CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1929-1930

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1930, was presented by Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Dunning, seconded by Mr. Crerar, moves that said estimates be referred to the committee of supply.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I wanted to make an explanation with respect to that. The special committee on Canadian National Railway affairs has not yet been set up. It is desirable, I believe, that estimates of that character should be referred to that committee, and an effort is now being made to set it up, but this being a supplementary for 1929-30 should really be passed through both houses and assented to before the end of the fiscal year. I think it would be better if for the present the motion to refer could be deferred pending the setting up of the special committee. I presume we cannot refer a matter to a committee which is not yet in existence. Later on in the day the whips may be able to arrange the personnel of the committee and we may then refer the estimates to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I remember last year the motion to refer the estimates anticipated the appointment of the special committee on Canadian National Railway affairs.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think a motion to refer the matter to a committee, without naming the committee, would be in order. There are in the supplementary estimates two or three matters that require very careful consideration by the house. One involves the expenditure of over $4,000,000, if my memory serves me aright, in acquiring railway lines in the United States and that is a question of policy that we must very carefully consider. We probably could discuss it on a motion to refer, but these estimates should certainly come before the committee of supply.

Mr. DUNNING: They will come back to the committee of supply.

Mr. BENNETT: What I had in mind was whether or not it would be feasible to give them the attention their importance demands, having regard to the one item I have mentioned—and there are other items of almost equal importance—between now and the end of the month. That is the real difficulty. To-day is the 27th. There are only four days between now and the end of March. Our fiscal year then ends, but the railway fiscal year does not end until the 31st day of December, 1930, so I suppose there is no difficulty if the matter is not considered between now and the end of March.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to look into that phase of the question, but there is no desire on the part of myself or the Minister of Railways to rush these estimates through.

Mr. BENNETT: When may we expect the report of the Canadian National Railways? I see the Minister of Railways is now in his place.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Railways): I think it will be ready in a short time. It is being held up pending the report of the auditors.

Mr. SPEAKER: Moved by Mr. Dunning, seconded by Mr. Crerar, that said estimates be referred to a committee for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT ACT AMENDMENT

OMISSION FROM RECORD OF DECLARATION OF PAIR

On the orders of the day.

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): I wish to call attention to an omission made in Hansard in the vote of March 25 on the Export bill. I rose in my place and announced that I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Foster) and that had I voted, I would have voted for the motion. This is omitted to be noted although all the others who announced their pairs were noted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I say to the house that according to May, twelfth edition, page 336, pairs are not officially recognized by the Chair, and it is not necessary after a division has taken place, to rise and state that so-and-so is paired with so-and-so. The custom is for the whips to leave with the Clerk of the House a list of pairs, and it is inserted in next day's Hansard.

Mr. SHORT: In this case about a dozen are announced as being paired, and my name is omitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The trouble is there are too many rising together. The correction will be made.

SUPPLY—AUSTRALIAN TREATY

AMENDMENTS TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, the amendment thereto of Mr. Gardiner, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I think I might summarize the few remarks that I propose to make at this time in one brief sentence, and that is, "Hands off the Australian treaty," at the present time at least. That is a slogan or watchword that I believe would be acceptable in the office of every big industry in British Columbia, and in Vancouver and Victoria especially. It will find an echo in the shack of the fisherman, in the bunkhouse of the lumberman, in the home of the workers in our sawmills and pulp and paper plants, and even in the homes of our coal miners and of those who work on the farm, because all alike are vitally interested in the preservation of the Australian treaty. I include both capital, the management or operators, and those who work in these industries as employees, because they have a common interest. Employers and employees may have differences of opinion in regard to the wages paid or as to their other relations, but the ordinary manual workers are coming to realize more and more that they have at least this common interest with their employers, that if they cannot find a market for their products, if they cannot sell what they produce, it means the slowing down of the wheels of industry, with consequent unemployment and lower wages. Therefore, I say that both employers and employees are a unit in a matter of this kind.

I added to the slogan the words, especially at the present time; I shall explain that a little later.

I propose, as I said last night, to consider the question before us without any regard to the bickerings of party politics or the constant jangle as regards high or low tariff. I think we have heard enough of that. I propose therefore to deal with this question on its merits, to consider how it will affect Canada, how it will affect the province from which I come, and more particularly, how it will affect the interests of my constituents whom I represent here in this house. We are considering to-day a motion of want of confidence in the government moved by the Progressive element in this house, coupled with a demand for the abrogation, which means the abandonment, of the Australian treaty. We have also before us a subamendment moved by a member representing the Conservative element in this house. That also is a motion of want of confidence, coupled with a demand that the Australian treaty be revised.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Would it be a vote of want of confidence if it carried, considering the ruling of Mr. Speaker the other evening?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, both of them would. While the Conservative amendment asks only for the revision of the treaty, not its abrogation, I propose to submit that conditions are such that if their motion carried, it would result in the abrogation or abandonment of the treaty. We are not dealing at all with the New Zealand aspect of the case nor with the importation of New Zealand butter. The house settled that matter a few days ago, and the government has decided to negotiate a separate treaty with New Zealand. So New Zealand is entirely out of the picture. We are dealing to-day with the Australian treaty and the Australian treaty alone.

I am completely against both the amendment and the subamendment, and if the suggestion that I have heard is true—I trust that it is not—that the government, working along the lines of least resistance or for the sake of political peace, might accept the subamendment, then I am against the government as well, and my position would indeed then be one of loneliness.

I am in favour of the Australian treaty and always have been, although I am not in favour of its extension to New Zealand. I should like to quote, if I may, three sentences from some remarks I made in the house on March 5, 1928. I said:

> The National Dairy Association has presented three resolutions to the government. The first one asks that the Australian treaty as applied to New Zealand be cancelled. I am heartily in agreement with that.

I would pause there for a moment to point out that my attitude then was the same as my attitude a few weeks ago when I put a resolution on the order paper dealing with New Zealand butter. This gives contradiction to the statement made that my convictions in this matter were of new found origin of a few weeks ago. Quoting again from my remarks:

> The second resolution asks that the dumping clause be applied on all butter sent from Australia to Canada either on direct sale or consignment as long as the Paterson scheme of bonusing exists. I agree with that suggestion and I will go further. I suggest that the dumping clause should be strengthened.
> The third resolution asked that the Australian treaty be done away with altogether. I am flatly and entirely opposed to that.

Those were my sentiments in 1928, and they are my sentiments to-day—curiously enough.

A number of the British Columbia members who have spoken in this debate have asked for a revision of the treaty, and they have given as their reason, and quite properly so, their desire that Canada should get something better out of the treaty, should be able to sell more produce to Australia under it. It seems a somewhat roundabout way of trying to accomplish that object to move a motion of want of confidence in the government. We may presume that they are sincere in moving want of confidence, and if so, they must hope that it will carry. That is quite all right from their point of view. I myself have sometimes wished to see the government defeated. We will suppose that their object is achieved, that the government is defeated on the motion of want of confidence. It does not make a great deal of difference whether it is on the amendment moved by the Progressive group, who want to see the treaty abrogated, or whether it is on the motion of the official opposition, who want the treaty revised along certain lines. I ask you, sir, what would be the effect on the minds of the Australians if it were wired to them to-night or to-morrow morning that the government of Canada, and incidentally the government that passed the treaty, had been defeated on the Australian treaty. By the time the news got jumbled up on the wires it would not be clear, nor would it be of very great importance, to the people of Australia whether the government had been defeated on the amendment or on the subamendment, but the impression on their minds would undoubtedly be that Canada did not want the treaty, that Canada had asked for its abrogation or its revision, and that the government of the day had been defeated over that question.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not think it will involve the defeat of the government.

Mr. NEILL: They hope so. They say it is going to carry. What are they voting for if they do not expect that? I ask you, sir, and the house, looking at the question from a sober point of view, so to speak, if Australia in that event would be likely to agree to a treaty that would be more favourable to Canada than the present one. If it is not going to be more favourable, why ask for a new treaty? The effect upon Australia would be especially bad when they found that the two parties in this house, who support these two amendments and particularly the members who introduced the two motions of want of confidence, both voted against the original treaty and that both have been fairly active in their condemnation of it ever since.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask a question? When the Liberal whip proposed a subamendment the other evening and it was carried, the government was not defeated. Why should it be defeated now if the subamendment carries?

Mr. NEILL: Because the subamendment moved the other evening was of such a character that the government could accept it, and I have not forgotten how hon. gentlemen opposite tried to raise a great constitutional crisis because the government, they claimed, had defeated themselves, by accepting that subamendment.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has suggested that we might, so to speak, placate or please the Australians by increasing the duties on the articles that we buy from them, and then give them a greater preference to help them out. I wonder what kind of a repercussion that meets with from my Progressive friends. It is not in line with the policies which they had adopted up to now. At all events, I suggest that the preferences granted to Australia now are already substantial enough, and if Australia is not benefiting by them, it is not the fault of the preferences. Here are some of the preferences that Australia receives:

	Preference to Australia per lb.
Honey	3c. to 1c.
Raisins	3c. to 0c.
Lard	2c. to 0c.
Tallow	20% to 10%
Cheese	3c. to 0c.
Butter	4c. to 1c.
Canned vegetables	1¼c. to 0c.
Dried apples	25% to 10%
Fruits, pears, etc	50c. to 25c. per 100 lbs.

On sugar the rate varies according to the analysis, but Australia has a preference of something like 50 to 66 per cent.

It is true that Australia is not selling us these products in the volume they expected, but I submit that that is solely the fault of Australia. You can drive a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. We have done our part, and it is now up to Australia to make the horse drink. Australia made the great mistake of thinking that the mere introduction of a favourable tariff was all sufficient to develop trade. It is not so, and never will be so. Their products are not put up in the style and package with which we are familiar, nor are their goods pushed by energetic salesmen, as is the case with the products of other countries. Australia will never penetrate our market until she realizes the need of competent salesmen, and the necessity of putting up her goods in the style to which our market is used. It is all right for Canada to help Australia by extending the services of our trade agents and trade commissioners to her, but it is not our business to give Australia greater and greater preferences in order to try and force a market in this country for Australian goods, putting the consumers of Canada to very greatly increased expenditure in the purchase of these products. There is no need of that. They would want a still higher preference. The real solution is for Australia to take advantage of the very considerable and sufficient preference which she has got and develop the market in the way that any other alert nation would do.

Now, sir, I want to picture to the house, if I can, the conditions existing in Australia at the present time, and under which the hon. members who have introduced these amendments want us to abrogate the treaty or very seriously revise it. Australia, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said, is in some respects dissatisfied with the result of the treaty. It has not worked out as she anticipated, she has not sold us the amount of produce she expected to do—particularly in the matter of raisins, which is a very urgent question in that country—largely, as I have suggested, through lack of business initiative. You have got a dissatisfied country to deal with. Then let us consider the financial conditions in that country to-day. Australia is in a very bad economic condition, she has strikes and labour troubles of various kinds. Here is what the Trade and Commerce Journal for March 22, 1930, says:

All the banks—

"All," Mr. Speaker.

—are imposing a more stringent check upon the volume of imports to conserve their balances in London.

How are they imposing that more stringent check? As hon. members know, we are paid by the Australian importer, not in cash, but by a draft on London, and the banks in their efforts to stop our selling goods to Australia have raised the exchange prices so high that in some cases this paper states they are up to six per cent. Again I read:

Possibly,—

Note that, Mr. Speaker.

Possibly, when drafts are paid, the collecting banks may remit a portion of the total.

They may. Say a man in Australia owes me $5,000, but I may get only a portion of that debt because the banks there in order to conserve their balances in London are restricting importations. In other words they are doling out the available money. Such a condition has not been paralleled for many years. I recall a somewhat similar condition in the United States, I think in 1907, when money was so scarce there during a financial panic that if you took a cheque to your bank for payment out of your own funds they would ask "What are you going to do with the money?" And if you could not give them a wholly satisfactory reason, such as that you were paying wages, you would not be able to draw out your own money. There is a condition almost parallel with that now existing in Australia. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre admits that we are suffering no great injury from the operation of the Australian treaty, that is, in any particular class of trade; eggs are not coming in at all; butter is coming in, but to such a small extent from Australia that there is no complaint. In fact no harm is being done to us, instead we are getting great advantage from the treaty. But Australia is dissatisfied with the bargain they entered into, as we are selling them about six times as much as we are buying from them. Consequently they are unwilling to buy more from us, and their banks are doling out money in an effort to restrict their importations. Under those conditions we are going to that country with a demand—it is not a request—to abrogate the treaty or to get more favourable conditions for Canada. Under those circumstances what on earth can we expect the answer will be? They will tear the treaty up and throw it in our face. They will say: "We have been waiting for this opportunity, and now it has come." We cannot put forward the Oliver Twist proposition in a case like this. I do not think the opposition parties could have selected a worse moment to suggest a revision of the treaty. It is a short-sighted policy. If a man is working for a big company, and times are very bad, so bad that he is only working part time, he does not select that moment to kick about getting an increase of wages. We do not find fault with the culture of the fire brigade when our house is burning; we are only too willing to get the services at the moment.

I am asked, why should it be such a critical time for British Columbia? I will explain the position. There are several reasons and one of the most urgent at the moment is the condition of the lumber industry. It is on record to-day that the United States senate has voted to impose a duty of a dollar and a half a thousand on our lumber going into the States. That means a most terrible blow to our lumber interests in British Columbia.

More than that, I see to-day in the paper that I have just received from home that the marine freight rates from British Columbia have gone up substantially. So there is another disadvantage to the lumber industry. The suggestion is made that there is a vague chance that the dollar and a half increase voted by the senate of the United States may be eliminated, but it is highly unlikely that it will not be imposed. I should like to quote some wires I have received showing the way in which the lumber interests of British Columbia look at this matter. Here is one:

British Columbia lumber manufacturers view with alarm possibility of losing Australian market and sincerely hope you will do everything to support their movement to widen markets and create steady employment in the lumber industry.

That is signed by the secretary of the British Columbia Lumber Manufacturing Association, a very big body. Here is another one, in part:

This is very serious matter to British Columbia lumbermen who are finding great difficulty in marketing their product in world markets. Increased lumber trade with antipodes will enable mills to operate steadily and provide employment thousands of workmen in your district. Seriously appealing to you to assist lumbermen at this time.

I have other wires but I need not read them. Here are some newspaper cuttings, most of them from the Daily Province, a Conservative journal and a very ably conducted one. This paper said not long ago that the Australian treaty was pumping lifeblood into British Columbia. This is from a recent editorial:

The Senate of the United States has voted a duty of $1.50 per board thousand upon softwood lumber imported into that country, and, if the tariff becomes law, Canada will be badly hit by it. . . . .

Canada sent $36,000,000 worth of lumber to the United States in 1928. . . . . From the port of Vancouver alone, in that year, we exported to the United States 95,000,000 feet board measure of our fir, cedar and hemlock lumber.

Here is a notice that the shingle mills are closing down to about 25 per cent of their capacity. Here is another statement:

United States tariff will wipe out lumber exports from Royal city.

That is the city of New Westminster.

It will seriously affect the operators of mills in this city and will wipe out 80 to 95 per cent of their exports to the United States.

Here is another one:

Means heavy loss. Canada will lose approximately $2,000,000 per year, according to Vancouver lumber interests. It is stated that such a tariff would prove a severe blow to the lumber industry in British Columbia and is certain to have an effect on the extent of operations in this province.

These are unbiased opinions from the press of the day. I submit, sir, that in this perilous condition of affairs it is no time for a change; as the saying is, it is no time to swap horses. To make a change now would be disastrous to all British Columbia, and more particularly, of course, to its coast industries. In my district it would affect our lumber industry, our sawmills, our paper industry, our pulp mills—because despite what my hon. friend from North Vancouver said, we have pulp mills, we have one or two so situated that they cannot economically make paper. By a continuance of this treaty our farmers will benefit, because they know what a splendid home market a logging camp makes; it will benefit our fishermen, who when they take the fish out of the water know it is going to Australia by reason of the tariff preference it enjoys under this treaty; it will benefit the coal miners, because steamers will bunker at the coal mines in our district if they have goods to take to Australia. So our workers are as much interested as the operators and the head men in the various industries. Almost any revision of the Australian treaty that might be granted by Australia would hurt Canada in some degree. I fully realize, and I want to emphasize this, that the lumber interests of British Columbia are very anxious to get preferential treatment under the tariff, but I am afraid, that if they throw the treaty into the melting pot now what they will get out of it will be this, not only will there be no preference for lumber, but we will lose some of the important advantages that we now posesss. Certainly this is not the time to ask Australia for better tariff conditions. Perhaps if economic conditions in Australia improve, and they become more ready to receive imports than they are to-day, they might then be approached to put our lumber on a preferential basis, but now is certainly not the time to go and ask for greater privileges.

Not only that, but there is the uncertainty that might result if the treaty were abrogated and negotiations set on foot for another treaty. The government might be defeated, and with the present treaty abrogated we would be up in the air while the new treaty was being negotiated. That could not be done in six months. It took fifteen years to negotiate the present treaty. Added to the uncertainty, there is the danger that Australia may take umbrage and say: "We will eliminate the treaty altogether." Then it would take us a long time to get back even to the stage where we are at now.

I should like to quote again from my speech which I quoted earlier in my remarks. I said:

It may be said, and I have been accused of it before, that I have been making a protectionist speech. I care not what epithet is applied, I am only applying the principle of common sense to conditions as they happen to exist. I believe that like the Sabbath, the tariff was made for man and not man for the tariff. So much as regards the Australian treaty. My suggestions in that regard are: that we should keep the treaty for the benefit of the big industries of British Columbia and the workers thereof; that we should keep the dumping clause and strengthen it if necessary; that we should cancel the treaty as regards New Zealand. These are my own views, I think they are the views of my constituents, and I challenge any member from British Columbia to say that the carrying out of such a policy would not inure to the general benefit of the province of British Columbia.

I take the same view to-day, sir; I invite every British Columbia member to forget party politics for the time being and unite against these two amendments, the first of which proposes to do away with the treaty altogether and the other proposing to revise it under conditions which will bring about practically the same result. I think we should take this action in the interests of the industries themselves, and of the workers in these industries. I think I am able to say that I express the feelings of the various industries in the district which I represent, the feelings of the workers, of the management and of those who provide the capital when I say we do not want to do anything which will jeopardize the Australian treaty at the present time.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I should like to ask one question. The hon. gentleman stated there was a discount of six per cent with regard to Australia. Is not that in our favour and against Australia, rather than against us and in favour of Australia? That means that it costs the Australians £106 to buy £100 of British sterling.

Mr. NEILL: I am not a financial expert, but I understand that the man buying the draft has to pay the exchange, and it seems to me that if he had to pay the 6 per cent it would increase the cost to him without making any difference to us.

Mr. LADNER: I should like to ask the hon. member one question before he sits down. What harm does he see in approaching Australia with the view of getting Australia to take more lumber from British Columbia, especially in view of the fact that recently a commission from the province visited Australia? Why does he object to an effort being made to improve that phase of the treaty?

Mr. NEILL: I take it that my hon. friend's inquiry is as to why I object to negotiating a treaty now?

Mr. LADNER: I should like to know why you object to a revision of the treaty with regard to lumber and other commodities?

Mr. NEILL: Because I suggest that present conditions are such that Australia is just itching to throw the treaty at us, and will make no revision for our benefit. If any revision is to be made it will have to be in favour of Australia. Conditions are so entirely unripe for us to ask for an increase to our own advantage; they are sore; they do not want imports; they are trying to stop them, and this is not the time for us to say, "We want more favours." The time for that is when conditions have become stabilized, when their goods are sold here and economic conditions are improved. If we do it now I fear the result will be the total elimination of the treaty for months and perhaps years.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), asking for the abrogation of the Australian treaty. Personally I have no objection to the making of any treaty having for its purpose the lowering of tariffs for the development of trade so long as such treaty is made on fair and equitable terms.

With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I should like to say that while I might be in sympathy with the principle involved, that of negotiating a new treaty with our sister dominion on fair and equitable terms, under the circumstances I have no option but to vote against it just as on similar occasions we have been obliged to vote against similar amendments, because if we voted for the subamendment we would be precluded from voting for our own amendment, which I think is of primary importance at the present time. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Acadia were adopted it would not prevent this government from doing what is suggested in the subamendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the Australian treaty was not negotiated on fair and equitable terms; agriculture was singled out and discriminated against in order to benefit industry generally. I presume in making any treaty it is necessary to adopt a give and take attitude, but in this case agriculture was asked to give all and take nothing. As a class the farmers are not antagonistic to industry, but we do believe that industry should be able to stand on its own feet. Personally I believe that Canada must be developed in no lopsided fashion, but that our basic industry of agriculture and the other great industries should be developed uniformly in the progress of the country. If, in order to develop industry generally, it must be allowed to ride on the backs of the farmers of this country, who are already bearing an overload, then I am absolutely opposed to any such practice.

In this treaty there is not one single thing which benefits the farmer; he gets no advantages in Australia or New Zealand, but is subjected to keen competition with the products of these countries in his own markets. We find that in order to negotiate this treaty the tariff on farm products was reduced; the tariff on fresh meats was reduced from 3 cents per pound to one-half cent; on eggs from 2 cents a dozen to free; on butter from 4 cents per pound to one cent; on honey from 3 cents to free; on tomatoes and vegetables from one and a half cents to free, and changes were made with regard to other commodities as well.

Some hon. members in this house representing agriculture have taken the stand that protection does not benefit the farmer. I am free to admit that under the general principle of protection the farmer does not gain the benefit which is afforded industry generally, but on those commodities in which the farmer is not on an export basis I am of the opinion that he does get a benefit. Evidently Australia had the same opinion; she accepted our manufactured products provided she could get her agricultural products into Canada, and therefore she must have thought it would be an advantage to her farmers.

I find that not only are the dairy farmers complaining; I have received letters from the Southern Alberta Sheep Breeders' Association and from the Western Live Stock Growers' Association, which I will not take time to read because I presume other hon. members have received copies also. However, they go on to point out the increasing importations not only of dairy products but also of mutton and beef into this country from Australia and New Zealand. We find that the United States tariff is being raised to such an extent as practically to close those markets not only to Canada but to the world at large, which means that we will be shut out of the markets in the United States which we have enjoyed in the past, and from the increased importations into Canada from New Zealand and Australia in the last year it would seem that these two countries have been preparing for this condition and have been trying to develop a market in Canada. Therefore, now that the United States tariff has been increased, we may expect further increases in the products imported into Canada from Australia and New Zealand.

It is true that wheat has been the chief product of western Canada, but I think every hon. member realizes that the future for wheat growing is none too promising. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) pointed out yesterday in his very able speech, during the last five years the wheat acreage of the four great wheat producing countries has increased by 20,000,000 acres, and in addition we find that the European countries, because of their economic conditions and in order to avoid sending money out of their countries, which they cannot afford to do, are making every effort to stimulate production within their own boundaries. I should like to give the tariffs imposed by these countries against the importation of wheat. As we know, the United States tariff is 42 cents per bushel; in France it is 53 cents; in Germany 61⅔ cents, and in Italy 73 cents. In addition we find that French millers are compelled to use 97 per cent of domestic wheat in making flour, and in Germany the millers are compelled to use 50 per cent of their own wheat. Further than that, these countries give a bonus on the export of wheat, so under these circumstances what are the future prospects of Canadian wheat being able to find a ready market in these countries?

In these circumstances the natural tendency is to turn more and more to mixed farming. Only a few days ago we were given to understand that the Department of Agriculture had called a conference of farmers from various parts of Canada to discuss a production campaign. I believe the opinion of the farmers to be that while they are ready to do everything to increase production, they are becoming discouraged. They cannot help thinking, "What is the use of producing unless we are sure that we are going to get at least the cost of production out of it," and when they find their own markets left open to the dumping of the same commodities from all parts of the world, it is hard to get them to undertake a larger production campaign at the present time. They feel they should at least have some preference in their own markets.

A great deal has been said about the imports of butter, and a few minutes ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) stated that those imports were insignificant. The viewpoint taken in regard to this tariff question seems to depend largely on whose ox is being gored. In 1925 the imports of butter amounted to 198,341 pounds, while, as a result of this Australian treaty, they had increased in 1929 to 35,928,249 pounds.

Mr. NEILL: I was speaking definitely about Australia; the hon. member is adding the imports from New Zealand. He might as well include Belgium or any other country.

Mr. LUCAS: When we ask for the abrogation of the Australian treaty we include the abrogation of the New Zealand treaty which was brought into effect by order in council.

Mr. NEILL: That is a separate matter.

Mr. LUCAS: It is well understood that when Canada negotiated a treaty with Australia each country extended to the other certain advantages in respect to lowered tariff. New Zealand asked that the same advantages should be extended to her, and by order in council 1757 the Australian treaty was made applicable to New Zealand.

Mr. NEILL: The doing away with the Australian treaty will not cancel Canada's obligation to New Zealand; that is a separate agreement.

Mr. LUCAS: The agreement states that subject to the provisions of the customs tariff of 1907, the governor in council may by order in council extend the advantages to the goods, produce and manufacture of any British country. If there were no treaty with Australia there would be no basis for an agreement with New Zealand.

In 1925 the importations of meat and meat products amounted to $4,264,076, but by 1929 that figure had increased to $5,904,979. Those are the figures for the imports from all countries, but it will be found that the imports from Australia and New Zealand have been increasing very rapidly for the last few years. On top of all this, the farmer has been compelled to pay more for his raisins, so is it any wonder that he is complaining? He is faced with competition in his own market and forced to pay higher prices for those commodities which he has to buy.

As I said before, this tariff question seems to be a matter of whose ox is being gored. I could not agree with the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) when he stated a short time ago that labour was in a different position from that of the cow. The attitude of the Labour members in this house has been to protect labour through keeping out of the country the large influx of labour which desires to come here. I do not blame them for taking that attitude, but is there any difference in protecting the farmers? The farmer's reward is the price he obtains for his products, and I think the farmer is asking only for that protection asked for by the Labour party.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Labour which is imported into Canada becomes part of the citizenship and national life of the country; cows do not.

Mr. LUCAS: I am putting it upon the basis of a cow; the farmer has to get his reward from the cow. Surely the farmer becomes just as good a citizen of this country as does the labour man and has just as good a right to a fair reward for his labour.

A few days ago when a resolution was introduced into the house by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) asking for a reduction of the tariff on motor trucks, to which an amendment was moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that the debate be adjourned because he did not have sufficient information, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) supported that amendment till he also could get further information. The result, of course, was to retain the tariff. I think all hon. members are agreed that the tariff on motor trucks and motor cars is much too high.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What was the amendment to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. LUCAS: I think the hon. member is familiar with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Macleod, asking for a reduction of the tariff on motor trucks.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What was the amendment to that resolution to which my hon. friend referred?

Mr. LUCAS: The amendment was moved by the hon. leader of the opposition that the debate be adjourned on the ground that he did not have sufficient information; nor did my hon. friend (Mr. Young, Weyburn), have sufficient information although he had been talking about free trade for all these years. When this question was up for debate a few days ago he defended the New Zealand treaty, and then turned around and voted to revise that treaty. If that treaty is revised, what other class of goods can we get from New Zealand except farm products?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): How did my hon. friend vote on that occasion?

Mr. LUCAS: The hon. member can obtain that information by reference to the votes and proceedings. My hon. friend seemed to be bitterly disappointed about hon. members in this section of the house sacrificing their principles, and yet I find that he is supporting a government which is taxing the people on other commodities of life just as esesntial as is butter. What has he done to have the tariff reduced on wearing apparel, boots and shoes, and things of that kind which are absolute necessities. We have a tariff of 30 per cent on boots and shoes, 30 per cent on clothing, 35 per cent on woollen goods—surely the people of western Canada require woollen clothing—30 per cent on furniture and 35 per cent on enamel ware.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the Consumers' League support those tariffs?

Mr. LUCAS: It is evidently supporting the government which keeps those tariffs in effect.

Mr. STEVENS: That is terrible.

Mr. LUCAS: I believe that the representatives of western Canada all have been sincere in advocating lower tariffs and freer trade, and yet they sit in with and take responsibility for a government which has not been able to reduce those tariffs. Is it any wonder that the farmers of Canada are losing hope of obtaining any reduction?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): At least we have not come to the point where we ask the government to increase the duties.

Mr. STEVENS: The government does it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about raisins?

Mr. LUCAS: I would like to call attention also to the composition of the cabinet.

Mr. STEVENS: Where are they?

Mr. LUCAS: In that cabinet are four outstanding men from western Canada who I believe are sincere and who possess ability, and of that four, two were former leaders of the Progressive movement. One would think that when those men got into the cabinet there would have been some lowering of the tariff.

In my opinion the proper way to deal with this question is to adopt a common sense attitude. I heard a very prominent gentleman from western Canada, a strong advocate of free trade, state that he was convinced that if we were going to hold confederation together we would have to have a tariff in this country. When one looks over the rates of duties imposed by Canada from confederation down to the present time, it will be found that the rate of duty has remained fairly stationary, but for the information of my hon. friends I would tell them that it is to-day a little higher than it was when the present government came into office. To save the putting of these figures on Hansard, I would refer hon. members to pages 10, 11 and 12 of Trade of Canada. It will be a good education for them to look over those figures, because they will find that the average rate of duty has remained almost static since confederation, irrespective of which party has been in power.

Mr. BROWN: The average rate.

Mr. LUCAS: The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) would be very glad to use these rates, to show that high tariffs existed under other governments.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Lisgar is not guilty of basing his argument upon averages.

Mr. IRVINE: He had better not.

Mr. LUCAS: I am of the opinion that the farmers still believe in the principle of free trade; I believe in that principle myself, but if we are going to have tariff then let it be administered fairly. It has been stated that we were breaking one of the planks in the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture.

I would like to suggest that there was also in that platform a plank on prohibition and yet we find to-day two farmer governments in western Canada are administering liquor laws. Nevertheless I believe the farmers of western Canada are just as strong to-day as ever in favour of prohibition but because of the situation they find this the most practical way to deal with the matter.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member aware that those laws were brought in by referendum of the people?

Mr. DUNNING: The debate has wandered far afield from the amendment and subamendment before the house. When it reaches prohibition, I think it is time to raise a point of order.

Mr. LUCAS: It was just on account of criticisms which have been levelled against this group that I was developing my argument along those lines.

Mr. STEVENS: It is going home, all right.

Mr. LUCAS: Yes. I should like to give another illustration. I believe the hon. gentlemen—and I was one of them—who voted the other night to establish a divorce court in Ontario, were just as much opposed to the principle of divorce and just as much in favour of maintaining the sanctity of the home as those who voted against it but we have divorce and have to deal with it. So it is with protection; I believe the farmers of Canada are still opposed to the principle of protection, but they realize that Canada has a tariff with no hope of it being lowered and they then insist that it be administered on a basis of equality, or as near equality as can be, for all concerned.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise for a moment or two to correct a false impression which may go abroad with respect to some remarks that were made yesterday afternoon in the course of a very able address by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). He claimed that because a very important member of the Conservative party had insisted that the Australian treaty should be abrogated, our party was practically put on record as being in favour of abrogating that treaty. I do not think that is much of an argument, but it seems to be more or less accepted by those who were paying attention to his speech. You might just as well ask hon. members from the province of Quebec whether they were bound by what the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) said when he sounded the death knell of protection. We on this side of the house have views of our own; we are not blind driven cattle. Although there are on this side of the house some who may favour the abrogation of the Australian treaty, a majority on the Conservative side are absolutely opposed to that action.

With respect to the advice so nicely handed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I should like to ask that hon. gentleman to confine his attention to his own constituency, because that is about as far as his vision has ever extended in the house—that and keeping the government in power. We hon. members from Vancouver island quite realize what we are doing and whether it is good politics or not we are trying in a large way to do something for the Dominion of Canada besides trying to keep ourselves in power. If that hon. gentleman could only extract a little pleasure out of some of his remarks, he might be excused, but he seems to make himself more miserable every time he says anything. In the tepid waters of the southern Pacific ocean there is a petulant fish known as the stingaree. If you happen to tread on that fish it will sting you. If it cannot sting you, it gets so angry it stings itself. I am sometimes reminded of that fish.

I see nothing dangerous in the amendment to the amendment moved by the Conservative side of the house in regard to the Australian treaty. It is simply an expression of opinion that an endeavour be made to see whether a more equitable treaty cannot be entered into. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni tells of the consternation of the lumbering people of Vancouver island. Our United States friends shipped $12,000,000 worth of lumber to the Antipodes, to Australia, while we of British Columbia shipped only a measly $144,000 worth last year. We want to see whether we cannot obtain some concession from those people in order to enable us to ship more of our lumber to Australia, especially in view of the fact that the United States have practically told us that we cannot ship them lumber, because that is what the duty of $1.50 on rough lumber means.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) pointed out certain advantages that might accrue to Australia by a revision of the treaty. We wish not to abrogate the treaty but to try to do something for Australia, for empire trade. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre pointed out where we might do something in the matter of importing hides from that country and he indicated how that might accrue to their advantage. He also showed how we might confer immense advantage on that country by buying their dried fruits instead of those of the United States who are milking us dry year after year of an immense amount of money which should be distributed throughout the British Empire. He also told us we might import sugar from Australia. There are many things that might enter into a discussion of a revision of this treaty and that would amply justify such a revision. If the Australian people, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggests, are ready to throw up this treaty, they would give us six months' notice and throw it up to-morrow. There is no danger of that. We can enter into negotiations with those people in the friendliest spirit in an endeavour to do something which is good for empire trade and which will keep our money within the empire.

When this treaty was entered into with Australia, we were not in favour of all its clauses, but I think none of us voted against it when it was put to a vote in the house. We thought then as we think now, that agriculture paid the whole bill for the treaty. We thought a treaty could be arranged whereby the agriculturists of Canada would not be penalized as heavily as they were in order that we of the Pacific coast might receive a few concessions. However, we debated that question and we were unable to have the treaty arranged along any different lines. We all know when that splendid gentleman, Mr.

Robb, who has departed from us, came back from Australia, he had different views with respect to the treaty. If we then had passed a tariff such as good economic sense would dictate, a tariff of eight cents a pound on butter against the world and especially against the United States, we could have given Australia a concession which would have been satisfactory to them and still not have had the effect of destroying, as the treaty extended to New Zealand has done, the dairy business of Canada. In an excellent speech made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman)—and I would advise the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to study that hon. gentleman's speech and see whether he cannot make one somewhat along the same lines because it was a speech full of kindness to all concerned—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would suggest the hon. member might sting himself before he got through.

Mr. DICKIE: No. In a very excellent speech the hon. member for Red Deer gave expression to views with which we are perhaps at variance, but his remarks were made in such a delightful manner that one could not but admire his sincerity, although one might, in one's self conceit, deplore his economic views. That speech, however, made a great impression upon me and reminded me of a point which I have forgotten. That is all I wish to say on the question. I am absolutely opposed to abrogating the Australian treaty, to doing anything to antagonize those people against the people of British Columbia or Canada. Our opinion on this side of the house is that the amendment to the amendment does not do that; it asks simply that a treaty be entered into which will confer greater advantages upon Australians as well as upon ourselves. If as a result of the amendment to the amendment the government were to go out of power—and I have no thought that such will be the case—I do not think Canada would suffer to any great extent.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which was moved to the motion to go into supply by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) representing the groups in the southeast corner, is of course a definite want of confidence motion, but it expresses, according to those who have supported it, their desires with respect to the subject matter of it. The sponsors of the amendment desire that the Australian treaty should be abrogated forthwith and they base their contention upon the idea that the Australian treaty at present existing imposes a hardship on agriculture as an industry for the benefit of other industries and they quote in support of their argument a great many figures and references from the treaty itself. I propose in that connection to apply the practical test rather than the theoretical test. Has the Australian treaty injured agriculture in Canada? The answer to that question will be found, of course, in the answer to another question. Have the imports of agricultural products from Australia been of such a character and in such volume as injuriously to affect agriculture in this Dominion? I have before me the statistics of the trade of Canada, and I can best illustrate by quoting directly from the import figures from Australia during the last fiscal year, ending March 31, 1929. I shall quote all of the articles which could even conceivably be considered to come into competition with any branch of Canadian agriculture or horticulture. I will give the figures in round numbers:

Value of Importations from Australia in Fiscal Year ending March 31, 1929

Apples	$ 91
Grapes	5,000
Other fresh fruits	2,000
Canned fruits	93,000
Onions	18,000
Peas	280
Seeds	27
Beef	97,000
Mutton	377,000
Butter	93,000
Raw wool	136,000

That comprises the full list of articles which we imported from Australia in the fiscal year 1929 which could in any sense be argued to come into competition with any branch of Canadian agriculture. I wish to ask the members of this house if they deem these imports, to the values that I have read, injuriously to affect Canadian agriculture to such a degree as to warrant the abrogation of the treaty. I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that the workmen engaged in the industries, the lumber industry, the motor industry, and all the other industries which were exporting to Australia in the same year under the treaty, consumed far more of the same products than were imported from Australia in that year; in fact, the very trade which was developed in Canada under this treaty produced a greater market in Canada for the agricultural commodities that we imported from Australia than Australia itself supplied. It increased the demand for the products of the Canadian farm and the Canadian orchard.

Let us look at the history of this treaty, again from a practical point of view. It is easy to argue questions of theory in regard to such matters, but we have in this particular case the practical experience of the operation of the treaty which has now been in existence for a period of fifty-three months. To the end of February last was fifty-three months from the date of coming into force of the Australian treaty. I have here the figures which indicate in a practical way the results of that treaty so far as trade is concerned. I find that during the period in which the treaty has been in force we have sold to Australia, $77,000,000 worth of goods and Australia has sold to us $20,900,000 worth; in other words, in fifty-three months of operation of the treaty, Canada has sold to Australia, $56,000,000 worth of goods more than Australia has sold to Canada. That is to say, month by month we have sold $1,000,000 worth of goods more to Australia than Australia has sold to us. That is the practical result of the treaty as a whole, and I may say frankly to my hon. friends in the corner who desire the abrogation of the treaty that the government is not prepared to give any encouragement at all either in this house or in the country to the idea that parliament favours the abrogation of the treaty.

The Australian treaty, as was indicated in the addresses to which we have listened in this debate, was negotiated by my predecessor in office. Every treaty, of course, is subject to criticism. It is subject to criticism for the reason that in order to arrange a treaty to sell our goods, we must also be willing to consider buying goods from the same country, and it is not possible, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) argued, to reach that perfect position where we can always export those things which the other country does not produce and always import those things which we do not produce. That is a counsel of perfection which never has been attained in any trade treaty negotiations with any country in the world so far as I am aware. We may endeavour to approach it as near as we can, and it is in that regard a counsel of perfection.

Mr. STEVENS: That is all I suggested, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: The Australian treaty was extended to New Zealand by order in council. I do not wish to get out of order, Mr. Speaker, by traversing the ground of a previous debate, but it is in order, I believe, for me to give figures respecting the operation of the Australian treaty as a whole, as respects not only Australia, but Australia and New Zealand combined. I find that we have exported to New Zealand during the fifty-three months of operation of the Australian treaty $69,000,000 worth of goods, and that we have purchased from New Zealand $40,000,000 worth, but as I indicated in a previous debate the government of Canada and the government of New Zealand are prepared to endeavour to work out a direct treaty as between Canada and New Zealand.

With respect to the Australian treaty, numerous interests in Canada representing industries other than those which specifically benefit under the treaty have on various occasions approached my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) with a view to opening negotiations with Australia for the extension of Canadian trade in those particular products. The Department of Trade and Commerce exists primarily for the extension of Canadian trade, and through the medium of the organization directed by that department every effort is constantly being made to extend Canadian trade not only with Australia but with all parts of the world. Notable success has been met with in the case of Australia, for during the past twelve months there has been a marked improvement in the shipment of Canadian lumber to Australia and New Zealand, an improvement which we hope and believe can be augmented in the years to come. We do not propose in connection with Australia or in connection with New Zealand to intimate either to Australia or to New Zealand that we do not want to trade with them. We do not propose that any indication shall go out to Australia, through the press or otherwise, that the Canadian parliament desires to abrogate the Australian treaty. We might conceivably be able to negotiate something better, but we are not taking the position that we desire to abrogate this treaty. With such a balance of trade in our favour as I have indicated, no government could possibly, in the interests of its own people, indicate a desire to terminate an arrangement which has worked out so satisfactorily for its own people.

Now I come to the Conservative subamendment. It is very skilfully worded, worded, of course, having in mind the known policy of the government in relation to matters of this kind. but quite contrary, may I suggest, to many of the speeches from Conservative members to which we have listened in this house in past sessions, and certainly quite contrary to the propaganda which has been spread from one end of Canada to the other, outside of British Columbia, by the Conservative party with respect to the Australian treaty. As my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) said last night, the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for South

Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking in that capacity in the budget debate of only last year, demanded the abrogation of the Australian treaty. Now this year we are faced with a subamendment moved by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre worded in such a way that the Conservative party may avoid expressing an opinion as to whether or not the Australian treaty should be abrogated. That subamendment is moved for the purpose of extricating the Conservative party from the dilemma of having to pronounce yes or no on the question of the abrogation of the treaty, which is what the motion of my hon. friend for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) asks for. No word at all of its policy in the past in that regard. All of the speeches to which we have listened with respect to this subamendment have emanated from hon. members of the Conservative party from British Columbia. We have heard no word whatever from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), practically the whole of whose speeches the other day on the New Zealand trade agreement were equally applicable in other parts of Canada as against the Australian treaty. The same arguments have been used all over Canada outside British Columbia by my friends opposite denouncing the Australian treaty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we on this side, in the interests of reasonable discussion and reasonable understanding on the part of the people of Canada of what we do here, deem it desirable that this house should definitely place itself on record either for or against abrogation of the Australian treaty. If we accept and support the subamendment moved by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) on behalf of the Conservative party, we deliberately deprive this house of the opportunity of expressing its will with respect to the abrogation of the Australian treaty. We do not propose, sir, to be placed in that position. My hon. friend's subamendment is of course equally a want of confidence motion. The fact that it expresses in very simple language agreement in the policy of the present government is not the point. The point is that the adoption of the subamendment would enable this house to evade expressing by a direct vote its opinion as to whether or not the Australian treaty should be abrogated. For that reason, sir, the government cannot accept the subamendment. The government desires to see this house go on record definitely, so the people of Australia may know to what extent the people of Canada really desire to continue trade relations with them under the treaty, to what extent the people of Canada through their representative desire its abrogation.

That, I think, Mr. Speaker, is all I have to say at the present time except this, that the work which has been done by the officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and by various delegations from Canada which have visited Australia in recent months and recent years, encourages us to believe that the experience which both countries have secured through this treaty, which took so many long years to negotiate, is of a character which will encourage both countries to endeavour more and more to trade with each other. We on this side of the house are desirous that this trade should be extended, and we are certainly not in favour of saying to Australia that we do not desire to trade with her.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen who have spoken from this side of the house have, I think, made it very clear why the motion for the abrogation of the treaty was made. I do not believe it is necessary to recapitulate the arguments in that regard. I desire rather to make reply to some of the references made by hon. gentlemen opposite to hon. members in this section of the house. First let me say that I am not surprised at the reply which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just made to the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this section of the house. It is to be expected that the Minister of Finance, being a member of the government which negotiated the treaty, would have more regard for the treaty than he has for the people affected by it, because the reputation of his administration is involved in the treaty. No wonder the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) runs away when he recognizes that fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: He never runs away.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister tells us that he is going to come down to the technical side of the argument, and he proceeds to give us certain lists of figures. In his first list he leaves out New Zealand, of course, and then he places his emphasis upon the smallness of the amount of import trade involved, that we have purchased so little from Australia and we have sold so much to her; and thus having a treaty that gives us an excellent, favourable balance of trade, it would be a shame indeed to abrogate it. I am surprised that the Minister of Finance should hold such views about trade balances as he expressed, although on second consideration, I recall that he regards a bank as a place where you can keep money safely. I think he might as well say that the ocean is a splendid place to keep water wet. Well, an hon. gentleman who has that conception of finance may have any kind of conception about trade. There is no such thing as a favourable balance of trade; apart from the expressions of the minister it has no meaning in so far as Canada is concerned—none whatsoever. He leaves out, I say, in his first list of figures the New Zealand part, but brings it in later and points out that during the period of the trade arrangement with that country we bought nearly $40,000,000 of goods: Now, a $40,000,000 market to the dairy industry of Canada during the last few months would have been of very great importance. We cannot disregard a market of that extent so carelessly as the Minister appears to do. However, the ultimatum has gone forth: Nothing shall be considered in the way of abrogating this treaty; the amount purchased from Australia and New Zealand at the expense of the agricultural industry of Canada does not matter; let it be known that certain great industries of Canada have benefited by the sacrifice of the agricultural industry; therefore the treaty must be continued.

I can understand the position of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He makes it clear without any equivocations at all. There are certain industries benefited by this treaty, and they happen to be in his province. Naturally he speaks for them. I disagree with him, however, when he points out that the amendment is a want of confidence in the government. The amendment is a want of confidence in the Australian treaty. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to vote want of confidence in the Australian treaty, and the next moment vote that this government stay where it is until the proper time, 1931, and then go to the people again. I am not seeking to defeat the government. I am seeking to express lack of confidence in the Australian treaty, and to that extent the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni were beside the point. He is very much interested apparently in what Australia may think about what we say regarding the treaty; he is not so much interested in the farmers who are suffering because of it.

Now, the Australian treaty of course is an agreement made in respect of trade between the governments of Canada and Australia, an agreement mutually arrived at. On the one hand, Australia agreed to reduce tariff on certain commodities imported from Canada; in return Canada agreed to reduced tariffs on certain commodities coming into Canada from Australia. Our government at that time was in a rather difficult political position. Having been elected on a platform of tariff reduction, revision of the tariff downwards with a view to free trade, it was of course anxious to get some excuse that could be used in election time as pointing towards specific tariff reductions. At the same time the government was being pressed by certain industries for an increase of tariff. So the Australian treaty appeared as a solvent of this political puzzle, for the advantages given to our protected interests were equivalent to increases in the tariff; and the reductions which were made on commodities produced by a class that has expressed itself in favour of tariff reduction. Therefore the government said; These people, the farmers, want tariff reduction; we will give them tariff reduction; they have four per cent protection on butter, we will reduce it to one cent and see how they like free trade when they get it; and in return for that we will secure further privileges in foreign markets for our manufacturers who already are protected very highly in Canada. Thus they placed the farmer at a greater disadvantage than before, because in exchanging his product of butter for commodities manufactured by our protected industries he would have three cents a pound disadvantage greater than previously. So the government when it is asked at the next election: "How much have you reduced the tariff; were you not elected to do that?" must reply to the farmers: "We reduced the tariff three cents a pound on butter coming from Australia."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I am not asking for the abrogation of the Australian treaty on the ground that Australia got a better bargain than we did. So far as the two countries are concerned the bargain may be fair; I have not gone into that phase of the matter. I am objecting to the treaty because it implies class discrimination, as the treaty affects certain classes in Canada.

That is the basis of our objection to it, and apparently that point escaped the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) yesterday, when he extolled the treaty because it increased trade and especially because it increased the sale of nails and fish in the maritime provinces. I wonder whether, in the early period of our industrial development, when child labour was in vogue, it could not have been said that child labour increased trade, but what a standard of statesmanship that is. If the manufacturers of the maritime provinces are so anxious to increase trade, let them reduce the price of their nails. They can give nails away, if they wish, and that will increase trade still further. If it is merely an increase in trade that the hon. gentleman wants he can get it in that way, but such an increase of trade surely would not be regarded by him as sound economics. Neither is it sound economics to increase trade with Australia in the way in which that has been done.

While I am referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Hants-Kings I should like to comment upon another observation which he made. Directing his remarks to the representatives of the United Farmers of Alberta in particular, he said he had envied the independence displayed by hon. members of the United Farmers of Alberta group in this house until some hon. member on this side said that as the representative of an organized agricultural community he must represent the voice of that community. That was too much for the hon. gentleman. What to him was the voice of the people; what to him were the boasted tenets of historic and theoretical Liberalism? They are no more to him, apparently, than the reddening of the rose or the swing of Pliades to Millet's Man With the Hoe. What would he have us do? There are only two other courses, so far as I am aware, that he or any other member of the house could take. One course would be to follow the party, to be a blind slave of the plutocratic class which dictates the policy of the party. That is one way, but there is another; my hon. friend could disregard everyone and stand up in this house expressing only what he thinks. That is the very acme of autocracy, but even if the hon. gentleman desired to do so surely he would not tell us that there is a community in Canada which thinks what he has to say so wise that they will indemnify him just for the privilege of hearing him say it on the floor of this house. With all due respect to his wisdom that is not a very safe basis of representation. The only other course is to represent the people who send us here, and in this regard also I think the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) misunderstood the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), when the former described the latter as having defended his right to change his principles. The hon. member for Acadia did no such thing although, if it be necessary to change principles, we are not afraid to do so. The hon. member merely established the fact that from the very beginning this group worked under a very different principle from that followed by the hon. member for Lisgar when he sat in this corner of the house.

In reply to the hon. member for Hants-Kings I might say that I regard myself as a delegate of my constituents, and I regard that as the highest function that can be fulfilled by any hon. member of this house. In trying to be such a delegate I would rather fail in trying to do some things than succeed in doing certain other things; I would rather fail in trying to be a delegate of the United Farmers of Alberta than succeed in being a thoroughly complacent and amiable partisan. May I add that I am free to serve the people who send me here, while a partisan is bound to serve the party system, the thing which sent him here. The party system is the thing which stands between hon. gentlemen opposite, who have criticized us in this regard, and the people they are supposed to represent.

The discussion on the amendment before the house has stirred up the musty arguments for and against the tariff, which cover a period of history from Adam Smith down to Stephen Leacock, who wisely made a huge joke of the "dismal science." The treaty itself is indeed a commodious umbrella under which free trader and protectionist alike can find shelter. The protectionist can argue with a great deal of force that in raising the tariff on raisins and thus increasing the price of raisins to the consumers in Canada he was true to the protectionist principle. He could also argue that in bartering with certain interests of Canada for certain privileges to the manufacturers in Canada, he was also in line with the protectionist principle. On the other hand, if he wishes to pose as an advocate of free trade or reduced tariffs, then he can argue that since he removed 3 cents from the duty on butter, he also is a free trader, and so as I say the treaty does not lend itself to either of the contending parties. Both may stand under it if they so desire, and I could not possibly say whether or not the treaty as a whole is more favourable to the theories of the Liberal or Conservative parties, just as I cannot say whether the hon. member for Lisgar is more free trader than protectionist because of his support not only of this treaty but of a government which is manifestly protectionist.

In this connection I am reminded of an editorial which appeared recently in the Ottawa Citizen, headed "Mulberry Bush of Politics." The editorial begins by saying:

> There is more fruitless discussion of tariff protectionism than of any other subject in Canadian politics.

Then it goes on to quote and comment upon certain statements made by the leaders of both parties in this country. The first statement quoted is a very liberal statement by the leader of the opposition, in which he said:

> A policy to give fair treatment, equal opportunity in competition with the peoples of the world, for the protection of agriculture, labour, industry and the consumer.

Then the editorial goes on to quote a protectionist statement by a member of the Liberal government as follows:

> Free trade is all right in theory, if countries did not erect impassable tariff walls around them. I am not afraid to say and use the word, that in a country which is excluded from the markets of another country, the tariff may legitimately be used in a reasonable way to protect the rights of the consumer and also for protection of the industries of that country so that these industries may have a right to their own market.

There you have the mulberry bush of politics. In that connection I believe there is a story of a strange way in which the foxes of Manitoba capture the turkeys. I do not vouch for the accuracy of the story itself, but I do vouch for the accuracy of its application. It is said that when the turkeys in Manitoba go to the tops of the trees in the evening to roost, they are sometimes captured by the foxes, which come to the foot of the tree, take their tails in their mouths and roll around and around the tree. The turkeys become so giddy after watching the foxes roll around the tree that they fall down, and are easily captured. It appears to me that the hon. member for Lisgar has been sitting at the top of the mulberry bush of tariff discussion and that he has watched and listened to the circumlocutions of his friends to such an extent that he has become giddy and fallen down to become the easy prey of his adversaries. He wants to be generous with regard to dairy products; he wants to salve his political conscience with butter. He has not been able to reduce the tariff on anything else, and so he dabs butter on his conscience and tries to make himself satisfied with that sort of thing. He suggests that those engaged in the dairy industry are incapable of speaking for themselves. I hope he will not charge me again with misquoting him; rather, I am interpreting him. He stands up to speak for the dairy industry, and says that they do not know what they want when they ask for the abrogation of the treaty; that apparently they are suffering from some kind of mental strain; that he knows better than they know what they want, and he knows they do not want any protection at all. When we in this corner of the house recognize the appeal of organized agriculture the hon. member for Lisgar charges us with apostasy. In doing that he reminds me of the story about the man crying "stop thief." The hon. gentleman is trying to direct the attention of the country away from himself. That word apostasy, like some of the hon. gentleman's opinions, belongs to the dark ages. It does not savour even of theoretic Liberalism, not to mention Progressive philosophy. My hon. friend will have to accept either the word "apostasy" or something worse as descriptive of his own position. It is quite possible that a man who had changed his views might be dubbed an apostate, but there are worse words than that. If he believed in what he said when he was on this side of the house, then he is now an apostate; if he did not believe what he said at that time he is worse than an apostate, and I will leave the house to supply the proper word to describe him. I presume I would be out of order if I spoke that word.

Let us see what my hon. friend was elected to do. According to the new national policy, which was apparently still born, he believed in the following:

> We believe that the best interests of the empire and of Canada would be served by reciprocal action on the part of Canada through gradual reduction of the tariff on British imports, having for its objects closer union and a better understanding between Canada and the motherland, and at the same time bring about a great reduction in the cost of living to our Canadian people.

And in dealing with definite tariff demands, it says:

> By reducing the customs duties on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

Mr. STEVENS: How long ago was that?

Mr. IRVINE: That was in 1918; I am afraid the five years are up.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Crerar) was there also.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. Minister of Railways was the leader of that new national policy; now he is the chaser of it. Let me point out what the hon. member for Lisgar did in that regard. A subamendment to the budget was moved last year by an hon. member from the farmers' group, urging upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations. That subamendment was moved on April 9, 1929. The vote upon the subamendment appears at page 1465 of last year's Hansard, and the name of the hon. member for Lisgar appears in the list of nays. That vote was cast in the face of the declaration which I have just read. Then the hon. gentleman has the audacity to stand up in this house and shout "apostasy" to hon. members across the aisle.

His efforts in defending himself in supporting the government remind me of an old parlour game which no doubt many hon. members of the house have seen played. I think it is called tailing the donkey. The game is to put a picture of a donkey upon the wall, which donkey is minus a tail, and then the competitor is blindfolded and handed the tail and is told, "Now, don't look, please, but stick the tail in its proper place." The hon. gentleman from Lisgar with the handkerchief of partisanship around his eyes has been groping for the proper spot upon which to pin the donkey's tail, which would complete the picture of his defence of his apostasy, but in his struggle he has pinned the tail upon the back of the donkey's neck, thus making a monstrosity. He attacks the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) upon the grounds of inconsistency, but I would commend to him Emerson's essay on self reliance, in which he will find the following:

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen.

I would point out to him that a great soul like the hon. member for Rosetown has nothing whatever to do with consistency. That hon. member will have to bear the penalty of the great, which is to be misunderstood. He is so great that he baffles the understanding of the hon. member for Lisgar.

I think the morality of the tariff issue was dealt with quite finally by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and I was pleased to discover that in one instance the hon. member for Lisgar supports the non-moral view of the tariff. He says, "What is the use of the farmers being protectionists, they can only get the husks anyway; if there was any chance of their getting the corn, then it would be all right for them to be protectionists." I quite agree with him that there is no morality in this tariff business; it is a business proposition pure and simple and there is no morality in business. We hope there will be some day, but at the present time it is every man for himself and the devil take the last one, and so far the farmer always has been last. Why does not the farmer want protection? Because so far as he knows there is no practical policy which will give him a protection equal to that which the manufacturer enjoys. There is no morality in that. Why does the manufacturer want a tariff? Because it is a practical political policy to give him the privileges he desires. There is no particular morality about that, and he is no more immoral in wanting a tariff than is the farmer in not wanting it. What we do want is equality of treatment. We want that firstly, because equality of treatment is sound economics, and we want it secondly because if there is going to be any morality in economics it must be upon a basis of equality.

The hon. member for Lisgar wants a treaty, and he wants it at once. He does not know why he wants it and he does not know what he wants to be in it, but he must have a treaty. He calls to account the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) for not wanting it. Let me say a word or two about the treaty, and about the subamendment which involves that treaty. The subamendment holds out the suggestion that this treaty which we seek to abrogate might be amended and might be improved thereby. We in this corner of the house are more interested in getting rid of a bad treaty than we are in negotiating a new one which, for all we know, may be equally as bad as or worse than the present treaty. This treaty offers an example of how a government can negotiate such an agreement to the disadvantage of agriculture. If we were to vote blindly and allow the government to proceed to negotiate another treaty, it might be worse than the present one and then, like the hon. member for Lisgar, we would have to assume part of the responsibility of having asked the government to take such action. We ask for the abrogation of this treaty because it discriminates against one class of people in our community. We insist that the government recognize that discrimination and we say that it is the first essential of good government to do so. If the government fails to recognize that discrimination it will not be able to get away from the evident implication that it is a servant of the class which is obtaining the most advantages from the treaty. There is more involved in this matter than so many pounds of butter or so many dozens of eggs; this is a very important question to the agricultural industry of Canada.

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with the expression of the hope that this amendment will be carried, but should the government be technically defeated we shall restore it. I assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who is so jealous in safeguarding the government that I shall help him to reinstate it in power. Perhaps it would be better to vote to sustain the government before we vote on the treaty, and in that way make sure that the government will be protected. I am willing to do anything which will please the hon. member for Comox-Alberni who is so afraid that the government will be wrecked.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulty of holding the attention of the house after its having listened to such an able and inspiring address as that just delivered by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). I will admit at the outset that the Australian treaty has been of considerable benefit to Canada. My objection to it is not that it has been a disadvantage to Canada as a whole. I believe it has been an advantage and at the same time I am going to admit that the advantage it has been to industry would be to some extent passed on to agriculture. We might as well admit that, but my objection to it is that it is based upon an entirely wrong principle. I need not go any further than to quote the former leader of the Conservative party, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. Speaking in the house in 1925, he told the government that they had secured a good deal for the manufacturers but had asked the farmer to step up to the counter and pay the whole bill. That is the principle upon which the treaty is based, and as the speaker who has just resumed his seat has said, it is to be judged not entirely by the amount of goods we have sold or purchased under the treaty, but by the principle underlying the treaty itself.

It is a matter of considerable congratulation to us in this section of the house that the agricultural industry has apparently come into its own as regards securing prominence in the debates of parliament. I recall away back in 1922 when those of us who sat in this section had considerable difficulty in getting the house to listen to a discussion of farm problems. Farming seemed to be an industry that had been very little considered prior to that time, but the change that has come about since then is illustrated by the fact that the agricultural industry, particularly the dairy part of it, has been given a great deal of prominence especially in the last two or three sessions. In the original draft of the treaty, the one that Canada had drafted and to which Australia agreed, there was an entirely different schedule of duties from the list that finally became law under the treaty. There may have been some objections on this account from the dairy industry, that those changes were made after the treaty had been agreed to by Australia. The particular objections of course from the dairymen are based on the fact that the tariff schedules under the Australian treaty have been extended to New Zealand and it is New Zealand that has been getting most of the advantage so far as the dairy industry is concerned. As I say, however, it is at least a matter for congratulation that the farmer and his industry, agriculture, have been recognized to the extent that they have been in public discussions.

There is a great deal of talk in the three sections of the house as to the farmer's attitude towards the policy of protection. Some hon. members, themselves good protectionists, seem to think it improper, almost immoral, for a farmer to ask for protection. I do not gather that the farmer is asking for protection. For many years we had a discussion in this country and throughout the empire over what we called equality of status. Finally we came to the point where our statesmen boasted that Canada had reached a position of equality of status within the empire and that the different dominions enjoyed that equality. Later, within the last couple of years, a new phrase has been coined—equality of status within Canada particularly as applied to the disposition and ownership of our natural resources. That is about to pass into history by the transfer of the natural resources to the various provinces, but now the farmer is raising another question of equality. He is asking for his industry equality of status within the economic unit. He is asking that the industry of agriculture be recognized and put on the same basis as other industries.

With regard to the question of protection, I am not quite so sure that the average farmer is as idealistic as his parliamentary representatives are. The farmers whom I know, the farmers with whom I discuss these matters, the farmers whom I meet from day to day, are intensely practical men. They are realists. The average farmer realizes that theorizing and philosophizing will not milk his cows in the morning, will not put his seed into the ground or take off his crop. He realizes that prayers without work will not secure him a good crop, and as I say he is an intensely practical man. What the farmer is asking for in connection with this question of protection is that there be no discrimination against him. He finds when he has to buy a pair of boots or shoes, an automobile, a motor truck, woollen or cotton clothing, hardware or the ordinary necessaries of life, he pays a tariff duty of from ten to thirty-five per cent, but when he offers his own products for sale on the market he has to compete with the outside on a free trade basis. I am not saying whether the farmer is right or wrong; there may be a difference of opinion about that. I am stating how I find the average farmer looking at these matters. I am simply stating the fact. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) yesterday seemed to be rather shocked that the farmer was taking this stand. I am not so sure that I can see the matter in just that light, because I think the farmer is choosing the lesser of two evils.

Let us illustrate the point in this way. Give the farmer a chance to-day to choose between absolute free trade, free trade in what he has to buy and what he has to sell, and the situation we have now, and the farmer will hold up his hands for free trade; there is no doubt about that. But he says that the parliament of Canada will not give him that; it will not permit him to buy his goods in the cheapest market. Therefore, he says: when I have to suffer all the injustices of the tariff in what I have to buy, surely I am not going to have free trade imposed upon me entirely on what I have to sell. It would seem to me to be just as logical to argue that because a farmer did not agree with a certain clause in the criminal code, when it came to a point where that particular clause would be of some protection to him, the officers entrusted with the enforcement of the law should say: Now, you do not believe in this particular clause in the criminal code, therefore we will not give you the protection of it. That is the way I think the average farmer looks at the matter. Whether the farmer is right or wrong, we are to-day facing facts and not theories. This is something we must recognize and any government must meet the situation as it exists. Indeed, the fact that the government realizes that was exemplified by its action a few days ago when it accepted a motion of the opposition to cancel the agreement with New Zealand. I say "accepted" because that in substance and effect was exactly what the government did.

Several members on the government benches, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) for one, seemed to argue that protection was of no use to the farmer. I am prepared to admit that protection can be of no use to the farmer where there is an exportable surplus. We must admit that. When there is an exportable surplus, the world market sets the price, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other men who take a protectionist stand would not admit that protection of industry does not benefit industry, and certainly as regards any farm product where there is not an exportable surplus, the tariff, whatever tariff there may be, must apply and must give those in that industry some protection.

Mr. MILLAR: Would that be a lasting benefit?

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. CAMPBELL: My hon. friend knows there is nothing lasting. Even the very sphere we are living in to-day is not lasting. We have to deal with things as they come up day by day.

Mr. MILLAR: That is hardly an answer. Would the benefit last even a few years? Would it not immediately be wiped out by increased production and reduced consumption?

Mr. CAMPBELL: It might or it might not, but my point is this—and I am trying to give the farmers' viewpoint, because I am talking with those men all the time; if it applies to industry, if those engaged in industry get any advantage from the tariff, surely it must apply to the products of agriculture so far as there is no exportable surplus. Of course I realize what my hon. friend says. If a tariff increases production and that production gets beyond the needs of the consuming ability of the country, then of course the price will immediately drop to the export basis. There is no argument about that, but at the present time we are a long way off from that situation in the case of butter.

My hon. and genial friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) had a good deal to say as to principles as applied to members in this corner of the house. I cannot see that there is any principle involved in this question at all. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said a few years ago, I think it is rather a geographical question. The farmer, I say without equivocation, would be prepared to accept absolute free trade tomorrow if he were permitted to buy in the open market. What he objects to is the discrimination that free trade is applied to him simply because he has accepted that philosophy. The result is that he has to buy in a protected market and sell in the open market.

There should be considerable satisfaction to those engaged in the dairy industry at the attention and consideration which that industry has received in the debates in this house. Away back in 1867 we chose the beaver as our national emblem because, I suppose, it was symbolical of industry. The beaver is an industrious little worker, always active. But in choosing the beaver, I think, regard was also had to the material side. The beaver at that time was very valuable. About 1867 we were carrying on a valuable fur trade in Canada. But the beaver, I think, has been supplanted by the dairy cow, and I suggest that we substitute the homely and prosaic dairy cow for the beaver as the national emblem of Canada. I want to make a suggestion to my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), who is interested in designing a new Canadian flag. I would suggest that his flag should show a fine Ayrshire cow against a grassy background, with a group of statesmen looking on admiringly. I think in view of the condition of the dairy industry at this time, such a design would be very appropriate.

Mr. COOTE: Who would be milking the cow?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Someone other than the farmer, probably.

A few days ago my hon. friend from Weyburn accused members on this side of the house of deserting the policies and principles upon which they were elected. May I remind him that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones, and rather than trying to take the mote out of our eyes, he should be thinking of the beam in his own. Whenever anyone posing as a proponent of protection for the farmer gets up and advocates such a policy in the house, my hon. friend from Weyburn swoops down on him like an avenging angel. He is ready to fight a legion of protectionist devils if they are not in league with the government, but when the manufacturers ask for and secure protection for their products, and we ask for consideration for the consumer, my hon. friend is as mum as an oyster; no one hears a word out of him. He asked one member in this group yesterday why we did not join the consumers' league. I will tell him why I do not join it, and I think this is true of my friends here generally. We are prepared to do our fighting on the floor of this house. We do not want to do it by proxy somewhere else: here is the place to do it. But my hon. friend sits quiet when there is any fighting of that kind to be done in this house, and he excuses himself by saying: just look at what the consumers' league is doing before the tariff board. Mr. Speaker, we in this part of the house are not doing our fighting by proxy somewhere else. We are doing it right here. I want to be fair to my hon. friend, for I know that he is honest, and that his heart is in the right place, but I think he is in a false position; he realizes that he has to answer the crack of the party whip. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) and several other speakers yesterday referred to red herrings drawn across the trail in this debate. May I tell my hon. friend from Weyburn that I consider the consumers' league is simply a red herring to distract the attention of the people from the action of its members in this house.

Let me give my hon. friend an illustration, and again I say I wish to be fair to him because I have a very high regard for him. In 1928, the representative of the consumers' league before the tariff board, a gentleman who is employed and paid by the members of the league, wrote a letter in which he referred to the budget of 1928 as the worst budget since confederation. He referred particularly to the fact that Liberal principles were departed from in the reduction of the income tax, and in the regulations applying to the British preference, which had the effect of doubling the tariff on many articles that we import from Great Britain. That is what the representative of the consumers' league said about the 1928 budget. What did the members of the consumers' league in this house do?

Mr. STEVENS: Vote for the budget.

Mr. CAMPBELL: They swallowed the budget as completely and effectually as the whale swallowed Jonah, although in this case it might be more correct to say that Jonah swallowed the whale. I am sorry to have to cross swords with hon. members over there. I really feel rather sorry for them and believe they are entitled rather to our commiseration than to our condemnation. I invite them to come forward to the uplands where the air is pure and sweet. Let them come over here, where there is no party whip, and where a man can express his opinions just as he expresses them back in the country. We shall hear a great deal in the coming campaign about what the consumers' league did. I am more concerned about what the members of the consumers' league are doing in this house.

I have here a newspaper clipping of a speech delivered by the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar) at Winnipeg, as reported in The Tribune of January 22, 1930, which, I believe, was after he was sworn in as minister. It reads:

> Condemning protective tariffs, Mr. Crerar said protection was a fiscal policy which could work out in no other way than by conferring benefits on certain sections of the community at the expense of the others. The principle of protection was not suited to a new country. "We can't build up eastern cities at the expense of western cities without developing jealousies, suspicions and strife."

Noble sentiments those; but what will the Minister of Railways do when it comes to deciding these issues on the floor of this house? That is the acid test—not sentiments expounded out in the country.

I say frankly that I do not want to see trade negotiations entirely eliminated between Canada and Australia. I believe that there is much to be gained by a treaty, and I take it for granted that if the government abrogated this treaty they would negotiate another one that would not be based on the present discriminations. That is what I have in mind in supporting the amendment, that the present treaty will be supplanted by a better one.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): We have heard at considerable length during this debate as to what the various dairymen's associations think about this matter, but we have not heard enough about what the dairymen themselves, those actually engaged in the business, think about it. I wish to place on Hansard the statement of a prominent dairyman of Saskatchewan, but before doing so I would refer to a report of the dairymen's association of Manitoba, held in the city of Winnipeg on the 6th of February last. Mr. P. E. Reid, dairy commissioner of Saskatchewan, delivered an address before the association, and from a Winnipeg Free Press correspondent's report, I quote:

> Saskatchewan, last year produced an exportable surplus of dairy products, i.e., exported outside of the province; that it was useless to expect the farmer to milk cows if he could make more and easier money in any other branch of farming.

The same correspondent states that in the addresses delivered by Doctor Marker, of Alberta, and Mr. Gibson, of Manitoba, there was no reference to the Australian treaty one way or the other. That is rather significant. This correspondent says that they stressed the necessity of quality and quantity production, and by inference one could assume that they were not worrying about markets, and profitable markets, if we improved our quality and increased our production. The correspondent goes on to say:

> These convention resolutions do not mean so much as some people would imagine.

I also wish to quote part of a letter written by Mr. Henry Thompson, a prominent dairy farmer of Fairlight, Saskatchewan, for twenty-two years, and a member of the dairymen's association. He says:

> I am very much of the opinion that if this protection was restored it would not benefit the producers one iota. Our biggest difficulty right along, as I find it, is that manufacturers are taking too much of the cream off the bowls right along, particularly here in Saskatchewan. They have played the same game for two or three years, to my knowledge. At the conventions they have worked a scheme to have a similar resolution put over each time.

[Mr. Campbell.]

In another part of his letter he says:

> Concerning the joint dairy association, held in the Saskatchewan hotel, Regina, two years ago, for about six weeks or so previous to this convention the price paid for this grade was 45 cents per pound f.o.b. Regina, but the price was dropped 3 cents to the producers, and in conversation with a prominent creamery manager of one of the city creameries, he stated to me a short while after, that there was no local cause to warrant that drop in price, as really their supply for that grade of cream was not equal to demand, and they personally could have advanced the price to 50 cents and give the producers the benefit, without hurting themselves in the least, and that they were able to pay over 10 per cent dividend that same year.

In describing the manner in which these dairy conventions are manipulated, Mr. Thompson says:

> When we greenhorns have sat and listened for some considerable time to these wonderful orations, and in rather an abrupt and blunt manner suggest that we do not accept these framed resolutions, as they have thus been prepared and cooked for us, it appears a bit funny, but the chairman begins to fidget and looks at his watch and reminds us there are other speakers yet to come, and, "I am afraid we will have to curtail this discussion. I am awfully sorry."

That is the way a prominent dairyman of Saskatchewan looks upon those resolutions on this question of protection on butter; stereotyped resolutions "prepared and cooked" for them.

I would refer to the reference made by the member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) to the attitude taken towards the Australian treaty by a prominent manufacturer. He said the manufacturers were behind the demand of the dairymen's association. I am not surprised at that in the least. The question in my mind is this: Which way did he reason; did he reason that in a short time the price of butter in Canada—provided the duty were increased to four cents a pound, thus bringing about increased production and reduced consumption—would be brought down to an export basis all the year round, and his workers would get cheaper butter than at present? Was that part of his reasoning? I think perhaps it was. Another reason probably is this, that by supporting the dairymen's association the manufacturers were allying themselves with those who are supposed to be representing the farmers, and they were gaining strength and support for their own efforts in getting protection for the manufacturing industry.

I listened with considerable interest to the addresses, particularly those from hon. members immediately across the floor. I found that in many respects their reasoning was sound but their conclusions were faulty. Take for instance the reasoning of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman); it was very logical, very clear, but he came to the conclusion that the tiny speck of advantage that might accrue to the farmer temporarily was well worth his support. That is just where I differ with him. Whether the principle of protection is involved matters not to me, but I think my friends in that corner of the house made a mistake in changing their attitude in regard to protection for the farmer. As representatives of farming constituencies they have, I think, made a mistake in allying themselves with those who would have protection; for I believe it would cost the farmer a great deal more than the benefit he would receive. The benefits from protection, as the member for Red Deer pointed out, would be very small indeed, and I am inclined to think those benefits would be lost in a very, very short time. After that the price of butter—and that is the commodity around which most of this discussion has centred—would in all probability be less to the producer than it is now. He would be selling his butter all the year round on an export basis, whereas now in the winter months he is receiving a higher price than the export price. It has been pointed out several times that he is receiving two cents a pound more than producers in the United States, and they are in a highly protected country. I will not detain the house longer.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the hon. member present the same argument in regard to wheat and ask the government to take that twelve cent duty off?

Mr. MILLAR: I am pleased to answer my hon. friend. I think the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) in his address made the point very clear. When there is a large export surplus it is impossible to increase the price by protection. As long as you can keep production below demand you can protect and benefit the producer of that commodity. But the main argument from this side of the house that I have listened to, and the argument that I stand by, is that in the matter of production it will be easy indeed by reducing consumption and increasing production to have an exportable surplus. I may add another remark: when there is a surplus for export you can protect those producing only if you have control of the output. Take fruit in the United States: the Americans export about seven per cent of their apples; with control they can get rid of that surplus of seven per cent at a slight loss or perhaps at bare cost; which enables them by reducing the home supply to bring that supply below the demand, and then they can protect the apple growing industry and raise the price of the 93 per cent above export price. I think that is a sound argument. I believe one reason why the producers of butter in Canada cannot be benefited by protection is simply that they have not got control of their output, and I do not see how they can get it, for they are too scattered. They are unlike the manufacturers of agricultural implements who are comparatively few in number and can get together on a gentleman's agreement, and so control their output, selling their small surplus abroad at a slight loss or at a small profit and then compelling the home market to pay a higher price. But that is not the case with the wheat grower, and it is quite evident that with a large surplus it is utterly impossible to benefit the producer of wheat by protection.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the debate has already taken up too much of the time of the house, and I think this is due to a custom which has grown altogether too common of late; too much time is spent in indulging in personalities and in criticism of other members, involving charges of inconsistency, apostasy and the like. We would make more progress if we confined our remarks to the question at issue. I am speaking simply for myself. Each member of this house is responsible to his constituents and not to his fellow members. The view that he expresses or the attitude that he takes on any questions coming before the house is his own particular business. If a member favours a measure I think he should advance any argument he may have in support of it, or if opposed he should advance argument against it, but leave questions of inconsistency and the like to the country.

So far as the question of consistency is concerned in my own case, I want to say that I opposed the Australian treaty in 1925 when it was introduced in this house, and I still oppose it. In that regard at least I am consistent. I am not opposed to the government entering into negotiations with New Zealand for securing, if possible, a better treaty, but I do not like to run the risk of voting to instruct the government to do so. I do not like the job they made when they negotiated the treaty with Australia and if they make as bad a job or worse in negotiating a treaty with New Zealand, I am sure I would feel compelled to oppose it and then I might be charged with inconsistency in that I had voted to instruct the government to enter into negotiations but refused to support the treaty when it was brought down. One always runs the risk of being charged with inconsistency in this house; I have found that out since I became a member.

I want to assure the government and the house that in my constituency there is more antagonism to the Australian treaty than there is to the extension of that treaty to New Zealand. I am anxious to vote for the abrogation of the treaty with Australia, because in that way we will get rid of both the Australian treaty and its extension to New Zealand. Cutting off the extension of the benefits of this treaty to New Zealand would simply be equivalent to cutting off one limb of the tree; I am anxious to see the tree itself cut down. If Australia were to abandon what is generally known as the Paterson scheme, instituted for the promotion of the export trade in butter, we would be faced with importations of just as much butter from Australia as we are now receiving from New Zealand. I am unable to understand the attitude of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

Those who are raising beef and mutton are facing the same conditions that are being experienced by the producers of butter, and just here I should like to quote briefly from a letter which was sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by the Western Live Stock Growers' Association. It is dated November 18, 1929, and says:

> Australia has not been exporting beef into Canada until this year. We find there was none last year, against 1,616,000 pounds for the first nine months of this year, and the mutton and lamb exports to Canada have increased from 1,119,000 pounds last year to 3,359,000 pounds for the first nine months of this year, which, at the present rate, will amount to nearly four times as much lamb and mutton as the preceding year. New Zealand shipped us last year 1,756,000 pounds of beef as against 2,000,000 pounds for the first nine months of this year, also a big increase. These two countries have such an enormous advantage over us in the cost of raising cattle and sheep that we can easily understand that the ability to capture the Canadian market might only be measured by the time it takes to raise more stock on their almost limitless ranges. Formerly a large part of the Australian beef surplus was going to the United States, but we find that the sales there have been declining, one of the reasons being that they are getting a foothold in this country since the United States tariff has been increased.

I shall not read the whole letter, but it goes on to point out that steers are marketed in Australia at about $17 per head, and they have no chance of competing against stock raised under such conditions.

During the debate with regard to the New Zealand treaty the objection seemed to be with regard to butter. Butter is too slippery for me to stand on, and I should like to ask this question: Why should we listen to the complaint of the butter makers and agree to revise the treaty with New Zealand, and at the same time refuse to listen to the case brought forward by these stock growers and sheep men? Why make fish of one and flesh of another? That is one thing I cannot understand, and I think I am consistent in saying that if this house signifies by a large vote its approval of a revision of the New Zealand treaty, I do not see why we should not do away with the treaty with Australia. There is a provision in this treaty giving either country the privilege of abrogating it on six months' notice, and that is all we are asking the government to do.

I believe in low tariffs, and I believe that the farmers of western Canada cannot carry on their business successfully under a high tariff. The duties which were imposed on butter and eggs before the Australian treaty came into effect amounted to the equivalent of probably 10 per cent, and I believe that the farmers of western Canada would be willing to have all these articles on the free list if the government would put furniture, paints and oils, pumps, harness, kitchenware and all the rest of these things on the same level. But does any member of this house believe that the government, in negotiating a trade treaty with New Zealand or Australia, would be willing to put these things on a reciprocal basis? For instance, would the government reduce the duty on furniture and harness and a number of similar articles to the same level as the duty on butter and eggs? As I have said, I always have been an advocate of low tariffs, and when I have urged any reduction in the tariff it has not been on any article which was listed at anything like 10 per cent. I think there are many things on which the duty should be reduced.

One hon. member has charged us with being under the dictation of our organization, the United Farmers of Alberta. I am no more under the dictation of the United Farmers of Alberta, Mr. Speaker, than he is under the dictation of the Liberal party, and in fact not nearly so much. I was nominated by the United Farmers of Alberta in my constituency; my campaign was financed by the United Farmers of Alberta in my constituency, and as a rule I report to them once a year, at their annual convention. They have never attempted to dictate to me in any way. The United Farmers of Alberta is a body of farmers who have organized together for mutual assistance, mutual help and I might say mutual protection. Their motto is "Equal rights to all", and in asking for the abrogation of this treaty I believe I am living up to that motto.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have had an extended discussion upon the motion to go into supply and the amendment thereto, involving the abrogation of the Australian trade treaty negotiated some few years ago by the late Minister of Finance. A few days ago we also had a discussion with respect to the New Zealand treaty, which arose out of the Australian treaty.

May I venture to say that very frequently there is a confusion of thought as between the Australian and the New Zealand treaties; it is a habit on the part of some members of the house to refer to the New Zealand treaty as though it were the Australian treaty. Such, of course, is not the case. The Australian treaty was negotiated; the New Zealand treaty was not. The Australian treaty represented at least some discussion on the part of the contracting parties; the New Zealand treaty came into effect by an order in council passed under the provisions of section 5 of the Australian treaty. In the one case there was a frank and clear discussion and negotiation; in the other case there was nothing but an order in council in the belief that it was advisable to apply the Australian treaty to New Zealand, regardless of what the consequences might be. These, I think, are facts abundantly established by the record.

Then there is another question arising out of the New Zealand treaty. It has been successfully contended in this house, I think, not only by those who sit to the left of Mr Speaker but also by those who spoke from the government benches, that the New Zealand treaty has threatened the very life of one of the basic industries of Canada; that if it were continued in its operation undoubtedly it would destroy the dairy industry of Canada, and that a period of at least three years must elapse before the dairy industry in this country can regain the position which it held before the treaty was made, and which it lost by reason of the treaty.

In the case of Australia there is this clear distinction: The government, acting in what the Australian trade authorities believe not to be good faith, imposed upon the imports of butter a dumping duty amounting to 6 cents per pound. The effect of that duty was to shut off importations from Australia, it amounts to prohibition. No such dumping duty was brought into operation against importations from New Zealand. As a result the dairy industry in this country which, in the judgment of those who can speak with authority, is one of or perhaps the most important of the farm industries apart from the growing of grain, has been seriously injured. This industry also relates closely to the production of meats, of hides and of pork products sold in various parts of the world, and it has been established that unless something is done immediately there is grave danger with respect not only to the butter industry of Canada but also to the hog industry and the related meat industries throughout the country. The loss of 130,000 milch cows, according to the figures given by those able to speak with authority, would mean at least half a million less pigs produced in the country as compared with the years previous to this diminution.

Under these circumstances I never have had the least difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that such a trade treaty as that existing with New Zealand should be abrogated and a new treaty negotiated, substituting negotiation and discussion for direct executive action, and affording an opportunity to this parliament to pass upon the merits of that particular treaty, an opportunity which was not afforded when the treaty now in existence came into being.

We also have this further difficulty. At the moment this country is faced with conditions which certainly are alarming to the thoughtful man. We have an adverse trade balance increasing steadly, and we have therefore a condition which is the negation of that to which the Minister of Finance referred when he was dealing with the Australian situation. How long can this country continue with an adverse visible trade balance? Our trade with Australia, however, has resulted in a great favourable trade balance annually, according to the statements made this afternoon by the minister. That he regards as being very desirable. I made a mental note to ask him why, if it is so desirable in the case of Australia, is it not injurious to continue to increase the enormous adverse trade balance with the United States of America? That trade balance is measured not by millions but by hundreds of millions of dollars, and it must be paid either by the invisible balances or by gold. Under those circumstances, if it is true, and apparently it is true from what the minister has said—I do not think anyone will quarrel with that observation that a favourable trade balance is to be desired, the condition in regard to Australia has been favourable to Canada due to the action taken by the government in connection with the dumping clause.

One thing which there is a tendency to forget is that trade is of two kinds, internal and external. The expansion of this internal trade of this country between the provinces is something which should engage the attention of this government more fully than any other matter, but although that should be the case, we find that last year we bought from the United States nearly one billion dollars' worth of products for the purpose of supplying the internal trade of Canada. A portion of the goods imported was utilized for the manufacture of products which went into our external trade. But there again we meet with a difficulty. An hon. member the other day placed a question on the order paper asking the quantities of manufactured goods imported and sold. In order to understand the answer given he must have before him an explanation of how the classification is made. For instance, blister copper is classified as manufactured goods because it comes out of the smelter in blister form, which is exported not as a raw product, which it is so far as commerce is concerned, but as a manufactured product. I could name other commodities, such as lead, asbestos and pulp, all of which are partly fabricated or processed when they leave the country and which are classified for trade purposes as manufactured goods. It must be apparent to every thoughtful man that blister copper is of no use so far as manufacturing is concerned; it must be refined, and up until a few months ago all the refined copper which was used in Canada was imported from the United States. It is true that recently they have been doing something at Trail in the way of refining copper, but I mention that merely as an illustration of the difficulty in understanding trade statistics when the word "manufactured" is utilized in the sense in which it is in the trade returns of all countries. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) very properly admitted last year, when you use the word "manufactured" with reference to various commodities which are partly fabricated or processed before they leave Canada, you have a considerable volume of goods, but for the purpose of trade those goods are not manufactured. Some of the goods classified as manufactured goods, are, so far as business is concerned, nothing more than unmanufactured goods or raw material. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce was good enough to indicate the list from which the classification was made, but it is a very difficult thing to make accurate comparisons when you come to deal with copper, for instance, as raw material exported from Canada, and then have to deal with refined copper as a manufactured commodity imported from the United States. It is very difficult for the Canadian people to arrive at a fair comparison.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Bennett.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was directing attention to the failure of the government to deal with the problem of the internal trade of Canada on such a basis as would ensure the largest measure of employment to Canadians in the fabrication of our own raw materials which are exported so frequently under the name of manufactured materials. The internal trade of a country, even of a country of ten million people, is of transcendent importance, and the failure of the government to recognize that fact constitutes one of the strongest counts in the indictment against the administration. I again point out that last year to meet the internal trade of Canada we imported nearly $1,000,000,000 worth of goods from the United States. That meant for people outside of this country so much employment that might usefully have been brought here. While a portion of that $1,000,000,000 represented the purchase price of goods not produced in Canada, such as petroleum, oranges, lemons, and other tropical fruits, sugar and other commodities, there could have been expended in this country by the production of goods from our own materials to meet our requisites something between $300,000,000 and $500,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Much nearer $300,000,000 than $500,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That depends on how you arrive at what might be done; but certainly $300,000,000 is the minimum value of the goods that might have been produced in this country but were imported from abroad. So much for the problem of internal trade, which, I point out, the government has apparently entirely overlooked. While we appoint trade commissioners abroad we neglect the trade at home. While we are content to dwell upon the great volume of our exports and of the imports that we draw from foreign countries, we overlook the fact that this adverse trade with the United States amounts to some $400,000,000 which must be counterbalanced either by invisible balances or payments in gold which arise from favourable balances such as those we had last year with Australia and New Zealand.

Let us come to the problem of external trade. To put the matter briefly, the external trade of Canada may be divided into two classes, namely, the trade which arises from the sale of our natural products partly fabricated or wholly unfabricated—that is in the raw state—and to a small extent what is described as the fabricated or manufactured products of the country. As regards the first branch of our external trade, I can illustrate it by the exports of asbestos, pig lead, silver, blister copper, pulpwood, logs and various other raw materials such as gypsum from Nova Scotia. I direct the attention of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) to that. Then if you turn to what might be called the partly fabricated articles, there might be included in that class some of those that I have just mentioned, such as blister copper, partly refined nickel, and other minerals and metals that hon. members present will have in mind. The wholly manufactured goods consist largely of commodities such as newsprint which, outside of grain and grain products, constitutes the largest single item in our exports. Grain products constitute the largest body of our exports. That in itself is again subdivided into manufactured products such as flour and other cereal products and the raw wheat, rye, barley and other grains. It is within the memory of hon. members that the combined value of the exports of grain and grain products and of wood and wood products amounts to between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 of the $1,200,000,000 constituting our exports, or, as a matter of fact, a little more in a good year. If you add to that the partly fabricated metal and mineral products you have in those items substantially over $1,000,000,000 of the entire exports of the country. Those items, as I have said, are either wholly raw or partly manufactured or wholly manufactured. To absorb those goods in their raw state various countries find no difficulty. The United States of America is almost entirely dependent upon Canada for some forms of raw materials. There are in every part of the world countries engaged in the business of manufacturing that are importing large quantities of our partly manufactured or processed materials. For instance, asbestos and nickel go across the ocean in large quantities. Many of our minerals find a market in Japan or Germany where they are fabricated into goods that come back to this country and are sold in competition with our own goods, and are manufactured under labour and other conditions with which we cannot compete.

But at the moment I am not dealing with that phase of the matter; I am dealing only with the division of our external trade into the classes to which I have alluded, and I am pointing out that with respect to our raw material practically every country in the world, our great neighbour to the south in particular, is drawing from us. Then we come to our partly fabricated materials and we find the United States drawing from us pulp, which after all is only partly fabricated. As regards fabricated materials we find them drawing from us almost our entire export of newsprint—I shall speak presently of that—and other goods of that class.

How are we able to carry on this external trade? The United States have trade commissioners in every part of the globe. They have their consular agents here and their business is to see what they can do to create markets for their products. This summer I was in a small community in Canada half way between the east and the west and I found there that the consular agent had been busy soliciting business in the broad sense in connection with a contract that had been recently awarded for the construction of a new hospital. Wherever goods are required, whether door locks at the Chateau Laurier or hardware of any kind in which trade may be afforded to the producers of their own country, you will find the consular agents of the United States seeking that market for their people. We have through the vision of Sir George Foster, established trade commissioners in different parts of the world. They have endeavoured to the best of their ability to do the same sort of business for Canada as American consular agents have done for the United States. We have extended our trade to a great many countries. It has been developed very greatly during the last few years, but that trade has not been in the materials that will make business for Canada. It has been in those partly manufactured goods and those raw materials which go to the countries to which I have referred.

Let me go further. The United States foreign trade to-day consists of less than 10 per cent of their whole trade, actually about 8 per cent. As the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) related the other day, in a classic discussion between Mr. Blain and Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Blain pointed out that the policy of the United States was the policy which this country should adopt; that the internal trade of the United States belonged to the American people and after they had secured a monopoly against any possible competitors in their own market, they would go to the outside world with their external trade, and destroy competition with the surplus products of their factories. What has happened in this country? By reason of the fiscal policies that we have adopted we have been ever seeking more and more external markets, while the internal trade of our country has been sacrificed to the United States of America. Do you mean to tell me that any country with a population and rich resources such as Canada has should be buying one billion dollars' worth of goods a year from the United States? Do you mean to tell me that that sort of thing would be at all possible if this country were doing its duty to its own citizens? The hon. gentleman referred this afternoon to what had been done by other countries and pointed out the favourable balance of exports over imports. I might point out to him and to this house that the real truth is that the favourable balance of trade of the United States, amounting as it does, in some years, to billions of dollars, has laid the foundation for their vast accretion of material resources that has enabled them to expand their foreign trade to every part of the world and to meet competition on terms that have driven many of the former competitors out of those markets.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What do they take in exchange for all these goods?

Mr. BENNETT: Gold. I wonder if the hon. gentleman knows that the adverse balance of trade of other countries with the United States is compensated for in gold, and that to-day the United States is the largest depository of gold in the world, which furnishes the basis of a national credit unequalled in the history of finance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend does not contend that this all came from their foreign trade?

Mr. BENNETT: Does the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) not know that the major part of it came from foreign trade during the great war, from exports paid for in gold, which meant a surplus of exports over imports?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Exactly. I agree with my hon. friend now.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What effect did all this gold coming into the United States have on prices and on the cost of living in the United States?

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman has raised the question of the cost of living, let me tell him that the cost of living in Canada to-day has reached the figure of 160 as compared with 100 for pre-war prices, and the cost of living to-day in Canada is higher than in the United States. That is the fact. What is more, from January, 1922, when this government assumed office, the figures supplied by the Labour department last month show that the lowest figure was 155, 100 being the basis, and the figure is now 160, whereas in the United States there has been a greater diminution in the cost of living in those years than in Canada. Further, there has been a higher standard of living in the United States than in any other country in the world. There are no 25-cent an hour men working for the United States of America. What is more, the production of wealth in the United States is higher than in any other country in the world of which we have any record.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Do you mean the per capita production?

Mr. BENNETT: Not the per capita production of new wealth, but the largest production in percentages. The hon. gentleman knows that. If it is desired, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) seems to think it is, to have a favourable trade balance, which has been the basis of the accumulation of the national wealth of the United States, a very large volume of the gold which furnishes the basis of unlimited credit has arisen because of the surplus of exports over imports. I wonder if hon. gentlemen saw the figures of last year's trade balance. I wonder if the Minister of Finance realizes, as some business men on that side of the house must, that this Dominion last year took nearly one billion dollars of the export trade of the United States; for what was to us imports was to them exports. While we were creating an unfavourable trade balance for Canada, they were creating the greatest favourable trade balance of any country in the world. These are the facts; we must look them in the face. The day of theories, of platitudinous reference to dictionaries and old historic volumes on free trade are a thing of the past. We are living in the realm of realities; we have to deal with actualities. When I read the observations of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar), I realize that it will not be the great apostasy of which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has spoken so learnedly that requires discussion; it will be something worse than that. I agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote); I am not concerned in the argument between these two rival factions as to which side of the house they should sit on. It is quite within the competence of the hon. member for Lisgar and his friends to associate themselves with the government of the day and thereby abandon their former friends, if they wish to do it. That is only a matter for history; it is not a matter in which we have any deep concern. We leave it at that. But it is not the same kind of thing when we come to deal with a minister of the crown; of whom more anon.

I would point out to the hon. member for Weyburn that we are no longer living in a day when we can discuss this matter in an academic sense. We are confronted with a condition in which our external trade, thanks to hon. gentlemen opposite, has been menaced and destroyed by the invasion and penetration of our market by our great neighbours to the south, who have taken it from us to the extent of nearly one billion dollars a year, and thus compelled Canadians to seek abroad in external fields a market for their products. Those markets can be made possible only by tremendous effort, in which the nation itself has assisted. We have assisted by subsidizing steamship lines, by subsidizing lines of communication other than steamship routes, by reducing the postal rates, by sending our trade commissioners to every part of the world to develop and expand our trade. All these things we have done. Why? Because we have been compelled to do it through the neglect of our own government to care for our own trade. That is the reason. If a storekeeper in a village permits trade to go to a rival from outside the community, and has to go to other communities far removed to find a market, I wonder if there is any man who would not say that that storekeeper had neglected his own home market, his own community. It is the internal trade of the country which has made the United States what it is. By securing a monopoly of its own domestic business, and exporting the surplus of the mass production of its mills and factories, it has been able to destroy the export trade that other countries enjoyed before the war. These are post war conditions. Once more I say Canada is dealing with actualities.

Let me point out that the other method by which we expand trade is by negotiating trade treaties. Perhaps the most classic example of a trade treaty—I thought of it this afternoon as the Minister of Finance was speaking—is the trade treaty negotiated between France and Great Britain in the days of Cobden. You will all recall his attachment to free trade, and the conditions that existed in France with its highly protective tariff in the days of the Second Empire. You will all recall that Mr. Cobden, in consequence of a chance conversation that he had with a well known free trade economist of France, Mr. Chevalier, made up his mind to see if a trade treaty could not be made between France and Great Britain, because France at that time was a highly protectionist country while Britain under Peel had become more or less attached to free trade. I have here the life of Cobden by John Morley, and I read these words at page 239 of the second volume:

> In the early part of September, Cobden paid a visit to Hawarden, and there he opened his mind to Mr. Gladstone. They were both of them thoroughly alive to the objections to which on strictly economic grounds treaties of commerce must always be open.

Now, I should like that sentence to be engraven on the memories of some of my friends opposite:

> They were both of them thoroughly alive to the objections to which on strictly economic grounds treaties of commerce must always be open.

I heard some of them from my friends this afternoon, some of the grounds that were in the minds of Cobden and Gladstone at that time. Now, let me proceed with this quotation:

> They both felt it to be perfectly true, if economic rules were never under any circumstances to be contravened, that, as Mr. Bright had already said, it was our business to look to our own tariffs, and to release French products from the duties that prevented our trading with France; and this without any stipulation as to what France should do in return. But then they felt that the occasion was one which could not be judged in this simple way. An economic principle by itself, as all sensible men have now learnt, can never be decisive of anything in the mixed and complex sphere of practice.

Now, sir, could any words more aptly describe the situation which in 1930 prevailed between Australia and Canada and that which prevailed between France and England in 1859?

> But then they felt that the occasion was one which could not be judged in this simple way. An economic principle by itself, as all sensible men have now learnt, can never be decisive of anything in the mixed and complex sphere of practice. Neither Cobden nor Mr. Gladstone could resist the force of M. Chevalier's emphatic assurance, that in no other way could the French tariff be altered in the direction of free trade than through a diplomatic act, that is to say, a commercial treaty with England. The emperor, moreover, in spite of his absolutist system, was practically powerless to reduce his duties, unless the English government gave him the help of a corresponding movement on their side.
> Mr. Gladstone discerned both the opportunity which such a movement would afford for continuing the great work of tariff reform, and the strong influence that a commercial treaty would have upon the violent and dangerous perturbations in the political sentiment of the two nations towards one another.

After a few more lines, he proceeds:

> He was, in fact, continuing the work which Sir Robert Peel had begun in 1842, along the very lines which Peel had then expressly laid down. In the case of wine and brandy, Sir Robert Peel had said that he did not reduce the duty, because he hoped that they might employ these duties—

I commend these words to my hon. friends on the government side, words quoted from Sir Robert Peel:

—"as instruments of negotiation, with a view of effecting a reduction in the duties imposed by other countries on the produce of our own country."

I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize the true significance of those words. Let me repeat them:

—"as instruments of negotiation, with a view of affecting a reduction in the duties imposed by other countries on the produce of our own country."

Again quoting from Sir Robert Peel:

"I am disposed, to carry too far that principle of withholding from ourselves the benefits of reduction of duties in order to force other nations to act in a reciprocal manner, and in many cases we weakened the effect of instruments we held in our own hands by reducing the duty of articles relative to which negotiations might have been entered into. Our general rule was that in cases where the articles were elements of manufacture, or where there was risk from smuggling, we took to ourselves the advantage likely to arise from a reduction of duty on these articles; but in others, wine for example, we made no reduction of duty, and intend to make no reduction of duty, in the hope that we shall induce other countries to give to us an equivalent advantage." The discussion therefore between Mr. Gladstone and Cobden at Hawarden in 1859 turned upon the means of realizing the hope then expressed by Sir Robert Peel in 1843, and expressed by him not casually, but as an element in a deliberate policy.

Now, sir, that principle laid down by Sir Robert Peel in 1843, and once more asserted by Gladstone in his conversation with Cobden in 1859, made possible in the end a commercial treaty between France and Great Britain. It laid the foundation of the great fame and reputation of Cobden, and it also did much to improve relations between the two countries. The principle laid down by Peel I commend to my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) in particular, and I commend it to every other hon. member: that the reduction of duties in themselves may imperil the very negotiation that has to be carried on for the purpose of making decent commercial treaties with the countries with whom you would deal. That principle apparently was in the mind of the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), because when he endeavoured first of all to negotiate a treaty—after negotiations had been initiated by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in the short time that he was at the department—he did so on the theory that having as he had an opportunity to increase the general tariff to have something to bargain with, he reduced the items which were to be the subject matter of negotiation so he would be able to make a reasonable agreement. But hon. gentlemen would not permit that to be done. It was not done, with the result that this treaty was negotiated between Australia and Canada, and I say frankly to the house that had I been a member at that time I should have voted against the treaty. That treaty disregarded certain fundamental principles that should obtain in the negotiation of treaties between countries. One of them was referred to by my hon. friend from Vacouver North (Mr. McRae) yesterday. It is this: no treaty made between this country and any other country in the world, whether it be the motherland, a sister dominion, or a British colony, is ever upon a sound basis if its effect is to destroy a basic industry of this country. That is fundamental. The effect of the treaty made without negotiation, by order in council, was, as I pointed out this afternoon, to destroy one of our basic industries. This so-called Australian treaty negotiated by the late Minister of Finance was a treaty which but for the bad faith shown by the Canadian government in putting a dumping duty upon Australian butter, would have wrecked entirely the industry that has been so seriously threatened by the treaties that have been made. There is no gainsaying that. It is obvious to every man and is known to all.

Let us see what happened. When that treaty was negotiated and brought down to this house for acceptance, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen pointed out exactly what would happen, the member for Welland (Mr. Pettit) also pointed out exactly what would happen, and it has happened exactly as they said. But the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) put the dumping clause in operation against Australian butter, although the Paterson agreement was in force at the very time that the treaty was negotiated. That Paterson agreement was not something new, it did not suddenly spring into being, but it afforded the government in the view of the Australians an excuse, not a reason, to do something which they say, and I think properly so, is not in good faith between two countries making treaties one with the other. That is only five short years ago. Let me recall what has happened since. In the meantime we have established a channel of trade for some of our products in Australia, and they have established a trade for some of their products here. I was rather amused—shall I say?—than surprised by the observations made by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) yesterday in connection with the extensive business in nails and wire that Canada is doing with Australia. He told us all about the Sydney nail works. Well, how many nails do you think we sold to Australia last year from Nova Scotia?—$8,000 worth! Those are the figures given by the department—$17,971 in all, of which $8,000 worth went from there; and of wire, out of the total, $40,000 worth went from Nova Scotia. So that the great Besco plant in Nova Scotia was able to sell to Australia, under this treaty, $48,000 worth of goods, including the nail that was found in the box.

Leaving that for the moment may I point out that when the treaty came into this house the hon. gentleman who at present holds the portfolio of Minister of Railways and Canals voted for it, and his colleagues to my left voted against it. It was one more instance in which for some reason undisclosed on the record they and he viewed it somewhat differently. Whether or not he with his keen vision and prophetic sight could look into the future and see himself occupying the office of Minister of Railways we do not know; at any rate, he managed on that occasion to vote for the treaty.

Now, when the treaty came into this house, what happened? From the discussion that took place the house realized that if it were carried out in the terms indicated it would not be beneficial to this Dominion. Although I was not in the house at the time, I want to say clearly that I cannot see how I could have supported that treaty. What is more, the late Minister of Finance realized the possible injuries to Canada in connection with it. It is a well known fact that he said not a pound of butter—or an insignificant amount—would come in under that treaty. So certain was the Prime Minister of it that when he spoke in Woodstock a few months after, pointing out the benefits of the treaty, he told the people there that if by any possible chance it could be shown that the treaty would be injurious to the interests of Canada the government would take steps to annul or cancel or abrogate it. Yet a week later, without negotiation, the government passed an order in council which, by executive action, made that treaty applicable entirely to New Zealand. We have all seen the result.

What is the present condition? We have an entirely different situation from what we had then. To-day in Canada we have an adverse trade balance of over $100,000,000 per annum. Has anybody looked without some alarm at the trade figures of this country for January and February? Has any thoughtful man who knows business at all studied them without realizing that if employment is to be given to the Canadian artisan every Canadian must do his utmost to sell goods wherever he can get a chance to sell them? It is because of that very fact that we who sit to the left, ever mindful of our obligation, have from that day to this, as you will find upon the records of the house, suggested to the government not the annulment or abrogation of the treaty at a time like this, but that the treaty should be amended to the mutual advantage of both countries. I make a clear distinction between Australia and New Zealand in that regard. We cannot afford to risk for a single moment the destruction of a great basic industry, the dairy industry in this country, confronted as we are with unemployment, with our industrial fabric threatened, and the markets of France, Italy and Germany shut out from the Canadian wheat farmer by hostile tariffs that have reached a maximum of 80 cents a bushel. I say to my friends to my left that they might better withdraw this resolution than have it before parliament at this time, the economic conditions in Canada being what they are.

Take the paper industry. Over-production, which is not the fault of this government, has compelled Canadians to accept a price for their paper in the markets of the United States and other parts of the world that according to modern economists is below its real cost and value. I wonder if hon. members know that newsprint shipped from this country to Australia and New Zealand netted the producer less than $42 a ton? And do they realize what that means? In order that the machines might be operated at capacity newsprint, the surplus product of those machines, has been sold abroad during the last twelve months at a price that has not met the cost of production. That surplus product had to find a market. If these conditions continue, can we afford to abrogate the treaty ? Having regard to present economic conditions in Canada; having regard to the almost superhuman effort that industrialists and others are making to provide employment for artisans, can we afford to abrogate that treaty? For my part, though I would have voted against the treaty had I been in the house at the time, realizing the conditions prevailing in this country to-day I am not prepared to vote for its abrogation—my hon. friend (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) is concerned only about laughing over the evils that come to this country. It is an old story; the hon. gentleman's efforts are restricted to smiling at injuries which have been done to the people of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I very seldom interrupt a speaker, but I wish to correct my hon. friend. I am not laughing at the ills that befall the people of this country; I am laughing at my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I would think my hon. friend would do, because his appreciation of the treaty is usually indicated by laughter; that is his usual practice. It is the old story: Nero fiddled while Rome burned. The hon. member contents himself with that and pays no attention to words of warning. But the warnings were given in this house five years ago; they were given when the treaty was entered into, and the very conditions have arisen which were then forecast by those who sat to the left of the Speaker. Those are the facts; sophistry or casuistry will not change the record of history. It is there; it is embalmed in Hansard. I ask the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Railways and Canals or any other member of the administration: Can you afford at this moment to abrogate the treaty? The Minister of Finance is not in his place, but I ask: What has Australia been saying during the last three years? What has Australia said in the last six months? Who will answer that question for the government? Australia has said: We will not tolerate any longer the adverse balance of trade against us in the form in which it now exists. We want improved treaties and improved conditions; we want a nearer approach to equilibrium as between the two countries than we have now. It is not we who have demanded that; they have demanded it. I ask the Minister of Finance, or someone on behalf of the government, to say whether or not the attitude my hon. friends take to-night is taken because they desire the people of Australia to say that the Canadian people are heartily behind the treaty which the Australian people say they will no longer tolerate. That is the question. We will not be deluded with any sophistry such as that which the Minister of Finance indulges in, when he suggests we should take this action. Some of us know what the Australian government is doing; we know what it has done. We know from the utterances of their public men and by communications from our own trade commissioners that these people are not acquiescent in the present conditions. How, then, are they to be remedied? They are to be remedied only by fresh negotiations, and when the government to-night asks this house to vote against the abrogation of the treaty, speaking for myself and for my friends here, owing to the conditions confronting this country at present I am not prepared to vote for the abrogation of the treaty. But we say to the government that by our vote we are not prepared to mark our approval of the treaty beyond the opportunity that may come during the next few months for the government to see what can be done; because if we do not move our great neighbours have intimated that they propose to take steps in the matter. The government of Australia has said that it will not longer tolerate this condition, and I believe what it has said it means. When this action was taken by my hon. friends to my left I thought, as I think now, that it was not the opportune moment. As I say, I am prepared to vote against the abrogation of the treaty at the moment, with this warning to the government: Unless conditions change between now and this time next year, when they will not be here and others will be responsible for the conduct of the government of this country, my position will be different. In the very nature of things, the treaty must be revised, because it cannot continue. The people of Australia have intimated that they will not permit it to continue, and the people of this country know that there are paragraphs in it which operate entirely against the economic well being of Canada.

These are my reasons for the position I have taken. I have occupied some little time in developing my views in this respect, because trade is something, after all, that every business man knows something about in practice, if not in theory. The hon. gentleman who is Minister of Railways and Canals occupied a very important business position during the time he was out of this house; he can tell you some of the hardships that are encountered in the conduct of business. Business in these days is not the simple thing that some imagine it to be; in one respect it is a very great science, and in another respect it is indeed simple. It is all nonsense talking about exports paying for imports; that theory was exploded in practice long ago. Every man who has studied the history and operation of business knows that. Why should any one come here with theories from text books fifty or sixty years old and try to make other people believe that the science of political economy does not progress, that it endures but does not change? We all know in practice that what has made the United States the country it is to-day in material resources alone—

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): And in unemployment.

Mr. McINTOSH: They have 6,000,000 unemployed.

Mr. BENNETT: So the figure is increasing now.

Mr. VALLANCE: How old was the book from which you quoted?

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. gentleman had a brain wave? What with interruptions from three sources at once, we have the figures of unemployment in the United States at 6,000,000, 4,000,000 and 3,000,000. Well, it is not for me to say how large the figure may be, but this I will say: The history of unemployment in the United States was that of an inevitable condition. Any thoughtful observer of trends in connection with trade realized the inevitability of the present result. If you substitute machines for men to the extent to which that has been done during the last five years—

Mr. VALLANCE: We have not been doing that.

Mr. BENNETT: I know the hon. gentleman has not, because the only machine of which he had any knowledge was broken during the last election in Saskatchewan. In his case it is not from lack of willingness to try but rather from lack of opportunity. However, let us proceed a step further with the point I was developing.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the hon. gentleman mind telling us who broke that machine?

Mr. BENNETT: I would say, the common sense and the outraged conscience of a free people. At any rate, the fact is that there is unemployment in the United States. But I wonder if hon. gentlemen ever thought of unemployment in a great country whose natural resources have been established by favourable balances of trade reaching into billions of dollars and extended over a period of a quarter of a century, as compared with a young, undeveloped territory with a population of 10,000,000 people and an adverse trade balance amounting to over $100,000,000 in a year. I wonder if the hon. gentleman realizes the implications of that statement. My hon. friend from North Battleford must realize them, as every thoughtful man does; as I do, with all the sense of responsibility I have. I am sorry my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) seemed to think that one who by toil accumulated a little wealth and then, because he was called upon to accept a place of trust and responsibility, abandoned occupations from which he was formerly able to derive a large income, is thinking of himself all the time. That is not so. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, if he had had the same opportunities that I had, would have abandoned those occupations. Let him answer that before he goes out of this house to attack me with respect to my attitude towards business. I would just remind him of that. It is all very well to exalt the necessity of men giving themselves to public life, but when a young member of this house goes out upon the public platform and denounces men who, by their own efforts, have accumulated a little money and then have abandoned their former occupations, which were very profitable indeed, in an endeavour to render some little service to Canada, he is not giving the best that is in him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do you say that is what I did?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the Globe reports my hon. friend as having done at St. Catharines.

Mr. ILSLEY: I denounced nobody.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend quibbles over the use of a word. He did not denounce; he only disapproved and he ridiculed the idea that the man of wealth was able to do anything for his country. That is what he did, he intimated that the men who had accomplished something in this world were incapable of serving the state.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I desire to state what I said. I said that gentlemen of great wealth had a distinctive and peculiar outlook upon problems, which was not that of the great mass of the people. That is all.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the hon. gentleman is reported as having said. He named the front benches on this side of the house and said they were filled with millionaires, and he mentioned the attitude they would have towards the problems of the people. Well, it was not so long ago that I was very poor, and I am not ashamed to say it. Neither am I ashamed to say that in my day I have made a great deal of money, but no man can say that a dollar of it has been made dishonestly. It is time that sort of thing should be stopped.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who said it was?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman was reflecting upon a man who had accumulated a million dollars as being unfit to serve the state.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is entirely misrepresenting me. He does not accept my correction.

Mr. BENNETT: The Toronto Globe reports the speech of the hon. gentleman at St. Catharines, and I take it as being an accurate report. Now sir—

Mr. CAHILL: Withdraw the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Withdraw what? I am quoting from the Toronto Globe, and my hon. friend says it is an inaccurate statement of what he said.

Mr. McMILLAN: The hon gentleman is forced to accept the statement of an hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member says the report in the newspaper is inaccurate, that is all. I have referred to the report which appeared in the paper. Let my hon. friend quarrel with the paper and not with me; let him write his letter of retraction to the paper; let him set himself right. I expect to be in St. Catharines to-morrow and then I will find out what he did say, from people who heard him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me make the statement—

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to have any statement made during the course of my remarks. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: I have permitted the hon gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: No interruption without the consent of the hon. member speaking, is permissible unless it is on a question of privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman can make a speech later. There can be no question of privilege in the middle of my remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no interruption during the course of an address without the consent of the speaker, unless it is on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman may speak on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BENNETT: There can be no question of privilege in the middle of my speech. If the hon. gentleman wishes to ask a question I am quite willing that he should do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I have the floor.

Mr. BENNETT: There can be no question of privilege in the middle of my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must state his question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: But he does not state it in the middle of my speech; he raises the point after I have sat down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If he thinks it arises from a statement made by the hon. gentleman surely he is entitled to state his question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: But not to interrupt my remarks. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are certain rules of order which govern debates in this house. I said that if the hon. gentleman desired to ask a question he might do so. He did ask his question and I have answered it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have been attacked for what I said in St. Catharines, I presume. I am going to state what I said in St. Catharines; it is very simple. My hon. friend has stated that I attacked men of great wealth, and he has said that I intimated that he did not make his money honestly.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a fair inference from what my hon. friend said.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman spent several moments trying to establish that he made his money honestly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not accuse the hon. member of not making his money honestly.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. ILSLEY: I made no reference to the hon. gentleman personally.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that the hon. gentleman had said I made money dishonestly, nor did I intimate it. He attacked members on the front bench.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) to take his seat.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I was observing when I was interrupted that business was a rather complex matter in these days, and I was trying to point out what was involved in the exports and imports of a country. I have endeavoured as best I could to point out what this government has done with relation to these matters, and I repeat that with the economic situation now existing in Canada, we dare not in any sense lessen the markets which may be available for the products of this country without facing the responsibility of putting Canadians out of work. That is what it means.

The observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon that the business was largely from British Columbia is not borne out by the facts. Sixty per cent of the newsprint which entered Australia and New Zealand came from eastern Canada, not from the west coast.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about it?

Mr. BENNETT: Because of the speeches made by British Columbia members it has been asserted in the house this afternoon that this was purely a British Columbia matter.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. member sorry that that business came from other parts of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: Could anything be worse than that—an hon. gentleman rising in his place and asking me if I am sorry that this business came from eastern Canada and not from the west? It is the old story of the east against the west; they cannot conceive of a man living in western Canada having any but a prejudicial feeling against the east. I wonder if the hon. gentleman realizes that most of us were born in eastern Canada and went to western Canada to live, and that we believe in one Canada, not nine Canadas or a divided Canada. That bears out the observations of the hon. Minister of Railways when he said that we must not permit benefits to accrue to the east at the expense of the west. He was reported as saying that the other day at Brandon when he accepted office.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend is quite mistaken.

Mr. BENNETT: The press may have reported it wrongly. It is not a question of east or west, it is a question of Canada as a whole. When the Australian treaty was made it was made for the whole of Canada, not the west alone, and when there was an effort this afternoon, as there has been on other occasions, to make the house believe that this is a purely western business, the fact is that sixty per cent of the newsprint imported into Australia came from eastern and not western Canada. It is true the fish products came largely from the west, but other articles came from Cape Breton; there was steel from the British Empire Steel Corporation. As far as I know there are no steel plants in western Canada. The products mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Hants-Kings were products produced in the east and not in the west.

Mr. BANCROFT: I hope my hon. friend has not forgotten that there is a large steel plant at Selkirk.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that plant carries on a very large export business with Australia; as I understand it, it is engaged largely in the melting of scrap.

In view of the circumstances to which I have alluded, this house will be well advised—I wish my hon. friend to the left had withdrawn his resolution after it had been discussed—to realize that the time is not ripe for the abrogation of this treaty. In saying that, I want the government to understand clearly that I for my own part, and for those who are associated with me, reserve the right to insist on the abrogation of that treaty should conditions arise to warrant that step being taken. If Canadian industry is placed in the future upon a solid basis, under an intelligent and a sane fiscal policy which will restore prosperity to Canada, that treaty, along with others, must be subject to revision. The Australians already have intimated that that is their intention, and we on our part cannot be solely in control of the negotiations.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I thought we were supposed to be discussing the Australian treaty, but after listening for an hour and a quarter to the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I begin to wonder whether we are discussing the Australian treaty or the general economic situation.

Mr. BENNETT: The one arises out of the other.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not propose to spend very much time in discussing the general economic situation, but I would like to refer to a few matters which we have heard mentioned so frequently from across the floor of the house. There never has been an attempt on the part of this government to negotiate a treaty, there never has been an attempt on the part of this government to deal with the tariff, but that we have been told by the opposition that we were going to ruin Canada. It has been only within the last two or three years that they have ceased crying blue ruin. I challenge any hon. member opposite to deny that assertion having been made by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and by my hon. friend who is now leading the Conservative party.

Mr. BENNETT: I deny absolutely that I have ever preached blue ruin in this country; there is the answer.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will accept cheerfully my hon. friend's denial, but it is about on a par with his statement to-night—at which I smiled—that had he been in the house at the time he would have voted against the Australian treaty, but that he was not prepared to-night to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We hear a great deal about the condition in which Canada finds herself, but we have not heard a word during this present debate about the wonderful prosperity of the United States. That country has increased its tariff in order to protect its farmers and its industry, but not a word has been uttered upon this occasion as to the prosperity of that country. What has happened? There is more unemployment to-day in the United States than there is in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes, my hon. friends have admitted it. We have heard much in the past about the prosperity of the United States, brought about by an increase in their tariff, and that was offered as an example to the Canadian government as to what should be done in the interests of the Canadian people. That country has increased its tariff, and in view of that action it was pointed out how much had been gained by our mighty neighbour across the line. But what about this present debate? We have not heard a thing about the United States. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the prosperity of Canada during the period this government has been in office has never been excelled in any period in her history. I make that assertion without fear of contradiction.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. minister should go down to the maritime provinces.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I read the press of the maritime provinces, and what does it say? That the maritime provinces now are enjoying unprecedented prosperity. I know my hon. friend will not say that.

An hon. MEMBER: I know the conditions prevailing there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend has said that the implementing of the Duncan report has performed a wonderful service for the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON: But that report has not been fully implemented.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is one thing yet to be done, and when that is done my hon. friend will admit that the maritimes have never received from any government the treatment which they have received from this government. In reply to my hon. friend's assertion that conditions in Canada have not been prosperous; that the splendid situation in the United States has been built up through all the generations during which they have enjoyed protective tariffs—that is his argument—and that our internal trade is suffering because we do not build up protective tariffs, I am not going into details; I simply leave the question to the good judgment of the house. We are at the present time suffering a depression in common with every other country but not to the same extent that it has hit the other countries with whom we are doing business.

My hon. friend spent about twenty minutes in discussing the advisability of being very careful in regard to treaties. He will not deny that if a treaty is to be brought about, there must be concessions on both sides. Both countries expect to get something out of a treaty, otherwise it would not be negotiated by either. I do not think that can be contradicted. We would not make treaties except for the purpose of mutual benefits, and naturally each country is extremely anxious to receive the outmost advantage out of any treaty made with the other. I know full well my hon. friend will argue that there would not have been much wrong with the Australian treaty if we had raised the general tariff. How would the raising of the general tariff affect the situation at this time of which my hon. friend is complaining? What is the complaint? It is that as regards natural products such as butter, beef, wool, mutton we are allowing the importation of those commodities to the detriment of the agricultural community. I ask him the question: had we accepted his suggestion and had we raised the general tariff, or if you please, left it at what it was before the treaty was negotiated, to what extent would it have stopped the importation of butter into Canada at this time? May I tell him?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell my hon. friend. Imposing the dumping duty answers that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The dumping duty, my hon. friend says, has stopped the importation of Australian butter.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But it did not stop the importation of Australian mutton or beef. It has not stopped the importation of New Zealand butter, but the conditions that exist in Canada to-day have so far been more favourable than in any other country purchasing those commodities. I do not think anyone will deny that. I think it is a perfectly proper statement that the prices of butter, beef and mutton in Canada are very much higher than in other countries. We were competitors in all those commodities in the British market. We were exporters of butter. To-day we are out of the export butter business.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Why?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Because we are shipping cream and milk to the United States. As soon as we reach the point where we can satisfy our home consumption, we shall be exporting again. That is the reason we are not exporting butter. We are exporting cheese, as my hon. friends will agree, and we have to take world prices for that commodity when we are on an export basis. I have some sympathy with the complaint of my hon. friends. They claim that the remedy is to give food products in Canada the same measure of protection that is given to manufactured articles. I would be willing to consider it if I thought it would do the farming community any good. Did such action do the United States farmer any good? That is the difficulty of the United States government to-day and with the exception of France, the United States enjoys the highest protective tariff in Christendom. Nevertheless the farmers of the United States with a protective home market are in a worse situation than the Canadian farmers. I make the claim that in seven years out of ten—and this has been the history of Canada—food products have been on an export basis. We are not on an export basis to-day as regards butter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Why?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Simply because of the increased consumption of butter in Canada; not because we have been suffering with respect to manufactured products as my hon. friend would have us believe, but because we have increased in manufactured products by leaps and bounds and because we have consumed and are consuming more butter. As a matter of fact as regards the consumption of butter, Canada ranks perhaps the highest in the world, consuming 29 pounds per annum per capita. It is because we have had prosperity that our people have been able to buy butter. The moment we go on an export basis again with respect to butter or any other commodity, we shall have to take world prices and again we shall be competitors of New Zealand and Australia in the British or any other market that is buying commodities of this character.

