing so. I cannot give him this information—which is Departmental information for the Minister and his employé. There would not be the least inconvenience to give it to him, but the hon. member ought to understand that I cannot commence to tell him at what day of the week, at what hour of the day, whether it was the evening or the morning, that I have my official duties with the officers of my Department. If the hon. member desires his motion to be adopted, he must abandon that part of it, or I must ask the House to refuse his motion. As to the date of this memorandum, I am able to tell him now that it was the 9th of March of last year.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). If the hon. Minister will pardon me I will venture to tell him that the date cannot be the 9th March last year; it must be the 9th March last.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). It is the 9th of March ultimo. It is a memorandum which was made by Mr. Perley for me. He advises me as to the condition of the matter. I do not think that the hon. member can gain anything by having this date. What does six or eight months amount to after the date which he speaks of; this can have no significance. As to Mr. Gingras, of whom he speaks, he wishes the country to infer that he sold himself in consideration of employment or in the hope of employment. The hon. member is entirely mistaken. Mr. Gingras is not a man to sell himself. He did not sell himself. Mr. Gingras was not advised by my Department, nor by any official of my Department, that he would be employed. It was the intention to employ him in case the works went on, but as I decided not to undertake the work, he was not employed. As to the condition that the payment of the works, if any were constructed before the 1st of July, could not be made till after that date, if the hon. member will take the trouble to examine at what time the money voted for these works was made payable, he will see that the money was not at my disposal till after the 1st of July, and that, consequently, I could not pay a cent of that money to any one before that time. I could, of course, lawfully commence the construction of the work before the 1st of July. There is nothing to prevent us commencing work at the end of May or the beginning of June, and paying for them after the 1st of July, when the money is at the disposition of the Minister in conformity with the vote of Parliament. The hon. member says he hopes that the Government will not make the county of L'Islet suffer because it did not carry the county. Although the Government has not the advantage of having in this Chamber a member from L'Islet to sustain them, it is perfectly satisfied with the result of the vote, inasmuch as the hon. member only represents a minority of the county. At all events, I congratulate the hon. member for taking so much interest in his county, and for trying to obtain public works for it. But the hon. member had no occasion to give himself so much trouble in the matter of these works at L'Islet, and at St. Jean Port Joli, for the intention of my Department, as I said the other day, was not to let this subsidy be lost, but, on the contrary, to use it as I said the other day. The hon. member need not fear that the first of July will arrive, and that, the works not being completed, the subsidy will be lost. The Department understands exactly what it has to do in the premises, and the money which Parliament gave it for these works will be certainly expended for them. I would ask the hon. gentleman to amend his motion by leaving out the last part of it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have no objection to amending the motion as the hon. gentleman suggests. I may say, however, I have gained the object I had in view by ascertaining that the report of Mr. Perley came after the first question I made on the subject—when I asked the Government whether they did not intend to continue the work at this place? This memorandum was put in after all the correspondence; and I suspected before, what I am sure of now, that it was put in as a cover, and for the purpose of giving a plausible reason for the work not having been proceeded with immediately after the election. The date of this memorandum is the 8th of March last—not the 8th of March, 1882—so that I repeat that it was put there to cover all the correspondence, and I say that such a fact is not at all creditable to any Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. The correspondence was ended just before, and that sheet of paper was added for the purpose of making the correspondence intelligible, for without it the information sought by the hon. gentleman would not have been given. Mr. Perley made me this short memorandum to show what occurred, though we had no documents in the Department. The hon. gentleman, instead of finding fault with the Department, should feel thankful for having obtained that information, for the correspondence might have been confined to the other papers and omitted this one, and then the hon. gentleman would have had everything I had in my Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Apologise.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I wish I could, but I cannot.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LAWS RESPECTING THE SALE OF INTOXICANTS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of despatches on the subject of Canadian and Provincial laws as to the imposition of restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks, and of reports and Orders in Council in reference to such despatches, said: I observe by the English Parliamentary Reports that some months ago application was made by the Imperial Government to this Government, and perhaps to other Colonial Governments, for information on the subject of Canadian and Provincial laws respecting the imposition of restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks; and so long ago as the 29th of November last an Order in Council was passed, transmitting a memorandum from the hon. Minister of Justice giving full information on the subject of the laws in relation to that question. I have made the motion because I think it would be interesting to have that correspondence brought down to us. While I am on my feet, I wish to say that we passed an Order of the House a little while ago, calling for all correspondence between any member of the Government and the licensed victuallers, or any one on their behalf. The return which has been brought down in answer to that Order is incomplete, inasmuch as it is simply a return from the Secretary of State declaring that there does not appear to be—I presume in his office—any correspondence between the Government and the licensed victuallers. It was not supposed that the correspondence would come through the official organ of the Government—the Secretary of State's office—as the Order was for correspondence with any member of the Government. What I alluded to in making the motion was, that a deputation had visited the

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

First Minister, that information had been requested by him of these persons, and that it was announced in the papers that they had forwarded the information to him for the use of Council. A return which speaks only of correspondence with the Government as a whole, and not of correspondence with any member of the Government, is one which does not fully answer the Order of the House. However, having called attention to the fact that the English Parliamentary papers contain these particular documents, I hope that we shall not receive a return from the Secretary of State's Department, that there does not appear to be any correspondence on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONARD. As regards the first portion of the hon. gentleman's remarks, I would say that there was a circular despatch sent by Her Majesty's Government to all the colonies, for copies of the laws respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and a return was made from the Department of Justice embodying a sort of collation of the laws. I understand that that is what the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That will be brought down, and I think it is in print, so that there need be no delay. With reference to correspondence with myself, I cannot at this moment state whether I did receive a paper from the licensed victuallers. If there be such a paper I will bring it down at once.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for a return showing the amount paid for rolling stock purchased for the Intercolonial Railway for each year since the 1st of July, 1878, the nature of such rolling stock, and the place where manufactured; the amount of such rolling stock charged to capital and revenue respectively, and the amount intended for the equipment of the Rivière du Loup section and the Intercolonial Railway proper, respectively.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall have great pleasure in laying upon the Table of the House, the information asked for by the hon. gentleman, and, I think I shall be able to do so very shortly—at all events, before the Estimates on that subject are considered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for a return showing the nature of the rolling stock purchased for the Intercolonial Railway as contained in the item of $153,853 84 on page 238, Part II. of the Public Accounts of 1882; the place where such rolling stock was manufactured, and the price paid for the different kinds of rolling stock respectively.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My attention was called to this motion, and I have had prepared a paper containing all the information required, which I now lay upon the Table of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE BRITISH VESSEL GENII.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council, documents and communications between the Secretary of State and the Department of Marine and Fisheries concerning the application of divers sailors in the port of Quebec praying for a release from confinement and to return to sea, &c., at the request of R. Temple, master of the British vessel Genii. He said: There has been for many years in the port of Quebec a custom prevailing among shipmasters in want of sailors, especially at the end of the season of navigation, of resorting to the gaol where sailors are sometimes detained for breach of discipline or other trifling offences, and the sailors, on signing the necessary articles, are released and put on board the ship for which they are engaged. In the month of October last, Captain Temple, of the Genii, was on the eve of leaving the port of Quebec, but he had no sailors, so he went to the Quebec gaol and through the medium of a gaoler got four men who were willing to go on board his vessel, and who voluntarily signed the articles. These men were G. Hindman, William Palmer, W. Neill, and G. Kennedy. To make the transaction proper and regular the captain sent a petition to the Government, through the Secretary of State, and also notified, by letter, the Department of Marine and Fisheries of that petition. Singularly enough no answer at all was received by Captain Temple to his communication to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The acknowledgment of the receipt of the petition was sent to him the day after the petition was sent, the 7th of November. On the 9th of November the Toronto Mail got hold of this matter and published an article on it, only three days after the communication took place between the captain and the Government. How the Mail got hold of the information I leave to the Department to explain. Doubtless some of the officials must have let out the secrets of the Government, but that, of course, is a very small matter so far as Captain Temple is concerned, though it may be of importance to the Department and the general public. In the meantime another captain, Captain Geddes, master of the Greyhound, of York, also wrote asking for those seamen, and he received from the Department this answer, to which I call the attention of the hon. Minister:

"OTTAWA, 8th November, 1882.

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 3rd inst., addressed to the Minister of Marine, stating that you had sent a petition to the Secretary of State praying for the release from gaol of certain imprisoned seamen to enable you to have a full crew for your vessel, and requesting the Minister of Marine to interest himself in your behalf. In reply, I am to inform you that the Minister does not wish to interfere with the ends of justice and that he has no power to release sailors or other prisoners confined in gaol for criminal acts.

"I am, Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"WM. SMITH,

"Deputy Minister of Marine, &c."

Two or three days later, these same men who had been refused to Captain Temple and Captain Geddes were handed over to the master of another vessel owned by Mr. James G. Ross, of Ross & Co., Quebec. In the face of this letter from the Department, I am at a loss to understand how it was the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries ordered the release of these men. I remark that these were not mates but ordinary seamen, and that the custom had hitherto prevailed in the port of Quebec of releasing seamen by telegram. I demand the correspondence to satisfy Captain Temple who owns a British vessel, and who complains of the discrimination shown in favor of Mr. J. G. Ross, a Canadian ship-owner. I think the letter of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries goes too far. It is well known that he has not the right to release from gaol, but he may exercise on behalf of the seamen the discretion of making a recommendation to the Governor in Council, when a petition is laid before His Excellency, and not impede the granting of such a petition. Captain Temple complained that the shipping paid for the maintenance of the police in the port of Quebec, and it was not right that the Department should act against their interests. Under these circumstances I think that the correspondence will not only satisfy Captain Temple, but will serve hereafter either as a precedent or as a guide, so that ship-masters may know what help to expect from the Marine Department in obtaining sailors, especially at the close of the season.

Mr. McLELAN. I would ask the hon. gentleman to include the Department of Justice in his motion. When a criminal has been convicted and is in gaol he comes under the control of that Department, and application for release must be made to it. The application referred to was sent by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the Department of Justice. From the correspondence you will find that Captain Temple communicated with the Department by telegram, and on that telegram the sailors were released by order of the Department of Justice. Not being so alert as others, Captain Temple lost the men. All the Department did was to order their release, not to hand them over to any one, and the men were obtained by another captain who was also on the look-out for them and was quicker than Captain Temple.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have no objection to the Department of Justice being included. My object is to ascertain how it was that somebody was able to intervene, because the delay was very short. The captain of the Jane Eyre says he never received any communication whatever from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and that the articles were actually signed. I have a certificate given by the shipping master of Quebec that these men were engaged on a Saturday evening and put on board at once. The captain, of course, could have at once engaged his men, but he pretends that it was a piece of favoritism exercised to the advantage of James Ross, proprietor of the other vessel. That is what will appear hereafter.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENSES TO ENGLAND.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant) moved for a return showing the expenses in detail, with dates, incurred by the several members of the Government, and any other person or persons in the service of the Government, sent to England or elsewhere on behalf of the Government, from 16th December, 1880 to the present date.

Mr. CAMERON (West Huron). There is no use allowing this motion to pass unless the Government pay some attention to it. In the early part of the Session of 1881, I moved a similar resolution, and the return was brought down in 1882. Early in the Session of 1882, I moved a similar resolution, and the return is not yet before the House. My hon. friend may expect to get this return in about two years from now, unless the Government pay more attention to it than they did to my resolutions. The return is very short, and there is no reason why we should not have it within a week or ten days.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend seems to assume that the return will not be very voluminous.

CHARGES PREFERRED AGAINST HUBERT HÉBERT.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation) in moving for copies of all charges brought against Hubert Hébert, employed as chief station master at Montmagny, relative to an accusation of fraudulent practices sustained by declaration of P. B. Casgrain, Esq., member for L'Islet, said: Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) whom I do not find in his place, asked me just now to mention whom he accused in this House of having committed fraudulent practices. I hope that the motion which I have just put in your hands will give him this information. A few days ago a motion was made by the hon. member for L'Islet. This hon. gentleman who makes a speciality of raising points of order, ought, I think, to study Parliamentary Rules and not put in his motions, facts which might be challenged. He asserted that Mr. Hubert Hébert had been found guilty of fraudulent practices, and he called the attention of the Government to this fact. This matter therefore is open for discussion and challengeable to such an extent. The judgment which I have in my hand does not declare Mr.

Hubert Hébert guilty of fraudulent practices; and even if this judgment found him guilty of fraudulent practices, I do not think it is of such a nature that the Government can interfere. The matter in question was a Local Election. In the Election Act of the Province of Quebec, which governs the elections in the Province of Quebec, there are clauses which define what fraudulent practices shall be, and there is in that Act fraudulent practices specified as such which are not in the Federal Act. Thus, according to clause 254 of the Election Act of Quebec, it is stated:

"Every candidate or his agent employed in any on the subject, or on the occasion of any election, with an elector entitled to vote, will be also, as well as such elector, deemed to have committed an act of corruption and punishable in consequence."

Thus what the Provincial Act declares to be a fraudulent practice is not one in any sense according to the Federal law. It thus appears that a candidate or his agent may be found guilty of fraudulent practices according to the laws of the Local Legislature, and not be guilty according to the Federal law. But come to the facts. Mr. Hébert, who is the person under consideration, was reported against by the Judges of one court. This is the judgment, or at least the report, made by three Judges on the 5th of January, 1883. This report is addressed to the Speaker of the Quebec Legislative Assembly, the hon. Mr. Taillon. It is signed by the three Judges who pronounced the judgment:

"We have the honor to transmit to you the judgment of the Supreme Court, sitting in revision at Quebec, in the case of the contested election of the Electoral District of Montmagny, which judgment declares the petitioner, Nazaire Bernatchez, elected in the place and stead of the defendant, Louis Napoleon Fortin, and we make to you at the same time * * * 2. That fraudulent practices appear to have been committed in the said election by the following persons:—Hubert Hébert, Xavier Letourneau, &c. * * * But that none of them received notice of the accusation, in conformity with section 270 of the Electoral Act of Quebec."

This, Mr. Speaker, is the only document which exists, and it is in virtue of this document that they wish to dismiss this employé. This is what the Federal Act says, clause 104:

"104. Every other person than the candidate found guilty of fraudulent practices in any proceedings in which, after notice of accusation and who has had occasion to be heard, cannot, during the eight years following the date of his conviction either be elected to sit in the House of Commons, nor vote at any election of a member for the House of Commons, nor fill any office in the gift of the Crown or Government of Canada."

In either of these cases where fraudulent practices may be in contravention with the Local Act or even with the Federal Act, it cannot be said that this officer has not a right to retain his position, for Mr. Hébert does not hold his place in virtue of an appointment from the Crown or Government of Canada. But as a matter of fact it is clearly established that he has not been found guilty. He has been prosecuted, the case is pending, and the judgment has not been rendered. I think that the hon. member from L'Islet, whom I am very sorry to say is absent from his seat was wrong in raising this question, and to invoke on the head of this man, who is not declared guilty, the thunderbolts of the Government.

Mr. LAURIER (Translation). In the absence of my hon. friend the member from L'Islet, I will endeavor to relate the facts which I think have not been correctly stated by the hon. member from Montmagny (Mr. Landry). The member from L'Islet brought no accusation against Mr. Hébert. He made no motion in the House, and my hon. friend knows perfectly well that all that the hon. member from L'Islet did, was to ask the Government, in terms which the Government allows, to enquire if the Government had been informed that Mr. Hébert had been reported by the Election Judges for fraudulent practices at the last election. Those are the exact words of the motion made by the member from L'Islet. In this motion the member from L'Islet asserts nothing either as to the guilt or innocence of Mr. Hébert. He contented himself in simply asking the Government if it had been informed that one of its agents had been reported by the Judges as guilty of corrupt practices. I am not prepared to say, myself, and the member from L'Islet did not say, that Mr. Hébert was either guilty or not guilty. I am not here to defend Mr. Hébert either. My hon. friend has nothing to do with offending him. He says he is innocent, and I have only to hope that he is innocent. But, at all events, there is a strong presumption of guilt against him, when three Judges report that he has been found guilty of fraudulent practices. I ought to say also in justice to the member from L'Islet that he has not in any manner invoked the thunderbolts of the Government on the head of Mr. Hébert; but with a good deal of reason, as I believe, he invited the attention of the Government to the fact that one of its officers had been reported by the Judges of Election guilty of fraudulent practices. Certainly, if these facts are true, the attention of the Government ought to be drawn to this matter. But I will go further. What entirely justifies the motion which he has made is, that the Government had anticipated this motion, and that the Minister of Railways has declared that he took cognizance of this judgment, and that he had referred the matter to the Minister of Justice. Under these circumstances I think that my hon. friend had no right to bring against the hon. member from L'Islet the accusation contained in this motion and, I think, in justice to him, he ought to reestablish the facts.

Mr. LANDRY. I regret not to have been understood by the hon. member from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and I regret that he has not taken the trouble to read the question made by the hon. member from L'Islet. He would have found that the hon. member from L'Islet affirms a fact. Here is what he says:

"The Government has been informed that one, named Hubert Hébert, employed as agent and station master at Montmagny, has been recently reported by the Judges of Election as having been found guilty of corrupt practices in the last election, and in such case has the Government taken or does it intend to take any action in the matter?"

Now, what does the judgment say? That fraudulent practices appear to have been committed. Not that they have been committed, but that they appear to have been committed, and the judgment adds that the notice of accusation was not given to any of the accused in conformity with section 270. That is to say that not one of these persons was afforded an opportunity of defending himself; and it is on those facts that the hon. member from L'Islet declares, ex cathedra, if I may so express myself, that Mr. Hubert Hébert was reported by the Judges of Election as having been found guilty of fraudulent practices. The simple exposition of these facts, rendered public by the documents which I have just cited, establishes conclusively that I was not wrong in accusing the hon. member from L'Islet, but that he was very wrong in accusing Mr. Hubert Hébert of having committed fraudulent practices when nothing of the kind appears, neither in the report of the Judges nor in the judgment itself, to establish the truth of these charges. With these observations I think I have perfectly reestablished the facts, and that the House will award me a verdict in the debate which has just taken place.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all documents and correspondence relating to the seizure of tobacco from the brig Adeline, and the enquiry held the 17th to 21st May, at the request of Messrs. Lemesurier & Fils respecting the said seizure.—(Mr. Valin.)

Copies of all petitions and correspondence relative to the rights of settlers or squatters on the Railway Reserve, Vancouver Island.—(Mr. Gordon.)

Copies of all correspondence relating to the building of a breakwater on the west side of Liverpool Bay, between any person or persons whomsoever; also all petitions, all surveys and reports by Government engineers, with an estimated cost of the same, from 1870 to 1882.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Return showing all sums paid to defray expenses of the late elections to this House, in the different electoral districts throughout the Dominion; showing the returning officers and deputy returning officers to whom the same were paid, and distinguishing the different services for which the same were allowed.—(Mr. McCraney.)

Copies of all documents (complaints, reports of enquiries, &c.), relating to a seizure of tobacco quite recently made on the premises of Mr. N. Bernatchez, and other merchants of Montmagny, under the law which permits a seizure of contraband tobacco wheresoever found.—(Mr. Landry.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. GIGAULT moved that the petition of His Grace the Archbishop of Quebec and others, read and received on the 28th March inst., be referred to the Committee appointed to enquire into the best means of regulating the sale of Intoxicating Liquors.

Motion agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the House adjourns, I should like to enquire from the hon. Minister of Railways, when he proposes to introduce his Bill respecting the Consolidated Railway Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that I would have done so before, but several points have cropped up, as the hon. gentleman knows, in the Railway Committee, and I deferred the introduction of the measure until a little later, in order to embrace anything which, according to the general impression, ought to be embraced in that Bill. That is the only reason for having deferred its introduction.

Mr. MULOCK. I presume nothing will happen to prevent such legislation taking place this Session.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; the Bill will be introduced.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:35 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 3rd April, 1883.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LANDRY introduced Bill (No. 100) to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in appeal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). The only explanation I can give is in the very title of the Bill. If the hon. members will please wait until the second reading of the Bill takes place, they will have an opportunity of voting upon the principle.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the Bill says to restrain the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but does not explain how far it is to be restrained. It is, therefore, perfectly indefinite.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). It only refers to the Civil Law.

Mr. BLAKE. Which civil law, that of Quebec, or that of the other Provinces?

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). To them all.

Bill read the first time.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 46) further to amend an Act intituled: An Act relating to Banks and Banking, and the several Acts amending the same.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That the House go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). In continuing this adjourned debate, I desire to notice that the tone of the Ministerial benches on the question of the Tariff has considerably altered since last year. The hon. Minister of Finance himself struck a lower key, and the hon. member for Cardwell, who followed him, indulged in a series of explanations which satisfied me that hon. gentlemen opposite do not feel as comfortable in regard to the Tariff as they did some years ago. The hon. member for Cardwell, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, besides being apologetic, was somewhat sympathetic as well. He could not refrain, in the first place, from boasting of the victory in June last, nor could he fail in reminding us of some of the unfortunate defeats which occurred on that occasion. As Mark Antony came to bury Caesar, not to praise him, so the faces absent from the Opposition benches gladdened his heart exceedingly. I am not going to follow this line, and to call the attention of the House to the defeats which at former Elections overtook hon. members holding the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, such as the defeat the hon. First Minister met in 1878, that which overtook the late Sir George Cartier in 1872, and the necessity Sir Francis Hincks was under to seek a constituency in Vancouver's Island a few years ago. The hon. member for Cardwell, after having satisfied himself that his party achieved a great victory in June last, turned his attention to the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Brant, and was kind enough to censure him for having referred to the fact that the policy of the Conservative party, while in power, from 1868 to 1873, was a policy that involved increased expenditure and inflicted serious burdens upon the country. The hon. member for South Brant, on this occasion, appeared to me to merely notice the fact that history repeats itself. He referred to the increased expenditure from 1867 to 1873; then to the fact that from 1873 to 1878 the increase was very slight; and finally, coming down to the second Conservative period, from 1878 to 1882, he found that the old extravagant policy of the Conservatives, which had added $10,000,000 to our expenditure in the first period, had begun again, and was doing its work by adding, in the short period of five years, $4,000,000 more to our expenditure. This is but history repeating itself, and is an historical fact which will always be found repeated in connection with Conservative Administration. It is a serious matter that the expenditure of this country should increase so rapidly. We are not so large a nation that we can afford to increase the burden of expenditure at the rate at which we are now adding to it. We are not so prolific in wealth or inexhaustible in resources that this increase can go on with impunity. This extraordinary expenditure means something more, it implies a heavy burden on the country while it is comparatively prosperous; it means that, should a reversal take place and prosperity in the least degree slacken, and our exchequer is not so buoyant in the next five years as it has been in the past, we have incurred an expenditure which it will be difficult to reduce, and that when the revenue shrinks the expenditure will remain the same, to our serious embarrassment. Let us see of what character the expenditure is. Is it a small matter that from 1878 to 1882 our expenditure should have increased from $23,500,000 to $27,500,000? Or is it a small matter that we should incur obligations of which no Finance Minister can very well relieve himself? Let us look at this expenditure somewhat in detail. The hon. member for Cardwell felt justified in defending the increased expenditure from 1868 to 1873. He said that we then, in 1868, had four Provinces, and the enlarged demands, owing to the enlargement of the country, necessitated increased expenditure. He was apologetic for that expenditure—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Not at all.

Mr. ROSS. When he came to the economy practised by the late Administration from 1873 to 1878, he was disposed to censure that economy. Extravagance in the first period pleased him, but he could do nothing except blame the economy practised during the following period. When he came down to 1878, and saw the expenditure of his hon. friend in the first period repeated, he again had recourse to apologies and explanations. But can the hon. gentleman justify the enormous expenditure in the ordinary and controllable departments of this country? Can he justify the fact that while, in 1878, the controllable expenditure was only $6,542,510, and that, in 1882, it had swelled to $8,293,161? Can he justify an increase, if we include all the items included in 1878, of $2,262,473 in five years? If we examine the details we will find that the expenditure was not incurred in a direction absolutely necessary for the interests of this country. Let him look, for instance, on the expenditure on Civil Government. In 1878, it was $823,369; in 1882, $946,031—an increase of $122,000 in five years in that Department alone. And the amount this year is $1,109,100. That is a Department in which, if the Government were disposed to be economical, they might have exercised great economy; and it will be noticed that in the expenditure for Civil Government the expenditure was not incurred for objects necessary for the prosperity of the country. For instance, in the matters of salaries alone the increased expenditure for five years amounted to $106,579. Nor is the increased expenditure confined to 1880 alone. We still have the facts before us, although the hon. Finance Minister tells us that we expended $50,000 less last year than in 1881, that the interest account of this country increased very largely the last five years. We have the fact that the charges for collecting the revenue have increased very largely, and also that in the ordinary and controllable expenditure the increase is $2,250,000. With these facts before us, it is time the Government should be warned. It is time they should apply the pruning knife, with much greater vigor, to the extravagance which characterizes their policy. Will hon. gentlemen opposite justify the large increase in immigration expenditure? What does this increased expenditure indicate? It indicates simply that the policy of the Government in regard to the settlement of the North-West has been comparatively a failure. It indicates that, notwithstanding they have free lands to give to immigrants, they are obliged to incur a heavy expenditure in order to settle these immigrants. Where can you find, in the policy of the United States, that they incurred such an enormous expenditure for Immigration in the settlement of their prairies? Nowhere. But here you have the fact that the Government now ask $500,000 to settle immigrants on their prairies said to be fertile. The Government feel that by their policy in the North-West they have handicapped the settler, and must provide additional facilities and offer additional inducements to secure settlement.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

I need not enter into the various details of the increased expenditure; it has already been done by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). We have an alarming increase in Superannuation, an increase, according to the present estimate, of about $88,000. We have an increase of $161,000 in Militia; and we have an increase, according to the Estimates now before us, of nearly $500,000 in Public Works. In referring to the increase in the Public Works, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that, under the old Administration, the late Minister of Finance was very economical in spending public moneys for public improvements. True, it may be said; and perhaps the hon. gentleman was right when he said so, that the necessities of the revenue required considerable economy in that Department, as well as in any other Department; but the hon. Minister of Finance, in proposing this large estimate, justified the expenditure on public works, on the ground that at least, he said, those hon. members in whose constituencies public institutions were erected, would not complain. Sir, that is one of the grounds on which we do complain. The hon. Minister of Public Works in the late Administration, erected public buildings on some principle. In towns of certain population, with certain demands upon the Government for public conveniences, public improvements were made, custom houses and post offices were built. Under the present Administration, there seems to be no principle. Send a representative from a constituency to this House, and the probabilities are, that if that hon. member is only importunate enough, and brings sufficient pressure to bear upon the Government, his constituencies will be favored with a custom house or a post office, or some other public improvement. We object to expenditure on public works in this manner, on the ground that the Government have no right to spend the public moneys of this country in order to strengthen themselves in the various constituencies, and to give to their friends, when they go back for election, an additional plea on which to ask for the confidence of the electors. Is it true, are we safe in assuming, shall I dare to infer, from the remarks of the late Minister of Public Works, from the remarks of the present Minister of Public Works in his late tour through Ontario a year or two ago, that that is the policy of the Government, and that this increased expenditure of $500,000, over and above the expenditure of the late Administration, is so much money to be spent in the various constituencies of Ontario in order that the hon. gentlemen opposite, who know right well that before this Parliament expires they may have to do things that will much interfere with their popularity—that they may then have a ground for appealing to the public by pleading the liberality of the present Administration? Then we come to the expenditure upon Indians, an expenditure which the hon. Minister of Finance sought to justify on the ground that unless we were liberal with the Indians there would be bloodshed in the North-West. He said: "Would any of you refuse to feed and clothe those Indians and to provide for them liberally rather than that they should be treated as they are treated in the United States?" No one proposes to deal with the Indians on any other than a liberal and humane ground. But does that liberality, does that humanity, justify an increase of $500,000? He knows the Indians are not very numerous. How is it that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot feed, clothe and provide for these Indians as well as was done under the late Administration? Is it possible, Sir, that there is some mismanagement? Is it possible that the hon. First Minister does not properly look after this Department? If any proof was needed to show that there is at least strong suspicion that this Department is grossly mismanaged, we have that proof in the fact that under the late Administration all the Indians in the North-West were fed, clothed, and provided for, for the sum of $421,503, whereas last year it required the sum of $1,183,414 to pay for this very same service.

Now, we come to another Department on which the hon. member for Cardwell bestowed a great deal of attention. After apologizing for the increased expenditure in some of the Departments referred to, he planted himself on the administration and collection of revenue, and he took the ground that because, under the late Administration, the expenditure sometimes increased while the revenue decreased, there must be some extravagance, and that, under the present Administration, because the expenditure did not increase as rapidly as the revenue there must consequently be economy. Is that a logical position to take? Let us enquire into some of the expenditures incurred by the late Administration in the collection of revenue. I find that the expenditure for the collection of revenue increased, under the late Administration, to the extent of $564,682. Now, for what was that expenditure incurred? Why that increase? Prince Edward Island had just come into Confederation—that necessitated our taking charge of the post offices in that Island. The post offices in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that had been way offices were changed to general post offices, and a large expense had to be incurred. The total increase in the entire collection of the revenue under the late Administration, which was $564,682, was made up by the increase of $337,668 in the Post Office Department, and $96,484 in the Weights and Measures Department. We are told by the hon. gentlemen opposite that the increased expenditure in the Post Office Department was incurred in order to provide increased postal facilities for the people of this country. Is that statement correct? Let us see. I find the entire expenditure in that Department, from 1878 to 1882, increased to $348,991; that in all that entire increase only the sum of $83,482 was incurred for increased mail service, and that the balance, $265,507, was incurred in increasing the salaries of the postmasters and other expenditure in connection with that Department; that is to say, for every dollar expended in giving the people increased postal accommodation during the last five years, more than $3 were incurred in increasing the salaries of postmasters and post office officials, and providing for their comfort. Is that an increase which hon. gentlemen can justify? For the Province of Ontario the increase, since 1878, is $214,569, and of that increase only $39,434 went for increased mail service. In the Province of Quebec the increase was $58,397, and only $7,087 went to increase the mail service of the country. Take the Province of Manitoba, where it is said an enormous expenditure has been incurred. The increase in providing additional mail facilities for that Province was $31,980, whereas the whole increase in the postal expenditure of the Province of Manitoba amounted to $62,902. That is, for every dollar expended in Manitoba to provide additional facilities for that Province we have $2 spent in other directions, $22,457 alone being spent in increasing the post office salaries in that Province. So we have this fact that, notwithstanding the necessities of the mail service and the large increase in the expenditure for the Post Office Department, that increase was not necessitated in order to provide an increase of postal facilities for the people of this country. Besides the increases in the collection of revenue and in the expenditure, we find, on close investigation, that hon. gentlemen opposite have a peculiar way of covering up their increased expenditure. For instance, we have $500,000 charged to Capital Account in the Dominion Lands surveys, which formerly was charged to Revenue Account and to the Consolidated Fund. We have large sums paid for rolling stock on the Intercolonial Railway charged to Capital Account which formerly was charged to Revenue Account, so that it is only by the strictest scrutiny, and with considerable difficulty, that we can accurately ascertain the annual increase in the expenditure of the country from year to year. Take these two items as samples. For instance, if you look at the expenditure last year for Dominion surveys in Manitoba you will find $1,500 paid to Sir Alexander Galt for travelling expenses, incurred by him on a trip to that Province. What had the trip of Sir Alexander Galt to the Province of Manitoba, about a year ago, to do with Dominion land surveys. I hear, I do not know whether I am rightly informed or not, that Sir Alexander's trip was to improve his financial condition; at all events, he invested largely in the coal mines in the Souris district, and his son resigned a position under the Government to act as manager of the Souris Coal Mining Company, in which Sir Alexander Galt is a large shareholder; and, so far as I can see, from the Public Accounts, Sir Alexander Galt drew this amount of $1,500 for travelling expenses to Manitoba while this little item of business, no doubt, among others, was being transacted. Then, we have the hon. Minister of Railways going on a trip to British Columbia. The country is charged with $1,600 in connection with that trip. The country is also charged in connection with the hon. gentleman's trip to England the same year the sum of $500; but on looking for that item hon. members are almost amused to find it entered under Capital Account, Pacific Railway section, British Columbia. Then if you look at the expenditures under the head of Capital Account, Eagle River section, Pacific Railway, there appears $800 charged on account of Pullman car expenses incurred by His Excellency on his trip to Manitoba, and $1,950.73 for the repairing of the car "Keowaydin," charged to the same account. Is that the honest way to place before the people the actual expenditure, the ordinary expenditure, of this country? What had the repairs to the Pullman car "Keowaydin" to do with the construction of the Eagle River section of the Pacific Railway? And yet those items, and similar items, can be found in the Public Accounts. I find $1,522.73 charged to Capital Account, Lachine Canal, and $1,850 charged to Capital Account, Welland Canal; and when we examine what the charges are, we find they were sums of money paid to La Minerve for publishing the report of the Chief Engineer of Canals. Instead of the amount being charged under ordinary expenditure, where it could be easily discovered and closely criticised, it is hidden away under Capital Account. And what is strangest of all, in endeavoring to arrive at a correct result as to what the expenditure of the country is, in endeavoring to expose this enormous expenditure, and while pointing to the Public Accounts and showing that the expenditure has increased to the extent which the Public Accounts disclose, we will be told, we are told over and over again by the hon. Minister of Finance, that the expenditure per head is 13 cts. less now than it was in 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The average from 1874 to 1878.

Mr. ROSS. And that if you add the deficits under the Mackenzie Administration to the ordinary expenditure, and deduct the surplus under the present Administration from the ordinary receipts, you will find, he says, that the expenditure is 13 cts. per head less than under the old Administration. Is that a fair way to ascertain the true expenditure? Is it not a fact that the money which the hon. gentleman calls surplus, was collected in the same way and from the same constituency as the money which covers ordinary expenditure; and that the tax-payer is taxed day by day for this surplus the same as he is taxed for the ordinary expenditure of the country. If that be true, on what ground can the hon. gentleman exclude the surplus from the ordinary collection? But let us examine this matter a little more closely. If you take up the report of the hon. Minister of Customs, who has made an assessment of the amount per capita paid by the people of this country, we will see how the expenditure, and how the Tariff bears upon the tax-payer. According to this report, the people paid, in 1878, $3.46 per head; in 1879, $3.50. This was the first year of the new Tariff, and a slight increase, of course, took place. In 1880, the people paid $3.83 per head; the next year, $4.25; and the next year, $5.02, so that the report of the hon. Minister of Customs reveals the extent of the burdens imposed on the taxpayers, and goes to show that, under this Tariff, the payment made by the people of the country has increased at least $1.50 per head since the Tariff was imposed. If you will notice in the same report how the burdens are distributed over the various Provinces, the force of the argument will become still clearer. For instance, in 1873 the amount of Customs duties received from Ontario amounted to $3.06 per head; in 1882 it had increased to $3.82. In 1879, the people of Quebec paid $3.97 per head; in 1882, $6.74. In 1879, the people of Nova Scotia paid $3.05 per head; in 1882, $3.99. The people of New Brunswick paid $3.67 per head in 1879, now they pay $4.54. The people of Manitoba, who are receiving the special attention of the hon. Minister of Finance just now, paid, in 1879, $9.14; in 1882, $16. The people of British Columbia paid $10.32 per head in 1879; last year, $13.73. Here we have the fact established beyond dispute that there has been an enormous increase in the expenditure, and that the expenditure presses, and must press heavily upon the people. When you add from $1 to $5 per head to the burdens imposed on the people, hon. gentlemen opposite, in their self-complacency, will say they do not feel it. That is impossible. It is no answer for the hon. Minister of Finance to say that, if you add the deficits and deduct the surpluses it will appear that the people pay 13 cts. per head less, than they paid between 1874 and 1878. As further evidence that our position in this respect is one which requires serious consideration, let us turn to the expenditure of the United States, and make a few comparisons. We find that, under the head of ordinary expenditure, what is called civil and miscellaneous, the people of the United States are taxed at the rate of $1.10 per head, that is to carry on the ordinary government of that great Republic. The people of Canada, taking the same departments of expenditure, are taxed to the extent of $2.03 per head; or, in other words, they are called upon to pay almost $2 for every $1 exacted from the people of the United States. If you take the expenditure for all purposes, the rate in the United States is $5.19, and in Canada $6.20. Besides, the expenditure in Canada has increased at a much more rapid ratio than the expenditure in the United States. From 1881 to 1882 there was an actual reduction of $25,177,962 in the expenditure of the United States, whereas in the same period there was an increase of $1,500,000 in the expenditure of the Dominion of Canada. This fact itself should be a sufficient warning to us that if we are going to hold our own and compete with the American Republic in all respects, we must not heap upon the people of this country intolerable burdens, weighing them down and crippling their resources. I do not, Sir, propose to follow the hon. member for Cardwell, or the hon. Minister of Finance, any further in the matter of expenditure. I think the fact already stated, that, in the last five years, the expenditure has increased over $4,000,000, is in itself so convincing a proof that hon. gentlemen opposite have not managed the affairs of this country economically, that further details are unnecessary. Nor need I add the additional fact that the ordinary controllable expenditure, which is quite within their reach, quite within their direct control, has increased $2,250,000; nor need I say a word more to establish beyond contradiction the extravagant tendencies of the present party in power. The hon. member for Cardwell having disposed of this extravagance, and after having apologized for this extravagance to his own satisfaction, expressed sympathy for the hon. member for South Brant, because, I suppose, the hon. gentleman assumed that the hon. member for South Brant now occupied the position of an advocate for a Revenue Tariff, after having, as the hon. member for Cardwell said, advocated a Protective Tariff years ago. Sir, the hon. member for Cardwell might have spared his sympathy in this particular instance. The hon. gentleman himself is to-day in a very anomalous position, compared with his position of a few years ago. Who in the House does not know that the hon. gentleman was a strong advocate of Free Trade, not more than ten years ago? In the Montreal Gazette, when Sir Richard Cartwright was about to bring down the Tariff of 1874, the hon. gentleman used these words:

“Let our wise men run the Dominion Ship as nearly as possible on the Free Trade plan, and we shall have no fear for her safety.”

These were the views of the hon. gentleman in 1873; and no more radical Free Trade views could be propounded by any hon. gentleman. Nor were these his views as expressed in the public press alone, but in the Dominion Board of Trade, where his views were formulated in that resolution.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; but may I ask where he gets that quotation, the first one, which he has just given.

Mr. ROSS. From Hansard.

Mr. WHITE. I was not in Parliament in 1874, and could not be so reported in Hansard.

Mr. ROSS. What I was trying to say—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman correctly understood me or not—was, that not only did the hon. gentleman state these views in the Montreal Gazette, in 1873, but before the Dominion Board of Trade in 1874; and I think that is what I did say.

Mr. WHITE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say I had said, they should still steer the Ship of State on Free Trade principles; and I wanted to know where he got that quotation.

Mr. ROSS. It is taken from the Montreal Gazette of 1873; and the quotation which I am going to read just now is from the report of the Dominion Board of Trade of 1874, and we will see whether the two correspond. We would not expect that the hon. gentleman, between 1873 and 1874, would modify his views very much. I find that his resolution of 1874 expresses very strong Free Trade sentiments, and it is very natural to suppose that the previous year—and the hon. gentleman can see the force of the argument—the Montreal Gazette would have contained the very same views. Here is the resolution of the hon. gentleman in 1874:

“That without forming any opinion, some of the details of the present Customs' Tariff, and the anomalies which are inevitable in all Tariffs, this Board is of opinion that no change should be made in it unless the exigencies of the public service demand large revenues, and that in such case any increase to be made should be in accordance with the principle of the present Customs' Tariff.”

That was a Revenue Tariff:

“Which while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion affords incidental protection to its manufactures.”

Precisely what we said then, and still say now:

“That this Board is of the opinion, that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important alike to its commerce and to its manufactures, and that no changes should be made in the Tariff no demanded by the absolute exigencies of the revenue.”

Will the hon. gentleman note that last clause:

“No changes should be made in the Tariff not demanded by the absolute exigencies of the revenue.”

Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the changes made in the Tariff regarding agricultural implements, sleighs, and carriages, and ploughs, are demanded by "the exigencies of the revenue?" The hon. gentleman will not say so, nor any hon. gentleman who sits on that side of the House. Let us now—having put the hon. gentleman right regarding his position, and reciprocated his sympathy for the hon. member for South Brant—proceed to notice some of the apologies which we have heard so pathetically made by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, in this present debate. In the first place, the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Cardwell, both apologized for an adverse balance of trade. I remember, Sir, that when, in 1880, the hon. Minister of Finance, posed as a great financier, because, having placed his hand on the commerce of Canada, he had increased our exports and reduced our imports, establishing an equilibrium, and this was one of the strong points in this Tariff, the hon. member for Cardwell thought that this was a great achievement, and all the members on the back benches cheered this achievement of the hon. Minister of Finance as one of the most wonderful feats of financial skill ever performed in this House, or anywhere else. Well, Sir, things are very different from what they were in 1880; and the hon. gentleman who had, by one wave of his hand, kept the exports of foreign countries from Canada, and by another wave of his hand sent the produce of Canada across the seas, is to-day apologising for and explaining away an adverse balance of trade of $17,000,000. And in his investigation allow me to congratulate him on having discovered what political economists believe to be the true solution of this financial problem, namely: there is and may be an adverse balance of trade, and yet a country may be progressing, because freight and charges, and other items too numerous to mention, may enter into the account, and make up the balance, though it does not appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns. Let me notice further, that the explanation of the hon. Minister of Finance did not satisfy the hon. member for Cardwell. This temple into which all their friends are invited to enter and worship—this shrine for all their devotees—was to be desecrated the hard facts contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns against this fetish being. The hon. member for Cardwell gave another explanation. His explanation was, that the imports last year were greater on account of including raw materials, which were absorbed in the manufactures of this country; and although this did not appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns, yet, after all, the balance of trade might not be so bad a thing. What was such a bad thing when we were in power, and what was then driving the country to ruin and proving so disastrous, was now a different matter; and the hon. gentlemen are to-day face to face with the fact, that they are just as powerless to regulate the balance of trade, as to do anything which political economists know right well cannot be done by the legislation of this, or of any other Parliament. The hon. gentleman apologized, in the second place, for an increase of imports into this country. I remember very well when the hon. Minister of Finance posed again, and exhorted the House as to the great loss which was inflicted on Canada because of our vast imports. Let me quote his words, for it is important that we should understand accurately the lines of difference and agreement. On pages five and six of his Budget Speech for that year the hon. gentleman said:

"Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. They have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing, in my judgment, that they ought to be still further diminished. It appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing our imports from all parts of the world."

The hon. gentleman turned his attention to this great feat of financial enterprise; he was going to reduce the imports from all parts of the world, as he considered it a great disaster to this country that they had gone on increasing. How far did he succeed in his attempt? In 1879, when he began this great feat, the whole imports of Canada amounted to $30,341,000, while, in 1882, when he had had three years practice in endeavoring to reduce the imports, they had risen to $112,648,000. Like Canute of old, who stood by the seaside while the tide was coming in, and thought that he could control the approaching waters, this hon. gentleman stood in the face of the large import trade which he believed was bringing disaster into the country, and he said: "I will prohibit these imports; I will stop them coming in." But in spite of his remonstrances, in spite of all his efforts to accomplish this great feat, we find that, as the tide ignored the royal mandate in olden times, so the import trade advanced, until now the hon. gentleman will be overwhelmed with the vast increase which I have pointed out. But not only was he unable to reduce the general volume of imports into the country, but to reduce the imports from any particular country. For instance, we find that the imports from the United States, in 1880, were $29,000,000, while, in 1882, they were $48,000,000. The imports from France rose from $1,100,000 to over $2,000,000; from Germany, they increased from $500,000 to about $1,500,000, and so on with regard to Spain and Portugal, and some other countries which I need not mention. These figures show that the hon. gentleman failed in accomplishing the feat which he endeavored to accomplish; and I do not wonder that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) apologized for endeavoring to sustain the weak position taken by the hon. Finance Minister. But let us examine the matter a little further. Not only was the hon. gentleman unable to control the imports; but, as was quite natural, he was equally unable to control the exports, for it follows, as a law of political economy, that as the exports of a country increase so do the imports, and that explains why the hon. gentleman was powerless to prevent the increase in imports. By the good crops with which our farmers had been favored with, by the development of the agricultural, mineral, and, to some extent, the timber resources of the country, our exports had increased very largely, and, as a natural consequence, our imports had also increased. Let us notice some of the figures: The total exports from the Dominion of Canada for the three years, from 1876 to 1878, were $236,169,000. The exports for the last three years amounted to $288,339,000, so that we have here a solution of the problem which the hon. gentleman proposed to solve in another way; the average increase of $50,000,000 in the three years explains why such a large increase took place in our imports. But the hon. gentleman was particularly anxious to reduce the imports from the United States, and increase those from Great Britain. This is what he said in 1880:

"I ventured, when submitting that policy, to remark that the resolutions were not aimed specially at any particular country; still as British subjects, owing allegiance as we do to the great Empire of which we form a part, it was designed in the preparation of our Tariff that if we favoured one country more than another, it would be Great Britain. I recollect, and the House will recollect, the objections that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the effort that was made to prove that the Tariff then submitted would operate more injuriously and affect more especially the manufacturers of Great Britain than those of the United States. Some gentlemen, out of Parliament, and through the press, have made various statements upon this matter, but here on the floor of Parliament, where we can bring up facts on both sides, we can arrive at a just and accurate conclusion on the subject; and while we could only speculate last Session with reference to these effects, time has shown, and the evidence lies upon the Table of this House, that instead of operating to the disadvantage of British manufacturers, as compared with those of the United States, it has borne less heavily and affected them less than the manufacturers of the neighboring Republic. These facts go to show that, while the object, design, and intention of the Government was not to legislate directly against any particular country, but in favor of Canadian interests, the effect of the Tariff has been to diminish less the importations from Great Britain than from the United States."

Those were his statements in 1880, and that was one of the grounds upon which his Tariff was submitted, and upon which he attempted to justify it to this House and to the country. Now, how did this Tariff operate which he had promised would reduce the imports from the United States and increase the imports from Great Britain? The imports from Great Britain, in 1880, were $34,461,000; in 1882, they were $50,597,000, or an increase of 47 per cent. The imports from the United States, in 1880, were $29,346,000, and, in 1882, they had risen to $48,289,000, or an increase of 64½ per cent. This is the result which was produced by a Tariff which the hon. gentleman promised would reduce the imports from the United States and press less heavily upon Great Britain than other countries. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman had to apologize in making his explanations, or that he had to call in the assistance of the hon. member for Cardwell, for we have in these figures the evidence of a gigantic failure; instead of the Tariff operating as he said it would operate, it has had the very opposite effect, and the imports from the United States are increasing more rapidly than those from Great Britain. The same result is found if we examine the export pages. In 1878, we exported $45,911,000 to Great Britain; in 1881, $45,274,000, or a decrease of $637,000 in the four years. We exported to the United States, in 1878, $25,244,000, and, in 1881, $47,940,000, so that, in the one case, we have a decrease of $637,000, and, in the other, an increase of $22,695,000. I will not trouble the House with the yearly average under the old Tariff, but I may say that the exports to Great Britain rose from $42,000,000, in the last three years of the Mackenzie Administration, to $48,000,000 during the years 1880-81-82, an increase of 13 per cent. The exports to the United States in the years 1876-77-78 were $27,651,000; in 1880-81-82 they were $39,385,000—an increase of 62½ per cent. Another statement which the hon. gentleman made was, that the Tariff would discriminate against goods imported from the United States, and in favor of those from Great Britain. Here are his words:

“Goods imported from the United States will pay a larger share of the duties than goods from Great Britain.”

And, again, he says:

“Out of the increase to the revenue of $2,100,000, he expected articles imported from the United States would pay $1,027,000, and articles imported from Great Britain would pay $500,000, and the balance would be imposed on articles from other countries.”

What is the substance of that statement of the hon. gentleman? It is simply this: that in introducing his new Tariff, he proposed that for every $1 he levied on goods imported from Great Britain, he would levy $2 on goods imported from the United States. That was his proposition; how has it turned out? The entire increase in the revenue, since 1879, amounts to $5,902,450; and of that increase Great Britain has contributed $4,500,000, and the United States $1,500,000. That is to say, for every $1 of increased revenue which the hon. gentleman has got by his Tariff from goods imported from the United States, he has taken $3 from goods imported from Great Britain. That is the way in which the hon. gentleman's Tariff discriminates against the United States—a Tariff which we were told and believed was not imposed with hostile intentions against Great Britain, and yet which we predicted would discriminate against British goods, as we now find it does, in the proportion of three to one. No wonder that the hon. member for Cardwell was obliged to apologize for the failure in the Tariff. We were told, again, that the Tariff was going to increase the commerce of the country; that it was going to extend our shipping; that we were going to have a Commercial Treaty with France; that our ships were going to be admitted on better terms into France; that in many respects, our commerce was going to be benefited by the

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Tariff. Well, Sir, what do we find? We find the same failure that we have found in other respects, and I will give the hon. gentleman a few figures to show the extent of that failure. In 1878, we built 339 vessels, whereas in 1882 we built 288; there you have a considerable decline. The tonnage, in 1878, amounted to 100,573 tons; in 1882, it amounted to only 60,113 tons. In the five years, from 1873 to 1878, there was an increase of 686 in the number of vessels registered in Canada, and an increase of 259,297 tons on the registration; from the period from 1878 to 1882 there was a decrease in the registration of 157 vessels and 72,238 tons. Under the old Administration there was an increase of 10 per cent. in vessels and 27 per cent. in tonnage, while, during the last five years, under the new Administration, there was a decrease of 2 per cent. in vessels and 5½ per cent. in tonnage. Now, let us see how the Tariff has affected our shipping with respect to values. In 1878, we sold ninety-three vessels, valued at $1,218,145; last year we sold forty-three vessels, valued at $403,311. So that, both in the amount of shipping built, and in the amount of shipping sold, as well as in the tonnage of the vessels owned by the people of Canada, there has been an extraordinary decrease. But hon. gentlemen opposite may say that wooden ships built in Canada are being replaced more than formerly by iron vessels. Well, we find that Norway, which uses wooden shipping, almost entirely, has increased her tonnage enormously during the last few years; and if hon. gentlemen wish to extend this paternal policy of theirs to our shipping as they profess to wish to do to other industries, why do they not offer a bounty for every ton of shipping built, and prohibit the importation of goods to Canada in any but Canadian ships. It would be part of the old policy of keeping Canada for the Canadians and avoiding all business negotiations or commercial intercourse with other nations. It would be carrying out the same policy which the hon. gentleman proposes, when he offers a bounty of $1.50 on every ton of iron smelted in Canada. But there was another matter for which the hon. gentleman had to apologise. We were told, in 1878, that if hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, they would preserve the home market for the Canadian farmer, so that not only would he get better prices for the goods he had to sell, but he would have the monopoly of that home market. Well, hon. gentlemen have now to explain how it is that this has not been done, and every explanation proves conclusively that, in this respect also, the Tariff has been a failure. In 1878, we imported 5,120 horned cattle, and, in 1882, we imported 7,112, a very large increase. Of horses, we imported 1,587 in 1878, and 2,492 last year. And this is not the only proof that our farmers do not possess a monopoly of the home market; but we have the additional proof that we have now to seek a foreign market for a larger amount of our production than we had in 1878. We found a foreign market, in 1878, for $14,000,000 worth of animals and their produce; last year, we found a foreign market for $20,454,000 worth. In 1878, we found a foreign market for $19,623,000 worth of agricultural products; last year, we found a foreign market for $31,038,000 worth. If I went into details on this point, I would show that the home market has not been, as the hon. gentleman said it would be, sufficient to consume the produce of our Canadian farmers. We were told that after this Tariff was put into operation, the Canadian farmer, instead of sending his produce to Liverpool, would find a market for it at home. That prediction has not been realized. The produce has to go to Liverpool as it always had, and this Tariff does not give the Canadian farmers control of the Canadian market any more than before. Not only did the hon. gentleman promise them a monopoly of the home market, but also better prices for what they had to sell. We had the admission from the hon. member for Cardwell the other night that the Liverpool market controls the wheat market of Canada. I am glad he made that admission. It was our contention for years, but the admission came slowly from hon. gentlemen opposite. It was only when they found that they were face to face with the fact that prices had declined, that they were obliged to admit that the Liverpool market controls the Canadian market as it does every market of the world. I have here a table showing the average price obtained for grain for five years, from 1873 to 1878, and from that time to the present, and what do we find. We find that for the five years, from 1873 to 1878, the average price of wheat was $1.25 a bushel. The average for last year, according to the report of the Bureau of Industries and Statistics of Ontario, was $1.14. The average for No. 1 spring wheat for the same period was $1.15. For last year, it was $1.17. The average price of barley was 72½ cts., and for last year, 71 cts. The average price of oats was 41 cts., against 43 cts.; and of peas, 76 cts., against 72 cts. The wool crop of 1878 was sold for 28½ cts.; last year it was sold for 23¼ cts. So that these hon. gentlemen are powerless, as we said they would be, to regulate the prices in our Canadian market, and give us their promised advance. I remember the hon. Minister of Railways, in his speech delivered at London, told the farmers that under the Tariff they proposed to introduce, the farmers, instead of sending their grain and produce to Liverpool, would find a home consumption and a home market for it. He said any one could see that a home market was the best. The farmers, however, send their products where they always did, and are obliged to accept the prices fixed in the markets of the world; and our hon. Finance Minister is powerless to regulate their prices. I do not wonder these gentlemen have to apologise. What do we find in the report of the Bureau of Statistics and Industries recently issued? We find that, if the farmers of Ontario alone received for the last half of last year the average price of the first half, they would have realized $14,000,000 more for their crop than they did. Shall we hold the hon. Finance Minister responsible for that great loss? Why did he not, by the power his friends asserted he possessed, and which, I think, the hon. gentleman himself claimed, at least by implication, see that the prices which ruled in the first half of last year, when the farmers had but little to sell, rule in the last half of that year when they had all their crops to dispose of? I think the farmers of Ontario will hold the hon. gentleman responsible for this vast decline in prices, for the promises which he made some time ago. But, besides being unable to keep the home market for our farmers, he has been equally powerless to keep the home market for our manufacturers. We imported this past year to the extent of $20,000,000 more than in 1878, of agricultural implements, furniture, cottons, woollens, &c. Were not our Canadian manufacturers told by the hon. First Minister: Place us in power, and we will see you are so fixed that you can produce these articles to replace imported goods in our market. The hon. gentleman came into power, and to-day the hon. member for Cardwell makes a list of the vast importations to the United States, to show that the position of the United States being similar to ours, it was quite reasonable this vast increase in imports should take place in Canada as well. That is the apology for the position which hon. gentlemen opposite took in regard to this Tariff. We held that no Revenue Tariff could, or should, prevent the importation of foreign goods. Hon. gentlemen opposite offered to the public, by the mode by which they presented this subject, to give to our Canadian manufacturers full control of our market, and, in this respect, their policy has been a failure. There is one respect, however, in which their policy has been a success, and that is in reducing the export of manufactured goods. How is it that while we exported, in 1878, $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, we now export only $3,000,000 worth? Perhaps the hon. member for Cardwell will explain that. In one particular line, this decline is most remarkable—the article of sewing machines. In 1878, we exported 27,769 sewing machines, valued at $215,809; last year we exported 22,563, valued at $159,643. How is it that the Tariff, which was going to contribute so largely to the success of sewing machine manufacture, has produced this result. Not only has it diminished the exports, but it has also decreased the imports. As Josh Billings says, it is a poor rule or a poor mule that does not work both ways, and this one works both ways. The imports, in 1878, of sewing machines, was 2,133, valued at $37,983; in 1881, they were 20,076, valued at $307,177. There you have this double-acting and high-pressure Tariff increasing the imports of sewing machines very largely—and it has done so apparently all along the line—and reducing the exports. Are these the promises made to the people in 1878? In the figures placed before us, in the facts displayed on every page of the Trade and Navigation Returns, we have the falsification of those promises. It is our duty to hold them to their promises. The people will hold them to their promises; and when the people know, as know they will, in due time, that this Tariff has failed, that it has falsified the promises which its authors alleged it would fulfil, we will come back to a true system, to a true fiscal policy, such as the interests of this country require. The hon. member for Cardwell proceeded to deal with the sugar question, as one on which he is, to a certain extent, an authority. In dealing with that, he charged the hon. member for North Brant with not making any reference to the matter, although, as he said, the figures had been placed in his hands. I wish to inform the hon. member for Cardwell that the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite were not received by the hon. member for Brant, until after he had finished his speech, and was unable to refer to the matter. I propose to make a few remarks upon it, accepting the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. Let us see to what conclusion they lead. According to their own figures, the average price of sugar in New York last year was $9.35. From that we deduct the drawback of $3.20, and 1 per cent. of that, leaving a net cost in New York of $6.18. The hon. gentleman deducted only $3.15 but should have deducted $3.17. If we add to the $6.18 the duties that would have been paid under the old Tariff, we will find that the cost to the consumer in New York would be $8.72½. The average cost last year, according to the figures, in Montreal, was $8.88 per 100 lbs., leaving a difference in favor of the New York refiner of 15½ cts.; or, if I put it in another form, you have a difference in favor of the man who purchases his sugar in New York of 15½ cts. per 100 lbs. In order to make out a case for themselves, the hon. member for Cardwell added two or three items which should not enter into the calculations at all; first, the item of 30 cts. per 100 lbs. for freight. Everybody knows that New York is as easy and as near a distributing point for a large portion of Canada as Montreal, and that Ontario, and Manitoba, and the Maritime Provinces can get their sugar from New York just as cheaply, as far as freight is concerned, as they can from Montreal. So we may fairly strike out this item of 30 cts. Then the hon. gentleman has a further item of 50 cts. for commissions. We know there are no commissions paid when you purchase your sugar from the New York refiner any more than when you purchase it from Montreal.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There is no question about commissions. The additional 50 cts. is arrived at in this way: When we had no refinery in Canada we took the price in Canada of the New York sugar — we had a graduated Tariff, and we took the average price in Canada for the same year, and we find there is a difference of 50 cts., which went to the profit of the merchant in this country.

Mr. ROSS. We have the same commission merchants now that we had then. I am now quoting the authority of a gentleman who deals largely in sugar, and he pays no more commission now than he did before; therefore, I say, that the commission does not enter into the calculation at all, and the hon. gentleman only put it there in order to make a case for himself, as he had no case without it. Let us see how the figures stand—let us see how this works out. We imported last year 133,788,114 lbs of sugar. Reduce this to granulated, that is, throw off one-eighth, and we find it makes 117,073,350 lbs. Now, there is a loss to the consumer, for if he pays 15½ cts. per 100 lbs. more for that sugar when bought of the Montreal refiner than he would if bought from a New York refiner, you will easily see that the loss to the people of Canada will be $181,463; so that, in order to maintain the sugar industry of which the hon. gentleman is such a champion, the people of Canada paid nearly $200,000 more in an enhanced price for their sugar. But that is not all. This quantity, at the old Tariff, would yield a revenue of $2,979,515; the annual revenue realized, however, was $2,272,896. There was a loss to the revenue, under the present Tariff, of $706,619, which, added to the loss of the consumer, makes the loss to the people of Canada of $888,082. There we have the true inwardness of the sugar industry, and we have it from the hon. gentleman's own figures, by striking out of his calculations the items which no man acquainted with the sugar business, and anxious to make a fair statement of the matter, would include. So that we have not only these hon. gentlemen and their facts exposed—the weakness of their arguments exposed—but we have, to a certain extent, evidence of the amount of money which the people of Canada pay for this large industry which is being fostered under this Tariff. No wonder, then, the hon. gentleman had to apologize for this also. But we have further apologies—and I am only going to refer to one or two more. They were somewhat weakly put. We have hon. gentlemen opposite apologizing now because no Reciprocity Treaty was established between Canada and the United States, or between Canada and other countries. I think it is not so very long since hon. gentlemen opposite said that they were going to do something in the way of treaties. I read in the speech of His Excellency delivered at the close of last Session, something about treaties, where His Excellency is made to say:

“During the recess my hon. Ministers will continue their efforts to secure favorable commercial arrangements between France and Spain. In these endeavors the High Commissioner will receive some hearty support from Her Majesty's Government and the Imperial diplomacy as has already been given to him.

“Such support must greatly strengthen Canada in any negotiations entered into for the improvement of her trade with foreign countries.”

Well, Canada greatly needs to be strengthened in her negotiations with some foreign countries. Evidently there does not seem to be much anxiety on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to enter into any such negotiations. We were told, in 1878, that this Tariff was going to bring about a Reciprocity Treaty at an early date; we were going to force the United States into better terms; and, I think, the hon. Minister of Railways, in a tour to Prince Edward Island, spoke strongly of the necessity of Reciprocity, and he held out to the people of Prince Edward Island a hope that if there was a change of Government there would possibly be a change of relationship between Canada and the United States in this particular. We were also told in the West, and elsewhere, that the only way to get a Reciprocity Treaty would be to have a change of Tariff. Well, have we had a Reciprocity Treaty from the change of Tariff? Does the hon. gentleman now wish to have such a Treaty at all? Have they not changed their tone? Does not the hon. member for Cardwell himself speak very differently on this question to what he spoke and wrote some years ago?

Mr. WHITE. No.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex.)

Mr. ROSS. Well, if he does not, the Conservative press of Ontario, and notably the Toronto Mail, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, hold a very different tone now to what it did some years ago on this question. So that we have here again another failure, and a failure of very great moment too, to the people of Canada, a failure which hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to apologize for, and which they cannot, I think, very conveniently explain. Then hon. gentlemen opposite told us, as late as last year, that this Tariff was going to add so much to the capital and to the business of this country. I have here the closing words of His Excellency's Address, giving one of the reasons why Parliament was dissolved earlier than it should have been. He is made to say:

“I heartily congratulate you upon the rapid and successful development of our manufacturing, agricultural and other industries

“I am, however, advised that their progress would have been still greater were it not that capitalists hesitate to embark their means in undertakings which would be injured, if not destroyed, by a change in the trade and fiscal policy adopted by you in 1879. In order, therefore, to give the people, without further delay, an opportunity of expressing their deliberate opinion on this policy, and, at the same time, to bring into operation the measure for the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, it is my intention to cause this Parliament to be dissolved at an early day.”

Parliament was dissolved at an early day, in order that this capital might come into the country; and the hon. First Minister, speaking on this question in the city of Toronto, said:

“I tell you—and this is not a matter of supposition, but of certainty and knowledge on my part—that there are millions of dollars waiting to be invested in Canada, millions in England, and large sums in the United States, waiting to come to Canada, waiting to be invested in every kind of industry, in mines and in manufactures.”

I think the money is waiting there still, in England and in the United States. Why, does it look very much as if these millions were ready for investment, when the hon. Minister of Finance is offering $1.50 a ton bounty on coal, and on every ton of pig iron? Those millions are still waiting, and now the hon. gentleman is going to give it an additional incentive. Probably it will come; but, in this respect, I fear the failures which are so notorious in every instance I referred to, and for which we had such long and strong apologies, will be nearly as notorious, and the millions of capital, I fear, will not come. True, if the predictions of the hon. Minister of Finance are realized, these millions of capital may come in. It will come in any way, for it came into the country before we had the Tariff. Industries were built up and money was invested, and we fail to see now any greater investments taking place, at least during last year, than during previous years, because of this Tariff. But then the hon. gentleman, who has boasted so much of what the Tariff would do, very strangely changes the Tariff all the while. I remember, it was in 1879, on the 14th of March, that the hon. Minister of Finance first brought down the Tariff, and it was received with enthusiastic cheers by hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1880, a great many changes, eighty in number, were made, and they were received with enthusiastic cheers. Next year fifty-five changes were made, and they were as heartily applauded. Last year 109 changes were made, and they were received with equal, if not a little more, enthusiasm. Now, eighty-seven distinct and radical changes are proposed, and I observed hon. gentlemen opposite cheered as if they had had a new revelation. What is the Tariff going to be like if the hon. gentleman intends to pursue this course?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is Excelsior!

Mr. ROSS. It is onward and downward, in many cases, however. Articles are being placed on the Free List which hon. gentlemen opposite applauded when high duties were placed upon them; and duties have been increased on articles which the hon. Minister thought were taxed at a proper maximum before, when they were 5 or 10 per cent. less. Besides, why place anything on the Free List if the position which hon. gentlemen opposite take is the correct one? They have said, over and over again, that the producer pays the duty. If so, there is no advantage in placing goods on the Free List. Let those who send free goods pay duty upon them, as it was said should be done when those hon. gentlemen sat on this side of the House; so it is utterly absurd, according to the language of hon. gentlemen opposite, that there should be a Free List at all. But if hon. members will notice the articles placed on the Free List, the absurdity appears much greater. We have duties on the necessaries of life, on breadstuffs, coal, light, glass, woollens and cottons. The hon. Minister of Finance might have relaxed these duties a little, surely, and have placed some of the articles on the Free List. But instead of doing so, what has he done? He has given us a beggarly Free List comprising articles not necessaries, but luxuries—sapphires, rubies and diamonds! Fancy the hon. gentleman visiting his own Province, to which he is so much devoted, and meeting the consumers of cornmeal in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, who, out of the total imports of 133,505 barrels, take 120,039 barrels, or nearly all the cornmeal imported into Canada. They tell him: "We pay duty on our cornmeal, Sir Leonard, and it is not right, it is a necessary of life, and our burdens are greater than we can bear. Money is scarce, and we should be very much obliged if you would relax the duty on cornmeal, Sir Leonard." I fancy our complacent hon. Minister of Finance saying to them: "Well, gentlemen, I must have revenue; but I will give you a little relief, and therefore place diamonds, agates, and rubies on the Free List as I want to make you as comfortable as I possibly can." Suppose the hon. gentleman went to Manitoba—and if he goes to Manitoba he will find that half the blankets imported into the Dominion are used by the people there and pay a duty of 46 per cent.—and fancy the hon. gentleman, on being remonstrated with by some stalwart Manitoban—and I wish them more power still—respecting this high duty, and after listening to their remarks, telling them, in his kindly and affectionate way, that he is a member of a paternal Government, that the people of Manitoba must not complain, that a high duty is placed on blankets, for it is to keep out the foreign article, but they must remember that sausage skins are free. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman retains a duty of 1 ct. per lb. on the sausage meat. In the same way, we may suppose the hon. gentleman coming up to Ontario, where the greatest portion of the imported coal is consumed, and telling the people: You complain a little at the Tariff as making coal high in price, and no doubt it has been dear during this severe winter. I cannot, however, reduce the duty which gives me $500,000, but to show that I did not deprive you of all consideration, I have placed sawdust on the Free List. The hon. gentleman then goes to the people of British Columbia and Quebec, who consume a considerable portion of the flour imported, 165,430 barrels out of the total import of 172,517 barrels, and when they make complaint about the wrong of imposing a duty upon this prime necessary of life, my kind friend, one of the members of the paternal concern, will say: I must keep the revenue from the flour duty, but I have reduced the duty on tobacco, so smoke a little more, and I have made scrap iron free. That is one of the mistakes into which the hon. gentleman is falling. Instead of reducing the Tariff in the direction where reductions would be a convenience and comfort to the people, he has reduced it on matters of no value to the people, and coal, cottons, flour and cornmeal, and other necessaries of life are taxed as heavily as they ever were, and some of the necessaries of life even more heavily. Bed comforters or quilts, shoe laces, lamp wicks, vinegar and other articles which enter into the daily consumption of the people, are charged higher duties. This is one of my objections to the present Tariff. It is an attempt by a system of patchwork to regulate the commerce of this country, instead of being based upon some well-defined and recognized principle. As I have shown, the Tariff of the hon. Minister has failed over and over again to produce the results that were predicted from it; and yet the hon. gentleman, instead of coming down with a Tariff based on some well-defined principle, which we can grasp and understand, goes on with his system of patchwork until the last days of the Tariff will be worse than the first. It is not enough to have high duties; but the Finance Minister is now entering upon a system of bounties, a system which was abandoned in England long ago, and which belongs to the Middle Ages, and is not known among the advanced political economists of the present day. What reason is there for paying a bounty of $1.50 per ton on every ton of iron made in Canada? What necessity is there for giving a bounty to the iron smelter any more than to the lumberman? We know it is desirable to develop our mining interests, but the Government of a country is not a financial concern, as the hon. gentleman would make it, but it has to give equal rights and justice to all members of the community; and if it is right for the hon. gentleman to give a bounty of $1.50 for every ton of pig iron made in Canada, why, on the same principle, should he not give a bounty to our farmers for every head of cattle they export, and to our manufacturers for every dollar's worth of goods they produce? Let us not single out one interest, or class, in the community and bestow on it special favors, and neglect and despise all other classes. Is that an honest, a reasonable way in which to bestow his smiles? If this system of bounties begins, where is it to end? If that concession is to be made to the iron men, how long will it be before similar concessions are made to others? May we not expect next year another list of alterations and another class of beneficiaries to receive the favorable consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then the hon. gentleman, when he told us what changes he proposed to make—and he has changed and modified the Tariff as he has done in former years—tells us that this Tariff is going to be perpetual. He says the fiat has gone forth. The fiat—whose fiat has gone forth? The fiat of the hon. Minister of Finance has gone forth that this Tariff must be perpetual. The hon. gentleman had better spare his fiats in matters of this kind. Does he not know that public opinion is very uncertain, and that, although to-day proud of his apparent success and confident in the position which he occupies in this House, he may insist that this Tariff shall be perpetual, yet when the people of this country come to know all the effect of this Tariff upon the trade of this country, and rightly apprehend it, as they will do when this Tariff is tested, as it must be, by a commercial crisis in not many years to come, then we will see whether the fiat, which, the hon. gentleman says, has gone forth, will still be a fiat which the people of this country will entertain. What is the Tariff which he pretends should be perpetual? It is full of exactions and injustices; it is a system of patchwork, and is full of variations and changes. If the hon. member for Cardwell was right, when he said that the Tariff should be permanent, what can the member for Cardwell say about a Tariff that seems to have no element of permanency in it at all? If it is right that the fiscal changes should but seldom be made, what shall we say about a Tariff like this, which is changed with every Session of Parliament, with every meeting of this House? Shall this Tariff be perpetual, then, when we know right well that there is a system of taxation which is based upon a principle that is righteous and fair in the taxes which it imposes on the masses, not on one man at the expense of another? Sir, I think the hon. gentleman may yet live—and I hope he may see the day—to see the people of this country realize the fact that this

Tariff is not a Tariff in the interests of the consuming masses, and not such a Tariff as should remain perpetually, as the hon. gentleman says it will, on the Statute-book of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. RYKERT. Mr. Speaker: It is impossible to ascertain upon whom, on the other side of the House, the responsibility rests for criticising this important Tariff and the Budget Speech. One would suppose, from the length of time during which the hon. member for South Brant was engaged in preparing for the criticism of the Budget Speech, that he had been selected by the Opposition as their exponent of financial affairs on that side of the House; but, Sir, I am somewhat in doubt, after having heard the remarks of the member for West Middlesex, whether this is the case. It is quite evident, Sir, that these two gentlemen have not had a rehearsal of their speeches; for it is quite true, that in the preparation of their speeches, there is very little harmony apparent; because, Sir, if you take the speech of the hon. member for South Brant, as the one who is the exponent of the views of the Opposition, and then the speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex, you will find the latter entirely in opposition to the former. I was somewhat amused, Sir, at the course pursued by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. He has attempted throughout his speech to find fault with and criticise the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell. He has favored the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance with very little attention, but seems to have devoted himself almost entirely to the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell. Now, Sir, this House is no doubt delighted at the extraordinary change which has taken place during this Session in the mode of criticizing the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance; and we can all congratulate the hon. member for South Brant on the tone and manner of the debate. But, Sir, there is this most extraordinary circumstance, about the speech of the hon. gentleman; while posing as a critic, he could not avoid falling back into the position which he has so long occupied as a stump orator. Well, Sir, finding it impossible to seriously criticise the Budget Speech, which was so ably delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, as he could find no fault whatever with it, we perceived that he had hardly launched out on his criticism of the same, before he seemed, as a matter of course, to be drawn into the delivery of a very large amount of that species of thunder, which, I may say, he is so accustomed to wield on the stump throughout this Province. The hon. gentleman during that criticism has endeavored to point out two facts: first, that there has been a very extraordinary increase in the expenditure of the country, and, second, that the country is rapidly going to the dogs. The hon. gentleman is quite aware, however, of the fact that his leader has declared that the country is prosperous, and that in every direction we see the benefits of the policy of the present Government. This is what he said:—

“There has been—and no man more heartily rejoices in it than the humble individual who now addresses you—a period of three or four years in which there has been prosperity. We have had excellent crops, good prices, a revival of the lumber trade, and very good development in other ways. The hon. member for Pictou gratified us by the information that the fisheries had been very productive and the prices high, and so in almost every direction has been shown the evidence of a period of prosperity.”

That hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, in looking at the older Provinces, discovers prosperity in every direction, and looking at the Provinces down by the sea he sees also a considerable increase of prosperity and their rapid development; and when he looks to Manitoba there, too, he discovers the most wonderful, rapid and gigantic strides are being made in the Province, which he and his party so much belittled a few years ago—that it is teeming in wealth, and that in the future it will play a conspicuous part in the destinies of Confederation.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

And the hon. gentleman has to recognize the fact that all his prophecies with reference to the Pacific Railway are entirely exploded, and that all his prophecies with regard to a heavy increase of taxation by means of the Tariff of the present Government are also exploded. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us, that he will not recognize the voice of the people. The hon. gentleman tells us it is true that the policy of the Government was laid before the people of this country upon the 20th of June last; that he then pressed his views before the people; that the Opposition then expressed their views in every direction throughout the Dominion; and that he has to recognize the fact, that the verdict of the people was against him; but then he says, Sir, in a boasting manner: I do not pretend to recognize the voice of the people—I do not pretend to recognise the verdict of the people; we have come here as a banded Opposition, and will, on the floor of Parliament, advocate the same principles which we advocated before the last election. Sir, one would suppose that the hon. gentleman, sitting, as he does on that side of the House, and that the hon. gentlemen who sit alongside of him, were willing to recognize that which we all do recognize on this side of the House—that the people are the masters of the situation. But the hon. gentleman defies them. The hon. gentleman says: We will still advocate the principles which we advocated before the people, and which met their entire condemnation. The hon. gentleman, as I said before, ought, in preparing his speech, or the essay which he read to the House, have compared it with that of the hon. member for West Middlesex, because at the very outset we find that the latter hon. gentleman not only challenges a statement made by the hon. member for South Brant, but also shows that it is very absurd. Let me, Sir, before I go into the general subject of expenditure, point out one or two inconsistencies in the speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex, and then I will dismiss him from the consideration of this question until somewhat later on. The hon. member for West Middlesex, in attempting to criticise the Budget Speech, and the expenditure of the Government for the last five years, pointed to several items which he considers the most unjustifiable expenditure. He selects, unfortunately for himself, two items which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) justifies as being in the public interest. The hon. member for West Middlesex, in his endeavor to make the people believe that this Government has been extravagant, pointed to the expenditure on behalf of the Indians, and I was surprised to hear the observations of the hon. gentleman on that subject. No hon. member of this House, for the last five years, has ventured to stand up and declare that the expenditure on behalf of the Indians is not a wise and proper expenditure, and when the votes were asked by the hon. Minister of the Interior for the Indian appropriation, not one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues ventured to say that that expenditure was unjust or was excessive. To-day the hon. member for West Middlesex says that the expenditure in that behalf is the result of gross mismanagement in the Department of the Interior. Here is what the hon. member for South Brant said the other day as reported, and no doubt correctly, in Hansard:

“Indian grants involved an expenditure of $489,327 in 1879; we are now asked to vote $375,919. Here I must say that the remarks of the hon. the Finance Minister in regard to that point, carried a good deal of weight. If this money is required to be expended on the Indians, fault cannot fairly be found with the Government in adopting the plan of conciliating the Indians instead of an opposite policy.”

The hon. member for West Middlesex then takes up another item, to which I shall have occasion to refer again, when I compare the expenditures of the present with the late Government—I refer to the Post Office expenditure—and he affirms that that expenditure is an evidence of the reckless extravagance of the present Administration. Sir, we have heard the hon. gentleman himself in times past when he sat on this side of the House defending the Government he supported, when charges were made against them of extravagance in that branch of Civil Government; we found him then justifying in the strongest possible terms the increased expenditure of the Government in that direction. He has forgotten his speeches on former occasions, and I will take the liberty of dragging to the light of day some of this interesting literature. In the discussion on the Tariff which took place 16th March, 1877, I find that a person named Mr. Ross, whom I assume to be the hon. member for West Middlesex, was called upon to justify the reckless extravagance of the Mackenzie Administration, and in the course of a speech of an hour or two's duration, he took up the question of the Post Office expenditure in the following language:—

"He admitted that this was a large deficit, one that could only be justified on the ground that every individual, not only in the House, but in the country, was interested in the utmost postal accommodation that the public could afford. He asked hon. gentlemen opposite if they were prepared to declare that a reduction should be made in the number of Post Offices, or that the number of miles necessary to be traversed in the postal service should be diminished in order to reduce the expenditure. He was confident that hon. gentlemen opposite would not commit themselves to such a policy, knowing the eager demand on the part of all classes in the community for that accommodation."

That was the view of the hon. gentleman at that time, and now, when by the rapid development of the country, by the extension of the postal system to the North-West Territory, and in every direction throughout this great Dominion there has been a necessity for a great expenditure in the reorganization of this branch of the service, he points to the increase in the expenditure as an evidence of extravagance. If the hon. gentleman had been desirous of placing the whole case fairly before the country, and of playing the part of an honest politician, he would have stated that though, on the one hand, we have had a large expenditure, yet, on the other hand, the revenue from the Post Office Service has largely increased under the Administration of my hon. friend. But I will bring a witness into court against the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for South Brant was fairer than the hon. member for West Middlesex. His criticism of the hon. Finance Minister was made in a very fair manner, and in that respect a very great and an agreeable change was noticeable as compared with the criticism of the former Finance representative of the Opposition. The hon. member for South Brant, the other day, in his criticism of the Budget Speech, used the following language:—

"With reference to the Post Office Department, we find that we are asked to vote $153,887 more than was the case last year. This item I shall not criticise very closely, because I think that the hon. Finance Minister gave some reason—and a good reason, I will even go the length of saying—for this increase in this Department. We must expect it, as we are opening up a new country as we are doing in the immense North-West, and while providing necessary postal facilities, we must make up our minds to the fact that we must have an increased expenditure in this relation; and we can rejoice—if the hon. gentleman is able next year, as he was to-day—to say that the increase in the revenue from this source was greater during the coming year than was the case during the past year."

Does the hon. Finance Minister want any stronger justification of the expenditure of the Government, so far as that branch is concerned? The hon. member for West Middlesex ignores entirely the speech of the hon. member for South Brant; there is a lack of harmony in their views which we should hardly have expected from the hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for West Middlesex has also discovered that there has been some cooking of the Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman is so well versed in that branch of Government, he is such a thorough cook, and his party are such thorough cooks, that he seems to expect that hon. members on this side of the House should also be found stowing away items under unlikely headings, so that they may not be discovered. The hon. gentleman knows right well, from the records of his own party in the past, how to hide away all kinds of doubtful items. I need only remind him of how his friends in the Ontario Legislature managed to stow away the corkscrew expenditures and the champagne guzzles.

Mr. ROSS. How about the Colonization Roads charges?

Mr. RYKERT. I am glad of that reminder. I have been waiting for a long time for the opportunity which the hon. gentleman has been kind enough to give me, and I am glad to be able to avail myself of it to justify my friends on this side of the House. I had occasion to follow hon. gentlemen opposite in no less than seventeen counties in Ontario during the last campaign, and I always found them making use of these charges against my hon. friend the Postmaster General of this Government when he was a colleague of the late Sandfield Macdonald; and the organ of the party had the audacity to declare that the Government of Sandfield Macdonald had hidden away, under the name of dusters, items which were chargeable to Colonization Roads. I tell the hon. gentleman that the first time that word was discovered—the first time its meaning was applied in that sense, was when I discovered that the hon. Archibald McKellar had hidden away the charges for his champagne guzzle at Belleville under that head, and he will recollect also that I discovered that the hon. Archibald McKellar had hidden away the charges for his canoe couch damask under a mysterious heading. Yet the Globe of a few days ago had the audacity to declare that the hon. Mr. Carling had been guilty of hiding away certain items under the head of dusters. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he considers the particular charge to which the Globe refers a justifiable one or not. These hon. gentlemen have paraded the assertion through the country that that charge was an extravagant one. Let me ask, who attended that colonization roads expedition? It was a matter in the interests of the general public, and on the floor of the Ontario Legislature, the Premier of that day asked the members of the House if they would like to visit the northern portion of the Province, about which there had been so much ignorance displayed in the discussions on the floor of the House. The proposition was accepted by both sides of the House, and the expedition was organized in August, and I find that no less than twenty-two of these noble patriots accompanied the expedition. Let me give you some of the names of these gentlemen: hon. Archibald McKellar, M.P.P. (now Sheriff of Wentworth); hon. Alex. Mackenzie, M.P. (ex-Premier of the Dominion); Mose Springer, M.P.P. (now Sheriff of Waterloo); Donald Sinclair, M.P.P. (now Registrar of Bruce); Peter Gow, M.P.P. (now Sheriff of Wellington); John Stevenson, M.P.P.; A. P. Cockburn, M.P.P.; R. McKim, M.P.P.; H. D. Smith, M.P.P.; J. S. Smith, M.P.P.; hon. John McMurrich, M.P.P.; H. Finlayson, M.P.P.; John Eyre, M.P.P.; James Trow, M.P.P. (now Grit whip, House of Commons); A. Oliver, M.P.P.; H. Crosby, M.P.P.; S. S. Clark, M.P.P.; J. Craig, M.P.P. Let me now call into the witness-box a gentleman who is now a member of this House, who accompanied that expedition, and who can testify whether or not the money was rightly expended. While there was a feast of reason and a flow of soul at that expedition, we find that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), then a member of the Ontario Legislature, and our friend Mr. Archibald McKellar, were desirous of placing on record their views regarding the policy of the Government that organized that expedition. The people throughout the country were told that expedition was a private expedition, organized in the interest of Mr. Carling, and that he and a few of his select friends were there. The fact is that no less than forty members of Parliament went on that expedition, and among them twenty-two members of the Opposition, many of whom to-day are enjoying the luxuries of office as sheriffs or registrars, or something of that kind, at the hands of the Ontario Government. These gentlemen, after returning from the voyage, after seeing the sights of that country, and enjoying themselves amazingly, and no doubt being somewhat elevated, desired to place their views on record at a meeting which they held on board the steamer Chicora, and that noble Reformer, the hon. Archibald McKellar, was put up to reply to the speech on behalf of the Local Legislature, and he is thus reported in the press :

"Mr. McKellar, in his usual fluent and capital style, among other things said he thought the expenditure in regard to the trip was a wise one, and congratulated the hon. John Carling on the great success which had attended it."

It has been stated that they had a piper upon that expedition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who paid the piper ?

Mr. RYKERT. No person paid him; and I have no doubt the reason may be inferred from looking at the men who were there. However, as a matter of courtesy, the health of the guests was proposed, and was responded to by the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who is reported to have said :

"He said he quite concurred with the former speaker (Mr. McKellar) as to the success of the trip, and the wisdom of the expenditure in regard to it."

At this meeting the following resolutions were unanimously passed :—

"That we tender to the Government of Ontario, especially to hon. John Carling and the hon. Stephen Richards, our thanks for having organized this trip which has combined so much information with great pleasure.

"That we respectfully urge on the Government of Ontario, as one of the results of that which we have seen, the improvement of the navigation of the Kaministiquia—the throwing open of the land on the north shore of Lake Superior—and the exercise of a liberal policy in the mineral districts in which we can look forward with the utmost confidence to the rapid settlement and development of the extensive and important region we have visited."

Let that do for the expedition which is cited as an offset to the celebrated corkscrew expedition so eloquently portrayed by the hon. member for Glengarry. But these hon gentlemen say: "Didn't we pay back the money spent on the corkscrew expedition?" Yes, they did; but a year after it was found out; just as Mr. Archibald McKellar paid back the public money which he had expended in getting furniture, after it was discovered. I am glad the hon gentleman has given me the chance of casting back the slanders which he has raised; I did not hope so soon to have the opportunity of doing so. Now, Sir, I dismiss my hon. friend from West Middlesex for the present. When these hon. gentlemen have been called upon throughout the country to justify the extravagance of the Mowat Government, the answer they gave was: "Look at John A. Macdonald down in Ottawa; has he not increased the expenditure of the Dominion in the short space of seven years from 1867 to 1873, by no less than $10,000,000;" and I was surprised to-day to hear my hon. friend repeat that charge, because it has been repeatedly disposed of on the floor of this Parliament. Has not the late hon. Finance Minister publicly declared over his own signature that all that expenditure was incurred for works of public utility? We recollect well that, in going to the Old Country to raise a loan, he showed the financial agents there the bright side of the shield. If he told the truth then, hon. gentlemen now have no right to stand up here and condemn that expenditure; and if he told what was untrue, the more discredit to him. However, I can show that every item of that increased expenditure of $10,000,000 was just and proper, independent of the testimony of Sir Richard Cartwright, and I challenge hon. gentlemen to point to a single item which is unworthy of approval. They cannot point to a single item. But hon. gentlemen seek to justify their own extravagance by asking us to look at the extravagance of this Government. What did the hon. ex-Finance Minister, Sir Richard Cartwright, say? He said:

"The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since Confederation, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional character, such as outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organization of new territories, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion, &c. The whole of this debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility, for railways, canals, &c."

And yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman opposite, a supporter—may I say a slavish supporter of the late Government—who never raised his voice against a single action of that Government, in the face of the declaration of his leaders of that day, tries to palm off on the people that trash and nonsense—if I am not using an unparliamentary expression—about that expenditure not being justified. Not only do we find that advertisements in England, signed by the late hon. Finance Minister, justified that expenditure, but we find running through all his financial statements made during the five years he was in power, a justification of that expenditure, and more particularly on page 2 of the financial statement of 1875. There he sought to justify the expenditure incurred from 1872 to 1874, and why? Because at that time it was a disputed question whether they were responsible for the expenditure over 1872-73 or 1873-74. The late hon. Finance Minister has placed on record the fact that the increased expenditure of 1873-74, over that of 1872-73 of $4,250,000, was an expenditure which could be justified and could not be at all avoided. The hon. gentleman pointed out and summarized the different items of that expenditure. He pointed out the fact that the interest on the debt had increased $500,000; that the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union cost $600,000; that the assumption of the Provincial debts, the grant to New Brunswick in lieu of the export duty on lumber, amounted to $850,000. Let me ask hon. gentlemen, who are criticising that expenditure—especially those from the Province of Ontario—whether any fault was then found with that legislation, by which the whole debt of Ontario was wiped out and she was thereby saved an annual expenditure of $296,000?—an expenditure which, had it not been assumed by the Dominion, would have sent Ontario on the high road to direct taxation. Had it not been for that wise act, where, to-day, would be the surplus of Oliver Mowat? Did these hon. gentlemen object to that? Not one of them. You cannot find in the records of Parliament any resolution, moved by any person, much less an Ontario member, opposing that item, by means of which the debt of the Dominion was swelled by more than $10,000,000, and a corresponding portion of Ontario's debt wiped out.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. When the House took Recess I was endeavoring to show that the statement of the hon. member for South Brant, in reference to the increased expenditure of the Dominion between 1867 and 1873, was not justified by facts; but that, on the contrary, his own leader when upon the Treasury benches had placed on record the fact that all the expenditure during those six or seven years was of a justifiable character. The items of this expenditure which I was enumerating were: Increase of debt, interest thereon, $500,000; the admission of Prince Edward Island to the Union, $600,000; the assumption of the debt of the Province and the grant to New Brunswick in lieu of the export duty on timber, $850,000; additional expenditure for maintenance of railways, $900,000; increased indemnity to Members, $400,000; Elections, $200,000; North-West Police, $200,000; Indians, $100,000; Post Office, $300,000, and Miscellaneous Charges, $200,000, making a total of $4,250,000, which the then hon. Minister of Finance publicly declared was an expenditure of a justifiable character. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman and his lieutenant, who has spoken tonight, whether or not any hon. member of the Reform party in this Legislature or elsewhere, put on record the fact that they were opposed to any one of those items. I can tell the hon. gentleman that had he been desirous of telling the people the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, he could have told them that he and his party were parties to the expenditure of upwards of $100,000, a portion of the $400,000, in which they themselves participated personally. In that increased expenditure we find an amount of $400,000 for increased indemnity to hon. members, and increased salaries to Ministers of the Crown. I have yet to learn that an hon. member of the Opposition refused to accept the increase of $400 indemnity for services, or that any hon. Minister of that party refused his increased indemnity. Had, therefore, that hon. gentleman and his friends shown the people the facts as they were, the people would have known that $400,000 of this expenditure was a sum in which these hon. gentlemen themselves had personally participated. As I remarked before Recess, they cannot point to a single resolution on the records of Parliament showing that they objected to one item of this $4,250,000, nor can they show that a single item of the balance of $10,000,000 has ever been objected to by them. I have shown satisfactorily, at any rate, to hon. members of the Opposition, who, no doubt, will be satisfied with the statement of their leaders, that $4,250,000 of this item was justifiable expenditure. The other items are the increased expenditure in 1873-74 over 1867-68, for the following items:—

Public Works chargeable to revenue.....	869,899
Post Office.....	45,664
Excise.....	92,765
Customs.....	90,262
Militia.....	235,648
Interest on debt and subsidies.....	747,086
Civil Government, increase to.....	156,433
Immigration.....	226,972
Superannuation.....	53,026
Ocean and River Service.....	519,074
Total .....	$5,207,489

Or a total of $5,207,489 increased expenditure over the first year after Confederation. Now, these hon. gentlemen know that during the first year of Confederation, the expenditure on Public Works was only $126,169, and that this was increased to $1,597,603, and all the items I have read increased in the same proportion, making an aggregate increase of $5,207,489. Now, Sir, if these hon. gentlemen can point to one single item to which they can reasonably object, or that they did object to on the floor of Parliament, then I say there may be some justification for their recklessly and boldly asserting the extravagance of the present Government when in power on a former occasion. Now, Sir, we know that a large number of these items were necessitated by pledges made at the time of Confederation. We know that the country was pledged to the Intercolonial Railway, to construct canals; and we have the recorded speeches of my hon. friend from East York, who declared in Parliament, when that question was under discussion, that the country must, as a matter of necessity, be involved in a large amount of expenditure in building canals and the Intercolonial Railway. So hon. gentlemen will see that, in addition to what Sir Richard Cartwright himself declared in Parliament, leading members of the Reform party declared also that these items were of a justifiable character. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the increase of expenditure by $10,000,000 is unjustifiable. He then goes on to say that the Mackenzie Government, between 1873-74 and 1878-79, only increased their expenditure by $1,139,065. Now, Sir, if it were improper, and the Government had acted extravagantly in increasing the expenditure to $23,000,000, why is it that these hon. gentlemen, when they had control of the expenditure, and sustained by an enormous majority, went on recklessly increasing the expenditure by $1,139,065? They should have been on their guard. Had they desired to keep faith with the people, to keep their pledges made to the electors, to act honestly and consistently, when they declared that $23,000,000 was too high an expenditure, they should have reduced rather than have increased that amount. But they did not do it, because party exigencies stood in the way, and they were compelled to go on and rapidly increase that expenditure. But, says the hon. gentleman, the debt has increased from $75,000,000 to $108,000,000. He knows the cause of that increase as well as I can tell him. He knows that the subsidies to the Provinces largely increased the debt, and the purchase of the North-West Territory cost us $1,460,000, and these went to swell up the expenditure and increase the debt. Now, let us see what these gentlemen did immediately afterwards. They could do just as they pleased, and had no person to restrain them in their riotous expenditure. They increased the Public Debt from $108,324,964 to $142,990,187, making an average increase during five years of $6,933,044; and during that time they only expended on Capital Account $33,982,565. Now contrast their course during the five years with that of the Conservative Administration which succeeded them. They increased the debt from $142,990,157, in three years, to $153,661,651, an average increase of $3,557,157 as against $6,933,044 by the Reform party. During that time the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches expended $23,768,541 on Capital Account. But what did they do besides? They did what these hon. gentlemen pretended they could do, and what the record shows they could not possibly have done—they decreased the Public Debt last year by $1,734,130. During the last year they expended, on Capital Account, $7,351,052. That is a record that any Government might be proud of, and which enables them to boast that they have not added one dollar to the taxation of the people. The hon. member for West Middlesex dwelt upon the ordinary expenditure of the Government; but we have a test by which we can judge of what that ordinary expenditure should be. We have it on record, in a speech made by Sir Richard Cartwright when Finance Minister, as to what he considered should be the minimum amount of the ordinary expenditure. I shall allude to that again presently. Now, let us examine this ordinary expenditure. Take the last year of this Government, the ordinary expenditure was $8,293,161. That, compared with the second year of the Reform party in 1875-76, which was $8,569,774, would leave a balance in favor of the present Government of $276,613. But let me point to something further. During the last year the expenditure on Indian account, which the hon. member for South Brant justifies, and justified a few years ago, was in excess of that of 1875-76 by $907,089; to which must be added the taking of the Census, costing $242,480 in excess of the same charge in 1875-76, making a total difference between the two years of $1,426,082 in favor of the Conservative party. Now, we will take the year which they call the starvation year of the Reform party, when they felt that the handwriting was upon the wall, when they felt that their extravagance and riotous living were becoming known to the people and who would pass upon them a condemnatory judgment on the first occasion. They cut down every kind of expenditure so that there was no efficiency in the public service, because they knew right well that if the people found out what they had been doing they would be sent about their business. In that year $6,542,510 was the amount expended. Now, if you add to that the difference in the Census, $251,624; the difference in the expenditure on account of Indians, $761,911; on Public Works, $424,846; Militia—which they starved during that year, as every person knows—$154,675, we have a total of $1,593,056 of exceptional items which were expended the last year, and which should be added to their last year, and that would show a difference in their favor of only $157,595. That is the starvation year. Now, if we take the last year, 1878-79, of $6,941,577, and add to that the $252,671 for Census, $694,087 for Indians, $409,577 for Public Works, making a total of $1,356,335, you have a difference in favor of the Conservative Government of $4,751. Now, the hon. gentleman boasts that the late Government decreased the expenditure by $1,382,499—that is during the starvation time—and how did they do it? They struck out $106,348 for Immigration, $200,000 for Militia, $812,408 for Public Works, $191,390 for Dominion Lands, $209,169 for Dominion Police Force, Manitoba, $144,916 for Militia Stores, $69,330 for Collection of Revenue, and $39,470 for Census; or a total of $1,773,004, which they admit was a justifiable expenditure. Any hon. member who looks at this record will see that the Government now occupying the Treasury benches have no fear of a comparison, so far as the controllable expenditure is concerned. Let us examine a little further. We find that the ordinary expenditure of the late Government for the first three years that it was in power was $23,273,542, and that for the first three years of the Conservatives, it was $22,550,576, or a difference in their favor of $722,966. If you also consider the immense amount which was expended by this Government in excess of that expended by the late Government, on account of the Indians, the House will see there is a difference in favor of the Conservative Government of $1,470,597. Let us see how these expenditures have been going on and what have been the results attained. The hon. member for West Middlesex said something about extravagance in the Customs Department. Let us make a comparison, and see how the two Governments compare as regards those Departments. In 1878-79, the cost of the Customs Department was $719,711, while the revenue was $12,900,659; in 1881-82, the cost was $723,913, the revenue being $21,581,570. The House will thus see that by expending $4,000 additional the Government were able to collect almost $9,000,000 more than their predecessors. Take Excise, and you find the same proportions exist. In 1878-79 it cost $211,064; revenue, $5,390,763. In 1881-82 it cost $280,573; revenue, $5,894,850. We come now to another item which will show a very favorable comparison for the present Government. I am quite aware that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like comparisons to be made, but they are necessary in order to place the facts in their proper light before the people. We will, therefore, take the Post Office expenditure, and the hon. member for West Middlesex seems to have some feeling against that Department. In 1873-74 there was expended $1,387,270; 1878-79, $1,784,423, being an increase of $407,153. The receipts in 1873-74 were $1,139,973; in 1878-79, $1,172,418, being an increase of $32,445. Contrast this with the record of the Conservative party. The expenditure in 1878-79 was $1,784,423; in 1881-82, $1,980,567, being an increase of only $196,144. The receipts in 1878-79 were $1,172,418; in 1881-82, $1,587,888, being an increase of $415,470, or over twelve times as much during three years as their predecessors had obtained during five years, while the expenditure for the same period was $211,009 less. I will now take the Public Works Department, and I think the comparison will be strongly in favor of the Conservative party. The expenditure in 1873-74 was $2,389,679; in 1878-79, $2,680,979, being an increase of $281,300. The revenue in 1873-74 was $1,509,915; in 1878-79, $1,863,149, being an increase of $353,234. Under the Conservative Government the expenditure in 1878-79 was $2,680,979; in 1881-82, $2,893,512, being an increase of $212,533. The revenue was, in 1878 79, $1,863,149; in 1881-82, $2,711,134, being an increase of $848,985. So that by an increased expenditure of $212,623, the Government had been able to obtain an increased revenue of upwards of $800,000. I have thus shown that the comparison is strongly in favor of the Conservative party. As regards the ordinary controllable expenditure, the hon. Minister of Finance of the late Government, Sir Richard Cartwright, laid down the rule that the expenditure for Civil Government must be at least $7,000,000. At page 19 of his Budget Speech, in 1878, Sir Richard Cartwright says:

"It will be quite obvious that the balance of about $7,000,000 which remains at our disposal, is not only a very small field to exercise any great economy, but is barely sufficient for the purpose we expect to discharge therewith."

Again, on page 15 of his Budget Speech in 1874, the hon. gentleman says:

"We will require for subsidies to Indians and for contingent expenses in North-West Territories—I am putting these things at the minimum—no less than $500,000."

Sir Richard Cartwright goes on and gives an estimate of the amount required for the different Departments. The following table will show this estimate and the expenditures for 1881 and 1882, under the present Government.

	Sir R. Cartwright's Estimate.	1881.	1882.

The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was very strong on the question of contingencies. I do not wonder at this, for it is a familiar subject with hon. gentlemen opposite. I have already pointed to one of the items of contingencies in the Ontario Legislature. The hon. member for South Brant has charged the Government with having entered $800, being expenditure in connection with the Governor-General's trip, under an improper head, namely, to Canadian Pacific Railway, Eagle River section. When hon. gentlemen opposite talk about contingencies, it is desirable to make a comparison between the contingencies of the present Government and those of their predecessor. Of course, the hon. member got off a little joke about the hon. Minister of War; but I can tell him that the difference between this Government and the late Government is this: that the present Government enter all charges under proper heads, but the late Government, during its five years of administration, entered amounts under contingencies, personal expenses and petty disbursements. And what do we find? During the five years they were in power; they spent $874,727 for contingencies, or an average of $174,945; while during three years of the present Government, including an estimated expenditure, for 1882-83, of $153,950, the total expenditure under this head was $640,260, or an average of $160,065, compared with the $174,945 of their predecessors. So whichever way you look at every item you take up in the Public Accounts and make a comparison, you find that the balance is on the side of the Conservative Government. I challenge an investigation of this by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) who, no doubt, will follow me, and who I understand is another candidate on probation for the financial position of the other side of the House. Now, Sir, after having heard the speech of the hon. member for South Brant, and his criticism on the expenditure of the Government, I think that the House will come to the conclusion, that, as far as the expenditure during the last three years is concerned, he has not made out a case, that the verdict must be against him; and that he has not properly and fairly laid before the House the figures as they really are, and compared them as he should have done. Now, Sir, we come to the Estimates of the hon. Minister of Finance. It must be satisfactory to the House and country—and it is a peculiar satisfaction to the members of this side of the House—to know that the hon. Minister of Finance could have laid before the House an exposition of our financial affairs in the manner he did an exhibit which the House and country must feel proud of, when they come to analyze it, see what it is, and look at the investigation and criticisms made by hon. gentlemen opposite. How does it stand? Why, Sir, the hon. member for South Brant has only complained of four items in the total expenditure proposed for 1883-84. It is true, Sir, that the hon. member for West Middlesex charged the Government with recklessness in the proposed expenditure on several other items. I have already shown that his superior in office on the other side, the gentleman who leads the Financial Department there, has declared that these are justifiable. Now, what are the items to which the hon. gentleman takes exception? That the item for Immigration is increased by $358,263. Well, Sir, during the past year we can point in this relation with some results. We find that, in 1875, we obtained 19,243 settlers at $14 a head; in 1876, 14,490, at $19 a head; in 1877, 13,323, at $12 a head; in 1878, 15,872, at $9.63 a head. Now, Sir, there appears a remarkable change in the figures. In 1879, when the Conservative Government was in power, we secured 13,770 settlers, at $5.74 a head; in 1880, 27,554, at $6.50 a head; and, in 1881, 22,587, at only $6.32 a head, and in 1882, 112,000 at $3.20 per head. Sir, that comparison, I think, is one which this House may feel proud of; and I think that, after the criticism made by my hon. friend, this House will see that he was unfortunate in the selection of this item. Why, Sir, says the hon. gentleman, what is the use of our expending money on immigration? I recollect well, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen, some years ago, declared that every immigrant who came to this country was worth $1,000 in gold; but they forget that now. Immigrants are now not worth much; and they do not care anything at all about immigration. They say that this House has encouraged the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and is doing what that Company ought to do. But I ask the House and country whether the expenditure of money in bringing immigrants to the North-West is not adding to the revenues of the Dominion. But a few years ago the hon. leader of the Opposition, and every one who then spoke on that side of the House, declared that the land in the North-West was not worth having, and that it was not worth $1 an acre; but, to-day, it is worth from $3 50 to $4 an acre according to their own statements. What brought this about? Why, the encouragement of immigration and the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and it is absurd to say we can expect the Railway Company, in the short space of one year, to bring immigrants to that country, while the road is not yet built; but the time will come when they will no doubt turn their efforts in that direction. The House and country will without question be satisfied with the expenditure of this amount of money by the Government, supplemented by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as money expended in the right direction. Now, Sir, it is rather refreshing to hear these gentlemen talking about the expenditure of the last few years, and also about the proposed expenditure during the next year. I would like to know, Sir, if they can point to any item that they challenged, during the last five years, of any consequence. I will tell them what they did. I have the record here of the motions made by these hon. gentlemen against the proposed expenditure of the Government. Had they been desirous of challenging these items and the expenditure, they had an opportunity for doing so on the floor of this House; but the records of Parliament and the Hansard will show that year after year the hon. Minister of Finance brought down the Estimates for public works and buildings, and that not a single exception was taken, not a single item was objected to, except on the ground that it was too small. Every year hon. gentlemen rose on the other side and asked the Government to expend more money; and if that expenditure was excessive, why did they not seize the opportunity then to challenge these votes on the floor of this House, and, in concurrence, to move amendments? Did they do so? Let us see what they did do. The hon. member for West Middlesex took exception upon March 6, 1881, to the item of $300,000 for Dominion Lands, and his resolution went on to show that it was wrong that any portion of this amount should be paid for publishing the speeches of Sir Charles Tupper, Messrs. Plumb and White (Cardwell), and others. Now, that was all the objection which they made during that Session to the expenditure of money, with one other exception: Mr. Mills, then member for Bothwell, moved to reduce the expenditure for the Department of the Interior by $7,000. We then find that, in 1880, on the 20th of April, Sir Richard Cartwright moved to reduce the item of Civil Government by $70,000, and, on the day following, we find the hon. leader of the Opposition moved to strike out $500 paid to Mr. Miall. On May 4, 1880, the same hon. gentleman complained about $14,000 paid to Sir Alexander Galt, but did not specifically challenge the item, and he did not say how much it was in excess of what it ought to be; but, on the contrary, only made a general charge against it. And I say it does not lie in the mouths of these hon. gentlemen now to stand up in this House and find fault with expenditure which took place years ago, and which, when they had opportunity on the floor of this House to challenge, the records of Parliament show they did not move resolutions condemning it. We take up the Public Accounts, and those hon. gentlemen make a great parade of bringing down vouchers. They last Session challenged about $800 spent in publishing speeches; and how far they will go this year in that direction we cannot yet tell. They have ordered the particulars of a large number of accounts, but I imagine that when they investigate them, we will hear nothing more of the matter. In having thus dealt with the figures concerning the affairs of this Administration, as discussed by the hon. member for South Brant, I think I can pass them over; and I think that this House will be satisfied that, in investigating the items to which I have directed attention, the criticisms of the hon. member for West Middlesex was neither fair nor just. Sir, I do not desire to enter fully into the question of the National Policy, simply because it is a threadbare subject. I think that the discussion of this matter by the hon. Finance Minister, and his able exposition of the condition of affairs, and the criticism of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) upon the speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), are sufficient to satisfy the House that the National Policy is a policy in the right direction. The hon. member for South Brant has declared that while the country is prospering, it is likely to go to the dogs by reason of certain failures which are taking place in some parts of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman is playing a role which is familiar to himself and his party. When the country is prosperous they are continually predicting disasters. They are never satisfied—they never feel at home unless they are prophecying that the country is going to the dogs. Another favorite role with them is to compare this country disadvantageously with the United States. They seem to desire to belittle their own country and elevate the United States at the expense of Canada. The hon member for South Brant said in his speech a few days ago :

"This country will, as I have said, pass through a period of stringency and trade depression as well as of prosperity, and I venture to prophecy that in two years from now, the hon. Minister, if he still retains his position as hon. Minister of Finance, will find that he will be compelled to offer apologies; he will explain how this factory and that factory was closed; how wages in this department were lowered, and how it occurs that the exports have declined. I believe this, and I am confirmed in my views by writers in commercial journals, equally well informed with the hon. Finance Minister. And then we, on this side of the House, will have the satisfaction of knowing that though we may have had to wait a few years, till a period of trial came round, yet it was bound to come at last."

What a satisfaction and glorification it is for a Canadian—a man who boasts that he is a native of this country—to be able to prophecy that the country will go to the dogs in two years. Is that not true patriotism with a vengeance? That has been their policy from beginning to end—one day the hon. member for Norfolk and the hon. member for South Brant are preaching Protection, and the next day they develop into out-and-out Free traders. These hon. gentlemen, a few years ago, were the great protectionist exponents of this Dominion. They educated the people on that point, and so keen was the hon. member for South Brant in favor of Protection, that—I will not say for personal reasons, although he did point out the fact that he himself had been benefited by the taxation of certain articles—he admitted that he could not have been elected if he had not expressed himself in favor of Protection. He used the following language on the floor of this House, as reported in Hansard of 1876:—

"At my last election, when my opponents told them that they need not expect any Protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that whenever this subject came up in the House I would raise my voice in their behalf, and I think it is hardly possible that the duty on wheat will give increased prices."

He has repeatedly declared that that policy would be a wise one which would prevent this country being a slaughter market for foreign goods. I wish to point out to the House how correctly one hon gentleman's prophecy as regards the effect of the National Policy on one portion of the Dominion has been fulfilled. The hon. member for South Brant in speaking on the motion for a Committee on depression of trade, used this language:

"Protection does not mean Ontario interests at the sacrifice of the interests of the Maritime Provinces. It is to stimulate the manufactures of the Dominion, irrespective of Provinces; but, if any part of Canada could now successfully compete in our markets, I think it is Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, from the fact that they have coal and iron lying side by side. They would be able to manufacture cheaply, and compete with Ontario. What is to prevent Halifax, under a Protective Tariff, having its manufactures?"

I wish now to point out the result of the operation of that policy so far as these Provinces are concerned. That result has been to create an inter-provincial trade as will be shown by the following figures:—In 1878 the Maritime Provinces imported $17,948,699, and, in 1882, $15,707,211, or a decrease amounting to $2,241,488. In 1878, these Provinces imported from the United States $7,818,203; in 1882, $5,151,036, or a decrease of $2,667,167. I suppose these Provinces consume as much now as formerly, but these figures show that instead of consuming American goods they are importing from the other Provinces of the Dominion. In 1878, there was imported into Nova Scotia, $605,633 worth of flour from the United States, and, in 1882, only $42,059. There was imported into New Brunswick, in 1878, $336,722 worth; and, in 1882, $46,503 worth. Prince Edward Island imported $50,536 worth in 1878, and only $4,202 worth in 1882. Take next, Sir, the item of oatmeal, of which, I believe, those gentlemen are particularly fond.

Mr. BRYANT.

Nova Scotia imported $4,386 worth in 1878, and only $372 worth in 1882; New Brunswick, $1,514 worth in 1878, and only $7 worth in 1882; while Prince Edward Island, which had imported $456 worth in 1878, imported none last year. So that it will be seen that the effect of the National Policy has been to stimulate the industries of the Dominion, and thereby to encourage trade between the different Provinces. The hon. member for South Brant has ridiculed the idea that the farmers have been benefited by the National Policy. Let me give him some figures which will prove the contrary. In 1878, there were imported for home consumption goods which the farmer produces amounting to $14,135,651. In 1882, there were imported only $3,143,171 worth, a difference in favor of the farmers of Canada of $10,992,480. I think it will not be denied that these figures are very significant, and that they speak volumes in favor of the National Policy. Let me refer, however, to another industry, and that is the cotton trade. I find that, in 1878—as pointed out by the hon. Finance Minister, and referred to by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), but a good story may be twice told—there were imported of manufactured cottons, $10,182,134 worth, and of raw cottons, 2,444,210 lbs. In 1873, there were imported $10,076,214 worth, and of raw cottons, 2,752,042 lbs. It goes on increasing on one side and decreasing on the other until at last, in 1882, we find that the manufacture of cotton imported into Canada amounted to $1,674,000, against $10,000,000 in 1872, and that the importation of raw cotton amounted to 19,000,000 lbs., against 2,000,000 lbs. in 1872. These are facts which speak volumes. Now, Sir, let me point out another significant fact, of which I have some knowledge myself. We have been told repeatedly that this policy has not benefited the manufacturers. I can point to my own city, where I find that in two years three of our large manufacturers increased the number of men employed by them as follows:—The Welland Vale Works, from 45 men to 155; the knife factory, from 55 men to 143; and the saw factory, from 30 men to 60. These figures speak for themselves; and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is appealed to daily by persons who wish to get water power along the Welland Canal for manufacturing purposes. Now, I wish to say a few words in reply to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). He says that we have no right to charge him with being unpatriotic. Well, I take his speech, in which he says he desires to see the country go to the dogs in two years, and upon that I have a right to charge him with being unpatriotic. I suppose it is unpatriotic to cry the country down and injure its credit abroad. He says the effect of the National Policy has been to create disaster in the country, and that we have failures by the score. He is a wholesale man, and I would like to ask him if failures have not been impending over these men for years. They have endeavored to do too much business, and the result is that some of them have failed; but I do not know where the scores or dozens are. Now, the hon. member for West Middlesex has ventured to prophecy a little in this House. He made a prophecy a few years ago, when the hon gentlemen on this side of the House were sitting in the cold shades of Opposition. On that occasion he said:

"He ventured to say if they remained in Opposition for a quarter of a century, as it was probable they would, they would have so practised and studied the principles of economy as to be a guarantee of the careful management of the country for all time to come."

We are now able to appreciate the value of that prophecy. The hon. gentleman prophesied a little to-night. He said that the day for success was passed, and he prophesied that the people would see in a short time the full effects of the National Policy, and would turn the Government out of power. Well, let me draw the hon. gentleman's attention to a little speech which he made at the last Session of Parliament. He was very fond of prophecies then. Speaking on the Budget of that year, he said:

"The hon. gentleman may say that, in calling attention to this increased expenditure, we are diverting attention from the National Policy; but I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that we are not afraid to meet them, either on the National Policy or any other issue for which they hold themselves responsible. Whether it be the National Policy, the increased expenditure, or the redistribution of seats, we have no hesitation in saying, here or elsewhere, that when the day of reckoning comes, the number of men from the other side of the House who will return here to give an account of the battle will be small indeed. Defeat is written on the faces of these hon. gentlemen. Why all these attempts to bolster up a failing cause? Why the resort to all these expedients so well known to hon. gentlemen opposite, in order to strengthen their candidates in the various constituencies, were it not for the fact that hon. gentlemen know right well that the country will repudiate them and their policy they have advocated for the last five years."

Well, Sir, the country has had the benefit of the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite, and what has been the result? We saw them assume the Treasury benches in 1873, with the Treasury full to overflowing; we saw surpluses turning into deficits during their Administration; we saw them leaving office and leaving increased deficits behind them; and after four years of criticism of hon. gentlemen at present in power, they went to the country last June. And what is the result? There is the result—they sit in the cold shades of Opposition, where I have no doubt they will remain for a good many years to come. Now, Sir, I do not propose to occupy the time of the House much longer. The country has passed its judgment upon the National Policy. If that judgment amounts to anything, if that verdict be a correct verdict—and I venture to say that the verdict of the people must be a correct verdict—hon. gentlemen should stand up here and do all they can to aid the Government in carrying out the policy which is acceptable to the people. I, as a supporter of the Government, having heard the policy of the Government propounded by the hon. Finance Minister, knowing that that policy is acceptable to the people, and knowing that the practical effect of that policy has been to develop the great North-West Territories and to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to cement the bonds which bind this great Confederation together—I feel myself in duty bound to give my support to the policy of the Government, believing it to be in the best interests of the people.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation). When the hon. Minister of Finance made his financial exposé the other day, he was cheered by his supporters in this House as a messenger with good news. I must confess that, whilst I do not agree with his political opinions, he spoke very eloquently of the prosperity which we enjoy in Canada, of the prosperity which he assumed he spread with a benevolent hand all over the country, and also of the gratitude of the people, as manifested in the popular verdict of the 20th June, 1882. The hon. members on the right joined in the chorus, and repeated on all sides that the protection accorded by our Tariff was one of the causes of this prosperity; they added that another cause was the policy adopted by the Government in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Notwithstanding his customary modesty, the hon. Finance Minister could not avoid saying and repeating in his speech that he had proved his wisdom and foresight, and that his colleagues had that comprehensiveness of mind which distinguishes statesmen. It appears that in politics it is somewhat permissible to compliment one's self when we are certain to have well deserved praise, and that it will be also accorded by others. However it may be, I regret I cannot join in concert with the praises which the hon. Ministers and their friends indulge in the matter of their policy. I rejoice, in common with them, and every man who loves his country ought to rejoice, at the prosperity which Canada enjoys. But I have no hesitation in saying that the Government has not the slightest reason to attribute to itself the merit of this prosperity, and that it has been proved on several occasions that it is due, and must be attributed to, entirely different causes than those alleged by those who occupy the Treasury benches. I think I will be able to establish, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of the present Government on the Tariff and in the matter of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has not only not rendered the country prosperous, but has even been less advantageous to the country than that policy propounded during the last three Sessions by the hon. member for West Durham. It is a fact, which is admitted by all those who know history, that there are years of abundance and years of distress in the best governed countries, depending in a special manner on good or bad harvests, over which Governments have no control whatever. In the commercial world there are years of depression, or crises, succeeding years of prosperity. There is a somewhat direct relation between years of scarcity and years of crises, as there is between years of abundance and years of commercial prosperity. But this movement of expansion and depression, which in certain years may attain extreme limits, is no more controllable than the rising and subsiding of the sea. The most experienced nations in the world in commercial matters—England and the United States—who are antipodes on the question of Tariffs, have passed through a crisis, and enjoy to-day great commercial prosperity. But it never occurred to the statesmen of either of these great countries to attribute either the prosperity or depression which succeeded one another in their respective countries, as well as in Canada, to their Tariff. Here, Mr. Speaker, the public has been greatly humbugged with these questions of crisis and Tariff. But I have too much confidence in the wisdom of those who govern us to suppose that they are really convinced that by any legislation they can at their will give us abundance or scarcity, and change, by a turn of the hand, the most severe crisis into commercial prosperity. It is easy, after five years of experience, to calculate what has been the general result of the National Policy in the matter of the prosperity of the country. According to the last Report of the hon. Minister of Customs we see that the Tariff has had very little influence on our imports, which are increasing at a rate which alarms our business men. Our exports are also greater during the last few years. But this increase does not exist except for the products of the forest and for our agricultural products on which the Tariff exercises no influence whatever. It is also as clear as possible for any impartial mind that the real resources of the country, our agriculture, our timber, and navigation, have not received any development by the present policy of the Government, and that the only effect of the Tariff has been to benefit the manufacturers of the country. I have already had occasion to prove in this Chamber that this discriminating protection to the manufacturers is at the expense of the rest of the population. So that the Government, by its Tariff, has only succeeded in changing the distribution of the fortunes of the public. If it has, by certain privileges accorded to them, been able to enrich one class by impoverishing another class of the people, I defy any to prove that it has, by a single cent, contributed to the general wealth of the country. A country really rich, Mr. Speaker, is not one which contains a great number of millionaires and powerful corporations, in contrast to the poverty which lies side by side with them, but is where the public wealth is more equally divided; it is where a country possessing a certain number of rich and poor according to the immutable laws of God, the rich are comparatively less rich and the poor less poor. A well governed country is not one which legalizes monopolies, despising the rights of the people, as was formerly practiced under the reign of Queen Elizabeth of England, and as is practiced to a certain extent in Canada; it is where the rights of each and every one is respected, and where favoritism is excluded. I am one of those who believe that the first duty imposed on a Government is to hold in their hands the scales of justice evenly, so that neither one side nor the other may be over-balanced by favoritism. Favoritism and corruption are the breakers of those who govern, and all legislation is dangerous the moment you open the door to either of these political plagues. I will not deny that the position of those who govern is often difficult and thorny. To retain power they endeavor to conciliate the influence of powerful corporations, and of associations or influential classes, and for this purpose they are led into temptation to make one side of the balance go down. The Tariff is a terrible weapon in the hands of a Government who might wish to avail themselves of the assistance of manufacturing companies or other powerful corporations in times of election. We can easily understand that these gentlemen cannot do otherwise than recognize the privileges given to them, and cannot do otherwise than lend a strong helping hand to the Government which has showed itself so generous in their behalf. It is a striking fact that the policy of the Government favors the rich and powerful corporations at the expense of the poor and unimportant classes. I do not accuse the Government of acting thus corruptly. But I cannot help realizing this fact as a great injustice which must strike the eye, and which has certainly the effect, if not the object to conciliate powerful influences for the Government so useful in times of election. There is not a member of this honorable House who can maintain here that the present Tariff distributes equally the burdens and the wealth in the different classes of society. What have we, as a matter of fact, observed in the last four or five years? We have seen spring into existence as if by enchantment under the present Tariff colossal fortunes. Manufacturers of all kinds have become millionaires, whilst the workingmen and the farmers are flying from Canada by thousands as an ungrateful country. These are the elements of this state of affairs which are called, perhaps on one side, the unnatural rapid enrichment of certain large corporations and some manufacturing companies which accumulate millions on millions, and on the other side there is an alarming emigration of the working and agricultural population. It is painful to admit, but it is the truth. Although the taxes paid by the agricultural classes are much greater since than before the passage of the Tariff, the cereals and other products of the farm, with the exception of wheat, are sold cheaper than they were in preceding years. This clearly proves that the Tariff has been unfavorable to the farmers. I will take the liberty of reading to the House a list taken from the Monetary Times containing the average price for the products of the farm on the Montreal market in the months of June and November of each year from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, and from 1879 to 1882:

Average price of
Red Winter Wheat. ....	$1.12½	$1.26
Oats .....	40½	37
Barley. ....	75	78
Peas.....	91½	88
Butter.....	20½	18
Cheese.....	11½	11
Pork.....	6.75	6.00
Beef.....	5 00	4 80
Wool.....	30	22½

We see by this comparison that the agricultural products, except wheat, sold higher from 1874 to 1878 than from that epoch to 1882. It is a fact, however, which no one can deny, that money is more abundant to day than it was several years ago among the farmers, and that property for the last three or four years is depreciated. This abundance of money may be attributed to several causes: First, to the good harvests, which have produced large revenues since 1879, although the average price has not been so high for farm products; second, to the improved state of the lumber market; third, to the enormous amount of American money which is circulating in the country and which comes from our emigrated countrymen. This is what the French Canadian farmers who are in debt do. They go to the United States with their families to work in the factories, and there at the sacrifice of their health and sometimes of their lives they gain large salaries which serve to pay their debts or discharge their mortgages. This last is the principal source whence comes the surplus money now in circulation among the Canadian farmers. It has been many times proved that the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the right could not have benefited the lumber interest, but on the contrary is injurious to it. It is useless to say that it cannot influence our harvests. So that if it in any manner has contributed to render money more abundant in the country, it has been increasing the emigration of our countrymen to the United States. But I say without fear of being mistaken, that it is not the manufacturers of Canada who enrich our fellow countrymen. It is not they who directly or indirectly contribute a single cent to the general prosperity of the country. They do not give their workmen sufficient wages for that. It is not that I wish to reproach them, they are business men and they have but one anxiety—to increase their profits. But I say that the law which gives a protection of from 30 to 40 per cent. to certain manufacturers, which permits them to double their capital within two or three years, is an atrocious law and unworthy of any civilized country, whilst it at the same time realizes its inability to increase a single cent the wages of the workmen employed in their manufactories. Thus we have the following strange result: Certain manufacturers can sell their goods 30 to 40 per cent. dearer than American manufacturers and at the same time pay 20 to 25 per cent. less for the wages of the workmen. The salaries of those who work in Canada as in all other countries in the world is regulated by the supply and demand. The work is proportionately dear as the demand is greater and vice versa, no indirect legislation can increase or lower the price of labor. But it is not the same with regard to the revenue of the capitalists. Capital can to a great extent be protected by special legislation. In order to do that all that is necessary is to prevent foreign competition against industries in which their capital is invested under a Protective Tariff. Nor does it follow that since we cannot protect labor, we ought not to protect capital. I will not go so far as to contend for that. Everyone is agreed that it is good policy to favor, to a certain extent, the investment of capital in certain industries. The only difference which exists between the Liberal party and the Conservative party is as to the degree of protection which should be accorded. In 1878 there was a General Tariff of 17½ per cent. on cottons and woollen goods. If we add to that the cost of transport, insurance, &c., we have a duty of about 25 per cent. on the value of the article between the place of manufacture and the place of sale. This 25 per cent. is a considerable protection, if we take into consideration the low price of manual labor in our Canadian manufactories as compared with the American. But the protection to capital becomes unjust when it rises to 40 or 50 per cent., including in the same the charges of transportation and insurance. It becomes oppressive for the workingmen, who, whilst not receiving larger salaries, are obliged as consumers to pay more for what they buy. It becomes oppressive to the farmers, who derive no compensation by the sale of their products. The actual state of the market for cereals and products of all kinds clearly establishes that the present Tariff cannot in any manner raise the price of their products. They have, indeed, during the last few months, experienced a considerable decline, notwithstanding the prosperity of our manufactures, of the lumber trade, and the commercial affairs of the country in general. I must congratulate the hon. Ministers on the good idea which they conceived, not in the interest of the country but in the interest of their party, in bringing on the elections one year before the time fixed for the expiration of Parliament, and a few months only before the falsity of their contentions on the subject of the sale of agricultural products was made evident by facts such as we are in possession of to-day. A remarkable fact, and one which clearly establishes that the imposition of a duty on grain is not advantageous to the agricultural population, is that from 1874 to 1878 the price of grain and cereals was dearer in Canada than in the United States. The contrary is the case since the passage of the Tariff. The price of grain, since then, has been invariably lower here than in the neighboring Republic. The duty on grain ought to be taken off, not only because it does not protect the agricultural class, but because it is injurious to it and because it is a source of embarrassment and difficulty to the grain dealers in the country. It is much to be regretted that the Government pay no attention to the complaints which come from all parts of the country against the imposition of duties on grain. There are a number of other changes which should be made and which have been proved in this House by judicious calculations. It is true that in each season since 1879 there has been certain readjustments—certain duties have been increased, others diminished, on certain articles the duties have been taken off altogether. But these changes do not satisfy public opinion. It was something more than an ordinary farce to hear at the last Election the noise made by the Conservative speakers because the Government had taken off the taxes on tea and coffee and some other items of trivial importance, and at the same time by a singular contradiction which exists only among our opponents on the principle of an entire absence of political principles they applaud their party which imposed them a few years ago. We remember that all the taxes, those on tea and coffee as well as the taxes on flour, coal, coal-oil, &c., had only been introduced to protect the people of Canada. To-day we take off these taxes on tea and coffee and some other articles. Why? The answer is very simple, to again protect the people of Canada. It is necessary to have a little more than ordinary cheek to swallow all that. For the same reason the hon. Minister takes off, this year, taxes on a certain number of articles. I will not consider in detail the merits of these changes. For the present I will content myself with observing that I find very strange the pretensions of the hon. Minister of Finance. According to his statements he is always protecting the people—first in imposing the taxes, and then in taking them off or in making them disappear entirely. There was an old man who did the same thing, but with a great deal more candor. One day one of his children came home to ask his benediction; it was on the morning of New Year's Day. For what reason I do not know, but the father and son were not on amicable terms. "Go away," said the old man; "not only I will not give you my benediction this year, but I will take away that which I gave you for the past previous years." The hon. Minister of Finance is wrong in not admitting that, in abolishing certain taxes he is taking away the blessings he bestowed on them so liberally by the Tariff of 1879. The hon. Minister made some remarks about the large surplus of the year ending on the last day of June ult. and which amounted to over $6,000,000. If I well understood the nature of his speech, a superabundance of good things may sometimes be injurious. If there is one man in the Chamber who thinks little of the millions which make up the surplus it is certainly the hon. Minister of Finance. These surpluses are there as a solemn protest of his errors of calculation, and of his false prophecies. We have got these surpluses because our importations have increased at an alarming rate, which is attracting great attention among business men. These importations cause an enormous balance of trade against us.

Patriots, such as the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, ought not to sleep in peace when they remember that they always contended that the country would be ruined if it continued to have the balance of trade against it; but the great reason that should make hon. gentlemen regret such large surpluses is the idea that there is among the electors of Canada, men sufficiently intelligent to recognize the iniquity of such high taxes, such revolting taxes, on such necessities as light, fuel and bread. It is the conviction that these numerous sums which are accumulating in the Treasury, are only the product of unjust legislation which presses heavily on the people of Canada, and which oppress in a special manner the workingmen, the farmers and the poorer classes of society. Another cause of prosperity, according to the hon. member from Cardwell (Mr. White), is the policy adopted by the Government in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the development of the North-West. I will say very little in reply to this question for the present, anticipating that it will come before the House in another form before the end of the Session. I think it is easy enough to establish the unsoundness of this contention. It is only requisite for this purpose to place side by side the policy of the two parties and to assign to each its share of the responsibility. The policy of the Conservative party in the matter of the construction of the Pacific Railway has undergone many important transformations from year to year since 1871, but especially during the last four years. I will not in the least reproach them with their change of policy, as the North-West is becoming year by year better known, that its lands are enhanced in value, and that certain opinions, which had appeared in the first instance reasonable, became absurd and practically inapplicable. The policy of the Liberal party has experienced certain changes; but there is an important and characteristic feature which has not been abandoned, that is, not to augment the burdens of the people, and I do not fear to say if the Liberal party had remained in power the burdens on the country would not have increased a single cent in the construction of the Pacific Railway. The essential difference between the two parties is that the Conservative party was determined to go on with the work irrespective of the enormous burdens it imposed on the country; whilst the Liberal party was disposed to advance more cautiously in carrying out the promises made to the other Provinces in 1871, that the burdens on the people would not be increased. But it was said in certain parts of the country at the last Elections, and it has been repeated in this House, that we would not have constructed this road, and that the country would not have profited from the great influx of capital and the influx of emigration which this gigantic work has induced. This was the argument which was employed to justify the squandering of millions and millions of dollars in British Columbia and on the north of Lake Superior, without object or benefit for the country. I reply to this objection in saying that there is not a man familiar with the political history of the last few years who can do otherwise than say that the man who did most to open up for colonization the fertile plains of the North-West is the hon. member from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). It was he who prepared the prosperous state which the North-West enjoys to-day. By untiring industry which exhausted his strength, the hon. member from East York made a multitude of explorations which taught the emigrants the value of this country. He made a map which is used to-day, and he furnished an outlet for the products of this immense territory by the Pembina Branch. The work which has been done since 1879 was rendered easy, and, to speak candidly, there are many men who are not statesmen who would have accomplished as much and in a much more efficient manner than the present hon. Minister of Railways in the last few years. I do not hesitate to say that the vain boastings of

hon. gentlemen on the right are not actually justified by the facts. What would we have had to-day, Mr. Speaker, if the policy of the Opposition had been followed? This is an important matter to calculate. Let us see. The two sections of British Columbia would not be under construction at the present time and would be delayed for an indefinite number of years, and by this means obligations to the extent of $50,000,000 would have been saved to the country. But the construction across the prairies of the North-West would have been going on the same as to-day, either by a Syndicate or under the immediate supervision of the Government. The lands would be sold as they are to-day; we would have the same number of emigrants; in a word, we would have all the same advantages. Where, in fact, go the emigrants, apart from the Chinese? To British Columbia, to the north shores of Lake Superior or to the prairies? It is well known by every one that the prairies are the only place to which there is any emigration. The actual facts prove that the Government has adopted a false policy in increasing by $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, in money and lands the obligations of Canada for the construction of the two sections north of Lake Superior and in British Columbia, which it ought to have postponed to a later date, as they are not at all required neither for the necessity of colonization nor for the general interests of Canada. But this is not all. The lands given as a bonus to the Syndicate sell to-day four or five times as high as the price given to the House by the hon. Minister of Railways. In constructing, in the first instance, the Prairie Section and in not giving out at once the whole work of the road, the Government would have profited by the increase in the price of the lands, and it is also as evident as possible to any man who is not prejudiced, that the two other sections which I have just mentioned would have been constructed by a land bonus, somewhat similar to that which we give to-day and without any money bonus. The Government would have thus saved in the public debt several millions of dollars, and we would have had the same number of emigrants and the same advantages for the North-West and for the rest of Canada. I think I have proved that the present prosperity does not exist in Canada as a consequence of the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the right, but owing to causes entirely beyond their control. It is to Providence that we owe this prosperity, as the hon. member from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) so clearly proved. It has been given to us whilst these hon. gentlemen are in power, notwithstanding all kinds of errors which they have committed, notwithstanding the injustice which they have committed in the imposition of the Customs duties. I will only make a few remarks, Mr. Speaker, on the public expenditure and on the Estimates which have been submitted to the House for the year commencing on the first of July, 1883. The administration of the public affairs is an important point to consider in the judgment which we must pronounce on those who govern the country. It is an old saying, that good accounts make good friends. I must confess that I do not find the administration of the hon. gentlemen on the right, perfect enough to extend to them my political sympathy. I will endeavor at all times to be just to them, and not to judge their acts more severe than is proper. We must bear in mind that governments are the great points of attraction for solicitors and office-seekers of all kinds, who make the country pay dearly at times for the services which they may have rendered to their party during the elections. Some demand positions, some wharves, some public buildings, favors, in a word, of all kinds. And I am sure that many a Minister, after having yielded without sufficient resistance, has often repeated this famous saying: "Lord, save me from my friends." This first consideration will be important. We must, moreover, make allowance for the surplus population, aggrandisement of territory, everything, in a word, which can justify any increase of the public revenue. After allowing everything that is proper to allow for that, I do not hesitate to say that the public expenditure is increasing at a most alarming rate, and with a rapidity which not even the alarmists would have dreamt of when the Conservatives succeeded to power in 1878. In 1878 the expenditure rose to $23,503,000, which was an increase of $185,000 on that of 1874. These $185,000 constitute the sole increase in the public expenditure for which the Mackenzie Administration was responsible during the time it was in power. Since that time the public expenditure has increased at the rate of $1,000,000 a year on an average, as the following table will indicate:—

For the Estimates of 1883-84, the enormous sum of $29,961,989 is asked, which is an increase of $6,458,851, in six years, over the expenditure of 1878. I will only enter into details in the matter of expenditure which is entirely under the control of the Government, as I do not wish to occupy at too great length the attention of the Chamber. The first item on the list is Civil Service. The sums voted for Civil Service ought not to be voted except on most careful examination, not only because the Civil Service absorbs each year a considerable sum, but because the nominations of public officials may afford opportunity for favoritism to the Government. If it is just, Mr. Speaker, to properly recompense, according to the nature of the service and the position which one occupies, every employé who performs his duty, it is unjust on the other hand that there should be in the public service, men who live, doing nothing, at the expense of the rest of the population, and thereby receive the reward for the services which they may have rendered during the elections. There is in the offices of the Government a considerable increase in the number of public employés, which has not been approved of by the Civil Service Commission nor justified by the hon. Ministers. We have the right to suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a certain number of employés would not be in the service of the Government without the favoritism of the hon. Ministers for those who support them. The expenses for Civil Service in 1878, were $823,369.80, which shows a reduction of $60,000 effected by the Liberal party during the time they were in power. The amount paid in the year 1881-82 according to the Public Accounts, was $946,031.65, showing an enormous increase of $123,000. For the year 1883-84, $1,109,100, or an increase of $285,731, over 1878 is asked. The second item is the Administration of Justice, in which the expenses amounted to $564,020 in 1877-78, and $581,695 in 1882, and in the Estimates now submitted $621,765 is asked. The hon. Minister of Finance has certainly given sufficient reasons to justify such an increase in the Department of Justice. An important economy which was solemnly promised at the elections in 1878 was the abolition of the Supreme Court. Its abolition was demanded, in the first instance, as a matter of economy, and secondly, because it was not as at present constituted a competent tribunal in civil actions in the Province of Quebec. The Supreme Court has been subjected to a regular attack during each Session of the Parliament. All the manœuvres, attacks, and remedies resulted in nothing. The Supreme Court is still in existence and it is evident that no change will be made in its constitution to satisfy the demands of the Province of Quebec. If the Supreme Court is a useful tribunal and it is important to maintain it, I would like to ask why such an attack was made on it. But this tribunal has been attacked not only by ordinary members, but by gentlemen who to-day occupy seats on the Treasury benches. If, on the contrary, it is a tribunal which does not render justice to the country, and which should not be maintained, then, I do not see why hon. members on the right have not abolished it, and have thus carried out the promises which they made to the electors of Canada. Another item showing a considerable increase, is that of the Department of Militia. The expenditures under this heading were in 1878, $618,136.58; they were $772,811.79 in 1881-82. According to the Estimates just submitted, $779,600 is asked. I think the hon. Minister of Militia will have much difficulty in proving to the House that such an increase for the defence of the country is necessary, when a few years ago we had not the least apprehension of danger in only expending about two-thirds of that amount. But I desire to draw the attention of this House in a special manner, to the amount expended in 1881-82 for the maintenance of the Military College of Kingston. In 1877-78, it amounted to $30,113, and in 1882, to $58,937, or nearly double. The Mackenzie Government was formerly reproached with the extravagance of maintaining this establishment at Kingston, and especially because this institution was deemed entirely useless. We might, therefore, have hoped that the Conservative party, in succeeding to power, would have chopped down or battered down this institution. But we can form some idea of the stability of the ideas and principles of the hon. gentlemen on the right, in seeing that not only the Military College at Kingston has been maintained, but that also its expenditure is double what it was before. Under the heading of Immigration and Quarantine we expended in 1878, $180,000; in 1881-82, $253,000. This year $570,487 is asked. We thus observe that the expenses of this Department have enormously increased. It is an admitted fact, that it is of the greatest importance to colonize the North-West as soon as possible. I regret, however, to see that so far the expenses of colonization are nearly all charged to the Department of the Interior. It would be only right to make the Syndicate bear a considerable part of this expenditure. When the different clauses of the Syndicate contract were discussed before the House, if I rightly understood hon. Ministers, it was distinctly understood that the Government would be relieved from part of the cost of immigration. The contrary is the case to-day. In my opinion, a very important matter, and one in which hon. Ministers seem to take very little interest, is the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen in the United States. It seems to me a very lamentable matter that the Government attach more attention to attracting foreign immigration, instead of trying to retain our native population at home, and repatriate our fellow-countrymen in the United States. The hon. members who occupied seats in this House before 1878, said that one of the planks of the Conservative party was the repatriation of our countrymen in the United States. After five years of trial, the result of the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the right is not very appreciable on this important question. No one doubts that many would come back to this country if they had only the assistance which is so liberally given to foreign emigrants. Where are to-day the promises of the past? I would like to hear during this discussion from our political adversaries, what has become of that solicitude which they had for our fellow-countrymen on coming to power, and which now has vanished. I will say nothing more on the public expenditure and on the Estimates which have been submitted, awaiting a more favorable time to make my intended remarks when the House is in Committee on the Estimates. I will content myself in comparing the most important items of public expenditure from 1877-78, and 1881-82, and also the Estimates for 1883-84.

If we compare the total expenditure of 1878 with the Estimates asked for in 1883-84, we will observe a difference of $6,458,831, or 26 per cent. in five years, without counting the Supplementary Estimates, which will be submitted, and which will amount to several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). The hon. member has said that the increase in the expenditure was $6,000,000. Will he tell us with what year he makes the comparison?

Mr. RINFRET (Translation). With 1877-78. It is a very serious matter to realize such an increase on the public expenditure, in view of the fact that many of the items which make up this increase, are of such a nature that it will be difficult to make any reduction in them, in case of a crisis. To-day we have several millions surplus revenue; but our Tariff is so constructed that these revenues may vary to a great extent, as was proved in the year 1879-80, the last year of the crisis and the first year of the operation of the Protective Tariff. Our revenues are not fixed; they depend to a great extent on the amount of our importations. I may not be believed by hon. gentlemen on the other side, but I will venture an opinion that, in the event of another crisis, our deficits will be as large as are our surpluses of to-day; and I contend that it is an unsound argument which our opponents use when they speak of the surpluses which they have to-day, as a justification for their extravagance. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the enormous revenues which we have, I believe I will be doing my duty as a member, in bespeaking economy and prudence in the administration of the public expenditure. I desire, Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, to draw the attention of the House to the appointment of Mr. Fabre, as special agent at Paris, with a salary of $2,000 per annum, and on the services rendered by Sir A. T. Galt, as Plenipotentiary in England, for the Government of Canada. The nomination of Mr. Fabre is of a peculiar character, and I wish to protest against it. Mr. Fabre, about ten years ago, was a journalist in the Province of Quebec. He was a member of the Liberal party. His paper obtained a large circulation at the time of the Pacific Scandal, owing to the energy with which he lashed the Conservative Administration, at that time when it had the same hon. members as now compose the present Government. He thereby proved that he had no confidence whatever in the present hon. leaders of the Conservative party. During all the time the Liberal party was in power Mr. Fabre fought in its ranks against Protection and in favor of the Ministerial policy. He was appointed Senator by the Liberal party. In 1878, as soon as the Liberal party lost power, a gradual change of opinion came over Mr. Fabre, as appeared from the tone of his journal L'Evenement. Six months afterwards the right-about-face was complete, and only one thing remained to be done to calculate what recognition he would receive from gentlemen on the right. From time to time since we saw occasional pickings either directly or indirectly given to him or to his paper, and which amounted to some thousands of dollars. But to-day he directly and in the light of day has received his reward. If I protest against the nomination of Mr. Fabre, I think it is time to finish with these premiums which are offered for treason. Many members will admit with me, that the noblest duty devolving on the Government is to make disappear that spirit of venality which destroys the formation of a public opinion moral and disinterested in its nature and character. The sum asked this year for Sir A. T. Galt, amounts to several thousand dollars. It has been proved clearly in the last two Sessions, that the office of Plenipotentiary is one which present political circumstances render unnecessary. The presence of a Plenipotentiary in England has no object, inasmuch as all transactions between Canada and the other countries of Europe is done through the intervention of the British Ambassador. All the overtures so far made to France and Spain have resulted in nothing, and evidently we cannot count on any conclusion of a Treaty as long as we cannot negotiate directly with France. We remember that the Quebec journals announced, a few months ago, the customs reductions on ships from forty to two francs per ton; but at the same time a bonus of $12 per ton, and $22 per ton on the engines and steam machinery constructed in France was given. These immense advantages more than compensate for the reduction of the duties, and place us in a much more disadvantageous position than we were in before the reduction in the French Tariff. One conclusion this House should come to, and that is, that there is, no reason for retaining Sir A. T. Galt, or any other Plenipotentiary, in England, and that the sums demanded for this item, besides being high, should not be voted as they are entirely useless. I regret that the hon. Minister of Finance has made no allusion to a subject which should occupy a large part of this Budget address; I refer to the making of a Commercial Treaty between Canada and the United States. I do not think I should close my address without making some allusion to it. Several opinions have been expressed in this House as to the best means of encouraging our mineral industries and manufactures. There may be some difference as to the best means to adopt to encourage these last two industries, but I do not hesitate to say that there can be only one opinion as to the best means to adopt to protect our agricultural classes. If we could make all party feeling disappear from those who are engaged in politics and who have studied the events of the last twenty-five years, I do not think that one farmer could be found who would not be in favor of the free interchange of agricultural products with the United States and in favor of a Treaty of Reciprocity with our neighbors. There is no doubt that the removal of the duties from agricultural produce would be of great benefit to the farmers of the country. We gain doubly thereby; first by the sale of our products, and, secondly, by the purchase of foreign products. Our exports to the United States amounted, for the year 1882, to about $11,000,000, for what is termed animals and their products, which includes horses, horned cattle, sheep, poultry, butter, cheese, eggs, undressed skins, wool, furs, &c. Under the head of agricultural products, embracing barley, wheat, oats, peas, rye, beans, hay, potatoes, malt, hops, green fruit, maple sugar, vegetables, &c., exports to the United States amounted to about $18,000,000. Barley figures to the extent of $10,000,000 in this classification. Adding up these two items we have a total of $28,000,000 to $30,000,000 representing all our exports of animals and agricultural produce to the United States. The duties paid on these articles into the American Treasury amount to several millions of dollars; our imports from the United States under the same heading are much less they only amount to $8,000,000 for the last year. For the last three or four years the price of grain, except for corn, has been all along dearer in the neighboring Republic than in Canada. Barley is always several cents dearer there than it is here. It is the same for vegetables, potatoes and hay. Horses, for several years, have been sold from 30 to 50 per cent. dearer in the New York than in the Montreal market, and this explains why, after paying a duty of 20 per cent., we exported $2,250,000 worth of horses in the year ending in the month of June ultimo. Our exports of butter, hay and potatoes are considerable also, notwithstanding the high duties imposed by our neighbors on these articles. That the greater part of these duties were paid into the American Treasury by the Canadian farmers who exported them, and only a small portion by our neighbors, no one can doubt. To sustain the contrary it would be necessary to prove that our export of these articles exercise an influence, if not controlling, at least important, on the market of the neighboring Republic. If no duties were imposed by our neighbors on these articles no one can doubt that we would have received from 10 to 20 per cent. on the average more for these articles than we obtained—that is to say, sometimes 5, sometimes 10, and sometimes 20 per cent., according to the supply and demand. This would represent about 50 to 100 per cent. on the net profit of the producer. The same reasoning applies to our imports from the United States, on which the duties are paid, in a certain proportion, by the consumers of Canada according to the control, more or less absolute, which our neighbors exercise on our market by the sale of their own products. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to believe for an instant, that if we offer as compensation to our neighbors, to take off the duties imposed by the Government of Canada on coal oil, coal, flour, corn and grains of all kinds, that they on their side will take off the duties on horses, hay, potatoes and on agricultural products generally. They could have no reason indeed not to consent to an arrangement, which would be advantageous to their own farmers as well as to those of Canada. In the first instance, our farmers would profit by the Reciprocity Treaty in getting more for the products which they export, and again in paying less for the articles of prime necessity which they import from our neighbors, and on which we have established unjust taxes, such as on flour, corn, coal oil, and a multitude of others. We have every reason to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the United States as well as Canada would be in favor of a Commercial Treaty of Reciprocity which would afford a mutually good market for both. I therefore regret that it has not seemed good to the Government to occupy themselves with the subject of a Treaty of Reciprocity especially with the United States. We remember that one of the reasons assigned for imposing a duty on grains of the United States was that in having resort to such reprisals we would compel our neighbors to negotiate with us a Treaty of commerce for the free interchange of agricultural products. This argument was used last Session by the hon. Minister of Public Works to justify the tax on flour. Well, Mr. Speaker, our Tariff has been several years in existence and the Government has not made a single step or move towards obtaining for us Reciprocity with the United States. I do not hesitate to say that in so acting they have failed in their duty and in the promises made to the country. I will not prolong my remarks further. I think I have proved that the administration of the public affairs is extravagant, that the taxes collected are not employed, are not expended in the well-understood interests, and for the greater good of those who pay them. I regret, moreover, that the Government is doing nothing to bring about a Commercial Treaty with the United States. What is necessary to develop our lumber trade, our navigation, and our agricultural resources is the free entry of our vessels into the important ports of the world; the free markets of the principal nations of the globe for the export of the lumber and agricultural products of Canada, which to-day are immense, but which will feed the world when the immense and fertile prairies of the North-West will contain millions and millions of souls.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation). I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the very elaborate discourse of my hon. colleague, the member for Lotbinière. I found in his speech a multitude of revelations, which it afforded me a pleasure to listen to, and if the history which he recounted to us of the benediction was realized, and if this old man is the one I knew in the county of Lotbinière, I pity him for the future, especially if he continues in the good way of admissions which he has commenced. The old man of whom I speak is in the habit, on New Year's Day, of assembling his family, and he causes his children to relate their exploits during the year. The one who has told the most lies and committed the most misdeeds then receives the greatest number of presents. When, therefore, my learned friend returns to his county, invited as representative to rejoin his friends, the family of the old man, the latter will say to him: "You have made too many admissions; I cannot give you as many presents as the others!" There was a large number of these old men when I passed through Lotbinière. They were in the majority, and that is the reason why I was not elected. My hon. friend rejoices with us at the prosperity which reigns in the country, but he says this prosperity is not due to the policy of the Government, is not due to the Tariff, to the good fiscal laws, but that it is due simply to the good harvests. The National Policy for him is a dead letter, which has had no influence in promoting the prosperity of the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, nor any class of society. If, Mr. Speaker, you will go back to what was said from 1874 to 1879 you will remember that there were two distinct issues between the Liberal-Conservative and the Grit parties. Then it was not sufficient to say that the National Policy, that Protection, would not give prosperity, but they went farther—they said that the Protective Tariff would be the ruin of the country; not only it would not produce wealth, not only the farmer would not benefit by it, not only manufactures would not increase, not only the merchant could not carry on business, but that all classes of society would be ruined. This, Mr. Speaker, was what was said at that time. Mr. Speaker, this is what the hon. members of the party said whose leaders have fallen one after another under the blow of vengeance, under what I might call the indignation of the people. Then these great minds were on these benches which to-day are so worthily filled by our leaders. They were there making all kinds of terrible prophecies, mocking at the Conservative party, which, when the people was straggling in agony and misery, said to the Liberal Ministry: Abandon these absurd doctrines, this antiquated system, which is no longer adapted to the present state of affairs; have recourse to the Protective system and you will restore the prosperity of the country. They laughed at us then; gave us figures as they do to-day. They cited to us the great systems, the great writers of old countries, and they told us, as you see, that Protection is the ruin of nations. But in spite of all this, Mr. Speaker, under the guidance of our worthy, of our honored and learned leader, the battle was fought; the Canadian people had confidence in the principles of Protection, and to-day, after four years of trial, we have come to the conclusion that Canada is more prosperous than it ever was before. The authorized oracles of the Opposition say to us: It is true the country is prosperous, but it is the good harvests which are the sole cause of it. Mr. Speaker, it is the harvests which have made spring into existence hundreds and thousands of manufactories. It is the harvests which has made the products of the farmer dearer. It is the abundant products of the farm which makes them sell better. But what is all this strange reasoning? When a party cannot deny any longer the practical results attained by a Government, it thus takes in this manner some such sort of means of escape. I admire the courage of the Liberal party in continuing to defend their past, admitting at the same time the present properity. I would admire it more if it would candidly admit that they were deceived in the past. They tell us, Mr. Speaker, that the Opposition is not opposed to Protection to a certain extent; but what does it object to? It is to a Protection such as we have to-day. Since when has the Liberal party inscribed on its banner that it was in favor of any kind of Protection? Have we not in our memories this axiom of the ex-Ministers: that this Tariff should not and could not be anything but a Revenue Tariff? Of Protection! they did not want any of it! They only wanted a sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the country, and, moreover, it was necessary to so calculate this revenue that each year they produced a deficit, augmenting at the same time the public debt without diminishing the expenses of the country, without advantage to any class of society. I take advantage of this admission of our Liberal friends, that protection is good, to a certain extent. This is so much gained. This will save us so much in answer to their arguments before the people. We will no longer have to defend the Protective Tariff in its entirety, because they admit its advantages to a certain extent. But as to the measure of this Protection, we repeat what we said before, and what they denied. We say that not only the Protective Tariff does not impede the prosperity of a country, not only it does not ruin it, but, on the contrary, it enriches it. We will recall that the facts and experience have proved that we were justified when we predicted these things, whilst the Liberal party prophesied disaster. We will again say to the country, since we had reason then, we ought to know better than the Liberals the measure of Protection necessary for the country. Mr. Speaker, they speak to us of England and the United States. They tell us that England is rich in spite of its years of crisis, and in spite of remaining Free Trade. No person can deny, nevertheless, that there is a considerable movement in favor of Protection. Several of the industries of England, which, for a time, supplied the markets of the entire world with the products of their manufactures, threaten to collapse, and already the United States, a protective country, are going into the English market, to compete against the products of England itself. There is a great move in England to obtain from the Government a Protective Tariff. England, notwithstanding that she has the raw material at the lowest price, in face of the immense rapidity of the progress of the United States, feels the necessity of protecting itself against the competition of their neighbors. They tell us that the United States are rich and prosperous. Yes, Mr. Speaker; but why? Why have they done more in fifty years than other countries in two hundred years? It is because the United States, in adopting a Protective Tariff, encouraged home industry, protected the working classes, and secured a market for the products of the farm. Having in their possession an immense country, where raw material is found in great abundance, they so arranged their legislation that manufactures rapidly increased, and now they are sending their fleet to all parts of the world, and have become, if I may use the expression, the manufacturing centre of the entire world. Well, if the United States have progressed in this manner, why can we not do likewise? If the United States have large surpluses which seem to sicken the hearts of many in this House, to what do they owe them? They owe them to Protection as we also owe our surplus to Protection, and with this surplus they diminish their debt each year, and no one has yet ventured to say that the United States in employing their surplus to pay off their debt adopted a bad policy. It is only the necessity for speaking, and a species of fanaticism of the party, which can give them courage to make such declarations as we have heard this evening. They tell us, Mr. Speaker, and so doing I recognize a confraternity of opinion between our opponents and a certain class of men in another country; they tell us, I repeat, that a country which is rich and prosperous is one in which there is the greatest equality. It is where we do not see one very rich man living side by side with a very poor one. In other words, it is a country, I presume, of social equality—it is the country which realizes the principle of liberty, equality, fraternity—there where the poor man is taught that he to whom God has not given the necessary energy and talents, to build up a fortune, to become jealous of the rich, and to desire to overthrow him, in order to appropriate the spoils. Mr. Speaker, this is a false principle—these are false maxims. And it is a bad social and political education to give to the people. The Liberal party, however, is determined not to be distanced by its elder brothers in the Old World. The Conservatives prefer to inculcate to the people that the law is the same for every man, but that fortune belongs to the most industrious—to the man to whom nature and habits have given the means to honestly acquire wealth. I understand, Mr. Speaker, the object aimed at—they imagine that the people, hearing these ideas propounded so eloquently, will say: These men who manufacture iron, sugar, india rubber, all the great manufacturers are rich, and, therefore, they are our natural enemies. Let us oppose them; let us unite against them; destroy their influence; refuse them our confidence, our assistance, co-operation. They hope by these means to bring about a conflict between the plebian, that is the workingman and, the capitalist, that is the manufacturing classes. They are mistaken, Mr. Speaker, and they do not make allowance for the intelligence of the people. The people, as a whole, are enlightened and just. Formerly, it was said vox populi, vox Dei. There is much truth in these words. The vox populi, vox Dei, manifested itself in 1878, when the people dismissed from power those who ruined the country by a blind administration, and it manifested itself again last year, when it ratified by a solemn vote the policy of the hon. Ministers, who had kept their promises not only in giving us the National Policy, but in restoring general prosperity. They may say to us that the vox populi, vox Dei made itself heard in 1874, at the General Elections, after which our friends were compelled to resign. Mr. Speaker, let us look into this matter. There are in countries enjoying the blessing of that system of Government of the people by the people, moments when the people become tired of those who govern them. The reason is that for a long time they have lent an ear to the incessant, excited and disloyal accusations of a political party whose sole programme is accusation, and during the fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years that the same party is in power the same accusations are repeated. The people, alarmed at the numerous accusations, each succeeding one more vile than the other, says to itself: Perhaps, there is some truth in these accusations on the part of the Opposition. Let us try them. And that is what occurred, when what is called the Pacific Scandal happened. And since so much is said about this scandal, let us see what there was in it. There was a man, who, unfortunately, is no longer among the living, who with his genius understood that the Pacific Railway was the great artery which would enrich the country. As he was very rich, he said to himself that it was his duty to favor the project as far as it was in his power. He made a mistake—a mistake which many people often make; he thought that with lots of money he could succeed. This was a mistake. But let those who never said “come down handsomely,” the disciples of the “big push,” and of certain other maxims which have now become historic, come forward and cast the stone at him. Men paid by the party of purity, under the pretence of protecting public morality, went and broke open doors and drawers, to steal private papers, despoil their secrets, which thrown suddenly before the gaze of the people surprised and captured public opinion and the people embraced the Opposition. It cost them five years of misery and distress, we were exposed to the danger of being compelled to pay hundreds of millions of dollars for an amphibious railroad, part of it a land, part of it a water route, and to see the construction of this road, the Canadian Pacific Railway retarded for an indefinite number of years. Well, Mr. Speaker this is the history of the Pacific Scandal as it is now commencing to be written. An error was undoubtedly committed because the sum of money subscribed was indeed too large. But it was not the money of the people as was there stated. The Liberal party deceived public opinion in saying this money had been taken from the public chest. Yes, it deliberately deceived the people then, and our Opponents will spend many years in the cold shades of opposition to expiate the fault of having thus misled and deceived public opinion. The people also committed a fault then in giving any faith to the slanders of the Liberal party; but it hastened to redeem itself; it seized the first occasion which presented itself. They had already learned that all the promises which the Liberal party made only saddled the people with ruin, misery and hideous bankruptcy, that the former prosperity had been changed into disaster. Mr. Speaker, they also tell us that we favor the manufacturers in order to make certain classes rich who will assist us in the elections. There are perhaps in this House certain wealthy gentlemen who sit on the other side, who would not like to have an investigation made as to the moneys which they furnished in election times and the use that was made of it. Mr. Speaker, all these accusations fall to the ground, when we find our accusers before the tribunals. Our judicial records are swelled with the shameful frauds which are perpetrated by the Liberal party. Is it necessary, for instance, to speak of the St. Ann Ballot Box Trap? Is it necessary to repeat the history of this election in which $18,000 to $20,000 were expended in the interests of the Liberal party.

Mr. RINFRET. Tell us something about the record in the Bellechasse election and the ballot papers in the Montmagny election.

Mr. AMYOT. I am asked to say something about the election in Bellechasse. I have no objection. I was defeated in 1878, and I contested that election, saying that it was through the corruption practiced by my opponent that I was defeated; and what was the result? After a trial of three years before the courts I convicted my opponent of personal corruption, and for the next seven years you will be deprived of the pleasure of hearing his voice in this House. In 1881 I was elected. They contested my election and the court decided that, as far as I was personally concerned, there was not a single corrupt act in that election. The court declared me legally elected, and said there was no corruption, neither by me personally nor by any of my supporters. If details are wanting on a large number of elections I am ready to give them, but I would say to the Liberal party and what is often said, that those who live in glass houses, and such fragile glass, should not throw stones into their neighbor's houses. To summarize, the result of the contested elections has proved that the Conservative party is more desirous of conforming to the law than is the party of the purists. Now, my learned colleague, the hon. member from Lotbinière, speaks to us about the repatriation of Canadian emigrants from the United States, and he complains bitterly that we do nothing for the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen. I think that the new statistics will prove to him that thousands of our fellow countrymen are coming back from the United States. I need not say what pleasure I contemplate the efforts of the Government in this direction, and the success which attends them. It must not be forgotten that the present Government must not be held responsible if, in the dispositions of Providence, our people expatriate themselves, as a matter of necessity, every year, to earn money among the Americans. But when it becomes a question of examining the question of repatriation and emigration, we must look at the general aspect and principal features of the question. What, therefore, do we find in the matter of emigration. We see that in 1875, there were 19,245, at a cost of $14 per head; in 1876, 14,490, at a cost of $19.60 per head, in 1877, the partiality of the Liberal party for immigration was so great that the number of immigrants was reduced to 15,323 at a cost of $12 per head; in 1878, there were 18,372, at a cost of $9.63 per head. We now come to the new era when the present Government came on the scene to change the then actual state of affairs, thanks to the good harvests according to the Liberals, thanks to the Protective Tariff according to us. The first year of the Conservative Government, the number of immigrants, which was 18,322 in 1878, ran up to 30,717, and the cost which was $14 a head, fell to $5.74 per head. In 1880, the number of immigrants was 27,544, at a cost of $6.59 per head; in 1881, 32,587 immigrants at a cost of $6.32 per head; and during the past year—I invite the special attention of the Opposition to this fact—102,000 immigrants at a cost not of $14 per head, but of $3.20 per head. If this, Mr. Speaker, is not a sound policy, if this is not the way to augment the vital force of the country, if this is not the way to direct the immigration to the immense prairies of the North-West, which will make our country before long one of the most prosperous in the world, if that is not introducing immigrants at a mere nominal cost, I must confess that I do not know anything about it. The Opposition may deny it, but it is not the less true that the result attained last year by the hon. Minister of Agriculture is a wonderful one, and we cannot doubt that during the coming year we will succeed as well. Mr. Speaker, there is much complaint that our Canadian emigrants who go to the United States, to eat the bread of misfortune and misery, do not return to our country. Are they aware how many returned this year? About 20,000 returned, the greater part of whom went to the North-West; and I may be permitted, in a House of which a majority do not speak my language, and do not practice my religion, to express the very ardent satisfaction and the sincere hope which I experience in seeing my French Canadian fellow-countrymen having also the courage to go to the North-West. At a later date they will be there as a nucleus, which will prevent us from being isolated in this vast Confederation which we so ardently sighed for, and which is to-day great and prosperous, and which will continue to do justice to all without distinction of religion or nationality. The hon. member from Lotbinière has said that the manufacturers of a country do not contribute to its prosperity, always coming back to his old argument that it is the good harvests which afford prosperity to the country. To-day the principal cities of the Dominion being filled with factories, with workmen going to them in the morning by thousands, going out of them on Saturday evening with lots of money which they circulate among the different markets and retail stores, for the purchase of the products of the farm and the goods of the retail dealer, to-day, in face of all these things, are we not justified in making a comparison with what existed when soup kitchens were in the ascendant, when workmen on a strike demanded bread in order not to perish by starvation? They tell us that this is no evidence of the prosperity of the country. But what do they understand by this word? When a farmer goes to town and finds there workmen who buy his products, and pay him a good price for them, when the workman earns good wages, when the manufacturer can sell his wares advantageously, when money is everywhere abundant, when everyone is making money and he can obtain what he wants, it seems to me that then we can prosper. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that a country would not be prospering solely because manufacturers are abundant, but when the manufacturers are prosperous the workmen are also. He can buy the products of the farm himself, buy from the retail merchant who buys from the wholesale merchant who is supplied by the manufacturer. And this wheel which turns makes the fortune of every one. This is the way in which manufacturers contribute to build up the fortunes of the country. There are complaints, Mr. Speaker, as to the surplus, but to-day who pays this surplus? They tell us always that it is the consumer. Well, I contend on principle that this is not the case. I go to-day to any farmer. I go for instance, to the home of some such hospitable farmer as are to be found in Lotbinière, and I ask him if he sells his grain, his pork, his wool and all his products cheaper to-day than in the famous, the fabulous era of the Liberal party? He will tell me that to-day he sells his pork for 9 cts., whilst then he sold it for 4, 5, and 5½ cts., his butter he will tell me he sells for 20 or 25 cts., whilst during that period we saw it sold for 7, 6, and even 5 cts., that his eggs sell for 20 cts., whilst then he sold them for 10 cts., and sometimes for 8 cts. I assert, and I say emphatically, that the farmer sells to-day all his products dearer, and much dearer than he did at that epoch. Again, if the farmer goes to the merchant ninety-nine times out of a hundred he will pay less for his goods now than then. For instance, bar iron sold for $3.50 in 1874, to-day we pay $1.80; nails sold for $5, to-day we pay $2.65; sugar sold for 10 cts., to-day we pay 8 cts.; flour was much dearer then than now. I have no fear of contradiction on this point. My learned friend took the trouble to make this statement himself. He complains that flour is sold cheaper; but, Mr. Speaker, when we fought the battle in Lower Canada what did they say? You tax the flour, which is an object of general consumption by the French Canadian farmer. They told us that Lower Canada did not produce flour. She must buy it, and you tax it, and they asked the people not to elect us on account of the increased cost which they were going to make us pay for the flour. But he replied to them that this tax would not change in reality the price of flour in the country. To-day they say to us: You should not tax it because it lowers the price of it. At what point of their addresses must we place ourselves to judge of their value in face of these contradictions? Calico sold in that period at 10 cts., it sells to-day at 8 cts.; overshoes are 10 per cent. cheaper than they were then. Axes are 10 per cent. cheaper, scythes 20 per cent. cheaper, instruments of husbandry are 15 per cent. cheaper. Besides that the interest on money has fallen, because this general prosperity has had the effect of putting money in everybody's hands, and those who know how to amass it have become capitalists and lenders. Money has fallen in value. We can get it to-day at 6 per cent., and in that period we were compelled to pay 10 per cent. and 15 per cent. for it, and that not very far from the county of my hon. friend. After all, Mr. Speaker, allegation is not proof. But if it is true that to-day the farmer sells his products at a higher price than it did before; if it is true that he pays less for merchandize; if it is true that there are more manufactures, and that the wages of the working classes are higher; if it is true that the retail merchants do more business, and buy more goods from wholesale merchants; if it is true that the wholesale merchants buy more from the manufacturers, and if it is true that all these things attract immigration, and if it is true that the country is prosperous, why will the gentlemen on the left deny it?—because they could not foresee that such would be the case, and because they predicted the contrary. Well, if that is any consolation to them let them have it. As to us we elevate on high our banner. We follow our leaders who have conducted us in the paths of prosperity, and will continue to hail the National Policy, letting our friends amuse themselves as much as they wish with this consolation in the cold shades of Opposition, where their course is likely to retain them for a long time to come. Mr. Speaker, the public expenditure has been also criticised. They have spoken about the Civil Service. They say that the Civil Service has been increased to reward political friends. As this matter is under consideration, I must congratulate the Government on the policy which it has adopted to have never made any dismissals for political reasons, not to have followed the example set by its predecessor, although it had much reason to do so at times. I am willing to accord to a public servant every liberty of action provided he commits no illegal acts. I will, in the second place, say that in our country the Civil Service in general is composed of persons who are competent, honest and industrious, who are an honor to themselves as well as to the country in whose interests they are constantly employed. After having consecrated their life to it, we ought not—we who can embrace any business, we who are not restrained by a bounded horizon, nor restricted to a prescribed life from the outset, and which obliges you to be at your office at such and such an hour—we ought not to reproach these worthy public servants with the little increases which they may receive from the Government in times of prosperity. Give them a little support when their family increases that the burdens which they have to bear may become lighter and that they may worthily discharge their duties. Often they have been compelled to accept these engagements from unforeseen reverses, which prevented them from struggling under favorable circumstances with the adversities of life, when misery in their family prevented them from awaiting brighter days. Let us not reproach them with this increase of salary if they can sometimes obtain it. Require them to efficiently discharge their duties, to give a conscientious service to their country, but do not begrudge them assistance. Do not imagine that you invite popular sympathy in economizing against the officers of the public service. Mr. Speaker, the people are too honorable, too just, to desire to speculate in this manner on the work of the poor. The people are in favor of paying liberally its public servants.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation). I think the hon. member from Bellechasse has misunderstood what I said. I am sure he has not done so maliciously, but I said I was in favor of properly remunerating those who discharged their duties well.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation). When one complains of the increase in the Civil Service expenditure that means something. My hon. friend has not been precise in his accusation; but I am much pleased to see him express himself more categorically, and to obtain his endorsement of this proposition that the public servants should be well paid. That is what I have contended for. But he must not, therefore, condemn the increase in the public expenditure incurred thereby. Again it is contended that certain appointments have been made as a reward for political services. Well, it is useless to disguise this fact; under party government it is only just that those who work for the party, and who are able to fill an office, that they should be appointed when a vacancy arises. It is not the Conservative party alone which acts thus. All parties who have contended for power in Canada since we have had responsible government, for the last forty years, have in this manner rewarded those who served them in the political arena, who had identified their destiny with that of the party. Secondly, the expenditure in the Department of Justice is complained of; but as the country increases the number of its tribunals, the expenditure must also increase in proportion. They keep repeating to us: You increase the expenditure. Let me make a very simple comparison, and I am surprised it has not been made before. A farmer has a bad farm; he expends $100 a year for the manual labor necessary to cultivate it. At the end of the year he derives from it $80. He thus loses $20. His neighbor, who buys a good farm of 400 or 500 acres, expends $100 for manual labor, and at the end of the year he derives from it $300. Which is the best off? This is the position of the country in terms as clear as they are precise, we increase our expenditure, undoubtedly, but we increase our business, we increase the well-being of all and at the same time we find ourselves with surpluses which serve to diminish the public debt or be applied to other objects. In a single year did we not reduce the interest on the debt to the extent of $400,000, at the same time reducing the taxation? I am surprised that an hon. member coming from the Province of Quebec could not understand to some extent the utility of these surpluses. He knows how the Province of Quebec has been bled almost to death to construct a link of the Pacific. The Province of Quebec put forth all her resources to construct a railroad which was to unite Quebec and Ottawa. To-day she finds she did the work of the Dominion in constructing this link which unites the Intercolonial with the Pacific Railway. The Province of Quebec will soon be happy to approach the Government of the Dominion and say to it: Since you have surpluses which came in part from the Province of Quebec, to render justice to her, and put her in a position to continue the great and noble work which devolves upon her under Confederation, this is a purpose for which the surplus might be applied; but perhaps they do not desire that; they fear that the Government may do something for Quebec; they fear lest they render the farmers prosperous; they fear lest the manufacturers succeed in their enterprise; they fear lest the merchant may prosper. And why? In the same way, Mr. Speaker, that a child often suffers for the faults of his father, in the same way a party bears the responsibility of its leaders. It was when the great question of the National Policy was under discussion that they should have foreseen the situation, and not be deceived. The fault has been committed, and those who committed it, as well as those who inherit, must expiate it. The Supreme Court, Mr. Speaker, has been attacked. Is it the dream of the Liberal party to destroy their past record and everything which it did in its sorrowful passage to power? Who established the Supreme Court, if not the Liberal party? It is true the Confederation Act provided for its creation, but our leaders had declared that its establishment was not necessary for a long time. In attaining power the Liberal party hastened to establish this Court, having a general jurisdiction over the affairs of all the Provinces. It finds this Court bad, and yet it created it under the pretext that it had the power to do so. It is like a man who would indulge in the luxury of cutting off a finger because he had the power to do so. I do not contend that the Supreme Court is perfect. Some changes may have to be made to guarantee the rights of the Provinces more fully. Perhaps in the future we may entrust the nomination of future judges, or a part of them, to the Local Governments. I am not prepared to discuss this question at present. May I lay down the principle that a Federal Court is necessary in Confederation. It was created too soon, say the Liberals who created it. At all events, since it has been established I do not think we can abolish it; it has become an institution forming an integral part of Confederation, and it could not be abolished except at very great inconvenience. As for myself, before laying a hand on any institution I would like to master the consequences which its abolition might entail, not act blindly and see that the remedy was not worse than the evil. The Militia Department has also been attacked. The expenses of the Militia Department increase, and yet we are not at war, they say. In all intelligent and well organized countries one must maintain a military spirit. Conflicts may arise; the existence of a nucleus of an army may prevent or avert them. A country must not be taken unawares, but as to our country we have tribunals of law. If one part of the population rebels against it, what power can intervene to defend it? We have Sheriffs. I know one who is only four feet two inches high, and others whose legs barely sustain them. What could they do against a mutinous crowd? It is necessary to have a military force, the mere existence of which alone often suffices to anticipate riot and inspire respect for the law. I do not doubt that under the intelligent administration of the present Minister of Militia we will have such improvements as will render the volunteer system more efficacious than during preceding years. There is room for improvement and not for diminution; there is need of making the volunteer system more efficacious in the towns and country. They speak also of the Military College at Kingston. This College is only in its infancy; it has as yet rendered no important services to the country, they may say. But who established it if not the Liberal party; who, according to the expression of a journalist, deprived the Citadel of Quebec of it to give it to such a hole as Kingston? I might say, to the credit of this College, that already it has trained a large number of cadets who are distinguished in different careers in life. Among them we see the sons of several leaders of the little Liberal army. I make no reproach to the latter—instruction is something which we should get wherever we can find it; but I think the Liberal party is very audacious when it reproaches the Conservative party with extravagance in the matter of institutions which itself established. The Indians are another subject of complaint, and, on this question, the only reply I deem necessary to make is to repeat the very sensible remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech. He asked the House whether it preferred to have a similar state of affairs to that in the United States, or if we preferred to protect the Indians as we do in the North-West. One thing must not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that any being created like unto the image of God, whether this man be an Indian, negro, or any other nationality, his life must be preserved, whatever may be the cost to a civilized country: And, for my part, I will say to the hon. Ministers: Do not fear, organize a good police force; protect the Indians, take the means to civilize them, to teach them to know God, to make them more familiar with our population, and you will have performed a very patriotic act. If they censure you for the few dollars it may cost, continue your work, for it is a good one. It will invite for you public respect, and public confidence will continue to be given to you. The Post Office expenditure is also complained of, but, in connection with this expenditure, postal facilities and receipts have largely increased. Will any one censure our admirable postal system, which places every part of our young country in communication—the eighth part of which, fifteen years ago, was uncivilized? Will we complain of a system which, if not the best, is one of the best postal systems in the entire world? They try to make us believe that the Government is extravagant, and that the Opposition, if in power, would practice economy. But this system is in use. It is sufficient to say to the people: Behold the excellent communications which you have, see how rapidly we distribute your newspapers—these great intellectual lights which are distributed from the great centres. We say to them for this purpose, expenditure must be incurred and this expenditure must increase simultaneously, as the revenue and the well-being of the country increases. We are also charged with having increased the public expenditure to the extent of $6,000,000 since 1878. They forget to tell us how much the revenues have increased, and the surpluses which they have given us. The expenditure will not remain even where it is. According as the population increases the expenses will increase, and I am anxious to see the country expending $100,000,000 when the revenues will reach $125,000,000. It was for this that we established Confederation, constructed the Pacific Railway, dredged canals and rivers, multiplied colonization roads. We have built public works to develop the country, in order that the population may settle on the banks of our great rivers, as well as in the fertile regions of the North-West, which must become a great centre towards which the wealth and population of all countries will converge. The expenditure in the Public Works, Railways and Canals Departments is also complained of. It seems to be their policy to attack each of the Ministers in order to afford us an opportunity of expressing our views on these subjects. Well I say to the recognized leader of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec that he can continue without apprehension to discharge the duties of his department with the same success which he has achieved in the past, without bothering himself with the nonsense and reproaches of the Opposition; let him continue as in the past, and all parts of the Dominion will be willing to hail to recognize him as a useful man who consecrates every moment of his life to the service of his country, who pushes rapidly to completion the great undertakings of Canada, and who is always found at his post in the House ever ready to meet any accusation of his adversaries. General accusations are indulged in without giving any details. Why? Because they know that there is not one of the works now commenced or under construction by the present hon. Minister which is not for the well-being of the country where it has been undertaken. They know very well that if any particular work was attacked, that there would be immediately a complete refutation of the charge. I have only two more questions to discuss, in reply to the address of my hon. friend, and then I will conclude. Complaint is made against Mr. Fabre; it is charged that the Government of Canada, composed to a great extent of an element foreign to the French Canadian Catholic race, has had the condescendence to give us an accredited agent in France, and this agent is one of our fellow-countrymen. They reproach us with having as a representative in France a man of talent, well instructed, a man devoted to his country. Mr. Speaker, this is not patriotic, it is not necessary for me to argue this. It is not politic either, because it is in the interest of the Dominion of Canada, that it should be known and well known in all parts of the civilized world, and especially in Europe. If we are a little better known in France to-day, we owe it to the efforts, to the energy of this great patriot, who was recently at the head of the Quebec Government, and who is to-day a member of the Government of Canada. It was he who by his brilliant eloquence made New France known to Old France. My hon. friend the member from Lotbinière ought to leave party spirit aside, and make an exception in this point, and there is one subject in which as a French Canadian Catholic I feel I can accord the present Government a little gratitude. But he complains that Mr. Fabre has been chosen, and he relates to us a little private history. Mr. Fabre was one of the supporters of the Mackenzie Government, and he abandoned them. He became a traitor and we should not put a premium on political venality. Mr. Speaker, politicians are like ordinary mortals. They make mistakes sometimes. If the Conservative party had reason to say that the Liberal party was wrong; if Mr. Fabre as an intelligent man understood that as we do; if he came to us through conviction, he committed no fault, he simply did his duty. Often does a party recruit its vital forces from among its adversaries. Why? Because these adversaries see so much obstinacy in evil ways, such a blindness that they end by concluding that there is no means of restoring public welfare, the welfare of the country through their party. Mr. Fabre said to the Liberals: You Liberals of Upper Canada, during five years, you refused to take our advice. You have kept Quebec in slavery; we were nothing in your eyes; we in vain protested again and again; we gave you advice on advice; you were deaf to our just demands; you despised the Liberals of Quebec. They abandon you. What could be more just than these words published by Mr. Fabre when the downfall of the Mackenzie Government came. Let them be a lesson to those whom they may concern. If I recall these facts it is in defence of one who is absent, who certainly requires no defence, but to prove that each accusation of our opponents is unjustifiable. The one just referred to is also unpatriotic. The appointment of Mr. Galt is also censured. They did not go so far as to accuse him of venality, for he does not speak the French language. These accusations are reserved for those who speak French like ourselves; other nationalities are respected. It is not in this manner that a man or a party advances in the world or wins respect and confidence. I have respect for public men, and when they change their party I am not prepared to throw the first stone at them. I examine rather the reasons which induced them to change. For each man has his feelings, his conscience and responsibility. As for Mr. Galt, I am glad to see him representing us in England, and I will always be glad to see him in a position to serve us. I need not repeat the history of his record so bright and enlightened at London, but I know that he has been able to render us there very important services. He can defend us, he can be our interpreter with the English Government, he can explain to it the position we occupy towards other countries. Those who are in intimate and daily communication with him, those who are on the Ministerial benches appointed him to discharge these functions, and I am prepared to say that I have the greatest confidence in him. The Government is also reproached with not endeavoring to make Commercial Treaties with other countries. They say to us: Why have you not accepted the offers of the Liberals when they asked for Commercial Independence and the power to make their own Treaties. But, on the other side, when we take the means to make these treaties; when we take care not to alienate English sympathy, to gradually obtain the means to establish the necessary diplomatic relations, intelligently study the means to arrive at the goal of making all our Treaties with foreign countries, to ascertain what other countries can give us in exchange, they throw the blame on us. In a word, Mr. Speaker, we are constantly reproached on all sides. We are reproached for our action towards the United States. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but you will see, Mr. Speaker, that, when the time arrives, when our manufacturers will be powerful and rich enough, our workingmen sufficiently skilled, and that the United States will be ready to open their gates to us, and when we will be ready to open ours to them, that the Opposition will then come to us and say: "No, it is Protection we want." That is to say they are always years and years too late, that they will so arrange matters as to always criticise, accuse, and reproach, but that, in the meantime, they receive prosperity, the salutem ex inimicis by the wish of the great majority of the people of the Dominion.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. There are two subjects on which hon. gentlemen opposite give no very certain sound. The first is the victory achieved in last June. The hon. member for Lincoln began and ended his speech with that subject; and if I gather the meaning correctly of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, he claimed that the voice of the people on that occasion was the voice of a higher power. I am not the man to begrudge them their victory. I go a step further, and say I have my own reasons for believing it was not desirable the gentlemen occupying this side should have been victorious in that contest; and, besides, when men get a whipping, I like to see them stand up and take it like men. I was forcibly reminded to-night of a little story I heard of the late Lord Brougham. You remember that Baron Rothschild was several times elected member for the City of Old London, and belonging, as he did, to the Hebrew race, he was not allowed by law to take his seat. The seat was declared vacant and he was re-elected again and again. One day he met the late Lord Brougham, and complained to him of the peculiar hardship of his case, the burden of his complaint being: "But, Sir, I was the choice of the people." Lord Brougham tried to explain the law in the case, but he always met the same reply, until finally he lost his temper, and said: "Yes, and so was Barrabas." Now, I do not intend at this late hour to take up much of the time of the House. As far as the National Policy is concerned—the other subject on which they seem to agree so cordially—I believe we have not yet seen the full effects of it. It is claimed that it is the cause of the great prosperity of the country for the last few years. Well, I believe other causes were at work which would make a country prosperous, independent of any Government policy. It has been truly said that these periods of depression and prosperity come in regularly occurring cycles, and no matter what the policy of the Government may be, these will occur at various periods. The hon. Minister of Finance struck at the very foundation of the matter when he laid it down as a cardinal rule that a nation is governed by the same laws as govern the individual, and that if the nation or the individual purchases more than it or he sells, or live above their income, the result must be poverty. The Trade and Navigation Returns bear out this view fully. On looking at the period which preceded the late severe period of depression, you will find it was marked by excessive importations. So great was the disparity between our imports and exports, that, in 1875, it reached the enormous amount of over $45,000,000; in other words, we imported $45,000,000 worth of goods more than we exported. The result followed that always follows in such cases. When times are good people launch out into unjustifiable extravagance and expenditure. Then comes the period of depression. The people are brought back to their senses again, and a period sets in of permanent industry and retrenchment. People live within their income, save something, and, by-and-by, consequently, the nation becomes better off. In 1875, the people imported $45,000,000 more than they exported, then set in an era of prudence and economy, and our imports decreased until, in 1879, they had decreased to the small sum of $10,000,000; and in the year 1880, for the first time since I remember anything about it, the balance was on the other side. We exported in that year nearly $1,500,000 more than we imported. But now we have entered again on a career of extravagance. Our imports are exceeding our exports by an alarming rate. In 1881, we imported over $7,000,000 more than we exported; in 1882, we imported $17,250,000 more than we exported. The hon. Finance Minister claimed that we had yet seven years of prosperity before us. I hope we have. I believe the period of depression in this case will be for a considerable time averted. We have had during the last four or five years extraordinary good crops, while, in England, they have had during the same period a series of bad crops. Then the lumber trade has revived, with the revival of trade with the United States and Great Britain. The exportation of live stock from this country has also greatly increased. The building of the railway has brought in a great deal of foreign capital, and immigration a great deal more. These things will have a tendency to keep the evil day further away from us; but still, independent of all that, I believe the period of depression will come sooner or later, and we ought to adopt a wise policy. We should in times of prosperity prepare ourselves for times of adversity. But it has been clearly shown that this is just what the Administration of the day are not doing. Instead of trying to lessen the expenditure and relieve the burdens of the people, they are increasing the expenditure and taxation. Let us always bear this fact in mind: that it is much easier to raise the taxes than to lower them. When a period of stringency comes, when confidence becomes shaken, when men have to contract their purchases, and have to import less, the natural result will be that we will have a good deal less revenue, and not only will we import less but the value of what we do import will shrink. The inevitable result will be that the revenue will diminish when we have increased our scale of expenditure far above what that revenue will meet. The supporters of hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, claim that the prosperity we have been enjoying the last few years is due altogether to the National Policy. That is just the point on which we, on this side, take issue. These causes that I have been enumerating have had a great deal to do with the prosperity of the country; but, Sir, there is only one source of wealth to the country, and that is the industry and the prudence of the people who inhabit it. We are far too apt to separate the Government from the individual. If we look at the matter in its proper light, what is the nation but just the individuals who compose that nation; and when we speak of national wealth, we do not mean something that the Government has in its pocket to distribute to the people, but we mean the aggregate—the sum total of the wealth of the people of the country. The National Policy was inaugurated, as we are told, to keep Canada for the Canadians. We all remember how the cry was raised in 1878, that we were ruined by importations of cheap manufactures from other countries; that this Canada of ours was made a slaughter market for the manufactures of other nations, and that we were being ruined by getting these manufactures at too cheap a rate. And so a policy was inaugurated that was going to keep Canada for the Canadians; that was going to give our manufacturers a monopoly of all the goods we required in this country, and thus save us from the expense of buying them from other people. Well, has that result been accomplished? I find, in looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns, that this is not the case; that instead of contracting our imports of manufactured goods from other countries, we have been largely increasing them. In 1878, that year in which we were told we were being ruined by importing manufactured goods, we imported to the amount of nearly $50,250,000. Last year, after four years of this National Policy, we imported over $70,500,000; in other words, in 1882 we imported over $20,000,000 worth in excess of our imports in 1878, before ever the National Policy was thought of. So far, then, as the National Policy was to accomplish this result, it has proved a failure; it has not kept Canada for the Canadians. Now, let us look at some of the manufactured articles that we were told we were going to manufacture in this country, instead of paying our money for them to other people. Take the manufacture of cottons, for example. In 1878, we imported over $7,000,000 worth, but, in 1882, after four years of the National Policy, which we were told was going to give us the manufacture of our cotton goods, we imported $11,000,000 worth. Then there is the matter of agricultural implements. In 1878 we imported $43,990 worth of threshing machines, reapers and mowers. There was a high Tariff put upon these articles to compel the people to buy them from Canadian manufacturers, and give these latter the monopoly of the market. Well, Sir, last year we imported of these two articles $26,417 worth. Now, I want to draw the attention of the House particularly to this item. I find that last year we only imported $11,611 worth of reapers and mowers; and yet, the other night, the hon. Minister came down and told the House that, in order to protect the manufacture of these articles against foreign competition—in other words, against this $11,611—it was necessary to increase the price of these very machines 10 per cent. There is a tax now of 25 per cent. on these machines, and it is to be increased to 35. Now, what does all this amount to? The selling price of these machines is $300; under the Tariff as it now stands every man in the Dominion of Canada whose necessities compel him to buy one of these machines has to pay something over $70 more than the actual value of it on account of Protection, and the proposal now is to add 10 per cent., or $30 to that. Now, Sir, it is a fact well known to those who are acquainted with the situation of the country at present—at least I know it is so in Ontario—that on account of the scarcity of labor there are many men who will be compelled this year to throw aside their ordinary machines and to purchase what is known as the self-binder—that is sold at the price of $300. I have been told by gentlemen from the North-West that in that country it is no use to try to sell any other kind of machines. Now, what I want to ask the hon. Finance Minister is this—and it is a question the country will want an answer to: Is it absolutely necessary, in order to meet this foreign importation of $11,611, to add $30 to the price of every one of these machines to the purchaser?