I do not contend for a moment that something cannot be done with the Australian treaty. I would regret it if we were to lose the advantage of the Australian market, because it means and will mean much to Canada. I am in favour of increasing to the fullest extent and by every possible means inter-empire trade, trade with Britain and with the overseas dominions. I believe this commonwealth of nations will profit tremendously by treaties that will increase the trade of overseas dominions one with another. If we are to have a trade treaty with New Zealand or Australia, there are few commodities that Australia and New Zealand have for export other than food products. If they cannot make a trade treaty with a country that can take some of those products, a moderate supply of them. I do not see what advantage the Australians or New Zealanders are going to have in making a trade treaty at all. But we in Canada have been friendly competitors of theirs in the British market, and that market has fixed the price for our butter, cheese, wheat, and generally speaking for all the food products that we have to export. At the present time my hon. friends are taking advantage of a situation when they find the Canadian market for butter the highest in price of any market in the world, higher even than the United States. My hon. friend forgot to mention that. The price of butter in Canada is higher than that in the United States where they have three times the protection that the Canadian government has placed against butter.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what last week's New York market shows.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Two weeks ago in Chicago and two weeks ago in New York the quotations were one cent lower than Canadian prices.

Mr. McGIBBON: That was not the case yesterday.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There may be fluctuations. My hon. friend will not deny that there is very little difference in the price to-day, but a year ago and two years ago he was making the welkin ring in regard to having for food products a protected market such as the United States has. We do not hear that now. It was that which brought me to my feet on this occasion, because I am not in the habit of making speeches in the house. My hon. friends are attempting to take advantage of a situation that is only temporary, because as I say—and my hon. friend can look up the figures and see whether or not I am wrong—at least seven years out of ten we shall be on an export basis so far as butter and other food products are concerned. If Canada is to progress, to go forward, we must have markets for those food products. It will be generations before we can consume all that we can produce in this country.

The complaint of hon. gentlemen opposite is that we have not protected our home market. Without going into details or giving figures, I state most emphatically that within the last five years we have increased our manufacturing to a greater degree than in any other five year period in the history of Canada. That was not done by increasing tariffs; rather the reverse. Then we are criticized by some hon. gentlemen for not decreasing tariffs still further. When we find ourselves in a situation such as I have described, with a market that consumes more than it produces of but one commodity, perhaps two—because we have to import bacon at the present time, whereas formerly we were exporting bacon—we are told that we should right-about-face and declare that the policy that we have followed, and under which our trade and manufacturing has developed to a greater degree than ever before, is all wrong. It is a perfect absurdity. If hon. gentlemen opposite were in office to-morrow, and they increased the duty against American or Australian butter, they would put our agriculturists in the same position as that in which the American agriculturists find themselves to-day, and the United States government, in that highly protected country, is at the present time offering various kinds of encouragement to the American farmer. With a surplus production, the export price regulates the price in the home market. That is a situation that we cannot get over. I might believe in protection were it not for this very stubborn fact that faces me upon every occasion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are the American farmers asking for lower tariffs?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The American farmers are asking for money these days. They tried tariff relief and found out the fallacy of it. Now they are seeking relief from some other quarter.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They want higher tariffs.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not higher tariffs; they tried that. That is not the solution of the problem in any country that must be an exporting country, and it needs no argument to convince hon. gentlemen opposite of that fact. Everybody knows that you cannot assist the farmer by putting a tariff on the goods that he must export, and which fixes the market price in his own country.

With respect to the motion of my hon. friend, I intend to vote against it. I do not say that this treaty is a perfect one. I do not say that changes might not be made in it perhaps to the mutual benefit of both countries. I quite realize what my hon. friend says, that there have been mutterings from Australia to the effect that in their opinion they are not getting a fair deal out of this treaty, and that they would like to revamp it. So far as we are concerned, having proper regard for the interests of this country, we are perfectly willing to do so. I am going to vote against the motion as well as against the amendment.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): At this late hour I do not intend to delay the house more than five or ten minutes at the most. I sat here and listened to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) as I have to the remarks of various other ministers, and heard him repeat over and over again—he said it four or five times in the fifteen minutes he was up—that we have never had such a prosperous five year period as during the time this government has been in office. I do not mind saying that, although hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes accuse us of crying blue ruin when we tell the truth, I am not going to let that deter me from stating the facts. I say that never before in the history of this country as far back as I can remember, and I can remember back a few years at least, have we had a deputation coming clear through from the Pacific coast to the Great lakes and on to Ottawa asking this government to help in the unemployment situation. That happened this very year, and I stood for over two hours with that delegation until I was driven out by the heat. It was a delegation representing every town from Vancouver and Victoria down through to Fort William and Port Arthur. They came here asking for help, and all they got from this government was an effort on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to convince them that there was no unemployment at all. He ended up by talking in a general way about unemployment insurance, and then a day or two afterwards in this house assured one of the Winnipeg members that unemployment insurance was a matter for the provinces to take up, that this government had no intention of doing it, but that if the provinces wanted to take it up, this government would not mind cooperating. I repeat, never before have there been so many labour groups urging any government to do something to relieve the unemployment situation. The government was asked to call a conference. The great United States, with all its prosperity— I deny that the United States has been hit anything like as hard as the minister tries to make out—called a conference of its leading business men, and only a couple of Sundays ago I listened to a minister telling of the advantages that had accrued through the calling of that conference. This government would not call a conference to satisfy anybody. Right in my own city of Fort William, for the first time in our history, we had parades of the unemployed, and one of the first places in this country to ask for assistance in the matter of unemployment was the home town of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). While the Minister of Labour was telling this country there was no unemployment, the town of Kenora, through its member in the legislature at Toronto, was asking for assistance to relieve the unemployment situation in that town.

We hear a great deal about unemployment in the United States. But what about the million and a half people in free trade England who are on the dole at the present time, and the number is constantly increasing? So far as the United States is concerned, it is true that conditions there have not been so good since the stock market crash last fall, but that is true of every other country. Certainly conditions in the United States are not so bad that they are talking of coming down to free trade. As the hon. member for New Westminster pointed out, the people there are asking for a greater amount of protection. I do not notice that they are cutting down the protection their producers have against Canadian products. Within the last few days they have raised the duties against the products of Canada which they import to the amount of $75,000,000 annually. That is in addition to the $100,000,000 of imports which the Fordney tariff shut out from Canada in 1922. What does this government propose to do to see that we get a fair deal with the United States? The only thing done is that the government says we must not do anything to provoke Washington, and we go on allowing our agricultural products of all kinds to be barred out of the United States. We do nothing in return but sit quiet and boast of the immense amount of unemployment there is in that great country.

I have heard a great many arguments in this house to-day and yesterday to the effect that tariffs increase the cost of living. I represent largely a workingman's constituency —, not entirely, because it comprises in part a farming section, but three-quarters of it is a workingman's constituency; and for thirteen years I have been taking in this house the same attitude on protection that I am taking now. I believe in a Canadian policy. I believe in the national policy properly brought up to date. In those thirteen years in which I have consistently taken that attitude I have never had the working people in my constituency complain that such a policy would increase the cost of living. I do not believe that any man or any woman in this country cares about the cost of living so long as he or she can get work and wages to pay that cost of living. That is the important part.

The government has claimed that we on this side of the house have been playing politics in connection with the butter industry, in connection with the fruit industry, and in connection with the egg industry. We have been told that it was either playing politics or just a joke. This government, as a matter of fact, makes no attempt to look after any interest in this country. Its whole policy is a policy of permitting this country to be swamped by the surplus products of other countries. The only possible way in which this country can get on its feet is to produce within its own borders some of that $900,000,000 worth of goods that we purchase from the United States in a year. We bought last year from the United States $338,000,000 worth of iron and steel products. Two thirds of those products could have been produced here.

Every pound of the butter that we are importing from New Zealand could and should have been produced in this Dominion. Out of all our imports we should produce at least fifty, sixty or possibly seventy-five per cent in this Dominion. Not until we adopt a policy such as that, a real Canadian-first policy, to produce what we can produce economically in this country, will this Dominion once more get back on its feet.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the chamber tonight my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was talking about asbestos, pulpwood, pulp and, I think, generally about the export of our raw materials and bringing them back into this country as manufactured goods. His argument, I believe, was that we should refuse to export those things in the raw or semi-raw state and should insist on everything being processed in this country and shipped out as finished products to other countries. It might interest the hon. gentleman and the house to know that at the present time we in Canada are the largest per capita exporters of manufactured goods in the world. I know my hon. friend will say, as he said this afternoon, that by our method of accounting we take goods that are manufactured to a very slight degree, in fact are not very far removed from the raw state, and count them as manufactured goods; but he also said that every other nation does the same thing; so that would still leave us in the lead as the greatest per capita exporters of manufactured products in the world.

My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Manion) referred to the unemployment situation in Great Britain where he said a million and a half are unemployed. Granted that that is so. In the United States, a highly protected country, there are six million unemployed. Taking the population of the United States as three times that of Great Britain—it is only approximately so,—the ratio of unemployment is four and a half in Great Britain to six in the United States.

Mr. MANION: They have not yet had to put the dole system into force in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is really unemployment insurance, to which the participants contribute. Now, let me come back to asbestos. I think my hon. friend's argument was we export our raw asbestos and import the finished product. In round figures we export about $14,000,000 worth of asbestos, and we import about $1,000,000 of manufactured asbestos goods. His idea is that we should insist on this $14,000,000 worth of raw asbestos being manufactured in this country into the finished product. But supposing those who buy our raw asbestos and process it should refuse to buy it if a prohibitive export duty were imposed?

An hon. MEMBER: They cannot.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Why not?

An hon. MEMBER: Because they cannot get it any place else.

Mr. CAHAN: They cannot get it anywhere else in the world.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): They can buy asbestos in South Africa.

Mr. CAHAN: They cannot for manufacture in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): They can buy it in Rhodesia.

Mr. CAHAN: They cannot.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If we refuse to sell them our raw asbestos they will simply tell us to keep it, and they will buy their raw material somewhere else.

Mr. CAHAN: Where?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): In Rhodesia.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman ought to study the elements of the asbestos business. He is absolutely ignorant of them.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Further than that, my hon. friend says—and his associates over there have repeated the argument time and again—that we should not export any of our mineral products in the raw state; we should finish them here. Let us see how they would encourage the mining industry in this country. The first thing in connection with a mine is the prospector, and they would encourage him by putting a higher duty on his pick and shovel, his boots and clothing, thus making it more expensive for him to go out and locate a claim. That is the encouragement they would give the prospector. Then when he has located his claim and sold it to a syndicate who will develop it, my hon. friends opposite would add a duty on all the machinery that syndicate requires to develop the claim into a mine.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And tax the stock certificates; that is what this government did.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): An Ontario mine on the installation of one single hoist had to pay no less than $70,000 in duty. But my hon. friends opposite think that is not enough; these duties they would make so high as to render it almost impossible to develop the mining properties of this country. That is the way they would encourage our mining industry. Then if the mining syndicate overcome that difficulty and get their mine developed to the producing point and have a chance to sell the ore abroad, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre would say: "No, you must not sell your ore abroad; you must build a smelter in Canada and treat your ore here." And to encourage them he would increase the duty on the machinery of that smelter! That is how hon. gentlemen opposite propose to develop industry in Canada by means of their protective tariff.

My hon. friend had something to say about the United States favourable balance of trade and our adverse balance of trade. When I asked him how the United States received payment for all the surplus goods they sent abroad, he said they accepted it in gold. I should like to ask him if we in Canada pay our adverse balance of trade to the United States in gold?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), he will tell him exactly what has been going on during the last few months.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Are we shipping that out of the country?

Mr. BENNETT: No, we have to make arrangements for the purchase of it. When I say gold I mean money.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Our exports of gold last year amounted to $60,000,000 and our imports were about half that amount, leaving a net export of $30,000,000 odd.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): How do we redress that two or three hundred million dollar adverse balance of trade? We pay for it in goods or in services, not in gold.

Mr. STEVENS: Or borrow.

Mr. CAHAN: We pay part of it by borrowing money in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We are not borrowing much at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, we are, we are borrowing too much.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The country of Australia has been held up to us as a model country which we should follow in these matters.

Mr. BENNETT: By whom?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): By my hon. friend's predecessor in office.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a complete answer.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He told us that we should do as Australia was doing, that Australia was going to build up a high tariff wall that would shut out imports and permit only exports, and that that was the policy that would develop their resources. What did they do? They adopted one of the highest tariffs in the world.

Mr. STEVENS: It is lucky for my hon. friend that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen is not here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: Order nothing.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Am I the only one who is glad of it?

Mr. STEVENS: No, there are a lot of others over there who are glad.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): And over there, also.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Now, let us see what happened in Australia under their high tariff. They have over two hundred and fifty items in their tariff which carry a rate of over forty per cent. This has increased the cost of production to such a point that it has become impossible for them to export—to compete in the markets of the world. They said in their hearts: "We will adopt a tariff that will make it possible for us to sell and not to buy." The result has been the very reverse. Now they have to buy instead of sell, and they are wondering how they are going to pay for their imports, because they cannot make anything cheap enough to sell to anybody else. That has resulted in their adverse exchange rate of about six per cent, mentioned the other night by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. He said they redressed that by the export of gold, and the figure quoted by him was $79,000,000 odd.

Mr. STEVENS: I said in the last eight months.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That makes it worse still.

Mr. STEVENS: I also said it was one of Australia's chief products. My hon. friend takes a small item and twists it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I was going to add that my hon. friend said Australia could afford to do that because she is a producer of gold. I am one year behind my hon. friend, because he had one book out of the library ahead of mine. Last year Australia produced only about twelve or thirteen million dollars' worth of gold.

Mr. STEVENS: No, pounds sterling.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No, £2,375,000, which is less than $12,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: You are all wrong.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No, I am absolutely right. Australia produces now between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 worth of gold per annum. Change that into dollars and it comes between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000. She exported in eight months $79,000,000 in gold.

Mr. STEVENS: According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm).

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): These figures show that Australia is depleting her gold reserve. She has nothing to give in exchange for her imports. The tariff policy that she has adopted has made it impossible for her to trade with the world, and she has to deplete her gold reserve. Take the issue of January 18th of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, and it will show you that the Australian government is even now drafting a law to make the Commonwealth Bank of Australia—the government bank—the sole repository of gold in that country, and to prevent entirely the importation of gold. That is the situation. That is because, as the hon. gentleman said, she is exporting gold that she is not producing, and she is depleting her gold reserve. That is the situation that has been brought about in Australia by this tariff policy which my hon. friends are so fond of advocating.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) took me to task the other night for preferring the consumer to the producer. He said that while he has great respect for the consumer and the consumer's rights, he prefers the producer when the two interests clash. He would rather satisfy the producer than the consumer. I must admit that that belief is very popular in the world at the present time. Nearly every country has taken that attitude. They have undertaken to encourage the producer and lost sight of the consumer, and with what result? This has been the result; production has been encouraged to the point that the consumer is no longer able to buy the product of the producer; the purchasing power of the consumer has gone. You cannot tell me that there is too much food in the world; we have hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat in this country, and yet there are millions of people starving in Europe. It is a fact that 75 per cent of the people of the world to-day are wearing clothes frayed at the edges, yet the shelves in our shops are loaded with the products of manufacturers that cannot be sold.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is wheat so dear they cannot buy it?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No. they are so poor they cannot buy it. This is the result of the policy adopted by practically every country of the world which favours the producer at the expense of the consumer. What is the remedy for the situation? There is only one remedy, and that is to bring those goods to a price the consumer can afford to pay. That is the only remedy. My hon. friend spoke of the depression in the United States as being due to the introduction of machinery.

Mr. BENNETT: And mass production.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The introduction of machinery and the adoption of what is called mass production has resulted in the possibility of producing the same quantity of goods with a lesser amount of labour. A certain percentage of the persons employed are laid off, and are thrown out of work; what should have happened then would be a reduction in price. Had there been a corresponding reduction in price where the manufacturer could then afford to sell his goods for less, and if he had reduced the price of his goods, the purchasing power would have been increased; there would have been a greater demand for the goods, more people would have been employed in that and other industries, and the men laid off because of the introduction of improved methods would be employed in some other way. But they have not done that. They have endeavoured to maintain the price until the time arrived when so many men were unemployed that there was no possibility of their buying the goods. That is the cause of unemployment, so far as the introduction of improved methods is concerned. The only remedy for that situation is to lower the price so as to enable the people to purchase the goods in the shops, and set the wheels of industry going again.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: If lower prices are good, would it not be a good thing for those owners of wheat to reduce the price of wheat that is being held in western Canada, and sell it for 25 cents a bushel?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I see what my hon. friend means. He asks, Why do you not sell your product lower than anybody else? To my mind that would not remedy the situation.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No, but it would be following out your explanation logically.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What is it that keeps prices high? It is of no use to lower the price of a single commodity unless you can bring the prices of all commodities down. What keeps the price of a commodity at a high level? It is the universal system of tariff all over the world which keeps prices up. There should be a system whereby prices of all commodities would be reduced to the point where the people could buy them.

There is some talk of revision of the Australian treaty. We bought from her last year something like $3,500,000 worth of goods and sold to her about $19,420,000 worth. The duty we collected on that trade was $133,770. There is not very much produced in Australia that comes into competition with our products, and there is not very much we ship into Australia that comes into competition with her products; why not have free trade between the two countries? That would be a step in the direction of empire free trade, and a step towards the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Fansher) which aims at extending the British preference. It would not hurt any Canadian industry; it would help both countries and we would lose very little revenue by it.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I would like to take a few minutes to express what I conceive to be the opinion of the people in the district from which I come. I have a standing arrangement with an hon. gentleman on the other side not to vote in his absence, but I would like to express my preference for and my support of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner).

As has been said so often, the farming industry, which is the great basic industry of this country, is at the present time in a critical condition. I believe almost any farmer in Canada would sell out, if he could. Not being able to do that, however, he simply must struggle along and do the best he can. It is not necessary for me to repeat the arguments which have been advanced or to labour this point in particular. We know that in a normal year we grow something in the neighbourhood of 500,000,000 bushels of grain. Each man, woman and child consumes about five bushels per year so that we have food enough for 100,000,000 people. Our population is only 10,000,000. The same thing applies, to some extent, to meat and cheese, and to a large number of products. At the present time there is over-production throughout the country, and the farmers are suffering on that account. Perhaps in no district in Canada have the farmers suffered more than in southern Alberta, where they tried the great venture of raising large crops of wheat and grain. This turned out unfortunately, and now they are turning to mixed farming and sheep raising.

It has been clearly established that this treaty provides a market for lines of manufactured goods, and it thus helps those engaged in these industries to prosper. However, it has not been shown that it is of any benefit to the farmer or to the great basic industry of agriculture, which at the present time greatly needs help. There is a strong presumption that it is not only of no benefit but is somewhat of an additional handicap instead. It has been often said that we should manage our own affairs in our own way, and with that in mind I venture to suggest this condition of affairs to the government, so that in the discussion of new treaties at any economic conference at least they will know some of the handicaps under which a great basic industry of this country is struggling.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Quebec—harbours and rivers—Cap de la Madeleine—in full and final settlement of the claim of Messrs. Munn & Shea in connection with their contract for wharf extension, $27,249.25.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When we were discussing this item the other evening the minister was asked to make an explanation. It had been suggested that the department had given contracts to people who did not intend to carry them out at the price named in the contract, as they expected to receive payment for extras. Some hon. members were of the opinion that this item proved conclusively that the contract had been taken at a lower figure than it should have been and that this item was to cover payment for extras.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): It is possibly true that the contract was taken at a lower figure than it should have been, but that is not the basis upon which this allowance is being made. The circumstances in connection with this item are unusual. The contract was taken at a price much below the next lowest tenderer, but that of itself would not entitle the contractor to remuneration. This claim is based on three different grounds. First of all, the estimate for ballast was made at $2 per cubic yard. At the time the tender was made there seemed to be no doubt that the contractor would be able to obtain his ballast at $2 per cubic yard, but between the time of putting in the tender and the awarding of the contract the Wayagamack Pulp and Paper Company had commenced the construction of a large wharf at Three Rivers and had contracted for the whole available supply of stone at that point. Another quarry had to be opened up and the stone cost the contractor $1 per cubic yard extra, which made an increase of about $32,000. They claim also that they were delayed in getting the berth dredged for their crib seats, as previous orders for the dredge had been booked and they had to wait their turn, losing about two months.

As my hon. friend will remember, the fall of 1927, when this work was being carried out, was exceptionally wet. Having failed to get their stone at the former quarry, the quarry which they opened for the supply of ballast stone, near Grondines, thirty miles below the site of the work, was so flooded that they were not able to work it. They were not able to discontinue operations as it would have left the wharf in an unsafe condition, so they had to buy stone at greatly enhanced prices, filling the crib during the winter under adverse conditions, and this made the work expensive. This high water continued until late in 1928. The district engineer states that the contractors' claim in this respect is substantiated by the fact that in 1927 and 1928 the St. Lawrence river level rose and kept at practically spring flood heights during those years. There was considerable damage all over the province and many bridges, railway wharves and roads were washed away. The engineer states further that in the spring of 1928, following the very wet autumn of 1927, the water level was still so high that the wharf and approach to the wharf were flooded to such an extent that they could not get to the wharf with the stone. This meant that the stone in railway cars was subject to demurrage and when unloaded had to be rehandled as it could not be taken to the wharf. The district engineer states that the contractors executed the work as best they could under the adverse conditions, and did all that it was humanly possible to do to proceed with the work in the most economical way.

The report shows that the stone filling between the cribs, on the stated figures given by the company, gives a price of $3.35 per cubic yard instead of their tender price of $2, and the engineer considered that the adverse conditions amounted to practically force majeure and recommended the claim for favourable consideration. What was done was this: an estimate was taken; the books were submitted for examination by the officials of the department, and it was found that this work cost the contractors $54,498.50 more than the amount they received. The recommendation of the local engineer was that in view of the diligence with which they had proceeded and the difficulties with which they had been confronted, and which had increased the cost of the work by this amount, one-half of this claim be paid. After a number of consultations, including interviews with the contractors during which they urged very strongly the payment of their whole claim, the practice that had been followed by the department in similar cases, of dividing under such exceptional circumstances the loss with the contractors, was adopted.

SIR GEORGE PERLEY: The latter part of the minister's explanation seems to be quite proper. The main item, I understand, was the extra cost of ballast which had been estimated at $2 and which it was found for certain reasons cost over $3. Is that a good reason for making an extra payment? Would the contractors have presented the government with some money if they had been able to get their ballast at $1 instead of having to pay $2 as was estimated?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no doubt about that and I may tell my hon. friend the contractors feel they are very badly treated as it is. They have lost their time and they are out now the sum of $27,000, but it is this force majeure that is, in the opinion of the engineers, responsible for the fact that the contractors were not able to get into the new quarry which they owned.

Mr. HANSON: I listened very attentively to everything the minister said. Does it not all come down to this, that the department is making a compassionate allowance? There is not a single instance of a legal or even equitable claim against the department, but because the contractors have fallen upon bad days and met a serious contingency they had not counted upon, the department now, as a compassionate allowance, is making a contribution of 50 per cent of the loss. This is on the same basis as the Escuminac item in New Brunswick.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quite so.

Mr. HANSON: I should like, for the information of parliament, to know what is the annual cost to the country of proceeding on that principle; because I know the amount is increasing. A claim for extra cost of procuring ballast would never be allowed by a private company if they had a contract with the contractor, or by a municipality which was guarding money collected from the taxpayers by direct taxation. I am satisfied on that point, having had a very substantial municipal experience in connection with public works. I am not at the moment adversely criticizing this policy, because I know of cases of great hardship such as occurred in the Escuminac case where not the contractor but the subcontractor lost $10,000 and was pretty nearly wiped out. This policy is costing the country a great deal of money and we ought to know for the last fiscal year how many such cases there have been and what it is going to cost the country to divide these losses. It cannot be urged that there was any force majeure in connection with the ballast; it was simply lack of foresight on the part of the contractor. He did not make a contract for the delivery of his ballast; someone else got in ahead of him, and he had to open up a new quarry, and that accounts for $32,000 of the total loss, according to the minister's statement. I do not think the contractor was entitled to a cent on account of the increased cost of the ballast. We might as well understand the principle on which this money is voted. This is purely a gift to the contractor. He did not look after his contract in a businesslike way. Had he secured the ballast before the other people got in ahead of him, he would have been able to do the work at the bid price. It is not a case of force majeure. Floods and high water, of course, are beyond the control of a contractor, but he ought not to be paid because of his neglect in securing the ballast.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend has taken a pretty reasonable view, and if I may say so, a fairly accurate view of the legal situation, except that the law with regard to force majeure is that if the circumstances were so unusual that they could not by any reasonable diligence have been foreseen and provided against, it could not have been in the contemplation of the parties.

Mr. HANSON: It is not quite that wide.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend will find that that is exactly what it is.

Mr. HANSON: That would cover lack of business ability.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to be fair to my hon. friend because I think that he has been absolutely fair in his criticism of the Escuminac case as well as the one now under consideration. Might I point out that it was not lack of diligence on the part of the contractor that prevented his getting the stone before the Wayagamack company got in? They got in between the time he submitted his tender and the time he was awarded the contract.

Mr. HANSON: He should have had an option on the stone.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend would hardly say that a contractor who did not know whether he was going to get the contract was justified in going to the expense of obtaining an option. There have been very few of these cases during my regime as Minister of Public Works. I should be very glad to get my hon. friend a complete list of such cases for some years past, and I think he will find that the department has adopted an absolutely uniform method in regard to all.

Mr. HANSON: I have no doubt about that, but it would be interesting to have a list of the cases.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to supply that information. My hon. friend would not expect me to be able to give him the list offhand. This year there are not more than one or two other cases besides the Escuminac case and this one, and I think this is by far the largest.

Mr. CANTLEY: Would the minister be good enough to tell us how many tenders were put in for the work and what the amounts were?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The following is a list showing the tenderers and their amounts:

Chief engineer's estimate.. .. ..$121,702	00
1. Munn and Shea, Limited.. 110,942	00
2. Page Equipment & Construction Co.. 121,786	60
3. Atlas Construction Co., Limited. 124,992	00
4. Onesome Poliquin—Jos Poliquin. 128,939	80
5. Joseph St. Jean—Albert Brouillet 139,998	00
6. J. Alphonse Lemay.. .. .. 160.533	36
7. Weddell & Saunders.. 174,321	00

Item agreed to.

Cap St. Ignace—wharf, $20,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What county is this in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is in Montmagny county. The work is under contract.

Mr. HANSON: Is this the total cost of the work, or just a payment on account?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is just the start. The work will cost in the vicinity of $100,000.

Item agreed to.

Carleton—wharf extension, $10,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is this in Bonaventure county?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Is this the total amount to be paid, or just a partial payment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The estimated cost is $24,000. This is just a start.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. HANSON: What is the nature of the extension? They have a large pulp wharf there now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work has been requested by the residents of Carleton and has been urged by the engineer and by the member. In 1929, during a heavy storm, some of the fishing boats moored at the wharf were driven ashore and completely wrecked. The proposed extension will provide the required shelter at this harbour, which is the only port of refuge within a radius of eighty miles. There has been a remarkable and very substantial revival in the lumber industry due to the building of several large mills in the vicinity. This construction will increase the traffic greatly by water, as Dalhousie, St. Omer and Carleton are linked together by a local service and the wharfage accommodation is totally inadequate.

Item agreed to.

Caughnawaga—wharf repairs, $1,800.

Mr. HANSON: This is the Indian village, is it not? Is there anything larger than a canoe landing at Caughnawaga?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are two ferries. Some 45,000 vehicles are carried to and from this port annually.

Item agreed to.

Cloridorme—wharf, $15,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this a new work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How much is it going to cost altogether?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The estimated cost is $65,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is the place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Grand Cloridorme is a large cove located in the centre of the municipality of Cloridorme, fourteen miles southeast of Grand Vallee and forty-nine miles from the terminus of the A. Q. and W. railway at Gaspe Basin. This work was requested in numerous petitions from the residents of the parish of Ste. Cecile du Cloridorme dating back to 1923, and is required to provide landing facilities for steamers and coasting schooners and to permit fishing boats to harbour here. The annual traffic amounts to approximately $125,000.

Mr. HANSON: What county is it in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Gaspe.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How far is it to the next good wharf in either direction?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is fourteen miles southeast of Grand Vallee.

Item agreed to.

Doucet's Landing—(Ste. Angele de Laval)—dredging, $45,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think we should have some explanation of this large item. It is new work, I assume?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This dredging is to remove the dangerous ledge to the east of the present channel between this place and Three Rivers and facilitate the ferry service between these places which is carried on by two boats every half hour. The traffic carried on here is very heavy, consisting of 4,500 tons of general freight and express parcels, 21,211 autos, 192,579 passengers and 19,500 teams. It is very dangerous for boats to pass one another in a high wind and in the winter season.

Mr. HANSON: What county is that in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nicolet county.

Item agreed to.

Doucet's landing—(Ste. Angele de Laval)—wharf reconstruction, $6,400.

Mr. HANSON: Is that part of the same work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, this is to complete payment on the contract with J. E. Fleury for the reconstruction of the headblock and approach of this wharf. The approach was in a very bad condition, the cribwork being so badly decayed that it has had to be closed to traffic, after a freight car loaded with paper cores broke through and fell into the river.

Item agreed to.

Fassett—wharf reconstruction, $8,500.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How much business is there at Fassett? It is a place down on the Ottawa river, I believe

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a village on the north shore of the Ottawa river on the Canadian Pacific railway, fifty miles east of Ottawa. It has important lumbering industries.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Important lumbering industries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Have you any figures of the amount of business done there? I understood the mill was closed down.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The work was requested by the district engineer in his annual estimates and is required to keep the wharf in a condition suitable for the accommodation of the traffic handled by the boats of the Ottawa Transportation Company. During the season of 1928, approximately 80 tons of freight were handled at this place.

Mr. HANSON: That is a large amount!

Mr. ELLIOTT: During the season of 1928-29 a portion of the landing-head was rebuilt with cribwork. It is now proposed to reconstruct the remaining part, which is of pile construction, and in very bad condition.

Mr. HANSON: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that is a trivial amount of traffic, not more than two carloads of freight in a whole season.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I should have given some further information. The condition of the wharf is such that we have to decide whether we shall allow it to go altogether or repair it. This is the report of the district engineer:

> The top of the piles in high level landing are in an advanced state of decay, so much so that the high level freight shed had to be supported temporarily last summer. Some of the floor stringers had to be braced also to keep this structure open to traffic. This part of the wharf will have to be rebuilt immediately.
> This work cannot be postponed without detriment to the public.

Mr. HANSON: I suppose the wharf is not fit even to handle the boat traffic?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Well, they are entitled to it.

Item agreed to.

Grand Anse (Gaspe Co.)—wharf, $34,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this to complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required to complete the contract entered into in November 1929.

Item agreed to.

Grand Entry, M.I.—pilework extensions, $4,500.

Mr. CANTLEY: Where is this place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the Magdalen islands, Gaspé county.

Mr. HANSON: Is there anything for St. Pierre and Miquelon in these estimates?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Yes, a warehouse!

Mr. HANSON: It will be needed soon.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $100,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have no objection to the item, but I think that some of the members may want to ask a few questions in regard to it, and as we have made very good progress I suggest the minister call it a day.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, March 28, 1930

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of the joint committee on the parliamentary restaurant.—Mr. Speaker.

NATURAL RESOURCES

AGREEMENT WITH SASKATCHEWAN TABLED

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Interior): I beg to lay on the table two copies of the agreement, respecting the return of the natural resources, between the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government of Canada, and to say that copies of the agreement will be available in the distribution office for any hon. members who desire them.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yesterday the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) inquired when the annual report of the Canadian National Railways would be available. I find that the auditors have completed their work. The report is now in the hands of the printers, and I expect to lay it on the table of the house before the Easter adjournment.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Quebec—harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $100,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How much was spent under this head last year?

[Mr. Hanson.]

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): The amount spent last year was $92,487.

Item agreed to.

Ile Perrot—dredging, $8,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is Ile Perrot, and is this work that has to be done every year, or is this a contract for some specific work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Ile Perrot is a post village in Vaudreuil county, about six miles from Ste. Anne de Bellevue, on the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. This is a revote, which is required to complete the contract which was entered into last year.

Item agreed to.

Lake St. Louis—dredging, $47,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does this department do all the dredging in lake St. Louis, or is some of it done by the Marine and Fisheries department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That department does no dredging above Montreal.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this amount complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will complete the contract that has been entered into. Of course, this is a place where dredging has to be done pretty constantly.

Item agreed to.

Little Montreal river—dredging—the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $14,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I notice that the cost is divided with the provincial government. Why is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: A contract was awarded in December, 1928, to G. Lorrain by the county of Napierville, amounting to $30,487, upon the understanding that the Dominion government and provincial government would each pay half the cost of each progress estimate up to a total of $30,000, the supervision to be made by the federal engineer's office. Order in council, dated February 6, 1929, gave authority to confirm the above arrangement, and for the Dominion government to pay one-half of the progress estimates to be submitted, such payments to be made as the work proceeded, and not to exceed the amount of the contribution voted, $15,000. Since that time, however, during the progress of the work, it was found that the material encountered was much harder than anticipated, and the contractor, after removing some of this at considerable difficulty by blasting, had to discontinue the work on November 15, 1929. The contractor claims that he should be paid for this material at rock prices, $2.25 per yard, as contained in the contract, and the matter is being dealt with by negotiations between this department, the provincial Department of Agriculture, and the county. I might say that this is carrying out work which was started in 1928, but on account of delays, due to the different governments interested, we have only made such progress as I have stated.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What differentiates this work from many other items where the provincial government is interested? Why does not the provincial government pay half of the other items?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is one of those matters where it is claimed that the Dominion government should contribute. This is similar to Norton's creek and some other cases where both governments have been doing the work for a number of years.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The reference to Norton's creek is rather unfortunate, as I understand that was really for the purpose of drainage. Is this item the same sort of thing; is it really a drainage scheme?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not say that it is a drainage scheme, but it is not dissimilar to Norton's creek.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the character of the work that is actually being done? The minister has not yet given a definite reply.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is dredging in the Little Montreal river.

Mr. GARDINER: Why are the two governments interested? It is rather unusual, is it not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is both a dredging and a drainage proposition, and each government claims it should be done by the other. So a compromise arrangement was arrived at under which each contributes to the cost.

Mr. GARDINER: After the dredging is done will the channel be of any use for boats?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Only for very small boats.

Mr. GARDINER: How large?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Row boats.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Much larger than that.

Item agreed to.

Manicouagan river—wharf—one-third of cost to be contributed jointly by the Ontario Paper Co., Ltd., and the Anglo Canadian Pulp and Paper Co., $275,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: This appears to be an old acquaintance. Would the minister be good enough to give us some information in regard to it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. This amount is required to cover the government's share of the completion of the contract entered into in September, 1929, with Messrs. Farley & Grant and Cummins & Robinson for the construction of a wharf, 1,900 feet long, the first 1,000 feet to be formed of a stone embankment and the next 900 feet of cribwork. This wharf is being built in connection with the construction of pulp and paper mills and power development near the mouth of the Manicouagan river by the Ontario Paper Co. Ltd., and the Anglo Canadian Pulp and Paper Co., these two companies having agreed to contribute one-third of the total cost of the work.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: One-third each, or one-third between them?

Mr. ELLIOTT: One-third between the two.

Mr. MANION: What is the estimated total cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The chief engineer's estimate for the total work to be done was $417,450. The amount of the contract is $474,774.

Mr. LUCAS: How much has been spent already?

Mr. ELLIOTT: About $75,000.

Mr. MANION: What constituency is it in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this remain the property of the Dominion government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Will there be any charges for its use by the companies?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Will any person have the right to use the wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, it is a public wharf; everybody will have the right to use it. These two companies are making large expenditures in the vicinity at the present time, and the reason they are contributing is that they will be more directly interested than the general public

Mr. MANION: Will the chief whip of the Liberal party (Mr. Casgrain) give us the particulars of this work? He will probably know more about it than the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I doubt it very much.

Mr. MANION: I do not doubt it at all. I understand this is in the constituency of the chief Liberal whip. Perhaps he will be able to explain to the house fully what the expenditure is for.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This is a development similar to others that have been carried on in certain parts of Quebec and also in other provinces. Manicouagan is situated about 250 miles below the city of Quebec. The Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Company and the Ontario Paper Company, Limited, have obtained from the provincial government a lease of all the timber limits in the watershed east of the Manicouagan river, the largest timber limits in the province on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The two companies have an agreement with the provincial government, a copy of which was deposited with the Department of Public Works, under which the companies covenant with the provincial government to establish pulp mills at Manicouagan and have them in operation by 1931. The provincial government is assisting the two companies to develop the town by providing a road from the site to the wharf. During the course of this summer or early next year the projected town will have, it is estimated, a population of 4,000 or 5,000 people. It is claimed that the new municipality will be a source of revenue both to the provincial and federal governments because the pulp mills will give employment to a large number of people living in the vicinity. I may say that the provincial government has also helped the Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Company to develop a place called Clark City on the north shore of the St. Lawrence very much along the same lines, and in that instance years ago, the federal government, under another administration, paid the whole cost of the wharf. The Ontario Paper Company, Limited, owns and operates timber limits at other places along the north shore, one in Shelter Bay and the other at Franklin. These two are the largest and most reliable companies engaged in the wood and paper industry in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. MANION: I congratulate the hon. member on how much he knows with respect to this item. He has given us a great deal more information than the Minister of Public Works did.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He took longer.

Mr. MANION: Of course the minister was interested in taking a shorter time. Will the chief whip of the Liberal party inform us if the Clarks interested in Clark City are the same gentlemen who run steam boats down the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The man who founded Clark City about twenty-five or thirty years ago was the uncle of the men who operate the steamship company and who own the Gulf of St. Lawrence Paper Company, Limited. The company at Clark City and the Anglo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Company, I may say, are financed by English capital furnished by the Rothermere interests in England, who own one of the largest newspaper concerns in the old country.

Mr. MANION: Are the Clarks who run the steamship line interested in this?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, it is a different company.

Mr. MANION: But are they interested in this?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think so.

Mr. POULIOT: But both gave their name to the city and the steamship company. I think the chief whip has made a very good defence of the item for the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain).

Mr. MANION: "Defence" is a good word.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are there any operations going on there at present; are they making paper now?

Mr. CASGRAIN: At the present time these people cannot start to operate and cannot fulfil their contract with the provincial government, and no work can be carried on in that district until this wharf is built. In the course of a few months or a year there will be a town located there, but at present it is a wilderness with rocks, cliffs, mountains, hills and forest. Last summer the townsite was cleared up and laid out by a company under the control of these two companies; much of that work has been done, and I remember being told by some of the officers of these two companies that during last summer between 300 and 400 people were employed on this work.

Mr. MANION: How many men do they expect to employ in the paper mill, and when do they expect to turn out paper?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I cannot very well give that information but it must be in the hands of the minister, because when these people applied for this work I think they deposited with the minister a copy of the contract with the provincial government. The provincial government called upon these companies to start work within a given period, and they will turn out the finished product in the province of Quebec.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Taking into consideration the present condition of the paper trade does not my hon. friend think it would be just as well if this company did not start work too soon?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I believe that question was discussed last year. Hon. members will recall that a few years ago, I think in 1927, an amount of $100,000 was placed in the estimates in order to start the work that year, but the following year that item was dropped because at that time there seemed to be some unsettlement in the pulp and paper business. Since then pressure has been brought to bear on these two companies to proceed with the work, and those interested in the pulp and paper industry are satisfied that work may be started now, because it is hoped that in the very near future the situation to which my hon. friend has referred will be adjusted.

Mr. SHORT: It was only last year, I think, that a similar amount was in the estimates for another paper concern down in Anticosti, in this same constituency. This seems to be a pretty large amount for this government to be giving a private concern. We might build pulp mills all over the country if we could get the government to contribute $200,000, $300,000 or $400,000 in order to start things going. It is almost impossible for us in the maritime provinces to get grants in order to carry on our general business and to repair the breakwaters and piers which we aleady have, but it is nothing for the province of Quebec to get $275,000 or $300,000 for the assistance of some pulp mill. If this pulp mill has received such wonderful concessions from the provincial government of Quebec, it seems to me it should be in a position to build its own wharf.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will this be a company town, in the ordinary sense of the word?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, it is going to be a public town and is to be called Taschereau. It will be built and operated under the act which regulates such townships and municipalities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: Now I have the secret of the grants and concessions that have been made by the Quebec provincial government. These Americans came to the government and said, "We want this and that, and we will give the name of the Premier to the town we intend to build." So then the Premier said, "Carried; you may have it." I think these people showed great ability in securing what they requested; they were very keen and very astute in getting these privileges from the province of Quebec. I have not a word of criticism for the chief whip of the Liberal party, nor do I suggest that he should not get a substantial amount of money for these improvements.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not get it personally; my people will enjoy the privileges.

Mr. POULIOT: I never thought my hon. friend was to do the dredging himself, but I am sure it will be for the benefit of his constituents. I am not so narrow minded as to ask these people to change the name of the town, but that gives me the answer to the whole problem. I should not have spoken on this item at all if some mention had not been made of grants by the provincial government. I think we should be very careful, not in the amounts which are asked for by my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay, but in connection with these contracts which are entered into by the Quebec government with foreigners. It seems to me that when a foreigner comes to the Quebec government for a grant he has a greater chance of getting it than a native son of Canada would have. That is why I bring this matter to the attention of the committee. I am not criticizing the item; I think my hon. friend has done right in looking after his constituents and trying to improve conditions in his constituency, but I think in future the department should be very careful in any assistance it may give to companies having contracts with the Quebec government.

Mr. BOYS: Am I correct in my understanding that the contract was completed in 1927?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BOYS: I thought the minister gave the date as 1927.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, 1929.

Mr. BOYS: At page 36 of the estimates for 1929, I find the sum of $100,000 for this purpose. Then I turn to the estimates for the following year and find that for some reason the item disappeared entirely. Then when I turn to the estimates for this year I find that the item reappears, together with a reference to a vote in 1929-30. I suppose that must have come out of the general appropriation. As far as I can tell from the estimates which I have here the vote first appeared at page 36 of the items for 1929.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I think my hon. friend is wrong about the year. Last year would be 1929; we call these the 1930 estimates.

Mr. BOYS: I may be wrong as to when it first appeared, but I think I am right with respect to the year I stated. I then find that in the following year this item is not in the estimates at all, but in the estimates for this year we find a revote of $50,000, which seems to indicate that they must have had some money from somewhere.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was in the supplementary estimates of last year. It was in the estimates of 1927 but was dropped the following year, and was only placed in the supplementary estimates at the end of last session.

Mr. BOYS: Do I understand that a contract was entered into between the Public Works department and some contractor and that, pursuant to the contract, contributions were to be made by these two companies, or was the contract between two other parties with contributions from the Department of Public Works? No matter how the contract was made I should like to find out from the minister to what exent the two companies in question have put up cash in connection with the work, up to the present time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think perhaps what causes confusion is the practice of referring to the estimates of the year before last as the 1929 estimates. We usually refer to the estimates now under consideration as those for 1930; last year's estimates were for 1929 and those of the previous year were the 1928 estimates. The item appeared in the estimates of 1928.

Mr. BOYS: In order to make it clear, I am merely taking the year which appears upon the estimates themselves. The estimates which I am calling the 1929 estimates are for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929. Then we have the estimates for 1930, and I have already said that nothing appeared in the main estimates for that year.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: As has been explained by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, this item first appeared in the estimates for 1927-28. Since there was a slowing up in the business the work was not proceeded with and the item was dropped from the main estimates of 1928-29, but an item was placed in the supplementary estimates. That was the item amounting to $100,000. The contract was only to be entered into by the Department of Public Works upon the assurance that the work which was contemplated, which was a very large work, would go on. When the department became satisfied of that fact, they took bonds from the companies which are to contribute as a guarantee of payment, and then let the contract for the work. In answer to the hon. member who asked with regard to the amount of freight which would be handled on this wharf, I think it would be interesting for the house to know that the incoming freight is estimated as follows:

Material for production of 19,000 tons sulphite and ground wood pulp, including sulphur, coal, limestone, stores, repairs, et cetera, to the value of $1,000,000.

Provisions, materials, tools, and equipment for cutting and preparing 300,000 cords of wood, to the value of $2,200,000.

Provisions and general supplies for a population estimated to be from 10,000 to 15,000 when operations have commenced, to the value of $1,250,000. That makes a total of $4,450,000 for the incoming freight.

The combined total of the incoming and outgoing freight is estimated to be valued at $9,080,000. It should be borne in mind that these estimates are made upon the present plans, but both companies have increased production in mind as soon as other plans have been consummated. Of course, the condition of the industry since this item was first inserted in the estimates has not been as favourable as present prospects indicate.

Mr. BOYS: What cash contribution has been made by these companies? These estimates are very interesting, and I do not want to be considered as criticizing this item—I do not know enough about it either to approve of or criticize it—but it is asked that a quarter of a million dollars be voted and we should have very complete information. I think the minister should give us some information as to what these companies are to do, and what they have done. His information as to the probable business is all very interesting and may be quite true, but I remember well some information which was given to us regarding Belle River. It was contended that wonderful business would ensue at that point, but the whole thing has been discarded and the money was thrown away and wasted. I do not say that this vote will be wasted but perhaps we have been taught a lesson, and we should be a little careful after voting $130,000 in the other instance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The reason I did not go into the details which I have here, and which cover many pages, was because the whole matter had been discussed in the house when the estimate was first inserted. As my hon. friend has said, there is a contract entered into with the Quebec government by which the companies agreed to make these expenditures and to employ a certain number of hands.

Mr. BOYS: That is between the companies and the Quebec government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Between the companies and the Quebec government. That contract has been deposited with the Dominion government and bonds have been taken from the companies to guarantee the construction of the wharf. The hon. member for Cumberland wondered why it was done in this way, but I may say that the same policy has been adopted before.

Mr. SHORT: When was I shifted to Cumberland?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should have said the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short); it would be a bad thing for Digby to have my hon. friend shifted to any other part of the province. This same arrangement was made in the Brooklyn case, where the Mersey Paper Company is located and I think the same procedure was followed with the Thunder bay and the Powell river cases.

Mr. BOYS: As I understand it, the contract referred to would be one between the companies and the province of Quebec and would have to do with the concessions the companies were getting from that province, the companies in turn having to do certain things. The contract we are dealing with is the one between the Department of Public Works and this company, and I would like to know something about what these companies have undertaken. If they have agreed to pay one-third of the cost, have they paid it? It is all very well to promise these things when prospects are bright, but apparently they have not been so good lately. I am prompted by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to ask the kind of bonds given by the company, are they guaranteed bonds or bonds of the respective companies? I am very anxious to find out how much cash has been put up by these companies in connection with this contract, for which we are asked to vote such a large sum of money.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There has been no cash put up; they put up bonds of a guarantee company.

Mr. BOYS: For the payment of their share of the costs?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: How much cash has the department paid out already on these contracts?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total is $75,000.

Mr. BOYS: If that is so, then we should have got $25,000 from the two companies. Why has that not been paid? What effort has been made by the department to collect, and why have they not been successful?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot tell my hon. friend the amount which has been paid, but the practice is to render a bill every month for their respective shares. Where the security is so large as it is in the present case, we do not worry particularly as to whether it is paid right on the day.

Mr. BOYS: If the income tax is not paid right on the day we incur an immediate penalty, and in this particular instance, if the department is entitled to it, I do not see why it should not try to get it. Perhaps the minister could tell us how many accounts have been sent out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not those details here. In a contract of over a quarter of a million dollars, the question of $75,000 is a very small part of the contract.

Mr. BOYS: It is much easier to pay when it is so small.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Much easier to pay, but a smaller risk when the security is so large.

Mr. SHORT: Is the department receiving interest?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not say that.

Mr. SHORT: Why not? The interest on $25,000 is a respectable amount. I was amazed at the figures given by the minister in connection with the expected traffic. They remind me of the prospectuses which are got out by some companies when they are floating these pulp mills, and I recall one in particular down in my own province.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That would be a good one, I would think.

Mr. SHORT: The facts were just as rosy as those presented by the minister, but unfortunately the wheels in the mill never turned, and this case may prove to be similar. We had an expenditure in 1928 of $300,000 at Ellis Bay, which is in the same constituency.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That was reduced to $200,000.

Mr. SHORT: In 1927-28 they spent $150,000, and $300,000 was spent in 1928-29. No wonder there are so many pulp mills in the province of Quebec. When they know they can come to this government and obtain grants such as this I can quite understand why so many mills are built in that province. I wonder when this sort of thing is going to stop. Probably there will be another one next year, because the hon. member who represents that constituency tells us that it is proposed to build two more towns down there.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The development work in those cases is being done by the companies themselves.

Mr. CANTLEY: This seems to be a rather remarkable wharf, because judging from the information given by the minister it will be about a third of a mile long. Has anything been done by the promoters referred to beyond putting out the prospectus, or has the whole thing floated in on the dew? How did they get any plant there if the deep water end of a wharf yet to be built is 1,900 feet away from the shore?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand the work has been proceeded with. There were 300 men working there all last year. The power development has been completed and the company has, I understand, made very substantial progress which makes it necessary that the wharf should be in shape for use this year.

Mr. MANION: Does that mean they will be producing paper this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, but it is necessary to have the wharf because such an immense amount of shipping is required in connection with the construction. This is a $10,000,000 construction and they cannot get the materials, machinery and that sort of thing in there without a wharf.

Mr. MANION: Is any time limit set when the mill will be completed and in operation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I believe it is calculated it will be producing in 1932.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is there any railway communication with this point?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CANTLEY: Then I gather there cannot have been any machinery actually delivered on the site or on the plant. The wharf is not completed. There is no railway. The outer end of the wharf is 1,900 feet from the shore. It is quite evdent to any hon. member who considers the situation that there can be no machinery there. There has been no development except on paper. Is that not correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not wonder at my hon. friend coming to that conclusion because that is just what I have told him, namely, that they cannot get the machinery in until the wharf is constructed.

Mr. BOYS: Has the minister made any inquiry as to the financial standing of the companies themselves? What cash has been put up? They first go and get a concession from the province of Quebec. The next thing is the flotation of the company and the sale of bonds. When was the first demand for their share of the cost made upon the companies and how many times has that demand been made since without anything being paid up to date?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These are two companies: the Ontario Paper Company Limited and the Anglo Canadian Pulp and Paper Company.

Mr. BOYS: That means nothing in itself

Mr. ELLIOTT: They already have large mills, one at Thorold and the other at Quebec. They are well known companies of high financial standing. I have the details as to the work the companies are doing at their different places.

Mr. BOYS: To my mind the minister has just given us the most valuable information we have had so far in regard to this item. Assuming that to be correct, one is prompted to inquire, if they are strong companies with large assets, why in the world have they not paid the $25,000 apparently demanded more than once by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It has only been very recently earned and I am not sure that it has not been paid. I am not aware of its having been.

Mr. BOYS: I thought the minister said the practice was to send these accounts out once a month.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the practice.

Mr. BOYS: I thought he was dealing with this item and I presumed the account had been rendered. Therefore I wondered, if they are strong companies, why the amount had not been paid.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was only saying it was the practice of the department to render the accounts once a month to any contributing company so that they would know, according to the engineers' estimate, what amount had been earned when they were checking up on the contract. I cannot tell my hon. friend whether or not they have paid. The work is really just well under way. Whether any part of their contribution of $25,000 has been paid, I am not in a position to say, but I shall be glad to find out.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has already told us, but the information may have been given without consulting the record. He informed the committee that no portion had been received.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not.

Mr. BOYS: Well, we will pass that up. We ought to know that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to get the information.

Mr. BOYS: While these are probably substantial companies, this savours in some respects of Belle River. We have a wharf 1,900 feet long. What is the depth of water at the end of it? At Belle River we had to go out further to get five feet of water.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Twenty-five feet at low water. Since the discussion started I have been informed that they have already paid $18,810.

Mr. BOYS: If we had known that sooner, quite a lot of this discussion might have been avoided.

Mr. CANTLEY: Who are the contractors? Are they doctors or dentists?

Mr. MANION: Or lawyers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The latter would probably be the best. They are Farley & Grant, and Cummins & Robinson, Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

Montebello wharf reconstruction, $10,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is the place where there is to be a large club which is in favour with the Canadian Pacific Railway and which has acquired a territory in and around Montebello for the purpose of developing the fishing and so on. Will the minister give us some of the facts regarding that project? I suppose this wharf is for the purpose of assisting in that development?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It has nothing whatever to do with that development. It is to reconstruct the landing head 90 feet by 40 feet in crib work construction from the low water line up, rebuild the wooden approach, raise the whole structure a height of two feet and construct a new two-storey freight shed.

Mr. MANION: In view of the fact that there is going to be a sort of summer club at that point, and no doubt many United States visitors are to be invited to go there, might it not be possible to use the dock and freight shed when they are constructed, for storing wet goods?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to make inquiry and if the facilities can be provided there—

Mr. MANION: We might go down there together.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would even consider that. To be quite serious about the matter, this is for the purpose of repairing an old structure damaged by an ice shove in the spring of 1928.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is it a wooden wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Norton creek dredging—the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $3,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I notice the amount is very much less than it was last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is just finishing up the work.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am glad to hear that. Can the minister undertake that no further money will be inserted in the estimates for the purpose of blasting the bed of this rocky creek in order that it may act as a drain for the surrounding country?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This finishes the work presently contemplated. I would not like to undertake that this would be the final amount. This is an old story. It started away back in 1912-13, as my hon. friend knows, and it has been a bone of contention every once in a while. I quite agree with him that unless these works, as a general rule, can be connected up in some way with some work the Dominion government has done, we should be careful about entering upon them.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I know the minister agrees with me that an expenditure for this particular purpose ought not to be undertaken. The Dominion government should not spend money for local drainage purposes. This amount will finish the contract, I understand. The minister says that the government should be very careful about expenditures of this kind. I would go further and say that the government should not spend money for this purpose at all, and I would ask the minister to use his great influence with the government to see that it is not done any more.

Mr. ELLIOTT: After we have been doing it all these years, it is pretty difficult to say that we are going to stop the practice absolutely. Each case must be decided on its merits.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Political merits?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. This is something for which the Dominion government, it is claimed, is responsible. That is the main ground of the claim.

Item agreed to.

Norway Bay—wharf reconstruction—to complete, $5,000.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: May I ask the minister what has been done and what is required to be done in connection with this work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to complete the reconstruction of the wharf by rebuilding four cribs in the approach and one crib in the landing head. We spent last year $5,557, and it is estimated that $6,000 will complete the work. The report from the engineer is that part of the landing head of this wharf was built on piles, and considerable damage was done to a portion of the structure by ice. In order to prevent any further damage, a crib will have to be built next year to replace the pilework in the upstream part of the landing head.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Just what use is made of this wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The engineers report contains this clause:

The above work is required to keep the wharf in a good state of repair for the accommodation of a very large tourist traffic during the summer months. The traffic between Norway Bay and Sand Point over the ferry is fairly heavy. There are two mails daily to and from Sand Point, Ontario, and the structure has to be kept in a safe condition.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: This happens to be the only one item in almost three pages of expenditures for the province of Quebec with which I am acquainted. I have heard recently that there is a possibility of this summer resort being flooded by some power project that is under way and is likely to be proceeded with this summer. Has the minister any information on that point?

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that as a result of the work at Chats falls, there will be flooding to some extent at Norway Bay, but, of course, that will have to be compensated for as part of the cost of the Chats falls project.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: In view of that, it seems rather strange to be going on with this expenditure. In 1928-29 there was $5,000 in the estimates, in 1929-30, $6,000, and this year an additional $5,000 for a small wharf at a place where there is absolutely no business with the exception of four or five months in the summer, and that only by ferry to Sand Point. If this summer resort is going to be flooded this summer and the wharf made useless, why continue making this expenditure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend is under the impression that it is only a small wharf, his information is incorrect. It is an extensive wharf about 700 feet long.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I have been up there several times.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not disputing that. It is quite an extensive wharf and accommodates a very large tourist traffic. According to the engineer's report, some 1,500 automobiles and 8,000 passengers use this wharf annually, ferrying to and from the Ontario side of the Ottawa river.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: That does not clear up the point with regard to flooding.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry I neglected to answer that part of my hon. friend's question. I understand the flooding, whatever there will be from the Chats falls project, will not render unnecessary the keeping in repair of this wharf. It is not going to be put out of business.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the flooding make the wharf inaccessible at times?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, no.

Item agreed to.

Petit Cap—breakwater, $31,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will this amount finish the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to complete the contract with Charles A. Nadeau for the construction of the breakwater.

Item agreed to.

Rimouski — harbour improvements — The Foundation Maritime Ltd. to contribute one-third of the cost of pier extension, $75,000.

Mr. SHORT: Would the minister give us some information with respect to this item? It is only one of a number of items where a private corporation contributes one-third of the cost.

Mr. BOYS: I see the member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) is here to explain it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required towards improvement to the wharf at Rimouski to provide facilities for the development of this harbour as the base of operations for the salvage and construction of vessels engaged in the gulf and river St. Lawrence by the Foundation Maritime Ltd. This company has purchased property here and is proceeding to install plant and equipment at an immediate cost of $200,000. They will centre at Rimouski floating plant having a value of $300,000, and will undertake repair work on plants on the north shore or vessels trading up and down the St. Lawrence at a considerable saving in time to vessels or plant needing repair, which would otherwise have to ship parts to Quebec.

This undertaking will give employment to about 100 men to commence with, and more later, and will promote and increase the welfare of a considerable region around Rimouski.

Mr. BOYS: When was the company incorporated?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It as an old company, I understand.

Mr. SHORT: Is it the policy of this government to contribute two-thirds of the cost to any private corporation that comes along and is doing a salvage business or any other kind of marine or plup business? There are salvage companies in the St. Lawrence which are heavily subsidized every year. In our part of the country these companies get no subsidies at all. They have to find their own plant and equipment. Why does this government contribute $75,000 to a corporation like the Foundation Maritime Ltd., which is a large corporation? They get contracts down in our part of the country. Perhaps the hon. member for Rimouski may be more familiar with the situation than the minister and may be able to throw some light on it.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have no hesitation whatever in explaining to my hon. friend the real object of this vote. The Shipping Federation of Canada, four or five years ago, approached the chamber of commerce and town council of Rimouski, asking if they would in any way help to establish in the lower St. Lawrence a wrecking plant in order to undertake salvage work and assist the shipping that is carried on between Quebec and the lower St. Lawrence. The company took the trouble to examine sites. They went as far down as Matane, then finally decided on Rimouski as the best location. I might add that the vote asked for at the present time is not for the wrecking corporation, but for an extension to the wharf at Rimouski in order to complete the inner harbour and provide shelter on the west side of the harbour. This work has been asked for, during the last four years, in the public interest. This amount is required to complete the work that was undertaken a few years ago. The Foundation Maritime Ltd. are being asked to contribute part of the cost of the construction of the wharf in order to compensate the public for the space that they will occupy, and I think that is only just.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): How many public wharves are there in Rimouski? Here is one item of $75,000, and the next item is for $10,000 for wharf repairs at Rimouski. How many public wharves are there in Rimouski —half a dozen?

Sir EUGENE FISET: There is only one. The $10,000 is required for ordinary repairs. This wharf is a mile and a quarter long. It has to be repaired yearly. The $75,000 is for additional work to complete a wing on the west side in order to give protection to vessels that come on that side of the wharf.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): In my judgment there is no more necessity or justification for this expenditure than there would be for putting a pier out into the river behind this building.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That may be your opinion.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It is not in the public interest at all. What is the minister's policy in regard to these wrecking and similar companies? Down in our province, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) has said, we do that kind of work according to business principles: the company is organized and secures its plant, Although we applied to this parliament for assistance a short time ago we were turned down, and yet you can subsidize wrecking companies in the St. Lawrence—as many as come along and ask for assistance. What is the policy of the government in regard to these companies? Why are not similar companies in the maritime provinces subsidized in the same way?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am rather surprised to hear my hon. friend's statement in view of what was done in Sheet Harbour, right in his own riding, to assist the Anglo Canadian Pulp and Paper Company. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that we did the dredging there and the company received the benefit. I thought I had made it clear to my other hon. friend that this was an improvement to the wharf at Rimouski, and the contribution is being made to us. My hon. friend spoke of it as a contribution made by us to these people to build the wharf.

Mr. MANION: Not a political contribution?

Mr. SHORT: If it is a public wharf wholly in the public interest, why accept a third of the cost from a private company?

Sir EUGENE FISET: I would be quite willing to strike it off if the minister would consent.

Mr. SHORT: They must be greatly interested in it in some way.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, they are doing a big business there, which is of considerable benefit to the shipping interests.

Mr. SHORT: And they are getting well subsidized for it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend would subside for a moment. They are anxious to have facilities at the wharf and are willing to contribute towards the cost. It seems to me an excellent agreement.

Mr. BOYS: This is a yearly friend. It appears in 1929 for $14,200, in 1930 for $11,000 and again this year for $10,000 more. I may now be referring to the item which immediately follows the $75,000 item. Why in the world is this annual expenditure necessary? It seems to be an expensive wharf to appear every year. Is there some special reason for it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, if my hon. friend knows Rimouski at all he must be aware that the wharf is just half a mile long, and that different governments in the past have spent over $1,600,000 on it. Some part of it will in all probability require repairs every year.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not think there is any justification at all for this vote. Why should we subsidize this concern? We have already subsidized a wrecking company up the St. Lawrence river. As to maintaining the wharf at Rimouski, which the minister states is about half a mile in length or more, if he went down the coast to Bic, a little below—

Mr. ELLIOTT: And abandon this wharf?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: After spending more than $1,600,000 on it?

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, certainly. Has he considered the annual expenditure which he has referred to? Has he considered that phase of the question?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why does he tie up this salvage company with this wharf? If they want a wharf for their purpose let them build one themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: I know a wharf below Quebec at a point called Trois Saumons that has been abandoned. It was not a public wharf, it was built by the Price Company. It is the only wharf that has been abandoned in eastern Quebec so far as I know.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite agree with you.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, we are not going to carry it for a while yet. I know the wharf in question, I have embarked and disembarked at it half a dozen times or more. A large vessel cannot get within a very considerable distance of the wharf now, and never could.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid my hon. friend is not aware that within the last three years a channel seventeen feet at low tide and twenty-two feet at high tide has been dredged.

Mr. CANTLEY: Did any Atlantic liner ever moor at the wharf or venture to do so?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Can any Atlantic liner moor at any port on the lower St. Lawrence on the south shore? Name me one.

Mr. CANTLEY: We have been maintaining an expensive tender service there for the last thirty years simply because the wharf is in the wrong place.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid that again my hon. friend is wrong. The tender operated at Father Point is operated for three departments of the government, the defence, customs and post office, and the only shelter they have in a northeast gale is the Rimouski wharf. Ask any department of the crown to abandon the Rimouski wharf and see what answer you will get.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Has the hon. gentleman had any negotiation with the minister with regard to the dredging after they get this wharf built? If I understand rightly, even vessels of reasonable size cannot approach the wharf and there will be another vote next year for dredging.

Sir EUGENE FISET: This is for completion of the work, $75,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: The fact of the matter is that no further money should be spent on this wharf. The work of disembarking passengers and mails should be done down at Bic. In proof of that statement I would say that four-fifths of the vessels going down discharge their pilots at Bic rather than at Rimouski.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Again my hon. friend is mistaken. Bic was abandoned over fifteen years ago.

Mr. CANTLEY: You do not know anything about it.

Item agreed to.

Rimouski—wharf repairs, $10,000.

Mr. SHORT: Is this the same wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. SHORT: The Foundation Maritime Co. do not contribute anything, they do not use this section of it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. SHORT: I see.

Item agreed to.

Riviere au Tonnerre—wharf, $110,000.

Mr. MANION: What is that for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required to complete the contract with Joseph Gagnon for the construction of a wharf composed of an approach of the pier and bridge type 675 feet in length by 16 feet in width and an open faced cribwork headlock 425 feet in length by 30 feet in width and having a height at the outer end of 35 feet with 20 feet of water at low tide.

Mr. MANION: What is the total of the contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total is $127,132.

Mr. MANION: Is this to complete the wharf, or will there be further expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to complete it.

Mr. MANION: This is a new wharf, is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: What constituency is this in, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is in Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Item agreed to.

Riviere au Renard—wharf extension and repairs, $49,500.

Mr. MANION: What constituency is this in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Gaspé.

Mr. MANION: I just wondered whether it was in Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I cannot control them all.

Mr. MANION: That is too bad.

Mr. SHORT: You must be anticipating difficulty in the next election in your constituency.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, the constituency is growing owing to the great prosperity there.

Item agreed to.

Riviere des Prairies—improvements, $73,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister might give us some explanation of this item. Is it for navigation or what?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to complete the contract for deepening the channel in this river. These improvements are required towards the restoration of navigation in Riviere des Prairies by providing a twelve-foot channel from Bout de I'lle to the village of Riviere des Prairies and the construction of a wharf at the village.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the business that will be done when this channel is completed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This will give access by water to the largest stone quarries in the district and will result in a saving of over one dollar per ton on the stone used in the Montreal district and along the south shore of the St. Lawrence. Approximately 400,000 tons of stone are shipped to Montreal, and 100,000 tons outside of Montreal. It is expected that new quarries will open up and that private wharves will be constructed on both sides of this river. It will be possible to bring coal to this district by water at a saving of 70 cents per ton, and a substantial saving will be effected on other commodities. Eventually this river will provide means of transportation for all the goods, agricultural and industrial, coming from the counties of Maisonneuve, Laval, Two Mountains and Terrebonne to Montreal.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I take it these quarries are privately owned?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Do you know who owns the quarries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I do not.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there any guarantee that this one dollar per ton will not be absorbed by the owners of the quarries, who may sell their stone at the same price? Is there any guarantee that the public will get any benefit from these expenditures of money?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The statement indicates that this amount will be saved.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: To the owners of the quarry or to the public?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To the public; to the users of stone.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has the minister any report which would warrant him in stating to this house that the public will save one dollar per ton on this stone?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, the cheaper you make transportation the less the user of the commodity will have to pay.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I presume the city of Montreal brings stone from a great many places, and that there are several firms who compete for the market. If this stone costs one dollar less to get into Montreal I cannot see why, unless there is some agreement or arrangement, they cannot continue to get the same price and absorb the dollar saving themselves. The minister has not yet made any case showing that this is for the public benefit.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the stone now costs a certain amount in Montreal, and if a dollar a ton can be saved by water transportation I should think it fairly evident that the cost to the user of the stone will be less.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose these people do not supply all the stone that goes into Montreal. The price of the stone in Montreal must be made by the competitors who ship from various places. I take it this is only one of the sources of supply, and we have been told many times that the price of wheat is set in Liverpool for different parts of the world. If the price of stone in Montreal stays where it is now these people must be more than human if they sell their stone for less than they are getting at present.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In view of my hon. friend's wide business experience, and in view of the fact that he has already suggested that there are other competitors in the stone market of Montreal, does it not suggest itself that if these men can now compete there after paying railway freight, with the cost of transportation reduced one dollar a ton naturally they will lower their price in order to sell more stone. It should bring all the prices down.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not prepared to admit that at all. I should like to know what companies in this district produce stone; how much stone they send to Montreal from that particular section, and the names of the companies.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I doubt very much if I have the names of the companies, but I have the statement that these are the largest stone quarries in that district.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What are the names of the companies? The minister says he cannot give the full personnel but surely he knows some of them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I do not.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the minister say he does not know the name of a single individual interested in these quarries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I do not.

Item agreed to.

Ste. Anne des Monts—wharf repairs, $35,000.

Mr. MANION: In what constituency is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Gaspe.

Mr. SHORT: Will this complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for the construction of a crib along the west side of the present wharf from the outer end in towards shore, for a length of 300 feet. The district engineer reported on November 8, 1929, that this wharf was considerably damaged near the outer end by storms and that the damage was due to the action of worms which had eaten the lower timbers at the outer end of the crib, weakening the timbers and allowing the storms and heavy seas to loosen and carry them away. The traffic over this structure is quite heavy and amounts to some $600,000 annually.

Item agreed to.

Ste. Anne de Sorel—reconstruction of icebreakers, $10,000.

Mr. MANION: Is this item for icebreakers in the form of ships?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, these are piers.

Item agreed to.

St. Antoine de Tilly—dredging, $57,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is in Lotbiniere.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will this amount complete the work or, if not, how much will it cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This completes both the contracts.

Item agreed to.

Ste. Petronille—wharf repairs and improvements, $14,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister give us an explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to provide for the contract with Ludger Lemieux, Limited, for repairs and improvements to the wharf at Ste. Petronille. This work was requested by the district engineer in his annual estimates and is required to complete the reconstruction of this wharf which was commenced in 1928-29.

Item agreed to.

St. Simeon de Bonaventure—rebuilding protection work, $1,500.

Mr. MANION: What constituency is that in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Bonaventure.

Mr. PECK: In connection with these small items which are provided for in the estimates, is the work to be done by contract or by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We do as many as we can by contract, but many of the smaller ones are done by day labour.

Mr. PECK: Would those cases represent two-thirds of the items?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In number but not in amount.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—Harbours and rivers—Cobourg—harbour improvements, $100,000.

Mr. MANION: I think we should have some information about this item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required towards the following harbour improvements: Reconstruction of north or esplanade dock which has been in a dilapidated condition for a number of years; the substructure to be cribwork and the superstructure to be five feet wide on top, total length 786 feet, $130,000, of which $40,000 is a revote from last year. Maintenance dredging between the outer ends of the entrance piers to a depth of 22 feet, 33,340 cubic yards at 48 cents scow measure,

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister tell us the nature of the business carried on at this point?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The engineer's report states:

This wharf has been previously reported on and as a result of an examination made a few days ago, I would state that the reconstruction of the superstructure is imperative if this section of the harbour is to be utilized by vessels.

The esplanade is owned by the town of Cobourg and when in good condition is extensively used by the passengers going to and returning from the car ferries. The number of passengers averages about 300 per day during the summer months.

In time of storm on lake Ontario, vessels in shelter in Cobourg harbour tie up to the esplanade wharf and the car ferries also make use of it as a tying up place when not in use.

Mr. MAYBEE: Is it the intention to provide for a depth of 22 feet?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MAYBEE: Is it expected that this amount will complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MAYBEE: Have any contracts been let or tenders called for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The estimated cost is about $146,000.

Mr. MAYBEE: Have any contracts been let or tenders called for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Tenders have been called for but no contract has been let.

Mr. MAYBEE: When are they to be received?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The tenders are in.

Mr. GEARY: How was the work done last year—by contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was done by contract by Messrs. Hardy & Grant.

Item agreed to.

Collingwood—harbour improvements, $160,000.

Mr. MANION: Could we have some explanation of this item? I am anxious to know how the member representing that constituency got it in.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister like me to assist him in that connection?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This case was so meritorious that I hardly expect I will need even the assistance of my hon. friend, but I will be very glad to have it.

Mr. BOYS: We are now dealing with a harbour of national importance, and one which has been an outstanding harbour for at least half a century.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Like Rimouski.

Mr. BOYS: I have only one criticism to offer in connection with this item, and that is that it should be $300,000 instead of $160,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think all expenditures when judged by the test of the opinion of the man who is on the ground will be considered as being too small. All the representations received by the department for these places, like Rimouski, are that a larger amount should be spent.

Mr. BOYS: This is not one of those perennial items.

Item agreed to.

Footes Bay—wharf construction and enlargement, $13,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What constituency is this place in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think this item should be criticized when we consider the meagre allotment made by the government to Muskoka, one of the greatest tourist countries in the world. I think we have been overlooked, especially when compared with Rimouski.

Item agreed to.

Hoople creek—contribution to the municipality of the township of Osnabruck towards dredging Hoople creek, the provincial government and the municipality to share in the cost, $18,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this another creek to be dredged out?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is similar to the other items.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let us have the report on this item.

Mr. SHORT: Where is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in the county of Stormont. This item is to cover 20 per cent of the total estimated cost of the work, which is the basis of similar grants made by the Dominion government for work of this nature.

Mr. BOYS: This item opens up a wide field for discussion, and I would like to ascertain the policy of the department in this connection. In my own county we have very serious trouble in connection with the Nottawasaga river which drains practically the whole of the county of Simcoe. It would be very desirable if some expenditure could be made there which would improve thousands of acres of land, and if there is any way in which we can obtain a little assistance from the public treasury we might think of going after it. Will the minister tell the committee what the policy of the department is in this connection?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Similar contributions have been made in connection with Norton creek and other cases to which reference has been made. This practice is resorted to only when the burden is so great that assistance seems to be justified.

Mr. BOYS: This work is being done for the drainage of land, and that is all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will assist the drainage very materially.

Mr. BOYS: It has nothing to do with navigation, not even for motor boats?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not at the present time.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing a deserving case is brought to the attention of the department where with the spring freshets there is constant flooding, is it the definite policy of the department to make a substantial grant?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To say that it obtains throughout Canada is a rather broad statement. It has obtained for many years in a number of places. It dates back to shortly after confederation. The difficulty is that in the vicinity either some work is done which it is claimed has affected the drainage or some other work of a similar nature has been done to which the government has made a contribution in the past, and perhaps where the hardship is greater in the particular case than in almost any others, the contribution may be made. That, I think, is about the policy. Every case stands on its own footing.

Mr. BOYS: I must confess I cannot gather any definite policy from that, and that is really what I should like to get. May I definitely state the situation which we have in Simcoe county and then perhaps the minister can tell me whether or not the department would be willing to consider an appropriation in that connection? The Nottawasaga river drains the whole county and a little more. It flows into Georgian bay. At one particular part which is locally known as "the neck of the bottle"—that is not at all significant—the banks are very high and the channel is narrow. When the spring freshets occur, the water is held back and floods the land to a depth of twelve to fourteen feet, causing considerable damage. It seems to be well understood locally that if the channel could be widened, we would not have this trouble, but the cost is too great for the lands in the vicinity. Under the Drainage Act no drainage work could be undertaken which would afford the relief and which would not cost too much for the lands to bear. I have no doubt the provincial government would assist in the work and if it is the policy of the department to aid in work of that kind, I am of opinion that with the aid of the department and the provincial government, the lands in question bearing their fair share of the cost, the work might well be undertaken. Tremendous benefit would undoubtedly result from it. This is a concrete case I put to the minister. It is foreign to the item, it is true, but if in this particular case a grant is being made for work of that kind, it would encourage me as long as I represent any part of the county of Simcoe to come to the department and ask for assistance in such a work which is of great magnitude and one of which would warrant the sympathetic consideration of the department if it is their policy to aid in work of that character.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course it is pretty hard to give even an intimation of what might take place until you know all the circumstances. What is the area?

Mr. BOYS: Thousands of acres. I do not mean for a moment to leave the impression that it is all waste land. It is not. All I am saying is that the land floods and great damage is caused thereby, whereas if the channel were widened, that might be avoided, if not in toto, at all events in part. I am not asking the minister to tell me whether he will give the county of Simcoe a grant of $100,000 or anything of that kind; I am not suggesting that. I am merely trying to find out whether it is the policy of the department to entertain such requests and if we assume the facts as I have outlined them are correct, whether the application could be made with some reasonable chances of success.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would say to my hon. friend very frankly that it is not the policy of the department to encourage applications of that kind; but if applications are made, and if the circumstances bring the matter reasonably in line with some of the other grants that have been made, or if, at any time a grant has been made on that particular work or assistance given by the Dominion government for it, that forms a pretty good precedent to go by and it is difficult to refuse it particularly if the hardship is so great that the owners of those lands will have to leave them or a substantial portion of them useless unless they get some assistance. That is about the general policy which is followed.

Mr. BOYS: That statement would hardly apply to any drainage work. Take the works carried on under the provisions of the Drainage Acts in every province. There is no suggestion that if the work is not done the farmers will have to leave their lands. The point is that there is a flooded condition which interferes with the ploughing of the land, the cultivation of the soil, and so on, which condition could be improved by drainage. That is the proposition to which I am referring. If this is the policy of the department, we certainly might get the benefit of it just as well as the particular case we are dealing with, namely, Hoople creek, which for all I know is a very deserving case.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If brought within the rules of ordinary drainage, the lands can be drained and a fairly good margin left after the cost of drainage for the value of the land, I would not look upon the proposition with nearly as much favour as I would upon a case where several thousands of acres of land are so submerged by water that the ordinary cost of drainage, with the aid the province gives, is not sufficient to justify the owners of those lands embarking upon a drainage project. In that case they would have a great deal better chance than if the ordinary drainage rules applied. I cannot quite agree with what my hon. friend has said, namely, that no drainage scheme comes within that category. I have known many that have come within it. Drainage schemes are being undertaken now that years ago would not have been considered on account of the excess cost of the drainage scheme over what the lands would be worth afterwards. As land increases in value and local conditions change, frequently by a draniage scheme land can be reclaimed that would not formerly have been worth it. I do not believe in many of the cases where aid has been granted, it would have been granted if they thought the matter just came within the ordinary drainage rules, but if it is a case where a few thousand dollars may be the means of making productive land that would otherwise be unproductive, I believe that is the policy that has actuated all the governments that have given assistance.

Mr. BOYS: I am considerably encouraged by the minister's statement, and I may be prompted to communicate with him at some future date. Will he give the committee an outline of just what has prompted the department to make the grant in regard to the item under consideration? Is it a case in which lands now useless are to be brought into a state of cultivation or lands now cultivated are to be improved, or what are the facts of this particular case?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a large area, about 25,000 acres, in a very similar situation to the desperate position in which the people in the Beaudette district, not so far from it, found themselves a few years ago, and towards which they were granted aid. I think that is what prompted these people to come and urge their claims which were urged for some time before they were granted. I believe this land will not be utilized unless some encouragement is given.

Mr. BOYS: Is the land in question settled on now or is this to induce settlement?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think portions of the various farms are occupied.

Mr. BOYS: Then this is just a case of relief from the spring freshets that the country suffers from? Is that the situation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is more than spring freshets; they are under flood a great deal of the time.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Has there been any correspondence with the provincial government over this expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The municipality represented that if we made this grant the provincial government would share in the cost and we are making the grant on that condition.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total cost of this project?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $90,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information in regard to the water levels?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not under my hand.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the water level pretty nearly as high as the land, or is this just a condition that occurs now and again?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Do I understand the minister to say that this amount asked for is only one-fifth of the proposed cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is just a contribution.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This amount will have to be asked for every year for five years?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, no. This is just one contribution.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: The whole cost is as stated in the vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. In reply to my hon. friend from Acadia, I have not the levels, but the engineer tells me from his information at the present time that the ordinary rainfall leaves a great portion of this land submerged a good deal of the time.

Item agreed to.

Kincardine—harbour repairs and improvements, $55,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this a new wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is an old one.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this for repairs?

Mr. MANION: I see that the amount of this item is $55,000, and that $51,000 was spent last year. I would like to know how much has been spent in Kincardine in the last five years.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can get that information for my hon. friend, but the best information I have here is that the total expenditure since confederation up to March 31, 1929, was $613,409.

Mr. MANION: What has been the expenditure for the last five years?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can get that information.

Mr. MANION: I would like the item held over until after dinner or until I have that information.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to do that.

Item stands.

Kingston—dredging Cataraqui bay, $73,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this amount complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. This is to complete the contract to dredge a slip on either side of the 2,500,000 bushel elevator under construction by the Canada Steamships.

Item agreed to.

Kingston R.M.C.—repairs and improvements, $2,200.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this for repairs to the Royal Military College?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Kingston (La Salle causeway)—reconstruction of guide piers, $13,300.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this to replace the guide piers damaged by the storm? The minister will remember that I drew this matter to his attention last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My note shows that this work was requested by district engineer, Mr. St. Laurent, in his annual estimates. It is required for the reconstruction of the guide piers at each end of the bascule span, which are decayed beyond repair.

Item agreed to.

Kingsville—repairs to piers, $30,000.

Mr. MANION: What constituency is this in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: South Essex.

Item agreed to.

Lion's Head—wharf repairs, $4,200.

Mr. SHORT: Where is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in North Bruce.

Mr. SHORT: Will this complete the work? I see that $4,000 was spent last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the estimated cost of completion.

Mr. MANION: There are four items as to which I should like the expenditure for the last five years. They are all in North Bruce. They are Kincardine, Lion's Head, Port Bruce, Port Elgin and Saugeen river. If the minister would not mind, I would like these items held over until after dinner, when perhaps the information will be available. With respect to Kincardine, the minister gave the amount that had been expended since confederation. As no doubt he has that information with respect to these other items, it might be interesting to have that too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to get that information.

Item agreed to.

Little Current—dredging, $50,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain this item and say where Little Current is?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in Algoma East, on Manitoulin island. This amount was requested by the district engineer to remove the loose rock from the bottom of the older portion of the improved channel and clean the latter up to the full project depth. At the present time the available depth is only 16½ feet, whereas 20 feet below water level has been made in the several other items of dredging carried out from time to time at this place.

Item agreed to.

Meaford—harbour improvements, $50,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required towards improvements to this harbour to provide sufficient depth and protection for grain vessels in connection with the proposed new two million bushel elevator to be constructed by the Canadian Terminal System Limited, of Toronto, at a cost of about $1,000,000.

Item agreed to.

Michipicoten—dredging, $50,000.

Mr. MANION: This is in East Algoma, is it not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, West Algoma.

Mr. MANION: Is it not in the same riding as Little Current?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MANION: What is the amount asked for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work has been very strongly urged on behalf of the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company, to provide sufficient depth of water in the approach to their new coal storage dock. This dock was constructed in 1929 by their subsidiary, the Algoma Central Terminals Limited, at an expenditure of $450,000, including a modern coal unloading bridge, and will be extended in the near future at a total expenditure of $960,000. The present dock handles 100,000 tons of coal annually, and is used to capacity, and the completed dock will handle 300,000 tons for use of this railway; pulp and paper mills at Kapuskasing and Smooth Rock falls; mines at Helen; and for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railway in that district, at a large saving in transportation costs. It is estimated that a saving of $100,000 annually will accrue from this development when completed, besides providing much needed revenue for the Algoma Central Railway Company. This wharf is also used by the public and this centre is increasing as a tourist resort.

Item agreed to.

Midland—wharf extension, $40,000.

Mr. SHORT: Will this complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The estimated cost is $72,000. This is just a start.

Mr. SHORT: It is intended to complete it this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is possible. It will all depend on when we can get started and on the progress the contractor makes.

Mr. SHORT: This is just an extension, not a new work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is an extension of an existing work. Perhaps I had better give the details. This work has been requested since 1927 and was very strongly urged on January 15, 1930, by a delegation consisting of the president of the chamber of commerce, Mr. Ross; Mr. Burke, representing the marine interests; Mr. Wagg, of the Georgian Bay Transit Company, and others. Very urgent letters have been received in January from the Burke Towing and Salvage Company, the Georgian Bay Tourist Company, of Midland, the Georgian Bay Shipbuilding and Wrecking Company, the Dominion Sugar Company, and F. W. Grant of Midland.

It was represented that the present government wharf, 250 feet long, was insufficient for the business, and a request was made that an extension, 200 feet long and 65 feet wide, estimated to cost $72,000, be provided for in the estimates. The present tourist traffic calls at Midland, and there is very serious congestion with the existing public wharf facilities.

Midland has grown from a population of from six to seven thousand ten years ago, to eight thousand at the present time. In connection with business offering, mention was made of the possibility of shipping sugar for distribution from Midland; also, the Cleveland and Detroit Boat lines are considering the extension of their business to take in such points as Midland with a new line of boats. The old Canadian National Railway wharf alongside the public wharf is in such a state of disrepair that it cannot be used to any extent. Midland harbour has the advantage of not requiring much dredging owing to its natural adaptability for a harbour, and it was felt the town should have sufficient wharf facilities to handle the traffic.

Mr. THOMPSON: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with everything the hon. minister has said with regard to the importance of Midland as a great national harbour. Midland is the Georgian-bay end of the tourist traffic amongst the Thirty Thousand islands, which islands are attracting tourists from all over the American continent, the scenery between Midland and Parry Sound being unsurpassed. I think the work done in the past has been altogether insufficient, and this vote might reasonably have been increased to the full amount asked for by the delegation.

Item agreed to.

Mitchell's bay—dredging, $14,000.

Mr. SHORT: Where is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In Kent county.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Short.]

Newcastle—wharf repairs, $1,500.

Mr. BOWEN: What is the nature of the repairs contemplated? This wharf has been going to pieces for years, and to-day it is in a very dilapidated condition. I had hoped there would have been a larger amount provided.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount is required for the reconstruction of a small section of the superstructure of the east pier, on the harbour side, covering a length of 132 feet with a width of 10 feet in order to permit of a landing place for small tourist craft. Owing to the decayed condition of the structures the summer tourists are under great hardship to find a landing place for their launches and boats.

Item agreed to.

North bay—Consecon—dredging, $7,200.

Mr. SHORT: Where is North bay?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In Prince Edward-Lennox county.

Item agreed to.

Oakville—dredging, $13,000.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Will this be done by contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Were the repairs last year done by contract or day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They were done last year by day labour.

Item agreed to.

Oakville—reconstruction of pier, $30,500.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Will this work be done by contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Partly by contract and partly by day labour.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): What proportion of it will be done by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work is urgently required to repair the damage done to the east pier by severe storms in November and December, 1927. In 1928 this work was postponed for a year by temporary repairs costing about $300, while the damage done to the west pier was being repaired. Further damage was done, however, by heavy seas since then, and in order to prevent the total destruction of the pier end and damage to the lighthouse, it should be attended to at once. A deputation to the minister on November 22, 1929, strongly urged the necessity for this work. These piers are extensively used by the tourist trade and Oakville is the only port of refuge between Toronto and Hamilton. The proposed work is to pay for emergent repairs authorized December 3, 1929, $6,600; and reconstruction of balance of superstructure of east pier (450 feet less 36 feet already authorized), $23,900: a total of $30,500.

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister any details of the amount of traffic handled at that point?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have already said it is the only shelter or harbour between Toronto and Hamilton, and is used extensively by craft of the Royal Canadian Yacht Club and tugs. The piers are also extensively used by tourists at Oakville.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): The minister did not say how much of the $30,500 would be done by day labour, and how much by contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT: About $10,000 by day labour and about $20,000 by contract.

Item agreed to.

Owen Sound—harbour improvements, $55,000.

Mr. SHORT: I notice there was a vote of this amount last year. Was nothing expended at Owen Sound?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Practically nothing. This is a revote of the full amount.

Mr. SHORT: If you voted $55,000 last year, surely it was needed. Why was not the money expended?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before making the expenditure we had to get from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company title to certain properties which they own and upon which the work was to be done. There was a good deal of delay in this connection. The transfer of the property has recently been completed and we are now going on with the work.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is being done for the railway?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a public wharf.

Item agreed to.

Port Bruce—repairs to piers, $4,300.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Is this to stand?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is not in the riding you spoke of.

Mr. MANION: I should like the figures on it also.

Item stands.

Port Credit—removal of wrecks, $3,000.

Mr. COOTE: What is this vote for?

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Is this an annual affair? There was a similar amount last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend is in error with regard to last year. This is a new vote and is for the purpose of removing wrecks of scows which have become an eyesore in the harbour.

Mr. COOTE: Is the harbour used at all now? I thought a few moments ago the minister said Oakville was the only harbour between Toronto and Hamilton.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The only harbour of refuge.

Mr. COOTE: I thought Oakville was the only harbour we were keeping up in that district.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This vote is not so much for the utilization of the harbour as to remove some unsightly derelicts that have been lying there for a number of years.

Item agreed to.

Port Burwell—harbour repairs and improvements, $215,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is this expenditure for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required towards the following work:

(1) To complete the three year contract with the Port Arthur Construction Co. for the construction of a rubble mound checkwater 200 feet long projecting westerly from the centre of the existing breakwater; for repairs to existing rubble mound wall between outer end of west pier and inner end of concrete breakwater; and for the construction of a rubble mound extension in four lengths of varying direction, having a total length of 1,800 feet—

Work done 1929-30 in excess of appropriation, $87,670.

Drawback owing on progress estimates, $31,370.

Work remaining to be done on contract, $60,850.—Total, $179,890.

(2) To replace stone washed out of outer leg of rubble mound breakwater by storm in fall, 1929, $26,710.

(3) To construct headblock at outer end of rubble mound breakwater 40 feet by 40 feet with timber substructure and concrete superstructure to suport lighthouse, $20,000.

(4) Repairs and renewals to west pier, $5,200.

(5) To pay further final estimate on the contract of Messrs. William Bermingham and Son in 1927 for reconstruction of the outer end of the east pier, this amount being recommended by the chief engineer due to the difficulty of driving piles through stones not indicated in original borings, $1,090.

The total estimated cost is $232,890.

Mr. SPOTTON: Will the minister tell us what trade passes through this port?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have a statement of the total tonnage of freight carried by the Pennsylvania Ontario Transportation Company together with a statement of the customs and excise duties. For 1927-28 the total tonnage of freight amounted to 444,113 tons and the customs duties to $157,147.73, and in 1928-29 the customs duties amounted to $186,575.53. The total number of loaded cars and tonnage handled by the car ferry during the season of 1928, from January 1 to December 31, was as follows:

In		Out
Coal and Coke	Miscellaneous	Cars	Tons
7,134 cars	818 cars
411,903 tons	26,283 tons	216	5,927

Mr. CANTLEY: It seems to me that the traffic through this port is almost all inward, with very little outward commerce of any kind. I take it this is all either coal or coke?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Coal and coke.

Mr. CANTLEY: Who are the users, the railways or the steel companies?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Largely the railways.

Mr. CANTLEY: The railways only?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I would not say only, but nearly so. I understand a number of manufacturing concerns get their coal through this port.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the proposal with regard to the reconstruction; what class of work do you propose to put in there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Rubble mound. I read the description; it is a rubble mound checkwater.

Mr. CANTLEY: I understand that was the class of work that was destroyed. Are you going to put in exactly the same class of work that was carried away?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will just read the description again for my hon. friend. This amount is required to complete the three-year contract with the Port Arthur Construction Company for the construction of a rubble mound checkwater 200 feet long, projecting westerly from the centre of the existing concrete breakwater; for repairs to the existing rubble mound wall between the outer end of the western pier and the inner end of the concrete breakwater, and for the construction of a rubble mound extension in four lengths of varying direction, having a total length of 1,800 feet. This work is to cost $179,890. It is further required to replace the stone washed out of the outer leg of the rubble mound breakwater by a storm in the fall of the year 1929, and this work is to cost $26,710. Then there are several other smaller amounts.

Mr. CANTLEY: I thank the minister for the information, but it seems to me, in view of the large area that was washed away by the storms, that this should be replaced by something more permanent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the most permanent type of construction that we can get for the money.

Mr. CANTLEY: But that is not altogether the question.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is one of the questions.

Mr. CANTLEY: Large sections of this work have been carried away, and I understand it is intended to use similar construction in replacements. Does not experience teach us anything? I understood it taught all classes of people except fools, and I am sure the minister is not one of those.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Port Colborne—repairs to harbour works, $75,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain what this amount is for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for the following work: first, to complete the contract with the C. S. Boone Dredging and Construction Company, Limited, for repairs to certain sections of the east and west breakwaters damaged by severe storms in 1927, which are estimated to cost $50,000. This amount is also required to repair the next most urgent section of the west breakwater, 290 feet long, which is estimated to cost $35,000. For this we are including the amount of $25,000, making a total of $75,000.

Item agreed to.

Port Dover—harbour repairs and improvements, $25,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister tell me what this expenditure is for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $25,000, of which $21,000 is a revote from 1929-30, is required for the following work: first, to complete the contract with A. C. Stewart and Company for the construction of the new east pier, 1,000 feet long, 20 feet wide and 12 feet deep, with concrete superstructure; for the removal of the old pier, the dredging of a wider entrance channel and for enlarging the turning basin. This work is estimated to cost $21,000. This item is to provide also for the repair of the decking, stringers, face timbers and cross ties of the west pier, estimated at $3,700, and for inspection which is estimated at $300, making a total of $25,000.

Mr. MANION: I see that last year there was an item of $135,000 in connection with Port Dover. Would the minister explain how that money was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. To February 28 the expenditure totalled $120,207.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give us some idea of the traffic through this port?

Mr. MANION: And I wanted to know something about what the money was expended for last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was a contract awarded A. C. Stewart and Company for the reconstruction of the east pier, which was wrecked by a severe storm. This contract amounted to $130,857. During 1927-28, 504 vessels arrived with a tonnage of 100,611 tons; the number of vessels departing was 506, with a tonnage of 100,782 tons. The value of the fish catch during 1928 amounted to $213,243. A ferry system was operated during the 1929 season but it has been discontinued owing to a serious breakdown. During that year the inward passengers amounted to 5,597 and the outward passengers 9,168; automobiles inward numbered 1,703 and outward 1,515.

Item agreed to.

Port Hope—repairs to harbour works, $9,000.

Mr. BOWEN: Will this vote fully complete the work started last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is to complete the contract which was started last year.

Item agreed to.

Port Maitland — harbour improvements, $80,000.

Mr. SENN: Was this item prepared before the recent floods occurred which caused considerable damage in that district, and is the minister aware of the damage done at that time? Will this amount be sufficient to cover the cost of all the repairs needed in that harbour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These estimates were prepared before the storm occurred to which my hon. friend refers. A report has been received and examinations are now being made. The report of acting district engineer Lamb, dated March 6, reads as follows:

As a result of ice jam between the two entrance piers and flood condition of the Grand river the bottom of the river was scoured causing serious subsidence of parts of both piers. To strengthen the most seriously damaged section of the east pier 180 feet long will cost about $55,000, and to strengthen 80 feet of the west pier which should be attended to as early as possible, will cost $15,000.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister provide in the supplementary estimates a sufficient amount to cover this work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is very hard to say what will be placed in the supplementary estimates. We have the request here, and it will be considered.

Mr. SENN: About $60,000 was expended on the harbour last year, and I would like to know just what was done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There were two contracts completed in 1929. One amounted to $18,058.50; date of contract, November 10, 1928; date for completion, July 24, 1929. This contract covered the reconstruction in concrete of superstructure and strengthening superstructure by placing steel sheetpiling around old work, tying said piling together across the old structure, replacing certain face timbers along the balance of structure. The total cost was $24,582.65, which included inspection. Another contract amounted to $22,059.21 and covered a wooden sheetpile wall, strengthened by round piles in front and pile anchors in rear, to be constructed inside and parallel to the harbour headline for a length of 700 feet northerly from the inner end of the west pier.

Mr. SENN: What work was accomplished proved to be very useful, because the water was scouring out the shore and in another year or two it would have undermined the dwellings situated along the bank of the harbour. Is it the intention of the department to extend that breakwater any further up the river? At the present time a certain amount of scouring is going on along the river above the breakwater and something should be done, otherwise should another storm occur the consequences might be serious.

Mr. ELLIOTT: A request has been made for the extension of that breakwater, but nothing definite has been decided upon as to what will be done. It was considered that the repairs we have referred to should be attended to first.

Mr. SENN: I would urge upon the minister the necessity of this case. Should another storm occur like we had last fall it is hard to say what might happen to a number of dwellings and business houses situated on the bank of the stream. Two or three years ago the east pier was completed, the one which has broken down, and the entrance to the harbour was washed to a considerable extent and it is harder to enter the harbour when a storm is occurring. The scouring which took place, and which necessitated the building of the wall, occurred during one storm which took place since the completion of the widening of the harbour entrance, and another storm might work serious havoc there. I urge upon the minister that the work be completed as soon as possible.

Item agreed to.

Port Stanley—harbour repairs and improvements, $150,000.

Mr. MANION: Could we have some information on this item, because I notice a good deal of money is being spent upon this harbour. I am not complaining, because I do not know much about it, but I notice that $105,000 was spent last year and $150,000 is being asked for this year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Unfortunately we spent last year only $47,263.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is unfortunate.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but it was inevitable also. The London and Port Stanley railway are directly interested in the traffic coming through this port, and negotiations with them and with the town of Port Stanley occupied a good deal of the year, and we were only able to complete work to the extent of $47,263. Of the $150,000 being asked for, $55,000 is a revote. The proposed work consists of the following:

1. Minor repairs to west pier, west breakwater and departmental pile driver, $2,000.
2. Extension of shore protection work at Orchard Beach just east of this harbour, commenced in 1928 to prevent erosion to public and private properties partially due to the government harbour works, $6,000.
3. To construct a new concrete warehouse 220 feet by 40 feet, estimated cost, $56,250.

As a result of the negotiations which were carried on it was found that a much larger warehouse than was contemplated would be necessary due to the increase in business. The next item is:

4. Reconstruction of three sections of west pier, 100 feet at north end of concrete section; 45 feet at south end of timber section, and 405 feet at the inner end; estimated cost, $62,011.
5. Sheetpile wall 930 feet long, along east side of inner harbour, to prevent erosion caused partly by widening entrance channel, $37,200.
6. Inspection, surveys and incidentals, say, $2,539.—Total estimated cost, $166,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: What are the principal imports arriving at Port Stanley?

Mr. BOYS: And the exports?

Mr. McGIBBON: Probably the hon. member for that constituency could help the minister.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt that he would be a very valuable assistant if I should need one. The traffic for 1925 amounted to 174,382 tons; for 1926, 137,000 tons; for 1927, 68,975 tons; for 1928, 271,314 tons; and for 1929, 251,069 tons. The Marquette and Bessemer Dock and Navigation Company have operated a car ferry for the past number of years, which ferry has a capacity of 30 cars of 100,000 pounds capacity each. They carry on a service between Port Stanley and Conneaut, Ohio.

Mr. CANTLEY: Carrying what?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The principal cargo is coal, with some coke, a small amount of steel and general merchandise. There has been a considerable increase during the last few years in the tonnage of coal handled, as well as some increase in the tonnage of coke.

Mr. BOYS: Is there an export dock there?

Mr. CANTLEY: Three of the largest items we have before us, namely, those for Hamilton, for Port Burwell and for Port Stanley, cover expenditures to be made mainly in the interests of our American friends in order to enable them to bring American coal into this country. This coal which comes into Port Stanley is imported with a 99 per cent rebate in duty. Not only do we give our American friends a rebate of 99 per cent of the duty, but we spend large sums of money to help them out. I will tell the minister quite frankly, that I do not at all like such a situation.

Mr. SENN: Rumour has it that a coking plant is to be established at Port Stanley in the near future. Have any representations been made to that effect to the government to induce them to place this amount in the estimates in order to improve the harbour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For some time representations have been made with regard to a coking plant at Port Stanley. I have no doubt some company will set up a plant there, probably in the near future, but the expenditure that is being provided for in these estimates will be required in all probability altogether apart from the requirements of the coking plant. I would say to the hon. member for Pictou that the coal they utilize there is being used in Canadian industries. Does he think that we should supply facilities for landing this coal? I may not have been listening as attentively as I should, but while I tried to get his point I could not do so and I am not able to agree with him at all.

Mr. CANTLEY: My point is this: a large quantity of coal is coming into this country for iron and steel making. Practically the full amount of the duty paid on that coal—99 per cent—is rebated. That is unfair as compared with the situation of the iron and steel industries in the maritime provinces. In effect it means that our coal miners are compelled to work without protection of any kind. Not only is that the case, but these iron and steel works so favoured, are situated in the great consuming centres of the Dominion and can deliver their products to the buyers and consumers at very little freight cost; whereas in order to reach Montreal, the eastern margin of the consuming district in Canada, we have to send our heavy material of a low tonnage value over 1,000 miles of railway. You are spending on these three points very large amounts of money mainly for the purpose of enabling the Americans to deliver their coal duty free, and that I think is unfair. We are asking for no such expenditures on public works to enable us to ship our coal. Our coal shipping docks are built by the companies who operate the colleries, as also the docks of the steel companies of Nova Scotia. We have never asked or received a dollar of public money towards the construction or maintenance of those docks.

Mr. HEPBURN: Port Stanley is more or less a distributing centre for western Ontario. The imports are not confined to coal alone. The big warehouse is taxed to capacity and we have to make provision for increased shipping facilities. There is a daily boat service between Port Stanley and Cleveland during the summer months, and before the item is passed, perhaps the minister will give the figures relating to the traffic between Cleveland and Port Stanley. Most of the coal is dutiable. The coal that is subject to a drawback is the coal shipped to the Hamilton By-product Coke Ovens Limited. I am sure the hon. member who is complaining will not want to impose a tax on coal when we are trying to establish coking plants throughout southern Ontario. We find that where coking plants are established, industries are set up to take advantage of the cheap coke those plants afford. If the members from Hamilton were present I am sure they would not object to spending money on a port that acts as a distributing centre practically from Windsor through to Hamilton.

Mr. MANION: I did not understand my hon. friend to assume the attitude that the money should not be spent. He took the attitude that the money should not be spent on bringing United States coal into this country.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have known of the great expectations and the development of Port Stanley over many years. The hon. member need not worry as to any misapprehensions on my part. I knew the port—before he was born. I object to expenditures of money made largely in the interest of United States producers of coal.

Mr. HEPBURN: Does the hon. member think it feasible for industries in southern Ontario to utilize anything but United States coal for industrial purposes?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

The house resumed from March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 20, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and the annulment of marriage, and the amendment thereto of Mr. McMillan.

Mr. W. A. HALL (South Bruce): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to say anything about the causes or necessity of divorce, which I know we all abhor, nor about the principle of divorce and its results, which I know we all deplore. This house has heard many times of its attendant evils, the depraved, or as the case may be, the broken-hearted individual, the broken marriage vows, the broken family circle and the ruined home, and so forth. But rather I want to prove to the house that divorce courts as already established in six of the provinces have increased divorces in Canada because in every case they have facilitated the obtaining of it by a cheaper and easier method.

Before proceeding with the arguments to establish this, may I be pardoned if I make a digression and refer to what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said a few days ago? You will remember he said what we had to deal with was the procedure, not the principle of divorce, that the principle had been settled many years ago. He said we may proceed in one of three ways:

(1) By action of the federal parliament, as at present or modified;

(2) By establishing a provincial divorce court, as the bill now before the house proposes;

(3) By the federal parliament refusing to deal with the petitions.

Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the Prime Minister, I think there are other ways. One is by the establishment of a court of conciliation and separation, to be presided over by a judge of the supreme court, assisted by one or more experts in social service work. This court, as its name implies, has a dual function. Briefly, its main object would be to effect a reconciliation between husband and wife, thus preserving the unity and sanctity of the home and everything else that that implies. Doubtless this would be quite possible in many cases. Why?

(1) The sin of adultery, the sole cause of divorce, is no more heinous than many other sins that are forgiven, if not forgotten, by husband or wife, as the case may be.

(2) And, in cases where there are children, I venture to say that reconciliation could be and would be effected in almost every case.

(3) And knowing that separation would preclude remarriage, this would be the strongest incentive to reconciliation.

Failing reconciliation, the court whose establishment I propose would issue a decree of separation, making proper provision for the custody of children, if any, and adequate provision for alimony for the deserving wife.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must not make this digression too long. I may add, however, that this plan would automatically abolish divorce; that is, it would do away with the need for it, as well as prevent remarriage, as remarriage in these cases would constitute bigamy. This scheme could be made to apply to the whole of Canada as well as to Ontario; it would be better, indeed, if applied to the whole of Canada because that would prevent migration from Ontario to other provinces. Doubtless, however, it would drive some people to seek divorce in the American courts, and in the event of a person thus securing divorce, remarrying and establishing a domicile in Canada, he or she could be and should be prosecuted for bigamy. At present I need not elaborate this further, except to say that no one can be in doubt as to the results of such legislation. I need scarcely say that I hope a provision for such a court as I have briefly outlined, when submitted to this house for consideration, may meet with the approval and support of most of its hon. members.

At present neither Ontario nor Quebec has a divorce court, so that anyone in either of these provinces seeking divorce has to obtain it by a special act of the federal parliament. This, necessarily, is much more expensive and difficult to procure. Here let me say that the province of Prince Edward Island has always had a divorce court, but apparently it has never functioned and only one citizen of Prince Edward Island has been granted a divorce by the federal parliament. This was in 1913. Other citizens who sought divorce went to the neighbouring American republic or elsewhere. I need scarcely say that each state in that republic has a state divorce court, which, I understand, is overworked, there being one divorced person for every six married persons in the United States. Surely we do not want to bring about this state of affairs in Canada, although we seem to be fast approaching it. Last year—1929—there were 816 divorces granted in this country and 1,368 Canadian marriage contracts were annulled by divorce courts in the United States, making altogether 2,184 annulments. This figures out to one divorced person for every thirty-two persons married in that year.

What must be done to cope with this problem? Before answering that question may I say that for a long time after confederation there were few divorces granted in Canada. In 1883, 13 divorces were granted; in 1903 there were 21; in 1909, 51; in 1913, the year before the war, 60 divorces were granted; in 1918, the year the war ended, 114; and in 1919, the year after the war ended, 376 divorces were granted. This represents an alarming increase, and it still continues although somewhat abated. The reasons for the increase are:

(1) The effects of the war.

(2) The establishment of a divorce court in 1919, owing to a decision of the privy council, in each of the three prairie provinces.

The war had a psychological effect which unsettled the minds of the people, and also there was a long separation of the men in active service from their wives, as well as something else which is better imagined than here stated.

But to return to what I wish to establish, namely, that provincial divorce courts have increased divorce in Canada; this can best be done by referring to statistics. The following figures are informative:

Province	Number of divorces granted 1918	1919	Proportion of Increase
Alberta	2	36	18 times as many
Saskatchewan	1	26	26 times as many
Manitoba	0	88	88 more than one million times as many
Ontario	10	49	Almost 5 times as many
Quebec	2	4	Twice as many
New Brunswick	10	13	One-third more
Nova Scotia	24	36	One-half more
British Columbia	65	147	More than twice as many

It will be noticed that there were great increases in all the provinces, especially in the three prairie provinces where divorce courts had been established and had just begun to function—Alberta with an increase of 18 times, Saskatchewan with an increase of 26 times and Manitoba with 88 more than one million times the number of divorces in 1918.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Have you any figures as to Prince Edward Island?

Mr. HALL: No, because they do not use a divorce court.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They have one there, though.

Mr. HALL: Yes, but they do not use it.

Let me also compare the number of divorces in Ontario in 1918 with the numbers in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In 1918 Ontario without a divorce court had ten divorces; New Brunswick with a divorce court had 10 divorces, and with the same population as Ontario would have 76. Nova Scotia with a divorce court had 24 divorces and with the same population as Ontario would have 135. As the years went by the number of divorces kept steadily increasing until 1929 there were 816. In the last year for which we have figures, 1928, the number of divorces for each province was:

	Divorces
Alberta	168
Sackatchewan	55
Manitoba	78
Ontario	213
Quebec	25
New Brunswick	14
Nova Scotia	28
British Columbia	203

Computing these on the basis of Ontario's population, the result is as follows:

	Divorces
Alberta	1,008
Saskatchewan	220
Manitoba	395
Ontario	213
Quebec	30
New Brunswick	110
Nova Scotia	160
British Columbia	1,218

Permit me to make another comparison, leaving Quebec and Prince Edward Island out of the picture, to be fair. Ontario in 1928 had 213 divorces. The six provinces having divorce courts, with about the same combined population as Ontario, had 547 divorces, or more than two and a half times the number of divorces in Ontario. It will be noticed that the provinces having divorce courts have a much larger percentage of divorces than is the case with the other provinces. That having been established beyond contradiction, we again ask what must be done. The answer is: Defeat the bill and clear the way for the introduction of legislation providing for a conciliation and separation court along the lines I have suggested.

In conclusion I might suggest that if this bill to establish a divorce court in Ontario should pass the house, some hon. member may place on the order paper next session a resolution something to this effect:

Whereas divorce has so greatly increased since the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario;

And whereas the number of divorces in Canada soon will be on a parity with the number in the neighbouring republic;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house companionate marriage should be legalized in order to reduce the number of divorces in Canada.

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I desire to accord the bill now before the house the same support which I gave to a similar measure introduced last year by the same hon. member. The matter has been so thoroughly debated that it seems to me some important points in connection with this legislation have been virtually settled. Particularly is that the case with regard to the question whether or not the adoption of the bill establishing a divorce court would tend in any way to impair the sanctity of the home.

However, there is one thing of which I spoke in discussing the bill last year, which I considered of very great importance and which I have not heard answered either during that debate or during the debate on the bill now under consideration. That is the point that just so long as divorces are granted by the parliament of Canada, just so long shall we be deciding matters of great importance to the people of this country on the most unfair basis possible, that of according justice to people of moderate means or of wealth while absolutely denying it to the poor. I cannot reconcile my conscience to the idea of allowing such a condition as that to continue longer than can be helped.

It has been pointed out, sir, that it is possible for those who desire to obtain decrees of divorce to go before the Senate committee and obtain a remission of the usual fees in order that they may not be put to expense which they can ill afford. As a citizen of this country I resent the suggestion that any man or woman should be called upon to proclaim his or her poverty in order to obtain justice. So far as I am aware there is no regularly constituted court of justice in any province where a citizen is told at the outset, "Because you are poor you need not come to this court looking for justice on any claim which you may have to present." There is not a man in this house familiar with the procedure in courts of justice in Canada but knows perfectly well that the poor man or woman who comes before our regularly constituted courts of justice can do so without being put in the position of paying fees which he or she can ill afford. No lawyer of standing whom I know or with whom I have come in contact will refuse to take a case which represents itself to him as being just. In fact, the members of the Ontario bar—and I presume the same condition applies in the other provinces—take an oath when they are admitted to practice that they will refuse no just cause. However, a lawyer who is approached in connection with a divorce case by a man or a woman of small or very moderate means has to ask the preliminary question, before he even considers the justice or injustice of the cause: "Have you so much money, not for me, but for the parliament of Canada, which demands so much before you can hope to get any justice regardless of what your evidence may be?" I challenge truthful denial of the statement that the result of this condition has been that anyone who comes to a lawyer with a divorce case must state, as a preliminary, that he or she has upwards of $1,000 to put down in order to obtain that justice.

Surely, sir, that condition reflects most shamefully upon our laws and regulations with regard to the administration of justice. It was said only a few moments ago, by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that the establishment of these courts would largely increase the number of divorces, and my hon. friend quoted figures, as he is entitled to do and which figures are deserving of some consideration, in an endeavour to show the house that if these courts were established such would be the case. But, sir, no consideration of these figures or of any figures which can be brought forward has any value unless we are able to include in them the number of persons, which reasonable and moderate estimates place at from 1,200 to 1,500 annually, who go across the line to get the justice which is denied them in this Dominion of Canada. That again, sir, is something which reflects upon us in a way that does this Dominion and its administration of justice no credit.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The number of divorces granted by parliament has increased also.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): And the number of divorces here has increased, as my hon. friend points out.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question? Could you not achieve your end just as well if the fees were reduced by this parliament?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The obvious answer to that question, I think, is that there has been no suggestion made and no disposition shown, so far as I have ever heard, to reduce the fees. Those who are opposing this bill are not suggesting, so far as I have been able to gather, an alternative measure looking to the reduction of the cost; they simply say the bill should be defeated absolutely. I am very glad my hon. friend, with his usual fairness, brought up that question, because it draws attention once more to another aspect of the situation which in my view is most important. Under the procedure of the only divorce tribunal which we have, the Senate of Canada, all such cases must be brought to Ottawa. That in itself makes the whole thing prohibitive to people of small means or people who are poor. In connection with no other court of justice or any other judicial tribunal is it necessary to journey to the capital of the nation, together with all witnesses, paying railway fares, hotel bills and the hundred and one other incidentals which so vastly increase the cost of the application which is presented. If it were necessary or imperative that a man having a claim to present before a court of justice should bring that claim to Ottawa and transport all his witnesses to Ottawa, what a cry would go out! The people would say, "You are making justice in this country prohibitive; establish courts in every province so that the poor man may have an opportunity of reaching them with the convenience offered to the rich." Apart altogether from the cost of the divorce legislation under the present system, apart altogether from the cost of the necessary agency work which has to be done, we have this almost unsurmountable obstacle presented in a great number of cases, in that witnesses must be brought to Ottawa and the expenses incident to that procedure are piled upon the applicant. If he has not the money to afford taking that course, what does he do? He crosses the Detroit river and goes into the state of Michigan or some other adjacent state in order to get his decree.

During the course of this debate some hon. gentlemen have said that the province of Ontario has not asked for this bill. I dare say that it is now within the knowledge of all hon. gentlemen that the premier of Ontario has specifically pointed out that it does not lie upon that province to ask for legislation from this parliament, but that on the contrary it is the obligation of every hon. member of this house, whether from the province of Ontario or otherwise, to take upon himself the responsibility of dealing with this question. Mr. Speaker, looking at it from that viewpoint, looking at it from the viewpoint of one who wants to see every man who has just cause receive justice in this matter, as in all other matters where a person appears before any judicial forum as a seeker after justice, I ask this house to pass this bill and do away with the inequality which has become, in my humble opinion, a disgrace to Canada.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain this hon. house unnecessarily, but I think in justice to my constituents and myself I should explain why I intend to vote against the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

I represent in this house a constituency which is seventy per cent French-Canadian Catholics. They are opposed to making divorce easier; in fact they are opposed to the granting of divorces in any form, and, therefore, as their representative I intend to vote against the motion. The remaining thirty per cent of the population of my constituency are English-speaking Protestants, and I believe that the great majority of that minority are against making divorces easier, and therefore as their representative I intend to vote against this motion.

My third reason is a personal one. Having gone over the figures presented to the house by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) who sits on the other side—figures which showed conclusively that in those provinces having their own divorce courts the number of decrees had increased considerably since jurisdiction had been granted to the provinces, I am forced to take my stand against the motion.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I object as a member of the House of Commons to having to deal with divorce in this house. I do not think the present method is the proper one to be pursued; my opinion is that this is not the proper place to deal with the matter. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) has stated he is convinced, because of the figures brought down by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), that the number of divorces has increased in those provinces having their own divorce courts. The figures presented by the hon. member for Parry Sound will be found on page 722 of Hansard, and they show that in 1922 Ontario had 90 divorces, which had increased to 208 for the year 1929. The hon. member claimed that the increase in Ontario and Quebec was smaller than in any other province, but his figures show that the increase has been smaller in the provinces having divorce courts than it is in Ontario and Quebec, which provinces are forced to bring their applications for divorces to parliament. The increase in the number of divorces granted in the province of Ontario between the years 1921 and 1929 is 105 per cent; for the same period Quebec shows an increase of 400 per cent, having only six divorces in 1922 and 25 in 1929; Alberta shows an increase of 75 per cent; Saskatchewan, an increase of 38 per cent; Manitiba, decrease of 26 per cent; Nova Scotia, a decrease of 26 per cent; New Brunswick, an increase of 60 per cent; and British Columbia, an increase of 73 per cent. That comparison is based upon the figures brought down by the hon. member for Parry Sound, at which time he said that there was a larger increase in the number of divorces granted by the provinces which had divorce courts than there was in the provinces which had no jurisdiction in that matter.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member is juggling with figures.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend needs only to read his own figures and do his own computing. Another hon. member has mentioned that the number of divorces granted to residents of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta was smaller before those provinces had divorce courts than it is at the present time. That is only natural because it involved a tremendous expense to those people to come to Ottawa, and in a great many cases they crossed the line and made up part of that 1,500 mentioned by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). At the present time hundreds of divorces are brought to parliament from Ontario and, according to the figures which have been circulated among the members of this house, which I think are quite accurate, at least twelve Ontario couples per week are divorced in the city of Detroit alone. That would add 600 more to the figures given by my hon. friend.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could the hon. member give us any authority for that statement?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The synod of the Church of England.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is not an authority.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am willing to take that as an authority on this occasion. The present system is that divorces are brought before a committee of the Senate, evidence is taken, which evidence is printed and distributed among the members of this house. I do not suppose that more than one out of a hundred members of this house have ever read the evidence in all cases; in fact I do not believe any member has done so.

Mr. CANTLEY: I hope not.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend would not like to do that, nor would I.

Mr. CANTLEY: Certainly not.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): These cases come into the commons without hon. members having any knowledge of what has happened, yet we pass judgment on these divorce bills.

The question is not a new one; the same problem was faced in England many years ago. In the year 1853 a committee of the British House of Commons was formed to look into the matter of divorce, which was then handled by parliament. In 1857, after four years' consideration, that committee reported to the House of Commons of Great Britain and it was decided to give the courts jurisdiction in divorce matters, and the question has since been handled in that manner. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the other evening, we have in the divorce committee of the Senate some five lawyers and ten laymen. This is probably the only court in the world in which laymen give judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Every divorce application that comes to this parliament is dealt with ultimately in the form of a bill, and naturally anyone presenting that bill has a right to lobby the members of the house and of the Senate in an endeavour to force the bill through. It is an act of parliament and they have a right to do that. And we know, it is done; but no judge would ever allow anyone to discuss with him a question that came before his court. Before the Senate committee there are no recorded decisions, no precedents set up, as in a court, for the presiding officer to be guided by. In ordinary cases, in every court, there are reports, decisions, to guide the judges in dealing with cases which come before them, but in the high court of parliament a chairman in one committee may be giving a decision to-day and at the same time another chairman in another part of the building may be giving a diametrically opposite decision. If these cases were heard before a court, the people asking for relief, would have a right, should the court find against their plea, to go before another court and appeal. That is not possible in this case. This is an act of parliament; it is a statute once it is passed and there is no appeal.

As regards divorce cases, there are no set decisions, no set rules. Divorce may be granted through the houses of parliament for any cause whatsoever that the chairman of the divorce committee happens to think fit. There are no definite rules set up. It does not have to be any one thing or another. The chairman makes his own ruling and a bill of this parliament is passed.

The question of publicity is very important. In a province which has a divorce court there is no publicity to the proceedings. You never see in our papers any report of a divorce case; only the decisions are given. But in parliament some 400 copies of the evidence are printed and distributed. Every member of the house, every senator receives a copy. These are broadcast and the evidence is placed in concrete form so that any person, even a child, may read it.

Mr. SPOTTON: When the hon. gentleman speaks of this evidence as being broadcast as printed literature, is he speaking only for himself? He is not speaking for me; I have never broadcast such literature. Let him speak for himself.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I was not speaking of the hon. gentleman or of any other hon. member. I was simply saying that some 400 copies of the evidence taken in every divorce case are printed and distributed to at least some 400 people. They are in print to be brought up at some future time and thrown in the face of some child. That is entirely unnecessary In a divorce court the evidence is not made public in any form.

Under our present system of granting divorce, one, two or three parties may be named as respondents. They may not appear at all. They may be entirely innocent. There is no written decision of the chairman of the divorce committee exonerating them from blame or finding them innocent. Any evidence that may be given—and they may not be present to defend themselves and may not be represented by anyone to defend them—goes out in the printed record. This evidence is never refuted, and the chairman of the divorce committee does not give a decision holding them blameless in such a case. Thus other innocent people may be damaged by the present system of divorce as granted by parliament. In the divorce courts in the provinces which have such courts, there is, I believe, a representative of the crown who, acting as king's proctor, looks especially for collusion and may defend any respondent who does not happen to be present. In that way a fairer trial is secured and there is less chance of collusion. In the ordinary course of events in parliament a divorce case comes to the Senate and to the House of Commons and if you read the cases you will find that most of the evidence that is adduced is from an investigator or a detective; in fact, practically all the evidence that is presented is paid for by someone—that is, the person who gives the evidence is paid.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will now revert to committee of supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before the committee rose I was asked by my hon. friend from Fort William for some figures regarding certain places which are mentioned in the estimates. I have them now and shall be glad to send them across to him.

Mr. MANION: I should like to have them on Hansard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Did my hon. friend want them by years?

Mr. MANION: What I asked for was for the last five years in bulk. The minister mentioned that he had the figures from confederation until the present, and I suggested he might add that in bulk figures for both of them. That would give two sets of figures, one from confederation till to-day and the other for the last five years.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will excuse me, but in the case of Kincardine I have given six years and I have them all added together. The figure for 1924-25 is $30,741 and the total is $170,808.

Mr. MANION: That is for the last six years in Kincardine?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, including 1924-25. For the last five years it will be $31,000 less than that, or about $139,000. The total since confederation is $638,879.33. For Lion's Head, the total for the last six years is $24,799.86, and the total since confederation $75,145. For Port Elgin the total for the last six years is $4,334, and the total since confederation, $147,790. For Saugeen river the total for the last six years is $69,055.91, and the total since confederation $160,364.23. For Port Bruce—

Mr. MANION: Is that in the same riding?

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not the Port Bruce that is in the estimates.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister the totals of those two sets of figures?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. SPOTTON: Does Saugeen river include Southampton? It is really the same thing. The Saugeen river enters the lake at Southampton. They are all within a few yards of each other.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are not the same works.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister the total revenue from Kincardine, Lion's Head, Port Elgin and Saugeen river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For Kincardine the import duties for 1927-28 were $44,804.98.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is that by rail or water?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the total of everything.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It all comes by rail, except a little coal, I am informed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think that is quite wrong. The excise taxes for 1927-28 were $41,314.08 and sundry collections $75, making a total revenue for 1927-28 of $86,194.06. For 1928-29, the import duties were $54,579.86, excise taxes $37,057.37, sundry collections $60, making a total of $91,697.23.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much of that revenue comes from the port of Kincardine, excluding the railways?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not those figures separated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister tell me how many vessels arrive at and depart from the port of Kincardine?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In 1928-29 the number of vessels arriving was 24, and the number departing 23.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That includes tugs and everything?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the number of vessels. In the 1929 season, up to November 5, there were twelve foreign vessels with a tonnage of 29,859, and 15 coastwise vessels entering the port with 4,434 tons of freight.

Mr. SPOTTON: As I understand it, all that comes in are a few small boats with soft coal for the salt works, not carrying even domestic coal for the use of the town, and once every two years a small scow of cordwood comes in. I would like to know what cargoes these vessels which the minister mentioned brought into Kincardine, and what revenue the government received from them. I should like those figures separate from the railroad revenue. There are only a few fishing boats at this harbour. The expenditure at Lion's Head in North Bruce may fairly be justified, but not the expenditures at Kincardine or Port Elgin, and at the private wharf of a fellow who owns a lumber mill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The coal imported during 1929, up to September 30, by the Valley Camp Coal company was 27,199 tons.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Are those water shipments up to September 30?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That coal came in by water. Coke was imported in 1929, to the amount of 700 tons, and salt to the amount of 275 tons. The freight rate on coal by rail is $1.90 per ton, and by water $1.25 per ton, from Lake Erie ports. The fishing catch for 1928 was 98 tons, with a value of $26,392.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The coal that comes in there for the salt works comes in free of duty by act of this government, does it not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I rather think it does.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister give us the number of vessels arriving at and departing from the Saugeen river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps we had better finish with Kincardine while we are at it.

Mr. McGIBBON: What was the value of the imports at Kincardine?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I gave my hon. friend the value of the fishing catch, $26,392. I have also given the tonnage of coal; I have not the value of that. I have a couple of letters from the Dominion Fuel Board dated April 4 and April 12, 1929, expressing the views of that board with regard to the value of this harbour, if my hon. friends would be interested in hearing them.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister tell us why they are on file?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would think perhaps my hon. friend would understand why information in regard to these harbours is on file.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think I do.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad to know that. First of all, it is information for the minister and the officials of the department to help them in arriving at the necessity for money to be provided in the estimates for these places, and afterwards it is for the committee to assist them in passing upon these items. This is the information:

During 1928 somewhere in the neighbourhood of 25,000 tons of water-borne coal was shipped into this port from Fairport, Ohio. The cost of moving this coal would come to approximately $2.40 to $2.50 per gross ton, made up as follows:

Mines to lake port (including loading)	$1 46
Water rate	50
Unloading charges at piers	50
	$2 46

I have no information as to the amount of coal hauled all-rail to this point, although I would imagine that the greater tonnage of coal used at Kincardine would be water-borne coal.

Mr. SPOTTON: Oh, no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend knows better than the experts, but I would not have thought so.

The rail haul from a lake port on the Canadian side to Kincardine could not compete with water-borne coal moving up the lake at 50 cents per gross ton. Although I have not checked an all-rail rate to Kincardine from such a point of origin, I cannot see how a combination rail and water route would get in less than $3.50 per net ton.

This point is not shown in the Bureau of Statistics report covering coal importations into Ontario, but surrounding territory such as Goderich, Collingwood, and Owen Sound, import from 120,000 to 130,000 tons of coal per annum. This includes both anthracite and bituminous.

This is just a general picture of the situation made rather hurriedly, but within the next few days, if you so wish, I will make every effort to amplify same if you feel it will be of any use.

* * * * *

Further to my letter of the 4th instant to Mr. R. de B. Corriveau, and in reply to your letter to me of the 10th instant, with respect to coal importations into Kincardine, Ontario, I have now before me data showing fuels used for domestic consumption at that point for the year 1927. This, combined with the tonnage of industrial bituminous coal quoted in my letter of the 4th instant would appear to give a representative picture of the annual tonnage of coal handled. The summary is as follows:

1928

Industrial coal (imported from Fairport, Ohio, 25,000 net tons.

Domestic coal and coke Pennsylvania anthracite, 2,962; United States bituminous, 455; Coke, 2,000.—Total 5,417 net tons.

Or a total potential market of slightly over 30,000 tons per annum.

Domestic coal and coke would come in all-rail via Black Rock or Bridge, the rate on bituminous coal being as follows:

Mines to Black Rock, $2.09; Black Rock to Kincardine, $1.70.—Total, $3.79 net.

Anthracite and coke would carry a still higher rate.

All coal moving to Kincardine by rail last year came via Niagara Falls or Black Rock.

Mr. SPOTTON: When I said no, I should like to explain I thought the writer was speaking of domestic, not industrial coal.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I did not so understand him.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister give out the names of the all-wisest who compose the fuel board and whose authority he quoted just a moment ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think anybody but my hon. friend characterizes them as the "all-wisest," but it is not a bad term after all. Doctor Camsell is the head of the fuel board. I am not able to give my hon. friend the names of the other members, but I shall be very glad to get them for him.

Mr. CANTLEY: We should be glad to have them, sir.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All right.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister state what the $55,000 was spent upon? I do not know if that was given earlier in the day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to give it again. It is required for the following work which the district engineer reported as necessary at this place:

(1) To complete contract 15,862, Henry & Ross, rebuilding superstructure of north pier, in concrete, at two points for length of 300 feet strengthening one section with face piles and other section 100 feet long completely renewed pile substructure. (This contract commenced 1928.)—$12,000.

(2) To complete contract 18,003, Henry & Ross, rebuilding superstructure of north pier, in concrete, for length of 200 feet (let in 1929). —$13,000.

(3) Maintenance dredging in entrance channel to depth of 20 feet, total length approximately, $18,500.

(4) Reconstruction of 60 feet of wall on south side adjacent to the Huron Terrace bridge, to be sheet pile with concrete superstructure, including removal of present wall, $8,000.

Minor repairs to piers, inspection and contingencies, say, $3,500.—Total, $55,000.

Mr. MANION: How much after this $55,000 will be required to finish the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is all that is contemplated at the present time. More work will have to be done. $24,469 was spent last year.

Mr. MANION: I suppose if the election is put off another year there will be a further $55,000 or so for this section.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think the dectruction by storms is affected in any way by elections, and the silting at Kincardine has been pretty uniform, no matter whether there was or was not an election pending.

Mr. MANION: Of course the storm of an election is coming on. Bearing in mind the number of boats that go into Kincardine, I think a good deal of the money has been spent for election purposes. Only twenty-seven boats went into Kincardine last year. We have as many boats nearly every day at the head of the lakes. This looks to me very much like political expenditure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course I am not of a suspicious mind like my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: You are not suspicious of your own people.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I am not, and I doubt if I have much reason to be suspicious of the people to whom my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. MANION: I would think the minister would have a good deal of suspicion in view of the immense sum of $268,000 having been spent in North Bruce in the last six years.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In order to dispel my hon friend's suspicions, which seem to come so readily to him, I may say that in 1927-28 we spent $33,844; in 1928-29, $43,189; and in 1929-30, getting much nearer an election we spent only about half of the 1928-29 figure This hardly bears out my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. MANION: But this year I notice you have doubled the expenditure again in Kincardine, and you are getting closer to the election.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I suppose we are getting nearer to it.

Mr. SHORT: Is there any revenue collected from these wharves in the way of top wharfage and side wharfage?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid my hon. friend will have to ask the Department of Marine with regard to that. I understand there is wharfage collected by that department.

Mr. SHORT: The minister cannot give us figures as to the revenue collected from that source?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot give figures collected by another department.

Mr. SHORT: I understand it is about $8 a year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not think that that statement was exaggerated.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many boats visit that harbour each month, and in what months?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid the best I can do for my hon. friend is to give him the number of boats that came in in the season.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the minister give us the tonnage of those boats?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hardly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; I can give you the tonnage they brought in.

Mr. McGIBBON: I must submit that the minister has made a very poor defence. I quite agree with the hon. member for Fort William that this is nothing but political expenditure. I must object to the money of this country being prostituted for such conditions as that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I can say to my hon. friend is that I am sorry his judgment is not more favourable, but I do not know what I can do to improve it.

Mr. McGIBBON: We all admire the minister's frankness in agreeing with us.

Mr. CANTLEY: The situation is worse than my friend suggests. The minister proposes to spend $55,000 for a wharf to enable 25,000 tons of coal to be brought in duty free in order to help out the friends of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He will remember that two years ago the matter was discussed in this house, and somebody wanted to know who had asked that the duty be reduced on coal for use in the evaporation of salt. Somebody was bold enough to say that no one had asked for it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce denied it, and said he had asked for it, though nobody had requested it. In other words the salt refiners had not asked for it, but the minister had. Put the loss of revenue plus your expenditure of $55,000 to the debit account of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN: There were three items allowed to stand. The first was:

Lion's Head—wharf repairs, $4,200.

Mr. MANION: The minister gave me figures for the last six years. He said $24,700 had been spent at Lion's Head. What was that for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The present item is an item of $4,200. This work was requested by the district engineer in his annual estimates, and is required to complete the repairs to this pier which had been seriously damaged by storms during 1928. The fishing catch at this place amounts to forty tons annually. The engineer's report says that the proposed repairs are required to maintain the existing structure. This amount of $4,200 is required to complete the repairs to the pier resulting from damages sustained in 1928. It is urgently necessary, according to the statement of the engineer, that the above amount be included in the estimates, as this is a most important point north of Wiarton on the Bruce peninsula. The amount spent there in 1928-29 was $17,811; in 1927-28, $8,197, and in 1926-27 $189.25.

Mr. SHORT: What is the other business carried on at this point, with the exception of the 40 tons of fish landed there? Forty tons of fish is about one week's catch for one of our good-sized fishing boats.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The success of fishing is in the report that you give. I see my hon. friend does that very well. May I just give him this information, which I think will satisfy him. If my hon. friend will look at the map he will see that this place has no railway facilities. It is in an isolated position, some distance from railway communication, so that all the business for that section of the country has to be done by water transportation. In 1928 the traffic was as follows:

Hay, 850 tons at $15 a ton..	$ 12,750
Cattle, 2,000 tons at $80 a ton.. ..	160,000
Hogs, 1,000 tons at $33 a ton..	33,000
Sheep, 1,500 tons at $14 a ton.. ..	21,000
Fish, 40 tons at $300 a ton..	12,000
Total..	$238,750

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will have to increase the facilities.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, as the business increases.

Mr. MANION: How many boats arrived there last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. SHORT: That is more business than they did at Kincardine. We will have to let this item pass.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is big business for the expenditure involved.

Mr. MANION: You have balanced it pretty well, because the other is a big expenditure for the business involved.

Item agreed to.

Port Elgin—breakwater repairs, $15,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In connection with Port Elgin I would say to my hon. friend that the expenditure for the last six years was $4,334.58. If my hon. friend thinks it is time well spent I will give the details.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister might give us the major items.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are not many major items, when you consider that the total expenditure last year was only $27.75. For the year before the total expenditure was $291.82.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister did not understand my question; I meant the major items of trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Had any boats called there at all?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will give to my hon. friend the information that I have. This amount was requested by the acting engineer to repair the damage done to this breakwater by storms. It is in a very bad state of repair and must be maintained to prevent the channel from filling in. It is in danger of destruction by heavy seas. About sixty tons of fish valued at $18,000 were shipped from here in 1927, when the channel was in good condition, and it is expected that the fishing will increase in future with the use of larger boats carrying gill nets when the channel is dredged. It is also a summer resort.

Item agreed to.

Port Stanley—harbour repairs and improvements, $150,000.

Mr. MANION: Before we adjourned at six o'clock the minister and the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) were explaining some points in connection with this item. I wanted to ask the minister as to the amount of business passing through this port, and particularly whether Port Stanley was one of the places which had one of the liquor export docks.

Mr. HEPBURN: No, it was not; there was no liquor export dock there. When the house adjourned at six o'clock hon. gentlemen opposite were taking mild exception to this vote of $150,000.

Mr. MANION: No, we were just asking for information.

Mr. HEPBURN: I am sure if hon. members opposite understood the merits of this item they would not question the expenditure. Port Stanley is situated at just about the centre of the north shore of lake Erie, and serves as the distributing centre for a large part of western Ontario. The chief business there is the bringing in of bulk coal; the bringing in of coal by the ferry company and the bringing in of tourists on the daily boats which ply between Cleveland and Port Stanley. There is also the fishing industry, and the Canada Steamship Lines make Port Stanley a port of call.

I do not want to take the time of the committee in quoting a lot of figures, but I might just show how the business has increased. With regard to bulk coal, 17,000 tons were brought in during 1925, while in 1929 that increased to 177,000 tons. In 1925 the ferry company brought in 174,000 tons of coal, while in 1929 they brought in 251,000 tons. The total merchandise brought into Part Stanley in 1925 amounted to 191,000 tons, and in 1929 that figure increased to 428,000 tons. Had there been increased facilities there for warehouses, according to the engineer's report business would have been much greater. Port Stanley is also a celebrated summer resort, with a line of steamships running to Cleveland. In 1926 there were 14,900 passengers brought to Port Stanley on these boats, and that number increased in 1928 to over 20,000 passengers; in fact during 1928 and 1929 approximately 40,000 passengers came from Cleveland; bringing with them 6,258 automobiles. While we cannot get any accurate estimate, I would judge that these people during the two years spent close to $800,000 in that vicinity. The amount of customs duties collected there has increased from $19,000 in 1925 to $107,000 in 1929, and that in itself represents only a small portion of the dutiable goods which passed through that port, because we must remember that the 251,000 tons of bituminous coal, a large portion of which was dutiable, was consigned to other ports. In fact, goods are manifested through Port Stanley for 98 inland ports. Practically all this trade is carried over the London and Port Stanley railway which is owned by the city of London. This is a very good source of revenue for that railway as otherwise there would be a larger deficit which would have to be made up by direct taxation on the people of London. This port not only serves the county of Elgin but, as I have said, is the distributing centre for practically the entire southern peninsula. I am sure my hon. friend from Hamilton will not object to this vote, because at the present time the coking plant in that city brings in a great deal, if not all, of its coal through Port Stanley. This coal travels to London over the London and Port Stanley railway and then goes to Hamilton over the Canadian National.

I think that is all I need say, unless my hon. friends desire further information. I might add that in southern Ontario the people appreciate very much the facilities which are being provided for the increased business there by the Department of Public Works, and I am sure if my hon. friend from Pictou understood the situation he would not object to this item.

Mr. MANION: There was no export dock there?

Mr. HEPBURN: No, but on perhaps four or five occasions liquor was shipped out of Port Stanley directly from freight cars into a rum running boat. There was no licensed liquor export dock there.

Mr. SENN: I fully realize the importance of Port Stanley. Just before six o'clock I was asking the minister whether the department had received any assurance that a coking plant was to be established at that place. Up until last year the facilities were quite adequate to accommodate all the traffic at Port Stanley; I think there can be no doubt of that. Is it not a fact that the new facilities at Port Stanley were to be the deciding factor as to whether that coking plant should be established there or whether it would go to another port on lake Erie, Port Maitland, which has facilities which are perfectly adequate? From what I understand of the situation it seems that if these facilities were not established at Port Stanley possibly the coking plant would not have gone there. Has any assurance been given to the department that a coking plant will be established there if the facilities are increased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The department has not taken sides as between Port Stanley and Port Maitland or any other port; we are only trying to provide for the business which comes to these ports or which is in prospect through the efforts put forth by the people in the vicinity. We do not take sides as between these different ports. There is no definite assurance with regard to the coking plant, although there is a fairly definite assurance that they expect to locate there. There is nothing binding them as far as the department is concerned, and there is nothing binding the department to provide any facilities for them. Every new industry which proposes to locate anywhere receives very sympathetic consideration at the hands of the department. If Port Maitland or any other port has an industry in prospect, nothing is done by the department or any of the officials to divert that industry to any other port.

Mr. SENN: I am sure the explanation of the minister is satisfactory as far as it goes. He told us before six o'clock that these facilities probably would be needed, but I do not think there has been any damage to the facilities which were there previously; the piers are not particularly out of repair. Will the additional facilities to be provided by this vote of $150,000, together with the $50,000 spent last year, be sufficient if a coking plant is established at Port Stanley?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, these facilities are just for the present needs at that point. If a coking plant is established there, further substantial expenditures will be necessary; and from all the information we have we believe more business is expected. My hon. friend has been told of the increase in business at Port Stanley in recent years, and I am told that the only reason that increase has not been greater is that the facilities would not take care of any further increase.

Mr. SENN: I think the hon. minister will agree with me that the same increase in business would apply to the other ports on that great lake.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am delighted to say that that is correct; all those ports are doing very well.

Mr. SENN: I am sorry to have to say that most of the goods are coming into the country rather than being exported. I think the member for West Elgin made the statement that most of the coal coming into that port goes to Hamilton, and that practically all the supplies for the coking plant at Hamilton come through Port Stanley. I am afraid he is misinformed in regard to that, because a considerable amount of traffic comes through Port Maitland to go over the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, not only for Hamilton but for other points. I do not wish to press this matter further, but it seems to me that we should be very careful about these expenditures.

Item agreed to.

Rondeau—harbour repairs and improvements, $49,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of this amount, $8,700 is a revote from 1929-30. It is required to complete the contract with the Chatham Dredging & General Contracting Company for repairs to the east pier and provide for repairs to the east and west piers during 1930-31. During the season of 1928 coal imported amounted to 482,743 tons. The fishing catch for that year was valued at $48,345. The proposed work is as follows:

1. To complete contract 19033, Chatham Dredging & General Contracting Company, repairs to east pier, $10,750.
2. To continue reconstruction east pier, further 250 feet, $26,750.
3. Shore protection—250 feet of concrete cribbing at each end of existing shore protection with timber substructure, $7,500.
4. Repairs to west pier, $3,250.

Inspection, say, $750.
Total estimated cost, $49,000.

Mr. MANION: What constituency is that in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is in Kent.

Item agreed to.

Sarnia—harbour improvements, $75,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to complete two dredging contracts and to commence the construction of a public dock and warehouse to provide for a large and increasing traffic in package freight. At the present time there is no public dock at this place to accommodate this traffic, and there is no place where tramp steamers can dock for supplies. The dredging completed in 1929, for which there is a balance owing to the Canadian Dredging Company, Limited, was required to accommodate the heavy grain traffic and relieve the congested condition of this harbour. A new elevator with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels was constructed in 1927, and this has been enlarged to 3,000,000 bushels capacity. Over 10,000,000 bushels of grain are handled per season.

Item agreed to.

Saugeen river—harbour repairs and improvements, $35,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to continue repairing the harbour work at this place for the benefit of the fishermen, whose annual catch amounts to 184 tons, valued at $48,900. It was decided in 1929 to abandon the Chantry island breakwater at Southampton owing to its costly upkeep, and in view of the fact that these works at the mouth of the Saugeen river provide a more satisfactory and economical harbour for the fishing boats.

Mr. MANION: What is the traffic going through that port?

Mr. ELLIOTT: A considerable quantity of lumber and logs is brought to this port each year. For the season of 1927, 700,000 feet board measure of timber were unloaded. The fishing catch for the season of 1927 amounted to 248 tons, with an estimated value of $65,840.

Mr. SPOTTON: This will be the only public work carried out at Southampton and vicinity?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. SPOTTON: You have abandoned the works at Southampton?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. SPOTTON: I think that is a very wise move.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister tell us how badly this constituency has been neglected in the past to need so much nursing at the present time?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I can say to my hon. friend in that regard is that Southampton is about the only place where we have abandoned works of this character. It was considered desirable not to make any further investments at Southampton. I think this change is desirable, although it has not been very acceptable to the people at Southampton.

Mr. MANION: Is Southampton in the same constituency?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph narrows and Pointe Anne—dredging, $75,000.

Mr. SHORT: Will the hon. minister tell us in what constituency this is, and also give us a little information regarding the item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is in the constituency of South Hastings. This work was requested in letters from the Canada Cement Company of Montreal, dated April and November, 1925; also by the Canadian Industrial Alcohol Company, Limited, and the chamber of commerce of Belleville. This dredging is required to provide facilities for the importation of coal and for the shipping of cement and alcohol products. The plant of the Canada Cement Company at Pointe Anne has an annual output of approximately 1,500,000 barrels of cement. One million dollars worth of freight is taken in and out of Belleville annually.

Item agreed to.

Toronto—repairs to pier, $3,000.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister not think that this is too much for the city of Toronto?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nothing is too much for the city of Toronto.

Item agreed to.

Wabigoon—wharf extension, $2,500.

Mr. MANION: What is the business carried on at Wabigoon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work was requested by the residents of Wabigoon in a petition forwarded by the Minister of Labour on February 27, 1929, and is required to provide adequate facilities for the handling of increased traffic due to the mining development. This extension would also be of great benefit to boats using this harbour during rough weather.

Mr. MANION: I shall not object to this at all because I like to see anything given to northern Ontario. At the same time I might point out that the mining development in that vicinity has not been great. A few prospectors were working outside of Wabigoon and I understand they closed down some time ago. I hope, however, they will get this.

Item agreed to.

Windsor—harbour improvements, $65,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister kindly give us the details of this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The department has been approached by the International Terminals Limited, Windsor, Ontario, L. A. Merlo, president, and by the Canada Steamship Lines in connection with the proposal to develop a cold storage warehouse at Windsor on government property and adjacent thereto, to develop a combined water and rail package freight transfer dock and warehouse. We are holding in abeyance action on the proposal to enlarge the existing warehouse on the government dock at Windsor in order to see if the proposal now made is feasible and warranted. It is proposed that this department undertake the construction of a dock built along the harbour line in the Detroit river, off the Canadian National railway yards, west or downstream of Devonshire street. It is thought that a wharf frontage about 800 feet long would accommodate both vessels at the cold storage warehouse and at the adjoining package freight warehouse. It would be proposed that the area in rear of the dock would be filled and a portion of the dock and the government land, being the filled area of the water lot, be leased to the International Terminals Limited upon a long term lease at suitable rental. It is proposed that the other section of the dock property be also filled in rear, where it is now water lot, and the department construct on it a freight warehouse 80 feet wide, of suitable length, and that this dock, land and warehouse be leased on suitable terms to the Canada Steamship Lines, which company would release their present holdings on the present government dock, leaving that wharf and warehouse for the accommodation of the general public of the Border Cities area in respect to passengers and freight. The Canadian National Railways have expressed their desire to cooperate and give rail connection to the cold storage warehouse and to the package freight warehouse. They would lay their rails both along the water side and the rail side of the cold storage warehouse and the package freight warehouse.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Saskatchewan and Alberta—Alberta Beach (Alberta), Lac Ste. Anne wharf extension, $3,800.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Might I ask the minister to give us a little information on this?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I can explain this. At Lac Ste. Anne, which is situated about fifty-five miles west of Edmonton, a great deal of fish is caught and shipped out to different points. About two years ago, I think in 1928, the government built a landing wharf and the water receded in the meantime leaving the wharf high and dry. This item of $3,800 is for the purpose of extending the wharf out to deep water.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am not objecting to this item at all. I just wanted to have it pointed out where it was and what it was for. I hope to be able to use this as a peg on which to hang something for the rivers in southern Alberta. I thing I mentioned to the minister some years ago and even last year that the Bow river at the city of Calgary had its course diverted considerably for two reasons: first, on account of the government giving a company the right to put a dam across the river, throwing the whole course of the river against the government's own boulevard. In the second place the government took no care to protect its own boulevard and because of that, the river washed into the city and washed a large part of its property away. The city endeavoured to fill in between the groins with stone. The Department of Public Works or the irrigation department for a time even endeavoured to stop the city from filling in between the groins, because it was represented to them they would be throwing the river back on its old course. I pointed out last year that the government gave a grant of $15,000 to protect the banks of the Highwood river. I did not object to that, but I make a plea to the Minister of Public Works that the city of Calgary ought to be assisted in some way. I would not ask the department to put the river back again to the old line. It eroded its banks to the extent of nearly 200 yards. We have to fill in between the groins to keep the erosion from going further into the banks or it would wash them clean away to the foot of the hill, and I suggest to the Minister of Public Works that either in these or in the supplementary estimates he make a small grant to the city to assist them in reclaiming part of the property that was washed away, through the government's own fault because they would not protect their own boulevard and because they granted a permit to a company to put a dam across the river.

Mr. SPOTTON: With the permission of the minister I rise just to expedite matters. When I came into this house this evening some hon. member on this side said that inasmuch as I had not been present when the Goderich harbour improvement item was called, it was left open. I do not want to speak on it. We are delighted at the treatment the minister gave us last year and we hope he will not weary in well doing. I am well aware that the deputation that came to Ottawa presented the matter thoroughly and the minister has it fully before him. If that item was left open, the Ontario estimate can be closed now. I just wish to expedite the business of the house.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask whether the Goderich item carried? I think it did.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have made pretty good progress and many of our British Columbia members are not present. It is now ten o'clock would the minister consent to have the committee rise?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to meet the convenience of my hon. friends, and I appreciate the manner in which they have discussed the various items. It is difficult, however, for me to get time for public works estimates and if we could get these items through it would be in the interest of the different sections of the country involved. I do not want to urge unduly, but I am taking a train at eleven o'clock and perhaps we might sit till quarter to eleven.

Mr. McRAE: I think there are enough of the British Columbia members present for us to proceed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Thank you very much. I do not wish to curtail criticism at all, because I think it is helpful. Still, the sooner we get these estimates through—

Mr. GUTHRIE: The sooner the election comes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —the sooner the various officials will be able to get to work and the works will be started.

Harbours and rivers—British Columbia—Coal Harbour—wharf, $9,000.

Mr. McRAE: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is asked to be provided for the construction of a wharf 60 feet by 40 feet, with an approach 358 feet by 14 feet. The proposed work is asked for by the member for Comox-Alberni, and is required to make it possible for freight and mail from Vancouver brought by motor trucks from Hardy Bay to be transshipped directly on to tug boats going to Port Alice and other points on Quatsino Sound.

Mr. ADSHEAD: By whom was this work recommended?

Mr. ELLIOTT: By the member.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the minister in the habit of considering recommendations from members, because, if so there are some that I should like to make.

Item agreed to.

Comox lake—float, $4,300.

Mr. McRAE: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to provide for the completion of a float 60 feet by 40 feet at Comox Lake, also known as Puntledge lake. During 1929-30 the approach was constructed. This float is necessary to serve the rapidly growing needs of the district and to provide a quick means of access to the adjacent town of Cumberland. It would also enable the accident cases in the camps to reach the hospital at Cumberland in a short time. The Comox Logging Company operating at this place employs 250 men, but will increase the number to 500 when operations are fully under way. Fifty men are employed by the K. and K. Pole Company, and five firms operate private launches here.

Item agreed to.

Deserters Canyon—improvements, $2,000.

Mr. FRASER: What are these improvements?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to provide for the construction of a tow path along the bank of Finlay river through Deserters Canyon. The proposed work is requested by the district engineer. The construction of this tow path will allow the freighters to line their boats up and down stream instead of unloading and packing over a long and difficult trail over the walls of the canyon.

Mr. FRASER: That is on the upper Peace river. Might I ask what work has been proceeded with during the current year at the Peace river rapids, just below the junction of the Finlay and Peace rivers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have the details here only of the works that have been going on in the places for which votes are being asked, and my hon. friend will readily understand that we have not the details with respect to places for which votes are not included in the estimates.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But the minister could make a note of the question, and send a memorandum to the hon. member on Monday.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. FRASER: Was an amount provided in last year's estimates for the improvement of the Peace river at the Peace river rapids?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: My hon. friend, I believe, is speaking of that part of the river just below the Finlay forks. I would advise the Minister of Public Works to take into consideration the necessity of improvements at that point, for it is a very hazardous place, passing up or down. Some improvements should be made there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the name of the place? Is it the Finlay forks?

Mr. FRASER: Just below the forks.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was nothing last year.

Mr. FRASER: Has there been any work going on there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think probably out of the general vote there was some work done at that point.

Mr. FRASER: Out of last year's general vote for harbours and rivers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That would be the vote if there was any work done. There was no special estimate. If any work were done there, it would be done out of the general dredging vote.

Item agreed to.

Fraser Lake—wharf repairs, $1,200.

Mr. BARBER: What is this for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is requested by the district engineer to provide for general repairs required to the wharf, which was damaged by the action of the frost and ice. There is a small settlement at this site, but it is a railhead for a considerable area in which logging and farming is carried on extensively.

Mr. FRASER: When was that wharf built?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was built in 1924-25-26, at a cost of $2,867. It is a pile structure, 606 feet long.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—north arm—extension to jetty, $40,000.

Mr. LADNER: I want to commend the government, the minister, and his department for providing for the extension of this jetty. Whether or not the amount provided is sufficient is a question. The north arm of the Fraser river is gradually becoming, and as the days go by will more rapidly become, the centre of the industrial portion of Vancouver city. The recent decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners granting a through rate on freight over the Canadian National Railway, as over the Canadian Pacific, will be an added influence in the development of industries in that district. I wanted to inquire whether or not under this vote the jetty will be extended into the straits to a point where the cross currents will not fill in the mouth of the river.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It does go out into the straits. It will extend 1,000 feet from where it is at the present time.

Mr. LADNER: What I want to know is whether this vote be sufficient to extend the jetty to a point in the straits where the cross currents will not fill in the entrance to the river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I suppose one cannot tell that until it is actually constructed. I have a map which I shall be glad to show my hon. friend.

Mr. LADNER: I take it from the minister that the intention is to extend that jetty out into the straits so as properly to protect the entrance of the river from cross currents and ultimately enable traffic to get up there. The officers of the department know it is uneconomic to allow the jetty to remain in its present position, because it does not extend far enough out to prevent the filling in of the river by cross currents, and this filling in of course necessitates dredging.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—north arm—dredging, $28,000.

Mr. McRAE: Why was there a carry-over of $28,000 from last year? Will the work be completed this summer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The contractors were delayed in getting started last year and were not able to complete their contract. This is to provide for its completion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What does this contract include?

Mr. ELLIOTT: An order in council was passed on October 17, 1929, accepting the tender of the British Columbia Bridge and Dredging Company at fourteen cents per cubic yard place measurement for the dredging of approximately 678,270 cubic yards class B material in the north arm of the Fraser river, entailing an approximate expenditure of $94,957.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In what part of the river is the work being done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These various cuts are shown on a plan which I shall be glad to have my hon. friend look at. These are the various cuts:

	cu. yd.
Cut No. 1—300′ wide by 3,500′ long at outer end jetty..	221,200
Cut No. 2—150′ wide by 7,500′ long west of Marpole bridge..	269,700
Cut No. 2A—150′ wide by 3,000′ long at Marpole..	74,000
Cut No. 5—150′ wide by 6,000′ long at 4½ miles east of Marpole.. ..	113,370
	678,270

Mr. McQUARRIE: What depth will this give up to New Westminster when the work is finished?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The channel, I understand, will be 10 feet deep at low water.

Mr. McQUARRIE: All the way through to New Westminster?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where improved.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister knows, of course, that this north arm runs up to New Westminster, and the channel is very much used, particularly for the towing of logs and of barges. I am interested to know whether when the work is completed there will be a ten foot channel right up to New Westminster, or is it contemplated that further work should be done?

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: The engineer has been instructed to make a report showing at what points further work will be required in order to give the desired channel right up to New Westminster. It is intended to make a channel ten feet deep at low water.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it contemplated that the work will be proceeded with as soon as possible?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will depend on how much is found necessary to be done. After the report is in the matter will be considered in regard to how much will be proceeded with as the next part of this improvement.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is quite true, as the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) said, the north arm is becoming very important. My constituency is interested in that channel as well as South Vancouver. There has been a good deal of delay in looking after the north arm. I congratulate the minister on the work he is doing, but I think it is very important, particularly in view of the development of the Canadian National Railways in that section, that the work on the north arm should be expedited as much as possible.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—improvements, $250,000.

Mr. McRAE: What is contemplated by this vote, and will it finish the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is proposed is the following work:

(1) Steveston north jetty—section 5—towards bringing section 5 up to grade by raising rock mound from low water level to 12 feet above low water level. Estimated cost, $150,000. Amount asked for 1930-31..	$ 98,000
(2) Annieville bar, extension to dyke, 1,800 feet long. Estimated cost..	27,000
(3) Steveston north jetty, section 6, towards contruction of section 6 (final section of Steveston north jetty). Estimated cost, $225,000. Amount asked for 1930-31..	50,000
(4) Sapperton bar. Towards construction of river training dykes. Estimated cost of dykes 1, 2 and 3, $51,000. To construct dyke No. 1.	25,000
(5) Steveston, south jetty, towards first section of south jetty. Estimated cost of first section 8,000 feet long, $370,000. To commence.. ..	50,000
	$250,000

My hon. friend of course knows that this is only the beginning of a much larger expenditure.

Mr. McRAE: That is all right.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the minimum depth in the main channel from New Westminster to the mouth of the river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand it is 28 feet at low water.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister understands it is 28 feet at low water? I hope it is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I find it runs from 16 to 18 feet at low water and from 27 to 29 feet at high water.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the objective now of the department in regard to the channel?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The objective is thirty feet at high water, and we are practically within one foot.

Mr. McQUARRIE: One foot, or two feet. When does that depth of twenty-eight feet prevail?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The following is the record of controlling depths of the Fraser river:

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are those the depths with a twelve foot tide?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I would say about a twelve foot tide. It is 27½ feet at high water and 16 feet at low water. The tide is between eleven and twelve feet.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister no doubt received a recommendation from a joint committee of citizens representing the New Westminster board of trade, the mayor and city council, the harbour commissioners and officials of Pacific Coast Terminals Limited in October of last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I remember that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He has been told of the increase there has been in the shipping at that port from 1921, when we had only thirteen vessels and a net tonnage of 38,987 tons, to 1929, when we had 198 ships with a net tonnage of 625,271 tons. The representation of the joint committee was that there was difficulty experienced by shippers in that they required to have a minimum depth of thirty feet on a twelve foot tide. They have had instances recently of three or four lines of deep sea vessels that refused to come up the river, claiming that there was not sufficient depth. The minister, I have no doubt, is familiar with these facts. It is absolutely necessary to have a minimum draft of thirty feet. That is the objective set by the citizens of New Westminster and other points along the river, and the figure at which they have been aiming for a great many years. In the recommendation of that joint committee certain requirements were pointed out. The first was for the construction of 8,000 feet of the south jetty during the fiscal year 1930-31; the second was that the north jetty be continued to deep water; the third, that the Annieville training wall be extended downstream the necessary distance in order to eliminate the Annieville bar; and the fourth, that permanent construction be undertaken on the Sapperton bar so as to create a permanent channel of 700 to 800 feet on each side thereof. The first item, I understand, has been accepted by the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They have all been accepted, and they are all being done.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How much will be done this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Shall I read to my hon. friend what is being done?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Do you propose to do all this work this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We propose to do this year what I read to my hon. friend a minute ago.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It will not complete the program.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, but it is as much as can be done. It provides for $300,500. This work eventually will cost half a million, but we propose to begin on the $300,000 worth this year.

Mr. McQUARRIE: And leave about $200,000 for next year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They may not complete their $300,000 this year, but they will do quite a proportion of it. I have before me the recommendation about which my hon. friend spoke with regard to the various repairs, and they are all under way. I am glad to know of the excellent results that have followed the work that has been done by the department, as shown by the increased business there. That is fairly typical of the beneficent results that have followed the work of this department all the way through.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That may all be true, and it may be that the department has been doing some good work, but I would suggest that it has been rather slow.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, not very slow, according to your figures.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The department has been a little bit slow. The minister knows this is not a political question at all, as will be seen by the nature of the organizations which joined in the recommendations. Owing to the developments that are taking place there, and owing to the fact that shipping is increasing to such an extent it is absolutely necessary that we should have a channel capable of accommodating the traffic. I must say that although we do appreciate the work that has been done, we are not altogether satisfied with the speed with which it is being carried out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know what would satisfy you.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The government has perhaps been working on it; no doubt the chief engineer and the deputy minister are interested, but at the same time we want results. We want to get ships in that are waiting to come into that port; as the minister knows, the port of New Westminster is becoming one of the great ports of Canada. There is no doubt that in a comparatively short time the Fraser river will be the industrial centre of the mainland of British Columbia. I know that the minister's colleague who sits to his left, the former incumbent of the office, is very much interested in the port of New Westminster, and he knows that what I am saying is perfectly correct. The people there are united in asking that the work be done as speedily as possible.

There is also another matter which came up for consideration just last winter, with regard to the ice in the river particularly above the Fraser river bridge. We had an unusually cold spell this year, and it looked as though there might be trouble both below and above the bridge. A channel was kept open below the bridge through the efforts of this department, but the large industries which are situated above the bridge had to close down, adding greatly to the unemployment which prevailed this year. It seems to me it would have been comparatively easy to have kept the river clear of ice both above and below the bridge, or at least to have kept a channel open. The suggestion I should like to make to the minister is that he and his officials consider the advisability of converting the dredge 303 into an ice breaker. I think that could be done at very little cost, simply by putting some sheets of steel on the bow. As the minister knows, this is a suction dredge and it could take enough water into its hold to give it the necessary weight. It has the power, and if the bow were reinforced with steel, which could be done at trifling expense, there would be no question as to her ability to keep the channel of the Fraser river open regardless of what kind of weather prevailed. The ice in that river comes from up above; as the minister knows, the river is several hundred miles long and the ice comes down from up above and causes this blockade at the bridge.

My suggestion to the minister is that the 303 is not very much good anyway for any other purpose; I am sure the deputy minister will not agree with me. The boat may be useful for some work on the river there, but as a general utility dredge it does not compare at all with the King Edward. I have said this before, but I am afraid my remarks have not had much effect. I think the 303 should be junked; it is an old dredge which was brought over from Germany, I believe, twenty-five or thirty years ago, and it is out of date. I do not suggest, of course, that there should not be a second dredge on the Fraser river, but I suggest that there should be a new dredge of the King Edward type constructed, and I think a lot of money would be saved if that were done. I have discussed this matter several times with the deputy minister, but he considers the results achieved by the 303 quite satisfactory. I do not believe that is so; I think it would be a good idea if we could get rid of that 303 except for use as an ice breaker or for work for which she is suitable. All she does is dig holes; she cannot construct a channel and never has been able to do so. All the channel work has been gone over by the King Edward after the 303 finished. The 303 simply digs holes and never finishes a job. I wish the minister would take up that matter with his officials and see whether it would not be good business to give us a new, modern dredge of the King Edward type on the Fraser river.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Since my hon. friend began his remarks I have taken up the matter at some length with my deputy and with the chief engineer, and they tell me that putting these sheets on the bow of the dredge would tend to make her nose down, and practically useless. I know my hon. friend has discussed this question with the officials before, but they do not agree with him. Neither do they agree with the theory that the 303 is not a good dredge and has not done effective work and is not still capable of a good deal of useful service.

With regard to the other remarks of my hon. friend, I must express appreciation of the appreciation which he has expressed. I quite agree with him that this is not a political vote; there are no politics in it at all, except that I think it is always good politics to do good work at a low price in order to produce good results.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is this work being done under contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river (lower)—operation of snag boat, $30,000.

Mr. BARBER: I understand this item provides for one boat. I should like to know what work this boat did last year and what part of the river it covered.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand it operated on the north arm of the river from the gulf of Georgia up as far as it could navigate. This $30,000 is to provide for the maintenance and operation of the snag boat, Samson, employed in the removal of snags and obstructions in the Fraser river between Chilliwack and the gulf of Georgia; for assistance in surveys and inspections; for minor repairs to floats and piers in nearby harbours, and for occasional work in Vancouver harbour.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—contribution toward protection work at Canoe Pass, the municipality of Delta to contribute a like amount, $2,000.

Mr. BARBER: I have no objection to this item, but under this head I should like to know what is the policy of the government in regard to the protection of banks. This is a matter which I have brought to the attention of the department on more than one occasion. The government have contributed toward the protection of the bank of Nicomen island; I believe they bore all the cost of that work. They have also contributed to the cost of the protection of the bank at Agassiz and Rosedale, and the other day I brought to the attention of the government the case of Matsqui, where a very serious condition exists. I think the engineer has pointed out that it is very dangerous, and the department has been requested to contribute to the cost of that work. I should like to know just what is the policy of the government. It appears that in some sections assistance is given in protecting the banks; in other places the whole cost is borne by the government, and in still other places the department refuse to give any assistance whatever.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a matter of arrangement between the provincial and Dominion governments. In the case of the bank at Nicomen island, the dyke was built by the provincial government and the shore protection work was done by the federal government, acting through this department. It is a matter for negotiation in the various cases to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. BARBER: In the matter of the protection work at Rosedale, certain work was done there last year with the understanding that the provincial government would contribute one-third of the cost, the federal government one-third, and the municipality the remaining third. Now I understand from the municipality that they have had a communication from the department stating that the department did not agree to contribute to the cost of this work. Both engineers were on the ground; it was important that the work be done at once, and it was done. The result has been that the municipality has had to contribute two-thirds of the cost, and they have applied to the department for a vote to cover the one-third which they understood to be promised. A precedent has been established in this respect because a few years ago the government contributed one-third of the cost toward the construction of a work in that district, and this is simply a continuation of that work. The municipality expected that the federal department would contribute towards this work, in fact I have just received a telegram to-night, as follows:

Has Rosedale protection work grant been included in estimates.

That is signed by the clerk of the municipality. This matter is very important and I hope the minister will give consideration to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to give the matter my consideration. The circumstances in the two cases are quite different. On the former occasion negotiations were carried on with the department and the department agreed to contribute towards the cost. On this occasion the municipality went ahead without any agreement and did the work and then asked the department for a contribution. No arrangement has been made up to the present time and the department does not see its way clear to make a contribution under the circumstances.

Mr. BARBER: The municipality understood that the provincial Department of Public Works at Victoria were taking the matter up with the department at Ottawa, and that the same understanding had been reached. Both the provincial and Dominion engineers were on the ground and the municipality understood that these negotiations had been concluded.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot add very much to what I have said already. It is true that the engineers did go over the ground but no agreement was reached by which the Dominion government would contribute to the work. The municipality went on without that arrangement being consummated, and my hon. friend can understand quite readily that we do pretty well when we contribute to the works to which we agree to contribute. I do not think we can be expected to contribute to works which we have not agreed to contribute before they are started.

Mr. BARBER: Apparently this government has no stated policy in connection with this class of work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It has a policy not to pay for work which it does not agree to pay for.

Mr. BARBER: It just depends upon whom the negotiations were taken up with. When both engineers were on the ground and the provincial department proceeded with the work, it was understood that both governments had agreed. There is the other matter concerning Matsqui dyke, which is a similar situation to that at Nicomen. Snags and jams have formed which in turn form bars, and a large gravel bar has formed just to the north of this point which has turned the river into the bank. The same situation exists at Nicomen. This is a very serious situation because if the dyke breaks at this particular point it will endanger not only 10,000 acres of land but also the right of way of the Canadian National railway. I think this matter is before the department at the present time and I hope before high water comes the department will give serious consideration to it.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: This matter will have the very best consideration.

Item agreed to.

Glenannan—wharf, $2,000.

Mr. FRASER: Could we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote of $2,000 to provide for the construction of a wharf now being completed by day labour.

Mr. FRASER: What is the estimated cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $6,400.

Mr. FRASER: Were tenders called for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Tenders were called for, and two received. One was received from Edward A. Nolan, of Glenannan, for $6,000, and one from R. C. McCorkell, Vanderhoof, for $8,638.03.

Mr. FRASER: Why was not one of those tenders accepted?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. Nolan would not carry out a contract in accordance with his tender, and we are doing it much cheaper than we could have done by contract.

Mr. FRASER: Has the work been completed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will be finished this year. There was $2,594 spent up to February 25.

Mr. FRASER: You have spent that much already and you are asking for $2,000 more to finish it?

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. FRASER: No, this item is not carried, I want some information on it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry to say I cannot give it to the hon. member to-night, as I must catch a train. I move that the committee report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Bill No. 46, to incorporate The Premier Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Mercier (Laurier-Outremont).

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE, OPTIONAL CLAUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table a copy of the declaration under article 36 of the statute of the permanent court of international justice, with respect to the optional clause which was signed at Geneva on September 20, 1929, on behalf of the Dominion of Canada.

This declaration covers only part of a foolscap sheet, and with the permission of the house I would suggest it be printed in Hansard so that it will be available for reference by members in that form.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is very desirable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I submit that a number of copies should be printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just suggested, and, the hon. leader of the opposition has agreed, that it might be preferable to print the declaration in Hansard; then it will be available to all hon. members.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There are others besides members of the house who would like to get a copy.

The declaration follows:

Permanent Court Of International Justice
Declaration made by the Hon. Raoul Dandurand, before signing the optional clause on behalf of His Majesty's government in Canada

Geneva, September 20, 1929.

On behalf of His Majesty's government in Canada and subject to ratification, I accept as compulsory "ipso facto" and without special convention, on condition of reciprocity, the jurisdiction of the court in conformity with article 36, paragraph 2, of the statute, for a period of ten years and thereafter until such time as notice may be given to terminate the acceptance, over all disputes arising after ratification of the present declaration with regard to situations or facts subsequent to said ratification, other than:

disputes in regard to which parties have agreed or shall agree to have recourse to some other method of peaceful settlement, and disputes with the government of any other member of the league which is a member of the British commonwealth of nations, all of which disputes shall be settled in such manner as the parties have agreed or shall agree, and disputes with regard to questions which by international law fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, and subject to the condition that His Majesty's government in Canada reserve the right to require that proceedings in the court shall be suspended in respect of any dispute which has been submitted to and is under consideration by the Council of the League of Nations, provided that notice to suspend is given after the dispute has been submitted to the council and is given within ten days of the notification of the initiation of the proceedings in the court, and provided also that such suspension shall be limited to a period of twelve months or such longer period as may be agreed by the parties to the dispute or determined by a decision of all the members of the council other than the parties to the dispute.

R. Dandurand.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MANITOBA, ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN—ORDER FOR PRINTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table copies of the correspondence with respect to the transfer of the natural resources as they relate to the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. This is the correspondence subsequent to that which was brought down last session. The correspondence with respect to Manitoba relates almost exclusively to the fixing of dates for a conference and it would not serve any useful purpose to have it reprinted; but I think the correspondence respecting Alberta and Saskatchewan should be printed and made available in that form.

I would move therefore:

That 1,500 copies be printed in English and 750 copies in French of the correspondence between the governments of the Dominion and the province of Saskatchewan respecting the transfer of the natural resources of Saskatchewan tabled this day; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move:

That 1,500 copies be printed in English and 750 copies in French of the correspondence between the governments of the Dominion and the province of Alberta respecting the transfer of the natural resources of Alberta tabled this day; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn) moved:

That the select standing committee appointed to supervise the official reports of the debates of the House of Commons have leave to sit while the house is in session.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the order of motion is proceeded with further, might I ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he does not think that in connection with matters of great public concern the correspondence and papers should be tabled without a formal motion. It has been the custom in England to print what is called a white paper containing such documents. It has occurred to me that correspondence in connection with the Economic conference, for instance, should be brought down as a matter of duty rather than in response to a motion. There are other papers dealing with similar matters that it has been the custom in England, as I have said, to present to the house at once so that members might see them without a motion being made for the purpose. I think it is desirable in matters of great public importance to follow this practice.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of having important papers so tabled, but I would point out that where a number of copies are required for members of parliament, the formal motion to have them printed places the expense of the printing on parliament, rather than on one of the government departments. So long as my hon. friend will undertake not to criticize the department for expense to which it may be put in the printing, I will try to oblige him.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend need not worry with respect to an important matter of that kind.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EIGHT-HOUR DAY

Mr. ADSHEAD:

What progress has been made and what action has been taken to ensure to civil servants in Canada, and all employees of the Dominion government, the eight-hour day?

Mr. HEENAN: With respect to this question, Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member (Mr. Adshead) has in mind two sets of employees, those in the government service and those engaged on government contracts. I may say that an order in council which was passed a few days ago gives the eight-hour day to the direct employees of the Dominion government. I am glad to table a minute of the privy council, and the order.

The documents follow:

P. C. 670

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 27th March, 1930.

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 19th March, 1930, from the Minister of Labour, submitting as follows:

1. That is was recognized in the labour part of the Treaty of Versailles and the corresponding provisions of the other treaties of peace, that the well-being—physical, moral and intellectual—of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, and that although differences of climate, habits and customs, economic principles and industrial traditions, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment, there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

2. That approval was expressed in the peace treaties of the principle of the eight-hour working day.

3. That a draft convention was adopted at the first session of the conference of the international labour organization (League of Nations) in 1919 to limit hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight hours per day.

4. That the draft convention above mentioned was referred in 1924 to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations of the House of Commons of Canada for examination and report.

5. That on the recommendation of the committee on industrial and international relations of the House of Commons, approved by the House of Commons, the draft convention on hours of work in industrial undertakings was referred by Order in Council to the Supreme Court of Canada with a view to determining the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial authorities, respectively, on this subject.

6. That the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada contained the following declaration: "The subject matter is generally within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces but the authority vested in these legislatures does not enable them to give the force of law to provisions such as those contained in the draft convention in relation to servants of the Dominion Government, or to legislate for those parts of Canada which are not within the boundaries of a province."

7. That a report from the Civil Service Commission, which was submitted to your Excellency in Council under date of February 16, 1925, showed that the standard daily hours of work of monthly rate employees in the government departments are from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., with an interval for luncheon and a half-holiday on Saturday, and that the standard hours of prevailing rate employees, numbering 1,576 in Ottawa and 18,264 outside Ottawa (of whom 12,247 were postmasters paid on percentage basis), are 44 hours per week, based on an eight-hour day for five days, and 4 hours, or a half-day, on Saturday. Certain exceptions to these standard hours of work were also noted in the report of the Civil Service Commission.

8. That request has been made to the government for the granting of the eight-hour day to its own employees.

9. That it is desirable that the principle of the eight-hour day should be applied to any branches of the public service of Canada in which it is not now observed.

The minister accordingly recommends that, except in cases where the work of employees is intermittent in character, or the application of this rule is not deemed to be practicable or in the public interest, the hours of work of any employees of the Dominion government who are still required to work more than eight hours daily be reduced to eight hours daily, with a half-holiday on Saturday.

The committee concur in the forgegoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire.
Clerk of the Privy Council.

The overtime allowance shall not exceed the rate or amount authorized by the Minister of National Revenue except in special cases approved by him.

4. Requests for customs or excise special service and for service outside the usual business days and hours shall be presented to the proper officer in sufficient time to enable him to make arrangements for the attendance of the necessary officers to perform the service if approved and acceded to.

5. The charge for customs and excise special services shall be paid to the collector of the port having supervision of the services, who shall keep accounts and make returns thereof, and also of officers' overtime, as directed by the Minister of National Revenue. Collectors shall deposit all collections of charges for customs and excise special services to the credit of the Receiver General.

When the service is performed by an officer who is not attached to any port the charge for the services of such officer shall be paid direct to the department.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. HEENAN:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Harrison is fair wages officer and mediator of the Department of Labour with headquarters at Vancouver, B.C., and his territory comprises the four western provinces. The payment under this vote is to cover his travelling expenses while engaged in gathering information as to prevailing wage rates in western Canada, which information is used in connection with the preparation of schedules containing labour conditions—wages and hours—for insertion in specifications and contracts governing federal government construction work. This officer is required to visit the various federal government undertakings in his territory during the period of construction and ascertain definitely that the wage schedule applicable to the particular work is posted in a conspicuous place on the work and is easily accessible to the workmen employed thereon; also to ascertain by investigation that these labour conditions are being fully complied with. Further, from time to time complaints are received of the non-observance of the labour conditions by certain contractors in respect to wages, hours and classifications, and these complaints necessitate the fair wages officer visiting the various works in question and, after investigation of the complaint, making whatever adjustment the circumstances may warrant. In addition a considerable amount of his time was occupied in dealing with labour disputes, particularly in connection with the mining area of Alberta, wherein he acted as mediator in adjusting strikes and disputes, as provided for in the Conciliation and Labour Act and the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

3. The payment referred to under this vote is to cover the travelling expenses of Mr. Harrison while engaged in auditing payments made under the Old Age Pensions Act in the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

4. Mr. E. S. H. Winn is chairman of the British Columbia Old Age Pensions Board and also the British Columbia representative on the Interprovincial Old Age Pensions Board. CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED

Mr. FERLAND:

How many employees of the Canadian National Railways have been laid off on account of reduction of staff in each shop of the central region during each of the past five years?

Mr. CRERAR: It is not considered to be in the interest of the Canadian National Railways, nor in the public interest, to bring down information of this character.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING RIGHTS

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. Is Canada making efforts to extend her rights in the matter of more numerous channels for broadcasting?
2. If so, what is the result of such negotiations with the United States?
3. What is the cost of service rendered for the improvement of radio reception in each of the provinces of the dominion?
4. What equipment and how many employees are there in each province in the above service?
5. What revenue is derived from this service?
6. What revenue is derived from radio receiving licences?
7. What are the government's regulations and licence fees for broadcasting rights, by broadcasting companies?
8. Is the power of the various stations limited by government regulations? If so, what is the maximum?
9. What is the maximum power allowed in the United States or is there any limiting legislation?
10. What is the maximum power used in the United States?
11. Is broadcasting in the United States under state control or under federal control?
12. Have the separate states any control or voice in the matter?

Mr. CARDIN:

1 and 2. The sovereign right of all nations to the use of every radio channel is recognized, thus Canada has always enjoyed the right to allot any of the frequencies in the broadcast band to any radio broadcasting stations under its jurisdiction.

It is nevertheless recognized that until technical development progresses to the stage where radio interference can be eliminated, special arrangements between neighbouring countries are desirable in order to minimize such interference.

To this end, negotiations were entered into with the United States, immediately on the passing of the United States radio act in February, 1927, with a view to concluding a formal agreement for a division of the 96 available broadcast channels between Canada and that country.

The division demanded by the United States representatives, based primarily on the relative populations of the two countries, was not acceptable to the Canadian representatives, and the conference was therefore adjourned.

In December, 1928, Canada notified all nations subscribing to the International Radio Convention, through the medium of the International Radiotelegraph Bureau, Berne, as follows:—

"The question of the division of frequencies in the broadcast band between the broadcasting stations in the North America area has been the subject of negotiations between the interested countries, but, so far, no agreement has been reached. The International Radiotelegraph Convention of Washington, 1927, becomes effective on January 1, 1929, and in submitting Canada's list of broadcasting stations for publication in the official list, in accordance with the provisions of the convention, the Canadian administration has refrained from notifying the temporary and inadequate assignment on which its broadcasting stations are now operating and desires it to be understood that pending the consummation of an agreement between the administrations in the North America area in regard to broadcasting, the Canadian administration in no way waives the right it considers it enjoys under the International Radio Convention in regard to the use of a reasonable proportion of the broadcast frequencies available in the above mentioned area."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) (for Mr. Euler):

It is impossible to furnish this information because the tax is payable by stamps such as are used for payment of other forms of excise tax. These stamps are purchased at post offices or banks and the object of their use is not disclosed when purchased.

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm the agreement between the governments of the Dominion and the province of Saskatchewan dated 20th March, 1930, respecting the transfer of the natural resources of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH WEST INDIES

REPORTED STATEMENT OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I should like to inquire from the Prime Minister if the government has under consideration any proposal for the taking over of any of the empire responsibilities in regard to the West Indies?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): None of which I am aware.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask whether the statement of the Governor General was authorized by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To what statement does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The statement which His Excellency is reported to have made before the Empire Club of Toronto.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume my hon. friend has reference to what I took to be a complimentary remark on the part of His Excellency with regard to the relations between Canada and the West Indies. The statement was made by His Excellency on his own responsibility.

PENSIONS AND SOLDIERS' PROBLEMS

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the printing of the proceedings which have taken place before the committee on returned soldiers' problems, I find that 950 copies of the reports issued from day to day have been absorbed by the Canadian Legion, leaving a very small number for circulation among the members. As a matter of fact, some of the members have not been able to secure a copy at all. Of course it is desirable that the legion should circulate these reports as freely as possible, but in view of the fact that they represent only about 75,000 of the entire membership of the overseas forces, I think it will be agreed that something should be done to make it possible to circulate larger numbers of these reports. I am bound to say that the distribution office could give us no reasonable explanation as to why the members of parliament were not furnished with these reports, while 950 copies were absorbed by the legion, under someone's orders. It is not customary to deprive members of the house of the opportunity of getting at least one or two copies of important documents of this kind.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): In answer to my hon. friend I may say that I obtained permission to have 1,800 copies printed, 1,500 in English and 300 in French.

Mr. BENNETT: When was that done, please?

Mr. POWER: I obtained permission without coming before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: To-day?

Mr. POWER: No, I obtained that permission some time last week, a day or so after my hon. friend brought the matter to my attention, and it was understood that that number would be printed. I was aware of the fact that the legion would require something like 900 copies, but I thought possibly the remaining 600 would be sufficient to meet the requirements of hon. members of this house. If my hon. friend desires me to do so, I will make inquiries as to the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I should say to the hon. gentleman, who is chairman of the committee, that some arrangement should be made to reprint the proceedings of the first two or three meetings, which hon. members cannot get even to-day. I would not have mentioned this matter except for the fact that just a few moments ago the point was brought to my attention. Hon. members have been endeavouring to get copies and have been unable to secure them, and some of our members have not even seen a copy of the proceedings.

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that the 1,800 copies to be printed would include the proceedings of the first and second meetings. I will make inquiries, and if that has not been done I will bring the matter to the attention of the house.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to-day is the last day of the fiscal year, and it is necessary to make provision for interim supply for the coming fiscal year. Therefore, with the consent of the house, I would move that you do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the granting of interim supply.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I merely rise to reserve the rights of those who, under our constitution, have the right to suggest that grievances should be remedied before supply is granted. I quite realize that supply must be granted; it is usual to do so. The Minister of Finance has mentioned the matter to us and we are quite agreeable that it shall be done, provided it is without prejudice to the rights of any member of the house to discuss any item, even though a portion of that item may have been granted by this interim supply bill.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question but that all the rights of everyone will be fully conserved.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $42,625,436.14, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1931, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1931.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. DUNNING moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1931, the sum of $42,625,436.14 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 47 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1931.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister, for Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Eskimo affairs.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. minister explain the object of this bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Some years ago it was thought wise to place the Eskimos under the control of the Indian department but it has been found that this does not work out very acceptably as we have no Indian officers in the territory where the Eskimos are located. The officers of the Department of the Interior are located there and we are asking that the control of the Eskimos be placed under the Northwest Territories council and the Department of the Interior rather than under the Indian department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was the control under the Northwest territories council?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Up until three years ago.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What difficulty has been experienced in the interval?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Royal Northwest Mounted Police are now located along Coronation gulf up in Baffin Land, in the territories frequented by the Eskimos, and they seem to offer at the present time the best agency to look after the Eskimos, and in addition to that the officers of the Department of the Interior are in that territory. I think it would work out much more acceptably to allow those officers and the mounted police to supervise whatever control is necessary over these people.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the Eskimo population?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We know that we have over four thousand Eskimos, although we are not sure about the number.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has any census been taken?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Figures as to population have been obtained through our officers in the Northwest Territories, as well as the mounted police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are these people considered to be British subjects in all respects?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Apparently that is a ruling I am not competent to give.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A ruling made by whom?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are assumed to be British subjects. As my hon. friend knows, we have taken over the control of the territory, which control has not been disputed in any particular except with respect to one small portion. The Danish government have presented a claim based upon the explorations made by Otto Sverdrup, and at the present time we are endeavouring to settle that claim.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the origin of these people, were they originally Indian?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Eskimo.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Or are they Mongolians; of what race are they?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid my hon. friend has asked me a question which I cannot answer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A good deal would depend upon that.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a difference of opinion. Many hold that they are Mongolian but I do not think anyone can prove it.

Mr. DUNNING: Some people say they are Scotch.

Mr. ARTHURS: They are treated as wards of the government and not as full-fledged citizens; that is correct?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that the government hitherto has treated them as being originally an Indian tribe and for some time past has assumed the guardianship of these people in the same manner as it assumes guardianship over the Indians. Are these people entitled to the franchise where the Indian is not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, our position with respect to the Eskimos and the territory over which they roam is that we claim that we own the territory, and therefore the residents in that territory must be Canadian. No treaties have been arranged with the Eskimos as with the Indians in other parts of Canada. These people are a nomadic race and are found in widely scattered territories. As my hon. friend knows, the Indians locate in some particular spot, but that is not true of the Eskimos. They return annually to their old camping grounds but so far we have not treated the Eskimos as we have the original Indians of Canada.

Mr. SPENCER: To what territory is the hon. minister referring?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Coronation gulf, Melville island, Baffin Land and all the territory north.

Mr. SENN: How many Eskimos are in that territory?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have answered that; we know there are about four thousand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister did not answer my question; if the Eskimo were seeking a franchise in this country, would he be entitled to vote?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I imagine that he would be a citizen of the country unless the same process had been gone through as with the Indians; which has not been done up to the present time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That has not been done up to date?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will continue to be wards of the government or of the North-west Territories council as formerly?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I doubt if they would be considered wards of the government in the sense that the Indian is a ward. They are granted educational facilities, provided largely by the missionaries, the same as the Indians, and in times of necessity they are given relief. Outside of that, no treaty has been enacted which would designate them as aborigines of that territory.

Mr. ARTHURS: There are Indians in Canada with whom we have not negotiated a treaty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Very few.

Mr. ARTHURS: But there are some?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS: The Eskimo would be in exactly the same position.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend would be correct in that.

Mr. ARTHURS: If one had the franchise then the other would have it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend concerned about the franchise?

Mr. ARTHURS: I just added that clause.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Indian has not the right to the franchise until he is enfranchised.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister argues that the Eskimo would have the franchise because he has not entered into a treaty with the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a very fine legal argument and one which I am not competent to answer.

Mr. LADNER: Do I understand the minister to say that Eskimos who are British subjects and wards of the government, exercise the franchise or have the right of exercising it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So far as I am aware, there has never been an election in which they could exercise the franchise.

Mr. ERNST: Will they exercise it under the proposed enlargement of the Yukon territory as an electoral unit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have never heard the question raised before. I noticed in the press a few weeks ago, someone raised it, but I would much prefer to take the position suggested by my hon. friend that not all of these Eskimos, but some of them, have been subject to the bounty of the Canadian government and in every respect are treated as wards of the government, although one cannot, I think, legally say that they are wards. That is the point.

Mr. ERNST: Would the minister consider them as wards of the government, entitled to the franchise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not care to give my hon. friend an answer offhand on that point. I will make inquiry and be prepared to give an answer later, but I am not going to assume the responsibility of saying that the Eskimos would be enfranchised.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I should like to call the minister's attention to this question which I asked on the tenth of March:

> Are adult Eskimos, being British subjects, residents of Canada for the period required by Dominion Elections Act, qualified to vote at elections of a member of the House of Commons?

The minister's reply was:

> Yes, Eskimos who are British subjects by birth or naturalization.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They would be identical with an enfranchised Indian in that respect. That is the position of an Indian when he is granted enfranchisement and foregoes the benefit of his tribal membership.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Would an Eskimo, in order to exercise the right of voting, have to be enfranchised the same as an Indian?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not clear as to the status of an Eskimo. My difficulty is this: the Eskimo is there; to all intents and purposes he is a ward of the government so far as care in time of necessity is concerned, but I believe there is no treaty existing nor would I say that his status has been defined. If, however, he were enfranchised under his own name he would be in the same category as an Indian who had been enfranchised in exactly the same way.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Do I understand the minister to say that this answer given by him on the tenth of this month is not correct?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it is correct.

Mr. FRASER: How does an Indian become enfranchised?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): By consent of the band to which he belongs, by foregoing all the rights he holds as a member of the tribe and becoming a citizen of the country, and by order in council.

Mr. LADNER: Might I ask the minister whether the government considers, as a matter of principle, that Eskimos, who are wards of or who receive bounty from the government, could exercise the franchise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not say that they were wards. I want my hon. friend to get my explanation correctly. What I say is that the Eskimos have in the past been in receipt of bounty from the Canadian government.

Mr. LADNER: I included that in my question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What status that might or might not give them, I am not prepared to say. It is a strictly legal question, but I say that the Eskimos have not, to my knowledge, made any treaty with the Canadian government.

Mr. LADNER: I was asking not as a legal question but as a matter of principle or policy whether the minister considers that Eskimos who are receiving bounty or any kind of favour from the Canadian government, should exercise the franchise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall have to leave that question to be answered by the Department of Justice. I cannot give a legal opinion on it.

Mr. ERNST: As I understand the matter, Canada claims sovereignty roughly from the forty-ninth parallel to the northern portion of the continent, and any British subject resident within Canada, if he is in an electoral district, is entitled to vote. Is an Eskimo born within this area over which Canada claims sovereignty, a British subject?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Eskimos who are British subjects have certainly the right to vote, just as any other British subject. They are not Indians. In the Dominion Elections Act under qualifications of electors, there is an exception for Indians ordinarily resident on an Indian reservation. The Eskimos are not in that category. Moreover, they are not Indians. There is nothing to disqualify an Eskimo simply because he is an Eskimo. That is my first impression.

Mr. ERNST: I would understand my hon. friend is speaking as Minister of Justice when he gives the opinion and would be prepared to stand by it.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is not altogether fair.

Mr. ERNST: Quite fair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He asks me what is my impression at the moment. I cannot give more than that. I have never given any consideration to the matter, but there is no doubt in my mind, speaking at the moment, that an Eskimo is not disqualified simply because he happens to be an Eskimo.

Mr. ERNST: To follow the question a little further, may I ask this: If the bill which affects the constituency of the Yukon passes the house and the Northwest Territories are incorporated with the Yukon as an electoral district, will these nomadic tribes who are receiving bounty occasionally from the government, be entitled to vote whether or not they have a permanent place of residence? It is a fact that they are objects of charity from time to time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They will be entitled to vote if they do not fall under any of the exceptions which disqualify people from voting.

Mr. ERNST: Is there any exception which would disqualify them?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is free to consult the Dominion Elections Act just as I am.

Mr. ERNST: The Minister of Justice being so ready with his opinion as to the rights of British subjects, I thought he would be equally ready with information concerning the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will see under the rules that an hon. member is not entitled to ask legal advice of the Minister of Justice. That is not my function.

Mr. ERNST: The question is of vital interest to the house and I think it should be answered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps I can have a private talk with my hon. friend and give him all the enlightenment he desires.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I do not wish to be too persistent in regard to this matter, but the Minister of the Interior has gone officially on record as giving his opinion that Eskimos have the right to vote. They are qualified under the Dominion Elections Act. Do I take it that the Minister of Justice agrees with that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When my hon. friend says he is quoting me, I presume he is quoting an answer to a question?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a definite statement that Eskimos who are British subjects are entitled to vote.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The question is:

Are adult Eskimos, being British subjects, residents of Canada for the period required by the Dominion Elections Act, qualified to vote at elections of a member of the House of Commons?

The minister replied:

Yes, Eskimos who are British subjects by birth or naturalization.

The question did not apply to United States or other foreign Eskimos; it was only Canadian Eskimos I was referring to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend asked a very distinct question: Are Eskimos who are enfranchised entitled to vote? Certainly they are. Indians who are enfranchised are entitled to vote. That is the question he asked.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I said Eskimos with the qualifications of other electors under the Dominion Elections Act. Then the government say that they are entitled to vote.

Mr. CANNON: Unless they are excluded under the act, how can they be prevented from voting?

Mr. ERNST: Surely the Solicitor General with his fund of legal knowledge knows why they should be excluded.

Mr. CANNON: The Dominion Elections Act recites very plainly who are electors and who are not, and unless a certain class of people are excluded under the act, they have a right to vote.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask the Solicitor General if the mere receipt of charity from the Dominion government is a bar to voting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is wrong about that.

Mr. ERNST: I do not say that it is. In my opinion it is not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I read the section of the Dominion Elections Act which relates to persons supported by charity? Under section 30 persons are disqualified.

Who, at the time of an election, are prisoners undergoing punishment for criminal offences, or are patients in lunatic asylums, or are maintained in whole or in part as inmates receiving public charitable support or care in municipal poor houses or houses of industry, or are inmates receiving public charitable support, other than for war services, in any institution receiving aid from the government of a province under any statute in that behalf—for the whole period of such election.

Surely the Eskimos do not come in that class.

Mr. ERNST: So they would be entitled to the franchise?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think so.

Mr. ERNST: That is exactly what I said, and I was trying to find out if the Minister of Justice agreed with me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is it the hon. member is objecting to?

Mr. ERNST: To their receiving the franchise and then receiving support from this government.

Mr. MANION: The classes just read by the minister would not include the ordinary Indian.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Indians come under another exception.

Mr. ERNST: Does the Minister of Justice consider it sound in principle that a person who is in receipt of a bounty administered by officials of the government should be entitled to the franchise?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no opinion to offer as to that, except to say that it is the law.

Mr. ERNST: Does the minister think it ought to be the law? It opens itself to the most vicious sort of abuses?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not in favour of restrictions as to the franchise, if my hon. friend wants to know.

Mr. ERNST: Nor am I.

Mr. DONNELLY: What would the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg say about the unemployed who are getting assistance from the government right along having the franchise? Would he exclude them?

Mr. ERNST: I do not know any that are getting assistance from this government.

Mr. DONNELLY: It would not make any difference whether it was a Tory government or a Liberal government. If my hon. friend applied his principle to the unemployed who are receiving assistance from the government, a lot of Nova Scotia people would be disfranchised.

Mr. ERNST: Many of them are, for municipal purposes.

Mr. ARTHURS: While this discussion is very interesting, I would remind the minister of my question regarding the position of Indians who are at present not under treaty.

A reading of the clause of the Dominion Elections Act just quoted by the Minister of Justice would indicate that any Indian who did not ordinarily reside on a reserve had the right of franchise.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh no.

Mr. ARTHURS: Any Indian not ordinarily resident upon a reserve is excepted from the disabilities applying to the Indian upon the reserve. I think I am correct in that, and certainly the Indians who are not under treaty would very largely out-number the Eskimos of Canada. So all these arguments would apply equally to men living in the northern parts of this Dominion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is wrong, if he will permit me. The Indians have not the franchise unless they are enfranchised.

Mr. ERNST: And if they do not receive a bounty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They may. They would not receive payments under the Indian Act.

Mr. ERNST: That is what I mean.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are Canadian citizens with all the privileges of citizenship. But no Indian is entitled to the franchise until he is enfranchised. An Indian is debarred from the privileges of the franchise until he becomes an enfranchised Indian under the act.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is no question about the ordinary Indian residing in Canada being a Canadian, and I say that a band of Indians who have no treaty with the government, and never had, should be placed in the same position at least as the Eskimo. There can be no reason why the Eskimo should be preferred while the Indian, who is, to say the least, just as intelligent, should be debarred from the franchise.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Indian Act provides as to the steps that are to be taken to enfranchise an Indian, and he is not enfranchised until those steps are taken. The question that arises about the Eskimo is a different one altogether. An Eskimo would have to be construed to be an Indian and subjected to all the restrictions of the Indian Act, which he is not.

Mr. ARTHURS: If this act passes, the Eskimo and the non-treaty Indian are in exactly the same position. There is absolutely no difference between them.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. MARCIL: I am glad to hear this discussion about the Eskimos. Now that the eyes of Canada are turning towards the north it is interesting to note that public interest is being taken in these people. Many hon. members of this house are no doubt aware that two or three years ago Pere Duchaussois, of the Oblate order, published a book, entitled "Aux Glaces Polaires," which has had a very extensive circulation all through Europe, and has been crowned by the French Academy. The book gives a most complete account of that northern country from the historical perspective, and especially of the Eskimo proper. The Oblate fathers, under Mgr. Turquetil, have been carrying on missionary work there for many years, and so also have the Anglicans. I am glad to know that the government is now going to take a larger interest in these farthest removed inhabitants of the north. The hardships with which they have to contend are almost inconceivable and, as described by Pere Duchaussois in his book, are indeed a revelation. Modern science to-day has brought the radio to the Eskimos, and through the good offices of the Royal North West Mounted Police day by day they are being brought into closer touch with civilization. One reason perhaps more than any other why they should receive sympathy and assistance of Canada is that they have to endure great hardships. I think we should extend to them the inestimable privilege of being recognized as British subjects, entitled to all the privileges that come to those who enjoy British citizenship.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have been looking into this bill very carefully. The minister draws a sharp distinction between the Eskimo and the Indian. Will he be good enough to tell us how he decides whether a person is an Eskimo or an Indian? What are the grounds of distinction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think one would have very much difficulty in deciding which was an Indian and which was an Eskimo by the appearance. That is one test. Another is language; to some extent, also, their habits. After all, there is not so very much difference between an Englishman and a Scotchman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Everybody will not agree with the minister there. What I really mean is this: There must be some description of an Indian and some description of an Eskimo. The minister says that a person could tell the difference between them by their appearance, but the minister himself is not going to decide which of these thousands of people are Eskimos and which are Indians. He must lay down some rule or regulation by which the officials can decide whether a man is an Indian or an Eskimo. I take it that they are all children of the wild, nomadic tribes, living very differently from us, both the Indian and the Eskimo. I think the minister ought in specific words to draw the distinction between the two when the act makes such a difference between them.

Mr. ARTHURS: I would point out to the minister that outside the first clause of this bill there is no word relating to Eskimos, nor are they referred to in any part of the text. Section 1 provides:

> Subsection 2 of section 4 of the Indian Act, chapter 98 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed.

That is the clause which places the care of Eskimos under the Indian department. According to the minister's statement, the bill is to empower him to direct the affairs of the Eskimos, but, as I say, except for the first section of the bill there is no reference to Eskimos, the other sections deal exclusively with Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is referring to subsection 2 of section 4 of the Indian Act, which provides that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have charge of Eskimo affairs. There was never any provision made as to how that charge should be carried out, because we have not had the same contact with the Eskimo that we have had with the Indian. Prior to bringing the Eskimo under the control of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, our contact with him had been through the officials of the Northwest Territories branch. Even that was not a very drastic change, because the minister in charge of that branch is the Minister of the Interior. However, as to whether that had the effect of bringing the Eskimo entirely under the Indian Act, I am not prepared to say. As to the definition of an Eskimo there is no doubt that the racial distinction between even the most northern Indian and the Eskimo is very marked. I do not think anyone would have a great deal of difficulty in distinguishing one from the other.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But the minister himself would not be making the distinction. He must have the Eskimo defined so that those who are administering Indian affairs may distinguish between the Eskimo and the Indian. They are both native races. I do not see how the minister can draft a definition which will hold water in all cases.

Mr. DICKIE: Aside from the point that is being discussed at the moment, does the minister think the nomadic Eskimo has a sufficient knowledge of our institutions to cast an intelligent vote?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was not thinking about the question of voting prior to the Eskimo being put in charge of the Indian department nor since; I was simply looking at as a matter of administration. If the Eskimo is conceded to have a vote, that is something I have given no attention to whatever. The question of enfranchising or disenfranchising the Eskimo never entered my mind. As I say, it is simply a question of administration.

Mr. BENNETT: I find it difficult to understand how the hon. minister can say that, if he looks at the explanation he has placed opposite section 1 of the bill. This is his explanatory note:

> This repeal is due to the fact that by order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, dated the 31st of August, 1927, and made in pursuance of the provisions of chapter 6, 8-9 George V. (1918) and the amendment thereto, chapter 23, 15-16 George V. (1925) the charge of Eskimo affairs was transferred to the Commissioner of the Northwest territories, Department of the Interior.

So that at the moment it is in the hands of the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but it was for a short period under the control of the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: But the point I am making is this: What authority did that give to repeal section 2 of the act? That act is in the revised statutes of 1927 which came into force in 1927. Subsection 2 of section 4 provides:

> The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have charge of Eskimo affairs.

How can an order in council passed antecedently to the date of these revised statutes repeal a provision of these statutes?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We could not legally repeal it. We were doing it for administration purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I agree with my hon. friend. We knew perfectly well that we had not power to override the statute, but as a matter of administration, to obviate the duplicating of officials, we have as a matter of fact been supervising Eskimo affairs by the North West Territories branch. We are simply asking the repeal of the section now.

Mr. BENNETT: Then what happens is this: The Minister of the Interior comes in to the House of Commons and says that under the authority of a statute passed in 1918 and of another passed in 1925, on the 31st August, 1927, which is over two years ago, he did an illegal thing and has been doing it ever since.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In what way?

Mr. BENNETT: He says so; he says he knows it is illegal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Whether he said so or not, he was wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: Was he? How could the governor in council in 1927 repeal the provisions of a statute that came into force as a part of the revised statutes of Canada a few months before under the authority of the statutes of 1918 and 1925?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is my hon. friend sure it was a few months before? My impression is that the revised statutes of 1927 came into force only in December of that year. That would be after this transfer.

Mr. CANNON: The proclamation is the 22nd day of December, 1927. The order in council would have been passed in the summer.

Mr. BENNETT: But the revised statutes of Canada are those of 1927.

Mr. CANNON: I know; but the proclamation which put them into force is dated December, 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; that is my point. The statute came into force subsequent to the order in council, and the statute governs. Therefore the order in council is illegal. That is what the minister admits. I have now the statute before me. It is chapter 98 and it came into force, as the Solicitor General says, after August, 1927. I thought it was September; he says December. Subsection 4 of section 2 of the Indian Act, being chapter 98 reads as follows:

> The Minister of the Interior, or the head of any other department appointed for that purpose by the governor in council, shall be the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and shall, as such, have the control and management of the lands and property of the Indians in Canada.

Of the lands and property of the Indians in Canada. Subsection 2 reads:

> The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have charge of Eskimo affairs.

That section was passed before 1924. Now the Solicitor General says this statute was in force in December, 1927.

Mr. CANNON: That is the proclamation.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some time in December.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has no effect whatsoever on this.

Mr. BENNETT: It has all the effect in the world. How can the governor in council do something which the statute prohibits?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As soon as my hon. friend gives me the floor, I will explain.

Mr. CANNON: That is in February of 1928.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even if it were before I do not think it would matter. As the explanatory note says, this transfer of powers took place under the statute of 1918, during the good days of a government other than the present one.

Mr. BENNETT: It says 1925, finally.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In 1918. In 1925 it simply amended and made clearer the provisions of the statute of 1918.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In 1918 it was enacted that the governor in council shall have power to transfer any powers, duties or functions from one minister of the crown to another, and from one department to another, or to combine two departments under one minister, and so on. It was amended in 1925 to the effect that the duties and powers are to be exercised by the minister in the department to which the transfer of duties is made.

The 1925 statute simply states that when the powers conferred by the statutes of 1918 are exercised all the duties which were under the deputy minister or officers of the first department shall be exercised by the deputy minister and the officers of the second department. It is under those two statutes that in 1927 the Eskimo branch was transferred from the Department of Indian Affairs to the Department of the Interior. It was perfectly legal to do so, but I believe my hon. friend says it comes in conflict with the revised statutes of Canada. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) now hands me chapter 165 of the revised statutes of Canada, which reenact the statutes of 1918 and 1925.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: At any time, whether before or after the proclamation putting into force the revised statutes of 1927, the governor in council has the authority to transfer one branch of a department to another department.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And this has been done.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not see the occasion for the discussion on section 1 of this bill, which merely enacts the law as it stands at the present time. The effect of section 1 is merely to make this law coincide with the existing situation; this is an anomaly which is being repealed by section 1 of the present act. It is a condition which no longer exists.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister before him the statutes of 1924? This particular clause we are dealing with was not passed in 1925, but in 1924.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it was 1925.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 2 of section 4 of the Indian Act provides:

The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall take charge of Eskimo affairs.

That is the same as chapter 47, section 1, revised statutes of Canada, 1924.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is 1924, and not 1925.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is talking about another statute. This was changed by the governor in council in 1927, acting in accordance with or under the authority of the statutes of 1925. It can be done at any time and in any department.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry the minister does not appreciate the point we are making. We fully agree with everything he has said, but he does not touch the point. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) sees it, however. The point is that the transfer of administration from one department to another is accomplished under the provisions of the statutes of 1918 and 1925, the substance of which we find in chapter 161 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. Chapter 98, however, of the revised statutes of Canada deals with the Indians of the country; it is the Indian Act. Under the provisions of subsection 2, section 4, of that statute, it is positively enacted that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have charge of matters pertaining to Eskimos. That cannot be repealed, except by this parliament. The transfer of the administration to the Northwest Territories branch does not relieve the minister of his responsibility; on the contrary, he still has that responsibility. What we are endeavouring to ascertain is why he is desirous of divesting himself of the authority which parliament placed upon him in 1924. That is the whole story. There is no variance between the Minister of Justice and ourselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the result the Minister of the Interior wishes to effect by the present section of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To make it coincide with the present situation.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Let me illustrate it in this way. The Minister of Justice has under his control both the penitentiaries and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. If he desired he could, by section 161 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, transfer the administration of the northwest mounted police to the Prime Minister, as was done, in fact, on one occasion. It is not competent, however, by order in council, to repeal this subsection of section 4 which affirmatively places the responsibility for the Eskimos in the hands of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. For what reason is this being done? It does not touch the administration, but it touches ministerial responsibilities, and as to who shall be the responsible minister in this house for the Eskimos. That subsection states that the Minister of the Interior or the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs is the responsible minister. Why must there be no responsible minister?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is one.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is to be the responsible minister?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of the Interior.

Mr. BENNETT: But he only gets it under the section we are going to repeal. The transfer by the order in council for administration does not in any sense repeal the substantive section which places responsibility upon the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is repealing it now.

Mr. BENNETT: Who will be in charge of it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is.

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking about ministerial responsibility in this house. It says that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs is responsible for the affairs of the Eskimos, and that he is the only minister in this house who is responsible. Until some other minister is made responsible, he must be.

Why change it and thereby shift the responsibility, if all this is going to increase responsibility? That section was put in in 1924 to deal with a situation about which the minister must have knowledge. The Minister of the Interior knows that the condition of the Eskimos was very acute, there was starvation among them, and he must recall that situation. Some of the missionaries brought it to the attention of the minister. I, myself, recall going to the minister and calling it to his attention. That being the position, what minister is going to be responsible when this section is repealed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The administration of the Northwest Territories is under the control of the Minister of the Interior, who at the moment happens to be also the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute says he shall be until someone else is appointed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend now is arguing that since in 1927 the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs was mentioned as the responsible minister, and that since now we are giving official control to the North West Territories branch the Minister of the Interior should be specifically mentioned, I have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has grasped the point. Under our system of government there must be ministerial responsibility somewhere.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then all my hon. friend desires is that in addition to this repeal there should be a section stating that the control is under the Minister of the Inerior?

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that should be done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think there would be no objection to it.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister sees the point because, as the Solicitor General pointed out, the revised statutes did not come into force until February of 1928. That section now stands as the law, and of course the question of administration is very different from that of ministerial responsibility.

Now let us deal with the vital question involved, assuming that you repeal the statute. The Eskimos are nomads; they have no established communities in the sense in which the Indians were established when this country was discovered. Rightly or wrongly we think we have a better system than other countries have, because we have recognized the right of the aboriginal red man and his title, in part, to property in this country. When we made a treaty with the Indians we recognized them as distinct tribes; we enacted that they should have property rights in certain areas, and even yet we cannot part with those property rights without their consent, as the minister knows. For instance, if it is desirable for any purpose to secure 1,000 acres of land from a band of Indians, it requires a very great deal of effort and labour to bring about that result; they must be convened together in a certain way and they must have interpreters clearly to place before them what it is proposed to do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend must remember that the act does give the superintendent general power in certain cases.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so; there are provisions which vest an arbitrary power in the superintendent general, to a certain extent, but the whole theory of the act is that, as far as possible, the Indians should be treated as proprietors of their reserves.

Now we come to the Eskimos. They have no treaties with us; they have no established reserves, as the minister knows, and I think a few moments ago he used two words which describe the situation very well. He said they were nomadic tribes. How can we, having assumed it, divest ourselves of responsibility by endeavouring to treat them as settled persons in certain communities? At the moment the responsibility for providing the Eskimos with a living rests with us, and the minister recalls that at very great expense he sent an expedition to that northern country to provide them with food and medicine, if I remember correctly, when they were not really able to make a living for themselves. I think I can safely say that they are an uncivilized class of people; they hardly live in tribes and they have not developed any form of settled life.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They may be broken up a very great deal; one can scarcely say they are in tribes.

Mr. BENNETT: I was coming to that. When we speak of them as a tribe we must remember that they have no settled communities in which they live, and I am told by those who have visited that country that during their summer they have no settled residences at all. They have no settlements, in the meaning of the term as it was used by the early pioneers with respect to the Indians. These people are not civilized as we use the word civilization. Whether or not the Indians are civilized is not the question. These Eskimos are wards of this nation, and being wards the question of who assumes trusteeship for them becomes important.

At present the trustee is the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. That superintendent now proposes to divest himself of responsibility, saying that because the administration is vested with the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories it is going to be left with him, but that does not get away from the essential fact that the wardship continues. These people are wards of this nation, and when the other day I heard a discussion with regard to the Eskimo having a vote I knew that if my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior were not in this house, and if politics and such matters were forgotten, he would regard it as one of the hugest jokes he ever heard. These wards of the nation are scattered far and wide, over mount and stream and sea. They are here to-day and far away to-morrow, and I am sure the Minister of Justice must realize that such wards of the nation are not people who should be entrusted with the franchise, because they are not a part of our civilized country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely this question should be discussed in connection with the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. BENNETT: No doubt that is correct, but at the same time it arises here, because we are divesting ourselves of a wardship and we are not naming the responsible minister who will communicate to this house the conduct of his wardship. It is quite clear that the order in council transferring the administration of this matter to the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories covers the matter of administration, but it does not get away from the essential question of the responsibility for the wardship of these people.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite agree with my hon. friend. I do not care to discuss the question of the enfranchisement of the Eskimo; to be very frank, it never occurred to me that such a question would arise. There is no doubt that if distress arises among these people, to that extent they are wards of the Canadian government, and if we allowed famine or pestilence to run riot among them we would be called to account. They are not Indians as we know Indians, with chiefs and councils and all the paraphernalia which has been set up by the Indians for the management of their affairs. These people congregate in small family groups; no doubt they have leaders, but apparently in discussing matters of importance with our officials they all speak, each for himself.

Mr. BENNETT: They have no chiefs.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not that I am aware of, as the Indians have, through whom they speak and do their business with the officials of the government. That is one reason for the difficulty in applying the Indian Act to the Eskimos. It is merely a matter of administration; we are seeking to take care of these people in times of distress, which fortunately are very infrequent, since they appear to be able to look after themselves fairly well. However, in the summer season, or even any other season of the year, they are liable to travel two or three hundred miles and locate themselves in another place; they have no particular habitations which they call their camping grounds or reserves.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Did I understand the minister to say that the Danish government had made some claim that these people were citizens of Denmark?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; they have made some claim to territory there. Many years ago a Danish explorer conducted an expedition among the islands south of Melville island and explored some territory there. Some claim has been made to that territory. It is not a very serious matter, and we are attempting to adjust it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You mean it was a claim for territory?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton)): Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not with regard to the citizenship of the people?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: I think another section should be substituted for this.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If that is necessary to meet the wishes of my hon. friend it will need to be done in an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act. This is merely designed to take it out of the Indian Act.

Mr. BENNETT: There must be some responsibility somewhere.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, chapter 103, which deals with the Department of the Interior, states in section 4 that the Minister of the Interior shall have the control and management of the affairs of the Northwest Territories and of the Yukon territory. I think that is wide enough to cover it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is because I doubt whether or not that is wide enough that I brought up this matter, and I understand it was for that reason that the section was put in its present form in 1924. In that year subsection 2 of section 4 was added to meet some doubts which arose over the very point the minister has just brought up.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): What is the object of the change; why transfer the control of the Eskimos from the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories. The Commissioner of the Northwest Territories is the Deputy Minister of the Department of the Interior; both the deputy minister and the minister have their offices in Ottawa, and it seems to me that the Department of Indian Affairs is the proper branch to have control of the Eskimos.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Eskimo question covers a much wider territory than is covered by the Indian question. The Eskimos are all along Coronation gulf and are over in Baffin land, in which country there are no Indians; the Eskimos are found also away to the north on Melville island. This embraces a completely northern territory, in which we have the officers of the Northwest Territories council and of the mounted police, and up to the present time we have found it much more convenient and advantageous to handle the matter in this way. The officers of the Northwest Territories branch and of the mounted police at present are looking after the Eskimos. The officers of the Indian department, while they go down the Mackenzie river, only come in contact with the Eskimos who come to Aklavik on the most westerly side of Coronation gulf. At the present moment all the administration given to the Eskimos is given by the officers of the Northwest Territories and by the mounted police who work very closely together.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Are any schools being conducted for the education of the Eskimos?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): For instance, in the duties of the franchise?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed about this franchise business. That is a matter which can be discussed thoroughly when the bill is introduced to add this territory to the Yukon.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the minister to say that schools similar to the Indian schools will be inaugurated for the Eskimos.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Anglican church has been working among the Eskimos for many years.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is a private work.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. The hon. member will understand that this is a very difficult problem with the tribes moving about as they do, but we have given some thought to the establishment of permanent schools such as we have now for Indian education.

Mr. ADSHEAD: With regard to the Indian schools; what class of teacher is provided, and is any religious instruction given?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Undoubtedly there is religious instruction given in the schools. About 51 per cent of the work carried on by the boarding schools is in the hands of the Oblate order, and the sisters of that order do the teaching. Anglican schools are conducted in the same manner, except that the men and women are hired by the church. The Presbyterian, and formerly the Methodist schools were carried on in the same way, and naturally there is religious instruction given. The curriculum is governed by the provincial laws.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do I understand that public funds are being expended for religious instruction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I would not say that public funds are being voted for that purpose. The grants are made on the understanding that the schools will be conducted according to the provincial laws, but it would be absolutely wrong to say that no religious instruction is given.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Public grants are made for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They receive the grants for the purpose of educating the children, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has put his finger upon the only contention which we are making at the moment in connection with this matter. He has stated that the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories is not a minister responsible to this house nor to the country, he is a deputy minister who is a paid official of the crown. A minister has responsibility to one or either of the houses of parliament, and inasmuch as in 1924 it was thought desirable that a responsible minister should be charged with the obligation of administering the affairs of the Eskimos, it would seem to me that some designation would be desirable, which would continue the sense of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. CANNON: Previously the Indian Act stated who was responsible for the Eskimos, but we have now an order in council instead of an act of parliament, and my hon. friend has doubts as to whether or not the act covering the Department of the Interior is wide enough.

Mr. BENNETT: It was thought it was not in 1924, and it was thought desirable to make it clear that a minister in either house of parliament should be the person responsible for the administration, or shall I say the minister in charge rather than the administrator, because there is a clear distinction between administration and ministerial responsibility.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is my intention to ask for an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act. All we are asking here is merely the repealing of what we did in 1927 in regard to the Indian Act.

Mr. BENNETT: This would be the act in which it would appear because they are wards of the nation. After all, the Indian Act is merely a code for dealing with the wards of the nation. They are called Indians in one instance, and Eskimos in another, both aborigines of this country. They are both wards of the nation and they are both covered by the Indian Act, which is a code only to deal with the conduct of the business of the wards of the nation as between the wards and the state. That is the reason I am drawing this point to the attention of the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend's convention were right, all that would be necessary to be done would be to add to the subsection that the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be repealed and that the control be placed under the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. BENNETT: Except that it is not usual to deal with a statute in that way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I confess that my hon. friend has confused me. I would consider that the Northwest Territories Act would have to be amended. If my hon. friend would allow this section to stand, we will look into it.

Mr. BENNETT: I desired to make it clear to my hon. friend, as it is a legal matter. Subsection 2 says:

> The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall have charge of Eskimo affairs.

Instead of a minister we have now an officer, and if it is desired to follow the principle of ministerial responsibility, then there should be a substitution.

Section stands.

On section 2—Annuities and interest applied to maintenance.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a very drastic change.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It merely gives us the right to transfer the moneys set aside. The present subsection reads:

> The superintendent general may apply the whole or any part of the annuities and interest moneys of Indian children attending an industrial or boarding school to the maintenance of such school or to the maintenance of the children themselves.

It is merely widening the powers. The annuities and interest moneys of Indian children attending industrial or boarding schools are not required for and not applied to the maintenance of such schools, and the provision for such application is eliminated in the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister realizes the seriousness of the situation. In four or five lines he changes a whole principle in connection with the appropriation of public money. Under the section as it existed before, a school was to be maintained and public funds went to maintain the school. This will enable the department to farm them out, a most pernicious practice.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: To pay somebody for them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I explain the difficulty? In the last five years, finding that those boarding schools particularly were in great difficulties financially, we have taken over the schools and their equipment in their entirety and the government have become responsible for them. There is no further charge upon the pupils, the Indians or anyone else for the maintenance of those schools. The teaching of course is still undertaken by the churches, and per capita grants made to assist in the tuition. All we are trying to do is to make applicable to the teaching the annuities that formerly were applied to the maintenance of those schools, sometimes to the construction of them, of course always, I will admit, largely under the control of the tribes themselves.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are the Indians consulted as to the religion they want their children to be taught?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Indians are always consulted. Seldom if ever do we take a child from an Indian family, unless the family are leading a vicious life, and place it in a school in opposition to their wishes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are they consulted as to the kind of religion they want their children taught ?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Always.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask whether a situation like this would not obtain: if some piece of Indian territory or reserve is needed for a public purpose such as a railway, the consent of the band has to be obtained. They are paid so much of the sum, I think it is 50 per cent, in cash and the balance is put into their fund. There is always great difficulty in getting the Indians to sign because they say—"What is the use of our signing? We get only 50 per cent and the other 50 per cent you take and keep. You use it for relief; now you are using it for schools." The government is going to make it more difficult to get Indians to agree to this sort of thing. The interest on the money has been used to pay for relief and the department pays for relief in any case. The next time the Indians are asked to give up land, they will say: "What is the use? They are going to take half of our money and use it for themselves." That is the way the Indian will look at the matter and I must say there is a good deal of truth in it.

Mr. SMOKE: This section and a number of subsequent sections seem to have general application to all Indians throughout the Dominion of Canada. In my constituency and in that of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Senn) there is what is ordinarily called an Indian reserve. It is not really an Indian reserve such as those existing in other parts of the country because the land upon which these Indians live was ceded to them by King George III in the latter part of the eighteenth century. These Indians were not native Canadian Indians; they were New York Indians or Indians from the other side of the line who took the part of the British crown in the revolutionary war and when Britain lost that war they were granted by Governor Haldimand of Canada the right to come over here, take six miles wide on either side of the Grand river from mouth to source and occupy it in the same way as they occupied lands over in New York state. That was a treaty. From that day to this they have had a certain measure of self-government recognized by every authority. It is true that their measure of self-government has been encroached upon from time to time by the Dominion parliament and that there has been considerable dissatisfaction amongst these Indians on that account. The Indians of the Six Nations are as civilized as the white men around them. They follow our way of life. They have some peculiar customs of their own, traditional customs, to which they are greatly attached. They do not like their rights to be encroached upon. I would ask the Minister of the Interior whether the Six Nations Indian council, which has charge of the administration of affairs of that band, have been consulted with regard to this legislation, and whether their approval has been obtained.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have not, because I do not see any reason for consulting the Six Nations Indians or any other band of Indians unless the legislation is going to interfere with their administration. The question of education is not one in regard to which we have been consulting the Indians. We have been endeavouring to have the Indian Act amended so as to give the Indian child the same class of education that he would receive were he attending a public school in the province in which he is located. Moreover, the government of Canada are providing all the money; they are building the schools; they are maintaining them; they are giving grants for the teaching and so far as I know, outside of the annuities that are paid under treaty, which annuities are used for educational purposes, the Indians are given all those privileges which, if I may say so frankly, their white brothers do not enjoy without paying for. I am of course not making any complaint in that regard. The Six Nations Indians are not treated differently from any other band.

Mr. SMOKE: I maintain that they should be treated differently because they are in a different class. The Indians elsewhere in the country formerly inhabited the whole country and as time went on reserves were set aside for them. This was not a reserve set aside for Indians; this was a parcel of land ceded to them and their method of government was conceded to them. They are in an entirely different position from that of other Indians in Canada; they are in a class by themselves. I wish the Minister of the Interior and indeed, every hon. member, would make a study of the history of the Six Nations Indians. It is very little known. They have in this country, as they believe and as I believe, rights which are not recognized, and when legislation is introduced affecting the rights of the Six Nations Indians, they should be consulted because they have a council which has control of the administration of their own affairs. I think the consideration of this bill ought to be deferred until it has been submitted to them and approved at least by the members of the council.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If that method were adopted we would have a very difficult time passing any legislation for the control and benefit of Indians. The Six Nations Indians are consulted on all matters that affect them personally, just as is the case with every other band. They are getting the same class of education, the same assistance from the government. I am not going to enter into an argument this afternoon with my hon. friend about the status of the Six Nations Indians although I do not agree with him at all. I simply say that they get exactly the same treatment under the Indian Act as any other Indian band in Canada receives. If my hon. friend contends that the Six Nations Indians have a right to be consulted about any amendment to the act and none of the other tribes has that right, I cannot agree with him. I want to say frankly to my hon. friend that these few amendments are all in the interests of the Indian and Indian education, and for the betterment of the social welfare of the Indians, and if they have to be delayed until all the Indian tribes and their councils are consulted, there will never be any legislation pass this house.

Mr. SMOKE: The minister does not get my point at all. It is only the Six Nations Indians that occupy that peculiar position. All the other Indians in the country were natives of this country as far back as we can go, but that is not the case with the Six Nations Indians. They came here under a treaty, and I do think that, as they have a council which deals with the administration of their own affairs, they ought to be consulted with regard to any legislation proposed by this parliament.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Under the section as it stands the Superintendent General can apply the whole or any part of the interest moneys of Indian children attending an industrial or boarding school to the maintenance of such school or to the maintenance of the children themselves. That is, it is optional with the superintendent general to apply the money to the maintenance either of the school or of the children. By the proposed amendment the minister is reducing his own powers; he is preventing himself from devoting that money to the maintenance of the school. Cases might arise where it would be desirable to devote part of the money to the maintenance of the school. What is the specific object in curtailing the minister's power in that respect?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think that there is really very much need for the amendment, but the reason for it is that we no longer require these moneys for the maintenance of the schools because we have undertaken their construction and maintenance as government institutions for the religious organizations that are carrying on the teaching. That is not true with respect to the day schools, but a great number of them have been constructed by the government. The boarding schools, however, where the pupils are brought and kept for a period each year under the control of the principal of the school, are all now constructed and maintained by the government.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is the government running the boarding schools?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We construct and maintain them.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): And the day schools?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We furnish them, but are not responsible for their whole maintenance.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is the government actually conducting these boarding schools?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, in the sense that we build and equip the schools, but the churches then take control of them, and we give them a per capita grant for each child. Formerly the churches built the schools and were doing practically all the work.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is that per capita grant sufficient to pay all the teachers' salaries?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I doubt if it would be. It is a pretty expensive proposition carrying on a school in these northern territories. I could not answer that question definitely.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do the churches contribute something?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The churches have been contributing very generously for Indian work.

Mr. COOTE: Is it not a fact that the main purpose of that per capita grant is to provide for the maintenance of the child, for its food and clothing?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: So far as I am concerned I think that this particular amendment is quite in order. In my opinion the old act gave the minister more power than he should have had in fairness to the Indian.

Mr. NEILL: I quite agree with the last speaker. I would go a little further and take this section out altogether. Why should the minister have power to take somebody else's money—for that is what it really comes to—and apply it against the Indian's will to some object which the government believes for the good of the child? We made a deal with the Indians. I am speaking more particularly of British Columbia, where I was agent for ten years, and I am familiar with the workings of the Indian mind. We agreed to educate them, to take care of their sick and destitue, and to give them a certain amount of medical relief. That was the understood bargain. Then we gave them a life interest in certain reserves. It is a little doubtful what their ultimate destination is, but the reserves may be used by the Indians as long as they like. On occasion the Indian has to sign away a piece of his territory, and what does he get in return? A sum of money, say $5,000. It is often necessary to get the Indian's consent, and now that he is becoming educated it is becoming more and more difficult to get him to sign away his land. Of that $5,000, $2,500 in cash goes to the members of the band, and the other $2,500 is put into a fund which accumulates and draws interest, I think, at 3 per cent. Then this is what I object to. From time to time there are relief bills incurred by the Indian agent, and the Indian department takes that accumulated interest fund and uses it for paying those relief bills. If the Indians had not given their consent to their property being taken those relief bills would have been paid just the same and to the same extent. The Indian begins to find out these things and says: What is the use of signing away our land, because we get only half of what we sell it for anyway, and the rest goes into a fund out of which bills are paid that would have been paid by the government in any case. I had understood that this money was applied only to relief. It is applied now, I find, to maintaining the children. We made a bargain with the Indians, and we should live up to it, and not take this circuitous means of taking away a piece of his land. It is becoming increasingly difficult to get the Indians to sign. I could give the names and dates of cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Why change it at all? As the act now stands you can use the money for rebuilding the school or maintaining the children.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I could have saved myself a good deal of discussion if I had left the clause alone. The only reason for this amendment is that the officials of the department desired to have it in view of the fact that we are now assuming full responsibility for the building and equipping of the schools.

Mr. BENNETT: But you do not operate the school. You hand it over to somebody else, and since you do that, why deprive yourself of the discretion you now have in case you want to operate the school yourself? That is what I cannot understand.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Indian education is fairly well defined. It is given over to the churches which have been carrying on this work for generations. Our assistance is now to a large extent a matter of providing buildings and equipment, together with a per capita grant for each child, which goes equally to all the Christian churches engaged in this work. May I say in reply to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that it took no small sum of money to build and equip all these schools, and it is going to cost a lot of money in the future. If a child who is attending this school is in receipt of an annuity, and is provided with an education and clothing and transportation to and from home, surely it is not too much to ask that you have the authority to apply towards that service such portion of the annuity as that child would have in any case. My hon. friend (Mr. Neill) has in mind another matter, not education. He has in mind the disposition of interest on money derived from the sale of Indian lands—sales made sometimes against the advice, if I may put it that way, of the Indian council themselves.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course the Indian council never want to spend money on any object that might bring them some benefit unless they are going to see the benefit come directly to themselves. My hon. friend makes the statement that Indian debts could be paid under this section.

Mr. NEILL: No, not Indian debts; Indian department debts. You come along and take away the moneys they have accumulated in lieu of their land; that is just what you are taking. If you had confined the amendment to annuities I would not have had the same ground for complaint; but it says "annuities and interest moneys." "Interest moneys" would cover the case of a band that has two or three thousand dollars, on which interest has accumulated: you use the interest to pay relief bills which you are obligated under the law to pay in any case. It applies equally to schooling; the argument is the same.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend will admit that if we have to incur expenditure for the relief of Indians—and, as my hon. friend knows, we cannot take the funds of another band and apply them to relieve the band in distress—this is reasonable. We are dealing only with the money standing to the credit of the band which for the time being is in need of relief. I think we are entitled to take that money to assist the band.

Mr. NEILL: No. That is exactly the point that I do not think I have been able to get the minister to see. Now we have arrived at the point of divergence. He says it is quite right to take the funds of the band to pay for their relief. On the face of it it seems so. But this money is something which has been exchanged in lieu of their land. As one Indian said to me, "It is all the same as if you took a piece of our land, because you are going to pay the relief whether we have a fund or not." You have obligated yourselves to do that. You get in exchange for the Indians' land a sum of money, and you propose to pay your Indian department obligations out of that money. At once the Indians will say, "Well, we have been tricked. We signed for the transfer, but we will never sign for another."

Mr. COOTE: What is the source of these annuities? This information might help to clear up the point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Strictly speaking annuities are moneys we have agreed to pay per capita annually for all time to the Indians in exchange for ceding their right to a very large territory. That is the source of annuities in one sense of the word. But my hon. friend is quite right here—there is an addition of the words "interest moneys." Of course those annuities are on a per capita basis, all the members of the band are participants. They are left with their reserve plus their annuities. That is, a certain territory is set aside upon which the Indians are located, and this territory is known as the reserve of that particular band. They have given up their right to all the surrounding territory for the annuities and this particular reserve. Now, the interest that my hon. friend speaks about is the result of further sales of their reserve.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The interest accrues on the capital amount received from the sale of a particular portion of the reserve. Hence my hon. friend argues that if the Indians of that band find themselves in distress, the interest fund should not be used by the government to alleviate their distress; rather the government should find money from the revenues of the crown for that purpose and leave the interest fund intact. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot agree with him in that respect.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will this section apply to the Six Nations Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have applied the Indian Act in its entirety to the Six Nations Indians.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then I agree with the member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) that the Six Nations Indians should be given special consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would my hon. friend suggest taking them out from the jurisdiction of the Indian Act altogether and allowing them to be Canadian citizens in the full sense of the word?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister pointed out that Indian legislation covers every Indian in Canada. I would point out that the Six Nations Indians have a different status altogether from other Indian tribes. I agree with the member for Brant that the legislation should refer to specific bands, not to every Indian with whom you make a treaty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is all right, we have different views.

Mr. COOTE: Is an annuity what is commonly called treaty money?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Then I agree with my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I do not think treaty money should be used for education. That is one of the treaty obligations of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite true of recent treaties, but there are considerable differences in the treaties made with the various Indian tribes with respect to what may or may not be done.

Mr. COOTE: I understand the educational provisions of the Indian Act are compulsory.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: They were put in the act not because of any treaty obligations. We are obligated to pay them treaty money or annuities, and it does seem to me that this proposed legislation might very well be considered by the Indian as a violation of his treaty, if we deliberately take his treaty money or annuity to pay for the care of his children in school.

Section agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: On division.

On section 3—Children from seven to sixteen to attend school.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This, Mr. Chairman, is merely extending the school age one year.

Mr. COOTE: Two years ago I was interviewed by a number of chiefs of the Blood Indian reserve. They complained that the children were taken from them at too young an age. They think the children should be left with them for another two years. As I understand it, at the age of seven years they are placed in these boarding schools, and can return to their parents only once a year unless the consent of the principal of the school is given to their going home oftener. A child taken from home at the early age of seven years and kept at boarding school until sixteen might scarcely know his parents when he returned home. That is the view of the Indians. It seems to me there is a good deal of reason in their contention. I bring it to the attention of the minister now that this section is being changed. I notice the new section provides:

> that where it has been made to appear to the satisfaction of the superintendent general that it would be detrimental to any particular Indian child to have it discharged from school on attaining the full age of sixteen years, the superintendent general may direct that such child be detained at school for such further period as may seem to be advisable, but not beyond the full age of eighteen years, and in such case the provisions of this section with respect to truancy shall apply to such child and its parents, guardians or persons with whom such child resides during such further period of school attendance.

The explanation of that is given on the next page. I must agree that the purpose of this amendment seems to indicate a step in the right direction, namely the safeguarding of those Indian children who have been in boarding schools until they have reached the age of sixteen. At the expiration of their school term there is no proper home to which they may go. I think, in general, this criticism might be levelled at our educational policy. Having kept them in our schools and separated them from their parents from the ages of seven to sixteen, we turn them loose from school and send them back to the Indian reserves. As I see the system, viewing it from the outside, we attempt to civilize the Indian child, and to make a white boy of an Indian boy. When he has reached the age of sixteen we send him back to the Indian reserve, with no provision for him and very little possibility that he will continue to live in the atmosphere in which he has been brought up in the school. I think our effort is largely thrown away.

I was impressed with an article which appeared in the August, 1929, issue of the Literary Digest. It refers to the American Indian, but to some extent I think it would apply to the Indians of Canada and their relation to our educational policy. I shall read one or two sentences from this article:

> Reversion to the blanket and a primitive way of living is said to be the tragic lot of the educated young Indian. It has been the policy of the government, we are told, to send the young Indian back to the reservation on the theory that he would leaven the whole lump; but experience shows, instead, that the returned student is forced by custom and example to drop all that he has learned, and to shed his civilization with his white man's clothes.

It would be unfair to say that that applies entirely, in our own country; but, very often it does apply. There are instances given which appear in the explanatory notes on the opposite page of this amendment to the Indian Act. The note to which I have reference says:

> As an instance, an Indian whose wife was dead and who was eking out an existence begging in the streets of a city demanded the release of his daughter from a residential school at the expiration of school age, which was refused.

In my opinion, the refusal was quite proper. Under the amendment the principal of the school may keep the child two years longer, but if the father is still desirous of taking her away when she reaches the age of eighteen, she is not in a much better position. True, she is older, but what future is there for that young child upon which we have spent so much money? We have given her religious and scholastic education; we have protected and sheltered her from the effects of her Indian environment from the time she was seven until she reached the age of eighteen. When she is turned loose from the industrial or boarding school, however, what will become of her; what is becoming of the Indian boys and girls we are turning out to-day?

I think our educational system is falling down in that it does not provide some means whereby these children upon whom we have spent so much money can go on living in what we term a civilized way, rather than returning to the Indian way. From this statement I do not wish to leave the impression that I begrudge one cent of the money spent to educate the Indian children. We have kept them in the schools from the time they were seven years old, during which time they have been taught subjects that would not enable them to earn their own living in the way an Indian is supposed to live. They are not fitted for the life of an Indian by the training they receive in our school; we have trained them in a direction other than that. Yet in the great majority of cases when they leave our schools at the age of fifteen of sixteen they go right back to the reserves; there does not seem to be anything else for them to do. The result is, as this writer whose words I have read to you has said, that in a few days the blanket of civilization with which we have clothed them through all these years is stripped from them. In some cases they go back and live in wigwams, and while we may have taught them the use of the toothbrush and the bathtub, such articles of toilet are not available after they leave school. One might imagine that the young Indian would have to withstand ridicule from his Indian friends if he persisted in the use of the toothbrush upon his return to the wigwam. I know the minister is interested, and I want to have the interest of the whole house in the problem of dealing with the Indians from the time they leave the industrial school. I think a start should be made by establishing an employment agency in the industrial school, so that before the children are allowed to leave, the authorities might endeavour to find the proper places in which to put the young Indian boys and girls. During the time such employment was sought, these children could remain in the schools. It is a difficult problem, but one which in fairness to the Indians and to ourselves we should endeavour to solve. We should see that these children are given a chance to live in the way we have taught them during their term in the industrial schools. If such is not done, I think we will be doing an injury to the Indians.

Mr. SMOKE: There are some points in the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat to which I must take exception. He has outlined conditions very different from those which exist in the Six Nations reserve at Brantford. Much of what he has said in connection with Indians with whom he is familiar do not apply to the tribe to which I have reference. Many of the Six Nations Indians are good farmers. I do not object to the schooling or education they receive, nor do I think that the education they get on the reserve will spoil them when it is necessary for them to go back to help on their fathers' farms. They are real farmers in the counties of Brant and Haldimand; they are not nomadic tribes. I just want to dissociate myself and the Six Nations Indians from the class referred to by the last speaker.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think the Six Nations Indians might be taken as a pretty fair criterion of what can be accomplished with all our plains Indians. One must remember that in the northwest and in the prairie provinces it is only a few years since all the Indians were hunting for a livelihood, and it is rather a difficult thing to change their mode of living almost over night. However, having visited the Six Nations Indians on a number of occasions I came to the conclusion that the Indians could be taught to be good agriculturists. You can scarcely tell when you are on or off that reserve, so far as farming methods are concerned; the Indian is almost as good as the white man there. On the File Hills reservation in Saskatchewan and on the Blood Indian reserve in Alberta we have been trying the experiment of providing some assistance for those young people who will take up agriculture, in order to permit them to construct houses, get married and take up farming operations on the reserve, and I think this is working out fairly satisfactory.

However, I must say frankly that when you get off the plains and into the wooded areas all over Canada, it is most difficult to know what to do with these young boys and girls. The churches do frequently take them and endeavour to give them secondary education. Many of them are very bright and intelligent; some of them take technical training and do well, but I must admit that we cannot find occupations of that character for very many pupils from the wooded areas. Naturally they are somewhat handicapped as young men and women going in among their white brothers and sisters in the ordinary vocations which are open to them. I have been giving that matter very serious thought in the hope that we might establish some scheme that would take care of these boys and girls when they leave the schools, give them training that would enable them to continue to follow the good influences to which they were subjected at the schools, and eventually—although one hardly dare say this —become enfranchised citizens in the real sense of the word and take upon themselves the full responsibilities of citizenship. However, I am not able at the present time to offer any concrete solution of that problem; I can only say that we are giving it very serious consideration.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to know whether many of these Indians who have gone to school until the age of seventeen or eighteen have asked to be emancipated in order to enjoy the civil rights of the white people of this country?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, an ever-increasing number of the Indians have been asking for enfranchisement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at that age.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That would be later in life?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I thought the hon. member referred to the time they left the schools.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They could not be enfranchised until they became of age.

Mr. DUPUIS: What I was getting at was whether, through their education, the Indians were more desirous of enjoying the civil rights of the country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think I can answer that in one word; yes.

Mr. COOTE: Has the department ever considered the possibility or advisability of picking out some of the more promising young Indians, which might be done on the recommendation of the teachers in the school, and giving them further education, perhaps in the technical schools? Would it not be possible to spend a little more money and send some of these young men to the technical schools in their own province, after which they might secure work on their own reserves or perhaps in adjacent towns?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, we have been giving that matter consideration.

Mr. NEILL: I think in justice to the department I should go on record as being of opinion that the department is doing a good and satisfactory work in teaching these children. Something was said about the boarding schools. For many years I saw the work of the day schools on the reserves, and I must say that the department has shown wisdom in practically abandoning those schools. They were utterly useless; the Indians moved around so much that by the time the teacher got a child at one fishing station and gave him a few lessons, the family moved away and the children learned practically nothing. They forgot what little they had been taught before the teachers got hold of them again for another few days. In the boarding schools, however, they are kept from the time they are about seven years of age until they are sixteen. They get home for a month or so in the summer time and they are not subject to any more restrictions than are imposed upon white children in other boarding schools.

The condition to which my hon. friend referred in quoting from the Literary Digest was true, perhaps, of what you might call the first generation of educated Indians. So far as we could judge, they went back to the dirty, filthy conditions under which their fathers and mothers lived, but there was some difference, and when you came to the children of those people you found a very marked difference. Now when these children leave the schools they go back to homes where the conditions approximate those which obtained in the schools. In the old days, when they got a little bit advanced they would buy some white man's furniture; they would put it in the front room, where there was a board floor, and then they would live in the woodshed where there was a dirt floor and under all conditions which had prevailed during the time of their ancestors. The second generation, however, has progressed beyond that stage; they have stoves, gramaphones, sewing machines and all the rest of it, and when these children go out into the world they are much more able to compete with white people. Their parents realize that. In the old days it was necessary to use compulsion in order to get these people to send their children to school, but now they are anxious to do so because they know the children must learn the white man's language in order to prosper.

It has been suggested that they should be given some advanced education along technical lines. Our industrial schools do give them that education; they are taught such trades as shoemaking and carpentering, and every industrial school must have at least one technical instructor. Beyond that I would not go. After all, our subject is to make these people good Indians, and if we accomplish that object we are doing all that is required. In the coast district of British Columbia these children take up the occupations of their parents; they carry on fishing or work in canneries, and they are much better equipped to do that, and receive higher wages and live under greatly improved conditions, in consequence of the education they receive. I think the amendments suggested here are to the advantage of the Indians themselves.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister tell us just how long these Indians are kept in the boarding schools and what vacations they get each year?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot give my hon. friend the period of vacation, but we try to give them an annual holiday in order to permit them to visit their parents.

Mr. NEILL: They get one month each year, in addition to a short holiday at Christmas.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—removal of cattle.

Mr. FRASER: What is the explanation of section 4?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It simply provides that in all cases the cattle either in charge of or owned by the individual will not be disposed of without the consent of the agent. Later on this is made a little more emphatic.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—produce unlawfully possessed.

Mr. COOTE: I should like the minister to make an explanation, which would apply to all these sections, as to why these changes are being made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps I might take section 42 as an example. The old section read:

> If any such grain or root crops, or other produce as aforesaid, are unlawfully in the possession of any person within the intent and meaning of this part, or of any regulations made by the governor in council under this part, any person acting under the authority, either general or special, of the superintendent general, may, with such assistance in that behalf as he thinks necessary, seize and take possession of the same; and he shall deal therewith as the superintendent general, or any officer or person thereunto by him authorized, directs.

The repealed section provided that the superintendent general might order seizure of grain or root crops, or other produce unlawfully in the possession of any person; the amendment extends the provision to include the seizure of cattle or other animals. Our greatest difficulty is in the preventing of trafficking with the Indian where actual possession of his crop is obtained without the knowledge of the agent. In nine cases out of ten the Indian makes a very improvident deal. It is not our desire to be arbitrary but rather to protect the interests of the Indian himself. We have pretty wide powers in this respect, but once in a while a shrewd individual will make a deal with an Indian and will remove the material from the reserve. We want to be in a position to follow that up and get possession of the Indian's property.