Mr. SPROULE. How is it that the machines are sold cheaper now than before the duty was put on?

Mr. FARROW. Will the hon. gentleman inform us of the company that sells these machines for $300?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I can inform the hon. gentleman of something more than that; there is a combination among the leading manufacturers of the country not to sell these machines less than $300 apiece.

Mr. FARROW. Who sells them at $300?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The manufacturers of the country.

Mr. FARROW. Name one.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. John Elliott, of London. Another hon. gentleman asks how it is that these machines are cheaper now than they were before the duty was put on them. I deny they are cheaper now. But suppose they were cheaper now. What has that to do with the matter? The simple question we have to consider, in dealing with all matters of manufactured goods, is not as to whether they are cheaper or dearer in this particular country, but whether they are cheaper or dearer in the markets of the world. If they are cheaper in the markets of the world, we have the right, unless there are serious objections, to go into the cheapest market and purchase from there.

An hon. MEMBER. I have an affidavit from an agent that they are 20 per cent. cheaper.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I know men who have had to buy them recently and I know it is not so, the agent of the company notwithstanding. In view of this fact, that in order to meet that competition that this enormous increase has to be made in the duty upon those articles, I ask any intelligent man if this is not a confession that the National Policy has proved to be a failure. It must prove one of two things, and there can be no other logical conclusion: First, that the imposition of 25 per cent. duty has not enabled our home manufacturers to make these machines at a profit with the enhanced prices; or, second, that they are so insatiably greedy they want to make 10 per cent. more. Hon. members will take either horn of the dilemma they choose. In regard to boots and shoes, we were told that the manufacturers in this country were ruined for want of protection. What do the Trade and Navigation Returns show in this respect? The value of manufactured boots and shoes imported in 1878 was $45,914, while in 1882, after the protective Tariff had been in force four years, the imports were of the value of $164,106, or nearly four times the sum. In the matter of furniture, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the imports in 1878 were of the value of $399,330. In 1882 this item is not separated from manufactures in wood; but I wish to call attention to this fact that after four years of high protection under the Tariff which was intended to develop manufactures in this country, the imports of manufactures of wood in 1882 amounted to nearly $1,500,000 in value. There is another branch of industry in this Dominion to which I desire to direct attention, and that is ship-building. We are told, and our people are proud of the fact, that Canada is the fourth in rank among the maritime powers of the world, and it is interesting to consider how the ship-building trade is progressing under the National Policy. In 1878, when the country was going to ruin, and would have gone to total ruin, if the National Policy had not come into operation to save it, we built ships to the extent of 106,978 tons. In 1882 we built only 63,535 tons, or a little more than one-half. Not only so, but in 1878 we sold of ships—and this is a great source of wealth, bear in mind—$1,236,145 worth, while last year we were only able to sell ships to the value of $403,311. That is what protection has done for our shipping interest. I am aware that some persons have calculated that Protection has made our manufacturers enormously rich. I do not believe anything of the kind. Those engaged in manufacturing when the Tariff was inaugurated realized very large profits from the enhanced prices they were enabled to charge, but the inevitable result followed—over-production; and the result is that, to-day, in most important branches, manufacturers have come down and told the Government and Parliament that they are not able to carry on and make living profits without increased protection. And wherever this has been tried in the world this has been the inevitable result—and it has been shown conclusively by the speeches of hon. members—it has diminished our exports of manufactured articles. Look at the United States. It has absolutely destroyed their export of manufactured goods and their shipping on the high seas. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) asked a question on this point, and I am ready to answer it. Hon. members must bear in mind that what is one man's raw material is another man's manufactured product, and if you protect one manufacturer you must protect all, and just so soon as you do that you raise the prices of all, and that prevents the manufacture of large articles, when everything manufacturers use is protected. Why does England stand at the head of nations in manufactures? Because she has pursued the grand old principle of admitting raw materials free, and taxing only a few of the luxuries of life. What has been the result so far as she is concerned? An hon. member has stated that England is the only nation which has not benefited by the good times. No greater mistake can be made. Since 1878 she has increased her exports of manufactured goods to the enormous amount of $300,000,000 in consequence of free-trade in raw materials. Much stress has been laid on the fact that our revenue has increased enormously during the last four years. No one rejoices more than I do at this state of affairs, and it is always pleasing to have plenty of money to spend; but I ask again, is the Government entitled to claim any particular credit for this state of things. If we resolve the National Policy down to solid, hard facts, what does it amount to? Just to the simple old plan of increasing the revenue by increased taxation. It is a simple thing if, instead of raising $17.50 on every $100 you raise $25, to obtain a surplus. I apprehend such action does not require superior statesmanship. If it does, then the Pacha of a Turkish municipality, who wrings from his people the utmost cent without driving them to utter starvation, is a greater financier than the right hon. W. E. Gladstone, or our Canadian Finance Minister, and the latter has not come to that yet, and has no intention of doing so. I do not wish it to be understood that I am advocating a policy of Free Trade, for I believe that is unattainable in this country; but what I do hold is, that no Government is justified in raising more money than the necessities of the country actually require. While I hold it to be true, and the items I have pointed out show it to be the case, that Protection when undertaken for the sake of protecting is not a protection to manufacturers, that it is the worst possible policy which a nation can adopt, and that the only true policy is not unduly to foster the manufactures of the country, because this will inevitably result—it has always followed in other cases, and will follow in this—in over-manufacturing to be succeeded by depression and hard times. The only true policy, I repeat, is while we have to raise a revenue by a Tariff, to give manufacturers all possible protection under it, and then to allow them to manufacture just according to the necessities of the country. Twenty-five per cent. ought to be enough for any legitimate protection, and when you go higher than that, the protection is inordinate. There is another fact worthy of mention. People are in the habit of pointing to the United States as an example of a country which thrives under Protection. Well, Sir, they have thrived under Protection, but they have also had hard times under Protection. Why, Sir, anyone who looks carefully at the years of depression which we went through, knows that the suffering in this country was nothing at all compared with that of the United States. The inevitable result there followed: inordinate protection—in many cases it was as much as 80 per cent.—led to over-manufacturing, then came depression; workmen were thrown out of employment; the whole trade of the country was deranged, and something terrible was the result; and unless our paternal Government adopts some policy of restraint on over-manufacturing in this country, and on over-importation, the same results, which happened before, will occur again, and the same evils, which have in the past overtaken highly protected countries, will overtake us sooner or later.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate. Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Government business take precedence on Thursdays during the remainder of the Session.

Motion agreed to, and (at 11:45 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 4th April, 1883.

DIFFERENTIAL DUTY ON TEA.

Mr. GUNN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to remove the 10 per cent. differential duty on tea imported from the United States?

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the intention of the Government to do so.

CAPE BRETON UNDER CONFEDERATION.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness), in moving for a statement showing the amounts charged in Public Debt Account of the Dominion of Canada which were expended on Railways, Canals and Navigation securities, in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia proper and the Island of Cape Breton, up to the 1st of July, 1882; and showing also, the area and population of each of these divisions of the Dominion of Canada, respectively, said: My object in making this motion is to show that the Island of Cape Breton has not received that attention to which its importance as a part of the Dominion entitles it. To do so, I desire to compare its progress with that of the sister Island of Prince Edward for a number of years in similar and different circumstances. Since the discovery of Cape Breton nearly 400 years ago, till the fall of Louisburg in 1758, its history has been a very eventful one, and since that time the people of that Island feel that it has been an unfortunate one. In 1762, after peace was declared between England and France, Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island were, by Treaty, declared to be British territory. In the following year both Islands were annexed to Nova Scotia proper, and considerable discontent existed in both these Islands on account of the annexation. After eight years of agitation Prince Edward Island secured its separation from Nova Scotia, and since that time it has been governed by a House elected by the people, and by a Governor in Council. It was not, however, until the year 1778, after fifteen years of agitation, that Cape Breton secured separation from Nova Scotia, and although it did not receive the blessing of a House of Assembly, it was governed by a Governor in Council, who seems to have looked after the interests of the Island much more satisfactorily, at least to the people, than had been done by the Government of Nova Scotia. In 1778, both Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island started in somewhat similar circumstances, each Island having its own Government. During the forty-two years that they were thus governed, it can be shown that the progress of Cape Breton was much more rapid than Prince Edward Island. In 1770, when Prince Edward Island obtained a separate Government, its population was nearly double that of Cape Breton, but in 1820, after forty years of separate Government, the population of Cape Breton was much larger than that of Prince Edward Island. From that date until 1867 Cape Breton was absolutely under the control of Nova Scotia, and its representation in the House of Assembly was insufficient to enforce from that Government what the people of the Island considered they were entitled to. After the inauguration of the railway system in Nova Scotia, it is true, it was impossible to extend the railways to the Island of Cape Breton; but the hope was always held out to them that when the railway system was extended to the Strait of Canso, they would receive that attention which the importance of the Island deserved. Unfortunately for that Island, before the railway was extended to the Strait of Canso, Confederation took place; and all are aware that the people of that Island strongly remonstrated against the Union, for more than one reason. They believed that the financial aid given to Nova Scotia under Confederation would be insufficient to enable the Legislature of that Province to do ample justice to the Island of Cape Breton. Again, they said that the progress of the Island, while annexed to Nova Scotia, was not such as its natural resources would seem to warrant, and they feared much less attention would be paid to the Island under Confederation than before. I am ready to admit that, in regard to the ordinary expenditures for local purposes, Cape Breton has received a fair share of money from the Government of Nova Scotia, and also from that of the Dominion since Confederation; but what the people of Cape Breton complain of, and which they have reason to complain of, is that while enormous expenditures have been made to various parts of the Dominion on railways and canals, no consideration has been given to the wants of the Island of Cape Breton. When the subject of better terms was under discussion in 1869, and when a meeting between the late hon. Joseph Howe and Mr. McLellan, now Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was arranged at Portland, I, as representative of one of the counties of the Island, took it upon myself to write to Sir John Rose, informing him that any concessions made to Nova Scotia might possibly be of no benefit whatever to Cape Breton, and I suggested to him that Cape Breton should receive a similar subsidy per head as was given to Prince Edward Island in the event of her coming into the Union, to which he made a very favorable reply. As you are aware a separate Province is entitled to many advantages under Confederation which the counties of a Province are not entitled to, and the isolated position of Cape Breton demanded that her interests should be looked after under Confederation to the same extent that the interests of Prince Edward Island were provided for. I think I can show that Prince Edward Island since the Union has progressed much more rapidly than the Island of Cape Breton, although the latter is in size more than double the former; and notwithstanding the great fertility of Prince Edward Island, I hold that Cape Breton, if its resources, agricultural and mineral, were fully developed, should progress more rapidly than Prince Edward Island. The area of Prince Edward Island is as follows:—Prince County, 467,000 acres, Queen's County, 486,400 acres, King's County, 412,000 acres, giving a total area of 1,365,000 acres. In Cape Breton, Inverness County has an area of 886,680 acres, as large as Prince County and King's County in Prince Edward Island together, or as large as King's and Queen's. There is Victoria, with 767,000 acres; Cape Breton, with 748,000 acres, and Richmond, with 398,000 acres, giving a total area to the Island of Cape Breton of 2,800,680 acres, being 70,680 acres more than twice the size of Prince Edward Island. In view of those facts, it would only be reasonable that Cape Breton should expect, as a member of the Confederation, the expenditure on account of railways and canals of at least as much money as has been expended in Prince Edward Island. The cost of the Island Railway was $3,250,000. It would be reasonable for the people of Cape Breton to expect that a similar amount should be expended on railways there; but whence the money will come is a question which agitates the public mind. Unfortunately for Cape Breton, there is a great difficulty in the way. Cape Breton, besides being an Island, is practically divided by an arm of the sea into two Islands, so that a proper treatment would require that the Island should be practically dealt with as two distinct islands. On the south-east side of Bras d'Or lie Cape Breton and Richmond counties, which require for the development of their resources a railway passing through from the Strait of Canso to Sydney, or Louisburg. The other side of the Island comprises the counties of Inverness and Victoria, which I have shown to be much larger than the whole of Prince Edward Island; and in order to develop the resources of those counties, and enable the people to distribute their productions, a railway is even more necessary for the north-west coast than for the south-east, because the south-east coast is very liberally supplied with natural harbors, while the north-west coast has not a single harbor from the Strait of Canso to Cape North, at which the people can ship the products of that side of the Island. The people of Cape Breton are at present, as they have been in the past, easily satisfied. I doubt very much they would ask that as much money be expended by the Dominion on railways in that Island as has been expended in Prince Edward Island, and although the railway system of Prince Edward Island was commenced before Confederation, yet, practically, it is a Dominion work, because it is a charge on the whole Dominion, for which the people of Cape Breton are called upon to pay interest just as are the people of that Island. I am of the opinion that one half the amount of money expended on railways in Prince Edward Island would amply satisfy the people of Cape Breton, and would be sufficient to build a railway from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg, and from the Strait of Canso on the other side of the Great Bras d'Or to Cape North. That would involve an expenditure on railways in Cape Breton for a distance of about 180 miles, which is thirty miles less than the length of the present Prince Edward Island Railway. I would distribute the money, if I had the management of it, which I doubt I will have, as follows: $1,000,000 for a railway from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg, just as the people of the south-eastern side of the Great Bras d'Or choose; and I would ask for the other two great counties of the Island, Inverness and Victoria, about $675,000, which, I believe, would be ample to build a railway to Cape North. I would ask in all earnestness that the people of the Dominion should make that expenditure. I think I can prove it would be to the interest of the whole Dominion, not excluding Cape Breton, to have that amount of money expended on the Island. Notwithstanding the National Policy, the population of the Island of Cape Breton does not increase very rapidly, owing to the emigration from the Island.

Mr. CAMERON. Some Opposition members say "hear, hear," but I tell them that I do not charge the National Policy with that result so much as the want of it—the want of the extension of the National Policy to the Island of Cape Breton, as has been done to almost all the other portions of the Dominion. The people of Cape Breton, as their representatives in Parliament can prove, did not object to the expenditure of large sums of money for building railways in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, and they only ask that the same treatment should be accorded to them. It is, indeed, part of the National Policy, that facilities should be afforded to the different portions of the Dominion, not only to develop the resources of the country, but also to enable the people of those sections to distribute the productions of those localities. Now, Sir, it is a notorious fact that in the fishing sections of the Island of Cape Breton, the population increases very rapidly, and it is equally the fact that in the coal district of this Island the population increases fully more rapidly. The reason why the population, in these sections, increases more rapidly, I believe, than in any other part of the Dominion, Manitoba excepted, is owing to the National Policy; and the reason why there is little or no increase in population in other sections of this Island, is simply because they are not so much affected by the National Policy. It is an established fact, and a fact which can be shown from the Geological Report now in course of preparation, that Inverness county has the finest coal area in the Province of Nova Scotia, and that is saying a good deal for it; but I hold it is impossible, owing to the want of harbors on the north-west coast of the Island, to develop the coal interests of Inverness, without having an extension of the railroad through the country to the north. I beg to inform the House that the shipments of coal from Cape Breton County, for 1882, were as follows: Sydney mine, 126,000 tons; International, 102,000; Re-eve, 72,787; Little Glace Bay, 68,606; Cowrie, 66,000; Caledonia, 59,813; Blockhouse, 57,375; and Imperial, 22,000, making a total for the year of 574,581 tons, as compared with 274,108 tons, in 1878. Besides this, coal commanded a higher price in 1882 than it did at that period. The output in 1882 was then more than double what it was in 1878, and this every reasonable person in the Island believes and feels convinced, is owing to the National Policy. The cash value of it was over $1,000,000; and the tonnage used in the shipment of coal from Cape Breton County alone, was 265,325 tons in 303 steamers, and 190,176 tons in 798 sailing vessels; but the increase of population during the last decade in the neighborhood of these coal mines was nearly 4,000, while the increase in all the rest of the county was only very little over 1,000. Now, Sir, if the extension of the railway from the Strait of Canso to Cape North, along the immense coal fields lying in the county of Inverness, would develop the resources of that county in that length of time with the same expense—and I hold that it should be considered a very great inducement indeed for this being done—the population in less than twenty years would then increase at least 40,000. Let me here remark, that the cost of maintenance of this unfortunate Island is now as great as it would be if its population was doubled; and if the increase in population in one county would be 40,000 in twenty years, it is reasonable to assume that the population of the whole Island would be increased 120,000 in that period, if the facilities, so reasonably expected by the people, were only given; but in order to show that the extension of the road through the immense coal fields of Inverness would amply repay the expenditure to the whole Dominion, I would estimate the value of an increase of 40,000 to the population, at the very low figure of $3 a head, which would be clear profit above all expenses. The cost of the railway for the whole Island would be only the interest involved, which would be $67,000. Now, if the increase in population were worth, to this Dominion, $3 a head, $120,000 would be realized by the increase of 40,000 alone, which would pay the interest on the money which the railway would cost, and leave a net profit to the Dominion of about $53,000; so that this view of the question would show that the expenditure of money would be justified. The north-west coast of the Island, besides requiring a railway to develop its enormous resources, would also require improved harbors around the coast. The railroad would be required to develop the vast mineral and agricultural resources of the Island, as well as to transport the products of the forest; but the improvement of the harbors along its sea coast, of not less than 150 miles, for the benefit of the fishermen, would also be needed; and if the Dominion could not conveniently find use for the surplus which they could make by the building of these roads in Cape Breton, it might be very properly applied to the improvement of the harbors along this coast for the benefit of the fishermen. The object in making this motion, then, is, if possible, to convince the representatives of the whole Dominion of Canada that special consideration should be given to the wants of the Island of Cape Breton; and that, if possible, the same consideration should be given to that Island by this Dominion as has been accorded to Prince Edward Island. I do not ask for a separate Legislature, although this would be very acceptable to the people; but even without this, some consideration in connection with the prosecution of her various industries would be desirable, in order to clearly show how much more money has been expended in all these sections of the Dominion than in Cape Breton.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton). I have very little to say in addition to what the hon. member for Inverness has stated. I have seconded the motion, for the purpose of getting the information which will be given in the return, so as to enable us at some future time to see whether the Island of Cape Breton has received the justice to which it is entitled. It is undoubtedly the fact that throughout the Island the impression prevails that it has not received that justice either from the Government of that Province, or the Dominion, up to the present time. The population of the Island of Cape Breton is nearly 90,000, and they contribute to the revenue of Canada from $500,000 to $750,000 annually, and it has received comparatively little out of that sum. I trust that when this information is brought down to the House, that we who come from the Island of Cape Breton will make out a case that will enable the Government to do justice to that long neglected Island.

Mr. BRECKEN. I do not doubt the soundness of the claim which has been made by my hon. friend from Inverness, but I rise for the purpose of setting him right on one point with respect to Prince Edward Island. He seems to have the impression that the railway was built at the cost of the Dominion. The fact is, that when we entered Confederation, in consideration of the insular position of the Island, and the large sums of money expended on great public works in other parts of the Dominion, our indebtedness was arranged at $50 a head. When we entered Confederation the railway was in course of construction, and as the monthly estimates were forwarded to Ottawa, we were debited with them, but the cost of the railway was deducted from our subsidy. We had $60 a head whether we built the railway or not, and the fact is that Prince Edward Island paid for her own railway.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sure we have all listened with great interest to the able exposition of my hon. friend from Inverness of the wants of the Island of Cape Breton, and the condition and difficulties under which that Island labors; and we must all be anxious that a remedy should be applied. I am surprised, however, that it has not occurred, either to the hon. member for Inverness, or to the hon. member for the county of Cape Breton, to suggest a good, reasonable, practicable step towards greater attention being paid to the interests of that interesting Island. It has never occurred to either of these hon. gentlemen that the Ministry of Railways is about to be vacant, and it ought to be filled from the Island.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I wish to invite the attention of the House to the reporting of French speeches. The French Canadians in this House have only one stenographer. Last evening we had two French speeches; this French stenographer was obliged to remain here all the time. He had to work for two hours or two hours and a-half, and pass the entire night to transcribe these two speeches. I think we ought to be not on what I will call a footing of equality, but of equity. I avail myself of the circumstances, to thank the representatives of the press, for the delicate attention to the hon. member from Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), and the hon. member from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). A morning journal merely announces that these hon. gentlemen spoke in French, and another announces that Mr. Amyot replied to Mr. Rykert. It was entirely ignorant of the address delivered by my hon. friend. I think that, as a matter of justice, these gentlemen who are admitted here ought to report the speeches of all who speak.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) I may say that the Committee on the Debates have had under consideration since the beginning of this Session the question as to how the difficulty of the French reporting may be met. The Committee meet to-morrow, and one of the subjects to be discussed then is this very question. The difficulty, of course, has been that the French stenographer, as in the case of last night, has sometimes really more to do than he ought, whereas for three or four nights to come he may have nothing to do. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that the matter is being seriously considered, and that we hope to arrive at a conclusion that will be satisfactory to the French members.

Mr. AMYOT. As both languages are admitted by the law, as Hansard is intended to give to future generations the thoughts of the members of Parliament of to-day, and as the press does not show sufficient consideration to the French members, even sometimes to state when they speak, I think this House would be willing to vote the few hundred dollars that would be necessary to secure a full report of our Debates. It is true, the occasion may occur only seldom. The French members frequently speak in English in order to be understood, and not be too tedious; but that is not a reason, I hope, for the saving of a few hundred dollars. We have a right to be reported in French, and I am sure this House will be disposed to vote the necessary funds.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I was about rising to reply to the hon. member from Montmagny (Mr. Landry), when the hon. member from Cardwell (Mr. White) rose to speak. I concur entirely in what the hon. member from Montmagny said. It is a fact that the speeches are not reported as they should be, and the exact reason is that the staff which is employed for this purpose is not sufficient. As the hon. member from Bellechasse observed, the two languages are on a footing of equality in this House; and I am convinced that the Committee, of which my hon. friend from Cardwell is a member, will not fail to deal fairly with the just demands which the French members made to-day. If we speak English often it is through deference to our English brothers, who could not understand as well if we spoke in French as if we spoke in English. I am convinced that if it is understood that our speeches will be well reported in French, and that we are not neglected on this point the number of French speeches will increase. This would not be an evil, but a benefit in many respects, because it would probably induce our English brothers to give some little study to the French language, which we think is one that should not be under-estimated. But looking aside, I am convinced, as the hon. member from Cardwell has announced that the Committee will do everything in its power to render justice to the demands of the French members.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the consideration of Bill (No. 14) respecting Carriers by Land.

Mr. OUMMET moved in amendment:

That in the opinion of the House, the adoption of this Bill would be unconstitutional and injudicious.

He said: I regret that the question of constitutionality should have to be raised by myself, on account of the importance of the question, and also on account of the peculiar position which I, with my confreres from the Province of Quebec, occupy in this House. It seems that we have the monopoly of constitutional questions, and that through esprit de clocher we are specially jealous of the rights of the Provinces. But I think that it is very important that these constitutional questions should be discussed in this House. They have been so much discussed before the various tribunals, and with such different results, that it might be as well, before we legislate on questions of this kind, that we should pause, and endeavor to arrive at an understanding as to the limit of our powers. This Bill relates to some special contracts that may be made between common carriers by land and individuals who have freight to be carried. These contracts, I hold, are contracts of a private nature—I might term them even civil contracts; and I think they fall within the powers that are exclusively given to the Provinces by section 92 sub-section 13 of the British North America Act. The powers given by that section are exclusive, and, according to section 91, they cannot be infringed by the Federal Parliament. It is expressly stipulated by section 91 "that all matters on which the Federal Parliament will have power to legislate, will be matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned to the Legislatures of the Provinces," and the enumeration that is given of the powers reserved to the Federal Parliament is only illustrative and not limitative of the Provincial powers, which are exclusive. It includes the regulation of trade and commerce, navigation and shipping, bills of exchange, promissory notes, weights and measures, and interest, and it is pretended that the present Bill comes under this heading of trade and commerce. Now, I hold that these contracts do not come under the heading of trade and commerce. It has been held by the different courts—the Ontario Court of Queen's Bench, the Quebec Court of Queen's Bench, the Supreme Court here, and even the Privy Council, that the words "trade and commerce" only extend to laws that may be made for the regulation of commerce in general. They do not extend to any contracts which may be commercial in their nature, but only to certain regulations or restrictions imposed on certain trades—restrictions, for instance, on insurance companies, on banks, or general regulations as to weights and measures, &c. If the words: "the regulation of trade and commerce," had been intended to be so general as to include all transactions of a commercial nature, it would have been unnecessary to mention specially bills of exchange and promissory notes. Bills of exchange and promissory notes, weights and measures, savings banks, banks in general, currency and carriage, bankruptcy and insolvency, are all commercial in their nature, and the case of the insurance companies give us a perfect illustration of the principles which I uphold. These insurance companies, as to their relations with the general public, are governed by a general law from this Parliament. They are, for instance, obliged to take a license from this Government, and to make a deposit with it for the security of their policy holders. But as to the special contracts they may make with the latter, these are deemed private civil contracts, and as such come under the civil or common law of the Provinces. This was expressly decided by the Court of Appeals in Ontario, and the Supreme Court of Canada, in the case of Parsons vs. the Queen Insurance Company, in which the constitutionality of an Act passed by the Legislature of Ontario, relating to the conditions that may be inserted in the policies of insurance, was contested. I beg to quote to the House the opinion of the Supreme Court on that subject, as expressed by Mr. Justice Fournier:

"No doubt the contract of insurance is extensively availed of in commerce as well as by non-traders, but the object of a contract does not change its character. Whatever may be its object, the contract of insurance is, nevertheless, a contract of indemnity which is similar to a contract of guarantee, and as such belongs to the civil law. In commerce, contracts of sale, of exchange, and of bail, are constantly employed and executed. Does it follow that any legislation in reference thereto must be considered as being a regulation of commerce? If this be so, if everything which has reference to commerce could for this reason come under the exclusive control of the Federal power, the greater portion of the powers of the Provinces would thus become of no avail, for 'commerce' in its most comprehensive meaning extends to everything. It is, as defined by a French author: 'C'est échange de produits et de service. C'est en dernière analyse le fonds même de la société.' It is evident that this word cannot have in our Constitutional Act such an extensive meaning."

If all commercial transactions were to come under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, we might as well dispense altogether with the Local Legislatures, and restrict them to jurisdiction over municipal institutions and education, the only two subjects on which there can be no doubt. If we take the one subject of marriage, we find that sub-section 26, of section 91, provides that marriage and divorce shall fall within the powers of this Parliament; but does this mean that all agreements made between parties in their marriage contracts shall be under the jurisdiction of this Parliament? Does that mean that dowers, that marriage covenants in general, are to be within the jurisdiction of this Parliament? Where then would be our civil rights? What would become of the power which was exclusively given to the Provinces to legislate on civil rights and property? That power would disappear at once. I submit that this Parliament may legislate as to railways in general; for instance, it may impose on railways obligations to secure the safety of passengers, to secure to the people a return for the privileges granted by this Government to these companies, and all that is provided in the Railway Act. But to infringe on private contracts that may be made by these companies with individuals, is an encroachment on the civil rights and the legislative powers of the Provinces. The judgment I have cited has been confirmed by the Privy Council in England. This ought to settle that question. I believe these two matters—contracts entered into by insurance companies with those insuring with them, and the contracts that are entered into by railway companies as common carriers with their customers—are of the same nature. I will now cite a decision, given by the Court of Queen's Bench of Ontario, in the case of Beard vs. Steele, in which it was held that the Ontario Statute, 33 Vic., chap. 19, amending the law relating to bills of lading and declaring the right and liabilities of parties under these instruments of traffic, was not an invasion of the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, which alone has the power to regulate trade and commerce; and, as I said before, if a Local Legislature has power to legislate on bills of lading, and if such legislation is not an invasion of the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, then the Federal Parliament has no jurisdiction in this matter, because under section 91 of the British North America Act, all classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces are excluded from the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. As to the second part of my motion, that the Bill is injudicious, I will begin by saying that it is, at least for the Province of Quebec, altogether useless. We have in our Civil Code all the provisions contained in this Bill. It is, therefore, sufficient to say that this legislation is injudicious, because it is useless. What is the use of putting into our Statutes laws which have already been enacted, laws which are already provided or in force in the different Provinces. I say, further, it would be injudicious, because the only provision in this Bill which is not included in our Civil Code is what I would term unreasonable, to use the expression that has been used by the promoter of the Bill. It provides that when special contracts are entered into between the common carriers and the shippers, the court may, although the contract may have been signed by both parties, set it aside, if in the opinion of the court the contract is not a reasonable one. Well, this is the first time I ever heard such a proposition in law. It gives to the courts a discretion they ought not to have. The courts have the duty of interpreting the laws, and that duty should not be left entirely to their arbitrary wishes, or arbitrary feelings. The courts ought not to be allowed to give an arbitrary construction to any laws. I hold that to be reasonable, which is held by the parties to the contract to be such; that is, if the party chooses to make a certain contract which is not against good morals, such contract is reasonable, and it is not for the Judges to say that when a contract has been entered into, whether by a company or individual, this contract is reasonable or not. That must be left to the liberty of the subject—to make agreements and contracts the way he likes. I am ashamed to see our legislation so often questioned in the courts and set aside. That would seem to indicate either that we have not the intelligence to know our jurisdiction, or we do not give the attention we ought to give to the legislation we are passing here. It is an everyday occurrence that these constitutional questions are raised in the courts, and decided sometimes against this Parliament, and sometimes against the Local Legislatures. And I think it is high time some means were devised to settle such questions between this Parliament and the Local Legislatures. It is time we had a Commission, or something like a court, to define in some way the special powers of the different Legislatures. I am told by the promoter of this Bill that the Supreme Court is doing it now; but, as I have said, it is not doing it to our honor. It is not very complimentary to us to see the Supreme Court deciding every day that we are legislating on matters over which we have no jurisdiction. This Parliament is supreme, and it ought to be supreme in intelligence and wisdom.

Mr. BLAKE. And it is.

Mr. OUIMET. It is held to be so. I think that when we have so many distinguished legal talents in this House, some of them ought to have authority to tell us what Bills are constitutional or otherwise. I think, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be a Commission in this House, or a Joint Commission of both Houses, to examine all Bills that are proposed to this House; and before they go to their second reading the preliminary question of their constitutionality ought to be settled by a Committee of competent men who would be responsible for it to the House.

Mr. ABBOTT. I think this House is indebted to the hon. member for Laval for bringing up the question, and for the mode in which he has argued it before the House. Although it is a very important question, quite as important as he claims it to be, it is not after all a very broad question, or one upon which a great deal can be said; in fact, I think my hon. friend has pretty nearly exhausted the arguments on the point. I will venture, however, to trouble the House for a few minutes with an illustration of the mode in which the opinions he has been laying before the House have been dealt with by the Privy Council. My hon. friend said the judgment to which he referred in the Supreme Court here, had been approved by the Privy Council. That is a fact, and in approving it the Privy Council has uttered no uncertain sound as to the principles of construction which should govern our Constitution in these respects. I regret, rather, to feel it my duty to say anything against this Bill, or to interpose any obstacle or any argument against its passing, because I think, on the whole, the Bill is a good Bill; I think, on the whole, there is some regulation required in the direction in which this Bill would regulate this particular contract; and I think, as a matter of general principle, that it would be a good thing if the laws regulating this kind of contract were similar in all the Provinces. But, at the same time, I think those considerations must yield to the consideration that this House ought not to show any example of legislating beyond its jurisdiction. We are constantly seeing the legislation of the Provinces, and, I think, occasionally, the legislation of this House, reviewed in the courts, and it is to be lamented that the occasion ever occurs for such review. At all events, so far as in us lies, I think we should show an example in our Legislature of confining ourselves strictly within the bounds which the Constitution has imposed upon us, and we should, under no circumstances, go beyond those bounds, or even tread upon doubtful ground unless the occasion is important enough, and the necessity great enough, to justify it. Now, I heard the speech of my hon. friend in introducing this Bill, and it appeared to me that he placed the jurisdiction of this House more particularly upon one clause of the Constitution, and also partially upon another clause. I think I understood him to say that he considered this House had jurisdiction to deal with this contract under the provision of the Constitution which gave to this House the regulation of trade and commerce; and I also understood that he referred indirectly to its jurisdiction over railway companies and similar companies as strengthening the position he took.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. ABBOTT. I may be mistaken in that, but I understood that he claimed that this House had jurisdiction, not only over railways which passed through more than one Province, or which had been declared to be for the advantage of Canada, but also over railways within a Province. However, as my hon. friend says that he does not rely upon that, his pretensions, I think, must rest altogether upon a clause of section 91 of the Constitution, which gives us jurisdiction over trade and commerce. The second subsection of the ninety-first section mentions that as one of the subjects in respect to which it shall be lawful for this House to make laws. It shall be lawful to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, &c., in relation to matters not coming within the class of subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. And then, for greater certainty, the clause proceeds to enumerate a number of subjects on which this House may legislate, the second of which is the regulation of trade and commerce. The eighteenth is bills of exchange and promissory notes; the fifteenth is banking and the incorporation of banks, and the use of paper money; the seventeenth specifies weights and measures; so that it appears that by this clause the Constitution gives us the right to regulate trade and commerce, and also gives us the right to make laws about bills of exchange and promissory notes, about banks, savings banks, and weights and measures. The ninety-second clause states what power the Local Legislatures shall have, and it appears to be quite clear that these powers are given exclusively to these Legislatures, and that they have nothing to do with any subject which is mentioned in the ninety-second clause, and one of those subjects is property and civil rights in the Provinces. Now, it has always appeared to me that this phrase, "regulation of trade and commerce," could not by any possibility go so far as to include within it the power of making laws respecting commercial contracts. It seems to me, even if there had not been some circumstances in the ninety-first clause, which appear to interpret it, to be impossible to believe that that language should mean that we may make in this House laws with reference to every kind of commercial contract. Now, if my hon. friend's proposition does not go so far as that, it does not seem to me to be worth anything. If he does not admit that that phrase gives us the power to make laws about every commercial contract, I do not see how he can claim that it enables us to make laws about carriers. A contract with a common carrier is a commercial contract, I do not think there can be any question about that. But, on the other hand, there is a contract involved in a promissory note, in a bill. Banking is trade and commerce, I presume; the regulation of weights and measures would come within this phrase in the interpretation which I understand him to claim for it. So, I say, if it were the intention of the Constitution in giving us jurisdiction over the regulation of trade and commerce, to give us the right to make laws about all commercial contracts, then no commercial contracts would have been mentioned in the remainder of this section. The express provision that we shall make laws about some commercial contracts, in this clause, seems to indicate that that phrase cannot mean that we should have jurisdiction over all commercial contracts. I presume an argument is unnecessary upon the point that the enforcement of a contract and the rights which parties acquire as against each other in respect to contracts, are civil rights. That, I imagine, cannot be disputed. And the ninety-second clause of the Constitution expressly says that the Provinces shall have the regulation of property and civil rights. That is my view of it. But there is a much higher authority than mine could ever possibly be, as to the view which I have taken, and it is to be found in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Parsons, to which the hon. member for Laval has referred. His Lordship, who rendered judgment—his name is not mentioned—referring to these clauses to which I have drawn attention, said:

"The scheme of this legislation, as expressed in the first branch of section ninety-one is to give to the Dominion Parliament authority to make laws for the good government of Canada in all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures. If the ninety-first section had stopped here, and if the classes of subjects enumerated in section ninety-two had been altogether distinct and different from those in section ninety-one, no conflict of legislative authority would have arisen. The Provincial Legislatures would have had exclusive legislative power over the sixteen classes of subjects assigned to them, and the Dominion Parliament exclusive power over all other matters relating to the good government of Canada."

Then his Lordship goes on to show that it must have been foreseen that a sharp and definite distinction could not be obtained in some classes of subjects, and that these would inevitably run into each other; and then his Lordship lays down the general principle, to prevent a conflict between the powers of the two Legislatures, the language of the two sections must be read together, and that of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified by the other. The first point with which his Lordship deals is the proposition of the promoter of the Bill; that is to say, as to whether the regulation of trade and commerce comprises the right to regulate contracts. His Lordship says:

"A question was raised which led to much discussion in the courts below and at this Bar, namely, whether the business of insuring buildings against fire was a trade. * * * * But in the present case their Lordships do not find it necessary to rest their decision on the narrow ground that the business of insurance is not a trade. The words 'regulation of trade and commerce' in their unlimited sense are sufficiently wide, if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the Act, to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to trade with foreign Governments requiring the sanction of Parliament down to minute rules for regulating particular trades. But a consideration of the Act shows that the words were not used in this unlimited sense. In the first place, the collocation of No. 2 with classes of subjects of national and general concern affords an indication that regulations relating to general trade and commerce were in the minds of the Legislature when conferring this power on the Dominion Parliament. If the words had been intended to have the full scope of which in their literal meaning they are susceptible, the specific mention of several of the other classes of subjects enumerated in section ninety-one would have been unnecessary; as, fifteen, banking; seventeen, weights and measures; eighteen, bills of exchange and promissory notes; nineteen interest, and even twenty-one, bankruptcy and insolvency. Regulation of trade and commerce may have been used in some such sense as the words 'Regulations of Trade' in the Act of Union between England and Scotland, and as these words have been used in other Acts of State."

The conclusion at which their Lordships arrive, is this:

"Construing therefore the words: 'regulation of trade and commerce,' by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-Provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion. Their Lordships abstain, on the present occasion, from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the Dominion Parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade, such as the business of fire insurance, in a single Province, and therefore that its legislative authority does not, in the present case, conflict or compete with the power over property and civil rights assigned to the Legislature of Ontario by No. 13 of Section 92."

It was urged that because the Dominion Parliament had the right to incorporate insurance companies to trade in the Dominion, they would necessarily have the right to define the powers of those companies, and it was attempted to be proved that in consequence of the Local Act there was conflict between the jurisdiction of the two Legislatures. But then his Lordship said:

"But it by no means follows (unless, indeed, the view of the learned Judge is right as to the scope of the words 'the regulation of trade and commerce,') that, because the Dominion Parliament had alone the right to create a corporation to carry on business throughout the Dominion, that it alone has the right to regulate its contracts in each of the Provinces."

It appears to me, that every word I have read from this judgment is applicable to this Bill, and it must be observed that the Bill is not at all restricted as to its purview. It is not contended that the transactions will extend from one Province of the Dominion to another, upon which some kind of argument might probably be hung as to the rights of this Legislature, but it includes all kinds of carriers' contracts, even the carriage of a parcel from one village to another. The Bill says:

"It shall include railway companies, express companies, and large coach proprietors, and every person or corporation who carries on the business of a common carrier on land for hire."

As I have remarked a moment ago, I think some regulation of these contracts would be advantageous; but I should regret exceedingly if we should pass this Bill, unless we have undoubted power to pass it, as we would be showing an example to the Legislatures of the Provinces to deal with subjects over which they have no jurisdiction; and for these reasons, as I do not think we have not that power, I will support the motion of the hon. member for Laval.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree in the observation which has just fallen from my hon. friend, that we ought to be very careful in not attempting to legislate on matters respecting which we are not invested with jurisdiction. But, at the same time, I see great difficulties in our refusing to legislate simply on the ground that we may, or may not, have jurisdiction. This Parliament, of course, must exercise its judgment upon that point. The suggestion of the hon. member who moved the amendment that some Commission should be appointed, composed either of members of this House, or of both Houses, to whom should be assigned the duty of saying whether matters were within the jurisdiction of Parliament or not, is not at present, at all events, the law of the land; and I doubt whether, according to the Constitution, a free Parliament would ever submit to have its hands tied by a Commission appointed, including even the most eminent members of that body. We are, therefore, obliged, when matters of this kind come before us, to determine, to the best of our ability, whether the matter proposed to be legislated by Parliament comes within the jurisdiction conferred by the British North America Act, otherwise legislation upon the subject might be impossible. If we entertain any doubt, and because of that doubt we decline to legislate on a subject—and no doubt the Provincial Legislatures will be equally modest—the people cannot obtain legislation on a subject, which it is admitted, as in this case, legislation is required upon. I admit, of course, the authority of the case cited by my hon. friend, that of the Queen's Insurance Company vs. Parsons; but to my mind—I may be quite wrong—it does not settle this question. The contention made in the Provincial courts, in which this case was first tried, was that it was a matter of trade and commerce, and being a matter of trade and commerce legislation by the Province was ultra vires. It was contended that the business of insurance was a trade—the decision of the Supreme Court was founded distinctly upon that view; but the Court of Appeal in Ontario, and in fact all the Judges in that Province, before whom the case came, unanimously held—I do not think there was a dissentient on that point—that it was simply a contract, not a matter of trade or of commerce, and, therefore, a matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. When it came to the Supreme Court here, one or two of the Judges took an opposite view; and when the case came before the Privy Council the effect of the judgment was that they thought it was not a matter beyond the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. Now, it may be quite true that a contract relating to insurance—which always, I must confess, to my mind, appeared to me to be merely a contract of indemnity, and, therefore, not a matter of trade and commerce—was within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures; and that this may not be, we ought not to take too narrow a view of our powers. I do not mean to say, by any means, that we should endeavor to extend our powers. The charter under which we legislate is just as powerful for the Provinces as it is for this Parliament. I do not pretend at all to urge that we should stretch any power which has been given to us; but we ought to take a wide and liberal view, having regard to the subject-matter with which we are about to deal. Now, if there is one matter, as it appears to me, more than another which ought to be, if it is not, within the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, it is the law relating to carriers, because we know that articles carried may be sent from one Province to another; and it will be certainly a misfortune if the laws of the Provinces are to be the guide, because they would differ from one another. I, therefore, think that the construction of the Act—I am speaking now directly in a legal sense—ought not to be lost sight of; and that the regulation of trade and commerce, which, in the language of the Privy Council, cited by my hon. friend, may refer to matters of inter-provincial concern, and may refer to matters of general concern, would, under these terms, very naturally be held to apply to all questions relating to the law of carriers; because, as I have said, the business of carriers is not circumscribed, is not limited, at all, within the bounds of any particular Province. My hon. friend who has just spoken, says that this Bill takes a wide view, and that it does not at all attempt to limit the law relating to carriers between Provinces, or to goods carried from one Province to another. I confess, Sir, that I would deem it a great misfortune if we were compelled to limit the law in that way; and that is the misfortune—if I may so speak of it—which regulates the Constitution upon the other side of the line. There, all matters relating to a State, within the State, must be regulated by the law of that State; but matters between States and foreign commerce are regulated by Congress. Now, the difference, I take it, and the broad difference, which exists between their Constitution and ours, is, that the matter is either wholly with us, or wholly with the Provinces; and it would, as I say, appear to me to be a very great misfortune indeed if we were to make a law here to regulate the business of carriers between Provinces, and each Province made a similar law regulating carriers within its own territory. I trust, therefore, that it will be found that the power to legislate in this matter rests with us, or with the Provinces; and for the reasons I have already given I think it would be a great misfortune if it were found that it does not rest with this Parliament. Now, no doubt, this is prima facie a matter of civil rights, and so is every matter relating to trade and commerce. I defy any hon. gentleman to point out any contract, or matter of trade and commerce, which cannot be brought under the head of civil rights. And the construction which has been placed upon the British North America Act, that has received the sanction of the Privy Council—if it did not originate there—is this: We are, first, to look to section 92, which prescribes the powers of the Provinces. If we find that they have authority to deal with any particular matter, then prima facie they have that power; but, before we can come to a conclusion, we have to turn back and look at section 91. And if, among the enumerated subjects specifically given to this Parliament by section 91, we find that those powers clash with these, which are given expressly by section 92 to the Provinces, then the power of this Parliament is supreme, and in that particular overrides the general power conferred by section 92 on the Provinces. Now, I think there is no doubt that—and every lawyer in the House will in this agree with me—this must be accepted as the construction to be placed on these two articles of the Constitution, upon which so much depends; therefore, I admit, in the first instance, that the law respecting carriers and the contracts of carriers is a matter of civil rights. But I have then to turn back and look at section 91; and on looking at section 91, I find that upon us is conferred the power of regulating trade and commerce to that extent. This power which is conferred upon us limits by the general authority of the Provincial Legislatures to deal with matters of civil rights. Well, my hon. friend points out—and there is no doubt that difficulties are created by it—that if it is evident that the ninety-first section gives us all the powers connected with trade and commerce, it would have been unnecessary to have specified, in subsequent sub-sections, the power of dealing with the matters to which my hon. friend has referred, such as banking, bills of exchange, promissory notes, interest, insolvency, &c. We have that difficulty placed before us; but what meaning are we to attach to trade and commerce? Because the section goes on to specify with particularity matters which might well have been covered by the words "trade and commerce," does it follow that the words "trade and commerce" have no meaning? Because it comes to that. My hon. friend did not attempt to point out anything that he understands is regulated under the terms, "trade and commerce" unless the language of the Privy Council expressly covers matters of this kind, matters of inter-provincial concern, and matters of general concern. Now, Sir, we are fortunate, perhaps, in having many of these questions determined for us by the court, which, I venture to say, is the most competent to determine questions of this character—and that is the Supreme Court of the United States. Of course, in England it is but very seldom, indeed, that recourse is had to the highest courts there to determine questions of legislative jurisdiction, but this is of constant occurrence in the United States; and from the earliest times, therefore, we have had discussions in the United States, and by the very ablest men there, as to the conflicting powers of jurisdiction conferred upon the State Legislatures, and upon the Federal Legislature. I would, therefore, refer—if the House would tolerate it for a moment—to decisions on this particular subject, by Chief Justice Marshall, and by other Judges who have dealt with this matter. Now, from Pomeroy's work on the American Constitution, in which these matters are summarized, I would read an extract on this branch of the legislative power. Dealing with the question of this power—having cited the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which Chief Justice Marshall first laid down the doctrine with regard to the powers of Congress, in matters of commerce—and referring to the extent of this power, he says this:

"I am now brought to the consideration of the second division into which the whole subject was separated: The extent of the power to regulate commerce; or, what particular Acts may Congress pass by virtue thereof?"

"As an introduction to the subject under discussion, I will quote some remarks of C. J. Marshall on the extent of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, which he made in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. He says: 'The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration and not definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying or selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations, which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of vessels of one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to the prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or barter.'"

Coming more particularly to this matter, it is stated on page 247 of the same work:

"Statutes relating to the liabilities of ship-owners and others engaged in commerce, either declaring, altering, or supplementing the rules of the Common Law, or general Law Merchant. Congress has assumed to enact laws of this description, and having this effect. In 1851 it passed a statute entitled, 'An Act to limit the liability of ship-owners,' &c. This Act provides in substance, among other things, that no owners of vessels shall be liable for any damage to goods and merchandise caused by fire on board the vessel in which the commodities are laden, unless the fire were caused by the design or neglect of the owner himself. Provisions of the same law modify the liability resulting from collisions and other negligent or wrongful acts. Here is a plain and most material change in the rules of the Common Law; for, under that law, the common carrier is an insurer against all loss and damage, except that caused by the act of God or of the public enemies."

Now, if that is sound law—and it has never been questioned since 1851—the power to make it is simply based upon the power given to Congress in the words: "to regulate commerce;" of course, not so much as in ours, because their power is confined to commerce between different States, with foreign nations, or the Indian tribes, while ours is much wider. The House will see that our power is, in point of fact, equivalent in all respects to theirs, and greater than theirs, because very properly, as it appears to me, we have authority to deal with subjects within our own jurisdiction and matters which by their law are confined to the State Legislatures. I would therefore submit, with all deference to my learned and hon. friend, that it would be unwise for this Parliament to hesitate to assume this power. Of course it may be a misfortune—and my hon. friend who first addressed the House on this subject seemed to think that it would be something more than a misfortune—that the court should have power to declare these laws unconstitutional, but I see no way out of that dilemma. All we can hope is that our courts shall rightly interpret our laws, and that as they do so from time to time we will pay every respect to their decision. But if we refuse to legislate because we have doubts, and the Provinces refuse to legislate because they have doubts, the result will be that the people of the country will be without a law on a subject upon which legislation is admitted to be necessary. On the other part of the motion I have only to say that, of course, the Province of Quebec is a most important part of this Dominion, but, with all respect to the hon. gentlemen from that Province, it is not the whole Dominion; and if the Code which is in force there provides, as it does very largely, for the Bill which I have introduced, why, it will not do them any harm to have it reenacted there. So far as I know I believe the other Provinces are without any such law. That is the case in the Province of Ontario. If we are not legislating against the law of the Province of Quebec, I do not know that hon. gentlemen from that Province should object to it. I have looked at the Code and I am inclined to think that the amendment proposed to be made by the Bill now under consideration will not be in the wrong direction. My hon. friend finds more fault because the court has power to say that a contract shall not be binding, but he forgets that contracts made with carriers are practically one-sided. If a man brings an article to be carried he has no alternative between possibly a law suit and signing the only terms upon which the carrier will agree to convey his goods. That is the result—we all know that to be the result. How is that state of things to be remedied? Some of my hon. friends think that we should remedy it in this way: that we should say that no carrier should have power to limit his common law liability—he should have no power to make a contract of any kind. But that would be a still greater interference than I have suggested, and I am not prepared to go that length. There may be cases—and the hon. member for West Durham pointed out when we were in Committee of the Bill—in which it would be in the interests of the public, as well as of the carrier, that he should have power to make a special contract; but at the same time we must interfere, and we ought to interfere, between the carrier and the public when he makes stipulations which are unjust and unreasonable. I do not know whether my hon. friends from Quebec will think it of any importance, but in the great commercial country of England, since 1854, provisions have been in force giving power to the courts to declare a contract to be unjust, and therefore not binding upon the man who signed it, and yet there are no complaints of its operation. Under that law decisions have been given in the courts which, if we enact a similar law, we will have the benefit of. In the very cases which the hon. gentleman cited, the insurance cases in the Province of Ontario, we have had decisions stating what were fair conditions between the insurer and the insured, and they have gone further and declared that special contracts should not be binding unless the court pronounced them just and reasonable. So that we have sufficient precedents, if precedents are necessary, to justify us in enacting such a law. For these reasons I trust that while this should receive every consideration on the constitutional question, and while the hon. gentleman who leads the House will deal with it with the responsibility cast upon him in that regard, and while hon. members of the profession to which I belong will also discuss it, I feel very strongly that the jurisdiction to deal with this matter rests wholly with us and not with the Provinces. I may say with regard to the case referred to in connection with bills of lading, that I have not read the decision lately, but I think it is perfectly obvious to every hon. member that bills of lading do not come within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. In a case which came before the Court of Queen's Bench a few days ago, it was proposed to call upon the Attorney-General to show cause why the Provincial Law should not be declared illegal, and the majority of the Judges expressed the strongest possible opinion, though I admit the case was not argued, that the law passed by the Province of Ontario with regard to bills of lading was not within the purview of the Provincial Legislature. For these reasons I trust the House will vote down the motion of my hon. friend and allow the Bill to proceed on its merits.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). As the seconder of the motion, I wish to make a few remarks to the House. Constitutional questions have been raised from time to time ever since 1867 in all our courts, Provincial and Federal, as well as in the Privy Council. They have also been repeatedly brought up in this Parliament, and I believe that this is a good opportunity for us to define our jurisdiction, so far as we are able to do so, in matters regulating trade and commerce. The subject matter of the Bill now before the House is one of great importance. If it was advisable for this Parliament to make uniform legislation for all the Provinces, regulating carriage by land, a measure to that effect could now be considered. But that is not the most important point. The most important point is, have we jurisdiction to do so. If we have not, we should not do so. This affects a very large interest in the country. Almost every kind of commerce is more or less affected by regulations concerning carriers by land. This Bill tends to create new regulations, and it is very dangerous to do so in a matter of so great importance as the relations existing between the public and common carriers, unless we have undoubted jurisdiction in the matter. My hon. friend referred to a case in which the constitutionality of Provincial legislation was raised with reference to bills of lading. I am of opinion this Parliament has undoubtedly jurisdiction in matters of bills of lading when relating to banking. When we declare that a bank shall make an advance on a bill of lading, we have a right to declare in what manner that security may be given to the bank. The moment we legislate on bills of lading as a contract having no connection with banking we have no jurisdiction. A great deal has been said about the decision of Chief Justice Marshall. I believe we are not going to be governed by American jurisprudence. We all know that the American Constitution is not the same as the Canadian, in matters concerning trade and commerce. We all know that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction over its commerce with foreign countries, between the States and the Indian tribes. We all know that in this country there is only to be found a provision in the Constitution—paragraph 3 of section 91—which establishes that the regulation of the entire trade and commerce shall belong to this Parliament. Not only have these American decisions no bearing on our Constitution, because our constitutional system is not the same as theirs, but we have Canadian decisions on the very point before this Parliament. There is the case of the Citizens' Assurance Company vs. Parsons, which has been alluded to by every speaker, and which my hon. friend says has not decided the point at issue. I believe it has. I believe my hon. friend from Argenteuil is not absolutely correct when he says the Privy Council has not decided that insurance companies are not traders. This point, I believe, has been decided by the Privy Council in that case, and also by other courts; but the Privy Council went a great deal further. I will read only that portion of the decision having any bearing on the question:

"Construing, therefore the words: 'regulations of trade and commerce,' by various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulations of trade affecting the whole Dominion."

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I presume my hon. friend is going to say this Bill affects the whole Dominion.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. Here is my hon. friend's definition of a carrier by land:

"It shall include railway companies, express companies and large coach proprietors, and every person or corporation who carries on the business of a common carrier on land for hire."

I would understand that some ground would exist for this Bill if the hon. member had limited it to common carriers, carrying on business between the Provinces, excluding local common carriers of any of the Provinces. How can he claim jurisdiction under the decision of the Privy Council?

"Trade and commerce include political arrangement in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulations affecting the whole Dominion."

The hon. gentleman asks, if we are going to give that interpretation to that clause of the Constitution, where will be the power of this Parliament in matters affecting trade and commerce? We have a great deal of legislation passed by this Parliament affecting trade and commerce of this Dominion which will come only under that clause and does not affect contracts. Take, for instance, the law of this Parliament which says that persons shall not carry on certain business without a license obtained from the Dominion Parliament. Is not that regulating trade and commerce? Take the Railway Act which contains many provisions for the safety of passengers, and for the carrying of goods from one Province to another. These are regulations of trade and commerce which seem to have been contemplated by the Constitution, but not an agreement or a contract which may be made between common carriers and the public, and which comes under civil rights which belong to the Provincial Legislatures.

An hon. MEMBER. The Tariff.

Mr. GIROUARD. The Tariff comes under another clause—the power of taxation. The rates which railway companies may impose come under that clause of the Constitution which gives to this Parliament power to regulate trade and commerce. Now, there is in this Bill another point which is more important to us members from the Province of Quebec, than to the other hon. members of this honorable House. In our Province we are governed by a code which is not only the result of the labors of our most eminent jurists, but it has been modelled on the Code Napoleon and the Justinian Code. In 1862, I believe, at a special request of the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, a Commission was appointed to codify the laws of Quebec. The codification of those laws was entrusted to the most able jurists of our Province, among whom were Mr. Justice Morin, Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Caron, the father of our worthy Minister of Militia. Some of our able lawyers also contributed to this great work, among them

Justice Beaudry and Justice Ramsay. The work of the Commission was completed in 1865, and Sir George Etienne Cartier took special pains to secure for that great national work the sanction of this Parliament. I may say that the Code of the Province of Quebec is the greatest monument which could have been erected to the memory of Sir George E. Cartier. Sir, the Federal Constitution which we are discussing to-day may pass away, and no doubt some day it will pass away, as did the Constitution of 1840. We shall all pass away in a few years, a great many of the present institutions of this country will pass away, Sir George E. Cartier himself has passed away, but one monument has survived him, and will continue to survive him for ever—I refer to the Civil Code of Lower Canada. Sir, we shall take good care that this Code be not touched, especially when it is doubtful if we have jurisdiction. Two years ago all the members of the Province of Quebec asked that the laws which were contained in that Code should not be submitted to the interpretation of the Supreme Court, because, as we understood, there were only two Judges of that court from our Province, and who were able to interpret those laws; and to-day are we going to allow this Parliament to exercise a jurisdiction which it is very doubtful whether it possesses? The hon. members from the Province of Quebec will fail in their duty if they do not object to this proposal, because it is one of the first duties of an hon. member to see that the civil laws of his Province are respected. I say we shall be failing in our duty as members from the Province of Quebec if we do not see that the jurisdiction of this Parliament is kept within its proper bounds. I object especially to the Bill of my hon. friend because it conflicts with the provisions of the Civil Code. If uniformity of laws be desirable, I do not see why the other Provinces should not adopt the provisions of that Code. It is not only based upon French principles, but upon English principles. In fact we all know that commerce is regulated by about the same principles of law in every country. If the other Provinces adopted the provisions of our Code then we would have a uniformity of laws, which is so desirable in matters of commerce. Now, let me quote article 1676 of the Civil Code, with which the Bill of my hon. friend comes in conflict:

"Notice by carriers of special conditions limiting their liability is binding only upon persons to whom it is made known, and notwithstanding such notice and the knowledge thereof, carriers are liable whenever it is proved that the damage is caused by their fault, or the fault of those for whom they are responsible."

Thus you will see that all the notices of carriers are permitted, provided they are made known, but section 11 of the Bill says:

"Except as hereinbefore provided, no carrier shall limit the Common Law liability of such carrier, for the loss of or any injury done to any horses, cattle or other animals, or to any articles, goods or things, whether contained in packages or parcels, or not, in the receiving, forwarding or delivering thereof occasioned by the neglect or default of such carrier, or his or its servants, by any special contract, unless the same shall be signed by the owner or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods or things respecting for carriage."

Here is an important change. You are going to change by this Bill the whole business of common carriers in this country—at least in our Province. I believe it is also the Common Law of England, which has force in the other Provinces of the Dominion to-day, that a common carrier may limit his responsibility by a notice, and it is sufficient that that notice should be brought to the notice of the public or of the party offering the goods for transportation. But this Bill proposes that it should no longer suffice that the public or the party offering the goods for transportation, should be made acquainted with this notice; it must also be signed by such party. A provision of that kind is not even practicable. Are you going to require that every merchant offering his goods for transportation to a company having conditions limiting their responsibility, shall be obliged to sign a paper acknowledging that he is aware of those limitations? I say that it is not practicable. That is not the way the business of carrying is done in a mercantile community. If there are limitations they are known to the trade, and it seems to me that is sufficient. That is one of the reasons for which I object to this Bill. But that is not all. There is another article of our Code which says:

"They are not liable for large sums of money or of bills or other securities, or for gold or silver or precious stones, or other articles of an extraordinary value, contained in any package received for transportation, unless it is declared that the package contains such money or other articles.

"The foregoing rule nevertheless does not apply to the personal baggage of travellers when the money, or the value of the articles lost is only of a moderate amount and suitable to the circumstances of the traveller, and the traveller is entitled to be examined upon oath in proof of the value of the things composing such baggage."

Let us see what the Bill says in that respect. By the provisions of our Code—which is also the Common Law of England—only gold, silver, precious stones and jewellery are excluded, but not the personal luggage of the passenger. In clause three of the Bill, the articles excluded are a great deal more numerous, comprising stamps, paintings, engravings, pictures, gold or silver plate or plated articles, glass, china, silks. If a lady has a silk dress or a fur cloak in her trunk she is to mention it specially, because the personal luggage of the traveller is not excepted in that Bill. More than that, in case the traveller or the merchant declares he has for transportation any of those excepted goods, the company has a right to charge extra freight. For all these reasons I am opposed to this Bill. I hold that it is unconstitutional, because it does not, upon its face, affect the trade of the Dominion alone, but seems to affect the local trade of the Provinces as well. Not only is it injurious but it is dangerous—dangerous to trade and commerce. Why is this Bill brought in? Have we seen any petitions from the mercantile community, from the Boards of Trade, or from any one else, complaining of the present regulations? We have received nothing of the kind, and we must have some evidence that the country wants this Bill before we undertake to disturb the business relations of our mercantile community. For these reasons I second with pleasure the motion of my hon. friend from Laval.

After Recess.

ACADIA POWDER COMPANY.

Mr. TUPPER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company.

Mr. AMYOT moved, in amendment:

That this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be declared by this House that the same is beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament of the Dominion of Canada.

He said: My object in moving this amendment is not to embarrass in any way the mover seeking the incorporation which he desires to obtain from this honorable House. I have all possible sympathy with him, and with those who seek for that incorporation; and I may tell him that if he applied for such incorporation to the Quebec Legislature he would receive a cordial reception, without a doubt. But we all know that in beginning this new institution, which we call Confederation, certain principles were laid down in the Statute-book, and it is not in the interest, as well of the Parliament of the Dominion as of the Legislatures of the several Provinces, that one of them should encroach on the rights and privileges of the others. We know that when improper legislation is cast it becomes a precedent for the future, and parties coming the following year and asking for such legislation point out that already similar laws have been enacted. After the several decisions by different courts that many laws passed are unconstitutional, it is time we should stop and not enact legislation beyond our power. I have not the intention of repeating what was so ably stated this afternoon, nor of quoting the same authorities and precedents, but it is well to remember what the fathers of Confederation said when Confederation was adopted. If we refer to page 1030 of the Confederation Debates we find clause 14 of the resolutions adopted by the construction—which is what was then intended to be placed in the Confederation Act, and I quote it now because it differs somewhat from the wording of the British North America Act as it now stands—ran as follows:—

"The incorporation of private or local companies, except such as relate to matters assigned to the General Parliament."

It is important, because, if I show the present Bill falls within the limits laid down here, there can be no doubt we have no jurisdiction to pass it, but the Bill must be referred to the Local Legislatures. Allow me to remind the House that at Confederation a solemn agreement was entered into between the several Provinces which joined the Union, by public men who had charge of Confederation itself. The present hon. leader of the Government used, according to the report at page 31 of the said Debates, these words:

"As I stated in the preliminary discussion, we must consider this scheme in the light of a Treaty. * * * We made the arrangement, agreed upon the scheme, and the deputations from the several Governments represented at the conference went back pledged to lay before their Governments, and to ask the Legislatures and the people of their respective Provinces to assent to it."

Then the late Sir George E. Cartier, at page 1022, said in his usual vigorous language:

"I have already declared, in my own name and on behalf of the Government, that the delegates who go to England will accept from the Imperial Government no Act but the one based on the resolutions adopted by this House, and they will not bring back any other. I have pledged my word of honor, and that of the Government, to that effect, and I trust that my word of honor will have at least as much weight with this House and the country as the apprehensions of the hon. member for Hochelaga."

What was the meaning of these words in the resolution—"the incorporation of private or local companies except such as relate to matters assigned to the General Parliament." The Bill which we are now asked to pass is a Bill seeking for the incorporation of a private company to manufacture and sell powder, and that company is already incorporated in another Province, and as the company wants to deal with other Provinces, it comes and asks for a general Act of incorporation. Can we find, in any part of the British North America Act, any clause which gives to this Parliament the power of incorporating such local companies for those objects? I fail to find in it any such clause. If we refer to the debates on Confederation we will see what were the intentions of the framers of the Confederation Act. If we look at page 30 we will see what the present hon. leader of the House then said:

"In the proposed Constitution all matters of general interest are to be dealt with by the General Legislature; while the Local Legislature will deal with matters of local interest which do not affect the Confederation as a whole, but are of the greatest importance to their particular sections."

And then at page 40 the same hon. gentleman says:

"But any hon. member on examining the list of different subjects which are to be assigned to the General and Local Legislatures respectively, will see that all the great questions which affect the general interests of the confederacy as a whole, are confided to the Federal Parliament, while the local interests and local laws of each section are preserved intact, and entrusted to the care of the local bodies * * * It will be seen that the Local Legislatures have the control of all local works; and it is a matter of great importance, and one of the chief advantages of the Federal Union and of the Local Legislatures, that each Province will have the power and means of developing its own resources and aiding its own progress after its own fashion, and in its own way. Therefore, all the local improvements, all local enterprises or undertakings of any kind, have been left to the care and management of the Local Legislatures of each Province."

Those were the words used by the present hon. leader of the House, who was one of those intelligent and patriotic men who brought about Confederation. If we look at page 62 we will see another declaration by Sir George Cartier :

"So if these resolutions were adopted by Canada, as he had no doubt they would, and by the other Colonial Legislatures, the Imperial Government would be called upon to pass a measure which would have for its effect to give a strong Central or General Government and Local Governments, which would at once secure and guard the persons, the properties and the civil and religious rights belonging to the population of each section."

Now, it is my pleasure to quote the words of another of the founders of Confederation, who still lives. I quote the language of Sir Hector Langevin, now the Minister of Public Works, from page 373 of the same work, as follows:—

"I may add that under Confederation, all questions relating to the colonization of our wild lands, and the disposition and sale of those same lands, are civil laws"—

I insist on the words "civil laws" because I will explain the extent of the meaning of these words further on :

"And all measures of a local nature—in fact everything which concerns and affects those interests which are most dear to us as a people, will be reserved for the action of our Local Legislature."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this question has been discussed in England, in the Imperial Parliament, and we have the authority of Lord Carnarvon on this question. Lord Carnarvon makes a distinction, or rather makes a definition, summarizing the whole Act in these words :

"In this Bill the division of powers has been mainly effected by a distinct classification. That classification is four-fold : 1st, those subjects of legislation which are attributed to the Central Parliament exclusively ; 2nd, those which belong to the Provincial Legislatures exclusively ; 3rd, those which are subjects of concurrent legislation ; and 4th, a particular question which is dealt with exceptionally."

And then he says :

"But there is, as I have said, a concurrent power of legislation to be exercised by the Central and the Local Parliaments. It extends over three separate subjects—immigration, agriculture, and public works."

We know, Mr. Speaker, that the present Bill does not refer to public works, or to immigration, or to agriculture, so it is not one of the subjects of concurrent jurisdiction ; but it must be one of exclusive jurisdiction. It does not fall within the exceptional provisions of the Act, so it remains to be discovered whether it falls within the jurisdiction of the Federal or of the Local Parliament. He goes on to say :

"Of these the two first will in most cases probably be treated by the provincial authorities. They are subjects which, in their ordinary character, are local ; but it is possible that they may have, under the changing circumstances of a young country, a more general bearing, and therefore a discretionary power of interference is wisely reserved to the Central Parliament. Public works fall into two classes : first, those which are purely local, such as roads and bridges, and municipal buildings—and these belong, not only as a matter of right, but also as a matter of duty, to the local authorities. Secondly, there are public works, which, though possibly situated in a single Province, such as telegraphs and canals, and railways, are yet of common import and value to the entire Confederation, and over these it is clearly right that the Central Government should exercise a controlling authority."

Now, the rest of all the public works belong to the Local Governments ; and Lord Carnarvon tells us most distinctly that in the distribution of the powers, all these local interests fall within the jurisdiction of the Local Governments. What are the words of this Statute, which was then passed by the Legislature of the United Kingdom ? The tenth subsection of section 92, says : One of the exclusive powers of the Local Governments relate to local works and undertakings, other than such as are of the following classes ; then comes the distinction respecting steamship lines, and such works as have been declared by the Parliament of Canada to be to the general advantage of Canada, &c. I may here remark that I heard, this afternoon, on this same question, something said, to which I do not like now to refer, in regard to a matter not so clear nor easy to decide than the one to which I am at present alluding. Then there is sub-section eleven which refers to all incorporated companies with Provincial objects ; and section 13 which refers to property and civil rights in the Provinces. Now, Mr. Speaker, I humbly contend : first, that these words are most comprehensible and most clear, and that the intention of the framers of the Constitution cannot be denied for one moment ; and if there were any doubt, if there were any room for controversy about this matter, it would be very easy in this regard to agree. Since the Confederation Act was passed, we have had any amount of decisions from the most learned Judges of this country, and even of England. We have also the very wording of the Act ; and if I cite these documents, it is because I wish to make plain the real meaning of the constitutional rights of the Provinces and of the Dominion. The whole question lies in this : What are we to understand by the words civil law ? Are these words opposed to Criminal Law, and to commercial law ; or to what are they in opposition. In the work from which I am now quoting, on civil law, it is stated :

"The Roman law as comprised in the Code, Pandects, Institutes, and Novels of Justinian, and his successors, constituting together what is termed the corpus juris civilis, as distinguished from the canon and common law."

"That system of law, which a community, state or nation establishes for its own peculiar Government, as distinguished from the jus gentium, or general law of nations."

This is the first distinction. Civil law means the law which is distinguished from the public law, and the law of nations. It goes on to state :

"That division of municipal law which is occupied with the exposition and enforcement of civil rights as distinguished from Criminal Law."

That is, the right is reserved to the several Provinces of the Dominion to pass laws relating to civil rights ; and the effect of the British North America Act was to give to the several Provinces the right to pass laws concerning all matters connected with the laws of the land, with the exception of such as pertain to the laws of nations, the Criminal Laws, and so much of the civil law, which has been especially entrusted to this Parliament, as enumerated in section 92. If we start from this point, and say that to the several Provinces belong the right to pass laws upon any question which is not mixed up with and does not form any part of the rights of these Provinces between themselves ; the rights of these Provinces in connection with other countries, or with the Dominion ; or of the Dominion with other countries ; and if we see that the Local Legislatures have the right to pass laws on all matters except criminal matters, and also except diverse powers given specially to this Government, we arrive at a very easy conclusion on questions which come up before this Parliament. We have also as an authority : the Civil Code of Lower Canada which deals with all those laws and the interpretation of those private rights, and those civil laws. It is true this law does not take its authority exclusively from France, for the best laws of England and all the experience which the legislators and Judges of England have acquired for centuries have been availed of by our codifiers in framing our civil laws. They have taken the best laws and the highest authorities which they have been able to find anywhere. With the permission of the House, I would like to quote a few authorities on this subject. There was a celebrated case of Dobie against the Temporalities Fund, which was decided in this country as well as in England. In England, the decision of the courts of Canada was reversed, but on totally different principles than those upon which a decision was arrived at in this country. In rendering his judgment, Mr. Justice Jetté, of Montreal, used the following words, as reported on page 184, of 26 Lower Canada Jurist :—

"The Constitution, in subjecting property and civil rights to the control of the Provincial Legislatures, did not make and could not make a distinction between the possessors of these rights; it has not limited the legislative authority to the case where the property belonged to a resident only. No, all rights of property, whether possessed by a resident or a non-resident, are under the authority of the legislative power of the Province. Any other interpretation of our Constitution would be contrary to the best established principles of the civil law and of the public law. Therefore, either the rights which the petitioner claims exist in this Province, or they do not."

Sir Antoine Aime Dorion, on page 187 of the same volume, says:

"The British North America Act was passed for the very purpose of allowing each Province to regulate its own internal affairs, including civil rights and incorporations for provincial objects, without interference on the part of the representatives of the other Provinces through the Dominion Parliament. It would be a mere evasion of the plain tenor and object of the Act, to say that the Dominion Parliament could interfere in matters purely provincial, merely because two or more of the Local Legislatures had adopted the same legislation, or, what would be more obnoxious still, because they had refused to do it."

On page 188 he says:

"The Supreme Court on a reference from the Senate has also decided that a Bill to incorporate the Christian Brothers as a body of teachers for the whole Dominion was beyond the powers of the Parliament of Canada (Journal of the Senate 1876, pp. 155, 204). This shows that under the provisions of the Confederation Act, civil rights and provincial objects are not to be determined by the extent of territory to which interested parties may wish to apply the legislative action of the Parliament of Canada, but by the character of such rights and objects.

"A society incorporated for certain objects in the Province of Quebec would by such incorporation acquire civil rights in this Province for provincial objects. A similar society incorporated in Ontario would have provincial objects in Ontario, and if the same society was incorporated both in Quebec and in Ontario, the rights granted to such corporation in each Province would still be civil rights, and its objects would not cease to be provincial as regards each Province, because there would be only one society incorporated in the two Provinces, instead of two."

I should like to give a few more extracts from a judgment of Mr. Justice Dorion, which is given with his usual lucidity and knowledge of the law. On page 190 he goes on to discuss the matter in this way:

"If in conveniences should result from such an interpretation of the British North America Act of 1867, they are not to be compared to the anarchy which would be created by giving to Local Legislatures the exclusive authority to legislate generally on all questions of civil rights, and by retaining to the Parliament of Canada the absolute right to legislate on the same subjects, whenever they should have been regulated by statutes passed by the late Province of Canada, or whenever it was proposed to subject two or more Provinces composing the Dominion to the same laws, or extend a statute already in force in one Province to another or to the whole Dominion. This would enable the Dominion Parliament to interfere in almost every subject matter of legislation coming within the scope of the legislative power conferred on the Local or Provincial Legislatures. The Dominion Parliament would only have to declare that it is expedient to have the same laws in more than one of the Provinces of the Dominion in order to assume exclusive jurisdiction in such matters.

"There would in that case be two codes of laws relating to civil rights in the same Province, the one enacted by the Local Legislature of the Province, and the other by the Dominion Parliament.

"The Provincial Legislature might, for instance, pass laws to prevent the accumulation of property in the hands of private corporations, as being contrary to public policy, and at the same time the Parliament of Canada might create new corporations for civil purposes or amend the charters of existing corporations and confer upon them the right to acquire and hold property in mortmain to an unlimited extent; the result being the most inextricable confusion.

"We must therefore come to the conclusion that the Parliament of Canada has no right to assume any jurisdiction in matters of civil right, except when they are necessary incidents of the exercise of some of the powers which are expressly conferred on it by the Confederation Act, or when they come within the exception contained in the subsection 10 of section 92 already referred to. As the establishing of civil corporations or the amendments of charters of such corporations do not come within either category, they are not within the jurisdiction or the powers of the Parliament of Canada."

In view of these words, I think it is clear that if we followed any other interpretation we would be stultifying ourselves and exposing parties to a costly litigation. The Privy Council itself in rendering judgment declares very clearly that such an interpretation of its powers by the General Parliament would be ultra vires. "In Doutre on the Constitution of Canada"—an excellent compilation—page 240, we find a decision of Mr. Justice Strong, who used the following language:—

"In the distribution of the legislative powers, it must have been intended to confer the right of legislation in private matters, and in matters of property and civil rights theretofore exercised by the Legislature of Canada, either on the Parliament of the Dominion or on the Provincial Legislatures, and there is nothing in the Act showing an intention to give any part of it to the Parliament. But the laws to be made by the Provincial Legislatures are confined to property, civil rights, and matters of a local and private nature in the Province, so that, although no limitation is imposed as regards the extent to which the Legislature may in their discretion affect private rights within their jurisdiction, they are limited to dealing with rights and property within the Province.

"That the Legislature have that power in all cases where the property and rights sought to be affected are 'in the Province' to the same unlimited extent that the Imperial Parliament has in the United Kingdom, I have not the slightest doubt."

And so on, he proceeds in the sense of the decision of Mr. Justice Dorion from which I quoted a moment ago. He refers, on page 242, to a decision given by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick which came up before the Privy Council:

"Their Lordships are further of opinion, with Mr. Justice Fisher, the dissentient Judge in the Supreme Court, that the Act in question, even if it did fall within the 2nd article, would clearly be a law relating to a matter of a merely local or private nature within the meaning of the 16th article of section 92 of the Imperial Statute; and therefore one which the Provincial Legislature was competent to pass unless its subject-matter could be distinctly shown to fall within one or other of the classes of subjects especially enumerated in the 91st section. This view is in accordance with the ruling of this tribunal in the recent case of L'Union St. Jacques de Montreal vs. Dame Julie Belisle."

On page 247 Vice Chancellor Blake is reported as using the following words:—

"That exclusive power is conferred upon the Local Legislatures by the B. N. A. Act, 1867, to deal with property and civil rights in the Provinces. The true principle, is, adopting the language of the Court in re Goodhue, that under the Confederation there has been a Federal not a Legislative Union; that to the Provincial Legislatures are committed the powers to legislate upon a range of subjects which is indeed limited, but that within the limits prescribed the right of legislation is absolute. And that the Local Legislatures have that power in all cases, where the property and rights sought to be affected are in the Province, to the same unlimited extent that the Imperial Parliament has in the United Kingdom."

In the same work, page 311, Chief Justice Ritchie uses the following language with regard to another case:—

"Therefore, the Dominion Parliament would only have the right to interfere with property or civil rights so far as such interference would be necessary for the purpose of legislating generally and effectually in relation to matters confined to the Parliament of Canada."

Now, I desire specially to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this last quotation. The Judge says:

"I scarcely know how one could better illustrate the exercise of the power of the Local Legislatures to legislate with reference to property and civil rights, and matters of a merely local and private nature, than by a local Act of incorporation, whereby, is granted a right to hold or deal with real or personal property in a Province, and the civil right to contract, and to sue and to be sued as an individual in reference thereto; and, if a Legislature possess this power, as a necessary sequence, it must have the right to limit and control the manner in which the property may be so dealt with, and, as to the contracts in reference thereto, the terms and conditions on which they may be entered into—whether they may be verbal, or shall be in writing, or whether they shall contain conditions for the protection or security of one or other or both the parties—or to declare the contracting parties may be free to deal as may be agreed on by them, without limit or restriction. Inasmuch then, as this Act relates to property in Ontario, and the subject-matter dealt with, is therefore local; and as the contract between the parties is of a strictly private nature; and as the matters thus dealt with, therefore, in the words of the British North America Act, are 'of a merely local or private nature in the Province;' and as contracts are matters of civil rights, and breaches thereof are civil wrongs; and as only the property and civil rights in the Province are dealt with by the Act; and as 'property and civil rights in the Province' are in the enumeration of the 'exclusive powers of Provincial Legislatures;' I am of opinion that the Legislature of Ontario, in dealing with those matters in the Act in question, did not exceed their legislative powers."

Now, I fail to find a single precedent contrary to that. As I have said, by the Bill now before the House, a local company for the manufacture and sale of powder, incorporated in one of the Provinces, comes before the General Parliament, and says that it would be more advantageous for it to have a General Act, under which it could trade in all the Provinces of the Dominion. We certainly have no objection to this company going into every Province of the Dominion and asking for incorporation; but we have objections, as members of the Federal Parliament, to the company infringing upon the undoubted rights of the Provinces. The power of the Provinces, so far as these local matters are concerned, is supreme and exclusive, and we ought not, with the immense power we have here, to infringe upon their rights. If this company wants to deal in the Province of Quebec, it should be incorporated there, and if it wants to deal in the Province of Ontario, it should be incorporated there. The great advantage of a legislative union would have been that there would have been no difficulties of this kind; but we are not called upon to decide whether the British North America Act was a wise measure or not. If that Act is not a good one, let us ask the several Provinces to consent to have it changed, and to delegate to this Parliament those powers with which they have been invested. But while that Act lasts, we must respect it. If we do not respect it, if we begin to attack the root of the tree of Confederation, if we begin to go against the solemn bargain which has been made, we expose the whole Confederation to danger. I am sorry, of course, for the private company whose Bill I have to attack, but I do it under a sense of duty. I feel it due to this Parliament that it should not be induced to pass laws which are ultra vires, and I feel it due to all of the Provinces that we should not exercise a jurisdiction which belongs exclusively to them. So that, in the spirit of those who obtained Confederation from this Dominion, and in the spirit of the interpretation of the law by the courts, I regard the local and private incorporation asked for as ultra vires of this Parliament, and we are in duty bound to refuse it.

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon. member for Bellechasse, when he came to this Bill—the name of which, I fear, has led him into a belligerent attitude towards it—had only kept his powder dry for a Bill to which his remarks would more aptly apply, the very interesting argument which he has addressed to the House might have had its due weight. But I think I can satisfactorily show to every member of this House, in a very short time, that the premises upon which that hon. gentleman built the whole of his argument have not the slightest connection with the Bill before the House. I could not avoid wondering as the hon. gentleman proceeded, and evinced such great interest in this Bill, why he sat quiet last night when a Bill fraught with the same danger to Provincial rights was discussed and passed by this House. Instead of being a powder company, it was a phosphate company; and instead of emanating from Nova Scotia, it emanated from Ontario. That Bill passed its third reading last night, and the hon. member for Bellechasse, if I mistake not, was in the House at that time, and his constitutional argument might then have been disposed of. There was a Bill before the House this afternoon of a different nature, to which the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse might fitly apply. All through his argument, parts of which I was only able to catch, from the distance at which the hon. member spoke, I caught the words “of a local and private nature.” I caught also the reading of a clause in the British North America Act, under the section that deals with matters of Provincial legislation and jurisdiction relating to the incorporation of companies of a private nature for local purposes. There is also another phrase: “For Provincial purposes solely.” If the hon. member for Bellechasse were to consider the weight of that term, and the whole clause itself, he would feel that, notwithstanding what the fathers of Confederation have said, the Confederation fathers have been ever since, permitting to pass and bringing forward, Session after Session, Bills of this character which are not of a local nature solely—which do not relate merely to a Province in the Dominion, but contain a preamble such as that in the Bill referred to that passed the House the other night, to incorporate the Dominion Phosphate Company, and this Bill to incorporate the Acadia Powder Company. These Bills state that their objects are not solely of a local or Provincial character, but to carry on business in the different parts of the Dominion. They ask only the privileges which are enjoyed by other companies—which Quebec companies enjoy to-day, such as the Construction Company of Iberville, the Credit Foncier, or the Canadian Engine and Machinery Company and others, a host of which I could cite if necessary. Ever since the Confederation Act was passed this Legislature has been occupied, Session after Session, with Bills of this character. True, this question has often come up; but I can appeal to those arguments, not one of which has been alluded to by the hon. member for Bellechasse, as settling the question we are now discussing, irrespective of that raised in the discussion of the Common Carriers' Bill. Here we are not tied down by the clause of the British North America Act, which deals with the incorporation of companies of a purely Provincial nature. We are following in the beaten track, in which we find the incorporation of companies of a precisely similar character. We have not only the cases I have mentioned, but many others, such as Lamb's Waterproof Gun Manufacturing Company. If we have the right to incorporate a company for the manufacture of guns, surely we can incorporate a company to supply the powder. Perhaps, when this question assumes a worse attitude, if the company's efforts are found to be very beneficial, and when a discussion of this kind takes place outside of the Dominion—a day that is yet, I hope, far distant—the services of the company will be recognized. I have alluded very briefly to the argument addressed to the House, because I think that on second thoughts every hon. member will agree with me that the question raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse does not apply to this Bill. The authorities cited and extracts read by my hon. friend do not apply to this Bill, because they all deal with objects purely local. There is a feature in this Bill not contained in some of the others referred to, and which was slightly touched upon by the hon. member for St. John the other night. This is not the case of an ordinary application for charter, but the case of a company incorporated under the laws of Nova Scotia coming here for further powers. There are precedents for this. A company incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, the Canada Consolidated Gold Mining Company, was incorporated by this Parliament in 1881. Another incorporated company with a Provincial charter, the McClure Manufacturing Company, came to this Parliament and obtained an Act of incorporation. I hope, therefore, this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. IVES. I was not in the House when the hon. member for Bellechasse made his motion, but as Chairman of the Private Bills Committee I was aware he entertained the views to which he has given forcible expression by the amendment he has proposed. The question is one of very great importance, that of the relative powers of the Parliament of Canada and the Local Legislatures over the incorporation of private companies. It is one the House has already considered and on which the courts have given their opinions. As the question is so important, and the House, perhaps, not sufficiently prepared to-night to discuss it fully or vote intelligently upon it, it would, I think, be desirable that the promoter of the Bill and the hon. member for Bellechasse should consent to an adjournment of the debate. I am sure there are many hon.

members who would like to look into the matter more thoroughly and prepare to discuss it more fully before coming to a decision that will form a precedent. There is no doubt on this point, that our companies, having purely and solely local objects in view, must go to the Local Legislature. There is no doubt also that companies having Dominion objects in view, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, that have not purely local objects in view, may become incorporated, here; in other words, that there is a certain class of subjects over which the Parliament of Canada and the Local Legislatures have concurrent jurisdiction—not exactly concurrent jurisdiction, but the same classes of subjects are, if purely local, within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, or, if general in their application, then they should obtain their Act of incorporation here: for instance, railways or companies which propose to operate throughout the whole Dominion. Now, this question has been thoroughly discussed with reference to a measure which I have the honor to promote here, the Credit Foncier for the Dominion of Canada. The question was raised by the hon. member for Montreal East on a motion for the six months' hoist. The matter was discussed by legal gentlemen in the House, and the opinion of the last Parliament was that in matters like this the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction. Here is a company which was local in its objects and local in its operations. Now it comes to this Parliament and seeks to be empowered to do business over the whole Dominion. The question arises, has this Parliament power to give this company that Act of incorporation? As I look upon it, that local incorporated company is the same as an individual resident in the Province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick who comes here and asks for incorporation. I take it that if any half dozen citizens from Nova Scotia wished to obtain incorporation as the Acadia Powder Company to manufacture and sell powder over the whole Dominion, then the Acadia Powder Company might come here. The question is, can citizens of Nova Scotia come here and obtain an Act of incorporation enabling them to manufacture and sell powder over the whole Dominion? Have we power to grant such an Act of incorporation? Now Parliament has taken that power. I am not aware that the courts have decided that we have not that power, and I think the question is one of sufficient importance that it would be well if the debate were adjourned; and I move in amendment to the amendment that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 63) to amalgamate the Presbyterian Ministers' Widows' and Orphans' Fund in connection with the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, and the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Presbyterian Church in the Maritime Provinces, in connection with the Church of Scotland, and to create a corporation to administer such funds.—(Mr. Richey.)

BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 20) to empower the National Insurance Company to wind up its affairs and to relinquish its charter, and to provide for the dissolution of the said Company.—(Mr. Coursol.)

Mr. Ives.

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 88) to unite the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company and the Nelson Valley Railway and Transportation Company into one Company under the name of The Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway and Steamship Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

CARRIERS BY LAND.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. McCarthy's proposed motion for the third reading of Bill (No. 14) respecting carriers by land, and the motion of Mr. Ouimet, in amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think the hon. member for North Simcoe should take advantage of clause 94 of the British North America Act, which provides that a law may be made to apply to all other Provinces of the Dominion except the Province of Quebec, and I would suggest that he should amend the Bill to that effect. Not only am I willing to accede to the principle of the Bill if restricted to Provinces excluding Quebec, but I will go even further, and favor uniformity in commercial laws. I recollect that in the Parliament of 1872 I introduced a motion which was carried, to the effect that the commercial law of all the Provinces should be assimilated and should be made as far as possible to agree with the commercial laws of the United States and England, the two nations with which we have the most direct trade relations. I throw this as a suggestion, and I reserve the right hereafter to renew the motion I moved in 1872 respecting the assimilation of the commercial laws of the Dominion. I think our system of commercial laws might be codified and made uniform, as we have made uniform our weights and measures.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is but fair and courteous that I should answer the hon. gentleman who has just made the suggestion. I am afraid I cannot adopt it. I think the laws should be as far as possible assimilated, but I do not hold that a law should be applied to all the Dominion with the exception of one Province. On the contrary, I am quite willing to consider the operation of the Civil Code as suggested by the hon. gentleman, and see how far we can approach the laws of the Province of Quebec in that direction. I do not think my Bill varies very much from the Civil Code, and although my hon. friends from Quebec declare it to be perfection, as we used to think our Common Law was, nevertheless a little reflection will satisfy them that it is capable of improvement. As I understand the matter has to stand over, we will have an opportunity to consider it at a later stage.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As this matter has been brought under the notice of the House for the first time to-day, and as no notice was given of the motion moved by the hon. member for Laval, I think the proper course to adopt is to adjourn the debate. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES, DRAFTS AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. WELDON moved, that the House resolve itself into Committee of Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act passed in the 45th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled: An Act to repeal the duty on promissory notes, drafts and bills of exchange.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. The first section of the Bill is to place innocent holders of promissory notes insufficiently stamped in the same position as they occupied prior to the repeal of the Stamp Act of 1872. Doubts have been raised as to whether such is their position or not. The second section is for the purpose of saving the rights of parties in actions now pending. The last section of the Bill, which was formerly the second section, declares that former Acts did not apply to stamps on debentures. This point was raised in a case, but I have since been informed that the parties have appealed against the decision, and I feel, under the circumstances that I will not press this clause.

Mr. MITCHELL. To my mind the Bill is an exceedingly objectionable one. I do not know but what my hon. friend may have made objections removing some of the objections to this Bill; but I will state to the Committee what I consider objectionable in it: In the first place, it deals with two classes of securities, and attempts to revive an Act which has been repealed by an amendment. In other words, by the first section it is declared that any suit or proceedings at law or in equity now pending, or hereafter to be commenced before any Court or Judge, &c. It is thus proposed to affect existing legislation, and securities which may now be pending before the courts; and I consider that this is legislation in which this Committee will not take action. While I have no objection to the hon. gentleman passing a measure which provides for any defects that may properly be proved; but with relation to suits not commenced, I say, it is a principle laid down and sustained by this House that it will not pass Acts, unless under special circumstances, which in any way affects existing legislation that may be in progress at the time. I believe my hon. friend intends to withdraw the second clause of the Bill.

Mr. WELDON. I have stated that I withdraw it as far as I myself am concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I need not state my objection to it; but in regard to the first clause, it appears to me, we ought not, as a matter of right and fair play, pass any legislation which will affect existing law suits, or alter the character of decisions to be given on this litigation. Again it appears to me a very singular way of reviving an Act, which is repealed, by such an amendment as the hon gentleman proposes.

Mr. JAMIESON. As a member of the Special Committee to which this Bill was referred, I may say that when it was introduced, I thought it was a very proper measure. My attention was called to this matter some time ago, by noticing a decision given by one of our county Judges, in which he held that the power to double stamp—if the stamps were procurable, which I believe is not now the case—was taken away by the Act of last year, repealing the Stamp Act, and I cannot see that there can be any possible objection, such as has been raised by the preceding speaker, to this Bill. The revenue cannot now suffer; and some remedy ought to be afforded. A doubt has been expressed with reference to the effect of the Act of last year; and the principle laid down by the county Judge referred to, was, that except as to matters passed and closed, when the Act was repealed, it was to be treated as if it had never been in existence; and this principle has been acted upon by the highest judges in England. I think it right that parties who hold unstamped paper should have some remedy to recover their security; for in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred where notes have been improperly stamped or perhaps left unstamped, there has been no intention on the part of the makers or holders of them to commit any fraud on the revenue. It would be a very serious matter to the holders of such notes, many of which are still unpaid, if they had not some remedy by which they may recover their security; and I was very much pleased indeed, when the hon. gentleman introduced this Bill. If allowable however, I would have liked to have seen the Government introduce a Bill legalizing all notes which had been improperly stamped; and I cannot see that there would be any serious objection to legislation of this kind. I hope that this Bill, under the circumstances, will be allowed to pass.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course we ought to be very careful in passing a law which affects existing legislation; but I do not think that this measure, as it is now framed, offends against sound principles; and for this reason—if I rightly understand the state of things, it was this: under the law in certain circumstances, these holders of unstamped, or insufficiently stamped paper, were entitled to make that paper valid by double-stamping. We passed an Act last Session, the consequences and effect of which have been to render it impossible to get stamps with which to double-stamp; and all that is now being done is to put these persons in, practically, the same position, as nearly as may be, as they would have been in but for our legislation of last Session. The revenue question is at an end; and we are now putting some persons, who could make their notes valid, by double-stamping, in a position, under which the Judge may declare that they are valid. This seems to me to be sound and wholesome legislation; and I do not think that any persons who are liable for unstamped paper, have any right to complain because we prevent them from taking advantage of our Act of last Session, which might enable them to cheat the holders of such paper out of the payment of their debts.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think that the case has been very fairly stated by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. We passed an Act last Session, repealing the law which required notes to be stamped; and now the question simply is, shall we place any individual in the Dominion in such a position that, owing to this Act, he cannot collect a legal and just claim. Looking at it from this point of view, I can see no objection to the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a letter from a lawyer in my county urging the principle contained in this Bill. He states that, in several cases, notes could not be collected owing to their not having been stamped, and he enquired where stamps could be obtained, and whether notes were collectable unstamped. Under the circumstances, I think it is very desirable that this Bill should pass.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Before we pass any legislation which interferes expressly in this way with existing litigation it seems to me we should be very careful that we fully understand the position of the litigation that is to be affected, and that we do what is right in reference to protecting the interests of the various parties concerned in them. I understand that this second clause, which is now made the third clause, was for the purpose of meeting a special case. My hon. friend, I believe, has abandoned that clause, but if it was introduced to meet a special case just now pending in the Courts of New Brunswick, possibly the first clause is introduced for a similar purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I understand that no one can suffer by it. It would only enable them to take advantage of the repeal of the Act.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If a liability is saddled upon him by this Act which would not be saddled upon him otherwise, he would suffer.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that John Jones who happens to be sued upon a note which he has reason to think is a dishonest note, should be in a better position than Smith who has not been sued. The question is whether we should allow any person, whether action has commenced or not, to suffer through legislation which per incuriam prevents him from holding a note by a system of cheating and dishonesty. I do not think the circumstance that a man is defending a suit brought against him on one of those notes puts him in a better position than if the action had not been brought. The question is, whether we shall allow the holder of the note to be placed in a position which, but for our legislation of last year, he would have been placed in.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman misunderstands me altogether. I said that inasmuch as we had been informed that the second clause which is now made the third was introduced to meet a particular case, I wish to know from the promoter of the Bill whether the first clause was intended to affect a particular case not covered by the general enactment.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman is entirely misinformed as to the second clause. I would not be guilty of bringing in an Act which would affect a client of my own in regard to litigation in which he was engaged. Parties asked me before the Bill was introduced as a favor to be allowed to appeal, and I said that sooner than raise any question of that kind, I would raise it here, whether there was an appeal or not. I felt satisfied, however, of the ultimate decision of any court on the subject. I would not for one moment use my position as a member of this House in favor of any case in which I was concerned. In regard to the first clause it does not interfere with any litigation, but I myself raised an objection in a case which came up with regard to stamps. I referred to the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman, of a decision of a County Court Judge in Ontario, in which double stamps were not allowed to be used under the law. He held that as to the innocent holder of the note the law was absolutely null and void, thus placing the holder in a worse position than if the law had not been repealed. It often happens, as the hon. gentleman is aware, that this question of stamps is sprung upon the holder for the first time when the case comes up, but under the old law a Judge would not have any hesitation in allowing the party to double stamps. The object is to place the parties in precisely the same position they were in before the case was repealed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not understand that the hon. member for Victoria made any such allegation as the hon. member has stated. What the hon. gentleman said was that inasmuch as the second section of the Bill has been admitted by the House to have been put in to meet a particular case, he wished to know if the first clause which deals with a different class of securities was put there for a similar purpose. I may say that I have had communications from a party who was defending a suit, calling my attention to the fact that the Bill would affect litigation in which he was himself engaged, and he asked me to look into the matter and to prevent any injustice being done to present litigants. I saw the mover of the Bill, and he frankly stated with regard to the second section, which affects the class of securities to which the writer of the letter referred, that if there was any question raised about it he would withdraw that section, and he has kept his promise. It struck me that the first clause would be unfair to the general public, but the explanation of the hon. gentleman may be all right, and if he allows it to stand, the responsibility will be his and not mine.

Mr. OUMET. As this Bill is one which comes to the relief of certain parties who have suffered from previous legislation, I would like to see it come to the relief of all parties; and I would like to call the attention of the promoter of the Bill to a fact which came to my knowledge last summer. A promissory note was in the hands of a third person who was innocent of any neglect of the law. The note had not been stamped and became prescribed by the five years limitation. The maker would not renew it, and the holder could not sue him, because there was no law authorizing him to sue on a promissory note which was not duly stamped, and on which he could not put double stamps. The amount of that note has been a clear loss to that man of something like $500 or $600. I think this is a fair case for the consideration of the promoter of the Bill. I will say frankly that he was a client of mine, and would like to see his interests attended to by this Parliament, as the interests of the clients of some prominent lawyers are attended to; and I would suggest that a provision should be inserted in this Bill that all promissory notes lost through prescription, as was the case with my client, should be held good.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend should apply to the hon. Finance Minister to put a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for the amount his client has lost by this legislation; and let him apply to the hon. member for North Renfrew to support him, because it is by the legislation of this House that he has suffered; and I venture to say that if not now, before the next Election, my hon. friend will succeed in obtaining an Order in Council and a vote in the Estimates to pay his client's prescribed debt.

Mr. OUMET. I have no doubt the Government will be willing to assent to that proposition, seeing that the leader of the Opposition is so ready to support it.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would suggest also that my hon. friend had better get the leader of the Opposition to telegraph his views on the subject.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 84) to amend the law relating to bills of lading, said: The House will understand that according to the law of merchants, the endorsement of a bill of lading transfers the property mentioned therein to the consignee; but some years ago it was decided by the English Courts that although the property was transferred, the contract was not, and the law was altered so as to make both the property and the contract transferable. The Bill I now move has the same purpose. It was enacted some years ago in the Province of Ontario, but recently the Court of Queen's Bench expressed the opinion, apparently, that this Bill was unconstitutional. I have, therefore, brought it here at the suggestion of some members of the profession in Toronto.

Bill read the second time.

MASTERS' AND MATES' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide for the examination of persons desiring to become Masters or Mates of vessels of certain descriptions, registered in Canada and employed on the Inland Waters of the Dominion or any coasting voyages; and, that after certain named dates every such vessel so employed must carry a Master certified, after such examination, to be properly qualified, and must also, if of a certain class or description, carry a Mate duly examined and certified as being qualified to act as such.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McLELAN. The frequent loss of life and property on the inland waters and along the coasts of the Dominion has raised the question whether the officers in charge of the vessels were properly qualified, whether there was not great risk to life and property in allowing vessels to be commanded by men whose qualifications have not been put to an examination test.

In the case of foreign sea-going vessels, masters and mates must be certified and qualified; and it is proposed to extend a similar law to vessels navigating along the coasts and in inland waters. The Bill proposes that after the end of January, 1884—so that ship-owners may not be taken by surprise—vessels exceeding 100 tons shall have certified masters, and that vessels carrying passengers shall have certified masters, that vessels carrying over forty passengers and sailing vessels over 200 tons shall have certified masters and mates.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will you apply the same class of questions as in the examination of sea-going vessels?

Mr. McLELAN. No; that will be left for regulation hereafter. The same qualifications will not be required.

Mr. BLAKE. Are there sailing vessels that carry as many as forty passengers?

Mr. McLELAN. No; it refers to steam vessels.

Mr. BAKER. What is the intention as regards those already running steamers in the coasting trade?

Mr. McLELAN. After the 1st January, 1884, they will undergo examination and procure certificates, if competent. If not, they will have to give place to others that are competent.

Mr. LAURIER. Who will give the certificates?

Mr. McLELAN. The examiners to be appointed by the Governor in Council, probably the same as those appointed for the examination of masters and mates on sea-going vessels to foreign ports, with a different standard.

Mr. DAWSON. I think this is a step in the right direction. I understood at the commencement of the Session that there was some further legislation contemplated in regard to the inspection of vessels on the Upper Lakes, to prevent their being overloaded, and carrying too many passengers. Something should be done to prohibit the burning of the inflammable oil now used on board those vessels, which is the cause of a great many of them being destroyed by fire. On the opposite side, vessels are not allowed to burn this oil. I hope the hon. Minister of Marine will bring down further legislation to provide against the overloading of vessels navigating the Upper Lakes, and prevent them from using this inflammable oil. They should also not be allowed to carry dynamite and other explosive articles, whereby the safety of passengers is endangered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this intended not only to apply to the inland waters and coasts, but to the sea coasts as well?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the Bill establishing this classification of masters and mates was proposed some years ago, we found, on reflection, it was very desirable that we should not at once put a large number of persons out of employment. There are hundreds of men running these coasting schooners, carrying lumber and produce of one kind or another along the coast to local markets, who are quite competent to do the work, but many of whom, if subjected to an examination, which, I presume will be pretty strict, would probably be thrown out of employment. I would make the suggestion to the hon. Minister, that while he should employ a strict rule with all persons in the future who are to be made masters and mates, he should make some provision to allow the continuance in their position of those who have been for a period of years masters and mates.

Mr. WELDON. This Act will work very badly as far as regards the River St. John and the Bay of Fundy. Many of those engaged in running vessels in the coasting trade between those ports and the United States, are farmers.

Their wood boats, originally used for the river, are now used to carry lumber to Boston. They do not follow seafaring as a profession, but are perfectly qualified for the work they do, being probably better acquainted with the coast between New York and the Bay of Fundy than experienced mariners who are used to crossing the Atlantic and have passed the necessary examinations. The effect of this Bill will be to deprive these parties entirely of a means of subsistence. In fact, those parties who have studied navigation, would not be prepared for the examination, but, at the same time, no more competent persons could be found for the particular trade in which they are engaged, and the result will be to throw these out of employment. Moreover, if only masters and mates can be employed who have passed an examination, it will add increased expense to the cargo and the parties who are shipping, and the result will be to injure, to a large extent, the trade which now exists between the Bay of Fundy and the United States. Many of these parties I refer to are the owners of vessels themselves, and, during the summer season they are employed on the coast in bringing lumber to St. John; at other times in carrying boards to the United States, more particularly in the class of vessels I refer to. They are sea-going vessels in the strict sense of the term, though they were originally employed on the river, and now they are navigated by men who are mostly farmers on the river and fishermen on the coast. The effect of this resolution, if adopted, will be to deprive these men of profitable employment, and, to a large extent, to cripple the carrying trade of lumber to the United States.

Mr. McLELAN. It is proposed to ascertain whether the man in charge of the vessel is competent for the trade in which he is engaged. When a man is examined for a sea-going foreign voyage he receives a certificate to take charge of a vessel in any part of the world. The hon. gentleman will see that for the River St. John or for the coast, there is no necessity for navigation, but it is necessary that the man should be qualified to command that vessel and to know what to do in case of emergency, that is, any vessel over one hundred tons. For the smaller craft it is proposed to exempt the masters from this provision until the House shall otherwise determine. There are but few vessels exceeding one hundred tons that navigate the coast, but these all required to have certified masters competent to take them to any part of the world. What we propose now is that they shall have captains competent to command them in the particular trade in which they are engaged. I have reason to believe that very often men are put in charge of vessels who know nothing of their management in case of a storm arising, or other emergency, and I think, it is due to the trade, due to the owners of property, due to the lives of crew and passengers, that these vessels shall be in charge of competent men able to take charge of craft in the particular trade in which they may be engaged. I may say in answer to the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) that this Bill refers only to the qualifications of masters and mates, and that anything the hon. gentleman may deem necessary in respect to the construction of the vessels and the safety of cargo and passengers, will more naturally come under another Bill.

Mr. VAIL. May I ask why the hon. Minister puts the number of passengers at forty?

Mr. McLELAN. I propose at first that all steamers carrying passengers shall have competent captains, and in the case of all the larger vessels the number of passengers is fixed by the size of the vessel. When you have a larger vessel carrying more than forty the line must be drawn somewhere. The object is to have competent officers on board.

Mr. VAIL. A steamer running, for instance, from Digby to St. John, of 500 or 600 tons, is at liberty to carry thirty-nine passengers, but she cannot carry forty unless she has a certified mate.

Mr. McLELAN. It is not the number of passengers on board, but whatever she is certified for.

Mr. WELDON. There is a difficulty with regard to the Board of Examiners, as I understand the observations of the hon. Minister. The present Board are men accustomed to sea navigation, but with all due respect to their abilities as seamen I doubt if they are as capable of running a coast voyage as men on the Bay of Fundy or on the River St. John; and the great difficulty would be to get a Board able to examine parties who would be competent for the coasting trade. For instance, with regard to the present Board of Examiners, masters and mates are examined as to navigation and the use of charts, and the method of ascertaining longitude and latitude. Now, these are matters which are unnecessary in the coasting trade. What is needed is a practical knowledge derived from the experience those men get on the coast, a knowledge of the Bay of Fundy, of the coast of Maine, and a knowledge of the tides. The difficulty will be to find a Board who would know what knowledge is required for that purpose.

Mr. McLELAN. I will explain to the hon. gentleman that when our examiner of masters and mates goes down to St. John or Halifax to hold his examination he selects a local man to act with him, and he would select a local man who was quite able to judge whether the candidates had the necessary attainments or not.

Mr. WELDON. The present Board in St. John comprise competent navigators, and will be able to examine and pass men for long voyages, but I question very much their knowledge with respect to coasting voyages.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that while any Bill interfering with vessels navigating the River St. John would be a serious matter, this Bill is confined to vessels of 100 tons and over, and scarcely one of them would be affected.

Mr. BLAKE. Hon. members have had reason to complain, for a number of years back, that Bills belonging to the Marine and Fisheries Department have been introduced and pushed through the House without proper information being furnished, in order that they might be intelligently considered. It is said that oil and water do not mix well, but this and the Inland Revenue Department are like offenders, for the latter has given notice of a coal oil Bill. The measure now under consideration is no doubt prepared with due regard to the public welfare, and with proper safeguards and with proper working may prove salutary; but as it is going to affect a large number of persons it is exceedingly important that on as early a day as possible we should have full details as to the mode of the examination and other points, in order that we may obtain the opinions of those parties who will be affected. The next notice standing on the Order Paper is with respect to the Civil Service Act of last Session. We passed a good law for the examination of Civil servants, and now it is proposed to relax it because it is found inconvenient to those in the service, and I warn the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he may, if he does not act with prudence, also inflict great injury on persons who are not so able to obtain redress. With respect to the date proposed to be fixed it strikes me that it has been considered rather with respect to the needs of the coasting service of the sea-board than the inland coasting service. There is no necessity as regards the inland service for fixing as early a day as the first of January, because the inland waters are locked up, it is two months' later before that season commences. I would therefore suggest to the hon. Minister whether it would not be proper, at all events, as regards the inland waters, that the first examination should commence at a later date. Their season terminates from the 1st to the 15th November. If they are called upon at an examination for book learning and scientific information—and we cannot tell how much may be called for, as that depends on the Board, and there must be many Boards—it is important that as long a time as possible should be given them to prepare. I hope the hon. Minister will consider this point and expedite as far as possible the printing of the Bill and afford the House explanation as to how these examinations are to be conducted, as to the points at which the Board will sit, and as to the character of the examinations to which these persons are to be subjected.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the Bill introduced by the hon. Minister is a step in the right direction. No doubt, boats of that size, carrying both life and property, require competent persons to run them; but I think it is equally important that other steps should be taken at an early day to remove evils which are perhaps as dangerous to life and property as this one. I think the hon. Minister intimated to the hon. member for Algoma that this Bill only applied to masters and mates; but if it was necessary to regulate and inspect steamers in any other way, it would be important to put it in another Bill. I should like to know from the hon. Minister if it is the intention of the Government this year to introduce a Bill for that purpose. When the subject was under discussion, I called the attention of the hon. Minister and the House to several lamentable disasters which had happened on our inland waters, especially on Lake Huron, Georgian Bay and Lake Superior. There was the Asia which went down with between 100 and 200 people on board, only two being saved. The year before we had the Victoria and the Jane Miller, last year the Manitoulin, and a few years ago the Waubuno; and these disasters show that some additional remedy should be applied for the protection of life and property. Last year I tried to impress on the Minister the importance of appointing an inspector to see that vessels leaving port were properly loaded. We find on examination that the Jane Miller was lost on account of the load being on deck, and when she tried to turn round against the wind, not being properly ballasted, she upset, and all on board were lost. As regards the loss of the Asia, it was partly due, perhaps, to the same cause, that of over-loading. I do not understand why inspectors cannot be appointed, whose duty it would be to inspect vessels at ports at which they call and ascertain whether they were over-loaded or not. That might be done by the Collector of Customs, and thereby a large amount of property and valuable lives might be saved. The inspectors should not be those who would go on the deck of a vessel and look round and be unable to give any authoritative command as to whether or not the vessel should leave port. With respect to the Asia this was one of the troubles. It was said the boat was inspected and it was intimated that she was not fit to leave harbor, but there was no one to order that she should not do so. It requires some person with authority to declare that a boat shall not go out of harbor if overloaded and considered unseaworthy. It is important that inspections should be made. It is important to make inspections at different seasons of the year. A boat which might be seaworthy during the summer when there are few storms, should not be allowed to go out in the fall if she has been injured by two or three storms, or run on a sand bank; and, in fact, only those boats should be allowed to go out in the fall which are very strongly built and most likely to withstand storm and tempest. Attention has been called to the lamentable fact that a whole fleet of vessels plying on Georgian Bay, Lake Huron and Lake Superior, has been lost, and all this has happened within a few years. An objection raised as to the appointment of inspectors, is, that so many would be required that a heavy expenditure would be incurred. It must be remembered, however, that a single cargo would pay the salaries of all inspectors for many years. But I do not recognize that this question has to be looked upon solely in the light of expense. The value of human life cannot be estimated, but the value of property can, and the time has arrived when strenuous efforts should be made to prevent the great loss of life which has occurred during the last few years. Inside of three years we can count between 1,000 and 1,200; and if we are not going to have recourse to remedies, which I believe will be effectual in preventing this great loss of life, I think that we will fail in the discharge of our duty. I hope that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see its importance, and that it is imperatively necessary to introduce this Session, a measure for the inspection of boats—not only of engines and boilers, which are, I believe, already provided for—but of hulls, and also cargoes, as to whether vessels are overloaded, and as to how the cargo is distributed. One boat, if I remember rightly, carrying grain to Chicago, was lost, owing to the fact, that the grain was thrown on the bottom, without partitions, or any division, and when the storm commenced, it shifted from one side to the other, until finally the vessel keeled over; but, if compartments had existed, and the grain had been placed in sacks and properly stowed away, it was the general opinion, that this loss would have been prevented. The loss of the Jane Miller was due to the cargo being placed on the top of the boat, and of the Asia to having been overloaded and to not having the cargo properly stowed away, while the boat was inferior and unfit to stand the Upper Lakes; and I think that with all these facts before our eyes we should deem it important that something should be done at a very early day, if possible, to save this property, and prevent this very great loss of life taking place every year.

Mr. BAKER. I fail to see what all this has to do with the subject of masters and mates. I would like, however, to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to take into consideration the position of those persons at present in command of vessels on the coast, who have commanded them successfully for a number of years, and that this law should not be made retroactive.

Resolution reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 89) respecting certificates of masters and mates of inland and coasting ships.

Bill read the first time.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:25 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 5th April, 1883.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That the House go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker. On entering, Sir, upon the field of discussion opened by the presentation of the financial statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, I have the disadvantage of coming after the field has been mostly occupied, and, of course, I can only glean where others have reaped. I trust, however, to be able to present certain facts not alluded to, that have a bearing upon the question under discussion, and perhaps I shall allude to matters which have been alluded to, and present them in a light which may elicit some new information bearing upon the subject-matter of debate. We are discussing this financial statement, Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of the House are aware, at a period very much later than on the last occasion. Last year, the hon. Finance Minister made his financial statement, if my memory serves me, on the 24th February. This year the financial statement was not made on the 24th February, it was not, indeed, made till March 30th, a month later I recollect, Sir, reading an anecdote once of Susan B. Anthony. During an address in Philadelphia on woman's rights she attempted to make a very impressive commencement by asking: "why was I born?" This was the first sentence she uttered, and she then made an impressive pause and just as she was about to resume, some little street Arab in the gallery called out, in a piping tone of voice: "I give it up." Well, if I were asked why this delay in presenting the financial statement I would certainly have to answer: "I give it up;" and I must confess that the reason assigned by the hon. Finance Minister did not seem to me a satisfactory reason of the delay. He told us that he delayed the financial statement because certain changes in the American Tariff were about being made. It was perfectly proper for him to wait until he should ascertain what the nature of those Tariff changes were. He told us he received the information he sought on the 16th March. Now, the term of the American Congress expired, by constitutional limitation, on the 4th March. The nature of the changes of the Tariff was well known on the 20th February, for at that time the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Mr. Nimmo, was instructed to prepare a statement to lay before Congress showing what the loss of revenue by the proposed changes would probably be. Had the hon. Minister of Finance desired to act promptly in this matter he could easily have taken means to have ascertained what those changes in the Tariff were, at a much earlier period than he has informed the House he received the information. There was not a prominent newspaper in the United States which was not discussing the effect of the proposed changes on the 5th March, the day following the adjournment of Congress. The hon. Finance Minister could have ascertained from the Treasurer of the United States by a telegram, which, no doubt, would have been most courteously answered, on the 5th March, what the changes he desired to know were; or if he had sent a letter to any newspaper correspondent in Washington, or to the Secretary of the Treasury Department, on the 3rd March, the hon. Minister would have been informed on the 5th March, either by wire or by mail, what the changes were he desired to know about; but he seems to have waited until the Tariff Bill had gone through the slow process of printing in the Government Office, and it was not until the 16th March he received a copy of the Bill, being fourteen days after all the world interested in the American Tariff knew what the changes were he desired to be informed of. He had told the House that he particularly desired to know what changes were to be made in Excise duties, especially on the duties upon tobaccos and cigars. The whole world knew that the changes in the Excise duty on tobacco would be a reduction to 8 cts. per lb. That was known on the 5th March, and even on the 3rd March. All the changes which the hon. gentleman needed to be informed of he could have ascertained twelve or thirteen days earlier than he did it. It cannot be denied, and I have no disposition whatever to deny it, that the hon. Finance Minister, upon this occasion, meets the country under very comfortable circumstances, circumstances that must be gratifying to him as the head of the Finance Department. He has an overflowing Treasury; he has a large surplus; he has been able to provide for a largely increased expenditure, and still has money to spare. This state of things is attributed by the hon. gentleman, and by those associated with him, to a cause which we hold to be merely coincident with the prosperity that exists. This prosperity is attributed to the National Policy. We say no, the national prosperity is merely coincident with the change brought about by other and independent causes; and while agreeing perfectly as to the prosperous condition of the country, and as to the flourishing condition of the Treasury, and while congratulating the hon. Minister on this condition of things, I must take issue upon the cause of this prosperity, and I will endeavor, in the course of my remarks, to point out what I conceive to be the true causes of the prosperity now existing in Canada. I hold that to assert that a Tariff can cause prosperity is to assert what is a self-evident absurdity.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." If those curious in this matter will go back to the derivation of the word, they will find that the word "Tariff" is derived from the name of a seaport in Algiers, the Algerian port of Tariffa, from which in former ages issued Corsairs that preyed upon the commerce of the Christian nations of Europe, levying upon their vessels tribute or toll; and from the circumstance that tribute or toll was levied by vessels issuing from Tariffa, the stronghold of a piratical State, we have derived the name Tariff. Tariff means toll, tribute, taxes taken by force. If hon. gentlemen can show me that a person who wishes to buy cotton sheeting, and through the operation of the Tariff is compelled to pay for seven yards, a sum, which, without the Tariff, would have purchased ten yards, and that he is enriched by receiving only seven yards instead of ten yards; or if they can show that, for every $100 purchased, the $25 or $35 that go for taxes which the Government exact is a benefit, he has proved that a Tariff can be a source and cause of prosperity. But I hold such is an impossibility, and that the operation of this or any Tariff, whatever its character, is simply to diminish the prosperity which the country enjoys, to the extent of the taxes taken from the pockets of the people. One Tariff may be more unjust than another, and bear more heavily on the resources and energies of the people than another; but any Tariff imposed by the Government is not a blessing, but an evil inflicted on the people. The Government may be compelled to raise taxes, and the people may be compelled to pay taxes; but the tax does not enrich them; but when a Tariff is constructed and devised for the purpose of securing the amount of revenue that is required by the Government, and goes no further, that Tariff the Government is justified in imposing. But when a Tariff goes beyond this, and imposes a scale of duties yielding revenue largely in excess of the requirements of the Government; and when duties are imposed, not for the purpose of securing revenue in the most common-sense, and most economical manner, but to foster and protect certain pet interests, then it ceases to fulfil the proper requirements and functions of a Tariff, and becomes to the extent in which it imposes extra taxes, a burden, and an unjustifiable burden on the people of the country; therefore, I assert that a Tariff cannot create prosperity. It merely provides revenue to the extent of the taxation imposed; and it is absurd to attribute to this National Policy the prosperity which we have enjoyed. The existence of the National Policy was merely a coincidence with this period, at a time when other causes happened to produce prosperity. Now, Sir, I do not see my hon. friend from Lincoln in his seat; but I will, nevertheless, take the liberty, though he has pronounced it unpatriotic, to refer occasionally to the example of the United States, because we can profit by their example. We have the blessing, if we please to call it so, of a Protective Tariff, the United States have a Protective Tariff; and taught by the experience of these two respective fiscal systems, we can make certain comparisons and come to certain conclusions. The United States inaugurated their protective system in 1861; but did that protective system prevent that country suffering from the effects of a great commercial depression and avert the disasters from which we suffered from 1874 to 1878? On the contrary, Sir, they experienced very severe commercial depression, which, under their protective system, was very much greater than that which we were visited with, while we were under a Revenue Tariff—and a very moderate one—and that country was enjoying all the blessings of a high protective system. The degree of depression from which that country suffered, was more intense, more widespread, and much greater than that which we experienced in Canada. We had by no means as large a proportion of laborers out of employment. We had by no means as large a proportion of industrial establishments lying idle; and the returns from the investment of capital in Canada were much greater during that period than was the case in the United States, and in every respect, in drawing a contrast between the condition of this country and of the United States, during the depression from 1874 to 1878—the one under the operation of a Revenue Tariff system, and the other under a high protective system—is very much in favor of Canada. The depression was less here, and was due not to causes which arose in Canada, but to causes which arose in the United States. The depression here resulted from the depression which commenced in the United States, a highly protected country; and but for that depression there the depression in Canada would have been by no means as severe as it was; and again, Sir, when we had changed our fiscal system, and adopted a protective policy, as we did in 1879, the revival of business had begun in that country before this policy was adopted. The resumption of specie payments in the United States on the 1st of January, 1879, and other causes, tended to produce there a revival in trade, and to bring about that change here, which is falsely attributed to the National Policy. The degree of prosperity which has existed in Canada since the adoption of the National Policy, has been by no means greater than the prosperity which has existed in this country during other cycles of prosperity; and at other periods in Canada, when we were under a Revenue Tariff, and a low Revenue Tariff, the degree of prosperity enjoyed by this country was greater than it is to-day; and, if prosperity could so exist under a Revenue Tariff, it is certainly absurd to attribute to the existence of this policy to-day, the effects which we have perceived. Well, Sir, what has produced this prosperity? If it is not due to the Tariff, as it cannot be, to what is it due? Well, Sir, I think that the main and principal cause of this revival of prosperity can be very easily pointed out. We all know, Sir, the effect on a country situated like Canada, of an abundant harvest, and we all know, Sir, as well, the effects produced on a country situated as this is, of a failure in the harvest. A failure in the harvest produces disaster and commercial stringency, and must necessarily do so; and it will do so in spite of any fiscal system which may be in force from time to time. On the contrary, Sir, an abundant harvest will set in motion the machinery of trade, and will give to the country larger means, a larger surplus and an increase in the wealth of the country. Now, Sir, if an abundant harvest comes you will necessarily have prosperity; and if a series of abundant harvests comes you will have great prosperity; and if these series of abundant harvests come in conjunction with the failure of harvests abroad, making an unusual demand for the products of our soil, and a demand at an unusual price, the result on the business and prosperity of the country can be easily understood. Then, Sir, the first and the primary cause of the revival of prosperity in Canada was abundant harvests—not one, but a series of abundant harvests—greatly augmenting our exports, which were sold at high prices in consequence of the unusual demand abroad, which was the result of the failure of the harvests in England, not in one year merely, but during two successive years. This, then, Sir, is the first and primary cause of the revival of the prosperity in Canada. Then there is another cause which had something to do with it. Commercial depressions, Sir, are brought about, to a certain extent at least, by extravagance, and the natural result of this, after a few years, is to cause a revulsion; and then we have a panic. What is the corrective of the panic? Why, the people commence to retrench and practice economy; and from this process which follows extravagance and over-trading, in due time a period of prosperity comes. Now, Sir, while one of the primary causes of prosperity was due to the economy and frugality practiced by the people of Canada during those lean years, from 1874 to 1878, when we were suffering from the effects of commercial depression, there is another cause which added somewhat to our prosperity. We were opening up the great region of the North-West; and this caused a very large amount of capital to flow into this country. There were then these three causes: the increase of our harvest exports; the effect of the economy practiced during previous years, and the influx of a vast amount of capital into Canada, which satisfactorily accounts, in my opinion, for the change in times which we have witnessed; and which I am glad to say we have witnessed during the last three or four years. Now, Sir, let us enquire for a moment what is the real character of this Tariff, of this policy which is lauded, by our hon. friends on the opposite side of the House, as the cause of our prosperity. It is not as bad a Tariff as are some Tariffs. It is not as bad a Tariff as is the Tariff of the United States. It might fairly be called, in some respects, a moderately Protective Tariff. I do not say it is in all respects a very bad measure; but it has certainly very bad features. Now, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend from West Durham were at the head of the Government, he would find, I have no doubt, that in dealing with this question, he would have to have a due regard for the interests which have grown up under this Tariff.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLETON. The hon. gentleman opposite says, "hear, hear;" but the hon. member from West Durham (Mr. Blake), no doubt, would avoid rash and inconsiderate action in this matter; he would avoid anything which would entail ruin upon any great interest of this country; and if he did not do that he would act unwisely, and would not act in the interests of the country. But I think I can assure hon. gentlemen on the opposite side that there are some things he would do without delay. I think he would remove the duties from the raw material. I think he would give the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces free cornmeal and free flour. I think, Sir, that he would give the manufacturers of Ontario, and other parts of the Dominion, free coal; and I have no doubt that he would scorn to deceive the farmers by giving to them any such Protection as is given to them in the matter of wool. If he were to give Protection on wool he would put the tax upon such wool as is imported into the country. But, under the operation of the kind of Protection given by the hon. gentleman opposite, we imported, last year, 9,646,000 lbs. of free wool, and only 36,000 lbs. of dutiable wool; in other words, for every 300 lbs. of wool we imported into the country we imported 1 lb. which paid a duty, and 299 lbs., which came in free. I repeat that this is a kind of Protection which my hon. friend from West Durham would scorn to give to the farmers. The hon. Minister tells us, in his speech, that he felt a difficulty about the duty on iron. I have no doubt he did. I have no doubt he has felt a difficulty about the duty on steel, as well as upon various other articles. If he is a man of sympathetic nature he must have felt a difficulty about the duty on cornmeal and coal; and I have no doubt he has felt immense difficulty, and has stifled his convictions in meeting the requirements of those who come to him, as he tells us, to make representations to him. The character of the Tariff could be changed in these essential particulars at all events. The duties might be taken off the raw materials, and there might be a reduction of the duty in order to bring down the revenue yielded by that Tariff within the limits of the requirements of the country. Will the hon. gentleman tell us that the great mass of the people of Canada are benefited by this Tariff? Is it the great mass of the people which have sent deputations down here from time to time, and visited him in his office in the Eastern Block, and made those representations which have resulted in the changes which are made in the Tariff, Session after Session? Do these representations come from the lumbermen of Canada, from the fishermen of Canada, from the laborers of Canada, from the farmers of Canada? No, Sir, they come from interests that desire to secure, and do secure, benefits from this Tariff. They come from a very small proportion of the mass of the population of this great country; and while I do not deny that this Tariff confers benefits upon some, I assert that while it does so, it inflicts grave injury on the majority of the people of Canada. Last year the hon. gentleman boasted—I notice that he did not indulge in the same strain this year—about the increase in the industries of this country. I do not know why he was silent in that respect this year, but his silence was rather ominous. Last year he informed us that this Tariff had been the means of creating new industries which employed no less than 7,035 hands; and he had the hardihood to claim that the increased operations of old industries which had resulted in increasing the number of hands employed by 17,000, was due to the operation of this Tariff. How absurd! Industries which were created under a Revenue Tariff were obliged, during a period of depression, to curtail their operations, and because, forsooth, they commenced on the old scale of operations which existed under a Revenue Tariff, when the good times came again, the hon. gentleman claimed that that increase was due to his Tariff. And even when we came to criticise his claim that 7,035 hands had found employment in new industries in consequence of his Tariff, we found in place of their being 7,035 we had to reduce the amount by something like three-fifths, and instead of their being 7,000 hands employed in those concerns, there were only about 3,000. However, Sir, the National Policy will have a fair trial. We desire that it should have a fair trial. The people desire that it should have a fair trial, and they have so decided; and in all human probability, for another five years at any rate, that policy will be the policy of this country. The hon. Minister tells us that we are to have seven years of prosperity. I trust we may have seventy times seven; and I have no doubt that if the conditions are observed which the hon. Minister attached to his promise of seven years prosperity, we may have seventy times seven. What were the conditions? He said we should have seven years prosperity; and, after a pause, he said if we only avoided over-trading, if we avoided reckless extravagance, if we avoided bad harvests, if we avoided low prices, if we avoided, in short, all causes that produce stringency and hard times, we would not have hard times, but seven years prosperity; and I have no doubt we would. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in the experience he has acquired as the constructor of Tariffs, has, doubtless, learned one truth—and I would ask the hon. gentleman if it is not so. I have no doubt he has learned that in arranging the details of a Protective Tariff, he finds that he has to meet and contend with the strugglings of conflicting selfish interests. I have no doubt he finds that this interest wants this thing, and that interest that thing—that each interest wants to promote its own selfish end at the expense of everybody else; and in arranging the details of his measure, he has to compromise between one interest and another; and in doing so he presents us with a Tariff, which, as he tells us himself, is not strictly scientific, but which is to a certain degree an experiment, and which seems destined to be a continued experiment, judging by the number of changes that are made from year to year. This effect of selfish conflicting interests—this grafting upon the Tariff branches incongruous and absurd, is well exemplified by the changes which were made in the last American Tariff. Though professedly a Protective Tariff the duty upon iron has been reduced 30 to 40 per cent.; but while doing that the owners of iron ore have succeeded in getting the duty upon ore increased 50 per cent., so that while the Protection is reduced the price of the raw material has been increased. Now, if we were at liberty to choose our own ground in the discussion of public questions we should pronounce this one of the Tariff to be a minor issue. I believe we have questions before the people of Canada to-day that are of far greater importance than the question of whether we shall pay 3 or 5 per cent., more or less, on our average importations. I believe the land policy of this Government is a policy of far greater moment to the people of Canada. It is a policy which will have more influence on the future of this country than anything connected with its fiscal policy. I believe, Sir, that a judicious land policy, calculated to promote the settlement of the North-West, and to lead to the rapid development of the resources of this country, is a matter vastly more important to us than the question we are discussing to-day. I believe that the railway policy of this country, that we discussed two years ago, was a matter fraught with greater consequences to Canada than this question. I believe the question of Provincial rights, the question of the preservation of the constitutional guarantees, under which the Provinces of the Dominion exercise their right of local self government, is of far greater consequence to the Dominion of Canada than this question. I believe that in the case of one of the Provinces, at any rate, the questions of whether that Province shall be shorn of half its territory, is a matter of vastly more importance to that Province than the question of a Protective vs. a Revenue Tariff. But as the National Policy is forced into the foreground by hon. gentlemen opposite, we are, of course, compelled to meet them on their own ground, and to discuss this question which they choose to make the leading issue in our political contests and in our discussions here. In discussing this question I shall, first of all, direct myself to the consideration of the enquiry, has the ratio of the manufacturing development of this country, under this policy, been greater than it was under the policy preceding it? I will ask the hon. Finance Minister whether the manufacturing interests of Canada owe their existence to the National Policy; and if he fails to answer I will take the liberty of saying that they do not. I will take the liberty of pointing out that before the National Policy was inaugurated, the manufacturing interests of Canada had attained a very high degree of development under the operation of a strictly Revenue Tariff. According to the Census Returns of 1871, we produced in that year over $200,000,000 worth of manufactures, and employed 187,000 operatives. The development of our manufacturing industries continued to be rapid in the years succeeding the Census of 1871. It is certain that during the period of depression, from 1874 to 1878, our manufacturing industries were in a stronger position than those of the United States with their high protective duties; that a greater number, proportionately, of new manufacturing establishments were erected in this country than in the adjoining Republic; and, Sir, if we had the Census statistics of 1881—and I hope we may have them sometime during this generation—and were able to institute a comparison between the amount of manufactures produced in 1871 and 1882, I venture the prediction that it would be found that the progress of the manufacturing industries of Canada had been satisfactory, had been healthy, had been rapid under the operation of a Revenue Tariff. I have something here from my hon. friend from Cardwell, which points out clearly and forcibly a truth to which I have now much pleasure in calling the attention of the House—the truth that a moderate duty imposed for revenue purposes is an ample protective duty for any manufactured product suitable to this country. The hon. gentleman told the Montreal Board of Trade, in a speech delivered in 1873, that a 15 per cent. Tariff means more than 15 per cent. of Protection to manufacturers. He said:

“There is the cost of the transportation of the goods from the other side of the water, which amounts, on an average, to at least 5 per cent., so that there is now a Protection equal to 20 per cent. That ought to be sufficient for any industry suitable to the country, and as for others, it would not be wise to support them by fiscal props.”

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. member for West Middlesex assured me that I was entirely wrong in my view, because he said that the price of sugar from New York was the same as the price from Montreal.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What I did say was, that New York was as easy a distributing point for Manitoba, Ontario, and the Maritime Provinces, as Montreal.

Mr. CHARLTON. The point raised by the hon. member for Cardwell was that the cost of transportation from Great Britain was equal to 5 per cent., and that consequently a duty of 15 per cent. upon goods imported from Great Britain was equal to 20 per cent. of Protection, and he very properly claimed that that amount of Protection was sufficient for any industry suitable to this country.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). So it was then.

Mr. CHARLTON. If that is the case, a duty of 20 per cent. is equivalent to 25 per cent., and a duty of 22½ per cent. is equivalent to 27½ per cent. of Protection. No man claims that we could in the present condition of our expenditure, go back to a Tariff of 15 per cent., or even of 20 per cent. It is my opinion that it would be necessary, under any circumstances, to impose for revenue purposes a Tariff of 22½ per cent., which, according to the hon. member for Cardwell, would be 7½ per cent. more of Protection than any industry suitable to this country requires. Well, Sir, let us suppose, at the time this policy was inaugurated, when the change came from bad harvests to good harvests, and from stringent times to prosperity, that the Tariff imposed a duty of 20 per cent. Does any man imagine that under that state of things, with rising prosperity, there would not have been an increase in the manufacturing industries of this country? Does any man suppose that the same causes which led to increased prosperity in our manufacturing industries would not have produced the same results under a Revenue Tariff of 20 per cent.? Will any man say that there would not have been a large increase in the production of manufactures in this country, that there would not have been new factories called into existence, and that the number of employés engaged in manufacturing would not have multiplied? Reasoning from the experience of the past, we are warranted in asserting that such would have been the result. I do not say that the increase would have been as great as it has been under the present system, I am quite willing to admit that it would not have been as great in particular lines, which are protected to such an extent that dividends of from 50 to 75 per cent. are possible. The profits of the cotton and woollen industries, would not, probably, have been so great, and I suppose the Redpaths would have been deprived of a few hundred thousand dollars of their gains; but I am satisfied that nearly all our manufacturing industries, besides the three I have named, would have been in a better position under a Revenue Tariff than they are under that which the hon. Finance Minister gave to this country in 1879. I would ask the hon. member whether he is prepared to assert that this Tariff of his has given to Canadian manufacturers a greater control over their own markets than they had under the previous system of a Revenue Tariff. The hon. gentleman does not seem disposed to answer.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will answer by-and-bye.

Mr. CHARLTON. I now assert that the result of the policy has not been to give to the manufacturing interests of this country a greater control of our home market than they possessed prior to the inauguration of this policy. I take the ground that this policy has not resulted in curtailing the importation of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada, and I will quote tables to sustain that assertion. In fact the hon. gentleman himself, in the course of his remarks the other day, practically admitted this—I do not know but that he did admit it in so many words, for he went on to tell us that importations to a large extent were all right if we had the means to buy. He thus gave the whole case away. Certainly it is not right to buy when we have not the means; but if it is proper and judicious to buy when we have the means, is it not wrong to impede this proper and judicious purchasing by throwing obstacles in our way, and preventing us from using, to the best advantage, the means we have to purchase with? It seems, however, that even the attempt made in this direction has been futile. I am about to make use of a few figures. I wish it were possible to present this financial question in the form of an allegory or parable. If the hon. gentleman himself will make his financial statement in the form of an epic poem, it, no doubt, would be more interesting, but financial matters are matters of figures. We can only express the results that we deal with by means of figures, and I shall use them as sparingly as possible. With reference to the assertion I made that the National Policy has not resulted in giving to our manufacturers greater control of our own markets, I wish to call attention to the fact: first, with regard to the importation of cotton, woollens, iron and steel; and, second, with regard to the importation of all goods susceptible of production in Canada, that there was a rapid diminution in the importation of these, under the Revenue Tariff, from 1874 to 1879, and a rapid advance in their importation during the subsequent period. These tables have been compiled from the Trade and Navigation Returns, and are the result of considerable labor. The classification may not be strictly accurate, but, for the purpose of comparison, the tables are accurate, because whatever article is named in one year is named in all the years. I find that the importation of cottons and woollens, and the manufactures of iron and steel, in 1874, were $34,435,000; and that the importation of goods of the same class, four years later, in 1878, had fallen to $24,271,000—this under the operation of a Revenue Tariff. I find that the importation of the same goods, in 1879, had fallen to $21,762,000. Then the National Policy was inaugurated. Did the falling off continue? If the National Policy was efficient in the direction promised by its promoters, if its result was diminished importation of goods susceptible of production in this country, the importation of iron, steel, woollens and cottons must have continued to decrease; but if the National Policy did not operate as hon. gentlemen opposite promised it would? Let us see the result. In 1881, the importation of these articles had risen from $21,762,000, in 1879, to $31,466,000; in 1882 it had risen to $33,170,000. When we come to analyze these returns what do we find? We find that the decrease from 1874 to 1878 was $10,164,000, or 29 per cent.; and that from 1874 to 1879 it was $12,673,000, or 36 per cent. Then this policy comes into operation, that is to diminish the importation of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada. What do we find? We find that from 1879 to 1881 there is an increase in those goods of $9,704,000, or equal to 44 per cent.; and from 1879 to 1881 an increase of $11,408,000, or 52 per cent. Thus the policy had not the result its promoters expected. It did not prove effective in keeping out of this country goods that could be manufactured here and largely promoting their manufacture. If we take the total importation of the manufactures susceptible of production in Canada, we will find results still more striking. In 1874, we imported of this class of goods $68,959,000; in 1877, this importation had fallen to $42,820,000; in 1878, it was $41,588,000; and, in 1879, $39,599,000. Then began the operation of this policy which was to put an end, to a large extent, at least, to the importation of these goods. What do we find? Had we Canada for the Canadians? Were these goods banished from the country? Were these importations diminished? Were the goods formerly imported from the United States and England produced here, and did a great falling off in the volume of importations follow? Nothing of the kind. We find that, in 1881, the importation had risen to $59,000,000 from $39,500,000 in 1879; and, in 1882, it had risen to $69,642,000. When we come to analyze these figures, we find that the decrease in the importation of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada, from 1874 to 1877, was $26,139,000, or 38 per cent.; that the decrease from 1874 to 1878 was $24,371,000 or 35 per cent.; and that from 1874 to 1879 it was $29,360,000, or 40 per cent. These were the decreases under the operation of the Revenue Tariff which these hon. gentlemen tell us was not conducive to the interests of our manufactures. Then the policy is changed, and what do we find? Do we find that these decreases are augmented? No; we find nothing of the kind. We find that, from 1877 to 1881, there was an increase in the importation of goods, susceptible of manufacture in Canada, of $14,106,000 or 31 per cent.; that from 1877 to 1882 there was an increase of $25,000,000, equal to 56 per cent.; that from 1878 to 1882 the increase was $19,000,000, or 45 per cent.; from 1879 to 1882 the increase was $30,000,000, or an increase of 73 per cent. between the years 1879 and 1882 in the importation of goods into Canada, that were susceptible of manufacture in this country; goods that that policy, forsooth, was inaugurated for the purpose of excluding from this country! Is not that a brilliant specimen of success? An increase of 73 per cent. between 1879 and 1882 in the goods that were to be excluded from this country by the operation of that Tariff! I must congratulate the hon. Finance Minister on his success. Then, what are the plain deductions? The plain deductions from these figures are: that the importation of manufactures is not diminishing; that, on the contrary, it is rapidly increasing, and that the manufacturers do not control our own markets any better than they did under a Revenue Tariff; nor indeed do they control it as well. And in addition to these facts, the prices of these goods have been greatly increased to the consumers of Canada by the imposition of the additional duty. The hon. Minister made a statement with regard to the balance of trade. The subject has already been alluded to by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). However, I think neither of these hon. gentlemen quoted the words of the hon. Finance Minister with reference to this matter of the balance of trade in 1879. The hon. Finance Minister said, the other night, that the average annual amount of balance of trade against this country during the administration of the hon. member for East York, was $15,000,000, and that the average balance of trade against the country during the time that he has presided over the finances of Canada, was $8,333,000. He forgot, however, to inform the House that this balance was created within the last two years. He forgot to inform the House that the balance of trade last year was, in round numbers, some $8,000,000, and that this year it had gone up to $22,600,000; or, if we deduct the estimated amount of exports from the inland ports, called short returns, which is merely guess work, then we have a balance of trade against the country last year of $18,511,000. When we strike an average for the entire period of four years, the statement of the case is somewhat misleading, for nearly the entire balance has accumulated in the last two years. Now, the hon. gentleman says we believe in an adverse balance of trade. Sir, we have never said anything of the kind. The position taken by the Liberal members of this House is that an adverse balance of trade is not an indication that the country is going to the bad, or that the country is running in debt. We have asserted that a nominal adverse balance of trade might not indicate the real state of matters, that the profits on the exports, that the earnings of our vessels in carrying these cargoes to Europe, and the cargoes exchanged for them would come back to Canada—that these various items of revenue might more than counterbalance the apparent balance of trade. We have always asserted that the laws of supply and demand would regulate these matters without the interference of a Finance Minister or a Government; that people would buy what they had the means to pay for—and if the sum exceeded by some small amount that limit in one year they would curtail enough in the next year to equalize matters. But the hon. Minister himself has held in the past that a balance of trade against the country was a dangerous thing. He warned this country when a balance of trade existed against it, and when the affairs of this country were presided over by my hon. friend from East York, that this was a ruinous condition of things; that it was a condition of things that it was high time to have rectified. In 1879 he said, in his Budget Speech:

"There are other difficulties. The volume of imports has not much diminished. Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. I look upon large imports ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against us, as one of the causes of the trouble with which we now have to contend, one of the difficulties that is our duty to remedy. Imports have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought still further to be diminished. It appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world."

Well, Sir, if that was sound political economy, if the position of the hon. gentleman on this matter was a tenable position, I implore him to turn his attention to that subject now, and to see that when another year comes round, our Trade and Navigation Returns shall not indicate a balance of trade against the country of \$18,500,000 in round numbers. Now, Sir, I have a few words to say as to the burdens that are imposed upon us as a people. First of all, I will refer to the increase in the duties levied. In 1878, the average rate of duties upon dutiable goods imported was  $21\frac{4}{5}$  per cent.; the average rate of duties upon all importations was  $14\frac{1}{5}$  per cent. In 1881-82 the average rate of duties upon dutiable goods was  $25\frac{3}{5}$  per cent.; the average rate of duty upon all goods imported was  $19\frac{3}{5}$  per cent., if I am correct in the calculations I have made, this indicates an increase in the taxes imposed upon the people of this country through the operation of the Tariff of 38 per cent.; and the revenue collected by the Government to day is 38 per cent. greater than it was under the Tariff that preceded the one now in force. Last year we paid \$21,708,000 in duties. At first sight, one would say that this represents the increased cost to the consumers of Canada of the goods that we imported; that in consequence of the imposition of these duties the people paid \$21,708,000 more for their goods than they would otherwise. But the case is worse than that.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The duties levied upon these goods, are as a matter of course added to their cost; it is an item in the cost of the goods. An importer importing $1,000 worth of goods that pay 35 per cent., adds that 35 per cent. to the cost, and the added cost of the goods stands at $1,350 in place of $1,000. When he proceeds to calculate his profits on these goods, he puts so much per cent. upon the entire amount of $1,350. We will suppose that the wholesale dealers' profit is 15 per cent. The importations into this country having cost $21,708,000 for duty in excess to the first cost of the importations. The wholesale dealer proceeds to assess his profit of 15 per cent. upon the original cost of the goods, and $21,708,000 as well, and these goods are sold to the retail merchants at $3,255,000 more, in consequence of the imposition of that duty. The retail dealer proceeds to assess his profit of say 25 per cent. He calculates this upon the original amount of duty plus the wholesale dealers' profit being $24,963,000, and the profit of 25 per cent. on this sum amounts to $6,240,000, making the goods cost the consumer $31,203,000 in excess of the sum they would have cost had no duties been imposed. So there is an increase of $10,000,000 in cost to the consumers in consequence of the imposition of the duty, beside and beyond the amount of duty collected by the Government. Then there is the enhanced cost of what we may term domestic manufactures, or the goods produced in this country. The agricultural implement manufacturer, in producing his implements, pays duties on coal and iron and various other articles. The cost of the article to the consumer is enhanced by the duty upon raw material. The cotton manufacturer charges almost up to the limit of the duty in addition to the cost of the article to the importer. Thus the goods of the country are enhanced in cost and in price through the operation of this system. In the United States the best authorities estimate that the people of the Republic pay $5 in the enhanced cost of domestic goods for every $3 that are paid into the coffers of the Government in the shape of duty. But we will take a much more moderate estimate than the proportion of five to three, and we will estimate that the cost of goods produced in Canada is enhanced to the extent of the duty imposed on importations, and that is certainly a very moderate estimate. And what is the result? The result is that the people of this country are paying, in duties and extra profits based on duties, $31,000,000 a year, and indirectly, in the enhanced cost of the goods produced in this country, $31,000,000 more. They are paying, directly and indirectly, in consequence of the operation of the policy, $62,000,000 a year, or $14 per head. These figures cannot be controverted; such is a reasonable statement, a statement showing the truth with respect to the direct and indirect burdens imposed on the people in consequence of the operation of this policy. Now a Revenue Tariff, would impose millions of dollars less; a Revenue Tariff, properly adjusted, would raise a revenue sufficient to meet the expenditure of the country without storing up a surplus of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000; a Revenue Tariff would remove the duties on raw materials, and to that extent cheapen the production of goods, for which that raw material is used in this country; a Revenue Tariff would impose millions of taxation less, and would raise millions less of revenue, and, at the same time, as I have stated, it would prove as efficient a Protective Tariff as the Tariff now in operation, and I have the authority of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) in making that assertion. What do we get for all this extra taxation? We do not get reduced importation of goods susceptible of being manufactured here; we do not get cheaper goods; and while we may benefit a few monopolies and a few cliques, we do not benefit the agriculturist, the lumberman, the fisherman, the laborer; we do not benefit one man for every eight hundred injured by the operations of this policy. And why then, it may be asked, have we prospered? I made a remark in regard to that point before, and I intend to go more fully into a demonstration of why we have prospered. I intend to lay before this House the exact reasons why we have prospered; I intend to adduce reasons which cannot be controverted, ample and sufficient, to account for all the increased prosperity which the country has enjoyed since 1878. I will not make a comparison between one particular year and another. I will not lay myself open to the charge of having made figures lie, or of having cooked accounts; but I will make a comparison in such a way that no man can challenge its fairness. I will make the comparison in such a way that every hon. member who listens to me will be at least compelled to say that the mode of comparison is a fair one—I take the entire period of the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) and the entire period subsequent to his Administration. I take these two periods, and take the exports of the one period and compare them with the exports of the other—not of a year when, on the one hand, we happened to have an exceedingly good harvest, and not a year when, on the other hand, we happened to have an exceptionally bad harvest; but I take the two periods, one of five years and the other of four years and a-half, and institute a comparison between them. I make these comparisons, not upon the statements published in the Trade and Navigation Returns of the amounts entered for consumption, and of the exports of goods produced in Canada, because such comparisons are not reliable; but, in order to arrive, for instance, at our exports of breadstuffs, I take our total exports and deduct our total imports, and the result shows accurately the net exports of Canada. Proceeding upon this basis what do we find? I take the period of five years, from 1874 to 1878. The net exports of breadstuffs for that period was of the value of $49,592,000. I compare that—and I am enabled to do so through the courtesy of the hon. Minister of Customs who very kindly caused to be prepared a statement of the exports for the six months ending 31st December last—with the subsequent period of four and a-half years, ending 31st December, and I find the net exports of breadstuffs during that period was of the value of $75,111,000, or a gross excess of $25,519,000 for the period of four and a-half years as compared with the preceding five years. The comparison shows that the average annual export for the first period was $9,918,000, that the average annual export for the second period was $16,691,000; that the annual average excess of exports of breadstuffs in the second period as compared with the first was $6,773,000; that the percentage of increase in the annual exports during the second period as compared with the first was equal to 68 per cent. Will it be denied that this excess produced no effect, that the swelling of the exports of breadstuffs to the extent of 68 per cent. had no influence on the prosperity and business of the country? Hon. gentlemen cannot thus argue. Let us take next butter and cheese. The exports of butter and cheese in the period of 1874 to 1878 inclusive, were of the articles value of $31,860,000. The exports of the same during the four and a-half years, ending 31st December last, was of the value of $36,882,000. And the annual average for the first period was $6,372,000, and for the second period $8,196,000; the annual average for the second over the first period was $1,824,000 per annum, and the annual percentage of increase was 28 per cent. Let us take animals and their produce, the produce of Canada. The exports from 1874 to 1878 amounted to $69,137,000, the exports from 1879 to 1882 amounted to $73,523,000 an annual average for the first period of $13,827,000, and for the second period of $18,380,000. The annual average excess of the second over the first period was $4,553,000, and the annual percentage of gain was 32 per cent. Now, Sir, these figures may not be very pleasant to listen to, and I have no doubt that they fail to have the fascination for listeners as a novel, but they tell a story and point to facts; and when I get through with these figures I will have explained to the House and country why we have had increased prosperity; and for that reason, although the figures may be dry, I ask the House to bear with me a little further while I lay bare the causes of the prosperity which fortunately exists, and I have not the slightest disposition to deny that we do enjoy it. Let us take next, Sir, the five articles in the list of agricultural products. Having taken up grain and breadstuffs, I will go through with the balance of the list, excepting a few insignificant articles, such as bran, flax-seed, and roots. I will take up malt, hay, hops, green fruit, and potatoes. The exports of these articles, the produce of Canada, from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, for five years, was $5,248,000; and for the four and a-half subsequent years, ending the 31st of December last, $14,700,000. The annual average export for the first period was $1,050,000, and for the second period $3,266,000; the average annual excess of the second over the first was $2,216,000, and the annual percentage of increase was 41 per cent. Let us next take the fisheries. The exports of the products of the fisheries from 1874 to 1878, was $26,671,000, for five years; and from 1879 to 1882, four years, $28,588,000; the annual average for the first entire period was $5,337,000, and for the second period $7,139,000; the average annual excess of the second over the first period, was $1,802,000, and the average annual percentage of increase was 33 per cent. These then, Sir, are the four great classes of exports, the increase of which, in my estimation, accounts for the increased prosperity of the country. Let us summarize them. In these articles, Sir, the total average annual export for the first period of five years, was $30,132,000, and for the second period, $45,476,000; the total average annual excess of the second, compared with the first period, was $15,344,000; composed of $5,073,000 in breadstuffs, $1,553,000 in animals and their products, $2,216,000 in malt, hay, hops, potatoes and green fruits, and $1,802,000 in products of the fisheries, making a total of $15,554,000 or an average annual gain of 50 per cent. What gain does that represent in four years? It represents the increased export of the country, and the gain in the purchasing power of the country of $61,376,000. There has been no material change, Sir, in the exports of the mine and of the forest, counting in the last half-yearly returns, and our improved condition financially is due entirely to the increase of some $62,000,000 in the exports of the products with which I have been dealing. Here then, Sir,—is the secret of our increased prosperity. It is not due to the increased taxation which the country has been called upon to endure. It is not due, Sir, to the extravagant expenditures of this country, which while they may enrich some, impoverish the masses. It is not, that so many additional dollars of expenditure have been imposed on every man, woman and child in Canada in direct and indirect taxation; but it is because our exports have swollen to the extent of $15,344,000 in each and every year. It is, Sir, because the purchasing power of the people of this country, through this augmentation in the exports, has been increased to the extent of $3.50 for every man, woman and child in Canada for each and every year during the period that my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Finance has presided over his Department. Well, in view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, is it not somewhat ridiculous for my hon. friend to claim to be the author of this prosperity. Is it not somewhat ridiculous, Sir, that he should claim that the policy which he inaugurated in 1879, and which simply amounts to additional taxation, and the imposition of additional burdens, should be the policy which has given us this increased prosperity? Why, Sir, this reminds me of a story which I was reading, last Sabbath. An old Jewish king—his name was Jeroboam, the son of Nebat—I know it is rather unusual to say anything about the Scriptures here, but this happens to be apropos—

Mr. BOWELL. A quotation from Shakespeare would suit you better.

Mr. CHARLTON. This king of the ten tribes thought it necessary to keep the children of Israel from going up to Jerusalem to worship the God of their fathers, and so he set up a couple of golden calves, and, like my friend the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. First Minister, who point to themselves—he pointed to these calves, and said—as they say: “Behold your Gods, O Israel;” but they are not the gods which are the authors of this prosperity, but they are the men who came into power at a fortunate juncture, when the tide was turning and the dawning prosperity of the United States and of other countries resulted in prosperity here. They put into operation a Tariff which happened to be contemporaneous with this prosperity, and claim, forsooth, that a measure imposing additional burdens on the people is the cause of this prosperity which comes, not from them, but from a higher power.

Mr. HESSON. The gods went back on you and your policy in 1878, in the verdict of last June.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who are these gods? Does my hon. friend believe in the maxim, vox populi, vox dei? Is there no higher power than this poor humanity in the Dominion of Canada? No; the gods did not go back on us, because, Mr. Speaker, I fear that the God of gods concluded he would give to Canada the drunkenness of prosperity, and allow us to go on in our own course, until finally He will show us that the overweening confidence in our own wisdom, in which we seem to trust so much, is a poor reliance at the last. Well, Sir, the results then of this policy are a decrease in our exports of manufactured articles, and under that head I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, and to make a comparison again between the entire period between the two Governments. The exports of manufactures from 1874 to 1878 amounted to $20,017,000; the annual average was $4,003,000; the export for the four years, from 1879 to 1882, amounted to $16,070,000; and the annual average was $4,005,000—this is not a bad showing—and when we come to make a comparison between the three last years under the régime of my hon. friend the member for East York, and the period subsequent to that, we will find that the comparison is not quite so favorable to my hon. friends on the opposite side. We will find, Sir, that the exports of manufactures in the period from 1874 to 1875 rapidly increased from year to year, that while the average export was $4,003,000, the average export of the last three years was $5,123,000, or $1,118,000 per annum greater than the export in the period subsequent to that time; consequently, as I said before, our importation of manufactures is increasing, our exportation of manufactures is decreasing, and, Sir, our export of food products has increased. Protection, I say, therefore, does not protect. The fact I am trying to impress upon the House has been discovered long ago by political economists, that the great mass of the manufactures of the country are just as prosperous under a Revenue Tariff as under a protective system. If we take the United States, we find that the importation of woollens, cottons, iron, steel, linen and flax manufactures and silks, upon every one of which a very high protective duty has been imposed, has rapidly increased in recent years. Without troubling the House with a detailed statement of the importation of each of these articles, I will say that while woollens are protected by a duty of 61 per cent., cotton by a duty of 39 per cent., iron and steel by a duty of 45 per cent., linen goods by a duty of 35 per cent., and silks by a duty of 59 per cent., the importations of goods of these five classes had increased from $95,808,000 in 1877, to $203,000,000 in 1882, or an increase of $107,000,000 in 1882 as compared with 1877; in other words, an increase of 112 per cent. Here again is illustrated the truth that I have laid before this House, that a Protective Tariff does not diminish the importation of goods susceptible of production in a country, for the imposition of enormous duties on these articles in the United States has resulted in an increased importation to the extent of 112 per cent. in these five years, and that in a country where the utmost efforts have been made to secure the exclusion of foreign goods through the operation of protective duties which were intended to be almost prohibitory. And has the American farmer succeeded any better than the Canadian farmer in securing the home market which was promised as the result of this protective system? On the contrary, while the process of increasing the importation of the goods of foreign manufacturers has been going on, the American farmer has been driven further and further away from the realization of his hopes that he might have a home market which would absorb the productions of the soil of that country. Year by year the exportation of the products of the soil of the United States has gone on increasing instead of diminishing, and year by year the hopes of the farmers of that country that through the operations of this Tariff, which was wringing from them hundreds of millions of dollars a year, they would be able to secure the home market has been proved to be delusive. I am sorry that the hon. Finance Minister has left his seat for I wanted to ask him a question. I see, however, that the hon. Minister of Railways is in his place, and he, too, is an authority on this subject. The question I desired to ask was this: whether the change in the Tariff—the increase of duties—was necessary for the purpose of meeting the wants of our revenue? I recollect very distinctly an occasion when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, in his place in the House, asserted very positively that there was no choice between the adoption of this policy and a resort to direct taxation. I wish to ask him, to-day, whether he is still of the same opinion, that the revenue wants of the country imperatively demanded a change. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is evidently non committal on that subject, and while he is considering it I will proceed to show that the change was unnecessary even for the purpose of securing the revenue we desired. Our revenue from Customs, in 1878, was $12,795,000, and it was inadequate. We were then laboring under depression. The importation of goods was very light, prices were low, and under an ad valorem duty they did not yield a great revenue. We should have placed those duties on a scale that would have given us a proper revenue; 20 per cent. would have done it, but we did not do it. Last year we collected, from Customs, $21,581,000 according to our Public Accounts. Now, that was an increase of 68½ per cent. in the period between 1878 and 1882 in the revenue derived from the Customs. We are able by comparison to show pretty conclusively what would probably have been the ratio of increase without a change of the Tariff, because we have a country lying alongside of us which did not change its Tariff during that period—which made no change of Tariff between 1861 and 1882; and if we take the revenue of that country in 1878, and its revenue in 1882, and see what the increase is, we will be able to arrive with tolerable accuracy at the knowledge we desire as to what the probable percentage of increase of duty would have been in consequence of the improvement of the times, and not as the result of any change in the Tariff. In 1878, the United States derived, from Customs, a revenue of $138,000,000. In 1882, they derived, from Customs, a revenue of $220,400,000. Mark, Sir, that there had been no change in the Tariff; that this increase was entirely due to better times—it was entirely due to that prosperity which came to the country from causes entirely aside from and beyond the operation of any Tariff. They realized an increase in that period of 67 per cent. in their revenue from Customs without the change of one iota in the Tariff; and we, with a change in the Tariff, realized an increase of duty 1½ per cent. higher than theirs.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There was no increase of taxation then.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was no need of an increase. I affirm that if the Tariff that was in force in 1878 had continued in operation till to-day, when prosperity has returned to this country, it would have met the revenue requirements of the Government upon a proper and economical scale of expenditure. I maintain that if the United States, without any change in the Tariff, realized an increased revenue of 67 per cent., we might at least have expected, without any change of the Tariff, to have realized an increase of revenue nearly as great, because the circumstances of the two countries were almost identical, both being producing countries, both depending largely upon the products of the soil, and both being blessed during that period with abundant harvests. I might go on to draw inferences as to the efficiency of a Protective Tariff in producing the results which it is desired to arrive at from the example of the United States with reference to the operation of a Revenue Tariff on the one hand in that country, and a high Protective Tariff on the other. I might point out that the United States, in the decade from 1860 to 1870, with a Revenue Tariff imposing duties less than we imposed under the Cartwright Tariff, advanced as rapidly in manufacturing as it has since. I might show that the value of property in that country increased during that decade 126 per cent., or nearly three times as much as in any decade since high protective duties were imposed. If we had time, and it was proper to go into these comparisons, I could prove that even the United States, under a Revenue Tariff, was more prosperous, that its manufacturing industries had more solid prosperity than they have had under the system that has prevailed in that country since 1861.

Mr. BLANCHET. Now read your speech of 1876.

Mr. CHARLTON. The ex-Speaker requests me to take a chapter of my speech of 1876. I might say as Fitz James said to Roderick Dhu: "I thank thee, Roderick, for the word." What was the position I took in 1876? Was it in favor of a duty of 35 per cent.? Was it in favor of duties on coal and upon breadstuffs? Was it in favor of a duty higher even than 17½ per cent.?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did I not occupy the position of the hon. member for Cardwell, that I believed in a Protection, not of 15 per cent., as he did, but of 17½ per cent.? Take the speech, read it, and see if you can find any conclusion arrived at in that speech that would warrant the assertion that I advocated a duty of more than 17½ per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will read that speech as a perfect answer to the present.

Mr. CHARLTON. I admit that I believed in a slight increase in the duties; I admit that I thought that they ought to be 20 per cent.; but what I did not favor was such a measure as that which the hon. Finance Minister introduced, and which is on the Statute-book to-day. Now, Sir, I come to the question of Protection to farmers. Of course, this Tariff never could have passed but for the votes of the agriculturists of this country—never could have been secured if they had not been deceived, cruelly deceived, by promises which the hon. gentleman knows have not been kept. He has not even had the hardihood to assert in this House that this Tariff has benefited the agriculturists of this country by enhancing the prices of any goods they have to sell. I think my argument would be incomplete if I did not present to the House the case from the agriculturists stand-point. The farming population of the country, under the operation of this Tariff, are taxed, directly and indirectly, to the extent of $14 a head for every man, woman and child. I do not say that they are taxed that much more than they were under a Revenue Tariff, but I say that that is the burden of taxation imposed upon them, and that it is very much greater than it would be under a Revenue Tariff. If hon. gentlemen opposite had not promised the farmer that the prices of the articles he had to sell would be enhanced in price, they would not have obtained his vote. I am prepared to prove that that promise was false—that the truth is, that while the goods he has to buy are enhanced in price, he has received no advantage in the price of the goods he has to sell. We produce grain for sale; we have a surplus of it; what we want is a free market. The Corn Laws of England, if re-enacted to-day, would be a damage to us; the Corn Laws of the United States are a damage to us; and Corn Laws here can do us no good, because we do not import for consumption, but have a surplus of all the grains we raise. This protective policy has thus far failed to produce a home market. Some speakers on the opposite side seek to surround the question with fog, in order to perplex the farmers. They make presentations of the case which, if not exactly false, are misleading. I was sorry, the other night, to see so respectable a gentleman as the hon. member for Cardwell making a presentation of this case that was entirely misleading. He told us that the home market had increased because the amount of the American grain entered for consumption was now less than formerly. The hon. member for Lincoln told us that in the year 1878 the value of American grain imported into this country for consumption was $14,000,000. Well, Sir, does the hon. gentleman not know that every bushel of grain imported into this country was entered for consumption. The importer entered his grain for consumption, and he had his choice whether to sell that grain in Canada, or export it. Let us see how the total imports compare with the imports for consumption, in two years. In 1877, they were as follows:—

	Total Imports.	Imports for Consumption.
Wheat .....	4,589,000 bush.	4,589,000 bush.
Corn .....	7,387,000 "	7,387,000 "

	Total Imports.	Imports for Consumption.
Wheat .....	5,635,000 bush.	5,635,000 bush.
Corn .....	7,387,000 "	7,387,000 "

Do you see how misleading this comparison is? To-day, the importer, if he enters his grain for consumption, must pay a duty, consequently he only enters what he wants to sell here. But before the imposition of that duty every bushel of grain was entered for consumption; and to make a comparison of this kind is very misleading, and is calculated to deceive those who are interested. In this very year 1877, when there was imported for consumption 4,589,000 bushels of wheat, we exported of that very wheat 4,196,000 bushels, and consumed in this country less than 400,000 bushels. In 1878, when we entered for consumption 7,387,000 bushels of corn, and 5,635,000 bushels of wheat, we exported in value—I have not the amount in bushels—$7,435,000 of American grain. And this is the kind of argument used in the country to mislead the farmers. If that goes to the country uncontradicted, a false impression will be produced, the object of which is to endeavor to induce the farmers to believe that a home market has been created by this Tariff, which is not the case. But the hon. Finance Minister was silent this year upon this question. Last year he had something to say about it. He did not tell us, indeed, that the duty had raised the price of barley to 15 cts. higher than the price in the United States, as the First Minister told the farmers of Strathroy it would. He did not tell us that wheat was raised in price to the extent of the duty, as compared with the prices in the United States market. He was where it would not do to make such an extravagant assertion, even if he had not, as I am sure he has, conscientious scruples. He claimed, I think, that we at that time were deriving a benefit of 3 cts. per bushel, owing to the National Policy, in the price of wheat. I will quote his exact words:

"Ten years ago wheat was sold in the Toronto market 3 cts. higher per bushel than it was sold for in the Chicago market, and it could not have brought these 3 cts. per bushel in excess had it not been for this Tariff."

You will take notice that the freight between those two points is considerably over 3 cts., a fact which exposes at the outset the absurdity of the allegation. Wheat could not have been transported from Chicago to Toronto for four times the difference in price. So that this difference of 3 cts. was not due to the Tariff. The hon. Minister goes on to say:

"The cost of transmission of that particular class of wheat from Chicago to Liverpool via New York, was precisely to a cent what it cost to convey the same description of wheat from Toronto via the Grand Trunk Railway and the Allan steamers to Liverpool."

He does not say anything about any other line. What might be true with reference to the Allan line might not be true with reference to others. He should have been able to say, in order to make his point, that the cost of transportation was the same as by any route, and not designate solely a particular route. The hon. gentleman adds:

"Therefore if it depended simply on the English market, that wheat would have had to go down 3 cents in price per bushel in order to compete with the wheat sent from Chicago. But it brought 3 cents more because as we know—after the harvest is in, and a large portion of it has been shipped to England—the quantity of Canadian grain in the country being diminished, Canadian millers have to pay an increased price for the wheat which they require, and this increase naturally goes into the pockets of our farmers, who reap the benefit. The miller, therefore, has either to go to the United States market and pay the duty, or he has to pay the price which the farmer demands for his grain here; consequently, our farmers, ten days ago, received 3 cents more per bushel for their wheat than they would have obtained had our market been open and exposed to the danger of being broken down by shipments from the other side, which without this duty would have been thrown in here and thus brought into competition with the produce of our own agriculturists."

The hon. gentleman tells us that in consequence of the shipment of grain to Europe, and the diminished supply in Canada, our millers had to pay more for grain. That is, our market was not then governed by European, but by local demand. What we have always contended is that the Tariff would only operate to increase the price, if we imported grain for consumption, if we had a short supply—but under no other circumstances. Clearly, the duty here had no influence upon the price of grain, which was but 3 cts. higher here than in Chicago—not one-fourth the cost of freight. In all other points of Western Ontario, the price was less than in Chicago, and the duty had no effect in that instance, at all. The duty was not necessary to prevent Americans bringing in wheat from Chicago, to sell at Toronto at an advance of 3 cts. on the Chicago price, though the cost of freight was 12 cts., making a net loss of 9 cts. per bushel. The whole statement is an absurd one, and we will dismiss it. Can we prove by quotations that the duty upon grain, during the period it has been in operation, has not had the effect of making grain relatively higher in Canada than in the United States? I have made it a practice on every occasion, when addressing public meetings in Canada, to compare the current market quotations, at that time, in the markets of Toronto, Montreal, New York, Buffalo, Chicago, Toledo and Detroit, and I have never found one instance upon any one of these occasions in which the prices of all kinds of grain have not been relatively higher in the United States than in the corresponding markets in Canada. I will not trouble the House with a long list of quotations to-day. I have quotations extending over a period of several years, taken on the third Wednesday of each month in each of these centres of trade—quotations which show in every case that wheat could not be sent from any American market to Canada and sold at the prices quoted here, without loss to the shipper or the importer. I have compiled some quotations on the 30th March, from the markets of Toronto, Chicago, Toledo, Buffalo and New York. What are the relative prices on this day of the various commodities of our agriculturists? No. 2 winter wheat was worth on that day in Toronto \$1.02; in Chicago, \$1.08½; in Toledo, \$1.10½; in Buffalo, \$1.14; in New York, \$1.21; in Montreal, \$1.16. Or 6½ cts. higher in Chicago than in Toronto; 8½ cts. higher in Toledo; and 11½ cts. higher in Buffalo. These are the comparisons of No. 2 red winter wheat. Will the hon. Finance Minister tell me that his Tariff has had the effect of preventing importers from buying red winter wheat at \$1.08½ in Chicago and bring it to Toronto to sell at \$1.02? Let us take No. 2 spring wheat. On that day it was quoted at \$1.06 in Toronto, and \$1.07½ in Chicago; and No. 1 spring wheat—I could not find quotations for No. 2—was \$1.30 in Buffalo, or 24 cts. more than No. 2 spring in Toronto. Oats—34 lbs. bear in mind, is the standard in Toronto and 32 lbs. the standard at other points—were quoted on that day at 46 cts. in Toronto and 42 cts. in Chicago, or a trifle higher in the latter per pound than in the former market; in Toledo they were quoted at 44½ cts., in Buffalo at 50 cts., and in New York at 52 cts. No. 1 barley was quoted at 75 cts. in Toronto, 98 cts. in Oswego, \$1 in Buffalo, and \$1.05 in New York; No. 2 barley, 70 cts. Toronto, 88 cts. Oswego, 65 cts. Montreal. Rye, 74 cts. to 78 cts. New York, 59 cts. Chicago, no quotations Toronto. Butter, the extreme price in Toronto, 28 cts.; Chicago, 30 cts.; Montreal, 32 cts.; New York, 36 cts. Cheese 14½ cts. New York, 15 cts. Chicago, 14 cts. Montreal. In this whole list of articles which the Tariff was intended to exclude from this country, there is nothing that was not materially higher in the United States than in the corresponding markets of Canada. The farmers have derived no advantage from the operations of this Tariff. It has had no effect whatever in raising the price of the grain, butter or cheese they have to sell. It has been entirely inoperative in these respects, and the promises made that it would have any effect, were false, and have not been fulfilled. As I said a while ago, duties are not needed to keep grain from coming from a high-priced market to a low-priced market, consequently my hon. friend's duties are not needed. What the farmers of this country need is free access to other markets. If the hon. Finance Minister could devise some scheme by which the duties would be removed from grain imported into the United States, if he could strike off the duty upon barley, for which that country largely furnishes us a market, if he could strike off the duties upon peas, if he could strike off the duty in that country upon live stock, if he could strike off the duty in that country upon Nova Scotia coal, or upon the iron ore from Ontario, he would then confer a benefit upon the people of the Dominion of Canada. But he cannot do that; and, Sir, I call the attention of the House to the fact, demonstrated more clearly this Session than ever before, that the Tariff policy is arrayed against any movement or any attempt to secure the striking off of those duties upon our products entering the markets of the United States. I call attention to the fact that the Tariff policy is arrayed against any scheme for obtaining Reciprocity upon any obtainable terms. While we sell to that country all these articles, and they sell to us none of them, that country, if it ever enters into reciprocal trade negotiations with us, will insist that we shall allow them to sell something to us that they produce in return for our sending to them articles that we produce. We are told distinctly and plainly by the advocates of the National Policy that they will never consent to any reciprocal trade negotiations with the United States, that provide for the free interchange of the mutual productions of the two countries. They did array themselves in enmity to the draft of the Treaty negotiated by the late hon. George Brown; which provided for the free admission of cottons and many other manufactures. They will array themselves against any Treaty it is possible for us to obtain to-day, and they stand arrayed against any obtainable reciprocal trade relations with the United States which, if we could obtain them, would confer tenfold greater benefit upon this country than it is possible for any Tariff policy to do. Now I come to the consideration of the changes in the Tariff. The hon. gentleman has been pleased to make certain changes. He tells us, as I said a while ago, that the iron question was one which he found it rather difficult to grapple with. I can tell you why. He found that whenever he imposes a duty upon iron to protect the man who produces it, he imposes a tax upon thirty men who use it as a raw material; that whenever he imposes \$1 of protection in favor of one he imposes the tax upon thirty others. That is where the difficulty comes in. He will find with reference to steel that what would be protection to one man, the producer, would be a tax to forty consumers. He has found that to be a characteristic of Protection duties. What is the manufactured production of one is the raw material of another, and consequently the iron question was a difficult one. He had already imposed a specific duty of \$2 per ton. The furnace men claimed that was insufficient protection; the foundry men claimed is that increased the cost of their raw material to as great an extent as they could stand. And how does the hon. gentleman evade this difficulty? Why, he introduces a new feature, a feature that, so far as I am aware of, has never been introduced into the protective system before to so great an extent. He proceeds to furnish the man who produces pig iron with protection, and not by imposing a duty which, as he tells us, raises the price of pig iron, but he affords him protection by giving him a bonus, and taxing all the people of the country to pay that bonus for the benefit of the iron manufacturer. He told us some years ago that his Tariff was an experiment; I should think it was, a very interesting experiment. I do not know what the result of this Tariff may be, but it certainly is an experiment, and we will wait and see what the result of this bonus system will be. Then he makes a change in the duties upon tobacco. He tells us that was what he was waiting for so long, that was why he delayed his Budget Speech until some twenty-six days after the American Congress had adjourned, in order that he might find out what it had been doing. He levies a duty of 12 cts. a pound and keeps it 50 per cent. above the American standard; and I presume by the time the hon. gentleman has got through with his experiments on the Tariff that there will be just about that relative disproportion between the duties in the two countries—about 50 per cent. higher in Canada than in the United States. That is about the limit he thinks it prudent to adopt. He makes certain concessions in the matter of raw material which are quite proper and with which we have no fault to find. He then comes to the question of protection for agricultural implements. By this policy he has increased the cost of producing agricultural implements very considerably. He has made it cost, according to one manufacturer in my county, \$2 per machine more to produce mowers than it did in 1878. A manufacturer in Brantford informed me last year that the effect of the hon. gentleman's policy was to increase the cost of production of the articles that he manufactured some \$7,000 a year. He has put a duty upon iron and increased its cost; he has increased the cost of fuel; he has increased the cost of malleable castings and the various articles of raw material used by those manufacturers. His protection of 25 per cent. is found insufficient, and they ask him now, inasmuch as he has imposed heavy burdens upon them, to afford them relief by granting more protection. I cannot say that their claim is an unreasonable one; I cannot say, looking at it from the hon. gentleman's stand-point, that it ought not to have been given. I think it would have been better to have removed the burdens imposed upon them; but if he refuses to do that, he could not do less than to give them additional protection. What is the reason for their asking this additional protection? The policy of the Government has been such as is calculated to shut those men out of their natural market in the North-West. Not only has it imposed heavy duties upon their raw material, but the Government have adopted a railway policy that subjects these men to enormous monopoly rates of freight before they can reach that country, and they have to pay these enormous charges for the benefit of the Syndicate. In order to pay these rates, in order to pay the taxes upon the raw material imposed by this Government, it is necessary for my hon. friend to tax the settlers of the North-West 35 per cent. more than the cost of imported implements in order that a great monopoly may go forward and bleed that country with excessive rates, and in order that he may pursue the pernicious policy of imposing duties upon raw material. A few years ago the Government of my hon. friend from East York adopted a policy which, if this country had continued to pursue it, would have made millions upon millions of difference to the country. My hon. friend determined to build a line of railway from Thunder Bay to the Red River, and he determined to extend that line on to the interior as the wants of the country demanded. That line was put under contract and its construction was provided for. That line from Thunder Bay to Red River was the key of the whole position. If the Government had retained control of that line it could have controlled the lines to the North-West. Whatever was reasonable rate of freight from Thunder Bay to Red River would have been the rate of freight that every competing line would have been obliged to adopt. It was, I repeat, the key to the entire position, and when this Government gave that link away it gave away its control of this whole question of freight rates to the North-West; it gave away its ability to confer an estimable boon upon the settlers who are now, or who may be in the future, in that country. They have not only given it away, but they have given millions upon millions more away unnecessarily. They have created a gigantic monopoly which commencing with comparatively nothing two years ago, is to-day able almost to control the entire railway system of this Dominion. In creating that monopoly they have fastened the fetters upon the settlers of the North-West, they have given away the only means in their power to regulate freight rates to the North-West, and to-day they come down with a policy imposing further burdens upon that country, in order to remedy a grievance that somebody else has in the East. Do we want to secure the settlement of that country? I imagine no man can deny it. Those prairies lying there in a state of nature are no source of wealth to us, but when covered with harvests and the homes of yeomen they are a source of wealth and strength. And how do we propose to encourage the settlement of that country? By a land policy that hands over the lands to speculative companies to double the price of it to the settler, by a policy that is not conceived in the interest of the settler, and by a policy that taxes the settler inordinately by enhancing the cost of goods that are sent there. I am told that the stock of implements—reaper, mower, plough and such implements as are absolutely necessary for a settler to carry on operations, cannot be obtained for less than \$700, and probably \$800. We are about to impose a duty on those articles of 35 per cent., and we thereby will increase the cost of a stock of implements by \$245. It is almost as much as the first cost of 160 acres of land. My hon. friend's policy takes from the settler \$245 more than it would be necessary for him to pay to furnish himself with implements necessary to prosecute his business. It is a beautiful commentary on the success of the policy, on the character of the policy, which is one that cannot fail to prove inimical to the interests of that country and cannot fail to retard its settlement. The next thing I have to notice is the change proposed in the duty on prints. It is now 20 per cent., which it is admitted is insufficient to protect. Producers here cannot compete against foreign manufacturers on those terms, and therefore, it is proposed to add  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., making the duty  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. This increase of duty is necessary in order to render it possible to produce these goods in Canada; and this change is to take place on 1st January next. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, there will be an unusual importation of prints about that time? I imagine that an importer will figure in this way: if I import in December I can obtain prints  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. cheaper than in January, and I can afford to import a whole year's stock; interest is 7 per cent., the saving is  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and I will therefore import a year's stock right out of hand. That will be the result of giving notice in advance of this change in the Tariff to take place on 1st January next. Settlers are given the right to import live stock free. There is no limitation, and probably an inordinate amount of live stock will come in under that provision, presumably for settlers, but really for some other purpose. I next come to the change in the duty on books. We have to return thanks to the hon. Minister of Finance for the small concession made here, but he certainly does not go so far as he should have done. He practically tells us that if we will remain seven years behind the times, and follow his example with respect to obtaining information from Washington, we will have free books, but if we desire to be abreast of the times and happen to desire to read a new book, then we must pay the duty. It is impossible for us to publish in Canada all the books the people want to read. We have no great publishing houses such as Harper's, Appletons, or Sampson & Son of London, and Chambers of Edinburgh. It is impossible, I say, that one-tenth of the books required will be published here, and notwithstanding this concession, which is a very inconsiderable one, the tax as it remains is a very objectionable one. The hon. Minister had better allow books published last year to come in free, instead of providing that we must remain seven years behind the times before we can avail ourselves of the concession. Then the hon. gentleman imposes an additional duty on cordage, and to compensate the ship-builders he grants an additional bonus of 10 cts. per ton on shipping; and again he confesses by the imposition of an additional bonus that the duty on cordage raises the price and that the consumer pays the duty. If not, it would be entirely unnecessary to make an addition of 20 per cent. to the bonus paid to ship-builders. The same with iron. The hon. Minister places a bonus on iron produced in this country, because he knows that the operation of the duty is to raise the price of the article to the consumer; and as the hon. member for West Middlesex said the other day, very properly and very forcibly, why not extend the system of bounties? If it is proper to grant a bonus to the ship-builder because the cost of his raw material is raised, and to the producer of pig iron, why not grant to the lumberman a bounty because the cost of the lumber he produces is increased by the operation of the Tariff? He sends it abroad, and meets the competition of lumbermen in other countries not subjected to the burdens he has to bear, and certainly he has as good a right to claim a bounty as the ship-builder or the blast furnace man. Why not give a bounty to the poor farmer of the North-West, to assist him to bear monopoly rates and a duty of 35 per cent. on his implements, being equivalent to \$250 added to the cost of his outfit to start farm work? There is a wide field to enter upon in this question of bounties. The hon. gentleman could extend it very much further. He might, perhaps, involve himself in difficulties; but it would be just as logical to give bounties in a thousand instances as in the two instances named by him. Another matter to which I wish to direct the notice of the House, is the increased complication introduced by the Tariff in the matter of specific and ad valorem duties. I see by a report issued from the Bureau of Statistics on 20th February last, that the Chief of that Bureau found great difficulty in obtaining any opinion from the experts in the Custom Houses in the different cities, as to what effect the changes in the Tariff would have, for the reason that the rules and regulations with respect to the collection of duties were constantly being changed by the Collectors of the different ports, and by the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington. Mr. Nimmo, says:

"As to the means within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury for supplying the information called for by the Committee on Ways and Means, I have to state as follows: The Secretary of the Treasury, in the administration of the law relative to the collection of duties, promulgates regulations which are mainly for the guidance of Customs Officers. Such regulations are especially addressed to appraisers of merchandise who, in their capacity as experts, determine all questions in regard to the classification of goods imported."