Mr. COOTE: Has not the agent the power to prevent the sale of any goods raised on the reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but there is some doubt of our control after those goods have been removed from the reserve.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—farms on Indian reserves.

Mr. SMOKE: Does the minister contemplate applying this section to the Six Nations Indians, because they are farmers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. SMOKE: Why make laws applying to them?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have not been in the habit of eliminating the Six Nations Indians from the Indian Act. It might as well be said that it is not necessary to apply the educational clause to those Indians, and yet they want that clause applied. This section would allow us to establish farms, mostly in the western provinces. We have one farm at the present time which was organized during the period of the war when there was a need for greater production, and that farm has been kept in operation for the purposes of providing seed. Our difficulty has been that while the accounts are audited by the Auditor General we have to return into the general revenue whatever receipts may be obtained and then ask for a vote from supply for the purpose of carrying on. We are asking that the accounts continue to be audited by the Auditor General but that we be given permission to use the money for the operation of the farm. We accumulated a very considerable amount in reserve and we asked the permission of parliament to use some of it for the purpose of establishing these young people upon farms, but what we are asking now is simply that we be allowed to use this money as a revolving fund for the purpose of carrying on the farm.

Mr. FRASER: How far does the minister expect this section will go? Will he be permitted to go upon any Indian reserve, in British Columbia for instance, and hire men to instruct the Indians who may be upon that particular reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. FRASER: The section would indicate a very wide power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We ask only for the power to use the moneys derived from this farm, which will be operated by the agent and the farm instructor. This farm is located near Regina and no additional officers will be required for the operation.

Mr. FRASER: It would look to me as though you could go upon any Indian reserve and hire any person to give instructions to the Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will understand that if we are to operate this farm we must hire Indians altogether to do the work. Those Indians expect to be paid every night and it would be very convenient to have this farm operated as is any other farm, that we be permitted to utilize the receipts in order to carry on the ordinary farm work. The accounts would continue to be audited by the Auditor General; I am not suggesting any departure in that connection.

On section 9—amusements on the Sabbath.

Mr. SMOKE: The Six Nations Indians, as the term implies, are a group of tribes, some of the Indians being Christians and some pagans. These Indians are entitled to continue their customs, and they were given that privilege when they were brought to Canada by the British government in about the year 1780. I am not advocating a loose Sabbath or anything of that sort, but so far as the pagan Indians are concerned, they do not know what the Sabbath is, or at least they are not supposed to know. I am informed that in the township of Tuscarora, and in some of the adjoining townships, they have carried on sports on Sundays. I have not heard of any disturbance being created, and I would like to know if the government has received any complaints from the Indian council in that regard. I can quite understand the minister's anxiety to pass legislation of this kind, but these people are very sensitive and I do not think there should be any undue interference with what they consider to be their just rights and privileges.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are asking that we be given some control over games conducted on the reserve, which games are quite frequently organized by other than the Indians themselves.

Mr. SMOKE: Has the minister received any complaints?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have received very strong complaints against the Six Nations Indians, although not lately.

Mr. SMOKE: By the Indians themselves?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, by the Christian Indians who reside upon the reserve.

Mr. SMOKE: That does not apply at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Collections were made at the games, and liquor was distributed and the Indians became intoxicated. I do not think my hon. friend can deny that as I have the direct evidence of the police themselves.

Mr. SMOKE: I am not denying it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This legislation is not aimed at the Six Nations Indians. I am asking simply that we be given some control so that such conditions will not exist at these games. To be quite frank, I do not think there is any more harm in an Indian playing baseball on Sunday than there is in a white man playing golf, and if it is left to my discretion I would not say that I would stop these games. I am going to stop the bringing of liquor there.

Mr. SMOKE: That is not referred to in the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, but that is the purpose of having some control. We wish simply to have control of some of the vicious practices that grow up around those games, not with the desire to stop them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I entirely agree with the criticism of the hon. member for Brant. I think one of the great weaknesses of what we call our modern civilization is that we are in many cases attempting to thrust down the throats of many citizens of the country Christianity by law. You cannot do that; you cannot make people Christian by law, nor can you make them observe the Sabbath in accordance with the tenets of the Lord's Day Alliance.

Mr. MANION: Religion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think my hon. friend corrects me properly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope my hon. friend is not going to argue that the pagan religion is the only effective one for the Indians.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): While I agree that the minister will administer the act fairly, what about those who have charge of the administration of it, those who are under him, those who are out there and who may be subject to the ultra moral influences of some religious organization? Frankly I have no objection to healthy young men and women playing innocent, good games on the Sabbath, if you like, after they have gone to church, if they are churchgoers; but I cannot for the life of me agree to a policy of restricting youth especially either to long walks or to complete silence within their homes. We might as well go back to Scotland in some of the worst days in its history if we are going to adopt a policy of that kind. I do not think it should be applied to the Indians especially when we who are so particularly moral in respect to observance of the Sabbath, as the minister has indicated, sometimes make a good deal of money and very often have a very hectic and unpleasant time playing golf on Sundays. I have known perfectly good Christian gentlemen, after church or sometimes without going to church, quite frequently to go out and put up a substantial bet on every hole they played. It is all right for them to do that, but not for an Indian to play a game of baseball. As long as the minister is personally supervising the interpretation of the act I believe it is safe to leave it in his hands, but I do not think it is safe to leave it in the act, because we are quite certain the minister will not personally administer the act; it will be left in the hands of a local agent or supervisor.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—certificate of analyst to be accepted as prima facie evidence.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister kindly advise the committee just what is the need of clauses 14 and 15? Have there been recent occurrences which make this necessary?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is really to bring our act into conformity with the provincial act. Clause 15 is drafted from the Alberta act so as to bring this act into conformity with the provincial legislation. I am told that it is working out very satisfactorily. I confess it looks a little drastic to accept a certificate as to the contents of a bottle of liquor, for example, without bringing a man into court, but I understand this has been done for the purpose of better enforcement of the law and that no serious complaint has arisen with respect to it. Liquor is one of the things with which we have a great deal of trouble on an Indian reserve and we want to bring the law into conformity at least with the law of the province.

Item agreed to.

On section 16—Indian wasting his time in a pool room.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give an explanation of this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend has visited Macleod he has got a full explanation. One of the difficulties we have in keeping the Indians farming in the communities where we are making some progress with them, is that they waste so much time loitering around the pool rooms in the towns, and if there is an agricultural fair within a hundred miles we have a most difficult time in keeping them at work on the reserve. It is true we have been guilty to some extent in allowing them to become part of the show at those agricultural fairs, and possibly we should not blame them too much for going, but if we have not some control—perhaps my hon. friend thinks this is drastic—we shall not be able to keep the young men particularly, and the old men as well, from engaging in games of chance within a pool room.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am convinced now that we are producing too much farm produce in any case, so why get so fussy about keeping the Indians at work? When we have to regulate how many hours they shall stay in a pool room, who is going to have the say as to the right number of hours? I suppose the white man's amount will be the correct number of hours, and then the Indians must go back to the farm. I think a section like that is ridiculous. It would be better if they never worked at all than to force them to do it. This will open the way for persecution. The same thing is true about the games; they are not to do this or that. Anybody who has ever taught children knows that the more not-to-do's you have, the worse it is for the children. I think these two clauses are unsound.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say is that I wish my hon. friend had the job of looking after the Indians. If she had, she would find that a lot of things that appear to be unsound are absolutely sound. I know at times the complaint is made that the Indians are treated too drastically, but one must bear in mind that the Dominion of Canada is spending a great deal of money on them.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is their country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is their own money.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Possibly that charge may be laid too, but hon. members do not want the Indians to remain in the condition in which they are to-day; they expect the department to show some progress with them. That is what we are endeavouring to bring about, and we are simply asking for authority to control a situation that is very serious from the standpoint of administration. There are two things that do more to injure the Indians than any others. One of them is liquor, and it is the worst influence in any community. If my hon. friend thinks an Indian can loiter around a pool room without coming into contact with liquor, all I can say is that she does not know the Indian as well as I do. The proper place for an Indian is on a reserve or in a school. Neither the white man nor the Indian gets much good out of his association with a pool room.

Miss MACPHAIL: If we are going to discuss what is the proper place for an Indian, then we should say at once that it would be to allow him to live his natural life. We have made that impossible. I do not want the impression to be gathered that I should like the Indian to have liquor or to be in a pool room, but by saying how long he is to remain in it and that he must get out at a certain time we are putting into the hands of some official a great deal of power which may be used in a very high-handed way. If the Indian race is a degenerate race, I am afraid that the whole effort is wasted. It may or may not be that a remnant of the race can be saved; I am not convinced one way or the other.

Mr. FRASER: You are imposing a penalty on the pool room proprietor for allowing an interdicted Indian to play pool. How is the pool room proprietor to know that the Indian is interdicted? Are you going to placard the Indian?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You do not placard an interdict for liquor.

Mr. COOTE: I did not ask for an explanation of this section with the idea of opposing it. I did hope that the minister would explain the first few lines of it. It seems to me it needs a little explanation, at least, to one who may not be familiar with the act. It says:

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Where it is made to appear in open court that any Indian, summoned before such court, by inordinate frequenting of poolroom either on or off an Indian reserve.

I wonder if there is any provision in the law for summoning an Indian because he frequents a pool room too much. That was the point that I thought needed explanation. While on my feet, let me say that no one regrets more than I do seeing these young Indians spending so much time around pool rooms. It is possibly because we have not completed our job of educating them, and have turned them loose from the schools without providing a place for them to go. For fear I may have been misunderstood, I want to say that I have visited quite a number of these industrial schools and have a great admiration for the men and women who are teaching in them. They are doing a fine work, the very best they can. My whole criticism is that our system does not go far enough. It does not carry the Indian up until he has reached the age of manhood or maturity. Perhaps the minister would make a very brief explanation of just how he is going to summon the Indian into court; and is there any act under which a judge can say that the Indian is spending an inordinate amount of time in the pool room?

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is inordinate?

An hon. MEMBER: Ten hours a day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend gets a pretty fair explanation from the wording of the clause itself. The act will make it an offence, not a criminal offence, for which you can summon the Indian to appear in court, and the magistrate will be the judge of what is inordinate. If the Indian is loitering away his time in a pool room to the extent that his family is suffering in consequence, the magistrate will be the one to decide what the penalty shall be. It is left entirely to his discretion.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, there is one phase of the application of this section to which I would direct the attention of the committee. In my province in the vicinity of the Blackfeet reservation the farmers are accustomed to hiring young Indians in the fall for harvest work and threshing. During the threshing if rain or snow interrupts operations the whole crew goes to town. There the men have only two places to resort to, the pool room and the beer parlour. This section would prohibit them from using the pool rooms. It looks to me as if it would put a premium on the use of beer parlours.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I know that is not the intention, but unless they sit on the steps of the hotel in cold weather, and of course they will not do that, they have only the two places to which I have referred to go to. Frankly, I think this section is going too far. I have no objection to the minister providing himself with ample powers to prevent abuse of their privileges by the Indians themselves, or for the protection of the family, or even of the tribe; but this section confers a power which will be exercised by some agent or local supervisor to determine what is the proper number of hours for an Indian to spend in a pool room—whether Tom Longcloak or Eagle Feather spent too much time there yesterday, and if either does the same to-day to report it to a magistrate, who shall forbid the owner of the pool room to allow the Indian to enter it again for a certain time. This may be all very well, but who is to determine the proper number of hours that the Indian may spend in the pool room—the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly not. Hon. gentlemen are getting excited about a situation that does not exist. A careful reading of the section will disclose the fact that the Indian must of necessity have neglected his family by staying in the pool room.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who is to determine "neglect"?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The magistrate.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But the magistrate would determine that only after complaint to him by somebody else.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is perfectly proper. The same thing would apply in the case of a drunken white man. The magistrate decides whether or not he should be put on what we used to call the Indian list; I do not know what it is called to-day. If Indians loiter to the extent of neglecting their duties to their families, they would be subject to this section. Surely that is ample protection for the Indians and some protection for the owner of the pool room. The owner of the pool room would be notified that in the opinion of the magistrate the Indians were spending too much time there to the detriment of their families. That is all.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Should not that provision apply to any Canadian citizen? He is supposed to know a good deal better than an Indian what he should do.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Especially a member of parliament.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Why should not the magistrate decide that James Smith is neglecting his family by resorting to the local pool rooms and prohibit him continuing that neglect?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He would, if someone laid a complaint against James Smith. For instance, if a man is using so much liquor that he is neglecting his family, he can always be haled into court.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But why introduce this section?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Indian Act applies to Indians.

Mr. CAHILL: Before the bill leaves the committee I wish to ask the minister a question pertaining to a reserve in my constituency. In the township of Nedellia in the county of Temiskaming there is a reserve occupied by a small number of Indians. It is two miles across by six miles long and in the centre of a well-settled district. The settlers are very anxious to have the reserve removed—if possible—of course, always with the intention of reimbursing the Indians for the land they may abandon. The settlers desire this because the Indians are not making any roads through the reserve, and therefore, it is necessary to travel considerable distances to get to and from town or church, which is very inconvenient for the settlers. I understand the matter has been before the minister on several occasions and I should like to know if he is making any progress towards its settlement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is one of many matters affecting Indian reserves in the province of Quebec that we are now considering with the provincial government. My hon. friend will remember that we got a settlement of these matters with the Ontario government, and the proceeds of the sale of the land is used for the benefit of the interested Indians in that province; but in the province of Quebec we have not yet reached a settlement. We are hoping to make a satisfactory arrangement that will enable us to clear up this matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Is a pool room the only place in respect of which an Indian would become liable to punishment if he frequented it too much? There are other ways in which he might waste his time, for instance, standing on the sidewalk or sitting under a tree. Are the latter things all right, and must he waste his time in a pool room to be arraigned?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think my hon. friend is serious.

Mr. IRVINE: I am.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would rather waste my time in a pool room than outside on a cold day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friends know full well that it is pretty difficult to keep an Indian working—

Mr. IRVINE: Or to keep anybody working.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —just a little more difficult than it is to keep the white man, unless we have provisions for restraining him to some extent. We do not wish to discipline him, because we have provided in this clause that a magistrate must deal with the case—not a superintendent general; not an agent. It may be done, however, by one or two magistrates in the district, and will have the same effect upon the owner of the pool room. There are already in the act a great many provisions for restraining the Indian and endeavouring to get him to obey the laws. This is one of the little difficulties, not provided for in the Indian Act, that we encounter from time to time, and I am asking for the amendment so that we may be able to lessen the difficulty. I do not claim for a moment that the white man has any more right to frequent a pool room than an Indian; that is not the point. But if the Indian persists in spending all his time there, as he frequently does, we want some means of restraining him. That is all we ask. May I add that I am informed that not a very large number of Indians need such restraint. After all, these restrictions are not for the general body of Indians, any more than our laws are for the general body of white men; they are for the Indians that we cannot control without special provision.

Mr. IRVINE: I object to it on the ground of the exception we take in regard to Indians. I do not think we ought to pass a law, even against Indians, which we would not dare to pass against white men.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to my hon. friend that if the white man loiters in a pool room to the detriment of his family he will find himself in trouble.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—control of public games on the Sabbath.

Mr. IRVINE: This is going even further. The aim of this section appears to be to control the Indian on the Sabbath day. May I ask the minister why these extremes are requested? What is his explanation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are simply adding to the powers of the council. I will read the powers that are within the control of the council, which is an elected body of the Indians themselves. This amendment affects section 185, subsection 1, revised statutes of Canada, 1927:

> The council may, by by-law, rule or regulation, approved and confirmed by the superintendent general provided that the religious denomination to which the teacher or teachers of the school or schools established on the reserve shall belong, shall be that of the majority of the Indians resident on the reserve; but the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority on the reserve may also have a separate school or schools, with the approval of and under regulations made by the governor in council.

Then they make regulations and by-laws in recpect to various things—health, order, disorderly conduct, subdivision of reserve, trespass, school houses, roads, public works, watercourses, removal of trespassers, et cetera. It is in regard to this latter subject to which section 17 of the new act refers. The section in the revised statutes referring to the removal of trespassers reads:

> The removal and punishment of persons trespassing upon the reserve or frequenting it for improper purposes—

This is under the control of the council. To that we add the provision outlined in section 17 which gives the council of the band the right to control or prohibit participation in sports, games, athletic tests or other such amusements on the Sabbath day.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It prohibits the Indians from engaging in sports on the Sabbath day?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. To that extent the council have control on the reserves. It is simply an additional power to the ones they already have, such as revenue, assessments, rates, payment of Indian's share on his default, appeals, et cetera. It is adding somewhat to the powers of the Indian council.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I note that at the side it says:

Serious complaints have been made with respect to the assembling of boisterous and undesirable crowds on Indian reserves—

May I ask who are the undesirable crowds?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Usually they are from the outside.

Mr. ADSHEAD: White men.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, white men.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And because the white men misbehave themselves you are going to prohibit the playing of baseball by the Indians on Sundays.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; it is not prohibitory unless the council says so.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But it is because of the bad conduct of white men.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And there may be other reasons.

Mr. SMOKE: Again I take exception to the remarks in connection with Indians generally. In most of the reserves throughout the country I fancy the Indians compose a homogeneous band; they all belong to one particular tribe. In the Six Nations reserve, situated near Brantford, there are six different Indian nationalities. I am not sure that I can name them all, but I can remember at last four of them, namely, the Onondagas, Cayugas, Tuscaroras and Mohawks—there are two others. There we find six separate nations, one or more of which is pagan. They have different ideas from those of Christian people, and I do not think it would be fair if the council of the Six Nations was allowed to legislate in matters of conscience in regard to the pagan members of the Six Nations band.

Mr. IRVINE: I was wondering if the Indians would be subjected to regulation if they took up the playing of golf. A great many of our distinguished citizens enjoy a game of golf on Sunday. I do not see why we should interfere with the Indian's Sunday golf, or any other game he chooses to indulge in; as a matter of fact, we ought to encourage him to play. I must express my approval of the remarks made by the previous speaker; it surely would not be fair for this parliament to pass legislation which would give the council the right to dictate against the thought and conscience of certain groups of Indians.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The intention here is simply to turn over a certain responsibility to a council of the reserve, the same as this government or a provincial government, would delegate to cities, towns and villages certain rights in respect to the regulation of their own territory. Surely we should be able to do that. We are taking nothing away from them, and if the majority of their people, as represented by their council, say they do not want a certain thing done on a certain reserve, certainly we should give them power to prohibit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is right. May I point out to my hon. friend that the Indian council is elected; it is a democratic institution and my hon. friend is strong for democratic institutions. In addition to the other regulating clauses under which the council operates, we are simply providing that this shall be within their power. They need not stop a baseball game on Sunday, if the council are in agreement. They act just as the council acts in any other municipality.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has each reserve a council?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, and if there are no councils this will not be effective, because these powers are given only to the councils.

Mr. BARBER: There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. Apparently the amendments before us tighten up the law to protect the Indian from the white man, which I think every hon. member will agree should be done. However, there are a number of us in the west who feel that some provision should be made for the protection of white people from the Indians. I refer particularly to a matter which has been presented to the government by several of the public bodies of our province; I refer to motor accidents. There have been several very bad accidents in our province caused by the reckless driving of Indians. A careful driver may go out on the road and be hit by a car driven by an Indian; his car may be badly damaged, but he has no chance of collecting damages. On the other hand, if he hits a car driven by an Indian and damages it, he must make good that damage. The resolutions which have been forwarded to the department by the good roads league, the board of trade, and other organizations, point out that under section 106 of the Indian Act an Indian has the right to sue for debts due him, or in respect of any tort or wrong inflicted upon him, or to compel the performance of contracts with him. No provision is made in the Indian Act whereby Indians can be sued for any wrong inflicted by them, and these resolutions have requested amendments to the Indian Act granting permission to an aggrieved person to sue an Indian for damages, or to compel them to assume the liability assumed by other users of the highway. I should like to get some expression from the minister as to whether consideration has been given this question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This introduces an entirely new feature, to which we will have to pay considerable attention. We have made laws in order to prevent an Indian from getting into difficulty with his creditors, but just how far we can go in making him liable to the civil actions to which my hon. friend has referred I am not prepared to say. There are cases where the Indian could pay damages, but I am afraid such cases are not very numerous. After all, the Indian is a ward of the government, and if damages were assessed against him I imagine it would become the responsibility of the government to pay those damages. However, I promise my hon. friend to give the question some thought. We have given it some attention, but it is a very difficult and knotty point.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 was allowed to stand.

On section 1—Eskimo affairs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition suggested that there should be some amendment replacing what is being taken away, but I would direct his attention to the fact that this subsection was added to the Indian Act. We could not very well put in the Indian Act a subsection stating that the Eskimos are under the Minister of the Interior. Prior to that amendment of 1924, they were under the Minister of the Interior, because they belong to the northwest. The statute concerning the Department of the Interior states that the Minister of the Interior has supervision over all the affairs of the Northwest Territories. I think if this subsection disappears the situation will be as it was before 1924. If there is any need of an amendment I will consider the matter with the Minister of the Interior, but the amendment will have to be made to some other act. I really think section 1 should carry as it is.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice has overlooked the fact that in 1924 this parliament brought the Eskimos under the provisions of the Indian Act, and thereby established the responsibility of a minister to the House of Commons for their affairs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that responsibility existed before that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Previously the Eskimos did not figure in the matter at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They were living in the Northwest Territories, surely?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it was not until about 1924 that the very serious condition of their affairs was drawn to the attention of this parliament and of the people of Canada. As a matter of fact, these people were starving, and it became essential that they should receive some attention, as wards of the nation. It was thought desirable then that they should be brought under ministerial responsibility; that was done and the minister mentioned was the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. As it now stands, we are repealing this section which the revisers of the statute put in the Indian Act, rightly or wrongly. They placed it as one of the subsections of an act dealing with Indians. We are now repealing that subsection and we have not made any head of government responsible to this parliament for the administration of the affairs of the Eskimos. If the amendment was properly made in 1924, presumably under the advice of my hon. friend, obviously its repeal with respect to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs will necessitate the naming of some official in his place to assume that ministerial responsibility.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But not necessarily in this act.

Mr. BENNETT: If it were desirable to place it in this act in the one instance it might be equally desirable to replace it in this act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This act relates only to the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but it does not relate any more to the Department of Indian Affairs to-day than it did in 1924, when parliament thought it desirable to place this amendment in the Indian Act. Now when you take away the responsibility of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, it would be logical to replace in the act the name of the official who is to assume responsibility. That is all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But surely my hon. friend realizes that it would look ludicrous to mention some other minister in the Indian Act, with regard to Eskimos. I think if it is necessary to make an amendment it would be necessary to amend the Department of the Interior Act, for instance, or the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We have before us a real situation in connection with the breaking up of the Department of the Interior, if one might so call it, and one has to exercise considerable care, I suggest, in order to see that the duties which are being discharged with respect to the Northwest Territories are not placed in the hands of new officials, for the purpose of creating new offices or continuing old ones. I am quite content to have the minister deal with it as he desires, but there is no ministerial responsibility, as it now stands with the repeal of that section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should think the amendment, if one is required, should be to the Northwest Territories Act, because the Eskimos will be under the provisions of that act.

MANITOBA BOUNDARY

EXTENSION IN NORTHWEST ANGLE INLET OF LAKE OF THE WOODS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 42, to provide for the extension of the boundary of the province of Manitoba in the northwest angle inlet of Lake of the Woods.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—boundaries extended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the imperial government any interest in this block of land as ordnance land or otherwise, and will it be necessary for the imperial government to ratify this agreement?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not think so. This two and a half acres is a plot of land covered by the indenture of the lake of the Woods where it crosses and recrosses the boundary between Manitoba and Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: This land belonged formerly to the United States.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It was supposed to, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The surveyors finally indicated that it belonged to Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: And as between Manitoba and Ontario it is to go to Manitoba?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the statute require ratification?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so because it came to Canada by a treaty ratified by His Majesty the King.

Mr. BENNETT: The surveyors simply determined where the line should be.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair and the house resolves itself into committee of supply, I would like to discuss a question which I consider to be of the utmost importance, and one which should be brought to the attention of parliament. Since the house has been in session, many days have been spent in the discussion of question of importance. We have discussed questions pertaining to butter, to eggs, and to cheese, and while I would not for a moment try to belittle the importance of those matters, I do not think they can compare in importance to the subject I wish to bring to the attention of the house, namely, the unemployment and under-employment which exists at the present time in the Dominion of Canada. Important as this matter is, not a day has been devoted to the discussion of it since parliament met on February 20.

It may be said, and no doubt will be said during the course of this discussion, that this is not a federal question, that it belongs to the provinces and does not concern this House of Commons. But parliament cannot evade its responsibility to the people. If time can be spent in discussing the questions to which I have just referred, then I think we can spend a little time in discussing this important matter. We owe a duty to the men and women who happen to find themselves out of work. It may be said that we have no legal responsibility towards these people. I cannot admit that. I contend that if there is no legal responsibility there is not an hon. member of this house who will say that we have not a moral responsibility in the matter. It will possibly be claimed that the British North America Act grants certain jurisdictions and creates certain lines of demarcation between the provincial and the federal governments. I am almost sick and tired of listening to definitions of the British North America Act. Every time a social question of importance is brought before this house the British North America Act is trotted out to show that we cannot do a certain thing. I am beginning to think that instead of calling it the B.N.A. act we should call it the B.A.N. act.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. HEAPS: As I have said on a previous occasion, the British North America Act was made for the people of the Dominion of Canada; the people of Canada were not made for the British North America Act.

Within the last few days this house has been very busy in making friendly gestures towards the people to the south of us. I have no objection whatever to friendly gestures being made to people in other parts of the world; in fact as a member of the Labour party I always try to cultivate kindly feelings between the people in different parts of the world. But if we can make friendly gestures which will cost the national exchequer of this country about $10,000,000 per year, then we can afford to make a friendly gesture to the unemployed people in the Dominion of Canada. My constituents are to a very large extent men or women who have to work for wages; if they do not work they cannot eat, and to them this question of unemployment is a very vital one. Am I to go back to my constituents at the end of this session and tell them that parliament sat by idly while they suffered? Am I to tell them that no action is to be taken with regard to this very important question of unemployment? Parliament could well afford to devote its time and energy to doing something for the people of this Dominion in order to alleviate the conditions which some unfortunately now find themselves in. I realize that the government have done something in regard to finding work. I am now accepting the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a delegation from the western provinces which waited upon him a few days ago when he said that the government was going ahead with public works as fast as it could and that the Canadian National Railways were doing the same—a few men being laid off but otherwise the work proceeding as if everything were normal. That, however, does not begin to touch the question of unemployment in the Dominion. The government have not dealt with unemployment in a direct sense; they have merely prevented it from getting worse than it is at the present time. I want to see parliament take some action that will deal with this question which arises year after year, because hardly a year goes by without this question of unemployment coming before parliament in one form or another.

The average workingman to-day is not the same as the workingman of twenty or thirty years ago. He is beginning to study; he is studying economics and when he is out of work he wants to know the reason why. That is a phase of the matter which we cannot lightly pass over. He sees that all around him are the material things of life. He himself has produced all the things that go towards making life worth while; but suddenly he finds himself out of work; he is face to face with poverty and in many cases does not know where his next meal is to come from. In parliament we protect practically all our industries, all our financial institutions, and the working people would like to know why we cannot give some protection to the workingman. When I use the term "protection" I do not use it in the sense of increased tariffs; I am using it in an entirely different sense. The workingman has the right to security in life in exactly the same way as we give security to capital.

Mr. IRVINE: How does the hon. member propose to do that?

Mr. HEAPS: I will come to that in a few moments if my hon. friend will permit me to continue my argument.

We give, for instance, protection to our railways; we almost guarantee them a certain fixed return on their capital. We give certain concessions to our banks. We give tariff protection to our industries, but what does parliament give to our working people? Practically nothing at all; and to-night as a representative of the working people of Canada I want to try to impress upon parliament the necessity of our doing something on their behalf.

Why, in the first place, is a person employed?—and now I am coming to the answer to some of the questions put by the hon member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). A person is employed because his services are required in order that the employer may profit from his labour. If a man cannot be gainfully employed, his services are, generally speaking, not required. In periods of depression labour cannot be gainfully employed; hence we have the unemployment problem on our hands. We do not have unemployment periodically as we used to have it many years ago, but it is an ever-recurring problem year after year. Why is it a recurring problem? Years ago it was claimed that cycles of depression would come once every five or seven years, but with the increasing use of machinery, with the speeding-up process to which labour has been subjected in recent years, production has increased by leaps and bounds and in a very short period during a year we can produce enough to satisfy all human requirements. When I say "enough to satisfy human requirements" I limit that statement by the qualification "in accordance with the purchasing power which the masses happen to possess". It is claimed by economists that during the past twenty years production has approximately doubled, but wages, that is, real wages, have remained almost stationary. That means that the position of the workingman has become relatively worse instead of better. When production becomes greater and greater, when we are able to produce more of the things of life, the position of the workingman should be better, but we find that it is exactly the reverse. At the present time, when we have an over-production of everything, we have the greatest poverty and want and what applies to the workingman applies equally at this time to our farmers. It requires to-day a smaller number of men to produce a given quantity of commodities and that is why less labour is required. As less labour is required, it is only natural that the amount of unemployment prevalent throughout the Dominion should become greater and greater.

In order to overcome the difficulty which confronts us on account of the ever-increasing productivity of the machine and the vast amount of unemployment that prevails in Canada as well as in other parts of the world, two things are required. One is a decreased working day and the other is an increased purchasing power on the part of the masses in order that they may consume more of the commodities which they themselves produce. Even if these two things come about, we shall still have quite an amount of unemployment in Canada.

These two questions cannot by any stretch of the imagination be claimed to be provincial in character. They are national; in fact, I can say they are international in character. Consequently it would be almost absurd for us to expect provincial governments to be able to deal with such questions and I can hardly expect nine provincial governments to deal with them. So far as I am able to judge, the provincial governments have all requested that the federal parliament take some action in regard to the matter. What action can we hope for?

I believe, in spite of its many drawbacks, in spite of its many handicaps, we shall ultimately have to come to a system of unemployment insurance. I cannot for the life of me see how any one particular province can of its own volition, inaugurate within its own boundaries a satisfactory system of unemployment insurance; it is practically impossible for them to do so. I wish, therefore, to deal with the question of unemployment insurance, not only from the aspect of the immediate problem itself, but also having regard to the impression that has gone throughout the country that parliament will do something along that particular line. In 1919 a federal commission was appointed by the then government. This commission had among its members many well known gentlemen, the chairman being the late Mr. Justice Mathers of the province of Manitoba. The commission travelled throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and after taking most voluminous evidence in all parts of the Dominion, it recommended the following:

> We recommend immediate inquiry by expert boards into the following subjects, with a view to early legislation:
> (a) State insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity and old age.

But ever since the year 1919 nothing has been done in a practical way to implement the recommendations of the royal commission of that year.

In the year 1924, we had hopes that something further was to be done. The Dominion government of that day had a large conference gathered from all parts of the Dominion, sitting at Ottawa, to discuss the question of unemployment. But when the conference had finished its labours nothing further was done.

I have referred earlier in my remarks to the question of interprovincial jurisdiction, and in this connection I should like, if I may, to refer to the platform of the Liberal party in the year 1921. I hope I shall be pardoned for making this reference, but I presume that the party in power to-day have not by any means changed their opinions since this platform was adopted. They issued in October 1921 a small booklet known as Publication No. 7. This is what they had to say in regard to social insurance:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

I heartily subscribe, Mr. Speaker, to that particular clause of the Liberal party platform of 1921.

Mr. MacNUTT: That was only a chart.

Mr. HEAPS: I am coming in a moment to the Conservative chart. I sincerely hope that the government have not gone back on their platform of that year, and that on this question of unemployment insurance they will earnestly endeavour to overcome any difficulty over jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion.

In order to make things even as between the two major parties in this house, I wish to quote from the labour policy adopted by the Conservative party in the city of Winnipeg in November, 1927. I do not know whether it was the environment and bracing air of the city of Winnipeg that impelled our friends of the Conservative party to include this particular clause in their platform. Nevertheless, I am glad to see it there, and I hope that they will stay with it to the bitter end. Section 9 of that platform, dealing with capital and labour, says:

So far as is practicable, to support social legislation designed to conserve human life, health and temperance, to relieve distress during periods of unemployment, sickness and old age; to encourage uniformity in labour laws throughout Canada and the wider spread of technical education, both in industry and agriculture.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): "So far as is practicable."

Mr. HEAPS: So far as that little proviso is concerned, it would not be very difficult to overcome the problem of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. I feel satisfied if the two major parties would only attempt to solve this question of jurisdiction it could be solved just as easily as it was in the case of old age pensions. I am sure that exactly the same jurisdiction problem could arise and would have arisen, if anybody had wanted to raise it, in regard to old age pensions. But where there was a will there was a way; the jurisdiction difficulty was overcome, and at the present time, according to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) there are 34,000 aged people in this Dominion drawing the old age pension—This in spite of all jurisdiction difficulties.

The question of unemployment insurance has been raised year after year ever since I have been in this house. This is my fifth session in parliament. In the very first session that I was here my hon. friend and colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I wrote a letter to the present Prime Minister and to the then leader of the opposition. I show you, Mr. Speaker, that the unemployment situation was even then, a very serious one, my colleague and I stressed it as being one of the most important questions with which we thought parliament had to deal. We addressed a very short communication to the two leaders under date of January 7, 1926, as follows:

As representatives of Labour in the House of Commons, may we ask whether it is your intention to introduce, at this session, legislation with regard to (a) provision for the unemployed; (b) old age pensions.

(Signed) J. S. Woodsworth.
A. A. Heaps.

From the right hon. Prime Minister we received a very sympathetic reply, and not many days later, on January 28, 1926, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) had this to say in the House of Commons, in answer to a question from my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill):

This question of unemployment relief is a difficult one in this country owing to the fact that we have a division of powers between federal, provincial and municipal authorities. It has been felt that the problem primarily is one of local responsibility, but the government is willing in case of serious emergency, when a grave situation exists, to cooperate with the provincial and local authorities, and to bear a share of relief work or other relief measures which have to be adopted to meet a serious situation of that character, and we shall ask parliament to give us authority to that effect.

That was in 1926. If there was a grave emergency as regards unemployment in the early part of the winter of 1926, the emergency in 1930 is a great deal more grave than it was four years ago; and if the emergency of 1926 prompted the federal government to give assistance to the municipal bodies and provincial governments, there is a thousand times more reason for giving that assistance to-day. I think I am correctly interpreting the intentions of the government as then expressed when I say that this was only a temporary measure of relief, looking forward to a more definite scheme dealing with the whole question of unemployment.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask how many unemployed there are in the city of Winnipeg to-day, and how many are on part time?

Mr. HEAPS: It is almost impossible for me to say definitely how many people in Winnipeg are at present out of work or only partly employed. The figures vary—some say ten thousand; some say more. According to statements that I have heard made by people who are competent to judge, ten thousand would not be exaggerating the situation so far as Winnipeg and its immediate surburbs are concerned.

Further, Mr. Speaker, in 1927 I introduced a motion for a committee to go into the question of unemployment insurance. Unfortunately some of my hon. friends opposite were very talkative on that occasion, and the discussion was not concluded at six o'clock, so that the motion went to the bottom of the order paper and could not again be discussed during that session. But in 1928 we had a committee appointed by this house to deal with the question of unemployment insurance. What did that committee report? I am going to read just one clause:

> That the evidence of the justice department makes it clear that the responsibility for such legislation rests on the provincial authorities, it being within their jurisdiction under the provisions of the British North America Act, but that it would be within the power of parliament to contribute by grant to such provinces as adopted such legislation, following the precedent set in the matter of technical education, highway construction, and, more recently the Old Age Pensions Act.

In other words, when the committee reported in 1928 it claimed that parliament was competent to make grants to any system of unemployment insurance in exactly the same way as at the present time we make grants to the system of old age pensions adopted by many of the provinces.

But we come to 1929, last year, when again the same resolution was submitted to the committee on industrial and international relations. Their report considerably whittled down the report of the year previous. Let me quote this paragraph:

> Your committee recognizes that, while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces, and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless according to the Department of Justice under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

Not a word about the right of this parliament to make grants to the provincial governments in order to assist the establishment of unemployment insurance in the Dominion. The report also contained the following:

> That the federal government be requested to bring the subject matter of this reference before the next federal-provincial conference, and your committee suggests when the agenda for such a conference is being arranged that the provincial governments be invited to send representatives of the employer and employee to discuss the subject matter of this report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, any ordinary person reading that section of the report would be under the impression that it was the intention of parliament to do something in regard to the question of unemployment insurance and in some way give relief to persons who happen to be out of work.

During last winter two conferences were called in Winnipeg to deal with the question of unemployment in western Canada. One conference was called in November, and the other in January. As a result of those conferences a delegation came from western Canada to Ottawa and interviewed the government. In a statement which the right hon. Prime Minister made to this delegation the impression was broadcast that the government was sympathetic and willing to do something to speed forward unemployment insurance. This is what he is reported to have said according to the Ottawa Evening Citizen of February 27:

> Eventually Canada will have a system of unemployment insurance. This was the only constructive way to deal with the unemployment situation and he hoped it would soon be possible to work out an insurance plan. Seasonal measures in the way of relief and public works were of no permanent assistance and an insurance plan offered the only constructive way of avoiding distress. Under it those who employed them would be compelled to contribute to a fund during their periods of employment and the insured would receive benefits when out of work.

A statement of this character, Mr. Speaker, would give an impression particularly to the working people of Canada, that the government had it in mind to deal with this question, which we regard as one of the most vital confronting the Dominion at the present time. A few days later my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre asked a question of the right hon. Prime Minister in relation to his statement made to the delegation, and in his answer he seemed to some extent to retract —if I may use the term—something of what he had said a few days previously. I quote the question and answer:

> Mr. Woodsworth: As I understand the statement, it was to the effect that the federal government was very much concerned in the matters of unemployment and believed that one of the solutions was a system of unemployment insurance, and that the government would be willing to take any steps possible towards bringing about an understanding between the provinces and the federal government. I want to know if the government would be willing to undertake the calling of a special conference so that this matter can be expedited.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: My recollection is that a special committee of this house considered this question last session and brought to the house a report to the effect that unemployment insurance was necessarily a matter with which provincial governments rather than the federal government would have to deal. I think I expressed the view yesterday that in my opinion a system of unemployment insurance would be a constructive way to deal with the unemployment problem, to which system not only the employer and the governments concerned would contribute, but the worker also. If the provinces make a move in this matter and it appears that the federal government can be of assistance in helping to bring about uniformity as between the provinces of any plan proposed, or can cooperate in other ways in any discussion on the subject, we shall be glad upon invitation to take the matter under consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this statement of the Prime Minister went far enough; it contained too many reservations. First of all, he states that he is prepared to discuss this question with the provinces on an invitation from them. I claim, sir, that it should be the duty of the federal government to bring about a conference with the provincial governments. He cannot expect nine provincial governments to call the federal government into consultation. I think it would be far easier and would show more sympathetic consideration on the part of the government if they themselves called the nine provincial governments into conference to discuss the question. He also said that this is primarily a provincial question. I have always refused to admit that, and I claim the federal government have just as much responsibility in respect to this question as any of our provincial governments, in fact their responsibility is greater.

Now I want to go a little further and come to a statement made more recently. I turn to my good friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). On the 14th day of March he made a speech in the city of London, Ontario, and evidently it was a very good speech. I want to thank him for it, because on asking a question of him a couple of days subsequently he told me to read the London Advertiser and he would stand behind everything he said on that particular occasion as there reported. In compliance with the invitation extended to me by the Minister of Labour, I am going to read extracts from his London speech. Evidently the people of London thought it was a very good one, and I shall read what the London Advertiser thought of it. In its columns I find the following:

Mr. Heenan, in a powerful address full of practical illustrations drawn from his daily contact with the problems of the worker and spiced with wit and humour, held the attention of an enthusiastic audience.

[Mr. Heaps.]

In that moment of exuberance, and with the enthusiastic backing of an audience of workers in the city of London, he spoke thus:

I believe during the times of depression the workers have some claim to a portion of the profits made by their labour during favourable years.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that statement?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, that is what appears here.

In a word, I believe, as the Prime Minister stated in his book entitled Industry and Humanity, "where the interests of industry and humanity conflict, industry must give way."

I quite agree with the statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour.

To continue with the quotations:

So I believe that the time has come when the employers and the workers, and if necessary the governments, should contribute to a fund in order to provide insurance against unemployment.

I feel when the Minister of Labour made that statement to the working people of the city of London he had in mind the federal government, as well as the provincial government. The quotation further states:

A system could be inaugurated in this country which would be suitable to Canadian needs.

Remember, he says "Canadian needs," not provincial needs.

Take, for example, our Canadian railroad workers; in the summer time there are upwards of two hundred thousand men employed, and during the winter periods there are about twenty-five thousand of those workers laid off for several months. The wages of all railwaymen average about $130 per month.

I must say that I do not agree with that statement. According to my information, and from reading an examination of the figures furnished by our Labour department and the bureau of statistics I find that the average wage paid by railroads in this country, from the highest to the lowest, is about 55 or 56 cents per hour. Further, I know cases in the city of Winnipeg where railwaymen have kept a check of the higher scaled trades, such as machinists, and they tell me the average monthly pay was $113. When you consider that there are men working on the railroad for 35 or 45 cents an hour, you will realize that there must be vast numbers whose average wage is not over $15 a week. However, I shall read further:

This would not be too hard on either and if necessary, the governments could assist.

I agree with him in this respect. His next statement is:

This system could be extended to workers in every industry and would provide a permanent system.

I agree with that. Unemployment insurance would provide a permanent system whereby men who happened to be out of work would not have to go begging. They would have an insurance fund to fall back upon, the same as exists in other parts of the world. At this juncture I want to point out that although it would be better for the unemployed, a system of unemployment insurance will not cure the problems of unemployment. The minister continued:

The workers of Canada are entitled to a permanent system. The House of Commons unanimously has already endorsed such a system. Parliament has also declared it is a provincial matter, and the government has taken the matter up with the provinces, but notwithstanding the fact that it is a provincial obligation the Prime Minister has stated that if the provinces so desire his government is prepared to cooperate with them in establishing a uniform system.

The last statement is rather significant, and in my view very important. I am in favour of uniform legislation when it comes down to social questions. I do not believe the people of one province should be treated better or worse than the people of a neighbouring province. It is so in the case of the Old Age Pensions Act. This parliament was anxious to have uniform legislation, and so far as uniformity is concerned I do not think anybody would agree to repeal that legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he intends to conclude his remarks by moving an amendment?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, I intend to move an amendment in a few minutes. The Minister of Labour went on to say:

As far as I am concerned, I will make every effort and the Prime Minister will back me up to see that the labouring man who is out of work for any period of the year will have a right to expect and to receive a share of the profits he helped to make.

I believe when the Minister of Labour made this statement to the people of the city of London, Ontario, he had in mind that the federal parliament would compel employers of labour to contribute something out of their profits towards an unemployment insurance scheme. In the speech to which the Minister of Labour directed my attention there is no place in which he states that it is entirely a provincial matter or that the federal government would not assume its responsibility with regard to it. If I am to make an exact interpretation of the minister's speech I would say it meant that the federal government was prepared to proceed with a scheme of federal unemployment insurance. Not only that, but it would indicate that the federal government would see to it that the scheme was uniform throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Uniformity of this character is absolutely essential in a plan involving unemployment insurance, just as it is in the case of old age pensions. It would be impossible to have a system of unemployment insurance confined to any particular province; such a system would have to be operative in at least five of the provinces before it could become workable in Canada.

I do not wish to say much more, Mr. Speaker, in regard to what has been said out of the house by members of the government. I would like to make one or two comments, however, in regard to parliament itself. We have been discussing questions in this house for the past five or six weeks which touch only a very small proportion of the people of this country. There is no question which affects Canadians so vitally as does that of unemployment and under employment. In this country at the present time I would say there must be one hundred thousand people suffering from the effects of these two conditions. Let each man who is unemployed be said to represent three people, we have a total of three hundred thousand people who are suffering, three hundred thousand people who want to know what parliament intend to do in connection wth this very important question.

There is another problem involved in this matter of unemployment insurance. To-day a man's security in his employment is not nearly what it was fifteen or twenty years ago. He never knows when some new invention or some new piece of machinery will be brought into the factory to take his place. I venture to say that if a proper census could be taken of the turnover of labour in industry it would show a greater number than we realize at the present time. I know figures have been presented in this house to show that more people are employed in industry now than were employed five or six years ago, but even those figures do not present an actual picture of the state of affairs. What I should like to know is how many hours people have been employed in industry over a given period. There we might find a different story. I believe the index figure for March 1 was about 106; there was a considerable reduction from February 1. It may be possible to show that that figure of 106 compares favourably with the figure of perhaps 95 ten years ago, but it might be shown also that the 95 figure means more hours than the 106. Our bureau of statistics does not give us any data on that important feature of our employment situation in Canada. For instance, we know that in the railroad shops and in many other subsidiary industries men were laid off not by hundreds but by thousands, yet these men were part of those employed during 1929 and perhaps part of those employed during 1930. The result is that although the index number is higher, not knowing the number of hours these men worked during the year we cannot get an accurate picture of the situation.

The federal government, in conjunction with the provincial governments, spent a great deal of money in collecting these statistics, yet we have no way of finding out how may men are out of employment in Canada. We have some idea of how many men are employed, but there are no figures to show how many men are unemployed. One of the officials of the Department of Labour has said that when there is the greatest number of men out of work there are the fewest registrations with the employment bureaus or, as I sometimes call them, the unemployment bureaus. That is so because the men claim there is no use going to these places because there is no work for them. So we have no means of knowing how great our unemployment problem may be, except from the relief which is extended by our municipal authorities, and if we gauge the unemployment situation this year by the relief extended by our municipal and provincial authorities it will be seen that this is one of the worst unemployment years we have had in this Dominion for twenty years past.

This is not a problem which comes occasionally, perhaps once every ten or fifteen years. It is an annual problem, and I feel that this house will be derelict in its duty if we do not take some definite action in order to deal with what is obviously a great national question. The Minister of Justice stated that a nemergency existed in the year 1926. If that was so, the emergency is very much greater this year, and the problem of unemployment should not be passed over in this house year after year. Hon. members should not be required to get up in their places and ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour what they intend doing about the unemployment situation, only to be told that it is a provincial problem. It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that a problem which affects the well-being of the people of this country is a federal problem. If pigs or cattle in any province of this Dominion became sick, our Department of Agriculture would send expert after expert and spend federal money freely in order to find out the cause and cure of that illness, but when we have human beings suffering, we are told it is not a federal question. I should like to know how long a human being has not been considered an equally valuable asset as a cow or a pig.

Mr. BRADY: I should like to ask the hon. member one question if I may. What countries have social insurance legislation at present?

Mr. HEAPS: It would take a long time to enumerate them all, but I might point out that South Africa was one of the last dominions to adopt legislation of this kind. In 1926 the government of South Africa appointed a commission to inquire into the question of social insurance, and that commission reported in favour of old age pensions, sickness, invalidity and unemployment insurance. All those recommendations were adopted with the exception of unemployment insurance, and if I am not mistaken the recommendation dealing with unemployment insurance was one of the last parts of that report to be adopted as a federal measure. I believe that in Australia they have had similar insurance as a provincial measure, but now in that country they are considering bringing in a federal measure in order to do away with the question of provincial jurisdiction. When a dominion such as South Africa, sparsely populated and with conditions very much akin to those existing here—and the same could be said with regard to Australia—has adopted insurance of this kind as a federal measure, there is no reason in the world why this federal parliament should not follow such a lead.

In Europe most countries have schemes of this character. Great Britain has had unemployment insurance since 1911, and although different commissions have inquired into the question of this insurance, the last being the Blanesburgh commission, whose report was published in 1925, they have all found in favour of social insurances. The last report stated in effect that social insurance had become an integral part of the social structure of the British Isles. Why Canada should be more backward than the other parts of the British Empire is something I do not know. If every other part of this commonwealth of nations has adopted social insurance generally as a federal responsibility, there is no reason why this parliament should not do the same thing through this federal government, just as we did with regard to old age pensions.

I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that the working people of this country were beginning to study these problems; they are trying to understand these economic questions and are taking an interest in the activities of both federal and provincial parliaments. To them unemployment is the important question. When we go back to our constituents they say to us, "What have you done as a member of parliament on the question of the unemployment situation?" The reply will be: "We have not done anything, because some question of interprovincial jurisdiction has arisen and it is contended that is not our sphere." They will go then to the provincial member, who will say, "We have discussed this question in the provincial legislature and we think the federal government should assume responsibility for this matter because it is federal in character." There we have the passing of the buck as between one government and another. What will the average workingman have to say? We have a responsibility in this regard and if we do not desire to bring parliament and democratic government into disrepute, this parliament should act in the interests of the common people. Can any hon. member go back to his constituency and face his electors and honestly say that because of some question of jurisdiction parliament refuses to assume responsibility?

We hope that when the hon. Minister of Labour and the right hon. the Prime Minister take part in this debate they will measure up to their responsibilities and not be afraid to say that parliament owes a certain duty to the people of the Dominion of Canada. I hope that the hundreds of thousands of people who are looking towards this House of Commons will not be disappointed in the discussion which is to follow and can look forward to some action by the ministers of the crown.

For these reasons, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following be substituted:
> "in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment."

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I think it devolves upon all Labour members of the house to take part in the discussion of a question of this kind. First of all, I wish to comment somewhat along the lines adopted by the hon. member who has just moved this resolution (Mr. Heaps), when he quoted the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) in a speech delivered at London. The minister was not giving utterance to a mere pious wish or sentiment when he said:

> I will utilize my every effort and the premier will back me up to see that the labouring man who is out of work for any period of the year will have a right to expect and to receive a share of the profits he helped make.

That was the statement of a responsible minister of this country—that the government would do something along the line of unemployment insurance. It cannot be regarded as a personal wish or personal statement of a minister of the crown when he said that the Prime Minister himself was with him in the matter. The Minister of Labour has made no denial or rebuttal of that statement, and so we can regard it as being correct. He went on to say:

> The workers who are unemployed—

Not only does he go on to say this himself, but he is speaking for the government and it is responsible for his statement. He said:

> The workers who are unemployed for perhaps two or three months of the year constituted an essential unit in the industrial life of the nation for the remaining period and the country should recognize their rights.

He went on to say:

> Those who oppose progress and social legislation of any kind will call it the dole. It is not that. It is a measure of protection to which the workers are entitled.

The Minister of Labour laid out a course which was to be followed by the government, and the Prime Minister has given his assent. I hope that the minister and the Prime Minister will have something to say in this debate, and relieve the house of any doubt it may have as to what the minister said.

At times I have been twitted in this house, especially by my hon. friends to my right, of being more liberal in my practices than I should be; in fact the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said the other day that I should be on the other side of the house. I have great pleasure in referring to some of the Liberal principles which were enunciated in 1919, and which should revive the drooping spirits of those Liberals who remained true to Liberalism. I suppose there are a few who still stand by the principles enunciated in that year when they were in opposition. There is an old saying:

> When the devil was sick, the devil a saint would be,
> But when the devil was well, the devil a bit cared he.

ments to catch the ear of the country and after they have been in power for some time they appear to forget them. Many things said in conventions are forgotten in the house. I would like to quote a few things said at that memorable convention in 1919, made memorable by the fact that the Prime Minister made some very nice speeches and presented some excellent resolutions. Speaking to the question of labour, the Prime Minister made this statement:

> The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded as a commodity or article of commerce—

That is, that labour is not a thing to be bought and sold, that it is something more than a commodity. That was the first statement of my hon. friend the Prime Minister, and then he went on to state the various proposals which the Liberal party were going to bring into effect after they assumed the reins of office. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment,—

That is the very thing the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was talking about, and is the very thing about which the minister spoke in the city of London. Some ten years save elapsed since these words were uttered by the Prime Minister:

> —sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces;—

I would like my hon. friends on the other side of the house to notice particularly that when the Prime Minister was speaking in 1919 he did not seem to have any idea that difficulty would be met in getting over the British North America Act. He went on to say:

> —and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

At that time the Prime Minister seemed to think that any obstacle offered by the British North America Act to social legislation could be very easily overcome.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the Prime Minister declared in 1919 that labour was not a commodity to be sold on the market?

[Mr. Adshead.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am simply quoting what the Prime Minister said, that labour should not be regarded as a commodity or as an article of commerce.

Mr. IRVINE: It cannot be said that labour is a commodity on the market.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I suppose they are going to take such steps as will make it not a commodity.

Mr. IRVINE: Have those steps been taken?

Mr. ADSHEAD: The hon. member had better ask the Prime Minister. Let me quote something further. Speaking to these excellent resolutions which were introduced, the Prime Minister said:

> The Liberal party of Canada, in accepting this program in its entirety to-night, is taking a position which, in the course of time, will be regarded as historic; it is declaring itself the first political party in any country in the world to accept this program, and to ask its followers to join with other nations in carrying it out.

That was ten years ago.

> Not only does the resolution recognize that the labour problem is a world problem.

I want to commend that statement to my hon. friends on the other side. It is not a provincial problem; it is not even solely a national problem; it is according to the Prime Minister, a world problem. He goes on:

> It recognizes also that the labour problem is a human problem. The resolution is based on the assumption that human personality is more important than any considerations of property. It is founded on the belief that ethical and human considerations ought to stand above considerations which are purely business or material.

Then follows a very expressive sentence which I wish we could live up to more fully:

> It is an expresion of the belief—

That was the Prime Minister's belief and I hope it is still.

> —that industry exists for the sake of humanity, not humanity for the sake of industry.

I might quote a good deal more in that connection, but I think I have given enough to show the point of view from which my friends of the Liberal party and the Prime Minister were looking at the matter of unemployment insurance and many other pieces of social legislation which he proposed to introduce when the party got into power. Of that social legislation all we have is the old age pension, which was obtained after a good deal of struggle. I hope what I have said to-night will help to revive the memories of those pious declarations.

In connection with the question of unemployment itself, as early as December last I wired to the Prime Minister as follows:

Unemployment here acute but most certainly it is right and just that federal government should bear cost of unemployed destitute immigrants of 1929 brought out by Immigration department. I have asked this for three years.

And then, referring to the conditions in the city of Calgary at that particular time, I said:

Churches fed 275 at dinner to-day, not all immigrants. Those immigrants awaiting deportation should be speedily dealt with but cost of their maintenance should not be borne by city or private people.

Unemployment in Calgary was acute at that particular time, and I received a letter to-day stating that the unemployment situation there at present is serious. To show how acute unemployment was at that time and is even now, I may say that the men who were fed were not the only ones out of employment, but they were men who were actually starving, who had nothing to eat and nowhere to lie. The first persons who took the matter up were the ladies of the Labour party in Calgary, and they fed 200 men. The next who took it up were the women of the Conservative League of the city of Calgary who undertook for a week to feed 300 men. The number had begun to increase. After they had done this for a week, the ladies of the Liberal League took it up and they fed these 300 men for another week. Finally the matter became so acute that the churches took it up.

Mr. IRVINE: Did they all give it up?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not know. They carried on the work at least as far as their finances would permit, and the question became so serious that they asked me to wire not only the Prime Minister but the Immigration department and the Labour department. I think the Minister of Labour received a telegram pointing out the seriousness of the unemployment situation in Calgary at that particular time. So far did the question of unemployment and destitution go that our good policemen in the station of the Canadian Pacific allowed these men as far as they could to sleep in the smoking room and about the station until such time as they were compelled to turn them out into the cold. Then, with the thermometer at twenty below zero, the men went into the streets with their coat collars turned up and got into any niche in which they could to find shelter for the night. Even a minister of that city telephoned to me saying: "I am sending some men up to you. I have kept them as long as I could. I have allowed them to sleep in the study of my church, and now as you are member for East Calgary, I am going to send them to you to see what you can do." Being member for East Calgary I did what I could. The citizens of Calgary have had to bear a burden which rightfully belongs to the federal government and perhaps to the provincial government.

I notice the following in the press, and I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is acquainted with this fact, if it is a fact:

Ottawa, January 20.—Immigration to Canada of continentals of south and southeastern Europe, that is to say of single men, will be limited this year to 8,000.

An arrangement has been made allocating 4,000 of these each to Canadian Pacific and Canadian National.

I want to know whether this is intended to increase unemployment, or where these 8,000 men are going. My experience has been that upon arriving in the city of Calgary after the prorogation of parliament, I have found a large number of these men taking work right in the city and swelling the number of the unemployed. I can give some statements in this regard. Last year, I think it was, I was standing on the street and I saw a number of men, evidently foreigners—or at least men who could not speak the English language; I do not know whether or not all men who cannot speak English are foreigners. I wondered what they were talking about. They were close to the employment bureau and apparently one of them could speak English. I went over and asked them what the trouble was. These men were recent immigrants, brought into Alberta by the railway companies under conditions which I have just read. We were told by the then Acting Minister of Immigration that there were ploughs and teams waiting for every man who came in; that they were all going to work on the farms and that none of them would work in the cities. He assured me time and again that conditions of employment in the cities would not be in the least affected by the thousands of men who were brought in. I took these men into the Dominion Labour Bureau and took with me a copy, sworn to as to its accuracy, of the document they were reading. They had been under the impression—and the document bore it out—that they were to be engaged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for at least two months to work on the extra gangs there at thirty cents an hour. In order that the railway company might be quite sure of its position, it got each man to sign this document, which I will read; because they could not understand how it was that after being engaged for two months they were all discharged after working for three weeks, and another bunch were hired to work on the extra gang. This is the document:

Contract to work made by the undersigned with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.
Particulars as to work:

(a) Capacity in which engaged.—Extra gang.
(b) Locality.—Beddington.
(c) Rate of wages of actual work.—30 cents per hour.
(d) Board.—$6 per week.
(e) Transportation.—Free one way.
(f) Deductions—medical fee.—$1.50 a month.
(g) Duration of work.—Two months.

That was the item which these immigrants could not understand. They could not realize why they should not have two months' work when the document stated two months. But there was a little joker in the deck, as there generally is with labour contracts of that sort. It goes on to say:

1. I declare that I am competent to work in the capacity described above, and if not found competent by the foreman in charge I agree to accept such work as such foreman finds me capable of, at the ruling rate of wages of the company for such work, in the locality mentioned above.
2. I agree to work for a period of not less than the probable duration of work as set out above (two months).

Now comes the joker. These men were foreigners who did not understand and could not speak the English language. Here is the joker clause:

I agree that no notice of termination of my engagement shall be required to be given by the company.

So they agree to work for two months, if required, and if the company does not want them, they can discharge them at any time. After three weeks' work these men were discharged and helped to swell the ranks of the unemployed in the city of Calgary. Further, I want to draw attention to the binding nature of this agreement and to the penalties that were to be exacted if the men did not live up to it. The following clause was added, and no doubt was very fully explained to the men who were engaged:

Extract from the ordinance respecting master and servants, section 2:

"Any person engaged, bound or hired whether as clerk, journeyman apprentice, servant, labourer or otherwise howsoever guilty of drunkenness or of absenting himself day or night without leave from his proper service or employment or of refusing or neglecting to perform his just duties or to obey the lawful commands of his master or of dissipating his employer's property or effects, shall be deemed guilty of a violation of his contract, and upon summary conviction of one or more of the said violations forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding $30 as to the justice or magistrate seems meet, together with the costs of the prosecution; and in default thereof forthwith shall be imprisoned for any period not exceeding one month unless the fine imposed and costs, together with the costs of commitment and conveying such person to the place of imprisonment, be sooner paid."

Mr. IRVINE: Why not crucify them at once?

Mr. ADSHEAD: No doubt. I am quoting from a sworn copy of the agreement, and it was no doubt impressed on these men that if they did not work for the full two months, if required, they would be liable to fine or imprisonment. But the company had the right to discharge them at any time they liked. So I ask the Minister of Labour: What are the conditions under which these eight thousand men are coming out to Canada this spring? According to the notice, they start to come about first of March. Are these immigrants, the bringing in of whom by the railways has been sanctioned by the government, going to work on the farm? Are they going where the government supposes they will go, or will their cases be just a repetition of those I have just cited? As soon as I go back to Calgary shall I find these men engaged in work at far less wages than the average worker will accept, thus aggravating the unemployment situation?

I want to give further proof of my statement that when these men come in with a guarantee that they are going to work on the farm, the government, or the Immigration department, which is the same thing, do not know where they are going. Unless some complaint is made, unless somebody draws attention to the fact that these men are not where they should be, the department takes no steps to see that they go where they are supposed to go. I have in my hand a letter that confirms exactly what I have said. Here was a man who was brought out to work on a farm. He signed to go on a farm, the same way that all these men I have spoken of signed to go on a farm. But he never left the city of Calgary, and the Immigration department knew nothing at all about his whereabouts or what he was doing until his case was brought to their attention. This man also helped to swell the ranks of the unemployed. I wrote to the department with a view to getting him deported, after he had been in the city of Calgary for two years. I wish to read the reply I got, and it shows conclusively that the department did not know where this man was or what he was doing, although he had been brought out to go on a farm. The department said:

Our records show that this man came to Canada to work on the farm. Our records show further that he was brought up on a farm, is fully experienced, and was accompanied to Canada by his wife, a twenty-one year old son, a fifteen year old son, and two smaller children. The two older boys were said to be experienced at farm work. There is no reason at all why this man and his family should not by now have become well on the way to a successful settlement on the land.

Certainly if he had been on the farm for two years, and had had previous experience in farming, there should be no reason why he should not be well settled on the land at the end of that time. The letter continues:

But I take it from your letter that he has been at city work and presumably has not made any effort along agricultural lines. However, we will deal with the case.

Four or five weeks later that man was deported. He had been maintained at the city's expense. What I want to bring out is the fact that that man came out with his wife and family to farm. The department knew that he came out to farm, and stated that he would be placed on a farm, but after having made that statement they knew nothing whatever of his whereabouts or what he was doing until I wrote to them that he had been in the city of Calgary for two years, and asked to have him deported because he was useless and was adding to the ranks of the unemployed.

Mr. COOTE: What country did he come from?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I think he came from the old country. His name was John Kidd.

There is another complaint which I have in connection with the unemployment situation, although I understand that the government are not going to grant any more assisted passages. In the past these assisted immigrants have helped to swell the ranks of the unemployed. They come out here supposedly to go on the farms, but they finally land up in the cities. I have a list here of twenty men, farm immigrants, who in the months of December came into the city of Calgary. Some of them got jobs, others tried to get jobs; others joined the ranks of the unemployed and had to get relief from the city. In order to have some of these men deported I asked the city authorities to give them city relief for a week because the Immigration department absolutely refuse to consider deporting these men until they become a public charge. So we had to resort to that expedient before I could apply to the Immigration department to have them deported. In the meantime, of course, they were swelling the ranks of the unemployed, while others of them were taking work that Canadians resident in the city should have had. I wrote to the Immigration department, and also wired to the Prime Minister to the same effect, asking that some recompense be made to the city and to those who had maintained these men for periods varying from a week to six weeks and two months, and I got this standard reply from the department. It is a peculiar reply, and I would like the Minister of Labour to take note of it. We asked the department to reimburse us the cost of looking after these men whom we were not instrumental in bringing to this country, but the department denied all responsibility. We had to expend several thousand dollars on relief measures. To every such request this is the stock answer we get. It would be humourous but for the tragic circumstances. This is the stereotyped reply:

I venture to suggest that the amount of money spent by the city of Calgary in a few cases—

That is, these numerous immigrants.

—is comparatively small, and further that the same is infinitesimal as compared with the benefit which your city must derive from these immigrants who locate within its borders.

The benefit which we have received from these trainees, these men who came out to farm but eventually landed in our city and finally had to be deported!

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who signed that letter?

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is signed by F. C. Blair, and is dated December 29, last year. I said it was a stock answer, and this is confirmed by another letter which I received. In fact one would imagine that the form was typed and pasted on the wall for use whenever a request is received by the department from a municipality for reimbursement of money spent on stranded immigrants. The other letter is signed by Mr. Egan. Let me quote it:

I venture to suggest—

The same wording precisely.

—that the amount of money spent by the city of Calgary in a few such cases is comparatively small, and further that the same is infinitesimal as compared with the benefit which your city must derive from these immigrants who locate within its borders.

Both Mr. Egan and Mr. Blair use the same stereotype form.

I thoroughly agree with the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that humanity does not exist for industry, but that industry exists for the sake of humanity; that the human element is the most important. He took the human side of the question. But it is just the lack of that human side which causes the trouble we have in connection with unemployment. For instance, in the city of Calgary last year—and this is typical of many such cases throughout the Dominion—the Canadian Pacific Railway Company without a moment's notice, without any consideration for their employees, without any consultation with them, discharged them, and those men are still in the city of Calgary without employment and in distress. Now, in view of this and similar cases I ask the Prime Minister, what does he think about labour not being a commodity when great corporations are allowed to discharge their men because they know that in the spring they can get a fresh supply? Those very corporations take excellent care of their machines, simply because they regard them as far more valuable than their workmen.

I submit, sir, that it is the duty of the government to implement their promises made in the platform of 1919, even though nine years have elapsed since that platform was published to the Dominion. I trust the Minister of Labour will put his best foot forward to have those promises implemented. Indeed, I think it is up to the government to state to the house how they intend to give effect to the speech made by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour at London, for as a responsible minister of the crown that speech of his is binding on his colleagues in the cabinet.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is of the utmost importance to each province of the Dominion that we should consider the causes of unemployment. My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) said that unemployment is not only provincial, it is a federal matter. I believe that it is also an international matter, because it has been studied even by the League of Nations. I see my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) laughing. Let me assure him that unemployment is too serious a matter to laugh at, and I am surprised to see my young friend, who is a man of intelligence, laugh at so serious a problem—a problem that cannot be solved by jokes or laughter. During the past winter I noticed in the New York Times a very sad picture which I place at the disposal of every hon. member. Underneath it is printed the following:

> The unemployed of Australia start a slave market. Men out of work in Sydney offer themselves to the lowest bidder in an effort to find employment for themselves.

[Mr. Adshead.]

It discloses a situation infinitely worse than that which prevails here. I wonder if my friend from Queens-Lunenburg could get a fair price for his services in Australia.

Mr. ERNST: If the hon. member is referring to me, I may say I was laughing at him, not at the problem of unemployment.

Mr. POULIOT: When my hon. friend laughs it makes a general disturbance in the house. In all countries, Mr. Speaker, the social order must be preserved, and any disturbance in that order affects the whole structure. We all remember the great economic disturbance following the war during the period of readjustment. Gradually the world got back to normal. But there is another disturbance of the social order, a continuing disturbance, caused by the shift of our rural population to the cities. People who live happily in the country are attracted by the mirage-like lure of the big cities, and they leave their healthful country surroundings for a stuffy tenement in the city. When those people, either through lack of initiative or of qualifications, fail to find work they become very much embarrassed and eventually are a source of trouble to the community. Then again the constant improvement in machinery displaces more and more men, still further aggravating the unemployment problem. The increased power of our modern freight and passenger engines means that a single train crew can do the work which a few years ago, with the lighter motive power then in use, would have given work to many more train crews.

There is yet another cause of unemployment. In this country we have what are called international unions. I must say that I am in favour of national unions, or Canadian unions. I spoke of the Canadian spirit in this house the other day and arising out of that I ask you how those union heads, who reside in the United States, could have the interests of Canadians at heart. International unions, as a whole, cannot show the Canadian spirit that we may expect from local organizations. What is the effect of unions of an international nature? The effect is that when they have not enough men within their ranks to attend to the work they have in hand, they call people in from the United States to do that work, merely because they are members of the unions, and thereby they discriminate against our Canadian citizens. To my mind this is an incorrect practice, and if something could be done to improve the conditions in this respect it would be highly beneficial to the community. It constitutes the worst kind of discrimination. We have people who can do a certain type of work; they are able workers, but cannot obtain employment because they do not belong to a union. Instead of giving employment to Canadians the union leaders call in men from the United States. I think there should be more humanity, not only in industry but in labour, so that such things could be prevented in the future.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and their colleagues are very much interested in the welfare of the working men of this country. The Prime Minister was the editor of the first number of the Labour Gazette. He has been deputy minister and Minister of Labour, and he has taken great interest in all labour questions. May I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, who has risen from the ranks, that it is a great compliment to organized labour when the head of a government consults labour as to a representative from its ranks to act as a minister in the cabinet. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour is equal to his task, and I am glad to see in this evening's papers that the government is doing its part to fulfil the treaty with respect to labour to the extent of recommending the universal adoption of an eight-hour working day in Canada. An order in council is being introduced to-day, as we have noticed in the papers, to the effect that the government employees will not work more than eight hours a day, and will receive pay for overtime after eight hours' work has been performed. It is because we have such real and sincere friends of labour in the government that the Prime Minister said to the president and chairman of the board of the Canadian National Railways that even if the expenditure was higher, the men who have been working for some time for the Canadian National Railways should continue to be given work. The same instructions have been given with regard to the Department of Public Works, and we find the Acting Minister of Imimgration (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) stating that subsidies to transportation companies which are used for the purposes of immigration will not be renewed this year. Transportation companies will receive no premiums to bring immigrants to Canada to take the place of our own people.

The Old Age Pension Act represents one of the most generous gestures made by this parliament. It is a fine thought when we consider that the old people who are destitute will be helped. I consider it is the duty of the state to give help to those who cannot earn a livelihood because of their advanced years. With this in mind the federal government passed legislation which was accepted by all the provinces from British Columbia to Ontario.

Last year I had occasion to bring before this house the question of low salaries in Quebec. I did so conscientiously to bring the attention of the whole country to the situation as it existed in that province. I mention that fact, Mr. Speaker, because when I referred to the subject last year some hon. members in the far corner of the house said they thought it would be rather inappropriate to discuss the matter, because there was a function in the city of Hull that evening and it was their opinion that the matter should not be before the house. To my mind, the question of low salaries is one of the utmost importance in Canada. I bring it before the house because this is the place where we can more easily broadcast matters of national importance. The situation of the working men in Quebec was very unsatisfactory. A year ago I took the opportunity to speak to the house on that subject, and hon. members were kind enough to listen to my remarks. For the satisfaction of my hon. friends in the far corner of the house may I say that there has been a change in the province of Quebec. I would not say that the change has resulted from what I said, but I shall tell you of what took place. First of all, there was the general report for the year 1929, by the Minister of Public Works and Labour of the province of Quebec. This report, dealing with the minimum wage law for women, was brought down on the 2nd of July, 1929. The speech referred to was delivered on June 12, and two or three weeks later that report was sent to the minister. They had been working on the matter for three years, but almost directly after that little speech they published the report and sent it to the minister.

That is a very small thing, perhaps, but there is more to be said. Last year complaint was made that the Minister of Labour for Quebec had no information as to the wages paid the working men in that province. In 1928 a list of questions was sent to 454 different labour groups, and answers were received from only 245. In 1929, 466 groups were questioned, and answers were received from 280, an increase of 35. That is not much, but it shows good will on the part of these people, and I am surprised that the minister was not sufficiently interested to send his officials to the leaders of the unions in order to get more complete information.

There is something else which brings consolation. A provincial member of the Quebec legislature drafted a minimum wage law for men. The matter was discussed by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; they considered the bill which was introduced in the legislature by Mr. Aimé Guertin, member for Hull. During the discussion by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association reference was made to a judgment of the supreme court in regard to a minimum wage law for men in British Columbia, and the association was under the impression that that minimum wage law was declared ultra vires. As a matter of fact it was only an order of the board of adjustment that was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada, which said that the board misconceived the nature and scope of its function, and the order which was made was declared ultra vires and invalid. The decision was given in the case of the International Timber Company against Field, judgment being rendered by the Chief Justice. The act itself was not declared ultra vires.

The most extraordinary feature, Mr. Speaker, is that the federated trades council of Quebec declared that a minimum wage enacted by statute would cause great difficulty, and might be taken as the maximum wage by the employers. These people declared themselves opposed to the establishment by statute of a minimum wage for working men. The minimum wage law introduced by Mr. Guertin is referred to in the Montreal Gazette of March 22, where Mr. Guertin is quoted as saying:

> This act shall apply to the provincial government as well as to the municipal school corporations.

Then the Gazette goes on to say:

> It is on this latter clause that the bill will be found out of order, since it affects the revenues of the province and, therefore, can only be brought down by a minister with a companion resolution. In drawing up the bill this fact is emphasized, because the clause is placed within brackets, as done with government bills accompanied by resolutions. The result will be, therefore, that there may not be even a debate on the principle involved.

As a matter of fact, the minimum wage bill was ruled out of order, and the Ottawa Citizen of March 27 has the following to say:

> Because it involved the expenditure of public funds, Speaker Bouchard ruled out of order the bill of Aime Guertin, Conservative, Hull, to the effect that there be established a minimum wage rate for men of 35 cents an hour. The speaker called the attention of Mr. Guertin to the clause which provides that employees of the provincial government come under the act, suggesting a change be made before he made his ruling definite.
> Mr. Guertin argued the point, refusing to withdraw the clause. The bill was ruled out of order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Guertin has put a motion on the order paper to the effect that "this house invites the government to introduce at the next session an act to fix the minimum salary of certain classes of male workers."

That is quite an improvement. We have not succeeded yet; the question has not been decided, but it is under consideration, and the day will come when the province of Quebec will have by all means a minimum wage law for men. As I stated last year, the maximum wages in Montreal for nine trades are lower than the average wage paid for the same work in twelve important cities from coast to coast.

The other day I was speaking on immigration, and a friend of mine for whom I have much respect said that a remark I made was nonsense. Perhaps that word may be a boomerang. At the time I said there was only one minimum wage law for men, and that was in British Columbia. Another member, who is not here and whose name I will not mention, said there was one in Alberta, and the other hon. gentleman stated there was one in Ontario for men and women as well. I said that if such laws were in effect in Alberta and in Ontario I did not know about it, and I wired the Minister of Labour for Ontario as follows:

> Hon. F. E. Godfrey,
> Minister of Health and Labour,
> Toronto.
> Please wire me if there is minimum wage law for men and women in Ontario and, if so, since when is it in force.

That wire was dated March 24, and Mr. Godfrey was good enough to answer me by wire the same day, as follows:

> Minimum wage law in Ontario applies to women only. In force now.

Evidently the hon. member who interjected the remark about Ontario forgot that the law applied only to women. I have here a copy of the Ontario act, which is headed, "An act to provide for a minimum wage board with power to regulate in certain cases the minimum wages of women and girls." Can men be considered as being women and girls? I have also the orders of the minimum wage board regarding the employment of women in the province of Ontario, and they will convince my hon. friend that it is dangerous to make preposterous statements.

Apparently some good has come out of the exposure made in the House of Commons as to the terrible state of affairs which exists in the province of Quebec. That province claimed at first that the Old Age Pension Act was ultra vires, but they seem to have changed their minds. The speech from the throne delivered to the Quebec legislature on January 7 last contains this paragraph:

> Several social problems of great importance are now up for consideration. Attempts have been made with more or less success to solve some of these in the other provinces and abroad. My ministers do not wish to be behind hand and intend to submit to you a bill appointing a commission composed of economists, to study the various systems of social insurance, of foster homes for children, of old age pensions and several other similar social questions. My ministers think that an exhaustive consideration of these different problems, in the light of experience gained elsewhere, will lead to their satisfactory solution.

I would point out to my hon. friends in the far corner of the house that that province considers this matter to be within its scope. In accordance with that speech from the throne a bill has been presented to the provincial house, and the provincial Minister of Labour has said that within three months the commission provided for will come into existence. I hope that that commission will not be used as a smoke screen in an effort to make the people believe that the government is coming to their rescue when in fact it does not intend to do anything. Conditions in Quebec are very bad; my hon. friends know that the day labourer is paid only from $2 to $2.50 per day, while the average is much higher in the other provinces. I do not intend to read the statistics which I gave last year to the house, but is not this matter taken as a whole worthy of due consideration?

Congestion in the big cities is brought about by the influx of people from the country, and one means of preventing unemployment would be to demonstrate to the country people that they would be much better off if they remained on the farms. They would be more independent and happier; during the bad years they would have at least sufficient to live on, and during the good years they would be farther ahead.

I take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for East Calgary on the manner in which they have discussed this question. It is not a matter to be discussed with heat; it should be considered calmly and with the idea of obtaining results. The hon. member for North Winnipeg said that it was the duty of the government to call a conference of the nine provinces in order that this matter might be studied. That would seem to prove that he himself is inclined to believe that the matter is one which comes within the provincial jurisdiction, because if it did not the government would have no reason to call a conference. Even if there is no vote upon his motion I believe he has attained his object, because he has brought this matter to the attention of the country, as I, in my very humble way, did last year regarding the low wages paid in Quebec. When such matters as these are discussed with moderation there is not a man in the country who is not interested in them and who does not give consideration to the best way of remedying the conditions.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, this matter of unemployment is one regarding which every large municipality has made representations to the house during the past three or four months. This government seems to be unlike any other government the world over, because they have simply sat down and fiddled with this question and have made a political football out of it. The first duty of a government is to look after the health, welfare and comfort of its people, but I begin to wonder whether or not we are living in a Christian country when we see this government treating human beings in such a manner. If we should love our neighbours as overselves, then before this parliament closes the government should do something about unemployment. Nine-tenths of the time of the Labour government of Great Britain is taken up in the consideration of the unemployment problem. The United States government, under the administration of Mr. Hoover, has appointed an economic committee composed of the brightest minds in labouring, manufacturing, agricultural, railway and other fields, to meet at Washington in an endeavour to solve the problem of unemployment.

No effort has been made to solve that question in this country. We have a Labour department, but it does not exist so far as unemployment is concerned. Unemployment has never been as bad since confederation as it is at the present time in the large municipalities in this country. Delegations have met the government, but no results have been obtained. The government shelters itself behind technicalities. The house was told a few years ago that unemployment was a matter for the provinces and the municipalities; last session the word "municipality" was struck out, and we were told that it was a matter for the provinces alone—the government refuse to answer the question at all this present session. While I have a high regard for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) I contend that he has failed utterly to conceive what the government's duty is to the unemployed of this country. The government shelters itself behind that celebrated document the British North America Act, which act would appear to be preventing this country from solving any of its economic problems. Unemployment should be the charge of the federal authorities for the reason that they make the tariff; they are in control of the banking laws, the immigration laws and many other items which are set out in section 91 of the British North America Act as being under federal jurisdiction. They say: We have had a meeting with the provincial authorities. We seem to have provincial government in the federal sense as regards not only water powers but every other problem. The provinces seem to be running the country because in regard to everything we propose, it seems that we must consult the provinces. This particular question has been made a political football of by the government. The resolution moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) is long overdue in the house. We have been here for five or six weeks and we have not had time in this chamber to take up the most important problem confronting Canada to-day, namely, the unemployment situation as it affects all the provinces of confederation.

The minister relies on the index system. The index system has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. I can show as regards industries in Toronto where this is the case. I know a man who received two weeks' employment in his industry during 1929, and who is listed as having been employed all the year round. According to reports, the British system and the United States system have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. As an index of employment it is far from being accurate. It covers only a few industries; it does not cover the key industries at all. The government send down a form and the industries fill it out. Some of the men may be working only five or six days or a couple of weeks in the year, but they are listed as being employed all the year round. The government say that there is practically no unemployment. All I can find out that the government have been doing during the past five or six years in regard to the unemployment situation is that they have established an unemployment bureau in Ottawa. They have provided an "ambassador" cure for unemployment, and they are sending out over the seven seas ambassadors to different countries, hoping by that method to cure unemployment. That is all the government have done. Since this government have been in power 1,300,000 people have gone to the United States and the exodus is still going on. We hear talk about the exodus of raw material. What about the exodus of Canadians who are going to the United States to-day and draining this country of its people? From the last issue of the University of Toronto Monthly I found that of the graduating class in medicine sixty-one stayed in Canada, fifty-seven went to the United States and fifteen to other foreign countries. In other words, 50 to 55 per cent went out of the country. The other day I saw a line-up of 347 men in Toronto on Yonge street near Gerrard, a long line of young men in front of a religious mission, waiting to get a bite to eat at the lunch hour. Anybody passing in the street car could have seen the crowd. In other parts of the country soup kitchens were opened up last winter. The government are asleep at the switch. When you ask them to solve any problem, what do they say? They say: We have nothing to do with it; it is a matter for the provinces, the municipalities.

It is the present tariff policy of the government that has put the workers out on the street, because that is where they are owing to the pan-American tariff of the government. As for their immigration policy, they cannot provide jobs for the men we have in this country now and they are still bringing them in. The first thing we ought to do is to set up an all-Canadian policy and to give jobs for the native-born Canadians, instead of having them to go to the United States to help build up that country. In the cities of Buffalo, Cleveland, Erie, Pennsylvania, Toledo and Detroit we have on the United States border of Lake Erie a cluster of cities that are becoming the largest Canadian cities we have. As Senator Couzens said, Detroit is becoming the third largest Canadian city. This process is going on all the time and immigration is to blame. No other province is suffering more than Ontario from unemployment at the present time. Ontario is losing thousands of its citizens in its cities and towns. The city of Toronto is spending $12,000,000 to $13,000,000 a year in maintaining its children in public and high schools and many of these children who are now ten or twelve years of age will, in the next five or six years, be going over bag and baggage to the United States looking for positions. Ontario has been a dumping ground for dairy produce, agricultural produce, coming in from the United States, but the government refuse to do anything; they sit still and say: We have nothing to do with unemployment. The minister says: I will find a permanent cure for it—unemployment insurance. The report of the royal commission in the United States shows that it is not a permanent cure for unemployment. It is a policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and imposing an additional burden on srtuggling industry. I believe in the principle of unemployment insurance, but in this country we have a state of affairs which is quite different from that of other countries. The policy of the government seems to be that nothing that can be purchased in the United States should be bought in Canada, especially eastern Canada, and that anything that cannot be purchased in the United States should be bought preferably in Europe, the first preference being given to Germany.

The Labour department has fallen down; it might as well close up shop for all the help it has been to the toilers and workers of Canada. The Labour department has failed to fulfil the functions for which it was created, namely to look after labour in the country, create jobs and protect the workers. The Alien Labour Act to-day is a dead letter. A couple of years ago when Sir Henry Drayton, then member for West York, was away, I wrote a letter to the minister. Some nurserymen in Sir Henry Drayton's riding complained that thirty-six workers had been brought in from southern Europe to work in the gardens of West York. I could not get a reply, but I found out afterwards that the minister said in the house that the question of the enforcement of the Alien Labour Act was a matter for the attention of the provincial attorney general. Anything to get out from under! Is it any wonder we have unemployment in Canada?

The other day the Prime Minister said at a dinner that freedom, equality and the end of privilege constituted the policy of twentieth century Liberalism. Yet he says: We have nothing to do with the condition and lot of the people among whom we live; unemployment is a matter for somebody else. Is freedom one of the principles of twentieth century Liberalism? Economic slavery to the United States is what the workers have in place of freedom. That is what the policy of the present government has given instead of freedom. Equality! There is no such thing as equality in this country. The government have a tariff policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul. Talk about the end of privilege in this country! Did you ever hear anything like it in your life? They give away the Seven Sisters falls, the Beauharnois water powers and the other water powers of the country. It looks to me as if the government to-day is a government of big interests and appetites instead of a government of freedom, equality and the end of privilege. The twentieth century Liberals were told the other night by one of them who was making a speech in eulogy of the Prime Minister: Liberalism is the open road. Yes, Liberalism is the open road to the United States. The policy of the government has been responsible for the unemployment existing in this country to-day. Liberalism has been the open road for hundreds of thousands of our working people who have had to leave this country to seek a living in the United States. There has been no concerted effort on the part of this government to deal with this problem in a constructive way. I have before me the report of the committee on education and labour of the United States congress, presided over by Senator Couzens, of Detroit. The committee was charged with considering the question of unemployment and ascertaining what the causes were. They found that unemployment may be divided under three heads. I would like to give a few examples of what that committee found in that great country to the south where our young men had to go to look for a living.

The committee find, first of all, that there is cyclical unemployment, unemployment that occurs in a cycle, just like children have diphtheria or the measles. That kind of unemployment is with us most of the time, and how to deal with that form of unemployment is the first duty of the government. A wise and up-to-date government will declare active war on unemployment all the time it is in office, because the government of the day is charged with the responsibility of dealing with this problem. The problem must be faced and dealt with in a large and constructive manner that will redound to the benefit of the toilers in this country.

Secondly, there is seasonal unemployment, which comes on us periodically. They are tackling that problem in the United States to-day, and they have a solution for it. I have already referred to the evidence given by Mr. Willard, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway before the senate committee. He said:

> It is a dangerous thing to have a large number of unemployed men and women—dangerous to society as a whole—dangerous to the individuals who constitute society. When men who are willing and able to work and want to work are unable to obtain work, we need not be surprised if they steal before they starve. Certainly I do not approve of stealing, but if I had to make the choice between stealing and starving, I would surely not choose to starve—and in that respect I do not think I am much unlike the average individual.
> The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, as one of the units of society, ought to recognize and carry whatever responsibility rests upon it as a large employer, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that it was due to our recognition in part of the obligation which I have just been discussing, that we of the Baltimore and Ohio developed a quickened sense of the importance of anything which had to do with the stabilization of employment. I do not hesitate to say that I should personally feel very much ashamed if it were made clear to me that the Baltimore and Ohio Company was not doing all that it could and ought to do, having due regard for the interests of the owners of the property while other employers of labour were fully meeting similar obligations.

The views which I have just expressed concerning this matter are in large degree held by all employers of labour at the present time. In any event I think there is a more universal appreciation of the obligation resting on employers because of our economic system than ever before, and this has led to what I may refer to as a changed point of view, of a changed state of mind, and it is due to that state of mind, in my opinion, more than to any other single thing that the efforts have been made in recent years, which certainly have been made by employers in all lines of business, to deal with this matter in a more constructive manner.

The third cause of unemployment is technological. It is caused chiefly through the introduction of machines that supplant the worker. Men find that their skill is no longer needed. Let me give you a few examples as found in this report:

Seven men now do the work which formerly required 60 to perform in casting pig iron; 2 men now do the work which formerly required 128 to perform in loading pig iron; one man replaces 42 in operating open-hearth furnaces.

In machine and railway repair shops one man replaces 25 skilled machinists with a gang of 5 or 10 semi-automatic machines; 4 men can now do in 3 to 7 hours what it formerly took 8 men 3 weeks to perform in repair work on locomotives, due to the oxyacetylene torch. Fifteen years ago it took 15 to 30 hours to turn one pair of locomotive tires; now it takes 8 hours to turn 6 pairs with same number of men by use of modern processes.

A brick-making machine in Chicago makes 40,000 bricks per hour. It formerly took one man 8 hours to make 450.

The most up-to-date automatic bottle-making machine makes in one hour what it would take more than 41 workers to make by hand in the manufacture of 4 ounce oval prescription bottles. In 25 and 40 watt electric bulbs the man-hour output of the automatic machine is more than thirty-one times that of the hand process.

In New York from 1914 to 1925 the number of workers in the paper-box industry decreased 32 per cent, while the output per wage earner increased 121 per cent.

Thousands of skilled musicians with a life's training behind them are being thrown out of employment by the advent of the talking movie. In the field of news transportation the Simplex and the Multiplex machines have eliminated the need of trained telegraphers, and to-day by the mere process of typing a message at the sending office, the message is automatically printed at the receiving office. Many thousands of trained telegraphers have been made unnecessary during the last few years as a result of this new device. In the printing trades new inventions in typesetting threaten to make possible the setting of type in innumerable offices scattered as many as 500 miles away by the manipulation of keys in a central plant.

That is what they call technological unemployment. It is evident that in the United States they are dealing with this problem of unemployment in a large, constructive way, conducting an active warfare not only on cyclical unemployment, but on seasonal unemployment, and on this newer form, technological unemployment. They are to-day getting results in the United States. The report of this committee has been presented and adopted by congress.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 1, 1930

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Second report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines —Mr. Cahill.

PENSIONS AND SOLDIERS' PROBLEMS

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) presented the third report of the special committee on pensions, and returned soldiers' problems, as follows:

Tuesday, April 1, 1930.

The special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems beg leave to present the following as their third report:

Your committee recommends that it be given leave to employ counsel for the purpose of assisting the Dominion executive officers of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League in the matters referred to it. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Charles G. Power,
Chairman.

Mr. POWER moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The question of the appointment of counsel representing the Canadian branch of the British Empire Legion is one matter; the appointment of counsel to represent returned soldiers is another. I think I intimated that such counsel should be appointed, but he should not be under the instructions of the legion. He should be there to represent returned soldiers, generally. It would be a wrong principle if counsel were not secured to represent, and did not in fact represent the great mass of soldiers who are not members of the legion. The membership of that organization is said to be about 75,000, out of a total number of returned men of something over 300,000. To that extent I think matters should rest until we can have a conference with the chairman, and it might be concurred in to-morrow.

Motion stands.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, April 1, 1930.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Mr. Justice Anglin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 9.00 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to the interim supply bill.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): May I call the attention of the house to the fact that there were five committees scheduled for this morning at eleven o'clock. The committees were banking and commerce, industrial and international relations, special committees on pensions and returned soldiers' problems, railways, canals and telegraph lines, and agriculture and colonization. It is impossible for members to attend all these meetings, and I suggest there should be some sort of clearing house so that committees will not clash in that way.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Excise Act to provide for power to examine witnesses on oath, and to pay their reasonable travelling expenses; for the imposition of duty on screened malt computed on the quantity after it has been removed from the kiln and screened; for making certain offences indictable, and such other amendments as are deemed necessary for a more adequate enforcement of the act.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the hon. gentleman might make a statement with regard to this resolution.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the bill are not many; they are designed almost entirely to clear up some problems and some inconsistencies which have developed during the administration of the act. There are one or two additions all of which, as I say, are designed to make the working of the act more clear with regard to certain weaknesses which have developed. I think possibly if hon. members would allow the motion to pass, the information in detail can be given much better a little later on. I can assure hon. members that the additions which are being made are very simple in their nature and do not involve any great principle at all.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose this resolution has received the approval of His Excellency the Governor General?

Mr. EULER: Yes, the matter has been brought to the attention of His Excellency the Governor General and his consent has been obtained.

Mr. STEVENS: If we adopt this resolution we agree to the principle of all that is contained in it, and it covers rather a wide range. Would the minister be good enough to take the points one by one and let us know just what are the explanations, in order that we may follow them in their relation to the present act? For instance there is the question of examining witnesses on oath. I understood that the act covered that already. What is the need for that amendment, and wherein does it amend the present act?

Mr. EULER: That particular provision arises almost directly out of an investigation which was held in Halifax last year, to which reference was made at the close of the session by the leader of the opposition. We found then that our own officers had not power to examine witnesses under oath, and an order in council was necessary to give them that power. In outlying sections of the country it will make it very much easier if the officers have that power. I do not see how anyone can possibly be prejudiced in the matter, and certainly it will make the work of the officials of the department a great deal easier.

The next amendment, providing for the payment of reasonable travelling expenses, explains itself pretty well. The proposition to impose duty on screened malt is to do away with the present condition whereby coomings and screenings are compensated for by a refund after the goods have been imported. We are going to do away with that altogether, so that no duty will be paid on the screenings but only on the net result after the screenings have been removed. Then there will be no necessity for refunds. I am not sure that I can add anything more.

Mr. STEVENS: What offences are to be made indictable?

Mr. EULER: This arises out of a situation which came up in connection with a certain tobacco company which was caught selling cigarettes without the payment of excise tax. They were fined and promised to amend their ways, but they did not do so. It was discovered that they had recommenced the practice and under the circumstances it was thought advisable to seize their stock, but a considerable doubt arose as to whether we could do so legally. I think the house will agree that in offences of that kind it should be possible for the department to deal more summarily with the offenders than has been the case in the past. We are practically without a remedy; people even move goods out of customs bond without any adequate punishment.

Mr. STEVENS: What other amendments are deemed necessary for the more adequate enforcement of the act? That is rather a sweeping power that the minister is requesting.

Mr. EULER: If I wanted to give my hon. friend full information I would have to give him a resumé of the bill itself. The bill is very short; I do not know whether or not my hon. friend has it before him, and I hardly suppose the committee would wish me to recite the provisions which are contained in the bill itself.

Mr. STEVENS: This is not captious criticism at all; the point is that the minister undoubtedly has a rather extensive bill which will follow this resolution. We do not want the minister to come back at us later on, when we query him on the bill, and say, "Well, you agreed to this in the resolution."

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. EULER: I will give my hon. friend the assurance that I will not find fault with anything he may wish to ask later on.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a very sweeping sort of blanket cheque we are giving; the minister simply asks for such other amendments as are deemed necessary for the more adequate enforcement of the act. We have not the faintest idea of what that is intended to cover. So as far as I am concerned I want the minister to understand that in agreeing to the resolution, when the bill comes up it does not mean that we will not give it the fullest examination.

Mr. EULER: We will not have any disagreement on that.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Euler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 48, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting fair wages and hours for labour employed by contract or otherwise on public works of the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HEENAN: The bill which is proposed to be introduced contains three distinct features. It will establish current rates of wages, provided that in all cases they must be fair and reasonable, which is a new feature in our fair wage policy. It also provides that the eight hour day shall apply to contractors, and it also takes in government employees on similar work, as provided for by the bill. When the bill is before the committee we will be able to give any details required.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I think these matters should be considered before the bill is presented to the house. I have received a telegram from an important firm of builders and contractors who state that there are clauses in the bill which would be a possible source of serious embarrassment. These contractors suggest that the construction industry be permitted to submit their views before a bill is presented to the house. I hope the minister will consider receiving suggestions from employers of labour in reference to the clauses of this bill.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. member state the name of the firm who forwarded that communication?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not received permission to divulge the name, but neither has any objection been offered, so I presume it would be quite in order for me to state that the name of the firm is John Flood & Sons, Limited, of St. John, N.B. Perhaps it would be better to read the telegram. It starts off by calling me "Honourable." Under ordinary circumstances I would not have mentioned that, but evidently they are taking a keen interest in the progress of events. The telegram reads as follows:

Learn Hon. P. Heenan moved resolution respecting fair wages and hours labour on public works contracts.

That would appear to be previous information as the resolution was moved to-day.

Mr. HANSON: They are an up to date firm.

Mr. MacLAREN: The telegram continues:

Have memo of bill draft and note provisions which are objectionable to construction industry and possible sources of serious embarrassment.

I would direct the attention of the minister to the following:

Suggest construction industry permitted submission views before bill drafted.

In view of the position which these people occupy in the community, and in view of their discernment with regard to the member to whom they sent the telegram, I would urge again favourable consideration by the minister.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, it will be quite proper for any citizen of Canada to make representations regarding this measure, but I do not see how those representations can be made until the bill is printed. A representative of that firm of contractors has interviewed me regarding the bill and I told him that he would be at liberty to bring any delegation at any time after the introduction of the bill. I think the hon. member will realize that no one can discuss the bill until it is introduced and printed, and I can assure my hon. friend that after that time we will receive any delegations in connection with this matter.

Mr. MacLAREN: They do not ask to present their views on the bill, they ask an opportunity to present their case before the bill is drafted. The minister should have the opinion of those who are interested before he drafts his bill as it is easier to make changes at that time.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if this bill will be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations, or is it proposed to deal with it in the committee of the whole?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: I think it would be only fair to those who are interested in this bill that they be given an opportunity to be heard. If the minister does not agree with the position taken by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren), then I would suggest that this bill be referred to a committee of the house.

Mr. HEENAN: I would rather introduce this bill as a government measure and take the responsibility than meet the wishes of representatives from all over the country. This is a government measure and it will be dealt with in the committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSON: The government seems to have one policy for one class of bill and another policy for other bills. This is a bill which will vitally affect business in this country. If it were a political plaything which the minister had in mind, I could well understand that he would not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. HANSON: There is nothing wrong about that. That seems to be exactly what he has presented—a political baby is now to be born. If the minister intends to pursue the line of conduct he has indicated, I would suggest, in the interests of business and in the interests of the men themselves who labour on public works, that the whole thing should be referred to the committee on industrial relations where the views pro and con can be discussed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We ought to see the baby before sending it away like that.

Mr. HANSON: We can well apprehend the character of anything that comes from the Minister of Labour.

Mr. HEAPS: A few days ago in committee of supply, hon. members from the maritime provinces complained that fair wages were not being paid on certain government contracts being carried out there. Now we have an hon. member from the maritimes (Mr. Hanson) complaining of the action taken by the government.

Mr. HANSON: I cannot allow that remark to pass. I was not the gentleman who took that stand, in fact it was the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) and I am sorry that he is not here to-day to speak for himself. I have not expressed any opinion as to the merits of this measure, and the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has no right to ascribe wrong motives. In fairness to all concerned, not only to the contractors but to the men themselves, as well as to the taxpayers of this country who, after all have to pay the bill, this bill should be referred to a committee of the house where views thereon could be presented.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, the department is eleven years too late in bringing forward this measure. Eleven years ago the city of Toronto adopted an eight hour day and the union or prevailing rate of wages, on contracts which is 60 cents per hour. Nothing is done regarding aid to unemployment until we have an election pending, and then the government decides that something must be done to appeal to the labouring class. This bill is brought down eleven years after the large municipalities in the province of Ontario had adopted not only a fair wage clause but the eight hour day in all civil contracts. The minister in regard to that particular amendment has no way of enforcing it. How is he going to enforce this proposal? What penalty will be placed in a contract to enforce it? Many contracts to-day are dead letters. A great deal of this work is being sublet; a contractor gets a job and sublets it to someone else. As I said last night, the Alien Labour Act is a dead letter in this country. Contractors are bringing into Ontario unskilled labour from all over Europe, and the government and the fair wage officer seem to be asleep because they are nowhere to be found nor can they enforce the contract.

No credit is due to the government for bringing in this legislation. It has been forced upon them by what was done by the provinces and the municipalities in 1919 and 1920. The city of Toronto provides for an eight-hour day and in every contract is inserted a fair wage clause, providing for the union or prevailing rate of wages, which in Toronto is sixty cents an hour for unskilled labour.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: After the bill is introduced, will there be an opportunity on the second reading to suggest extensions or amendments to it? I am not objecting to the bill; I am supporting it, but I do not want to be confined to the resolution and not be able to suggest amendments.

Mr. STEVENS: I notice my hon. friend (Mr. Adshead) says that he has no objection to the bill as it stands. I did not know the bill was distributed. I would like to have had the same opportunity of seeing it and I would perhaps be able to discuss the matter more intelligently. The minister may tell us in a moment just to whom the bill has been distributed and who has had an opportunity of seeing and examining it. It would be interesting to know that.

Mr. HEENAN: The bill has not been in the possession of anyone but members of the government. It has not been distributed.

Mr. HANSON: A memorandum of the draft bill has been handed out. Messrs. John Flood & Sons say that they have seen it.

Mr. HEENAN: All I can say is that if they have, I do not understand it, because the bill has not been distributed from our department.

Mr. STEVENS: In the first place, I do not think there has been any occasion for this bill. The government, all through its history, should have been practising the principle enunciated in the resolution. I have in my hand a letter from The Building Trades Council, Vancouver. It is addressed to me and it reads:

> We have been instructed to draw to your attention an anomaly in the methods adopted by the Dominion government in carrying on the construction of public works, viz: when calling for tenders from the various contractors the fair wage clause is a component part of the contract, therefore it becomes compulsory upon the contractor to pay the established or current wage of the district in which he is doing government work; and in the event of any dispute regarding wages the government fair wage officer is empowered to enforce the act. However, on the other hand when the government undertakes to carry out its own construction work by day labour a different procedure is initiated and the fair wage clause is not given the slightest consideration. The men so engaged are hired in most cases at a considerably lower rate of wages than a contractor would be compelled to pay for the same class of work.
> This is manifestly unfair because it debars members of the various mechanics' unions from accepting employment on government work when such work is being carried out by day labour and the matter does not end here, as the standard of living which has been built up by organized labour in this Dominion is imperilled. We would therefore respectfully request that you bring this anomalous condition to the attention of the government and have the act so amended that it will definitely rule; that the fair wage shall be paid on all government work whether undertaken by contract or day labour.

The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is this: he gives us no adequate information in the resolution as to the contents of the bill. In reply to questions he has stated: "Well, when the bill comes in, you will see it." He prefers to put the bill in as a government measure and force it through the house. This is a case where there is a definite and reasonable complaint that in certain instances where contractors do government work a fair wage clause is included in the contract. The fair wage clause calls for conditions prevailing and wages paid in the various branches of work in the community in which the contract is awarded, but on government work done by day labour, according to this letter—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does he cite the cases he has in mind?

Mr. STEVENS: I have read the letter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a very general statement.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the generality of it that is somewhat alarming.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If a man wrote a letter of that kind I would expect him to set forth some specific case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not agree with the minister nor with the "Hear, hear." This is an old dodge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not.

Mr. STEVENS: It is—to say, when a member brings something to the attention of the house, name the specific case; name the particular job.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is never a letter read on this side of the house but that complaint is made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I think it is a perfectly fair and proper question. If my hon. friend's letter makes an assertion, it should give the particulars.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not the particulars and I am now making a statement based on the letter. The statement I am making is this: I think it is an exceedingly unwise and unfair policy for the government to carry out work under conditions that are different from those that are imposed upon a contractor working on government work, should the work be let by contract. I have other letters on this subject; I have looked for them in my desk, but I find I do not have them under my hand. Does the minister cover that point in the bill which he proposes to base on the resolution which is very brief and incomplete? It says simply that it is—

> A measure respecting fair wages and hours for labour employed by contract or otherwise on public works of the Dominion of Canada.

That is a very broad, sweeping statement. It might be a revision up or a revision down. You cannot get any information from it. Will the minister say whether the particular point I have mentioned has been covered in the resolution?

Mr. HEENAN: Evidently the hon. member was not in his seat when I made my first explanation, or perhaps I did not make myself understood, because that is one point I explained. This will apply not only to contractors or employees engaged by contractors but also to employees of the government on government work.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will it apply to government employees in the Public Works department?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: For instance, on dredging machines and so on?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it to be provided that they get a fair wage and also holidays?

Mr. HEENAN: Perhaps I had better explain. It is to provide that every contract with the government of Canada for construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of any work shall be subject to the fair wage conditions. Those are the contracts, and any employees of the Dominion government itself engaged on similar work will come under this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if the fair wage proposed is a minimum wage or simply the going wage in the district?

Mr. BENNETT: The current wage, the minister says.

Mr. HEENAN: It applies to current wages that are paid in the district, with this added provision, that in all cases the wages must be fair and reasonable. That is new.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That does not mean anything. I have a specific instance that just came to my notice to-day. I should like to read a paragraph from a letter that I received from Canon F. G. Scott of Quebec, with regard to conditions in Grand-Mere. He speaks of the generally bad conditions there owing to the large number of people being out of work through the closing down of the paper mill, and goes on to say:

> The government is building a new post office. At present only the foundation work, outside work, blasting, etc. is being done. I am told on good authority that the workmen are being paid at only 20 cents an hour. . . . Probably a contractor has got the job. Could you bring it before the house? The poor people are desperate and forced to work for anything.

In a district like that, where there is a lot of unemployment, and where wages apparently have been definitely forced down, it would seem as if the going wage is not an adequate safeguard. I think if we are going to have anything of this kind at all, we ought to have a definite minimum wage based on the cost of living.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Is this bill being introduced in substitution for the draft bill submitted by the trades and labour congress?

Mr. HEENAN: The trades and labour congress did present a draft bill to the government. The bill based on this resolution does not include everything that the trades and labour congress had in mind, but it does take in most of the important features of their draft bill, and a good deal of what is left out is covered by other acts and regulations, such as the water powers regulations, section 244 of the Railway Act, and our own regulations of the Labour department.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): In answer to a question the other day, the minister told me that the bill submitted by the trades and labour congress had been declared by the Justice department to be ultra vires. Are any such sections included in this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: I think that the questions, submitted by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) and by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) should in some way be answered, because one of the large firms of contractors upon public buildings here in Ottawa, who are also contractors on the Welland canal, have alleged that their financial position, they being presently in the hands of receivers, was brought about by the arbitrary action of a minister of labour who changed the terms of their wage contracts with their employees, and thereby brought about their financial destruction. That is their contention. Whether it is right or not, I cannot say. It did occur to me, however, listening to the minister, that he is dealing with a matter that has received the approval of almost every member of parliament. If I turned to Hansard, I should find that practically every member who has spoken on the subject has urged that it was not only desirable but essential that the government should have the same hours of labour and pay the same wages on its works as other contractors. That is based really on the obligation of the treaty of Versailles. That, I think, is unquestionable. The important question to answer, it seems to me, is what effect this bill may have upon existing contracts, where contractors have employed sub-contractors on certain terms as to wages? This resolution does not touch that at all, which I think is an important question to be answered, because as I have already said, one large firm of contractors claims that its present financial position is due to a minister of labour changing the rate of wages to be paid to their employees.

Mr. HEENAN: The agreements now in existence contain specific provisions, and this bill will apply only to future contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. That is what I would suppose.

Mr. ADSHEAD: About ten minutes ago I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) a question, and I have not received a reply. I stated that I wholeheartedly supported the bill so far as it went, but that it did not go far enough. Will there be an opportunity on the second reading to offer amendments to the bill?

Mr. HEENAN: Every member of the house will have a right to offer amendments when we are in committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Heenan thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 49, respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works of the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, March 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): The amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to the motion for committee of supply, reads as follows:

That in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

If we wait till the government takes action, we will wait till doomsday, because they have had all the opportunity they want to take action on this matter, and are incapable of doing anything to give relief or adopting any constructive policy.

Last night I was pointing out to the house what had been done in the United States, under the Hoover administration, to deal with the question of unemployment in a constructive manner. I showed that unemployment came under three heads—cyclical, seasonal and technological. By technological unemployment is meant the unemployment caused by the application of new machinery to industry, thereby displacing man power. Professor E. A. Stewart, of the State Agriculture College, university of Minnesota, says:

Machine-farming developments from 1850 to 1920 have released approximately 27,000,000 workers from agriculture. Picture the undeveloped state of our cities, industries, transportation, and above all the entire absence of our modern sanitary and labour-freeing homes if we were still required to produce our agricultural crops as we did one hundred years ago. It takes but little imagination to picture our now beautiful cities, as a peasant country, ground down under long hours of toil, poorly educated people, faced periodically with famine and pestilence, with simple labour-killing homes for our families to live in, if farming were now carried on as it was in 1830.

While our population in 1950 may be six times as great as in 1850, yet it is conceivable and probable that the decrease in the number of farm workers which started to take place in 1910 will continue, and by 1950 no more farm workers will be required to supply food for a population of 150,000,000 than were required in 1850 for a population of 25,000,000.

This shows the inroads that machinery is making on manual labour. Now, the Minister of Labour says to our municipalities: "We have not anything to do with unemployment; go and see the provincial authorities." Then in turn the provincial authorities tell the municipalities, "Go and deal with unemployment yourselves." If the Dominion government is not concerned with unemployment, what is the necessity of a Department of Labour? Surely its function is to protect the working classes, to secure jobs for them, instead of neglecting their interests and forcing them to go in their hundreds of thousands to look for jobs in a foreign land. The federal government through its immigration department spends a vast amount of money in advertising in England and in bringing in immigrants, and then these people are left to shift for themselves. Unemployment means that most of our factories are running only half time while others are closed down altogether. No doubt Canada is a wonderful country, but what are we going to do about this unemployment? It is no good to tell starving men about the great natural resources of the country; they want work to maintain themselves and their families. The unemployed call for bread, and get a stone and no work.

As I said last night, the United States are dealing with this problem of unemployment in a large, constructive way. They are conducting an active warfare not only on seasonal unemployment but on this newer form, known as technological unemployment, brought about mainly by the introduction of machines that supplant the worker. But what is this government doing to solve the problem? They should be in a state of active warfare all the year round against unemployment. In time of war we mobilize all our resources to overcome the common enemy at the gate. Now, in time of peace, let us mobilize all our resources against the economic invader; let us preserve our home market for our own working men. Is the government doing this? No, the pan-American tariff of the government is throwing our workers out on the street. In short, the government say, "We have nothing to do with unemployment; that is a matter for the provinces." No doubt they rely on section 92 of the British North America Act which declares that the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions are in the jurisdiction of the provinces.

There are several causes for the very serious condition of unemployment that we are now passing through. One is the pan-American tariff that I have already referred to. We have been told that Liberalism is the open road. Of course it is. Liberalism is the open road to the United States for many of our workmen as well as for many of our technical and professional men. Last year the Prime Minister told us that in relation to United States tariff matters we must keep a cool head. Now, after a year of this cool-head attitude what is the fiscal policy of the government to-day? It is a cold-feet policy towards the aggression of the United States. Mussolini has said that Italy will pay back the United States in her own medicine; France will do the same. This country? Well, we are suffering from the cool-head-cold-feet tariff policy of the government. We may as well take a leaf out of the book of Mr. Hoover, for all is fair in the race for business. Let us tell the people of the United States that we can no longer continue the one-sided "reciprocity" relationship with that country that we have tolerated for the past twenty-five years. The United States have conducted an economic warfare against this country for the last fifty years, making Canada the dumping ground for their manufactured products in exchange for our raw products and man power; and this man power is of much more importance to the future of this country.

Another cause of the present unemployment is lack of technical education. This government says it has nothing to do with technical education. Then there is the lack of any proper policy of scientific and industrial research. Scientific research does not consist in building a great monument of stone and having a research council with a lot of figureheads—mostly doctors. I have been trying to find out what kind of a doctor Doctor Skelton is; he is in the exterior department. Then we have Doctor Tory, who is a Tory in name only, in the research department. Our policy is all wrong. Let us adopt the policy of the British government in this regard. Instead of frittering away millions of dollars on buildings, let us devote the money to medical science, bio-chemistry and other lines of research by grants to the universities.

The government seem to have a lot of specialists in the immigration department. Well, if they were only as successful in immigration as they have been in emigration I should have no fault to find. The former head of that department has been rewarded with a seat in the other chamber. The only cure the government has provided for unemployment is the "ambassador" cure. We have ambassadors in Washington, Tokyo and Paris, with their first secretaries, their second secretaries, their third secretaries, while thousands of our college graduates have had to go to the United States. The government's tariff policy seems to be that nothing that can be bought in the United States should be manufactured in Canada, especially in eastern Canada; and that everything that cannot be bought from the United States should be imported from Europe especially from Germany. That policy has helped to fill the ranks of the unemployed. There is no unemployment in Germany to-day, nor in France or Italy. Why? Because each of those countries has adopted a constructive fiscal policy. The government have no coal policy. Instead of fifty or sixty million dollars going to the American coal barons it should go into the pockets of the coal miners of Alberta and Wales and the maritime provinces. We have a national railway. What are they doing for unemployment? Their policy of immigration has brought thousands of Europeans into this country.

In the Canadian Pacific Railway system we find Canadians in office, from the top down, but in our government owned system we have many Americans. In the first place, there is Mr. Gaston, a young lawyer from Yale, who is brought in to take the office of vice-president of the Central Vermont line. As a matter of fact, Gaston seems to be a very popular name with the government of this country.

The Minister of Finance claims that he is a low tariff man; the same applies to the Minister of Railways. The Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance seem to be in a low tariff way the Alphonse and Gaston of the prairies. The policy of the government has been that anything that can be bought in the United States must not be bought in Canada, and especially, in eastern Canada. According to this policy if it cannot be bought from the United States, it should be bought from Europe. Is it any wonder that with such conditions we have unemployment in this country?

One of the unfortunate features of unemployment in Canada is that the workers are forced to lower their standard of living. Another feature is that the state of unemployment has the effect of lowering the morale and self respect of the workmen. Unemployment is a problem of industrial organization, and it is not a problem confined to the operations of individuals; it is a persistent factor in modern life. The industries in Canada however, that can give regular employment to their workmen, even in times of prosperity, are few indeed. From a report I have in my hand I find that from one million to six million people are out of work in the United States, one million is the minimum and once it was six million.

When President Hoover was faced with an unemployment situation he called the heads of industries together in order to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem, but we find no such constructive policy adopted by the government of Canada. Instead of the Minister of Labour trying to stem the tide of unemployment, and summoning industrial leaders, he does nothing. As a matter of fact, the government was asked in this house a few days ago if it would hold a conference to relieve the present situation, and it refused.

Unemployment in Canada is the price society is paying for progress, and in many instances it may be traced to efficient management. Many are out of work to-day in this country because of the progress of modern industry, and revolutionary changes in Canada. Unemployment is caused by methods of manufacture which make it no longer necessary to produce goods by manual labour. Out of this condition we find decay in society which formerly was prevented because of the need of labour. The efficient executive finds that by eliminating the service of a certain class of labour he improves and increases his output.

A considerable amount of unemployment occurs at more or less regular intervals. Such a situation is due to business depression, and to seasonal ups and downs. Such unemployment is constant. Men are thrown out of work regularly, and because of this the subject needs constructive treatment. They lose their work because of financial failures which are occurring and the removal of plants from one end of Canada to the other. This situation requires attention. Where is the Minister of Labour? What is he doing, when this situation exists in our country. We have hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat in the western elevators, stored up for distribution on the world market. But what is the situation? We find when the price of wheat goes down, the price of bread remains stationary. What is the Department of Public Works doing towards relieving the unemployment situation? What is being done on the national highways, or on the St. Lawrence waterway?

The Canadian Pacific Railway is doing its part to help unemployment and has voted the sum of $50,000,000 to aid the unemployed and for reconstruction. The Canadian National Railways does not take this as an example, however. Thomas Bradshaw, the president of the Massey Harris Company has returned from Europe, and he advocates a marketing board for Canada; but the government will have nothing to do with it. If we were across the border the president of the United States would not take five minutes to find a cure for the problem which faces us. In Canada, however, we do nothing; we refuse to cooperate with industrial leaders. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the government should set up a commission for this purpose.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, year after year, we in this corner, have tried to bring the question of unemployment to the attention of the house.

I think we have to admit that this year the volume of unemployment is greater than it has been for some years. It seems to me most unfortunate that our statistics show the amount of employment, but give very little indication as to the amount of unemployment. The statistics simply show the number who on a given date are employed, but does not show the number left out. To my mind this is an important item of statistics, and we should have from the Department of Labour the actual statistics as they apply to this subject. There is little doubt, however, that the situation is serious at the present time. A few weeks ago we had a delegation which waited upon the government, composed of officials of nearly all the cities in western Canada; a week or two later there was a similar delegation from the city of Toronto. I need not go into the figures which they presented to the government, as they have been published already in the press. Undoubtedly we have a large amount of unemployment today. Last fall I was through twenty or thirty cities and towns of Ontario, and I found that even some of those places which hitherto had been comparatively free of unemployment were complaining of it at that time.

We may as well face the fact; we have unemployment. I will say very frankly that I would not blame the government for this condition of affairs; unemployment exists not because of administrative defects but rather because of great economic forces over which no government has very much control. The government may and does claim credit for prosperity; I think they take altogether too much credit for prosperity when it exists. I do not much wonder that people who have been taught to praise the government for prosperity will hold the government accountable for hard times when they come, and I think possibly the government will find that out to their sorrow before many months go by. However, as I say, I do not blame the government for this condition; I think we would have a very large measure of unemployment at the present time no matter what government might be in power. Unemployment is not limited to Canada; we have it in the United States to a very large degree, and our conditions are more or less similar to those which exist in that country. We have it in Great Britain as we all know, and we have it in almost every country in Europe. It is a world phenomenon.

Further I should like to say that I think we should get beyond the stage where we say the unemployed are to blame for the condition in which they find themselves. Many are unemployed through no fault of their own. Again and again we hear people getting impatient with the unemployed and regarding them as the next thing to criminals. I quite admit that there are a certain number who are lazy and shiftless, but I would say that laziness is itself one of the outstanding results of unemployment. A man who is out of work or who gets only an occasional job for weeks and weeks is not going to continue to be a very good worker, but the fact is that the great majority of the men who are unemployed to-day were employed when work was available, and they would be employed again if work were forthcoming.

Anyone who has been engaged in social work cannot help but be impressed by the hopelessness of the condition in which the ordinary worker finds himself when out of a job. I have been more or less closely associated with the unemployed of my own city for the past twenty-five years. Sometimes we have had more and sometimes less unemployment, but every year in the winter time we have people who are praying that the spring may come in order that they may earn enough to buy something to eat for themselves and their families. Some years ago I was engaged in institutional work, where little children in the kindergarten were being fed at noon because they had insufficient nourishment at home, and some of them were unable to keep on their stomachs the cocoa that was given them, because having been accustomed to only the poorest kind of food the milk cocoa was too rich for them. I say it is no less than a disgrace in this country that year after year we allow maladjustments of this kind to continue. I have stood in a line with the unemployed, and from the scores whose stories I have learned personally, I know that many of these people are only too glad to get a job if the job offers. I remember one day when a few jobs were being passed out to a crowd of one or two hundred men. One man standing beside me was passed over; he gulped and the tears came to his eyes, and as he turned away he said, "I would not mind so much if it were not for the kids." I sometimes wonder, as we sit here in our comfortable chairs and listen to statistics and talk about great policies, whether we recognize quite clearly enough what this unemployment really means in the terms of human worry and human suffering.

We have to-day men in the building trades employed for only six, seven or at most eight months in the year. What are they to do during the other months? They are absolutely helpless in my part of the world; there are no other jobs offering. When the factories close, as they are closed now in some parts of Ontario, what can the man with a little cottage and a family do? He cannot move out to some other part of Canada; he would be just as badly off if he did so. He has to remain where he is, and his family may suffer. Consider the coal miners in Alberta, from whom I am getting heartbreaking letters almost daily, asking that something be done. If these companies cannot market their coal what is the poor miner to do? He cannot move anywhere else; he has to stay there and suffer, and naturally he looks to some authority to do something for him.

Last fall in my own city and my own constituency, where the Canadian Pacific Railway has very large shops, within a few days nearly a thousand men were laid off. What could these men do? Their families were there, it was the beginning of winter, and they could not possibly move out. The situation became more and more desperate in the little village of Brooklands, which is a part of my constituency, on the outskirts of Winnipeg. The municipality began to help, but the municipality consisted of the people themselves and it was poor. One of the last things I did just before coming to Ottawa was to meet a deputation which came to see me, consisting of the mayor and councillors of this little village, who asked that if it were at all possible something should be done for them in the way of relief. Already most of these men have mortgaged themselves to the limit, and they will have to work all this summer to begin to pay their grocery bills.

In this country we must recognize the fact that a considerable amount of unemployment is seasonal in character. Whether or not we admit it to the outside world, in western Canada at least we have a cold climate, and many kinds of work slacken up or cease altogether when winter comes on. Farm labourers are turned off after the harvest, and these men have nothing else to do. Bush work does not open up until later, and at all events there is not so much bush work offering as there was work for harvesters, so these men drift into the cities and increase the problem with which the cities are already struggling.

But I would say that deeper than any of these things I have mentioned is the fact that the unemployment situation seems to be inherent under the existing capitalistic system. We forget that this system, through which the greater part of the productive machinery is concentrated in the hands of a few, is a comparatively new system in the history of the world. In the old days each individual worked with a few tools, produced for himself and consumed pretty much what he produced, or exchanged his products with his neighbours. I am not going into the history of all that was involved in the industrial revolution, but we all realize that we have an absolutely different state of affairs now from that which existed one hundred or two hundred years ago. Our present system is comparatively new, and we have not yet adjusted many things in it so that they meet the needs of the mass of the people.

Take for example one phase of this situation, the wonderful productivity of the machine to-day. Roger Babson, the well-known statistician, in a recent article in the Cambridge Tribune, stated that since 1914 such progress has been made that to-day thirty men can produce as many motor cars as one hundred men could produce fourteen years ago; forty men can produce as many rubber tires as one hundred men could produce fourteen years ago; in the iron and steel industry forty men can produce what one hundred men produced fourteen years ago; and in metals other than iron and steel sixty men can produce as much as one hundred men could produce fourteen years ago. In varying degrees this is the experience in industry generally. Along this line, I could quote some interesting statistics from the January, 1929, issue of Manufacturing Industries, a copy of which I hold in my hand, but I do not intend to take up the time of the house in doing so. We all recognize how the machine has changed the entire situation, but perhaps most of us have not realized the effect of that change in our own agricultural areas. Let me quote some statistics which a friend of mine procured for me in Saskatchewan, as follows:

On the farms in Saskatchewan, according to the 1926 census, there were 26,674 farm tractors; in 1927, 5,727 tractors were sold; in 1928, 8,703, making a total of 41,104 farm tractors, which means roughly that practically one-third of the farms in Saskatchewan employ tractors. Not only do these tractors apparently displace a number of men but their operation requires men with some mechanical ability and some experience in the operation of tractors, which is evident by the fact that tractor companies conduct schools throughout the province during the winter in the handling and operation of tractors.

In addition to the tractor there is the growing tendency for placing machinery on the farms, as a result of the development of the internal combustion engine and availability of electrical energy. A newer development of farm mechanization is the introduction of the combine. In 1926 there were 148 combines operating in Saskatchewan; in 1927 there were 382; in 1928, 2,679 and the estimate of the Implement Dealers Association for 1929 places the number of combines for this province at between 3,500 and 4,000. Each of these machines will, at a conservative estimate, displace four to six men. They reduce the harvest operation on an ordinary farm, for cutting, stooking and threshing, from a period of possibly ten to fifteen days to five or six days. The total number of these combines in 1928, in the three western provinces was 4,716.

A few years ago immigration was advocated for the west as a means of supplying farm labour, but to a considerable extent that labour is not needed to-day, and in many cases the men brought in are not fitted to do the work which is now required. I wish I had time to give to the house an outline of those books which have become almost standard, such as Tawney's The Acquisitive Society, and Sidney Webb's, now Lord Passfield, The Decay of Capitalist Civilization. I wish hon. members would remember that such social maladies, if I could call them that, as unemployment are part of this system under which we are now living. Some of us are enjoying great privileges under this system; perhaps the whole race is enjoying a higher standard of living, but large numbers of people are suffering because of these maladjustments.

I wish I had time to speak of the larger proportion of production which is going back to fixed capital. A few years ago I mentioned the book of Mr. J. A. Hobson, entitled Economics of Unemployment. He takes the position that although at first our present system may have enabled us to accomplish a great deal more by concentrating wealth in the hands of the few, as this process has gone on and has been extended, not merely to Europe but to almost all parts of the world, we have the phenomenon of a great deal more being produced than the people can purchase, of a very large amount being put back into fixed capital so that the fixed capital is out of all proportion to the commodities produced. That is an economic argument which I think might be considered.

I do not see why we in Canada should not have established a permanent economic commission to carry on research in this particular field. Failing that, it seems to me that we might very well appoint some sort of a joint parliamentary committee, which might sit even between sessions, as I think is done in some parliaments. This committee would be composed of representatives from various parties in the house and would be able to give definite study to questions of this kind.

I do not intend to dwell upon the financial aspects of unemployment, but I would like to quote a paragraph to show what some people think of the underlying financial reforms that might be made. I read from an article entitled Banking Credit and Unemployment as published in the International Labour Review of January, 1924, as follows:

There is a growing school of economists whose attention is mainly directed toward the possibility of stabilizing industrial activity by judicious regulation of the bank credits upon which industry is largely dependent.

And again:

Bank credit, the main agency through which the community may add to its purchasing capacity, might be regulated, not, as previously, in accordance with mechanical and virtually uncontrollable processes, but in accordance with the broadest interests of society as expressed by a scientific combination of indexes of trade and employment.

When one mentions anything of this kind he is apt to be regarded by the house as more or less of a faddist or crank, and yet these views are being put forward by a large and growing school or series of schools of economists. The subject has been thought worthy of study by the League of Nations.

Unemployment in other countries is brought about by their own local conditions, but our difficulties have been aggravated by our immigration policy. Year after year I have tried to impress upon the house the serious condition which exists in the city of Winnipeg. I should like to read a clause or two from a resolution passed last autumn by the city council of Winnipeg, as follows:

Investigations disclose that a large number of those likely to be unemployed during the ensuing winter are immigrants who have been brought into the country within the past two or three years, and also some who have been put out of employment by the newly arrived immigrants for whom there was not sufficient employment without displacing those who were employed at the time of their arrival.

The responsibility is placed clearly, and these figures are borne out by the conditions obtaining in other cities of the west. Another resolution was passed by the city council which I think is rather interesting. Some hon. members may say that it is very socialistic in character, but it was passed by the Winnipeg city council. It reads:

That council petition the Dominion government to take steps to shorten the length of the working day in order that available work be more widely distributed.

Mr. NEILL: What is the date of that resolution?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is signed by the mayor and by the city clerk and was passed early this winter. It is a petition to the governor in council of the Dominion of Canada by the mayor and council on behalf of the citizens of Winnipeg and of the province of Manitoba. I am sorry I have not the exact date.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did you say to lengthen or to shorten the working day?

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

That council petition the Dominion government to take steps to shorten the length of the working day in order that available work be more widely distributed.

We have been told again and again that unemployment is primarily a municipal or provincial responsibility. I quite admit that sixty years ago when a man was out of a job in a little rural area in Ontario or Quebec, this was clearly a local responsibility. I quite admit that in those earlier days when the great part of the population was resident in the country districts or in little villages and dependent upon the country for work, such a matter as unemployment was local in character and naturally would be attended to by the municipalities, helped out in an emergency by the province.

But the situation is entirely changed to-day, and when the Dominion government throws out of equilibrium our population by introducing hundreds of thousands, yes millions of people into this country, the responsibility ceases to be merely local in character and becomes Dominion-wide. Further, as long as the Dominion government so largely controls the country's fiscal policies which may make or unmake an industry, the Dominion government cannot avoid responsibility for ensuing unemployment. It is only in recent years that the present administration has undertaken to refuse all responsibility for social needs of this nature. After the Versailles treaty we find that the report on this subject of the draft conventions was submitted to the Governor General in council on November 2, 1920, by the Minister of Justice and that it was duly concurred in by the council and approved by His Excellency the Governor General on November 6, 1920, as follows:

Recommendation Concerning Unemployed

As to Number 3, the minister observes that the experience of other countries has demonstrated that a system of unemployment insurance, in order to be effective and successful, must be made ancillary or complementary to a system of labour exchanges, the whole being adapted to the principal function of finding work for unemployed insured workmen. In this view,—

And I would like to call special attention to this sentence:

—unemployment insurance has a pronounced federal aspect and on the whole the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance is competent to the Dominion in the exercise of its residuary legislative power with regard to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I for one am getting a little bit tired of being told by the government that almost any proposal is ultra vires. We are informed in case after case that this has been the declaration of some mysterious people—I do not know just who they are—called the law officers of the crown. When we have in 1920 the Department of the Minister of Justice making an important ruling of this kind, it ought not to be lightly set aside. If the British North America Act was drawn up sixty years ago, surely it ought to be the same in its interpretation for at least ten years and not to be dependent upon what one must more or less characterize as political considerations.

In speaking as I do to-day I am representing the views not merely of the Labour group with which I am associated, but of a very large number of citizens of western Canada. I should like to read a paragraph from an editorial from the Manitoba Free Press of January 14, 1930. The Free Press on the whole, I think, has been favourable to the present administration. It says:

Senator Forke did not say anything very useful when he told the United Farmers of Manitoba that immigration was not responsible for unemployment. Technically he is probably right, but more than technicalities are needed to ward off unemployment. Most people will agree with Mr. A. R. MacNamara, Assistant Deputy Minister of Public Works for Manitoba, when he stated that so long as immigration is a federal affair, one of the keys to the unemployment situation lies in federal hands. He is undoubtedly right.

More than this, it is common knowledge that persons have come to this country on assisted passages with a "guarantee" of employment in their hands, and have found on arrival that hard times have made it impossible for the propective employer to give them jobs. What about these new arrivals? Are they a federal responsibility or are they not? There can only be one answer.

As for the Hon. Peter Heenan's contribution to the problem, the less said about it the better. Even if it is true that the provinces in conference in 1927 definitely stated that unemployment relief was a provincial affair, it does not make Mr. Heenan's position as Minister of Labour much better. The fact is that it is not a purely provincial affair. If the provinces say it is, it is up to Mr. Heenan to disabuse them on that point.

I think that is all I need to quote from the Free Press. I heartily subscribe to that view and instead of the Minister of Labour doing as he did a few months ago when he was asked to call a conference on unemployment, trying to sweep away the suggestion, he should have been in the very forefront endeavouring to champion the cause of labour and the unemployed. I would say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has not yet said a word in this debate: He may represent a constituency in western Canada, but he does not understand the spirit of the west if he thinks he can hide behind the British North America Act when such important questions as this are at stake.

Reference has been made by previous speakers to what the Minister of Labour said at London. I would be glad if by his speech he has given the public generally the idea that unemployment insurance in this country is needed. I suppose that would be a gain. I know the impression has gone out that the Dominion government is about to bring in some measure of that kind. A friend of mine in Toronto, who is not a labour man but, as a matter of fact, a financial man, wrote to me a day or two after that speech saying: "I am glad indeed to find out that the Dominion government is taking action along this line. I have written a letter to the Prime Minister to congratulate him on his action." He said—and he was speaking as a financial man—"I have always taken the ground that labour should have its reserve just as capital needs its reserve." There are many people outside the ranks of labour who are coming around to that point of view.

But whilst there may have been an advantage in the Minister of Labour setting a sort of ideal before the people of this country, it is little less than cruel to raise the hopes of the people unless in some way the government is prepared to back up the statement of the Minister of Labour. The Prime Minister is very fond of dilating upon responsible government, its great advantages and how it was attained. If we believe in responsible government and that the cabinet ought to be responsible for what is said by a minister, then the Minister of Labour ought to be held responsible for an important pronouncement such as the one he made at London. He ought not to give to the general public such a statement as that without being prepared to back it up, or if the report is not correct he should officially deny it. I want to read two or three paragraphs from the report of the Canadian Press. This particular item I took from the Toronto Globe, but a similar statement was in nearly all the papers east and west. This report is taken from the Toronto Globe of March 15, 1930, and reads:

Ottawa to Back Project for Unemployment Fund Heenan States at London

The Dominion government is ready to assist the provinces in establishing unemployment insurance for Canada on a contributory basis announced Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, in an address here to-night. In making this announcement, Mr. Heenan said:

"As far as I am concerned, I will utilize my every effort, and the Premier will back me up, to see that the labouring man who is out of work for any period of the year will have a right to expect and to receive a share of the profits he helped make."

Mr. Heenan said that the nature of certain Canadian industries made it inevitable seemingly that there should be seasonal unemployment in certain occupations. The workers who are unemployed for perhaps two or three months of the year constitute an essential unit in the industrial life of the nation for the remaining periods, and the country should recognize their rights, he said. Mr. Heenan amplified his proposal to say that he believed that the worker, the employer, and the governments, provincial and federal, should each bear a part of the cost of such unemployment insurance.

Now I would like to ask, did the Minister of Labour say that? That is reported by the Canadian Press, and from coast to coast, the government was given credit for it. Did the minister make that statement? I hope that he did. If he did, did the Prime Minister state that he would back him up in that policy? I should like to have an answer from the Prime Minister himself before this debate goes very much further.

An hon. MEMBER: From the Minister of Labour.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the Prime Minister ought to state his position, as well as the Minister of Labour. Further than that, there is a definite pronouncement that the Dominion government is prepared to give a certain amount to assist the provincial governments. Just to be accurate, let me read it again:

Mr. Heenan amplified his proposal to say that he believed that the worker, the employer, and the governments, provincial and federal, should each bear a part of the cost of such unemployment insurance.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That evidently would not be a vicious principle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not think that, and I should like the Prime Minister to expatiate a little bit further on what he meant last year by vicious principle. I have read the Hansard only recently, and for the life of me I cannot see anything else than that after mature deliberation the Prime Minister believes that the granting of old age pensions was based on a vicious principle. I believe that he has subsequently denied that, or it is said that he has denied it. I should like him to state frankly what his position is in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very glad to do so now. I thoroughly believe in old age pensions and in all that this government has done to support them. I would ask my hon. friend to produce any statement of mine on Hansard or anywhere else which will bear out his statement that I thought old age pensions were based upon a vicious principle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not the page of Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, and you cannot get it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the Prime Minister permit me to bring it before him later?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but you cannot find it anywhere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I remember distinctly that there was an interruption by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), and the Prime Minister replied. I referred to this last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The interruption my hon. friend is referring to will not bear out what he is saying.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know why my hon. friend should be so anxious to misrepresent me. He knows what my attitude is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister is hardly fair to me. I have not been unfair to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You are unfair to me now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall take the earliest opportunity possible of finding the page in Hansard and reading it, and I shall hope to do this early enough that the Prime Minister may be able to make his statement based on that Hansard record. I do not want to be unfair to the Prime Minister. What I thought was simply this: As the years have gone on, the Prime Minister has been so busy emphasizing the necessity of placing responsibilities on the provinces, that he has gradually come to the point where he feels that it would not be a good principle for the Dominion government to hand over grants to the provinces in the way that was done under the Old Age Pensions Act. If that is not the case, why I shall be delighted, because it may mean that the door will be open and that we may get other types of social insurance. I would say to the Prime Minister —he may think that I have no right to make the suggestion—that from the political standpoint he could not do anything better in this country than to grant some relief to the tens of thousands of people who are to-day having a very hard time through lack of employment. I am not particular whether that relief comes from the Liberals or the Conservatives. We in our little corner are too small a group to hope to be in a position for a great many years to come to bring in a money measure. We cannot do that, but we do urge one of the older parties that has the necessary numerical strength to do it. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour to place very clearly before this house and the people of this country what their policy really is. I do not think it is fair that despatches of the kind I have read, should go out through the press to the people of this country from coast to coast, and then when we try to pin the speakers down to declare what they really mean to do, we get an evasive reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made a frank reply to my hon. friend in the house, in answer to a question that he put to me. He knows that it is on Hansard. There is no evasion. It is as clear as day.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Labour says exactly the opposite of what the Prime Minister says.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister's statement was clear, but it was not the same type of statement that he made the day before in the room where the deputation was being heard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The statement was identically the same, and again I challenge my hon. friend to point to any authoritative source which will indicate that there is any difference. My hon. friend is not fair. He is not following his usual custom; I will say that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to be fair. I shall be glad to have this matter cleared up. I was present and heard the Prime Minister. We had no official Hansard there, but a great many people came out from the meeting under the impression that something would be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Something very different from what my hon. friend is now saying.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then the next day the Prime Minister refused, as he rightly said, to commit himself to definite action. But a few weeks later, the Minister of Labour goes out and says something very different from what the Prime Minister has said, and the Prime Minister so far has not repudiated what the Minister of Labour says.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Labour will make his own statement. My hon. friend was referring to me, and I was referring to what he said about me. He can find nothing on record anywhere to support what he says is my attitude with regard to old age pensions or unemployment insurance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister knows as well as any member of this house that on the theory of the collective responsibility of the cabinet, no responsible minister can make a general pronouncement of policy without committing the cabinet itself. The Prime Minister has not repudiated what the Minister of Labour has said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not heard the Minister of Labour yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have read to-day the statement, in quotation marks, of the Minister of Labour that went out over the Canadian Press wires, and the Minister of Labour himself has not repudiated that statement. I want to get this situation cleared up. I should like the public to know whether the government does or does not intend to do anything along the line of unemployment insurance. If it does not, I think the people of this country will turn to somebody who will. On the other hand, if the government intends to go ahead with a scheme, some of us here are prepared to back them up to the limit. But we should like to know, and the public has a right to know, what the government proposes to do.

I do not want to go into the details of unemployment insurance. May I say simply that it is generally recognized the world over that under the existing system, with the evils and maladjustments that have arisen, it has become essential that until some better system is brought in, some sort of unemployment insurance should be provided. Here let me give credit to the Prime Minister; he agrees with that position. Well then, I ask, what action may we expect the government to take at this time?

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with a great deal—

An hon. MEMBER: Let us have the Minister of Labour—Heenan.

An hon. MEMBER: The member for Winnipeg South Centre has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let us have Heenan.

Mr. THORSON: I agree with a great deal of what has been said by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

An hon. MEMBER: It is time we heard from the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. THORSON: With him I agree as to the necessity of a scheme of unemployment insurance. I believe in unemployment insurance, not as a panacea for unemployment, but as a means whereby the evils of it might be very considerably lessened. One of the most comprehensive editorials that has been written on this subject appeared in the columns of the Manitoba Free Press shortly after the unemployment conference that took place in Winnipeg in January of this year. May I quote one or two paragraphs from that editorial? It says:

> The idea that unemployment can be entirely cured or prevented will not be entertained by anyone who recognizes the effect that economic changes and the invention of new machinery have had in the past, and will have in the future, in displacing labour, and who also remembers the weakness of human nature and the measure of incompetence and improvidence that it contains. The problem will always continue, and it is a question of reducing it as far as we can. In seriously attempting this, no one will imagine that it can be accomplished by any single panacea. The problem must be attacked in many different ways and success will largely depend upon general cooperation.

I believe the statement that unemployment will always be with us is particularly true of a country subject to the climatic conditions that obtain in Canada. The editorial proceeds:

> Although unemployment cannot be completely cured, the conscience of the present generation is impelling it to make the most intelligent and most resolute attempt to reduce the problem to much smaller limits.

In common with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, I agree that a system of unemployment insurance will have the effect of reducing the problem to very much smaller limits than those that exist at the present time. The editorial goes on:

> The community hears the cry of the women and children and realizes the worry of men who are unable to help their suffering dependents It knows that unemployment begets poverty with all the unhappy social effects flowing from it. Apart from human compassion, there is the fact that the unemployment of labour is an economic loss and also that the conditions arising from unemployment result, directly or indirectly, in heavier demands upon our general hospitals, mental hospitals and jails.

Then the editorial goes on to consider where the responsibility rests:

> What is the responsibilty of the Dominion, the provinces, and the municipalities? And in what way should they cooperate? The Dominion government cannot divest itself of a measure of permanent responsibility,—

With that statement I entirely agree.

> —at least whenever unemployment becomes very acute in any section of the country. Apart from the duty of helping any part of the Dominion when there is real trouble there on a large scale, there are two counts on which the federal government has a responsibility for unemployment. It has control of immigration and the influx of more people than the country can absorb is sometimes the cause of unemployment. It is undoubtedly partly the cause of the present difficulty. Another ground for Dominion responsibility is that there are many ex-service men among the unemployed and some of them are there as a result of war service. If it were left entirely to the provinces and the municipalities to deal with unemployment, and if one province did so more adequately than another, it would be inviting the unemployed to come to that province. With federal cooperation the provinces would all be better able to meet the situation and this trouble would not arise.
> The Dominion then has a certain definite responsibility and should be ready to cooperate whenever unemployment becomes too great a burden for the municipalities and provinces. How can that cooperation be given? It can provide work by proceeding with public works and by having the government railway system make a special effort to proceed with improvements. And it can also contribute a percentage of the cost of unemployment relief that is undertaken locally. It may be a bad principle, as Premier King says, for the Dominion to make grants to the provinces and lose control of the spending of the money, but it is a practical expedient which is necessary to meet serious unemployment situations.

So much for Dominion responsibility. Then the editorial deals with the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities:

> The provinces have a responsibility because there is always a certain drift of the unemployed within the province, particularly to the larger centres, and the burden cannot fairly be left to them to bear. And the unemployment of their own people is sometimes so great in some municipalities that they have a proper claim upon the province for assistance. The municipalities, of course, are brought directly face to face with the problem. They cannot evade it because it is pressing upon them and they must cope with it as best they can, and with all the cooperation they can obtain. But unemployment is often due to general rather than local causes, and it is unreasonable to leave too great a burden upon the municipalities.
> What can the municipalities and the provinces do to lessen unemployment? They can encourage such developments as will ensure a large element of stability of employment. The fact that many of the unemployed in Winnipeg this winter have been farm workers shows that the encouragement of mixed farming, which would keep more farm workers employed all the year, is one practical way of stabilizing employment in Manitoba. The municipalities and the province can also deliberately plan to have as much work available in the winter as possible. Are there other ways in which the Dominion, the provinces or the municipalities can cope with the problem?

Then the editorial deals with the responsibility of employers with regard to unemployment:

The railways, manufacturers, public service corporations, and other employers also have a very definite responsibility to maintain the greatest stability of employment possible and to avoid, wherever possible, the laying off of workers for certain periods. They cannot, in this generation, treat their workers simply like equipment that can be used or laid aside when not required. They must have regard, and must feel a direct responsibility, for the welfare of their workers. A great deal has been accomplished when there was a real effort towards stability of employment, and great hardship and suffering have often resulted from the lack of such effort. The principle should be accepted of every industry or business endeavouring to carry all its permanent employees and making that a charge against the business.

The editorial proceeds with a statement which I think is very important, and with which I entirely agree. It is this:

Finally unemployment insurance must be regarded as one inevitable means of dealing with seasonal unemployment in Canada. Under our constitution, apparently, it must be undertaken by the provinces. Should the constitution be amended to enable the Dominion to contribute, since the Dominion has a responsibility in the matter? With the workers, the employers and the government sharing the cost, the workers would be protected against the annual loss and hardship due to winter unemployment. It would be one of the most effective means of dealing with the situation.

I do not propose to analyze the causes of unemployment, or to lay down any rules that ought to be followed in any attempt towards a solution of the problem. I doubt whether the problem will ever be solved, in our present state of distribution of the proceeds of labour and of our national wealth. There are some things, however, which are not the causes of unemployment. The editorial goes on to say:

It is hardly necessary to say that unemployment in Canada or elsewhere is too serious a matter to be treated as a partisan political issue. The suggestion that the problem can be solved simply by raising the tariff and giving greater protection to Canadian producers is answered by referring to the situation in the United States, highly protected and yet with some 3,000,000 workers now unemployed; or to Australia, whose tariff has been raised from time to time for the specific purpose of offsetting unemployment but whose new government finds that unemployment is still very serious, and proposes to apply the old remedy although a recent royal commission expressed the opinion that, while the tariff had been beneficial to Australia, it had been raised too high and was hampering and injuring the country. There is no such cure for unemployment. It must be attacked in various other ways. It is an urgent human problem that demands the best thought that can be given it, and the most practical forms of cooperation that can be devised.

This house has placed itself on record on a number of occasions as being in favour of the principle of unemployment insurance. Reference has been made from time to time to the powers of the Dominion on the one hand, and of the provinces on the other, in regard to this matter. Much as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre may deplore the fact, the British North America Act is of importance in connection with this subject. May I indicate wherein the difficulty lies? I do not think there is any constitutional objection to the Dominion government participating in the cost of unemployment insurance, in so far as that cost ought to be borne by the state. The Dominion government now contributes to the cost of old age pensions, and it could with equal right contribute to the cost of unemployment insurance. There is a constitutional difficulty, however, that is fastened upon us by the British North America Act; we are subject to certain restrictions. I use the expression "fastened upon us" advisedly, because it frequently happens that our federal system is an absurd arrangement so far as national progress and development are concerned. I would not be in favour of any scheme of unemployment insurance which is not based upon compulsory contributions towards the cost of it by the employer on the one hand, the workman on the other, with the state as a third contributing party. There is no doubt whatsoever that it is beyond the constitutional powers of this parliament to enact a scheme of unemployment insurance which can effectively compel employers and workmen to contribute to the cost of such a scheme.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would it not be possible that the Dominion government could say that if such a scheme were set up it would be willing to make a contribution?

Mr. THORSON: I am coming to that phase of the question. No scheme of contributory unemployment insurance can be validly effected, in so far as it is a general scheme, without the cooperation of the provinces in the project. Therefore, while there is undoubtedly a large measure of responsibility for unemployment resting upon the federal government, there is also the necessity of having the provinces enter into such a scheme, because no scheme of unemployment insurance is likely to be accepted by this country unless it is contributory in its character. We must admit that it is beyond the legislative powers of this parliament validly to enact such a contributory scheme.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It would be a scheme which would be dependent upon concurrent contributions, in the manner the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, and the cooperation of the provinces would be necessary.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the hon. gentleman think it is the duty of the federal government to initiate that very thing?

Mr. THORSON: I would be very strongly in favour of the Dominion government initiating such a scheme.

The situation I have described was realized by those who drew one of the resolutions that was presented to the unemployment conference held recently in Winnipeg. The resolution to which I refer was moved by Thomas E. Moore, an alderman of the city of Fort William, and seconded by Thomas W. Malloy, who represented the government of Saskatchewan. The text of the resolution is as follows:

> Whereas after an exhaustive enquiry by a committee of the federal government recommendation was made for the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme for the whole Dominion; and
> Whereas the law officers of the crown expressed the opinion that under the British North America Act the federal government cannot inaugurate such a scheme; and
> Whereas there is urgent necessity for the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme;
> Therefore be it resolved that this conference endorses the principle of unemployment insurance, and urges the calling of an inter-provincial and federal conference at the earliest possible date for the consideration of the adoption of a Dominion-wide scheme.

There are various methods that might be adopted in setting up such a scheme. We might follow, for example, the course we took when we enacted the Old Age Pensions Act. We set up the machinery for the administration of the old age pension system, and then said, in effect, to each of the provinces, "You may come into this scheme; you may apply it to your province or not as you choose." We might follow a similar course with regard to inaugurating a system of unemployment insurance. One of the difficulties with regard to such a proposal was voiced at the unemployment conference in Winnipeg last January when Mr. MacNamara, assistant deputy minister of public works for Manitoba, said:

> I firmly believe that no city or province dare work out a comprehensive unemployment scheme without making that city or that province the Mecca for the unemployed beyond its boundaries. Any scheme must be undertaken in all parts simultaneously. It has been suggested that unemployment insurance is the cure. Fancy any one province undertaking a scheme like that on its own.

[Mr. Thorson.]

That is one of the difficulties of setting up a scheme similar to the one that we set up with regard to old age pensions. Much hesitation might be shown by any one province in being the first to come into such a scheme.

The suggestion has been made, however, by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), that we might in this parliament set up machinery of the sort which I have indicated, and provide that it should not come into operation until three or four or five of the provinces have indicated their willingness to enter into such a scheme. That course of procedure, I think, would meet the difficulty which Mr. MacNamara suggests and at the same time would bring about the necessary cooperation between the Dominion on the one hand and the provinces on the other. With that suggestion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg I quite agree. I would like very much indeed to see proper steps taken towards the calling of an interprovincial and federal conference with a view to instituting such a scheme of unemployment insurance as that which I have endeavoured to outline.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River)): Nor with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson), who has just spoken.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Perhaps not, but my hon. friend does not know yet what I am going to say. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre when he says that the cause of unemployment is the introduction of improved machinery.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not put it in just that way. I suggested that the improved machinery did bring about immediately a certain amount of unemployment, that it was one of the contributory causes.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We will let it go at that. The introduction of machinery has had this effect. It has made production cheaper and has made it possible for a smaller number of men to produce the same amount of wealth. When we say that the introduction of improved machinery and methods brings about unemployment, we place ourselves in the position which the workmen took two or three centuries ago when the loom and the spinning jenny were invented. They thought these machines were going to take away their employment; therefore they proceeded to destroy them.

Mr. CAHAN: And so they did for the time being.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): For the time being, but in the long run the result was more employment, and it was possible for the world to sustain a larger population in a greater degree of comfort because of the existence of those machines.

Mr. STEVENS: Kindergarten stuff.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Perhaps so, but my hon. friend would not be any worse for a little kindergarten teaching. I cannot agree with my hon. friend, either, when he says that a shorter day will solve the problem.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Again that is hardly what I said. I read a resolution passed by the Winnipeg city council, urging upon the government a shorter working day.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Do you not approve of it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I do, but I do not say that would solve the problem.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): But you approve of the suggestion. Well, in my opinion a shorter working day would mean less wealth created in the world, less wealth for the people to consume; less food; less clothing, less of all the things that go to make real wealth, and therefore you would only aggravate the condition.

Mr. HEAPS: Then why not work a fourteen-hour day?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If it could be demonstrated that by working a fourteen-hour day we could produce more than in a ten-hour day, I think we would be better off to do so. However, what I want to deal with at the present time is the particular condition in Canada at the moment, rather than unemployment in general.

I think at least hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that there is more unemployment in Canada to-day than there has been for some years past. What is the reason for it? The primary reason is that we had very poor crops last year. Railway employees were laid off and have been out of employment all winter, because there has been no wheat to move. Not only were railway employees laid off for that reason, but factory workers are also out of employment from the same cause. Those farmers who had wheat to sell found that the price had gone so low that when they had paid their necessary out of pocket expenses nothing was left for themselves. The purchasing power of the farmer has disappeared; he is not buying. If you would restore employment in this country the first thing to do is to restore the purchasing power of the farmer.

It has been suggested—in fact all the suggestions have been—that we should adopt some form of unemployment insurance, the cost of which would be contributed to by the workers, by the employers and by the government. I have no objection to any form of unemployment insurance which is to be supported by the workers themselves and their employers, but when you ask the government to contribute to the cost of that insurance I object.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I will tell you why. The unemployment situation has been worse during the last six months than it was the previous six months. It got worse in the fall, when it was found there was a very small crop to move, and that that crop had brought the farmer very little purchasing power. These men who were laid off had been employed for the previous six months, and were paid for every day they worked. The farmer worked the whole year. He did not receive his wages every week or every month. When the end of the season came he found that he was getting nothing for his year's work, and when you ask the government to contribute to an unemployment scheme you are asking that farmer, that man who for a whole year has been unemployed so far as receiving wages is concerned, to contribute to the support of a man who has been paid wages for at least six months.

Mr. HEAPS: If the farmer has nothing how could he contribute anything?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is a very clever remark. I say the purchasing power of the farmer has gone. The farmer who had some wheat found that when he paid the necessary out of pocket expenses, that is, his threshing charges, his taxes and such things, nothing was left. The government takes a toll on everything that farmer buys, and out of that revenue it is proposed to pay a part of the cost of this unemployment insurance. The government has taken that toll from him and will continue to take it every time he buys anything.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask one question. Is my hon. friend opposed to the idea of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which is unemployment insurance when that unemployment is caused by disability?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Not necessarily, but that is another question entirely.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask a question, which I think my hon. friend will not say is another matter entirely. Is he in favour of the provincial government backing the possible losses of the farmers through the wheat pool guarantee and is that not a possible contribution by unemployed labour as well as by farmers?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is another question entirely. I say that it is a rank injustice, and I protest against asking a man who has worked for a whole year and who has received no return for that labour to contribute to the support of a man who has been out of work for only six months. I have seen a farmer sell his entire crop at the end of the season and after paying his out of pocket expenses take every dollar of what was left and give it in wages to his hired man. I have seen that hired man go into the city and within two months he was flat broke, and I protest against the farmer being taxed to contribute towards the support of a man like that for the rest of the winter.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Sir Eugène Fiset): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. MANION: Are we not going to have a statement from the government?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it is rather a pity at this stage of this debate to find there is to be no answer from the government to an amendment to go into supply, which is practically a vote of want of confidence. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) sits mum, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) sits mum, and no effort is made, except the smiles of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to answer the amendment put forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps).

The government is going to sit there and manoeuvre politically to see what it can do to wiggle out of the situation in which it finds itself. It would almost let the question be put rather than answer the arguments made by the hon. member who proposed the amendment. It would let the unemployed tighten their belts a little bit more before it would enunciate to the country a policy which might relieve the situation. This session has taken the cake as far as political manoeuvring is concerned. The government has on more than one occasion sat back in order to see if it were possible to get hold of something apart from the general administration of the affairs of the country upon which it could hang an election issue. We have one instance after another which demonstrates its efforts to get away from the maladministration of affairs and to centre the attention of the people upon some side issue. The Minister of Justice looks towards me, and I suppose he would like me to talk about something which would be of interest to him.

The Prime Minister has intimated in previous years that he would bring down some legislation on divorce. After sidestepping several efforts which were made to force him to keep his promise, he asks an hon. member from Winnipeg to introduce a resolution and then, when the vote comes on, he asks the hon. member who sits directly opposite me to vote first, so that the press gallery and the country would not have the idea the government was taking any particular position upon the question raised in the house, as that question had been raised by a private member. The Prime Minister squirmed in his seat, he snapped his fingers and sent a message over that this gentleman should rise first and the government would have no responsibility for the issue, even though the promise had been made a year previous that legislation would be brought down. An effort was made to divert the attention of the people from the administration of this government, and the members of the house almost were challenged to make an issue with regard to the resolution brought in on the customs report. Members were told, "If you do not do such and such a thing and adopt this export bill, we will ask the country about it." Ask the country about anything and everything except the record of your administration during the last few years. The government will sit there and receive the benefit of the discussion upon this unemployment question and will not make any answer to the resolution which is equivalent to a vote of want of confidence. The government is enabled to pick out what valuable suggestions have been made, and then I suppose some member of the government will make a reply Do you call that following the mother of parliaments? Do you call that solidarity of government, when your back-benchers are put up to state their opinions before an official reply is made? As I understand a solid government it is one which, when challenged, immediately states its position in order that the other hon. members may know what it is. I suppose the government will state its position at the end of this debate when it has heard the representations made from all sides of the house as to what is best to be done.

Coming to the question under review, there is no doubt that considerable unemployment exists. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, unemployment has been worse during the last six months than it was for the previous six months. It has been worse during the last six months than it was on January 28, 1926, when the hon. Minister of Justice rose in his place and stated:

—but the government is willing in case of serious emergency, when a grave situation exists, to cooperate with the provincial and local authorities, and to bear a share of relief work or other relief measures which have to be adopted to meet a serious situation of that character, and we shall ask parliament to give us authority to that effect.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) will admit that the situation is worse to-day than it was in 1926. If this condition exists, why was not something done when deputations came from all parts of Canada and asked this government to participate in unemployment relief in order to relieve an emergency. Not only did the government know about this condition, but during the months of December of last year and January of this year the press of the country were bringing this to the attention of the government. Even that good friend of the government, the Ottawa Citizen, had something to say in December. They reported:

Never before in the history of the city has the Union Mission, the hostel for indigent men, been so crowded at this season of the year as it is to-day.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave us the situation in Winnipeg. Four thousand single men and some four hundred married men with their families are being fed by the province and the municipality at Edmonton. The government knew that such a condition existed during December and January, but what is their answer to this plea? Statistics, the index figure of unemployment for September, October, and so on. It is claimed that this is not a federal responsibility but is a matter for the provinces. I think it was the Prime Minister who said that it was first for the individual, then the municipality, then the province, then the government. In other words, the individual who may be in a hopeless and helpless position due to unemployment has to wait until his municipality is in that same position; the municipality in turn is forced to wait until the provincial government has reached that stage; then when they have all reached that state of chaos this government will rise to the occasion and offer assistance for the relief of the situation. Is that fair? We are all one people.

[Mr. Harris.]

In my opinion, before the hopeless individual finds himself helpless, policies should be enunciated; not economic argument but economic action to relieve the conditions in this country is what the hopeless and helpless individual wants and it is what the members of the government are on the treasury benches for. They are there to give us economic action, to see that these men are not left in this condition. When they are left in this condition through the world situation, the collapse of the stock market and—I will not say wheat pool manipulations but wheat pool activities, then the Minister of Justice, according to his utterance of January, 1926, can come to the relief of the situation, and parliament, I am satisfied, will endorse what is done.

A deputation from the city of Toronto, from which I come, visited Ottawa and made a few modest representations to the cabinet. We told them of $300,000 being spent to relieve the unemployment in Toronto. We told them that never before in the history of that city did the House of Industry provide so many meals for men out of work. We told the cabinet that all we wanted them to do was to participate in the extra cost involved in the carrying on of necessary work. We told them we had the assurance of the provincial government that they would pay their share and all we asked was the cooperation of the Dominion government in paying for the extra cost of carrying on works which will be done this summer. But no, the answer we got was more statistics, more bluebooks, more employment indices. In the meantime the taxpayers of that great city are paying into the treasury and the treasury in turn is paying out to the House of Industry a sum which will amount to more than $300,000 and which will make it that much more difficult for industry to continue, that much more difficult for the citizens to carry on.

The problem has been before the government; the government has taken no action and a great deal of the responsibility rests with it. Of course there has been a great deal of unemployment in other countries. Hon. gentlemen on the other side who will follow me will no doubt tell us all about the difficulties in the country to the south; but in that country they realized the difficulties; they saw what was happening. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) told us last night and again to-day that the United States federal government, instead of waiting until the situation was at the fag end before taking action, called together the leaders of industry and of agriculture, and then they took action. Public works to the extent of $175,000,000 and road work to the extent of $125,000,000 were started, and after the conference of those industrialists and agriculturists the inspiration came from the top for everyone in every vocation in life, industrial and agricultural, to try to take the slack out of the unemployment situation, the result being that leadership in the time of crisis made it much easier for the people of that country to carry on.

I want in my remarks to divide the question of unemployment into two parts—unemployment and underemployment. Unemployment in Canada is seasonal and also due to world conditions, but with us now—to a more marked extent than at any other time I can remember since coming to the house—is the under-employment situation, and I charge that this is directly due to the policies that are being carried out by the present administration. I will support that argument by bluebooks, statistics and figures which the government have been handing out to the public. Industry finds herself working two, three, four and five days a week, instead of a full week with a full pay envelope. Why is industry in this condition at this particular time? Because inroads are being made into the products of her manufacture from countries which, not satisfied with economic argument, are taking economic action whereby goods cannot enter their country but they are able to export goods to this country. I see that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) is taking an interest in this debate, and before he leaves the house I should like to put on record a few figures with regard to importations, which are increasing as one year succeeds another and are replacing the handicraft of the artisans who are trying to find a livelihood in our Canadian industries. I will eliminate from these figures agriculture, vegetable and all animal products—I will deal with them later—and I will stick rigidly to the other schedules. The last leaflet that came to me from the Department of National Revenue is in my room, but I copied some figures from it and I am giving now the imports for the ten months ending January on all classes of commodities other than agriculture, vegetable and animal products.

Year	Value of Imports
1922	$ 432,000,000
1923	476,000,000
1924	552,000,000
1925	476,000,000
1926	549,000,000
1927	628,000,000
1928	654,000,000
1929	781,000,000
1930	807,000,000

Or almost double in those groups which are the basis of industrial production in this country. In spite of the fact that we have depression, that our people are not able to buy luxuries, that those who went down in the stock market have not the money to buy, our purchases from abroad have increased from $432,000,000 to $807,000,000 since 1922. In like manner our imports of everything for the ten months ending January of each year show a similar state of affairs. Ever since the policy of the present administration first got a start, there has been an increase right along the line of imports of those products which take away from the workingmen of this country the chance to earn a livelihood. I will not talk about wheat. Some hon. gentlemen profess to know more about wheat than some of the rest of us do. I will talk about something I know a little about that is in the agricultural line; I refer to fresh vegetables. In the production of fresh vegetables a great deal of work is required. Let us see what the picture is with regard to the imports for the ten months ending January:

Fresh Vegetables—Importations
10 Months Ending January

1922	$ 2,862,198
1923	3,071,268
1924	3,313,774
1925	3,528,026
1926	3,593,368
1927	3,949,578
1928	4,916,836
1929	5,615,891
1930	6,746,438

There is a steady increase without exception in regard to fresh vegetables; and I am speaking about something everyone knows about, just the simple things such as onions, carrots, potatoes and tomatoes. There is a steady increase in each and every year from $2,800,000 in 1922 to $6,746,438 for the ten months period ending January, 1930. This is the product of work which has been performed in another country and which has been shipped into Canada, thereby displacing the work of our own citizens who want to employ themselves in market gardening surrounding large centres of population.

Figures of a similar character are shown for vegetables of all kinds. In 1922 we imported vegetables of all kinds amounting to $4,075,575, and in 1930, $9,075,231. In other words, we imported two and a quarter times as much in 1930 as in 1922. That means two and one-quarter times less amount of work to be done in the market gardens surrounding our large centres of population, two and one-quarter times as much more unemployment, because, of necessity, these people who are thrown out of work as a result of these importations come into the cities and make it more difficult for those already there to find work.

While this is going on with regard to our imports, we find that another element of employment is being destroyed due to a lack of policy on the part of this administration, due to the failure of the government to recognize what is actually happening in this country with regard to our exports. You hear hon. gentlemen talk about the export of raw materials and of finished goods, and of how much labour is incorporated in the goods that are finished and shipped out of this country. Some hon. members of this house who are wont to think only in terms of grain and live stock and agricultural produce will have something real to think about when I give them these few figures. Canada's export trade in animal products is disappearing; indeed it is hardly too much to say that in most products it has already disappeared. I have here a table showing the net exports or imports of animals and animal products for the years 1920 and 1929:

	1920	1929
Cattle (live) No. . .	234,663	162,100
Sheep and lambs (live) No. . . .	181,213	11,000
Beef, lbs.	63,364,000	26,530,000
Cheese, lbs.	142,287,000	114,000,000
Pork, lbs.	76,100,000	17,458,000
Mutton and lamb, lbs.	1,256,000	—3,829,000
Butter, lbs.	12,256,000	—34,528,000

—indicates imports.

The point I am trying to make is this: The difference between exporting grain and exporting animals and animal products is largely one of labour, or employment. I know it has also to do with the consumption of food, but a good deal of the difference is accounted for by labour. If these men who now flock to our cities were given a fair opportunity to stay on the farm and develop mixed farming, they would not concentrate in the urban centres, only to make the employment problem more acute.

In 1920 we exported 63,364,000 pounds of beef; in 1929 we exported 26,530,000 pounds. In 1920 we exported 142,287,000 pounds of cheese, and last year 114,000,000 pounds. Of pork, we exported in 1920, 76,100,000 pounds, and last year 17,000,000 pounds. Now I will give the figures with respect to mutton and butter; and the advocates of the New Zealand treaty will please note these figures very carefully. We exported in 1920, 1,256,000 pounds of mutton, and in 1929 our net exports were minus 3,829,000 pounds. I hope the giggler in the back row over there will convey to his constituents the significant of that minus figure, along with the next figure that I shall give. In 1920 we exported 12,256,000 pounds of butter, and in 1929, we imported 34,528,000 pounds.

The point I make is this: The difference between exporting grain and exporting these other commodities is very largely one of labour, and it is labour which is carried on the year round. Throw this labour out of employment by increasing exports of grain only, and they flock to the large centres of population to find work there, and if they are unable to find work there, they have to live on the municipality. This condition I say is chargeable to the lack of policy on the part of the administration, which has failed to prevent our markets being flooded with products which we are quite able to produce ourselves.

The dairy industry, as all hon. gentlemen know, is demoralized. These figures say so. But that is not all that suffers when the butter industry is more or less demoralized. Something else goes to pieces along with it. What is that something else? When the production of pork and the production of bacon for our home consumption goes down—the tourist trade is an extra consumption with which I shall deal later—our exports go down with it. Our exports of pork and pork products declined from 76,100,000 pounds in 1920 to 17,473,000 pounds in 1929, and that situation is due to the fact that we allow butter to come in here instead of ourselves being an exporter of butter and we have no buttermilk for hogs.

What do we find with regard to those countries that are at an advantage as compared with Canada? The hogs slaughtered for export in New Zealand reached 150,000 head during the year ended October 31, 1929, against 5,000 head in 1923-24. Again I say, the difference between producing and exporting grain, and producing hog and hog products, or producing cheese, is very largely one of labour, or employment, and the effect on the employment situation of the treaty with New Zealand, increasing, as it has, our imports from that country, has been most serious.

What are we going to do about it? How are we going to relieve the situation? I say that the only way to relieve the situation is, not by economic argument, but by economic action, and I ask this government to face the question fairly and squarely and not try to steer the people up a side alley, as they are wont to do, with regard, for instance, to divorce and liquor, and perhaps unemployment insurance. It is not unemployment insurance that this resolution speaks of; it deals with unemployment, so do not try to divert the people's attention from what the real issues are, issues that are staring us in the face, and see to it that when the people have a chance to vote, they will vote on the record of this administration. Stop the political manoeuvring. Be a little fairer with the people who have sent you here to legislate for them, and give them a fair chance with other countries the world over. When I say other countries, I need only refer to the latest bulletin of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and quote one or two figures of the imports and exports of almost any country you may choose. I find, for instance, that from Czechoslovakia for the twelve months ended January, 1929, we imported $3,133,899 worth of goods, and in 1930, $3,828,018 worth; our exports to that country in 1929 were $1,843,522, and last year, only $606,000. Our imports from Germany jumped by ten per cent in 1930 as compared with 1929, and our exports to Germany declined from $47,000,000 in 1929 to $29,000,000 in 1930. These countries seem to have sense enough to take care of themselves. The United States, the same day that you make them a present of $10,000,000 of the excise taxes of this country, bring down a tariff measure which tends to shut off $75,000,000 of our exports to them. They have the sense to take economic action to protect their own interests. It is time that more of my free trade friends, even my friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young), woke up to the situation that Canada should take care of herself in fiscal matters.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Has my hon. friend any figures showing the total of our exports to and our imports from all countries?

Mr. CANTLEY: The tariff board will give you that.

Mr. BENNETT: The consumers league.

Mr. HARRIS: I have not the question very clearly in my mind, but I can give my hon. friend a ready reference.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I prefer to make the question clear to my hon. friend. He has quoted our exports and our imports to and from certain countries. Could he give us our total exports to all countries and our total imports from all countries? That would give us a better idea how we stand.

Mr. HARRIS: I do not know that I can, but the file is quite open to my hon. friend. I will give him information along a line that he knows something about—our exports of butter. He comes from a constituency that knows something about butter. Our exports of butter are not exports but imports of 34,528,000 pounds.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That does not prove anything at all.

Mr. HARRIS: It does prove that the butter industry of this country is demoralized.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It does not.

Mr. HARRIS: Beef, 26,530,000 pounds, plus. But nine short years ago it was 63,000,000 pounds. What is the answer to that?

An hon. MEMBER: More beef is being eaten in this country.

Mr. HARRIS: The answer to that is unemployment on the farms of this country during the winter months.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It means our teeth are more active.

Mr. HARRIS: Cattle, sheep and lamb: we exported this year 11,000. You could almost herd them in this room. Nine short years ago we exported 181,000. What about that? The answer is that the men who should be on the farm the year round helping at mixed farming are out of a job; they have to come to the city. If my hon. friend will take the statistics all the way through he will find the same situation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 46, to incorporate the Premier Life Insurance Company—Mr. Dubuc (Chicoutimi) for Mr. Mercier (Laurier-Outremont).

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

The house resumed from March 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 20, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and the annulment of marriage.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, at nine o'clock on Friday evening I was discussing the second reading of the bill, and had reached that point in my remarks where I was directing attention to the fact that in a great many cases before the Senate committee, paid agents were used to gather evidence. I think that very often agents are used whose evidence might be questioned in courts of law.

Another point I intended to bring out was that anybody from the provinces of Ontario or Quebec who wished to procure a divorce through this parliament had first of all to go to a local lawyer, and then obtain an agent in Ottawa. Such procedure makes it more costly to obtain a divorce through this house than through a court of law. Further, if a divorce bill is turned down this year, the same bill may be brought up next year. If sufficient lobbying is not done it may not be passed the next year, and the result is that it has to be considered again and again. Had such a case gone to a court of justice and the judge ruled against it, it is questionable whether the case would be reheard. The judges in the divorce courts will not endeavour in any way to encourage divorce, and will conduct their cases in such a manner that the litigants must be very sure of their ground before instituting proceedings.

The committee of parliament in charge of divorce can rule only as to the dissolution of the marriage, it cannot grant alimony; it cannot rule on the disposition of the children, and no doubt in connection with many cases that come before the committee family troubles have arisen. For instance, the man in the case has proceeded against his wife for a divorce; she knows he no longer cares for her, and she will not contest the application. In such cases the divorce is granted, and the wife, who may be a mother is left without assistance for her children and with no way of gaining redress except by instituting action in some other court. On the other hand, if divorce proceedings in a case of that kind were taken in a divorce court, the disposition of the children, the settlement of alimony and sustenance for the family might be ordered. Evidence would be taken in camera, and the publicity experienced here would be avoided; the rules of evidence would be maintained as they are in the higher courts; decisions of those courts would be followed, and only the best evidence given by proper witnesses would be admitted; the king's proctor would be watching for collusion and cross-examining the witnesses; the interests of the petitioner and respondents would be protected, and no evidence would be given without cross-examination. These several things we avoid by having a divorce court, instead of bringing divorce before a committee of parliament and through the House of Commons.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for the bill, and I hope it will pass as soon as possible.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a few words in connection with this bill. Hon. gentlemen may feel at ease; so far as I am concerned they will be able to register their votes tonight. Coming from the province of Ontario, I am more vitally interested in this question than I would be if I lived in another province, and I cannot understand why members from other provinces are so very anxious and in such a great hurry to thrust a divorce court upon Ontario before that province has spoken in the matter. Ontario is truly awakening. Six months ago in its rural communities not more than one person in a hundred was in favour of a divorce court, and after the passions that have been aroused have died down and the efforts of those who have tried to stir up the people have been forgotten, it will be found that in our rural communities not even one in a hundred will desire the establishment within the province of such a court.

Many harsh things have been said in the press and elsewhere in connection with this matter, but I think we should be able to approach it from the standpoint of information and fact. I find in a paper published in the city of Toronto, in connection with the recent vote on this bill, the following statement:

> One would think that the very fact of the insolent clerical interference would drive the Protestants together.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, because an eminent clergyman of another faith has spoken against a divorce court for the province of Ontario, without any consideration whatever I should simply turn and go in the opposite direction. That appeal, sir, will not stand in the province of Ontario; that statement is not worthy of the source from which it comes and entirely misrepresents the spirit and teaching of the people they are supposed to represent. The article proceeds:

> But the vote of last week proves either that they—

That is, we who dared to vote against the divorce court for Ontario.

> —are supremely indifferent to the menace of clerical control, or they have come under the influence of the Roman Catholic bishops and priests in their own constituencies.

It will be news to the people of North Huron to find that their member is talked about in this way. Now I desire, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this question as briefly as possible. I am going to ask our friends from western Canada to be very careful about sending such a cold, blighting blast to destroy all that is good and sacred in the homes of Ontario. You know, we in this province are accustomed to balmy breezes, and sometimes these cold blasts get in deadly work. I am going to ask our friends from the maritime provinces not to be in any hurry to force this bill upon a province that has not asked for it. For sixty-three years, ever since confederation, we have gone along in this manner, and I contend that no great harm could come if we passed through the sixty-fourth year without a change, in order to give the old province of Ontario a chance to make up her mind in this matter.

We find hon. members from other provinces saying they refuse to come here and waste their time discussing Ontario's affairs. Well, sir, I believe there are eighty-two members from Ontario and sixty-five from Quebec in this house; the one hundred and forty-seven members from these central provinces have not taken up as much time in this house as has been taken up by the representatives of two smaller provinces which I could name. This bill strikes at the root of our home life, and I am surprised that an hon. member of this house who toured my province preaching "peace, peace, perfect peace" during the recess, should come into this house with a shillalah in each hand, telling this house that unless we pass this divorce bill, whether it is right or wrong, he will hold up the business of the country. I think that is unbecoming to an apostle of peace; those are not peaceful methods.

When we in Ontario adopt this court we want to do it after mature consideration and with all the information and facts before us, instead of merely opinions. If this bill is good, whoever may have the honour of coming back to this house next year can pass it and not much harm can come to us in the meantime. But, Mr. Speaker, if we fasten this thing upon the province of Ontario; if we allow it to sink its fangs in deeply; if we allow the cancer to take root, we cannot pull it out easily a year hence. So, in the words of an old profesor of mine, I would say "When in doubt, don't." A number of arguments which have been brought forward will scarcely stand examination. In the old days young men—perhaps including some who are now members of this house—used to sit around the doorsteps of homes, perhaps in the province of Ontario or some other province, in spite of all that the man of the house could do, telling the daughter that they could not live without her and that they could not stay from her presence a moment. After they were married, however, and the knot was tied—in the words of Grattan O'Leary, "until death or divorce do us part"—they were not so anxious. Then they did not hang around so much; they started to look around for an excuse to be absent.

However, I will not develop that point; marriage is a legal contract and also a sacred contract. We have heard a great deal about the children; that is the great cry.

> There's not a monster bred beneath the sky
> But well disposed by art may please the eye.

I will let the editor of the Toronto Globe dispose of that argument—and I wish to pay my respects to that newspaper. As a life-long reader of the Globe I am free to say that on questions affecting the moral life of our province and the sanctity of the home it always has been sound and has placed its finger upon the pulse of the common people of that province. This is what the Globe has to say:

> Mr. Woodsworth and his associates are reckoning without their hosts. Ontario is the province concerned. The great majority of the people of Ontario have been reared in the atmosphere of old fashioned evangelical Protestantism. They will have much to say when they learn that facilities for easier divorce are to be foisted upon them at the request of the Senate and at the behest of radical members from the west.

Then it goes on to quote some of the weekly papers throughout Ontario, which are speaking loudly. The first paper quoted is the Simcoe Reformer:

> It will be difficult to convince the sane thinking citizens of Ontario that the time has come to adopt United States methods of severing the matrimonial bond. For instance, in southern California, with a population slightly larger than that of Ontario, the daily papers each morning carry a list of from 25 to 50 new applications for divorce. The average would be easily 200 a week, or as many as Ontario has at the present time in a year. True, living conditions are considerably different there and the standard of morality lower, but the tendency with the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario would certainly be toward a tremendous increase in divorces. The question resolves itself into this: Do the injustices inherent in the present system of parliamentary divorce outweigh the inevitable flood of applications, the consequent lowering of moral standards, and the breaking up of homes that would follow the institution of a divorce court? We think not.

Whether in Canada, Britain or the United States, increased facilities for divorce have inevitably meant increased divorce. The irrefutable facts are against those who claim that the establishment of a divorce court in this province would have no other effect than to lower divorce costs. The divorce rate is right now alarmingly higher throughout the west, where divorce courts sit regularly, than it is in the province of Ontario.

The tragic feature of the arguments used by the advocates of easier divorce is that they ignore the rights and interests of those who are most harmed by the divorce evil—the children of the separated couples. Bad as is the present system in Ontario, it victimizes only a few hundred children per year. But if Mr. Woodsworth and his supporters have their way the children, now numbered in hundreds, will be multiplied to thousands. Are these children to have their whole lives marred because of the failure of their own parents to honour their own marriage vows? And what will be the effect on national life?

The article then quotes President Hoover, who states that the great majority of the youthful gangsters, gunmen and such, have been the victims of broken family circles in their earliest years. The article continues:

Mr. J. J. Kelso, superintendent of the children's aid branch of the provincial secretary's department, knows whereof he speaks. He says:

It would soon be found, as it has been clearly demonstrated across the line, that men would more readily seek divorce, not because of unfaithful wives, but because temporarily enamoured of a younger woman. I have known of instances where men have left their wives and children penniless in Toronto while they saved up money to go to Detroit and pay a clever lawyer to secure a divorce, the failure of the wife to appear being taken as a justification for granting the divorce.

It may seem harsh to say so, but the establishment of a divorce court would be giving legal force and respectability to a vicious principle under which innocent children would be robbed of their rightful heritage.

I submit that Mr. J. J. Kelso, who has made a life work of the study of neglected children, is an authority equal to that of any hon. member of this house. The editorial concludes:

It is for reasons such as these that the Globe does not believe that the people of Ontario will passively accept the loosening of the legal marriage tie. They will undoubtedly begin to seek ways and means of counter-attack. They will discover that the great driving force behind the desire for divorce is the desire to remarry —the desire to legalize an illicit relation regardless of the blight implanted in the lives of the children. And they will also discover that the parliament of Canada has power to prohibit remarriage of divorced persons; has power to refuse recognition to United States divorces; has power, in brief, to decree that those who refuse to live up to their own vows do not get the chance to break them legally for the mere purpose of making new ones equally empty.

It has been said that the cost of divorce will be cheaper and yet the number will not be increased. The Hon. G. N. Gordon, a former minister in this house, writing in the Toronto Globe, said that a divorce could be secured for $500. I know a man who is getting one for less than that. We were told the other evening by an eminent legal member of this house that it was a crime that applicants had to deposit $200 with the government of Canada, but he did not tell us that if the applicant was very poor he received $150 back, nor did he tell us that if he was in average circumstances, say earning $100 a month, he would have $100 returned to him.

Mr. PARENT: They receive more than that.

Mr. SPOTTON: It cost this man $100 to bring himself, his lawyer and two witnesses to Ottawa from Toronto, and he won his case in spite of his lawyer. If he paid that lawyer $50 he gave him all he earned. That man is getting by under the figure given by the lawyer member.

Reflections have been cast upon the committee of the other house, the insinuation being that it was composed of a bunch of incompetents. In looking over the names of the fifteen gentlemen who comprise that committee, I find five eminent lawyers, three eminent physicians and other men of high standing. We have it on the word of the chief justice of Ohio that a judge is not the proper type of man to try divorce cases. That learned gentleman points out that there is a sociological, psychological and ethical side to this matter which cannot be considered by a judge who has just given a judgment to Billy Wilson regarding the killing of a steer by the automobile of John Jones, and then immediately switching to divorce cases, and perhaps trying as many as twelve in one forenoon. He quotes an instance of one judge granting a divorce because the wife would not get up before daylight to prepare breakfast for her husband, while a judge in the next county refused a divorce to a man who claimed that his wife would not prepare any meals at all for himself or the children. A lawyer who has been a ward heeler and is appointed a judge is not in a better position to try such cases than is the honourable body which at present adjudicates upon these matters. Chief Justice Marshall of the Supreme Court of Ohio has this to say:

It has sociological and ethical features requiring study and treatment of a sociological and ethical nature, which experience has fully demonstrated that courts are not designed to render.

And again he says:

We may therefore conclude that judges of the courts of general jurisdiction are not qualified either by training or by inclination to render decisions in divorce cases.

I will not weary the house with further reading, but that gentleman offers a suggestion that if a commission were appointed to give a sympathetic hearing to these cases, or to even one-fortieth of the 200,000 divorces issued annually, and inquire into the causes leading thereto, a solution might be found to lessen the divorce evil. Last year the Prime Minister told us that he would strive to do something in this regard, and I trust that he has something to report. When the business of the house was being held up last year, the Prime Minister said:

I gather that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is of the view that by this time the government should see that this method of dealing with divorce bills is anything but satisfactory, or in other words that under the present method it is within the power of a few members of this house to block the entire business of parliament, if they so desire, in order to demonstrate their dissatisfaction with the prevailing system of granting divorces through the agency of private bills.

I would not like to think, Mr. Speaker, that the province of Ontario is going to have a divorce court thrust upon it by the members from other provinces, who have a fear that the business of the house will be held up. I submit that the province of Ontario deserves better treatment than that. Ontario and Quebec have always supported legislation which was considered vital to the west or the east, and I plead with these gentlemen not to be in a hurry to thrust this thing upon the province of Ontario. I know that my own county is unanimous in opposing the creeping into this country of such insidious conditions as we find to the south. The Prime Minister continued:

I will say to hon. members of the house that the government will continue as we have been doing to give very serious thought to this question: I could not promise that we will find a solution during this session of parliament, but I would express the hope that by another session, by conference in the interval with members of the house and by other methods, we may find it possible to effect some arrangement which will enable those seeking divorce to secure such redress as should be given them by a means which will commend itself more completely to parliament and avoid a recurrence of a situation such as we have at the moment.

Further down the Prime Minister says:

It being understood that between now and next session the members of the government and other hon. members of the house will do what they can towards finding some means of freeing parliament from the necessity of continuing to deal with divorce bills along the lines which we have followed thus far.

I would invite the Prime Minister to give us the result of his investigations and his thought in this matter. I am not going to detain the house longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPOTTON: I notice the "hear, hear" comes from sources where a great deal of the time of the house is occupied. I have not occupied three hours of the time of the house in three years, but I am prepared to occupy time to defend the home life of my province. I ask the other provinces to go slowly in thrusting upon Ontario legislation for which she has not asked. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn):

That all the words after "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not read a second time now, but this day six months."

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Spotton) which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

[Mr. Spotton.]

Mr. HARRIS: I had not quite concluded my remarks at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS: I cannot speak half as loud as will be the answer the government will receive when next they face the country after the way they have handled the unemployment situation during their term of office. Unemployment is with us in this country, and will be with us as long as we are in this northern zone, but Providence, which has been so kind to this government in the last few years, will always send snow to the large centres of population to help those of our citizens in winter who find themselves out of employment. The great question that I emphasize is the under-employment which has been caused by the maladministration of this government—under-employment on the farms and under-employment in industry—because we are not exporting the products of the farm and because we are importing products that we can produce on our farms; under-employment because we are importing double the quantity of manufactured goods that we are well able to manufacture ourselves here at home. I say to this government, do not try to steer this issue up some side alley by saying that it is part of an unemployment insurance scheme or something of that kind. Face the issue, and face it fairly and squarely.

I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) in his seat. He had his chance to speak, and I think he should have taken advantage of the opportunity to say what he has to say on this question before some of us on this side of the house were called upon to say a word or two. I hope that he will avail himself of the opportunity to speak to-night. As Peter denied his leader three times, so the Minister of Labour will have his chance to deny his leader to-night.

I see that the apostle of free trade, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar), is stretching himself a little bit. Now that he has left the scene of storm and strife on the prairies and come down to this haven for a little rest, it will be interesting to hear what he thinks of the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of products that we import into this country which our own people are quite capable of producing; yet he is content to sit idly by and watch these goods coming in by the thousands of tons, displacing labour and employment in this country. The men who are out of work are not so much interested in unemployment insurance. What they ask is a fair day's work for a fair day's pay. Strong men of the north do not look for doles. They do not look for unemployment insurance.

They look for an opportunity to work and to provide for their dependents. We have heard in this debate of the thousands of unemployed and idle men. What about the wives and children of these men who are undernourished because of unemployment? Should not they receive some consideration from the Minister of Pensions? Why should pensions be thrown into the political arena? Why was not some other subject chosen? I say to him: At the last minute, just as you are going to the country, I would be very sorry to see you try to obscure the issue by making a political football of the returned soldier question. Face the country on the record of your administration for the past eight years, and do not, in collusion with your colleagues on the treasury benches, try to divert the attention of the electorate from your record by making an issue of a matter which should not at any time be thrown into the political arena.

I will conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting an editorial from one of the newspapers supporting the government, the Manitoba Free Press. In its issue of December 17 last I find the following:

> All that a government can do is to create a set of subsidiary conditions which permit the people to take advantage of their opportunities to the fullest extent possible.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate,

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

> An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1931.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker, when the interruption occurred we had a good representation on the treasury benches. That representation is at the present time somewhat depleted, but there are one or two ministers remaining. I want to draw to their attention some of the difficulties which obtain due to recent enactments. The Minister of Justice is in the chamber—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Justice is always in the chamber.

Mr. HARRIS: When the bell rings for the next election you will have a little more syrup to hand out to your constituents.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Maple syrup?

Mr. HARRIS: There will be a little more cream left for you; they will not allow it to go to the country to the south, a country which economically is penetrating Canada to such an extent as has never before been known. Not only has that country penetrated Canada from an economic standpoint, but it is throwing out ideas which are being absorbed by our younger generation through reading American magazines and books. What is the government doing about it? The government is doing nothing to stop this economic penetration; it is doing nothing to stop the adoption of American ideals in this country. It is allowing the United States to send in vast quantities of products manufactured by them, products even of their farms and market gardens.

When the interruption occurred I was proceeding to read from the columns of the Manitoba Free Press. I quote:

> All that a government can do is to create a set of subsidiary conditions which permit the people to take advantage of their opportunities to the fullest extent possible. There will be no argument that Mr. King and his government have done so.

Of course there is no argument that they have done so. They have not only failed to create such a set of conditions as the Free Press declares it to be their duty to create, but they have brought about and encouraged an opposite set of conditions under which foreign capital is enabled to exploit Canadian resources with foreign labour in foreign countries, and then to exploit the Canadian market with foreign manufactures. From such a source as the Manitoba Free Press, the rebuke may be judged the most severe one which has been administered to Mr. King and his cabinet.

The unemployed are not among those who lost heavily in the stock market crash; they are not among those suffering from the wheat blockade. Those who lost in the stock market were able to buy their Rembrandts, their radios and their Turkish rugs. It is such men as the 1,132 who were lined up at the soup kitchens in Montreal the other day who are interested in unemployment. They are our kith and kin who demand the opportunity to be gainfully employed in order that they may be able to sustain their families.

We must have for this country a policy which will provide work for the minds and hands of all kinds and classes. Such a policy will never be forthcoming under the maladministration we have witnessed during the last eight years—take another drink, Mr. Minister of Labour—with ministers almost denying their leader, one minister in one direction, another in another; with ministers who will not act when they have the opportunity. In my opinion it has not been a fair "shake" for the workingmen of this country.

In conclusion I ask this government to face the issue fairly and squarely when the time comes, and not try to turn it up some side alley.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attempt to follow the last speaker, because I was not aware that we were in the throes of an election; I did not know we were preparing for an election at the present time. At any rate, I am glad to know that the hon. member reads the Manitoba Free Press and believes in some of the ideas expressed therein. I hope he will always follow, believe in and quote from the Free Press, especially during the next and every other election.

I thought we were discussing the amendment to the motion to go into supply, which was moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), and I desire to congratulate the hon. member for bringing up this very important matter on the floor of the house. I have no doubt that the purpose of the amendment was to enable a discussion to take place with regard to this very important question of unemployment, and great credit is due the hon. member for the moderate language which he used, which indicates his sincerity of purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the house.

During the course of his speech the hon. member for North Winnipeg asked, among other things, that something should be done immediately for the unemployed. I might state that the purpose of the motion to go into supply was to secure funds with which to carry on public undertakings and let further contracts which would aid the unemployed.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister said the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were to be considered.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. STEVENS: We have just granted two months' supply, so you can go right ahead.

Mr. HEENAN: Another matter strongly advocated by the hon. member for North Winnipeg was unemployment insurance, and in that connection he quoted from my remarks as contained in the London Advertiser of March 15 and asked me to explain my position. I desire to take this opportunity of making my position clear, if it is not clear already. First let me say to hon. members who are advocating unemployment insurance that their appeal is no stronger than the appeals I made on the floor of the Ontario legislature when I was a member of that house. I thought at that time, and still think, that that was the proper place to advocate a contributory unemployment insurance plan.

When the hon. member for North Winnipeg brought this matter before the house a couple of sessions ago and asked that it be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations, no objection was raised by any member on either side of the house. That committee met and worked diligently in connection with this matter, and a report was brought in directing the government to refer the question to the provinces. Last session again the hon. member brought in a similar resolution asking that the question be referred back to the same committee. That was done, and after a good deal of hard work the committee arrived at certain conclusions which they brought before the house in their final report. They endorsed the principle of a compulsory contributory plan of unemployment insurance, but stated in effect that they had received the views of the law officers of the crown, which were that it was a provincial matter. The recommendations made by that committee were brought before parliament, and parliament adopted the report. It is true that an amendment was offered by the hon. member for North Winnipeg which, if it had been adopted, would have asked the provinces to pass legislation giving up their rights in this respect. That amendment was defeated by a very large majority.

The report also recommended that the government, at the next Dominion-provincial conference, place this matter on the agenda and bring it before those attending the conference. This government did not wait for such a conference to be called; as soon as the report was printed it was sent to the provinces in order to ascertain their views. I think everyone will agree that it is far better for the provinces to have time to consider such an important matter as the adoption of an unemployment insurance scheme before discussing it at any conference.

Unemployment insurance will be adopted in Canada only after public opinion has been educated to the necessity for such legislation. The unemployment insurance scheme in effect in Great Britain has been so very much misrepresented in Canada that our people have not yet a true understanding of what unemployment insurance really means, or of the system which is in vogue in England. It has come to be represented in this country merely as a dole. Then again, some newspapers in this country have taken the position that there is no use discussing the question of unemployment insurance in Canada until it is known what system is in the minds of those who advocate it. Personally I am very much interested in some definite, permanent plan which will give something to our unemployed so that they will not need to look for relief every winter or during every season of unemployment. I took occasion at London to tell of a plan which I had in mind, in order to stir up public discussion and help form public opinion.

In this case public opinion certainly must include the working men, because if the working men are to be compelled to contribute part of their wages to any such scheme, of necessity they must know what is in view and what they will be expected to do. I know a number of working men—and I have known more since I made my remarks at London—who oppose a contributory system of unemployment insurance. Many claim that the employer should stand the whole cost, so that in a country like Canada it is necessary first to form public opinion along these lines. In view of that, and in view of the fact that this parliament has spoken already in regard to this matter, my remarks can apply only in the light of what parliament already has said. Parliament has not said that the federal government should contribute to any plan of unemployment insurance. My statement at London, and I thank the hon. member for North Winnipeg for reading from the Advertiser, because I have myself referred him to that paper—was very plain in that regard. I claimed that a simple method could be worked out which would apply to the railroad men much more readily than to the men in any other industry, and I said:

> A system could be inaugurated in this country which would be suitable to Canadian needs. Take, for example, our Canadian railroad workers—in the summer time there are upwards of 200,000 men employed, and during the winter periods there are about 25,000 of those workers laid off for several months. The wages of all railwaymen average about $130 per month. If a fund were created, it would take about $5,000,000 to pay these employees half-pay for three months,

I had not in mind a plan which would operate for twelve months of the year, but rather one which would apply to the winter season. My remarks at London continue:

> —say January, February and March; the employees contributing about one per cent of their wages and the railway companies the balance. This would not be too hard on either, and, if necessary, the governments could assist.

In the light of what has occurred in this parliament, and in the light of the opinions given by the law officers of the crown, I could not mean anything else but the provincial governments. I went on to say that this system could be extended to every line of industry.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a very sharp corner.

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. members on the other side of the house know what sharp corners are.

Mr. STEVENS: We see the minister running around them.

Mr. HEENAN: Even if it is a sharp corner, it is better to go around it than to say nothing at all. I am not afraid.

Mr. MANION: Especially when you can back up afterwards.

Mr. HEENAN: My remarks continue:

> This system could be extended to workers in every industry and would provide a permanent system.

I agree with my hon. friend from North Winnipeg that the workers are entitled to a permanent system. I then said that the House of Commons had endorsed such a system. My hon. friends will notice that I did not confine myself to saying the Liberals had endorsed this system, but I included my hon. friends in that endorsation. I then stated:

> Parliament has also declared it is a provincial matter, and the government has taken the matter up with the provinces, but notwithstanding the fact that it is a provincial obligation, the Prime Minister has stated that if the provinces so desire his government is prepared to cooperate with them in establishing a uniform system.

I could not go beyond the limits set by my leader, who, on February 27, in answer to a question from the member for Winnipeg North Centre said:

> My recollection is that a special committee of this house considered this question last session and brought to the house a report to the effect that unemployment insurance was necessarily a matter with which provincial governments rather than the federal government would have to deal. I think I expressed the view yesterday that in my opinion a system of unemployment insurance would be a constructive way to deal with the unemployment problem, to which system not only the employer and the governments concerned would contribute but the worker also. If the provinces make a move in this matter and it appears that the federal government can be of assistance in helping to bring about uniformity as between the provinces of any plan proposed, or can cooperate in other ways in any discussion on the subject, we shall be glad upon invitation to take the matter under consideration.

During the course of my remarks at London I said that I would do my utmost in this regard, and I propose to stand by that statement. So long as I remain in public life I intend to work to the end of providing a solution to this unemployment problem. It may be that I become too enthusiastic about these things. I remember after the Old Age Pensions Act was passed that I went through this country from coast to coast speaking to members of the different provincial governments and upon different platforms in an effort to arouse enthusiasm for this measure in the provinces. Many letters came to members of the government and several editorials were written asking the Prime Minister to keep his Minister of Labour at home where he could mind his own business. My hon. friends across the house prophesied that the Old Age Pensions Act would not benefit any one man or woman in Canada because no province would desire to participate in the plan. They were mistaken in their forecast because I am glad to state that about 35,000 old men and women of this country are receiving benefits through the provisions of that act.

Mr. BENNETT: How many?

Mr. HEENAN: I think it is about 35,000, although I may be one or two thousand out.

An hon. MEMBER: How many provinces are participating?

Mr. HEENAN: The majority of the provinces, and three more are now considering the matter.

Mr. GEARY: I am glad you follow the lead given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. HEENAN: This amendment asks that the government should take immediate steps to deal with unemployment. The government is asking for supply in order to start the construction of public works. The question has been asked, what is the government doing to relieve unemployment? I remember when my hon. friends across the way were in power one principle enunciated by them was that work should be given and not relief. We propose to give as much work as possible to take care of the unemployed. We are doing something now, and all last winter we put on a large program of public works, much of which might have been postponed until a more favourable season. We urged the railroad companies to go ahead with their program of extensions and their orders for supplies, equipment, et cetera, and I think it is generally acknowledged throughout the country that the Canadian National went ahead with a good deal of work that might very well have been deferred until a more favourable season.

We have also contributed something in our immigration policy. Contrary to what my hon. friend across the floor would say, by order in council we prohibited employers of this country from going over to European countries and bringing in contract labour.

Mr. STEVENS: Has that not been the law for many years?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I am pretty sure it has. You cannot bring anyone into this country by contract.

Mr. HEENAN: They were brought in by the thousands when my hon. friends across the floor were in power.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister is astray.

Mr. HEENAN: They are bringing them in to-day, but we do not catch them all. Only recently we had to consider the question of letting a contract to build a ferry in this country. The government could have had that ferry built in Great Britain for about one-half the cost that we are going to expend on it in Canada. In order to give employment to Canadian workers we will expend far more than a million dollars extra on that particular work. We are now putting into operation the eight-hour day for government employees. We are also, with the consent of hon. friends opposite, putting into operation the eight-hour day in connection with all public works and public contracts.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could the minister give the house the actual cost of labour involved in constructing that ferry?

Mr. HEENAN: The contract is away over $2,000,000. There is also the fact that during last winter we contributed in the neighbourhood of $600,000 for unemployment relief for war veterans. I am not saying we should not have done that; I am just telling the house some of the things we have done. Hon. members will realize that the passage of the War Veterans' Allowance Act will also contribute a considerable amount next winter towards the relief of unemployment.

I notice that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was very moderate in his language; there was not a semblance of politics in his whole speech. But such was not the case with hon. members who spoke from the Conservative side, and I did not expect it would be, because one realizes there are very few questions, whether it be mothers' allowances, workmen's compensation or any other humanitarian piece of legislation, out of which they will not endeavour to make political capital. They have discussed the question of federal responsibility; they have talked about unemployment and its causes, the tariff, immigration, and so forth, and have stated that the Dominion government should have contributed something towards the excess cost in the municipalities. It might be well to review the history of unemployment relief measures in this country. During the years following the war, when unemployment was prevalent throughout Canada, there was a cry for financial assistance not only from one or two provinces, but from every municipality and every province, and the federal government rendered financial aid. The policy of the government at that time was declared through the Minister of Labour in a letter dated the 14th of December, 1920. It was addressed to the Hon. Walter Rollo, Minister of Labour in the Ontario government, and in this letter I find the following statement:

> The situation should be met to the utmost possible extent by the provision of work instead of the provision of relief.

He stated further on in the letter:

> I feel sure the provincial and municipal authorities will join in to provide a substantial amount of employment and in this way the situation should be materially relieved.

A little further on he said:

> Every possible effort should be made to avoid the necessity of any other form of relief.

And in another part of the letter we find this statement:

> Should, however, the emergency relief measures become necessary by reason of utterly unavoidable shortage of employment, the federal government is willing to cooperate.

And he outlines a system of cooperation of paying one-third of the excess cost over normal construction. But all the way through his letter he emphasizes local, municipal responsibility. Everyone knows that the system which was put into vogue at that time was neither equitable nor satisfactory; because hon. members will readily understand that when there is an offer of excess cost over normal construction, it is only the provinces that have large construction work to do and only the municipalities that are financially strong enough to put on a program of construction work, that can take advantage of this. Therefore, the majority of the provinces or of the municipalities did not participate in any such scheme.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) will possibly be making a speech in the house on this subject, but I notice that in Winnipeg he made a speech in which he took exception to my statement that unemployment was primarily a municipal responsibility and, secondly, a provincial responsibility.

Mr. IRVINE: If these matters of importance to labour be provincial responsibilities, what is the use of the position which the minister now holds? How can he justify to the workingmen of Canada the $14,000 paid to the minister if he cannot do anything?

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend knows it would embarrass me to tell of all the good works the Minister of Labour does, so that if he is really desirous of ascertaining what the value of this position is, I would advise him to ask the labour men of Canada, the men who urged the establishment of the Labour department of this government.

I was saying that the hon. member for Fort William took exception to my remarks, at least as reported in the press. I could not understand his objection when I read it because I recall that the hon. member for Fort William was a member of the cabinet in 1921 and on October 7 of that year, some time after he had been sworn in, an order in council was passed dealing with this important question, from which I quote this paragraph:

> Unemployment relief always has been, and must necessarily continue to be, primarily a municipal responsibility, and in the second instance the responsibility of the province.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will permit me, did not the government of the day contribute one-third of the cost to assist the provinces in the relief of unemployment?

Mr. HEENAN: I think my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was also a member of the cabinet at that time.

Mr. STEVENS: And we contributed.

Mr. HEENAN: I was giving my hon. friend the enunciation of their own policy as it appears in the order in council. I will read it again so that there may be no misunderstanding:

Unemployment relief always has been, and must necessarily continue to be, primarily a municipal responsibility, and in the second instance the responsibility of the province.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask that this document be read in full, Mr. Speaker? It is a public document, and when public documents of that character are quoted we are entitled to have the full text.

Mr. HEENAN: I intend to read it. I would like to read it over and over again, because I get inspiration from it.

Mr. STEVENS: You need it badly.

Mr. HEENAN: If I have made any mistake at all, it is where I have been following in the footsteps of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. MANION: You have followed nearly everybody else's footsteps in the country at different times.

Mr. HEENAN: Sometimes I catch up to them.

Mr. STEVENS: We are entitled to have this document read.

Mr. HEENAN: I will read it in a minute or two. It is good reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has already stated that he intends to read the order in council.

Mr. HEENAN: Before I read it, I want to say to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre and to the hon. member for Fort William, who, as reported in the press, assailed the government in Winnipeg and said that unemployment relief was a federal responsibility—

Mr. MANION: May I just correct my hon. friend? I said that it was a joint responsibility of the municipalities, the provinces, and the Dominion. I have right here the clipping from the press. That is the same statement that I have made on different occasions, and I adhere to it.

Mr. HEENAN: I think at this juncture, I had better read the order in council, because it is an interesting document. It is P.C. 3831, dated October 7, 1921, and reads:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 5th October, 1921, from the Minister of Labour, submitting that the problem of unemployment, and means best calculated to relieve it, has been receiving constant study and attention since about December, 1920. On December 14, 1920, a federal relief policy was announced, the object of which was to aid responsible municipal authorities to fairly meet existing needs and prevent suffering to any citizen willing to work but unable to obtain employment. It provided for payment by the federal government to any municipality of one-third of the amount disbursed by the municipal authorities for unemployment relief—

Mr. STEVENS: That is an inspiration for you.

Mr. HEENAN: There will be a few more inspirations before we get through.

Mr. STEVENS: That is an inspiration this government needs, too.

Mr. HEENAN: It is good reading. I will repeat that sentence:

It provided for payment by the federal government to any municipality of one-third of the amount disbursed by the municipal authorities for unemployment relief, together with a proposal that provincial governments join in on an equal basis. The federal government's disbursements for this purpose since January, 1921, have been over $600,000. Many gratifying expressions of appreciation have been received, in most cases accompanied by the suggestion that employment should be provided instead of paying unemployment doles. Since July 13th the Department of Labour has been in communication with provincial governments, mayors of municipalities and others as to improved methods of dealing with the situation next winter.

It was suggested to the provincial governments that, inasmuch as the extent of unemployment, as well as possible remedies, varied in different provinces, a provincial survey by conference or otherwise might be made by each provincial government, after which a conference of provincial representatives might meet with the federal government to discuss the problem and devise some general plan of assistance to the municipalities, upon whom the duty and responsibility of dealing with relief primarily rests.

Three provincial governments only have thus far signified concurrence in the suggestion for a central conference of provincial representatives, two of which desire the representation to extend to organizations other than governmental.

I would ask my hon. friends who are clamouring for a conference to listen to the next sentence:

Inasmuch as a federal conference with wide basis of representation would be both cumbersome and expensive, of doubtful value, and, thus far, only approved of by three of the provincial governments, and, further, because of the necessity of early decision and action, if useful service is to be rendered, the minister recommends that the following federal policy of basic principles on unemployment be approved.

1. Unemployment relief always has been, and must necessarily continue to be, primarily a municipal responsibility, and in the second instance the responsibility of the province.

2. That because of the present situation being due to causes beyond the power of local, or even national control, provincial and federal governments should cooperate with municipal authorities

So the situation had got beyond local control, beyond provincial control, beyond even national control. Before I get through I will examine the present situation to see if it is as bad as the situation prevailing in 1921.

Mr. MANION: Much worse.

Mr. HEENAN: It continues:

in,

(a) helping to create and provide employment.

(b) where employment cannot be furnished to workmen who are willing to work, to aid in providing food and shelter for themselves and dependents until the present emergency period is past.

3. That federal funds used for unemployment relief or for relief work must be disbursed only through responsible municipal authorities, who in each case shall bear at least one-third of the total or extra cost.

The minister further recommends that the federal government agree to participate in the cost of work provided by municipalities to relieve unemployment on the following basis:

(a) Municipalities to bear the normal cost, that is to say, the cost of carrying on the said work in the normal working season.

(b) Estimate of normal cost to be approved by federal government's engineers in the Department of Public Works.

(c) That municipal, provincial and federal governments bear equally and jointly the actual cost over the estimated normal cost, thereby encouraging the creation of employment where possible.

(d) That where work cannot be provided the federal government continue to refund one-third of the disbursements actually made by a municipality for unemployment relief, conditional upon the provinces participating on an equal basis.

Then:

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

Mr. MANION: Why did you not copy that yourself?

Mr. HEENAN: I will explain that before I get through.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a real inspiration.

Mr. HEENAN: If my hon. friends will only possess their souls in patience for a little while I will tell them why I did not do it. I wonder why the member for Fort William takes me to task so seriously for imitating what the government of which he was a member initiated at that time.

Mr. MANION: Not at all. We absolutely offered to help in every way, and did help; but you refused.

Mr. HEENAN: They said that it was first a municipal and then a provincial obligation pure and simple. I wonder why, for instance, they did not take Premier Ferguson to task?

Mr. MANION: Because Premier Ferguson helped in many ways. I was with the deputation from northern Ontario that interviewed him. He assisted us. He did not put us off with the hot air that we get here.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Fort William did not come down here.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I was on the deputation and listened to the Prime Minister's remarks, which he says now mean nothing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Mr. MANION: Order yourself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have already made three speeches.

Mr. MANION: You often make too many yourself.

Mr. HEENAN: Let me quote what appeared in a press despatch of January 24, 1928:

Hopes for unemployment relief from the provincial government were blasted at the meeting of the York township council yesterday. A letter written by Premier Ferguson, in answer to an appeal sent from a recent session of the council, made it plain that the province was not prepared to take any such action. Premier Ferguson stated in his letter "that unemployment is an entirely municipal affair". "It would not be just," he said, "to use the money contributed by the whole province for purely local relief. The municipality derived the benefits from the working men in times of prosperity and should be prepared to bear the burden when times were not so bright." He added, "The only time when the province had rendered any such assistance was just following the war."

I have heard my hon. friend take the premier of Ontario to task for that statement. I think probably the public would expect the Dominion government to take more notice of the representatives of the provinces with respect to their requirements than of gentlemen who are not elected to represent the provinces. In this connection I should like to remind my hon. friends—

Mr. CAHAN: Do not members of the House of Commons represent their respective provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: I did not mean it just in that way. I think the public of Canada would expect the federal government to take more notice of the representations of the provincial premiers as to the requirements of the provinces than they would even of the members in the federal house who are not elected for provincial matters.

Since all these things took place we have had a Dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa, and the question of the Dominion contributing unemployment relief was on the agenda for discussion. I should like to read from the blue book the result of that conference.

An hon. MEMBER: What date is that, 1927?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

The question of unemployment relief was but briefly dealt with. With the possible exception of Manitoba, no speaker urged federal aid in this direction. Several of the representatives in fact were of the opinion that unemployment relief on any fixed basis was simply an encouragement to unemployment. The representative from Manitoba, however, cited the case of Winnipeg, where at times by reason of itinerants wandering in unemployment was frequent, though labour conditions were fairly uniform. He believed that if the Dominion government did not undertake to bear any share in the cost of looking after these strangers, it should establish a depot for the relief of those who drifted in from the outside.

That is a pronouncement on this question by the premiers of the provinces.

Mr. CAHAN: That is three years old.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not very old.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, we are all getting older.

Mr. CAHAN: Unemployment is increasing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The principle is the same.

Mr. HEENAN: I find again this year—this is not three years old—that Premier Ferguson made another statement. On January 24, 1930, he had this to say.

Our unemployment problem is spotty in various sections of the province; it centres chiefly in Toronto; but we are paying the one-third excess cost to municipalities, which seems to be meeting the situation.

There was no complaint from the provincial authorities of Ontario that they were not meeting the situation, but simply a bald statement that they were contributing one-third, and it was meeting the situation. I have not heard my hon. friend from Fort William say anything about that.

Mr. MANION: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the premier of the province assisted northern Ontario when we came down and asked for help. I was on the deputation and know what I am talking about.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Repeat that later on.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: Neither have I heard my hon. friend nor any of his colleagues say anything with respect to the statement made by Premier Tolmie of British Columbia. In a despatch dated Victoria, February 6, 1930, he is reported as follows:

I am not in a position to say anything about the unemployment situation here.

He added:

The responsibility of caring for destitute people rested primarily with the municipalities.

That is the opinion expressed by the premier of British Columbia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been criticized in some quarters for not calling a national conference—

Mr. PRICE: You are repeating what you said before.

Mr. HEENAN: I beg your pardon?

Mr. SPENCER: The minister just stated that at the Dominion-provincial conference Manitoba was the only province which did not accept responsibility for unemployment. I think he knows quite well that Alberta refused to accept full responsibility, and was of the opinion that the federal government as well had some responsibility in the matter.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not say anything about the position taken by any of the provinces; I read from the reports of the proceedings of that meeting, and so far as I am concerned it speaks for itself.

Mr. SPENCER: But the Minister of Labour has in his possession a statement made by the premier of Alberta, which I sent to him only a few weeks ago.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, and the premier of Alberta has this report also.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the last statement on this question made to the minister by the premier of Alberta?

Mr. HEENAN: I forget what it was but it was not in accordance with this report. I happened to be present at the conference also, you must remember.

I have been criticized by some hon. gentlemen opposite for not calling a national conference, which to me is a very serious question. I feel that to call a national conference during a season when unemployment prevails is not going to help that unemployment very much. I can imagine municipalities and provinces, which might have work in contemplation or actually undertaken, holding up that work for a while and coming to Ottawa to find out who was to pay for it. Our Conservative friends, in their order in council, stated that such a national conference would be at any rate of doubtful value.

Hon. gentlemen want me to follow the example set by the United States; in fact it has been stated on the floor of the house that the government could very well emulate what President Hoover has done. I want hon. gentlemen to know that so long as I am in public life I propose to do what I think is best for the working men of Canada, whether or not it follows what has been done in the United States. I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize that when that conference was called at Washington and the unemployment and distress were shown, one of the first things asked of the labour representatives was whether they would promise not to ask for an increase in wages or for better conditions. I want to say that before I would take the responsibility of calling a conference to do that to the workingmen of Canada, I would want to know that I had the majority of those working men behind me. If you have followed what has been going on in the United States you will know that the conference has not had the result claimed by some of my hon. friends. I thought I knew whether or not I was doing what the majority of the labour men of this country wanted me to do when I did not recommend to my colleagues the calling of a national conference, and I was glad to know, as I am sure my hon. friends will be, that when the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada representing the majority of the workers of this country, met here, our action in not calling such a conference was endorsed.

I am not going to follow the system advocated by my hon. friends with respect to unemployment when they were in power. I well remember reading in Hansard of one hon. member who stated in 1921 that the cause of unemployment was that industries were becoming insolvent and therefore could not give work, and it was stated that the reason they were becoming insolvent was because the working men would not give a fair day's work. I remember those words very well, and I am sure every person in Canada who was interested in labour never will forget them.

Mr. CANTLEY: Who said that?

Mr. HEENAN: I will give the name of the hon. gentleman and the page in Hansard after a while, so my hon. friend can read it for himself. I hope, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite will have changed their minds in that regard after having been out of office for such a long time. The same hon. member said that the only cure for unemployment would be to go through a period of depression such as the country was going through at that time. I am not going to adopt that position with regard to the unemployment situation.

When I was interrupted a short time ago I was going to say that some hon. members had misunderstood or misinterpreted my statement with regard to unemployment. It was made to appear by some of my hon. friends that I was unsympathetic and did not really realize that there was unemployment in this country. I want to point out that at the time I made my statement I was dealing with the request to call a national conference. During my statement I not only acknowledged that there was unemployment but advocated a means of alleviating that condition. I went on to point out that the federal government was undertaking a large program of public works and that we were asking the railway companies to do the same thing, and I stated that if the provinces and the municipalities would follow that example it would relieve unemployment to a certain extent. It is true that I quoted some statistics to show the amount of employment in this country as compared with that in the United States, but I am afraid those figures did not suit some of my hon. friends, because they adopted the slogan "statistics do not feed hungry stomachs." It appears to me that those figures were too strong for my hon. friends to stomach. The statistics are there; they were not gathered for that year particularly but have been gathered for many years past from the same sources. The statistics at that time, and up to February 1, showed a comparatively greater number employed in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. PRICE: I should like to ask the minister whether it affects Canadians or Americans when he speaks about unemployment in the United States. Is it a matter of chasing Canadians back home or is it a matter of putting Americans out of employment? Answer that.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not going into statistics to-night, although I have them here if it is necessary.

The Prime Minister was criticized when he made his speech for saying that the country was in a prosperous condition, and for quoting from statements made by the heads of financial institutions. I am not going to quote from such statements, but I am going to quote from the statements made by premiers of our provinces as to what condition those provinces were in at the end of 1929.

Beginning at Prince Edward Island, this is what Premier Saunders had to say:

The island is, however, prosperous. Nineteen twenty-nine has been a successful year. In agriculture and its branches of stock raising and dairying, much progress has been made.

Then he goes on to say:

We look forward to the year 1930 with confidence and optimism. Our people, in common with Canadians generally, are conscious of the urge resulting from a sense of past achievements and the promise of a great destiny in store for Canada.

Premier Rhodes of Nova Scotia made this significant statement:

There has been a distinct improvement in conditions surrounding our steel-coal industry and prospects for stabilized winter employment are most promising. Real progress has been made in the development of mines other than coal mines, notably at Stirling in Cape Breton, where the zinc lead deposit has about reached the point of regular production, and the further development of our gold mines.

In addition to that he has this to say:

Taken as a whole the outlook for the coming year is distinctly bright. I am fully confident that marked as has been our progress during the past few years, there are even better things in store for this province. Our future is assured. The extent of our progress and prosperity depends largely upon the amount of individual effort which we are prepared to put forth.

Premier Baxter of New Brunswick states the following:

New Brunswick has enjoyed one of the most prosperous years our people have ever known, with agricultural and industrial activity especially marked, and a substantial upbuilding taking place in virtually every field of development.

He goes on to say:

The financial position of the province has been markedly improved this year by the successful culmination of negotiations which have been in progress for some time to have the Saint John Valley Railway taken over from the province by the federal government as a part of the Canadian National Railways system.

We will not refer to the statement made by Premier Taschereau. Still, I do not see why we should not read what that gentleman has to say about the province of Quebec:

In spite of many counteracting factors, general prosperity has prevailed throughout the province of Quebec during 1929. Much advance has been made in some of the most important domains, notably in agriculture.

We now come to the statement made by the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, premier of the province of Ontario:

During the past year Ontario has maintained the steady progress that has long been characteristic of this province. In all important departments there has been satisfactory advance, and in many ways the outlook for the future has been improved.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date of that, please?

Mr. HEENAN: The statements I have been reading are dated January 14, 1930. To continue with the statement by Mr. Ferguson:

In the considered judgment of our financial experts, the position of Canada is fundamentally sound, and this is especially true of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Ferguson is speaking not only of the province of Ontario, but of Canada as a whole. He says:

We are constantly growing and expanding and our faith in the outlook is firmly established by experience.

Next we have the statement made by Premier John Bracken of the province of Manitoba:

It is a common belief that Manitoba is a purely agricultural province. It is true that agriculture is still her chief means of maintenance, but during recent years other industries have grown and prospered until to-day the annual value of their gross output closely rivals that of farm products. The year 1929 has seen substantial progress in this direction. During the past year thirty-six new manufacturing concerns have been established in Manitoba, while twenty-two others have extended their plants. It seems certain the total output will substantially exceed that of 1928, which was estimated at $159,252,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Have you any quotation from the remarks of Mayor Webb of Winnipeg?

Mr. HEENAN: He is the mayor of the city, and not the premier of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. STEVENS: But he is the man who is faced with the unemployment problem in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. HEENAN: We have next the statement made by Premier Anderson of Saskatchewan:

The settling of our vacant farm lands and the development of industries are reacting favourably upon the growth of our urban centres. The population of some of our larger cities has increased fifty per cent in the last three years. Since January 1st of this year the total value of building permits issued for construction work in the province amounted to $34,000,000, as compared with $20,000,000 for the year 1928.

The future progress of Saskatchewan rests upon the firm foundation of the productive effort of our people, aided by a discriminating immigration policy. Capital from eastern Canada and the British Isles is increasingly available for the development of our natural resources. The achievements of the past have been considerable. We have merely scratched the surface of our vast resources, however, and there is every indication that the future holds in store tremendous possibilities for the people of Saskatchewan.

Premier J. E. Brownlee of the province of Alberta has the following to say:

At the end of another year the province of Alberta finds itself in a strong financial position. At the end of March, 1929, the fourth successive surplus was reported. The surpluses for the past four years have been as follows:

1925..	$ 188,019 54
1926..	17,800 53

For the fifteen months ending March 31st:

1928..	$ 279,763 13
1929..	1,578,823 09

Further on in the article he says:

Therefore, we face the end of the year in a spirit of confident optimism, believing that the next few years, at least, will be years of continued development, both agriculturally and industrially.

Mr. GEARY: Would the minister intimate to the house what he is trying to prove?

Mr. HEENAN: I thought the hon. members would like to hear this.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has scrupulously avoided stating what the mayors of Edmonton, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and other cities have said.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member must realize that sometimes a man chooses to eat and drink what other people do not like.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister quote the appeals made by Premier Brownlee and possibly some others to the government for relief?

Mr. HEENAN: I shall be very glad to do that in a little while; I have those statements somewhere among my papers. I am trying to answer hon. members opposite who have criticized the Prime Minister because he has stated that Canada is prosperous. I am trying to show in my own humble way just what the premiers of each of the provinces have said. I know it is hard medicine to take, but my hon. friends sometimes prescribe for others and I would like them to take a little of their own medicine. Premier Tolmie of British Columbia has this to say:

British Columbia has just closed another active year in all its primary lines of industry. Completed returns should show that the forestry output for 1929 will surpass all previous records for quantity, though, owing to falling prices, values will be somewhat lowered.

Then he goes on:

With new mines discovered and old mines developing, with all our primary industries expanding, with additions contemplated or in progress in our abundant hydro-electric powers there appears at this time to be no good reason why 1930 should not be a banner year for British Columbia.

As an ordinary layman I have tried to figure out how Canada can be in such a deplorable condition as stated by my hon. friends when the premiers of the different provinces have stated that their own provinces are each prosperous.

Mr. STEVENS: Are the minister and his colleagues aware of any unemployment problem which exists in Canada at the present time or which has existed during the past three months?

Mr. MANION: Certainly not.

Mr. HEENAN: In my statement of December 16 I stated that the government had asked the railway companies to go on with their extensive programs of expansion, and I suggested that the provinces should do likewise. When the government of the province of Ontario was about to go on with the construction of the highway from the head of the lakes to the Manitoba boundary, which highway had been promised for years and years at every provincial and federal election, and which had been started, the hon. member for Fort William went down with a delegation to consult with the provincial government. They returned home and stated that the province would go ahead with the work if the federal government would contribute 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. MANION: We did not say anything of the kind. Mr. Finlayson, the Minister of Lands and Forests, made a statement in writing that they would do that. The provincial government is ready to do its share but this government has not shown a readiness to do anything.

Mr. HEENAN: That highway has been promised at every provincial and federal election. My hon. friend did not succeed in stopping the provincial government from going ahead, because an announcement has been made in the press that the work will be started when the snow is off the ground.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that I tried to stop the provincial government from going ahead with that highway?

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend went down to Toronto and after consulting with the provincial government about the highway, the construction of which was an obligation upon the provincial government, he returned with the statement that the provincial government would go ahead with that which they were obligated to do if the federal government would contribute 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. MANION: They were not obligated to build a trans-Canada highway unless they wished.

Mr. HEENAN: Would the province of Quebec be obligated to build a highway through the province of Ontario?

Mr. MANION: The whole house, with the possible exception of those under the command of the government whips, has asked that a trans-Canada highway be built.

Mr. HEENAN: Which is the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. MANION: A part of that highway is the highway about which the minister is trying to fake right now.

Mr. HEENAN: How does the hon. member know this?

Mr. MANION: It is that part which the minister has refused to support but which has the support at the present time of his constituency.

Mr. HEENAN: I have heard that a meeting of Conservatives from the north was held and the proposal was that if by any chance the Dominion government called this bluff and said that a contribution would be made towards that highway—

Mr. MANION: This government is not calling anybody's bluff.

Mr. HEENAN: —the Conservatives up in Timiskaming district were to claim that the highway should go through their way instead of through Fort William and Kenora. I am satisfied to allow the electors in that part of the country to deal with this matter. The Conservatives are trying to find an excuse for the province of Ontario delaying the highway a few months longer.

Mr. MANION: They dealt with that question at the last election and they beat everyone who was put up against them.

Mr. HEENAN: I know one member they did not beat.

Mr. MANION: The minister made a bet upon a public platform, which was a corrupt practice.

Mr. HEENAN: The trouble with my hon. friend is that he knows I won the bet.

Mr. MANION: I would like to know what the Prime Minister thinks of one of his ministers making a bet on a public platform.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: I just called one of my hon. friend's bluffs.

Mr. MANION: The minister did not do any such thing. He made a bet on a public platform and his bluff was called.

Mr. BENNETT: He called for relief money.

Mr. STEVENS: It might be well to discuss unemployment for a little while.

Mr. HEENAN: This highway was discussed upon the platform at Sioux Lookout and Kenora during the last provincial campaign. The vote taken in the House of Commons last session—and my vote is shown there—was shown to the people in that country, but notwithstanding the man who opposed the Conservative candidate was elected by a majority of over four hundred.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with unemployment?

Mr. HEENAN: I have shown that the premiers of each province have stated definitely that at the end of this year they were all in good financial standing. I have not heard any of those gentlemen complain that they are not able to cope with unemployment in their province, although the Prime Minister has left the door open.

Mr. MANION: He surely has.

Mr. HEENAN: They came down here to the conference of 1927 and stated that they did not wish any contribution towards unemployment relief, and that statement has not been reversed as yet.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister should not make a blanket statement like that.

Mr. HEENAN: The premier of Alberta has asked for a contribution but has not stated that he cannot cope with this matter himself. He has said that that province has the greatest surplus in its history.

Mr. SPENCER: That was before the unemployment began.

Mr. HEENAN: They said in 1927 they did not want relief, and their statements I have read were all made at the end of the year 1929. The Premier of Alberta did not state he could not cope with this situation; instead he said that his province is in such financial condition that they have the greatest surplus in their history.

Mr. STEVENS: As of March, 1929.

Mr. HEENAN: January.

Mr. STEVENS: No, 31st March, 1929, a year ago.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not propose to make any excuses in regard to unemployment. I am not going to stand here and say that I have the cure for it. I am not going to agree with my hon. friends who say that the way to cure unemployment is by protection. Neither am I going to agree with my hon. friends who have stated that because the federal government has charge of immigration, it is responsible for unemployment. I can recall the great clamour there has been for many years from that side of the house for a wider immigration policy. I can recall the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. McRae) advocating in the house a couple of sessions ago a policy whereby we should bring 250,000 or 300,000 families into this country. He advocated doubling the population of western Canada. Yet I find that the hon. member for Vancouver North a few weeks ago stating that the federal government, on account of bringing in so many immigrants, was responsible for unemployment. I think I can recall even a question on the floor of the house some time ago when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was reported in several newspapers, when he went over to the old country, as having said that there was a job waiting in Canada for every unemployed miner in Great Britain if he was physically fit.

Mr. STEVENS: I never made any such statement.

Mr. HEENAN: I am glad to know there are others who can be misunderstood or misreported once in a while.

Mr. STEVENS: It is misquoted.

Mr. HEENAN: I will read the hon. member's own statement. There is a question in Hansard of March 30, 1928, page 1854. The matter was brought up by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The hon. member for Vancouver Centre is reported in the Sunday Times of London, England, of December 4, 1927, as follows:

"Every unemployed miner in Great Britain," said Mr. H. H. Stevens, M.P., Vancouver, who arrived in Liverpool yesterday on the Canadian Pacific liner Melita, " can be found employment in the Canadian mines, provided he is physically fit."

Mr. STEVENS: Read a little more. That is not the statement.

Mr. HEENAN: That is the statement which appears in Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a distorted extract out of an interview which was given.

Mr. HEENAN: I believe that, and I will not read any more. If the hon. member says he did not say that, I believe him, because I know no sensible Canadian would make such a statement.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with the minister. Then why the insinuation?

Mr. HEENAN: Because that went into thousands of homes of British miners of England who were looking for jobs, and no doubt thousands came to Canada because of that misstatement. On the one hand statements going out about "blue ruin" are driving Canadians out of the country, and on the other, statements about "wide spaces with a job for every man" are bringing them in. Is it any wonder we have unemployment in this country?

Mr. BENNETT: We have the admission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: It is no wonder we have unemployment. My hon. friends may applaud. It is no matter to laugh at that thousands of men who have come to this country through misrepresentations in the press or statements by hon. members, find that they cannot secure jobs here.

Mr. STEVENS: That is utter nonsense.

Mr. HEENAN: Before I leave the immigration policy, let me point out that the hon. member for Fort William said on the floor of the house, "Canada should be the mecca for the surplus people of the whole world."

Mr. MANION: So it should if we had a proper government and a good policy.

Mr. HEENAN: Then my hon. friend goes to Winnipeg and says that we are bringing in too many immigrants.

Mr. MANION: I did not make any such statement in Winnipeg.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member is reported as saying that.

Mr. MANION: I am not reported as saying that. My hon. friend is just talking.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) quoted from his statement the other day and I will quote it to-morrow.

Mr. MANION: Nobody quoted it because I was never reported as saying any such thing.

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friends blow hot and blow cold for political expediency, nothing more and nothing less. Is it any wonder they find there are hundreds or thousands of men out of work? They say that all these things have been done by the federal government, lack of policy on tariffs, immigration and all these other things are responsible for unemployment; yet they have continually advocated immigration from the housetops.

Mr. MANION: Has the hon. member finished?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 2, 1930

The house met at three o'clock

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

First report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. Kay.

Mr. KAY moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS AND SOLDIERS' PROBLEMS

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) moved concurrence in the third report of the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since yesterday I have had an opportunity to discuss the subject matter of this report with the chairman of the committee on returned soldiers' problems and I have ascertained that it is the purpose of the committee, if it has not been done already, to appoint counsel for the committee in addition to counsel for the various organizations to which reference was made. Under these circumstances I have no objection to the report in any way, but while I am on my feet I may say that the heading of an article appearing in one of the local newspapers this morning was hardly a fair statement of the position taken yesterday, as indicated by Hansard. The difficulty was whether some now in remote sections of the country, who do not belong to the different organizations, might feel that their cases were not adequately safeguarded before the committee. The appointment of counsel of eminence to represent the committee as such should, I think, meet that difficulty.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Manion.]

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING, (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Hon. Mr. Rinfret be substituted for that of Mr. McLean (Melfort) on the select standing committee on banking and commerce, and that the name of Hon. Charles Stewart (Edmonton) be substituted for that of Hon. W. R. Motherwell on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

AIR MAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) when I may expect the return covering the tenders, correspondence, et cetera, in connection with the air mail contracts which was ordered on March 17, 1930. The house will soon be taking up the estimates of that department and I would like to have this information before me at that time.

Mr. VENIOT: I was informed yesterday that this information would not be ready until Monday.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether a committee has been appointed to consider the question of superannuation. If my memory serves me aright, a committee was appointed last session but no report has been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may be mistaken, but I have no recollection of any such committee having been appointed.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understood that a committee of officials had been appointed to consider this question.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think a governmental committee of any kind has been appointed. A committee may have been appointed by some organization to investigate this matter, but I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any information regarding it.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, during the discussion of last night I took occasion to congratulate the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) for bringing this important question before the house, and also for the sincere manner in which he had carried on his argument on the amendment. I pointed out to the hon. member that the government had contributed to the relief of unemployment by carrying on an extended program of public works construction, which program would be continued. I pointed out that the government had urged the railroad companies to carry on an expansion program in order to help this situation. I mentioned that the government last year spent about $600,000 for the relief of unemployed ex-soldiers, and that by letting a contract in Canada for construction work which could have been carried on in the United Kingdom at about $1,000,000 less, considerable employment was being given to Canadian workmen. I pointed out that this government was contributing towards old age pensions, assisting approximately 40,000 Canadian citizens. Last night I mentioned the figure of 35,000, but my office advises me that it should be 40,000.

There is legislation now before the house which I do not propose to discuss, but I am satisfied that the War Veterans' Allowance Act will contribute to a very large extent towards the relief of unemployment by taking many men out of the industrial field. I directed the attention of the house to the fact that the government was making a further contribution by prohibiting contract labour being brought into Canada.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) asked me last night if we had not already a law of this nature upon the statute books, and I took it for granted that he meant the Alien Labour Act. A reference to Hansard will show that I was discussing the prohibition of the bringing in of contract labour from European countries, and the Alien Labour Act does not apply to those countries. That prohibition is being applied only to the United States as that is the only country which has a similar act with regard to Canada. The act contains no provision for administration by any department of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a statute of the country, is it not?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it not the duty of the government to enforce it?

Mr. HEENAN: It is the duty of everyone to enforce it. The act provides that the lieutenant governors or the attorneys general of the provinces have considerable to say in the matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. minister speak a little louder; we cannot hear him in this corner of the house.

Mr. HEENAN: I have a long way to go and I want to save my wind.

I would point out to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that the new immigration policy will assist in the solution of this problem as it gives to the provinces a great deal of the responsibility in connection with immigration. I do not think the provinces will ask for as many immigrants as they have in the past. The eight hour day has been applied to the public service, and with the help of my hon. friends opposite I hope that the eight hour day will be made applicable to all employees on public works.

Mr. BENNETT: That is four years too late.

Mr. HEENAN: If that were done it would relieve unemployment, and more so if the provinces and the municipalities will follow this lead. I hope that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who is a good friend of mine, will not endeavour to discover further excuses on behalf of the Ontario government for delay in the commencement of the construction of highways through northern Ontario. I have stated several times outside of the house, and I state again, that the province of Ontario should have gone on last winter with the blasting of rock and the cutting out of the right of way for the construction of the highway from Fort William to the Manitoba boundary. The road has been promised, it has been started, and there is no reason why they should not have gone on with it.

Mr. MANION: They are going on with it at the present time. They are still building it.

Mr. HEENAN: I might say for the benefit of my hon. friend I have a clipping from the Kenora Examiner of December 30, 1921, and I want to read it to him. It reads:

> The contracts for clearing the right of way for the highway between Keewatin and the Manitoba boundary have been let, and one of the contractors has already started to work.
> The successful tenderers were as follows:
> Thomas Nolan, of Rainy River, secured the first and fifth and sixth five miles.

That is, they were let in five-mile stretches.

> Adam Blondin, of Kenora, was awarded the second five miles.
> Harvey Cottam, of Rainy River, got the third and fourth five miles.
> An important condition of the contract is that the work must be completed by April 1, 1922.
> One of the contractors is already on the job, and the others start work next week.
> Last Friday, after the Enterprise had been printed it was learned that Mr. Peter Heenan, M.P.P., had returned from Toronto, where he had gone in the interest of his constituents, and stated to the Kenora Examiner that the work of clearing the right of way would be completed this winter and that construction of the roadbed would be carried on next summer.

Mr. ARTHURS: At that time I understand there was a grant from the federal government subsidizing the building of roads in the various provinces.

Mr. HEENAN: This work was all done out of the northern development funds.

Mr. ARTHURS: The grant existed at that time.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the minister explain what connection work done on some road in 1922 has with the question of unemployment insurance?

Mr. HEENAN: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience, I may lead to that in a little while.

Mr. STEVENS: Rip Van Winkle.

Mr. HEENAN: I pointed out that the road which the hon. member for Fort William says the Ontario government should not be expected to bear the whole cost of, was started in 1921, and if they had gone on with it in 1929 there would have been a great body of unemployed men employed on that road. I wonder whether my hon. friend heard that.

As I say, the work was gone on with. The highway was cut out and it gave a great deal of work to unemployed men at that time of the year. The Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario, speaking in 1924, promised that the highway would be finished, as he said, before the snow fell in 1924. In 1925, during the federal election, he promised that the road from the Manitoba boundary to Sault Ste. Marie would be finished before the snow fell in 1925. In the 1926 federal election he promised the same thing. In 1926 there was also a provincial election and I have under my hand the appeal of the local member to the electorate. I will read one sentence of that appeal. He said:

If elected I propose to join forces with the members for Rainy River, Fort William and Port Arthur for the rapid completion of the Trans-Canada highway from Fort William west.

That was the appeal made by the local member in 1926, and he was elected. In 1929, he made another appeal to the electorate and I am sure it will be interesting to the house if I read this appeal. He said:

The Kenora district has waited many years for motor highways to link it up with the outside points. Joe Earngey, representing the Ferguson government, has this work well under way, so that with his return as a supporter of the Ferguson government, which will undoubtedly continue in power, this work would be completed in a very short time.

Then he asked:

Can any elector who has the interests of his district at heart risk delay or postponement of the completion of these highways?

That is a very significant question.

Mr. MANION: And the minister helped to defeat the member who put out that appeal.

Mr. HEENAN: The people in my part of the country do not take such intimidation as that from any hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: We will remember that next election.

Mr. HEENAN: He said:

Can any elector who has the interests of his district at heart risk delay or postponement of the completion of these highways?

In other words, if you do not vote for the Conservative candidate, you do not get the highway built. There is no question of that, and because of that appeal he lost his election by over 400 votes.

Mr. GEARY: Supposing he did, why waste the time of the house talking about it?

Mr. SPENCE: Why spend the time of the house on this?

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: I thought the hon. member for Parkdale would like this.

Mr. SPENCE: I would like the minister to come up to date.

Mr. HEENAN: I am coming up to date. The member who made this appeal on this highway, which was supposed to be completed in 1925 before the snow fell, made the appeal in 1929 but he was then defeated. This is his own paper; he owns and edits it and this is what he said. I want my hon. friend from Fort William to note this, because only a few days ago my hon. friend said in the house that the Ontario government should not be expected to bear all the cost of this highway. The member who made the appeal said in his paper, Kenora and Miner News, February 22, 1930:

Start work on Manitoba road in the spring. Ontario government will complete all or major portion of balance of road this year.

Construction work on the highway to Manitoba will be commenced by the Ontario government in the spring at as early a date as it is possible to work, thus affording employment to a considerable number of men.

And so on. What I want to ask the hon. member for Fort William to do is to forget politics for the time being.

Mr. FRASER: Did the minister ever forget politics?

Mr. HEENAN: I should like him to come over here and join hands with me in helping to get this highway built which the Ontario Conservative government has promised since I was a little boy.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman voted against it the other day and I voted for it.

Mr. HEENAN: No; the hon. gentleman, when he heard there was likely to be an onslaught on the Ontario government to go ahead and give work to the unemployed people in that part of the country, went down with a delegation to Toronto and after the interview the statement was made that the Ontario government was to go on with this highway if the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. MANION: And in the meantime the Ontario government has continued to build it and is building to-day some sixty or seventy miles of the highway.

Mr. HEENAN: What highway?

Mr. MANION: The same highway that my hon. friend is speaking about.

Mr. HEENAN: If they are doing that, why does the hon. member ask us to bear 50 per cent of the cost?

Mr. MANION: I will explain that when I speak. I do not wish to be unfair to the minister. If the minister wishes me to reply now, I will do so.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member can use his own time. I like to work on my time and I do not think there is any other hon. member who sits more quietly in his seat than I do when members are speaking.

Mr. MANION: The minister asked me a question.

Mr. HEENAN: I just want him to be a good fellow and help me to get this highway completed, and no more stalling.

Mr. STEVENS: Stop talking nonsense.

Mr. BENNETT: He is thinking about his election.

Mr. HEENAN: We have had a great many elections in that part of the country, and the peculiar thing about my hon. friend from Fort William is that for six months before and after an election he seems to get out of kilter; he is not so friendly somehow or other. A few days ago he took exception to the Minister of Labour leaving Ottawa to take part in a provincial election. I can well recall that in every federal election in which I have taken part we have had a number of provincial ministers out in our part of the country, and the hon. member for Fort William has never criticised them for taking part in federal elections. He was glad to accept their assistance in every way—to accept all their promises of provincial highways and by-ways and bridges and everything else. I do not know that it was not proper for me to go up there, but if it was improper for me to speak in a provincial election, certainly it is improper for provincial ministers to take part in a federal election.

Mr. MANION: I did not accuse the minister of any impropriety, but said that, while he did not have time to look after the unemployed, he had time to go to western Ontario and speak in a provincial election.

Mr. HEENAN: I might point out that 400 more workers believed me in that part of the country than believed my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: In four or five other ridings that the minister visited, the people did not believe what he said.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not sure that in Fort William they did not take notice of what I said. I remember that in the election before last, the provincial member had 3,700 of a majority, and in the last election, even with the help of the organization from Port Arthur, where there was an acclamation, which allowed the two organizations to work together, the provincial member had only sixteen hundred of a majority.

Mr. MANION: Just sixteen hundred; that was all.

Mr. HEENAN: So my hon. friend's influence apparently is on the wane, and by the time the next election comes around he may have enough to do to look after his own constituency.

Mr. SHORT: What has that to do with the resolution?

Mr. ERNST: He is keeping himself from being unemployed.

Mr. HEENAN: I wished to tell my hon. friend that he and his friends on the other side are using their influence with the Ontario government not to go on with work for the relief of the unemployed, but it seems that no matter what I say, no matter what appeal I make to them—

Mr. MANION: That is the utmost nonsense. The provincial government is helping the unemployed.

Mr. HEENAN: I regret that it has been necessary for me, because of the attitude of my Conservative friends, to expose their inconsistencies and their insincerity in dealing with unemployment. It has always been the same. They blame the tariff, they blame the immigration policy, and I do not know what else. It brings to my mind that there was some unemployment in this country in 1913, 1914 and 1915.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us go back a little further.

Mr. HEENAN: There was a Conservative government in power at Ottawa in 1914, and a Conservative government in power in Ontario, and there was so much unemployment prevailing all through the country at that time that the Ontario government appointed a commission to investigate the causes of unemployment in the province, and to make recommendations for remedying the situation. I think it would not be at all amiss for me to quote from that commission's report.

Mr. HANSON: Why not go back to 1887?

Mr. RYCKMAN: What did Gladstone say in 1872?

Mr HEENAN: We had a Conservative government in power at Ottawa and a Conservative government in power in Ontario in 1914, and this is what that commission recommended.

Mr. STEVENS: What date is that?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Although everyone seems to be in very good humour I must remind hon. members that it is not fair to a speaker to be continually interrupting him.

Mr. HEENAN: It does not matter, Mr. Speaker. I know that the public take notice of the fact that my hon. friends opposite always laugh at the distress of the unemployed in this country. This is not the first time. The commission in one of their findings say:

> The result of inquiries has impressed on your commissioners most forcibly the fact that the depression, which occurred in 1914 and 1915, was but a phase of the movement alternating between inflation and depression, which is a characteristic feature of modern industry. A false sense of security should not blind the public world, in times of thriving trade, to the fact that widespread unemployment is likely to recur in future.

Mr. STEVENS: What date is that?

Mr. HEENAN: This is the commission's report of 1915.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a war on in that year.

Mr. HEENAN: Further on in their findings, after comparing depression in the older countries and in the younger and faster-growing countries, the commission say:

> The fact that the growth of the younger countries is so rapid in times of prosperity makes them subject to depressions more violent than those of older countries.

Under the heading of Idle Workers and Plant, the commission say:

> The returns of employment received from Ontario manufacturers show that, during 1914, the decrease in the volume of employment was equal to the full working time of, at least, thirty thousand persons. The figures for unskilled labour and the building trades are not available, but these would increase the already formidable total of those out of employment for long periods of time.
> It is common knowledge that our industrial plant in many lines has outgrown normal requirements and that but for war orders many Canadian factories would be closed down or running at a small percentage of their capacity. This situation is not peculiar to Canada.

Further on they point out:

> It would appear to show that in proportion to output, Canada had in 1911 an industrial plant 200 million dollars in excess of productive requirements.

[Mr. Ryckman.]

The commission also make this significant statement, that between 1900 and 1910 the capital invested in Canadian manufactures increased 179 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest that it would be more correct to say that the production was $200,000,000 behind the consumptive powers of the people than that there was $200,000,000 of over-production?

Mr. HEENAN: It is the same thing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not quite.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, except that my hon. friend says it in the English way and I say it in the Irish way. In other words, the significance of the commission's statement is this: In ten years of Liberal rule, there was so much development in Ontario and in Canada generally that the capital invested in Canadian manufactures had increased 179 per cent, and there was $200,000,000 more invested in productive plant than was necessary for the country's requirements.

Mr. HANSON: What about 1930?

Mr. HEENAN: Further on the commission recommend the organizing and securing of outside markets for Canadian products. I am not so sure that we are getting very much help from hon. friends opposite in that regard.

Mr. MANION: A Canadian market for outside products?

Mr. HEENAN: So we have the Conservative party in 1914-15 not suggesting any tariff revision to provide for unemployment, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is doing throughout the country to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: The Third Internationale was not sitting then; there was a great world war on at the time.

Mr. STEVENS: That is news to him.

Mr. HEENAN: Is that news to my hon. friend, that there was a war on at that time.

An hon. MEMBER: It is news to you. You were quoting 1913.