He goes on to say that the regulations are constantly changing, and that there is no system by which they can arrive at any definite conclusion. The hon. Minister of Finance is introducing that state of things here—all the contention, all the difficulty, incident to a mixed system of specific and ad valorem duties which have been found such a source of trouble in the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not the reason of the difficulty; it is owing to the fluctuation of prices.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is greatly enhanced, the hon. gentleman will admit, by the mixed system of specific and ad valorem duties.

Mr. BOWELL. No, it is not.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Customs experts in the United States claim that such is the fact. The hon. Minister of Finance tells us that the changes proposed in the Tariff were in consequence of representations made by representatives of different interests in the country. I think this House has a right to demand from the hon. gentleman that it should be made aware of the reasons which he deemed sufficient to warrant those changes. The hon. gentleman listens to representations from delegations and then comes down to the House and proposes changes in the Tariff based upon those representations, but we are left in ignorance of the premises on which he arrived at the conclusion. We have a right to demand full knowledge as to those representations from time to time made to him, representations on which he seems to act in these matters. We have a right to know, I say, what these representations are, and to judge for ourselves what is the character of the conflicting interests leading to these constant changes made year after year in the character of this Tariff policy. So much for the changes made in the Tariff. I now come to consider briefly another point alluded to by the hon. gentleman. He told us in the course of his speech that in consequence of the duty imposed on coal, the export had increased from 500,000 to 600,000 tons. He told us that in consequence of this duty, mainly, the increased consumption of Nova Scotia coal had run up from 1,606,500 in 1877-78 to 2,500,000 tons in 1881-82; and my hon. friend from Cardwell also gave us statistics with regard to the output of coal, and he also claimed that this increase in the output of coal was directly attributable to the operation of the duty on coal. Well, Sir, I felt inclined to doubt the correctness of the inferences which these gentlemen drew, and I proceeded to investigate this matter for myself, and I find that we are hardly warranted in making the claim which they have made, with regard to the operation of the coal duty. I find Sir—I take the year 1878 for the purpose of comparison with the last year, inasmuch as during part of the year 1879, we were under the operation of this Tariff policy from the 15th of March to the 30th of June—that the output coal in 1878 was 770,000 tons in round numbers; that deducting the consumption at the coal mines, the sales were 693,000 tons; that the export to the United States was 88,000 tons; and that the balance of sales, deducting the exports to the United States, were about 605,000 tons. And I find, Sir, that, in 1882, the output was 1,365,000 tons; that the sales were 1,250,000 tons; that the export to the United States was 111,000 tons, leaving a balance of sales of 1,138,000 tons, or a gain in the period from 1878 to 1882, of 533,000 tons, or 88 per cent. Well, Sir, that shows a very rapid increase in the coal output. It shows that, for some cause, this business had received a great impetus, and that its development had been very considerable; but I turn to the imports of coal, and I find there, too, a very marked increase. While the import of coal to the United States, in 1878, was 863,000 tons, in 1882 it was 1,309,000 tons, a gain during this period of 446,000 tons, or equivalent to 61 per cent. Well, Sir, we have an increase in the first case of 88 per cent. in the output, and an increase in the imports of 61 per cent. Can we account for the disparity in any other way than by attributing it to the operation of the coal duty? I think so, Sir; I think that when we take into consideration the facts, that the consumption of coal in Nova Scotia has been very greatly increased during that period, and that steamers are now calling at Sydney and Pictou for the purpose of coaling to a greater extent than formerly, I believe it can be shown most conclusively that the increase in the consumption of coal in Nova Scotia will more than account for this disparity between 88 per cent., the increase in the output of Nova Scotia, and 61 per cent. the increase in the import from the United States. The duty then, Sir, in my opinion, has not in any material degree affected the relative increase in the output, on the one hand, and in the imports on the other hand; but with regard to the large increase in the consumption of coal, I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is most preposterous to claim that this consumption is due entirely to the starting of large manufacturing interests. I do not believe, Sir, that a tithe of this increase is due to that cause. Those familiar with railway matters in this country are aware of the fact, that the change from wood-burning locomotives to coal-burning locomotives has been largely inaugurated since the coal duties were imposed; and to that change, Sir, is due a vast increase in the consumption of coal in Canada. The change from the use of wood as fuel to the use of coal as fuel on the railways of the country, and the building of lines which have been opened since the coal duty was imposed, will, in my opinion, to a very great extent, account for the increased consumption of coal in the Dominion of Canada. There has been an increase in consumption, too, for domestic purposes. It is used to a very much greater extent, than was the case four years ago, as fuel in the households of this country; and these two causes will almost entirely account for the increase in the consumption of coal in the Dominion of Canada since the 15th of March, 1879. Another claim made by my hon. friend—and I must state, that I am indebted to him for his courtesy in furnishing me with some statistics with which I found it necessary to make the comparison—was, that the trade in the transit of grain through Canadian channels had not been diminished by the operation of the duties on grain. Well, Sir, this is a question concerning which it is perhaps rather difficult to arrive at an accurate conclusion. The fluctuations in the amount of grain which has passed through Canadian channels have been very considerable, from year to year; and I am convinced, after looking over this matter, that for some cause—I do not know whether it is attributable to the present Tariff policy, or not—we have not secured that proportion of this carrying trade, which we would reasonably be led to expect from the operations of this trade from 1874 to 1878. I find, Sir, that there has been a very marked increase in the volume of the carrying trade of the United States, in the export of these products. I find that in wheat, flour, and corn, the value of the exports of these articles there from 1874 to 1878, five years, was $670,000,000; and that the value of the exports of the same articles from 1879 to 1882, four years, was $922,000,000, and nearly 60 per cent. greater in these four years than for the preceding five years, the annual average for that period being $124,000,000, and for the other period, $230,000,000, and the average annual increase in the volume of trade being $96,000,000 a year for the United States, and an annual percentage of increase of 71 per cent. Now, taking this fact into consideration, I think we must come to the conclusion—and I shall treat this question very briefly—that our trade has fallen off. Our exports of American produce in 1874 were 8,611,000 bushels, its value being $8,652,000; and in 1877, 8,547,000 bushels, value $8,589,000; while these exports in 1879 were worth $10,603,000, and in 1882, $8,579,000. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of an advance in the volume of this trade in the United States of 71 per cent., there has been a large falling off in Canada—a falling off from $10,600,000 in 1879 to $8,579,000 in 1882. The volume of this trade in 1874 was in fact greater than it was even in 1882, so I think I am warranted in saying that the claim made by my hon. friend with reference to this carrying trade is not borne out by the facts, and that the volume of the carrying trade has fallen off, whereas it ought to have increased in volume very materially, if our proportion had been retained from the year 1879 down to the present time. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I am not wearying the House. I shall cut my figures as short as possible, but I have a few statements which I consider of prime importance to make yet. I wish to say something now, Sir, with regard to the expenditure, and I desire to point to the fact that it is evident that in the management of our apportionment of taxation we do not do it in a very scientific style. I see, Sir, that last year, by the report just made of the financial year ending the 30th of March, the expenditure for England was £89,086,000 sterling, while the receipts were £89,004,000 sterling showing a difference between the expenditure and the receipts of £82,000 sterling, which difference is less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. This is scientific financing; and when my hon. friend can present estimates as to the receipts of the Treasury of Canada, and as to the expenditure of Canada, and when at the end of the financial year those estimates are found to come out within one-tenth of 1 per cent. as to the difference between the one and the other, or even within 1 per cent., or even within 5 per cent.—then my hon. friend will be able to lay claim to the title of being a scientific financier; but as long as a discrepancy between the expenditure and the receipts of some 25 per cent., swollen up into the millions, exists, I think that we must come to the conclusion, and very fairly too, that the work is done in a kind of haphazard way.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Is not that the expenditure?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. You refer to expenditure?

Mr. CHARLTON. I refer to expenditure and to receipts; to expenditure on the one hand and to receipts on the other hand, which in England for the last fiscal year came within one-tenth of 1 per cent. of each other, while in my hon. friend's case the difference in excess of receipts was 25 per cent. Well, Sir, I am not aware that any comparison has yet been made based on the figures that the hon. Finance Minister gave us the other day with regard to the expenditure for the current fiscal year. He informed us that that expenditure would be \$28,850,000. If we compare that expenditure with the expenditure of the previous year, which was \$27,067,000, we find that there has been an increase of \$1,783,000. The hon. gentleman claims in justification of this increase that it was nominal rather than real, and he entered into a very ingenious argument upon that point. But, Sir, the same circumstances would apply in the case of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie). He might with just as much propriety have claimed that the advance in the expenditure during his regime was nominal rather than real, and that the real expenditure was less than it appeared to be. But the country will judge of these expenditures by their aggregates, and if the Government expends \$1,783,000 more in one year than in the previous year the people will hold that the expenditure was to that extent greater than that of the previous year. That increase amounts to 6.5 per cent. in one year. Now, the increase in population of this country is about  $1\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. a year, probably less; and I hold that a scale of expenditure which is fourfold greater in its ratio of increase than the increase of population is a dangerous expenditure. I hold that if the hon. Finance Minister goes on increasing the expenditure four times faster than the population increases, the time will come when he will have to stop perforce. He will come to the point ultimately at which the stern inexorable necessities of the country will compel him to retrench. I say that we are entering upon a dangerous tide of extravagance, and that it is high time that the hon. gentleman and his associates should call a halt in the course they are pursuing. The estimated expenditure for the year 1883-84 is \$30,250,000, or an increase of \$1,500,000, and by the time that the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, I have no doubt that the ratio of increase will be fully as great as last year, and that the dangerous rate at which we are progressing in the line of extravagance will not be checked in the slightest in the coming year. Let us contrast this state of things with the state of things under the Mackenzie Administration. That Government commenced, in 1873-74, with an expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Fund of \$23,316,000; it ended, in 1878, with \$23,503,000—a total increase during that period of \$186,000, or an annual increase of \$46,000. The increase during the whole period was equivalent to eight-tenths of 1 per cent., and the annual percentage of increase was two-tenths of 1 per cent.—an increase eight times less than the increase of the population. The increase of population was eight times faster than the increase of expenditure, while in the other case the increase of expenditure was four times faster than the increase of the population. You can make the contrast one with the other, and any man can draw the inevitable inference. Even if we take the year 1878-79, which does not belong to the hon. gentleman's Administration—take that year, with its expenditure of \$24,455,000, and still the gross increase for the whole period is but \$1,149,000, or an average annual increase of \$229,000—a total increase for the period of 5 per cent., or an average annual increase of only 1 per cent., which was an increase one-half as fast as the increase in the population of the country.

Mr. FARROW. What about the deficits?

Mr. CHARLTON. We are not talking about deficits just now, but we are making comparisons. If we take the second period, the period for which hon. gentlemen are responsible and give them the advantage of commencing their expenditure in 1878-79, instead of taking the previous year—as we should for the purpose of comparison—we find there has been a total increase of \$4,395,000, in the four years, or an annual increase of \$1,098,000. The total percentage of increase is 18 per cent., or an average annual increase of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., which is over two and a-half times faster than the increase of population. If we take the ordinary controllable expenditure for the same periods, we find that my hon. friend the member for East York, decreased his expenditure between 1874 and 1878 to the extent of \$1,781,000, or an average annual decrease of \$445,000. On the other hand, the present Government have increased their expenditure by \$4,058,000, if we include the votes for Dominion Lands, as was done under the previous Administration; while if we do not include the Dominion Lands, the increase has been \$3,400,000, or an annual increase of \$850,000, if the Dominion Lands are left out. These figures presented in this broad way, give to the mind a correct impression as to the relative financial administration of the present Government and of the one which preceded it.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to make one or two more comparisons in order to make my statement complete. I wish, first, to call attention to our expenditure per head of the population for the last two years, and compare that expenditure with the expenditure of the United States. I institute these comparisons because the relations of these two countries will be very intimate in the future, and it will be detrimental to the interests of Canada if we allow our public burdens to mount up much in excess of those of the country to the south of us. The expenditure for the year 1881-82, based upon a population of 4,324,000, was \$6.26 per head, and the expenditure of the present year, as given by the Finance Minister, based upon an assumed population of 4,400,000, is \$6.55 per head. Now, when I turn from this statement to the financial statement contained in the report of the Secretary-Treasurer of the United States, I find that the expenditure of that country for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June last, was \$257,981,000, upon an estimated population of 52,186,000 being the assumed increase over the previous year when the Census was taken, making an average expenditure of \$4.94 per head, against an expenditure in Canada for the same year of \$6.26 per head, or an expenditure in the United States of \$1.32 per head, or 26 per cent. less than the expenditure in Canada. When we take into consideration the fact that the United States has an army and navy to maintain, the fact that it has its diplomatic relations with foreign powers to pay for, and the fact that the expenditure of that country has been considered very extravagant, its appropriations for rivers and harbors alone having last year reached \$43,000,000, which was in proportion to a sum of nearly \$4,000,000 for the same purpose in Canada—when we take these things into consideration, the contrast presented by these figures is very unfavorable to Canada; and if we turn from these comparative statements with regard to expenditure, to the actual taxation imposed upon the people of the two countries, we shall find another unfavorable contrast. Our Customs revenues for the year 1881-82 amounted to \$21,581,000, or \$4.99 per head, the Customs revenues of the United States for the same year amounted to \$220,410,000, or \$4.22 per head; or the people of the United States were taxed in Customs duties at the rate of 77 cts. per head less than the people of this Dominion. The people of Canada were taxed, in 1881-82, at the rate of 18 per cent. more than the people of the United States in Customs duties. Now, I understood the hon. Finance Minister to say, in his speech, on Friday last, that the people "required" to be taxed last year only one cent per head more than they did in the period between 1874 and 1878. Well, what the people required to be taxed I will not pretend to say; but I will have something to say as to what the people were taxed by Customs, Excise, and Stamp duties; and I may say, in making this estimate, that I have endeavored to approximate the population of each year. Taking the population of 1871 at 3,602,000, I have added  $1\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. per annum, and I have added besides 10,000 for the years 1874-75, when the exodus was least, and 2,549 for the years 1877-78, when the exodus was greatest; and upon this basis I have arrived at an estimated population, upon which I base my calculation per head for each of the years named:—For 1877-78, \$4.34 per head; for 1878-79, \$4.42; for 1879-80, \$4.34; for 1880-81, \$5.53; and for 1881-82, \$6.26, or \$1.92 more than in 1877-78. So that whether we required to be taxed only one cent per head more than we were formerly, we certainly have been taxed much more under the present Government than we were under their predecessors. If we come to the matter of interest charged, we will again find that our position, as compared with that of the United States, is unfavorable. Not many years ago the interest charges of the United States were heavy, while those of Canada were light, but year by year those of the United States have been diminishing as ours have been increasing. Last year our interest charges amounted to \$7,740,000, or \$1.56 per head. In this same year the same charges in the United States amounted to \$71,071,000, or \$1.36 per head, or 20 cts. per head less than we were paying. Our interest charges last year were 14½ cts. per head heavier than those of our neighbors. If we go back a term of years, and compare our expenditure during the last decade, with those of the United States, from 1840 to 1850, we shall find that our expenditure to-day is 500 per cent. greater than that of the United States was at that time, with its army and navy and its diplomatic corps. The taxation of the United States in Excise and Customs, from 1840 to 1850, amounted to \$217,411,000 on a mean population of 20,130,000 or on an annual average taxation of \$21,741,000. Our taxation in Customs and Excise for the last ten years has been \$201,000,000, an average of \$20,100,000 a year, on an average mean population of 4,071,569; or we were taxed on an average \$4.93 per head, while the people of the United States were taxed \$1.81 per head during the decade named. We have, to-day, reached a scale of expenditure five times as great as that of the United States during the period from 1840 to 1850. So much for these comparisons with regard to taxation and expenditure. I now wish to refer for a few moments to some statements made by the hon. the Finance Minister with regard to savings bank deposits. It is certainly a matter for congratulation to the Government and the country that the saving deposits indicate a state of prosperity among the small depositors in the country; but I think the hon. gentleman is wrong in attributing this state of things to the cause to which he does attribute it. I attribute it as he does to the fact that the country is prosperous, but that prosperity I hold to be due to other causes than that to which he credits it. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if, under the increased prosperity this country enjoys, there has been an increase of \$13,000,000 in the savings bank deposit, how much greater he supposes that increase would have been had the people not been subjected to \$7,000,000 or \$8,000,000 a year of useless taxation. I know it will be difficult for the hon. Minister to give the exact figures, but I would like him to give a "guess," as the Yankees say, as to the amount.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We would have about the same increase as from 1873 to 1878, $2,000,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then we had bad harvests. Since then Providence has kindly enabled us, by means of good harvests, to export some $15,000,000 more annually than before. With regard to these savings bank deposits, I think the hon. gentleman felicitates himself on the fact that he will probably be able to get through this year with the surplus and the money furnished by deposits. Yet he does not want to have the country under the impression that this amount is so much clear gain. It is a debt and may possibly become a very dangerous form of debt. The hon. gentleman pays 4 per cent. on deposits and has to pay the cost of management. These deposits bear interest some time before he can use them. He tells us that a portion of the deposits has to be redeposited in banks bearing the same rate of interest, entailing therefore a loss to the Government of interest from the time they are received until they are deposited, in addition to the cost of management. I assume that in these two points the hon. gentleman sustains a loss of 1 per cent. per annum on the entire amount of savings bank deposits. The hon. gentleman considers those deposits a source of strength to the country; but should a crisis occur, and a run be made on them, it might come at a time most inconvenient to hon. gentlemen. I do not think, although the deposits are an evidence of prosperity, that the hon. gentleman has reason to congratulate himself particularly on the management of this money which costs 1 per cent. in excess of what it brings. The hon. gentleman informed us that the Elections might have been postponed. I suppose he meant that they might have been brought on at the proper time—at the expiration of the five years for which the last Parliament was elected. He did not deign to explain why they were brought on prematurely; but the country, I apprehend, is well aware of the reason. I apprehend the fact that the Government brought on the Elections one year in advance was a confession on the part of the hon. gentleman that he was afraid to allow the fruits of his policy to become more apparent by another year's trial. The fact of his bringing on the Elections prematurely, and of endeavoring to secure a packed jury by gerrymandering Ontario—to say the least, a not very commendable piece of political morality—indicates very clearly that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have very little faith in the policy they vaunted so loudly, and that they were afraid to allow it to bear its fruits and wait until the proper time came to appeal to the public. They did not dare to wait. They were afraid of a bad harvest. They were perfectly well aware that one bad harvest would dissipate to the winds all their assertions about the blessing conferred by their Tariff policy. We have been accused of making prophecies, but I see that Saul is also among the prophets. I see that the hon. Finance Minister has indulged in the prophetic vein. He tells us, at the closing of his remarks, that the fiat has gone forth and that the National Policy would never be repealed, but must be perpetual. Physicians tell us the human body changes by degrees until there is a total change every seven years. If my hon. friend is permitted to continue changing this Tariff year by year, he will soon not be able to recognize his own progeny. It cannot be perpetual. The hon. gentleman stamps on it the stamp of mutator and changes it every time he comes down to Parliament, and he will change it entirely if left alone. It is a rash policy to predict that any fiscal system will be perpetual, that any measure passed by this House will be perpetual. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he supposes that this policy of his is more strongly entrenched in public favor than was the protective policy of the United States, which has lasted some ten or twenty years. Can he look into the future and predict this policy will be perpetual, with any greater certainty than a Secretary of the United States might have predicted five or ten years ago that the policy of that country would be perpetual? We know that when the protective policy of the United States which had been in vogue for twenty years, went to trial at the last General Elections there, the people pronounced against it by a plurality of 581,970 votes, and pronounced in favor of qualified Free Trade 26 out of 38 States went against it. The politicians of that country recognized the handwriting on the wall, recognized that the time had come when this policy, which was to be perpetual, should be changed at the demand of the people. The protective members of Congress endeavored to draw a herring across the trail to satisfy, in advance, this demand of the people by making changes in the Tariff—those changes my hon. friend had to wait to see how radical they were before he ventured to make his speech.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were not very radical,

Mr. CHARLTON. I agree they were not very radical, and will not satisfy the popular demand; and I take it, the Congress which was elected last fall will not consider them sufficiently radical, and will proceed to enact greater changes. I think the hon. gentleman's prophecies will not be fulfilled. I believe this policy which he has inaugurated will not bear the strain which may yet be put upon it, should we have harvests again such as we had in 1876, when this country's production fell short two or three million bushels of wheat of the quantity required for our own consumption. Do you suppose the National Policy would prevent the evil effects of such a harvest as that? It would aggravate the evil precisely as the American Protective Tariff aggravated their evils in that period of hard times resulting from short harvests and other causes. It would act precisely as that Protective Tariff, which made the depression in the United States so much more severely felt than in Canada, because greater burdens were imposed on the American people than were imposed on ours. I have yet but one or two points to lay before the House which I shall briefly state. It is the function, I suppose, of the Opposition to point out errors of administration, to endeavor to check what it considers extravagance of the Government, to labor in its humble capacity and to the best of its ability for the public good. I am happy to congratulate the hon. Minister on the condition of affairs which exists, so far as the prosperity of the country is concerned. I am perfectly willing to acknowledge we enjoy a fair degree of prosperity, and the hon. Minister has reason to congratulate himself on the fact that he has an abundant revenue, more than sufficient to meet all his wants. But overweening confidence is a thing we ought always to avoid. There is an adage contained in a very good and wise book which tells us—that when we stand we should take heed lest we fall; and in periods of prosperity we ought to exercise a wise discretion, a wise caution, as to the course we should take lest we be ultimately precipitated by that course into difficulties. I hold that a condition of things that leads to an alarming increase in our expenditure, that leads to an expenditure of $132 per head greater than that of the United States, or 26 per cent., that leads to taxation by Customs, 77 cts. per head greater than that of the United States, that requires for interest on public debt 20 cts. per head more than the United States, that leads to an expenditure of public money in a ratio four times greater than the increase in the population of the country, is an alarming state of things. I hold the Opposition would not discharge their functions as an Opposition if they did not call attention to these things, and warn the country and the Government that in their belief this state of things, if persisted in, is sure to lead to disaster. Having presented the case in this way to the Government, having discharged the duty that devolves upon the Opposition as an Opposition, they are content to wait and see whether their efforts will be futile, or whether those efforts will bear fruit; and it remains for the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to let us see whether they will heed the warning that has been given them.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had occasion to ask the kind indulgence of this House for the remarks which he, an old member of the House, proposed to address to it, on the ground that the debate was well worn, and that the patience of the House had been taxed, I think I may be pardoned if I ask a still greater measure of indulgence, on the ground of my inexperience in dealing with such matters as these, on account of my being a new member of this House, and of having to follow in this debate after the very able speeches delivered on this side of the House, and the lengthy criticisms which have been given on that side of the House. I suppose that as long as we maintain our present system we shall be obliged, for a time at least, to conduct our affairs in Parliament by what is known as the machinery of party Government. It is, perhaps, an evil incident, but not essential to party Government, that the country must be divided into two hostile camps, and that in Parliament we must have the generals and leaders of those two hostile camps pitted against each other—often more anxious, I am afraid, to gain an advantage over each other, than to be over careful as to the work which is necessary to be done. I acknowledge, too, that the functions of an Opposition are rather difficult. It will not do for them too much to agree with what has been done by the Government to which they are opposed. Necessarily to their position they must find fault, they must criticise, and after year has passed upon year, it is not to be wondered at that this fault-finding spirit comes to be a chronic complaint, and those who are so fortunate as for a long period of time to sit upon the Government side of the House, ought to have, I think, a great deal of charity and consideration for the unfortunate circumstances I have mentioned, and which are incident to a long service in Opposition. The members on the other side of the House have, as I stated, necessarily to criticise and find fault. I must say that I was somewhat puzzled to know how they would proceed, or what they would find fault about, after the very excellent setting forth of the financial affairs of this country by the hon. Finance Minister, and after the very lucid explanation which he gave of the figures which had appeared in the Public Accounts. After having looked carefully over those Public Accounts, and knowing the condition of the country, I confess that it was difficult for me to imagine what particular grounds the Opposition could take. I have noticed the Budget debates in the British Parliament, I have noticed the Budget debates in the Congress of the United States, and I have found that some great mistake in public policy, some defeat of armies, some disaster which has befallen the country either at home or abroad, is the matter which is chiefly brought up and relied upon with reference to any criticism of the speech from the representative First Minister of the Parliament. But, Sir, in this country we have none of this. Our country is at peace. All over it, from British Columbia to Cape Breton, a peaceful feeling seems dominant and uppermost. Nova Scotia is perfectly happy, enjoying herself upon the proceeds of the better terms which were gained in 1869, and has ceased to grumble. Prince Edward Island is quiet, and is only disturbed in its political horizon by a contested election in the celebrated King's County case. New Brunswick is, as usual, good tempered and steady. Ontario, as the critic of the hon. Finance Minister's speech has stated, is prosperous, and the war cloud which arose there not many months ago, and grew to be, at least, as large as a man's hand, materialized, I think, probably for political purposes, has again been dissipated and no longer appears upon the horizon. In Manitoba, which raised a sort of war cry, or rather reechoed a sort of war cry, which, I think, issued from the Globe office in Toronto and reverberated on the distant hill of—what was that? The Turtle Mountain district?—the cry passed away and is completely deadened by the tread of the hundreds and thousands of settlers, and the hum of the steadily increasing business in that Province. British Columbia which, as I know from reading the debates, used to come down here and talk about its being so badly used, now seems to be perfectly quiet, and its able members are philosophically contemplating the problem of the extinction of the Chinese. Even Quebec, that new France, or rather that old France upon new soil, seems to be altogether at peace, with the exception that just now its serenity may be a little bit ruffled by a slight flutter of the Orange and the Green. Our trade has increased in volume, our manufactures are steadily growing, our labor is at a premium, our wages are given more liberally and more steadily, and, taking it through and through, this is a prosperous year, and this is a prosperous time in the Dominion of Canada, and it is difficult to conceive how hon. gentlemen opposite can find fault in this respect. Then, again, with regard to the position of our country abroad. I suppose Canada never stood better known to the world as a place where immigration may find a large outlet, and where immigrants may find a happy and prosperous home. Entering into relations of cordiality and sympathetic co-operation with the Mother Country greater than ever before, with her credit good, and her position in the money market better than in any preceding year of her history, her position abroad seems to be all that we can desire. And when we think that at home we have no deficits, but that surplus is king—and long may he be crowned as king, say I—when we recollect that, for the first time in the history of the country for eleven years we have reduced the public debt by about $1,700,000, and for the second time in the history of this Confederation we have reduced the public debt; when we recollect that our revenue shows no sign of decided decrease, that our expenditures are met and our liabilities as they mature are redeemed, all this without finding it necessary to float a public loan—it seems to me that the condition of the country is such that it will be very difficult indeed for hon. gentlemen opposite to criticise it. I find they have peculiar methods of dealing with the finances of the country and with its fiscal policy. I think as the attacks have been very largely made from the Opposition side of the House upon this side of the House, that it will be well for us now to make a counter movement, and direct a little of our attention to hon. gentlemen opposite; and I propose, with the kind permission and indulgence of the House, to criticise very modestly, and very humbly, some of the attitudes which have been taken on the financial question by them. First, then, with respect to our financial condition. The method that has been pursued by the party organs through the country, and has been followed up in this House by leaders of the party, has been this: They have three columns of figures. One is a column of debt from 1868 to 1882—that is kept constantly ready to do service as occasion may require in the papers and in this House; then, again, they have a column of expenditures, running in the same way, from Confederation up to the present time; and they have also a column of revenue which shows, as they say, the burden of taxation which is placed upon the people of the Dominion. The fault I have to find with the method of the Opposition in the country and in Parliament, is that it is their object to keep those three columns of figures, debt, expenditure and revenue which they say shows the taxation wrung from the people, constantly before the people and Parliament, without giving the other three columns of what we have to show for our debt, for our expenditure, and for what we have, in the elasticity and expansion of our trade, to show as receipts which do not bear heavily on the people, and so cannot be called the burden of taxation upon the people. It goes in this way: In 1867 the debt of Canada was $75,728,641; in 1874, $108,324,974; in 1879, $142,990,187; in 1882, $153,663,650. Now, I wish this to be borne in mind, and I think it cannot be too prominently kept before the country, even though it be patent and plain to hon. members of this House, that the debt of $75,728,641 is not a debt which is due to, or which was created by this Dominion as a Dominion. It was simply a transference of debt which, before that time, existed in the several Provinces, and which at the time of Confederation was placed in one Consolidated Fund, where it could be better managed and at a lower rate of interest. The impression often obtains abroad and through this country that the seventy-five millions odd, somehow or other came to us because of Confederation. Now, suppose we were to adopt the method pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the increase of debt should be held to show the extravagance and incapacity of the Government. What conclusion would we arrive at by adopting this method of reasoning? The increase of debt from 1867 to 1874 was $32,596,323, that from 1874 to 1879 was $34,665,223—the former representing seven years, while the latter represented only five years; and that from 1879 and 1882 was $10,671,463. And taking an average—recollect that during the period the debt has been incurred the Conservative party has been in power ten years to the other party being in power five years, and so, though each party increased the debt at the same ratio, a larger portion would appear against the Liberal-Conservative Government than against the Liberal Government—of the amount added during the ten years by the Conservative Government on the same basis as that added by the Reform Government, which during five years added $34,665,235 to the public debt, the amount added by the Conservatives would have been $69,330,440 instead of $43,267,786. That, I say, is according to the reasoning which prevails among hon. gentlemen opposite; but that is a fallacious reasoning, and never can be used as proper, just and legitimate criticism with respect to the finances of the country. Here is the fallacy which underlies such reasoning, viz.: that an increase of debt is necessarily blameworthy, unstatesmanlike, and an index of coming disaster. I say that this is a fallacy; it will not hold water, it will not bear dissection, or the light of investigation. Suppose we were to make a business application of it. Here is a man with three sons. The man owns a farm, and his sons each own a farm; they are all mortgaged. Some fine day the father and sons come to the conclusion to merge the farms in one, to lift the small mortgages existing and go into partnership. They see directly opposite them a large piece of country, which promises to be excellent grass land; and they say: "We will buy it, because it will add to the resources and to the production of what we already possess;" and then they say: "A portion of our land needs trenching and tiling; we must put a barn here, and an out-house there," and so looking around them, they get capital and buy and make these improvements. Now, what I want to say, is that, if in that expenditure of capital, they have increased their resources, and put all these different pieces of land into a condition by which a greater return would be brought to them than before, I say it is no argument against them to foot up the expenses which they have incurred, and assert that they are wasteful and extravagant, and going to ruin. This very extravagance, so-called, is sagacity; and the amount capitally expended, the amount of ordinary expenditure, is a wise expenditure, because it is a guarantee of a return which is to come by-and-bye. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. members of this House if that is not a fair application of a business principle; and also if the very same business principle does not apply to countries as well. I take issue entirely with the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, when he intimates that it is only the function of a Government to administer the affairs of a country. I say that a Government is unworthy of being at the head of a country if it is simply to sit down and do nothing but administer the routine business thereof; but that Government must be sagacious and long-sighted, and must have business principles, and put them into execution, and that it must reach forward, and look to what would be best for the development and future growth of the country. Like a business man, a Government must get to work, and expend and bring its undeveloped resources into a condition where wealth can be realized; and that you will find, Mr. Speaker, as the House well knows, is the method pursued now among all younger countries. I hold in my hand a table with reference to the Australian colonies: New South Wales, with a population of 781,000, has a debt of £18,924,019 sterling; Victoria, with a population of 882,000, has a debt of £22,944,602 sterling; New Zealand, with a population of 500,000, has a debt of £29,946,711 sterling; South Australia, with a population of 295,000, has a debt of £12,481,800 sterling; Queensland, with a population of 227,000, has a debt of £13,125,000 sterling; Tasmania, with a population of 119,000, has a debt of £2,003,000 sterling; West Australia, with a population of 32,000, has a debt of £500,000; and all these Australian colonies, with a population of 2,844,000, have a debt of £99,925,482 sterling. Now, the other fact that I wish to couple with that is this: That in 1860 the debt of all these colonies was only £10,000,000 sterling, and twenty-two years afterwards it is £99,000,000 sterling; that is, there has been an increase of over 900 per cent. in their debt, which is £34 sterling per head, or about $170. Now, if the hon. gentleman who criticised the financial address given from this side of the House only had the good fortune to be leading the Opposition in the Confederation of the Australian colonies, and could point to a debt which had increased 900 per cent. in twenty years, I think, Mr. Speaker, he would be able to draw a picture before which the dark and gloomy outline foreshadowed here, would be only in comparison as the sombre shadows of Milton's Paradise Lost is in contrast with the lurid and ghastly scenery of Dante's Inferno. And what do we find in reference to the Australian colonies? That this immense expenditure of money has been an expenditure of money on public works, and that they are already getting in a very large return for that expenditure; and that their credit stands high, as we will see, upon the English money markets. Now, what are the reasons for this? I think that the reasons are easily seen. Countries do not grow as they did one thousand years ago. It may be all very well for a country in an age, and situated as Great Britain was, to take fifteen hundred years to grow from her wildness and barbarism up to the great civilization of to-day; but a new country which hopes to progress by that merely natural method, will remain unknown and undeveloped, while other countries about it will measure themselves with it and vastly surpass it in the race of national development and of real true growth. Things are different now to what they were in the olden time. There is now competition, and what are you going to do with a new country? It has no people, it has no wealth, and it has very large resources, and before the older countries will look at it or send immigrants there, you have to put capital into that country; and as capital is not in the country itself, you are bound to borrow that capital and expend it upon the country; and I hold Mr. Speaker—and I think that it cannot be successfully contradicted—that taking into account this change of affairs, and the competition which takes place between the countries now seeking for immigration from the older countries, as not likely to be misproved, that a judicious and a wise expenditure of money in the shape of capital investment, making the debt of the new country, is not an index of coming disaster, but a sign of businesslike qualities, an index of the wisest statesmanship, and a guarantee for the best prosperity in the future for that country. Now, then, with reference to the increase in the expenditure and in the Public Debt, I wish the House to especially think of what was noticeable all through this debate: that there was not a single item of all that public capital expenditure which was taken exception to by the members from the other side of the House. All they did was simply to point to an aggregation of figures: the debt was so much this year, and so much greater next year; and the debt was so much in 1882. That was the sole comment which they made upon it, and that was what they meant to be an argument against the Government, and the policy of the Government, as supported by this party. I hold that such an argument is altogether inconsequential, and has no force; and that it cannot be used against the Government of this party, unless they can support it with this: That the items upon which this capital expenditure was made were items which cannot be defended, and which, therefore, shows waste and extravagance on the part of those who made them. What do we find with reference to this? Has the debt been increased? Yes, it has; but what has been done with this increase? We have dealt liberally with the different Provinces of the Dominion; and would it have been a good thing for the future prosperity, for the unity of this growing nation, between the different Provinces of Canada, that after the Dominion had taken very largely the great sources of income from them, it should keep them ground down under debt, and constantly keep them in disquiet, and that this should be a constant source of anxiety to them? And this Parliament said that such was not the policy, and so it agreed to treat the Provinces of this Dominion liberally and I want you to think with me that the Liberal-Conservative Governments; of all that increase of debt with which they are charged, spent on the debts of the Provinces from 1869 to 1870, $23,099,096. That is caused by the aggregation of Provincial debts, but it has not added one cent to the indebtedness of the whole country; it has gone towards taking off the heavy burdens from the different parts of the country where they would pay larger interest, where they would not be so easily managed, and it towards massing them in the aggregate where it can be more easily managed, and where the rate of interest will be decreased—where it can be met by the great revenues which come in as an offset to them. We have also built the Intercolonial Railway. No one has appeared in this House to find fault with that expenditure, yet the Conservative Governments of these different periods expended no less than $21,180,054 on Capital Account for the Intercolonial Railway. Then, again, we have built canals and public works, and on miscellaneous public works by the same party during their different periods of power, there has been added to the debt of the country $9,750,226. Upon the Canadian Pacific Railway there has been spent on Capital Account $14,933,724. On North-West Territories—the purchase of the territory and the amount expended from capital for Dominion Lands—we have the sum of $3,766,563, making altogether, $72,789,663 which added to the $77,500,000 assumed at first, makes $150,299,663. What I say is this: that until the Opposition can find fault with, and charge as extravagant, these different items, it is altogether inconsequential, and it is, I might say, absurd to run up this long list of figures without giving the purposes for which they were expended, and the resources we have on hand to balance that expenditure. The same method is adopted with reference to the expenditure. The expenditure in 1868 was $13,468,092; in 1882, it was $27,067,183. The rate of expenditure was small in the period from 1874 to 1879 while the opposite party were in power. They are entitled to all the credit which they can get, and which we and the country cheerfully accord to them for that lessened expenditure, and they will get a larger meed of our praise and of the praises of the country if it can be shown that in that lesser expenditure they did not at the same time starve the public works of the country, retrench where retrenchment could not be properly made, and which afterwards would cause an increased hunger of these public works, and add more than if they had been kept up all the time steadily from one year to another. This is the method which they take of showing an increase of expenditure. If you read carefully, as I have no doubt every true Liberal-Conservative does, the columns of the Globe, you will see that a stereotyped set of figures called the expenditure of the Dominion comes out in a column by itself every now and then, but the other side is not put down alongside of it. That same method has been the method of criticism during this debate. The following which underlies this argument is that increase of expenditure necessarily means extravagance. Is that true? Let us make an application of it to common business principle. Here is a man who sends out a person to another country to sell on commission. The merchant conducts this year a business of about $10,000, we will say, and incurs an expenditure of $1,000 or $2,000 for carrying on that business. The commission merchant sees that he can do better, and the second year after consulting the person who has sent him there he enlarges the business, he opens out on a new line of goods, he sends one agent here, and another there, and so goes on with the business. The person who established the agency sends out a man to look after the business, and at the end of the second year, after a thorough investigation he reports: Why, the expenses last year were only $1,000 or $2,000; they have risen this year to $3,000 or $4,000; you had better recall that man. Do not you see that he is extravagant; that the expenditures are going right up? What reply would the merchant make? He would say: Before I recall him, I want you to give me something besides a mere list of expenditures; I want you to give me a list of the returns from that expenditure, and if it can be shown that the returns are adequate to, and follow closely after the expenditure, I will say that it is an evidence of business capacity and not of extravagance. Is not that a fair business principle, and should not the same principle be applied to the country as to the individual? Is it not just as unfair simply to run up a long list of expenditures without giving the extra returns and the receipts in the case of the nation as in the case of the individual? What do we find? We find that money was spent. I think we may lay it down as a fair theory that no one here will dissent from, that if money is spent without any adequate return, we may call it waste. If money is spent in the way of capital expenditure with a return equal to a fair interest on the amount expended, and if the ordinary expenditures give back an equivalent in the shape of a return to the expenditure made, we must call those expenditures judicious investments, and those investments will be profitable in proportion as the degree of the return which comes from that expenditure keeps pace pari passu with the expenditure made. Are not those fair business propositions? Let us apply them to the expenditure of the Dominion of Canada. It is true that the expenditure has increased, and it is also true that the returns and the receipts have increased as well. Let us take for instance the single item of the Post Office. In 1868 the percentage of expenditure over receipts was 17 per cent. In 1874 it was 57 per cent.—a large increase. In 1879 it was 43 per cent.—a small decrease; but in 1882 it has dropped to 6½ per cent. Now, from the year 1868 to 1882 the Post Office expenditure over receipts has decreased from 17 per cent. to 6½ per cent., while taking the middle period it has decreased from 57 to 6½ per cent.; and on the business principle we have laid down, the Post Office expenditure cannot be criticised simply on the ground of expenditure, because the receipts have been steadily creeping up, and within a few years at this rate they will have overtaken it, and I hope the Post Office will before long come to be a source of revenue instead of a cause of expenditure. Let us look again at the question of Revenue and Expenditure. From 1867 to 1874 the receipts or the revenue increased 76 per cent.; the expenditure had increased 73 per cent. From 1874 to 1879 the receipts decreased 7 per cent. and the expenditure increased 5 per cent. From 1879 to 1882 the receipts increased 48 per cent. and the expenditure increased only 10 per cent. Between 1863 and 1882 the receipts increased 143 per cent.; while the expenditures increased only 100 per cent., there again showing that the expenditures have diminished while the receipts are constantly increasing and justifying the rule we have laid down. Let us take again the question of Customs. From 1867 to 1874, the increase in the receipts was 67 per cent., while the increase in the cost of collection was only 37 per cent. From 1874 to 1879 there was that ominous decrease in the receipts of 10 per cent., but an increase in the cost of collection of 9 per cent. From 1879 to 1882, there was an increase in the receipts of 66 per cent., and an increase in the cost of collection of only ½ per cent. In 1868 the annual percentage of expenditure for the collection of revenue was 5·99; in 1874 it was 4·55; in 1879 it rose to 5·56; and in 1882 it fell to 3·33. The business principle we laid down has been fairly met in every one of these instances; and so I say that, although the expenditure has increased, yet we find that along with that increase, we have had more than a corresponding increase in receipts. There has been an increase in public works and public services given to the people of Canada, and we have felt the beneficial result of this expenditure all over the country; and unless the Opposition find fault with the items of the expenditures, I think it cannot be controverted that the expenditure has been increased on business principles, and that there has kept up with it an accretion of receipts largely preponderating over the augmentation of the expenditure. I wish to refer to another of these columns. There are three columns, a sort of trinity of figure lists. There is a debt column, an expenditure column, and what is called a taxation column. The taxation column, translated into plain English, means nothing more than this—that it is the column of the receipts of revenue from all sources, and to which is applied the name of taxation. Our revenue, fortunately, has been almost always on the up grade, and if you call that by the name of taxation, it is easy to prove that the taxation of this country is continually increasing. In 1878, we are told, the revenue was $22,375,011, and in 1882, $33,383,452, an increase of $11,008,441. Hon. gentlemen opposite point to that increase, and they say that the whole of this is extra taxation wrung out of the hard earnings of the people of Canada. Now, it cannot be successfully held that the larger part of that $11,008,441 is an increased burden of taxation. There is a quid pro quo. If I hire a man and give him a dollar for a piece of work, I cannot truthfully say that that dollar is a burden of taxation upon me; for the man has given me labor in return. We have a Post Office service in this country which charges 3 cts. per letter for carrying our letters; are we, then, to turn round and say that this Post Office revenue is taxation wrung out of the hard earnings of the people? Would we take our own letters and deliver them at 3 cts. apiece? Do we not consider that we are getting service for the money we pay? Then, I want to say that there is a difference between the amount of taxation and the burden of taxation. For instance, here is a man with a small business. It requires correspondence to carry it on. This year he writes five hundred letters in the course of that business, and pays $15. You may call that, if you please, the burden of taxation for that year. The next year his business requires the writing of double the number of letters, and so he pays $30 in postage instead of $15. He has paid double, but he has received service for every one of the letters carried. So I want to make this point—that of that $11,003,441 increase of revenue, there is a large share which is not to be attributed to the Tariff, and not to be called taxation, but simply to the growth and expansion of the revenue, due to the increased business and the increased services in the country. For instance, from 1878 to 1882, there has been an increase in the Post Office revenue of $330,098. Is that wrung out of the people? There has been an increase in Excise of $963,812; has the Tariff anything to do with the Excise? There has been an increase in Public Works dues of $676,651, but this has been from tolls and railways, freights, and these have not been heightened but lowered. That must show that this increased revenue is not taxation in the proper sense of the word, but that for every cent of it a service has been rendered, the country rendering service to the people, and getting pay from the people in return for it. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite are persistently drilling into the minds of the people that the whole increase of the Customs duties from 1878 to 1882 has been due to the increase in the Tariff. I remember a summer or two ago, when I was in the city of Fredericton, having the pleasure of listening to the hon. leader of the Opposition. It was on the occasion of that celebrated tour that he made to the Maritime Provinces, in which he gained a great many acquaintances and made a great many friends, even though he did not secure a very large increase of votes. I had the pleasure of listening to that hon. gentleman; and to the farmers, who were all about him looking up into his face, he used this argument: "Now," said he, "when you farmers go into a store and buy a number of yards of shirting, I want you to recollect that you must cut off so many yards, and send them up to the Government at Ottawa;" and in my simple-mindedness, I began to imagine what an astounding wardrobe the hon. Finance Minister must have, and what a plethoric larder these members of the Government must keep. Now, there are two ideas in that that are erroneous. The first is this, and although it may not appear of much importance to some, I think it is very important, and the principle underlying it is very important. I say there should not be any question of antagonism raised between the Government and the country. It should never be represented that the payments which come from the country in the shape of revenue are going into the hands of another and totally distinct party, the Government of the country. But the Government of the country is a part of it, doing its business for the individuals in the aggregate, and that kind of representation has just this influence, that it produces an antagonism between the people and the Government. The people are led to look upon the Government as something foreign and hence arises the jealous idea the Government are using the people's money for their own purposes, while the expenditure by the Government is only the expenditure of the people's money by persons who are selected to do that business for them. Then there is the suppressio veri—is that not the right term? the concealment of the truth. They tell the people that when they buy so many yards of shirting they have to cut off a proportion and send it to the Government at Ottawa. But the people are never told that under the former regime if they bought so many yards they had to cut any off. They are led to believe that all they were obliged to cut off was due to the National Policy. But what do we find when we examine into the question? We find that in 1878, $91,199,577 worth of goods were entered for home consumption, and that the duty paid was $12,795,693. In 1882, $112,648,927 worth of goods were imported, on which $21,708,837 duty was paid, being an increase of duty of $8,913,144. Now, all that duty was not due to the Tariff which was brought in with the National Policy. If we look at 1878, we find that the average duty was 14 per cent, and if we look at 1882 we find that the average was 19 per cent.; so that the Tariff simply caused an extra collection of 5 per cent. If we apply that, we will find that 14 per cent. of the home consumption entries of 1882 would amount to $15,770,849, the difference between that amount and what was collected being $5,937,988—that is, there was an expansion of the revenue, and if the duty had only been 14 per cent. for the year 1882, there would have been still several million dollars more collected than was collected in 1878, because the volume of imports was greater. Therefore, when we come to look at the whole revenue of $33,383,452, and contrast its increase over that of 1878, we must not look at it in the light of more taxes on importation, but we have to show that such was the expansion of business and prosperity, that a very large accumulation to our revenue resulted.

Mr. PATERSON, (Brant). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," because they think I have very effectually stated an argument of their own, that if there had been no extra duty put on at all in 1878, the natural expansion and growth of the business of the country and the revenue consequent on that growth, would have given us sufficient to carry on the whole affairs of the country. I do not make that statement, but I state two considerations which go against it. First, I do not believe this growth and expansion would have taken place to any great degree if it had not been for the impetus given to the business of this country by the policy of the Government. I think that the effect of the National Policy, and the effect of what arose out of that in the increase of manufactures and consequent increase of importation of machinery and the consequent greater ability of the people to buy, through the wages paid—all these things and others I might mention, have made the expansion of the revenue greater than it would otherwise have been. The other point I want to make is this, that the legitimate expenses of this country, as I have explained before, have increased, and we require more revenue in order to meet them.

Mr. PATERSON. The National Policy was designed to decrease imports and to restrict trade.

Mr. McCALLUM. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. Finance Minister said so.

Mr. FOSTER. Who has the floor? The next point I wish to make is this: I want to bind the Opposition down to the position which they have made inevitable to themselves. What is their whole argument? It is this: Here is this trinity of figures—the increase in debt, the increase in expenditure, and the increase in revenue, which we call taxation. All these increases show, or ought to show, the incapacity of the present Government, and their unworthiness of the confidence of the country—that they ought to be put out and that we should be put in. Is not that the argument, if there is any truth or honesty, or candor in the Opposition, and there is? Here is the inevitable position into which they are forced, that if to-day we could go backwards and put them at the beginning, if they are true to this argument which they make, they would not increase the debt or the expenditure of the country. In what condition then would we be? We would be stagnant and stationary. Where would have been our public improvements which could not have been carried on without increased expenditure? Where would have been our consequent increase of revenue? The inevitable position they are driven to is this: that if they had been in power, they would either not have incurred this expenditure or else increased it in a vastly less degree. And so all the great lines of public policy which have been inaugurated and carried out, and which have made Canada as great as it is, and given it such a future, would not have been for this country and for this people. I want to know if such a position as that, and such an alternative as that, if put to the people of the country, would not stamp any party as inefficient and incapable? If the country believes—and the country has reason to believe, and it is a just and legitimate belief—that for a new land like Canada, with such immense resources, so few people, such comparatively small wealth, it is of prime necessity that great expenditures should take place in the way of public works and means of intercommunication in order that people may avail themselves to the greatest degree of the heritage which we have. I have stated that there has been no serious criticism with reference to the items of the debt or the expenditure. At first sight it may seem that that is a rash statement to make after the long hours of speeches by the ablest critics on the Opposition benches, and yet I leave it to the good sense of this House if, from the time this debate opened until now, there has been anything brought up on the other side to impugn one single item of the capital expenditure which goes into our public debts. I leave it to any competent person to decide whether, in any of the talk which we have heard about increased expenditures, there has been one serious effort made to get down to the bottom of any large expenditure and show that it is extravagant, unwarranted or uncalled for. The critic of the speech of the hon. Finance Minister approved distinctly of a number of expenditures, he slightly touched with no great reprobation one or two others, and then swiftly descended into the region of cab hire and contingencies—two items which, I think, might very well come up for criticism when the Estimates come before the House, but the quick resort to which proved to me that there could not have been much to criticise in the great items of expenditure. Now, the hon. member for South Brant know well enough that that was not a legitimate way to criticise the financial policy of this House, and he admitted as much. His conscience, I think, from his courteous disposition and his pleasant manner, is still tender, and rather pricked him at first. He stated what the hon. member for North Norfolk has stated to-day, but in a little different way: he said the Finance Minister went into explanations. He was bound to admit that many of the explanations had weight, but did not the people of the country know, and were not the Public Accounts before the people? And that was all that was necessary. The people had the figures in the Public Accounts, and they did not want any explanations. And yet for days and hours before that same hon. gentleman looked anxiously and longingly for the time to come when the Finance Minister, notwithstanding that these Public Accounts had been before this House almost from the first of the Session, should come down and make the necessary and needed explanation of those Public Accounts to the people. Why are they not needed? Mr. Speaker, every young member in this House who gets the ponderous tome which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs issues each year, and sits down to his table to look that over and pick out some figures which will just suit himself, knows that there is almost a technical education needed to get at the bottom of even the best regulated Public Accounts, and that to give that volume simply to a man who is not used to the Public Accounts is almost like putting so much Greek and Latin before him. And so it is necessary that explanations should be given. But the hon. member for South Brant said that these explanations were not necessary; he was not going to give them their weight, he was just simply going to take the items of expenditure in the Public Accounts. He knew it was not the proper method of criticism, and he simply justified himself on the ground that "others did it." Here is what he said:

"The hon. gentleman knew that the Public Accounts were in the hands of members; he knew they showed that there had been a very great increase of expenditure; and he did what it was only natural he should do, he sought to break the force of that, by attempting to explain and justify each item, in order, if possible, to save himself and the Administration of which he is one of the ablest members, from blame and censure in that regard. I will be able to charge back upon those hon. gentlemen, and it will not be for them to resent anything in this direction, they themselves having adopted that line of criticism when they occupied this side of the House."

Now, all I have to say is, that if, when this Government occupied the Opposition benches, they took that wrong method of criticising the Public Accounts, then when the Government then in power took the Opposition benches and became a better and purer party, it ought to have left its old and wrong methods back in oblivion, and stood upon higher grounds and taken a proper method of criticism. When the hon. member for South Brant went through with his criticism, he impugned no items of the debt or expenditure, but struck away upon the National Policy. I wish to say one word with reference to his criticism of the National Policy. If I recollect aright, the Elections were carried on and ended in the autumn of 1878. Parliament met here in 1879, it got through with its operations in April or May, and this policy went into operation, I believe, about the first day of May, 1879. The Public Accounts closed on the last day of June, 1879, and yet the hon. member for South Brant criticised the National Policy because in a month or a month and a-half, it did not do that which its exponents said that in the course of time it would do. I put it to the hon. member if he considers that is a fair method of criticism.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not say so.

Mr. FOSTER. I think if the hon. gentleman will refresh his memory, he will find that he took the ground that the National Policy, in 1879, had not done that which his friends and supporters had claimed that it would do, and went on to talk about a long list of bank failures, and read a long column of prices, in one of which he stated that "oats had fallen from 28 to 31 cts.," and I think that it is in the memory of this House.

Mr. PATERSON. What month, June or September? One year after the Mackenzie Administration, or one month?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not one year after the passage of the resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER. The unfairness is there all the same. Suppose that a man has been sick for a month, and a physician is called in to prescribe for him; after a long time the physician strikes the seat of the disease, he diagnoses the complaint exactly, and supplies a remedy on a certain date. You go in three weeks afterwards, and find that the man is still confined to the lounge, that he is not walking around, that he is not strong and able to do his work—do you say that that physician's skill has been useless, and that he has not touched the disease and virtually healed it? No; but you say, as any reasonable man would, the man has been sick, the disease has only just lately been diagnosed; it will take months for him to recuperate and get back to his normal condition. We must give him time. It is exactly the same with reference to this National Policy. I never heard the hon. First Minister state that if the National Policy were adopted and this new line were carried out, that immediately, like waving of the wand of the magician, all these good things would spring up and flourish. That statement has been made by the Opposition. They put up a man of straw, in order that they might amuse themselves in knocking him down.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. Prime Minister said it.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think the hon. Prime Minister ever said any such thing.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, he will tell you so.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to see you bring to me anything containing any such statement—

Mr. PATERSON. Well, he will not deny it.

Mr. FOSTER. And I have yet to find out that any such statement was made. The Government by any policy which it introduces, brings down and inaugurates, and by this the National Policy which it brought down, never promised to build factories, never promised to put up tall chimnies, to establish refineries, while the people sat idly by with their capital in their pockets, or in their banks. Government does not do that thing any more than it makes the rain fall or takes the place of Providence, as the same hon. gentleman opposite is in the habit of representing. But the Government does not take, and should not take, at least the opposite extreme that they are nothing more than a "fly on the wheel," and no matter what the position of the country is, or what are its requirements, all the Government can do is to go on administering the Post Office and collecting taxes, and is powerless to aid industries by legislation. This statement has been made often and often with respect to the growth of our exports and with respect to this great prosperity. A simile occurs to me, and I think it is a true one. Government cannot create the water that flows in a mighty river, but the Government can take the water out of the mighty river and by appliances and machinery can carry it through acres and acres of arid soil, and by a proper system of irrigation, can make the desert bloom like a rose, and cover the sands with fertility and an abundant harvest. There is this distinction: that which causes this fertility is the gift of Nature, but the duty of utilizing it rests with man, and it is the same thing with the prosperity of a country. The great river in a country's prosperity is that which comes out of the soil, the sea, the mine; but that is powerless to do what it may do unless the Government provide proper conditions and unless they foster and care for and direct the energies to be applied to it. That is the distinction I would make, and it is one which, if carried in our minds would very much lighten up that often muddling and perplexing assertion that the Government cannot make good crops and cannot cause the fish to multiply in the sea. Well, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) finding he had not any chance of criticising the items of capital expenditure and ordinary expenditure, after a time forgets the calm way in which he commenced and launches out into hyperbole. He says that this Government has embarked on an era of extravagance. Did he prove it? He simply read a long line of figures. He says they have put a blight upon Manitoba. Manitoba still exists and is wonderfully prosperous so far as I can hear. He states that the people there have been bound hand and foot. I have heard of no manacles or chains being sent to that country. This is intemperate language—language which, coming from the prospective Finance Minister of this country, makes people pause and think whether or not they should entrust such important affairs to a man who will make use of such intemperate language when he is speaking about his own country. I am sorry that this language has been used. I am sorry he has thus copied the ex-Finance Minister who formerly criticised the Budget Speech in this House, and who stated upon one occasion that Canada was a country to which no person could go, and in which no person could move without meeting at every turn the usurer and tax collector. These statements are not for the health of the country; they are not true statements; they go abroad and affect our immigration; they are caught up by those with whom we are competing, and they are made to do duty to keep people away from this country. The hon. member for South Brant, seeing how weak and comparatively futile his criticism of the public finances have been, got up a rolling fire of light artillery under which he retreated into safe and sure cover. He talked about the Finance Minister acting in the place of Providence, about the Finance Minister making crops grow and the sun shine. It was all a little piece of subterfuge to deceive the eye, while he gathered up his shattered forces and retired under cover. It was like the bivouac fires which sometimes are made to burn very brightly all night long, and lead to the belief that hostile forces are getting ready for the attack in the morning; but when morning comes it is found that the bivouac fires were kept burning all night, but the opposing army had safely and quietly taken itself away. I now come to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). That hon. gentleman dealt largely in implication. I want to emphasize that fact before the House. The hon. member for West Middlesex did not take up a single item of public debt and criticise it. He, however, thought something should be done in the direction of criticising items of expenditure in the Public Accounts, and he commenced. What were his criticisms? He took up Public Works. He found the expenditure had increased; he asked the question why it had increased, and insinuated that it had increased for patronage purposes, and that a public building was placed here and there for the sake of making patronage and strengthening the party for the coming elections. That was the whole extent of his criticism of the Public Works Department. Did he state it had been so? Did he show a single instance where it had been so? If I had been an independent person, perfectly unbiassed, and had been waiting until the hon. gentleman made out a case against the Government, I would not have accepted his statements as making out a true bill against the Administration. The hon. gentleman took up the Department of Indian Affairs, and pointed to the great increase in expenditure, and then made the statement that he thought gross mismanagement occurred somewhere in the Department. But did the hon. gentleman show a single instance of that mismanagement? Not one. The hon. member for West Middlesex is, I think, a lawyer. We will suppose a case before a Judge and jury. He charges a man with murder, and the man is put in the dock, and, on coming before the court, the Judge asks what the charge was. The hon. gentleman would reply: I charge the prisoner with murder. The Judge would thereupon say: What is your evidence against the man? The hon. gentleman would reply: Well, your Honor, I have a person here who will say he thinks the prisoner looks as if he were a man who might have committed murder; but I do not say he has done so. The Judge would ask if any further evidence is forthcoming. The hon. gentleman would reply: Yes, I have another man who states he thinks that a murder has been committed. The Judge would ask if there is any further evidence, and on receiving a reply in the negative would say that the case was out of court. What Judge or jury, I ask, would condemn a man for murder on such evidence? Now this is the High Court of Parliament and tries public charges. There are charges made against the Public Works Department and the Indian Department, but when examined they are found to consist simply of insinuations and intimations of what might have been. Does that establish anything? Not a bit of it. Again, the hon. gentleman finds fault with the Post Office Department, and points out that expenditure has increased largely, although increased service has been given. Now, what is meant by that? Did not the hon. gentleman know that the increase of salaries is fixed by law? He does not mean to say that a bonus was given to this one and a bonus given to that one. As I understand it, the postmasters outside of the cities get 40 per cent. of the income of the office; and if this income increases, their salary must necessarily increase; and so it is, not a thing which is under the control of the Department. The only thing that the Department can do, is to listen to the wishes of the people, and to establish post offices where they think they are needed. Then as the revenue increases, and more postage is paid, of course, the salaries of these postmasters increase in proportion. Then, again, he says that the sum of $500,000 was hidden away for Dominion Land Surveys and charged to Capital. Well, I think the hon. gentleman knows—and I think it is time—that these expenses which were formerly charged to revenue and ordinary expenses, are now charged to Capital; that there is a sort of separate account kept for Dominion Lands; and that although it was placed there, this was done intentionally, in accordance with the rule under which these things are done in that Department, and of which this House was cognizant. But I wish, Mr. Speaker, to direct the attention of the House—and I am sorry that the hon. member for West Middlesex is not present—to that hon. gentleman's criticism of the immigration question. Now, why is he opposed to the item for Immigration? The hon. member for South Brant was entirely in accord with this expenditure on Immigration

Mr. PATERSON. No; no.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, at least, he did not criticise it; at least I think I am within bounds when I say that he did not criticise it harshly, but held out the idea that immigration was necessary to this country, and the increase in the appropriation for immigration purposes was not an improper increase. Well, the hon. member for Middlesex finds fault with it very much. A summary way of dealing with this matter would be to allow the hon. member for Middlesex and the hon. member for Brant, to settle this matter between them; but I think I see why the hon. member for Middlesex took strong exception to this idea of immigration. In turning up an old copy of the Hansard of 1876, I find that the hon. member for Middlesex, was then indulging in what has grown to be an almost chronic pastime with himself—making a prophecy. He was talking about the United States, and the way they built railroads, and immigrants followed; and then he ventures upon this prophecy:

“Anyone, who has watched the flow of immigration for the last four or five years, must admit, it was beyond the range of probability, that anything like the number of immigrants would settle in America, during the next ten years as in the last decade. The immigration of the last year was not one-third of what it was the preceding twelve months, and it was unlikely to increase in the future. The wages of the working classes in Great Britain and other European countries having largely increased of late, and their condition being much improved, the inducements for the people of the Old World to immigrate were therefore not so great as they had been in the past.”

That was the utterance of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex in 1876; it was one of his forecasts; he cast, as it were, the horoscope of the coming decade. He looked over the condition of affairs in the Old Country and in the New; and from his high position of vantage ground, coming up pretty nearly to the approaching election, and with a strong prospect, and in the hope, that he would be one of the governing body during the next few years, he ventured on his prophecy—that immigration must decrease; and that there is no possibility that it can increase after this. Now, a little bit of fact alongside of that prophecy. The hon. member for Cardwell said the other day, that Time was the worst enemy which these gentlemen had to contend with; and time has unravelled and uprooted this prophecy. That was in 1876; and there was to be no great increase of immigration. Now, in 1876, 169,986 immigrants came to the United States; in 1877, 141,857; in 1879, 177,826; in 1880, 457,257; in 1881, 669,431; and in 1882, 788,992. That is the way in which time and fact play havoc with the elaborate prophecy of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex; and perhaps it was because he was a little vexed with Time, because it did not carry out his prophecy, that he undertook to find fault with and criticise this expenditure on immigration. Well, I think that no expenditure that this country goes to, or may go to, is an expenditure which is so well warranted and which will so richly repay this country, as is and will be the expenditure for immigration. I am willing to back up this Government in the widest possible immigration agency that it will put to work, to bring settlers into this country at a moderate rate of cost. Why, Sir? Because I find that in 1882, 112,000 persons settled in this country of ours; 100,000 of these were probably white men and the others Chinamen; and we find that these 100,000 who were brought in cost only $3.20 per head. Now, I say, bring all the people you possibly can into this country at $3.20 per head. Why? Because, Sir, take the average, and they will, from the first year that they are here, pay back some $5 or so into the Customs of this country, and they will therefore pay for the expense of bringing them here; and they will do more than that. Every one of them brings a certain amount of wealth into the country, and that becomes to us a stock-in-trade, from which wealth grows and increases; and more, Sir, every one of them brings labor to this country and work for the period of his lifetime, and this will be an increasing quantity to this country. More than that, Sir, every one of them becomes an immigration agent, and writes to friends at home, praises up the country, and brings a greater or less number of his friends into this country; so, I say, put down just as much for this item of Immigration as you like, so long as you bring immigrants into the country at the rate of $3.20 per head, and there is no person in this country but would say to that Government: Go on with your policy and we will back you up in it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And go forty-five cents better.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, the next criticism of the hon. member from Middlesex was with reference to the commerce of the country. He says that the commerce of the country was to be promoted by this National Policy, and simply intimates that this has not been the result. Now, Mr. Speaker, no array of figures, dug from all the archives of this country, is going to make me lose the operation of my eyesight and observation. No ingenious mass of figures, or transposition of figures, is going, in the face of my own eyes and observation, and what I know of this country, to make me believe that the commerce of this country has not increased, and is not increasing. Why, if we want figures for it here is the set which settles the matter immediately. The volume of trade has grown. Is there any doubt about that? It has grown. You can turn to the Trade Reports and find that it has grown. In 1868 it was $131,000,000; in 1874, $217,000,000; in 1879—an ominous decrease—$153,000,000; and in 1882, it was higher than ever it was in the history of this country before, and our aggregate trade was, during this year, $221,556,705. Now, in the face of that will any hon. gentleman get up and attempt by any array of figures to prove that the commerce of the country has not increased. But that is only one part of our commerce. It is the external commerce of the country, but there is an internal commerce of the country, which no man can get at. We have not a system of statistics, and we have not the power to grasp what is meant by the internal trade of the country, but there are some pointers which tell us that it has increased. One of these is the decrease of the imports of the Maritime Provinces. We do not believe that they eat or wear less than before, and we must conclude, that if they do not import from the United States or other countries, that there must be going on an interchange of commodities between them and the Upper Provinces, and I think it is a fact beyond all dispute that Nova Scotia has sent her coal in increasing quantities; that cottons have been sent from our factories; that sugar has been sent from our refineries; that manufactures have been sent from our manufactories, up to this western country, and that there have come down to us in return the goods which these Provinces can supply. Can any man tell me who has lived along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, or has travelled upon it now and again and seen the increasing lines of freight which are carried, and looked at the immense amount of stuff that goes and comes upon that road, and yet say that the internal traffic has not increased. It has increased, it is increasing. Here is another pointer which gives us additional proof of that. Take the Manitoba trade. The imports into Manitoba in 1878, were $1,122,744; in 1882; they were $5,144,493, in other words the imports had increased 350 per cent. Is it not according to the rule of reason as well as to our observation and experience, that if this immense volume of imports has taken place, there has taken place a corresponding increase in the internal trade between the Eastern Provinces and Manitoba and the North-West? We get at the import trade because we have the figures; we get at the other by a process of induction and by our own observation and experience. So as we stand by the Intercolonial, as we look at the canals, as we go into our refineries, and stand in the midst of our cotton factories and see all that is going on and know of the interchange of commodities, we must conclude that the volume of internal commerce is increasing in this country. Then with regard to our carrying trade there is a strong point in our favor. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the shipping interest is declining, but let us look at the carrying trade as another indication. In 1878 there were, in arrivals and departures of vessels (exclusive of coasting vessels) 48,027; in 1882 there were 55,620. In 1878 the number of tons registered was 12,054,690; in 1882 the number of tons registered was 13,379,882. In 1878 freights were 3,296,391 tons; in 1882 they were 3,998,459. The crews employed in 1878 were 465,776; in 1882 they were 512,728. Does not the extra employment of men show the extra trade which is taking place in the matter of sea-going vessels; and if we take the coasting trade we find it equally favorable. In 1878 the number of these vessels was 61,046; in 1882 it was 75,620. The tonnage in 1878 was 11,047,661; in 1882 it was 14,791,064. The crews in 1878 numbered 585,415; in 1882, 734,926. I am aware that these figures do not show the number of vessels engaged in the trade, but as they show in both cases the arrivals and departures of vessels at our ports the comparative statement cannot be impugned. I think I have effectually disposed of the statement that the commerce of the country has decreased, and you will not make it any more clear to the House or the country if you gather from now to doomsday all the figures to be found in every book in all the Departments. The hon. gentleman, unfortunately for himself, declared that our shipping interests had fallen off, and that this showed the failure of the National Policy which was to help our shipping interests. I find that, from 1875 to 1879, under the former policy, there was a decrease of 44 per cent. in the shipping built in Canada, while from 1879 to 1882 there was a decrease of but 34 per cent. Now, if that decrease was due in this latter case to the National Policy, to what was the decrease due in the preceding series of years under the old policy; and, if we take this as an infallible test—which it is not—we find that the old policy was more disastrous to the ship-building interests by 10 per cent. than the new policy was. How is it with reference to the registered vessels? We find that, from 1875 to 1879, under the old regime, there was a decrease of 53 per cent., while, under the new, from 1879 to 1882, there was only 17 per cent. of a decrease. Again, if you take this as a rule, the present policy gives a less decrease than the preceding one. But it will be apparent that this is not a fair line of argument—that it is not indubitable proof, for wooden sailing vessels are fast going out of date. Let me put a fact alongside of this. Shipping has declined in Canada, but it has also declined in the United States. Hon. gentlemen say that that is due to a Protective Policy as well. Then we will go to Great Britain, and the sailing vessels have decreased continuously for the past few years. The only place where the hon. gentleman could show an increase was the little country of Norway with its immense shipping. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the extra increase in that country does not arise from this fact, that while other nations are doing away with their old vessels the Norwegians are buying the hulks and using them as they can. If he looks at the tonnage he will find that Norway is no exception, and that sailing vessels are going out of the trade. So much for that argument. I thank the House for the kind and indulgent attention it has given to me. I know there are other things which I might answer, but there are other hon. gentlemen who can answer them far better, and at this time I will notice only one or two points.

Mr. FOSTER.

I suppose the hon. member for South Norfolk will not object to my reading from any report which comes from the Province of Ontario, with the imprimatur of the Mowat Government upon it. He has stated, in substance, that our manufacturers were as prosperous in the old period about 1871, 1872 or 1873, as they are now, that there has been no great increase of manufactures as a result of the National Policy—in fact, that there has been very little increase at all. Well, they have a Bureau of Statistics in Ontario, a very excellent thing, which I would like to see in every Province; and this Bureau has made some enquiries as to the manufactures of the Province in the year 1882. The report says:

"But fragmentary as are the statistics of manufacturing industries furnished to the Bureau, they afford evidence of great progress having been made during the past twelve years."

And when we come to look at the table, we find, taking for instance agricultural implements, that they get returns from forty-four factories. The Census of 1871 gives returns from 173 factories; and we find that the forty-four factories returned to the Bureau, employed 2,397 hands, while the whole 173 in 1871, employed but 2,143; that the forty-four paid $954,586 of wages, while the 173 in 1871, paid but $745,693; that the total product of the forty-four factories was $3,883,018, while the total product of the 173 factories in 1871, was only $2,291,989. The Bureau also got returns from three cotton factories. In 1871, there were five in operation. The three employed 1,139 hands, while the five employed only 495 hands; the three paid in wages, $256,960, while the five paid but $87,400. The product of the three was valued at $683,400, while the product of the five was worth $192,200; and so on throughout the whole list. But just let me sum up. The hon. gentleman opposite has stated that wages are no better, and that there is no more employment now than formerly. Taking the aggregate of wages, and dividing it by the number of hands employed in these factories in 1882, and applying the same test to 1871, we find that the average wages paid in 1882, were $336, while the average wages in 1871, were $251, an increase in 1882, of 33½ per cent. So much for the tables. Now let us see what the compilers state:

"This statement requires no analysis. It is manifest that there has been a large increase of manufactured products, as well as of hands employed and wages paid. The 41 agricultural implement works giving returns for 1882, for example, make a better exhibit than the 173 giving returns for 1871. * * * The returns of agricultural implement works to which reference has already been made, give a good indication of the progress of the Province agriculturally, even had we no other evidence of it. The total number of these establishments as appears by the table, is 122, but there is a large number of foundries doing a mixed business, which might properly be included in the same class. An idea of the extent to which improved implements of husbandry are used by the farmers of the Province may be obtained from figures given in a few of the complete returns. In fifteen establishments—8,786 single reapers were made last year; in sixteen, 6,979 single mowers; in four, 425 combined reapers and mowers; in three, 800 self-binding harvesters; in five, 2,880 seed drills; in six, 8,140 sulky rakes; in one, 120 threshing machines, and in four, 8,000 ploughs. The total number of those implements made for last year's market must consequently be large."

I leave the hon. gentleman to settle his account with the Report of the Bureau of Industries for the year 1882. The hon. gentleman devoted the latter part of his time to making a comparison between this country and the United States. He compared the expenditure per head of a young country just commencing its national life and with a sparse population of 4,000,000, with that of an old country of centuries standing, with a population of 50,000,000. He says the expenditure per head is less there than in Canada. Why, I can show that the expenditure per head in China is much less. All you have to do is to double the population in order to make our expenditure just half of what it is. Is there any justice in comparing the expenditure of a young country, straining every nerve to attract immigrants to its shores, with an old country to which the stream of emigration has long been established, and with which we have to compete? We are in competition with both Australia and the United States, and if we do not make strong and constant efforts to turn the current of emigration from the old track and to make it come into the new track, we shall get the go-by. The comparison of an expenditure with that of the United States is not, I think, a fair one, and will not stand with the country. But the hon. gentleman must be answered out of his own mouth. He has made several statements that Protection is not necessary in order to establish manufactories, that it does not help our manufactures, that it has nothing to do with the bringing of wealth into the country, that it is a burden on the people, that it does nothing for the laborer, and is against the agricultural classes. What did this same oracle put forth as confidently in 1876 as he put forth his present opinion to night. In 1876 he said:

"Arts and manufactures do not spring up readily on a virgin soil."

If they do not spring up readily they must be planted; they cannot be planted without capital; and if they are planted they will not grow without protecting care. The hon. gentleman's statement is one of the bases on which the Protective policy is essentially and rightly founded. In the first place there is a tendency, as the hon. gentleman says, for "trade to remain in the beaten track." How can we get it out of the rut and induce trade to take a new course, unless we offer some inducement to turn the current, and this current must be turned if turned at all, by something we must do to foster, protect, and direct that trade? He goes on again to say:

"The advantage is on the side of a nation in which manufactures are established because money is always more easily obtained there than in a new country. Then again the possession of organized and skilled labor is an advantage that the manufacturers in a country where manufactures are established for a long time possess over a new country."

That was the strongest argument in inducing me to support a protective policy—that all along our border there was an old country, rich with manufactures long established, with home and foreign markets at its disposal, possessing an immense amount of skill and organized labor in its midst; and I saw that unless we could counterbalance those advantages they would flood our markets with their productions and destroy all prospect of our ever having any great manufactures of our own. The hon. gentleman proceeds to say that it must be shown that agriculturists are to be benefited, otherwise all these arguments fall to the ground. If it could not be shown that the agricultural interests would be helped he could not give his support to any policy of Protection. But he said:

"I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious Protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by Protection, and that the manufactures, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away."

I commend that last sentence as in a few words furnishing a complete answer to the argument of the hon. member for Middlesex, who stated that Liverpool was the market and ruled the prices of this country. Aye it is in some respects and rules the prices of certain commodities; but does the hon. gentleman mean to say that when a farmer comes to town from two or three miles distance with a load of chickens, the Liverpool market fixes the price he obtains? What rules the market is what is stated here: When the manufacturer with his employed labor is brought to the door of the farmer, the latter has a ready market for that class of produce, perishable you may call it, which he has to sell. That is what the National Policy promised and what it has given—"A home market of this kind established by protection to manufactures." That is the way to establish a home market by which "the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops." Then the hon. gentleman flies off again to the United States for illustration. He says:

"We have at our own doors all the illustrations and experience of Protection and its benefits required for our government and guidance. The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted until in 1870 their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 and disbursing over $775,500,000 in wages."

He goes on further into the very essence of this business of a Protective policy:

"British manufactures crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic,"

Just the same as American manufacturers crushed out all efforts to start manufactures in the Dominion.

"And the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect, in a few years, not only of building up manufactories, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactories before their own industries were established."

Following in the lead of this, I beg to state—not in the way of parody—that the imposition of a judicious duty on foreign goods would have the effect, in a few years, not only of building up manufactories in this country, but lead to the production of articles better in quality and lower in price than we received from the Americans. The hon. gentleman continued:

"The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher on the average than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But when a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market."

And so on. I have simply quoted from a speech delivered in this House in 1876 by the hon. member for South Norfolk.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman will allow me, as a matter of fairness, to read the conclusion of that speech, the qualifying portion of all the things he has stated. Unless he does that, he will make a false impression.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman seems to have the faculty of wearing a double shield. One side has been turned out to us, and remains turned out to us until the last paragraph is reached. Then he turns out the other side, and qualifies what he has said by stating that he only goes for a little increase; but it is really too much for me to read the balance of his speech to the House, and if the House chooses, and the Speaker will allow it, I will consider it as read and hand it to the official reporters.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must protest against the unfairness of the hon. gentleman and ask to be allowed, at the close of his remarks, to make personal explanations.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot conclude without referring to one objection made by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex. His last objection to the Tariff was that we were always tinkering at it. He wanted something to be laid down on principle and objected to this Tariff because there was no principle in it, because it was subject to no end of changes. I would call attention to this fact. There is such a thing as a plan upon which a thing is modelled, and there is an infinite diversity of detail by which it is carried out. Take, for instance, the electric light. The principle is to give a light of a certain intensity for certain uses. What would you think of the argument of a man who should go to Menlo Park and look at this lump built in one way and that lump built in another way, at this one discarded and another one taken, and should say: I don't believe in electric lighting at all; I want something founded on principle, you are always tinkering at this. That is just the very distinction that exists here. A principle underlies the policy, viz.: Protection to home industry, building up the trade and manufactures of this country. These things that the hon. gentleman objects to are simply the infinite variety of details by which that principle is carried out; and I say that it would be one of the most infinite pieces of absurdity and folly to attempt to put down in one year a cast-iron scale of duties for everything that came into the country, and never take one mould out and run the duties into another. Circumstances change; the conditions of trade change; and that Government is recreant to the duty imposed upon it, which does not keep a sharp eye on every one of these changes, and when something can be introduced that would better the condition of the country to have that introduced at once. Mr. Speaker, whatever we may have heard with reference to disasters that are impending, and that great disaster that is to come in about the space of two years, whatever we may have heard in the way of prophecy, I am fully convinced that there is in this country a spirit of hopefulness and confidence which bids all croakers take a back seat, which sets its face firmly towards the future and grows impatient of hearing this continual grumbling and depreciation. I say, to-day, that nothing inclined me to this policy more than the fact that I felt growing up within me the spirit of our wider nationality. I saw its boundless resources; its undeveloped wealth, and its magnificent future, and I could not brook that the country should be depreciated, that its great resources should be minimized, or that any influence should go forth which should be as a damper on the spirit of the people. I believe that Canada taking into account her increased resources, which she is just beginning to develop, taking into account her fisheries, which now amount to $16,000,000 per year, and which may increase almost indefinitely, has a broad and splendid future before her. She is the fourth shipping power in the world; she stands high in comparative freedom from debt—for, whatever may be said as to her debt per head, if you take the nations of Europe or the Australian colonies, you will find that Canada has less debt than any of them—you will find that her credit is strong and continually increasing, and she is becoming more and more known to the world. We have being breathed into us a subtle influence which cannot be stayed, which cannot be measured or weighed, but which goes farther to build up a country and give an impetus to its people than anything else—the strong, subtle influence of material growth, of intellectual expansion, of a something before us greater far than anything behind us. A review of the past gives us courage to look upon the future, to turn the present to our advantage, and to go forward in the race of developing our young nationality, which is destined some time to be as great as any that the sun shines on.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to make a personal explanation—or at least to read a quotation from a speech, a garbled quotation of which has been made. Any quotation can be made in a way to convey a meaning quite contrary to that which is intended by the speaker. I asked the hon. gentleman, as a matter of common fairness, to read the conclusion of that speech, and in a most unfair manner he declined to do so. With the permission of the House I will read the concluding portion of that speech:

"In conclusion I may state that I am desirous of doing everything calculated to promote the manufacturing interests of this country. But looking from my stand-point, I believe that the present Tariff is adequate; that at all events to demonstrate its inadequacy will require more time. I heartily endorse the policy of the hon. Finance Minister in declining to advance the rate beyond 17½ per cent."

That is the concluding and the qualifying in that speech, and that is the portion which the hon. gentleman most unfairly declined to quote when I asked him to do so.

Mr. BOWELL. Does that affect the principle of Protection, as advocated in the whole speech from the beginning?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all. I held that was an adequate amount of Protection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a matter of some importance. The hon. gentleman, of course, had a right to read that passage, but I think he had no right to state that the last speaker, my hon. friend who has made that able and magnificent speech, that he garbled the speech of the hon. gentleman opposite—that was the expression. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman if my hon. friend inserted a single word? If he did not read exactly what is reported? If he did so, then the hon. gentleman has committed a Parliamentary breach in saying it was garbled. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman, too, if the first part of the speech was not made before six o'clock and the last part after six o'clock? Did not the hon. gentleman whip in that clause he has read between six o'clock and eight o'clock?

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to inform the hon. First Minister that, in my estimation this was a garbled extract, because the hon. gentleman refused to read that portion of the speech which I called his attention to. I informed the hon. gentleman that he was reading from that speech in such a way as conveyed a false impression, and requested him to read the last portion of it, which he refused to do. Consequently I am justified in saying it was a garbled extract. In answer to the enquiry of the hon. First Minister: if I did not make a portion of that speech after recess? I beg to say that I made the whole of that speech before six o'clock; and when I rose to make that speech I never took my seat till the last word of it was uttered.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk. I would have gladly read the last two paragraphs. I stated if the House would allow me, I would consider them as read, and hand them to the Hansard reporter. I believe that is allowable. I had before heard hon. gentlemen simply make mention of long tables which they had, but which were not read to the House, and then had been printed in the Hansard. I was quite willing that the whole of the two paragraphs should go to the country, and be in possession of members along with the others, but I was tired, and I did not think it necessary to read the whole speech, because I read whole sentences of the speech as I found it. You garble a speech when you pick out part of a sentence, a clause which gives a wrong meaning, but when you give whole sentences and whole paragraphs I do not think it can be called garbling.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker: I have listened with a good deal of attention to the speech delivered by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), and I must confess I have probably been as much disappointed with that speech as with any speech to which I have ever listened to in this House. I have had pleasure, in other places, and on other occasions, in listening to the hon. member for King's. I have been pleased while listening to his remarks on another subject, and to-night I expected to have something from the hon. gentleman which would be new on this subject. In that I am disappointed. Hon. members will recollect that a few evenings ago, when the subject of Chinese immigration was under discussion, the hon. member for King's, rising in his place in this House, and holding up a very large volume containing perhaps, a thousand pages, said he would not inflict upon the House the reading of the whole of that volume, but he had read it completely through, and would give the conclusions which he had drawn therefrom in respect to the Chinese question. I find that the book to which the hon. member was then referring was a work prepared by a Commission appointed by the United States Government to investigate that subject, and so I fancy it contains the opinions of disinterested gentlemen on both sides of the question, and therefore I must concede that it was perfectly right for the hon. member to deal with the question.

from that stand-point and in the manner in which he did deal with it; but to-night it must be plain to every hon. gentleman who has listened to the speech just delivered that the hon. member for King's, while having had access to a book has not had access to a book of the same description. I might say that I think, although I am not Professor Cumberland, that I do not need to cross the floor and take the hon. gentleman by the hand or place my hand on his brow in order to define where his inspiration comes from. It must be patent to the House that the hon. gentleman has simply read the Budget Speeches of the Finance Minister, with, perhaps, a few extracts thrown in from speeches by the hon. member for Lincoln. In the hon. gentleman's opening remarks he alluded to our prosperity existing at the present time in the different Provinces which go to make up this Dominion. But there was one thing which I remarked particularly, that while the hon. gentleman thought it worth while to name Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, he omitted to name the Province of which he is a representative in this House. I make no apology to-night for any remarks I may make on this subject in dealing with it from the stand-point of my own Province; that has been my custom in years past when speaking on this question, and I intend to follow the same line to-night. I think I am justified, more fully, in taking the course I now propose to adopt, on account of the action of the hon. member for King's, who represents the county adjoining my own. There are particulars connected with the National Policy and Tariff which bear, perhaps, more heavily upon that Province than upon any other Province in the Dominion, and it is to those features which, I think, bear especially heavy upon our Province that I propose to call attention. The hon. member for King's has said something with respect to the National Policy. He has gone so far as to endorse what has been said in its favor by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not to-night prepared—notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman has not alluded to it—to deny that New Brunswick is in a somewhat more prosperous condition than it was some three or four years ago, but I deny that the increased prosperity in that Province is in a large measure due to the National Policy. I should have liked the hon. gentleman, while addressing himself to the subject, to have pointed out what the National Policy has done for that Province during the last year. I recollect, in the three or four Budget Speeches to which I have had the pleasure of listening, it has been customary on three of the above occasions, at least, for the hon. Finance Minister to dwell largely on the benefit it was doing his native Province, and referred to the tall chimnies going up in all directions—or rather in prospective. But no such allusion was made in the Budget Speech to which we have listened this Session; the only fair inference is that no very great increase has taken place in the manufacturing interests in New Brunswick. Since we last met I am aware a cotton factory has been started at St. Stephen, or rather near the St. Croix, and in that connection I may say that, sitting on my right is a pronounced opponent of the Government on the trade question, and one who was strenuously opposed by the Dominion Government, and yet he carried the county and polled a majority of votes in a parish in the vicinity of the cotton factory. It is true that some changes have taken place in the representatives from New Brunswick since we last met, but to say that the question of the National Policy has in any way influenced the change that has taken place in any county save perhaps Westmoreland, would be saying too much. I am not going to allude to other causes which I believe has had as much to do with effecting the change as the advocacy of the National Policy in those counties, but I said that New Brunswick was more prosperous than she had been three or four years ago, and I think I can show very clear, good and sufficient reasons why such is the case. I have taken the trouble within the last day or two to prepare a table showing the exports of New Brunswick before the National Policy was inaugurated, taking 1879, as they claim that in 1879 the effect of the policy had not been felt, and I show how the exports of farm produce from that Province in that year compare with those in 1882. In 1879, 138 horses were exported, of the value of $13,762; in 1882, 511 were exported, of the value of $55,315. Of sheep in 1879, 12,301 were exported, of the value of $24,154; in 1882, 27,130 were exported, of the value of $70,510; or, to put it in another way, the sheep exported in 1879 realized only $2 per head, while those in 1882 realized $2.60. The value of poultry exported in 1879 was $1,936, while in 1882 it was $6,023. Then, Sir, I find that butter—of course it is true, that no additional duty is placed on butter—in 1878, New Brunswick exported 2,727 lbs., realizing $537; but for the last year in the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the export of this article increased to 64,185 lbs., just twenty times the quantity exported in 1879. Then, Sir, in eggs we find that 579,432 were exported in 1879, realizing $66,249, at an average of 11 cts. a dozen, while in 1882 our farmers in New Brunswick exported 727,616 dozen, realizing $123,076, or an average of 17 cts. a dozen, and this in face of the fact that there was a largely increased home market, as hon. gentlemen opposite claim due to the National Policy. Of hides and skins in 1879 we exported $15,000 worth in round numbers, while in 1882 we exported $20,000 worth. Then, of mutton, in 1879 the farmers of New Brunswick exported 6,706 lbs., for which they received only $33, while in 1882 they exported 193,785 lbs., for which they received $11,190. Of hay, in 1879 they exported 476 tons, realizing $5,046, and in 1882, 2,311 tons, valued at $21,440. Then, of potatoes—which is the principal crop, I may say, of the farmers of New Brunswick—in 1878-79, the whole quantity exported was 47,161 bushels, for which they obtained $18,948, or an average of 40 cts. a bushel; but what do we find last year? They have exported to the United States market, 323,894 bushels, for which they obtained an average of 70 cts. a bushel, or a total of $218,084, an increase in this article alone, as compared with 1879 for 1882, of from $18,009 to $218,000. Then we come to vegetables. Now, it would be supposed that the largely increased home market which was to be created by the National Policy, in New Brunswick, would certainly afford a market for all the vegetables we could produce; but I find that the exports of vegetables increased 100 per cent., in 1882, as compared with 1879; or taking the whole of the exports of farming produce from New Brunswick, in 1879, we find that they amount in value to $189,000, as compared with $578,476, in 1882. Now, it does occur to me, that if the hon. member for King's, who represents a farming constituency, took the trouble to look up the figures, he would have ascertained beyond all manner of doubt, that this has had more to do with the increased prosperity of the county which he has the honor of representing, than has the National Policy; because, I say this, that if the hon. gentleman were now in his place, I would challenge him to show that any more manufacturing is done in his county to-day, than before the introduction of the National Policy. I go further. Before the introduction of the National Policy in the town of Sussex, which is the principal town in his county, they had a shoe factory, which was then, I think, in a flourishing condition. Sir, I am sorry to say, I regret very much to say, that since the introduction of this National Policy—I do not say that this is by any means due to it—this factory has gone down, and the capital invested in it, has not realized fifty cents on the dollar. It has changed hands since, and I hope and trust that it may make progress in the future, and prove a good investment for the stockholders; but I do assert, that there is no more manufacturing done in the hon. gentleman's county to-day than before the introduction of the National Policy. I have not yet come to what I believe to be the true cause of the prosperity which has come to the people of New Brunswick during these last two years. Any gentleman who will take the trouble to look at the Trade Returns, will find that, taking one year with another, lumber forms four-fifths of the exports of our Province; and this being the case, it must be admitted that any considerable increase in the price of it affects us favorably, and that any serious decline in the price of it affects us unfavorably. Now, it is the fact, that, during the last year or two, the price of lumber has gone up in foreign markets. It has not affected the export of it very much, which is not much larger than it was heretofore; but taking the article of lumber for 1879-80, what do we find? That the whole of the products of the forest exported from New Brunswick, during that year, amounted to $4,031,000, while, taking the year 1882, the quantity was not largely in excess, but the amount realized was $5,444,000, leaving a clear balance in favor of the Province, on this article alone, of nearly $1,500,000 in round numbers. Now, I think that this, above all other things, has had to do with the increased prosperity of the Province; but, Sir, we will look a little further, and take the total exports of the Province of New Brunswick for 1879-80, during that time of depression, and compare the exports with last year: $5,371,401 are put down as the value of our exports for 1879-80, and $7,474,407 for 1882, or a difference of $2,102,000 in favor of 1882, showing a large gain in our exports, which has most certainly gone into the pockets of the people, and this has had much more to do with our increased prosperity than the National Policy. There is another feature connected with the Tariff which I think it would have been well for the hon. member for King's to have addressed himself to—that is the unfairness of the Tariff. Admitting that it has been adopted for the good of the country, that the manufacturers have pronounced favorably upon it, and that it has been accepted by the people, nevertheless it remains that these manufacturers are coming here continually and asking to have the Tariff readjusted; and it is also the fact that the demands made upon the Government by the manufacturers are being acceded to every Session by the Finance Minister. Suppose we consider how this Tariff affects the farming interests which is represented by the hon. member for King's, as compared with the manufacturers. By way of illustration I will give another item or two from the Trade Returns as they apply to my own Province. In 1882, the last year to which these Returns refer, I find that New Brunswick imported 302,759 lbs. of lard, valued at $34,620, of pork 1,904,279 lbs., valued at $168,405, and of beef 80,803 lbs., entered for consumption—and a very much larger quantity was imported for ship stores, I imagine—valued at $4,959; and on this an average duty was collected of 12½ per cent. It does seem to me that if the hon. gentleman were to look into this matter, as I have suggested, he would agree with me, that in the readjustment of the Tariff, a change could be made that would be in the interest of his constituents, and which, I think, is asked for by the farmers of the country: and that is, if the high Tariff which has existed up to the present time and which applies to all the articles that they consume, is to be maintained, a change is absolutely necessary in the duties which are imposed on these articles that are produced by the farmers of the country. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman to-night has alluded to struggling industries which needed building up by Protection. I want to know if the farming industry of a Province which does not produce a sufficient quantity of pork to supply the wants of its people, is not a struggling industry, and whether our farmers are not entitled to as much Protection as are the manufacturers of this country. Of course I may be told that the increased duty on pork would affect the lumbermen. I admit it would; but if hon.

gentlemen opposite are to be believed it would not affect them, as the producer pays the duty, and what I wish, is that in that case that duty may be put on pork, which would come out of the Yankees, because we get our pork from them. I desire next to call attention to the promises which were made to the people of the Maritime Provinces, that this policy was a retaliatory policy, that its object was to compel the Americans to give us Reciprocity. I am satisfied that if our people could be convinced of the fact that Reciprocity could be promoted by a continuation of this policy, they would not hesitate very much to consent to it. But our hopes in that respect have been dispelled, for the hon. Finance Minister has told us that this Tariff is to be perpetual that it is to last as long as Canada lasts. It may be said that there are resolutions in the Tariff which provide for the free exchange of the natural products of the country. I admit that they are there, but I think no one will assert that they are likely ever to effect anything in the way of Reciprocity, or will deny that something more must be offered to the people of the United States before they will trade with us on reciprocal terms. I was sorry that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) did not make some points on this question, to which I might have replied, but I failed to see any. It is true the hon. gentleman alluded to the increase of debt under the Mackenzie Administration; but he might have stated, in all fairness, that a very large amount of that increase was due to the obligations imposed upon his Government by the Government which preceded them. I was much amused with another idea of the hon. gentleman, and that was, that an increase of the Tariff which increased the revenue did not impose taxation. I would like to bring that point home to him in a homely way, but in a way which, if he could not understand, many of his constituents would. In 1867, and even later, after the Province of New Brunswick had entered into Confederation, the whole amount of Customs and Excise duty did not exceed $3 a head, and at all events we were assured before we went into Confederation that it would not exceed $2.75 per head for many years after we came in. No one will deny that at the present time it has increased to $6 a head. The hon. gentleman's county ten years ago contained in round numbers about 25,000 inhabitants, and I think I am safe in stating that it has not increased much during that time. Now, if 25,000 people paid $3 ten years ago, it would make $75,000; but this amount has been increased to $150,000, and as the hon. gentleman has told us that the Post Office Department has become a source of revenue, he will not claim that the money expended in his county for carrying the mails is a fair charge against that $150,000. Nor do I think he will claim that any portion of $150,000 goes towards the running of the line of railway which passes through his county. I would like to ask him to point out to me what his county gets for this increase of $75,000 of taxes imposed upon it during the last ten years over and above what was imposed before. The hon. gentleman tells us that an increased revenue does not mean an increase of taxation; but I think as applied to his county that this is the case—I know it is in mine. It is true that there is a difference in counties along the coast which have been provided with lights and harbors, but in the inland counties the return is far less for the money expended than it was some years ago. The hon. Finance Minister in closing his financial statement the other night, said he had been taunted last year with not having a following from his own Province, and that this year he had a majority. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can, as things stand at present, claim a majority, but he owes that not to the votes of the electors of Albert county, but to the decision of a Judge. The courts will settle the question of whether he has a majority or not. In Restigouche the hon. member who has the honor to occupy the seat formerly held by my friend Mr. Haddow was not, I think, the gentleman whom the hon. Minister of Finance was anxious to see returned. He may support the hon. gentleman's policy, or he may not, but I believe he was not the candidate whom the hon. Finance Minister desired to see elected. The hon. member for Northumberland, judging by the expressions on the floor of this House and by his speeches elsewhere, does not fully agree with the hon. Minister of Finance with regard to this policy. I think I have heard him complain bitterly of the imposition of the tax on the lumbermen, and that he hoped to see these wrongs redressed. In fact that hon. gentleman stooped so low as to mention cornmeal—something which would not be tolerated on the part of myself and others of this side of the House, though the hon. member for Northumberland was allowed to refer to it. We come next to the county of Westmoreland which is so ably represented by the hon. gentleman who defeated the late member, but it is not unknown, in fact it is currently believed, that that hon. gentleman while representing Westmoreland, and dealing with the National Policy, represents at the same time investments he has made in manufacturing in that county. I am glad he thought proper to invest his means in that way, but at the same time he cannot be called quite disinterested in his views upon that question. I shall say little with regard to the hon. member for King's, for everybody knows that while the late hon. member for that county was prepared to swallow the National Policy, as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway bargain, fully as much may be expected from the hon. gentleman who succeeds him. Before taking my seat I wish to allude a moment to two notable predictions which have emanated from the Finance Department during the past year. Everybody on the floor of this House and throughout the country remembers the prediction of a gentleman calling himself the Astronomer to the Finance Department, that a great storm would sweep over the continent in the month of March.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The only regret of hon. gentlemen on the other side is that the storm did not come.

Mr. KING. I am glad it did not come; and there is just this difference between the prediction made by the astronomer of this Department and that made by the head of the Department—that the prediction of the astronomer, if it did no good, did no harm; it at least made the newspapers sell. But the prediction the hon. the Finance Minister made the other night is calculated to do more harm, if the hon. gentleman fails in his prediction, than the prediction made by the gentleman to whom I refer. He predicted that we are going to have seven years of plenty. I hope we may; but it strikes me that the hon. gentleman has not much of a foundation on which to rest that prediction. If he could look into the future, and foresee that for seven years to come the Province which he represents would be able to obtain good prices in foreign markets for its exports of lumber, he might claim that that Province, for that time at least, would be prosperous; but I think he will not claim that our lumber can maintain its price in those countries, and therefore I think he is going out of his way to predict prosperity for that Province. I think he is equally astray with reference to the other Provinces of the Dominion. If he could predict that we should have seven years of good crops, he might predict seven years of plenty; but as it is impossible for him to know what is going to take place, he is not certain that his prediction will be borne out. I will not take up the time of the House any longer. I am only sorry that the hon. member for King's did not address himself to the question of the Tariff in the interest of the constituency he represents.

Mr. JAMIESON. It was not my intention, until a few minutes ago, to take any part in the debate, and at this late hour I will not detain the House at any great length. I have been a little surprised at the tone of the debate, and the matter which has been introduced into it. I do not know how it may have been in other constituencies during the last Election, but my opponent, who represented the Liberal interest, stated publicly at the meetings that were held, that the National Policy was not an issue in that contest. I judge, however, from the speeches that have been delivered in this House by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, that the National Policy is still an issue in Canadian politics. I am here to represent a constituency composed largely of two classes, the agricultural class and the manufacturing class. It may not be known, perhaps, that in that constituency there are at present some fourteen woollen mills, some of them of large capacity, employing a large number of people. Now, I think, I would not be true to my constituents, I would be recreant to my duty as a public man and a representative of the people, if upon the floor of this House I either advocated or supported a policy which would bear heavily upon one class of my constituents for the advantage of another class. I am of opinion that the policy which was so auspiciously inaugurated in 1879, has been for the benefit of all classes in the Dominion. I have a few figures in my possession which, I think, will be sufficient to satisfy this House that, so far as the manufacturing industries in my own riding are concerned, it has been a very great advantage. I apprehend we shall have to judge of the effects of this policy largely from personal experience, because it is utterly impossible, in many instances, to find statistics that will enlighten us upon this question. Some time ago I called upon a man engaged in a manufacturing industry in the town in which I reside, and asked for some figures which would enable me to point out in some significant way any benefit the town had derived from the operation of this policy. I found that in 1878 the number of hands employed in the woollen industry of that town was 386. When I say employed, I mean only partially employed, for at that time they were working scarcely more than half time—or three-quarters time. That town was in anything but a prosperous condition at that time. I think there were something over 100 tenantless houses which were erected for the accommodation of those engaged in the factories; but owing to the depression which existed in that industry it was impossible for the employers of labor to increase the industry to any extent. At the present time the number of hands employed in these woollen mills alone is 690, against 386 in 1878. Now, a good deal has been said in the discussion of the National Policy on the results predicted by the hon. Finance Minister with reference to keeping Canada for the Canadians. I have heard the statement made with a good deal of stress cast upon it by the hon. member for South Middlesex, that the policy in that respect had been fruitless; that it had not secured Canada for the Canadians. I believe the hon. member for South Middlesex is not in a position to sustain that statement by facts. I would simply ask what is the test of keeping Canada for the Canadians. I apprehend that if the people of this country are employed, that is keeping Canada for the Canadians. I would ask any hon. gentleman if there are any unemployed people at present in this country? Every man who is disposed to work, and is capable of working, can secure employment and at higher wages than he could under the late Administration. That is what I understand to be keeping Canada for the Canadians. The hon. member for South Middlesex did not proceed very far until he told us that labor was so scarce, the farmers of his section were contemplating the introduction of labor-saving machines, such as self-binders. I think that demonstrates to a certainty that the laboring classes of the country are now fully employed. I may say in addition to what I have said in reference to the number of hands employed in the industries of my town, that since 1878, wages have increased 25 per cent. on an average. This policy has been very beneficial so far as the laboring classes are concerned, and, I believe, has also largely benefited all classes of the community. The result of the last General Election shows that the people of the Dominion are thoroughly satisfied with that policy, and that, so far as they are concerned, they will endorse the statement of the hon. Finance Minister that it must be perpetual. I should hesitate to advocate the permanence of a policy of that kind if I believed for a moment that any single class of the community would be injured by it. But I have failed to find any data in the discussion on this subject from which a deduction could reasonably be made that this policy was prejudicial to any interest in the Dominion at large. If it gives employment to the people, as no doubt it does, at least so far as my constituency is concerned, and if the laboring classes receive higher wages, I think they have been largely benefited, and can afford to pay higher for the necessaries of life. A remark was made by the hon. member for South Norfolk in reference to the duty on wool, to the effect that the hon. the Finance Minister was not legislating in the interest of the farmer because he had not imposed a duty on all grades of wool. Well, I have no doubt that, if our farmers cultivated the grade of wool required by manufacturers, it would be only a pleasure to the manufacturers to purchase that wool; but I understand from skilled men, that it is impossible in this country to produce the class of wool required by the large majority of our manufacturers. If that is the case, I do not see what great benefit it would be to the farmers to have a duty imposed upon fine wool. In the town in which I reside, all the mills, except one employing twenty-five hands, run upon fine wool which they cannot procure in the Dominion, and if a duty were imposed on this wool, it would only cripple them without aiding our farmers. I recollect in my election campaign, I was brought to task on this question. I was asked if I would advocate the imposition of a duty on fine wool. I replied without hesitation that I would not, because I thought it was against the interests of the people to put a duty on the raw material which entered into manufactures. I was frequently told by those politically opposed to me that I was not acting in the interest of farmers by not advocating this duty. They said that the low price of Canadian wool was largely due to the fact that the manufacturers of this country imported their wool from abroad. In every instance where parties took that position I found they themselves wore clothes produced from fine wool and would not wear the class of goods produced from Canadian wool. Thus it is that as the country becomes more prosperous, employment and money more plentiful, people wear finer clothes than they would if the contrary were the case. I will not detain the House at greater length. I have treated this question, perhaps, from a local stand-point, for it seemed to me such was the proper course to pursue; for, if I except a few figures given by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, all the speeches on this question, so far as I can recollect, were from a general stand-point; and I hope I have not wearied the House in my statement of the few facts I have given. I have strong faith in that policy, in developing the industries of this country. I do not believe it is inimical to any class of people in the Dominion; and I have no doubt that, with the experience we have had of that policy in the past, the people of this country will hesitate before they place any gentlemen on the Treasury benches, who will go for reversing a policy which has been so advantageous to the people of the whole Dominion.

Mr. WIGLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:35 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 6th April, 1883.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That the House go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. WIGLE. Mr. Speaker: I do not rise for the purpose of making any very lengthened remarks to-day, in this debate on the Budget Speech, which was brought down by the hon. Finance Minister a week ago; but, representing as I do, Sir, a constituency which is largely interested in the growing of raw leaf tobacco, and having had some experience in the purchase and shipment of tobacco, I feel that I would not be doing my duty to my constituents if I did not make a few remarks upon this question. I wish, however, before making any remarks on this particular question, to make a few observations with reference to what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. If we took everything they said to be true, we would be led to believe that times were better from 1873 to 1878, when they were in power, than they have been since the National Policy was in force. I always understood, before I came to this House, that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), were good debaters, but after hearing them make their speeches, I have come to the conclusion that they are either not good debaters, or that they have a very poor subject. I think it must be hard for them, when the Government which they supported from 1873 to 1878, was compelled to come down to the House, year after year, with a deficit, amounting in the five years to $7,000,000—I say after such a record it must be hard for them to stand up and criticise the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, who showed a surplus of $8,000,000 in one year. For that reason I do not wonder that they seem to feel dissatisfied themselves with the speeches they have made. I think, Sir, that the business of the country should be carried on upon the same principle as a successful man would carry on a private business. I am a general merchant, and we will suppose I hire an accountant or overseer of my business for five years. At the end of the five years he shows that it has cost me to run the business, $5,000 a year, but he has a surplus for the five years of $10,000. Another gentleman comes along and says he can run my business better and more economically than the other, and believing him I engage him to do my business for the next five years. At the end of the next five years he shows that he has conducted my business for $1,000 less a year than the other; but when I ask him to deduct liabilities from assets, he shows me that instead of being $10,000 ahead I am $7,000 behind. When we ask these hon. gentlemen to explain why they had a deficit of $7,000,000, they say that they carried on the affairs of the country better than hon. gentlemen on this side, because their expenditure was less than that of the Conservative Government. I say that the same principle applies as in the case I have mentioned. One hon. gentleman on the other side, who spoke in French, but whose remarks were translated to me, said that if they went to the country to-day the people would send supporters of the Opposition to take the places of the Government. That must be very consoling to these hon. gentlemen. But there has been a little calculation of this matter showing that if in future General Elections the Reformers gain at the same rate as they gained at the last, they will be able to come into power in just fifty-five years from the present time. I think that it is right that they should be in power once every fifty-five years; it is right that each generation should have five years' experience of their government in order that they should appreciate good government from those on this side of the House. I have had five years' experience of their government in my lifetime, and goodness knows I do not want any more of it. The only thing that troubles me now is the thought that my children will have to have five years' experience of it. The hon. member who criticised the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, read an article from the Mail newspaper, proving that wheat was worth less in 1879, after the National Policy, than it was in 1878, before the National Policy; and the argument of this hon. gentleman, from beginning to end, is that the National Policy has done the farmers no good. I propose to show that the National Policy has done the farmers good—that it has done them good in many instances, and that in none has it done them harm. With reference to the price of wheat. We always said that we knew that the markets of the Old Country governed the markets of Canada; but if the price of wheat ever happens to be lower in the United States than in Canada then the National Policy would do the farmers good, but if it is dearer we did not pretend to say that it would do them good. I propose to show that it has been dearer in Canada than in the United States since the National Policy. The hon. member for Brant quoted from the Mail newspaper, and he compared the 12th September, 1878, with the 11th September, 1879. On the 12th September, 1878, the price of fall wheat in Toronto was $1.06 to $1.10; No. 2, $1.02 to $1.03; spring No. 1, $1.02 to $1.02; No. 2, 97 cts. to 98 cts.; oats, 27 cts. to 28 cts.; barley, No. 1, $1.05; and peas, 60 cts. to 70 cts. On the 11th September, 1879, the price, in Toronto, of fall wheat was $1.02 to $1.04; No. 2, $1 to $1.02; spring No. 1, 98 cts. to $1; No. 2, 96 cts. to 97 cts.; oats, 31 cts. to 32 cts.; barley, 60 cts.; peas, 63 cts. to 65 cts. We find in the very same number of the Mail, that of the 11th September, 1879, after the National Policy was in force, that wheat, in the city of Toronto, was worth from $1 to $1.02, while the same kind was worth, in Chicago, 89 cts. Going farther back, and taking August the 11th, 1879, we find that wheat, in Toronto, was worth 98 cts., while the same kind was worth, in Chicago, 84½ cts. to 84¾ cts. Taking July 11th, 1879, we find that fall wheat was worth, in Toronto, $1 to $1.10, while, in Chicago, it was worth 90½ cts. to 90¾ cts., and in Detroit, $1.02½. I know of my own knowledge that a company owning a mill in Windsor, opposite Detroit, would have gone to Detroit to buy wheat for the mill, but on account of the 15 cts. duty they had to stay at home; and they went down the lake thirty or forty miles and bought wheat for $1.05 and paid the freight. I ask if that miller would not have gone to Detroit and paid out our money to the people of the United States, and allowed our farmers to either keep their wheat at home or take less for it if we had not had the National Policy. Suppose we had no National Policy, and wheat was down to 80 cts. a bushel; the farmer would sell his 100 bushels of wheat for $80; he would take that money and pay it to the retail merchant, the retail merchant would send it to the wholesale merchant in the United States, the wholesale merchant in the United States would pay it to the United States manufacturer, the manufacturer would pay it out to the workingmen in his employ, and the workingmen would pay it to the farmers of the United States. So that but for the National Policy, the money would go to the United States, while we would be using American manufactured goods. But under this policy, if the farmer sells a 100 bushels of wheat for $80, he pays the money to the retailer here, the retailer pays it to the wholesaler, the wholesaler pays it to the manufacturer, the manufacturer pays it to the laboring men, and the laboring men pay it back again to the farmers of this country. That is the effect of the National Policy, and these hon. gentlemen cannot deny it. The hon. member for North Norfolk, last night, stated that he had looked carefully over the price of wheat since the National Policy had been in force, and that not in a single instance did he find that wheat was cheaper in the United States than it was in Canada. I say that five or six months after the National Policy came into force, wheat was cheaper in the United States than it was in Canada. There is another thing I happen to know something about, and that is dressed There is a duty of a $1 per hundred on them. A little hogs, more than a year ago I sold hogs in Essex Centre, sixteen miles from Detroit, for from $8.10 to $8.15 per hundred, and sent them to the pork packers in Montreal, while at the same time the price in Detroit was from $7.30 to $7.40 per hundred. I would ask hon. gentlemen if that duty of a $1 a hundred had not existed on dressed hogs, do they think the pork packers of Montreal would stop at a small village like Essex Centre and pay $8.10 or $8.15 per hundred, when they could go to Detroit, six miles further, and get them for $7.30 or $7.40? So we find that the Canadian farmer gets 60 cts. or 70 cts. per hundred more for his hogs than he would have got without the National Policy. The whole drift of the hon. gentleman's speech is that the National Policy has not been a benefit to the farmers. Has it not given the farmers of this country a market in Manitoba? The effect of this policy has been to bring money back into the same channels that it originally leaves. Suppose a man in Ontario sells his farm for $5,000, and goes to the North-West and pays $3,000 for the land; when he comes to stock that land, he takes $2,000 and sends it back into the same channels that it comes from at first. What hon. gentlemen opposite want, is, that he should take his money to Manitoba, and that when he wants to stock his farm he should send his money into the United States; but that is not the policy of the Conservative party. Suppose a man buys a horse in this country, and pays $100 for it, that $100 circulates in the Province of Ontario. Suppose he takes that horse to Manitoba and sells it for $150, and, after paying expenses, has a profit of $20 or $25. If we had not that policy, instead of coming to this country for their horses, the farmers of Manitoba would go to Minnesota or Dakota. That would satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. So the National Policy is not only a benefit to the farmer, but the man who makes his profit of $20 or $25 pays that to a tailor for a suit of clothes; the tailor pays his butcher's bills; the butcher pays his blacksmith, and so the money is circulated throughout the country. But hon. gentlemen opposite want the money to go to the United States and circulate it amongst the tailors and manufacturers of that country. The National Policy has also done this country a great deal of good in reference to harness, and so forth. I was in Toronto last winter, and I went to a harness manufacturer to get a bridle. He did not know who I was, and I did not know who he was. He said to me: "My Reform leaders told me that the National Policy would not be a good thing for this country; but I did not know them then as well as I do now, and I voted for the Reform party; but since then I have found that I was mistaken. This very day a gentleman from Manitoba came in and left an order for harness, for which he paid me $1,200 in cash." This gentleman employed some thirty hands, and he paid that money to them in wages, and they boarded on the farmers of this country. Is not that a benefit to the country? Hon. gentlemen opposite would prefer to have that $1,200 paid to the United States to circulate among the farmers there, instead of among our own farmers. I was going along a road a short time ago, and I saw a sign-board on which was painted: "Cash paid for wheat," and a hand was pointing down the road. I looked down, and I saw the burnt ruins of a mill that had been there about fifteen years before; but that sign-board remained, although not a bushel had been purchased during that period, and the mill had been burnt down for fifteen years. Such, I thought, was the Reform party. They have been advocating reforms since Confederation, but, like the old finger-board, they are pointing to the reforms without carrying them out. The people of this country have also been benefited by the National Policy in the article of nails. On the 18th of February, 1880, nails in the city of Detroit were worth $5.35 a keg, less 2 per cent. for cash, which made the price $5.24 per keg for cash. On the 9th of the same month they were quoted by Benny, MacPherson & Co., Montreal, at $3.50 per keg, less 5 per cent. for cash, which made the price $3.33 for cash. So we find that, in February, 1880, nails were $3.30 per keg in this country, under the National Policy, and $5.24 per keg in the United States. Now, suppose we had no National Policy, we would have been compelled to depend upon the United States for our nails, as we did before, and would have had to pay $5.24 per keg, and 17½ per cent. duty in addition, which would amount to $6.16 per keg. That would make a difference to us of $2.62 per keg. Now, why was it that nails were $5.24 in the United States and only $3.33 in this country? Because the manufacturer of nails in the United States made a corner in nails, and put up the price. Well, Sir, the manufacturers of nails in the United States can corner the Yankees, but not the Canadians any more, for we are making our own nails. That is the answer to that. I have been in the general mercantile business for the last eighteen years, dealing in all kinds of goods manufactured in this country, and I defy any hon. gentleman in this House, whether a merchant or not, to prove that a single article used by the mass of the people here is any dearer than it was before the National Policy. Ready-made clothing is cheaper to-day than at any time since Confederation, so are boots and shoes—and the farmers get as much for the hides as they ever did—so are clothes, and better as well; and we have the fact that in our own country we manufacture our wool which we grow in the country. These facts account for some of the success under the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that because 30 or 40 per cent. duty is charged on cloth imported from the United States, we have to pay that much more for it. Such is not the case. The duty was put on, not for the purpose of making our people pay it, but for the purpose of keeping American shoddy out of the country and giving our own manufacturers a chance to manufacture our own wool. A man can buy 100 lbs. of our own wool for $25, take it to the manufacturer and have it made up for 40 cts., making a total of 65 cts. for a yard of cloth containing a pound of good long wool in it. I believe to-day that if party were left out of the question there would not be 500 people in this Dominion who would not be Protectionists. These gentlemen got on the wrong string of the bow, and the people told them to skip out of office, that they wanted men who would look after their interests. They saw that the Liberal Conservative party was the party which looked after the interests of the country. They adopted the principles of that party, and are bound to keep them up for at least the next fifty-five years. I do not propose to take up the time of this House any longer than necessary; but, before I speak on the tobacco question, I wish to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for West Middlesex the other day. That hon. gentleman said that the hon. Finance Minister, in replying to some remarks about 40 per cent. duty on blankets going into the North-West, said: "Oh, but we allow sausage skins to come in free;" and the hon. member for Middlesex proceeded to say that the people of the North-West had to pay 40 per cent. more for blankets on account of the National Policy. No business man would argue in that way. The wool is grown, manufactured, and sold here. Forty per cent. on a blanket that costs 50 cts. per lb., means 20 cts. per lb. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the people pay 20 cts. per lb. more for blankets than they did previous to the National Policy? They can buy blankets for 52½ cts. per lb., not of the best quality, and pure wool blankets at 60 cts. per lb.; the wool is grown and manufactured in our own country without a single cent of duty being paid on it, while the blankets imported from the Old Country are made out of short poor shoddy wool. Gentlemen in the riding I represent, have told the farmers that they had to pay 40 per cent. more for shirting than before. Well, when one large merchant, who was a strong Reformer, was telling that at a meeting in South Essex, one of the farmers present said: "You can tell that, but you cannot make me believe it. I used to pay 22 cts. per yard for the kind of shirting I have on, before the National Policy, but now I get it for 18 cts. You cannot make me believe that I pay 10 cts. per yard more for it now, because I buy and pay for it myself, and know exactly what I pay for it." These hon. gentlemen argue that the poor man has to pay more on account of the National Policy. I say he does not, and can prove what I say. The more factories we have the less we will have to pay for our manufactured goods. These hon. gentlemen point at the United States, and say: "Look at the manufactured goods we bring from there." What better evidence could you have to prove that the National Policy is a good thing, than to refer to a country where they have had a National Policy for years—a policy which has brought them to where they are. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they sent the hon. George Brown to Washington, at an expense to the country of $6,000, in order to bring about a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. What was the reply? The people there replied, in so many words: We had a Reciprocity Treaty with you at one time but we abrogated it, and we do not want any more Reciprocity Treaty, because we have adopted a Protective policy, and are looking out for our own people and our own manufacturers. Tell the Reform party we are looking out for ourselves, and when we want a Reciprocity Treaty we will let you know. The right hon. leader of the Government, who was then in Opposition, tried to induce hon. gentlemen opposite to bring down a Protective policy, but what was their answer? They said: "We are only flies on the wheel," and if we attempted to bring one down, the people of the United States would retaliate. They were flies on the wheel, and were like all other flies. You have a small sore on the end of your little finger, let a fly light on your hand, and he will find out the sore spot, and others will follow, not for the purpose of assisting to cure it, but to make it a larger sore—exactly like the flies on the other side. If they find a sore spot on the National Policy, they pounce on it, not for the purpose of assisting to heal it, but to make it worse. The people of this country, however, have found out the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite, and every time they come before them, say: We will elect you to take your seat in the Opposition; you are natural born Oppositionists, and not meant naturally to take the reins of Government. And the people will carry that plan out at least for the next fifty-five years. I wish now to make a few remarks with reference to tobacco. According to the Census Returns, 399,870 lbs. were grown in Ontario in 1871, and 169,280 lbs. in 1881—a decrease of over 100 per cent. In the Province of Quebec, 1,195,345 lbs. were grown in 1871, and 2,356,581 lbs. in 1881, an increase of 100 per cent. If in Ontario the growth of tobacco decreased on an average of 10 per cent. a year, while in Quebec in the same period it increased 10 per cent., there must be some reason for it. In Ontario, especially in the south-western portion where we grow grapes and peaches equal to any grown in the Southern States, and corn as much to the acre and better, there must have been something wrong, or the growth of tobacco would not have decreased in Ontario and increased in Quebec. How do we account for it? We find there was a duty put on tobacco of 4 cts. per lb. In Ontario the Inland Revenue officer followed the seed to the field where it was sown, and then followed the plant from the field to the bonded warehouse, where the purchaser could only look at it through the cracks from outside. There was too much red-tapeism about it, so the farmers made up their minds it was not worth the trouble to raise it. That was the cause of the decrease in growth in Ontario. But it will be asked how came the growth to be increased 100 per cent. in Quebec, where the law was the same. There, however, the law was not carried out, and I do not blame the farmers for evading it, nor the officers for not seeing that it was carried out, because otherwise they would have had to stop the growth in Quebec as they did in Ontario. We find that, in Quebec, 2,000,000 lbs. were grown in 1831, and that the duty collected amounted only to $15,128, or a little over the duty on 300,000 lbs., so that about 2,000,000 lbs. in 1882, and the same amount in 1881, paid no duty at all. I would then draw the attention of the Minister to this point: that when this new law is brought down, it should be simplified, so that the people of Ontario and Quebec will be able to grow tobacco, and I am satisfied the country then will be in a better shape in five years from now. I think I could propose a change which would be better than that proposed by the hon. Finance Minister. In 1879, there was a duty in the United States of 24 cts. per lb., which was reduced to 16 cts. Our Government reduced the Excise duty to 20 cts. on American leaf and 8 cts. on Canadian leaf manufactured, making a difference of 12 cts. between the two. In 1882, an Act was passed imposing a duty of 8 cts. per lb. for two years on Canadian leaf manufactured, and after that 10 cts., so that there would be a difference of 12 cts. for the first two years and 10 cts. after that. It was also made law that Canada leaf tobacco could not be manufactured in a factory where American leaf was manufactured, in order that factories might be established for the manufacture of Canadian leaf only. Under that law only one factory was established in the Dominion. It would have been better if the duty had been 12 cts. per lb. on American leaf tobacco, with Canada leaf allowed to go free, at least for one year from next July, in order that the difference of 12 cts. might be kept up until the time those gentlemen supposed it would be equivalent to 12 cts. per lb. Protection, and after that charge the Excise at 10 cts. I believe it would be better if a duty of 10 cts. per lb. were charged on American leaf tobacco brought into this country, and 2 cts. on all manufactured tobacco, and allow Canada leaf to be manufactured in the same factories with American leaf. Instead, then, of having only one factory to take Canadian leaf, all the factories would use it. But I am perfectly willing a trial should be given to the law as it stands. I believe we can grow as good tobacco in Western Ontario—especially in the county of Essex, where we have such a good climate, and where the frosts leaves the ground at least two weeks earlier in the spring and returns two weeks later than in any other part—as that grown in the Southern States. In the course of two or three years, protected as we are now, I believe we shall be able to show as good tobacco grown in Essex, as that grown in the Southern States. I believe that the desire of the Government is to do what they think best for the people of our own country with reference to the growing of it, and I hope that the regulations will be simplified so that the farmer can grow it without so much restriction. I have now, on the strength of this change, got seed which is particularly adapted to this climate, and enough of it to plant 300 acres in the part of the country which I represent; and I hope that in less than five years from now, before my time will have expired in this House, I can bring tobacco here and show to the hon. members here in this House something that cannot be excelled even in the United States. I have nothing more to say on this question. I hope everything will come out as we expect; and I would just say that, so long as the hon. gentlemen at present sitting on the Treasury benches carry on the affairs of the country in the future as they have done in the past, I believe the youngest child on the earth will never live to be old enough to see them out of power.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without making a few remarks on this question, and what I shall say will be partly from a farmer's stand-point. I am convinced that the farmers of Canada have suffered more than any other class from this National Policy, and that they have paid the greatest amount of taxes without receiving any corresponding benefit. I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat to pass entirely without remark. We are told that a great many hon. members of the Opposition are prophets in their own way; the hon. gentleman ventured to indulge in prophecy, and the last thing he said was that the National Policy was such a great blessing to Canada that the present Government would remain in office for fifty years to come. Well, Sir, we read in that good book which we all revere, that in these latter times many false prophets will arise. The hon. gentleman also referred to the respective prices of wheat in Chicago and Toronto. I have also a few remarks to make on that point, as I have prepared a table of prices in those two cities. The quotations which the hon. gentleman made did not include the whole period of the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, neither does it take in the whole period of the present Government. I shall now proceed to read the prices, in Toronto, of several articles grown in the Province of Ontario, taken from the Toronto Mail on the 20th October, for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878. I find that the average price of wheat during those years was $1.08 per bushel, that is during the rule of the Reform Government. I find that oats was 38 cts. per bushel, on an average during those five years; barley was 88 cts. per bushel; a ton of hay, $17.75; straw, per ton, $13.50; wool, per lb., 27 cents; hogs dressed, per 100 lbs., $1.75; eggs per dozen, 20½ cents, making on the whole for these several articles in the market of Toronto during the rule of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, $10.87. Now, let us see what was paid during the four years of the rule of the present Government, in the same market in Toronto, and on the same days of the same month. We find that in the years 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882, the average price of a bushel of wheat was $1.27; a bushel of oats, 38½ cts.; a bushel of barley, 77 cts.; a ton of hay, $13; a ton of straw, $9; wool per lb., 2½ cts.; dressed hogs, per 100 lbs., $7.44; eggs, per dozen, 21 cts., making a total of $32.20, or the sum of $8.57 less received by the farmers of Canada in the Toronto markets during the last four years of the present Government, than they received during the five years of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie's Administration. Yet they tell us that the farmers have been benefited by the National Policy. Then let us take it during the summer months in the same manner, and you will find that on the 20th June, in each of these years, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878, a bushel of wheat in Toronto cost $1.21; a bushel of oats, 45 cts.; a bushel of barley, 62½ cts.; a ton of hay, $17.30; a ton of straw, $11.40; a pound of wool, 32½ cts., making in all $30.31 for those articles that the farmer received during the rule of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie. Then we find that in 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882 also on the 20th June, the price of wheat was $1.15; oats, 42½ cts.; barley, 62½ cts.; a ton of hay, $12.66; a ton of straw, $7.44; a pound of wool, 25½ cts. giving in all $22.55, during the four years that hon. gentlemen opposite have held the reins of power, or a difference in favor of the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, upon these six articles, of $8.76. Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that the farmer has been benefited by the National Policy. Now, let me attempt to make another comparison. Let me take the year 1877, and see what wheat was worth in Chicago and in Toronto on the 24th September. We find that in Chicago on that day wheat was worth $1.13 per bushel, while in Toronto on the same day, it was $1.23, or 10 cts. more in Toronto than in Chicago. Then we will take the price of wheat on the 17th March, 1883—and that is coming down almost as close to the present as I could get the record—we find that, in Chicago it was worth $1.06, while in Toronto it was $1.05, making a difference again of 11 cts. per bushel in favor of the Mackenzie Government as compared with the present Government. We also find that oats in Chicago, on the 24th September, 1877, were worth 24 cts. a bushel; in Toronto, on the same day, the price was 35 cts., a difference of 11 cts. in favor of Toronto. We find that, in March, 1877, oats were worth 43 cts. in Chicago, and in Toronto 46 cts., making a rise in oats of 8 cts. per bushel as between Chicago and Toronto during the time that hon. gentlemen opposite have held the reins of power. That is the way the farmers of this country have been benefited by the National Policy. I, as a farmer, ask if it is not the National Policy that has brought about this difference in prices between Chicago and Toronto. What is it? I hold that it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that has made the difference; and I will again attempt to prove it by arguments from another source. We were told that, if it was not for the National Policy, the Canadian farmer would be selling his wheat to the American buyer for a less price than he can get for it in the English market to-day. Let us examine, for a moment, what are the facts. I will take the year 1877. We find there was exported from the Dominion of Canada 1,697,968 bushels of oats at 36 cts., we imported 3,996,156 bushels at 41½ cts., and that was a gain on oats brought into the Dominion from the United States of $93,388. There was of corn imported 8,260,039 bushels at 51½ cts. per bushel; there was exported 4,833,174 bushels at 63 cts. per bushel, leaving a gain of $465,565. There was of barley imported 3,684,260 bushels, at 50½ cts.; there was exported 6,587,180 bushels, realizing a gain of $78,290. There was imported of barrels of flour 549,063 barrels, at $5.39; there were exported 276,439 barrels, at $5.51½, leaving a gain of $34,554. When all the different articles are considered it will be found that there was a gain of over $1,000,000 to the trade of Canada. But what do we find was the case in 1881 and 1882? We find that over 2,000,000 bushels of wheat were imported into Canada, for which $1.14 was paid, and for which we received only $1.11 per bushel, when exported, thereby showing that our business had been destroyed by the National Policy. I desire to refer briefly to some remarks made by the hon. member who preceded me. He went on to show that in Ontario we had entered into the manufacture of tobacco, and pointed out that the condition of the business in Ontario was not satisfactory, because the Excise officers strictly carried out the law, while the business was prosperous in the Province of Quebec, because the officers there did not carry out the law and collect the duty, and the hon. gentleman did not blame them for it. These are the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite; when it serves their purpose to invoke the law they do it, but when it does not do so, they think it proper to set the law at defiance. The hon. Finance Minister, in his speech the other day, admitted that wherever the duties were excessive it was incumbent upon the Government to watch very carefully the different countries, thereby conceding that we were not able to have an independent policy,* but were obliged to be guided by the policy of the United States. In this connection I desire to read a statement made by Secretary Blaine at a Conference in 1881, in regard to cotton goods. He said:

"In one year 24,000,000 yards of cotton were exported from the United States into Canada, and that 19,000,000 yards was smuggled, and that on only 5,000,000 yards duty was paid."

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron).

Such is the effect of the National Policy; and while the consuming community has to pay an increased price the duty collectable does not go into the Treasury, or into the hands of the manufacturers, but into the pockets of a band of men who set the laws at defiance. I wish to say a few words with regard to what the farmers of the country were led to expect from the National Policy; and before doing so I will refer to what has been said by those in power, especially by the hon. leader of the present Government while leader of the Opposition before the Election of 1878. At Parkhill he said:

"If the Conservative party carried out the policy laid down in this resolution the present state of depression would disappear. Instead of having to send to a foreign country for so many of our goods, we would have our clothing made out of wool of our own production, and our shoes out of our own leather. * * * Returning to the trade question he expressed the opinion if the Conservatives gained a majority there would be a return of confidence at once, and even before a new Tariff could be introduced, the manufacturers would have such hopes for the future that they would be employing more men, circulating money and increasing their business, all of which would reflect beneficially on the farming community."

It was proved, the other day, by the hon. member for Brant, that within a few days of one year after the Elections of 1878 had been in force the price of almost all kinds of farm produce had fallen in Canada, and the predictions of the hon. First Minister had therefore not been realized. I was very much surprised yesterday at hearing an hon. gentleman opposite, who occupies a leading position in the party, declaring that within a month after the policy had been adopted, times improved. The hon. gentleman drew a very good comparison from his stand-point, and I will draw a comparison from my stand-point. If you call in a doctor to attend a member of your family, said the hon. gentleman, you would not expect the sick man to be relieved of his trouble at once. But if a medical man tells a member of your family, who is sick, that he knows the disease from which he is suffering, and that he has a medicine which acts as a specific, and that even before the sick person partakes of it, but simply smells it, he will improve—if, after not only smelling that medicine, but taking it for a long period, the disease is not removed but is increased, then, I say, you would declare the doctor to be a quack. I heard the same hon. gentleman congratulate the hon. Finance Minister on his being able to go to a foreign country and obtain a loan. That hon. and learned gentleman passed high eulogiums on the hon. Finance Minister; and yet, Sir, I was astonished when I found him passing such high eulogiums on the hon. Finance Minister for the manner in which he handled the finances of this country. Then, Sir, what do we find? How is this large amount of money paid? Why, we find that, in 1881-82, more money was taken out of the pockets of the people of the Dominion of Canada in taxation, to the extent of $9,707,108.26, than 1877-78. That, Sir, is an easy way of raising the revenue of the country—imposing a Tariff which places in the hands of the hon. Finance Minister $6,300,000 of a surplus. What do we find again, Sir? That one important factor in preventing him going to a foreign market for money was the very large amount of money which had been placed in the savings banks of Canada by the free will of the people, who deposited this money in the hands of the Government. The very large amount of $13,271,648 was placed in the savings banks from 1877-78 down to 1881-82; and what is the difference, if the hon. Finance Minister does not go into a foreign market to effect a loan, so long as this country is indebted to its own people. This only shows, Sir, that the Government is taking credit to themselves for funds which really belonged to our own people, and which they may be called upon within a week at any time to refund to the people. Then, Sir, I was just as much surprised to hear that gentleman go on and criticise the actions of the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie during the five years they held the reins of power. He said he was willing to give them credit for a reduction in the expenditure, provided that they had nursed our infant industries and properly fostered those interests; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman admitted that with the present increase in importation of goods the Tariff of 17½ per cent. would have very largely increased the revenue, and he did not venture to assert that 17½ per cent. would not have been sufficient for all the requirements of the country in 1831-82. He forgot, however, in that connection, to tell us that after the harvest of 1876, when the farmers throughout the length and breadth of Canada had threshed their grain, and had begun to see what was to be the result, we would have had an actual famine if we had not had the United States market to go across to and purchase breadstuffs to the amount of $3,430,426. He forgot to tell us that this was one of the great causes of that depression which swept over the country. He certainly did not mean, by fostering our industries, that the Government was to take money out of the public chest and put it in the pockets of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, to enable them to go ahead, and our merchants to purchase goods in order that the revenue might be increased. At this point, I will just take the opportunity of saying that this National Policy is one of the strangest policies that was ever inaugurated in any country. We also find that hon. gentlemen opposite considered a lowering of the Tariff to be a great blessing to the people. Do you all remember when the mouthpiece of the party opposite, the Mail, came out and boasted we were getting cheap breakfast tea and coffee, and said that it was a national blessing; and yet we are told, on the other hand, that it was a national blessing to the Dominion of Canada that the National Policy was introduced. But I would ask every farmer in this Chamber, and in the Dominion of Canada, whether it is really a great blessing to the country? What are the blessings which we receive from it? Under the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, farming implements came into the country free; and the present Government has imposed a duty of 35 per cent. on this class of goods. In one instance, the hon. Finance Minister, when laying his scheme before the House, stated that agents who were accustomed to sell Canadian goods, had left their employment because the Americans were offering the same description of goods at the same prices, showing conclusively that it was the consumer who paid the duty in this case. I ask, what benefit has been conferred on the farmer, to repay him for the large amount of duty which he has to pay on his agricultural implements? I hold, Sir, as agriculture lies at the foundation of the prosperity of this nation, as well as of every other nation, that this is one of the industries which ought particularly to be protected, and to be placed on an equal footing—and that is all we ask—with every other industry in the country. I hold that as the hon. Finance Minister has a very large amount of money on hand—$6,300,000—and as he has introduced the system of bounties, giving a bounty to the manufacturer of iron of $1.50 a ton for the first three years, and $1 a ton after the expiration of that period, it is certainly his duty, in justice to the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, seeing that their promises have not been fulfilled to us, to give a bounty of 10 cts. on every bushel of wheat brought into the market, and 10 per cent. on every article that our farmers sell. But there is one element wanting, and that is that the farmers are not sufficiently importunate. I find that all the changes in the Tariff are brought about by individuals who feel themselves interested, and who send delegations to Ottawa to wait on the hon. Finance Minister in the rooms andobbies of the House, and get the changes they want effected. I hope, Sir, that the farmers of the Dominion of Canada will see their way clear next year to do this also. I hold that after the last harvest, when wheat came down from $1.25 to 83 cts. a bushel, the farmers of Canada found that this Tariff or no other Tariff which could be imposed would keep up the price of goods; and I say that more than one good Conservative stated that they had been deceived by the present Government, as to the effects of the National Policy upon the farmers, and that the statements made by the leaders of the Reform party, and its rank and file, during the campaigns of 1878 and 1882, had been verified. But why should wheat go down in Canada? Because all the wheat growing countries of the world had wheat to sell, and whenever this takes place, wheat will be cheap in Canada. We have shown that our farmers have not received as much for their hay, straw, pork, eggs and other commodities under the rule of the present Government as under the rule of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie. Now, let us enquire whether or not other lines of goods are unduly taxed for the farmer by the policy of the present Government than the goods consumed by the more wealthy classes. We will take the article of cloth, such as coarse tweeds and blankets, coarse woollens, which pay a duty of 45 per cent. I was astonished at the hon. gentleman opposite, when he stated that this class of goods was not increased in price by the present Tariff. I have a near relation who is in business, and who goes to the Old Country to purchase these goods; and I have a letter from him, written since I came to Ottawa, in reply to my enquiries. He tells me that the duty he pays upon coarse fabrics is 45 to 46 per cent., while the finest broadcloths imported pay only 23 per cent., and I hold that it is the duty of the Government, in imposing a Tariff—if it be a high Tariff—to impose the duties at least in the same proportion on the different classes of goods, according to the abilities of purchasers to pay. Will he tell me that laborers and farmers are more able to pay 46 per cent. than the wealthy man, who wears broadcloth, is able to pay the same duty? In this connection I will just say that the hon. Finance Minister informed us that, on this description of goods, the increase in the revenue was some $1,890,000, and that this class of goods might fairly be considered luxuries, not necessaries of life. I just thought to myself, Sir, that if hon. gentlemen had been going to increase the Tariff in any direction, they should certainly have put it on the class of goods which the wealthy classes eat and wear, and that they would not impose them upon the goods consumed by the working man and the farmer, who has, by the sweat of his brow, to extract his living from mother earth. But I find that he has to pay 46 per cent. as compared with the wealthy gentlemen who wear broadcloth and who pay only 23 per cent. Then, Sir, we have flannels, plain and checked, which pay 30 per cent. That is a class of goods largely worn both by workmen and farmers, and what do we find? We find that the workmen and the farmers have to pay exactly the same as my lady who buys a silk dress; and I would ask if that is a Tariff which does justice to all classes of the community? Hon. gentlemen may ask why find fault because the working man and the farmer pay the same rate of duties on his flannels that the lady does for her silks. But the reason I find fault is, that as there is no real wealth but what is taken out of the field, the forest, the mine, and the sea, I hold that the men who really create this wealth should not be discriminated against in any Tariff, but if there is to be discrimination at all it should be in favor of the class who perform the manual labor of the country. One hon. gentleman opposite asked what benefit would the farmers derive if a duty were imposed on wool of the class which comes into the country. I answer that of the class of wool which the farmers produce here there are 1,053,305 lbs. exported from Canada—a fact which is certainly of interest to the farmers, who produce the wool. I would ask if the Government is fulfilling the promise which was made by the hon. First Minister in his famous speech in Parkhill on the 3rd of June, 1878, when he said that if hon. gentlemen opposite came in power, not only would all the industries be in a thriving condition, but all our own wool would be manufactured in our own country. We, as the farmers of the Dominion, hold that that promise has not been fulfilled; and I ask in what position does that place the hon. gentleman who made that statement? Taking him on his own line of argument, I find in Hansard of 1879, vol. i. page 23, that the hon. member who now leads the Government made the following statement:—

"Nobody more agrees with the hon. member for Lambton than myself in the statement he made on a celebrated occasion, that the man who makes a promise and propounds a policy, and fails to act upon it when in the Government, is little better than a demagogue. I will accept the name if we do not carry out, while in office, the pledges and promises we held out to the country in Opposition."

I hold that those promises and pledges have not been carried out to the agriculturists of the country; and although we have heard many assertions, we have not heard a plain statement by hon. gentlemen opposite showing where farmers have derived any benefit from this policy. I hold that the Tariff bears more heavily upon the agricultural community than upon any other class, and that they, as a class, have more reason to feel aggrieved than any other. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this policy has raised the price of labor. We will grant for the sake of argument that it does, though I do not admit it; but if it has raised the price of labor it has also raised the price of agricultural implements, which are used by the farmer, and it has raised the price of all we consume apart from what we produce on our farms. It has also raised the price of labor, and cheap labor is one of the elements of a farmer's success. I contend that the hon. the First Minister announced his own doom when he used the epithet I have quoted; and all that that epithet implies may be applied to him on the present occasion. The only wealth which can be raised is that which comes from the forest, the mine, the fisheries, and the field; and a Government which would impose a duty on the first necessities of the farmer, who extracts his wealth from the soil, is a Government which does not attend to the first interests of the country. We were told by the hon. Finance Minister that $550,000 was to be set apart during the present year for the purpose of immigration and colonization; and while we are paying out this money with the one hand, we are, with the other, increasing the duty 10 per cent. on agricultural implements which go into that North-West, and which will be so largely required by the farmers and settlers. The hon. gentleman, while he is paying a large bonus to get settlers into that country, is putting on such a high rate of taxation that he is driving them out, and in many cases driving them into another country where they can get cheap land and cheap goods. Let me tell him that his policy is already bearing fruit in the Province of Ontario. During the last Recess of Parliament, I went home to my county, and while I was there I met the assessor of my own township, who has assessed it for the last six years. We went all over the old assessment rolls for the last five years, and we found that no less than 220 individuals had left that township with a view of settling in the North-West. Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite lift up their voices and tell the Government that if they wish to settle that country, which is said to be the finest country that ever the sun shone on, we must foster, not only the industries of that country, but the settlers of that country. It is said that 70,000 yards of duck were brought into the Lower Provinces, at a 5 per cent. duty, to make sails for vessels, but it found its way up to the North-West to make tents, and the settlers there, instead of getting it for 5 per cent., had to pay 20 per cent. duty upon it. The whole policy of the Government tends to take the money out of the hands of the people and to drive people out of the country; and I tell them that the time is close at hand when the farmers of this country will rise in their might and demand justice. They know very well that the promises made to them with regard to the price of grain have not been realized, and that we had higher prices for our grain before the policy of the Government was introduced than we have had since. What caused our prosperity? It was not the Government, but a benign Providence that caused the sun to shine, the genial shower to descend, and the earth to bear her fruits in abundance in this Dominion of Canada. It was also Providence that, in His wisdom withheld that sunshine on the other side of the Atlantic, and instead of genial showers, gave the British farmers torrents of rain, causing a failure in their crops, to the advantage of the people of Canada, although we cannot help sympathizing with the people of that country in the hardships they have suffered under the unfavorable circumstances in which they have been placed. I did not intend saying anything on the National Policy, but I could not let this opportunity pass of showing its real effects on the farming community. I will now close by repeating a conversation that took place between a merchant and a farmer. The farmer called on the merchant and asked to be shown some Canadian tweeds. The merchant showed them to him. The farmer then asked to be shown some Scotch tweed, which the merchant went to buy in Scotland every year. He was shown them, and asked: "Do you sell many of these tweeds?" "Yes," "How does that come?" asked the farmer. "Sir John and the other members of the Government tell us that the duty is not paid by the people of Canada. Now, you go to the Old Country, and, besides incurring an amount of expenses, you have to pay a duty of 34 or 35 per cent. on the goods you import." "Yes," said the merchant, "that is true." "Well, who pays that duty?" asked the farmer. The merchant replied: "You, sir, and everybody who buys my goods." Here are American goods and Canadian goods, and the farmer—who, after all, is not a bad judge of goods—takes that class which is the cheapest and most suitable for him. "Well," said the farmer, "I cannot understand that. We have been told that the goods are no dearer because of the duty." "Do you know," said the merchant, "that there is a man in the United States named Barnum, who said that the American people were willing to be humbugged and to pay for it? He showed them a woolly horse, and the people of the United States were humbugged by that woolly horse, and they liked it. Well, the woolly horse in Canada is the National Policy, and no people have been more humbugged by any fraud than the people of Canada have been humbugged by that National Policy."

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker: I intend to occupy the time of the House but a very short time, and I shall not make any reference to that particular branch of subject which has just been under discussion. The influence of the present Tariff upon many of our articles of commerce has been very fully discussed. The policy of the Government has been considered from various stand-points. This afternoon it was considered from the Ontario stand-point. In my present remarks I propose to view it from the New Brunswick stand-point. In that connection I regard it as of the first importance to bear in mind the relations of the Maritime Provinces to the other Provinces of the Dominion, and certain prominent facts regarding some of the principal interests of the Maritime Provinces. It is well known that, in the past, one of the most important industries of those Provinces has been the shipbuilding industry. The hon. member for West Middlesex called our attention to the fact that the number and tonnage of the vessels registered in this Dominion had decreased since the year 1879, and also to the fact that previous to that year there had been some slight increase; and I assumed that he intended to convey the impression to the House that the decrease was due to the operation of the National Policy. I understand that the hon. member for King's, in his speech last night, although I was not present to hear it, explained the circumstances under which this decrease took place—that the decrease in the number and tonnage of the vessels owned in the Dominion was due to the decrease of shipbuilding in the Dominion, and that the decrease of shipbuilding took place principally between the years 1874 and 1879, and that the decrease has since continued, but in a much less rapid ratio. A reference to the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will show that, in 1874, the vessels built in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick numbered 274, with a tonnage of 126,507 tons; that, in 1875, the vessels built numbered 242, with a tonnage of 100,589 tons; and so on down to 1879, when there were 169 vessels built, with a tonnage of 58,275 tons, and to 1882, when there were 183 vessels built, with a tonnage of 43,531 tons; a decrease in those eight years of upwards of 65 per cent. Now, in connection with this subject, I wish to draw attention, not merely to the fact that a decrease has taken place, but to the fact that we may expect that decrease to be of a permanent character. It is evident to any one at all familiar with the shipbuilding interest, that the swift steamers of the present time are fast superseding the slow sailing ships of former years. The great improvements which have been made in recent years in steam navigation, the great saving of time, effected the greater security of goods in transit, and the enormous reduction in freights, place steamers to-day almost beyond the reach of sailing vessels as competitors for the traffic of the ocean. It is true that there are certain services, such as the coasting trade and long ocean voyages, in which sailing vessels have still some advantages. It is true also that there are some classes of freight which are at present, and must be for some time to come, largely carried by sailing vessels. There are, moreover, certain ports from which, for special reasons, steamers are largely or entirely excluded. But any one who has given the subject even a superficial study must be convinced that the time is coming, and is not far distant, when ocean steamships will as fully monopolize the freight traffic between all principal sea-ports as they now monopolize the passenger traffic of the western ocean. Then, in reference to another great interest, the lumbering interests of the Maritime Provinces. What do we find? On referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that, although there has been some increase in the export of lumber for the last year, yet for several years preceding there was no marked or material change. It is well known this industry is at present one of the most important of the Maritime Provinces, and that it will continue to hold that position for some years to come; but I wish to draw the attention of the House to this point in connection with this subject. The timber lands in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are now nearly all taken up, and that the manufacturers of lumber in those Provinces find the area of their operations circumscribed. That this industry affords no more room for expansion, and that its power to attract capital and labor must, in the future, gradually diminish. With these facts before us, realizing, as we must, that the great shipbuilding industry of the past is rapidly declining; that the lumbering industry has reached or nearly reached the full measure of its development, and that these have been the industries upon which our people have principally depended in the past, this question presents itself for our consideration: how are we to supply the want which the decline of these industries must create? Where are we to turn in the future to look for investment for accumulating capital, and for employment for our increasing population? You may point to our agricultural resources; to the wealth of our mines and minerals, to our extensive and valuable fisheries; but will any hon. gentleman presume to assert that these industries, rich though they be, afford sufficient room for future growth and development to enable us to keep pace with the rest of the Dominion? It is evident such cannot be the case. It is evident that if we are obliged to confine our energies to these alone, we may well look forward to the future with anxiety, and distrust and fear for those coming days of depression that now disturb the dreams and haunt the lives of hon. gentlemen opposite. But when we can look forward to the establishment and growth of manufacturing industries the scene changes and the prospect brightens, and it is here we find the true relation that should exist between the people of the Eastern Provinces and those of the great agricultural districts of the West. We are now in a position which indicates we should become a manufacturing people. Situated upon the sea shore, we are enabled to procure raw material from foreign countries on the most favorable terms. We have in our great coal fields an unlimited supply of cheap fuel; we have a healthy climate and an industrious population, ready and willing to work if they can receive fair remuneration for their labor; and we have in the West a great growing market for manufactured goods. It is when we are placed in a position in which we can avail ourselves of these advantages and make the most of the resources under our control, that we feel our growth will be commensurate with the growth of the rest of the Dominion. How will the establishment of factories affect the other great interests of the country to which I have referred. It is clear they must give rise to manufacturing towns and villages, and these must aid in the development of our coal mines by increasing the consumption of coal. It is clear that the people who labor in those factories and work those mines must create an increased demand for products of the garden, the dairy, and the field, and to some extent at least, to enhance the value of the agricultural districts of those Provinces. But, Sir, there is something more than this. The development of all these interests together must create and foster the growth of a great inter-provincial trade, and exert an important influence in attracting to our shores the commerce of other countries and in making our magnificent harbors scenes of business life and activity, and building upon our sea-board commercial cities to become the homes of the merchant princes of this Dominion. I am aware that many hon. gentlemen in this House take exception to the manner in which we speak of the present prosperity and the future prospects of this country. I am aware they consider our language sometimes extravagant and our views somewhat visionary. As the hon. leader of the Opposition very aptly expressed it near the opening of the Session, our pictures are too bright, our skies are too clear, something is needed to shade them from the force of the solar rays. Now, Sir, I can quite understand that feeling. It has become fashionable of late years, to predict approaching storms, and hon. gentlemen, I have no doubt, influenced by this prevailing fashion, have in the past been predicting stormy weather, and if I mistake not the time has about arrived when this storm was to be expected, yet it has not come. Now, I can quite understand a person having predicted a magnificent storm, and going out on the day it was anticipated and finding the sky clear and the sun shining bright and warm, that he would complain of the heat a little more than he would under other circumstances. For myself, I not only rejoice in the present prosperity of this Dominion, but I have faith in its future growth and greatness. I do not claim to be gifted with the spirit of prophecy, but if I have learned anything from the experience of the past, it is this lesson: that while the great political parties occupy the relative position they do at the present time, the heavenly bodies are in wrong position for any very disastrous or protracted storms. It is because the present Government have recognized the true relationship which exists between the different parts of this Dominion; it is because they have sought to strengthen that relationship; it is because they have adopted a policy which meets the demands of this country at the present time, and adapts itself to our changed and changing circumstances, that they may fairly claim the support of the people of the Maritime Provinces, as well as that of the rest of this Dominion; it is for these reasons that they are receiving that support to-day as they have never done before. There is one other point to which I wish to refer before I resume my seat, and that is a theory which has been advanced during the course of this debate. I assume that we may take the views expressed by the hon. member for South Brant, as expressing the general views and policy of the party to which he belongs. That gentleman acknowledged, and he was proud to be able to acknowledge, that this country was at the present time enjoying exceptional prosperity, but he took exception to the claim set up by the hon. Minister of Finance that this prosperity was in a measure due to the operation of the policy of the present Administration, and he ventured the assertion that the good harvests which had prevailed, the high prices in other countries, and the increased quantity and value of our exports, were the only causes of this exceptional prosperity. In support of that view he directed our attention to the fact that in 1880 we exported from this country some $10,000,000, I think, more than the exports of 1879, that that amount had come back in gold into the country and had been circulated among the people, and that was the measure of our prosperity for that year, that a similar increase had taken place in 1881 and again in 1882; so that in these three years our imports had increased by some $60,000,000 over the average of exports the preceding years, and that that was the source and measure of our present prosperity. It is to that view that I wish to take except on, for I cannot endorse a doctrine which gives no credit whatever to the hon. Minister of Finance for the good times that we are enjoying. I feel that doctrine takes the national welfare and the national success too much out of the control of the Government and people of the country, and makes it too largely dependent upon the operations of Nature and the smiles and frowns of Providence. Now, Sir, we all admit that good harvests and high prices contribute largely to the prosperity of any people; we all also recognize the great truth that there is a power above and ruling over all, that years of prosperity and years of depression will come, due to causes beyond the control of any human power. But yet it is still true that nations as well as individuals have the power, subject to the higher power and in obedience to its laws, to mould for themselves their destiny. The husbandman, it is true, cannot bring the sunshine and the rain, but he can use them and make barren fields yield him a livelihood. Governments cannot bring good harvests nor control at will the market prices of the products of the people, but they can by legislation contribute largely to their prosperity. They can open new channels for trade and commerce, or direct the course in which they are to run. They can clothe capital and labor with power to create new industries and develop the material resources of the country. They can infuse increased vitality and vigor into the national life, and increase the wealth of the State by increasing the wealth-producing power of the people of the State. They have power to make prosperous times more prosperous still, and periods of depression less burdensome to bear. They have this power, and for its right use they are, and should be, held responsible. Now, if you will pardon me for a few moments, I will briefly refer to some figures which have already been presented to the House in the course of this debate. In 1878 we imported into this country some 75,000,000 lbs. of refined sugar, and in the same year 1,000,000 lbs. of raw, and upwards of 14,000,000 lbs. of partly refined sugar. In 1882 the trade is changed, the imports of refined sugar in the latter year being less than 10,000,000 lbs., while the imports of raw and partly refined reached some 129,000,000 lbs. Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that in 1878 we sent gold out of this country to buy that refined sugar in markets where hostile tariffs were imposed to exclude our imports, and that we buy raw sugar at the present time in markets where our products are wanted and can be sold, and the fact we enter those markets as customers increases the foreign demand for those very products, upon the export of which the hon. gentleman himself contends, and we all admit, our prosperity as a people greatly depends. In addition to this, our attention has been directed to the fact that we have imported in 1882 upwards of 19,000,000 lbs. of raw cotton, an increase of 175 per cent. over 1878; that we have imported upwards of 9,500,000 lbs. of wool, an increase of over 50 per cent. over 1878; and without detaining the House with further figures, it has already been shown that a corresponding increase has taken place in the imports of raw hides and many other raw materials. Those articles have been brought into this country; they have been manufactured in this country; their manufacture has aided in developing the resources of this country; that manufacture has occupied a large amount of capital, and it has given employment to hundreds and thousands of working people, and furnished them with the means of subsistence for their families. Can it be affirmed that Canada derives no advantage from this changed state of her trade, that the employment of all this capital and labor confers no benefit upon the people of this Dominion; or will it be affirmed that these can be classed among the blessings of Providence? The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, asked the hon. Finance Minister whether he had the power to make the sun shine, the harvest ripen, and hens lay. May I ask him whether these elements of our prosperity can fairly be attributed to the intervention of an over-ruling Providence. I have listened to the remarks made during this debate, but I have found these important items omitted from the list of Providential blessings; and yet these are elements, and important elements, in contributing to the prosperity that now prevails throughout this country; these are factors, and not unimportant factors, in promoting the present increased activity which characterizes our trade and commerce. They have established new relations between capital and labor, and have enabled them to furnish each other with steady employment to their mutual advantage. They have added to the wealth of this country and increased the wealth-producing power of the people. And this is not all. These features of Canadian trade and industry have a prominence to-day which they have never had before in the history of this country. We have passed another mile stone in the march of national progress, we have entered upon a new era in our history as a people, and this is an era to which Canadians, for all future time, can point, and not only date its advent, but trace its origin to the introduction and operation of the fiscal policy of the present Administration.

Mr. SPROULE. At this late stage of the debate it seems scarcely necessary to continue the discussion; but we still find some persons affirming that no substantial benefit has been secured from the policy introduced some four years ago. We are told that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and if that be so it is as much our duty to-day as it was four years ago to give close attention to this fiscal question, because while we find persons willing to spread broadcast throughout the country the statement that we receive no benefit from that policy, we will find those who are ready to accept that assertion on the bare statement of the party who makes it. I am pleased to find in respect to this debate a very great change in the tone and manner in which it is carried on now, as compared with the debate four years ago. Hon. members of the Opposition, on the Tariff being introduced, took their line of argument against it, and pronounced denunciations against the men who introduced it, and indulged in prophecy respecting what would be the result to the country; but, strange to say, after a lapse of four years, those same members, at all events the few who have come back again, have entirely changed their tactics, and those who are the foremost in denouncing the National Policy are young members who have given comparatively little attention to the subject. The hon. member for Huron made the remark that farmers give very little attention to the subject, and he as a farmer could not be expected to know much about it. Almost every person will be inclined to admit the truth of that statement after hearing the hon. member deal with the subject as he did, especially remembering that it is one in which he is directly interested, and one affecting the occupation in which he is engaged. I was much amused at an argument directed against the National Policy, to the effect that the farmers were burdened by the additional amount they were compelled to pay for everything they used, because a short time before the same hon. gentleman had found fault, in very strong terms, with the hon. Finance Minister, because he had refused to place a duty on wool. Yet, almost in the same breath, the hon. gentleman had tried to prove that, because there was a duty of 40 per cent. on woollen goods, it enhanced the price of the goods which the farmer had to buy. If I know anything about farmers, and I think I do, because I was raised a farmer, and lived all my life with them, they make, themselves, the cloth they wear; they make their own fulled cloth, and their own flannel, and in every instance, as far as possible, make their own wearing apparel from the products of their farms. I could never understand why a duty of 40 per cent. on cloth could affect the farmer, when he made his own cloth, and was able to card and spin the wool which he produced. The object of the duty was to keep out foreign woollens. The hon. member for Huron also referred to farming implements, and contended that the effect of imposing an additional duty was to increase the price. The hon. gentleman must know very little about farming implements, or he would be aware that they are cheaper to-day than they were in 1878. During my canvass last summer I was flatly contradicted as to the statement I make now. I went to agents for implements, in my own riding, and obtained from them a statement to this effect, that agricultural implements were 20 per cent. cheaper than three years before. Some of these agents were Conservatives and others Reformers, and in one instance an agent voluntarily signed an affidavit that his statement was substantially correct. This man, I say, was selling them for several years; and in face of this fact, am I to believe, that farming implements are dearer to-day than they were four years ago. The hon. member for Huron made a very lamentable reference to the poor farmer in Manitoba, who had gone up to stock his farm; and another hon. gentleman some time previously, made a calculation as to how much additional it would cost him to buy his farming implements and carry on operations there. I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen, if they have been there? If not, I can tell them, that I have; and my enquiries lead me to this conclusion. I have a friend or relation engaged there, in the sale of farming implements, and I was there last fall. Seeing that he had done a very extensive business during the summer, I asked him what implements he was selling. He said: Late last season, I was selling Ontario implements, but now a great many of American implements are brought in; and we are selling perhaps an equal number of both. I asked him how he was able to sell American implements? and he replied in this way: When a duty was put upon these articles, and they were brought up from Ontario, the Americans found that they could not compete. The first stratagem which they adopted to secure the trade of the country again was to offer a bribe to the agents, by giving them a large per cent. of their sales, if they would only sell their implements; and after trying this for a time, the agents, although selfish enough to make money in this manner and to endeavor to introduce the American implements,—found it up-hill work, because they had to sell the American article at a higher figure than those which came from Ontario, and so they reported that they could not dispose of the American goods. Then finding themselves frustrated in this direction, the Americans made another effort. Having held a caucus amongst themselves, I presume, they finally decided to sell their implements as cheaply as the Ontario goods were placed on that market. Now I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen who—as the hon. gentleman who sat down some time ago—calculate that it costs the farmer in Manitoba from $200 to $400 more than it should, to provide himself with agricultural implements, whether they know anything about this? The result was, that after the Americans agreed to take that much off the price of the implements, and offering an additional amount for selling their goods, they were able to sell more in Manitoba than was previously the case. I do not wonder, under these circumstances, that to-day the manufacturers of this country are coming down here and asking for the imposition of an additional duty on this line of goods; and I do know one thing in connection with this matter, that notwithstanding what an hon. gentleman said the other night—if 10 per cent. more is put on agricultural implements, it will not mean adding 10 per cent. to the price of these articles. It will mean no such thing; because I know for a fact, that some of these same men offered to pledge themselves to the hon. First Minister in the event of a higher duty being placed on these articles, to supply these implements as cheaply as before. Is that evidence that an increase in the duty is going to increase the price? I think, that it is quite the contrary. Now, Mr. Speaker, I said with reference to the tone of the debate, I was very much surprised to find the altered tactics of the Opposition as exhibited in their speeches. Four years ago, when this Tariff was introduced, what were the objections which were then made to it? What were the prophecies of these hon. gentlemen then? The first objection was that this Tariff might be imposed, but it would not raise sufficient revenue. The hon. ex-Finance Minister, who has not now the honor of a seat in this House, warned the hon. Finance Minister, that although we imposed these additional duties, we could not raise enough revenue. Now, I would like to ask how far he has been justified in that statement; in the light of our present experience, how far has that prophecy been fulfilled? It has been fulfilled this far: instead of raising a revenue under the old Tariff of 1878, of $12,500,000, we have obtained $21,581,000. I say, what is the judgment of such a man worth, or what is his integrity worth, provided that his judgment tells him he was wrong in making that statement? When the country sees, as it does to-day, that this statement made, or said to be made, on the strength of that gentleman's intelligence as being his forecast of the future, how much must it respect that intelligence to-day; or, if his intelligence was at fault, how much must it respect his integrity, seeing that this prophecy was not fulfilled at all? Again, he stated that if this Tariff were imposed, and it did raise sufficient revenue, it would kill out every industry in the country; be a burden to the farmer, and instead of improving his condition, make it worse; kill out the laboring man by putting additional taxation on everything he wore, without advancing his wages; kill out the lumberman, because everything that he required to carry on his operations would be very heavily taxed, while his sales of lumber would not be increased; kill out the commercial man and the trade of the country, because the trade of the United States would not go through this country; and destroy every industry in this country. If we believed the assertions of the hon. gentlemen—those who are now in this House—when they were made, we must have believed that the country was going very rapidly to the bad. But has this been accomplished? Do these men come back to-day and say that this is the condition of the country? No; but they come back, one after another, and quietly and tacitly admit that the condition of the country is to-day improved. They say that the farmers are better off, and are prosperous; they admit that the laboring man is better engaged, and is receiving higher wages for his work; that the shipping interests of the country have not been effectually killed out, that the lumberman is making money; and that there is every evidence of peace and prosperity in the country, which has been unparalleled in our history during the last ten years; and what do they say to-day with reference to this matter? Do they admit that they were wrong; that their forecast of the future was bad; that their intelligence was defective; that their integrity was defective? Not a bit of it. They have not the honesty to come here to-day and admit to the people of this country that they were wrong in their forecast of the future, and they were defective in their judgments, or else dishonest in their representations; but they now try to press into their service every argument which they can find to prove that these results have been brought about by other influences entirely outside of the National Policy. Only last year hon. gentlemen travelled over the whole continent of America and the continents of Europe, to try and find arguments to prove that this prosperity was due to other causes. One after another they get up and say that it is due to a beneficent Providence, to better crops, to a failure in the crops of Europe, to increased markets for our lumber, and to anything and everything but the National Policy. They will not give it credit for anything at all. Four years ago when this policy was introduced the hon. ex-Finance Minister said that he believed that the people had been misled into voting for the Government and had done a great injustice to themselves; that everything had been misrepresented, and that when from the effluxion of time, another opportunity was presented for giving a verdict, he could assure the hon. Minister of Finance that the people would drive these incompetent men from power, because their policy was detrimental and did a wrong to the country. But where are these hon. gentlemen—the Government—to-day; they sit in the same seats which they occupied four years ago, they stand to-day as high in the confidence of the country as they did four years ago, and a great deal higher, and they made predictions and introduced this policy; they carried it out, and in accordance with the statements which they then made, the country has been progressing rapidly ever since in a measure quite commensurate with the predictions which these hon. gentlemen then placed before the people. I do not know that it is necessary to touch on any of the lines of argument which have been treated with reference to the criticisms of the Opposition, but it seems to me so altered and so changed to-day that I believe it is deserving of a few words. The hon. gentleman who was put up as the financial critic of the Opposition adopted a line of criticism which amused me very much; I thought that, after the verdict which was rendered at the polls, and in view of the decision of the people of this country, he would have dropped the National Policy as a child does a hot potato, and that we would hear no more of the arguments which they kept up for four years in this House. But I see that the natural instincts of this party crop out on almost every occasion when they have a chance of expressing their deep antipathy to the National Policy. Notwithstanding the fact, that at the elections, many of them declared—because I have heard them on the stump in many instances do so—that they were not antagonistic to the National Policy, that they were willing to abide by it, and that they believed it had done great good to the country, still they are opposing it to-day as fiercely as ever.

Mr. SPROULE.

But what did their financial critic say? Did he criticise the actions of the hon. Finance Minister, and the management of the Departments by the Government, as the representative of the Opposition might be expected to do? Strange to say, he merely quoted a few figures, took exception to a few items, making in all some $400 or $500. Then the hon. gentleman turns round on his old hobby, the National Policy. The Globe said in reference to the question in the Provincial Legislature, that the best evidence that the financial affairs of the country were well administered was that the closest scrutiny by the Opposition failed to reveal anything objectionable; and as the Opposition here object only to a few items amounting to some $400 or $500, I contend that this is an evidence that there is nothing far wrong in the state of Denmark. We must conclude either that there is nothing to criticise or that the critic is defective, and hon. gentleman must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other. The hon. gentleman said that too large a sum was spent on surveys in the North-West, and in the Post Office service—that though the country was prosperous the expenditure was too large in proportion to the revenue. What is the expenditure for? It is for developing the country so that it will give us back a large return for every dollar we spend. He went on to show that the expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration was not so large as it is to-day, but the fact is that there was no need for this expenditure at that time. I find that in the Report of the hon. Minister of the Interior for 1873 it is stated that the requirements of settlement would not necessitate the opening up and surveying of more than ten townships, and he did not think that even they would be settled. Let us contrast that condition of things with that which exists at the present time, when the development of the country is so rapid that we must survey some 500 townships instead of only ten. Surely that is the best evidence that is required to show that the policy of the Government is a correct one, and that the expenditure was judiciously incurred. One hon. gentleman last night took exception to the expenditure on immigration, but the hon. member for King's answered him very ably. He said that he thought that an expenditure by which 126,000 people, who brought over $1,000,000 worth of goods with them, which cost us $3.60 per head and brought in over $10 per head, was an expenditure which certainly was judicious; and I agree with him. To my mind it is a policy which will give us a return one hundred-fold for the money we have spent, and, so long as we pursue that policy, the country will not object. The hon. gentleman also objected to the expenditure on the postal service—he said it was too large. But, I ask, how can you open up a new country, extending over 1,000 miles, without additional expenditure? If only ten townships were required to meet the purposes of settlement in 1878, and we now require that 500 townships should be surveyed to keep pace with the incoming population, must it not also follow that the postal service of that country must be very largely increased? Some of these people come from other countries, and many of them go from these Provinces, and when they go up there they expect to retain some of the conveniences and comforts of life—they expect to communicate with their friends, and they are entitled to have these conveniences so far as we can possibly give them. I was much amused at some of the figures given by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) for the purpose of proving that the farmers of this country had not been benefited by the National Policy. He took some figures for September, 1879, on a particular day in that month, a few months after the adoption of this policy, and he drew a comparison between the figures of that day and those for another particular day in a previous year. I ask the House if that is a fair way of arguing? There may be many incidental circumstances which affect the comparison. The fact is, that the figures he gave prove nothing except that he is willing to resort to unfair means in the endeavor to convince the people of the country. In my campaign I endeavored to put this matter before the farmers, as fairly as possible, and to have them judge by the evidence whether or not they had benefited by this policy.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed :—

Bill (No. 20) to empower the National Insurance Company to wind up its affairs and to relinquish its charter, and to provide for the dissolution of the said Company.—(Mr. Coursol.)

BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee and reported :—

Bill (No. 42) to amend and continue in force the Act incorporating the Grafton Harbor Company and for other purposes.—(Mr. Guillet.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker: When you left the Chair at six o'clock I was endeavoring to explain why the line of argument adopted by the Opposition in the House to-day was different from that which they pursued four years ago. I was endeavoring to show that their prophecies and predictions at that time were that disaster would naturally follow the introduction of this Tariff, that it would create ruin, that it would impose taxation on the people and yet make them no better off; and that the Government were doing this in the face of opinions that such would result to the disadvantage of the people and to their own ruin at the next Elections. In the light of experience we find that to-day the tone is entirely altered. Instead of trying to prove to the country that disaster has followed the introduction of that policy, that the people are worse off than they were before, and that there is less contentment and less prosperity, they are satisfied with endeavoring to show that the prosperity existing is not due to the fiscal policy of the present Government, or any other policy they introduced. A great deal of the argument used during the present debate has been levelled directly at the farmers, because as one hon. member said they are the foundation of the whole fabric of society, and are the bulwark of the country; and if we can prove to the farmers that they are being ruined by this policy, then, he said, we will be able to accomplish something, and satisfy ourselves and our party that we shall be able to secure a change of position in this House. For that reason it is attempted to prove that everything the farmer wears, eats and uses, is raised in price, and that everything he has to sell has been reduced. Figures have been arranged for that purpose by hon. gentlemen of considerable note and considerable ability. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a man of very extensive experience, and an able man in that line, has arranged figures in almost every way for the purpose of proving this point. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) followed in the same direction, and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has spent night after night during the last four years in endeavoring to prove the same thing; and, after an experience of four years, they find the people have not agreed to think as they think. They were standing at the last Election in the same position as a boy about to receive correction. A schoolmaster had cultivated a vine until it produced fruit. The boys were warned not to take the grapes, and told that if they did so, severe punishment would follow. One day at noon, when lying on the ground looking upward, the master saw one of the boys take a cluster. The boy said: "If anyone knows any just cause or reason why these two should not be joined together, let him now declare it, or forever after hold his peace." There was no answer given and no objection made, and the boy ate the grapes. After the schoolmaster saw the grapes had disappeared, he asked several of the boys if they knew who the culprit was. He soon discovered him by his downcast looks, and before proceeding to administer punishment, the master said: "If any one knows any just cause or reason why these two shall not be joined together let him declare it." "I object," said the boy. "Why," asked the master. "Because the parties are not agreed," answered the boy. That was the position of the Opposition in this country at the late Elections. When they appealed to the people they found they were not agreed to send them back to occupy places on the Treasury benches. I have already said that much argument was used to convince the farmers that the National Policy was ruining them. The hon. member for North Norfolk, four months after the introduction of the Tariff, took the quotations of Toronto for one day in that and for one day in the previous year, and thought he had effectually settled the question to the satisfaction of the farmers, because he was able to show that the price had not increased. Another hon. member took one month in one year during the four years the policy had been in force, and one month selected from the five years before that time, and compared the average price of grain, and because he was able to prove that the average price of the former period was higher, he thought he had satisfied the farmers that this policy was of no benefit. Another hon. member endeavored to prove, that because the exports were higher during the last four years than during the previous four years, he had satisfied the farmers that the National Policy was of no use to them. During my election campaign last summer I endeavored to arrive at some conclusion which I might lay before the farmers of my riding, which is an agricultural riding. I took this method of arriving at results; and the fairness of the test will commend itself to the better judgment of every hon. member. I went to gentlemen who had been buying grain for the last ten or fifteen years, and obtained from their books the prices for every day in the year during the past three years, and the same for the three years previous to the introduction of the National Policy; and I thought if I could, on striking an average of prices, show the farmers they had received better prices under this policy, I could convince them that it had proved beneficial. I obtained the prices from two of the most extensive grain buyers in the county, and I got this statement certified as correct. These figures proved beyond a doubt that the price of grain, notwithstanding all that has been said by the hon. members for North Norfolk, Queen's, and Huron, the price of grain has been higher during the existence of the National Policy. I took spring wheat in 1876, 1877, and 1878, those three years being prior to the introduction of this policy. I took the price paid every day in the year on the market. Where I contend the unfairness in the calculation arises, is due to hon. members making comparisons from the markets in Toronto, Chicago and New York. A distance of twenty miles will frequently make a difference of three or four cents in the price of wheat, and eight or ten cents in the price of oats. Although there may be a difference, which is apparently a benefit to the farmers, or against him, it is not a sure criterion to prove for or against the farmer; and I say, that if you take the price paid to the farmers directly at their own waggons, and satisfy them that they get better prices to-day than they did at that time, I think it will go a long way to satisfy them that they have received a benefit from this policy. As I said before, these are the prices paid at the farmers' waggons; nothing is taken off for carriage or charges, or the ups and downs of the market. Taking the three years previous to the National Policy, I find that the average price paid for spring wheat in Meaford was 79 cts. a bushel, while for the three succeeding years, it was $1.14 a bushel—for 1879, 80 and 81, a difference of 17 cts. a bushel; and if you remember that the duty is 15 cts. a bushel, I think this proves very clearly a benefit derived by the farmer. The question arises was this due to the Tariff? One thing is evident: although these gentlemen have tried to prove, and have not been successful in proving, that the farmers have received less during the years following the introduction of this policy, I think it is proved that they have received more. They got all the money, there was no middle man to share the profits, these went into their own pockets, and for every 100 bushels they sold, they received $17 more than they did during the three previous years. Taking barley, I find that during the three years previous to the introduction of the policy, the average price paid was 57 cts. a bushel, and for the three years following, it was 67 cts., showing a difference of exactly 10 cts. more than they had been receiving. Now the duty is 15 cts. a bushel, and I think that this shows a benefit. Every farmer who sold 200 bushels of barley knew he got $20 more for it than he did during the three years previous to the introduction of this policy; and he is satisfied that when it was introduced, this was done for his benefit, and he has received substantial good from it. Taking peas, I find that for 1876-77-78, the average price was 58 cts. a bushel, while for 1879-80, it was 61 cts., a difference of 8 cts. a bushel. Now, these are differences which are always on the right side, in their favor; and they can appreciate the advantages of it. I will now take oats, of which so much has been said lately. I would like here to give an explanation. Some hon. members of the House, either intentionally or from the want of knowledge, seem to forget to explain to the House that it is never safe to take the prices for oats at Toronto as a criterion to prove what farmers receive for their oats. In Meaford, 40 cts. are often paid for oats, when twenty-four miles away the price is only 36 cts., and at Collingwood, 60 cts., while in our neighborhood, thirty-five miles from there, it is 45 cts. When farmers find it an advantage in their favor to haul their oats a little distance, they do so, and get the larger price; their time is not so fully occupied, that they cannot always spare a sufficiency of it to transport their grain to some other part of the country, where better prices are paid. We find very frequently that oats are much higher at Collingwood than in Toronto, and very much higher at Owen Sound than at Toronto, or in various parts of the country; and that is just the reason why the National Policy, by shutting out American oats from the particular locality where oats are high, enables our farmers to transport their grain there and receive the benefit of the larger price. Taking oats, I find that during those years there is a difference of 7 cts. a bushel in favor of the three years under the regime of the Finance Minister. Now, that is a great advantage to the people of this country; and, I think, hon. gentlemen forget this when they are quoting prices paid in the central market. They forget that we have an extensive frontier, over 2,000 miles long. In one part of the county of Grey, they can raise a great deal more oats than they require for their own use. In some other parts they do not raise so much as they require, and when a demand there arises, the grain is taken there and sold; the money consequently is kept in the country for our own advantage. This is a great difference from what was the case a few years ago, when 20,000 bushels of oats were landed one day at Collingwood from Chicago, and bought by the people in our country, bringing down the price 15 cts. in one day. The money was sent to Chicago, enriching Americans and impoverishing ourselves. In a short time the oats were consumed, and nothing remained in the country to represent the labor lost.

Mr. COOK. When did that occur?