Mr. HEENAN: I am going to suggest at the end of my address that the hon. leader of the opposition did not know there was a war on at that time. Well, there was no war being waged in 1921.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: There is no war on at the present time. What about unemployment now?

Mr. HEENAN: There was unemployment in 1921.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That was just after the war.

Mr. HEENAN: Last night I promised an hon. member that I would quote from Hansard to-day, giving the page, to show what the Conservatives regarded as the cause of unemployment, and what cure they advocated for it in 1921. I am going to read from page 1379 of Hansard of 1921. It is part of a speech delivered by an hon. member who was supporting the government of the day. He said in effect that the main reason why there was so much unemployment in the country during the last few months was because of the impossibility of getting men to do a fair day's work, thus causing industries to become insolvent. In his speech you will find what he advocated as a cure for that unemployment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Who?

Mr. HEENAN: I would prefer that my hon. friend looked up Hansard himself. I do not wish to give the name across the floor. These are his words:

I have it from other sources,—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Who was it?

An hon. MEMBER: Who made the speech?

Mr. HEENAN: One of the leaders of the Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: Be specific. Who was it?

Mr. HEENAN: You will find it at page 1379 of the 1921 Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Who prepared the speech for you?

Mr. STEVENS: Your secretary should have put that name in.

Mr. HEENAN: It was a very prominent Conservative from Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was it?

Mr. HEENAN: It was Mr. Hocken. These are his words:

I have it from other sources, sir, and quite reliable sources, that in some of the trades the men during the last year or two, particularly during the last year, refused to give their employers the efficiency of which they were capable. That has to be corrected, and I think the only way it can be corrected is by such a period of depression as we are going through at the present time.

I wonder if that is up to date enough for my hon. friend.

Mr. SHORT: No, that is 1921. Give us this year.

Mr. HEENAN: He stated that the working men would not give a fair day's work, and consequently that had caused unemployment. The cure he proposed was that they should be starved into submission.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what you are doing to-day.

Mr. HEENAN: That is the Conservative policy.

An hon. MEMBER: That won't feed the bread line to-day.

Mr. HEENAN: This commission goes on to recommend that after the war the federal government, the provincial governments, the municipalities, the railways and all large employers of labour should get together and finance a large scheme of immigration. That was recommended by a Tory commission.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What are you recommending now?

Mr. HEENAN: I recommend that my hon. friend possess his soul in peace for another few minutes.

An hon. MEMBER: What have you been drinking?

Mr. HEENAN: What I have been drinking and what my hon. friend has been drinking are two different things.

Mr. STEVENS: We have water. We do not know what you have.

Mr. HEENAN: What does my hon. friend say now about immigration?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What do you say now about unemployment?

Mr. HEENAN: I see my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. McRae) is in his seat. He was advocating the other day the same principle as was recommended by a Tory commission in 1915.

Mr. McRAE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I promise the hon. minister that I would do better than the previous minister did last year. The net loss in population last year was nine and the expenditure $3,600,000 I would do better than that.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no point of order in that.

Mr. HEENAN: Oh, yes; anything is a point of order with some hon. members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: The people of Canada are not laughing at my hon. friends advocating on the floor of this house that we should bring in 250,000 or 300,000 farmers with their families and so double the population of western Canada. That was their policy a year ago. This year they are going all over the country saying that the federal government has been bringing in too many immigrants and are responsible for unemployment. Our people will not put up with that kind of inconsistency, and I am confident they are not going to be fooled when the time comes to make a decision. I feel sure everyone regrets the short crop the western farmers had last year, and their inability to secure adequate prices for that crop. But I know the Canadian people will not tolerate any body of politicians going through the country and preaching blue ruin because we have a little more unemployment than usual as a result of conditions in western Canada.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the minister permit me? How many employed have we in Canada to-day?

Mr. HEENAN: I am not prepared to answer my hon. friend; he does not ask his question in a gentlemanly way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman may interrupt only with the permission of the member who has the floor. I am protecting the hon. minister now just as I would protect the hon. member himself if he had the floor.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. minister said that I did not ask my question in a gentlemanly way.

An hon. MEMBER: You never asked his permission.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I did ask his permission, and then I asked him a question that he could not answer, or would not. As an excuse for not answering he says I did not ask him in a gentlemanly way. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he should withdraw that remark.

Mr. HEENAN: If it will satisfy the hon. member I will withdraw the remark and say he is a real gentleman. But when he asked that question he knew very well that neither I nor any other man in Canada could answer it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Why not? You are head of the Department of Labour.

Mr. HEENAN: Because no method has yet been devised to secure registration of the unemployed in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not pay to treat the minister as a gentleman, apparently.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: While we are on that question—

An hon. MEMBER: What question?

Mr. HEENAN: —I should like to read something that has just been clipped for me from the Nation of April 2, 1930. My hon. friends very often advise us to copy the United States, so I will read this article to show what high tariffs do to a country. This paper is published in New York, and I hope it is up to date enough for my hon. friends opposite. It says:

> The unemployment situation is grave. Frances Perkins, industrial commissioner for New York, and John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, testifying before the senate committee on commerce, declare that conditions in New York city are the worst that they have been since 1914, and that they have been growing rapidly worse since October, when distress first appeared. Professor Benjamin M. Squires, of the University of Chicago, director of the Illinois state employment agency, testifies similarly that suffering from unemployment in Chicago is the most acute that it has been in ten years, and that Chicago is just like other industrial centres. The Family Welfare Association of America, a federation of 234 charity and welfare associations in more than 60 cities, reports an increase of 100 per cent in their expenditures for relief in January, 1930, as compared with those of January, 1929, and an increase of 200 per cent in the number of families in distress because of lack of work. Bread lines are crowded in the leading cities. The National Urban League estimates that there are at the least 330,000 Negroes with no work. The American Federation of Labour, on the basis of figures from twenty-four cities, announces 22 per cent of reporting members unemployed in February, against 20 per cent in January.

I may say at this point that our figures from trade unions show about 10 per cent unemployed, as against 22 per cent in the United States.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Those were broadcast to you, I suppose.

Mr. HEENAN: I quote further:

The employment figures of the New York state Department of Labor, probably the best series in the country, in January stood at the lowest point in their fifteen-year history, except for three months in 1921, and February showed a further drop of nearly one-half of 1 per cent, although February ordinarily brings a gain of more than 1 per cent.

That report comes from a tariff country.

For the information of the member for Winnipeg North Centre and to explain the remarks I made last night to the effect that it required some education to get the public to adopt an unemployment insurance scheme, I want to read from the Montreal Gazette, the leading Conservative paper. I quote from an editorial in the issue of April 2, 1930:

The rather vague announcement of the Minister of Labour that the government may, in cooperation with the provinces, give effect to employment insurance affords cause for apprehension. The thing itself is not so startling as are the implications under the political conditions which obtain. Whither are we drifting in this matter of socialistic paternalism? Now is the time, rather than later, to think seriously and soundly about the outlook. As has from time to time been pointed out in these columns, we embarked rather impulsively on a broad scheme of old age pensions, and to follow that up with so radical a measure as employment insurance would be to open the door wide for every other fad which the aggressive socialists are advocating. When we had gone to that length, the dole would be in sight; in fact, it would be inevitable. We had better pause and take our reckonings; for experience has amply demonstrated that it is an easy thing to set in motion a process of that nature and a very difficult thing to control it. That process would seem to have been begun, and, if we are to avoid grave perils, we should begin at once to look ahead in a sober and calculating spirit.

Human nature is a fairly constant factor in the social scheme. If there is poverty, unemployment at times, want in old age, and so on, it would be infinitely better to attack the problem at its roots than to seek mere palliatives. To the extent that the cause is to be identified in the indolence, the improvidence, the intemperance, the lack of foresight of individuals, it is quite evident that conditions would be aggravated by a premeditated plan of notifying such people that they need have no fear of the consequences of their folly. While human nature remains as it is, and as it has been through the centuries, it is sheer madness to tell idle and shiftless men and women that the state will step in and save them from the penalties of their violation of fixed social laws. That there are many cases quite outside of that category does not in the slightest degree mitigate the unwisdom of extreme and needless paternalism. The end is pauperism; and in a young country like this, with unrivalled opportunities for the industrious and ambitious, the last thing we ought to do is deliberately to lay the foundations for precisely that sort of thing.

We have already done an unwise thing in adopting a system of indiscriminate old age pensions. Every alert observer must have seen that politics had more to do with the matter than genuine need. It was an act of stultification in a period of abounding prosperity and national expansion. It was a frank announcement to the improvident that they need not look ahead to the inevitable years of disability; and few things could be fraught with greater menace to society than that. It was at the same time an equally candid notice to the thrifty and hard-working that their savings would be drawn upon to provide for the wasters; for that is what it means. The state may have the legal power to commit such an act of injustice; but we should all calmly see that it is the sure road to endless trouble. For that reason it is to be hoped that not another step will be taken until time has been given for the people at large to think the problem out in all its bearings and grave implications.

That is a notification to Conservatives throughout the country that they must not in any sense be a party to unemployment insurance. So that I want to point out to my hon. friends in the labour group that it requires a considerable amount of public education before we can get a contributory unemployment insurance scheme, a thing which I consider to be very necessary to cope with the unemployment situation in Canada,

In conclusion I would like to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: I thought the hon. members over there were just beginning to like me. I would like to ask any member of parliament, whether he be a member of a provincial legislature or a member of the House of Commons, who desires to see a permanent scheme to deal with the unemployment situation, to use his influence throughout the country to educate the public as to the necessity for such a scheme, and not "pass the buck" from the legislature to the House of Commons.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: Under our laws we have no jurisdiction. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said "hear, hear". I noticed, however, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved an amendment last session to the report of the industrial and international relations committee, asking that the provincial governments be requested to pass legislation to give up their rights in this matter, my hon. friend voted against it.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they cannot give it up.

Mr. HEENAN: I admit they cannot give it up; consequently I am asking members of this house not to try to urge something on the federal government which cannot be done, and which they admit cannot be done. In the meantime I would suggest that this is a young country; there is a great deal of development and construction to be done here, and I would ask that every hon. member use his influence to assist in every possible way to get that construction carried on, not only through this Dominion parliament, but through the provincial legislatures as well, so that the work will help to a very large extent in eliminating unemployment.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member who introduced this resolution that it is the most important problem facing our country to-day. I do not think anyone in this great land of promise can realize that in the cold northern winters of Canada there are times—and this applies particularly to the present—when men and women and innocent little children are suffering from lack of the food which is necessary to keep their bodies and souls together, without feeling a very deep and abiding sympathy for the cause which has been advocated by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps).

I listened with respect and attention to the theories for a permanent solution of this problem proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) as well as by the hon. member for North Winnipeg, but while I agree that some day a permanent solution must be found, I would point out that at the moment the fact is that we have a very severe unemployment, and temporary measures of some kind should have been brought forward long ago by this government in order properly to deal with this problem.

Before the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) made his three-hour speech, if I might use that term in regard to his remarks, we had been discussing for nearly two full days this question of unemployment, and it was almost unprecedented to see this government sitting quietly by and having to be almost kicked into the debate before they made anything in the shape of a suggestion. Now that we have listened to the Minister of Labour, I do not know that any suggestion has been made as yet. Without a doubt, the government were hoping for some idea to come from someone else, not having any ideas of their own; they were trusting in Providence, as they usually do, waiting like Micawber for something to turn up, and at last, after two days of debate, the Minister of Labour rises and talks for practically three hours—an hour and three-quarters last evening, and over an hour to-day—and we have listened to the veriest drivel and a most infantile sort of attempt to deal with this problem. I do not wish to be extreme, although this may sound a little that way; but in the whole course of his three-hour speech I was able to recognize no atom of thought which he had given to this problem; I was able to recognize in his remarks no hint of a remedy. In fact, sir, as far as I could see, he not only has no idea of a remedy for this problem but he has no idea that there is a problem at all in this country at the present time. He is the representative of labour in this house; he is the hon. gentleman who speaks on labour problems for this government, so no doubt he was speaking for the government last night and to-day. If that speech is any criterion of what the government thinks, then it is a veritable policy of futility, hopelessness and despair. When we consider our great country, this land of promise with its wide open spaces, it is appalling to think that the government has no policy on this question, any more than it has on any other question, except the policy of hanging on to power.

The Minister of Labour, who has just taken his seat, did what most of the other ministers —including the Minister of Interior the other evening, the Prime Minister and various other ministers at different times during this session—have done; he claimed a prosperous condition in this country and referred to "blue ruin talkers" when speaking of those who pointed out that things were not as prosperous as they tried to make out. I fear that the trouble with the Minister of Labour is that he is so prosperous himself; that he has reached realms of prosperity beyond his fondest dreams in days gone by, and he mistakes his own personal prosperity for the prosperity of this country.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The hon. gentleman should not forget that he is sitting in millionaire row at the present time.

Mr. MANION: But I must remind my hon. friend that I am not one of the millionaires, I am sorry to say. I wish to point out that in the three hours which the last speaker took, he devoted about half an hour to pointing out the difference between his viewpoint on unemployment insurance and that of the Prime Minister, and he took another half hour in an attempt to prove that neither one had meant what he said. Then he took another half hour to read statements made by provincial premiers at the opening of legislatures—when premiers are naturally taking the most optimistic outlook that they can —apparently in order to try to prove by these statements that there is no unemployment at all. Then he took the better part of an hour last evening and more time to-day to criticize myself, misquoting statements which I have made at various times.

I must confess that I felt a little sorry to be forced to interrupt so often, but I have had a great deal of experience with the hon. gentleman, and if one does not correct his statements at the time they are made, his methods in northern Ontario are something like this: He would go back with this statement which he made, if it were not corrected immediately, and on the back concessions he would say, "I said this to Doctor Manion's face, and he did not have the courage to contradict me." The hon. gentleman has a method of his own, a method which is cunning, if one cares to stoop to it during election time. He has a habit of misquoting statements and misstating facts, and after he has done that for a week—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: He spends a week doing that sort of thing during election time, and then on Sunday he goes to church and prays that the good Lord will not allow anybody to come around to tell the truth during the next week.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: He also conjured up in his brain—if I may use that term after listening to his three-hour speech—a sort of idiotic delusion that in some way I had endeavoured to stop the building of the trans-Canada highway.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is a very old and wise parliamentarian, and I have the highest regard for his ability. Surely he knows that "idiotic" is not a parliamentary expression.

Mr. MANION: Well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the expression, but I wish to point out that I did not say the minister was idiotic, but that the delusion was idiotic. However, I will withdraw the word. At any rate, the minister conjured up in his mind the delusion that in some way I was endeavouring to block the building of the trans-Canada highway. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I advocated the building of such a highway not only here the other day in a speech on that very question, but elsewhere on the hustings, and whenever the question has come up I have taken the same attitude.

The hon. gentleman took some time to deal with the attitude of the province of Ontario. I also wish to deal with that question for a moment, although I have only forty minutes in which to speak, and not three hours as was the case with my hon. friend. However, the province of Ontario has taken the attitude that there are certain sections of that highway, particularly the section between Sault Ste. Marie and Fort William, the construction of which will not aid agriculture or any other interest, but will be of advantage only in uniting the east and the west. Having taken that attitude, which is a logical and straightforward position to take, they suggest that for the purpose of uniting the east and west by a transcontinental highway they should not be asked to build a stretch of road some hundreds of miles in length, across that more or less barren section of northern Ontario, and they suggest that in the interests of Canadian national unity this government should cooperate with them in the construction of that highway. With that attitude I entirely agree, and in addition I should like to point out that if this government had cooperated with the Ontario government in that work during last fall, they would have helped the unemployment situation to a very great extent. Let me point out in passing that the Ontario government to-day is building in my section of the country some sixty or seventy miles of road which will be part of the trans-Canada highway, despite the higher winter cost. That construction is being carried on largely because of the demands for unemployment relief which have been made in that section of the country. I was a member of that deputation which visited Mr. Ferguson and the rest of the government, which deputation made a statement upon its return that the Ontario government was going to help relieve this situation.

The hon. minister consumed some time in reading from an order in council passed during 1921 by the government of which I was a member, in which the preliminary statement was to the effect that unemployment was primarily a municipal matter, and secondly a provincial matter. He stopped reading at that point, with the intention of course, of leaving it at that, but the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) insisted that he read the whole order in council. I have a copy of that order in council before me and it shows that the government had spent $600,000 during the previous nine months in assisting unemployment; that they had offered to the municipalities of this country one-third of the extra cost entailed by the construction of municipal works during the winter months; and where that did not succeed in relieving the situation the government offered food and shelter to the unemployed who remained. If the present government had taken that same attitude—they had this order in council before them, as was demonstrated by the minister's quoting from it—no great criticism could have been offered. Instead of that we have had nothing from this government in regard to this matter except words; such verbosity as we heard last evening and again this afternoon from the Minister of Labour.

Perhaps it should be mentioned that one thing has been done by this government during the last few years to relieve unemployment in Canada. Had this government not driven out of the country 111,000 Canadians annually for the five years of 1921-26 when they were in power, the number of unemployed would be much larger. Through that lack of initiative and lack of Canadianism they have perhaps helped this problem.

After listening to the lengthy speech of the hon. minister I have come to the conclusion that his labour friends, if he has any left, will decide that the sooner the Minister of Labour and his confreres, including the Prime Minister, join the ranks of the unemployed the better it will be for the country.

I am interested in this problem because the conditions in my own city of Fort William have been worse during the past year than for many years previously. Parades of unemployed have been held, and a deputation from that city joined with the deputations from the prairie provinces to interview the Prime Minister. I will admit that for various reasons the grain blockade has had a certain effect in increasing unemployment, but I submit that the policy which this government has carried on since 1921 has resulted in the closing of industrial plants throughout the country, including a number of plants at the head of the lakes. Those plants were running when this government came into power.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What plants is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. MANION: The Canada Starch Company's plant employed over 300 workers in 1921, and because they were refused the infinitesimal protection which they asked on starch and glucose they were forced to close their plant in 1922. I have not the time to go into this phase of the question in detail, but I would mention another plant, the Canada Iron Corporation. That plant is at present running half time because of the Belgian competition in iron products. Labour is paid about $1.20 per day in Belgium, and the duty placed upon iron products coming into this country is so small that it permits Belgian iron to be brought into Canada through the Panama canal, Vancouver, Calgary, the home of my hon. leader, to be sold at prices lower than the Canadian products. I have named two plants to illustrate my point, but there are others in the city of Fort William which were running up to 1921.

Conditions in Fort William have been relieved to a certain extent by the action of Hon. G. Howard Ferguson's government. Considerable assistance has been given by work on roads which are being built despite the fact that it is very costly to carry on this construction during the winter period. The provincial government is constructing a portion of the trans-Canada highway, about which the hon. minister seems to have so much doubt. The provincial government has also assisted in helping to reopen a pulp mill in Fort William, which mill is now running and employing about 300 men. Deputations who attended upon the government from the province of Manitoba and other western provinces pointed out that those provinces also assisted, but this matter can be dealt with more fully by my western friends. I need only say that those deputations received no assistance from this government.

This unemployment problem is nothing new, although the Minister of Labour spoke as though he had not realized there was such a thing. I hold in my hand an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe of August 8, 1929, eight months ago, which is headed and which reads as follows:

Sleeping Under Stars, Starving Immigrants Vainly Seek Positions

Men Still Crowd Into Employment Offices, Many in State of Destitution—Professional Branch Official Supports Mayor Smaller Harvest Is Complication

Last Friday the seriousness of the problem was stressed in a report in The Globe based on the words of Superintendent Dobbs of the government employment office, Front street, who, when interviewed on the subject, definitely stated that there were as many people out of work in the city of Toronto as there were during the winter months.

And the article continues:

"It is hard," said this well set-up fellow,

Referring to one of the men:

"to be an optimist on a stomach crying out for food."

And again:

The exact number of men unemployed in Toronto is not known; but so far as unemployment is concerned, officials state that this summer is the worst experienced for many years, and all are agreed that something requires to be done immediately to ease the situation in Toronto.

There would appear to be nothing new about this matter. There is one member of this house who should have realized the seriousness of this matter more than any other member, and that is the Minister of Labour. His own town of Kenora has been talking about this question for many months, and I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the council of that town. Kenora is probably one of the most important towns in that section of the country.

Mr. HEENAN: The most important town in Canada.

Mr. MANION: I will admit that if it will please the minister. This resolution was dated December 27, and reads as follows:

The council of the town of Kenora view with alarm the problem of unemployment prevailing at present due to conditions over which this body has no control, and for the relief of which it would be utterly impossible for local authorities to assume the whole responsibility on account of the financial aspect.

Therefore this body hereby instructs the mayor and clerk to petition the Dominion and provincial governments to send representatives to a conference to discuss the situation with a view to such governments assuming a portion of the cost of relief work started by the town, and to undertake such provincial and Dominion government work or works already commenced and in prospect by the different departments as will seem justly possible to do.

And that copies of this motion be sent to Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, Premier of Ontario, Hon. Dr. Forbes Godfrey, Minister of Labour for the province of Ontario, Hon. William Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests.

And that January 7 be suggested as the date of the said conference.

Unemployment was not a new thing to the Minister of Labour, or it should not have been if he had been paying any attention to his own home town; for I find another article published many weeks earlier, which I will read for the minister's edification. The minister himself quoted from the Kenora Miner and News, and I would like to read an article which appeared on November 4. It is as follows:

The Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour in the Dominion government, was in this riding during almost the whole of the provincial election campaign and had been here a great portion of the time since July travelling up and down in a splendidly equipped private car. We doubt if he was observant enough to notice that each night the station waiting room floors on the Canadian National Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway lines were almost covered with sleeping men, who were beating their way east during the day time on freight and passenger trains. Strong, fine looking men, unable to obtain work in the west, were risking their lives to reach the east. He had no message of hopefulness or cheer for these men, broke and buffeted about as they were.

The same Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, voted against a proposal at the last session of the Dominion house to make a grant of $10,000,000 to the provinces for the purpose of assisting in building the trans-Canada highway. This amount would have materially assisted in providing work for the army of men who have daily for many weeks been beating their way east on the railways at the risk of their lives.

The town of Kenora has been drawing this matter to the attention of the minister. The hon. minister has been boasting in the house of the fact that he helped the present provincial member for Kenora in a successful contest for that seat.

Mr. HEENAN: The article the hon. member has just read was written by the defeated candidate just after the election.

Mr. MANION: So was the article the minister read written by the defeated candidate. It was written by the same man in the same paper. It apparently all depends on which foot the boot is on. This is from the Ottawa Citizen and the action happened on February 20, the very day that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) put into the mouth of His Excellency the statement that the country was enjoying the utmost prosperity. The Labour member in the legislature at Toronto made the following speech:

The only Labour member in the house, in resuming the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, said that unemployment in Kenora was very serious, and he believed the government should render immediate aid, either through providing work on highways or by grants of money to the municipalities.

That was the very day the Prime Minister put into the mouth of His Excellency the statement that conditions in the Dominion of Canada were so prosperous. The minister had this matter drawn to his attention early in the year, and in fact late last year by various labour organizations in this country, asking for a conference, and he gave out a statement which is published and which I hold in my hand. This is the heading in the Evening Citizen of the 17th December last:

Labour minister thinks no need for conference. Proposal to call meeting in respect to unemployment not favoured by Hon. Peter Heenan and government.

Then it goes on:

The federal government does not consider that any necessity exists for calling a conference with respect to unemployment, according to Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, who issued a statement to this effect following a conference he had yesterday with the executive of the Employment Service Council of Canada. Among the considerations which impelled the government not to convene such a conference were the fact that employment in Canada at the moment stands at the highest peak reached at this period of the year since 1920, and that further to this the great transportation companies and the government have embarked or are embarking on programs of work aggregating many millions of dollars.

Moreover, the minister does not think that a conference of the character that was recently held in the United States by President Hoover would accomplish any good in Canada.

That is the attitude of the Minister of Labour. In other words, he took the stand that there was no unemployment; that statistics showed that unemployment was practically at its normal position in this country. That was the attitude he took according to that statement which was published with that interpretation throughout the whole Dominion of Canada.

I well remember some years ago reading about the period of the French revolution. Louis XVI had a minister named Foulon—and possibly emphasis should be placed on the first section of the name—who, when he was asked on one occasion when conditions were bad in France, what the unemployed people were going to do, said: "Let them eat grass." This government does not even offer grass to the employed of this country; all it offers them is statistics of employment, statistics showing that they are employed. It tries to convince them by reiterating the statement by various ministers that the people are employed, have plenty of money in their pockets and plenty of food in their stomachs, in spite of the fact that they foolishly think they have not. While I was listening to the minister yesterday I was struck with the date on which the minister was making his speech. It was certainly an April Fool's speech so far as the workingmen of this country were concerned.

The President of the United States, in that vast and rich country thought it necessary, because he had it drawn to his attention that unemployment was rampant there, to call a conference, and a couple of Sundays ago I had the pleasure of listening to a speech over the radio given by Mr. Lawrence, speaking for the president. He said:

Speaking for Mr. Hoover, he said that while there was unemployment in the United States very great improvement had been shown in this since December first.

That was about the time of the conference.

He stated that in sixty days the whole condition should be relieved.

[Mr. Manion.]

He went on to say:

Only twelve states have unemployment trouble and no requests have come from them for help from the national government as their unemployment troubles are being looked after locally.

I took down these notes as I listened to the gentleman speaking, so the statements made from the other side that conditions are so severe in the United States are not correct.

The Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister have taken the stand that the government is not called upon to help this situation; that it is, first, a municipal and, second, a provincial problem, but a different attitude was taken by Mr. Brownlee, Premier of Alberta, and the Canadian Council of Agriculture whose resolution I have under my hand, who consider that this government is responsible; and we took the same attitude under the order in council in 1921 that the Dominion was responsible along with the provinces, and the municipalities. I repeat what I said in Winnipeg, that when it becomes so serious in our country it is a joint matter, federal, provincial and municipal.

As regards these deputations that came from the great lakes to the Pacific ocean to see the Prime Minister and his government—and the Minister of Labour was present at the interview—the Toronto Globe says that the Prime Minister took this attitude, and this is the day after the deputation waited upon him. Quoting the Prime Minister, it says:

"I can't understand why you gentlemen are stirring up and exaggerating this unemployment situation"—

He was speaking to the delegation.

—said the Prime Minister, after listening to complaints for two hours. "If the situation is as deplorable as you try to picture, why is not eastern Canada represented? The answer is that, generally speaking, the employment situation in Canada is not abnormal. I have a telegram from the government of the province of Quebec that conditions there are quite satisfactory. You advertise that there is unemployment, and the relief is to be sought from the Dominion government, and immediately there is a rush to the cities.

"Why turn to Ottawa?" he asks, "and why is it that when municipal and provincial problems arise the local authorities always turn to the federal government for aid? You say your public works are costing more and you want us to bear a portion of the extra cost. Well, our public works are costing more, and are you willing to help us pay for the extra cost?"

That is the attitude the Prime Minister took according to the Toronto Globe of the day following the visit of the deputation. I have also a clipping from the Collingwood Messenger to the following effect:

Young men, clean limbed and able workers, arrive each day, penniless and hungry at the Orillia jail, with a plea for a night out of the cold and a breakfast in the morning.

All the papers in Canada were taking a similar attitude. In regard to unemployment insurance there was quite a discussion yesterday between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The Prime Minister heatedly defended the attitude he had taken with regard to unemployment insurance. The headings in the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal show that the Prime Minister's statements are sometimes misinterpreted. This is the heading in the Ottawa Citizen:

Canada to have insurance plan for unemployed.
Mr. King, replying to deputation seeking federal aid to municipalities and provinces, makes forecast of insurance.
Hopes to be able to work out plan soon.
All would be compelled to contribute during periods of employment.

The heading in the Ottawa Journal is very much the same.

Premier hopes relief scheme prepared soon.
Tells deputation insurance plan only permanent solution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why does my hon. friend not read the article instead of the headings somebody else puts on them?

Mr. MANION: I will read the articles. One can draw almost any conclusion from statements made by the Prime Minister. I do not wish to impute motives, but I think that is the purpose of the statements put out so that they will be misunderstood here and misunderstood there, and so that men will draw their own conclusions and perhaps vote for the government. The first paragraph sums up the situation and it is identical in the two papers. It is as follows:

Eventually Canada will have a system of unemployment insurance, Premier Mackenzie King predicted to-day in replying to a deputation seeking federal aid to municipalities and provinces on unemployment relief. This, he said, was the only constructive way to deal with the unemployment situation and he hoped it would soon be possible to work out an insurance plan.

People believed the Prime Minister meant what he said; they trusted him; they took his attitude as meaning that. Then the Prime Minister was asked a day or two later by the same gentleman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, what he meant by that statement. I have the question here, but have not the time to read it. I have also the statement of the Prime Minister in which he says, in effect, that it is a matter for the provinces to deal with, that so far as the Dominion government is concerned, if the provinces want to talk about it, the government will deal with them, but the provinces have no hope of getting help from this government. I think that is a fair summing up of the attitude of the Prime Minister. He now states that as far as he is concerned, this is not a Dominion matter at all. A few weeks later the Minister of Labour goes to London and makes a speech, which is summed up in a newspaper heading, as follows:

Government prepared to assist fund for unemployed. Would aid provinces to establish insurance scheme on contributory basis, says Hon. Peter Heenan.

I will read the first paragraph of the despatch:

London, Ontario, March 14.—The Dominion government is ready to assist the provinces in establishing unemployment insurance for Canada on a contributory basis, announced the Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, in an address here to-night. In making this announcement Mr. Heenan said:

"As far as I am concerned I will utilize my every effort and the Premier will back me up to see that the labouring man who is out of work for any period of the year will have a right to expect and to receive a share of the profits he helped make."

In other words, it is simply a matter of blowing hot and blowing cold on this question, with the hope that different sections of the country will draw any conclusions they wish, and probably go on supporting the government.

So far as the Prime Minister is concerned, and I think this applies particularly to him when making public pronouncements, he reminds me of the saying of the brilliant Frenchman, that language was given us to hide our thoughts. If I applied that to the Minister of Labour, I am afraid that I would have to say that language was given us to hide our lack of thoughts. I am afraid that the Minister of Labour forgets or never knew that there is supposed to be ministerial solidarity under constitutional government. Ministers are expected to take on matters of policy the same attitude. You cannot have one minister taking one attitude in one section of the country, and another minister taking a different attitude on the same question in another part of the country, because each minister speaks for the government. He cannot speak on his own behalf; he speaks for the government. I suppose the Minister of Labour forgot that. He was apparently not speaking in London in a ministerial sense at all, but in a Pickwickian sense. I submit to the Prime Minister that the people of this country are anxious for frank and candid statements from the government at the present time on all matters of public policy. They are tired of political humbug; they are weary of political shell games, played with the idea of catching votes in various parts of the country. They want public pronouncements made in such a way that they cannot be read in any way the reader chooses to take. The Prime Minister gives out statements continually, both to this house and outside, that may be read in any sense; for instance, his statement on unemployment insurance. Let me give three instances which have happened recently. There was his statement with respect to unemployment insurance with which I have been dealing, and which everybody understood to mean that this government was going to bring into force unemployment insurance. Now the Prime Minister contradicts that. The Minister of Labour takes the other attitude, and no one knows just where the government stands on this question.

The Prime Minister not long ago gave out a statement in this house on the liquor export question, in which he said that the only question was that if we did not straighten this difficulty out, it meant danger of war between the two countries. His statement was interpreted in that way by the papers of Canada and of the United States which referred to his speech. When the matter was brought to his attention by my hon. leader a day or so afterwards, the Prime Minister took the attitude that he did not mean that at all. Well, Mr. Speaker, if his statement did not mean that, it did not mean anything. That is all I can say.

So far as the tariff is concerned, we have the Prime Minister taking various attitudes in various parts of the country. His ministers take contradictory attitudes in different parts of the country. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), for instance, at Brantford came out flatly as an out-and-out protectionist. Ten days afterwards—I notice that an interval of a few days is always allowed to elapse between these ministerial utterances so that people can forget, I suppose, the statement just previously made in another section of the country by another minister—the Minister of Finance at Regina said that he was a low tariff man, and he emphasized that very strongly. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) takes the death-knell attitude on protection. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Health (Mr. King), well the Lord only knows what attitude they take. They are probably drifting around waiting for some life preserver to float within their reach that will be to the advantage of the government. Undoubtedly, in the whole realm of politics in this country, in the United States, and in England, there is no question upon which political parties differ more fundamentally than upon the tariff, and yet, and to my mind this is the most severe criticism that anybody can make of this government, within three or four weeks of the budget being introduced, there is not a man or woman in this house or outside of it who has the slightest idea whether the government in its budget will raise or lower the tariff.

Mr. HOWARD: Wait and see.

Mr. MANION: That is the policy of the government on everything.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is not that always the case with the budget in every country?

Mr. MANION: No, it is not true of any other country where the government takes pride in pronouncing its attitude upon any public question. But this government takes the wait-and-see attitude, and nobody knows its attitude to-day on any question that is before us.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I ask one other question?

Mr. MANION: I have only five minutes left. I do not mean to be discourteous, but I am pressed for time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain tell beforehand what he is going to do in his budget?

Mr. MANION: Yes, he does. Within the last two weeks he said that he was going to wipe out absolutely any vestige of protection that remained in the Safeguarding of Industries Act.

Mr. McINTOSH: The Chancellor's statement was very general; there was nothing very definite about it.

Mr. MANION: It is absolutely definite. They are a free trade government, and they are taking the free trade attitude. We believe in protecting our industries at all times, and we take a protectionist attitude. But this government takes no attitude on anything.

I wish to point out to the Prime Minister this: He is going to be defeated at the next election because of two main reasons. One is because of this political humbug that this government is putting over on the people of this country at all times. The people have awakened to it; they are wise to the fact that this government cannot be depended on in any statement it makes on any public question before the people of this country. P. T. Barnum said that you could not fool all the people all the time—I do not take time to quote his saying in full—but I want to say that this government has fooled the people so often that it cannot fool them any more.

There is a second reason why this government is going to be defeated, and I might as well hand it to the Prime Minister now, and that is because of his continued subservience to the United States. Perhaps I should put it in his own words, and say his don't provoke Washington policy. I admit frankly that he has not provoked Washington, but he has provoked hundreds of thousands of red-blooded Canadian people who look on Canada as a proud young nation, and not as the hinterland of the United States. The people are awake to all this political humbug and this subservience to Washington, and are waiting for a chance to express themselves on these two matters.

My time is almost up. Let me say in closing what the government should have done in regard to unemployment. In the first place, they should have called the conference which was asked for by the labour unions of this country from one end to the other. Secondly, they should have cooperated with Ontario and the other provinces, and supported the members sitting to your left in this house who urged upon the government a policy of highway construction, which would have relieved unemployment to a large extent. Thirdly, they should have taken the attitude that was outlined by the Minister of Labour in 1921, and which they had before them, under which we gave help in various ways to the provinces to relieve unemployment. Fourthly, and this is the most important of all, for a permanent cure—not a complete cure for unemployment, but it would lead to a substantial reduction of it—they should bring in a policy—I know they will not, but we will shortly—they should bring in a policy to stop our importing hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of goods from the United States which we could produce at home, and large importations from other countries as well as the United States of fruits and vegetables, butter and eggs that we could produce here. They should bring in a policy to hold the home market for the Canadian people. They should remember our importations of iron and steel products amounted to $340,000,000 a year, products that we could manufacture in this country, and sixty to seventy-five per cent of the value of which would represent work and wages for the people of Canada. They should remember that every ton of iron ore used in the blast furnaces of the Dominion are imported from the United States. Premier Ferguson put legislation through the Ontario house this year granting a bounty to encourage the development of our own iron ore when he could not get cooperation from Ottawa. Let the government look at the conditions in France and Britain. In France, under a protectionist policy, there is no unemployment and she has been able to absorb tens of thousands of workmen from other countries. But in Great Britain, just across the channel, there are a million and a half unemployed at the present time. Sir, it is time we had a government with some policy, with some courage, with some leadership in this country, if we are to solve not only this problem but the other pressing problems that confront the Dominion.

Mr E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the vocabulary and speed of the last speaker (Mr. Manion). I congratulate him on the tremendous amount of material that he got into a comparatively short space of time. I congratulate also the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan)—

An hon. MEMBER: On what?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On his extreme courtesy and patience throughout his entire speech. He showed a good deal of tolerance and forbearance. I am sorry I cannot congratulate him on the aggressive, constructive attitude that I had hoped for from him as representing the government. It is only fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has to some slight extent begun to meet the aspirations of labour. The introduction of the eight-hour day in the civil service, the regulations improving the fair wage clauses, are all to the good; but of course they do not touch the real problem of unemployment. It is that to which I wish to direct my remarks in the short time at my disposal. I think it was Thomas Carlyle who said that a man willing to work and unable to find work is perhaps the saddest sight that fortune's inequality exhibits under the sun. And yet Carlyle had not the opportunity in those days of seeing what we have seen in the west—magistrates and judges saying to the unfortunates who had been taken off the street by policemen, "There is no use my giving you thirty days, you will be back here again; there is no employment for you; the best I can do for you and the country is to put you in for three months." That state of affairs has existed during the past winter and throughout previous winters. That there is serious unemployment in Canada no one can deny unless he be mad or blind or shuts his eyes to the actual facts that confront him. That there is actual unemployment in every country of the world to-day, almost without exception, so far as I know, is also true. So it is no use for the last speaker (Mr. Manion) to offer protection as a solution or to blame free trade as the cause of the trouble. As a matter of fact the problem of unemployment is due neither to protection nor to free trade. Although, if there could be a general application of the latter principle I think you would find possibly there would be less unemployment than we have to-day under protection. But even that remains to be proven. One fact does stand out, that protection as such does not either raise wages or increase employment. In that connection let me give the house one brief quotation in support of my statement. It is from an article by one of the greatest of the European economists, Henri Lambert of Belgium. He says:

> It is untrue that protectionism, preventing importation and making for a self sustained people, is a source of higher wages and a factor of a higher standard of living; on the contrary protectionism tends to lower both and it is free exchange only which can have such favourable results.

He now gives his reason:

> All imported things are paid for by equal values of exported things. Therefore to begin with importation does not and cannot reduce home production, demand of labour and wages.

I think hon. members who have studied the question at all realize that the old slogan used by protectionists, "protection protects the worker," is all tommyrot. Let me give Mr. Lambert's view in that connection, that protection protects the worker to the same degree and for the same reason that the farmer protects the cow. These are his words:

> "I protect my cows," says the farmer, "I know why I do this, but the cows do not." So is it explainable that with the consent of the workmen and the gradual auto-suggestion of the farmers, protection has become for most peoples an economic credo—which indeed in the future will be considered as the most mischievous and widest spread superstition known in the history of men.

I question that latter statement myself. I think the widest spread superstition known in the history of men is the fetish of the gold standard. However, that in passing.

I wish to support my previous statement that unemployment is not confined to Canada or to the United States. It is a world-wide problem. The problem cannot be laid at the door either of the present administration or of my friends of the opposition. It would not matter which government was in power at the moment, we would still have unemployment and will continue to suffer from it unless it is tackled in some fundamental way. I quote from the Christian Science Monitor of May 10, 1927:

> Walter R. Layton, the British economist, estimates the total number of persons whose breadwinners were unemployed in Europe at 10,000,000.

I quote also from Leland Olds of the Federated Press:

> In the United States 4,000,000 unemployed.

This is for 1928, and conditions are even worse this year.

United States	4,000,000
Germany	1,548,000
England	1,178,700
Russia	1,127,000
Italy	414,000
Austria	224,000
Holland	220,000
Poland	117,000
Denmark	86,000
Canada	75,000

A large increase this year must be admitted.

Czechoslovakia	50,000
Portugal	50,000
Other European	97,287
	9,186,987

Or a grand total of almost 10,000,000 in 1928. There is no doubt also that in addition to the normal unemployment—if it can be called normal—you have exaggerated unemployment in this country at the moment as a result of several causes. We had a small crop, with reduced purchasing power on the part of the farmers, resulting in a smaller volume of wheat moving one way and goods the other, followed by a great decrease in the employment of railway workers. Then you have a slowing up of orders, resulting in a slackening of the output of the factories of eastern Canada, and the laying off of men in almost every industry in the country. One of the main factors undoubtedly, is the smaller crop, about half the volume that western Canada produced in 1928. On top of that you had the stock market crash. Now, although the stock market collapse it is alleged, wiped out mostly paper profits, there is no doubt it did also wipe out a tremendous amount of savings of small investors, stenographers, clerks, managers of stores, heads of departments, and so on. They all put their savings in the stock market, and those savings were wiped out when the crash came. The result is there has been a considerable reduction in the purchasing power of the masses. One of the greatest truths discovered in the last four or five years on the American continent is—and it is a wonder it was not discovered long ago—that one millionaire cannot consume ten thousand pairs of boots and shoes in a year, but give ten thousand people the purchasing power and they will consume them. That truth is just beginning to make itself apparent to industrialists, financiers and employers of labour. The root cause of unemployment as we have it to-day is just that lack of purchasing power. There is not a sufficient volume of money or buying capacity given back to the producers of the world to buy the goods that they produce or are capable of producing. I do not think anybody can challenge that statement. I will attempt to show you in a moment that the problem has increased enormously because of the tremendous productivity of men to-day as the result of labour saving devices. In Canada we have some exceptional conditions, some of which are permanent, and must lead to a greater proportion of unemployment in this country than in the older countries. One is embodied in the reference quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour from the report of the Ontario commission, which pointed out that because the country was new and its development more rapid than that of older countries, periods of depression were likely to be more extreme, leading to longer periods of temporary unemployment. On top of that we have the climatic factor recently referred to in some newspaper despatches as the most formidable question which arises in regard to unemployment and which makes some such protection as insurance for the unemployed seem most desirable. We admit Canada is prosperous; we admit its prosperity and its productivity. We grant you at once that the revenue of the various provinces during the last year has been very great, that the resources and the man power are there, but we deny definitely and conclusively that prosperity has descended to the common people of this country. The purchasing power of prosperity has not been spread out in a fair and equitable manner. A recent newspaper article goes so far as to say:

> So prosperous a country as Canada could almost afford to disregard the whole subject of unemployment, were it not for her climate, but because of that one factor, if you excepted all the others, there are so many people out of work each winter that prosperous or not we must be prepared to treat unemployment as a permanent problem. We must do so for the reason that climate becomes the most conspicuous difficulty in the face of Canadian unemployment insurance.

Just in order to refresh the Prime Minister's mind on this point, I have some things I would like to say. He suggested recently that all the provinces were particularly satisfied with the situation. I wish to refer him to the report of the meeting of the Calgary council appearing in the morning Albertan of November 26:

> With every member of the council agreeing that the situation is one of the most serious which has faced the city in many years, discussion of unemployment featured proceedings at the city council meeting Monday night.

I have also in my hand many telegrams from various sections of Alberta. The one I intend to read will illustrate the situation and is illustrative of the general condition:

> Drumheller, January 9, 1930.
> E. J. Garland, M.P.,
> Rowley, Alberta.
>
> Have sent the following wire to Walter Smitten, Hon. Peter Heenan, Ottawa, and Premier Brownlee, Edmonton. "Many returned men and families absolutely destitute Drumheller and Wayne valleys owing to unemployment. Situation desperate. We demand immediate steps be taken to relieve this situation."
>
> C. G. Durham,
> President and Executive Canadian Legion.

Let me jump from Alberta to Nova Scotia. Some hon. member referred to the very prosperous condition of affairs in Nova Scotia. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has published some factory figures covering that province. While they relate particularly to it, they reflect the continent-wide trend of affairs. These figures show that in the year 1890 there were 34,944 men employed in the factories of Nova Scotia; by the year 1927 the number had shrunk to 17,840, which represents just half of the first number. During the same period, however, the output of the factories had increased from $30,000,000 a year to more than $74,000,000 a year. Briefly, that means that in twenty-seven years the output per worker had increased more than five times.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In dollars, but not in quantity.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I shall touch upon the question of dollars in a minute John Jacob Raskob, who is well known to this house by reputation at least, a leading financier and business man of the United States who can be quoted with some authority, now recognizes that industry can produce more than it can sell. He states frankly that it can produce more in five days than it can find an outlet for in seven. The only solution he can see for such a situation is to shut down two days a week instead of one as is the custom at present. That is not the way to approach such a problem, of course, for it would but make the position of the worker worse.

I was very sorry that the last speaker did not definitely place himself on record as favouring some action on the part of the government in regard to unemployment insurance. I recognize that the inauguration of unemployment insurance alone is not a solution for the problem; it would only be a temporary relief of it, but will alleviate extreme suffering. I wish to refer to a very respectable publication, popularly known as The Thunderer—the Times of London, England—on this subject. In discussing unemployment insurance, whilst approving its use, they admit that it would not solve the problem permanently, but would tend to remove utter destitution. We in this section of the house, and doubtless other hon. members of the house must seek to remove the misery, suffering and loss to the community caused by utter destitution of our working people as the result of unemployment.

I now come to that phase in my discussion touching the effect of labour saving devices on the productivity of man. James L. Davis, Secretary of Labour for the United States of America, says that the United States can make in seventeen days all the boots and shoes that are required by that country for a period of one year. Is that not an imposing illustration of the strides that have been made in labour saving devices in recent years? The United States coal mines can produce in six months all the coal that is required for the United States for one year. It is our distribution system that is at fault, not our system of production. We have almost entirely solved the problem of production, but have not even commenced to touch the problem of distribution. Governments are not even making an intelligent contribution to research in the solution of this problem. To my mind it represents one of the greatest problems facing us to-day, if it is not the greatest.

When we consider what we call our present economic system, I am reminded of the story of the homesteader who hired a sailor and gave him a team of oxen and a plough. I do not suppose the sailor had ever before seen a plough or a team of oxen, except in the picture papers. The sailor went out to work in the forenoon, and returned to the farmer with the following complaint: The starboard ox is on the larboard side, the larboard ox is on the starboard side; the rudder is bust, the steering gear bent and the whole doggone works has gone to the dickens. The present economic and financial system tends to introduce a condition of affairs quite like that. Everything is topsy-turvy; production runs on almost unguided, excepting by the profits which are made. As yet the people have failed to realize that profits depend almost entirely upon consumption, and consumption depends upon purchasing power. If the people cannot buy the goods they produce we must inevitably come, some day or other, either to a crash as illustrating the experience of the sailor, or to a solution of the problem.

I referred to the boot and shoe industry. It is not many years ago since the man who made boots and shoes by hand turned them out at the rate of two pairs a week, or roughly 100 pairs a year. To-day, with improved machinery, one man can produce 1,800 pairs of shoes a year, or rather not in a whole year but in 260 days. Then take the Buick branch of the General Motors business. In the year 1923 that plant increased its production from 625 cars to 1,000 cars, with a reduction of 5,000 men during that year.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Was there any corresponding reduction in the price of the cars?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will let my hon. friend answer that, he is an authority on that question. In the steel industry, to which reference was made by the hon. member who preceded me, seven men now do the work of sixty in the casting of pig iron and two men do the work of 125 in its loading. One man replaces forty-two men in the open hearth furnace. In the machine and repair shops of the railways you will find the following condition: One man replaces 25 men, using five to ten semi-automatic machines; four men in five to seven hours can do what it took eight men three weeks to do in the repairing of locomotives. This latter change is due almost entirely to the introduction of the acetylene torch. In 1914, which is the basic year with which most of these comparisons are made, it took from fifteen to thirty hours to turn one pair of locomotive tires. To-day, in eight hours the same man power can turn six pairs of locomotive tires. Why, Mr. Speaker, I could go on almost illimitably illustrating the extraordinary change in production capacity which machines have made in our modern human life. One more illustration: A single machine in the city of Chicago produces 40,000 bricks an hour. Formerly it took one man eight hours to produce 450 bricks.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Can the hon. member tell us anything about the man power the combine has saved in the west?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Some four years ago I think western Canada had three or four combines; we were just beginning to be interested in them. I think last year it was estimated—I am not certain of these figures, but they are approximately accurate—that there were between 5,000 and 6,000 combines. Each machine is estimated to displace from five to ten men, depending upon its size.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): More than that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Very well, we will say ten men to the combine on the average. In other words, we need 60,000 harvesters less each year, or a number equivalent almost to the entire harvester excursions which formerly moved from east to west. That alone is a significant fact in connection with this whole discussion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn for one moment to Great Britain. I find that one of the greatest authorities there, Mr. Arthur Kitson, who is a manufacturer, an authority on financial questions and also president of the British Banking Reform League, says:

It is quite certain that the need for labour must become less and less with the growth of inventions and the increase in industrial efficiency. Indeed the real problem we have to solve is not so much that of finding constant employment for our people as our supplying them with life's necessities and comforts out of the abundance of goods created. Even to-day the labour of less than 10 per cent of the population will readily suffice to maintain the entire inhabitants of this country in a high state of comfort. Suppose discoveries and inventions during the next half century result in the displacement of all manual labour by machinery, must the bulk of the world's inhabitants then perish?

Is work to be the sole basis of living, Mr. Speaker? We will have to answer that question sooner or later. Sir Charles Sykes, a Yorkshire manufacturer, says:

The problem of unemployment or its cause is not due to a defective system of production, but to a defective system of distribution.

As I said, I could continue almost endlessly with illustrations of how jobs are vanishing from under the hands and eyes of the workers of the world. We find a striking illustration reported by the United States department of labour, whose report, referring to the copper refining industry, says:

The figures show that during this period of nine years,—

That is, from 1918 to 1927.

—the number of men employed was reduced from 578 to 233, with a coincident increase of about 10 per cent in total output.

Then you find another in the automobile business as a whole; you find since 1922, that 1,400 per cent more cars are produced with only ten per cent more men employed. It would be unfair for me to conclude this part of my discussion without reference to a newspaper which has done much to educate the public with regard to this question. I refer to the Ottawa Citizen. In an editorial appearing some time ago it dealt with this situation, and hon. members might compare this editorial with the statement of Sir Charles Sykes, the Yorkshire manufacturer, with that of Mr. Arthur Kitson, or with any other authority dealing with the question, and a striking similarity in their conclusions will be found. The editorial states:

If every able-bodied adult in Canada were set to work eight hours a day at productive labour, there would result such a surplus of production that the factories would be closed down in a very short time, even if the goods were given away, simply because the power to produce is greater than the power—but not the capacity—to consume.

That the increase of purchasing power among the masses of the people is a necessary first step towards industrial prosperity is recognized by students of up to date economics. So far as unemployment is concerned, it seems logical that the one solution is to find some way of diminishing the hours of labour without reducing the purchasing power of the individual.

That is only a part.

Whether the present industrial system can be reorganized on this basis is a question for discussion and solution. The fact remains, however, that only along this line does improvement seem possible. It is not debatable that improvement should be made, if possible, by orderly rather than violent means.

At this stage perhaps I should draw just one more comparison. Not long ago I picked up a United States publication called Labour, coming from Washington, under date of December 14, 1929. In that publication I find the following editorial:

Fewer Workers, Less Pay—And More Work

Some figures in the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission are very important if not wholly pleasant reading for railroad workers.

The average number of rail employees in the United States during 1928 was 1,656,411, and their total pay was $2,826,590,000.

This is a drop, in round numbers, of 79,000 employees and of $84,000,000 in compensation as compared to the year 1927.

At the same time, the reduced force of workers in 1928 handled 4,073,000,000 more ton-miles of revenue freight than the larger force handled the previous year.

Hon. gentlemen may reply, "But that is the United States, we do not have that terrible situation existing in this country." In order to give a comparison in this country I will quote Senator Robertson, the former Minister of Labour in the Meighen cabinet. That gentleman points out that the Canadian railways employed 9,000 fewer men in 1927 than they did in 1920, and paid them $23,000,000 less in wages. This in spite of the fact that there was an increase of 1,500 miles of railways operated during that period and an increase of about 30 per cent in the volume of traffic handled.

I think these facts speak eloquently for themselves. I wish I had the striking delivery and verbiage of some of our older statemen. No finer picture could be drawn of what is actually taking place at this moment, and of what has existed for the past twelve years, than the picture drawn by Disraeli himself of similar conditions which existed in his day. Over eighty years ago these words were uttered by Disraeli:

> A spirit of rapacious covetousness desecrating all the humanities of life . . . is our besetting sin.

The words used by Disraeli were "England's besetting sin." The quotation continues:

> The altar of mammon has blazed with triple worship. To acquire, to accumulate, to plunder each other by virtue of philosophic phrases, to propose a Utopia to consist only of wealth and toil, this has been our breathless business for the last twelve years, until we are startled from our voracious strife by the wail of intolerable serfage.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg and his colleague represent the wail of intolerable serfage; the rest of you may place yourselves where you will.

Perhaps sufficient has been said regarding immigration and its effect on unemployment in Canada, but I wish simply to point out one fact which may be of interest. During the last two years there is no doubt that unemployment has existed, and that it has been known to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of Immigration. During that period 331,775 immigrants were brought into Canada. The unemployment condition was such, particularly in the west, that protests were registered. Western cities sent delegations to Ottawa, and correspondence took place between the premiers and the Minister of Labour. But has there been a cessation? Have the gates been closed until unfortunate Canadians have found jobs? Not a bit of it. During the one month of January, 1930, 290 immigrants were admitted to Canada, destined for the province of Alberta alone. This has been done in the face of protests which have been lodged with the federal government. Is there one industry in Canada in which there is at the present time any shortage of labour? If there is not, then for heaven's sake let us close the gates at least a little while until employment can be given to the men already here.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: What about the 8,000 who are coming in?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let us hope that we may be able to stop them.

Mr. ADSHEAD: They are coming.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That then is most unfortunate. Mr. Stuart Chase has treated this subject most eloquently. He asks the question, "Have you ever hunted a job, and if so, have you ever hunted a job when you were over forty years of age? If you have not done that, you do not know the tragedy of unemployment and you have no conception of what it does to the heart and soul of a human being, of what it does to his family." Have you ever heard a wife say, "Well, Jim is lucky if he can hold his job," or "John does not know when he will be out of work, perhaps to-morrow or maybe the day after." There is no permanency or no continuity offered to our workers under the present economic system. Without saying that it is the deliberate voracious rapacity to which Disraeli referred, it is evident that there is something wrong with a system which denies to the labouring man a permanency of employment. He does not know from day to day or from week to week whether or not the job upon which his family depends is going to continue. Such conditions are a disgrace to any civilized country. The whole thing is wrong, and Professor Soddy sums it up as follows:

> On Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays science invents new methods of abolishing labour, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays new labours to relieve the consequent unemployment. This farce should cease.

Until he is placed in employment again he must remain a stranger to the buying market. In the meantime the community must care for him and his family in much the same way as though he were a steady permanent worker. But the unemployed are not cared for in any permanent way. They sometimes receive miserable charity, a thing which degrades and demoralizes their morals and reduces them to the miserable condition of almost industrial serfage. Public confidence is shaken and I say to the Prime Minister that his own government even is feeling the tremors of uncertainty caused by this unemployed situation.

There follows upon it immediately a curtailment of credit which deprives further numbers of employment, resulting in a greater decline of buying power which leads to a further reduction of credit and so on. The whole thing is a most extraordinary, uncontrolled, vicious system, governed only by the profits which those who control credit can make, and this is the fundamental factor which governs the system under which we are to-day operating. I say to the Prime Minister that until he and his colleagues appoint a body to make a survey of economic and social conditions, a commission capable of intelligently analyzing this situation, he has not taken any step in the direction of a real solution of this problem. Unemployment and under-employment are two of the most destructive diseases which can visit any community, national or international. They render a human being physically unfit; they weaken his moral as well as his physical fibre so that when work does offer the man is unable to compete with those who have been in steady employment. One wretched condition leads to another. If this thing is permitted to go on it will sap the whole vitality and vigour of all nations; for this thing is not confined alone to our country. Children brought up under such conditions must inevitably be less virile, less conscious of their possible powers, than those brought up under privileged circumstances. Can the child in a home where they do not know from day to day where to-morrow's bread is coming from; can the child in a home dependent upon some form of charity, have the same self-respect as have your own children? The words are not at my command to bring home as I would like to this House of Commons and to the country the misery of this appalling cancer of unemployment and its effect upon the country.

I do not think it would be unfitting to state that I have no desire to make any political capital out of this matter, but perhaps it would not be out of place if we had a little cynical amusement at the expense of the Minister of Labour. I hope hon. members have recognized that I have made this an absolutely non-partisan question. It is a non-partisan question and must remain so. It is a problem the solution of which will require the massed intelligence of the people, the best brains we can procure. It is going to be worth while trying to find a solution. But here let me glance back to 1925 and read the following words:

> I am sure there is no need for me to argue that unemployment prevails on a very large scale. We have had delegations to the government at Ottawa, and we have recently had a delegation to this government at Toronto. Up to date, there does not seem to have been very much done to relieve the situation, other than one body "passing the buck" to another party.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the words of the Hon. Peter Heenan, M.P.P., speaking before the members of the provincial legislature of Ontario. At that time he deplored any attitude of "passing the buck." He referred to it in terms of contempt. I ask him frankly, as one member of the community to another, as one who is anxious to cooperate with him: Does he not think he to-day is "passing the buck"? And to the Prime Minister I say: Would it not be rather the part of courage and statesmanship to start out now and say definitely: We will accept the responsibility for initiating a scheme of unemployment insurance? I will give the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour all my support in any program they wish to outline that will offer some relief—and that is all it would be at the moment—to this wretched unemployment problem.

But I continue. The Minister of Labour in the same address made a most eloquent appeal. He referred to the vast power of the country to produce, to its great resources, to its great plant capable of producing 20 per cent more than it was producing. He referred to the financial conditions, the amount of money there was in the country, and he almost wept tears because we were unable to solve the problem of unemployment. But he comes down to this towards the close of his speech:

> Men are out of work here because of irregular and uneven demand for labour. Some definite step ought to be taken now. Any government, which fails or refuses to help its people to procure the necessities of life, cannot hope to retain the loyalty of its people.

I am afraid the minister's statement at that time was but prophecy. Any government which neglects this appalling problem and fails to make some constructive contribution towards its solution, will undoubtedly lose the loyalty of the people of this country. The hon. member concluded with the following:

> I have dwelt at considerable length in connection with this question, because to my mind it is the most important question we have to contend with, and I sincerely hope that the time I have consumed will not be in vain and that some definite and systematic policy will be laid down by the governments of this country to meet this economic problem.

Not the Ontario government nor the Alberta government, nor any provincial government did he refer to specifically; he said: "The governments of this country." If we are to wait until provincial governments take the initiative, I am afraid we shall have to wait for a long time. At this particular point let me say this: I cannot strain or stress too vigorously the thought that this problem is a state problem and that the federal government as a major element in the state cannot reject its responsibility.

The Russell Sage Foundation, which by the way is an organization that was formed in order to make an inquiry into the social and economic conditions of the United States and Canada, has this to say:

The study touched seventy cities and thirty-one states and Canada:

Widespread unemployment is now a constant phenomenon with far-reaching economic social, psychological and moral bearings. It found that from one to six millions each year were out of work for weeks and sometimes months at a time. In Great Britain unemployment had become so general for several years before the war that the government had been compelled to inaugurate an unemployment insurance policy in order to relieve the suffering caused by the so-called captains of industry being unable to manage the industry of a nation in the interest of the whole.

Now I turn to one who might be regarded as an even greater authority than the Russell Sage Foundation. This authority says:

The sacredness of human personality is more important than all other considerations. Without infinite regard for individual life, however obscure or deformed, impressions of social values are meaningless. Estimates of national power, pride in industrial growth, forecasts of world expansion—any and all of these which reckon material gains apart from human losses they involve, mistake for life itself the course texture of but a part of the garment of life.

The same authority goes on, and this is particularly relevant:

When idleness is the fault of the social order rather than of the individual concerned, it places the onus on the state to safeguard its own assets, namely, human beings.

That authority is the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. He himself placed the responsibility on the state and he cannot now relinquish his share of the responsibility. If this problem is not tackled we admit that the law of the jungle prevails.

I might refer to other authorities who have made much the same statements. We have Brandeis, Couzens; we have the Minister of Labour in the United States and dozens of others who are steadily recognizing the state's responsibility to its own citizens.

But I must conclude. In this section of the house we are, so far as I know at the moment, unanimous to this degree; we ask that the government immediately initiate some sort of unemployment insurance which can be applied to all the provinces and which will depend upon concurrent legislation by them, involving, if you will, contributions by employer and employee. That is just one phase of the question. I now formally ask the Prime Minister to institute this year a survey into the whole economic and social structure of the country, a survey by Canadian economists—he will not have to go outside of Canada to find suitable men—in order that they may advise him as to a permanent solution of the problem. It is an honour to second the resolution of the hon. member for North Winnipeg.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does my hon. friend not think that the statement made by the Minister of Labour in London bound the cabinet and the government to something?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have not read the statement, I say frankly, and so I cannot tell.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I take it that it is not necessary to enter into any argument to prove that there is a very large amount of unemployment in this country. I wish to thank the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) for having brought this matter to the attention of the house. With a great deal of what he has said I am in complete accord. With some of his statements, however, I cannot agree. For instance, he made this statement:

It is claimed by economists that during the past twenty years production has approximately doubled, but wages, that is, real wages, have remained almost stationary. That means that the position of the workingman has become relatively worse instead of better. When production becomes greater and greater, when we are able to produce more of the things of life, the position of the workingman should be better, but we find that it is exactly the reverse.

Speaking broadly, I think it will be admitted that the position of the working man and his family as regards not only the necessities of life but also its comforts and its sources of enjoyment is better to-day than it was, say ten, twenty or thirty years ago. As to that I do not think there can be any argument. I have lived all my life among a working people, coal miners, steel workers, artisans of various kinds. I know their scale of living is better and their opportunities for recreation are greater now, I am glad to say, than they were thirty years ago.

Again, the hon. gentleman stated:

It requires to-day a smaller number of men to produce a given quantity of commodities and that is why less labour is required and why therefore the amount of unemployment should become greater and greater.

To overcome that difficulty of growing and increasing unemployment, he suggests that what is required is a decreased working day and an increased purchasing power on the part of the masses. I fully agree that a shorter working day would give the workmen of this country more time for social enjoyment and self-improvement, and I believe that the great majority of our workmen would take advantage of such opportunities and would benefit very greatly thereby.

With his statement that this question is not provincial, but national in character, I am also in complete accord, as well as with his statement that we cannot expect provincial governments to deal with this vitally important matter, which is really a matter of trade and commerce, and should therefore come within the purview of the federal government, not the provincial authorities.

The Minister of Labour is reported as making the following statement in his recent address in the city of London:

> I believe during the time of depression the workers have some claim to the portion of profits made by their labour during favourable years.

I would like here to ask the Minister of Labour this question: How can the labourer obtain, or how can the minister obtain for the workers of Canada, a portion of the profits that they have made by their labour during past years—during say, 1929, or 1928, or during any past year? Does the Minister of Labour propose confiscation? If not, how does he suggest that the labourer can get his share of the fruits of his past labour? There is not much use in the Minister of Labour putting before the working people of this country suggestions of a kind which are absolutely impossible of being carried out.

So far as seasonal unemployment is concerned, we in Canada, due to climatic conditions, are bound always to have that problem with us to a greater or lesser extent. Such is preeminently the case in the mining centres of Nova Scotia, also elsewhere in Canada, in regard to some other occupations. But the question is much wider than simply one of climatic conditions; it is infinitely more serious than that.

In the matter of the coal output of the Dominion of Canada, I find that for February last, the output was 26 per cent below that of the previous month—January—and 11 per cent below the monthly average of the last five years. On the other hand, I find that our import of coal during February, 1930, was 1,043,041 tons—a substantial increase over the corresponding month of last year, and this notwithstanding the well known slackening up of trade and present unemployment.

While our domestic coal production during February last was 11 per cent below that of the monthly average of the five year preceding period—and many of our coal miners are on short time—the imports of Soviet coal, which began in 1928, increased during 1929, and it is said that they will be still further greatly increased during the coming season. For it is claimed by the coal dealers that a quarter of a million tons of this fuel will be by them imported into Canada during the coming season. What does that mean? It means that we are asking our miners in the east in particular—it does not apply so much to the west—to compete with Soviet labour. I shall not go into any lengthy disquisition as to what that means, because every man of intelligence in this house knows exactly what it means and what it involves. Should our miners in Nova Scotia be asked, and they are being asked, to compete with Soviet labour under all the degrading conditions that prevail in regard to that particular class of labour in Russia? That Soviet coal is admitted into Canada into Montreal, and to-day lies on the docks of Halifax without paying a cent of duty. It has been coming in, in very considerable quantities and will continue to come in larger quantities unless this government takes action to restrain it of which frankly I have very little hope in view of their past indifference.

Out of this question of unemployment, Mr. Speaker, arises one of the saddest tragedies of life that I know of. That has already been referred to much more ably than I can depict it by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who has just taken his seat. I know of no experience that is sadder than to see men, the fathers of families with small children at home, men who are able and willing and anxious to work and daily going out to seek it, being unable to find employment; while they and their families are suffering, in consequence, privation and want and distress. Unfortunately, such conditions do prevail in Canada to-day, and men in this condition are to be seen in scores in every considerable town and in all centres of population throughout Canada—from Sydney in the east to Vancouver in the west. I doubt if there was any time during the last fifteen or twenty years when unemployment was greater in Canada than it is to-day, speaking generally with respect to the whole country, and I do not think that the unemployment is confined exclusively to the industrial towns and cities.

One of the most depressing experiences that I have had in recent years is the meeting of a constant stream of men, both heads of families and young men, who besiege my door almost every day while I am home, pleading with me to find employment for them or to intercede on their behalf with the heads of local industrial establishments; and to see, as I have seen day after day for months past, scores of men of the army of the unemployed standing in groups outside the gates of our collieries, steel works, and car-building plants, looking for employment which is not to be had. I suppose the same conditions can be seen in other industrial centres in Canada, though I cannot speak of my own knowledge as to that.

Again, consider the scores of young men who, after years of study, graduate from our universities each year, not one-fifth of whom, if indeed, one-tenth, can or do find suitable or congenial employment within the country of their birth, and must perforce go to the United States in search of employment which is denied them in their own country.

Unemployment insurance would probably help a little those who are temporarily unemployed, but at best it is only a palliative. It is no cure. It may help temporarily, I admit, but it is not the cure for unemployment in Canada. Unemployment in Canada is both agricultural and industrial and it is largely due to our vicious fiscal system. Inasmuch as the fiscal policy of the country is under the control of the federal government, who alone can determine the terms on which foreign agricultural and manufactured products may compete with our agriculturists and artisans, the prior obligation as to matters of relief during times of unemployment lies with the federal government, not with the provincial authorities. In my judgment the only effective cure for unemployment as also for the matter of immigration is the inauguration and vigorous application of a national policy which will protect the Canadian producer on the farm and in the mine, and the workers in our manufacturing establishments by damming back the flood of products coming in from other lands where the workers are not enjoying the standard of living which we should like to see generally adopted, and which to a large extent to-day prevails in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the house to consider for a moment the fact that we are importing iron and steel products from the United States alone to the value of over $1,000,000 a day. Now, I state, and I think with some reasonable basis of authority, that seventy-five per cent of those products could be and ought to be produced in Canada, and would be so produced had we reasonable protection. Did such conditions now prevail, it would mean that an army of 200,000 men would find employment during every working day in the year at wages as high as $2,000 per annum. Those facts should be faced, taken into account and definitely dealt with. Why do we send over $1,000,000 a day to our well-to-do steel producing friends across the line, while Canadian furnaces are standing cold and our workers are idle? Why create such a balance of trade against ourselves?

[Mr. Cantley.]

There is but one reason why we do not make the great bulk of that material in Canada, and that is that our fiscal policy is absolutely and stupidly wrong. Again I would point out that responsibility for unemployment rests primarily upon the federal government. My hon. friends opposite may treat this matter lightly, but I want to tell them that they have entirely failed to remedy the situation. For years they have refused to take any effective action. This is not the first time this matter has been brought to their notice, it is not the first time that I and others have called attention to this situation. The government has done nothing. This matter of the iron and steel duties, we have been told, has been before the tariff board for more than three years. We have protested at the lack of definite action, but nothing has been done. What the government now propose to do I do not know; they will not tell us until after the recess and when the matter is dealt with it will, I fear, be in a way that will fail to produce satisfactory results, or the results which I am confident the people as a whole greatly desire. For that reason, and others to which I have referred, I confidently believe that just so soon as the electorate of Canada are given an opportunity to express their views in regard to the continuance of this government in office, they will express themselves in terms which will be unmistakable and which will result in others being called upon to take up the work in which this government has so signally failed.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, in the policy of Canada for Canadians, and that the most effective cure for unemployment is by the introduction and maintenance of such a fiscal policy as will ensure the production in Canada of the largest proportion of our consumptive wants which under a reasonable protective tariff policy our own people can supply, and which will thereby contribute to the greatest good to the greatest number of the people of this Dominion.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, since it is within a few minutes of six o'clock, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. McINTOSH: All right. May I say I have listened to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) with considerable interest. I was expecting that he would give us a solution of the unemployment problem. I also expected that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) would offer a solution. I regret that neither of these hon. gentlemen put forward any solution.

Mr. SHORT: What solution did the Minister of Labour give?

Mr. McINTOSH: I will come to that a little later if the hon. member will be patient. The hon. member for Pictou spoke about the results of the coming election and intimated that when the electorate gets an opportunity to express itself upon the issues of the day the party which he supports will be in the majority.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear..

Mr. McINTOSH: I am glad to hear some hon. members thumping their desks. I realize that that appeals to them. But perhaps they may not be so demonstrative after I have explained the situation from this side. I believe when the electors get an opportunity to express themselves on the issues of the day the result will not be as predicted this afternoon by hon. members opposite. I am confident that after the issues of the day have been discussed from coast to coast and the people have had an opportunity of studying them they will return the present government with a still greater majority than it has at the present time.

Mr. SHORT: You are only fooling yourself, you don't think anything of the kind.

Mr. McINTOSH: You will be the one who will be fooled when the ballots are counted.

Mr. SHORT: Don't make any mistake.

Mr. McINTOSH: You have predicted the defeat of the government now so often that you have made yourself believe what you would like to see happen.

Mr. POULIOT: The Tory party will be short of supporters.

Mr. McINTOSH: This afternoon my hon. friend drew the attention of the house to what he termed the sad plight Canada is in because of unemployment. We all admit there is a certain amount of unemployment in Canada to-day. But there was a certain amount of it in 1929, there has been a certain amount of unemployment for the last five years, and for the last ten years, and for the last twenty-five years, and for the last half century, and even for the last century, and there will be unemployment in the days to come. Historically speaking there has been unemployment down through history. I do not think it is getting us very far towards a solution of the problem simply to make the bald statement that we have unemployment. We must clear away a lot of superficial discussion and see if we as parliamentarians cannot by our united efforts help to solve this problem in the interests not only of the workers but of the whole nation.

My hon. friend who preceded me stated that there was a certain amount of agricultural unemployment. That may be the case, but we know the exact cause of it It was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and dealt with very clearly and definitely. We know that any person who is capable of working on the land, and who wants that kind of employment can always find it if he will adjust himself to the scale of wages in existence. Of course, if a man asks a wage beyond that which a farmer can pay, it simply means that he will not be given a job. He does not want to work, and consequently he is added to the long list of unemployed.

My hon. friend also mentioned that this was a federal and not a provincial matter. It seems to me every speaker who has discussed this question in the house has said that it is a national problem. Even my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) makes that statement, after sitting in a committee for two sessions and discussing this unemployment problem in a very full and able manner, working hard on it and afterward sending in a report to be endorsed by the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did I not take that same stand last year in the debate which followed the presentation of the report?

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member did take that stand, to a certain extent. He realized, however, in taking it, that it would have been impossible to have arrived at an harmonious and conclusive report if he had adhered to it, and he therefore did not adhere to it. He took his part, however, in manufacturing the report, and in having it adopted two years ago by the house. Instead of standing foursquare with it, he fights it and rejects the proposal which it makes for the solution of this whole unemployment problem. I differ from him. The hon. member was a hard worker on the committee; he did splendid service, and I am surprised to find him standing in this chamber and holding up before the electors of Canada a position directly opposite to the one he took when he was helping to frame the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be desirable to conclude or continue this debate to-morrow. For that purpose, Mr. Speaker, by permission of the house I move the following, seconded by Mr. Crerar:

That standing order No. 28 be suspended on Thursday, April 3rd instant, and that motion be then made that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 3, 1930

The house met at three o'clock.

On the orders of the day.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, some two years ago I brought to the attention of the house somewhat critically the fact that the Toronto Daily Star radio station CFCA had received a licence for the exclusive use of a certain wave-length. I have received from a constituent an editorial from the Toronto Telegram quoting and commenting on an editorial published by the Toronto Star which latter reads in part as follows:

As a pioneer in the radio field, with its station CFCA—which, if radio remains in public hands, will have a powerful new station.

My correspondent takes that to be a declaration on the part of the Toronto Daily Star that they have the assurance of the renewal of their present licence, and authorization for a more powerful station. Will the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) be good enough to inform the house if the department has given an assurance to this newspaper that, in the event of broadcasting not being nationalized, its licence will be renewed with provision for an increase in power, and if similar assurances have been given to other radio stations?

Mr. CARDIN: No such assurance has been given.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) when I may expect an answer to my question regarding the number of vessels in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine employed in trade between Canada and Australia and between Canada and New Zealand.

Mr. CARDIN: If the hon. member's question relates to the merchant marine, it should be directed to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar).

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): It is question No. 3 on the order paper.

CORRECTION—HON. MR. STEWART

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, referring to page 1092 of Hansard, I would like to correct a reply I gave to a question of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). The hon. member asked a question regarding a ruling which had been made with reference to the territory under discussion, and I stated:

They are assumed to be British subjects. As my hon. friend knows, we have taken over the control of the territory, which control has not been disputed in any particular except with respect to one small portion. The Danish government have presented a claim based upon the explorations made by Otto Sverdrup, and at the present time we are endeavouring to settle that claim.

I should have stated that it was the Norwegian government which was making the claim. The same correction should be made on page 1101, it should be the Norwegian government instead of the Danish government.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, my question regarding the immigration expenditures since 1922 was passed as an order for return on March 5, and I would like to ask the minister when this return will be brought down.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I will bring the matter to the attention of the officials of the department and ask them to bring down the return as soon as possible.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. M. E. MAYBEE (Northumberland, Ont.): I would like to ask the Postmaster General when the answer to my question which was passed as an order for return in regard to the Post Office Department will be brought down?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): If I knew to what particular question the hon. gentleman referred I could answer now. However, I shall have officials of the Post Office Department look into the matter.

IMPERIAL TREATIES AND STATUTES

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he cannot bring down in the next ten days the return, either wholly or partly prepared, which was ordered at the last session of the house, with respect to Imperial treaties and statutes which affect Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be pleased to inquire at once as to what condition the return is in and to do my utmost to have the request of my hon. friend met.

RURAL MAIL ROUTES

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ont.): On the 10th March, an order of the house was passed for a return in connection with rural mail routes in Canada. I should like to know from the Postmaster General when that return will be brought down.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I gave the answer yesterday. So far as I can find out it will be ready for Monday. I am trying to have it ready for to-morrow, but it will be ready not later than Monday. It is quite a voluminous piece of work and it requires a great deal of extra time to prepare it.

JACK MINER BIRD SANCTUARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Is it the intention of the government to renew the $5,000 grant to the Jack Miner bird sanctuary this year?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend an answer at the moment. I would wish to confer first with the Minister of Finance.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night at six o'clock, I was discussing in a general way the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with respect to his helping to frame two reports on unemployment insurance, one during the session of 1928, and the other during the session of 1929, and the attitude that he is taking now in contradistinction thereto, with regard to the discussion at present going on in the house on the question. As I pointed out yesterday, the hon. member did a great deal of hard work in the committee, but when, on two occasions, this matter came up for discussion in the house, and after the report of the committee had been adopted and endorsed by this chamber, if his attitude had been slightly different, it might have been better for organized industry and organized labour alike in this country. That, however, is a matter for the hon. member himself to decide, and later on I may deal with one phase of the problem, namely, that of legislative power or competency of jurisdiction that concerns my hon. friend and with reference to which he has taken his present attitude.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris), when dealing with this question, touched practically all the points of the compass. One would think the house was engaged in a debate on the budget rather than on the question of unemployment insurance. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) also dealt in a very general way with the question, but he tried to make out that the unemployment situation was largely due to the fiscal policy of the government. That is not so, because we have had unemployment in Canada from decade to decade and from one administration to another.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) waxed eloquent yesterday—and I like to hear him speak in this chamber—with respect to the unemployment problem. He tried to present to the house an argument to the effect that if we were to go back to the good old national policy days, we would have no unemployment. I think my hon. friend must forget the years prior to the time when the national policy was given a decisive setback. I refer to 1896 when the national policy was not endorsed by the electorate of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: The national policy was not an issue then; my hon. friend is talking about the Manitoba schools.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not so. At that time the Liberal party came into power and Canada experienced an era of development such as had never been known in its history. We recall that prior to 1896 industry in Canada was stagnant; commerce was not by any means active; unemployment was rife and deficit after deficit was presented to the house by the administration espousing the national policy. So we cannot accept the national policy as a solution for any unemployment problem affecting Canada at the present time. The hon. member for Fort William spoke about getting joint action. I believe if we start in the right way we can get joint action, at least in some stage of the problem. If we would confine our attention to the point where we can really make a start and look for combined action later on, there is no reason why that action should not be secured.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) reviewing the problem, put forward some commendable ideas in connection with the causes which underlie this question. He felt, however, that all the provinces should act at once.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is the very thing I did not do. I pointed out that it was hopeless to expect unanimity at the beginning.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am reading from a report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen of the hon. gentleman's speech in the House of Commons yesterday. I had not time to read his speech word for word.

Mr. HOCKEN: Read it in Hansard.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am only too pleased if he did not make that contention. Another point the hon. member put forward was that we should have an economic survey made of the whole country. We have had enough of economic surveys and it is about time we looked to a certain quarter in Canada for action, that is to the provinces to whom this problem belongs, and let them provide any further economic survey that we may need.

Regarding the report for 1928 on this question of unemployment insurance, the house decided on March 21, 1928, to refer to the committee on industrial and international relations the resolution dealing with unemployment. After two months' investigation the committee reported. Before that committee we had as many witnesses as possible to deal with every side of the problem. We had organized industry and organized labour represented before the committee. The two representatives of organized industry who were called to give evidence were the president and the secretary of the international relations committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association of Canada. We thought if we could get the Canadian Manufacturers' Association on record as to any such departure we would have some valuable evidence. These two gentlemen in their sworn evidence stated that the question of unemployment insurance had not been taken up by their association at all, that they had given no attention to it nationally, that they had given no attention to it provincially, that they had given no attention to it in any way; and consequently, it was impossible for the committee to get any authorized point of view on this problem from the two witnesses who appeared before it representing the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I merely draw attention to that fact because I believe that before we ask the federal government to jump into a proposition of this kind we had better get a thoroughly organized body of public opinion, both in industry and in the provinces, in favour of it.

We also had before the committee the representatives of organized labour. Mr. Tom Moore appeared, representing the trades and labour congress of Canada. The all-Canadian labour congress, represented by Mr. Mosher, also gave its point of view to the committee. These two gentlemen went on record to the effect that unemployment insurance belonged entirely to the industrial interests of Canada, and not to the employees, nor to any provincial or national government, but wholly and entirely to the industrial interests of Canada. That was the labour point of view. I have already shown that so far as industry is concerned, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had not discussed the problem at all.

We moreover took evidence from other quarters, and after all the evidence had been heard, we brought in a report. I believe it is worth while for me to deal briefly with the first clause of that report of 1928. Here is what the committee recommended with respect to the compulsory aspect of this problem, and let me say that this was endorsed unanimously by the house in 1928. I wish to stress the idea of unanimity as strongly as possible because we had a debate last year, and we are having another this year on this same question, and the public business of the country is thereby being held up. The first clause of that report reads:

> We accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions, derived from the state, the employer and the employee. In this connection, we would point out that a somewhat similar decision was arrived at by a royal commission on industrial relations, which dealt with this subject in 1919.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would it not be well to finish reading that report?

Mr. McINTOSH: I have not time to finish reading it. I wish to deal with only one or two important points in it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps it is just as well for the hon. gentleman not to finish reading it.

Mr. McINTOSH: That same principle with respect to compulsory contributions was incorporated in the report of 1929, and the house again endorsed that principle last year. There was no division in the committee on the compulsory aspect of unemployment insurance. The committee was unanimously of the opinion that that was the course to take, that it was the pathway along which the provinces and the Dominion, if they wanted to take action, should travel. That phase of compulsory contributions was discussed at great length. The committee based its recommendations in that regard largely on certain clauses in the report of the Blanesburgh committee which was appointed in Great Britain to look into the matter of unemployment insurance in 1925, and upon the report of which committee legislative action was taken in 1927.

In Great Britain the National Insurance Act was passed in 1911. A new act was brought into force in 1920, and amendments were made to it in 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 and 1927. The report of this committee was the foundation of the legislative action that was taken in 1927. Our committee based its action to a large extent on the recommendations of this committee whose report read in part as follows:

(1) The worker's contribution must be moderate in amount. It should never normally exceed 5d. a week, and, supplemented by the contribution of his employer and the state, should secure him an insurance sufficient in the great majority of cases to save him, during inevitable unemployment, from recourse to public assistance.

(2) The scheme must not, by the extent of benefit promised, tempt the insured contributor to improvidence when in receipt of good pay.

(3) It should provide benefits definitely less in amount than the general labourer's rate of wage, so that there may be no temptation to prefer benefit to work.

(4) It must not interfere unduly with the mobility of labour in this country.

(5) It must not deter from emigration those who would be benefited by a life overseas.

That report, upon which legislative action was taken by the British parliament, stressed this important fact, that there would be a tendency to abuses in any system of unemployment insurance, and the whole effort of parliament, whether it be the imperial parliament, this parliament or any other, should be to safeguard against those abuses, and to make the act as watertight and effective as possible, to make any policy of unemployment insurance as solid legislatively as it could possibly be made, so that when it was in operation there would be a minimum of abuses, and it would operate as effectively as possible on behalf of the workers, organized industry, and the country generally.

Our committee considered the same resolution in 1929, and after deliberating for a considerable time reported to the house, and that report was adopted on an amendment by 92 to 18. There was an acrimonious debate when the report came before the house last year, and it was largely over one point of policy in the report, the question of jurisdiction.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Now what about this question of jurisdiction? That is where my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has had some difficulty. Although he is very anxious to see this problem solved, I am inclined to think that he is making a mountain out of a mole hill, and that with a little more time and patience, and with public opinion developed in the provinces and in organized industry to the point of giving a lead in this matter, we will get action from the provinces, and when that action is taken the Dominion government will consider the whole proposition and deal with the provinces in an equitable manner. Turning to the report of the industrial and international relations committee of 1929, it will be noted that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) discussed before that committee the same constitutional aspect of the problem that he brought before this house a few days ago. Mr. Stuart Edwards, Deputy Minister of Justice was giving evidence, and he was asked this question by the hon. member:

May I ask a question in that connection? I understand that during the session of 1920, parliament had placed before it privy council order No. 2722, dealing with the report from the Minister of Justice in reference to a number of draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference (League of Nations) at its first annual meeting, held at Washington, D.C., October-November, 1919. Amongst these were two of particular application to the present inquiry, concerning which the order in council says:

Recommendation dealing with unemployment insurance: The minister observes that the experience of other countries had demonstrated that a system of unemployment insurance, in order to be effective and successful, must be merely ancillary or complementary to a system of labour exchanges, the whole being adapted to the principal function of finding work for unemployed insured workmen. In this view, unemployment insurance has a pronounced federal aspect, and on the whole, the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance is competent to the Dominion in the existence of its residuary legislative power with relation to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Then the hon. member said:

That was the opinion of the Minister of Justice in 1921.

And he put this further question to Mr. Edwards:

Has the opinion of the department altered since that time, or how can you explain that opinion?

To which Mr. Edwards answered:

That opinion was given mainly in connection with the international aspect of the subject.

I believe that is where my hon. friend is floundering. Mr. Edwards proceeded:

As I explained to the committee last year, in so far as we are under any obligation by way of treaty, the legislative power rests with the parliament of Canada. I understand that the particular convention to which reference was made in that opinion was not a treaty within the meaning of the act, but it was a draft convention which was submitted to the several governments constituting the League of Nations, with a view to the proposals contained in that convention being placed before the proper controlling body for consideration, and, in dealing with that, the minister pointed out that where the scheme called for by the convention was international in its character he would be prepared to submit that to parliament. It would follow that if such a scheme were submitted to parliament, parliament would have power to carry out the provisions of that treaty. But a moment ago I was speaking about the matter from a domestic point of view.

In short, the ruling of the law officers of the crown is that only the international aspect of this problem of unemployment—in relation to treaties to which the Dominion is a party —is a federal matter; every other phase is provincial. Consequently the stand taken by this house on the report formulated by the committee on industrial and international relations is absolutely constitutional; that is, that the whole problem falls, within the jurisdiction of the provinces. This being the case, we may well be at a loss to understand just why after the debate on this question last session on the amendment which the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) moved to the report, we should this session have another protracted discussion along practically the same lines; for there is no possibility in the world of the decision then reached being changed. The proposition before the house and the country is simply that the unemployment problem comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces and not of the Dominion. Should the Dominion see fit in its discretionary power to take action to supplement any action the provinces might take, well and good; but the two reports adopted by this house last session and the session before put the proposition squarely up to the provinces. If the provinces decline to take action, then it seems to me that those who are concerned in this matter on behalf of organized industry and organized labour, ought to stir up the public provincially and so get the provinces to enact the necessary legislative measures. If organized industry and organized labour succeed in arousing public opinion throughout the provinces, I do not think it would be long before the various provincial governments took the necessary steps to bring about a solution of the difficulty, which would enure to the benefit not only of organized industry but of all labouring classes. I believe this problem will be solved in the near future. It is an important problem. It is national in some aspects and it is provincial in others, but under our constitution legislative action must be taken by the provinces, and when they do take action I think the interests of agriculture ought to be safeguarded. In the main, Mr. Speaker, this problem concerns our industrial employees, not our agricultural employees. That being the case, and I do not think anyone will dispute it, as a member from an agricultural constituency in western Canada, I would ask that the interests of agriculture be safeguarded in any legislation that may be enacted. Agriculture should be safeguarded absolutely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What has the hon. gentleman in mind when he speaks about safeguarding the industry of agriculture?

Mr. McINTOSH: The primary interest in connection with this problem is that of our industrial employees, the employees in our large centres, those who are working in our factories, on our railways, and so forth, and if agriculture is to be included in any legislation that may be enacted to deal with the problem, I think agriculture should be given an opportunity of expressing its views on the whole question before such legislation is passed. I believe that that is only right.

Now, as my time is fast passing, may I draw the attention of the house to the stand taken by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg with regard to this matter last year. He listened to all the evidence before the committee on industrial and international relations, he was given that privilege from meeting to meeting, and last session he brought in an amendment to the report when it was presented to the house. It was an amazing amendment, being in fact nothing short of an attempt to amend the constitution. Let me quote the amendment so that hon. members may appreciate its full effect:

That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the Dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance based on compulsory contributions and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces be vested in the Dominion government.

It will be seen that the hon. member finds it difficult to realize that this is a provincial problem. I think that is his difficulty and the difficulty of his friends.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: For his and their benefit let me quote this passage from the Scriptures: Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free. I believe the truth alone will make the hon. gentleman free in this case; in other words he must get the facts.

Mr. HEAPS: Would not that biblical quotation apply equally to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, but mainly to my hon. friend. Now, as I have said, the hon. member for North Winnipeg moved that amendment last session. When the matter came before the house the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) exposed the fallacy of the amendment. They showed it was impossible for the provinces to delegate any of their powers to the Dominion, and vice versa; and so the amendment failed, and the report of the committee was adopted by a large majority.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I ask the hon. member: Is that not exactly what parliament did with respect to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. McINTOSH: That was thoroughly discussed last year in this house, Mr. Speaker. I have not time to go into it now, and I think the hon. member knows the facts. I can add nothing to it by taking up the time of the house at the present moment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You could answer yes or no.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You cannot answer that to all questions.

Mr. McINTOSH: What does the amendment amount to that my hon. friend has this year placed before the house? A blockade amendment like that of last year. It has held up the business of the house and has delayed the business of the country. After the committee's report of 1929 was adopted and endorsed, and after the matter was passed on to the provinces for their action. When we consider that phase of the matter, why should we debate this question indefinitely? Why not accept the decision of the house and the committee? Why do not hon. members accept this decision? I would say that all further amendments just postpone the day of action and deprive the provinces of the opportunity they should have to outline to all Canada their stand on a matter of this nature.

My hon. friend from North Winnipeg is quoted in Hansard at page 2775. Hansard at that page simply records the answers given to my hon. friend by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and other members of the house. I do not think I should take up the time of the house in dealing with them. But I wish to read the words of my hon. friend as they are recorded at page 119 in the 1928 report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations. I think the report clears up the difficulty rather definitely. On the occasion to which I refer the Deputy Minister of Justice was giving evidence before the committee. It was our intention at that time to get the question of legality and jurisdiction cleared up once and for all, and it was for that reason we called the deputy minister as a witness. The question by the hon. member for North Winnipeg appears as follows:

> If I understand the statements here this morning correctly, I would interpret your remarks to mean that the federal government has not authority to impose Dominion-wide legislation, or has not the authority to impose compulsory unemployment insurance, or sickness insurance.

The answer by the deputy minister to that question was clear and concise. It is simply:

> Yes, that is correct.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg did not have any more questions, and he accepted that answer as final. Yet, after accepting the report of that committee as final, and accepting that as a final statement, we have the spectacle of the hon. member coming before this house on two occasions. The first time was in 1928, on which occasion he moved an amendment that was hopelessly beaten. He has repeated the amendment in the 1930 session, and it also will be beaten.

It seems to me that the hon. member for North Winnipeg and every other hon. member of this house, should be devoting their energies especially to an acceleration of public opinion in this province and other provinces in the hope that one province, or a group of provinces will take the initiative and, in cooperation with the Dominion government, as our Prime Minister has advised, seek to work out a uniform plan—something that will be satisfactory to all concerned. That is what all parties should be doing, apart from political prestige or political fortune, if they consider the problem of unemployment to be one that affects closely the lives of thousands of working people in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the hon. member think that the greatest possible impetus that could be given to this particular thing of which he speaks would be by initiatory action of the federal government?

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not believe there is any great impetus to anything, when it is illegal and when it is unconstitutional, and when it is not demanded in that sense. We ought to go at it in a correct way, and by doing that we will arrive at a more satisfactory solution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We are not asking for anything that is illegal.

Mr. McINTOSH: I take the hon. member's statement and I am looking at it in the light of the action of this house last year. I am looking at it in that light, and in the light of what this house will certainly do this year. From this viewpoint I think I am correct in estimating that the hon. member's question has an illegal or unconstitutional ring to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What did this house do in regard to the liquor question last year?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is in reality a budget question, and does not affect this one. I therefore think it is the duty of this house to defeat the amendment. I am going to vote against it, so that we may uphold the record of the house in its responsible committee activities for the years 1928 and 1929. Then in no uncertain voice I am going to ask the Prime Minister to impress upon the house the fact that it is the privilege of the provinces to take action under the constitution which belongs to them. Once they take that action the cooperation of the Dominion government and the financial cooperation of this house can be given them. There is no question about it that if we can do it in that way, legally and constitutionally, public opinion may be massed on this vital question from one province to another, clear across Canada. Once we get that, I am satisfied hon. members of this house will repeat the action taken in other years, in view of what was done by the committee on international and industrial relations in 1928 and again in 1929. The action of the committee on those occasions was upheld by this house, and I am sure the action of the committee and this house last year will be repeated this year, and that action thus will be found to be a distinct contribution to the solution of the problem, in a way that will redound to the complete and permanent satisfaction of the people throughout Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I moved that the house go into committee to consider supply, I did so in the hope of having supply voted for the Department of External Affairs. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) moved an amendment that all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

> In the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

For a period of three days since, the house has been discussing the subject of unemployment. I have tried to follow the debate closely, with a view to seeing what was most in the minds of hon. members. After listening to the addresses from all sides, I must confess I have come to the conclusion that some appear to have one objective and others another. The house is far from united in its understanding of what the hon. member who moved the amendment had in mind when he asked that the house should immediately consider the question of unemployment.

There is a certain aspect of the problem of unemployment which all members have sought to emphasize; that is that the problem of unemployment is a national one. I observed that many hon. members stressed strongly the view that the unemployment problem was a national problem. I do not think we can question that for a moment. What significance attaches to this depends entirely upon what inferences are to be drawn therefrom. If it is meant that the unemployment problem is a national problem to the exclusion of being a provincial problem or to the exclusion of being also a municipal problem or, to take a step in the other direction, to the exclusion of being an empire problem, or to the exclusion of being a world problem, then in that sense I cannot admit it to be a national problem. Once we admit that the problem of unemployment is something which far exceeds being any merely municipal or any purely provincial problem; that it is larger by far than any merely national problem; that it is again wider than an empire problem and that it is in fact a world problem, then at once I am prepared to agree that in this meaning of the term and in this relationship it is a national problem.

Admitting that, what inference is to be drawn? The inference, I think is clear; it is that in the endeavour to meet or to solve this problem, there must be as much in the way of combined effort as may be possible, and there must be very much in the way of division of labour. Each part must do what in its particular sphere and within its own jurisdiction it finds it possible to do. The League of Nations, representing most if not all of the nations of the world, may do something towards the solution of the problem of unemployment, but with regard to this problem the part taken by the League of Nations, will be very different from the part taken by a municipality, the question will not be solved by either one attempting to deal with it to the exclusion of the other.

Because it has been conceded that unemployment is a national problem, some hon. members have sought to draw the inference that at the present time there is throughout Canada an emergent situation demanding immediate action on the part of the federal government. Other hon. members have not stressed so much the emergent condition; indeed, they have dropped it altogether and have devoted their attention—and I think very wisely—to the larger question of whether or not the problem of unemployment can be solved, at least in part through the introduction of some system of social insurance, some particular form of unemployment insurance The discussion in this particular has centred around the question as to whether or not this federal government should take the initiative in seeking to bring about the adoption of a system of that kind by the provinces of the Dominion.

Having regard to the obligation of the League of Nations, one would hardly feel that because the League is concerned with the problem of unemployment it should therefore immediately set out to assess all the countries of the world with a view to meeting an unemployment problem as it may arise in any one particular country. The League of Nations, moreover would not feel it a part of its obligation to attempt to force upon the different countries of the world a system of unemployment insurance. I do think, however, that it would be and is an all-important part of the work of the League of Nations to endeavour to draw to the attention of all nations the magnitude of this problem, its many intricate phases and, so far as may be possible, by educational efforts and propaganda of different kinds, to supply the different countries of the world with the information needed to enable them, so far as may be possible, one with the other, to adopt some system or systems of unemployment insurance that in the course of time will be uniform throughout the world. I think also it might be reasonably argued to be a part of the obligation of the League of Nations that, if a very serious situation should arise in any one country, where there was great distress, the League might well appeal to all other countries to enable some fund to be raised whereby immediate assistance could be given to the particular country affected.

Almost the same thing might be said with regard to unemployment within the British Empire. I do not think for a moment that any one here would say that the problem of unemployment where serious in any part of the British Empire does not affect all parts of the empire. I believe that to-day this Dominion is being very vitally affected by the serious unemployment problem which exists in Great Britain, but because that is the case it does not follow that Great Britain is called upon to expect all parts of the empire to contribute to some fund to be made available to the particular part of the empire in which distress exists to-day. Nor do I think it follows that Great Britain would feel for a moment that it was a part of her obligation to say that a system of social insurance or unemployment insurance was something which necessarily must be adopted by all the dominions whether or not they wished to have such a system, merely from the fact that she herself has a system which has been thought appropriate for the British Isles. I say it does not follow that she should seek to oblige all the dominions to adopt a similar method of dealing with this question. I do believe, however, that there is imposed upon Great Britain and upon the component parts of the British Empire the obligation to do what they can to have established uniform standards of living, standards of health, and standards of working conditions in industry throughout all parts of the Empire. I do not believe any part of the world has gone as far as the British Empire has gone in that direction; I think in this matter the British Empire as a whole stands as an example to the world.

When it comes to our own Dominion and more particularly to the work of this federal government, I feel that we are in a comparable position to that which I have described with regard to the obligations of the League of Nations or the obligation of the British Empire as a whole. Recognizing that the unemployment problem is as vast as it is, there is a real obligation upon this federal government, in accordance with the powers which are given to it and having regard to the entirety of its obligations, particularly in relation to the obligations assigned to the provinces, to do what it can in what it believes to be an effective way to help solve this very great problem. I do not feel however, that for that reason this federal government is called upon to ask the taxpayers of all parts of this Dominion to permit it to assess them by way of additional taxation in order that it may take money out of the federal treasury, not to be used for federal purposes as such but to be distributed to certain of the provinces, not necessarily to all provinces, and possibly not even to the provinces but only to certain municipalities.

Let me repeat that statement. I can see nothing arising out of a recognition of this problem as a national problem which obliges this federal government, having regard to our constitution and the division of powers under it, to collect taxes from the people generally in order to meet a situation which affects only a certain group of people in some municipalities in this country, but which does not adversely affect the country as a whole. I am not saying we could not do such a thing; I am not saying that this federal parliament cannot vote money for any purposes for which it may desire so to do, but I am trying to make it clear that under our constitution I do not think it was ever intended that this federal government should become the agency through which problems which are primarily municipal and provincial should be dealt with.

I might go a step further. In connection with this question of unemployment, as hon. gentlemen more particularly of the Labour group have dealt with it, we have heard only of the unemployed who happen to be in the favoured, or if they wish to so construe it, in the unfavoured position of belonging to certain trades which may or may not be allied with organized labour. Their reference primarily was to groups of citizens of this country who are engaged more or less in certain of the trades of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We did not narrow it in any such way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to accept my hon. friend's explanation. I would ask the house and the country this question: What consideration has been given in this debate to members of the professions? There are large numbers of young men and women in Canada who have gone into the so called learned professions—physicians, lawyers, ministers, members of the teaching profession, professors, teachers and others. I do not think my hon. friend will deny that those people are perfoming a useful service and function in the state and that they are entitled to consideration. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he has ever stopped to consider that many a young man, seeking to get a start in his chosen profession, whether law or medicine or other calling, has to wait, not one or two months during the winter, but sometimes month after month, and I might almost say year after year, before he begins to receive any remuneration worth speaking of in his own business. These persons and their families are part of the taxpayers of this country, they constitute a portion of those who are paying the taxes which my hon. friend desires to take from the treasury and send to the municipalities to be dealt with in the manner he has described.

In connection with the professions, may I mention the journalists as being also an important branch? Those who are engaged in literary work in its many forms do not have continuous occupation every day of every month of every year. Consider also those who are engaged in commercial and financial enterprises and the number of persons employed by them. Has my hon. friend given special consideration to those people as respects their periods of unemployment? What about those engaged in wholesale and retail trades and the thousands of men and women employed as clerks in the shops and stores and hotels and other places of business? During periods of depression employer after employer, whether at the head of a shop or of a large industrial or financial enterprise, is obliged to eliminate a certain number of employees. Is this money which is to go out of the federal treasury to the municipalities to go to those who are being thus eliminated?

Mr. SPENCER: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish we had heard a little more of it, because we now begin to see the scope of what my hon. friends are suggesting. Consider the farming community of which the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Spencer) is a member. During several months of the year it is impossible to carry on certain farm operations. Those who are engaged in farming are aware of that and during the time that there is an opportunity to work, they take that factor into account. Have they been asking this federal parliament to take the taxes of the people and dole them out for the purposes of meeting their temporary periods of unemployment? I have yet to hear of a single deputation coming to this parliament from any agricultural district in this country to ask that federal moneys should be used in the way here proposed. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the agricultural element in this country is entitled to every possible consideration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman? The farmer members in the Alberta legislature, who are themselves farmers, voted in favour of the adoption of some system of unemployment insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just directed our attention to farmer members; I am speaking of the farmers themselves.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Those members are themselves farmers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We all understand why a member of parliament or of a legislature may make a particular appeal such as my hon. friend is making, but what I wish to bring home to those who are so lightly suggesting that we should dip into the federal treasury for these purposes—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not lightly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not say that my hon. friend is treating it in that manner, but there are some who are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that I interrupted my hon. friend, and I would ask hon. gentlemen kindly to allow me to make my speech without interruption. I think by actual count there were 146 interruptions yesterday during the speech of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan).

Mr. STEVENS: The minister invited them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not inviting them, and I should like to be permitted to make my statement with as few interruptions as possible.

Every man, woman and child in this country who directly pays taxes or on whose behalf any taxation is levied, is interested in what is done with the moneys received. They are equally interested in sharing in the benefits which are to come out of the expenditure of public moneys for the purposes mentioned. I believe it was for that very reason that the fathers of confederation when they framed the constitution of our country very wisely saw that there were some matters which best could be dealt with by the federal government as a whole, and other matters which it would be infinitely preferable to assign to the provinces. A perusal of the British North America Act fails to disclose any powers of legislation assigned exclusively to the federal government with reference to that class of enactments best described as social legislation. That may have been a mistake upon the part of the framers of the constitution, and as time goes on it may have to be changed, but I am pointing out the position of the constitution at the present time. I am seeking to give what I believe to have been one reason why the fathers of confederation found it advisable to define as they did the respective powers of the Dominion and the provinces. Section 92 of the British North America Act which deals with the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures reads as follows:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

Clause No. 7 reads:

The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

In reading that clause one might well be led to believe that the fathers of confederation saw that there would be cases of hardship and distress, and that institutions would be essential for the care of individuals suffering the handicaps indicated, and they felt that it was advisable that the unit of government which would be more immediately associated with the localities and persons interested should be the one to deal exclusively with that class of subjects in matters of legislation. Clause No. 8 reads:

Municipal institutions in the province.

This question of unemployment has come up almost exclusively from the point of view of the aid to be given to municipalities, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when municipal institutions in the province were set out as belonging to the class of matters with which the provinces would be exclusively concerned in legislation, it is reasonable to assume that in matters of unemployment relief for municipalities the first approach, at least, should be made to the province of the municipalities concerned.

Clause No. 13 reads:

Property and civil rights in the province.

Employment is a matter of contract and of civil rights. Why is it that this parliament is not dealing with factory legislation? Why are we not dealing with mining legislation? Why are we not passing laws governing workshops and the like, and fixing the hours of labour in different occupations and so on? All of these have a direct bearing on employment or unemployment, they are at their very root. No one is questioning the power of the provinces in that regard, but I submit that from the point of view of serving the interests of the working classes of the country it is just as unfair to advocate that this Dominion parliament should deal with the question of unemployment as a primary obligation as to urge that it should be primarily concerned with legislation with respect to factories, workshops, and mines.

I believe the day will come—it may be centuries hence; I do not know how long it will be, but I do not think it will be so very long—when in this Dominion one central parliament will deal with all this class of legislation. But that time has not yet arrived, and until it does arrive the constitution of our country says that all these matters which relate to factories, mines, workshops, contracts between master and servant, between employer and employed, all of which are matters pertaining to industrial relations come within the extensive jurisdiction of the provinces and not of the federal government. Therefore I submit that we are justified from the federal point of view in making clear the line of division and seeking to reserve in the public treasury for federal purposes the funds that are raised for federal purposes.

The last of the powers mentioned as exclusively belonging to the provinces is set forth, for in clause No. 16 it reads:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

Surely the unemployment of which we have heard is of a local nature in certain only of the provinces. We have heard from Manitoba and I think the only Manitoba municipality mentioned in all the discussion was the city of Winnipeg, one locality. We have heard from the province of Ontario. I think the hon. member who resides in Fort William and the hon. member who resides in Kenora mentioned their particular communities, but apart from those, Toronto is the only centre that has been mentioned.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Calgary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Calgary is not in Ontario. In regard to the other provinces, my hon. friend's remarks will help to illustrate what I have in mind. There has been mention of one or two cities and only one or two. I have not heard mention in the house of a single municipality in the province of Quebec; I have not heard mention of one in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I mentioned one in Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which one was it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The other day I mentioned conditions in connection with Grand-Mere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in the course of this debate, if I may correct my hon. friend. The fact that hon. members are obliged to restrict themselves to naming individual municipalities and are able to name them in numbers that can be counted on one hand so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, demonstrates more strongly than words could how little we have a national problem of unemployment in this country at the present time.

As I have said, after discussing unemployment as a national problem the discussion took in the main two trends. The one trend was that at the present time there exists an emergency which demands that out of the federal treasury we should give money to the provinces and to the municipalities to aid in relieving unemployment. The other was that there being a condition that arises and that will continue for all time to arise with respect to unemployment at certain seasons and from other causes this condition should be met by some system of unemployment insurance. Let me deal with those two separately.

And the first is that there is in Canada to-day an emergency condition of unemployment which demands that the government should take from the federal treasury a portion of the taxes of the people of Canada as a whole, taxes which have been contributed by all the provinces and from some provinces from which not one word has been said with respect to any need for unemployment relief, and should hand these moneys over to one or two or more of the other provinces to help an alleged serious unemployment situation there. I submit that there is no evidence in Canada to-day of an emergency situation which demands anything of that kind. Every winter in this country, ever since there was a winter or a Canada, there has been unemployment and there always will be. That situation unquestionably may be aggravated by particular conditions, and when a condition becomes aggravated for any locality, human justice and feeling would demand that those localities that are immediately associated should come as neighbours and share in the relief of the situation. When a local condition becomes too great to deal with, the province in which that municipality is situated should be the body next to deal with the matter. That has always been the case. When conditions become such that not all the provinces but two or more provinces, if you like, find that they are unable to cope with the situation which has arisen within their boundaries, it may become the duty of the governments of those provinces to make such representations to the federal government and it would be the duty of the federal government to take those representations into consideration. But in the absence of any representations whatever from any provincial government to the federal government for aid of this kind, or representations indicating that there is an unemployment situation which the provinces cannot cope with, we have no right to say that there is any national unemployment problem in this country.

Let me point out the facts. We have had no representations from Premier Tolmie of British Columbia to the effect that there is in that province a problem which is not being and cannot be handled satisfactorily by his government. There has been no request from him to give aid to any municipalities. When this organized deputation to which reference has been made came from Winnipeg—and I shall have a word to say later with respect to it—to meet the federal government, a telegram came from Premier Tolmie stating that he had been requested to ask us to receive the delegation and he hoped we would receive them kindly, or words to that effect. There was no specific request that the government do anything; we were simply asked to listen to the delegation which, by the way, I do not think had on it a single representative from the province besides members of parliament who happened to be in Ottawa for the session.

As regards Alberta, we have had no request from the premier or any member of the government of Alberta for assistance with respect to an unemployment situation there. As regards Saskatchewan, we have had no request from the premier or any member of the Saskatchewan government, although we have been meeting these gentlemen from these several provinces and discussing with them the conditions with respect to their respective provinces. There has been no request from any of them in regard to an unemployment situation with which they are finding it impossible or even difficult to cope. We have had no representations from the premier or the government of Manitoba to the effect that the Province of Manitoba is unable to handle its own situation. From the province of Ontario we have had none, but I quoted in the house in a previous debate a statement made by Premier Ferguson which no one will refute, to the effect that Ontario had no unemployment problem. That statement was made during the month of January or February when conditions were supposed to be at their worst. The premier said that here and there there were difficulties, mostly centred in Toronto, but he thought they could well look after their own affairs.

The government received from the premier of Quebec a telegram, not to the effect that there was an unemployment situation demanding federal assistance, but saying that there was no such situation and that his province did not want any assistance. I should like to ask my hon. friends: Do they suppose there is no unemployment in Quebec? What about the longshoremen who, every year, have to give up their work because the St. Lawrence river is frozen over, and who go to their homes at the beginning of winter where they have to wait until the spring comes? They are humble men; they do not receive very much in the way of earnings. I doubt if their wages are comparable with those paid in western Canada. But I have not heard any complaint from them; they have accepted the situation this year as they have done year in and year out, recognizing that it is a condition of the trade with which their particular lot is cast. They seek to lay up in time of work what will enable them to tide over the period of the winter.

I come to Nova Scotia. We have had no communication from the premier of Nova Scotia or from the members of his government to the effect that there is an unemployment problem there which necessitates federal aid. We have had no communication from the premier of New Brunswick or his government that they have an unemployment problem of the kind there. We have had no communication from the premier of Prince Edward Island or his government that they have an unemployment situation. As a matter of fact, we have had hardly a voice from the whole eastern portion of Canada; we have had nothing, as a matter of fact, in the way of an expression of an unemployment problem excepting from a few persons who come for the most part from western Canada, and from certain parts only of western Canada, and from those in this house who are interested in the matter because of a point of view that they intend to take in discussions on the budget, when they will seek to have it appear that there is a serious unemployment problem in this country at the present time.

May I draw attention to this further fact? Not only have we had no communications from any of the premiers of any of the provinces, but we have had with the possible exception of Winnipeg no communication that I can at the moment recall, from any of the heads of municipalities.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) the other evening gave the other side of the story. He pointed out that while we had had no communications stressing unemployment, the premiers of every single province in this Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, had during the month of January given out public statements to the effect that conditions were prosperous in their respective provinces. The minister quoted them in turn, one after the other, as saying that conditions were prosperous in the different provinces from coast to coast. Then the minister asked, very pertinently: How can we have a national unemployment problem if so far as each and every province is concerned its government reports prosperous conditions within its boundaries?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do governments ever declare that there is anything else but prosperity during their regime?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend that they have, and we would very soon hear from them if there were in fact an unemployment situation of the kind he would have us believe exists. They would be interested enough to bring it very soon to the attention of this administration. May I say this to my hon. friend, in order that he may get the real point of what I am saying? What does the suggestion amount to that is being made by those who ask us to dip into the federal treasury and take out money raised by taxation from the people of Canada as a whole to give it to certain of the provinces? It amounts to this. A Liberal government was returned to power in this country in 1921 on certain policies which we believe have made for prosperity, which we believe have made for economy, which we believe and which the country knows have made for a reduction of public debt and a reduction of taxation. We, as a Liberal government, are standing by our policies and are seeking to maintain our position. But hon. gentlemen opposite say to us: Now that you have got the country into this favourable position, we ask you to take part of the moneys that you may raise in taxes from the people of this Dominion as a whole, and give it to other administrations to spend, and to whom, if you please? To a Tory government in the province of British Columbia; to a Progressive government in the province of Alberta; to a Tory government in the province of Saskatchewan; to a Progressive government in the province of Manitoba; to a Tory government in the province of Ontario; to a Tory govtrnment in the province of New Brunswick; to a Tory government in the province of Nova Scotia. No request has come from or been made on behalf of either Quebec or Prince Edward Island, where there are Liberal governments attending to the affairs of the province. If you wish to play politics, that is the way to play it. Give to these Tory governments and to those Progressive governments at the present or all times money raised by taxation of the people of Canada as a whole to spend in their respective provinces and thereby save them raising taxes for their own purposes.

Mr. IRVINE: Who asked them to spend money?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not getting the money to hoard it.

Mr. IRVINE: What money?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The money my hon. friends are asking to be paid out for unemployment relief to these provinces.

Mr. IRVINE: Did the Prime Minister read the resolution?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I conclude what I have to say? So far as giving money from this federal treasury to provincial governments is concerned, in relation to this question of unemployment as it exists to-day, I might be prepared to go a certain length possibly in meeting one or two of the western provinces that have Progressive premiers at the head of their governments—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —but I would not give a single cent to any Tory government.

Mr. BENNETT: Shame!

Mr. STEVENS: Shame!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do my hon. friends say "shame"?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, shame!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is there to be ashamed of?

Mr. STEVENS: You ought to be ashamed of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is getting very indignant. Something evidently has got under his skin. May I repeat what I have said? With respect to giving moneys out of the federal treasury to any Tory government in this country for these alleged unemployment purposes, with these governments situated as they are to-day, with policies diametrically opposed to those of this government, I would not give them a five-cent piece.

Mr. CAHAN: Why give it to a Progressive government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My Tory friends do not like it. They think that they are the only ones who are entitled to the administration of affairs. May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that, having regard to the situation as we know it in this country at the present time, we have had no representations from any of the provinces expressing the need for assistance from the federal treasury to meet an unemployment situation, because of an emergency too great to be dealt with by the province itself, and in the absence of that I submit that hon. gentlemen who suggest that anything should be given out of the federal treasury have in support of their position not a leg left to stand on. There have been times when there have been emergent conditions, and where there have been emergent conditions this government has been quick to recognize them. When we came into power we found in this country a considerable amount of unemployment, a lot of unemployment arising in large part out of circumstances connected with the war. Men were returning from overseas and seeking to get back into civil employment, and there was no opportunity to secure employment for them. We recognized that provincial governments had a problem there with which they could not cope, and when they made representations to us, we met those representations, and here may I tell my hon. friends that we made at that time no difference between Liberal and Conservative. We gave our money just as freely to the Tory governments then as we gave it to the Liberal governments, because there was a necessity to meet and a very different situation prevailing from what there is at the present time in this country.

Mr. KAISER: Older and wiser.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, wiser. I think, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps I have dealt at sufficient length on the question of the emergent situation.

From the point of view of helping in a solution of the unemployment problem, what good purpose I may ask is to be served by conveying to persons of other lands an entirely false impression of conditions in this country. May I say this? In dealing with unemployment, the first thing that is essential to meet the situation is to have capital wherewith to give employment. Until capital becomes available for employment, with industry organized as it is to-day and with industrial processes what they are to-day it is impossible to deal with any unemployment situation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no way in which you can more effectively defeat the possibility of investment of capital in your country than to seek to create the impression in other lands, and throughout your own, that conditions are not prosperous, that they are bad, and that there are within this country large numbers of unemployed. Unemployment begets unemployment, just as employment begets employment. What is needed in Canada to-day if we are to solve any unemployment problem to the extent that it may exist, is to get more capital into the country to increase the investment of capital; and we will get it as people come to have confidence in conditions here. Hon. gentlemen opposite in their various discussions on tariff matters have from the beginning adopted the attitude of seeking to undermine confidence with respect to industry, commerce and trade in this Dominion; that has been the whole nature of their attack. We had it in the early part of the present decade; we heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, after we came into office, nothing but one dire wail, cries of unemployed Canadians leaving this country to go to the States, of the woeful condition of affairs generally, "whispers of death" and the like; in other words, everything possible was done to cause those who had capital to invest, if they were thinking of placing it in this country, to withhold it from investment altogether. If we are prosperous it is not because of any assistance we have had from hon. gentlemen opposite; it is in spite of everything they have done to try to defeat our ends.

Let us see how this sort of thing sounds when we get it from other lands. On the 28th of February there was an Associated Press cable despatch from Vienna, Austria. It appeared in most of our papers. I ask hon. members as they listen to it to ask themselves this question: Were they thinking of making investments in Austria, how far would they proceed after reading the despatch?

Conference Called On Unemployment
Austria Seeks Method of Reducing Present Widespread Distress
(Associated Press Cable.)

Vienna, Austria, Feb. 28.—Chancellor Johann Schober to-day summoned an economic conference to consider means for alleviating social distress resulting from unemployment in Austria on a scale never known there before.

He called on eighty representatives of industry, trade, banking and labour to form commissions and to report to him within a week what measures to improve the situation immediately they could advise.

According to reports, there are 450,000 families in Austria obliged to live on a dole of 25 cents per week.

Would anyone on reading that announcement give any further thought to making an investment in Austria? May I say to my hon. friends opposite when they urge that the Minister of Labour should have called a conference in Canada to deal with this question, that people in Great Britain, in the United States, in Europe and in other parts of the world on reading that the federal government had found it necessary to call a conference on unemployment would immediately have hesitated to make any investments in this country. More than that, I say our own people who were contemplating starting in new businesses or enlarging their present business would have hesitated in the face of an announcement of this kind by the federal government. For when a government takes action it is supposed to know what is the need of action. We understood the situation in this country, and may I say to my hon. friends opposite that when the Dominion trades and labour conference representatives waited on the government and presented their requests as to matters which they desired to have considered, they told the Minister of Labour and myself and other members of the government who were present that we had done what was right in not calling a conference. It was said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the minister should have followed the example of president Hoover. My hon. friends are fond now and then of alleging critically that we are following examples from the other side: they do not emphasize the extent to which they are repeatedly making suggestions of the kind. What did the conference called by president Hoover amount to so far as Labour was concerned? It amounted to this, that when the different groups were called together and Labour was invited into the conference, Labour was requested not to press further demands for increase of wages of any kind. Our organized labour representatives told the government very plainly that they thought we had acted in the interests of labour itself when we did not call a similar conference. I prefer their verdict in the matter to that of hon. gentlemen opposite.

May I say this while it is in my mind? During the first three sessions of this parliament we heard a lot about immigration, the need for increased immigration. Hon. gentlemen opposite were pressing us day in and day out to open wide the doors, to bring in larger numbers of immigrants, and an amendment was moved on the motion to go into supply by the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. McRae) inviting the country to go in for some huge land settlement scheme which would bring in multitudes of immigrants, and hon. gentlemen opposite endorsed the scheme. As a matter of fact one effect of their propaganda was, in part, to cause a good many more persons to come in than otherwise would have been the case, and some of these persons are to-day unemployed. Now may I draw the attention of the house to this, and I ask my hon. friends who are diagonally opposite to keep it in mind. Look over the proceedings of preceding parliaments and what do we find? Always in the first, second and third session, the Tory party asking that larger numbers of immigrants be brought in. They always urge in the early sessions to bring in more immigrants. What do they want to bring them in for? To effect more in the way of competition in the labour market. Then as we get towards a general election they drop their immigration talk and one hears from them nothing but complaints about unemployment, about the number of people out of work, just as we are hearing from them to-day. If hon. gentlemen opposite ever got into power—supposing such a thing to occur—I fancy we would find very soon the labour market of this country glutted with people whom they would bring in to help favour the position of those who are already favoured in many of the industries of this country.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What about the 8,000 that came in in January?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I turn to another phase? I have perhaps touched at sufficient length on the situation as to there being an emergent condition. Let me come now to the matter of unemployment insurance. Here perhaps I cannot do better than quote first of all what the hon. member for North Winnipeg said when he was speaking on his amendment. In making this quotation, may I say to him and to his neighbour from Winnipeg North Centre and to my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) and to a few others, especially where in order to give point to their remarks they proceed to draw deductions from press reports, that they should in selecting press reports in the first instance be very careful to see that the reports are accurate, and secondly that the quotations are accurate before they put on Hansard quotations or alleged quotations that are not truly representative of what has been said, or in accord with what the press generally has had to say in reporting a matter. I am not saying that my hon. friend did intentionally what I am about to disclose, but I say it served his purpose very well to make a certain quotation in the manner he did. Let me read what my hon. friend said. On March 31, my hon. friend put the following on Hansard:

In a statement which the right hon. Prime Minister made to this delegation the impression was broadcast that the government was sympathetic and willing to do something to speed forward unemployment insurance. This is what he is reported to have said according to the Ottawa Evening Citizen of February 27:

"Eventually Canada will have a system of unemployment insurance. This was the only constructive way to deal with the unemployment situation and he hoped it would soon be possible to work out an insurance plan. Seasonal measures in the way of relief and public works were of no permanent assistance and an insurance plan offered the only constructive way of avoiding distress. Under it those who employed them would be compelled to contribute to a fund during their periods of employment and the insured would receive benefits when out of work."