Mr. SPROULE. I think it was in 1876; I bought part of it. I can tell the hon. gentleman, who is engaged in lumbering pursuits, I lived in the county where he operates very extensively, and I know that not only did he buy foreign oats and pork, but in a great many other lines, he did what it would not be creditable to expose in this House. I knew him, when operating there, to buy his pork and oats from the Americans, to carry on his operations. I was living in North Simcoe, where the hon. gentleman was operating very extensively—as is the case still—as a lumberman and speculator, when his money was sent out of that county to the extent of thousands of dollars, and sent across the border to enrich the Americans, from whom he bought his pork and oats, and feed for men and horses, while engaged in lumbering. But we do not see any of that to-day; our farmers raise the oats used there, and the money is kept in this country for the advantage of our own people. We have a border 2,000 miles long; at one place, it may be at Collingwood to-day, Port Hope next week, or down at Ogdensburg a few weeks hence. We may have one kind of grain very high in price while right across the frontier there may be more of this grain than they require; and if there were no restrictions on imports it would be sent into our market and take the place, bushel for bushel, of our grain, which ought to have been brought perhaps a few hundred miles to that point from some other part of our country; but this policy prevents that injustice. One of the greatest secrets of success, to my mind, of any Government is to so distribute the pursuits of the people as to enable them to work into each other's hands, and to supply each other's wants. This is the case in the distribution of grain. We have had from time to time, oats brought into Canada from the Western States, and sold here; we have had hundreds of thousands of pounds of pork brought into the country and sold; and yet our pork had to be sold at the same time to the detriment of our farmers at a less price. It had to be taken to Europe to find a market; and if we raised of anything more than we required, and American grain took its place, what must be the result? We must take it to some market, and if we do not find a market at home, we must send it to Liverpool, Boston, or Montreal, or to some other market, at a reduced price to the farmer. The cost of carriage, &c., must be paid by the farmer; but if we distribute our own grain from one part of the country to another, we do not lose anything, and the country is greatly advantaged. The Trade and Navigation Returns for the last four years since, the introduction of the National Policy, show that we have excluded a great deal of foreign grain from this country. We excluded last year over 2,000,000 bushels of American oats; very nearly 2,000,000 bushels of wheat, and over 3,000,000 bushels of American corn which was taking the place of our oats and other coarser grains. What has been done by this? Exactly what the hon. Finance Minister said would be the result—an increased market for the people of our country; and not only have we excluded these grains from our country, but also many cattle, horses, and other animals. Now, I take the item of pork, and I find, by the same calculation that the average price of pork in the Meaford market for the years 1876-78 was $4.76 per hundred and that in the three succeeding years, with a duty of one cent per lb. on American pork, the average price paid the farmers of that part of the country was $6.03, or a difference of $1.27 per hundred in favor of the last period. Who will undertake to convince the farmer that he has derived no benefit from the National Policy in the face of these facts? I contend that it is utterly impossible for these figures to be fallacious, because they take in every day of the year, and every bushel of grain, and every pound of pork; and they show that there has been an advance during those four years, notwithstanding the fact that in our outside markets of the world, prices remained almost the same as they were in former periods. The hon. member for North Norfolk stated that Liverpool ruled the markets of the world. Every school-boy would say the same; but at the same time it must be admitted that local markets are regulated by local supply and demand, so that as every farmer knows, sometimes the difference of forty miles will make a difference of 10 cts. per bushel on the price of oats. There have been various times when but for this Tariff the Americans could have sent in their grain, and sold it at a reasonable profit in our country, thus depriving our own farmers of the home market and giving them less remuneration for their labor. In the condition of affairs which existed previous to 1878, we found that farmers were unable to make both ends meet; the proceeds of the year's labor did not pay their store bills; they could not hire additional labor on their farms, because it did not pay them to do so; and the result was that farmers and their sons were found going to other countries in the hope of receiving better remuneration for their labor than they were receiving here. Let us contrast the condition of things to day with what it was a few years ago. At the time the hon. gentlemen now in Opposition began to guide the Ship of State everything was prosperous, everybody was contented, for we had passed through a period of prosperity and our country was going upwards in the scale—there was an abundance of money in the country, the deposits in the savings banks were large; but suddenly a change came over the spirit of our dream. People had been demanding that the Government should make some change—that they should, if possible, introduce some policy which would keep our own markets for our own people, but no change was made; and the result was that instead of the Treasury being full to overflowing, as it was under the previous Administration, deficit after deficit had to be announced by the Finance Minister. Calls were made from various parts of the country that the Government should expend money on necessary public works; but the answer came back that they could not expend the money as they had none to expend. They were getting deeper and deeper into debt every year, and an increasing number of people were getting out of employment, and evidence of want and despair were visible in every part of the country. The party who are now in power propounded a policy, and proclaimed what that policy would produce in the way of changes in the condition of things; and though it was attempted on every stump in this country to prove that this policy would not produce these results; the better judgment of the people decided to try it as they certainly could not be worse than they were, and what has been the result of that policy? The result has been, notwithstanding all these unfavorable predictions, that the best anticipations of the people in reference to this policy have been fulfilled. The result has been to give us an ample revenue; to give employment to every man, woman and child in the Dominion able and willing to work; to raise the wages of the people; to give us money to expend on great public works, and to bring about a period of prosperity which was almost unequalled in the previous history of our country. The attempt has been made by the Opposition to prove that these results have not been accomplished by that policy, but that it was due to the beneficence of Providence, who has smiled upon our people—in fact, that it was due to anything and everything except the National Policy. In this case I believe the old maxim holds good, that Providence helps those who help themselves. Hon. gentlemen contend that our prosperity is due to the bad crops in England and the good crops in this country; but the fact is that we had better crops in 1876 and 1877 than we have had since. In fact, these hon. gentlemen are prepared to credit our prosperity to every cause but that which has been the main instrument in bringing it about. Our prosperity is due to the fact that our people have obtained increased labor at higher wages, that an impetus has been given to every line of trade. Objection has been made to the railway policy of the Government, but I should think that if there is one subject more than another which hon. gentlemen should be ashamed to mention in this House, or in the country, it would be a comparison of the railway policies of the two parties. They had several years experience in endeavoring to weld this iron band which was to bind our Provinces together, and, after four years of that experience, they succeeded in running the country into debt to the extent of $6,000,000 a year, and they built only 117 miles of the road on one end, and 115 miles on the other, while between these two sections there was nothing but a dense swamp—nothing to show for their money except that notable structure called the Fort Frances Locks. When an hon. gentleman spoke, the other day, of that part of the railway between Prince Arthur's Landing and Winnipeg being the key to the whole situation, I thought that these locks might be called both the lock and the key, for after having lost the key and spent $40,000 for the benefit of a political friend, they had nothing left but the lock and the beautiful water stretches, of which we hear nothing to-day. These hon. gentlemen who are so ready to condemn the policy of the present Government, forget that they themselves increased the taxation of the country to the tune of $24,000,000 in four years, and only built 230 miles of railway. They forget that the people of this country are not obliged to pay a cent of additional taxation for the building of that railway, notwithstanding the fact that a couple of years ago they tried to persuade them that it was going to ruin the country. In a year or two that road will be built to the Rocky Mountains, and will open up the vast stretch of country for the teeming millions who are coming in to obtain homes for themselves; and the whole of the work will have been done without the imposition of any additional taxation on the people of the country. Is that not a pleasant thing to lay before the people. When this policy was propounded, it was said that it could not be carried out when the hon. First Minister proposed to obtain money to build the railway from the sale of lands, hon. gentlemen opposite said it could not be done. The experience of the last two years has shown that it could be done. Last year over $2,000,000 was realized from the sale of lands, notwithstanding the fact that we are offering free homesteads to all who chose to go into the country. Last night, the hon. member for South Norfolk said that the National Policy was not as important a matter as the land policy. He did not, I suppose, think of comparing the present land policy with the policy of his friends when they were in office. Settlers could not obtain land at that time unless they paid $5 an acre for it near the railway, or $1 an acre twenty miles back from the railway; but they could not get free homesteads. They left the country in such a condition that hardly any settlers went in, although they were making every effort to attract immigrants. They had to devise the most questionable expedients to settle the country. One of these was to give agents eighty acres of land for every settler he placed in the country, after he lived there three years. I think Mr. Young, a gentleman engaged in that business, made a nice little fortune out of it. Mr. Young took in 100 settlers, and the land he received under that agreement would amount to over $400 for every settler. Contrast that condition of things with what exists to-day, when we are sending in settlers at a cost of $3.60 a head. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in this respect could only have the effect of making millionaires of those who had assisted their party in the past; and when Mr. Young's partner or agent came before a Committee of this House and acknowledged that they were to receive eighty acres of land for every immigrant he took in, they was acknowledging the incompetence of the men who were trying to settle up that country. The country was not being settled up, because the people knew that when they got there they would have to live a long time before they got communication with the outside world; they knew that they had none of the facilities possessed by the people of the older Province; they knew that the burdens of life would press heavily upon them, because they had not the advantage of those great lines of railway that would bring out their grain, and take back the products of other countries. It was no wonder that in the last year of that Government, all they thought it necessary to survey was ten townships. We have no such policy to-day, but we have a policy that provides for keeping pace with settlement, by arranging for the survey of 800 townships. We have a policy that is giving to the people going into that country a railway, which is being built at the rate of over four miles a day in the summer season. As the result of that policy, we find the eyes of the world centered in the North-West; we find people flocking in there from the United States in thousands, and from England, Ireland, Germany and other countries, bringing their wealth with them, and helping to build up our commerce, to increase our strength and population, and to make Canada a great nation. Is not that a policy worthy of our Administration? When hon. gentlemen opposite rise to criticise the railway policy of the Government, what do they say? The criticism has simmered down to one word, and that word is "monopoly." It is an unmeaning term; we find nothing in it. When we go to the North-West, we find that the people are receiving equal advantages with the people of the older Provinces. That gigantic bug-bear of monopoly raised three years ago has turned out to be nothing but a mist. I say that such criticism is unfair. I had expected that the critics of the Opposition benches would pursue a different line of tactics this Session, because I thought the verdict of the people at the last Elections was so decisive that it would compel them to adopt some other means in the hope of getting back to the Treasury benches. But they seem to have fallen back on their old hobbies again, and I think a manly, straightforward, honest criticism is scarcely to be expected from them. In the last campaign the Opposition, after all their denunciations of the National Policy in this House, were very mild on the subject in the country. Why? Because they knew that the people were not with them. It was not on the National Policy, or the railway policy, or the land policy that they appealed to the people, but on the Boundary Award, and on Provincial rights in connection with the Disallowance of the Streams Bill and of the railway in Manitoba. These were the questions placed before the people, and not the policy of the Government. Every unfair question that could be dragged before the people was discussed, and the legitimate subjects of discussion were kept entirely in abeyance; and yet, notwithstanding all that, and notwithstanding the predictions made by the Opposition four years ago, that when the experience of a few years would give the people an insight into this policy they would condemn the Government, the result was that hon. gentlemen opposite came back reduced, if not in numbers, very much in strength. The celebrated philosopher of Bothwell, with all his platitudes, failed to come back; the ex-Speaker, when he told it to his people that they were being ruined by the National Policy, was told that he had better stay at home, and a large majority of the able and influential men of the Opposition were left out. The hon. member who has the honor of leading the Opposition only came back to this House by a hair's breadth, and I believe the return was largely due to the fact that he admitted that the National Policy was not an un-mixed evil, and scarcely touched it at all, but confined himself to other questions—Provincial rights, robbery of our territory, selling of our timber limits, French domination, and the Disallowance of the Streams Bill. These were the questions laid before the people, and according to their own showing you would have expected them to come back largely increased in strength. But the reverse is the case. What are the conditions to-day? Notwithstanding all the unfavorable criticisms we have heard during the last few days on the Budget Speech of the hon. Finance Minister, we find that the people are satisfied; and I believe that all the speeches made from the Opposition benches have not tended to convince an intelligent man in this country that he is injured by this policy. I believe the Government is as strong in the confidence of the people to-day as it was four years ago. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that if they desire to remain in the cold shades of Opposition they have only to attack the policy which was so successfully inaugurated four years ago. If they expect ever to reach the Treasury benches they must alter their tactics, and this they do not seem inclined to do. I would ask nothing better, if I wished to come back, Parliament after Parliament, as representative of the people, than that these hon. gentlemen should continue pursuing the tactics they have followed during the last four years. The hon. member for North Norfolk attacked the Government because changes are made in the Tariff year after year. Why, the very charge made against the late Government was that they persisted in shutting their eyes to the fact that necessities arise from day to day demanding a change of policy, and they refused to make any change. The present Government, however, are very willing, when necessities arise, to make the required changes, and their good judgment is evinced by the fact that these changes always turn out for the best, and everything they predict takes place as harmoniously and regularly as if by clock-work. Perhaps the discussion on this question is drawing to a close, and will not continue many days longer, and I must say from the experience I have had, through two elections in my part of the country—and I have had a fair opportunity of ascertaining the minds of the people—that I believe the people are well satisfied that their affairs are in the hands of competent men. They are well satisfied that we have the greatest living statesman on the continent of America to-day at the head of our Government; the finest Finance Minister that ever directed the financial affairs of the country; one of the ablest Ministries the country has ever had, and one that would be an ornament to any country in the world. As we pass down the course of time, year after year, the pages of history are being written, and I believe these men are leaving their stamp on those pages; I believe they are building colossal monuments to their own honor that will last for ages; I believe that they are leaving precedents on Parliamentary legislation that will be read with interest and used with profit by other nations around us for centuries yet to come. If there is one thing more than another that we desire, it is that these men may long live to fill the position they now occupy, and direct the affairs of the country with the ability which has distinguished their direction during the last four years.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to engage the attention of the House for a few moments while I endeavor to make a few remarks which will, I trust, be pertinent to the question now engaging the attention of the House. I may state here that I will not occupy a great deal of time in discussing the question of Free Trade vs. Protection, or rather the question of a Revenue vs. a Protective Tariff, because I think this has been fully, and I trust finally, settled, by the parties most interested, viz., the great majority of the electors of this Dominion. I think that a great deal of time has already been wasted in discussing this question. During the last Parliament, for four years, every opportunity was taken by hon. members opposite to attack this policy, and I think to those attacks is due the fact that their numbers are so small to-day. To them may be charged this great waste of time. It was the duty of the Government and the members supporting it to repel those attacks until a second appeal was made to the country on this question of the National Policy, which was then on its trial. Previous to 1878, during the regime of the Mackenzie Administration, deputation after deputation, comprising men of both political parties and representing all the varied industries of the country, waited upon the hon. leader of the late Government and his Finance Minister, and begged of them, I may almost say on their knees, to do something in the way of legislation to revive the languishing industries of the country. What was the answer they received? The answer was: "Go home, gentlemen; live economically; cut down wages, do the best you can to compete with the Americans on a 17½ per cent. Tariff, and if you cannot do so close up your factories and go West." They said that so far as they were concerned they were going to make this a cheap country to live in. We are going, they said, to make laws so as to have the farmers with us, and we care not for the rest of the community. Previous to the dissolution of Parliament in 1878, the right hon. leader of the then Opposition moved a series of resolutions embodying the principle of Protection. After having been fully discussed they were voted down by the late Government and its supporters. An appeal was made to the country. The question before the people was Protection to our native industries. That was the great issue of that time. I might quote here from speeches then made by the Opposition candidates, but will merely quote a few lines from an address published by Mr. W. H. Fredenburgh, Liberal candidate for South Leeds at that time. Here is what he said:

"Taking advantage of the depression which exists the world over, they in the most brazen manner try to throw the blame on the best Government Canada ever had, and with a quack remedy in their hands propose to be able to cure all our ills and make us, with a few doses of their powerful specific, at once prosperous. This panacea they have labelled by different names in the different Provinces, to suit the various tastes of those whom they hope to make their victims. Its name is the National Policy, but in Ontario it is more familiarly known as Protection to native industry. The great thoughtful mass of the people are not to be hoodwinked by any such stale device. Protection, indeed! Why, it is a step backwards into the dark ages, and commits us to a policy which will manacle Canada hand and foot and effectually retard her growth for years to come. Protection is neither more nor less than legalized robbery. One class of the community cannot be benefited except at the expense of another; and what we have now to consider is, what class of electors in South Leeds is to reap the benefit? Let us strip this Protection of the gaudy colors with which its blatant and hypocritical advocates have dubbed it, and show it in its hideous nakedness and deformity to the public, that all who cast their votes in its favor may not do so in ignorance. Is it the working man who is to be protected? Most emphatically no. It means for him dear food, dear clothes, dear house rent, dear fuel, insolent bosses, hard times, strikes, and lock-outs, in the end starvation and communism. Any further Protection would only act as an unhealthy stimulus stopping our revenue and making direct taxation necessary. For a time, a year or two at most, there might be more work; but let the mechanics of Gananoque rest assured there will be more men to do it and wages will never be any higher, while the cost of living will be increased over 30 per cent."

Those are some of the prophecies of some of the members of the Reform Administration and their supporters in 1878. The verdict of the people in favor of the resolutions moved in 1878 by the hon. leader of the present Government was overwhelming. Early in 1879 the hon. the Finance Minister introduced his Tariff which was adopted and put into force. During Recess that hon. gentleman visited various parts of the Dominion to observe the effect that policy was having on the industries of the country, and he found that the wheel of progress which had been at a standstill, owing to its having been over freighted with lazy flies, had begun to move, and before one year had passed away that wheel had commenced to revolve so that you could hear the hum of it from one end of the Dominion to the other. Parliament met again the following year, and the hon. the Finance Minister proposed some changes after the experience of the year. Where he found any friction it was removed, where there was any tension it was adjusted, and this process was kept up for four years. During all this time the policy was being attacked by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The right hon. leader of the Government, knowing that the result of these attacks in the House and the press were having an injurious effect upon the country, took means to have another verdict from the people. In this he was true to his country as he has ever been, and I am sorry I cannot say as much of my hon. friends opposite. I challenge the Reform press to point to one word or one act which the right hon. gentleman has ever said or done that could be construed to be against the best interests of his country. One year before the time, he appeals to the country, and asks the people whether they are still in favor of that policy. How was he met when he appealed to the country? Was he met on this question of Protection? Sir, the leader of the Opposition wrote and published a book, and in this book he laid down a sort of milk-and-water policy, and told his followers that, in certain localities they might adopt the National Policy if they liked, while in other places they might oppose it if they thought it would be to their interest. My opponent at the Election in June last, was a manufacturer. In the town of Gananoque he adopted the National Policy, but in the country he opposed it, and gave Mr. Blake's book as his authority for doing so. Now, let us dissect this little book. The hon. leader of the Opposition, as everyone knows, is a first-class lawyer, and fearing that the verdict of the people might be in his favor, and knowing it would be ruin to the country if he were returned to power, wrote this little article in his book, making this charge against the Government:

"They have greatly added to that charge, and have, as far as in them lay, insured the recurrence of a period of serious financial difficulty and distress."

Why did the hon. gentleman place that in his book? Knowing if he were returned that bad times would come again, he could then turn round and say: "Gentlemen, I told you so; there it is in the book." He wrote more than that in his book. He says:

"The progress of the North-West is due to work we did and proposed to do."

Now will any hon. gentleman in this House, or out of it, say that the progress of the North-West was due to what the late Administration did when in power? It is true they bought a lot of steel rails. They built the Neebing Hotel and the Fort Frances Locks, but will hon. gentlemen say these works caused the great progress in the North-West? The people of this country told the hon. leader of the Opposition in act, what an individual over the lines told a politician in words. This old politician had been a sea captain, and was running for Congress, while his opponent was a young limb of the law. The two gentlemen met on the hustings one evening before a large audience. The lawyer delivered an able and very eloquent address. He was followed by the sea captain, who spoke to them as follows: "Fellow-citizens, I claim your suffrages, I have fought, bled and nearly died for my country. I have fought the Britisher and the Indian; I have travelled over this country with a gun on my shoulder, and my knapsack on my back, with the blood running out of my feet. I have lain out doors at night without any covering save the blue canopy of heaven." At this moment a countryman of mine, an old Irishman, arose in the hall and said: "Mr. Speaker, did I understand you correctly to say that you had fought the Britisher and the Indian?" "You did, Sir." "Did I understand you correctly to say that you had travelled over this country with a gun on your shoulder and a knapsack on your back?" "You did, Sir." "Did I understand you correctly to say you had laid out doors all night without any kiver?" "You did, Sir." "Then I will vote for the ether chap, for I think you have already done enough for your country." Now that is what the people of this country said to the leader of the Opposition: "We will vote for that chap, John A., for you have done enough for your country." The hon. gentleman opposite says that the farmers have been injured by this policy. Well, I think, the farmers should be the best judges of that themselves. I have the honor to represent a constituency containing over 4,000 voters, and over 3,500 of them are agriculturists, and I am sure they are of the average class of farmers, wealthy and intelligent. What is the verdict these farmers gave on the National Policy in June last, as compared with 1878? Why, the returns show that 256 more farmers in South Leeds voted for the National Policy in 1882 than in 1878. If any one has a right to judge as to the effects of this policy it is surely the farmers who are the most directly interested in it. Now, let us turn to the manufacturers, whom we are told are not benefited by the National Policy. I have the honor to live in the town of Gananoque which is sometimes called the Birmingham of Canada. I will just read for the benefit of my hon. friends who do not think the National Policy has benefited the manufacturers, one or two specimens of circulars issued by manufacturing houses in that place. The first one is issued by Mr. George Gillies, and is as follows:—

"GANANOQUE, 188

"Your favor of inst., ordering carriage hardware, has been received. I cannot fill your order at once, nor specify any time in which I can, but will ship your goods at as early a date as possible. On account of press of work I will be unable to fill the following for this spring's trade.

"Yours respectfully,
"GEORGE GILLIES."

I think the hon. Finance Minister would be safe in offering a reward of a thousand dollars, or more, for a circular like that published during the regime of the late Administration. Here is another specimen:

Mr. TAYLOR.

"GANANOQUE AXLE WORKS.

"GANANOQUE, Feb. 1882.

"DEAR SIR,—Your favor of the inst. came duly to hand, with order for axles, which will have our best attention. We are very much behind with our orders, and we think it only fair to you to state that we cannot name a date at which we can forward the goods. We may say that up to 1st Dec. last there was no indication that an unusual quantity of our goods would be required this season, and, as a consequence, we did not turn out the quantity we might have done. And, notwithstanding we have now all our machinery running, it will be some time before we can fill orders promptly. If you can wait we will do our best to get your order out in shortest possible time.

"Yours Truly,
"BYERS BROS & Co."

I do not think any further evidence is required to prove that the manufacturers are being benefited, and that the laboring men are being benefited by the present policy. I resided in Gananoque during the hard times, from 1873 to 1878. There our mechanics were on half time, and I never saw a circular of that kind addressed to customers. In consequence of the present prosperity, the factories are all running overtime, more hands are employed, and they are receiving higher wages. I can only say, in conclusion, that so far as I know, the manufacturing and the agricultural portion of the community in my riding, and I think I know them as well as any one, the great majority are in favor of this policy. The majority that South Leeds gave me at the last Election, 277, proves conclusively that the National Policy is approved of in that constituency, and what is the opinion there is a fair index of public opinion all over the country.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. Speaker: Seeing no desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to address the House, I conclude, as they are few in number, they are going to let the verdict go by default. After the many speeches which has been made in the course of this debate, little remains for me to say. In claiming the indulgent consideration of the House for what I, as a young member do say, I only offer the favorite apology, and follow the track marked out by those who have preceded me. Even were I able to present to the House in an intelligent form arguments in support of the policy of the Government, and statements to controvert those made by hon. gentlemen opposite, such arguments would not be necessary. The attack, if I may call it such, on the Government and its policy made from the other side of the House, has excited in my mind, a feeling that really they have nothing to attack. What do we find their attitude to be? They make reckless charges against the Government of extravagance. Have they brought forward any proof in support of those charges. No; on the contrary, even some of the hon. members opposite had to admit that those made by their companions in arms were entirely groundless. It occurs to me, from hearing the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they are rather narrow and rather sectional in their ideas, that they are more disposed to touch small matters than to deal with matters of importance to the country. I am not disposed to belittle the idea that attention should be bestowed on small as well as on large matters; but the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite introduce small matters in this debate proves to me they have nothing large to attack. What do we find? We find the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) applying himself, I think, in a very unwarrantable manner, to an attack on the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster). I am proud, as coming from New Brunswick, that this House possesses a member who has so ably expressed the views of the Province, and not only the views of the Province but the views of the country; and I think it would have been only chivalrous and courteous on the part of the hon. member for Queen's, who is an older member of the House than is the hon. member for King's, to have complimented him on the extraordinarily able manner in which he placed his views before the House. We find that the hon. member for Queen's carrying out the sectional, small, and narrow ideas of his companions in arms, when he referred to the fact that the hon. member for King's did not allude to the Province of New Brunswick. Was it particularly necessary that he should make a special reference to that Province? I think it was not. So, as in the case of the hon. member for Queen's, we find the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), stating in this House that the matter to which we are addressing ourselves is one of very little consequence indeed. If the financial condition of the country is of very little importance, I ask the House why it was that the hon. member and those politically associated with him devoted so much time to the question. If I remember rightly, that hon. gentleman said the question of opening up the North-West and that of the Ontario Boundary were of more general importance than the financial question or the Tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made an attack on the Government respecting the increased expenditure in connection with the Civil Service. Have they attempted to point out that the increase was not necessary? The increased expenditure on account of the Civil Service was consequent on the development of the country, the opening up of the North-West, and the fact that the affairs of the country are administered in a more efficient manner. They have also alluded to the question of the cost of gas. I know no party that comprises better judges of the value of gas; it is an article of which they seem to possess a large quantity, and certainly they seem able to measure its value. They have also referred to the travelling expenses of the members of the Government—another small matter while not unimportant in itself, it is so, comparatively speaking, when compared with the issues now before the House and country. If the members of the Ministry had to expend some money in travelling expenses, I assume that, in doing so, they were discharging duties which they owed to the country, which received good value for the expense incurred. Allusion was also made to the fact that the Minister of Inland Revenue devoted some of his time to Ontario lately. Well, is that a charge which can be brought against the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue alone? Can I not point to seats which were empty on the other side of the House, for days and weeks, in order that the members which should occupy them might engage in the Ontario Election, and was it not necessary, if you will, that the Minister of Inland Revenue, or any other member of the Cabinet, should devote his time to meeting the charges which these hon. gentlemen opposite were making from every stump and hustings in Ontario against the Government? I say it was. The policy of the Dominion Government was discussed, and it was decidedly necessary that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, or any other Minister who could take enough time from his Department, should devote himself to controverting and contradicting the assertions falsely made. They charge extravagance in connection with the general expenditure, and they single out two or three items, particularly the item on immigration. Well, Sir, I can only say that to my mind, the money spent on immigration has been wisely and well spent. The Administration of the day is quite alive to the necessity of bringing in people to fill up the country, to settle on the lands in the North-West, and to contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the Dominion; but while I am an advocate of such expenditure, I may be excused when I say I do not think that the Government should devote their whole attention in this respect to the North-West. There are other parts of the Dominion to which immigration could be directed; and I put it to the Government, would it not be well that they should devote some attention with the view of aiding the other Provinces in securing a share or portion of the stream of immigration which is flowing from the other side to this side of the water. We have, in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and I speak more particularly in reference to New Brunswick, some of the finest farming lands in the Dominion of Canada; and I think it would be a wise expenditure for the Government to appropriate a certain amount of money, in order to supplement anything which may be done by the different Provinces to promote immigration. Attacks were also made on the expenditure on Public Works; but have we not something to show for Public Works. Has this expenditure been lately made in such a way as to financially embarrass the country, as was the case from 1874 to 1878, when the then Government produced deficits very year? No, Sir. It has been carried on out of the surplus revenue. We have railways and canals to show for this expenditure. We have assisted railways in several Provinces, out of the surplus revenue; and, therefore, I say, as it was so well put by the hon. member for King's, that we have assets to show—and liabilities if you will—in connection with these items. We have also harbor improvements, piers and breakwaters; and can it be truly said, that the present head of this Department shows any inefficiency, or any desire to be extravagant? No. I will accord to the hon. gentleman at the head of this Department, the tribute that he manages its affairs in the most economical manner possible—in fact, to some of his supporters, he appears to be rather too economical. Can such jobs be charged on him as were referred to by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that is such as the Fort Frances Locks, &c.? No such charge can be made. Now then, Mr. Speaker, we will proceed to another matter referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite; it relates to the Tariff. These hon. gentlemen seek to convey this idea and this impression to the country that the effect of the Tariff has not been what was predicted for it by its promoters and supporters, that is that it would reduce imports from the United States; but that it has, on the contrary, increased them. Hon. gentlemen opposite allege that it has increased our imports from the United States. I take issue with them, and say, that if you deduct from these imports, raw cotton, locomotives, and other things, which may be called raw material, being necessary to the development of this country, you will find that the effect of the Tariff has been to increase our trade with Great Britain, as against an increase of trade with the United States. Suppose that this Tariff had not been in existence, and that the National Policy had not been framed, I ask you and the House, what then would have been the result? Would the position of imports from the United States versus Great Britain, be as it is to-day? Sir, I claim, that the imports from the United States would have been largely in excess of those from Great Britain. Another charge, which has been made by hon. gentleman opposite, was, that the framing of this Tariff, or, the inauguration of this policy, was taken in the United States as an evidence of our hostility to them. I say that this cannot be the case, because in framing and carrying out this policy we were simply following the example which was set us by that great country; and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it not just as much in the interest of the United States to be friendly with us as it is in our interest to be friendly with them. The Trade Returns place our imports from them at \$48,000,000, while their imports from us were \$40,000,000. In going over these matters I only do so in a cursory manner. I am not prepared to hurl against hon. gentlemen opposite the mass of figures which they hurl against us. The House, I think, has been deluged with figures, and I am sure that it is tired of them, and therefore I propose not to indulge in any elaborate figurative argument at all events; but I may be pardoned if I refer to a few by-and-bye. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk say that the savings bank deposits were no indication of the prosperity of the country—that, at all events, they are no proof as to its prosperity. Well, really, this is an argument which I never heard advanced before, and I am sure that it is an argument which will not carry weight and conviction to the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House; if it convinces hon. gentlemen opposite, they are indeed very easily convinced. That hon. gentleman endeavored to prove the correctness of his contention by instituting a comparison between the deposits of the Lower and Upper Provinces; and argued that because they were greater in the former in proportion to population they could not be used as an argument to show the prosperity of the country. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman and the House, what, in my opinion, his reasoning is worth, and why the deposits in the savings banks of the Lower Provinces are much greater in proportion than are the deposits made in these banks in Ontario and Quebec. The hon. gentleman himself answered his argument. The hon. gentleman told the House that money is taken from one investment and placed in another; and so it is with the earnings of the people. In the Lower Provinces we have not reached that point in manufactures that has been reached by the people of Ontario and Quebec, and which we hope to arrive at by-and-bye. The savings of the people of Ontario are invested in manufactures and bank stocks, while in the Lower Provinces, owing to these manufactures not having reached so forward a stage of advancement, the money of the people is more largely deposited in the savings banks. Why is it that the deposits in the banks have increased? It is simply because the workmen of the country have been getting increased wages, and have therefore been able to save money to put in the banks. Reference has been made to the chartered banks by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they quoted the prices of bank stocks in 1874, and compared them with those of 1878. It would have been much fairer to this House and the country, if that hon. gentleman had compared the prices of these stocks in 1874 with those of the present time; I will give the House the quotations of two or three of the leading banks for those years, which will show that the chartered banks, at all events, are enjoying a great measure of prosperity, that prosperity being the outcome of the employment given for their capital. In 1874, the stock of the Bank of Montreal was quoted at 130; to-day it is quoted at 200. In 1878, Bank of Toronto stock stood at 138; to-day it is 184. In 1874, Federal stock was quoted at 98; to-day it is 161. Reference was also made to the prices of our bonds in the Old Country, and an hon. gentleman stated that the reason our bonds were at their present high prices was because the money market of England is open to the world. True, they are open to the world, but were they not open to the other colonies as well as to ourselves? Why is it that our bonds are worth so much more to-day than they were some years ago? It is simply because we are not under the necessity of going into the market to borrow money—simply because we have a surplus and are able to pay our interest at maturity. I ask if our credit would have stood as high as it stands to-day if we had deficits staring us in the face year after year, as hon. gentlemen had. I come next to the question of imports versus exports. Hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to make it appear that the utterances of members of the Government to-day and those of some years ago are entirely inconsistent. I maintain that such is not the case, and that the hon. Finance Minister has always said that it was the aim of the Government to make our exports as nearly as possible equalize our imports. If the country is going to the dogs, as hon. gentlemen say, with increasing exports, let us contrast the condition of affairs in this country during the last four years with that which existed between 1874 and 1878, and show if the imports were not as much in excess of the exports in the former period as they have been for the last four years, and very much greater. I will give the round numbers, so as not to tire the House. In 1874 the exports were \$89,000,000, as against \$128,000,000 imports—or an excess of 43 per cent. In 1875 the exports were \$77,000,000; and the imports \$123,000,000, or an excess of 57 per cent. In 1876 the exports were \$80,000,000; and the imports \$93,000,000, an excess of 15 per cent. In 1877 the exports were \$75,000,000; and the imports \$99,000,000, or an excess of 32 per cent. In 1878 the exports were \$79,000,000, as against \$93,000,000, an excess of 16 per cent.; or, taking the whole five years, an average excess of imports over exports of 32 per cent. Let us now take the period between 1879 and 1882. In 1879 the exports were \$71,000,000; and the imports \$81,000,000, or an excess of only 13 per cent. In 1880 the exports were \$87,000,000, and the imports \$86,000,000, a balance of trade on the right side, for, I believe, the first time in the history of our country. In 1881 the exports were \$98,000,000, and the imports \$105,000,000, an excess of 17 per cent. In 1882, the exports were \$102,000,000, and the imports \$119,000,000, an excess of 17 per cent.; or, taking the latter period, an average excess of imports over exports of only 9 per cent, as against 32 per cent. in the former period. It has often been said, and I suppose truly, that figures cannot lie; but hon. gentlemen on the other side will not allow them to lie, they sat them up again and again but only to be demolished. I do not think that it will be asserted that the Tariff prevented any increase of exports, and, on the other hand, I think it can be truly asserted and is susceptible of proof, that it has decreased the imports. If during the last four years, which is considered an era of prosperity, we had not this Tariff in force, if we had not had manufactures going on all over the country, I ask, would not our imports have been very much greater? What has become of all the goods manufactured in the country from 1878 to 1882? Have they been lost? No, they have gone into consumption, and our imports have been lessened thereby. Reference was made by an hon. gentleman on the other side to the question of wheat, and I think he sought to make it appear that the farmers of Canada had not, under this Tariff, the control of their own markets, and he instanced the fact that, because 5,838,156 bushels were entered for home consumption in a year, in which there was no duty levied, we could not very well arrive at what was consumed in the country. Well, if that hon. gentleman would turn up the exports, he would find a solution of the problem. In 1876 we imported 5,838,156 bushels and we exported, not the produce of Canada, 3,177,979 bushels, showing that of what we imported into the country, 2,660,159 bushels went into consumption; and to that extent the farmers were deprived of a market for their wheat. In 1882 our total imports of wheat were 2,931,220 bushels, and the exports, not the produce of Canada, were 2,580,498 bushels, showing that only 345,909 bushels went into consumption. Then, again, with reference to the balance of trade, it does not follow, and I think it has been admitted, that because our imports exceed our exports, the country is in a bad state. In order to see that an apparent excess of imports does not indicate that the country is in debt to that extent, we must take into consideration, as stated by the hon. Finance Minister, the disbursements on our ships. A large amount of money is advanced by the shipper to the ship-owner, to defray loading expenses, port charges, wages, &c., and is drawn for against freight payable at port of discharge. That money does not enter into our exports at all. The amount is a very considerable one, much greater, I take it, than the amount stated by the hon. Finance Minister. I think he placed the amount at 5 per cent. on \$350,000,000, producing \$17,500,000. The amount would more likely be \$25,000,000. There are also the earnings of our ships, to which reference has been made. Canada, as has been said, is the fourth ship-owning country of the world; its ships are trading in foreign countries, sometimes the owners never see their ships, but drafts representing their earnings are constantly coming in, and adding to the wealth of the country; and go to help to meet any balance of trade that may be against it. The profits on our shipments, are no unimportant item, at 5 per cent., an ordinary business profit, they would amount to several millions of dollars. A still further item which has not been mentioned is the earnings of our seamen abroad, and which are constantly coming back to the country, they may also be applied to reduce the balance against us. There are also the earnings of a large number of our people who are working in the woods and the factories of the neighboring Republic. Taking all these items into consideration, although the balance of trade for last year is shown by the Returns to have been \$17,500,000 against us, it really has no existence, but had its amount very much less, proportionately, than the smallest balance that was against us under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, because the volume of trade is so much larger. We are also charged with having placed ourselves in an attitude to preclude us from obtaining Reciprocity from the United States. That contention is absurd. I believe it is part of our Tariff law that whenever the United States Government show a desire to reciprocate by placing any article on the Free List, the Governor in Council is authorized on our side to place the same article on the Free List. Therefore we have nothing to fear from the position we have taken. Is it not much better that we should be in the position of having something to give? If we had nothing to give would the United States open their doors to us? We would be met with the statement: "Oh, if we open our markets to you, you have nothing to give us in return." Hon. gentlemen opposite have made labored efforts to show this House that the price of farm produce has not been benefited by the operation of this Tariff. Well, the same argument that I have applied to other matters will apply to this—that if we had not imposed duties on grains coming from foreign countries, our farmers would not have been able to realize the price they did. To my mind, no class in this Dominion derive as much advantage, to-day, from the operation of the Tariff as the farming class. I would ask the hon. members from Prince Edward Island, if they could have obtained, during the past year, the same price for their oats as they did, if our markets were free to the United States? They would not have had the markets of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. Therefore, I say the Tariff was a very great boon to them in this respect. The hon. member for Queen's has read to the House a statement to show that the farmers of New Brunswick have not had the control of their own market under the Tariff; and how has he attempted to show that? Simply by reading the exports of farm produce from the Province of New Brunswick. Does that go to prove that the market of New Brunswick was not completely under the control of the farmers? What they exported was simply the surplus that they had after the market of their own Province was supplied. When he quotes the large export of certain articles from New Brunswick, the figures he has given do not, to my mind, correctly represent the surplus of the farmers of New Brunswick, because a large portion of the farm produce and the produce of the dairy—butter, cheese, oats and other articles of that kind—which are consumed on the north shore of New Brunswick are brought in from Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island, therefore the farmers of New Brunswick had not the amount of produce to export which the figures of the hon. gentleman would seem to indicate. Then there is the shipping industry. That matter has been so very ably dealt with by the hon. member for Westmoreland, that very little is left me to say on it. As was stated by my hon. friend, sailing ships are driven from the seas by steamers, and I am pleased to learn the Government intend to encourage the building of composite ships which will be able to compete with iron ships and in a measure with steamers. While we are not building a very large amount of tonnage, we are building a large number of vessels to run between the Dominion and the West Indies and South America, and which find employment in carrying away our lumber and our fish, and in bringing return cargoes of raw sugar for our refineries, which are giving so much employment to our people, and which are doing so much to build up, not only our shipping industry, but the trade of the country generally. Our friends on the other side seem to demur very strongly to the verdict of the people. They will not accept it, but I think it is time they opened their eyes to the fact that the people in 1878 and 1882 very emphatically endorsed the policy of the present Government, and that they should turn their efforts in a different direction from that they are now pursuing. It is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Government secured its majority by what is commonly called the gerrymandering process. I am not going to talk of the effect of this in Ontario, but I know that no gerrymandering was done in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, and I do not think any was done in Quebec. Yet what do we find? From Quebec to Cape Breton, with the exception of one county, every constituency along the sea-board has sent a supporter of the Government. In every one of these constituencies the National Policy was the issue pure and simple, and I know that in the county which I have the honor to represent, and which is one of the greatest, if not the greatest fishing county in the Dominion, and is also a good farming and lumbering county, the issue of the National Policy was placed as squarely as I could place it before the people, and they adopted that policy and sent me here to support it. And I do not think it can be said that the gentleman who opposed me was, by any means, a mean exponent of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. I had intended at one time to cast at the hon. member for North Norfolk that famous '76 speech of his, but that has been done much more ably and effectively by my hon. friend from King's. I will simply refer to one statement of the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk, viz.: that he would not object to a 20 per cent. Tariff. I think we can show from the utterances of that hon. gentleman himself, that the average amount of duties paid on goods imported into this country only amounted to 19 $\frac{3}{10}$  per cent., so that we are under the 20 per cent. Tariff he said he would like to see imposed. The hon. member for Queen's has said that we have not yet seen in the Province of New Brunswick any of the tall chimnies promised us by the promoters of the National Policy. I take issue with him there. While the statement may be true as regards the county of King's, it must be remembered that that is purely an agricultural constituency. In that county, so far as I can recollect, there was only one industry of any consequence—a boot and shoe factory—and through causes which it is unnecessary to state that factory has been closed. What can be said of that can be said of many others of a similar kind; but if the hon. gentleman will turn his attention to the metropolis of New Brunswick—St. John—will he not find tall chimnies there? To-day, in St. John, a very large cotton mill is being built; also a cotton mill in the town of Moncton, in addition to the factories already established in those places, and all due to the National Policy. In addition to the cotton mill now being erected in St. John, the capacity of the old cotton mill has been very materially increased. Therefore, I say, not to speak of the bolt and nut works, and the amount of work done by the foundries there in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all the other requirements of the country, we will find that St. John is becoming a large manufacturing centre. I think the hon. gentleman is not discharging his duty to the Province of New Brunswick, or to this House, when he keeps out of sight the fact that St. John is certainly increasing the number of its manufacturing industries. In Nova Scotia, a new cotton mill is in progress at Windsor, also one at Halifax, and a large sugar refinery; and to-day, in glancing over the paper, I saw an advertisement calling for tenders for the erection of a new sugar refinery in Dartmouth. The output of coal, I may add, has also very largely increased in Nova Scotia through the operation of the National Policy. Now, Sir, the general effects which have followed the National Policy are these: our people are better employed, they get better wages, they are kept at home. Instead of going to the United States, they find employment at their own doors. The farmers are getting better prices for their products than they would get if this policy were not in existence. The manufacturer has the home market for himself. It is not necessary for us to go abroad to borrow money. Notwithstanding the statements from the other side, I assert that the goods our manufacturers produce under the operation of this Tariff, are given to the consumer just as cheaply as they could have been given under a 20 per cent. Tariff—a similar class of goods imported from the other side of the water. We get as cheap goods, and we get better goods. I assert, as a matter of fact, that the article of tweeds, referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, are produced cheaper and better under the operation of this Tariff than they could have been imported under a 20 per cent. Tariff. It has had the effect to shut out a lot of inferior products of the mills in Manchester and other English cities. Take the ordinary kind of tweeds, costing 2s. a yard, largely made up of shoddy. Under a 20 per cent. Tariff those goods cost, laid down, about 63 cts. a yard; I assert, without fear of contradiction, that you can buy a Canadian tweed for 55 or 60 cts. a yard, a much better article, and giving much better satisfaction, than English tweed. Again, the policy of the Government has given us cheap tea; it has given us free tea. Not only that, but it has conferred on the people of the Maritime Provinces, and more particularly on the county I represent, an inestimable boon in the fishery bounty of \$150,000. I ask you if we were under the regime of the hon. gentlemen opposite, with deficit after deficit, could they afford to give that bounty to the fishermen? No, Sir. My hon. friends opposite will say that the money was due to the people of the Maritime Provinces, under the award of the Washington Treaty, but if we had deficit after deficit, that \$150,000 would have to be taken to meet the ordinary requirements of the Government. I was glad to hear that the attention of the Government has been drawn to the necessity of better trade relations with the people of other countries. It is very desirable that our trade should be increased in the direction of the West Indies and Brazil, and also with the continental countries of Spain, France, Italy and elsewhere, in order that we may become less dependent on the United States for a market. To my mind, the West Indies and South America are the natural markets for the Maritime Provinces. I hope every effort will be made by the Government to develop trade in that direction. In connection with this matter I may mention that there is a feeling in the Maritime Provinces that molasses should be placed on the Free List. It enters largely into everything that we produce, yet it may be necessary to retain the duty now levied on it in order that we may better be enabled to secure Reciprocity for our fish and our lumber with countries producing it. I regard that point in the same way that I regard our position with the United States. I do not desire to detain the House any longer. I can only say in conclusion, that having been sent here to support the policy of the Government, and having heard nothing from the other side to cause me to change my views or prove recalcitrant to the trust reposed in me, I shall continue to support that policy and give all the assistance I can towards carrying it out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk). I desire to direct the attention of the House briefly to that portion of the Tariff which affects the Province of Manitoba. I shall not attempt to go over the whole question now before the House with any elaborate arguments as to the merits of the National Policy; but in the interests of my constituency, in the interest of Manitoba and the North-West, I wish to refer to that portion of the Tariff, or to the changes which the hon. Finance Minister proposes to make in the Tariff, which I consider will be very injurious to the settlers of the North-West. It is a well-known fact to those who have taken the trouble to study the question, and who have resided in Manitoba or the North-West for any length of time, that, notwithstanding all the arguments to the contrary, the settlers out there pay the duty on agricultural implements. I do not think there is any question at all in the minds of the people of that country on that point, no matter what stripe of politics they may belong to. I am perfectly satisfied that if a vote was taken to-morrow, that not only the Reform but the Conservative electors of the whole Province of Manitoba would declare by a nine-tenths majority against an increased duty on agricultural implements. We are perfectly well aware that it has been the policy of the Government to foster the manufacturing industries of the eastern portion of the Dominion, and notwithstanding that it is a burden upon our people we are willing to pay a fair share of that excessive duty in order to give the policy a fair trial. But when the hon. Finance Minister started out with the assertion in his opening remarks that he had $1,250,000 to give away, or in other words, lessen the burdens of the people, because he had a large surplus, I hoped that we were to receive a small share, at all events, of that $1,250,000; but, Sir, I was surprised to find before he got through that instead of attempting to lessen the burdens of the people of the North-West he was going to increase them by adding to the duties upon agricultural implements. Here is what he said:

"If you take up the list of the American houses in Winnipeg, you will find that they offer their agricultural implements at precisely the same prices as our manufacturers, and a fair inference is that they allow them a larger margin than our own people allow them. The result is that unless some steps are taken, the Americans will drive our people out of that market, and they will not reduce the price of the implement to the consumer, because our people show that their prices are as cheap as those of the United States; and we ask Parliament to say, inasmuch as the people of Canada who manufacture these implements can produce them as cheaply and sell them at from 10 to 15 per cent. less than 1878, and are prepared to supply them as cheap as the Americans, that they will not be driven out of the country, and therefore we ask for this increase of the Tariff."

I must assume that the hon. Finance Minister was not in possession of the facts when he made that statement. He says, in the first place, that in 1878 agricultural implements were from 10 to 15 per cent. higher than they are at the present time. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in 1878 we had no railway to Winnipeg, and consequently agricultural implements had to be carted there overland, or taken in flat boats, and no wonder they were higher than they are at the present time—it is unfair to make a comparison with that time, and I hope hon. gentlemen do not think the people of Manitoba are so dull as to believe that argument. Then the hon. gentleman says that representations were made to him, by a deputation of agricultural implement manufacturers, that the American agents are giving more liberal terms than the Canadian makers are able to offer, and, if they are not protected by 10 or 15 per cent. more duty the Canadian makers will be driven out of the market. I have not had the opportunity or the time to make enquiries from my constituents or communicate with all the implement dealers in the North-West, but I have received information from those who are better informed on the question, than either the hon. Finance Minister or myself, that quite the contrary is the case. We all know that in the States of Dakota and Minnesota we have strong competitors for the immigration going into the North-West. If we are not able to offer as good inducements to settlers on our side of the line as those States can offer, we must expect to lose a large portion of the immigrants. In a strip of land 100 miles wide in Dakota, immediately south of Manitoba, it is a well-known fact that three-fourths of the settlers are Canadians. There is no use in denying the fact. I am not here to make speeches that can be used by American agents against immigration to Manitoba, but the truth must be told, and if the hon. Minister of Finance will not take the trouble to ascertain the facts I am forced to the conclusion that I must tell the whole truth in order that our case may be fairly and honestly presented. There must be good reasons for all those Canadians settling on the American side of the line; there is no use in saying there is not. What are they? They are told, and it is a stock argument with American agents, that the outfit for the first year to start farming can be purchased by the settler much cheaper in the United States than in Canada. I regret to say there is too much truth in that statement; I regret also to say that the statement will be intensified by the increased duty which the hon. Minister proposes to impose on agricultural implements. I think he is putting a stronger argument in the mouths of the American agents than I, or any other hon. member can do, that they will have better arguments with which to canvass Canadians passing through that country than heretofore; and as the Canadian Pacific Railway will not be finished for another two or three years, the loss of immigrants to the Canadian North-West passing through the United States will be very much greater than is represented in this House. If Manitoba and the North-West were likely to produce manufacturing establishments, if we had the raw materials there for manufacturing agricultural implements, there might be some excuse for protecting this product; but, it is a well-known fact that, with the exception of the lumber interest, there is no manufacturing interest in that country, nor is there likely to be any for a long time. It is a fact, that we cannot bring in raw material, pig iron and other articles required, and pay the freight on it, and compete with manufactured goods from abroad; and not until we have a railway built to Hudson's Bay, can we expect to compete with our neighbors across the line. I hope that at no very distant day we will open this country and obtain the raw material for manufacturing, such as the coal and iron, and build up a Montreal at the mouth of Nelson River before very many years have passed away. I am not replying to any of the arguments on the general question of the Tariff, but I am confining myself entirely to the Province from which I come, and I voice the opinion of the people when I say that the hon. Finance Minister never made a greater mistake in his life than when he proposed to increase the duty on agricultural implements. I do not ask that the duty should be abolished altogether, inasmuch as the country has pronounced largely in favor of the National Policy; it must remain as it is, I suppose, during this Parliament. I am not going to oppose the present duty, because I am not here, as I have stated, to discuss the question of existing duties in detail, but if those who have voted for it, and believe it is right, are satisfied, I must be. Returning to the interview between the hon. Minister of Finance and the agricultural implement makers, and the arguments used, I think it strange the hon. gentleman did not think it worth his while to consult the people of Manitoba through their representatives, but allowed the manufacturers to come here and bulldoze the Government into enacting a higher Tariff and placing more taxes on settlers in Manitoba without consulting them in one way or the other. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman mentioned this matter beforehand to any of the members for Manitoba, and I think the time has come when more attention should be paid to the wants and requirements of the people of that country by the Government of the day than has been done heretofore.

It is all very well for hon. Ministers to sit in their cushioned chairs and govern the people of the North-West without possessing practical experience of the country, or seeking information respecting it. What are representatives sent here for, if not to be consulted, especially respecting the requirements of their own Province? But the hon. Finance Minister appears to think more of a few manufactures than of the bone and sinew of Manitoba. Without consulting their representatives in any way whatever, he comes down to this House and proposes to increase the duty on agricultural implements going into that country. As I said before, I hoped that if we were not to get any portion of the $1,250,000 which he proposes to distribute by reducing the taxation of the country, at least we should not be taxed any more than we were, and if he had left us alone I would have been better satisfied; but he has not only lowered the duties on some goods, but he has put other goods on the Free List, and has not only protected manufacturers, in some cases with higher duties, but he proposes to give away a portion of this money in the shape of bounties to manufacturing industries. Well, Sir, I might perhaps approve of the policy of giving bounties to certain industries in this country. I believe that this after all may be the proper way to protect some manufacturing interests, and I think that if the hon. gentleman had taken into consideration the industries of the North-West and had considered for a moment before he made the statement that he would increase the duty on agricultural implements, and before he gave the people of the North-West what I suppose he considered a quid pro quo in the shape of the entry on the Free List of agates, rubies, pearls, sapphires, emeralds and opals, we might have had a different proposal. Why, Sir, we asked them for bread and they gave us a stone. We asked them not to increase the burden on agricultural implements, the staple articles required in our country to produce our bread, and, Sir, they give us precious stones without duty. Well, Sir, on behalf of the agricultural interest of the Province of Manitoba, and the laborers and farmers of that country, I return to the hon. Minister of Finance my sincere thanks for this great favor; but if the hon. Minister of Finance has determined that the duty on agricultural implements shall be increased—although I believe he will find it necessary to reconsider this question before the matter is settled—if he is bound that he shall impose this extra duty, then I ask him to extend the same liberal policy towards the agriculturists of Manitoba and the North-West that he has extended, or proposes to extend, to the iron interests of the Eastern Provinces. If he proposes to adopt that system, and to inaugurate that policy, why should he not give to the farmers of the North-West 10 cts. per bushel bounty on wheat and 5 cts. a bushel on coarse grains during the next three or four years, in compensation for this extra duty on implements; and I shall then be prepared to let the thing go.

Mr. LANDRY. Hear, hear.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hear an hon. gentleman call out "hear, hear;" but I can show him by a very simple calculation—and will do so at a later stage, if necessary—that the increase in the duty from 25 to 35 per cent. on implements would not be more than balanced in three or four years by 10 cts. bounty on each bushel of wheat, and 5 cts. a bushel on our coarse grains. It may appear to be a very remarkable statement to make; but it is the fact. If this thing is to be perpetuated for a certain number of years, of course this will be necessary. It is said that we get free homes and free land in the North-West; but in the outfit of implements only, which it is necessary for the immigrant going into that country to purchase—because he cannot take agricultural implements from here to the North-West, these being unsuitable for that country—he pays over $1 an acre for his 160 acres, the very first year that he settles in that country, in the way of duty. There are many good reasons why this increase of duty should not be imposed, and I think I shall be able to show that, at all events, the universal opinion of the people of that country, is, that this duty should not be increased. As I said before, I have not had the time to place myself in communication with all the dealers in the North-West; but I have received sufficient assurances, at all events, to know that they are all, or nearly all, opposed to this increase in the Tariff. Of course, the implement dealers who deal exclusively in Canadian goods, may use the same argument which, I presume, was used with the hon. Finance Minister, in order to induce him to increase this duty. I have a letter which I received by this day's mail, giving the views of one of the largest dealers in these goods in the North-West, and, I may add, by the way, that he is a prominent Conservative; of course, if I read letters from any others than supporters of the Government, they would not be believed. One of the largest dealers and the oldest house established in this relation in the country, state on this subject their views, as follows:—

"We were always in favor of dealing in goods of Canadian manufacture. We started business here in 1877, with the determination of confining our attention chiefly to manufactures of our own country. We found in 1878 and 1879 that our Canadian goods were reasonably fair; but from that time there was a depreciation in quality to such an extent that as a matter of self-protection, in order to keep our trade as against other dealers, we were drawn to purchase in the United States.

"Regarding prices, take the following examples:—

"STREAM THRESHERS.—The price list herewith (marked A) of the Canadian manufacturers, Stevens, Turner & Burns, of London, Ont., shows the price in Winnipeg to be $1,515.

"The price list herewith (marked B) of the J. J. Case Threshing Machine Company of Racine, Wisconsin, shows their price in Winnipeg for the same article to be $2,000, or a difference in favor of the Stevens, Turner & Burns, of $485, or about 33½ per cent. less than the American article. Case's price for the same article at Racine is even more than the Canadian machine in Winnipeg—namely, $1,585.

"We sell the American made machine at $2,000 in preference to the Canadian at $1,515, not because we desire to do so, as our own interests are in the direction of Canadian manufactures, but because the Canadian article is so far behind the other, that the Manitoba farmer prefers to pay the large difference in amount and take the American article.

"AMERICAN PLOUGH—PRAIRIE QUEEN.—Price list shows the cash price here of the twelve-inch breaking plough, manufactured by John Deere & Co., Moline, Illinois, to be $25.

"Price list shows the cash price here of the same plough manufactured by the Thomson & Williams Manufacturing Co., Stratford, Ont., to be $20.

"We sell 20 of the American to one of the Canadian, in spite of the difference in price. If they were to put on a hundred per cent. duty farmers would take the American. They cannot keep the American out, so as to secure the market to the Canadian. The Canadian manufacturer does not secure the trade of the country by the higher duties. The farmer here will continue to purchase the American article, and the increased price imposed upon him in the way of duty will not benefit the Canadian, but will be so much more tribute he has to pay to the Government without any effect in increasing home industries. But by-and-bye, the weight will be so burdensome to him, combined with other things that he has to contend with in this country, that he will remove to the United States, where he can get what he requires and what he cannot do without at about first cost.

"SELF-BINDERS.—Respecting these: We have always dealt in Canada for self-binders until now we are driven to get them in the States. And for the reason chiefly that the Canadian manufacturers are quite unable to supply the country with the number it requires. Messrs. Elliott & Son, of London, Ont., manufacture these binders. We have been acting as their agents for three or four years past. But we found that they were unable to meet the demand, and we had to make arrangements with the United States firms, or lose the trade. Last September, in arranging for the trade of 1883, we found that we should require at least 400 binders and 400 mowers. We applied for them to Elliott & Son, but they advised us that they could not possibly supply us with more than 250 of each kind. We were consequently obliged to give up Elliott & Son, London, and go to McCormick, Chicago, notwithstanding that the Chicago price is $10 more. Our own interest is entirely in the direction of the Canadian article, and for the very good reason that our commission on the Canadian article is nearly double what is allowed us on the American. The Canadian binder sells here for $340, the American for $350. (See price list D.) There is this further to be said in this matter, that the Canadian article is inferior to the American.

"Again, regarding the inadequacy of the Canadians to meet the demand. We applied last December to Messrs. Stevens, Turner & Burns, of London, Ont., for from fifty to seventy-five outfits in the shape of steam and power threshing machines, in the proportion, say of about half of each kind. Their reply was that they would supply us

"Canadian manufacturers themselves, or their agents in Winnipeg, were compelled last year to purchase United States binders and ploughs, being unable to supply the demand from their own establishments. It is out of the question to contend that they can supply us with what we want in these articles. Last year we were unable to get from them more than one-half of what we wanted. We lost heavily in consequence. We were always on nettles, because we could not get what we required. We were then dealing in Canada for all goods excepting ploughs and seeders. In the matter of ploughs alone, we are quite sure that over five thousand farmers in the North-West would have to do this year without ploughs if they were not supplied from the United States. We can give the names of the manufacturers in Canada who, by themselves or their agents, bought from parties in the United States to supply the demand in this market, which they were themselves unable to meet.

"Our business last year amounted to $450,000. This year we have bought goods to represent a business of from $600,000 to $700,000."

Mr. FARROW. What is his name?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the hon. Finance Minister will give me the name of the agents who said they were paid more by the Americans than by the Canadians I have no objection to give the name of my informer.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. Finance Minister did not ask you his name.

Mr. CHARLTON. One of his lieutenants did.

Mr. BOWELL. One of his lieutenants did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think little more would be required to show the utter absurdity of putting any more duty on agricultural implements. I believe that if the hon. Finance Minister had taken proper measures to make himself familiar with the subject, he never would have proposed any such increased duty. However, there is no use talking, so long as the Government will insist on having their own way in these matters, without consulting the interests of the Province of Manitoba; and just so long will they be unpopular in that Province. I am bound to say that at the present time, for reasons which I could explain with reference to the land policy and other matters, the Government is unpopular in the Province of Manitoba. I do not know that the Government is altogether to blame for this. We have been unfortunate in not having our case presented on the floor of this House, but I do not know that the Government have taken the trouble to ascertain the causes of our grievances. They were not properly ventilated here, and I suppose the Government assumed that we were satisfied. We have been very forbearing, and we are willing, if we must, to put up with a duty of 25 per cent.; but we think the time has come when there is such a thing as paying too much for a good thing, and I believe that the proposal made by the hon. Finance Minister will be one of the most unpopular acts of the Government. This is not only the opinion of the agricultural implement men but of every man who knows anything about the question; and it is the universal opinion of the press of Manitoba and the North-West. I will quote an article from the leading Conservative organ of the city of Winnipeg—the Winnipeg Times. At the very time when the hon. Finance Minister was delivering his Budget Speech the well-known editor of the Winnipeg Times—one of the ablest writers in Canada—was writing the following:—

"The attempt now being made by Ontario manufacturers to induce the Finance Minister to increase the duties on certain articles that they may secure a more complete monopoly of the North-West market, will, it is to be hoped, be frustrated. The North-West settler has many difficulties to face at the outset, and every dollar added to his burdens is a material drawback to the future of this region. People down East are apt to forget that the North-West has formidable competitors in Dakota and Minnesota, to go no further south or west. The settler, Canadian and British, naturally prefers his own flag and soil to the foreigner's; but when his pocket is unduly pinched the pressure seriously affects his patriotism. The most cogent argument used by the agents of American railroad companies just now is that on their side of the line the four great necessities of a settler's life—lumber, fuel, agricultural implements and provisions—are cheaper than on this. There is no denying it; all that can be said in reply is that when the all-Canadian route is completed from the Landing eastward, prices will come down here.

"Two or three years must elapse, however, before that event can occur; meanwhile irreparable injury may be done to the North-West by increasing the duties and sending current prices still higher. There is, or was, a legend in the Eastern Provinces that the consumer does not pay the duty. That was an excellent joke, but it is not regarded in that light up here, where the consumer in every purchase he makes finds the duty adding just so much to the cost of the article. Some day, when our coal fields and iron mines are developed, and when the railroad brings us into direct communication with the great lumber region lying between Lake Superior and Ottawa, we shall no doubt set up in manufacturing for ourselves. But until that day dawns, the Government, instead of adding to the profits of the Ontario manufacturers by increasing duties, should endeavor, as far as may be possible, to lighten the burdens of the North-West settler, on whose prosperity alone the future of this country rests. The pioneer, after all, is more to the North-West than the Ontario manufacturer."

When the writer was penning these words he had little idea that the hon. Finance Minister was then making the astounding statement to the House that he proposed to increase the duties on agricultural implements; and after the news was telegraphed to Winnipeg, in the same paper appeared the following:—

"There is one feature of the speech, and perhaps only one, which will not meet with approval in the North-West. The duty on agricultural implements has been raised to 35 per cent. all round. The duty before was 20 and 25 per cent. Sir Leonard justifies the alteration on the ground that it is necessary to preserve the North-West market for Eastern manufacturers. But as the development of the North-West and its future progress rest not with the Eastern implement maker, but wholly with the North-West pioneer, it does seem to us that the latter ought also to have received some sort of consideration. The high price of agricultural implements in Manitoba is one of the stock arguments, one of the unassailable arguments put before the emigrant as he passes through the States on his way hither; and certainly the proposed increase will not lessen its cogency. It is to be hoped that before the debate on the Budget is closed, and the Tariff changes passed, the Finance Minister will see his way to encouraging the North-West settler as well as the Ontario capitalist."

In the issue of the same paper that arrived to-day another article appears. This question is, no doubt, occupying a great deal of the attention of the people, when we find three leading articles in succession in the Conservative paper. In fact, I am informed that indignation meetings are being held there, and that a deputation will be down here shortly to oppose this duty. The latest article is as follows:—

"The Finance Minister purposes increasing the duty on agricultural implements from 20 and 25 per cent. to 35 per cent. all round, on the ground that American manufacturers are paying large commissions to Winnipeg agents in order to induce them to sell American rather than Canadian articles; and because it is necessary to preserve the North-West market to Canadian makers.

"As to the commissions, The Times has had an opportunity, one which Sir Leonard has clearly not been afforded, of examining the contracts existing between American and Canadian makers and their Winnipeg agents last year. Instead of the American makers offering larger commissions than their Canadian competitors, the latter offer commissions running from 13½ per cent. on mowers to 16½ per cent. on binders in excess of the commissions offered by American firms like that of McCormick. The Winnipeg agents, therefore, have the strongest possible inducement to give Canadian machines the preference. Unfortunately, the settler prefers the American machine. If the two machines were put on an equal footing as regards price, 100 American would be sold for one Canadian. The trouble with the Canadian manufacturer is that the present Tariff has somewhat spoiled him. In 1879 and 1880, his machines were almost as good as the best made by McCormick; but since then he has taken to 'scamping' the work, trusting to the duty to protect him against superior American implements. In the North-West, time is the essence of seeding time and harvest. A badly constructed machine entails grievous loss on the settler when every minute is precious, and last harvest complaints against Canadian-made implements of all kinds came from every quarter. Moreover, the Eastern manufacturers are quite unable to supply the demand for this year. In short, leading Winnipeg dealers have been literally compelled, in spite of the larger commissions paid them by the Eastern makers, to go to Chicago and Racine for their supplies for the coming season. The duty of 20 and 25 per cent. would have afforded the Canadian maker the amplest protection had his goods been saleable. Thus a steam threshing-machine of twelve horse-power costs $1,585 on the cars at Racine, the headquarter of the J. J. Case Company, and $2,000 when landed at Winnipeg after payment of freight rates and the 25 per cent. duty. A machine of the same power and built on the same principle can be laid down in Winnipeg by the Ontario maker for $1,515—the Ontario maker thus having an advantage of nearly $500 on each machine. But the farmer prefers to buy the Racine machine because of its superior workmanship and material, and because he can rely upon it doing the work and doing it well. Increasing the duty 10 per cent. is simply adding just so much to the farmer's burdens or else forcing him to buy an inferior article from a manufacturer to whom he is already giving a bonus of 25 per cent. on the value of each machine. This may be good for the Ontario manufacturer, but it will not suit the North-West settler, and to him alone the Government must look for the development of this region."

I have one more short article from another Conservative paper in the North-West, the Regina Leader, edited by the well-known Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin. It has not taken him long to change his views after going to the North-West any more than it has taken most others who have gone there during the last year or two. That gentleman says:

"Sir Leonard Tilley will add to his reputation as a financier if he recognizes the fact that it is as ridiculous to apply the same tariffs to Regina as to Toronto as it would be to wear the same overcoat in Regina that one had been accustomed to wear in Toronto or even Ottawa."

Now, Sir, I think I have shown pretty conclusively that the views of the people of Manitoba are largely against the increase of duty on agricultural implements. When the hon. Finance Minister boasts of a surplus, and proposes at the same time to lessen the burdens of the people by giving back some of the surplus, I think it is very unfair to the people of that country that, instead of giving them the benefit of any of the reduction in taxation, he should have increased their taxes. The chief trouble about agricultural implements is that Canadian manufacturers have not the experience to enable them to manufacture for a prairie country, so as to compete against the manufacturers of the Western States, who have had thirty or forty years' experience. The American manufacturers are always ahead of the Canadian manufacturers in their improvements. It is impossible for a Canadian manufacturer, at this time, to make a plough that will compete with the Deere plough at Racine, Wisconsin. There is something about the casting which, it is said, the Canadian manufacturer cannot get hold of, though one firm, Frost & Wood, have come near it; and that being the case, is it reasonable that we should have to pay a high price unnecessarily for that article which we must have. In heavy or clay land the Canadian plough will not turn the furrows and will not clean itself. There are to-day many of these Canadian ploughs in the North-West that cannot be sold. It is only the new settler, who knows nothing about it, that will use it; but he soon finds his mistake, when he sees the advantages of the American plough used by his neighbor. We are a go-ahead people in the North-West, and are bound to have the best article, no matter what it costs. With regard to the business in which I am engaged, although it is the greatest industry in the North-West, it has the smallest protection—only 20 per cent. But we are perfectly satisfied with that protection; and if the Government will come down and wipe out all the protection on implements and other things that affect the North-West, we shall be perfectly satisfied that it should be taken off lumber as well. We have to go to the United States for our machinery, because we cannot get what we want in Canada at any price at all. We have to compete, in manufacturing our lumber, with the mills in Minnesota; and the machinery they use is far ahead of any manufactured in Canada. I, myself, have to pay nearly double the price for machinery that I would have to pay in Canada; but I am forced to keep abreast of the times, and have, consequently, to use the same machinery as my neighbor, although there is a duty of 25 or 30 per cent. upon it. It may appear very strange to hon. gentlemen opposite that we cannot use Canadian machinery there as well as they do here. The reason is that the Americans are continually making improvements, and making them so rapidly that the Canadian manufacturer cannot keep pace with them; and we must have the best machinery made. I will give one instance. One of the greatest revolutions made in saw-mill machinery during the last few years is the steam feed and rotary mills. We do not produce them at all, because there is a patent right on them, and they will not probably be manufactured here for some time to come. The same argument that applies to milling machinery, applies to other machinery, and I only particularize this class because I happen to do business in that line. If the hon. Finance Minister is bound to go ahead with his proposition to increase the duty on agricultural implements, he will place the Province of Manitoba in the position of a wet nurse to the manufactures of this country; and I think she is much too young for the business. The policy which he has laid down in his speech, of giving a bounty for a certain number of years, if introduced—I think three years—to iron manufactured in Canada, should be extended by giving a bounty of 10 cts. per bushel on wheat and 5 cts. on coarse grains. This would be a very small amount, but there is nothing he could do that would more aid immigration to the North-West than a policy of that kind.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I hope he will adopt my proposal, and should he do so I will give him a good "hear, hear," when he comes out to the North-West. If he should not I do not know what may happen. At all events we desire fair play. We think it is only fair that this excessive taxation should be borne as evenly as possible by all parts of the community; but if the Government are bound to take the opinions of agricultural implement men in Ontario in preference to those of the farmers of the North-West they may expect, as has been laid down in the article I have read, that nothing but dissatisfaction will exist in that country. If, on the other hand, they should consult the wishes of the people in the future more than they have in the past, and before they take an important step of this kind make the necessary enquiries; if the hon. Finance Minister would spend two or three weeks in the North-West in the summer, he would come back with a vastly different opinion as to the duties on those implements. If the hon. gentleman will act on the views I have expressed; and harmonize his policy with the wishes of the people of the North-West, then, and not till then, may we expect to see that great and glorious country settled with a happy and prosperous people.

Mr. HAWKINS. I am quite aware that great latitude is allowed in the discussion of the Tariff, and that every manner of possible and impossible states of affairs is brought to bear in the discussion of this question, but I shall take a different course, and endeavor to confine myself to the discussion of the question proper—the Tariff itself. In response to my hon. friend from Selkirk, I may say that I feel quite satisfied there are many persons in Manitoba who would be very willing that the older Provinces should tax themselves to build the Canadian Pacific railway to Manitoba and the North-West, to open up the country and give value to its lands—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. And make them millionaires.

Mr. HAWKINS. And as the hon. Finance Minister has said, create millionaires in that country with almost railway speed. In this part of the country we feel that while we are investing millions of the taxes collected from the older Provinces of the Dominion in developing the North-West with a rapidity almost unknown, not only in our own history but in that of the United States as well, we are perfectly justified in telling our hon. friend that we cannot consent to any such one-sided arrangement as that which he advocates. What seems to be the burden of complaint on the part of the Province he represents, is, that it is believed to be desirable by the hon. Finance Minister that sufficient protection shall be afforded to the manufacturers of implements in the older Provinces of the Dominion to enable them successfully to compete with the American manufacturers, who have the advantage over them of being many hundreds of miles nearer the North-West. When we can show that many millions of the revenue collected chiefly from the older Provinces are being expended yearly in the rapid development of that country, I feel that sufficient justification is given for the proposal of the hon. Finance Minister to place agricultural implements among those articles on which the duty is to be increased. I have been accustomed to hear my hon. friend from South Brant for many years past, and have frequently had the pleasure of meeting my hon. friend from North Norfolk, as well as my hon. friend from West Middlesex. With the exception of the changes incident to a little greater or less expenditure in the different years, I feel satisfied that every word of the speeches which each of these hon. gentlemen have delivered on this question might be found in the Hansard reports of previous years. I believe that in order to create perfect fac-similes of those speeches it would only be necessary to transcribe a few figures in their previous utterances. As to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), I must compliment him on the fact that he was chosen by his party to represent them in the discussion of so important a question as that of the Tariff. I must further compliment him upon having delivered, from his point of view, a very able argument. But at the same time I could not help thinking, nor can I help believing, now, that the hon. gentleman's efforts were largely directed to the contradiction of previous speeches, wherein he himself had been one of the ablest advocates of a protective policy, had been one of the most eloquent advocates of building up and creating Canadian industries. So long ago as the Election of 1874, the three members from Montreal were returned as direct Protectionists, also the two members for Hamilton, and also the hon. member for Toronto Centre. Undoubtedly, at that time my hon. friend from South Brant felt perfectly justified in making strongly Protective speeches, and, if time permitted, we might go over many of them and find Protection doctrines. We would find that he said, when the Government of that day gave additional Protection to the manufacture of cigars, that "that measure of Protection would transfer the labor of 1,000 men from Germany to Canada." Further, he said that "the erection and creation of these industries in different portions of Canada, would have the effect of making the steam whistle of manufacturing establishments the best emigration agents the country could possibly have." Now, when these great industries have been brought into existence in all parts of the country, when the four cotton mills of 1878 now number some twenty-four, and when, in the city of Brantford, which he represents in this House, he may see a great industry that was never thought of, which never would have been thought of but for the National Policy, in the shape of a cotton mill with 300 looms running every day in the year, he stultifies himself and advocates a Revenue Tariff. I am sorry that my hon. friend is not yet satisfied. He might further see, in the same city, another establishment for the manufacture of winceys, which will go into operation in a few days with, perhaps, 150 operatives. If he had visited the town of Cornwall the other day, in company with many members of this House, he would have had the pleasure of seeing a factory in which there are upwards of 800 hands employed to-day, wherein there were scarcely 150 employed in 1878. He might have gone to the various car manufactories of the country—to Cobourg, where he would find some 300 operatives busily engaged in manufacturing passenger and other cars, wherein, in 1878, there were scarcely forty hands, and even these few very irregularly employed. If he had gone throughout the country he would have learned that the fiscal policy of the present Government has had the effect of giving an enormous impetus to its various industries, and he would have realized the correctness of the position which he took when the Reform party returned some seven or eight out-and-out Protectionists to this House in the Election of 1874. If he had wished to extend his peregrinations he might have visited the farmers of his own and other sections of the country. In 1876, in his speech on the Tariff, question he said: "My opponent was promising the farmers protection. I was obliged to do likewise and I promised them that on every occasion my voice would be raised in their behalf demanding that they should receive a measure of protection." But owing to the exigencies of party, owing to the necessity, as he confesses, of bowing to the will of the party, of stultifying his convictions, we find him to-day an out-and-out advocate of a Revenue Tariff and languishing industries. Now, we know that in the days when these hon. gentlemen were in power they had a Tariff of 15½ per cent. It was proposed by the then Finance Minister, Sir Richard Cartwright, that that Tariff should be increased to 20 per cent. They had every reason for making an increase upon their Tariff, they had deficits staring them in the face from year to year; they had the state of affairs which must inevitably lead the country to financial depression and eventual bankruptcy, which must inevitably, nay, did, depopulate our towns and cities. We find the hon. gentleman offering here to-day in his argument in behalf of a Revenue Tariff the strange idea that the showing of the Finance Minister of a surplus the present year of nearly \$3,000,000 is something for which we should not congratulate ourselves. "Why," he said, "in our time we could come nearer to the necessities of the Government than you do, in estimating the expenditure we came within \$1,000,000 of hitting the correct figures." It is true that \$1,000,000 was the necessary figure for carrying on the affairs of the country, but it was on the wrong side of the ledger—in short, it was a gaping deficit. In fact, he is like the boy who boasted a mortgage on his father's house, in order to extinguish his comrade's boast of a cupola on his home, he wanted to outdo the Finance Minister's splendid cupola in the shape of a surplus of \$8,000,000, and consequently he pleaded that a million or two a year of deficits constituted a happier state of affairs. Now, I think that was a very strange argument. If the hon. Finance Minister was intending to show that he had a very large surplus each year, it was certainly a novel idea to plead in favor of heavy annual deficits as a counter argument. It was a very weak argument to advance the counterfact that in their day they had \$1,000,000 deficit, but that million was nearer to the figure of the expenditure than the hon. Finance Minister's six, seven or eight millions of a surplus. Now, the question appears to me to be this: Has the Tariff introduced by the hon. the Finance Minister met the necessities of the trade of the country? It seems to me that the evidences are in every portion of the country that we are enjoying universal prosperity. The deposits in our savings banks, we were told by the hon. Finance Minister increased last year \$5,800,000. These deposits are in the names of those same workmen who, in 1876 and 1877, came to the House of Parliament demanding from the then Premier that he should either furnish them with work or furnish them with bread. Are we to be told that these men, who could scarcely find means of subsistence and could scarcely obtain food and clothing for their families in those days, are the same men who have to-day in the books of these Savings Banks upwards of \$13,000,000 over and above what they had in those days. We have been told by the hon. Finance Minister that the Consolidated Revenue for 1881-82 was \$31,383,000, and that the expenditure for the same year was \$27,667,000, leaving a surplus of \$6,316,000. In addition to that there was a land surplus of \$1,744,000, making in all a total surplus of \$8,060,000. Is this the same Canada which, only a few years ago, had annual deficits varying from \$2,000,000 to \$2,500,000? Is this the same country in which towns and cities were depressed, in which the agricultural industries were languishing, and in which there was every appearance of a necessity for a total change of our political relations, or else the country could not possibly carry on its affairs successfully. And yet we have hon. gentlemen in this House, the hon. member for South Brant, the hon. member for North Norfolk, and the hon. member for West Middlesex, rising in their places and making the same speeches that would have answered their purposes in 1878. Why, those same Revenue Tariff speeches were delivered on various hustings in 1878. How were they received by the people? The answer given to those speeches in those days was a majority for Sir John A. Macdonald of nearly ninety in the House, elected on 17th September, 1878. Not satisfied with that verdict, not satisfied with the view that was expressed by the people at the polls in that year, we find these hon. gentlemen making another appeal. We find them, during the whole of the four Sessions that intervened since 1878, again and again, each Session, urging the self-same idea, the necessity of doing away with the Protective Tariff and returning to a Revenue Tariff, the necessity in fact of returning to annual deficits. But how were those contentions received by the country? Let the verdict of 20th June last say what was the answer received at the hands of the people. We have to-day substantially the same majority supporting the Government that was sent to support the Government in 1878. We have the people of the country reaffirming their verdict, and reaffirming the fact that the creations of the National Policy have been such that it has met with their universal approval at the polls. The next fact we find in connection with the hon. Finance Minister's statement is the expenditure on Capital Account. Last year it was \$7,300,000. The surplus over expenditure on Capital Account was \$760,000, and taking into account the sinking fund, the net increase of debt was only \$1,750,000 in the year 1881-82, notwithstanding the expenditure on Capital Account was, as I have stated, \$7,300,000, not a dollar was raised by way of loan. We find that whereas in the days of the late hon. Finance Minister we were obliged to go to England to raise loans for the purpose of meeting the ordinary expenditure, for the purpose of meeting an expenditure which, in those days, only averaged from \$22,000,000 to \$23,000,000 annually, we find in these days, and at all events, last year, an expenditure of upwards of \$27,000,000, and yet the hon. Finance Minister is able, out of the increased earnings and savings of the people, to meet all requirements and still have a surplus on hand. He has been able to show that from the amount deposited in the Savings Banks \$4,000,000 has been applied for the redemption of debts maturing in England. And yet this is the policy and the state of affairs which arouses opposition from the other side of the House. It would seem that hon. gentlemen opposite desire—for the hon. member for South Brant declared that in the cycles of years, commercial distress would again prevail and overrun the country—to have the honor of having predicted that state of affairs, they will have the satisfaction of being able to say that the hon. Finance Minister should have accepted their prophecy, for they predicted what has occurred. In other words the hon. gentleman hopes at that still distant time to be able to say—I told you so! We have our hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) devoting his efforts to proving that he never made any Protection speeches, and if he did that he should not have made them, although they appear in Hansard, and are household words, nevertheless he argues most ably, annually, to prove that he never made them. The aphorism that words have their revenges is true in his case—he can no more recall his utterances in favor of Protection than he can recall time. It seems to me that it would be better to be consistent, that it would be better to give his reasons why he has been converted from those Protectionist ideas, to those of comparative Free Trade, to those of a Revenue Tariff, as we find him to-day. It is no great crime that he should have been mistaken, and have made speeches which, if he had adhered to them, would have placed him in the position of being the forerunner and the precursor of that state of national prosperity and happiness, brought about through the beneficent operation of the National Policy. It would seem as if our hon. friends on the Opposition benches, are very much afraid they will be considered what the great Gambetta was called by his opponents, they constantly reproached him with being, in some sense, an Opportunist. His answer was, that he would like to see any gentleman advocate the necessity for Inopportunist. If he had gone in search of that class of politicians, he would doubtless have fixed on the hon. member for North Norfolk, as the best specimen of an inopportunist, which this or any other country could afford, because he seems not only unwilling to learn by experience, and to see the evidences of prosperity on every hand throughout the country, but he goes the length even of endeavoring to utterly obliterate and wipe out from memory, and out of the record of Hansard, the fact that he has made speeches which would be a credit to him to-day if he stood in the same position as he did when he made those speeches. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think enough has been said on the subject of the Tariff, especially at the late hour it now is; and knowing the desire of the House, that this discussion should be brought to a termination to-night, I feel it would be improper on my part to trespass at any too great length upon the attention of this House; but I do feel, that the country must realize the fact, that the splendid showing of its affairs which was given out by the hon. Finance Minister on last Friday, has been totally and completely unanswered; and that it has been left as a standing monument of the good management, of the correctness of the position, and of the results of the National Policy, as the means of building up and developing the great industries, and the various interests of this Canada of ours. It is, Sir, true, that the hon. member for South Brant endeavored to pick flaws here and there in that glowing statement. It is true that he endeavored to show, that the importation of goods was somewhat increased from the United States as compared with England. It is true, that he endeavored to show a falling off in our English imports; but if the speech of the hon. the First Minister is carefully read, it will be found that he has completely and most effectually answered that assertion, and that he has shown that we import to-day something like 4 per cent. more of English goods, while we import some 26 per cent. less of American goods under the operation of the National Policy; and we have the fact further, that the savings of the country are now being heaped up, and are being deposited in the savings banks, and in the various banks and banking institutions of the country. I have here a statement showing the amount of deposits in the banks of the country, wherein it is shown that while in 1878, the deposits in our banking institutions outside of the savings banks, was only \$86,406,516, they are to-day, or at least were on the 3rd of December last, \$96,879,540, being an increase of \$30,473,000 during the four and a-half years that the present Government has been in power. Now, I think, that such a statement as this, that such a showing of the financial position of the country as is evidenced in these figures, given by the Finance Minister, and which have not been controverted and which our friends of the Opposition have not even attempted to controvert, must be most convincing with the country, and must carry the conviction to the people of this country, that the administration and the management, under the present Government, has been such as must commend itself to this House. Why, Mr. Speaker, if we could have believed the prognostications of our friends opposite and the statement of the leader of the Opposition, as to the state of affairs, which would have prevailed in Manitoba, of which I spoke at the outset of my remarks, what a different state of things we would see to-day. I remember myself hearing the leader of the Opposition state, that the proposition, the idea of building the Pacific Railway out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the North-West, was a perfectly preposterous proposition; and, that the idea of these lands being worth \$1 an acre, was something which the Government would utterly fail to realize; and yet the same gentleman, a few years later, or rather a few months later, is found on the floor of this House, when the Syndicate bargain was being made, and the contract was about to be ratified, stating that these lands were then worth \$4.34 an acre. Now, if they had received this additional value, if they had increased in value to such a wonderful extent, what gave them this enhanced value? What has given that country the wonderful development which we have witnessed in the last three or four years. In the first place it was the placing upon the Treasury benches, gentlemen who were capable of grasping the situation, gentlemen who were capable of restoring the financial affairs of the country from, and of lifting the country out of, that state of depression in which five years of Reform Administration had plunged a hitherto prosperous people; and after they had grappled with this question, and after the hon. Finance Minister had gone to England, and arranged for the placing of our credit upon a first-class basis, bringing our debentures almost to par, which had been sold by the late hon. Finance Minister for 93 cts. on the dollar bearing  $4\frac{1}{2}$  and 5 per cent. interest, we find him coming home and devoting his energies, together with his colleagues, to the successful prosecution of the building of the Pacific Railway. Contrast for a moment, the state of affairs in respect to that wonderful enterprise, when the hon. member for Lambton laid down the reins of power, and see what a wonderful change has gone over the face of the country in the North-West. When the Mackenzie Government laid down the reins of power, there had been an expenditure of upwards of \$11,000,000 on the Pacific Railway, and what had the country in return for this expenditure? What was there to show that this work was likely to be prosecuted, was likely to be brought to a successful termination within any reasonable number of years?

Mr. McCALLUM. We had the Fort Frances Locks.

Mr. HAWKINS. Why, Mr. Speaker, we had the Fort Frances Locks, as my hon. friend from Monk says; we had the Neebing Hotel; we had portions of the magnificent water stretches—

Mr. CHARLTON. Give us something new.

Mr. HAWKINS. We had that magnificent mixed system of railway, which was to result in developing that country eventually; that is to say, if the time ever came, when the predictions of the present hon. leader of the Opposition should be contradicted—that is, that we might as well attempt to build a railway to the North Pole, as to attempt to build a railway over the inhospitable wastes of Northern Ontario. Now, we have seen the attempt made, and we see that attempt under successful prosecution; we see the railway, left by the late Government almost at a stand still, to-day constructed, counting westward from Thunder Bay, a distance of upwards of 1,100 miles; we see thousands of immigrants pouring into that great North-western country; and we see thousands of farmers going in there from other parts of the Dominion and taking their families to make their homes in that great North-West; and the only complaint we have, the only whimper of complaint we have heard from that quarter, has been on behalf of the member for Selkirk, who says that the proposition to place an increased duty on the introduction of agricultural implements into that country, is a hardship on the people of Manitoba, and of the North-West generally;—but, Mr. Speaker, I say to any one who might be inclined to give weight to that objection, let them read the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, and also the speeches which were made in answer, let them read the attempt made to answer that speech, and see how completely it has failed, and they then cannot help being convinced that after all, the Government of the day has been the very best Government that could have been constructed in the interests of the country; and that when that Government let the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at a cost of only $25,000,000, and 25,000,000 acres of land, they did the very wisest thing that they could have done in the interest of the country. Take another statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Here, in his place in the House, when the Syndicate bargain was being passed upon by the House, he stated that he believed that the Government would be called upon to pay that $25,000,000 so rapidly that it would embarrass the finances of the country; and that the work was likely to be prosecuted at so rapid a rate, the country would be seriously embarrassed in endeavoring to meet these and other necessary obligations. Well, I hope and trust, that whatever his opinion may be of the administration of the hon. the Finance Minister, he has been disabused upon that head; and that the fact that the hon. Finance Minister is able to show for the present year a surplus of nearly $8,000,000 is a sufficient answer to his fears of two years ago, and that he will now be convinced that, whatever else may have been wrong in the text of this bargain, certainly the Finance Minister did not over-estimate the capability and capacity of this country to meet this and all our other obligations. I feel that I have trespassed on the time of the House quite sufficiently, and that it would be improper for me to occupy the attention of hon. members at any greater length; and I can only say, in resuming my seat, that I, for one, having watched the development of the country's industries, having watched the rapid and wonderful progress that has been made in the North-West, having seen the prosperity that has come to pass over all the industries of the country—the large increase of population and all the other evidences and signs of prosperity—I certainly cannot and do not feel, although there has been probably an annual increase in the permanent expenditure, that it is something which should not be. I feel that in this great and growing country, whose population has increased nearly 1,000,000 in the last ten years, we must expect, as the Finance Minister very properly said, not only a very great increase in our revenue, but a great increase in our expenditure as well; but so long as our expenditure does not exceed the revenue, so long as we can show, instead of the state of affairs which existed when the friends of the Opposition were in power—annual deficits amounting in five years to nearly $11,000,000—I say when we can show instead of this a surplus amounting in four years to upwards of $13,000,000, I believe the country is on the right road; and the feeling of the House and of the country will be, that the present Government will be sustained and maintained in power for many years to come, unless the Opposition see the error of their ways—unless the Opposition are willing to open their eyes and see on every hand the signs of prosperity, the signs of industry and national progress and greatness, which are to be seen on every hand in all portions of this great Dominion of ours, as the direct result of the adoption of the National Policy.

Mr. GILLMOR. If the Debate is to be closed to-night, I desire to make a few remarks, but if it is to be continued now I must trouble the House with some observations to-night. I have been somewhat surprised at the character of the discussion which has been proceeded with up to this time. It seems that the hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House are endeavoring to prove that the present prosperity of the country is the result of the National Policy, while prominent gentlemen on this side have endeavored to prove that it is not the result of that policy. It appears to me that it does not require very much discernment to understand the question so far as the prosperity of the country is concerned. It appears to me absurd to suppose, whether the country is prosperous or not, that the question of taxation has anything to do with its prosperity or adversity. To me it seems absurd to argue that to take the people's money by a Protective Policy you can induce prosperity. Yet that is the drift of the discussion we have heard in this House. It is really amusing, from my point of view, to see intelligent men on one side of the House trying to prove that a country is made prosperous because, forsooth, four years ago the Protective Tariff was introduced which largely increased the burdens of the people. Now, with regard to the accumulation of wealth. There are certain natural laws which have been ordained and designed by the Creator and by which alone the people of any country can accumulate wealth. These laws are well understood. Men get rich by working and saving, by buying and selling, by building ships, by conducting commerce, by transporting the produce of the world from one quarter to the other. This we can all understand, but we see nothing in the laws of Nature that teaches us that taxation can ever possibly increase wealth. Taxation is an evil. Taxation we must submit to as members of society, but to hear men argue by the hour that taxation is going to increase the wealth of men or of the nation is, to my mind, simply absurd. On the introduction of the financial statement hon. members of Parliament always have an opportunity of expressing their opinions with regard to the policy and the practice of the Government, and with regard to the condition of the country generally. The general prosperity of the country has made the duty of the hon. Finance Minister comparatively an easy and pleasant one—I am willing to admit that—and that duty he has performed in the usual and plausible manner in which he makes his financial statements. I would not have spoken, perhaps, on this occasion at all, were it not for the reference which the hon. gentleman has made to the condition of New Brunswick, implying that there were no complaints to be made from that Province, and therefore he took it for granted that its inhabitants were quite satisfied with the introduction of the National Policy. But when he referred to some hon. members of the late House, who are not here to-day, it carried me back some thirty years, when I first entered politics, and when the hon. gentleman who now fills the honorable and responsible position of Finance Minister was in the Local Parliament at the same time with myself. I remember very well the circumstances when we first met in the Parliament of New Brunswick. The first thing that he and I did, as members of the Liberal party, was, in June, 1854, to aid in upsetting the Government of that day, which was a Conservative Government, and then came our duty to form a Government out of the Liberal party of the day. I remember very well, thirty years ago, talking with my hon. friend in front of the Parliament Buildings, when we were about to form a Liberal Government, and saying to him that he must take the position of Provincial Secretary. It was thought that he was the best qualified of any member of our party for that position. Well, our party held power, and he and I worked on the same side for eleven years. My hon. friend occasionally thanked me for the humble support that I gave to that Government; it was a support given conscientiously and with the best of my ability. We differed on the question of Confederation, and from that time to this, for some sixteen years, we have been travelling in different paths, and I fear that we are so far apart now on the question of this National Policy that we shall never, probably, get together again on this side of the grave. I regret to some extent, and I regret also that I have never experienced the luxury of thanking my hon. friend for the slightest favor during the sixteen years that we have been walking in opposite directions. He thanked me for the support I gave him while we were members of the same party; but I have never had the opportunity of returning the compliment. Now, with regard to New Brunswick, I rather infer from the manner in which my hon. friend referred to the election there, that he flatters himself that his influence made a great change in that Province. If he wishes to impart that idea I do not agree with him, because I think the facts of the case do not justify it. For instance, in Queen's county, his own native county, where his influence might be supposed to be great enough to carry the county, and where he brought out the strongest man he could obtain, the Opposition candidate, my hon. friend behind me, who is opposed to the National Policy, succeeded in getting his election by a very respectable majority. The hon. gentleman says there are no complaints; but my hon. friend is here to protest against his policy, so far as Queen's county is concerned. Then in Sunbury, though the strongest man the opposite party could induce to run was put in the field, my hon. friend from Sunbury is here to complain against the National Policy. If we take the county of York, where my hon. friend spent the best of his days, where he lived in his prime, where he spent eleven years in public life, where he was Governor for five years, and where one would have thought his influence and that of his policy would have been effective, if anywhere, we find that, though the strongest man obtainable, a man who was Attorney-General for many years, was run in support of that policy, my hon. friend who represents York in this House, led that man by about 1,100 votes, and he is here to enter his protest against the National Policy. In the county of Albert, also, where the hon. Finance Minister personally advocated the cause of his nominee, a gentleman opposed to the National Policy was elected by a majority of votes, although he does not occupy the seat in this House, for reasons which I am not able to explain; but if justice had been done, he would have been here, to enter his protest against that policy. Then we come to St. John, the great and important constituency which my hon. friend has represented from his first entrance into public life thirty years ago. There he brought out two of the strongest men that the party could find, but his two comrades fell by his side, and he was returned by a small majority, but the two others came here to complain against the National Policy. Two days afterwards a Local Election was held on distinct Dominion issues, and the result was that five out of six members were elected holding views contrary to those of my hon. friend. Then there is the county of Charlotte, which I have the honor to represent. My hon. friend, I know, has influence in that county. I know the influence of his oratory, and I know a more potent influence which the hon. gentleman knows how to use as well as his arguments. Well, they brought against me a man who was for fourteen years in Provincial politics, who was in the Government during the most of that period, and who was Speaker of the House during the last term. That gentleman had the advantage of the influence of my hon. friend, and the influence of the cotton mill that had just been built under the fostering care of the National Policy. I had to meet that influence, and I did not know whether I would succeed or not. It was thought by some that I would have to trim on the question of the National Policy, on account of that cotton mill. But those who know me as well as the hon. Finance Minister does, know that I do not trim on any question. My convictions are my guide. I declared my principles in my card, so that there was no mistake about them, and I will read to the House two or three paragraphs bearing upon the question of the Tariff and taxation:

"To professional politicians who deal in millions, wrung from the people by grinding taxation, anything like economy in the public service is considered meanness. To such the duty on flour and meal is a small matter, but there is a vast difference between feeding from the Government crib, and from a crib supplied by a man's hard and honest toil. The man with his last dollar, and expecting the next only when he has earned it by the sweat of his brow, ought not by law to be prevented from expending it in the cheapest market. Taxation is best understood by those who toil year after year, seldom enjoying any of the luxuries of life, and often deprived of the necessities of life, and at the close of each year find no surplus in their till. The Government and their supporters boast of the four millions of surplus in the Treasury. It would be more just, and would add a great deal more to the comfort of the people, to have allowed that amount, and much more that has been recklessly squandered, to have remained in the people's pockets."