That is from the Ottawa Citizen of February 27, 1930.

I have here the Ottawa Citizen of February 27, 1930, with the quotation my hon. friend placed on Hansard, and which he said bore out the point of view that at the time I was committing the government to some scheme of unemployment insurance. This is the quotation:

Eventually Canada will have a system of unemployment insurance.

Please note my hon. friend read the quotation as if it went on to say that this was the only constructive way to deal with the unemployment problem. He however left out the important words which follow this first sentence:

Eventually Canada will have a system of unemployment insurance, Premier King predicted yesterday in replying to a deputation seeking federal aid to municipalities and provinces on unemployment relief. This, he said, was the only constructive way to deal with the unemployment situation and he hoped it would soon be possible to work out an insurance plan.

In other words, the paragraph I have just read was a lead put in by the newspaper reporter who sent this particular item to the press. It was a lead in which he gave his own interpretation of the significance of what had been said and which, at most, he characterized as a prediction. May I direct the attention of the house to something further? I do not think this was in any way intentional on the part of my hon. friend, though it is rather singular that he preferred the Citizen version for his quotation. The quotation is:

Under it those who employed them would be compelled to contribute to a fund.

Exactly the same despatch appeared on the same day in the Ottawa Journal and in the Montreal Gazette as well as in other papers, but with an all important additional phrase. Both those papers have the following wording:

Under it those who expected relief and those who employed them would be compelled to contribute to a fund.

My hon. friend used the particular cutting which left out the words: "Those who expected relief and."

Mr. CAHAN: What did the Prime Minister say, really?

Mr. HEAPS: May I explain that I took the Ottawa Citizen because I thought it would be the paper that would not be unfriendly to the Prime Minister? That is the only reason I quoted from the Ottawa Citizen. I never took the trouble to look at it in any other paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept the explanation of my hon. friend. May I point out, however, not only to my hon. friend but to any members who are fond of using press references, that before they use them they ought to be perfectly sure that the report is accurate?

Mr. HEAPS: How can they do so?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By making comparisons with despatches, in other papers dealing with the same matter; or, as was suggested this afternoon by an hon. member opposite, quoting Hansard instead of the press. My hon. friend by making use of a quotation which omitted all reference to contribution by employees was giving an entirely wrong interpretation of what I said.

Mr. CAHAN: What did the Prime Minister say, really?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will tell my hon. friend what I said. I have my words here. I will quote from the Montreal Gazette, which my hon. friend would no doubt prefer to any other paper.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the slightest preference, but I would like to know what the Prime Minister did say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is what I said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of February 27:

Seasonal measures in the way of relief and public works were of no permanent assistance, and an insurance plan offered the only constructive way of avoiding distress. Under it those who expected relief and those who employed them would be compelled to contribute to a fund during their periods of employment and would receive benefits when out of work.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the Prime Minister now state that insurance of that character is the only constructive way of giving relief for unemployment in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not say it is the only way, but I say it is one way. I believe many hon. members here present, and I hope my hon. friend will be among them, will live to see the day when a system of social insurance is introduced which will help to relieve labour of many of the fears it now has with respect to unavoidable misfortune. If insurance is a good thing against fire, accident or loss of life, it is at least equally good for the family of the worker against unemployment, one of the many inevitable things he has to face.

May I remind hon. members how it came about that the statement I have referred to was made? It was given on the occasion when the delegation referred to waited on the government. I carefully reviewed, as far as I could, everything material that had been said by those who spoke, I could not state all in the short time at my disposal, but I left out so far as I am aware no essential feature. One gentleman—I cannot recall who he was and I do not know whether he was a Liberal, a Conservative, or what he was—in the course of the representations made spoke about unemployment insurance as a means of dealing with the problem. Stating my own views on the question, I said that I agreed with the gentleman who had said that unemployment insurance was one constructive way of dealing with the problem of unemployment. That is how the remark came about. Nothing further was said in regard to it. Out of that, however, whoever wrote the despatch wrote the interesting lead to the effect that there was a prediction that unemployment insurance would some day come about. I think that is a perfectly sound prediction, but it is a very different thing from saying that I was committing the government and parliament to a system of social or unemployment insurance. I merely stated a position as I believe it to be correct.

In order to make my attitude clear, I ought perhaps to say that my views on labour problems are not born of to-day. They are not put forward at this time or at this moment for the purpose of seeking political or party gain. I have strong convictions on some of these questions that affect the well being of the masses of the people, and I have expressed them in a manner which anybody who wishes to be acquainted with them can soon discover. It has been said:

Oh that mine adversary had written a book.

I have in my hands a book written by myself over some thirteen years ago. At that time I was not in parliament, nor was I then thinking of reentering parliament. I was, however, thinking about the problems that other countries and we in this country would have to face in the days of reconstruction after the great war. I sought to turn to advantage, along with my studies, such experience as I had had in public life, and wrote this book which is entitled Industry and Humanity—A Study in the Principles Underlying Industrial Reconstruction. In stating those principles I set out clearly what I felt and believed in regard to labour problems and the only or most effective means of their solution. Amongst other subjects I naturally touched upon the problem of employment. At page 237 of this volume I find the following:

It is the fear of unemployment which lies at the root of most of the minor fears which labour entertains. The fear of unemployment is in reality the fear on the part of labour that capital will not be provided to carry on industry continuously, and under conditions which will afford adequate remuneration to effort. It is an outgrowth of the fallacy that quantity of work is necessarily limited. This fear gives rise to the fear that the introduction of new machinery, or the increased use of machinery already installed, will displace labour; the fear that speeding-up processes will diminish work; the fear that female, child, unskilled, or imported labour will be substituted for skilled; the fear that men of one trade will encroach upon the work for which men of other trades have been specially trained; the fear that the number of apprentices will be so increased as to lessen the requirement for skilled hands; and the fear that long hours and continuous overtime will exhaust employment.

That is but one reference to unemployment. I did not, however, stop at a mere mention of the case, but I wrote what I believed to be one of the remedies for the situation. On page 345 is the following reference to social insurance, of which unemployment insurance is one form:

Social insurance, which in reality is health insurance in one form or another, is a means employed in most industrial countries to bring about a wider measure of social justice, without, on the one hand, disturbing the institution of private property and its advantages to the community, or, on the other, imperilling the thrift and industry of individuals. Social insurance looks upon industry as in the nature of social service.

Here may I say a word to my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland)? He said yesterday that industry should not be a mere device for making profits. I agree with him absolutely. I believe we will get no solution of the problems of industry until we get the conception, yes until the world gets the conception that industry is not a mere device for the making of profits but that industry is in the nature of social service, and that every one who contributes to industry, whether it be by his capital, labour, or skill as a manager, is playing a part in the nature of a social service. Until we get that idea into the minds of the people and have our legislation based upon it, we will not reach a solution of unemployment or of any other social problem. I quote further:

> Social insurance looks upon industry as in the nature of social service. It regards the owner of land or capital as a capitalist, but also as a public trustee. It looks upon the worker in industry as a wage-earner, but equally as a necessary member of the community. It places the emphasis on personality rather than on property, and on life rather than on wealth.
> Insurance against unemployment recognizes that an isolated human being, not less than a machine, must be cared for when idle. It recognizes also that nothing is so dangerous to the standard of life, or so destructive of minimum conditions of healthy existence, as widespread or continued unemployment. Where idleness is the fault of the social order, rather than of the individual concerned, it places the onus on the state to safeguard its own assets, not more in the interest of the individual than in the interest of social well-being.
> Workmen's compensation, sickness and invalidity insurance, widows' pensions, maternity and infant benefits, recognize wherein personal relationships in industry have changed, and where as a consequence of new conditions permanent handicaps arise. The social legislation of which these measures are an expression rejects, as unworthy, the thought that men and women voluntarily incur accident, sickness, disease, enfeebled health, or dependence in distress, any more than they willingly seek enslavement of any kind. It recognizes the difficulty of differentiating between industrial accident and occupational disease; and between disease occasioned by occupation or its environments and illness otherwise contracted; also the impossibility of dissociating from economic conditions the social waste caused by excessive and preventable illness. It sees that debt binds health as it binds freedom, that sickness represents the most frequent factor of individual destitution, and that it is in painful crisis that handicaps for the whole of life are oftenest imposed. To save the spirit of men from being crushed is quite as important as to prevent their bodies from being broken or infected. Many a man's spirit fails when, through no fault of his own, or of his family, efficiency is permanently impaired through accident, or savings become exhausted by unemployment or sickness, or where a new life in the home suggests an additional burden instead of a joy. Much invalidity and penury is due to lack of character and thrift; but much also is evidence of want of effective social control. What society fails effectively to prevent, society is in some measure under obligation to mend.

There is the statement I made at that time with respect to social insurance. I then proceed to give my views with respect to old age pensions, and by the view as expressed in this volume I stand now and am prepared to stand for the remainder of my life.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What does the Prime Minister mean by the word "state"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will come to that. May I point out that at page 348, I had this to say:

> It is the elimination of fears with respect to these fundamental requisites of health that labour speaks of as a national minimum standard of life.

I then point out wherein the Labour party of Great Britain put forward as its first principle the universal enforcement of the national minimum, and if my hon. friends care to go a little further they will find another statement at page 353. I might draw attention to the fact that this statement was in print sometime before the terms of the labour convention of the treaty of Versailles, was drafted:

> It is not a national minimum only, but an international minimum, which is needed, if labour standards are to be protected against the undermining effects of the law of competing standards operating through international competition. The possible creation of some international agency to further the establishment and enforcement of international conventions aimed at the maintenance of an international minimum, is a subject of momentous concern. It is well deserving of consideration in any discussion pertaining to a League of Nations which may constitute a part of the peace negotiations at the conclusion of the war.

There is a statement of my belief that the industrial problem, whether it relates to unemployment, accident, old age, disease, invalidity or otherwise, never will be solved satisfactorily to any nation or to any country until we have an international minimum standard of health which will prevail in all the countries of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend laughs. He may well laugh; I am not surprised, because he has not always had—well,

I will not say what I had in mind. My hon. friend will find out one of these days, if he comes to interest himself in industrial problems, that in seeking a final solution he will have to take notice of what is happening in every part of the world, and will have to take account of the industrial standards that exist in all parts of the world. There is a law familiarly known as Gresham's law, which asserts that where two metals are in circulation, the one pure and the other base, if the metals are left in circulation long enough the base will drive out the pure. That law has been demonstrated to be true with regard to the precious metals in circulation in every country. The same law is I believe discoverable with respect to competing standards of health, or other standards of living and working conditions. Bring into competition a lower standard with a higher standard, and sooner or later the lower standard will drive the higher standard out of existence altogether. That is why the League of Nations, representing all the countries of the world, is seeking to bring about among the different nations uniform standards with respect to matters of health and working conditions and those matters dealt with by social legislation generally.

As far as the British Empire is concerned, as I said a moment ago, I believe its standards in industry and health are higher, taking it by and large, than those of any other political entity on earth. I believe also that within the British Empire we in Canada have higher standards for labour generally, and better working conditions, than exist in any other part of the empire, which means that our standards are the best in the world. If however, we are to maintain our standards it can be done only by the raising to our level of the standards of other countries that enter into competition with us.

Mr. STEVENS: Or by protecting our workmen from that competition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I expected to hear that from my hon. friend! Shut ourselves in and do nothing for anyone else. Last night my hon. friend was speaking on the birth of Christianity. I believe I can show him that no man lives unto himself alone, and that it is only by helping his neighbour that eventually he will help himself, and that the same is true of a nation.

Mr. STEVENS: But in the meantime will the Prime Minister allow the unemployed in Canada to be subjected to the competition of those working under the lower standard to which he himself has referred, until such standard is raised to our level?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not dealing with a momentary situation; I am dealing with this industrial question in a broad way and as a world problem. I am not dealing with what is going to happen inside a circle around which a ring fence can be put.

Mr. STEVENS: I would remind the Prime Minister that he cannot put a ring fence around Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I stand by what I have said, that our own standards can be ultimately maintained only as the standards are raised to a like level in all competing countries. There are apparently some who hold to the idea of building up around Canada a tariff wall which will shut her off from competition with any and every other country in the world. For the next month or two we shall hear about the erection of tariff walls which will serve to restrict our trading with the countries of the world. But were this to occur, what would be the position shortly after such a policy had been effected? More and more in the way of unemployment.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is high enough now.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When we fail to keep it high enough it brings about unemployment in this country, but creates employment in other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for East Calgary asked me about the resolutions of the convention with respect to labour in the peace treaty of Versailles, and I think he as well as some other hon. members in the course of their remarks commented upon the fact that the Liberal party had incorporated into its platform the various principles which were laid down in the labour convention of the treaty of Versailles. That is perfectly correct; and let me say that the liberal party of Canada was the first political party in the world to incorporate in its platform those principles; and they were incorporated in their entirety. I think I am safe in saying that those principles have not been more fully recognized or maintained by any other country in the world than they have been by Canada. I would like to quote them to the house.

Mr. McGIBBON: Were they not framed by Sir Robert Borden?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think Sir Robert Borden ever saw them until they were printed, though he may have. At the Liberal convention in August, 1919, I presented a resolution which reads as follows—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is this the chart?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member will look at the chart he will be amazed at how far we have gone in the directions indicated. I said:

I have the privilege of presenting to this gathering a resolution of the committee on the subject of labour and industrial relations. I shall read the resolution first, and then address myself to the subjects and contents mentioned in it:

"Resolved that the committee recommends that the National Liberal Convention accepts in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform, in the spirit in which they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

"These methods and principles for regulating labour conditions set forth in the treaty are as follows:"

I ask you to note these words, "as set forth in the treaty,"

The question was raised by some hon. member as to whether or not I had used the phrase that labour was merely a commodity, and I think that question will be answered by the following:

I ask you to note these words, "as set forth in the treaty," because the committee thought it well to make an exact copy of what is contained in the treaty itself.

"First—The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce."

With regard to that, I said:

Had the committee been framing that resolution themselves, I think that they would have omitted the word "merely." The labourer and his labour cannot be separated, and the members of the committee feel that the resolution would be stronger and would more fully express the sentiments which they have at heart if it read:

"First—The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded as a commodity or article of commerce."

The word "merely" being left out. But we prefer to take the exact wording of the articles as drawn up at the peace conference.

"Second—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers."

I think that principle has been generally recognized in Canada. The next clause reads:

"Third—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country."

This administration has stood four-square for the principle as there enunciated. That it was a principle of the Liberal party was demonstrated in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose government was the first in Canada to introduce a fair wages resolution and to put it in force in government contracts.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Liberal administration was the first to create in this country a department of labour in the federal government. The Liberal administration was the first to put upon the statute books of Canada laws respecting conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes. I could mention many other such reforms initiated by Liberal administrations. The next clause reads:

"Fourth—The adoption of an 8-hour day or a 48-hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been obtained."

May I remind the house that there is now before parliament a bill which has been introduced by the present administration through the Minister of Labour to make the eight-hour day compulsory to the extent that the parliament of Canada can do so with respect to the employees of the federal public service and persons employed under contracts for Dominion public works. The next clause reads:

"Fifth—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours which should include Sunday wherever practicable."

I think that for the most part has been accomplished. There may be cases where it was not observed; where they exist I think they should be at once eliminated. No man should in carrying out the duties of his occupation be required to work or to absent himself from his family for seven days in the week; nor should any woman have to do so. Labour on six days in the week should be enough, no matter what the occupation. The next clause reads:

"Sixth—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development."

The problem of child labour comes under provincial jurisdiction; we have nothing to do with it beyond obeying in our own field the principle laid down. So far as the present administration is in a position so to do it will continue to lend its influence in support of this principle.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do not all these things apply to the federal government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might desire to have it so, for example, that there shall be no child labour in factories, but this parliament has no power to enact a law of the kind; it has been left by the constitution to the provinces. I would remind my hon. friend again that the mere fact that the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over questions which deal with hours of labour, minimum wages, working conditions and the like, is to my mind conclusive evidence that the provinces were intended to be the ones primarily concerned with all such phases of the industrial situation. Clause 7 reads:

"The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value."

That principle has I believe been recognized so far as our public service is concerned. Clause 8 reads:

"The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein."

So far as we have to do with that matter, we have recognized it. The next clause reads:

Ninth—"Every state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to insure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed."

Mr. ADSHEAD: What is meant by the state?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I intended to anticipate my hon. friend's question, but he was too quick. It means the recognized political entity possessing the necessary authority. In the case of Canada under our constitution as drafted the state would mean not the federal government, but the governments of the several provinces. The clause reads:

Ninth—"Each state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part in order to insure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed."

The laws and regulations for the protection of the employed come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces; they would be the state so far as enactment and enforcement are concerned. We could not appoint women inspectors to enforce these laws even if we wished; we have no authority. The day may come when it will be thought desirable, and I believe that in the course of years industrial legislation in all the provinces will be made uniform. I hope the day will come when legislation regarding industrial matters will be uniform in all the countries of the world, because until that day does come the attainment of higher standards will continue to be prejudiced by possible invasion and undermining by the lower standards.

Those were the principles incorporated in the convention of the League of Nations and they were adopted by the Liberal party in its platform. Every one of those principles has been lived up to and fulfilled as far as has been possible. But we went still further in dealing with labour problems. Our resolution reads:

And further resolved:

1. That the introduction into the government of industry of principles of representation whereby labour and the community, as well as capital, may be represented in industrial control, and their interests safeguarded and promoted in the shaping of industrial policies.

We have sought, wherever we could, to see that labour's voice should be heard with respect to matters of industrial policy with which labour was concerned.

2.—

And this concerns more particularly the one question we are discussing.

That in so far as may be practicable—

"Practicable" means amongst other things having regard to what is set out in the constitution of the country.

—having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The British North America Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Everything has to be in accordance with the constitution. May I ask this of my hon. friend: If with regard to these matters there is to be cooperation between the Dominion and the provinces, is it not right, reasonable and just that those who under the constitution are given exclusive jurisdiction to legislate with respect to such matters, should be the first to move in seeking the necessary cooperation? That is where I take exception to the attitude of some of my hon. friends. They always insist that in matters of this kind the federal government should take action before any of the provincial governments move. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said the other day that when he was in the west, the mayor and councillors of some municipality begged of him, when he came to Ottawa, to put in a word with regard to the unemployment situation. May I ask him: Why did they go to him? Why did they not go to the representatives of the province who make the laws with respect to these matters? I think I know why they went to him. They recognized in him a friend and advocate of the cause of labour and they believed he would do all he could, but I think he ought to have told them at once that much as he would like to do what he could for them, the first court of appeal, if I may so describe it, was the provincial government, and that they ought to appeal to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That deputation had already waited on the provincial government, and our provincial government is in favour of a scheme by which the provinces will co-operate with the federal authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the provinces ask us to interest ourselves with them in a scheme of the kind, we will be more than ready to consider their representations. But until there is some representation made from the provinces, I think I must repeat what I said the other day: namely, that we stand ready to cooperate but we feel in this matter which so vitally affects the provinces themselves we should wait until we are asked by the provinces themselves. I do not by that mean all of the provinces; I mean a reasonable number, at least two others—before we should be expected to cooperate with them in these particular matters.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why did the Prime Minister put this in the federal program?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I come to the next one?

3. The representation of labour on federal commissions pertaining to labour matters.

That has been observed.

4. Effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health.

Much legislation of that character has been introduced by this and the previous Liberal administration and has passed this parliament.

5. The representation of labour on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

I may remind my hon. friends that the present Liberal government was the first and the only government to give labour direct representation on the directorate of the Canadian National Railway.

6. That the system of retraining soldiers unfitted for their past work, because of physical injuries, be extended to disabled workers in industry.

That, I think, might be carried out, but it again comes more directly under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

7. More effective restriction of Chinese immigration.

Another undertaking that has been fulfilled by the present Liberal administration to the point of a restriction which in fact has amounted to complete exclusion of Chinese.

8. The federal incorporation of cooperative associations.

That is a matter which is receiving consideration.

9. The acceptance of the principle of proportional representation.

That remains to be brought about, and I hope it may be before very long.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): That will be a new plank.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will not be a new plank, but it will be one for which I venture to say my hon. friend will not give me his support.

10. Immediate and drastic action by the government with respect to the high cost of living and profiteering.

Since we came into office in 1921, very much has been done in both of these directions. Profiteering has been stopped, and the cost of living materially reduced. And finally:

11. Restoration of the control of the executive by parliament and of parliament by the people through a just franchise and its exercise under free conditions, and a discontinuence of government by order in council.

Every resolution put forward at that convention relating to the attitude of the Liberal party in respect to the problems of labour has been carried out almost to the letter since this government took office. That is the Liberal record in regard to these industrial matters.

I referred a moment ago to the care which I thought ought to have been taken by the hon. member for North Winnipeg in quoting from the press. I meant to pay my compliments to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) who did not even quote the text, but who confined his remarks to quoting the headings that had been put on by newspaper editors.

Mr. MANION: That is absolutely unfair, because the Prime Minister asked me to quote the text and I read exactly what he read himself to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon friend was leaving the matter where it was when I asked him to go ahead and read the article itself, and then he only read part of it.

Mr. MANION: I had only forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I had let the matter go at that, he would have sent out to the country headlines with which I had had nothing whatever to do and would have had them represent my position before the country.

Mr. MANION: That was the conclusion drawn by all the newspapers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am now about to say refers not merely to what was said by one member, but to a deliberate effort on the part of a large number of hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent my position with respect to old age pensions and several other matters which involve grants from the federal treasury to the provinces. I have already explained pretty fully the reasons why I take the position I do in seeking to defend the federal treasury and in so doing to keep to their respective fields of effort both the provinces and the Dominion. When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact, I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body raise the taxes and another body spend the people's moneys thus raised. Is there any hon. member who will disagree with me in that statement? There is none. That is the extent of the statement I made. I was referring to a principle of financing, speaking simply in relation to what is sound and what is unsound in financing. Anyone interested in financing, whether of a municipality, a province, a dominion, an empire, or a league of nations, will, I think, admit it is unwise, an unsound, a wrong principle for one body to have to do with raising the taxes and another to be concerned with the spending of the money so raised, that other body not having to account to the representatives of those who have paid the taxes.

Mr. BENNETT: The foundation of our whole financial structure is grants to the provinces by subsidies that they do not earn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, would come along with that quibble.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the foundation of our whole financial structure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will ask my hon. friend now: Does he think it a sound principle that the federal government should raise taxes and then give that money, in whole or in part, to the provinces to spend?

Mr. BENNETT: The foundation of our whole financial structure is grants from the Dominion to the provinces of money not raised by the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend does not answer the question.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point this out to my hon. friend: When the Dominion was formed certain obligations were placed on the provinces and certain on the Dominion. It was recognized at that time that in connection with the confederation agreement it was necessary, and might continue to be necessary, to give to the provinces certain specific amounts in order to make the balances even, if I may so express it. In other words, what the fathers of confederation were seeking to do was to give each a distinctive field or jurisdiction; but they recognized that in giving to each a distinctive field the provinces would to a certain degree be handicapped in the matter of raising revenues, and they met that situation by fixing certain definite subsidies to be paid from the federal treasury to the provinces. Those subsidies had no strings of any kind attached to them. They became the complete property of the provinces to deal with as they pleased, and were so recognized as part of the pact of confederation. That in itself is, I submit, a reason why we should not go further in dealing with federal moneys in relation to the provinces. If the provinces have not enough money to carry on their functions as assigned to them by the constitution of this country, then there should be a further revision of the financial terms of confederation. There has been already, may I say, one or two financial revisions for that purpose. We should give to the provinces what, if any, is their due, in that regard. But once we have given them subsidies of a specific amount and said that they are free to deal with them as they see fit, they should not be permitted to come to the federal treasury for additional amounts, one day for highways, another for technical education, another for old age pensions—one thing after another, apparently without limit. I am speaking now wholly from the point of view of what I regard as sound financing.

To make my position perfectly clear, may I say this? I have been from the beginning one of the strongest advocates of technical education. I believe in transcontinental highways and in other highways. I believe in old age pensions. I believe in unemployment insurance. I believe in all these things, but if they are to be carried out it must be done in accordance with the spirit as well as the letter of the constitution. Discussing this matter on the 21st of February of last year, I said:

> May I direct attention to this further fact which bears immediately upon the grants from the federal treasury to the provinces.

I am reading this now more particularly because my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre in his remarks sought, I think, to have the inference drawn that I was opposed to old age pensions. I hope that he did not, and I think I can expect him to say that he did not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is one other point of order, Mr. Speaker, that I would raise at this time. The Prime Minister said a few minutes ago, referring, I presume, to myself and others, that there had been a deliberate effort to misrepresent him. I suggest that that is not in order. So far as I am concerned there has been no deliberate effort to misrepresent him. I quoted from Hansard, and I did not intend to imply that the Prime Minister was in any way opposed in a general way to old age pensions; but what I did read from Hansard was that he was opposed to the financial arrangements underlying the existing old age pensions scheme, that he regarded it as being based upon a vicious principle, and I think I am justified in saying that by the text which he is now about to quote. But, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the words, if he applies them to me, that I deliberately attempted to misrepresent him. I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend says that he did not, certainly I accept his word at once. I confess that I was very much surprised when I heard him speak as he did, and my own words as they appear on Hansard will show that I said he was not following his usual method. I confess to no little surprise at the way in which since last year some hon. members opposite have sought to have the people of this country from one end to the other believe that I was opposed to old age pensions, that I so stated, and had said that old age pensions constituted a vicious principle. When I used that expression I was dealing wholly with a certain method of financing. I am going to read now the text in Hansard to which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre says he was referring. When he looks at that text he will find that I began and ended with a reference to the principle of financing, and that what I said had nothing whatever to do with the question of whether the principle of old age pensions was sound or unsound. What I said was this (Hansard, 1929, page 316):

> I believe that everyone who has given any attention to public finance will agree that it is a thoroughly vicious system to have one body raise taxes and another body expend the money thus secured. In other words, give to the provinces these grants from the federal treasury, without their being obliged to raise the money themselves by taxation, and you will not get, with respect to expenditure, that careful supervision which would be exercised if the provinces themselves were obliged to raise the money in the first instance. It is a bad system, a thoroughly vicious system, and that is the reason why the present administration has been seeking to put an end to a system that grew up at a time when the country was in the throes of war or had to meet a post-war situation—a system which, had it been permitted to develop, would have become thoroughly destructive of anything in the shape of economy with respect to the expenditure of the people's money.
> Mr. Ladner: What about old age pensions?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am glad my hon. friend speaks of that. There is another case where we are giving to the provinces a lot of money in addition to what they are raising.

That has no reference to old age pensions as a vicious principle.

Mr. BENNETT: Read the rest of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It goes on:

> Mr. Ladner: Is that vicious?
>
> Mr. Bennett: A thoroughly vicious principle?
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I think it is, yes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I still submit to my hon. friends opposite that there is not one of them who in his heart and mind believes that I was suggesting either directly or indirectly that old age pensions constituted a vicious principle. They may applaud as they like. If they wish to go on repeating this misrepresentation they are free to do it, but I do not think that they will gain much in the country by that kind of misrepresentation.

May I continue to quote and read the next question asked in that same debate last year:

> Mr. Ladner: Why doesn't the government provide for old age pensions itself instead of shifting it to the provinces?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: It is the province's obligation, and so far as this government is concerned we have sought to safeguard the public treasury to the extent at least of one-half of the required expenditure.

In other words, I was making it plain that in connection with the contributions we were making under the old age pension scheme, we had recognized the unsoundness of the principle of taking money from the federal treasury and giving it to another body to spend, by attaching certain conditions as to how and when and where that money should be spent, safeguarding so far as we could a principle that was unsound. The question of old age pensions was so all-important, having regard to existing conditions, that in order to get old age pensions under way it became necessary for us to adopt a system of financing that was not sound. That however is very far from meaning and does not mean that the old age pension system is not sound. What I think is this: when there is a further revision of the finances of this country matters should be so arranged that the moneys for the whole of any such expenditure should thereafter be raised solely by the one body primarily concerned, instead of being raised in part by the provinces and in part by the Dominion. Compensation of a necessary amount should be paid to make up for whatever probable loss there may be from abandoning the present method of grants in aid.

I hope I shall not have to refer to this question again. I corrected the misrepresentation last year when it was made. That is why I find fault with my hon. friends—that notwithstanding that last year I made it perfectly clear in this parliament that I was being misrepresented, they have persisted in this misrepresentation. Here was the statement I made; I quote from Hansard, February 21, 1929, page 322:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Let me make myself perfectly clear with respect to that. I did not say that the principle of the old age pensions is vicious; I say that the principle of giving money from one treasury to another is, having one authority raise the money by taxation, and the other permitted to spend without the obligation of taxation, and it was the conference with the provincial premiers that helped to convince me on that point, particularly what the provincial premiers themselves said.

Then my hon. friend is recorded as saying:

Mr. Bennett: I am glad the premier of Ontario has had at least one good effect upon the Prime Minister by having a conference with him, because the Prime Minister has seen the error of his ways after coming into contact with Conservatives at the Dominion-provincial conference.

And yet my hon. friend when he was touring the west took this volume of Hansard and read to his audiences the part containing Mr. Ladner's quotation to be found at page 316; and never once made the slightest reference to this part on page 322 of which he himself had the fullest knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: That is untrue, Mr. Speaker. I was careful enough to read what the right hon. gentleman said in Hansard. My criticism was then, and is still—what does this country think of a man who as Prime Minister denounces as vicious the principle which he put in operation twelve months before?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now we have the hon. gentleman's measure exactly. Read the Hansard reports and you will not find in all that I have said, speaking on my responsibility not only as a member of this house but as Prime Minister, any reference to old age pensions as being a vicious principle. Notwithstanding I have made this clear again to-day, my hon. friend now comes again forward with a statement which is intended to convey that impression throughout the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Again, Mr. Speaker, I ask, is this Prime Minister really responsible?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Is he responsible?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Does he realize—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, does he realize—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to take his seat. If he means the word "responsible" in a derogatory sense he will have to withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have used it exactly in its right sense. The question is this: the right hon. gentleman said: If you read Hansard to-morrow you will find what I said. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman's memory is of any use, because he answered Mr. Ladner and myself by saying: Yes, I think the contribution by the Dominion of moneys for old age pensions is a thoroughly vicious principle.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: No, he did not say that; that is not what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: Read it again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, fortunately the country has Hansard and the passage speaks for itself.

An hon. MEMBER: The country is just waiting for the opportunity to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again I repeat what I have said. I hope I shall not have to refer to this matter again, but if my hon. friend and others wish to continue their misrepresentation, as far as I am concerned they are free to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the right hon. gentleman withdraw the word

"misrepresentation." Your honour ruled the other day that it was unparliamentary. The rules of this house must be observed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to Bourinot, page 361, the expression "misrepresentation" is not parliamentary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend thinks I have used any word that I should not have used, I am quite prepared to withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that is not sufficient. Let the withdrawal be ample and complete.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does my hon. friend want me to say?

Mr. BENNETT: To withdraw the use of the word "misrepresentation" as being against the rules of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as I have in any way transgressed the rules of the house in the use of the word "misrepresentation," I withdraw the expression. But I do not withdraw my statement that my attitude on this matter has been misrepresented and is being misrepresented.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, you also ruled the other day that a member could not say indirectly what it would be unparliamentary for him to say directly.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the withdrawal is complete as applied to the hon. gentleman. I repeat that as regards the expression "misrepresentation," Bourinot at page 361 gives several examples of unparliamentary terms, and amongst them is "misrepresentation."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to have opportunity to devote some part of my remarks to enlarging a little on the constructive side of this question of unemployment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends need not laugh. I will give them twenty minutes of it. May I say of the addresses that have been delivered in the course of this debate, I think the most thoughtful and the most helpful, if I may distinguish between them, was the one made by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland). He did seek to give to the house some appreciation of at least one very important phase of the problem of unemployment. He did so, I thought, exceptionally well, and in a manner which revealed full and careful study. His remarks had largely to do with the effect of discoveries and inventions, and he pointed out how through the course of the years under the agency of invention and of discovery labour was repeatedly being placed in the position where it was finding its former occupations disappearing and was forced to get new training or to go into some new branch of trade or industry or was left by the wayside altogether. My hon. friend went on to suggest that it would be well for the government to appoint a commission to make a survey of conditions in the country bearing on the question of unemployment. May I say this to him? If I believed a survey would throw any light whatever on the problem beyond what we already possess, I would recommend to my colleagues the appointment of a commission for the purpose. But my hon. friend's own speech was the best answer that could be made as to where a commission would be wholly inadequate to deal at all effectively with this situation. The situation that faces labour, as we look ahead a few years, is going to arise out of conditions that are largely unforeseen at the present moment. New inventions are coming, new discoveries are going to be made which will bring other processes into existence and eliminate in part, if not altogether, certain of the callings and trades and employment connected therewith, that are being carried on at the present time, and these changes will inevitably bring about unemployment to large numbers of men. Discoveries of new processes brought about by scientific research, discoveries of new portions of the earth's surface and of much that lies beneath the surface, and methods of production, distribution and exchange—these things are going to recur and recur throughout the future, and no commission appointed will ever be able to anticipate what may come about in that regard. More than that, unless I have failed altogether to convey to hon. members the conception I have of this labour problem, namely, that it is a world problem, it must be apparent that conditions so far as this country is concerned in matters of unemployment are going to depend, not so much on what is going to happen in Canada itself in the first instance as on what happens outside and beyond the bounds of this country. No commission can foresee what will happen. Let me take the opening parts of my hon. friend's speech. He very straightforwardly said that the present depression so far as it exists was due, first of all, to the western wheat crop not being as large as it had been in previous years; in the second place, to the fact that the crop had not been marketed to anything like the extent it had been in former years; and in the third place, to the railway earnings and other earnings being smaller in consequence. He spoke about conditions in Great Britain and the extent to which the markets over yonder were being affected by what had taken place and was taking place in other countries. He also referred to the collapse which took place on the stock exchange. My hon. friend is right in stating that these are in the main the causes that account for any existing depression and consequent unemployment; but what body of experts could have foreseen so long as a year ago that anything of the kind was about to happen?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was not so much my purpose that the commission should examine into the actual causes of unemployment as to try to find a solution for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pointing out to my hon. friend that the solution cannot be found in any one formula; it cannot be found in any one method. It can only be found by each authority doing what it can within its own jurisdiction, and in cooperation with all other authorities. It is moreover a world problem.

My hon. friend asks for a solution of this question. I tell him that the only way in which this country can hope to solve the unemployment problem to the degree to which it is possible for it alone to solve it, is not by the adoption of some single measure relating specifically to unemployment, but by making prevail in regard to all its policies those principles which will make for greater productivity in our country and for an increase in employment as a consequence. May I point out that at the end of the term of office of every Conservative administration which has been in power in Canada and has sought to enforce its doctrines of high protection, we have had a period of depression such as had not before existed in the country's history. May I point out with some degree of pride that whenever Canada has a Liberal administration holding office for any length of time, after the first few years the country has begun to show prosperity. Prosperity has rapidly increased. This has not been due to chance; it has been due to a difference in the policies which have been put into force by Conservative and Liberal governments respectively. When the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office in 1896 it found this country in a condition of depression, the like of which had not been known theretofore in the history of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman remember 1877 or 1878?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not as old as my hon. friend, but I do remember 1896. I remember the discussions of the industrial situation as it existed at the time. From the day Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power conditions began to improve and from then until the day he left office this country enjoyed more in the way of prosperity than at any previous time. It was a golden era. I will come down to more recent times; I will come to the time of the present administration. What are the facts? When we came into office in 1921 what did we find? We found that the public debt was being increased at the rate of $92,000,000 per year; we found a condition of extreme depression. We heard for some time after nothing but cries of blue ruin and whispers of death. Our railroads were disorganized, and throughout the country everything was in about as bad a condition as it could possibly be. What has been the change? Once our policies were given a chance to take effect, from that time on we have witnessed steady reduction in the debt of the country, steady reduction in taxation, increase in production, increase in trade, increase in industry in its several branches, and a degree of prosperity which has not been paralleled since the days of Laurier, and which has never been equalled in the history of our country. I say to my hon. friend from Bow River, and I hope he will agree with me, that during the next few years more will depend upon the policies of the government with respect to trade and production than upon anything else—upon wise fiscal policies. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition talks about sending raw materials out of the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I say to the right hon. gentleman that more depends on trade and consumption in the next few years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition suggests as a remedy that we must not allow the export of any of our raw materials or their manufacture in other countries. I notice my hon. friends have published within the past day or two a small political pamphlet in which amongst other things that argument is stressed. What are the raw materials of this country which my hon. friend is going to stop being sent out if and when he assumes office? Will his policy apply to agricultural products? Will he prevent raw materials of that kind going out?

Mr. CHAPLIN: No, the United States is doing that now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What would Canada not give at this time if we could only market more of our raw materials in the way of grains and other agricultural products? What would Great Britain not give at this time if she could find wider markets for her coal, which is another raw material? Every country is blessed by Providence with certain great resources. They are at different stages of development; it does with these resources as is best for the country itself. In regard to mining, we have vast resources from which there are raw materials we must export if we are to gain the advantage we should from their possession. We cannot consume in any form a fraction of these raw materials within the country itself. In connection with one or two classes of minerals we may possess more than other parts of the world, something of a monopoly, but generally throughout the world these things are distributed amongst the different countries. If we do not continue to sell them some other country will, and we shall lose the market we already have. Is my hon. friend going to stop the export of the products of the different mines that exist in different parts of Canada to-day? I wonder where the working men who are employed in mining operations will get their wages when that sort of thing begins. Where will the home markets be when we lose the markets we have across the seas or to the South and which through our exports we have worked so hard to gain? When it comes to fisheries, another great natural resource, will we stop their export too? And what about our lumber, the products of the forest, is that trade too to be stopped? If we are going to prohibit the export of our raw material will other nations continue to send their raw materials to us.

To-day my hon. friends opposite were talking about our trade with the United States. They know very well that we receive more in a year in the way of raw materials from the United States than we send to the United States. If we are going to refuse to send raw materials to other countries, can we expect them to contract to trade in raw materials with us? What about our iron and steel industry? We get most of the raw material, most of the iron ore, from the United States, and the whole iron and steel industry in our country is largely dependent upon it. Are my hon. friends going to say: We will give nothing in the shape of raw materials to a country that supplies us with these essentials to our own industry? What about our cotton industry? We get most of our raw cotton from the United States. It gives work to thousands of men here. Is my hon. friend's policy one which will stop the trading back and forth in these raw materials in which each of us has a special advantage?

Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of talking about the home market; it is not the home market they are thinking about so much as a monopoly of the home market for the benefit of a few of their privileged friends. Does my hon. friend know we will be able to have a home market in this country only as we have purchasing power, and that we will get purchasing power only as we are able to sell our products in the markets of the world? The wider your foreign trade, the better will be your home trade. I tell my hon. friend that by his policy and the policy of his friends no ships will be going out of Vancouver or Halifax harbours. When we get what my hon. friend spoke about a moment ago, a tariff wall around this country which will keep everything from coming in and as a consequence prevent everything from going out, you will soon have again the condition of stagnation and unemployment which we have witnessed in previous times.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to finish my remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A few minutes ago I dealt with the "vicious principle" of old age pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that my hon. friend wishes to deprive me of the next five minutes in which I should like to finish my speech.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so, I have just received this from the library.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. A question of privilege is always in order.

Mr. BENNETT: A few minutes ago I stated my recollection of a statement which was made last year by the right hon. Prime Minister. I stated he had said that the payment of money to the provinces by the Dominion for old age pensions was a thoroughly vicious principle. I now read from page 316 of Hansard of last year:

Mr. Ladner: What about old age pensions?
Mr. Mackenzie King: I am glad my hon. friend speaks of that. There is another case where we are giving to the provinces a lot of money in addition to what they are raising.
Mr. Ladner: Is that vicious?

Mr. Bennett: A thoroughly vicious principle.
Mr. Mackenzie King: I think it is, yes. I have come to the conclusion that it is a thoroughly vicious principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That has been read before; I read it myself.

Mr. BENNETT: You denied the statement, and so did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend the mover of this resolution that when he introduced his amendment he was no doubt anxious to provide an opportunity to discuss the general question of unemployment. It is unfortunate that my hon. friend found it necessary to introduce the matter in the form of an amendment on going into supply. Probably he did so because he felt it to be his only opportunity, and that if he did not do so someone else might get ahead of him.

May I say to my hon. friend: that I hope when the debate is concluded he will feel that his purpose has been served and that we will have had a sufficient discussion of this question? I think the debate will run on in all likelihood for another day or two, and by the time it is finished I hope he will feel that the discussion has been ample, and that he will ask to have his amendment withdrawn. I do not think my hon. friend wishes to be put in the position of opposing the policies with regard to labour and other matters for which this government stands, and I do not think he wishes to place this government in the position where supply cannot be granted. We cannot accept his amendment for the reason that amongst other things we would be voting against the granting of our own supply. If permission to withdraw his amendment is not given by the unanimous consent of the house he and others might I think very well take the view that the discussion has accomplished the purpose he had in view.

May I say to my hon. friends who sit diagonally opposite that before very long they will find out—and particularly those who come from the western provinces—that hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious to unite in a vote with them in an effort to further their policies of higher protection. Hon. members opposite want to have those who are members of the Labour party and those who are members of the Progressive party vote with them on an amendment on going into supply. They desire that so that when we come to our next budget debate—because this has been practically a budget debate—they can claim this division as evidence that there is an unemployment problem due in some way to the policies of the present government, and that the policies that should be adopted are not those of this government or policies that may be akin, but, the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite, which we know are now and always will be simply matters of increased protection. I ask hon. members to study the position into which they are being drawn in connection with this particular debate. So far as the wording of the amendment is concerned we cannot accept it for still another reason. By implication it suggests that the government is not seeking to do anything in the matter of the relief of unemployment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is true—or at least I put the question: is it not true?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just say this: my belief is that every major policy of the government has some bearing on the question of unemployment. I believe the policies of the present administration have brought our country from depression to prosperity and helped as nothing else could have done to lessen unemployment. I believe my hon. friend who has just interrupted is sincere in his desire to help labour and his fellow men. I wish he would believe that there are other hon. members in this house who are just as anxious as he is to do the same. Just because we do not see eye to eye with him on his particular nostrum, I hope he will not believe that we have not as much heart and soul as those who may label themselves the friends of labour to the exclusion of all others.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, but a day or two ago I received from the riding which I have the honour to represent in this house, communications which stated that on account of the unemployment in the city in which I live, it was considered to be my duty to lay before the government and before the house the real situation existing not only in that city but throughout the western portion of Ontario.

Since the opening of parliament I have been under the impression that there was but one opinion in this house as to the existence of a very critical situation with regard to employment or unemployment; I thought that it had been a matter of common knowledge for months past in every quarter of the house and in every quarter of the country that such conditions existed. This matter has been referred to continually in the newspapers of the country regardless of their political affiliations; hardly a day passes that public attention is not drawn to this vital question. I have come to the conclusion after hearing members discussing this matter in the corridors of this house that there is but one mind on the subject, that unemployment does exist in Canada to a very grave extent. Until I heard the speech delivered this afternoon by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I was not aware that there were two opinions in the matter. I have listened with the greatest interest to the remarks of the hon. members for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and East Calgary (Mr. Adshead), as well as to the speeches delivered by hon. members on the other side of the house, notably by the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) and North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), and by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). Not one of those hon. members attempted to deny that a serious condition exists in the matter of unemployment; until the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon it was accepted as the real situation.

I am inclined to think that the Prime Minister is significantly misinformed in regard to the conditions with respect to unemployment. I can well understand that the cry of the unemployed has not penetrated the comfortable seclusion of the Prime Minister of Canada, but I cannot understand why the Minister of Labour was not aware to the fullest extent of all the facts. We who are not connected with the government know a great deal about this question. We cannot shut our eyes to the facts; we know that they exist; we know that deputations have come to Ottawa to meet the Minister of Labour and have laid before him the true facts. The minister in the course of his three-hour speech did not attempt to deny those statements of fact, but he offered absolutely no suggestions for relief. As for the right hon. Prime Minister he boldly proclaimed that the government intended to do nothing.

The resolution before the house is very plain; it is merely that immediate action be taken to deal with the question of unemployment. The Prime Minister has told us to-day that there is practically no unemployment in this country. Have my hon. friends of the labour movement misrepresented this situation? Are they uninformed as to the true situation? Is the Minister of Labour uninformed? He did not deny the actual fact, but he could not give us any figures. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister correct in his attitude? What does he see in this plain, simple, direct amendment which evidently causes him so much alarm? As soon as I first read the amendment I thought that it was one which would be accepted unanimously by this house. In my own innocent way I thought that the Prime Minister would so manage matters as to be able to announce to the house that he would accept this amendment, not as a motion of want of confidence but as something which carried with it the unanimous approval of parliament. He did not take that course, but he suggests that in some way or other my hon. friends who represent labour in general are to be inveigled into adopting an attitude which they do not desire to adopt, they are to associate themselves with the Conservative opposition, which association will lead inevitably to disaster. That is something the Prime Minister has conjured up in his own mind. He asks that the amendment be withdrawn, which amendment would have been unanimously approved by this house were it not for the speech of the Prime Minister. I hope sincerely that the words of my right hon. friend had no influence upon the hon. member for North Winnipeg. The hon. member has moved a resolution which will be strongly supported in parliament, a step in the right direction, taken at the proper time. All he asks is that action be taken to remedy a grievance, and one of national extent. Should we not seek some remedy now, or should we be bluffed out of it by the high sounding phrases of the Prime Minister, who says in effect that he will not believe in a condition of unemployment unless the premiers of the various provinces bring the matter to his attention? Does he not feel that the members of parliament represent all the provinces of confederation? For all federal purposes we are the representatives of the provinces, and we bring to the attention of parliament the fact that in the various provinces there is an extreme, an emergent condition, and that it is the duty of parliament to take action under this emergency.

I have watched the career of the Prime Minister since he came into parliament. I am sorry he is not present to-night. I remember well when he entered parliament in 1908; and I refer to this matter because from his speech to-day and one on another occasion, one would imagine that he had been the great champion of the rights of labour since he entered the Canadian House of Commons. I heard him proclaim to-day what he had done in regard to technical education. What are the facts? I know they are within Your Honour's knowledge. At the request of various organized labour bodies throughout Canada, in the year 1909 I had the honour of introducing into the House of Commons, while my right hon. friend was Minister of Labour in this parliament, a resolution asking for the appointment of a committee to investigate the question of technical education in order that the Dominion parliament might take some action in the matter. I was supported by two or three on the Liberal side of the house, where I then sat. What was the attitude of the then Minister of Labour, the present Prime Minister of this country? He rose in his place and after a long speech, he killed my motion; he moved the adjournment of the debate to put my motion to the foot of the list. I would not stand for his motion. We divided the house, and on that occasion for the first time I had the honour of voting with the Conservative party. But my right hon. friend called upon his followers who were in the majority to vote down the motion on technical education, and it was voted down. Much time did not elapse after the end of that session before the attitude of my right hon. friend entirely changed. He got busy. The labour unions communicated with him, and very soon thereafter by order in council he appointed the commission which he would not let parliament vote to appoint. Before that commission made a report to the House of Commons my right hon. friend was out of the house. He was out of the house from 1911 to 1919 and he had no more to do with the question of technical education. All he did was to kill the first motion. The Conservative party was in power when the grant was made by parliament to the various provinces in respect of technical education. He was not present either to support or to oppose the grant, but later on when he was in power as Prime Minister, he put an end to that grant and the provinces now do not enjoy a dollar from the Dominion treasury for technical education.

My right hon. friend said this afternoon that if a time ever comes when there is co-operation in this country between the federal authority and the provincial authorities in regard to labour, it will be a happy day for Canada. Does any hon. member think my right hon. friend this afternoon advanced the cause of cooperation by the statements which he made on two occasions when in this house he proclaimed a new policy, a new doctrine; when he announced on two occasions during the course of his speech that under certain circumstances he would be prepared to grant out of the Dominion treasury money to two provinces which at present had Progressive governments and to two provinces which at present had Liberal governments, but he would never consent to a dollar being paid out of the treasury of Canada to any province that had a Conservative government? Was there ever a more glaring piece of impropriety on the part of a prime minister? What does that language amount to? It is a threat or a bluff against five of the great provinces of Canada, and an inducement or a bribe to vote Liberal, and that from the lips of the Prime Minister! Surely that is "a vicious principle" to proclaim in public. It is an exposure of the narrow, partisan mind of the Prime Minister himself. Language of that kind might be worthy of a Tammany leader in the lower wards of New York, where they say: You will vote the whole ticket or you will get no money; but it is unworthy falling from the lips of the Prime Minister of this country. I for one sincerely hope that for the good name of parliament, for the dignity of the house, the Prime Minister, before this debate is concluded, will rise in his place and withdraw the improper remarks he made this afternoon.

What think you, Mr. Speaker, of the great province of Ontario, being threatened or bluffed in that manner—the richest province we have, the largest contributor in taxation to the treasury of this country, a province which recently went through a provincial election where the people, almost to the extent of eighty per cent of those who voted, cast their ballots in support of a Tory administration and returned it to power; an administration that is in office to-day by the largest majority of popular vote and sitting members that has ever existed in the Ontario legislature? What think you of a threat or a bluff to that legislature or to the voters who elected it? We provide in our election act against threats and inducements to the individual. What say we when the Prime Minister of Canada threatens a whole province that if they do not agree with him and elect a Grit legislature no money will come out of the Dominion treasury for that province?

There is another remark made this afternoon by the Prime Minister, for what purpose I know not, but a remark that I want to draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman who moved the motion. The Prime Minister argues that he has had no complaints from lawyers, doctors, professional men or financiers in regard to unemployment. Does he realize the meaning of the resolution which we are at present discussing? It is a motion for the relief of the wage earner, not of anybody else. It is for the relief of the wage earners who are thrown out of employment. It is their cry which we hear throughout the length and breadth of the land, and it is to remedy their condition that this motion has been launched by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. I will grant that there may be room for a great difference of opinion as to what has brought about the present disastrous situation in this country. I know hon. members opposite take the view that they cannot attribute any part of this disastrous situation to the record of the present government. On the other hand I am just as firmly convinced in my own mind that the proximate cause, the chief contributing cause, of the situation which we have in Canada to-day has been the mistaken fiscal policy of this government during the years it has been in power. But let us differ upon that. We are not engaged now upon an inquiry into the causes; we are concerned with the facts. We have a situation here; or, in the language of former President Cleveland of the United States, we are confronted by a condition, not a theory. We have the unemployment, and the motion before the house asks for immediate action by way of relief.

I cannot accept the position either of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) in regard to the responsibility which rests upon this parliament under these circumstances. I believe that, in the first instance, the liability or responsibility is upon the municipality. In the second instance, it is upon the provincial authorities. But that does not exclude liability or responsibility upon the part of this parliament. In my judgment we are legally and morally just as responsible as are the municipalities and the provinces. Let me point out just what I mean by that statement.

My hon. friend has pointed out that under the British North America Act, all charities and all eleemosynary institutions are under the control of the province. I do not think that the labouring people of this country who are out of employment are asking for charity. They are asking for rights, not for charitable contributions. I would also point out that under section 91 of the British North America Act all matters pertaining to the country at large are expressly placed under the jurisdiction of this parliament, and for those matters we are responsible. Included in them is, first, the whole question of trade and commerce. Any mismanagement of trade and commerce matters in Canada will reflect upon employment in this country. Parliament is the only instrument that can manage or mismanage our trade and commerce, and if we make an error which causes unemployment we surely should in the first instance bear the responsibility. Let me illustrate that by something that happened just two years ago. The then Minister of Finance brought down a measure to remove the customs duty on worsted yarns taking off the duty of 12½ per cent and putting woollen yarns on the free list. Immediately after that action was taken, about 50 men were thrown out of employment in a worsted mill in the city of Guelph, and 150 were thrown out of employment in the town of Hespeler, nine miles from my city. That was the direct consequence of the action of this parliament. Nothing else intervened. This parliament decreed that worsted yarns such as were made in these factories should be placed on the free list, and no more yarns were made in those factories. They were imported from Bradford, England, and men to the number I have mentioned were thrown out of employment. Who was responsible for that unemployment in the first instance? I do not say that that unemployment in those two individual cases exists to-day. I am using them only as an illustration of what may happen through the action of this parliament. Who caused that unemployment? Why, this Dominion parliament when it changed the tariff schedules in regard to woollen yarns.

Note, also, that the largest employers of labour in Canada are under the direct jurisdiction of this parliament; I refer to the two great transportation systems. No other legislature in this country except this parliament has jurisdiction in respect to the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railway, which are by long odds the greatest employers of labour in Canada. The legislation of this parliament and of this parliament alone can affect them. We by an act, if we so chose, could throw thousands upon thousands of men out of employment on the railways. Would any responsibility rest upon us in that regard? Would not the first responsibility rest upon us in that regard? I maintain that ours would be the initial responsibility.

So, Mr. Speaker, in everything pertaining to trade and commerce and in everything pertaining to our great transportation systems we in this parliament have absolute and exclusive jurisdiction, and any act of ours that throws men out of employment surely places upon our shoulders the responsibility for anything that may occur. I cannot see it in any other light. Our responsibility for unemployment is just as great as that of the provinces and just as great as that of the municipalities. If the condition exists which I believe, nay, which I know, exists throughout the length and breadth of Canada to-day in regard to employment and unemployment, I submit that it is our duty to intervene, and had it not been for the speech this afternoon of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, our intervention and our assistance would have been a matter of unanimous action in this house. Now that is blocked by the action of a single individual who happens for the time being to be the head of the government.

Is it too late to make a plea to the government to reconsider the position which the Prime Minister took this afternoon? I am impressed with the seriousness of the situation. I hear on every side of thousands and thousands of men out of employment. I do not get my evidence from the provincial premiers. No one needs to wait for such news; it is a matter of common knowledge. What are the conditions? Five or six thousand men out in one city in British Columbia; four hundred families in Edmonton being taken care of by the city and two hundred single men by the provincial government; ten thousand out of employment, I am told, in the city of Winnipeg; twenty-five to thirty thousand out of employment in the city of Toronto; in Windsor, thousands of mechanics walking the streets. I was in Windsor three weeks ago, and a pitiable sight is to be seen there about noon on an ordinary week day. In Oshawa thousands of men are out of employment. In every city in western Ontario it is the same story, and still the Prime Minister of this country proclaims to-day that there is no emergency, that there is nothing unusual in the situation.

The Minister of Labour, charged with the administration of the particular department which should have all the information in regard to employment and unemployment appears before us absolutely ignorant of the situation and unable to tell us how many men are to-day out of employment in the Dominion of Canada. That is the spectacle under the government of my right hon. friend, who proclaims himself a great friend of Labour. I will say this for him: During his whole career since 1908 in this house, I do not believe that there is any man in this country, or for that matter, in any other country, who has thought so much and has talked so much and written so much upon labour questions, and done so little for labour, as my right hon. friend. But I am not yet going to abandon all hope, I believe there is still time for him to consider the real situation. We do not need to make a party question out of this. We are not trying to gain any party advantage, notwithstanding the insinuations of the Prime Minister. It is not our motion; we were not consulted about it. There is nothing behind the motion, so far as I know, but the one straight question: Shall we grant the needed relief or shall we not? The occasions upon which I have made appeals to this government have not been very many and so far they have been uniformly unsuccessful. I wonder if I could do better on this occasion. I do not believe there is much use making an appeal under these circumstances to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. While outwardly he is the most genial and whole-souled man you could meet anywhere, under his skin I find he is as hard as flint. I am afraid there is no hope from him. In a three hour speech he offered nothing—no remedy, no solution, no contribution, no assistance. I am afraid my appeal to him will fall on deaf ears. I see a smile on the face of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott). Is it worth my while making an appeal to him? I am afraid not. I am afraid he does not understand the real situation—he does not know what it means to have a wife and children crying for bread; if he did, I believe there would be more hope from him than from many others. Then there are my hon. friends the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Crerar). No; I do not hope for much from them. Their views are circumscribed, their horizon is very limited; they cannot see past the conditions of the western wheat farmer; they know nothing of industrial employment in the rest of Canada. I am afraid I can make no impression on them. And as to my friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), I said the Minister of Labour was hard as flint; I can only refer to the Postmaster General as harder than granite. Twice last session I tried as earnestly as a man could try, I appealed as fervently as a man could appeal, for a little more pay for the rural mail carriers, for the letter carriers, and for the railway postal clerks, and my appeal fell on deaf ears; for when I had finished he merely gave orders for the crack of the party whip and the ring of the division bells, and down I was voted.

Mr. VENIOT: The prayer of the wicked availeth nothing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is perhaps true. I wish my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) was in the house. He is a genial, smiling fellow, and I have no doubt he is a man with a big heart; he does understand the unemployment situation, and he has taken apparently every opportunity to be absent during the course of this debate. He knows the condition of labour, he knows the terrible hardship of men with families to support and no money to buy food and clothing. They say that, like myself, he has a strain of good Scotch blood in him. Perhaps he is a bit thrifty, but I cannot believe it. When I recall how he was able to splash around the money of this country in North Bruce last year and is doing it again this year, I say to myself: Surely he can find in the recesses of the treasury some place where he can dig up half a million, a million or a million and a half for the relief of the unemployed at the present moment. Well, I have still my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, to appeal to. After his speech today I have not very much hope of persuading him, but I can tell him this: If he will rise to the occasion now, if he will make a compromise in the matter, if he will go down into the treasury and produce some money to assist the unemployed now, he will have the intense gratitude of a tremendous number of people in the Dominion. Some hon. members may ask why I do not do it myself. We in this house are aware that no private member can introduce a resolution or a bill involving the expenditure of one dollar of public money. That is why I am making an appeal to the government. If I were able to do so under the rules of this house, to-morrow I would bring in a bill for the expenditure of half a million, a million, or a million and a half dollars to join with the municipalities and the provinces in bearing this burden and granting this relief; but, as I say, unfortunately no private member can do so.

Now I ask my right hon. friend again if he will not do so. The bill will pass unanimously. I ask him to do it before we adjourn this Easter. Before we go home let us remedy this situation. Then while he is enjoying his Easter holiday let him develop some permanent policy to meet the recurring unemployment which comes to us annually on account of the rigour of our winter season. That is the plan I suggest to him. Do something now; that is what the motion asks—immediate action. Develop then a permanent policy and bring it down, and we will help him. I cannot imagine there is any shortage of money. Last year the government announced a surplus of $70,000,000 in the treasury. Surely there are one, or two, or three million dollars that they can devote to this laudable purpose. I cannot believe that a government that will go down into the treasury of this country and spend half a million dollars a year on motor cars cannot dig up half a million dollars for the unemployed. I cannot believe that a government that will go down into the treasury of this country and spend half a million dollars on a building for a rich representative in the city of Washington cannot get half a million dollars for the unemployed. I tell my right hon. friend that if he tries he can get this money, and we will cause him no difficulty. Let him get it and distribute it pro rata amongst all the provinces, disregarding that improper statement which he made in the house this afternoon. Let him do it now and he will earn the gratitude of a tremendous number of people in the country now politically opposed to him. We will not oppose him, we will help him. Will he do it? He will have the unanimous voice of the House of Commons behind him if he will. I pledge myself that if he will do it I will never mention the fact as an act of contrition on his part, or a concession or admission that his government has failed to do anything during the last seven or eight years.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I propose to give to this subject of unemployment the attention that its serious character demands, and I will be a proud man if any suggestion that I may make will aid by ever so little in the solution of this question. For that reason, sir, I have neither the time nor the inclination, to imitate some of the partisan speeches that have been made in the course of this debate. Supposedly dealing with unemployment they were very much earmarked as being part of the usual preelection political ballyhoo—I think that is the word. As the debate progressed I recognized the time-worn platitudes, the glistening generalities, and the old familiar catchwords that we associate with the approach of a general election. Let me quote some of them: Canada the land of promise; Canada the land of broad, wide open spaces; our red-blooded citizens; the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world, and so on; but often descending to the most petty personalities, both as regards parties and as regards individuals.

Now, what aid is it to the unemployed if we say that Bob on one side of the house, after hours of debate, demonstrates that Peter on the other side once upon a time made a political bet; or we will say that Jim on this side of the house, after much wrangling of Hansard and so on, proves that John on the other side three weeks ago at some place in the west, said something somewhat different from the language he used when opening a flower show in Prince Edward Island nine and three quarter years before? That is the sort of stuff we have been listening to. Is this the best statesmanship we can give to the men who sent us here? If we cannot act as statesmen at least let us try to reach a little higher grade than schoolboys squabbling over a game of marbles.

Now, as regards the unemployment question, I want to state my position quite frankly. I am of the opinion that the Dominion government, being the dominant factor, so to speak, in the confederation of the provinces should call a conference of the provinces to deal with this subject. I think the conference should have a twofold purpose in mind. First, it should discuss the underlying causes of more or less permanent or recurring unemployment, and the possible remedies for those conditions. Secondly, in a subordinate degree, it should consider with the provinces unemployment insurance, and whether they could cooperate either to devise a scheme that would be workable under the British North America Act as it now exists, or, with the consent of all the provinces, make such a change in the British North America Act as would permit the inauguration of such a scheme. The idea of such a conference would meet with general support throughout the country. It would not commit the government to any lavish expenditure, beyond preliminary expenses, and much good would be likely to come from it. It would perhaps demonstrate to our industries methods of reducing seasonal unemployment, which is so much a cause of the trouble. It would educate us in the true conditions regarding the unemployment situation.

May I say a word at this point in regard to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. I think he misapprehended the purpose and the meaning of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). The amendment is that in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment. That is the amendment, and no more than that. The Prime Minister appeared to go upon the premises that his government had been asked to make two very heavy expenditures, one to meet immediate relief and the other to inaugurate a system of unemployment insurance. Neither is an essential of the request made in the resolution. In the first instance, as to dealing with unemployment, it might take the form of a reduction of expenses. For instance, it might be asked or suggested that immigration should be curtailed, and a saving thereby effected, or it might necessitate certain legislation or representations to encourage industry to cut down periods of seasonal unemployment. At this stage I might quote a clipping from to-night's issue of a labour paper in the United States:

> Governor Roosevelt, of New York state, has appointed a committee of five to study and make plans for the stabilization of industry and the prevention of unemployment.

This has nothing to do with the present depression, but is looking forward to the preventing of a recurrence of unemployment in the future. That is what I understood the purpose of the amendment before us to be. As to unemployment insurance, the resolution does not ask, and the government might never be asked, to spend a nickel in connection with it. It may be found when this conference is called that the provinces will be agreeable to recognizing unemployment as their responsibility, and they might agree to pay the whole of the State's share of unemployment insurance. However, as no one province can successfully inaugurate a system of unemployment relief, and it would be impossible to have nine different and competing systems, it would be necessary for the Dominion government to inaugurate what might be called the machinery, and the different provinces would come in and agree to bear the expense. Possibly it has been suggested that the Dominion government might pay a portion, but it does not follow as a matter of course that because we ask the Dominion Government to consider legislation of that nature we are asking it to commit itself to any outlay in that regard.

As to unemployment, I am afraid as long as we have our present economic conditions, and the easy way in which we can speed up production, we will always have it with us; I think it will get worse. Even when times are thoroughly prosperous there is a great amount of unemployment, as I shall attempt to show in a moment. Then when the reaction comes the drop from the high standard of employment makes it even more severe. I am inclined to agree with a leading economist of the United States who says that unemployment will be the biggest problem in that country during the next decade, and he attributes the condition to standardization of industry and to improved technique. To bring it home to us in Canada, I shall quote the conditions in Vancouver. If I understood correctly the hon. member who just took his seat, he said that in one city of the province of British Columbia there are between five thousand and six thousand unemployed. No doubt when he quotes those figures he is exercising a political poetic licence, because, I have returns from Vancouver, the biggest city of British Columbia, to the effect that for the two weeks ending January 29, 1930, there were only 1,093 unemployed. It cost that city $25,400 for those two weeks to furnish work for unemployed labour. For total relief including people who were not able to work, the cost was $36,000. For the whole of last year the total cost for unemployment work and relief in the city of Vancouver was $232,000. This condition is coincident with a period of prosperity in that city. The industrial payroll has gone up $1,700,000 in the last year; more than one thousand men have been added to the industrial payroll in the city of Vancouver, and it is in a prosperous condition, the total payroll being $65,000,000 a year. Yet we have a constantly growing number of unemployed who require assistance.

I had occasion recently to look at these men; I went out and watched them at work. I did not announce myself or speak to the foreman, but I just watched them, and I wish to say that only a very small percentage of those men were apparently addicted to either drink or dope. They were not the down-and-out variety, but were honest working men, quite able, willing and anxious to work if they could. I watched the rate at which they worked and I found it was up to the average. I must say that they worked a good deal harder than I would have done for one dollar a day; the single man receives one dollar per day, and the married man two dollars.

Early in the month of January the city of Vancouver called an unemployment conference. That city invited a representative from the Dominion government, which did not send one and should have done so; it invited representatives from the province, who acted in a similar manner to the Dominion; it invited the British Columbia provincial members and all the Dominion members from the province of British Columbia. As a result one of the provincial members attended, and none of the federal members, except myself. I had three days' travel to get there and back, whereas many members who lived in the city of Vancouver or nearby did not attend; probably they did not have the time or interest to go and inquire into the industrial and unemployment conditions in their own locality. I venture to say they will find an abundance of time, however, during the next election campaign to come swarming into my constituency as they have done in the past in a method comparable only to the nine plagues in the time of the Pharaohs, seeking, of course, to coerce and bully the electorate, and to compel them to vote in such a way as to suit their peculiar points of view. I am glad to say my electors are free born, independent men and women, and not coerced so easily.

I may say, indeed, that the invasion has already begun. Last week a cabinet minister and a private member of the legislature took part in a nominating convention in my district, and the Hon. R. L. (Pat) Maitland was quoted as saying this:

> Speaking of Independent candidates, Mr. Maitland said that he had never met Mr. Neill. He must be a good man or he would not occupy his present position.

I have often had occasion to applaud remarks made by our Conservative friends, but I do not think I have ever done it with more sincerity than when I applaud that remark. I hope he will come again and bring his friends with him. If they follow the line this man took it will do me good, and if they take a different line it will do them harm.

At this conference on unemployment I was asked to say a few words, and I pointed out at that time what I thought were the underlying causes and possible remedies. I am glad to say since I have come to this house I learn from the remarks made by labour and other members that my views coincide a good deal with theirs. The suggested causes of unemployment which I gave were four: First, over-immigration; second, seasonal production and unregulated production; third, the mechanization of industry, which is even extending to farming now, and fourth, business depression. Possibly that last is more caused by unemployment, but there are cases in which financial panics, stock market crashes and the like, would affect employment.

The remedies which I suggested, in a simple way, were: First, with regard to immigration, my suggestion was to stop assisted immigration. That has been generally accepted by the country and I understand the government has put it more or less into effect, but I will go further and suggest that we stop all immigration for the present time. We have a precedent for that in New Zealand, which is very much in touch with the old country. I saw recently, on February 1, that Sir Joseph Ward, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, stated that he has notified Great Britain that owing to the number of unemployed in New Zealand his government would not be able to accept any of Great Britain's surplus population. If that is good for New Zealand probably it would be good for us, for a short time at least.

Then I would suggest that the Dominion government, the provincial governments and the municipalities take active steps so to arrange their programs of expenditure—because they spend enormous sums of money in the aggregate—as to make the work begin earlier in the spring and continue until later in the fall. Certainly that would help a great deal in keeping down the peak of employment, and would result in a smaller number being unemployed in the winter time. Then again I think industry should be encouraged by the government, and perhaps by the provinces as well, to aid in doing away with rush periods. I am not familiar with the boot and shoe business, but I am told that there is a period, three or four months in length and occurring twice a year, in which the peak production is reached, after which there is a slack time. Probably that could be overcome. There is an industry in the United States dealing with some foreign product which enters that country only about three months in the year. That formerly meant an enormous difference between the high and low levels of employment, something like 600 per cent. Now they are putting this product into cold storage for a while, and that has brought that difference down to normal. It is good business for them to make that change, because now they have permanent, steady workmen in their service. Things like that would cost nothing and would help industry, and the different branches of industry might be encouraged along that line by means of investigations by government officials or possibly by a commission appointed for that purpose. I can illustrate that point by referring again to the commission appointed by Governor Roosevelt of the state of New York, which has for its purpose the readjustment of industry to reduce seasonal unemployment.

Then we come to the question of the mechanization of industry. Of course it is obvious what that means. Production by machinery has gone ahead so fast that to-day one man can produce what it used to take ten, twenty, or thirty men to produce. Not only is that the case, but we have also constant new inventions. Hardly a month, and certainly not a year, goes by without comparatively large bodies of men not only being thrown out of work temporarily but finding their occupation entirely wiped out owing to the invention of some improved machinery. These are things we cannot avoid and could not stop. We would not stop them if we could; that would be going back to medieval times, like doing away with trains and so on, but we should take cognizance of it and take steps to remedy any grievance or any hardship which might result from this rapid increase in mechanization.

Now we come to the last remedy which I suggest both for these and for other conditions which I have outlined. I suppose it will be regarded as revolutionary, but my suggestion is that we should have a shorter working day. I was much surprised and pleased to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) state during the course of his remarks that there had been a petition signed by the mayor and council, on behalf of the citizens of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba, asking that the Dominion government take steps to shorten the working day. If a city council as large as that of Winnipeg, composed for the most part, not of working men but of business men, can take that line, surely it is worth at least considering, and it shows that such a movement possibly might be acceptable generally. I see that the Labour Statesman, of Vancouver, endorses the same idea and says:

> While the short-sighted employers of Canada desire an ever abundant supply of subsidized immigrants, so that they can continue to operate their industries with low-paid labour, from everywhere there is the cry for more markets to consume the products of the modern producing machine. What better way is there than to make this possible by a well-paid wage-earning class?

Certainly I can endorse that suggestion.

Now we come to the question of unemployment insurance, and I put that last because I realize that it is only a palliative, that it is only treating a symptom of the disease. It is like a doctor treating a man for a headache when he has a fever. It is all right to treat the symptom but at the same time you must get at the underlying trouble. Here I differ for the first time, I think, with my hon. friend for North Winnipeg. He says the Dominion can and should and must deal with the question, that it is our responsibility as members of this federal parliament. Well, the Scriptures say that if you have faith you may move mountains, but it does not say anything about faith moving the British North America Act. If I have enough 60 per cent dynamite I can remove the mountain without faith, but I can do nothing with the British North America Act. I may say that to-day is some other day in the month or year than the calendar shows it to be, but no amount of eloquence and no amount of belief on my part can change the cold fact that it is not that day. It is just the same with the British North America Act; no matter how much we may desire that the government should not be bound by that act, the fact remains that the government is bound, and we cannot evade that fact.

Let me quote an instance which comes from British Columbia. Ever since the time of confederation the government has proceeded on the theory that the fisheries were entirely under the jurisdiction of the Dominion. A case came up in police court; it was appealed and went on from court to court until finally it went to the privy council, where it was decided that a considerable proportion of the jurisdiction, that on land, belongs to the provinces. What is the condition? That does not suit the Dominion; it does not suit the provinces either and certainly it does not suit the industry, because it is a dual control which is undesirable, but what are we to do about it? We say it is wrong, that the Dominion should have complete control. I will agree with that. Some people think the provinces should have the entire responsibility, but they do not have it. That is the British North America Act, and that is an illustration that no matter how much we may desire to get away from that act, we cannot do so. Change it if you like; get together with the provinces and agree to amend it, but we cannot ignore it.

The hon. member spoke of old age pensions as an example of what this government could do. That is an entirely different thing. In connection with old age pensions we gave the provinces so much money and we did not propose to force the working man to pay a portion of his wages as would be the case if we had unemployment insurance. I need not go into that; it is obvious that one province could not successfully inaugurate an unemployment insurance scheme. I grant that the Dominion could and perhaps should assist; I do not know about that; they can assist if all the provinces are agreeable, but if all the provinces are agreeable you can do anything; you can change the British North America Act if you like.

Now I want to refer to the report with respect to unemployment insurance brought to the house last year by the committee on industrial and international relations. The committee recommended simply that the federal government be requested to bring the subject matter of the report before the next Dominion-provincial conference. I find that the Ottawa Journal of the next day has this to say, after commenting on the report:

> It is to be hoped that parliament and the government find a resting place for these recommendations in the most convenient waste basket. . . . . It is absolute nonsense. This country has no more need of unemployment insurance than it has need of polygamy.

I wonder what the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) thinks about that statement in his party organ. That was not published thirty or forty years ago; that was last year. It reminds me of an item which appeared in a newspaper many years ago with regard to a man who was trying to sell shares in a telephone company. The newspaper said he should be put in gaol, because everybody knew it was nonsense and even if it could be used there was no commercial value in it! Times change, however, and there has been a considerable feeling growing up throughout the country with regard to this question even in the last year. We find three large cities in Canada suggesting this same thing, and then we have the resolution referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) passed by this convention on unemployment held recently in Winnipeg. This convention was not composed of unemployed men, but rather of representatives of cities, men in business who were responsible for the financing and running of those cities. This convention passed a resolution which concluded as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that this conference endorses the principle of unemployment insurance, and urges the calling of an interprovincial and federal conference at the earliest possible date for the consideration of the adoption of a Dominion-wide scheme.

The mover of that resolution was an alderman from Fort William, not a working man in the sense of being unemployed, and the seconder was a representative of the Saskatchewan government. As I have pointed out already, that was not a council of idle men, it was a conference of business men seeking a solution for this problem.

I would like to emphasize that when we speak of unemployment insurance we do not mean the dole. The dole has been mixed up with unemployment insurance, much to the disadvantage of this insurance scheme. This insurance is similar to that carried on by fraternal societies, where the insured must have paid for thirteen weeks before he can collect anything and where he can draw only so much per year. The government of the day in Great Britain, perhaps owing to some pressure of politics, or I believe some strike, put down the bars and extended the benefits. The result was not an insurance, it was a payment to all and sundry who asked for it.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not a fact that in Great Britain the employees have to subscribe to the fund when they are in employment?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but under the extended system they were released from having to make any payments before getting relief. Beginning, I think, on May 1, they are going back to the old system. It will then pay its way, as it did before they introduced the extended system known as the dole. The trades and labour council has gone on record as being in favour of this scheme. I will not detain the house by reading their resolution, but they are in favour of the workmen paying at least one-third of the cost, and the scheme being put on an actuarial basis.

I believe that public sentiment is veering towards this proposed scheme. When a city the size of Vancouver is forced to pay more than a quarter of a million dollars annually for relief, is it any wonder that they are interested in a reasonable system of unemployment insurance. The question of cost is always a vital one. The suggestion is that a third is to be paid by the men, a third by the employers, and a third by the state, although it is not stated whether that is dominion or provincial, or whether that third will be split half and half. But in the consideration of this phase of cost we should not overlook the concealed cost.

Unfortunately, unemployment is progressive. Every man who is out of employment is forced to butt into the other man's job, and that throws him out. Then presently he and his family have lost their purchasing power, and that in turn throws more men out of employment. A considerable loss is brought about by deterioration. Six weeks' idleness makes a man a potential hobo; six months' idleness makes him a potential criminal. In the early nineties I had an experience in the city of Vancouver somewhat along that line. I was very hard up, and could not get work, although I had not reached the point of actual destitution, but I could not help but notice the rapid mental degeneration of other men in like circumstances. The idle rich can find something with which to employ themselves, but the idle poor has nothing to do. A man in such circumstances deteriorates mentally and physically at a most remarkable and rapid gait. Three years ago I was in the House of Commons in London and I heard a man who is now a member of the cabinet make the statement that the gap between unemployed and unemployable was very narrow, and that the gap between unemployable and criminal was narrower still. A man will steal before he will see his children starve, at least I know I would. Think what is involved in that. We are forced to pay the costs of an army of police, courts, magistrates, judges, jails and such things. Statisticians tell us that after a man has been in jail three times he rarely comes back; he is a criminal for the rest of his life, and has to be kept by the people. If he has been in jail twice, he has some hope, and that hope is increased where he has had but one jail sentence. A certain percentage of the men sent to jail for petty stealing into which they are forced by these conditions will never get back to normal life. Then there is the price of ill health to be paid. Statisticians tell us that preventable ill health costs more than all the wars in the world. Wars occur only occasionally, but this thing is going on all the time. There is a lack of proper sanitation, a lack of proper food and clothing; all these things tell upon the population. There are the mental, moral and physical weaklings caused by such conditions, who in turn breed further generations of weaklings.

Unemployment insurance is insurance not only against unemployment but against something else—it is insurance against sovietism. I do not say that the working man of Canada would go to that extreme, he has too much sense, but we must be prepared to meet the political upheaval which might follow a continuance of such conditions. How can we assume that a starving man or woman will reason with the precision of a university professor? Can we blame them for acts committed when they are in a condition of helplessness and hopelessness. I do not know of two more damnable conditions in which the human mind can be than those of absolute hopelessness and absolute helplessness. Can we wonder that men in such a state of mind will hit out against the system under which they are suffering and under which they do not receive a fair deal?

Deducting these costs from any monetary costs of establishing a system of unemployment insurance leaves a very small debit, if any, to be considered. The question is not that we cannot afford to do it, but that we cannot afford not to do it. It is our duty as would-be statesmen working for the people to do everything possible to not only check this continual unemployment but to relieve any occasional unemployment which may still occur.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Neill) will not adjudge me guilty of any lack of courtesy if I do not attempt to follow his remarks. I do not do so for the reason that the hon. member, like myself, is a private member, and the responsibility for this matter rests upon the government. I would refer to the speech of the man to whom the labouring people of Canada have looked during this debate, namely the man in control of the Labour department, the Minister of Labour (Mr.

Heenan). Before I make any comments upon his remarks, may I offer him perhaps what is a unique form of congratulation? I have to congratulate him for delivering in this House of Commons what in my judgment was certainly one of the longest, one of the most illogical, one of the most inelegantly expressed, and one of the most hopelessly mixed speeches ever inflicted upon any parliament of Canada. Out of this Gratiano performance of the Minister of Labour, I shall attempt to extract some little common sense. I use that character as an example, because when Shakespeare delineated the character of Gratiano in the Merchant of Venice there must have passed through the prophetic mind of the great poet a performance such as we had yesterday from the Minister of Labour. Certainly the minister spoke an infinite deal of nothing; his reasons were as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them, they are not worth the search.

Out of this welter of illogical conclusions and grammatical errors I have tried to extract a little common sense. I have found this: the hon gentleman told us in his speech that he had conceived a permanent plan to solve unemployment in Canada; he had conceived that within the fathomless—I had almost said abyss, but I will say recesses—of his mighty mind. It has not been given to the people of Canada yet. I could very well conjure up the sleepless nights and laborious hours that the hon. gentleman consumed in evolving the plan within his mind. I could very well understand the amount of mental energy that was consumed in the process that he described. But after telling us that he had devoted all this time to forming some plan to deal with unemployment in this country, he wasted two hours of the time of the house in reading extracts trying to prove that there was no unemployment to which the great plan that he had endeavoured to evolve could be applied. I mention this just to indicate one of the choice illogical titbits from the clumsy and spavined intellectual performance of my hon. friend.

Ah, but there is, in the speech of my hon. friend, another point, if I may so designate it to which I should like to refer. Not, mark you, saying what he said in London; not saying what he will say in the back concessions when he is let loose from parliament, he said that the time was not yet ripe for unemployment insurance. Why? Because, he says, the people of this country have to be educated; it is advanced social legislation and the working people have to be educated before we can introduce unemployment insurance. Whence must their education come? We would naturally suppose it would come from the man who presides over the destinies of the Labour department for the whole of Canada. If that be the fountain head, the source whence education on this problem of unemployment insurance must come, all I have to say to the unemployed, to the organized labouring people of Canada is this: The Minister of Labour is the source whence education on unemployment insurance must come: read his speech and then weep for yourselves, for your children and for unemployment insurance.

But there might be some point in having public opinion in Canada crystallized along the line of unemployment insurance. If there be any need for education along this line, the party that now holds power has had ample opportunity in which to provide it. I read over the platform on which the Prime Minister attained his position as leader of the Liberal party, on which he succeeded in getting the votes of the electorate, and I find that in that platform was a commission for unemployment insurance. That was in 1919, eleven years ago. What did the Prime Minister have to say about it this afternoon? Did he come out and say, as I suppose he would say when he accepted nomination as leader of the party, that he would do something? In all the ramblings of the Prime Minister this afternoon you cannot find a single definite, positive statement, that he is going to do anything in regard to the question of unemployment insurance. Yet he was able, supporting unemployment insurance as one of the planks in his platform, to get the votes of the people of this country. Fortunate it is for the people, particularly for the unemployed, that he will never get those votes again! But if there be any education required in regard to the matter of unemployment insurance—and I want to submit this to the Minister of Labour that labour in Canada will not take kindly to that suggestion; for labour in Canada is just as advanced in the matter of social problems as labour in any other country in the world. They do not need any education, particularly from the Minister of Labour. He is not capable of giving any education to anybody. But eleven years have passed since the Prime Minister adopted this plank in the Liberal party and nothing has been done.

There is in the speech of the Minister of Labour another statement to which I might make a passing reference. He said that the present government should be given great credit for the fact that it is going to establish an eight-hour day on public works under government control. May I point this out? For two years the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), myself and others in the opposition have been demanding that this be done. Last year when the minister's estimates were before the house, we succeeded in getting a promise from him that he would at this session introduce a bill making provision for an eight-hour day on works controlled by the government of Canada, and also making provision for the payment of a living wage. When there was no sign of that bill being introduced in the early stages of this session, at the very first occasion on which the Minister of Public Works introduced his estimates, I took the matter up again and for over an hour discussed it in the house. Two weeks afterwards, when nothing was being done, members of the opposition, including myself, held up the estimates of the Minister of Public Works for two hours and a half until we succeeded in getting a definite promise that that legislation would be introduced at the present session. It is now being introduced, and one of the Toronto papers, I think it was the Toronto Star, supporting the present government, comes out with the statement that this legislation will mean $600,000 a year to the people of Canada. They follow this with the statement: "Hats off to Peter Heenan."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I hear some members faintly applauding. I hope they will applaud after I have concluded my statement. I might point out that the hon. gentleman to whom hats ought to be taken off has been Minister of Labour for four years. I think he assumed office in 1926; he should never have assumed it at all. If that legislation which he was forced by the opposition to bring into the house means $600,000 a year to labour in this country, this means simply that the hon. gentleman by his passivity and indifference to the cause of labour for four years has brought about a loss to labour amounting to $2,400,000, on account of his not having introduced that legislation four years ago. Let the Toronto Daily Star take account of that statement, and then let it give it out to the labour people of Canada and ask them to take their hats off to the Minister of Labour. So much for the rambling, rattling, illogical speech of the Minister of Labour.

In respect to the amendment which is before the house, there is no other question that could be considered by the parliament of Canada which is of greater importance than that of unemployment. Not only is this question serious to those men—and there are to-day thousands of them in Canada—who stand idle, who are without work, whose wives and children as a consequence are without bread, but it is a matter of very great consequence and concern to the whole of society. Society has been compared by sociologists to the human body. Just as the human body is made of different members, so too is society. Individuals are the members of society. Where, in the case of the human body, its members are functioning properly, you have a healthy physical organism. Where one or two members may not be functioning properly, you have a diseased organism. So too, in the case of society. Where you have hundreds of thousands unemployed—and there are over a hundred thousand unemployed in Canada to-day, although the Minister of Labour evidently does not know anything about it—where you have that vast number without work and their dependents starving, you have a situation that affects not only the individuals immediately concerned but the whole of society.

Now I come to the argument of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is this, that unemployment should be a question first for the individual; secondly, for the family; then for the municipality; then for the province; and then, I suppose, as a natural consequence, because he could not escape responsibility any further, it becomes a matter for the Dominion government. Speaking on the address in this house the Prime Minister said that unemployment was first a question for the individual, and then for the family. I do not think that I ever listened to a more absurd statement falling from the lips of any public man. What did he mean when he said that? There is only one conclusion, and that is that he meant that unemployment was a question to be solved by the individual who is unemployed. In other words, he propounds to the unemployed people of Canada this choice morsel of sophistry, that unemployment should be the problem of the unemployed and should be paid for by them. If there was any sense at all in his remarks, that is the only sense that I could extract from them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does my hon. friend find my statement in that regard?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: At page 38 of Hansard, in the Prime Minister's speech on the address. My right hon. friend does not get me on that kind of thing; I come armed with the reference. Just look it up. I wish to say to the right hon. gentleman that I entirely disagree with him when he says that the first body that is responsible in this matter is the municipality, and then the province.

Let us see why it was that men formed themselves into societies. We have, first, the society which we call the home, where members are drawn together by propinquity and ties of blood. Later they join together in municipalities, and then in provinces, and then, in the case of this country, the provinces joined together in one dominion. Why did they do that? They did it for the purpose of securing for the individual citizen greater security and protection. There is no question about that; it is the only reason for the formation of the Canadian confederation. That is the only reason why the provinces joined together in order to form this great dominion. They did it because they wanted to be sure that in times of stress and need, when the individual was in difficult straits, they would have a powerful social organization behind them to help them out.

But there is another consideration. I wish to point out to this house that when this dominion was formed, the various provincial governments gave up to this central power, this power which is supposed above all others to protect them, the majority of their sources of taxation. The provinces retain only the sources of direct taxation, and even those sources, I submit, have been invaded by the present government and by previous federal governments. I mention the income tax as an illustration. We must in discussing these problems extract some canon of social justice. What is the canon that must be extracted here? The canon in the application of matters of this kind is that the strongest back shall bear the heaviest burden. Whose back is the strongest as between the federal provincial and municipal bodies? In 1867, when this dominion was formed, Ontario—I might take any other province—was receiving a revenue from duties amounting to only $2,000,000. In 1929, the government over which the right hon. Prime Minister presides took from the people of the province of Ontario in duties, $103,000,000. And so with the other provinces. The federal government has invaded the provincial sources of revenue. The federal government is capable of dealing with situations such as unemployment throughout the country, and from the very organization of society it is absolutely logical and absolutely just that the federal government should deal with a situation such as unemployment.

We have had a lot of loose talk in this house about the British North America Act and about the powers of the provincial and federal governments. I want to ask this question of the Prime Minister. Perhaps he may not answer me at all; I do not suppose he will. Is there anything in the British North America Act to prevent this government giving assistance to the provinces to help relieve unemployment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nothing that I know of.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Then why don't you do it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because we have other uses for our money, other obligations.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: There is, then, nothing in the British North America Act to prevent this government from giving assistance to relieve unemployment in this country. There is nothing in the British North America Act to prevent the provinces from receiving that assistance. We are faced with the problem of unemployment. It is here. We have people starving in this country. What are we going to give them? Are we going to give them what the Prime Minister tried to give them this afternoon? I do not wish to detract at all from the literary and economic efforts of my right hon. friend. I may say that before I ever came to this parliament I had read thrice the book from which he quoted this afternoon. To my mind it was excellent. It did credit to the right hon. gentleman who occupies the exalted position of Prime Minister. In some respects it has distinct literary merits. But though it is a good book to read, extracts from it are very poor feeding for the unemployed people of Canada. In the Scriptures we read of people who were crying for bread and were offered a stone. Well, the right hon. Prime Minister is not quite that bad. But what do the unemployed get from the Prime Minister when they send a delegation here composed of representatives from all over the country? And, Mr. Speaker, that to my mind is the most humiliating spectacle the people of Canada have ever had to witness—men in this great, young, rich country to have to come here to beg for bread! What did they get from the right hon. Prime Minister? They got ringing, jingling, platitudinous sentences from Industry and Humanity, and they are supposed to go back satisfied with that treatment. He had to admit to-night that there is nothing in the constitution to prevent him giving aid to the people whose wives and little children are starving—absolutely nothing: yes, he admitted it publicly.

Now, I say to the right hon. Prime Minister in days that have gone he had occasion to go up and down this country on a political mission, and I remember some of the phrases —he is a coiner of striking phrases—I remember some of the phrases he used in connection with a certain matter, and particularly one that he repeated in almost every address he delivered in every province. He said: "The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life." To-day when the unemployed come to him for relief, he reads extract after extract, couched in beautifully-worded platitudinous language, from Industry and Humanity and in effect says to them: Take that; it should be sufficient for you. I repeat to him to-night: The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life. There is no man in this country to-day, sir, that can truthfully say there is any constitutional reason why assistance should not be given to the 14,000 unemployed people in the city of Winnipeg, why it should not be given to the men who have to depend on soup kitchens in Toronto and Montreal, —

Mr. CANNON: There are no soup kitchens in Montreal.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: There are hundreds.

Mr. CANNON: No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I will permit a question.

Mr. CANNON: There is no such thing in Quebec.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: At the present time in the city of Montreal there are 1,800 male adults being fed at soup kitchens.

Mr. CANNON: No; you do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. LACOMBE: Were you in Montreal last week?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I did not have to be in Montreal last week to know that.

Mr. CANNON: You had better go and see.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I was there yesterday. There are 1,800 people a day fed at soup kitchens.

Mr. CANNON: No.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is lamentable, Mr. Speaker, that people do not know the economic conditions even in their own province.

Mr. LACOMBE: Do you know Sir Hugh Allan?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Are you asking a question or making a speech?

Mr. LACOMBE: Do you know Sir Hugh Allan?

An hon. MEMBER: He is a dead one.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I want to get this clearly before the house—

Mr. LACOMBE: We want some figures concerning—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, we want some figures concerning Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, we want some figures concerning Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: There are two points I want to get before the house. The first is, there is nothing in the constitution that prevents the right hon. Prime Minister and his government from giving assistance to men who are unemployed in this country. No amount of sophistry, no amount of reading of platitudinous extracts from Industry and Humanity can disguise the fact. This afternoon the Prime Minister made a statement, and although I have a great admiration for him, honestly I think it was unworthy the position he occupies at the moment. He stated that he would not contribute to assist unemployment in the provinces where the governments are not Liberal. But, Mr. Speaker, this question is one that transcends party politics. My right hon. friend after reading those very beautiful extracts from Industry and Humanity, with all the idealism which he had conjured up during his residence in the United States, fell down to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell me when I ever resided in the United States?

An hon. MEMBER: During the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I tell my hon. friend he is entirely wrong. I have never had a residence anywhere except in Canada at any time.

An hon. MEMBER: You lived there. They could not conscript you in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shut up.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not know what my right hon. friend means by the interruption. He may not have had a home in the United States, but at least he was there on a certain occasion. In this book which is so beautifully phrased, Industry and Humanity, and in which he expresses such high ideals, he tells us what he was prepared to do for labour in this country, and having quoted extract after extract, five minutes afterwards he says in effect—and I think it was the most disgraceful statement I ever listened to in this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: All right, I will change the adjective and say the most humiliating spectacle I ever saw, and the most humiliating pronouncement that I ever heard in this house—he said in effect: that although women and children were starving in this country he would not contribute out of the abundant revenues of this Dominion five cents to keep them alive, if the government of the province in which they were starving happened to be politically different from the right hon. gentleman. I think he had better write an appendix to Industry and Humanity after making that statement.

Well now, with all this cant, with all this drivel about constitutional objections, I want to say to my right hon. friend to-night, first of all, there is nothing in the constitution that will prevent him from helping the unemployed, to save them from starving; and certainly there is nothing in the constitution to prevent the provinces from receiving grants from this government for that purpose. But I want to add, he has a responsibility in this connection, for the simple reason that the unemployment existing in the Dominion to-day, and it is very general, exists because of the failure of the government over which he presides. Nationally considered, there are four factors in the matter of national productivity; they are, first, land—I use the term in its economic sense to include not only the surface of the earth, but all the resources with which we have been endowed by Providence; second, labour; third, capital, in the sense of capital goods; fourth, the managerial ability which must come from the government that controls the destiny of the state.

Now, let us see if in respect to any or all of these factors they have fallen down. Can anyone say we have unemployment because our natural resources are not sufficient to provide a good living for our sparse population?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Hon. gentlemen say "no". I am glad to hear that. Undoubtedly to-day we have illimitable opportunities for the production of wealth, we have potential wealth of farm, forest, sea and mine. We should be able to provide a good living in this country not only for ten million people but for one hundred million people, and we could do so if we had a proper government. Consequently I say to this house to-night that the first factor to be considered in the matter of national competition has not fallen down. We cannot blame Providence for stinting in the matter of bestowing natural resources upon this great young country.

Let us take the second factor, that of labour. Does any man in this house, whether he be Grit, Tory or Progressive, mean to tell me that the men who stand idle to-day, the men to whom the Prime Minister directed his platitudes in his sentences from Industry and Humanity this afternoon, do so because it is a pleasure to them to be idle? Do they desire to see their wives and little children starving? On behalf of the labourers of this country I want to say that all they want is the opportunity to work at fair wages. Consequently, the second factor in national productive enterprise has not fallen down.

Thirdly, we come to the factor of capital. With our great natural resources there should be no difficulty whatever, were it not for the unwise fiscal policy of this government, to get all the capital we want in order to develop the abundant natural resources with which we have been endowed by a bountiful Providence. There is no reason why we should not have all the capital we want.

If the first three factors have not fallen down, what has fallen down? I will tell you. The thing that has fallen down is the directive force which those factors must and should receive from the right hon. Prime Minister and those hon. members who are associated with him. There can be no doubt about that. How can we expect to have anything but unemployment in this country when we have promulgated and supported by this government policy which is not Canadian but one under which raw materials of Canada are shipped, formed and fashioned in American mills and factories, by American workmen? What can we expect in Canada, other than unemployment, when the only solicitude that this government is capable of providing is to fill the factories with American workmen? I am not speaking too strongly on this subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No, I am not speaking too strongly; I am speaking very fairly, and if any evidence is needed to prove that statement it can be readily found in the trade returns between this country and the United States of America. During the last year we brought in from the United States over $900,000,000 worth of goods. We had an unfavourable trade balance with our great southern neighbour of $347,000,000. Seventy-five per cent of those goods could have been produced in Canada by Canadian workmen, and if they had been produced here we could have given employment to 500,000 Canadian people. We have in this country to-day about 100,000 unemployed. Not only is it necessary that we should have a wise fiscal policy, but if the right hon. gentleman who tells us he never resided in the United States would think a little more in terms of Canada than in terms of the American republic, we would have our people working. It would affect not only the 100,000 people who are now fed in the soup kitchens of this country, to the great disgrace not of Canada but of the Canadian government, but it would affect also 400,000 other Canadians who are endeavouring to find employment in this country.

The other day my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) stated that there is coming into this country each day $1,000,000 worth of steel and steel products. Eighty per cent of those products could be manufactured in Canadian steel mills; why are they not manufactured here? The reason is that we have a government in Canada that is legislating not so much in the interests of Canada as in the interests of the republic to the south. It is time for someone in Canada to speak up about this condition. When you speak about it, however, you are hushed by the Prime Minister. He will tell us that we must not provoke the United States, even to the extent of giving up the livelihood of Canadian men and women. I admire the great republic to the south, and I seek no ground to disagree with them. I say, however, that when young men in public life in this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I had almost completed my remarks.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I wish to read once again the amendment which is before the house. Although it has been read by several hon. members, I wish to make special reference to the inference drawn by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), namely, that the amendment necessarily involves a large expenditure of money. It is quite clear that the terms of the motion do not justify that inference. With that in mind I shall read it once more. It was moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland):

> That in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

There may be many ways of "dealing" with unemployment without expending public money. That is for the government to discover.

I have been amazed at the amount of heat which has developed in this discussion, and with few exceptions I have been amazed equally by the lack of light. I was surprised that the saintly, peace-loving Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) should have injected a note of antagonism in his reply to the argument of the hon. member for North Winnipeg. Certainly he did not hold true to his title of peacemaker when he opened this debate by baiting the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and by placing the whole discussion on a low, narrow partisan basis. I am interested in this question of unemployment because it is the most outstanding indication of the disintegration which is taking place in modern civilization. I am interested in it, moreover, from the point of view of a student; above all I am interested in it because of its human implications. Because of my interest in the matter from these points of view I deplore the attitude taken by hon. members in this discussion. Unquestionably there has been an effort on the part of some hon. gentlemen to extract political advantage from the tragic condition we have been trying to discuss. I should think the hon. members who have tried to do that have indicated that they are more skilled in political strategy than they are in economics. If hon. members of this house were to get their deserts for their failure to cope with the vital problem now before us I fear, Mr. Speaker, that very few of us would come back after the next election.

Mr. HANSON: "Speak for yourself, John."

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, I am speaking for myself also in this regard, for I must acknowledge, with other men who have been entrusted with public office, that the question of unemployment has represented so far the bankruptcy of statesmanship throughout the civilized world. If you will permit me to call myself a statesman of the bankruptcy type, I must line myself up with all the others and say: "We have failed to find a solution for the problem."

Catch phrases suitable for winning elections never have been noted for their achievements in settling matters of great economic importance. Our consumers' league across the way, with their fine phrases about free trade, find that the problem has escaped them; hon. gentlemen to my right, with their phrases about higher protection, are not touching the problem either. Even a greater party, in my opinion, than either of the two parties in this house, the Labour party of Great Britain, seems to have gone to seed also on the catchword of public ownership, thinking that would be a solution. Unfortunately, up to this point even that great government has not found much of a solution for unemployment.

I want to support the resolution, Mr. Speaker, because it deals with a question that confronts not only Canada but the entire civilized world to-day, a question which is ominous and one for which a solution must be found or civilization itself will succumb. Then I want to support also the suggestion of the hon. member who moved the resolution that, as a tentative thing, giving assistance to those who are suffering at the present time from the evils of unemployment, a system of unemployment insurance should be introduced. I agree that that is a tentative thing; it is temporary, something to be carried on until we have found a solution for the problem. While there is no better solution I agree that this should be done. In the absence of that better way, to which I have referred, I should say that unemployment insurance is an imperative need in Canada to-day, as it is in other countries.

Surely unemployment will be taken as a fact without any wealth of figures to demonstrate it. To argue in this house that there is such a thing as unemployment and to back up that argument with copious figures, seems to me analogous to an attempt to prove that the world is round, quoting once again the old arguments which support that view. I think unemployment is a fact as well established in the minds of the people of the country to-day as is the physical fact of the shape of the planet on which we live. It is a fact which bears with it some problems which are grim, ugly and ominous. Indeed, unemployment is no longer confined merely to the wage earners. Of course we always have had an unemployed rich class; they are still with us, only they are a little more fortunate than the other unemployed. They can live on interest, but the unemployed at the other end of the social order cannot live on nothing.

There are intellectual workers in the ranks of the unemployed. Our public school system with its easier access to institutions of secondary education is overstocking the market in the professional world. Lawyers, doctors and teachers, while they may not be actually lined up in the ranks of the unemployed, are finding it more and more difficult to get employment at fair remuneration in the work to which they have devoted their lives and their study. We also have industries unemployed, with millions of dollars' worth of machinery tied up, rusting, and doing nothing. There you have unemployment of a kind which will appeal to hon. members of this house.

As I say, unemployment is not confined to one class; it is becoming more and more not only an acute problem but one that is widespread. It is the most prominent symptom of a civilization which is in the process of disintegration. How far that disintegration will go, no one knows; whether intelligence will arrest this disintegration and gather together the decaying pieces remains yet to be seen. I think it was H. G. Wells who remarked in this connection that civilization was in a great race between intelligence and disaster. Judging from the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour I would be inclined to bet on disaster winning the race; if we are to depend upon the labour leader of this country; if his utterances may be taken as indicative of his views and his activity in this matter; if we are to take that as the leadership of Canada on a question of this kind, and if it requires intelligence to divert disaster, then disaster is absolutely certain. This is a condition which, more than anything else, attracts the attention of the student and creates deep apprehension on the part of all who wish to save modern civilization.

As my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) very ably pointed out, this situation is universal; it is not merely Canada which we are discussing when we talk about unemployment. Just for a moment I should like to refer very briefly to some figures. The London Daily Herald, which may be regarded as the mouthpiece of organized labour in Great Britain, estimates that to-day there are 30,000,000 unemployed in the civilized world, and that the crisis extends over the entire globe. There are about 6,000,000 unemployed in the United States; about 4,583,000 idle workers in Germany; approximately 1,000,000 unemployed in Japan, and several millions in Russia. So it goes on. As I say, it is a universal situation, and I do not see any reason why the Prime Minister should have become so angered and displeased to-day because in Canada we are facing a problem which every government in civilization must face and is facing with at least some degree of sincerity and intelligence.

I would go so far as to say that unemployment is inevitable under an economic system which depends upon machine production, profit and distribution through the wage system. Perhaps enough has been said to demonstrate the effects of modern machinery on this question of unemployment, but I will just add one or two little quotations to the point. I should like to read one short extract from an article which appeared in a recent issue of the New Republic:

As a result of labour's growing productivity, American manufacturers were able to get along with over 400,000 fewer men in 1927 than in 1923, and to reduce their wage bill by nearly $160,000,000. In the meantime, the value of factory output increased by over two billions. The consequence was that the wage bill dropped from 18.2 per cent to 17.3 per cent of the gross value of factory product.

One more quotation:

Still more important is the record of profits. Between 1923 and 1925, the profits of a group of 403 manufacturers and mining corporations increased 29 per cent. Between 1925 and 1928, the profits of a larger group (574 in all) increased 27 per cent, to a new high record. This makes a gain of nearly 64 per cent between 1923 and 1928. The National City bank reports that the earnings of 375 industrial corporations during the first quarter of 1929 were 37 per cent above the corresponding period in 1928. "Many concerns," says the bank in its July review of business, "have in six months made more profits than in the year 1928."

Surely this statement, which is not an isolated one, could be taken as evidence of the effect of machine production on unemployment.

One honourable statesman across the aisle has suggested that the unemployed should go back to the farms. It must be apparent to anyone who is studying this situation that industrialization of agriculture will have the same effect as has the industrialization of other branches of industry. Farmers by the use of machinery are enabled to produce more with half the labour necessary twenty years ago. I quote from Saturday Night, which should be authoritative to hon. gentlemen opposite, as follows:

During the past 20 years the farm population (of the United States) has decreased nearly 5,500,000. Figures of the bureau of agricultural economics show that the farm population of the United States in 1909 was 32,000,000. In 1929 this had decreased to 27,511,000. About 1,960,000 persons left the farms last year, 1,978,000 in 1927 and 2,155,000 in 1926.

Those who expect to settle the unemployment situation by settling people on the farm will have to face the fact of possible unemployed agriculturists. In fact, these men from the farms are flocking to the cities of Canada in hundreds and thousands, and are aggravating the problem which is already acute.

One of the factors to be considered as a cause of unemployment is the supplanting of men by machinery, the effects of which will be increased as time goes on. Another factor in our economic system which inevitably causes unemployment is known as the profit system. I am not speaking against that system, although I would do so readily if that were pertinent to the discussion.

My intention is to find out the effect of the profit system upon unemployment. Some other time I may extend my argument, but at present I desire only to show that the system under which we are operating, the profit system, makes unemployment inevitable. Why? Because the price of all manufactured goods includes not only all the overhead expense involved in manufacturing, but, as well, a little more than the amount expended, otherwise there can be no profit. Will any hon. gentleman in this house tell me where that "little more" is to come from? Will any hon. gentleman say that there is available as purchasing power among the masses of the people any other money than that which has been distributed in the processes of production? Since in order to realize a profit a manufactured article must be sold for more money than was expended in its production, the result must be that less goods are sold than were actually produced. That is to say, there must inevitably remain a surplus of goods at the end of every producing year. Those goods are placed upon the shelves in our warehouses; next year additional goods are added, and by manufacturers, who of course cannot afford to manufacture goods for pleasure, are forced to discharge their man and again by that act the purchasing power of the country is further reduced. This state of affairs progresses until we reach the very bottom of what we call the period of depression.

The first factor in our system which tends to create unemployment is the supplanting of human power by mechanical power. The second is the profit system, whereby goods manufactured must be sold for a price greater than the amount of money distributed in their manufacture. Therefore, the total goods manufactured cannot be purchased, which leaves a surplus, and that surplus continually piling up ultimately means unemployment.

Let us look at the third factor, distribution through the wage system. No matter how much we are able to produce, we can distribute only to the extent of the purchasing power of the masses of the people. This is a very interesting study, but I do not think I would be thanked by hon. members of the house if I were to consume the remainder of my forty minutes in a discussion of this factor. For the benefit of those hon. gentlemen who may not have thought it worth while to study a question of this kind, I think I should indicate certain works which they could look up for themselves. I would recommend to those hon. gentlemen that they should read what Keynes has to say, and what the Hon. Reginald McKenna has to say. They should read the works of Major Douglas, and those of Maurice Colborne, who gave a performance last week in the city. They should read Arthur Kitson, and Warren Edwin Brokaw. They should read Wells, Shaw, Vowles, Cousins, Wakinshaw and Professor Soddy. Those gentlemen are well able to set forth the principles of what we call the new economics to the full satisfaction of hon. gentlemen who perhaps would not thank me for spending my time in outlining to them those principles.

But perhaps I should expound the point I am dealing with, namely the distribution through the wage system. In the price of an article there is included items which we might designate as A, B, C and D, that is, wages, profits, overhead, replacement of plant, price of raw material, and so forth. Those items of cost must be included in the selling price of an article; therefore, although we may say that the price represents A, B, C and D, the only thing we have with which to buy it is A, and A cannot possibly purchase A plus B, plus C, plus D. There you have the algebra, if you like of this problem.

I would suggest that before a solution can be found for this problem, there must be developed a new aim for industry itself We have to come to the conclusion that merely to find work will not longer be regarded as an intelligent basis of subsistance. It is surely positively ridiculous for us to say that the man who does not work cannot live, when there is not any work for the man to do. Why not hang him at once and be done with it? Why let him have three weeks of misery and hell of mind and body on account of his family when we could get rid of him in an electric chair? Why not be sensible about the matter if that is the only cure hon. gentlemen have for unemployment? If hon. gentlemen are Christian, the electric chair is more Christian than unemployment; it would certainly be much more humane to do that than to do nothing.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does a doctor kill the man that he cannot cure?

Mr. IRVINE: I wish we had some doctor for my hon. friend. I am quite certain he could not cure him and I would not say a word if he did the other thing. In regard to the curse which fell upon mankind, the curse of work, according to the Book which my hon. friend over there follows, the situation has been reversed and now everybody wants to be cursed. everybody wants work. To-day the man who is really cursed is the man who cannot get work. If I had time I should like to tell hon. members I do not want work and I do not want anybody else to work, but until we find a better way of distributing what machinery can produce, I suppose we shall have to stay with the outworn system. If, however, we are going to stay with it we must organize our industrial pursuits and regulate hours of labour so that every man will have an equal opportunity. We must also stabilize wages on a living basis and not pay men for two hours instead of eight hours when there is not eight hours' work for everybody. That is such an elementary proposition, one would expect even a consumers' league to understand it, and yet they do not. It is surely uneconomic to produce goods which are not consumed. Such a condition is of course the defeat of economics, and yet that is what we are doing in Canada and in every other country, namely, producing goods which cannot be consumed because we have not discovered how to get them to the consumers.

I think it is true that the greater the surplus of production, the greater will be the unemployment. In that respect I believe the Prime Minister will have to accept responsibility for unemployment, for he has proved, or tried to prove to us, that last year was the greatest year in production that Canada had ever seen: it was unprecedented. I forget all the adjectives which the Prime Minister called to his assistance to express this tremendous output which characterized the industrial life of Canada last year. If he would just study the problem he would find that this is the very reason why unemployment is greater than it ever was before, because production being so great and there being no market for it, the men are thrown out of employment. The shelves are all filled up with goods, but there is nobody to buy them and nothing to buy them with. So the Prime Minister is probably right when he says that last year we produced more than we did in any previous year and so we have more unemployment now than we had at any other time.

The government is surely not going to try to escape entirely from its responsibility in these matters. To begin with, the government is certainly responsible for the administration of finance. It is responsible, as one hon. gentleman in debate to-night pointed out, for the management of our railway system. It is responsible for the expenditure of money, hundreds of millions of dollars of public money on all kinds of undertakings. It is, or at least it has been up to the present time, responsible for the immigration policy of this country. All these things have a direct bearing upon unemployment, and surely the government is not going to sit here and authorize the bringing in of thousands of immigrants to swell the already over-swollen volume of unemployment, to administer finance without regard to its economic significance, and to get away from the direct responsibility which any self-respecting government ought to be anxious to assume. Refusal by word of mouth to accept responsibility will not be sufficient to enable my hon. friends to escape from it, because responsibility has a way of sticking closer than a brother. The government, as I say, is trying to deny its share of the responsibility. We ought to follow for a moment the idea about greater production and its corollary of unemployment. I notice that the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and the Prime Minister were both deeply concerned about the farmer in this proposition; indeed, they were solicitous for him. The Prime Minister went even so far as to ask: When did a deputation of agriculturists come to the government and ask for assistance to the unemployed? Since when, for instance, has the Prime Minister been interested in deputations of agriculturists? Did they ever come to him and ask him to increase tariffs against them? I do not think they did, but he did not hesitate to increase them, and he did not hesitate to fail to reduce them. So I am rather surprised that he, having disregarded the farmers before, should now take such an interest in them.

But let me point out that this question of purchasing power which underlies unemployment is the real problem of agriculture as well as of labour. Do hon. members realize that while we had a comparatively small crop last year, nevertheless we could not sell it to advantage nor have we been able to do so as yet, and while we were in the position that we could not get rid of our wheat, millions of people in China were actually starving, unable to get our wheat? There you have internationally the same problem that we have nationally in respect to unemployment. It is a question of money. Moreover we shall have to get the idea that industry is a human proposition. That is, every industry shall be measured, not by its output, not by the size of the payroll, but in terms of the human element which it has turned out. Has our producing system actually produced greater, nobler, wiser and happier men and women? That is the measuring standard I would expect the Prime Minister who wrote Industry and Humanity to use, when considering the problem which we are now discussing. We must have a new function for finance also. It would be interesting, if I had time, to deal with who creates the money, especially when we realize how important the creation of money is to the distribution of goods.

Mr. GEARY: Tell us privately.

Mr. IRVINE: I will tell my hon. friend publicly. He will agree with me that there is much more money in circulation in Canada to-day than there was fifty years ago. Where did it come from? Who is the manufacturer of money? Do hon. gentlemen think it snows money? If any hon. gentleman or any gentleman anywhere is entrusted with making money, how do we know he has made enough or too much of it? In any case, who has charge of the matter? Let me give a quotation from Major C. H. Douglas who, in an address on "Where money comes from" before the International Engineering Congress at Tokyo, said:

> It is astonishing, when we consider the importance to every one of us of money in our daily life, that most people have no conception of where money comes from beyond a hazy idea that a certain amount of it is dug out of the ground in the form of gold, silver and copper, and the rest of it is printed and issued through a government department. But as a matter of fact money in this form only bears a very trivial relation to the amount of available purchasing power, insufficient as the latter has been stated to be. The total amount of money in circulation, in the form of gold, silver, copper and paper coinage is, in Great Britain, only about .7 of one per cent of the total amount of bank clearings, or less than 10 per cent of bank deposits, available to be drawn or for purchasing purposes. Money is created by banks in the form of bank credits.

Perhaps we would go a long way towards solving the unemployment problem if we studied the question; who issues the purchasing power which is available to the people of Canada with which to buy goods? There are numerous other quotations that I should like to give, but my time is flying.

There is another statement that I wish to make, and that is that credit control is a very important factor in the prevention of unemployment, or at least in the problem that lies behind unemployment.

Someone has mentioned France in this debate. I would mention France first, of course, for the reason that it has no unemployment. But there are two reasons at least why France has no unemployment. First of all, France has had a stationary population for a great many years. The second reason is that France did not deflate and go back to the gold basis after the war. Hon. gentlemen here who were so anxious to rush back to the gold basis, not knowing what they were doing, are now reaping some of the fruits of their stupidity. Some hon. gentleman says that we are not on a gold basis now. That does not worry me. We ought to be forced back to it so that hon. gentlemen would realize fully the result of such a policy. France did not do that, and to-day, according to this morning's Ottawa Citizen, the French franc is worth 4 cents where it used to be worth 20 cents in international exchange, and the Belgian franc is worth still less. But the French and Belgian people have been kept employed. Purchasing power has been maintained at least sufficiently to keep the wheels of industry running steadily. So hon. gentlemen who quote France as having no unemployment had better examine all the factors before rushing to conclusions that such is due to her tariff policy.

Poverty, which results from unemployment, is preventable. Unemployment is the secondary cause of poverty. Poverty itself is preventable. We have the equipment, we have the resources, we have the intelligence, and we have the skill. There used to be a time when it was said that tuberculosis was not preventable, but the doctors got busy and now it is preventable. To-day it is said that cancer is incurable, but the doctors are now working on that. They do not deny their responsibility. Some day they will be successful in finding a cure. Unemployment, I say, is the chief secondary cause of poverty. Our government denies its responsibility and refuses even to work on the proposition. I want to ask that the government reconsider the position that has been taken by the Prime Minister, and give relief in this unemployment situation, if it is necessary. I do not know whether it is necessary now or not, but we ought to find out. Let the government give a lead and go as far as it can constitutionally to organize a system of unemployment insurance. If after that the provinces do not follow in the manner presented by the constitution we will know where the blame is to be placed. Let a permanent commission be appointed to study this problem until a solution is found.

I want to say something about the Prime Minister's speech. He was very definite about what he cannot do and what he will not do, but very hazy about what we think he ought to do. I think he is obligated to making a an attempt to solve the problem, and we are not going to be satisfied with his old constitutional argument. He says that he does not want to take the taxpayers' money to be expended perhaps in some isolated community in the west or in the east as the case might be. Let me read the admirable words of the right hon. gentleman when he was speaking in this house in 1926, when the old age pension legislation went through. Someone took the objection that such legislation was ultra vires of this parliament, and the Prime Minister said:

> In that regard may I say that as between the different provinces I fail to see where there is any distinction to be drawn between the money voted by this parliament, say for the purposes of immigration, which may go to place a man or woman in any one of the provinces, and money voted for preserving the individual, no matter in what part of the Dominion he may be found. Human beings are the greatest of the resources of the country. What we are here considering is human life. An individual, no matter which province he is in, is an asset to the Dominion as a whole, and it is from that point of view that the Dominion is, I think, considering this matter.

If an old gentleman of seventy years of age is an asset to Canada, surely a young man of seventeen or twenty or twenty-seven is an even greater asset; and the very same logic which the Prime Minister applies to old age pensions must be applied to the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg. The Prime Minister says that he has had no requests from the provinces for assistance. For obvious reasons. In the first place, they know that it would be useless. In the second place, the provincial premiers do not wish to put themselves into the position of advising the Prime Minister as to his duty and responsibility in regard to this matter, so naturally they may have been a little reticent in this regard.

I am sorry that the Prime Minister felt called upon to state that he would not give five cents of the money from the public treasury of this Dominion to a Tory provincial government anywhere. I will not say much about that because I feel sure that the Prime Minister was not quite himself when he said it. I mean to say that he is usually so courteous and generous in debate, but to-day he was angry and said things that I feel sure he himself will be sorry for. I do not think that that is the practice of the Prime Minister. I think he is bigger than that.

The Prime Minister went on to place the blame on the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada for his having failed to call an economic conference. If that is true the congress will have to answer to organized labour.

I shall conclude my references to the Prime Minister's speech by recalling his remarks in connection with the argument of my hon. friend from Bow River. The Prime Minister indicated in his closing remarks that the attitude of the hon. member for Bow River was that everything that could be known about this subject was known already, and therefore there was no need to appoint any commission to investigate. I think that the shafts of the right hon. gentleman's sarcarsm went very wide the mark. If he will examine the speech of the hon. member for Bow River, he will find that the hon. member was merely asking for an economic commission to find a solution for the problem. That is where I think the Prime Minister missed the point.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): The subject brought up by the amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) is one in which I am deeply interested. I have the honour to represent a county that is entirely industrial, being comprised largely of coal miners and steel workers. We have no leisured class in my county, and every man and woman in it is intensely interested in the question of unemployment. The amendment itself asks the house to declare that the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment. It is probably in its terms a little narrow, but in the course of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon a very wide range of subjects has been covered. Possibly the amendment is so worded as to admit discussion not only on the question of unemployment but also on the causes and the cure, if a cure can be found. The discussion, as I have said, has taken a wide range. For the most part it has consisted of theories; we have heard various theories discussed by hon. members, ranging over distribution, consumption, finance, industry, capital—anything having the nearest or remotest relation to unemployment has been discussed. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in his quotation of a remark by Grover Cleveland, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. An ordinary person, if he were asked what is the cure for unemployment, would naturally say "work." It is far better to give a man work than to give him insurance against unemployment. And it is to that feature of the question that I intend to address most of my remarks.

We on this side of the house contend, rightly or wrongly, that the fiscal policy of the government is largely responsible for the unemployment in this country at the present time, and I propose to submit some facts in support of my contention. I listened to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) yesterday, and I may tell him frankly that I sympathize with him. I understand how difficult is his position. I know he felt that he had not been successful in getting his colleagues in the cabinet to see eye to eye with him in labour matters. I fully appreciate the difficulty he had in trying to defend the action of the government in regard to labour conditions. Not only do I sympathize with him, I appreciate the importance of his position, as I know he does. He speaks articulately for labour in this country, and in my opinion there is no portfolio more important, more fraught with good or evil towards a great body of our people than the portfolio he holds. I listened to his speech and I congratulate him on one aspect of it—it was probably as good a defence of his position and the position of the government as could be made; and although the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-day employed the same arguments that the Minister of Labour used yesterday, in my opinion he made no better defence.

I understood the Minister of Labour to rest his defence on three grounds. First—and in this possibly the Prime Minister went further than did the Minister of Labour; he said there was really no unemployment problem in this country at the present time. The Minister of Labour did not go that far; as a matter of fact he said he was not stating that there was no question of unemployment confronting us; he admitted there was. As I say, the Prime Minister went a little further. On the strength of not having received any word from the premiers of the various provinces, he boldly stated that unemployment did not prevail to any serious extent. In short, the Prime Minister made an election speech; but, I repeat, I do not think he made as good a defence of his government as did the Minister of Labour.

The second ground taken by the Minister of Labour was that unemployment was just as bad in other countries. He may be right. But he spent most of his time in dealing with totally irrelevant matters—the construction of the trans-Canada highway and questions of local interest that have absolutely nothing to do with unemployment. The impression we all received from the speeches of the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister is that the government is opposed to the idea of unemployment insurance. There is no question that the government is so opposed.

The third ground was that the Minister of Labour had ordered a great deal of work to be done, and had gone out of his way to ask the railways to provide employment. But unfortunately he did not go into particulars in that respect and show us how much work he had ordered and how much employment he had persuaded the railways to provide. I think the Minister of Labour made a mistake in trying to place responsibility on the Conservative party for something they had done in order to justify the stand he was taking. He quoted, in part, from an order in council for the purpose of showing that the Conservatives in days gone by had said that unemployment was a municipal question. But when he had to read the whole order in council, it threw a very different light on the question, and I think the minister would have been far better advised had he confined himself to a straight story of what he had done and what he proposed to do to meet the unemployment situation. Also, he was a little indefinite in defending the speech he made at London. That was a forward-looking speech for him to make. We all recognize that when a minister makes a public statement he binds his government, that is, if the government is guided by the usual constitutional principle of cabinet solidarity. We find now that the interpretation placed on his London speech was not justified by any action the government had taken or proposed to take. The Minister of Labour has put himself in a false position with regard to the labour of this country: he makes a stetement on a public platform as to what he intends to do and what the Prime Minister and the government will back him up in doing, and when he comes to the House of Commons and is questioned about it, the Prime Minister absolutely refuses to back him up, and takes a different ground altogether. With regard to unemployment, in my view there is only one cure, and that is work. Has this government been guilty of any act, either legislative or administrative, that has injured employment in Canada? After all, employment insurance is a good thing only under certain circumstances. We in Cape Breton would hold up both hands for it if we could get it. Every winter we are faced with this problem. During the summer months we ship our coal by water, but in the winter months, when water transportation is not available, the mines have to work on half or quarter time, and the men through no fault of their own have to be idle. They are willing and anxious to work, and would be quite content to enter into any scheme of contributory unemployment insurance.