With regard to Protection, I said:

"I am in favor of Protection, but of a very different kind, and for a very different class from those protected by the National Policy. I am for protecting the great mass of the people who toil upon the land and on the sea, all those who by their labor produce the wealth of this country—the millions who buy and consume the goods. I am for protecting that large class in its natural and proper right, to exchange their money or their productions in whatever market they can exchange them to the best advantage. I am for protecting this class by rescuing them from the hands of the men who are plundering them without any remorse. I trust you will not support a system which cost England many a struggle to get rid of, and which is now a burning question in the United States, and is only continued there, in my opinion, through the influence of monopolists, rings and corrupt politicians."

I think that my sentiments were plainly enough expressed for the men to whom I appealed for support. I rejoice as much in the erection of a cotton mill as any one else. I recognize the advantage of large expenditures of money in industries that give employment to the people, but I want the cotton mills and every manufacturing industry to stand upon an equal footing with all other industries in this country; and I am opposed, and will continue to be opposed, to any policy which will tax one industry to build up another. Notwithstanding my hon. friend came to that contest and addressed public meetings—and I need not tell this House of the ability he displays when addressing an audience; no one could deny that, for he has many of the elements which make a very acceptable speaker, and can make the worse appear the better reason, as well as any man I ever listened to—the result was that I came to this House with a larger majority than ever before. I stand here, representing a county with a population of 26,000 and more—a population as intelligent, to say the least, as any constituency in the Dominion, and I only wish I had more ability to enforce their views and to advocate the policy they approve of; and I am here to protest against the principle of Protection. Then, with regard to the other parts of the Province, we go over to the north up to Victoria, and, of course, I do not suppose my hon. friend claims credit for bringing in the representative of this county. If we go over to Restigouche, I believe the candidate of my hon. friend there lost his election. In Northumberland there was no contest, and the hon. gentleman who was elected would take it as an insult if we were told that the influence of the hon. Finance Minister had anything to do with his election. Neither had his influence anything to do with the election of the hon. member for Gloucester, and I think it had very little to do with that of the hon. member for Westmoreland, or with any other election in the Province of New Brunswick. Notwithstanding all I have said, my hon. friend has succeeded and has a majority of two to one in this House in favor of his policy, but I do not endorse the sentiment I have heard so often expressed here, that because the National Policy has been adopted by two to one in this country we should be silent on this question. If a majority has endorsed the National Policy a very respectable minority has been returned to oppose it, and if the minority were much less than it is, it would be still their duty, if they are convinced that the National Policy is a bad one, to endeavor to have it reversed by speaking against it in and out of Parliament. If I stood here alone I would enter my protest against protection, and, according to my abilities, urge my arguments in favor of a system which I think to be more just and more beneficial to this country. I do not intend to criticise the speeches of hon. members, but I think they do not enlighten us on the great question at issue. This protective system is upon its trial. We know something of the history of that policy, we know something of the history of monopolies and of Protective Tariffs in the past, and I think it is the bounden duty of every man who is opposed to that policy to oppose it and urge his reasons against it on all suitable occasions in order that it may not become permanently fixed upon this country. Of course, we are well aware that we are in the minority here of only one to two, and I regret it. I regret in the first place that the hon. gentleman who occupy the Treasury benches, who ought to have the interests of the country at heart, with all their intelligence, their experience, their knowledge of political economy, with their knowledge of the workings of Tariffs throughout the world—I am astonished that, in this enlightened age of the world, they have introduced a policy which has been discarded by that country, which, of all others, they should have taken as their example. I am still more astonished that the intelligent people of this Dominion, a people who ought to know that taxation could not remove any of the evils from which they suffer—I say I am astonished that they have adopted that policy. But is that any reason why those who believe it to be wrong should not try and correct the mistake? I believe it is a great mistake. There are a great many influences which tend to fix that policy upon the people. They ought to know that if governments are corrupt, they have in this policy a means of pandering to the different interests of the country and of keeping themselves in power indefinitely. The longer those evils exist the harder it will be to remove them. I have very strong views upon this question. I look upon it as very little better than slavery. There were arguments that could be used in favor of that. The monopolists of that day, the slave holders and slave drivers, found arguments to justify their system, and until the American war they succeeded in holding 5,000,000 of slaves in bondage. They found arguments in Scripture, and from political economy, to justify that horrible system, but who would raise their voice now in favor of African slavery? Who would undertake to prove from Scripture, or by logic, that it was justifiable? But there was just as much to be said logically, rationally, and morally, in favor of slavery as there is in favor of a protective system. That is my honest conviction, and that is the way I look at the question. While I am opposed to this policy I do not deny that the Government in every civilized country must levy taxes for the support of the institutions and Government of the country, but I deny the right and justice of levying a single cent of tax from the people unless it is levied for public uses alone. It is because this policy violates that principle that I am opposed to it, and I shall urge that reason upon all suitable occasions. I shall continue to insist that though the Government may tax the people for public purposes, they have no right to tax them for the purpose of stimulating one industry at the expense of another, to take one man's money and give it to another by force of law. Some hon. gentleman found fault with the expression used here that it was legalized robbery. Sir, it is legalized robbery, and nothing else. There is no argument that can justify such legislation. Government may levy taxes for public purposes which are for the benefit of every one. It may raise money to support our public institutions, our asylums for the poor and destitute, penitentiaries, courts of justice, and other institutions of a like public character. I would go further and say that when any public work is required in the benefit of which all can participate, Government may levy taxes for that purpose. But building up certain private institutions, certain industries, at the public expense, is to violate the first principles of public justice. That is something which no Government ought to undertake. The people themselves are the best judges with regard to what building up industries. We have knowledge of three modes of taxation. The first, and I think the best, is that mode which does not affect the price of any interchangeable commodity. That might be called Free Trade. Call it what you like—that is the best mode of taxation which interferes least with the great law of exchange, with the rights of every man to buy and sell and do with his own what he likes. He is the best judge of what will increase his wealth, and when his wealth is increased the country has become that much more wealthy. Everybody should be at liberty to make the most money they can in an honest way, but when a Government steps in and by law undertakes to tell a man where he shall buy and where he shall sell, they undertake to do that which no Government ever ought to undertake. They undertake a duty that they cannot perform half as well as the individual can perform it for himself. There is no danger of a man buying and selling where he does not make gain. When men can increase their wealth and comforts by exchange, I say the system is wrong, and the law is wrong, that prevents their doing so. I say they know better than this Government or any Government how to do their own business, where to buy and sell, and how to enrich themselves; and when by that system they become rich, it is by a system which cannot be improved upon. There is another system of taxation which is inferior to this, but it is the next best, and that is a Revenue Tariff, which, so far as I understand their views, is advocated by the Reform party—I do not speak for the Reform party, but for myself and the electors who send me here. I am in favor, under existing circumstances, of a Revenue Tariff. I would make it contain as little of the harmful principle of Protection as possible, because, under a Protective Tariff, you can do a great deal of injustice to one class and a great deal of favor to another. But there is another system which has been adopted by the hon. Finance Minister and his associates, which is the worst system of taxation ever known in the world. It has been a system of taxation which has done more to keep the world back in progress, which has done more injustice, which has caused more wars, and which has inflicted more cost on the people than almost anything we have ever been burdened with. I object to a protective Tariff because it involves a double taxation. If all the money that the Government levies under this Tariff came into the Treasury, it would not be so bad if the surplus, instead of being $3,000,000, was $28,000,000. Of course the money would come out of the people, but it would go back some way or other, except what was squandered, to the public use again. You would thereby be able to increase the public works and improve the country. But the objection I have to the protective system is that all the money does not go into the Treasury. The Government imposes taxation to benefit struggling industries, but those industries deny that they receive it. The truth is they do obtain it, but it is difficult to show how. But there happens to be a mode by which we can obtain a pretty good idea as to how much the people pay under the National Policy. I have made a little calculation; I do not say it is correct, but it is the best I could make. British Columbia is a Province of the Dominion which does not consume Canadian manufactures to any great extent, and from it we can come to an approximate estimate of what the whole Dominion pays under this policy. British Columbia has a population of 4,350 Chinese, 25,661 Indians, all other nationalities 19,448, making a total population of 49,459. It paid into the revenue $679,207, or $13.75 per head, in cluding Chinese and Indians. If the whole Dominion were in the same position as British Columbia, and did not consume any domestic products, we could tell exactly what revenue the Tariff would bring in. I presume it will not be contended that Canadians do not consume as much dutiable goods as either Indians or Chinese. Of course, the other nationalities will consume about the same amount as Canadians in any part of the Dominion. If the position was as I have stated we should pay $13.75 per head all over Canada. Prince Edward Island, with a population of 108,000, would pay $1,497,250; Nova Scotia, with a population of 440,572, would pay $6,057,786; New Brunswick, with a population of 321,233, would pay $4,416,953; Quebec, with a population of 1,359,027, would pay $18,686,620; Ontario, with a population of 1,923,228, would pay $26,343,385; Manitoba, with a population of 65,000, would pay $906,876; the Territories, with a population of 56,446, would pay $776,132; making in all $59,364,288. By this it appears that there are $37,664,261 taken from the people that have not gone into the revenue at all.

Mr. GILLMOR. My hon. friends opposite say "hear, hear." I do not know myself whether my calculation is strictly correct, or not; but it is my opinion that it is correct; it is at least as near as I can come at it. The only way in which that argument can be met, is, by saying that the prices of goods are no dearer with, than without, this Tariff. I do not know of any other way. Now that the manufacturers put on to their wares the duty on similar goods imported, there is no doubt in my mind at all. The Tariff has not kept out imports, because these have been greater since the introduction of this policy than before; and those imports, duty paid, go on the shelves of our merchants, side by side with the similar classes of goods manufactured in Canada. No one will say: the imported goods are not increased in price by this Tariff; we buy them, and not only pay the duties, but the cost of importing, commissions, &c.; and the additional profit of the wholesale and retail dealers, is all added, and paid, at last, by the consumer. I contend that the manufacturers in this country increase the prices of their wares by the amount of the duties. If they do not do that, what good on earth is the Tariff to them? If they are not benefited by the increases in the Tariff, and if the consumers do not pay this in the prices of the goods, of what use is the Tariff? And I contend that the people of this Dominion have paid $21,700,000 into the Dominion Treasury, and $37,664,000 to the struggling industries of the country, to the manufacturers, the poor manufacturers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Mr. GILLMOR. Oh, yes. It is not your policy, and not your interest, that the people should be enlightened on this point. You succeed by making them feel that it does not increase their taxes at all. Oh, no, their taxes are not increased; and the manufacturers are not benefited by any increase in the price of their wares—they are not helped to start manufactures and to get more money. Do you suppose that the cotton mills would have been started, if it were not for the advantage given by putting a tax on their cotton; and do you not know that the consumers buy the cotton and pay this increase. I do not know whether my hon. friends opposite will think it worth while to reply to this at all or not; but I think that it is worth making the statement, because I believe—and I think that if it is true, the people ought to know it—I believe there is not much exaggeration in what I have said—and there is none from my stand-point or in my calculations—but let them go for what they are worth. I believe that the people of the Dominion have paid $37,664,261, during this fiscal year, and not one cent of it has reached the revenue; but, the people have paid it. Where are the manufacturers? They ought to be getting rich very fast, and so they are.

Mr. GILLMOR.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). How are they selling agricultural implements 10 per cent cheaper, than they did ten years ago?

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not know anything about that. You heard the speech of my hon. friend from Manitoba, and what your own organ there stated. They tell you that the consumers pay the duty; and it is absurd to say anything else. Any statement to the contrary is hardly worthy of consideration. Men say they do not pay anything more; but, if so, what benefit do you get from the duties?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I say positively—and I am a manufacturer of reapers and mowers—that these machines are sold 10 per cent. cheaper than was the case five years ago; and I defy any respectable contradiction of that statement.

Mr. GILLMOR. That proves just nothing at all. I can remember, when cotton was 40 and 50 cts. a yard, and when molasses was $1 a gallon—and you had then no Protective Policy. No matter what an article is sold for, an addition is made to the price to the extent of the Tariff anyway. There is no doubt about it. The law cannot help them. The Government do not intend to give it to them, but they make a law that the people should pay it; and the only way that the people can get relief from this, is through the tender mercies of the people who make the implements and manufacture the goods. The duties must either benefit the manufacturers, or the latter must fight against themselves in competition; but I do not think that there is much discord amongst them. They are firmly united within their own ranks; and they will never complain, as long as this policy is kept on. They may complain, when they quarrel among themselves, when one industry wants a little more than another. The best evidence that can be given that the manufacturers of domestic goods have put the tax on their goods, is because they have not kept the others out; and the same goods would not be imported if they did not add the Tariff. In agricultural implements this is done. The duty of 25 per cent. does not keep them out, and why? Because you can import the same articles from the United States with the taxes on, on the same terms. Here is my friend from Manitoba, who from patriotic motives, would like to patronize Canadian manufactures. But for patriotic motives I would simply like to do the opposite, and I will tell you the difference. If I cannot get Canadian goods cheaper, and I have to pay the duty, I will buy the imported article and let that part of the price go into the Treasury. If I buy the other it costs me just as much and the Treasury gets nothing, while I make a contribution to the Canadian manufacturer, and so I say for patriotic motives men ought to buy imported goods, and let the increase go into the Treasury, and let the Government have more money to advance the interests and to maintain the institutions of the country. Of course it may be said that you cannot prove this—that the manufacturers are enriched by this enormous sum of money that is levied on the people. Well, I do not suppose that they are, all of them, but some of them have become richer. I saw an article in a paper a few weeks ago, with reference to the splendid Hudon Mill, which is now lighted by the electric light. I will just read it:

"The Hudon Cotton Mill has a most interesting history from a financial point of view. For example, a gentleman purchased $2,000 worth of stock in it. In a few years he was presented with one hundred per cent. on his original investment, besides, meantime, having drawn annually ten per cent. interest upon his capital. This latter was his, besides the watered stock of one share for each of his original stock, or one hundred per cent. as stated. But quite recently the company has again watered the stock, giving two shares upon each of the original stock, or two hundred per cent., so that the $2,000 has swelled into $8,000 in a very few years. Besides this, the shareholders are now drawing eight per cent. per annum, paid quarterly, upon the stock that has been watered, or thirty-two per cent. upon the original capital. This is a splendid picture for the financier."

Now, there is no doubt that our richest men in the Dominion of Canada are our manufacturers. I do not mean to say that they will all succeed, but this shows the folly of the system. Many manufacturers do not succeed, and why? They may start an industry which is entirely opposed to the existing condition of things, and it may not pay. I would be glad to see them succeed, but if you are determined to manufacture everything that the Canadians want, without regard to the natural condition of things, without regard to the climate or the natural products of the country, or all the other conditions which enter into the question, they may get all the money which the Government will give them, and yet with all their money and their ability they may still go down. It was intended by Nature, by the God of Nature, that men should promote the interests of society by a system of interchange. The saying of the hon. leader of the Government, that Canada should be kept for the Canadians, has grown to be a proverb, believed in by these hon. gentlemen, perhaps, more than the Proverbs of Solomon; but if we are to construe it in its full meaning it is folly to stop at 40 or 50 per cent. We should prohibit outside trade altogether, and thus grow rich by trading among ourselves. That is undoubtedly the idea which flows through the whole argument of these hon. gentlemen. An additional tax is to be put upon agricultural implements, and this will not only affect the Province of Manitoba, but every farmer throughout the Dominion will have to pay his 10 per cent. just as much as the people of Manitoba. But why not prohibit the American implements from coming in at all. That is what you want, and why do not you do it? Why! because it would show the absurdity of this principle, and hon. gentlemen would themselves be ashamed of it. But they wish to effect the same thing by a policy of deception. Although I think that men and nations should act upon their own convictions of what is right, yet, in matters of this kind, and in other matters, wise men should look to the experience of the past. I think if there is any nation on the face of the earth that has made progress in the right direction, so far as exchange is concerned, so far as Tariffs are concerned, it is the Mother Country; and I think she is the best example that the world has at the present time. I think Great Britain in her trade policy is an example that the world might point to with pride and might follow with great advantage. She had a protective system—she had her National Policy from generation to generation. But I am thankful, and the world should be thankful, that while the battle of Free Trade was going on, there were statesmen, men of great minds who, seeing the discord and annoyance which resulted from a system of protection and monopolies, seeing the loss and confusion which resulted from it, proved by their discoveries and experience that there was a broad principle underlying this question, and they made political economy a science as fixed and as true as any other science—fixed as the science of astronomy. I know that many arguments are advanced against the science of political economy—the science of free exchange. But these arguments are fallacious. I know that clever men, like the hon. Finance Minister, and many others on his side, can represent this subject in many ways, and that some cannot answer them at the moment, but at the same time I have just as firm a belief in the fixed, eternal, and immutable principles of the science of Free Trade and political economy as I have in the science of astronomy. I do not profess to understand the science of political economy in all its bearings; I do not profess to answer all I hear on the subject; I could not do so with reference to the science of astronomy either, but I believe as firmly in the one as I do in the other. I believe that the great Creator of the world intended that that science should be understood by men for the benefit of the race, and I think England has made a discovery by which we should profit, and has given us an example which we should follow. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us she never adopted a Free Trade policy until she had grown rich and powerful, and could manufacture cheaply; but that argument carries its own answer. Do you suppose that the manufacturers and statesmen of Great Britain would change a system which was making them rich more rapidly than the one they were about to adopt? Did they change it for the good of other countries? No; but for the benefit of the British people—for the benefit of the poor of that country; and it was for the British nation, and the whole world, that they fought out that battle. They fought that battle for many long years, and that nation paid dearly enough for its long years of folly and mistaken policy. And we are entering upon it to-day; we have gone back in civilization fifty years by the introduction of this policy. I never could conceive how the minds of gentlemen, who have had experience in the science of Government—both in the Local Legislatures, and now for sixteen years in the Dominion Parliament—could, four years ago, introduce a policy that has been proved to be fallacious and deceptive from the foundation. This policy has been in operation for more than twenty years in the United States, and we know, by the deep tones of rumbling that we can hear, that its end is near in that country. I know it is a hard thing to remove this system of Protection. Monopolists are rich, and the Governments are no better than men, and want to keep their party in power; and so these parties combine, and make a power that it is hard for the people to resist. The people are not consulted in these cases. The monopolists are consulted in the United States, and they are consulted here. Who compose the delegations that come to Ottawa? Do the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces come here? Have they any interest in this question of taxation? Why are not the farmers asked their opinion on the subject? Why are the lumbermen not consulted, and why do you not find delegations coming here from the shipbuilding and every other interest, to influence the men who rule this country? The manufacturers have ruled it already too long, and I am afraid they will rule it for some time longer. I am not surprised at this, because the people for ages have been ruled by just such influences. These men have the influence and the money; if they have the money they can get the press. They also deceived their audiences by their fallacies, which are as absurd as those against which Galileo spoke and suffered. One of these fallacies is, that Protection, which is given ostensibly for the purpose of helping to start new industries, does not cost anything—that the goods will be just as cheap as if the duty had not been put on. Another fallacy told them, is, that Government are going to keep the money at home and thus make the people become rich. I wonder how rich England would be if she had kept her money at home. I want Canadians to make money by going abroad and making it out of other nations; and it is a beautiful law of political economy that both parties can be made richer by the bargain; and if they do not become rich, the Government need not interfere, for they will stop the trade themselves. If the principle is good, why do you not stop inter-provincial trade, and let the people of New Brunswick have a chance of getting rich among themselves? A worthy example for us to follow is the example we see in the prosperity and the progress and the greatness of the British nation, of which we form a part. I do not intend to quote from the Trade and Navigation Returns, but I will just give you a few figures from British statistics. In 1840 there was deposited in the savings banks of Great Britain, \$75,000,000; in 1878 there was deposited, \$400,000,000. That is an evidence of the progress of the country under Free Trade. Under the improved condition of things brought about by Free Trade, crime decreased, because I maintain that a Protective Tariff promotes immorality. It leads to smuggling, and enables one class to prey on another class, under the sanction of law. In 1840, the number of convicted criminals in England was 34,000, out of a population of 26,000,000; in 1878, it was only 17,000, out of a population of 33,000,000. In 1840, 200,000 paupers were supported by the public and private charities; in 1878 the number was less than 100,000. In 1840, the poor of that country only indulged in the buying of tea to the extent of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. per head; in 1878 the consumption was  $4\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. per head. In 1840, the poor of England consumed  $15\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. of sugar per head; in 1878 they used  $48\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. The consumption of coffee was the same in both years. In 1840 the consumption of rice by the poor was 1 lb. per head, and in 1878,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. per head. Raisins and other dried fruit,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. per head in 1840, and  $4\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. in 1878. In 1840 the tobacco used was 1 lb. per head, it was  $7\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. in 1878. In 1840, the foreign trade of England was a little in excess of \$800,000,000; in 1878 it was \$4,000,000,000. In 1840, the revenues of England were \$260,000,000; in 1878 the Customs duties amounted to \$100,000,000, and the whole revenue to \$450,000,000. Nearly all of this was paid by the rich. Under this wise policy of Free Trade, this great and benevolent policy, that has been worked out by great minds, the poor man could get all the necessaries of life without paying a cent of taxation, no matter from what part of the world they came.

Mr. FARROW. What about the income tax?

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not know how much was raised from that.

Mr. FARROW. Still, it is a tax.

Mr. GILLMOR. What about it? Do you pretend to say that a man who has $100,000 per year income ought not to pay something, and that the man having $1 per day should pay more than his share?

Mr. HESSON. Is it not a tax all the same?

Mr. GILLMOR. It does not fall upon the working man. In the United States no man with less than $1,000 per year was taxed on his income at all, and in Great Britain a limit was also made. The rich men in England, whether Liberals or Tories, are not now clamoring for Protection, though there was a little movement some time ago for "fair trade." Its advocates did not dare to state their case in plain terms, but there is no danger of Great Britain ever going back to a system of Protection, with all the evils that follow in its train. I am not afraid of expressing my opinions. I know the time is far in the future when we shall have entire free trade all over the world, and one great reason is that the monopolists of all countries want to keep it back. What better system of raising revenue could there be than a tax on a man's income. Each man ought to pay according to his means. Heaven knows our party is small enough, and I want to make it larger, and the way to make it larger is to appeal to the reason of men, and to be true to our principles and convictions. If they are logically right and moral, they are sure to triumph in the end, as all other true reformers have triumphed. I do not expect to live to see this great question decided, but you will live to see this fabric of Protection knocked to pieces on the other side of the line. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh at this, but, so did men in former days mock at the attempts to put down slavery, and so were the attempts to repeal the Corn Laws scouted in England. I remember when a boy, in England, I saw the anti-Corn Law movement at work, carried on by the people, directed by the best minds of England, and though the great mass of traders and manufacturers were against them, they pursued their course honestly and industriously, and with the blessing of God at length succeeded. We will succeed in the same way, and Canadians will be ashamed, in a few years, that we ever had a policy so iniquitous, dishonest, impure and corrupt as this is. I have belief in the great mind and great heart of the people of this Dominion, and will trust them before any Government or party. I know the majority in this House is against us. How they got there I do not know. I know that millers have fat hogs, but I do not know whose corn they eat. I have a short extract from a speech made by Sir Robert Peel, which I will read to the House. I seldom call men Tories—although the appellation is quite proper. I call them Conservatives, as I do not wish to be offensive. Sir Robert Peel was a statesman and a Christian, although he was a Conservative, and occupied the proud position of being Premier of England, yet his convictions were so strong on this question that for its sake he gave up power and left his party. I will read an extract from his speech, and I would be glad to read some such authority from the hon. Finance Minister, my early friend of thirty years ago, if he could speak so conscientiously—and I do not think he would do any great violation to his conscience if he would come over to the right side. He was there once, and I think he was a happier man than ever he has been since. Here is what Sir Robert Peel said:

"I shall leave a name execrated, I know, by every monopolist who will maintain protection for his own individual benefit; but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good-will in the abodes of those to whose lot it is to labour and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant untaxed food, sweeter because it is no longer leavened by a sense of injustice."

Are those not noble sentiments? And who should the Government not look after but the great majority and the poor? They need not trouble themselves about the rich, they can look after themselves. They pretend this policy is a new relation between the capitalist and the labourer; but the truth is that it is all on one side. This policy does not at all protect the labourer. He is left still at the mercy of the employer. He gets no more than the employer chooses to give him. If these rich monopolists whose profits are so great wished to show their benevolence to the poor who wanted bread they could have done so, but they have done nothing of the sort. They let them go hungry, they let them go cold, and the Government is going to help them mightily by taxation. You are making it harder for them to get a blanket during the cold winter, making it harder for them to get bread to support their families, but you protect the monopolist, you protect the men who have got money, and you keep all other goods out so that he shall get a high price for his. But how do you protect the workingman? Do you keep any workingmen out so that they shall not compete with our workingmen? No, you would not do a thing so absurd as that, but to be consistent you ought to incorporate it in the Tariff. My hon. friend, the Finance Minister, knows a gentleman in New Brunswick who used this expression: "When justice ceases to be even-handed it ceases to be justice." There is no justice here, there is no protection to the workingmen except the tender mercies of their employers. They give them more wages now because they are obliged to, because so much labour has gone out of the country. In New Brunswick, I am saying only what the hon. Finance Minister knows and everybody else knows, that the population has been going to the Western States until it is difficult to get men to carry on the ordinary operations of the country. I do not say that the National Policy drove them out, no more than I would say that a Revenue Tariff would drive them out. But they go, as labour always will go, and it ought to be free and unrestricted. Let the working man go where he can get the most. Hon. gentlemen opposite charged the Government who preceded them with sending people away. Now, I tell them truly that more people have left the Maritime Provinces since they came into power than they did in any four or eight years preceding. Now, I do not charge that upon the National Policy—that would be unreasonable—but I do say that the National Policy has entirely failed to do what the hon. gentlemen who inaugurated it said it would do. They said it would keep people in the country, but in the Maritime Provinces it has not had that effect, and the hon. Finance Minister knows it as well as he knows that he is sitting there. The Government promised universal happiness everywhere, there was to be no more suffering and no more sorrow in this wide Dominion. The absurdity of their pretension is beneath notice, they can do only one thing, they can rob one class of men and stimulate certain industries, but they cannot make the mass of the people richer. The Government sometimes employs labour. Last spring, before I went away, I noticed that workmen were in great demand around these buildings. I saw a good many of them digging out cement in the cracks of those buildings which was just about as good as that they put in. A gang of men would go round and dig out the cement to fill it in with other cement, and the Government were paying these $2 and $2.50 a day. When they got through with that job the Government found work for the men pulling up dandelions. All that was before the elections. After they were over they did not employ so many men. I looked at the Citizen this morning and I saw an extract from a Budget Speech in England, delivered a few days ago, which, with your permission, I will read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense.

Mr. GILLMOR. Personally, I have great respect for my hon. friends on the other side. I think they are for the most part very good men, but they remind me of a little story of a man who wanted to get a note discounted. He went to every director of the bank to ask accommodation, and each of them told him he would discount his note. When, however, they met at the Board, they decided, notwithstanding their promises, not to discount his note. Hearing this he opened the door of the room, and said: "Gentlemen, individually you are a very respectable class of men, but collectively you are a set of infernal scoundrels." I observe by the papers to-day that Free Trade England has a surplus. A cable despatch runs as follows:—

"London, March 6.—In the House of Commons to-day Hon. Mr. Childers submitted the Budget for the year ending March, 1883. The revenue was £89,994,000, and exceeded the estimate by £408,900. There was a decrease in the consumption of spirits, the reduction from that source being £500,000. The total expenditures were £88,900,000. The expense of the war in Egypt, including the amount for the Indian contingent, was £3,836,000. He had no arrears to report on account of the war expenditure, as increased by the present Government. The expenditures of the coming year he estimated at £85,789,000, and the revenue at £88,480,000. The National Debt was reduced for the past year £7,100,000. He expected to make a further reduction this year of £8,000,000. During the next twenty years he expected to see the debt reduced by £172,000,000. Mr. Childers proposed that the duties on the goods made from silver be charged on goods actually sold, and eventually they should be abolished altogether, but not this year. He proposed the tax on railway earnings, where the fares were very small, should be abolished; the standard moisture of tobacco and snuff, on which an exemption was allowed, be raised one per cent.; that provision be made looking towards a reduction of the rate for telegrams sent anywhere inland to sixpence, and that three halfpence of the income tax be removed. These reductions, if made, would reduce the surplus to £240,000. The report was received with much favor."

I submit that if we want an example of the benefits to be derived from a Free Trade policy, carried out to its fullest extent, we find it in the Mother Country. Her progress in wealth, comfort, and everything that tends to make the people happy, has increased to a marvellous extent under that system. She has grown rich, not by keeping England for the English; not by excluding foreign products. She discovered long ago, and we will discover it, that if we want to grow rich we must extend our commerce and produce articles as cheap as anybody else, and sell them abroad. The laws of Nature and of God show that the free interchange of commodities was intended by the Creator for the happiness and benefit of His children, and therefore we have the ocean before us and ships to carry the products from one clime to another. We would do well to produce what the laws of nature tell us we should produce, and we should bring other products from other countries. We would get the product of five days' labor for one of our own, if we worked according to nature's laws, but instead of doing that we are undertaking to do what the God of nature never intended we should do. He did not make all climes, soils and conditions of all countries the same. He knew that men would exchange products, and that their comfort, happiness and wealth would be increased by free interchange. Your protective system tries to thwart the laws of God and the best interests of man. Hon. gentlemen opposite may have even a larger majority than they have now at the next election. Will that be any comfort to them? If they think they are right, no doubt it will, and I suppose they do think so; but if my argument has had the effect of causing them to think they may possibly be mistaken, then my object is served. Hon. gentlemen are doing what is unnatural and unjust, and I would have no hope for the future of Canada, with our intelligence, morality and religion, if I thought there was no hope of a good time coming, when the present policy will be reversed. You may build railways and develop the country, but you are doing more injury by this policy than by any extravagance in which you might indulge. That is my honest opinion, and the experience of the past has proved it, and the experience of the future will prove it likewise. With these views advanced in my humble way, I think the House will understand what my convictions are on the trade question. Everyone knows I am not a man to trim for the sake of getting here, to violate my convictions and despise myself for the sake of getting into Parliament. I value the respect of my fellow-men, and I am anxious to retain it; but I value my own self-respect, my regard for truth, more than I regard the opinions of all the world besides. I will not trim on this question. Of course, I cannot have my own way. I do not expect to have a Tariff to suit me; but I hope to live to see the time when a Tariff will be framed upon sound principles, when a Tariff will be framed so that every dollar taken from the poor man's pocket, and from the rich man's too, will go into the Treasury for the public good, and for uses in which every one can share. It is a satisfaction to me to see men becoming rich, according to proper laws, laws just and fair, and approved by morals and approved by God himself. If men become rich by industrious toil or intellectual attainments it is perfectly fair. One lawyer may obtain a thousand dollars for pleading a case, while another will only obtain a hundred, but it is free and open competition in the market, and this sort of free exchange will regulate itself everywhere. When a man gets rich by his unaided industry, whether from manufacturing, mining, or anything else, I am glad to see it, but I have no regard for the man who has become rich from the sweat of the poor, and by taxing the great mass of the people. You may speak of your Redpaths and your millionaires, and point to their palaces; these look very well; but this is very little satisfaction to the poor shivering wretch, who hungry and cold, is sitting on the door steps of these palaces. It is better for him to have what he has earned; but you do not give it to him; you take it from him, and give part of it to the revenue, and the largest part of it to the manufacturers. I was very much pleased with the manner of the speech of the hon. member from Westmoreland. It was a good speech from his stand-point. He told us that the ship-building interest was waning in the Maritime Provinces, and the cause of it; I think this is the case. I am quite satisfied that this industry is waning, and the National Policy is helping it to wane a little faster than was the case before. As he says, the introduction of iron ships and steamers will eventually injure and reduce in value wooden ships. He told us that the lumbering interest was waning, and the cause of it, to which I am not disposed to take exception. I think that this interest must eventually wane. I know it will, because the sources of supply are being cut off. He told us that other industries required to be started to supply their places, and to that proposition I can make no objection, but I want these to be started just in the same way as were the ship-building and lumbering interests. After these have started on their merits and succeeded, and become old and poor, you will tax them, and give them another push down hill, in order to start some new industries in their place. Let the latter start in the same way as they did, or let the country do without them. No industry is any good to the country which has to be kept up by taxes. Under a protective tariff a man will start any sort of absurdity. I will run any business if you choose to guarantee that every body will buy enough and contribute enough to make me prosperous. My hon. friend wants to do the same thing, and to tax the lumbermen, the ship-builders, the fishermen and the farmers, in order to build a cotton mill at Moncton, and a sugar refinery; and to enable manufactures to succeed and pay him, a rich man, a large capitalist, and a large stockholder in all these institutions. I do not think that my hon. friend is selfish, but his proposition has that air. These are things in which he is interested. I wonder if the law ought to provide for the fair division of the profits. If I invest, as the Government compels me to do, I want my part of the profits. I ought to have a return for my money, but that does not follow; that is not part of the National Policy. Its object is to take money from the many and give to the few. I want to see every man in Canada have a fair field and no favor. Let him start in the race of life untrammelled, and let the smartest man get ahead if he can, but do not shackle a part of the community, and let the others rob it, and get ahead in the race, let there be free and open competition. I have a great deal more which, perhaps, I might say, but, on mature consideration I have concluded not to say it. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentlemen who have listened so kindly to me, and it may be that I will not trouble you any more this Session.

Mr. VAIL. Before the resolutions are adopted I desire to make a few remarks on the subject of the Tariff, from a Nova Scotia stand-point, and give the House a few of the reasons why, in my humble opinion, the Protective Policy of 1879, which—with a few alterations, the Government propose to continue another year at least—is injurious to the interests of the Maritime Provinces. I regret that I am obliged to speak at this late hour of the night, but as I have not had an opportunity till now to say anything on this trade question, and only propose to occupy a few minutes, I am sure the House will give me a patient hearing. Now, it will be remembered that before Nova Scotia entered into Confederation with the other Provinces, we had a 10 per cent. Tariff. In 1866, which was the last full year the accounts were made up for, the goods entered for home consumption amounted to $13,025,433, on which we paid, under our then Tariff, $1,226,398 duty. Now, let us compare this with the importations into Nova Scotia last year, and the amount collected. I notice by the Trade Returns that the Province of Nova Scotia only imported, last year, from foreign ports, $6,169,546 of goods, for home consumption, on which we paid $1,758,000 duty, so that while the importations were less in value by about $7,000,000 than in 1866, we actually paid over $500,000 more into the Dominion Treasury than we paid on the $13,000,000 in 1866. Now, some hon. gentlemen opposite seem desirous of making the public believe that an increase in the duties does not necessarily increase the taxation of the country, and I should be disposed to agree with them if it could be shown that the consumption was less than formerly; but as that is not the case, and the difference between the value of the goods imported in 1866 and 1882 has been made up by the consumption of domestic goods, for which the people pay a higher price in consequence of the higher duties, it is quite clear to my mind that the taxation is largely increased; and that what my hon. friend from Charlotte has said is quite true, viz.: that it is simply absurd to say there has been no increase of taxation. It is unreasonable to suppose that the Government could, by a turn of the screw, take $6,000,000 out of the pockets of the people without making them just that much poorer. It is all very fine to say that the country is no poorer because it goes into the Treasury and belongs to the people; but allowing that to be true, I think it will be a long time before it finds its way back into their pockets. As you all know, Nova Scotia is almost an island; her ports are open to the commerce of the world the year round; our products are ships, lumber, wood, bark, gypsum, farm produce, fish, coal and gold, for all of which, except the latter, we must find a market in foreign countries. Consequently, we require the freest possible opportunity to exchange our products for those of other countries, and any Tariff which restricts this is injurious to our people. Nova Scotia is the Province above all others, if I except Prince Edward Island, that would be benefited by a low Tariff such as we had before 1879, and we were led to believe before Confederation that a 15 or 20 per cent. Tariff would be the most that we should be called upon to pay after we became a part of the Dominion. I know that we were told by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in 1865, that it was idle to suppose that this was correct, or that Confederation with the other Provinces did not mean increased taxation beyond what the Province could well bear, but it appears he has since changed his mind, and now endorses the present high Protective Tariff, which he said a few years ago would be exceedingly injurious to the trade of the Maritime Provinces. It will be in the recollection of some hon. members of this House that the Finance Minister himself told the people of his Province in 1866, that $15,000,000 would be ample to pay all the necessary expenses of the Confederated Provinces. This Sir, would seem rather a remarkable miscalculation in the face of the fact that before the end of eight years, he required about $23,000,000 and now asks the House to give him almost double the sum he named in 1866, as the outside sum that would be required; and to meet this enormous increasing expenditure, he has been obliged to raise the Tariff not only to 25 or 30, but in many cases to 40, and on coarse goods to as high as 60 per cent. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I would not object so much to this increase, if the taxation was fairly and justly levied, but as it stands at present it bears more heavily on one portion of the Dominion than it does on another, and I contend that the Maritime Provinces are now paying too large a proportion of the taxation for the development of the North-West as compared with the older and more wealthy Provinces; and it would almost seem, as the changes which are being made from year to year are all in the direction of placing heavier burdens upon the people who live beside the sea, to force them to consume the manufactured goods of the Upper Provinces, that the Government is just a little too much influenced by the manufacturers of Ontario, and a portion of Quebec, and too ready to carry out their suggestions at the expense of the smaller Provinces. Some hon. gentleman on the other side, said a few days ago, that the people of Nova Scotia were prosperous and happy. I acknowledge that they are reasonably prosperous, and I may add happy; but it is in spite of the Tariff, and they would have been in a much more prosperous condition if the 17½ per cent. Tariff could have been continued. Our people are not confined to one or two industries. We do not depend altogether on agriculture, or on fishing, or on lumber, or on coal; we do not depend on building ships; we do not depend exclusively on any of these industries, so that the people of Nova Scotia may go on prospering from year to year notwithstanding this, I may say, iniquitous Tariff. I am told that the Government of which

I was a member for a few years, was a Government of deficits, and that the present Government is a Government of annual surpluses. Let me take the four years of the Mackenzie Administration, and what is the result? In 1874-5 the expenditure was $23,714,071; in 1875-6, $24,488,372; in 1876-7, $23,519,214; in 1877-8, $23,503,580—in all $94,923,902. Let us take the receipts for those same years. In 1874-5, they were $24,648,715; in 1875-6, $22,587,587; in 1876-7, $22,059,274; in 1877-8, $22,375,011, making the receipts of those four years in all $91,679,000, and making the deficits for the same period $3,353,315. Now, let us turn to the other side of the picture. In 1878-9, the first year after the Government obtained power, the expenditure was $24,455,381; in 1879-80 $24,850,634, making the expenditure for those two years $49,306,015. The receipts in 1878-79 were $22,517,382; in 1879-80 they were $23,307,406, or a deficit in the two years of $3,481,227, as against $3,253,315 during the four years of the Mackenzie Administration. Where is the surplus there? It is quite true there has been a surplus since. It is said on the other side of the House that it is an evidence of great statesmanship on the part of the hon. Finance Minister to be able to take four or five millions out of the pocket of the people of this country, but for my part I take a very different view of it. A Finance Minister should be able to estimate just about the amount of money he requires to meet the expenditure of the year, and not take a dollar beyond that sum. I say, Sir, it is not statesmanship, and it is unwise and unfair, in the present condition of this country, to take five or six millions out of the pockets of the people to pay for building railways that are thousands of miles away from the seaboard, from which the people of the Maritime Provinces can never derive much benefit. True statesmanship, on the part of the hon. Finance Minister just now, would be to take no more money from the people's pockets than he requires for ordinary expenditure; and let future generations, who are to benefit by the development of the North-West, pay the interest on the cost of that development. I repeat the Maritime Provinces ought not to be called upon to develop the North-West for the benefit of future generations. I have taken some trouble to look into the taxation of the Province of Nova Scotia as compared with 1865 and 1866, and, I am satisfied, if the hon. Finance Minister would take the trouble to enquire into this matter as closely as I have, he will find that instead of the people of Nova Scotia paying, as they did in 1866, $1,226,000 in duty, they are paying to-day directly and indirectly, no less than $5,000,000. If you take the duties paid by us and the population of Nova Scotia in 1866, and take the population of the present day, and apply the Dominion Tariff, you will find that the people of Nova Scotia are paying over $3,000,000 directly, and I am quite satisfied that the increased price they pay on manufactured goods would be more than enough to bring the amount up to at least $5,000,000. I do not make these statements without having taken some trouble to look into the matter. When I was a member of the late Government, I told my colleagues that Nova Scotia even under the Tariff then prevailing, was unjustly taxed, and the taxation on the goods consumed by the poorer class had increased almost ten-fold since then.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. VAIL. Five-fold at any rate. It seems to me, Sir, that between the Government on the one hand and the manufacturers of the Upper Provinces on the other, the people of Nova Scotia are between the upper and the nether millstone, and will be compelled to leave the country, unless they can bring some influence to bear on the Government to consider their peculiar position and grant relief in some way. The hon. Minister of Marine must surely know that the bone and sinew of the country is fast leaving Nova Scotia; if not, I can convince him by reading from his own organ, the Halifax Morning Herald; but before doing so I would just say that when canvassing Digby last June, I found a great many vacant farms, and on making enquiry as to where these people had gone I was invariably told they had gone to the Western States. Why, Sir, in 1878 they had a Liberal-Conservative Club in Digby, but before the election in 1882 I was told that everyone of them had gone to the Western States except one, and he had been appointed Census enumerator, otherwise I suppose he would have gone with the others. He has since been appointed as overseer of the work on the Digby Pier at $3 per day, and as he only has some four or five men to look after, his duties are not very arduous, and he will remain till this work is completed, if no longer. Now, I am not one of those who, it may be said, is desirous of making it appear that our country is being depopulated. I want to see the people kept in the country, and I think considering that the present Government not only promised to keep the people in the country, but bring those back who had gone away, I am sure we have just cause to complain that they have not done so. In my opinion the only way we can keep our people in the country is to make the taxes as low as possible, and make it a cheap country to live in. A short time ago a movement was made in Nova Scotia to form an immigration society, to induce farmers from the other side of the water to come over and settle on the vacant farms in the western part of Nova Scotia, and this is what the Halifax Herald said at the time, in reference to the Annapolis Valley, which may be considered the garden of Nova Scotia, and the finest agricultural district in Canada. Halifax Herald, 1883:

"We stated in yesterday's article that on the authority of Mr. Pitman there are one hundred farms for sale in Annapolis County. We believe the statement to be rather under than over the mark, and have no hesitation in saying that the desire to sell is even more prevalent in many of the other counties than that of Annapolis. In every county of the Province there are numerous proprietors of farms who are anxious to sell at a very moderate price. The prices asked for good farms are astonishingly moderate, just because there is no immigration to the Province, and there is consequently no demand for them."

Now, I consider that the value of real estate is the true index of the prosperity of the country, and when real estate is as low as it is at the present time in the Province of Nova Scotia, and farmers are anxious to sell out, it is a pretty sure indication that the country is not in the prosperous state we would like to see it. As I said before, I would have made no objection to a reasonable amount of increase in the taxation, provided it was required for ordinary expenditure, but I again repeat that I object to continuing the tax on breadstuffs, to pay the principal of the money required to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know that the protective policy as, to a certain extent, an experiment, as it was impossible to tell how much would be realized from Customs duties for a year or two, hence the excuse for placing a duty on wheat, flour and meal but now that the hon. Finance Minister is boasting of a surplus, I am astonished to find he is disposed to continue this obnoxious duty, which he must know comes out of the pockets of the poorest class of people in the Maritime Provinces. Had he enquired as to how these taxes were levied, and on whom they weighed most heavily, I think he could have relieved the Maritime Provinces to a limited extent without doing any other Province an injustice. I am astonished that some of his Lower Province supporters have not protested against the last changes. Our people are too far away to send delegations here, and their interests are in consequence neglected. The people of Ontario are within easy reach of Ottawa, and consequently always have the ear of the Government. I should have supposed that the hon. Minister of Railways, who knows the situation of our people as well as any man in this House, would have insisted on justice being done to Nova Scotia, but it appears he has neglected his duty in that respect. Now, a word in regard to the savings banks deposits in Nova Scotia. One hon. member on this side of the House—I think it was the member for South Brant—very properly stated that this was not an evidence of increased prosperity. The returns showed that the people of the Maritime Provinces deposited last year about four times as much as the people of Ontario and Quebec, and it was not reasonable to suppose that they had saved four times as much as the people of the Upper Provinces. I quite agree with him. There is scarcely a wealthy man out of business in Nova Scotia that is not a depositor in the savings banks to the full extent the law will allow, and many of them have used the names of the several members of their families in order to exceed the amount which an individual is restricted to. As an illustration of this I may mention a case in which a widow not long ago claimed $10,000 deposited in her name, and the heirs were obliged to go into the courts, and prove that the money belonged to the estate, and was only invested in her name to get over the restriction. Again, only the other day, I wrote a lady whose income is not less than five or six thousand dollars a year, to know what I should do with a small sum in my hands at her credit, and she instructed me to place it in the savings bank; consequently, the House will see that the amount in the savings bank does not represent the savings of the laboring class. Before I take my seat I wish to refer to one little matter in reference to my own county. I do not know why it is that Digby County receives so much attention from the Government. In 1878, I ran a by-election; at that time the hon. Minister of Railways, then in Opposition, came down with a gentleman from Quebec, by the name of Thibeault, the latter was sent into the French district, and by great exertions I was defeated. Two years ago the hon. Minister of Finance, in his tour through Nova Scotia, held a meeting at Digby. He had his right-hand man, Mr. White, of Cardwell, with him. Nobody interfered with them, and they had their meetings to themselves. The hon. Finance Minister put the National Policy before the people in the brightest colors, and Mr. White made his speech which was listened to with great attention. The result was my minority of 1878 was turned into a considerable majority in 1882. They held another meeting at Weymouth, which was also not interfered with, and the result was that the majority there of fifty-eight against me in 1878 was reduced to three in 1880. It was only necessary for me to read an extract from a speech made at the Board of Trade in Montreal, by Mr. White, where he told the people of the Dominion that 15 per cent. was quite enough to encourage manufacturing in this country, and that anything beyond that was unreasonable and excessive, to counteract the effect of his arguments; I say it was only necessary for me to read that speech to anybody who heard Mr. White, or the Finance Minister, to dissipate the effect of their meeting. Now, not satisfied with this they sent down another Lower Canadian in 1882 to instruct the people of Clare in their duty, but they told this hon. gentleman that they knew quite as much about what was to their advantage in the election as he did, and they advised him to take up his valise and turn his face homeward; and he was wise enough to do so, and was not able to hold a meeting in the county. I hope, therefore, when another election comes round the Government will leave the Digby people to attend to their own business, and elect whomsoever they please to represent them in this House. I regret to have occupied so much time of the House at this late hour, but I felt it was incumbent upon me as a member in Opposition from Nova Scotia to say a few words before this resolution was adopted.

Mr. McLELAN. I shall not detain the House with a speech, but I want to give one fact in answer to the hon. Mr. VAIL.

gentleman who has complained that the Province of Nova Scotia is the poor house of the Dominion.

Mr. VAIL. I did not say anything of the kind. Mr. Speaker, I must protest against that.

Mr. McLELAN. Very well, I will take back the word poor-house; but the hon. gentleman has stated that it is the poorest part of the Dominion of Canada—

Mr. VAIL. Not at all. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. McLELAN. And that she was suffering under the operations of the National Policy. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that, although he made this statement in the first part of his speech, he answered it in the latter part. He says it is the Upper Provinces entirely that are manufacturing for the Lower Provinces, and especially for the Province of Nova Scotia. If the hon. gentleman will compare the Census returns of 1871 and 1881, he will see that the Province of Nova Scotia has increased the most in the production of her industries. The hon. gentleman knows that trade never was so good in the Province of Nova Scotia as it is to-day. He has referred to the Digby pier. I had the returns from the Digby pier prepared in answer to a question which he has on the paper to-day. In 1880, the amount received for wharfage upon the Digby pier was $354; in 1882 it has risen to $542. I now come to a larger matter. I have here a table showing the comparative state of industries in the various Provinces in 1871 and 1881 respectively:—

per cent. in their products, while in the Province of Ontario her industries have only increased 37 per cent. The hon. gentleman knows that in the city of Halifax we are refining sugar and sending it away to the North-West. We have there now one of the greatest manufacturing industries in the Dominion of Canada, the iron industry, which has been developed by this Tariff, and bids fair to become the greatest industry in the Dominion. The hon. gentleman says he has given a great deal of attention to gathering information as to the condition of his Province. Why, Mr. Speaker, a delegation was here two days ago from the city of Halifax who said that the shipping and trade at that port had doubled since 1874. I believe that the increase in the prosperity of Nova Scotia would have been very much larger had the National Policy been adopted earlier, and had not the hon. gentleman had the honor of being at one time a member of the Government that ruled this Dominion from 1874 to 1878. The hon. gentleman says that Nova Scotia is between the upper and the nether mill-stone. Well, we did feel from 1874 to 1878 that we were in that position—that we were suffering from the grit of the upper and the nether mill-stone. Prosperity has followed since then, and if the hon. gentleman had gathered fuller information he would have seen that the Province of Nova Scotia was never more prosperous than it is to-day.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) is the occasion of my offering a word or two on the subject, and in reply to what has been stated as to fair play not being meted out to all the Provinces. I have no desire to say a word on the Budget which has been so ably laid before the House by the hon. Minister of Finance, but I think that the statements made by the hon. member for Digby, ought not to go unchallenged and uncontradicted. I remember the hon. gentleman said that all the Provinces should have fair play, and that Nova Scotia was not receiving fair play, and that the taxation was oppressive in regard to that Province. I have here a table prepared from the Trade and Navigation Returns—and it is the only correct record on the subject—and I find from it, that the Province of Nova Scotia entered the Confederation with a per capita tax for Customs in 1868 of $3.06; in 1882, it had increased to $3.99, being an increase of 93 cents since Confederation. If there had not been an increase in the other Provinces, I should have considered the hon. gentleman's remarks perfectly justifiable, and that he had a right to complain in the House. But what are the facts? I find that Ontario has, perhaps, of all the Provinces, the greatest reason to complain. That Province came into Confederation in 1868 with a per capita Customs tax of $1.44; in 1882 it had increased to $3.82, or an increase of $1.38, as against an increase of 93 cts. in Nova Scotia. We next come to the Province of Quebec, and I do not think any hon. member from that Province has complained that fair play was not dealt out to her. Quebec entered the Confederation with a per capita Customs tax of $3.89; in 1882 it had increased to $6.74, being an increase of $2.85 as against an increase of 93 cts. in Nova Scotia, which Province the hon. member for Digby declares has not been fairly dealt with. We next come to New Brunswick, represented by the Finance Minister. It entered Confederation with a Customs tax of $3.22; it had increased in 1882 to $4.54, being an increase of $1.32, or about the same ratio as Ontario's increase. The little Province of Prince Edward Island, perhaps, of all the Provinces makes the most favorable exhibit in this regard. It entered Confederation in 1872, with a Customs tax of $2.33; in 1882, it had decreased to $1.82, being a decrease of 51 cts. This is the only instance of a Province having entered Confederation, and now showing a decrease in the expenditure under that head. We come to British Columbia, the youngest of all the Provinces, and what do we find? It entered Confederation in 1872, with a Customs tax of $6.85; in 1882, it had increased to $13.72, being an increase of $6.87. I see a representative from that Province in this place, but I do not hear him utter a word of complaint. I think I have fairly met this charge that the Province of Nova Scotia has been unfairly dealt with, in the matter of taxation, and such charges should not be made when they cannot be substantiated by the public records placed in our hands. I had no intention to occupy the time of the House, but while the hon. member for Digby was speaking, my attention was drawn to his charge, and I thought it fair that the House should have the benefit of this answer to it.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the Committee rise and report and ask leave to sit again.

Committee reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 2.45 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 9th April, 1883.

DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved that the Second Report of the Special Committee appointed to supervise the Report of the Debates be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

CHARITABLE, PHILANTHROPIC, AND PROVIDENT ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. COLBY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) to amend and extend the provisions of chap. 71 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, respecting charitable, philanthropic and provident associations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. COLBY. The Act which it is proposed to amend and extend by this Bill is one respecting charitable, philanthropic, and provident associations. The provisions of the Act are that any number of persons may unite themselves into a society for making provision, by means of contributions, subscriptions, donations or otherwise, against sickness unavoidable misfortune, or death, and for relieving the widows, and orphans children of members deceased. It provides also for the establishment of branches, election of officers, the promotion of the objects of the association, the taking security from officers, the holding of property, the punishment of officers found embezzling, &c. That Act is operative in its fullest sense, and, indeed, has been extended in the Province of Quebec. In Ontario the substantial provisions of the Act have been incorporated in a similar Act, and effective machinery has been provided by which these provisions might be made operative. The object of this Bill is to provide for machinery, in respect of which the original Act seems to be somewhat defective, and extend its provisions to those societies whose operations are to be carried on in the various Provinces of the Dominion. I have introduced another clause which I think will commend itself to this House, and meet a need in the country, as it is intended to meet the case of societies or voluntary associations for the promotion of immigration. There are, in various Provinces of the Dominion, unincorporated societies who are endeavoring to promote the immigration of particular classes of people suited to the needs of particular localities. I may say, that the object of the whole of the Act is to carry on the benevolent purpose intended by chap. 71 of the Consolidated Statutes in an inexpensive and summary manner.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has stated that this Statute is in force in Quebec. Is that by an Act of the Local Legislature?

Mr. COLBY. No; the Act remained in force in that Province, and a portion has been extended by the Local Legislature.

Mr. BLAKE. And in Ontario by virtue of a local Statute which provides machinery. Will the hon. gentleman inform us whether he proposes substantially the same machinery as that provided for in the Ontario Act?

Mr. COLBY. I may say that the Ontario Statute was before me; and, to a considerable extent, I have adopted the same machinery.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us whether he deems it necessary that the provident and charitable associations should be incorporated under Dominion legislation at all.

Mr. COLBY. I think it is desirable on the part of the Legislature to promote every good object. I am sure my hon. friend is himself benevolent enough to desire to see benevolent operations extended over the whole Dominion, and this Bill is for the purpose of meeting a want which exists. We have no law at present by which any number desiring to associate themselves together for these objects can incorporate themselves in an inexpensive manner. They are obliged to come here for special legislation, as they cannot, by the Joint Stock Companies' Act, or any other Act, reach their object economically. If the hon. gentleman disputes the desirableness of these purposes, then of course the hon. gentleman cannot see his way to support a proposition of this kind; but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that there are objects which can be accomplished by isolated individual effort, nor can they be well accomplished by the State in its capacity as a State, and all voluntary associations who desire to accomplish their purposes of beneficence, and relieve suffering humanity, should be encouraged as far as possible. I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree with me that those who are endeavoring to promote immigration to this country of a particular class should be strengthened in this laudable effort. When the Bill comes to the second reading we will be in a better position to discuss the details of the machinery and provisions I have mentioned to which I am sure the hon. gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with the hon. gentleman that in point of fact the Bill is so colorless that one can see through it.

Mr. COLBY. That is not a defect in any law.

ACADIA POWDER COMPANY.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Tupper, that Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company (limited) be now read the third time, and the motion of Mr. Amyot in amendment thereto.

Mr. COLBY.

Mr. HALL moved that the debate be adjourned. He said: I hope this discussion will be postponed as it involves a question of a good deal of importance to our Province namely, the question of the jurisdiction of the Local and Dominion Parliaments respectively.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member is aware that this Bill has been before the House several days, and has been postponed from time to time. It has been fully discussed, and there has been ample opportunities for every hon. gentleman who had anything to say on the subject to address the House. The hon. gentleman is also aware that the passage of the amendment would involve the House retracing its steps, as during the present Session two Bills similar to this one have been passed without a word of objection by the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member. The Phosphate Mining Bill was one of precisely the same character and involved the same principle. Yet not an hon. gentleman on either side of the House objected to its passing, and, so far as this House can make it law, it has become law. The hon. gentleman knows that the passage of this resolution would render illegal at least twenty Bills passed by this House similar in character to the present, but to which no objection was taken. The hon. gentleman is aware that by passing that resolution, the House would declare to be illegal companies which have already been incorporated by this Legislature, and which stood in precisely the same position as this company. I am at a loss to know why hon. gentlemen take exception to this Bill, which comes from the Province of Nova Scotia, when Bills of precisely the same character from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec have been passed again and again in this House without a single word of objection. It does seem a little singular that this Bill, which is promoted on behalf of a corporation in the Province of Nova Scotia, should receive such exceptional treatment at the hands of the House. I am at a loss to understand it; and, although I give the fullest weight to the questions raised, I think that precedents which have been cited in support of this Bill ought to have settled the question in the minds of hon. gentlemen, and if those precedents are not sufficient, I think the same objection should have been raised to Bills from other Provinces.

Mr. HALL. I am sorry that my motive in moving the adjournment of the debate has been misunderstood. I sympathise with everything that has been said by the hon. Minister of Railways, and I am sure the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate the other day is of the same mind; that is, we believe that this Parliament has power to pass measures of this kind. But as this measure has provoked considerable discussion, our object was that it might, on this occasion, be justly discussed and finally settled.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite understand the object of my hon. friend in moving the adjournment of the debate. As the hon. Minister of Railways says, we have already passed, without objecting, two Bills to which the same constitutional objection will apply; and, as the whole question is involved in the Carriers' Bill, perhaps the discussion can be continued on that Bill just as well as on this. This Bill will not then have been treated exceptionally. I think we had better now allow this Bill to pass, and have the discussion on the other.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HALL. I do not persist in it if the Government object. The Bills referred to, however, are not the same in principle. If the Government do not object I will withdraw the motion; if not, a day should be fixed, and the question be discussed fully, and disposed of.

Mr. OUMET. From the reading of our Constitutional Act, it is quite clear that corporations created by the Local Legislatures may come here to have their powers extended, that is to say, to have powers granted to them which could not be granted by the Local Legislatures, just as, for instance, the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien came here the other day, not to become incorporated, but to ask for some privileges in the matter of interest charges, but that the Local Legislature had no jurisdiction in that matter. But this case is quite different. From the reading of this Bill I understand that the corporation does not come here to get a new charter, but only to get extended powers. The first clause provides that a certain business may be carried on throughout Canada. No doubt we have power to create corporations whose operations may be extended to the whole of Canada, or, as the Constitutional Act says, whose object is general or federal. The first clause then might be allowed. But the second clause, giving the company power to increase its capital, is, I think, an infringement of the rights of the Province which created this company. The third clause, relating to the directors being continued in office, is of the same character. This Bill does not make this corporation a federal corporation. It is only a local corporation which comes here for extended powers. I would say, therefore, that this Legislature ought to grant only those powers which the corporation could not obtain from the Provincial Legislature. I think that we ought not to grant to this corporation, which is not a federal corporation, powers which it might obtain from the Local Legislature, and thus deprive the Local Legislature of control over this corporation, which is its creature. If the Bill is amended so as to exclude the last two sections I will support it; if not, I will vote in favor of the motion to reject the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. The observation of the hon. gentleman is, I think, perfectly just. It is a very grave question, what is the precise line of demarcation in the powers of the Local Legislature in reference to the incorporation of companies. My own impression is that we have very largely created a legislative current of opinion which may so far influence judicial decisions as to give an interpretation to the Constitution in favor of Federal powers greater than that which a juster interpretation of it, if applied at an earlier date, would have given. I have not been able myself—I have not been able to apprehend why a trading company, intending to have its seat of business and the carrying on of its operations, so far as manufacture and production is concerned, within one Province, should go beyond local and come within Federal jurisdiction, simply because it intended to sell to citizens of other Provinces. I do not think that sufficient reason for making it a federal corporation; but my hon. friend from Laval has correctly pointed out—whether it be true that the company is about to extend its operations in the way the second clause proposes or no—that clause does, on its face, suggest something which a fairly liberal construction of our powers might place within them. It does not say that the Acadia Powder Company want to sell powder within the limits of Nova Scotia, which, in my opinion, would have been no sufficient reason for federal action at all, but says the Acadia Powder Company wants power to make powder in other places and different Provinces, and that may be a reason for our acting. There are two modes in which we can deal with a manufacturing or trading company which wants more than a Local Legislature can give. We can either extend to the corporate entity which has been created by the Local Legislature certain powers which we alone can give; or we can create a federal corporation complete and entire, created by ourselves and amenable to ourselves, totus, teres, atque rotundus, giving it such powers as we see fit to give. On the general principles of these two modes I strongly prefer the second, because the second gives you a multiplicity of conveniences. I would refer all those who are interested, whether as shareholders, creditors or otherwise, in the constitutional powers of the company to the one Statute, or the amendments of that Statute in the records of the Legislature which created it. The other exposes you to complication, of which the observations of my hon. friend as to these subsequent sections affords an instance—complications as to the power of this Legislature to intervene; and upon the whole I think it is too plain to require lengthy argument that a corporate body engaged in trade should owe its birth, origin and powers to some one legislative body to which it is responsible, and to which it can apply for further powers. That does not affect the constitutional powers of this Legislature to give an additional power to a corporate entity already erected, not capable of obtaining that additional power from any other body than ourselves; but I perfectly concur in the observations of my hon. friend, that if we adopt the first and least convenient course we ought to know the extent of the corporate entity, the sum of power which it cannot obtain from the Local Legislature, and which will enable it to enlarge, if required, the sphere of its operations; and if we decide that we will give the required additional power, that does not alter in any respect the end of the corporation. That corporation continues to be after this Act what it was made before—owing its birth, its corporate existence, to the Local Legislature which created it; and I do not see how we can, with any degree of propriety, interfere in the other domestic details of that corporation. Why should we enlarge the capital stock of this company, or do the other things here mentioned? It is not proposed we should turn it into a federal corporation; it remains a local corporation. We merely give to this local corporation, created by a Local Legislature, and wanting something what that Legislature has not forbidden it to have, but cannot give it, that which it lacks. There we stop. We leave its whole domestic arrangements where they were. Suppose this company wants something else next Session. Cannot it get it from the Legislature of Nova Scotia? Are some of the domestic arrangements to be altered by the Nova Scotia Legislature and some to be altered here? What inextricable confusion would be created if we adopted this principle. I beg to move that the Bill be not read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for reconsideration.

Mr. RICHEY. The argument of my hon. friend from Laval is, I apprehend, that local corporate bodies, incorporated by a Local Legislature, may not come to this Parliament to obtain an extension of their powers.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no; quite the contrary.

Mr. RICHEY. That was the first argument. But conceding that they may come here to obtain an extension of their powers, it is claimed that we have no right to go farther than simply to give them the authority to carry on that business throughout the Dominion, and none whatever to touch the capital, or to enact such a section as the second one of this Bill. This is the way the matter strikes my mind. Looking to the powers which are given to the General Parliament and those which are given to the Local Legislatures, a doubt would rather seem to arise as regards the powers of a Local Legislature to deal with those corporations which may have their business extended throughout the Dominion. The powers given to the Local Legislature are for the incorporation of companies having simply and solely local objects. All others powers of incorporation, I take it, are within the purview of those powers which are given to the Parliament of Canada; and especially when you come to those which concern in any respect trade and commerce—for trade and commerce are particularly specified as among those objects which are exclusively within the power of the Dominion Parliament. I am aware that in the United States of America, where, I may say, their Constitution differs somewhat from ours in this respect, the question has arisen, but while the United States was formed by a Union of separate sovereign States, as they were considered to be, and all those powers not by them conceded to Congress, were necessarily, by the mere effect of the Constitution itself, reserved to those separate States; we combined, as we have been, under the authority of the Imperial Parliament, are brought into an even closer federal Union, and by the very terms of the Act itself those powers which are not conceded to the several Provinces are vested in the Dominion Parliament, and we have full and absolute right to deal with all subjects that are not specifically mentioned as belonging solely to the Local Legislatures. From this point of view it appears to me there can be no question whatever as to the right of Parliament to deal with the incorporation of companies which, in any way, relate to general trade. Now, is this company seeking to have its trade extended throughout the Dominion? By the very preamble of the Bill itself, we find that to be the case. It has already been incorporated, it is true, by an Act of the Local Legislature; but it is not to be precluded by that fact from coming here and seeking those powers with which this Parliament is competent to clothe it. The point has been already very well placed before the House in the remarks of my hon. friend who has just spoken, who has clearly demonstrated the power of this Parliament to deal with the question, and has clearly shown that with the terms that are employed in the first section of this Act, setting forth that it seeks not only power to sell, but power to manufacture, or the power to extend its business throughout the Dominion, it is brought within the purview of the Act. It is said that there are two ways in which the matter may be dealt with: either by extending the powers of the corporation, or by creating a new corporation. The Bill which is now before the House, is in effect creating a new corporation, which may carry on its business throughout the Dominion in the manufacture and sale of gunpowder and other explosive substances. It vests in the company that power which this Parliament alone is capable of conferring on it. Then, as to the capital. If we take upon ourselves to create a company which may extend its business throughout the whole Dominion, basing that upon the legislation of the Local Legislature, may we not increase the capital? If we are to extend the powers, must not we extend their means for pursuing those powers? I do not think it necessary to carry this argument further, having placed before the House, as simply as I could, those answers which suggested themselves to my mind in reply to the objections which have been stated.

Mr. McCARTHY. As this question has now come so prominently before the House, it is perhaps well that it should be considered, and perhaps determined in such a way as will settle the doubts which seem to exist in some minds as to our power to deal with Bills of this kind. For my part, I entertain not the slightest doubt that we can give increased powers to an incorporation, although it may owe its existence to one of the Provinces, just as we could give increased powers to an American company, or an English company. But I think it must rest there. I agree with my hon. friend who has moved the amendment to the amendment, that we ought not to go beyond that, because it is not necessary for us to do so, and it will only end in creating endless confusion. Now, by the second clause of this Bill we are asked to increase the capital stock of this company. The Local Legislature of the Province of Nova Scotia had power to incorporate this company with such capital as that Legislature thought fit; in the same way it has power to increase that capital from time to time upon such terms as the Legislature thinks proper. But it would be difficult to know how the matter should be dealt with if we were going to give them additional power, or were interfering with the organization of the company, which are matters wholly within the jurisdiction of that sovereignty which is creating that corporate right. I shall, therefore, have great pleasure in voting for the amendment to the amendment. I am glad the line has been drawn so clearly and distinctly, because we could not have voted for the original amendment.

Mr. WELDON. I might say, in addition to the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe, that the very difficulty might arise which he has suggested by the Act in amendment to the Act incorporating this company. That Act had power to increase their stock by a vote of the majority of the shareholders. That is given to them by the Act subsequently passed. By the Act as amended in the Private Bills Committee, we adopted the Rule laid down by the House with regard to the capital stock of companies. Now, here is the difficulty. On the one hand, by the Act of incorporation of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, they had power to increase their capital by a majority vote, while, under the Act as proposed to be amended in accordance with the principles of legislation laid down in this Bill, it would require a two-thirds vote. What law is to govern? It seems to me the argument of the hon. member for West Durham, and the hon. member for Simcoe, as to the powers of this Legislature to trench upon domestic institutions, is one which is legal and correct. It seems to me it is beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament to interfere with the internal arrangements which are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This matter has already been referred to in the Railway Committee, but we might also allude to it here. In the Railway Committee we laid down the principle that if the purpose be a Dominion purpose, and any individual can apply to Parliament, surely any local or foreign corporation may apply to Parliament for the purpose of getting powers which we are able to confer upon it. But when a local corporation, for instance, is incorporated by a Provincial Legislature it is the creature of that Legislature, and it is only created as a corporation under certain conditions and provisions; and if those conditions and provisions had not been inserted in the Provincial charter non constat, that the Provincial Legislature would have created the corporation and brought the entity into existence. And, therefore, a complication arises when the local corporation, having certain limited powers conferred it by a Provincial Legislature, seeks extended powers. While we can give extended powers we cannot alter the constitution of the corporation granted by a Provincial Legislature; nay, I go further and say, that if a corporation, chartered under certain conditions and provisions by a Provincial Legislature, comes to the Dominion Legislature and asks for increased powers, which the Provincial Legislature says are contrary to their policy, and would thwart their policy, under which, by which, and for which they created it a corporation originally, then I think it is quite within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature to destroy that corporation and to take steps to dissolve it. The company has committed a breach of the ground and of the principle under which it received its charter. Those powers having been granted, so long as the entity exists, they can be exercised by that entity; but any local corporation which comes here for extended powers runs the risk of being destroyed altogether. We will take any Provincial Act—we will not speak of this Act—say the Provincial Insurance Companies' Act. Suppose that company comes here seeking for enlarged powers. The Local Legislature may say: "It is contrary to our policy to have insurance companies taking risks in more than our own Province; we want to have Provincial insurance companies for Provincial purposes, under Provincial charters, so that we may be able to look after the administration of their funds, and we do not desire that they should invest money and take insurance risks all over the Dominion, or in foreign countries." The Provincial Legislature may say that, and if it does, and if we give the company additional powers contrary to the policy of the Local Legislature, that Legislature may say: "This is a breach of the primary condition under which the company's charter was granted, and as we brought the company into existence so we now repeal the Act." If this were done incorporation would cease to exist, and all the extended powers given by the Dominion Parliament would of course expire with the decease, and with the destruction of the Provincial corporation. So that I quite agree with hon. gentlemen opposite, in stating that the most convenient way to obviate the inconvenience already pointed out, is, that when a corporation wishes to extend its powers, obtained from the Provincial Legislature which originally created it, the company should come to this Parliament and obtain a new charter giving it a Dominion existence instead of a Provincial existence, which existence can be destroyed or hampered at any time by our dealing with the company contrary to the policy of the Provincial Legislature which created it.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Blake) agreed to; and the House again resolved itself into Committee.

Bill reported; Committee to sit again.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 58) to amend the several Acts incorporating the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Great Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 53) to declare the meaning and effect of certain provisions of the Act to incorporate the London and Ontario Investment Company, (limited).—(Mr. Hay.)

Bill (No. 23) to continue an Act to incorporate sundry persons by the name of the President, Directors and Company of the Farmers' Bank of Rustico.—(Mr. Davies.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Brant County Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Royal Canadian Passenger Steamship Company.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

LOYAL ORANGE ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH AMERICA.

The Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Loyal Orange Association of British America, being read.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I wish to ask the indulgence of the House while I make a few explanations as regards this Bill. This Bill was placed in my hands by a Committee. One of the members of the Committee wishes me to have this Bill stand for another week, while another member wishes me to go on with it. A week ago the hon. leader of the Government asked me to allow the Bill to stand. I have noticed, since I have been a member of the House, that on every occasion, no matter who leads the Government, when a Bill is under consideration, the member who has it in charge consults the wishes of the leader of the House with regard to it. A week ago to-day, if I do not mistake, when you called the Order, the hon. First Minister asked that the Order should stand, and he did so with my permission. In order that there may be no difficulty about this matter, I ask the House to grant me a little more indulgence, and that is, to allow the Order to keep its place on the paper for one week, and by that time the Committee which has been appointed by the worshipful Grand Lodge, will have come to a conclusion as to the course which is to be pursued in the matter. If they should decide that the Bill shall go on then no matter whom I hurt, or offend, or injure, in this matter, I am going on with the Bill, and I want them to understand that I will have no more of their badgering or troubling about this Bill. I am not a member of this House to be kicked about by any party, and I think I have been very badly treated all through; and if the House will have the kindness to extend this courtesy to me I will return them my sincerest thanks, as I now do for their allowing me to introduce the Bill in the first place. If I am to go on with the Bill no one will control me in this matter, and I hope I will have the privilege of having a vote which will enable the Bill to become law. If the House will not indulge me so far as to allow the Order to stand, I am ready now—I am always ready. Hon. members always understand my position. I ask that the Order may stand.

Mr. PICKARD. I would ask the hon. member for East Hastings if the Bill which he has had before the House for the past three or four weeks will be affected by the Bill which was introduced to-day by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). Will the Orange body come under that general Bill?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to inform him that I am not in negotiation with any party as regards the General Bill, and that I positively declare that, individually, I want no General Bill. I want an Act of incorporation for the Orange Society, and I am satisfied that nine-tenths of the society want the same thing. I have nothing to do, directly or indirectly, nor will I have anything to do directly or indirectly, with the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead, and if I thought that allowing this matter to stand to-day would jeopardise the Bill I would go on with it now. I believe that time will be allowed by this House to get the Bill through the Committee and sent to the Senate, so that it may become law.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that the time for reporting on Private Bills expires, I think, on the 18th, and the postponement for which he asks renders it impossible that the Bill can go through if it passes the second reading.

WORKS AT COFFIN'S BAY, N.S.

Mr. FORBES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the works at Coffin's Island, Queen's County, Nova Scotia, during the coming season; if so, will it be done by tender and contract, or by commission?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the vote of money placed in the Estimates for this work is granted by Parliament, the intention is to expend it in the same way as the last vote was expended, viz.: by day's work under a superintendent.

THE CARE OF IMMIGRANT CHILDREN.

Mr. RICHEY enquired, Whether, in prospect of the promotion by benevolent societies, or individuals, in England and elsewhere, of a large immigration to Canada of young persons from orphanages and other institutions, with a view to their being settled in various parts of the Dominion as apprentices or servants, is it proposed by the Government to organize any system of inspection by which the locality and treatment of children so brought into this country may from time to time be ascertained?

Mr. POPE. It is the intention of the Government to organize a system of inspection, the locality being given us by those who locate the children.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Is any, and if so, what length of the Canadian Pacific Railway is under construction north of Lake Superior and east of Current River? Has the route at this part been submitted for approval, and when? If not, under what circumstances is construction proceeding?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The paper I have already laid upon the Table will answer in detail all these questions, I think. 166 miles are under construction, of which 100 miles are from Callander to Sudbury Junction, and sixty-six miles from Red Rock to Current River. The route was submitted for approval from Callander to Sudbury Junction on the 30th March, 1882. The approval of the Government in Council was given to the line from Callander to Sudbury Junction on the 17th of April, 1882, and from Red Rock to Current River on the 29th of March, 1883. I may, perhaps, be permitted to say, in addition, that in that portion of the line from Red Rock to Current River, construction has been going on for some time, and that the work is going on upon a line located by the Government—in fact, it was the only line that could be obtained there.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. PLATT enquired, What particular point or points on the coast of Prince Edward County have been selected for life-saving stations, and what person or persons have been appointed as captains or keepers of such stations?

Mr. McLELAN. I have obtained all possible information as to what points should be selected, the bulk of which favors Wellington and Poplar Point. I have not selected either of these points yet, but will do so by the time navigation opens. There is a boat now ready to be placed at one or other of these points.

PICTON AND TRENTON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. PLATT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to provide for the carriage of mails between Picton and Trenton by railway instead of horse carriage? If so, when will the change take place?

Mr. CARLING. At present it is not the intention to make any such change.

THE REDEMPTION OF BILL STAMPS.

Mr. McMULLEN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask the House for a vote of a sum sufficient to enable them to redeem bill stamps not presented for redemption within the time limited by Statute?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not the intention of the Government to ask for any such vote.

CAPE GEORGE (N.S.) BREAKWATER.

Mr. McISAAC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision, this Session, to rebuild the breakwater at Cape George, N.S.?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to give a definite answer to-day, because the matter is now receiving my attention.

IMPORTATION OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to accede to the request of the United States National Distillers' Association to modify the existing Customs Laws and regulations so as to admit of the entry of spirituous liquors into Canada from foreign countries in packages of less quantity than the regulations now admit?

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the intention of the Government to make any change in the regulations affecting the importation of spirits into Canada.

Mr. BLAKE.

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM HALIFAX.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for despatches, Orders in Council and reports on the subject of the withdrawal of the troops from Halifax, said: A statement has been made in the papers with regard to a rumor as to there being some discussion and correspondence concerning the withdrawal of the troops from Halifax. I do not know the facts, but if there be any grounds for the statement it will be well to know them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There have been no despatches, Orders in Council, or reports concerning the withdrawal of the troops from Halifax; but there has been some correspondence—I forget whether it was confidential or not—as to the reduction of the forces.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, papers with reference to the reduction of the forces.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of the values of agricultural implements, &c., on which have been based the proposed new specific duties, with the data such values were fixed, said: I have found much difficulty to make correspond with the information I have received, the general statement of the hon. Minister of Finance as to the effect of some of the duties, specific and ad valorem, on some articles. We should have the material on which that statement is based, in order that we may apprehend what really is the character of the change.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Customs Department were directed to arrange the amounts, specific and ad valorem, so as to cover the 25 per cent. duty. The data, therefore, on which the result is based must be in the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. Unless they guessed it.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. CURRAN, in moving that a copy of the Hansard, containing the Debate on the introduction of the National Policy in 1879, would be of great advantage to the hon. members of this House, and that measures should be taken to provide them with such copies, said: I do not think it is necessary to make any observations on this motion. I understand that these copies can be procured easily, as there are a large number in print. It must be evident to all that a copy of this work would be exceedingly valuable, especially to the new members, as references are continually being made to the speeches during that Session, and it is necessary for them to have the book almost constantly on hand.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This would involve reprinting the volume.

Mr. BLAKE. This is not in order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman must strike out the last part, that measures be taken to procure copies, because it would involve an expenditure of money. There can be no objection to the statement that a copy of the Hansard would be of great advantage. I have no doubt it will be of great service to those hon. members who were not in Parliament in 1879. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he contemplates, in the motion, reprinting the Hansard, for it will cost some money.

Mr. CURRAN. As I stated a moment before, I am informed the copies are actually in print.

Mr. BLAKE. The object is, of course, to get some more Hansards that are in print. I am one of those unfortunate members who were not here in 1879, and I had to go to the library to get the Hansard of that year. But I have survived the loss, and I am not disposed to vote money to supply the hon. gentleman with a copy of that Hansard at the public expense. There have been other important debates upon the National Policy even since 1879, and many hon. members might desire to have those debates also. If all hon. members must know what has taken place in the Parliament of the country, during the periods when they were out of it, I think the proper way would be to pass an Act compelling those members who formerly represented the constituencies to give up their Hansards to the present members, so that, like the Order of the Bath, or the Order of St. Michael and St. George, the insignia may descend from generation to generation. I think we must give up the idea of supplying past Hansards to all new members who come into the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If we are to reprint the Tariff speeches of the Hansard, we ought to have the Tariff speeches of the hon. leader of the Government in North Middlesex. I am always greatly influenced by the hon. gentleman's speeches, and I would like to have them in the Hansard.

Mr. BOWELL. Including the speeches of the hon. gentleman in Dundee, Scotland.

Mr. CURRAN. I shall exempt the hon. member for West Durham from the statement that the great majority of the public, as well as the members of this House, know that the speeches that have been made on the National Policy, ever since 1879, contain nothing new—although I except the speech of the hon. gentleman—but were mere reiterations, in a new form, of the arguments used then; and I think, in common with a great many others, that if we could only digest that great debate, on which the giant intellects of the Dominion were engaged—many of whom, perhaps, unfortunately for the country, are no longer in a position to discuss that question in this House—we might greatly refresh and enlighten our minds, and store our intellects with the great efforts that were then made. We, new members of this House, cannot be so well aware of the course of the debate at that time as those hon. gentlemen who were then members of this House.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I have no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman would find a great deal of interesting, though perhaps heavy, reading in the Hansard of 1879; but I am surprised he does not go a little further back, and ask for the Hansard of 1877 and 1878, so that he might read the very interesting speeches of the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk, and the hon. gentleman for South Brant—speeches so necessary to a knowledge of the history of the National Policy; but I think it is going a little too far to ask this House to provide the hon. gentleman with the speeches of a bygone Parliament. I think hon. gentlemen ought to equip themselves with that literature before they enter Parliament. It is an easy matter for my hon. friend, if he wishes to get possession of the Hansard of 1879, to put his hand in his pocket and pay for it, as I have done, and as other hon. gentlemen have done.

Mr. SPEAKER. The last part of this resolution seems to involve a charge, and is not in order.

WATER LOTS IN THE HARBORS OF LAKE HURON AND SUPERIOR.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, in reference to the disposal by the latter of lots covered by water, in the Harbors of Lakes Huron and Superior, to private individuals, said: In making this motion, I may say it is very much to be desired that the Dominion Government, and the Ontario Government, should come to some understanding about water lots on Lakes Huron and Superior. The Government of Ontario claims and exercises the right of selling land under the water. Now, the sale of land pre-supposes the right of the individual to utilize it, and if the Ontario Government sells the land under water in a harbor, it might lead to very serious complications in the use of that harbor for public purposes afterwards. I know that this has been done on Lake Superior. In one place four thousand acres of land under water has been sold in one block at Thunder Cape Harbor near Silver Island. I believe the intention of the Government of Ontario in doing that, in the first instance, was to protect the rights of miners. I think the object was a good one at first, but now people who have bought those lands under water claim the right to utilize them. At Prince Arthur's Landing, also, lots have been sold under water. I may say that quite recently a lot was sold under water in the harbor which was actually in use, and necessary to the ground covered by a wharf built by the Dominion Government. I imagined it was by mistake, but still that mistake has not been remedied. I do not think that the Government of Ontario would have made that sale otherwise than through mistake, or seek to embarrass a great public undertaking such as making a harbor; but the fact, nevertheless, remains, that lands under water have been sold at Prince Arthur's Landing at Thunder Cape, and other places. The object of the sales at first, was to protect the rights of miners, and very properly so in several cases. I observe, by reference to a return brought down, that correspondence took place some years ago between the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government about a reserve at Thunder Bay. The Dominion Government has been for fifteen years in possession of that reserve. They cleared it down to the water's edge, put up expensive buildings on it, and ran a wharf out. I see by these returns that, in 1870, the Dominion Government applied for a patent for that land, but the patent appears not to have been granted through some mistake—I do not know how it could have arisen—and last fall the Government of Ontario sold a portion of that reserve with a Dominion building upon it. I believe it was done by mistake, but whether it was by mistake or otherwise, there remains the fact: that a patent has been issued to other parties for ground which the Dominion Government had been in possession of for fifteen years, and which it had cleared up, and on which it had erected expensive buildings. In view of this state of things, it is very desirable that some understanding should be arrived at between the Dominion and Ontario Governments in regard to cases of this kind, because there is no saying where it might end. The Dominion Government might select a harbor, and speculators might go there and say: "Here is an excellent chance for speculation." They would buy land under the water in the harbor, and claim the right to put up wharves. I call attention to this subject in order that something may be done in regard to it, and some understanding between the two Governments arrived at so as to prevent embarrassment in the future.

Mr. BLAKE. With respect to the first transaction to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, it will be found, I think, speaking from recollection of events ten or twelve years ago, that the grant was a proper one, and that it was not proposed by the Government to give the grantees any right to interfere in any way with navigation. That is my recollection of this particular grant, with which I had something to do.

Mr. DAWSON. That is the grant at Silver Islet, and it was given with a very proper object at that time. I feel quite confident it was intended not to interfere with navigation.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the grant was made on that ground.

Mr. DAWSON. That is no doubt perfectly correct; but the grants to which I more particularly referred were at Prince Arthur's Landing, and are lands taken up by speculators for the purpose of getting some claim which might be valuable to them in the future.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a very important matter, and the whole subject came up some time ago before the Supreme Court here in a case from Prince Edward Island. The court in effect decided that all grants by Provincial Governments of lands covered with water, in any part of the Dominion, were illegal and invalid. The decision goes considerably further than I thought it would go. While it was quite clear to myself that, of course, navigable waters came within the control of the Dominion Parliament, I always thought the land covered by the water, subject to the right of navigation, belonged to the different Provinces; but this decision seems to controvert that, and it is strong and specific in its terms, and the Government of Prince Edward Island have applied to the Dominion Government for payment for all harbor improvements, on the ground that they all belong to the Dominion, and not to the Province.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman understand that the decision applies to inland waters?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it will apply to inland waters if it applies to harbors, as the principle is the same; however, I am not quite sure that it is so. The decision is not that below low water mark the land belongs to the Dominion, but that the portion of land covered by water in every harbor belongs to the Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE. It does not deal with fore shores generally?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Motion agreed to.

STEAM SERVICE BETWEEN CAMPBELLTON, GASPÉ AND INTERMEDIATE PORTS.

Mr. FORTIN, in moving for correspondence relating to the steamer running in connection with the Intercolonial Railway between Campbellton, Gaspé and intermediate ports, said: In moving this resolution, I desire to offer a few remarks to the House. Before the Intercolonial Railway went into operation, we had, on the coast of Gaspé, for ten or fifteen years, a service of steamboats which ran from Quebec to Pictou, calling at several places in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure and ports in New Brunswick. This service was performed by two very good steamers, the Secret and Miramichi, with efficient captains and crews. The people were satisfied with that service. When the Intercolonial Railway went into operation, the Government thought proper to discontinue the subsidy to the Gulf Ports Steamship Company, and consequently they ceased to run one of their steamers, and the remaining vessel does not run in Baie des Chaleurs. The Government, in order to obtain the traffic of the coast of Gaspé and the coast of Bonaventure, engaged a steamer to run in connection with the Intercolonial, from Campbellton as far as Gaspé, stopping at eight or ten places coming and going. The people did not find fault with that arrangement. The first vessel engaged for that service was called the St. John; she was properly a steamboat, and consequently not built for the service. Before I proceed further, allow me to describe the route. The route may be divided into two sections: one of inland navigation from Campbellton to Paspébiac, on Bay Chaleur, sixty miles distant; consequently any vessel may navigate there because in case of a north-east wind blowing she can find shelter at several places. The other section extends from Paspébiac to Gaspé, on the Gulf of St. Lawrence, distance 80 miles—that is sea navigation, and consequently requires a sea-going vessel, and when the wind blows from the offing, unless it is a first-class vessel, she is not able to perform this service. Well, the St. John performed the service tolerably, but not in a proper manner. After running for three years, the Government made another arrangement, and we then obtained another steamer, the St. Lawrence, which, in the opinion of a great many people, was a better, and larger, and speedier vessel. For the St. John a subsidy of $10,000 a year had been given; and for this new steamer $12,400 a year. The St. Lawrence ran three or four—and perhaps more—trips, and the people seemed pleased with her; but all at once she was taken from the route, and a smaller, and in every respect very inferior, vessel was put on, and kept on the route all summer, greatly to the disappointment of the people of Gaspé. Instead of being, as we all expected, that after a few trips she would be removed from the route, she continued her trips until the rough weather came, and was then placed in winter quarters in one of the ports of New Brunswick, and apparently the owners wished to run her again this coming season. Under these circumstances, I, as the representative of the county of Gaspé, and having seen the vessel myself, knowing that she was not in proper condition, and was always, when the water was a little rough, behind time, and that she missed several trips from Paspébiac to Gaspé, thought it my duty to make proper representations on the subject to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, who has control of the Intercolonial Railway, in connection with which this vessel runs, on what is called a side line. I wrote a letter to the hon. gentleman setting forth these grievances, and received in reply a very kind and very frank letter, in which the hon. Minister of Railways informed me that it was the fact this steamer was not a proper vessel, but that a good and proper vessel would be placed this year on the route. It should be remembered that the people of the coast of Gaspé and Baie des Chaleurs are shut out from communication with the outside world during the winter, and in the spring they have to procure their outfits for the fisheries, which must come from elsewhere. It is from Quebec, Montreal or Toronto that the provisions are obtained, and it is consequently necessary that the steamer should begin her trips as early as possible in the spring. If a good vessel were on the route these people would obtain their provisions at the proper time; and again in the fall, when the results of the fall fishing are prepared to be sold and sent into the interior of Canada—to Quebec, Montreal and Toronto—the vessel, not being adapted for rough seas, ceases her trips just about the beginning of November, at the very time when thousands of quintals and barrels of fish are ready to be shipped to the places which I have mentioned. Under these circumstances, I was greatly pleased to receive a letter from the hon. Minister of Railways, telling me that an efficient vessel would be placed on this route; and since its receipt, I had the pleasure of an interview with the hon. gentleman, when he informed me that such a vessel had been bought in the States, which gave me great satisfaction. I make this motion, in order to give to the hon. gentleman an opportunity for stating to the House what he has done, and what he intends to do in this relation, so the people of Gaspé, who during the past five or six years have suffered so many inconveniences from the causes which I have detailed, may definitely learn that this service is to be improved and rendered efficient. I consequently move, for an Order of the House for correspondence relating to the steamer running in connection with the Intercolonial Railway between Campbellton, Gaspé and intermediate ports.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection at all to the correspondence upon this subject being brought down. What the hon. member has said is quite true. This is a very important route, and its business has very largely increased since the steamer was placed on it; and I have no doubt, that, if the service is properly performed, not only will very great facilities be given, but a very large and