The idea behind insurance is one of security. There are three things, of course, that the labouring man wants: first, fair wages; second, fair hours; third, security in his work. For the present we may dispense with consideration of the first two. It is the principle of security for the man disabled at work which underlies unemployment insurance. That principle was recommended to this government in the Mathers report away back in 1921. I am going to read from sections 35 and 36:

> 35. This is something which affects all wage earners, but more especially the casual labourer. He can never be sure just when his employment will terminate and he will be left without the means of subsistence.
> 36. Unemployment may arise from other causes than the loss of his job. He may be incapacitated by sickness, invalidity or old age. Very few labourers are able, out of their earnings, to make provision for these contingencies. We recommend to your government the question of making some provision by a system of state social insurance for those who through no fault of their own are unable to work, whether the inability arises from lack of opportunity, sickness, invalidity or old age. Such insurance would remove the spectre of fear which now haunts the wage earner and make him a more contented and better citizen.

In what way does the fiscal policy of this government affect the question of unemployment? Take, for instance, the item of coal. The coal mines are idle for perhaps five months of the year. We import in the vicinity of 13,000,000 tons of coal from the United States, and last year we sent them $54,000,000 of our money. We have ample coal in this country in the eastern and western sections to meet all domestic demands for that commodity. For three or four years those of us who come from coal-producing counties have been urging upon the government the desirability of inaugurating a national fuel policy. Instead of that, however, we find imports of coal from other countries increasing every year, and this year we have the additional news that 250,000 tons of coal from Soviet Russia will be brought into Canada. That is a serious matter for us, because such an importation will displace a certain amount of our coal. Three years ago I submitted to this government in my remarks on the budget a proposition by which a national fuel policy could be evolved. Instead of that the government contented itself with bringing down the bonus to coking plants bill. There never was, I suppose, in the history of all the legislation brought into this house a bigger piece of fake legislation than that coke ovens bill. It pretended to offer a subsidy for the creation of coke ovens in Canada. Three years have gone by and needless to say not a dollar has been granted under the bill, because nobody has applied for it. Nobody ever will apply for it so long as the policy of this country is to allow coke into Canada free of duty, and to give a rebate on coal brought in for the purpose of producing coke. We can supply all the coal that is needed; all we want is a sensible suggestion as to how we can solve this problem, because it is not beyond the power of man to do it. Two or three days ago I got a letter from my home town stating that 500 men had been laid off the steel works there because there was no work for them. Yet every day one million dollars' worth of iron and steel products is brought into this country. This government, since it came into power, has lowered the duty on fifty-five different items in the iron and steel schedule.

Is there any connection between the fiscal policy of the present government and unemployment in Canada to-day? Theories may be all right, but the moment you subject them to the acid test of practical business principles they go to the wind. While the Utopian theories and ideas of world revolution are all very fine and may come to pass centuries hence, the question for us at the present time is to deal with the immediate problems that face us. My submission is that until there is a different outlook on the part of the government things will be very little better so far as unemployment is concerned. I think it was the hon. member for Bow River who said he did not think the result was so very different whether we had protection or free trade. I may be a bit of a free trader myself, up to a certain limit; I believe in free trade in boots and shoes, hats and caps, clothing, furniture and flour, but I am not a free trader with regard to coal and steel. When it comes to coal and steel I want a duty, but I cannot get that duty unless I give the other fellow protection on hats, caps, boots, shoes, clothing and furniture, and I am willing to do that because I am satisfied that it is the only way I can get what I consider to be necessary.

Let me say just a word or two in regard to the constitutional question. If ever a smoke screen was thrown around a subject, it has been the case with regard to the invoking of the British North America Act in connection with this matter, and the statement that primarily it is one for the provinces or the municipalities to deal with. I say it is nothing of the kind. In 1864, when the British North America Act was being framed, the statesmen of that day who builded better than they knew could not foresee everything that was likely to happen. They did hand over something to the provinces and the provinces in turn handed it over to the municipalities, where we now have what is known as the Poor Relief Act. Under that act, which I assume is practically the same in nearly all the English speaking provinces, a man who has a settlement in a particular district and who is in need of support is entitled to get it from that district. If he has no settlement there but has a settlement in some other part of the province of Nova Scotia, he can be moved there where he will receive his support. If he has his settlement outside the province then the province has to take the responsibility of sending him to that outside district where he belongs. Beyond that the Dominion government must step in and deport the man if necessary, so the so-called constitutional aspect of this question is not a factor at all.

The question of unemployment is one which affects all the people of Canada, and we cannot take it away from this government by handing it over to the municipalities. I think the Minister of Labour made that clear in his speech at London. He stated that his idea was that a system should be inaugurated which would be suitable to Canadian needs. He said:

> Take, for example, our Canadian railroad workers—in the summer time there are upwards of 200,000 men employed, and during the winter periods there are about 25,000 of those workers laid off for several months. The wages of all railwaymen average about $130 per month. If a fund were created, it would take about $5,000,000 to pay these employees half-pay for three months.

The Minister of Labour knows very well that no province could undertake anything of that sort; any such system must come from this government. In the light of these facts and with the knowledge possessed by the minister, why should he try to throw the responsibility on the provinces?

Another question which is very pertinent is this: The Prime Minister himself said the provinces had not asked for such a scheme and that no demand had been made for it.

Mr. HEENAN: If my hon. friend would read a little further he would see where some of the finances would come from.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Yes, I know that; this suggested solution of the problem might be all right, but it never can be carried out by one province with regard to a railway system which passes through seven or eight provinces. Not one of these provinces could bring such a scheme into operation, because of the fact that the railway crosses so many other provinces as well. The very illustration given by the minister shows how futile is his suggestion that it is a matter for the provinces.

The Prime Minister also says that the provinces never have asked for this scheme. The provinces did not ask for the old age pensions scheme; why was it forced upon them. That legislation was passed in this house without the provinces having been consulted; general legislation was passed and the provinces were invited to take part in it. The same thing could be done here; it might be worked out on the same basis as workmen's compensation. There is no difficulty and no obstacle in the way of putting this unemployment insurance in force if only you are honest about it. Unemployment insurance should be on an actuarial basis, as is the case with all other forms of insurance.

On motion of Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Probably it will be the wish of hon. members of the house to continue this debate to-morrow. In order that the matter may be regularized, with the consent of the house I would move:

That standing order No. 28 be suspended on Friday, April 4th instant, and that motion be then made that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April, 4, 1930

The house met at three o'clock.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn) presented the first report of the select standing committee on debates, as follows:

Friday, April 4, 1930.

The select standing committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House of Commons, beg leave to present the following as their first report:

Your committee have had under consideration the question of the status and remuneration of parliamentary reporters, and having heard the Clerk of the House and the Editor of Debates in support of the claim of the parliamentary reporters to recognition as professional or technical officers, which claim was endorsed by a minute of the Board of Internal Economy, of date April 16, 1929, and also having heard their representations as to the difficulty of maintaining the existing establishment, filling vacancies, and ensuring efficiency under the present provision with respect to minimum and maximum salaries, recommend as follows:

That the following grades and salaries suggested in the report of the Royal Commission on Technical and Professional Services be made applicable to the parliamentary reporting and editing staffs:

	Minimum	Maximum
Assistant Parliamentary Reporter, Grade III.	$2,800	$3,360
Chief Assistant Parliamentary Reporter, Grade IV..	3,420	3,900
Parliamentary Reporter Grade IV..	3,420	3,900
Associate Editor, Grade V..	4,020	4,620
Editor, Grade VI.. ..	4,800	5,520

and that steps be taken by the Civil Service Commission to give effect to this recommendation.

Your committee also make the following recommendations:

(a) That the organization and establishment of the house be amended by making provision for the addition to the staff of the Debates branch of one English and one French parliamentary reporter.

(b) That representations be made to the Civil Service Commission pointing out the advisability of so amending their regulations that appointments of parliamentary reporters be made within a few days when applications therefor are forwarded during the sessions of parliament.

(c) That the Editor of English Debates and the officer occupying the joint positions of the Editor of French Debates and Parliamentary Reporter be placed in the same class and paid the same remuneration, and

(d) That the above recommendations be submitted to the Civil Service Commission.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, to amend the Winding-up Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When the Winding-up Act was placed in the statutes there were no shares of no par value. This is for the purpose of giving to the holders of a certain number of shares of no par value the right to petition for winding-up.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Yesterday I was questioned by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) as to when he could expect a return. I promise him the return by the beginning of next week.

LIBERAL CANDIDATES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I inquire whether the Prime Minister will endorse the candidature of Thomas Reid as Liberal nominee for New Westminster, in view of the fact that Reid stated at the nominating convention that he was in favour of greater protection for Canadian producers?

Mr. SPEAKER: We will say, stand as an order for return.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There is another question that I wish to ask the Prime Minister, and that is in regard to the Liberal candidate for Burrard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is a sign of nervousness.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He also criticized—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The time of the house is very precious just now.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Thursday, April 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I wish to correct a misapprehension which may have arisen from what I said yesterday with regard to the question of free trade. I intimated that I might be a free trader myself along certain lines, but that I wanted protection on coal and iron. The point I was trying to make was this, that if I were a free trader, I would likely be a free trader of the kind that we meet in this house, particularly on this side to my left, free traders who want free trade in the articles they buy, and protection on the produce that they have to sell.

I was trying to point out last night that the fiscal policy of this government is responsible to a certain degree, at least, for the unemployment now existing in this country. I was dealing with the question of coal. Since then I have read in the newspapers a statement made on the floor of the legislature of Nova Scotia to the effect that coal used in the heating of the public buildings at Halifax was imported from points outside of Canada, while miners within two hundred miles of Halifax are walking the streets idle. Surely there is a direct connection between the policy of this government and the unemployment that exists in the town of Glace Bay.

I also pointed out the effect which the introduction of Russian coal is going to have on the market that we want to get for Nova Scotia coal and possibly coal from the western provinces. Last year a large consignment of coal came from Russia into this country. It was refused admittance into the United States, but was admitted into Canada. The newspapers tell us that this year contracts have been let for the purchase of 250,000 tons of Russian coal. There is one thought that I want to leave with my friends from the west, the wheat farmers and free traders. The papers tell us that within the last year or so hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent in the United States for agricultural implements for Russia. Who dare say that within four or five years from now the great agricultural lands of Russia will not be developed to such a degree that, if they can replace our coal now, they will not then be in a position to replace our Canadian wheat? What will be the position then of the wheat farmers in this country? Will they be free traders then?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Sure.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) says sure. He is a consistent free trader. He is, I believe, the father and mother of the consumers' league. He is the exponent of the free trade doctrine in this house. Yet he sat here the day before yesterday and listened to the most extreme protectionist doctrine that has ever been presented in this house. He heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) say that he had paid $2,000,000 for a ship in Canada when he could have bought the same ship in London for $1,000,000. Is the hon. member for Weyburn going to subscribe to any such doctrine as that? Where are all his free trade theories? Those free trade theories are, after all, theories only. When they come up against the acid test of practical conditions, they vanish into thin air.

The newspapers to-day also bring us some surprising statements with regard to remarks made by certain provincial premiers in this country. I read that two or three of them have doubted that the Prime Minister made the statement in the house yesterday that he would not give five cents to a Tory government, but that he was prepared to go a certain length possibly in meeting one or two of the western provinces that have a Progressive premier at the head of their government. These three provincial premiers appeared to be surprised at such a statement by the Prime Minister. Why should they be surprised because the Prime Minister makes a frank and honest statement that we all know to be true? Certainly he would not give five cents to a Tory provincial government. Why? Because it is the policy of this government, and has been from the start, that every dollar of public money that is going to be spent is going to be spent for a political purpose. Give public money to a Tory government that will not expend it for Grit purposes? What nonsense. No, sir, this government is not going to do anything like that. There is where the vicious principle comes in, and I quite agree with the Prime Minister that is a vicious principle; but it is the outlook that has always characterized the Grit party in this country.

We have an illustration in my province, where the militia was called out to settle a strike. The cost amounted to $133,000. The militia was called out, my hon. friend says, by a Grit government. The federal government presented a bill to the province for that sum, and, what is more, made the province pay it, because they deducted it from the subsidy. Just contrast that with what the Borden government did in an exactly similar case; they presented a bill to the provincial government for the cost of the militia, but subsequently withdrew it. The Borden government did not collect a dollar, although a Grit government was in power in Nova Scotia. I do not think we could find a better contrast between the respective attitudes of the two old parties. This government is running true to form. We have ministers making pledges in this house and out of it in an endeavour to catch votes, but when they are called upon to implement these pledges we find them blocked by the Prime Minister.

But out of this debate comes one clear declaration—this government is opposed to unemployment insurance. There is no beclouding that fact. That declaration is going out to the people of this country who are in need, and to whom unemployment insurance would be a blessing. Let me tell the government that there will come a time when our unemployed will have an opportunity to return to power representatives who will attend to their wants. To-day we see the government without any cabinet solidarity; ministers saying one thing, the Prime Minister saying another. On the other hand, the Conservative party is true to its principles, it is true to the national policy, a policy that has done more than anything else to build up this country. It is on that party, Mr. Speaker, and its policies, especially the policy of protection as developed by experience, protection not only for capital, but also for labour and for the consumer, that our people may rely to maintain the progress which Canada is destined to make in the coming years.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. MacDonald) who has just taken his seat will forgive me if I do not follow his remarks very closely, but I hope to refer to them briefly before resuming my seat. The ground has been so well covered by a number of strong and excellent speeches that I would hesitate to take up the time of the house but for the fact that St. Boniface, embracing as it does the town of Transcona and the Canadian National shops with its many hundreds of workers, as well as the labouring suburb of Elmwood, is essentially a labouring constituency, and I believe that if ever I should raise my voice in this house now is the time when we are considering the subject of unemployment, which is so disastrous to the welfare of the labouring classes.

It has been repeatedly stated, and I think it is pretty generally accepted, that unemployment is not an emergent condition, that we always have unemployment. In that statement I heartily concur. Of course, since our rigorous winter climate ties up many industries, unemployment is always increased at that season; but all through the summer, fall and winter while I am at home, not a day passes, cerainly not a week, but that I am asked to find jobs for men out of work. They seem to think that a letter from me is all that is necessary to secure them a job—unfortunately a much mistaken idea. There are always scores of men looking for work at the Transcona shops, men who go back day after day and week after week until finally they give up in disgust and despair and look elsewhere for work, with, I fear, no better success. There is no doubt that unemployment is a permanent and constant condition of our social structure, a malady or disease pertaining thereto, for which a cure must be sought and found if possible.

I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of many that seasonal unemployment is caused by our rigorous climate. Undoubtedly the collapse of the stock market and the fact that our wheat crop for 1929, as well as a large portion of that for 1928, is not yet sold, have had a very decided bearing on unemployment, for it has prevented considerable building programs being proceeded with. Some unemployment is caused by lack of training or fitness of the worker for his work. In this regard I might state that the migration of many thousands of people yearly from the British Isles and from Europe to this country has always been a large factor in unemployment. A few nights ago the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead), pointed out that the major railway companies had for some years brought in immigrants from the old country, who had displaced men already in occupation at the various railway shops, and these in turn were later displaced by a fresh batch of immigrants. This complaint has been made to me in very bitter terms a number of times in connection with the Transcona shops. I have not verified the statement, but I have good reason to believe that it is true. If it is true, it is certainly a shame; it is a bad piece of business and it should be stopped immediately. Here, at least, is one place where charity, if it may be so called, should begin at home. I fancy, however, the basic cause of unemployment goes much deeper than this. Canada produces roughly ten times the amount of wheat required for her consumption; she produces many times the amount of minerals and forest products that can be used in this country; she produces 300,000,000 pounds of fish each year; there are greater quantities of manufactured products and products of the dairy, such as meat and eggs than can be consumed within the country. I fancy if the value of these products were estimated it would be found that Canada produces probably ten times the value of the amount required to provide comfort for her citizens. Still, the vast bulk of Canadians are not well off; there is no doubt about that. Unemployment is with us from year to year, and it is not infrequently that we find destitution amongst us. In these days, with our modern machinery and improved methods of production one man can do the work for which some years ago two or three men were required. That is to say that the employer or the head of a corporation buys for the wages of one man the work that was done in former years by several men.

> For unto every one that hath, shall be given; . . . . but from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath.

Fifty per cent less men can do more work than twice the number did a few years ago; in order to provide work for greater numbers the men are put on short time and small wages. The consequence is that they are frequently unable to procure the necessities of life, and an increasing number of men from year to year find themselves entirely out of work. This, to my mind, is the underlying cause of unemployment. Assuming that is correct, what is the cure? In medicine we say that the first principle in treatment is to eliminate the cause of the disease. Unfortunately this is a disease in which we cannot so easily eliminate the cause. It is, however, within the power of this parliament to bring in measures which would include a more equitable distribution of the wealth of this land, and would go far to overcome this evil and to remedy the present state of unemployment.

What would be the cure for unemployment, as we have it to-day? We cannot change the climate of Canada, but we could see to it that workmen were paid a sufficient wage during the period of occupation to carry them over a reasonable period of inactivity during the winter. Secondly, we could stop undesirable immigration, and allow in only such immigrants as are actually needed to carry on the industry of this land, and those immigrants who are able to look after themselves upon their arrival. The governments of Canada, both federal and provincial, have the power to tax the wealth of this country for the purpose of providing for the general welfare of the body politic and its greatest asset, namely, its citizens.

I would now turn for a few moments from the field of mere platitudes to the criticism which has been offered to the government by some hon. members opposite who have taken part in this debate. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) referred the other day to the policy of this government in connection with unemployment. Since the remarks of the hon. gentleman were made in the course of this debate, I presume I am at liberty to refer to them at this time. He stated that the policy of this government had annually driven out 100,000 men, for a number of years. I think that is a correct statement of his remarks. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) speaking in Regina this year is reported to have said these words:

> It would surprise you to know that during the nine years the Liberals have been in power 859,000 Canadians have left this country to go to the United States. If in nine years the policy of the government has driven 859,000 Canadians to seek employment in the United States, twice as great a number as ever went in the same period before, what do you think of that policy?

As far as we can learn, these figures must have been taken from the United States immigration records. I might point out that this government took office in 1922, and can only he held responsible for the progress or otherwise of this country from the time it brought down its budget in March of that year. From that time until the period when these statistics were compiled was briefly seven years, rather than nine years. Those two years would cut a considerable number from the figure 859,000, and bring it down to about 740,000. So that with that treatment the figure is contracted. Further, 740,000 includes migration from Newfoundland, which is not a part of Canada, and would lower the figure by 2,000 men yearly. Taking this into consideration, the figure is now reduced to 726,000. That figure takes no account of people who have returned to Canada, or of Canadians who resided in the United States for only a short time and then returned to this side of the border. When these people are considered, the figure is still further reduced by 153,000, which brings it down to 573,000.

So, Mr. Speaker, if we carry this inquiry a little further we find in the end that the actual number of men who left Canada during this seven year period, instead of being 859,000, is actually 352,000. I might put a few figures on Hansard. In 1925 there migrated to the United States from Canada 100,859 people, and 15,815 people came to Canada from the United States. Returning Canadians numbered 43,775, which made a net loss to Canada in that year of 41,302. I will not follow these figures down to the present except to give the result for each year. I have given the figures for 1925. In 1926 the net loss was 25,020; in 1927 it was 3,524; in 1928 it was 8,260, and in 1929 it dwindled to 82. So, in the five years from 1925 to 1929, the migration to the United States from Canada amounted to only 78,188, which is a considerable comedown from the figures quoted by my hon. friend. When the hon. member for Fort William stated that we were losing 100,000 men a year to the United States, he remarked that this was a good way to cure unemployment but that he preferred the disease to the cure.

The fiscal policy of this country has been pretty thoroughly attacked as a cause of unemployment in Canada. Obviously the contention is, sir, that if the government would build a tariff wall around Canada so high that no foreign products could enter and the industries of this country had the entire home market, they would be able to develop to such an extent that they would employ sufficient men to do away with unemployment. It has been pointed out by hon. members in the course of this debate that the cause of unemployment in this country is the fact that machinery largely has supplanted man power in industry. As we find it to-day, there is not enough work for the men who were formerly employed; if these men are kept at work at all they are working only part time. Then of what benefit would it be to them to increase materially the industries of this country? These men would continue to be supplanted by machinery and still would be working on short time, and there would be an ever-increasing number of men out of work. Not only would that be the case, but these men working on short time would have to pay higher prices for the necessities of life owing to the increased cost of production which would be brought about by such a tariff wall.

There is another reason, I think, which applies here. Canada is an exporting country; she exports hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat; she exports millions of dollars' worth of pulp, and many kinds of manufactured products. We send out millions of dollars' worth of minerals, lumber and other things, and if we build a high tariff wall around Canada in order to keep out foreign products, just how are we going to export our own products? We cannot expect to sell our products, be they what they may, to other countries without buying from those countries, and if Canada adopts a closed door policy what then are we to do with Canadian industry? I am not much of an economist, Mr. Speaker, but to me the very idea of this argument seems absurd and entirely out of the question.

An hon. member opposite pointed to the lack of a national coal policy as causing a great deal of unemployment in this country. A few years ago I had the good fortune to be on a committee of the house which investigated this matter. My memory is not very accurate, but I do remember that at that time the matter was thoroughly gone into. During the war, when the United States was threatened with a shortage of coal, it became necessary for Canada to develop rapidly her coal resources, and so probably for the first time that portion of eastern Canada east of western Ontario became acquainted with western coal. That coal made a very good impression; the people of central Canada signified that if this coal could reach the centre of the Dominion at a price which made it possible for them to use it, they would be very glad to do so. Unfortunately, in the long run this was found to be impossible. I believe that coal is worth $4 a ton on cars at the mine door, while the actual cost of moving it to central Canada is $9 a ton. This is a bituminous coal, and the people of central Canada can buy first class bituminous coal from the United States for less than $9 a ton.

Just here I might refer to something which may surprise some hon. members of the house. Pocahontas coal, which is very popular in Ontario, finds its way as far west as Winnipeg, where it is equally popular and where it is largely bought in preference to coal from Alberta. If United States coal can penetrate this country as far as Winnipeg; if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sees fit to use United States coal on its lines from Montreal to Moose Jaw, there is not very much likelihood of the people in central Canada being able economically to use coal from Alberta.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If the government has given a cost rate to Ontario, is it not fitting that the people of Manitoba and Saskatchewan should receive the same rate?

Mr. HOWDEN: It seems reasonable that they should be entitled to a cost rate, and I have heard that argument before. However, Manitoba is not clamouring for western coal, although if a favoured rate were granted, probably it would have the effect of displacing some American coal, and I would like to see that displacement take place.

I think it has been found that coal from the maritimes cannot be economically moved farther west than Montreal, or possibly Ottawa, even with a subvention of 50 cents per ton, benefits of the tariff, and a favourable boat haul. It has been tried out, but I do not think there is any use in our hoping to put coal from the maritime provinces or from Alberta upon the central markets of Canada. That is to be regretted because it is those markets which create the greatest demand. The last speaker, the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald) pointed out that foreign coal was being burned in a public building in Halifax. I do not know much about the maritime provinces but I assume that he had reference to the parliament buildings. Halifax is considerably closer to the coal mines than is central Canada, and if the people of the maritimes cannot see to it that their own coal is burned in their own capital and their own parliament buildings, how can we hope to burn coal from the maritimes in the central portion of Canada?

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Will the hon. member permit me to correct him? The public buildings to which I referred were buildings of this government in Halifax, not of the local government.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What do they burn in the buildings owned by the local government?

Mr QUINN: Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. HOWDEN: That may make some difference, but not a great deal. If coal cannot be produced in Nova Scotia at a price to compete with foreign coal, then it is a sorry state of affairs.

While I am referring to the remarks of the hon. member for South Cape Breton, I would like to mention the ship which was built in this country at a cost of about $2,000,000. The hon. member criticized the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) and other hon. ministers for their inconsistency in not following up our free trade policy. The members on the other side of the house have been most energetic in their demand for relief for the unemployed labouring men of this country. It has been stated that this ship could have been constructed in the old country at a cost of about $1,500,000. There may not be much difference between having this work constructed abroad and making a grant of $500,000 for relief purposes, but there are added advantages which accrue. The labouring men not only receive the benefit of that extra $500,000, but they receive also the benefit of the other $1,500,000. I do not consider that the hon. minister should be taken to task regarding that item.

The attack which has been made upon the hon. Minister of Labour has been a matter of extreme regret to me, but I must say that I feel sorrier for those who have carried on the attack than I do for the minister himself. I have grave reason to doubt if Canada has ever had a better minister of labour than the Hon. Peter Heenan. I have grave reason to doubt if Canada has ever had a minister of labour who has done more for the labouring classes or who has enjoyed the confidence of the labouring classes to a greater degree than has the Hon. Peter Heenan. I had occasion to discover that fact regarding some fairly large contracts which were being carried on in Manitoba during the last year. Three contractors whom I know had engaged labour at rates entirely satisfactory to the men, who were delighted to obtain work at that period of the year. They were receiving from 75 cents to 80 cents per hour and were all satisfied with their lot, but the Minister of Labour, a member of this government, saw to it that those wages were increased from 75 cents to $1.10 per hour, and payments to the contractors were held up until that stipulation had been carried out.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What class of workers were they?

Mr. HOWDEN: They were carpenters—other classes of labour were concerned, and the rates were increased at the instigation of the Hon. Mr. Heenan.

Mr. THORSON: That would be skilled labour?

Mr. HOWDEN: Yes. I think it should be mentioned that it was largely due to the urging of the hon. Minister of Labour that the government has carried on public works so intensively during the last few months. Hon. members opposite have complained that although the minister stated that these works were being proceeded with, they were unable to obtain any information as to the amount of money expended. It might interest the hon. gentlemen to know that since last fall this government has spent on public works something like $20,000,000. This amount cannot be considered as a donation, but it was a fairly substantial expenditure and no doubt has had an extremely beneficial effect in relieving unemployment during the winter months.

I think we all realize that unemployment is an ever-threatening evil to our state, and is something which will have to be faced and dealt with by this country. I agree with some hon. members who suggest that the initial step might come from this house. The condition will become progressively worse from time to time, and this is something which, if disregarded, may well be fraught with dire consequences. During the past period of stress, as I indicated before, the government of this country saw to it that its servants were not allowed to suffer, not only so, but the plan of the president of the Canadian National Railways not to reduce his forces was endorsed by the government at no small loss of revenue. The government, as I stated a moment ago, also pursued the building policy to which I have referred and which undoubtedly has helped considerably to ameliorate matters. Considering these things, I certainly do not think this government merits a motion of want of confidence and I shall certainly vote against the motion, but I am ready to join hands with all hon. members who are seriously anxious for a solution of the unemployment problem, in the hope that we may make Canada a better place for its labouring class to live in.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) upon the very able address which he has just made to the house. With most of it, I am glad to say, I heartily agree, particularly with the first part in which he outlined the reasons for unemployment and offered certain suggestions for alleviating it. There is, however, one point on which I differ from him, although it may be considered a small difference. One of the reasons he claimed for unemployment was that a good deal of the 1929 crop and some of the 1928 crop was not yet sold. I should like to point out that as regards this crop, the producers have received most of the money coming to them and no doubt have spent it. Therefore, when the grain is ultimately sold, it will not make a great deal of difference with regard to employment or unemployment.

Mr. HOWDEN: It probably did make a difference.

Mr. SPENCER: I wish to congratulate the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) on having brought this all-important subject before the house. He has been criticised for bringing it in as an amendment to the motion for committee of supply, but I do not blame him, for the simple reason that he wished in the first place to bring this subject before the house by way of resolution, and as private members' day has been cancelled, he had no alternative to the procedure he adopted.

He has also been misunderstood so far as his intentions with regard to the resolution are concerned. It has been intimated from the government side of the house that the resolution calls for large government expenditures. In his resolution he does not ask for any government expenditures at all. If the recommendations are carried out, there might even be a saving in expenditure. For instance, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, in trying to rectify the unemployment problem we might cut a large amount off the immigration estimates; we might save money in other ways, and in the long run it might not involve any extra expenditure on the part of the government. I am glad the hon. member brought this subject up, because it is of fundamental importance. It is a subject that will grow in importance from time to time, because unemployment will increase from year to year as long as we have our present system of production and exchange.

I am interested in this subject, not from the point of view of its provincial, federal or international significance; not because action taken to ameliorate the present conditions might benefit the labourer, the farmer or the professional worker, but because first and foremost it is a human subject. It is a human subject because it deals with many thousands —and the number will certainly increase— who are at the present time suffering from lack of food, clothing and shelter. This is a phase of the subject we cannot ignore; and it has not been touched upon by more than four or five of the hon. members who have spoken in this debate.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), speaking in this debate on April 1, referred to the action of the Dominion-provincial conference held in 1926, and stated that none of the provinces except Manitoba refused to take full responsibility for the expense in connection with unemployment. I challenged that statement at the time and reminded him that I knew the province of Alberta had refused to acknowledge full responsibility for the expense. He was at the moment reading from a bluebook which was supposed to be a record of what had taken place at that conference. It must have been only a synopsis and not a full one of what had taken place. I reminded the minister that he had in his possession a statement made by the premier of Alberta at the conference named, and for the benefit of the house I am going to read the statement to which I referred. Speaking on unemployment relief, Premier Brownlee said:

> For some years in the past the Dominion has been assuming a certain percentage of the cost of unemployment relief, and we think, in all fairness it should be continued. I am not sure we did receive our proportion last year; my memory is we did not, the reason for that being, in the province of Alberta we arranged with the municipalities a scheme of relief by which the province took care of unemployment among single men, the municipalities the married men.
> The department at Ottawa seem to feel that this was not in accordance with their ideas and did not make us a contribution as in previous years. Now, unemployment, as far as western Canada is concerned, is caused to some extent by the immigration policy, and we feel the Dominion government should assume some proportion as in the past, and should not insist on any one definite scheme between the municipalities and the provinces.

I sent this statement to the minister on February 28, and I received a reply in acknowledgment on March 3. Therefore I think the statement he made the other night in regard to the matter was, to say the least, unfair. Moreover, in regard to unemployment in Alberta this last winter, they estimate it will cost the province not less than $393,000. This is a sum larger than any that the province has previously been called upon to pay for that purpose by no less than $200,000 in round figures. I understand that the number of the unemployed in Canada to-day is in round figures, 100,000. I think therefore that according to these figures the prairie provinces with their small population are carrying quite a fair share of this burden.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) for the very excellent speech he made last night. I differ from him, however, when he referred to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Crerar) and said that the people of eastern Canada would not expect much consideration from the men on the prairies because they were so taken up with the growing of grain that they had no interest in the industrial centres. I want to remind the hon. member that there are no bigger hearted men anywhere than the men on the prairies, and if there is distress, whether it is on the prairies, in central Canada or in the maritime provinces, he will find that those people are willing to do their bit and pay their share in relieving that distress.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said the minister, not the men on the prairies.

Mr. SPENCER: I thought the hon. member had reference to the men on the prairies generally.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, to the minister.

Mr. SPENCER: When the Prime Minister spoke on April 3, I had hoped that as a student of social problems he would give us one of those able speeches which he can make and often does make in this house, dealing with the problem that is confronting us, stating whether he considered it a federal, provincial or international problem, showing the causes why it was with us and why it was increasing, and at least point the way to how best we could relieve this growing distress and this growing expenditure on account of unemployment in Canada. I must confess, however, that I was very badly disappointed in his address. I had expected that he would make one of the best speeches of which he is capable. I cannot congratulate him on some of the remarks that he made during his address, particularly those of a partisan character. With reference to the province from which I have the honour to come, he said:

> As regards Alberta, we have had no request from the premier or any member of the government of Alberta for assistance with respect to an unemployment situation there.

He further went on to say, if I remember correctly, and I do not wish to misquote him, that none of the provincial governments were represented at the unemployment conference which was held in this city. In that statement I claim that he is not correct as no less than three of the provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, were represented. With further reference to his statement that no action had been taken in this regard by the province of Alberta, let me point out that this morning I happened to come across in the Edmonton Journal of March 11, 1930, a resolution that was passed unanimously by the Alberta assembly, reading as follows:

> Whereas unemployment constitutes a recurring and serious problem requiring large expenditures of public money for relief purposes and in non-productive work;
>
> Therefore be it resolved that this assembly is of the opinion that the government of Canada should, with the least possible delay, call a conference representative of the federal government and of the provincial governments for the purpose of investigating and considering this problem, and particularly to consider whether any nation-wide plan of unemployment insurance is practicable and feasible, having regard to all circumstances;
>
> Provided that in any action, legislative or otherwise, taken by the government of Canada following such conference, the province of Alberta shall not be deemed to concur therein, or to be bound thereby, until this legislature gives its approval thereto.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

That is sufficient, I think, to show that the province of Alberta at least has taken the problem of unemployment quite seriously. It also is quite conclusive that the province does not consider that the responsibility of carrying this burden is entirely its own.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, no government can claim exemption from responsibility with regard to unemployment so long as it controls the fiscal policy of the country, its immigration policy, and its currency and credit policy. I am sorry to see that in the course of this debate my friends of the official opposition have claimed that the only panacea for the unemployment situation is a change in the fiscal policy to higher and higher tariffs. If I were going to blame the government at all, I would blame them because they have not reduced tariffs where they might have done. We have seen in past years a large number of people, particularly from western Canada, drift into the United States, but so far as I know, and I know a great many who have gone to that country from farming in Canada, not a single one of them has taken up farming in the United States. That is an evidence of the poverty of agriculture in this country. If we are going to help agriculture, the basic industry of this country, one of the ways in which we can help it is to cut down the tariff on the many things which the farmer has to buy, particularly on those necessaries that go into his household.

With reference to immigration, we know full well that much against the insistent demand from this corner of the house during the last eight years, the government, with the fullest support of the opposition, have done their best to aid immigration to this country in greater and greater numbers. But the time has come, and it has probably been accelerated by the short crop which, unfortunately, we had in Canada last year, when the public generally realize that a stop has to be made. Looking at the figures of deportation for 1929, I see that they have risen to the large number of 3,267. Of these, 1,788 are listed as public charges. They would not be public charges if there was lots of work in this country, and if there is not plenty of work for them to do, it is proof that we had too many men with us at the time, or these men would have found work. But the most regrettable thing about these figures is that no less than 574 people were deported for criminality. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), in the very excellent speech he made yesterday, pointed out that there was a very fine line to be drawn between the unemployed and the unemployable. In that I quite agree. He said further that there was also a fine line to be drawn between the unemployable and the criminal cases. There is not one of us if placed in the same position, say of starvation, particularly if we had a wife and children depending upon us, who would not hesitate to take food to sustain life. Therefore it seems to be the duty of any government not only to see that the country is not over populated, but also to see that the people have work, and particularly to arrange that there are as few people as possible so badly off that they have nothing to lose. The most dangerous position for this or any other country to be in, is to have a large proportion of its people destitute, for these unfortunates in their extremity will have slight respect for law and order. I fear that is the position we shall drift into if we do not make some change in our economic system.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also raised the question of the cost of looking after the unemployed. I entirely agree with him that we cannot afford not to look after them. I would remind the house that in Great Britain, where they have had a serious unemployment situation for a long time, they adopted unemployment insurance, and it has had a marked effect in reducing crime, so much so that they have been able to close some of their jails. In other words, unemployment insurance, or the dole if you like, has relieved extreme poverty; and we all know that poverty is the mother of crime.

We often hear that machinery is doing away with man power, that is, it is doing the work that men used to do, and some argue that the men so displaced will be employed in making more machines. This fallacy I think, has been exploded by several speakers during the course of this debate. I may be permitted to refer to an instance that comes within my own personal recollection. I well remember the time in Great Britain some years ago when men and boys used to be employed by the thousands in selling boxes of matches to railway passengers. Then somebody invented a very simple slot machine. These machines were placed on the station platforms and all the passengers had to do was to put a penny in the slot whenever they wanted a box of matches. It is quite possible that the men and boys who were thus displaced were able to get employment in the factories manufacturing those machines; but in a few years enough of such machines could be turned out to put one on every railway platform in the United Kingdom, and as, barring accidents they would last for a hundred years, it will easily be seen that within a few years at the latest, those men and boys would again find themselves among the unemployed.

Some people think that we are still in the age of scarcity. That was the case not more than fifty years ago, but they fail to appreciate that to-day, through the aid of science and invention, we can with ease produce all the goods we need. This is true not only of the factory but also of the farm. The whole problem is to get the clothes and food that we can so easily produce distributed to the population that needs them. In a word, to-day the problem is one of markets, both domestic and foreign. To-day Canada can produce more wealth than all her inhabitants need. Every session we hear in the Speech from the Throne of the great prosperity this country is enjoying, but as the hon. member who last spoke (Mr. Howden) said, prosperous as this country may be, the rank and file of the people are not well off. This can be proved very readily by looking at the income tax returns, where we find in round figures that only fifteen per cent of the population pay income tax, which means that the other eighty-five per cent do not get sufficient income to pay the tax. It is admitted that large numbers of our people are on the verge of poverty—want and abundance go hand in hand. Speaking at an unemployment conference in Baltimore last April to deal with local and national unemployment, Dr. Sumner Schlicter, professor of economics at Cornell university said:

> We are eliminating jobs faster than we are creating them. The problem before the nation is how to create new jobs as rapidly as machines destroy the old ones.
> We must face the five-day week and the six-hour day.
> Is there any more reasonable demand than that every man willing and able to work shall be guaranteed that opportunity?

Let me also refer to Doctor Irving Fisher, head of the department of political science at Yale university. He advocated unemployment insurance, stabilization of price levels and currency, stabilization of seasonal employment and the regulation of employment by building programs.

I have been amused during this discussion to notice how much stress was placed by certain hon. members on a higher tariff as the only panacea for unemployment. We have only to look to the United States, one of the highest tariff countries in the world, where unfortunately to-day, both for themselves and the world, they have over 6,000,000 unemployed. If the 9,000,000 of our people to-day had all they needed without any extravagance, there would not be a single mill or factory idle throughout the country. The answer, of course, for our present condition is largely insufficiency of purchasing power. Our money system places industry and the people in a strait-jacket. Some blame must be laid at the door of the policy known as the gold standard, under which we are supposed to keep down the currency in circulation in relation to the amount of gold we have in our vaults, and to issue credit only in proportion to the amount of currency. If, for instance, we have a limited amount of gold, or ill luck in finding more, and the country demands a large increase of credits to carry out needed developments, those developments will be handicaped because of the system to which we tie ourselves. The time will come, to my mind, when we shall have to recognize that we must place the country on a "goods basis" and not on what is termed and claimed to be a "gold basis." These conditions exist in most modern countries. We have heard that France, being a protectionist country, is well off. I think this statement was exploded only yesterday by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), when he pointed out that France was not increasing her population and was one of the few countries in the world which was wise enough after the war to refuse to have her currency deflated. Our fiscal policy in respect to unemployment will not solve the problem. It might make a slight difference one way or the other, but ultimately neither free trade nor protection is a panacea for the problem before us. The economic warfare existing between countries will lead ultimately only to military warfare; war is inevitable under the present economic system. Nations must adopt a new system of distributing goods, because machine power is emancipating mankind from toil. This was very ably expressed the other day by my friend the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and I will not take up the time of the house repeating his remarks. He placed on record the most outstanding facts in this connection I have ever heard.

Unemployment insurance will help to some extent. I am not suggesting for one moment that it will solve the problem, but like old age pensions it will give the people a certain purchasing power; it will keep them from penury and protect them from extreme suffering, thereby helping to eliminate a certain amount of crime. The taxation necessary to get the money for unemployment relief will, to a certain extent, help to level incomes, but it will not increase the volume of money. Though it is only a temporary relief, I am in favour of it, because I think it is a great deal better than the policy of stagnation under which we are slumbering at the present time. The policy of immigration is, of course, relative to unemployment and I am very glad that the government of the day has realized this fact and has decided to change its policy in respect thereto. We have heard many figures as to the world's jobless. Different figures have been stated during the course of this debate, but the figures I obtained the other day are, to my mind, fairly accurate. I have a statement before me from the London Daily Herald, which gives the number comprising the world's jobless as between 15,000,000 and 16,000,000. Of this total the United States has 6,000,000 unemployed; Germany, 4,5000,000; Russia, 2,000,000; Great Britain, 1,500,000; Japan, 800,000, and Italy, 500,000. This article goes on to say that the hope long held by economists that the situation was only temporary and would right itself, has vanished, and that unemployment seems likely to increase rather than to decrease.

Although this discussion has taken up considerable time in this house, it was no doubt introduced because the hon. member responsible for it felt he had to bring it forward as an amendment to the motion to go into supply. He had no other opportunity, owing to the fact that private members' days have been cancelled. For my part, however, I do not regret that the subject has come before the house for discussion. The subjects of unemployment and financial reform are, to my mind, two of the outstanding subjects to which this parliament particularly, as time goes on, is in duty bound to pay more attention. We have had some very excellent speeches with regard to this subject, but as I said before, only five or six of the hon. members have, in my opinion, actually reached bedrock. It does not matter what government may be in power; they will always have this unemployment problem to solve until we pay more attention to the very important problem of distribution, and as to how we can make it possible for the people of this country to get the purchasing power to buy the goods they require.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to listen to the remarks of my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer). His speech follows in the train of others I have heard from him, and like those others bears the impress of thought and consideration.

I propose to join my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), in support of his resolution and to vote for it. It is drawn in such wide terms that it has invited discussion not only of the situation as it exists to-day, but of the causes of that situation, and of possible solutions of the problem as we have it before us. My hon. friend from Battle River, in common with others, has engaged himself more particularly with the root causes, as he sees them, of the condition which we face to-day. It is well that we should have had such a discussion, giving an opportunity for exposition of the various views which are held in this house as to our position in regard to unemployment. I do not propose, however, to deal so much with the question of the cause of unemployment as with the fact that it exists, and to offer some suggestions as to how it may be immediately met—to use the exact wording of the resolution.

It has been very instructive to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who in giving his views, lays particular emphasis upon his conviction that we must return to the question of distribution of production—not so much production itself, but the question of distribution of production, and the profit taken. He suggests that in that way we might arrive at some solution of the cause of unemployment. Others have considered the question of immigration; others have dealt with the supersession of man power by machinery. One hon. gentleman has said that in his view our difficulty is in the worship of the "fetish" of maintaining the gold standard. It would be very interesting to enter into a discussion of all these points, but it is not my purpose to do so. For my own part, I will say what is probably not to the taste of my hon. friends to my left and my friend who proposed this resolution, that I think one of the main contributing causes of the difficulty in which we find ourselves to-day is to be found in the fiscal policy of the government. With that ground I am not going to deal; other opportunities will present themselves, and it does not seem to me that I would be serving any useful purpose to elaborate further upon a point which has already been well put to the house in this debate.

We must agree, and take it as proved, that we have to-day a serious situation in regard to the employment of our people. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) has accepted that proposition. Not only does he make no attempt to deny it, but one cannot read his speech without observing that he is fully conscious of the importance of the situation; I venture to say if we were able to read his mind it would show that in his personal view the proper thing to do, out of consideration for the rights of the people, would be to take some action, and to take it at once. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) says unemployment does not exist to-day in such a degree as to warrant our attention at the present time. I do not know which of these hon. gentlemen is in the better position to know the facts. I would think that he who is supposed to be more in touch with labour conditions than any other member of the cabinet, the Minister of Labour, would ascertain exactly what conditions existed in Canada in that regard, and that his finding that serious unemployment exists, should be valid and sound.

The Prime Minister seems unaware of some things that have occurred, and I should like to make a slight correction in what he said yesterday, when he stated that no municipalities have ventured to express their views to this house or to the government. I took part in a deputation from the city of Toronto and the surrounding municipalities, the head of each municipality being there, and without doubt these gentlemen stated clearly the very serious conditions which exist in their municipalities in regard to unemployment. The Prime Minister was corrected also by my hon. friend from Battle River with regard to the province of Alberta, so I venture to say that he has not thoroughly acquainted himself with the conditions as they exist. For that reason, and also because I believe the Minister of Labour is in the better position to know, I agree with the Minister of Labour that there is a very serious condition of unemployment in the country to-day which merits the immediate attention of the government.

I do not, however, agree with the attitude of the Minister of Labour with regard to that situation. I remember two lines of a song descriptive of a bird which roams the deserts of another continent. This bird is quoted in this way:

> "I will bury my head in the sand," quoth he,
> "And I won't tell where I am."

It seems to me that is exactly the position this government are taking at the present moment; they think that by concealing the facts of the situation from their eyes they can ignore them completely.

The Prime Minister has discussed the question of the constitutional limitations of the federal parliament, and I should like to say just a few words on that point. As I understand him, he does admit quite freely that there is no restriction on parliament voting money to be spent in any way that parliament desires it should be spent, but he goes on to say that under the British North America Act unemployment relief is not one of the matters for which the government should provide by expenditure of public money. We are authorized in one very broad clause of the British North America Act to enact measures for the peace, order and good government of the Dominion of Canada. I do not say for a moment that that definitely authorizes us to impose financial liabilities or responsibilities upon the provinces or to interfere with the provinces on the question of contracts. However, under that provision the Canada Temperance Act was upheld many years ago as being within the jurisdiction of the Dominion, and I would point out that at all events, following the argument of the Prime Minister, anything which affects the peace, order and the good government of Canada is something with which the Dominion properly can deal. Surely no one will deny for a moment that unemployment is productive, not of order, but rather of disorder.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow a question? Has it not been decided many times by the privy council that these opening words of the residuary clause mean that this power can be exercised only provided that we are not dealing with subjects included in section 92?

Mr. GEARY: Yes, that is quite true.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it has been decided in the opposite way.

Mr. GEARY: Let me put it this way: This is one of the subjects allotted by section 91 to the Dominion, but it is restricted to a great extent by the exclusive power and control given to the provinces under section 92. However, it is also clear, as I am sure the Solicitor General knows, that the power given the Dominion under section 91 is not strictly so limited. That is to say, the Dominion power can reach over, impinge upon and interfere with the exercise of provincial powers if such is necessary or if it is ancillary to the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament. With regard to something which may be ancillary to a provision for the peace, order and good government of the Dominion, or in a matter which has grown too large to be considered local, we may reach over into the provincial sphere. I think that is a correct statement of the law in that regard.

There is no question but that the regulation of trade and commerce is within the jurisdiction of the Dominion. That is a very wide power, and I fail to see how the provinces, in exercising any of their powers under section 92, can bring about unemployment. Unemployment must result from the exercise or non-exercise of the powers of the Dominion; there is nothing under provincial jurisdiction which would bring about the result. Similarly there is the question of immigration. Hon. gentleman during the course of this debate have indicated that the immigration policy has had a very great deal to do with unemployment, particularly in western Canada. With that statement I am inclined to agree. Now, since unemployment may result from the policy of this or any other federal government in regard to immigration, so far is it a matter which can be dealt with by this Dominion government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The statement my hon. friend has just made is fully borne out by the fact that the premier of one of the western provinces announces that 61 per cent of all the relief granted this year was granted to immigrants.

Mr. GEARY: Yes, that confirms the impression I had gathered from listening to my hon. friends to my left. Yet the Prime Minister yesterday blamed this party for all the immigration difficulties of the country. I remember very well the first campaign in which I was engaged in connection with the federal parliament. That was in 1925, and during that campaign the Prime Minister outlined four distinct points upon which that election was being fought. They were the tariff, railways, immigration and Senate reform. The immigration policy of the government at that time was to bring in more people. It was not a Conservative policy; it was a policy of the Liberal party five years ago, at the beginning of a new parliament. That parliament did not last very long, and perhaps my hon. friend meant to say that by the beginning of the next parliament conditions had changed, but that was not the case. Until this year the government have taken no steps with the view to restricting very severely immigration into this country.

The Prime Minister stated that the provinces have under their jurisdiction such things as charities and eleemosynary institutions. That is not at all applicable to the situation we have to-day. That refers to such things as asylums or other institutions, incorporated bodies if you like, which take care of people who are indigent or in need of some sort of help or treatment or assistance of that nature. By no stretch of the imagination can it be deemed to include charity. Much less can it be taken to include what is spoken of here, which is not charity but rather the provision of work to be done by the unemployed, for which they will receive money and for that money give value. Similarly with municipal institutions; that point can have no bearing here, nor can matters of a local or private nature, because this is a general, national situation. The only ground upon which the Prime Minister can rest is that property and civil rights come within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that that might interfere with the exercise of any compulsion by this Dominion. But is there anything in that analysis of the respective jurisdictions of the Dominion and the provinces to prevent the Dominion from, first, spending its money in the alleviation of unemployment or, second, taking the initiative in calling a meeting of the provinces and the Dominion in order to evolve some system of unemployment insurance, or a general discussion of the situation? That is the point I desire to make in my analysis of the question of jurisdiction.

The municipality is primarily liable. Whether or not it is right as a matter of fact, in practice it is so. It is the city hall or the town hall—the mayor or the reeve—they are accessible to the man or woman who desires employment, and naturally the matter is brought up in that form. It is then passed on to the province, and in cases of extreme need it should be passed by the provinces to the Dominion. I think that is all we desire at the present moment to draw to the attention of the government, the theory that the Dominion cannot absolve itself from taking some interest in this matter.

If a poor chap were to come to one of us and ask for some work, such as cutting wood or mowing grass or anything which might be within our power to give him, I do not think anyone would feel that he was doing right if he catechized that man and said: "Are you a Grit? Are you a Tory? Are you a Jew or a Christian? Do you speak English or French?" It would be a poor man indeed who would grant relief only upon such a catechism as that. Yet the Prime Minister has indicated that as being the principle upon which relief should be given to the provinces. That was his meaning when he said: If you are a Tory, you come to us with no hope of success; if you are a Progressive you can come to us with partial hope of success, and if you are a Grit you can come to us with the most complete hope for success. It would be bad enough for one of us so to conduct his affairs, but when the Prime Minister of this Dominion adopts that attitude in regard to provincial relations, it is to me beyond all question of right doing. I suppose the right hon. gentleman made those remarks in that fine zeal for unity which he is preaching from one end of this country to the other.

Knowing the conditions in my own city, and having heard of the conditions which exist elsewhere, my view is that immediate action should be taken, not next week, not the week after, but to-day. Other forms of relief may be considered a little later, but a sum of money should be made available immediately in order to take care of the requirements of the moment. In suggesting this I do not forget what other hon. members have offered in the way of a solution of this problem. I agree with the hon. members for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) and Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson)), and with other hon. members who have stated, against the dictates of their leader, that in their view this government should initiate the calling together of the provinces with a view to considering some form of unemployment insurance. I do not know whether or not I am correctly quoting the hon. member for St. Boniface, but the other hon. gentleman stated in terms that he felt that the Dominion government must share some of the responsibility for unemployment. If the responsibility be shared by this government, surely something should be done by it towards alleviation. Although I do not possess the knowledge necessary to enter into a concrete discussion of this matter, I believe that a system of unemployment insurance could be worked out, providing for contributions and actuarially sound. All these things should be the subject of discussion with the provinces. The provinces are vitally interested and this government should lead the way in suggesting a conference or discussion of this matter. I do not think it can be said that the provinces should do this, because it is not possible. We have in this government a central body dealing with all the provinces and it is in a better position to initiate a conference of that sort than is any one province An endeavour should be made to have all the provinces attend this conference, but the Prime Minister says, "No, we will not do anything of the kind, we will wait until the provinces come to us." I would like to point out to the house that having said that the Prime Minister immediately nullified any good which might be in his suggestion, by saying to the Tory provinces: You need not come, for you will not get a five cent piece.

I have no desire to be drawn into a partisan condemnation of the Prime Minister; his words speak for themselves; he who runs may read. That is the exact attitude taken by the Prime Minister, and I do not desire to emphasize it. Government should not proceed on any such basis. If a conference were called the provinces should be able to feel that they are coming to discuss a matter of jurisdiction or contribution in the creation of an unemployment insurance scheme, and not that any favour or refusal would be based upon their political affiliation. The present policy of the government is that certain provinces would be refused.

I would like to consider in a brief manner the various suggestions put forward by hon. members. While I press my suggestion that money should be provided immediately, I do not by any means disregard the valuable information given to the house by other hon. members. The hon. member for Bow River contended that an investigation should be held into the causes of unemployment. That would also be an investigation of the solution of the difficulties, economic or otherwise, under which we labour at the present time. The hon. member's suggestion is well worthy of thought and consideration and I would not for a moment suggest that it be discarded. I think one might well say that that is a very proper course to pursue, and it should receive attention. Perhaps this suggestion, instead of being brought to the attention of the house through an amendment, might be brought forward in a more definite form.

I think every hon. member has had some experience with the unquestionably pathetic results of unemployment, and I do not think I can usefully add to the store of knowledge of hon. members of this house. In common with others, I have had experiences which were heartbreaking, which made one think that all constitutional limitations should be smashed if that were necessary to give relief to people suffering as such people do. Rather than sit with folded hands, rather than give up the ghost as the hon. Minister of Labour has done, and as the government itself has done, I would like to see them up and doing in their attack upon this problem, and holding out some promise that their consideration would lead to action. It is the helpless, do-nothing attitude of the government which we deprecate most at the present time. We would urge them to forget what has been said; as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said, let them forget what position they have taken; let them consider the matter from the standpoint of the human being and of the humanity that is in the whole question and say: We may have committed ourselves to a course of action, but we are men enough to free ourselves from that and we will endeavour with you to find some solution that will clear up a situation that is tearing at the heartstrings of men and women in this country. May I say to the Prime Minister, as the hon. member for South Wellington said yesterday: if he does that he will find unanimity behind him; there should be no question of support from the men who sit to the right of the Speaker; he certainly will have no measure of opposition from those who sit in the corner or those who sit to your left.

An emergency exists. There is no use quibbling about it or finding a little lack of expression here or an over-expression there to indicate that it is not national; that it is local and provincial; that it is usual, seasonal, recurrent and not an emergency at the present time. There is no use arguing in regard to that. We have an emergency to-day and practically overnight the federal government could relieve it to an appreciable extent. If the government were to take that attitude they would have the support of the whole country.

The Prime Minister has asked hon. gentlemen to my left not to be inveigled into supporting any policy of the Conservative party. I know them as well as and perhaps better than he does, and I do not think we could do that. We have endeavoured to impress the truth upon them and they do not receive it. They have their own views and they are going to hold to them. Why does he not say to us: Do not be coaxed, cozened or cajoled into supporting any of the policies of the Progressives who sit to your left?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The danger in the case of the hon. gentleman's party is greater.

Mr. GEARY: That is the situation as I see it. One does not want to be sentimental about the matter; but one wants to see the facts as they are. The situation should be remedied and if it be of any avail I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for South Wellington who yesterday left the door open to the government to do what, not only from a humanitarian standpoint, but even from the lower ground of policy, is one of the best things they could do.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary I believe the unemployment question to-day is a national one. The Dominion is practically in control of all policies relating to labour, for instance, immigration, et cetera. That unemployment will occur during the winter months is perhaps inevitable because of our climate, but for the whole of 1929 work was scarce for all those who seek their living by their day's wage. In any case, unemployment is not an emergent question to-day; it is with us and with us to stay. The question is whether we want to tackle the problem in the manner we should. Unemployment insurance, while not a cure, will at least relieve the sufferings of many, some of which sufferings I myself saw last winter.

There are many causes for unemployment and I am going to enumerate some of them. One fact that we must face in our economic life to-day is that we are everlastingly driving our workers into our industrial centres, our cities. Our population is being more and more separated into two distinct groups; and we need not seek very far for the cause. In the cities we have the capitalists and the wage earners; in the country we are getting more and more into the way of the older countries, and we have the landlord and the tenant; both these groups corresponding to the old days of feudal lord and serf.

The high cost of living certainly debars many people from entering into small industries and concerns for themselves; it puts all such enterprises out of reach of those who are willing to work. I meet to-day in the country many who express their desire to go into poultry raising or dairying on a small scale, believing that the family could keep those things going while it was profitable for the father to work out while wages were at their highest. But it seems to me that the policy which our friends to my right are advocating is killing this spirit of enterprise, and we are driving our population into two distinct groups.

Let us see what the man who would go into an industry on a small scale is up against. First he builds a house, however humble it may be. He goes to the lumber yard nearest to him and there he finds that the price of common lumber, probably planed on one side and one edge, is as high as $56 a thousand retail in any yard in Saskatchewan to-day. Perhaps he asks the price of siding and finds it runs all the way from $80 to $90 a thousand, I believe a good deal dearer than the price at which the mills in British Columbia have been delivering it in the Orient. He can, however, secure at $62 a thousand a grade of siding which, I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), carries a 25 per cent duty. This is the cheapest grade of siding at present in the yards in the west. It is called No. 2½ siding, and it is cut, I believe, from stumps, such as fallen logs that are over ripe. He can get this for $62 a thousand by calling a five-and-a-half-inch board six inches. Sometimes it is five and three-eighths inches, but he must pay for six inches. Every worker, too, must buy flour, and he finds that a sack of good household flour costs about eighty cents more to-day at his point than the price at which the same grade made from Canadian wheat is quoted in Liverpool. In fact, flour, Manitoba Top Patents, is sold at about $1.69 per barrel cheaper in Liverpool than in Winnipeg. If he goes into dairying he finds himself up against a fiscal policy which can easily be explained by the action of the government in removing all protection on the dairy products which he expects to produce and placing it on the necessaries of life which he must buy, tending still further to herd our workers into the cities. Let me give a case in point. To provide that freer entry into the Australian market for the manufacture of Canada the government took three cents a pound duty off butter and placed it on raisins. In fact, this was the foundation of the Australian treaty. I would not mention it but for the fact that it seems to have been the policy of governments in this country for the last sixty years so to divide our people into two distinct groups, the capitalists and the wage earners. When there was a duty on butter which promised to be a factor in price fixing, it was at once taken off and that duty was placed on the necessaries of life. The old duty on butter was four cents a pound, but it was never then of any use to the farmer.

The efficiency of any nation must always be judged according to the cost of living and the cost of production in that country, and not by the ease with which the earnings of the worker are filched from him, which in the past has been mistakenly called prosperity. Land is cheap all over Canada to-day. It is the necessaries for settlement that are beyond the reach of the worker's energy and enterprise. We guarantee the profits of the owners of urban industry, but there is absolutely no security for the workingman, particularly the unskilled. There is no security either for the man on the farm. Everything seemingly is done to aid the capitalists, whose profits are guaranteed; but the workers are herded together without any consideration for their well-being. Urban industry to-day seems nothing better than an excuse to secure privileges by legislation and to filch the earnings of the farmer and the worker.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that capital was the great essential in industry. The great essential in industry, to my way of thinking, is energy and enterprise, and the end in view should always be the well-being of the subject. I had a resolution sent in to me, which I passed on to the Prime Minister, from the Biggar division of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, and it reads this way:

Whereas it has been brought to our attention that thousands of railway employees who would normally have steady employment throughout the year have been laid off, and are feeling severe privation and hardship resulting therefrom,

Be it therefore resolved that Biggar division No. 151, Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, go on record as favouring a conference of representatives of the financial, industrial and labour organizations being called with a view to stimulating industry, restoring the confidence of the public, and reducing unemployment.

The Minister of Labour says that the Dominion government has no responsibility in the matter of calling a conference to consider the question of unemployment. I have thought since that perhaps it was a good thing that a conference was not called on the spur of the moment, because after calm and more mature consideration a commission may be appointed, composed of men of economic thought and foresight, who will go to the root of the matter and find some permanent solution of the problem for the future as well as the present. The fact is that the worker's lot in Canada—and I must say that it is also the lot of the farmer, who is being continually driven into the industrial centres—is a precarious and haphazard one, subject to all kinds of class legislation and class privileges which neither the agriculturist nor the workingman shares. The ease with which production is carried on should be a national benefit. If it is easier to produce, it should be easier for the workingman as well as the capitalist. To the capitalist, ease of production is a bonanza; but to the wage earner it is a nightmare.

I was struck by a remark of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) in his speech the other day. He wants the farmer to make more butter, and he would place a duty on butter for that purpose. He really is speaking there for the great creamery combine or merger which is being formed to control that business from one end of this Dominion to the other, and for which he wants to secure all kinds of advantages. When the farmer's wife was the butter maker, everything she needed was, in price, out of line with the butter which she made and sold. But now that the merger is being formed, every advantage will be given to it, particularly the power of price fixing.

As I said before, the farmer has to pay high duties. He is penalized on all his raw material. Take salt, for instance. The packers and fish curers can get their salt in free, but the farmer must pay a high duty, not only on the salt itself, but on the covers containing the salt. By these means the small farmer is soon driven to throw up his hands and to tell the mortgage holder or the banker to take what is left, and he himself then crowds in with those who are already standing outside the factory doors in our industrial centres waiting for employment.

The hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough, who made a very good speech in a way, deplored the fact that we were importing a large quantity of foodstuffs which we might be producing here. Yet he very illogically advocates an increase in tariffs, which is the very bane of agriculture. He never told us, though, with what we pay for the goods we import. If the price of farm products to-day were in line with the price of manufactured goods, and the farmer were given the freedom of exchange which he needs, there would be a rush to the farm, and more people would be making their own living. Intensive farming would be the result, and our cities would not, even in the wintertime, be overburdened with workers. The means of production here should be the cheapest in the world. They say that unemployment exists in England as well as in Canada—one a free trade and the other a protectionist country; but the difference lies in this, that in England land is very dear, here it is cheap. In fact one of my protectionist friends told me not so long ago that if a farmer wants to sell out to-day in Ontario all he expects to get for his farm is the cost of his buildings —very little more. Indeed, I know one farmer who did sell out for less than the buildings could be put up to-day. That means the land is within reach of everybody, but the necessaries to make it productive are out of reach of the man who in an honest and humble way, with his own courage and enterprise, can make it go. Here is one of the real causes of unemployment at the present time.

Now, the demand for unemployment insurance is simply a natural growth of urban industry, as our fiscal policy is maintained to-day. We are subject to panics and industrial depression, very often seemingly for no cause whatever. The present situation may have been brought about largely through a bearish pressure on the stock market, which created a lack of confidence, and that in turn brought about a period of under-consumption. This is a fact anyway, that underconsumption is not only rife amongst the working class who are out of work, but people of independent means have curtailed purchases to bare necessities. The curtailing of the British preference by the latest restriction, a measure brought into force by our government a year ago, has prevented, I feel, a very large portion of our wheat being moved, and in this way we have the cause of unemployment accounted for in large measure.

It is a terrible indictment of our economic system that while our warehouses are full of manufactured goods and our granaries are full of grain, our industrial centres are full of hungry people out of work. Our manufacturers for whom this nation has been bled white take upon themselves no responsibility for the welfare of the men and women who work in their factories, and on the most flimsy excuses they have thrown them out of employment. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which was actively engaged in immigration, turned immigrants loose on a sympathetic rural municipality or village without any further care for them. I have here a letter written by the pastor of one of the churches in MacGregor, Manitoba, in which he says:

I had made up my mind to write you regarding a number of Welsh miner immigrants. Their statement to me was that they had come to Canada under what was known as the Canadian Pacific Railway cottage scheme. Their passage was paid, and then when they arrived in Canada they were to be put in a cottage with furniture supplied, and at once they were to receive wages amounting to about five dollars per day. Then after a year's experience on a farm they were to be placed in charge of a farm for themselves, etc. Rosy and bright was it not? When they arrived here, the cottages were old, unused, unfurnished houses, and there were no farmers looking for men at any such wages. I do not think much is to be gained by having men come to Canada under any such conditions, but at the same time the citizens of Canada ought not to permit any company whatsoever to bring immigrants here and dump them on a community in the expectation that the neighbours of those unfortunates would not see them starve. Four of the five families went into Winnipeg securing work for the summer, but how about the winter?

They are there to-day, swelling the ranks of the unemployed.

Regarding the conference which the Minister of Labour has been urged to call, the Saskatoon Star has this to say:

Only the Dominion government can take a proper survey of the economic problems thus created, chiefly the problem of seasonal unemployment. This is very clearly a national issue. No province or municipality can see the whole of it or attempt to control the movement of seasonal workers.

There are other reasons why the Dominion government has a duty to give a lead. It is responsible for immigration policy. It can, if it chooses, shut the door tight on immigration or open it wide and the policy it elects to follow evidently has an important bearing on the state of the labour market. Again, the Dominion government is the only government in the country which has any control over the monetary and financial policies of the banks, another powerful factor in limiting or enlarging opportunities for employment.

I think a duty rests there on the Dominion government, and I shall hope to see a commission appointed that will go to the root of this matter. A similar resolution to the one I have already read was passed by the United Farmers of Canada at a conference composed of the executive of the united farmers, the trades and labour council and the churches in Saskatoon. They, too, called on the government to investigate the present situation. I believe with the Star that the government must take the responsibility in a very large measure for unemployment, seeing that they control practically all the policies relating to labour conditions. I believe, too, that the present crisis is largely due to the inelasticity of credit. In point of fact, since the bank is the nerve centre of modern business, all crises are financial more or less.

Now, whatever we do, there is a duty we owe to those who are suffering hunger and the want of the necessaries of life, and without doubt some way will have to be found to bring about a scheme of unemployment insurance. The responsibility for this must be placed on the protected industries, and I believe with a proper system of such insurance based on the responsibility of the protected parties, the manufacturers of this country, a far more stable condition of affairs would be brought about. I am sure that under such a scheme employers could not create panics in the hearts of their workers through the threat of taking their jobs to the extent that it is done to-day. Labour is itinerant because of the uncertainty of employment. Employment insurance must be based chiefly on protected industry. Established industry in Canada to-day has an assurance which is not enjoyed by capitalists in any other country, and these capitalists must be made responsible for the working men whom they have induced to take employment in their factories. At the conference held by the United Farmers of Saskatchewan, the secretary of the trades and labour council told us that a very large concern which had established itself in Regina employed last year about a thousand workers. It laid off practically three-quarters of them at the beginning of this winter. When the manager was consulted he made the statement that it was the policy of his company to have one man on the job and two at the gate. It is unreasonable to expect that the nation's workers should be subjected to the exigencies of capitalism, and panics created to satisfy greed. I would tolerate protection in some form, and to some extent, if it were extended to the worker, but it is unreasonable to tax their necessaries of life. If the protectionist system, which at the present time is only a debauch, could be extended to the worker, and give some assurance to the wage earner, it might be more tolerable. There is no stability in our present method of manufacturing and distributing goods, and we may as well ask ourselves what it is that gives value to the subscribed capital of going concerns, all of which depend upon the exploitation of the people. It depends very largely on the control of parliament by the capitalistic concerns of to-day. Let me quote the words of Roger Babson, that great wizard of business and finance. This is what he has to say in regard to capitalistic investments:

> The value of our investments depends not on the strength of our banks but rather on the strength of our churches. The underpaid preachers of the nation are the men upon whom we are really depending, rather than the well paid lawyers, bankers and brokers. The religion of the community is really the bulwark of our investments.

To my mind those words are rather significant. It is a telling indictment against our present business methods when it can be said that the safety of the whole structure depends, not on a square deal for all, but on the want of proper information and the piety of our people.

Of the country's earnings last year, the banks took some $27,915,255 in net profits. Exorbitant profits mean under-consumption. We only need to know something of the A.B.C. of economics to understand that the fact that there are exorbitant profits means that there must be under-consumption. I have the following figures as to the net profits of Canadian banks, obtained from the bureau of statistics:

Bank of Montreal..	$7,070,892
Bank of Toronto..	1,453,436
Banque Provinciale du Canada.	551,622
Canadian Bank of Commerce..	5,066,229
Royal Bank of Canada..	7,145,137
Imperial Bank of Canada.. ..	1,561,561
Banque Canadienne Nationale.	1,053,099

The profits of the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Dominion bank and the Weyburn Security bank are not given. If we take the returns of those three as published last year and add them to the others, it brings the total amount up to about $30,000,000. This is so much money taken out of the Canadian industry. Canadian industry during 1930 will be that much more dependent upon borrowed money, unless agriculture is able to export at a profit what it has on hand. We have been able to meet these exorbitant profits by expanding agriculture year by year, but agriculture has reached the stage where it can no longer bear the strain. I see no hope of equity between the classes so long as our present system of privilege continues, and exorbitant profits are taken each year from the earnings of the workers. In fact, to me it is no wonder there is unemployment; big profits, I say, cause under-consumption. Credit and banking should be public utilities, publicly owned and controlled. More and more it becomes evident that the state must assume certain functions hitherto not deemed to be appropriate to it. Canada's inefficiency to-day is to be seen in the cost of living and the cost of production. The cost of living in Canada is higher than in any country to which she exports her goods, whether they be agricultural products or manufactured articles. Such a condition cannot be very long continued; the cost of living and the cost of production must be lowered as the first step in solving the unemployment problem.

With regard to the Prime Minister's speech yesterday, I want to say that if this government refuses to cooperate with the provinces, then the provinces, as sovereign entities, will have to take steps to protect themselves. In the past neither the Dominion nor the provincial governments have had any control over the welfare of our people, as a result of whose brawn and sweat the industries of this country have been established. The fiscal policy of this country has been in the hands of the capitalists, who nominally own the industrial plants of the Dominion. I say they only nominally own the plants which they direct, and with which they exploit the workers of the country. Neither Roger Babson's method, the capitalistic control of parliament, nor even the militia will be able to hold this country in peace, order and good government if the railway companies and other concerns, such as Besco, are allowed to import labour, as they import raw material, for their own benefit. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Star which describes conditions in the United States and contains also a warning which was thrown out the other day to one of the committees of congress in Washington. The clipping is dated April 1, 1930, and states:

> The country is faced with possibility of revolution unless the unemployment situation is met, William Green of the American Federation of Labour warned the Senate Commerce Committee to-day demanding enactment of the three pending Wagner bills to alleviate conditions.

Conditions are much the same in this country; we are following exactly the same policy that has brought United States agriculturists to the point where they must accept direct aid.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. R. E. RYERSON (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention unduly to prolong this debate but, sir, representing as I do an industrial centre which has been greatly affected by the serious unemployment situation which has existed for the past four months and is still with us, I deem it my duty to protest against the utter lack of sympathy on the part of this government and its unwillingness to assume any responsibility towards the relief of a situation which has become most serious in many centres of Canada. Appeals for assistance have been made to the government from many sources; deputations representing burdened municipalities extending from the Pacific coast to the Quebec border have waited upon the government and have pleaded and urged the necessity for cooperation and help in dealing with the situation. To all these appeals the government has assumed the attitude that unemployment and its distressing consequences are matters for municipalities and provinces to deal with. No effort has been made by the government in any way to relieve the situation.

I contend, sir, that the welfare and happiness of any people should be the first duty of a government, and that in times of depression and unemployment like the present it should use every means within its power, not only to remove the cause, but to assist in the relief of those who are in distress. While there may be no direct legal obligation on the part of the government in this matter, undoubtedly there is a great moral responsibility which should outweigh any other considerations.

In this respect, sir, may I mention the question of assisted immigration, and the effect upon unemployment of the dumping upon the industrial centres of the thousands of immigrants who were brought to Canada during the past year, under many different schemes and organizations, by agreement and with the consent of the government. Many of these immigrants originally destined for farm work were either improperly placed or were dumped upon the industrial centres, where they were left to their own resources, either to become public charges or to secure industrial employment to the detriment of our own workers.

May I describe to the house briefly the operations of one of these plans to secure immigrants and the manner of their treatment upon arrival here? The plan I refer to was called the Canadian Pacific cottage scheme, and was a three-way agreement between the British government, the transportation companies and the Canadian government. Under this arrangement 100 British families were to be brought to Canada and placed in cottages on farms, with regular employment guaranteed at fair wages. The British government were to make an advance of £25 to each family, this amount to be disbursed by the transportation company, and in addition were to recruit and make the selections. The transportation companies were responsible for transportation and placement at farm work in Canada, the Canadian government to share in the expense and to look after medical inspection.

The literature and advertisements used in recruiting were of the most alluring kind. I have examined several pamphlets which were distributed in certain districts in England and Wales, mainly mining districts, through the labour offices of the British government. Promises were made of a beautiful little cottage, a coloured sketch of which was displayed, and which was described as—cottage No. 2 of the farm on which the man was to have one year's employment at good wages. In addition, the family was promised a cow, some chickens and a piece of land to cultivate for its own use. I believe that the original scheme contemplated settling these families in the west, but for reasons best known to the transportation company they were landed in Toronto and distributed from there. In the neighborhood of 35 to 40 families arrived in Toronto during June and early July of last year. Complaints having been made to the Department of Immigration and Colonization, an investigation was held which resulted in the scheme being dropped. Many of the families were sent on to Brantford, where two double frame shacks, or rest cottages, as they were designated, had been erected in the centre of a large field or common about three-quarters of a mile from the city limits. The accommodation in these shacks was very meagre and the sanitary conditions wretched. No water was provided; it could be secured only from friendly neighbours nearly a quarter of a mile distant. These cottages were condemned and officially closed by the health authorities of the township of Brantford early in August, but I remember two of these families, one with nine children and the other with six, who were unable to find living quarters in the city and who lived under the conditions described until latter part of October. Upon their arrival in Brantford they were taken to the cottages and from there efforts were made to place them at farm work. Any hon. member who is familiar with farm conditions in the province of Ontario well knows that comparatively few farms are provided with secondary homes for hired help. With few exceptions the only homes available were deserted or anbandoned, most of which were unsuitable for human habitation. A family would be taken to one of these places and told: There is your home, the rent will be so much, and we have a temporary job for you on another farm, which might be a mile or a mile and a half away. Some thirteen or fourteen families found their way to the city and to the suburbs. Three or four families have been deported on account of having become public charges, and one woman was sent back on account of an improper medical inspection having been made.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

MERCHANTS' AND EMPLOYERS' INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 52, to incorporate the Merchants' and Employers' Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by my desk mate, the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier), to take charge of this bill of which he is the sponser.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 20, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage.—Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On account of the absence of a number of hon. members on both sides who are anxious to be present when this bill is discussed in committee, I would ask that the bill stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. J. J. E. GUERIN (St. Ann) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, respecting government contracts.

[Mr. Ryerson.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. GUERIN: The other day when this bill was being introduced I explained in a few words the nature of it. It provides that there shall be no age limit so far as workingmen are concerned, in connection with government contracts or contracts entered into by any organization, corporation or company other than the government, which organization, however, depends upon the government, has received, or may receive, or does receive government support. Consequently it includes many corporations such as harbour boards whose contracts would not necessarily be considered as government contracts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sorry, but we cannot hear at this end of the house.

Mr. GUERIN: There are many organizations which receive government aid or which owe their existence to the government. There are, for example, harbour boards, railway companies and many other organizations too numerous to mention which at one time or another have received government aid, and which, I think, should be governed by legislation of this kind.

I find that when people apply for work they are generally refused it on account of some limitation of age. Men in the prime of life, forty to fifty years of age, are not given work because of some arrangement that a contractor may have with an insurance company, or for some other reason. Objection has been taken privately to my bill in that it might interfere with insurance, but that is merely a side issue. Any insurance company will insure any man, no matter what his age may be, provided that the contractor is prepared to pay the premium. The objection is not one of insurance; it is one of economy on the part of the contractor who wants to get his insurance at the lowest possible premium. Therefore I think all hon. members will agree with me that insurance has nothing to do with the matter as it is all a question of the payment of the necessary premium by the party who does the insuring.

Many large contracts are shortly to be given out in Montreal. Upwards of $50,000,000 have been voted to be spent within the next five years and great works will be going on in that city. Unless some legislation of this description is enacted, I am afraid that contractors will hide behind the cloak of the private corporation and not live up to the conditions that would prevail in respect to a government contract and it is in order to cover all such contracts that I have introduced this bill. I think it was two years ago we voted $10,000,000 for the harbour of Montreal. We built elevators. I sent men there for employment and I was astonished to find that although they were husky, ablebodied, well-appearing men, they were refused work under the pretext that they were too old. Out of curiosity I visited one of the elevators that was being constructed in order to inspect the kindergarten, that was carrying on the work. I found that they were a lot of men who were evidently working for less than the ordinary Canadian citizen would work. I went in amongst them. There was hardly any English being spoken—practically nothing but foreign tongues. There were Poles, Italians, Lithuanians, and many others whose language I could not identify. But they were all foreigners. I looked around to see the habitations of these people, and I found that they just hived together, ten, fifteen or twenty in a house. They prepared their own meals. When the bell rang at twelve o'clock for luncheon, they would run to the nearest grocery, buy a loaf of bread and a little something else—while our citizens are going around with their hands in their pockets. My bill is to provide against such a condition. I do not want our people to be told that they are too old as long as they have robust health and comparative youth. The way things are going to-day, Mr. Speaker, the man who gets married at twenty-eight or thirty has only his first or second child on his hands before he is told that he is too old to work. The thing is preposterous, and we must legislate in some way in order to overcome any such pretensions, which are nothing but absurd. I am told that the Workmen's Compensation Act militates against my contentions because it insists on a certain insuring of the workingmen by their employers. But as I said before, the age limit at which a man may be insured is not defined in any workmen's compensation act; the matter is left entirely to the sense of justice of the employer of labour—in other words, to the contractor. Suppose the contractor could not get the necessary insurance for the employee. There is always the civil law that protects the working man, and he can always have recourse to the courts if the contractor has not covered his case by insurance. The Workmen's Compensation Act provides, as I understand it, that when an accident occurs the case shall be submitted to a tribunal which decides on the extent of the injuries done and the amount of damage to be paid. Their verdict is communicated to the insurer, who meets the obligation. But in order to get his employees insured cheaply, the contractor sets an age limit, and that is the crux of the whole matter. That is what I want to combat.

The last clause of this bill, I must confess will be more or less covered by the enactment presaged yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). I refer to the fair wage clause. In my bill I ask that the rate of wages prevailing for labour in the district shall be paid, and failing that, that it shall remain with the Minister of Labour to decide whether or not to cancel the contract. I provide that penalty in order to see that the contract shall be carried out on just terms.

I do not think there is anything in the bill that is likely to meet with objection. As far as my judgment goes, I have done all I can, with the aid of legal help that I have received in the house, to make the purpose of this proposed legislation clear. I sincerely hope and trust that it will receive the favourable consideration of the house.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): I am in sympathy with the purpose of this bill, but I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that clause 4 makes it a money bill, and therefore out of order. Apart from that, the bill does conflict in some degree with the working of the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province of Quebec. The Workmen's Compensation Act of that province is different from any other provincial act so far as I am aware, inasmuch as under the Quebec act employers are required to insure their employees with some insurance company. Employers are permitted to insure in any company they choose, subject to the approval of the Workmen's Compensation Board of the province. So that the Quebec Act, and the commission appointed under that act, have full control over the insurance under which the workmen are insured. Of course, the age of the workmen is a big factor in determining the premium that is to be paid by the employer, and I suppose that many employers of labour in the province are taking advantage of that fact and insuring their employees up to a certain age limit. That operates in the way my hon. friend has indicated, so that there is an age beyond which an employer does not insure his men and still have them protected under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

I am not sure whether my hon. friend from St. Ann (Mr. Guérin) knows that the labour representatives have been encouraged to expect that at the next session of the legislature of the province of Quebec the provincial act will be amended to place it on a somewhat similar basis to that of the Ontario act, which provides for state insurance rather than insurance by a company.

Apart from the fact that this is a money bill, I have only this to add. There is a principle in this bill which we might consider, and I think it might well be considered under Bill No. 149, which is now before the house. I feel that we might be able to provide by regulation that workmen shall not be debarred from employment on public works simply because of their age. If my hon. friend will withdraw the measure I will undertake to see if we can incorporate such a provision in our own regulations.

Mr. GUERIN: Mr. Speaker, I cannot see that there is any proposal in my bill to spend money, unless it be in the last clause referring to the fair wage that should be paid. I am quite willing to withdraw the clause, as I believe it will be covered by the regulations that are being prepared by the Minister of Labour; but I am not inclined to withdraw the three other clauses unless I see similar provisions written into the minister's bill. I do not know how far it would be in order for me to ask you to allow my bill to stand until I have an opportunity of seeing the clauses to be incorporated in the minister's bill, but if they do not cover what I am trying to provide for in my bill I shall be obliged to ask the house to proceed with it. I do not say that by way of a threat; I want to be as respectful as possible to the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid the bill cannot be allowed to stand as suggested, but in order to meet the wishes of my hon. friend I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

RIGHT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO ESTABLISH DOMICILE

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I ask permission of the house to revert to Bill No. 31? I was delayed and could not be in the chamber when the bill was called.

Mr. SPEAKER: It can be done only by unanimous consent. Is it the pleasure of the house that we revert to Bill No. 31?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands. The hour for private and public bills being exhausted, the house will now revert to the motion that I do now leave the chair and the amendment thereto.

[Mr. Heenan.]

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. RYERSON: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had nearly finished describing the sad experience of a number of British families who were brought to this country last summer. It is not my intention to set out in detail the disappointments and sufferings of these people. But is it any wonder they should strongly resent their treatment? I submit, sir, that the whole shameful proceedings constitute a blot upon the fair name of Canada—a blot which should be wiped out at the earliest opportunity. I do not blame the government for the manner in which these people have been deceived, or for the treatment handed out to them upon their arrival here, but I do desire to point out that in permitting and assisting in this kind of immigration the government is imposing additional burdens upon the municipalities affected, and for that reason is morally bound to assume some responsibility.

Another point which I should like to bring to the attention of the house is this: that while there are unemployment problems and trade depression throughout the world, these conditions in Canada are, in my opinion, caused by the policies of this government in tinkering with the tariff and in lowering the tariff protection in certain lines of industries, which has made possible importation of enormous quantities of products of all kinds, any considerable portion of which, if produced or manufactured here, would have furnished employment for the greater part of those who to-day are unemployed. In that respect may I point out as one example the importation of agricultural implements for the calendar year 1929. The figures furnished by the bureau of statistics show for the period named that we imported agricultural implements to the startling amount of $31,845,326. Had one-half of these implements been manufactured in Canadian plants, we would have no unemployment in my constituency. This is only one example; there are many others of a similar nature affecting different centres of industry.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the house to an incorrect statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the course of his speech yesterday which I am sure he will desire to have corrected. He stated that unemployment was of a local nature in certain provinces only, and for the province of Ontario, Port Arthur, Kenora and Toronto were the only centres mentioned. In making this statement he evidently overlooked a large deputation representing many Ontario municipalities which waited upon the hon. the Minister of Labour on February 3rd in respect to this matter. In confirmation of this I desire to quote the Brantford Expositor of February 4, 1930:

Mayor Beckett Is Disappointed
Sees Little Hope of Getting Federal Unemployment Assistance
Says Critical Time is Now, Not Six Weeks Hence

Mayor Beckett who returned with Alderman Linscott from Ottawa where they were members of the deputation waiting upon the government yesterday with regard to unemployment matters, expressed himself this morning as disappointed with the prospects of getting assistance. The mayor was one of five spokesmen chosen for a very large deputation from many Ontario municipalities. He stressed the fact that the critical time in unemployment was right now and assistance not forthcoming before a month or six weeks' time would be too late to meet the real needs. He discussed the unemployment conditions in Brantford at this time and told the Minister of Labour, Hon. Peter Heenan, that with the assurance of Premier Ferguson that Ontario would bear a one-third share of the excess cost of local improvement works undertaken during the winter as relief measures, an assurance that the federal government would bear a like proportion, would enable him to telegraph a message at once to Brantford that would enable the Brantford city council, in session last night, to provide for an immediate start on an extensive program of local improvement work. Without the minister's assurance the much needed work could not be undertaken as under the act the city and the taxpayer on whose frontage the local improvements were constructed must bear the cost in certain proportions. Under the present winter conditions the cost of such work was three times what it would be under summer conditions. The property owners and taxpayers could not in fairness be asked to bear this extra burden, and the assistance from the provincial government was conditional upon a corresponding contribution from the Dominion government.

I will not read the whole report, but will merely give the last paragraph:

Expressing his disappointment this morning, Mayor Beckett commented that "When you have got to carry politics to the length to forget about the actual needs of the citizens in the communities, it is time we got rid of politics." The need for assistance he said, was immediate, and from the result of the meeting with the minister it appeared "just a case of these politicians passing the buck, one to another."

I hold in my hand a series of resolutions from the Brantford Unemployment Association which I would like to present to the house. This resolution is dated March 12, 1930, and is as follows:

Whereas the unemployed in Brantford have found it necessary to organize an association for their own protection and whereas unemployment is the natural result of the application of power and labour saving machinery to industry,

And whereas this association is of the opinion that a system of unemployment insurance is the only logical solution of the problem of unemployment,

Therefore be it resolved that this Brantford Unemployment Association petition the federal and provincial governments to take immediate steps to enact legislation providing for a system of unemployment insurance, and be it further resolved that in the opinion of this association the provincial and federal governments should immediately take such steps as may be necessary to permit of the federal government assuming full responsibility for the relief of unemployment in all parts of the Dominion.

This resolution is signed by James Robson Humble, 68 Queen Street, Brantford, Ontario.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): A good deal of the discussion on the question of unemployment has hinged around the question of the relative responsibilities of the federal government and the various provincial governments. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) admits that the problem of unemployment is national in character, but he does not admit federal responsibility. It seemed to me that in his speech the Prime Minister attempted to put some of us who are supporting this resolution in a false position before the public by deploring the advertising that the debate gives to adverse conditions in the country. I cannot agree with such a proposition. As some other speaker said this afternoon, that is simply the attitude of the ostrich; he sticks his head in the sand and persuades himself that the problem does not exist. It seems to me that the only sane way to deal with problems of this nature is to face them; we must admit that they exist and do what we reasonably can to meet the situation. May I in this connection quote the late President Wilson:

That man is not a pessimist who, when he sees the funnel shaped cloud approaching directs the feet of his wife and children towards the cyclone cellar; but the man is not an optimist, he is a fool—nay, a criminal—who at that critical moment neglects his parental duty and stands agape rejoicing in the manifestations of nature.

It seems to me this quotation has an application in the problem we have before us.

I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister say that no representations had been made to him on the question of unemployment by the various provincial governments. At the recent conference held in the east block representations were made by three prairie governments, those of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I correct my hon. friend? I made no such statement; I did not say there were no representations made. I said there were no representations to the effect that the provincial governments themselves were unable to handle this question. That is what I said.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly the Prime Minister conveyed that impression to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not at all. If my hon. friend will look at my words he will see exactly what I said.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am glad to accept the word of the Prime Minister, and am pleased that he has set the matter right. Naturally I was very much disturbed, the same as many other hon. members, to hear the Prime Minister say that no relief would be given to the province of Saskatchewan because there is a government other than Liberal in that province. The Prime Minister did admit, rather grudgingly I think, that he was prepared to give some assistance to Progressive governments, but none at all to other provincial governments. In other words, in order for the poor, needy people to get consideration from the federal government they must obey the dictum to elect nothing but straight Liberal governments. I wonder if the Prime Minister would treat his own constituency of Prince Albert in a similar fashion. That is the constituency from whence he derived his seat in parliament; I wonder if he will tell the needy and hungry people there that they cannot secure consideration in this parliament because of the fact that the people in Saskatchewan have a government other than Liberal.

I enjoyed, as I am sure other members did, the extracts that the Prime Minister was pleased to read from his book entitled Industry and Humanity. I agree with all the statements he read. I always like to think of the Prime Minister as the man who wrote Industry and Humanity; I like to think of him as a humanitarian, and a man whose heart and sympathy go out to the common people. But, Sir, when I place the quotations from that book along with the statement he made in the house, I wonder what to make of it.

I agree with the quotations from the book; I agree with everything that the book contains, and it was a shock to hear the Prime Minister couple with his quotations the statement that relief would be withheld from those provinces who were represented by other than Liberal governments. When one compares that statement with the idealism, the altruism and noble sentiments expressed in the book, one begins to wonder if in the physical form of the Prime Minister there are two opposing spirits; one wonders, to use a common literary expression, whether he represents both Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. However, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine)—as a matter of fact, I think we all do—that the exactions and nervous strain imposed upon one holding so high and responsible a position as the Prime Minister must be very severe, and it is possible that when the Prime Minister made that statement, he was not in his normal temper or his normal state of mind. I can scarcely think that he was.

It is regrettable that this question of unemployment, involving the welfare and happiness of thousands of women and children, should be considered in the party spirit we have witnessed in this debate. It is my opinion that the question cannot properly be considered in this partisan atmosphere. It is something which calls for the cool deliberation of scientists and economists; it is not for the consideration of politicians who are placed in a political atmosphere.

When we come to the question of the relative responsibilities of provincial and federal governments I certainly cannot agree with the Prime Minister or with those who claim that this is a purely provincial or municipal matter. Let us take the case of a municipality that deals effectively with the problem, looks after its unemployed and provides relief or work, and compare it with the municipality which does not care for its unemployed. What is the logical outcome? The needy who are looking for work come into the municipality where work is being provided and where the people are being looked after. I can see no way in which to avoid such a situation. As a matter of fact, how can we prevent the needy, those who are out of work, from spreading from one province to another? To my mind there is only one government that can stop the people coming into the country, and that is the federal government which has control of immigration. For these reasons I say there is no way in which one municipality or one province can deal effectively with this problem. I am not one of those people who would lay the whole responsibility at the feet of this government—certainly not. There are great economic forces at work in the world to-day which neither this government nor any other government can control. We have to recognize that. These are world conditions, and Canada is only a small unit.

To come down to the local consideration of the question, however, and to deal with it as it affects Canada and as perhaps we might be able to control it, I would put the problem under three heads. I would say that first the trouble was caused by the recent stock market crash and the consequent reduction of the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of people. That has had wide ramifications in industry and in finance, and naturally it has had a great deal to do with the unemployment conditions which exist to-day. Then I would say the reduction in wheat prices has had some effect, and of course that also is to some extent a reaction from the stock market crash and the consequent curtailment of buying by farmers. Under the third head I would put the large immigration into Canada during the past few years. There is no question about federal responsibility for immigration. During the last three years we took in 330,000 immigrants. The Prime Minister referred to complaints made against the government because immigration into this country was not large enough. Probably that may have been so, but I can inform him that no such complaint ever came from this section of the house. From 1922 up to the present time the group in this section of the house has protested against a vigorous immigration policy. We never took the stand that people should not be allowed into the country, but we were opposed to the activities either of the government or of transportation companies in order to induce people to come here.

May I say in connection with the number of immigrants brought in during the past year, which amounted to 165,000, that never at any time in the history of the United States was that country ever called upon to absorb so large a percentage of its own population as Canada was during last year, and ordinarily that would not be considered a very large number of immigrants to come to this country. I think the immigration into the country during the past few years has had something to do with the increase in wheat acreage, and of course that has had an effect on prices.

Then there is another question, and this of course is related to the question of the stock market. It involves the whole money system, and the question arises as to whether or not we have the right money system. The matter of inflation and deflation has a great deal to do with unemployment, with business stagnation and with distress both in the rural and urban sections of the country. The hon. member for Westaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) last night gave it as his opinion that the unemployment in England to-day was the direct result of the deflation policy adopted by the British banks in 1920. Canada adopted the same policy, as did the United States. However, we are much younger countries, with greater resources, and it did not affect us so badly as it affected Great Britain. With that assertion I agree, and I think the reason that France has been in the happier position of recent years of having no unemployment problem is due in a very large measure at any rate to the fact that she did not permit deflation.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) this afternoon dealt with the question of the gold standard. The question as to whether or not getting away from the gold standard would change this condition is a very large matter. I have under my hand an article commenting on a book written by Professor Irving Fisher of Yale. In this book Professor Fisher points out that the trouble with the gold standard is that the unit of value, the measurement of value, is changing all the time. He has one remedy for dealing with the question, and the article points out that another remedy, from a different angle but involving the same thing, is put forward by Maynard Keynes, the distinguished economist of Great Britain. There is no doubt that the changing of the unit of value had a great deal to do with these problems.

Let me illustrate it in this way. We will say that a farmer secures 1,000 bushels of oats from a neighbour. The unit of measurement is a bushel, which is 34 pounds. If that unit is changing all the time, the way the dollar is changing in value, what is the result? The farmer incurs a liability for 1,000 bushels of oats, to be paid back perhaps in a year's time, but if at the end of the year, when his liability becomes due, he finds that he must pay back 1,000 bushels of oats on the basis of 60 pounds to the bushel, his debt is nearly doubled. That is the situation of thousands of farmers, business men and manufacturers to-day. Those who incurred liabilities even a year ago; those who borrowed money or incurred any kind of liability and are forced to-day, under deflation conditions with a slightly different unit, to pay back very much more than they actually borrowed.

Then the article goes on to say that Professor Fisher has recently issued a statement in which he gives it as his opinion that we are in for a period of low prices, business depression and unemployment. Professor Fisher states that the amount of gold that is being mined to-day is not sufficient to keep our currency up to the standard of our statutes, as far as maintaining the gold standard is concerned. He points out that the demands of commerce and industry for gold are very great; a large percentage of the gold mined is used in the filling of teeth and the making of jewellery, and there is not sufficient gold left to meet the requirements of our statutes in order to maintain a gold standard. Because of that fact, Professor Fisher points out that we are facing a period of low prices, of business stagnation, unemployment and distress.

Does that not seem an absurd situation? Let me put it in this way, to reduce the proposition to an absurdity. Supposing there were no gold mined at all; supposing all the gold mines in the world petered out and the production of gold ceased. Would that mean that if I have wheat to sell and some other man has clothing to sell, there is no medium of exchange by which he can buy my wheat and I can buy his clothes? That is exactly what it means, so long as we maintain this rather ridiculous system. Of course the gold standard is something like the British constitution, a thing which does not exist; because as a matter of fact we never have maintained the gold standard; there is not gold behind our currency as there is supposed to be. Our statutes are fairly flexible, and that is the only reason the system is workable at all. However, it does seem time that we began to inquire into this matter in order to try to get a permanent unit, something that would not be varying from day to day and causing all these business disturbances.

In a general way the unemployment problem is a result of the increased efficiency of the machines. There is no doubt about that, and that again is something governments cannot control and would not control even if they could. Let me again illustrate it in this way: Take the hypothetical case of say 1,000 people living on an island, with no contact with the outside world. We will say they have a perfect division of labour so that each person supplies his quota in the interests of the community. We will suppose that ten men have the responsibility of supplying the community with food. If these men invent a machine which will reduce their hours of labour, or which will do the same work with two men instead of ten, would that mean there would be eight men doing nothing and being fed by the community? In a properly ordered community these extra hours of labour would be absorbed back into the whole community, and the hours of labour would be distributed all around and shorter periods of work would ensue. If they worked full time, some of the time previously expended could be used as extra time to produce luxuries and other unnecessary things. Of course, this is the idealistic way of considering this matter. We do not want to destroy the machine because an efficient machine is simply making a slave of the machine instead of the man; it is producing with less labour, but there is something wrong with our system when an efficient machine which does away with human labour is responsible for a great deal of unemployment, which in turn is responsible for misery and distress.

I believe that immigration has had a great deal to do with unemployment. I would like to read a report which appeared on February 28, in a Swift Current newspaper. This deals with the evidence given before the Saskatchewan royal commission on immigration, as follows:

> J. S. Laycock, mayor of Swift Current, stated that in his opinion all immigration should be discontinued for a period of three to five years, or at any rate until the country had a chance to absorb and find employment for those already here. He was not opposed to immigrants coming to the country who had sufficient capital to establish themselves on the land and who would not become a charge on the province.

That gentleman went on to say that it would cost the town of Swift Current this year $5,000 for relief, and that is a very small town. He used some other pointed expressions regarding immigration. At the same sitting Mr. F. G. Westlake presented resolutions on behalf of the board of trade of Swift Current, which resolutions opposed immigration of any kind except in the case of those persons having sufficient capital to establish themselves and carry on without assistance. I cite these extracts as examples of the evidence presented before that commission. I would like to quote an editorial which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press on March 6, dealing with the recent immigration conference at Ottawa. That editorial refers to the statement made by the Prime Minister that unemployment was not a federal matter, but rather a matter which belonged to provincial and municipal governments. This editorial points out that recent immigration is a tremendous factor in unemployment. I quote:

> For instance, Vancouver testified that 70 per cent of the men on its register were immigrants brought out here under some form of assisted immigration, and 58 per cent had been here less than five years.

Calgary testified that 28 per cent of those unemployed were born out of Canada, and had come out to Canada during the past two years. The editorial refers to the fact that a very large proportion of the unemployed of Winnipeg were ex-service men, and it says:

Saskatoon declared that 40 per cent of the unemployed there were immigrants who should have gone on the land.

The editorial concludes:

—the general agreement seeming to be that 70 per cent of those on the list had been in Canada less than five years.

I realize that the government lately has changed its policy with regard to immigration, but even so I do not think the fact can be overemphasized that immigration has had a great deal to do with the unemployment problem, and I think this matter should be placed before the government for their future guidance.

Under the policy previously followed we have gone out into the highways and byways and pleaded with people and have done everything we could to induce them to come to this country. We have been doing our best to borrow the most terrible of all problems, the problem which confronts Europe and Asia, that of over-population. Canada should prize her free, open spaces, and should not be ready to give away the heritage of her people.

One of the causes of unemployment is the fact that the farmers are not purchasing as much as they did previously. One reason for this, although not the only one, is that agriculture has been made the shock absorber for the whole immigration policy. A deliberate attempt has been made, not only by the government, but by the transportation companies, to stimulate agriculture artificially, and when you artificially stimulate any industry or calling, whether it be agriculture, manufacturing, or professional work, you throw the whole economic machine out of gear. Organized skilled labour has been able to hold a club over the head of the government, and it has been able to say: You must not bring in men to compete for our jobs. The unskilled labourer and the farmer are not so vocal, they are not so well organized; consequently their industries have been forced to absorb the vast majority of the immigrants. I contend that the policy we have been following in the past is not only unjust and unfair, but it is unsound and uneconomic as a national policy. It would be just as fair and reasonable to advertise for doctors, for lawyers, for school teachers, for manufacturers and such like to come in and help develop this country, as it is to bring in farmers. I wonder what the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues would say if we advertised in the newspapers of the United States and Great Britain in an effort to induce lawyers and professional men to come to this country and compete in their professions. There would be a terrible outcry from the members of those professions if anything like that were done. The farmer has not been so well organized, he has not been so vocal, and therefore his industry has been made the shock absorber.

Mr. WARD: In that case we might get cheaper legal services.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps we might, although I was referring to the complaint which would be raised by the members of the legal profession.

I think it was about a year ago that I read a statement by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Crerar) in which he said that Canada soon would be producing a billion bushels of wheat per year and would have no difficulty in disposing of such a crop. Perhaps he was right and Canada soon will be producing a billion bushels of wheat, and perhaps she could sell it all, but at what price? That could be done within a reasonable time only by reducing our Canadian farmer to the position of a serf, and in that process business generally and the ordinary workingman would suffer to the same extent. A serf on the land cannot buy the products of the factory, business generally would suffer, and there would be unemployment and distress throughout the country. Because of the recent drop in wheat prices, unemployment and distress have occurred and business stagnation is general throughout the country. A statement with respect to a billion bushel crop may sound impressive; it may read fine in the newspapers and bring applause when it is made before a Canadian club, but I say that that can be brought about only by a reduction in the cultural, educational and economic standards of the men and women who live upon the land. I might add that it can be brought about only by a reduction in the moral standard, because you cannot reduce the economic and educational standards without a like reduction in the moral standard. The standard of living upon the farm cannot be reduced without a like reduction in the standard of living in the cities.

Russia has placed recently an order with the United States for $500,000,000 worth of farm machinery. That country to-day is engaged in the most ambitious project of development and of production perhaps ever undertaken by any country in the history of the world. She proposes within the next few years to put under cultivation an additional 30,000,000 acres of land. Russia must produce an exportable surplus in order to pay for this machinery. That is a factor to be taken into account in the consideration of an immigration policy, and when we talk of breaking up more land and bringing more people into the country.

The new immigration policy recently announced by the minister is rather late. It seems to me it should have been put into effect many years ago. May I point out that to the extent to which we provide remedies to alleviate conditions in this country, to that extent will other people come in and try to absorb those remedies, and it may be necessary to provide an immigration policy that will protect our working people and farmers from too much outside competition. I have under my hand an article which appears in the last issue of the Financial Times. It is written by Mr. R. J. C. Stead, who, I understand, is publicity agent for the Department of Immigration. Mr. Stead points out that in 1900 Canada produced manufactured goods to the value of $481,000,000. In 1927 this figure had risen to $3,425,000,000, or an increase of 700 per cent. In spite of the fact, however, that the value of manufactured products increased by 700 per cent in the twenty-seven years, the number of employees in the factories increased by less than 100 per cent. He pointed out that Canadian agricultural products in 1901 were valued at $572,000,000. In 1927, only twenty-six years afterwards, this figure had risen to $2,224,000,000, or an increase of 400 per cent; but notwithstanding the large increase in the output, the rural population had in that time increased by only 33 per cent. He pointed out what I have already mentioned, that while there are complaints—and he was answering some of them—that the government was not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants, never at any previous time in the history of the United States had that country been called upon to absorb so many immigrants in proportion to their own population. Mr. Stead further pointed out that since 1920 there was an increase of 22,388,000,000 tons of freight handled by United States railways. That is an enormous increase in the short period of nine years, but he pointed out that in spite of that huge increase there had been an actual reduction of 366,000 in the number of workers employed in that period.

My point is that Canada is capable, with the new and more efficient machinery we have, of making tremendous progress to-day with her own natural increase in population. Of course I am not advocating the shutting of the door. As regards those who have the money to establish themselves and who wish to come in of their own volition, I have no objection to seeing them come in, but we should stop now, henceforth and forever all efforts by advertising and special inducement to bring people into this country. The trouble with the policy that we have been carrying on in the past is that it did not take into consideration the social and economic welfare of the people who were already here. Any immigration policy, present or proposed, should have as its only object the welfare and happiness of the people now in Canada. I quote from a recent newspaper dispatch some observations made by Professor Ottewell of the University of Alberta before the Canadian Club in Montreal:

> Speaking before the Canadian Club in Montreal, A. E. Ottewell, of the University of Alberta, warned the capitalist class of the results that will flow from power farming, and advised that immigration should be curtailed in order that the farmers who were driven from the soil might find employment. He also advocated that "schools, churches and all social institutions should be overhauled to meet the new requirements."

Another newspaper article, dated at Winnipeg, November 29, in part reads:

> Prof. A. R. M. Lower of Wesley College, Winnipeg, in a recent public lecture declared: "We have no need of immigration to increase our population, and if immigrants in large numbers continue to come to us there can be but one result. Our own people—those who are born in this country—will have to go away. The presence or absence of immigration will not affect in the slightest degree the rate at which this country will grow."
>
> "For sixty years," Prof. Lower proceeded, "we in Canada have been receiving so many immigrants that we have had to embark a large proportion of native-born for the United States. This proves that, in five years out of six we have had more than sufficient man power.
> "'Cheap' men will always drive out 'dear' men. The man who is willing to take the least stays here; the other goes away. About 1,000,000 persons, native-born and immigrants, have left this country for the United States in the last seven years. This simply turns us into a training ground for United States citizens. The advent of the immigrant lowers the standard of living and makes the opportunities to the south of us loom larger in the eyes of the native-born.
> "Artificial accession by way of immigration is at least only so much waste effort—at worst, a form of racial suicide."

May I refer hon. members to a very interesting book called Mankind at the Crossroads, written by Professor East of Harvard university? Professor East lays down the doctrine that population tends to increase with available food and land supplies and opportunities existing within the country. His doctrine conflicts rather with that we call the Malthusian theory, that put forward by Professor Malthus of Oxford. In this connection may I quote some figures from his book? Professor East gives the rate of increase per thousand of population in the various outstanding countries of the world, and he also gives at the present rate of increase the number of years it will take the respective countries to double their population. The figures are as follows:

Country	Number of years to double population
France	436

France as we know has an almost stationary population.

Norway	105
Sweden	83
Austria-Hungary	82
Spain	80
England	67
Japan	64
Holland	57
Germany	51
Roumania	47
United States	38
Australia	34
Canada	24

Canada, because of its opportunities, increases the most rapidly in population. Professor East states that if Canada can support 60,000,000 people she will do well, and he says that she will approach that number in less than three-quarters of a century. The crux of Professor East's argument is that immigration does not and cannot increase the population; that to the extent to which we bring people in and absorb them in this country, to that extent we either drive our own people out or prevent their natural increase. That is a very interesting theory, and it is well worth considering.

The Prime Minister in his speech seemed to fear the demands on the treasury which would result from any federal measure of unemployment relief, and objected to taxing the people to assist the provinces to that end. He stated that his government, the Liberal government, was elected on a platform of economy, and he objected to taking money out of the federal treasury for the purpose of relieving unemployment. I have just the same objection as the Prime Minister has to taking money out of the treasury, but if he examines the public accounts he will realize he will save enough money for this purpose if he will practise economy in other things. If economy is the policy on which his government was elected; if that is the policy of the Liberal government, I would suggest that he practise it a little. Take for instance the expenditures on the Governor General's office, Rideau Hall and so forth: this year it cost nearly $441,000 and since the present government took office there has been a steady increase. Surely we could cut that in two and save a quarter of a million dollars. These figures are not final, because we spend on vice-regal cars a great deal of money which is charged up to the Canadian National Railways and which does not show in the public accounts. Last year we spent $149,000 on the citadel at Quebec. This has been discussed here so often that I do not wish to weary the house with it now, but the figures are startling. Their Excellencies, I understand, spend only about two or three weeks in the summer at the citadel, and yet we find this enormous expenditure of money. Let me give one or two items in the list of expenditures for the Quebec citadel, taken from the Auditor General's report for 1928-29:

Carpet, 1,871¾ yards $10,036.09
(Purchased from the Brinton-Peterborough Carpet Company, Peterborough.)

There is also an item for renovating and plastering the ballroom, at a cost of $7,712. It seems to me that when women and children are suffering because of unemployment in this country, we could very well do without these expenditures. The ballroom, I suppose, would be used only two or three times in twelve months. If the Prime Minister would go over these expenditures, he would easily find where he could save money enough to relieve unemployment without dipping into the treasury.

Take the expenditure on automobiles for the government, which was mentioned by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). That expenditure has been increasing steadily year after year, and the Auditor General year after year has been complaining about it. May I read a note, under the heading of automobiles and operating costs, in the introduction to the public accounts of 1928-29. The Auditor General states:

> The total expenditure in connection with new automobiles and automobile repairs, renewals, etc., but not including cost of gasoline and lubricants, amounted to $634,549.10, an increase of $92,622.46, or 17 per cent over the expenditure of 1927-28.

The Auditor General goes on to comment on that increased expenditure and to plead for a reduction. He made the same sort of comment in the public accounts of last year. He complained of a similar increase over the year before. I commend that to the consideration of the Prime Minister as a means of saving money to provide for the relief of the needy unemployed without increasing taxation at all. Undeniably there is unemployment in the cities and destitution on many of our farms. As a matter of fact, in western Canada to-day the land is rapidly passing out of the hands of those who toil on it. I do not know about the eastern provinces, but in western Canada landlordism and tenantry is almost as bad as it is in Europe. Those are conditions that we dislike to mention, but there they are, staring us in the face, and there is no use running away from them.

I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) as to the effect of poverty itself. Some people are accused of a lack of thrift, but their condition more often than not is the effect of poverty rather than the cause of it.

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise with very much pleasure to support the amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and his plea that immediate action be taken by the government in regard to unemployment.

Unemployment is not confined to Canada. It is a problem which we must all acknowledge belongs to every country in the world, and it is receiving the attention of statesmen everywhere and of legislatures the world over. In Canada we see, on the one hand, every mark of prosperity and wealth; we see millions of dollars passing in and out of the country for imports and exports; we see our trade and commerce expanding; we see thousands of our citizens living in security and sometimes in the lap of luxury; but, on the other hand, standing idle in Canada to-day are hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens, the very rank and file who are producing the wealth from which the nation benefits. They are physically able and willing to work, but the opportunity for work is not there. Others of our citizens, though at present engaged in work, have at all times the dread of unemployment hanging over their heads like the sword of Damocles. These, Mr. Speaker, are just the simple facts. The fear of unemployment is the most tragic and appalling problem that besets the great mass of men and women to-day. It is the paramount evil in the workman's life. His livelihood, his savings, his family, everything that is dear to him, is very often threatened by unemployment. His one great fear is that he will be out of work. The right to work, the right to get a fair wage for work, the right to earn the necessities of life, is the privilege of every man. It is based both upon divine and civil law. The causes of unemployment the world over are so numerous and varied that it would be impossible for me to enumerate them. I shall therefore attempt to speak only of the causes of unemployment in Canada itself as I see them, and before I conclude I shall offer what I believe to be the solution of this problem, or one that will at least reduce unemployment to the minimum in Canada.

We have the common accidents of life. We have sickness. We have casual and seasonal unemployment. We have the irregularity of large public works being carried on at intervals by the provinces and by the federal government. We have the closing down of industrial plants. We have new industrial methods developed in the interests of efficiency to increase output, with a consequent decrease in the number of workmen employed. We have likewise within Canada to-day the slow but steady destruction of our primary and sometimes of our secondary industries. We see this country being flooded by manufactured goods in an enormous volume, the great majority of which could be manufactured here. We are sending out millions of dollars—nine hundred million dollars went to the United States last year—for manufactured goods. Seventy per cent of this could be kept within Canada to build up our industries. I am simply stating facts as I know them. Unemployment, greater or less, must always be found as the natural corollary of our modern industrial system. Never can unemployment be eliminated; it is a by-product, it is the very shadow of our modern industrial life. But by a study of the causes of unemployment in any given locality, in any given province, or throughout the whole Dominion, and by the cooperation of the employer and employee, the provincial and the federal governments, ways and means can be found to reduce this unemployment to a minimum.

To make my position clear on this matter, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I firmly believe it is a sacred duty, incumbent upon this parliament, sedulously to watch for and provide ways and means to cope with the unemployment problem which is increasing in this country to-day to such an alarming extent. In the middle ages, labour was mostly agricultural and held in bondage by the feudal lords, but in the towns and cities it was controlled by the guilds. Later the state took control and began to interest itself in labour. You will recall that in England the Statute of Labourers was enacted which restrained workmen from wandering around the country, and likewise set the rate of wages, and these wages they were obliged to accept. But with the rise and development of modern industry the whole aspect of labour changed, with the result that the character of the relationship changed, and it has been recognized by every commisison that has investigated labour conditions that the obligation to reduce unemployment rests, not upon a municipality, not upon any particular division of the commonwealth, but upon the commonwealth as a whole. In other words, unemployment is a national reseponsibility. Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) endeavoured to limit the significance of the word "national", just as later he also endeavoured to limit the significance of the word "state," to a province merely. I do not accept the limitation, Mr. Speaker, and I feel there are many reasons why this parliament should take part in reducing unemployment throughout the whole dominion. In proportion as the state receives wealth from labour and from industry in the form of income and other taxes, and as the federal Minister of Labour is concerned with labour throughout all the provinces, it is but right that this parliament should take appropriate action so that every man who is physically fit and willing to work should be given at least a fair chance of obtaining employment at good wages.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to get before the house what I believe is recognized by the great masses of the people to-day to be fundamental. Our present government—I want to get that home—our present government is responsible for something that is not only a tragedy, it is a shameful blot upon our fair Dominion. In what way, I am asked. I reply, many of Canada's sons and daughters are leaving the country, as every hon. member knows, simply because they cannot get employment within her boundaries. And sir, for the last two days we have been trying to shift the responsibility for unemployment and throw it to the four winds of heaven for the league of nations or some other body to take up. I was surprised when I heard the argument advanced that unemployment was a matter that did not concern this parliament. England is a thousand years old, and is it any wonder that she should have unemployment; is it any wonder that after those many years with her intensive industrial life that unemployment prevails there? But when you come to Canada, a young country of great natural resources, to which the eyes of Britain are looking in the hope that Canada will assist in solving some of her problems, what do we find? We find that Canada herself is unable to cope with this problem of unemployment. I think we should bow down our heads in shame to be paraded before the empire and before the world at this hour as a country unable to cope with it. Is it not humiliating to reflect that with our small population and our great natural resources we cannot give to our able-bodied, physically fit men the right which is theirs to do a day's work and so get an assurance that at least they will be able to provide their wives and children with the necessaries of life?

I have heard yet no argument advanced by the Prime Minister, nor by the Minister of Labour, nor by any other hon. gentleman that would cause me to change my view that unemployment is a national problem, that is, a problem for the federal authorities to deal with. In their efforts to shift the responsibility to the provinces the municipalities they have moved around in a large circle, but on no occasion have they come out and declared the faith that is in them. I honour a noble opponent, I respect the man who differs from me politically, but I want to know exactly the basis of his political faith. During the past year while crossing Canada I have watched deputations of the unemployed and on the city streets I have noted the crowds waiting patiently for work, and the sorry state of affairs has always brought to my mind a countryman of mine, Oliver Goldsmith, who at a period when something similar was happening to his country, wrote these lines:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay:
> Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

More governments have been defeated by failing properly to estimate public opinion upon vital questions concerning the well-being, happiness and material success of the people than from any other cause. I wish to say to-night that such a question is before the people of Canada, one which concerns their well-being, their material success and their happines. I may recall to the house an occasion somewhat similar to this in 1910 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, doubting the advice of his friends, decided to go west and learn the state of public opinion in those western provinces. Therefore, in the months of July and August he crossed western Canada. Here was a popular man, one who had won the respect of all, welcomed by foe as well as by friend through the years of his political life. What did he find? He found that instead of admiration he was received with cold criticism; in place of applause he received silence, and the result was that before the election of 1911 came he anticipated exactly what was going to take place. He found at that time, as I believe the present government will find when it goes to the country, that the voice of public opinion was against the policy which his government was pursuing. Agriculture is the key industry of Canada; my friends opposite will no doubt admit that. Moreover, it is not merely a key industry; it is a vital factor in times of national defence; it is at all times the basis of material welfare of the people of Canada. That being the case, let us look at a few very important facts to illustrate what I said a moment ago. Agriculture, the great primary industry of Canada, has been strangled by the action of this government. Do you want proof to show where we are drifting in regard to this basic industry? If that is what you wish, I will quote figures. In the last ten years the animal products of Canadian farms have decreased from $156,000,000 down to $55,000,000. In 1920 Canada was an exporter of every principal animal product, but to-day our Dominion is an importer of bacon, butter, mutton and lamb. The export of other animal products at the present time is a mere fraction of the 1920 figure. An outstanding fact is, to my mind, that for the first time in forty years Canada's exports of bacon to Great Britain are nil; yet the United Kingdom imports annually over 900,000,000 pounds of that particular commodity.

Why pursue what we all know to be the case? It would not be in order for me to attempt to alter the viewpoint of those who persist in saying that the fiscal policy of a country plays no part in the solution of the unemployment problem. I wish to say that if we could keep within Canada 60 per cent of the $900,000,000 we paid out during the last year for manufactured goods imported from the United States we would not have an unemployment problem to-day, and we would not be faced with the amendment which is presented for our consideration. On that point I wish to say that as far as I can see, after reading the steps that have been taken in other countries in regard to social legislation and unemployment insurance, there is merit in the proposal. It draws to the attention of the government, the employer and everybody concerned, the importance of solidifying industry. Marine and fire insurance, when first introduced, did not have the expected results which were later realized, yet we find over two-thirds of the expected fires did not take place; the same may apply to unemployment insurance. If that be the case I see great merit in this particular insurance scheme. Yet we heard the Prime Minister put forth yesterday the argument which precluded the possibility of this parliament having anything to do with the relief of the unemployment problem.

Before I speak about the Prime Minister I would like to say a word to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), and I shall try to speak in a way which, owing to his genial nature, he will understand. When he made the speech the other evening covering such a wide range of subjects, and to a great extent subjects which were very remote from the problem before him, I was reminded of an Irish story. An Irishman went to Australia, and while there he saw the Australian parakeet for the first time. It is a beautiful bird with golden plumage and variegated feathers. This particular bird was sitting in a tree, and the Irishman became so interested and absorbed in the beauty of the bird that he determined to catch it. As it was in the suburbs of the city he climbed the tree, and when about to put his hand on the bird he heard the remark, "Hello, what do you want?" The Irishman thereupon lifted his hat and said: "Oh, excuse me, sir, I thought you were a bird." Until the other evening I thought the Minister of Labour was the Minister of Labour, but now I would call him the Minister of laissez faire, because I think he very nicely went over a delicate problem and left it untouched.

Furthermore, coming to the speech of the Prime Minister, I think he did not realize the gravity of the situation as the people of Canada see it to-day. Before I go on with that point, I wish to draw attention to a state of unemployment which I know particularly well, and which exists in my own part of Canada. We have among the fishermen of British Columbia the finest and most daring body of men in the world. They are out on the stormy waters in the depths of winter, dashed and lashed by the infuriated gales, in quest of what? They are there in order to secure the rich products of the sea, bringing it into port in order that thousands of people in their luxurious and well looked after homes can sit down and enjoy that food. What is this government doing for the fishermen on the Pacific coast? I will tell you, sir, that there is an immediate way to stop unemployment and to help Canadian men give a little more comfort to their wives and children, to which they are entitled. Why, sir, we always believed that beneath the British flag we found not merely justice and equity but consideration on the part of those who were in power. The fishermen of the coast, in their very own harbours, have to pay two cents a pound on halibut which is taken out in bond and sent to the markets of the United States. Furthermore, they are being threatened with an extra 5 cents per pound on this frozen halibut. Right now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that if the Conservative party, to which I have the honour to belong, were in power it would not be more than twelve months before the men at present unemployed would be working, and in five years from now not merely would every man be employed but we could employ one million more of our own kith and kin. It is no use disguising the fact, sir, I will go further and say that under our present policy the government of this country, to use a simile understood by all, is taking the ship of state down a stream whose loud and resounding roar indicates that there are cataracts of danger ahead, not merely for Canada but for the empire as well. That is a statement the truth of which any man who wishes to examine matters will see for himself.

Now, sir, the next step is to turn to the Prime Minister's statement, and I wish to say that it astonished everyone. I see the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) would like a little story, so I shall tell him one. A gentleman was caught by his wife kissing the cook.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRADY: Is that unparliamentary? His wife said to him: "John, you surprise me." He had a little more knowledge of grammar and of correct speech than she, so he replied "No, my dear; you are astonished, but I am surprised." When the Prime Minister last evening made to this house and flung to the four winds of Heaven the terrific pronouncement that he would not give five cents to a province that had a government that was not Liberal, I was astonished, and I want to say that the very dykes that he has been standing behind, and which were supporting the Liberal party in Canada, were swept away by public opinion, and the flood waters of indignant public opinion were let loose over the Liberal party. I do not want to exaggerate, but I will tell you the effect produced by the words of the Prime Minister last evening. He stood representing the Liberal party, which is the supposed party of freedom for democracy, but no oligarch of Russia; not even Alexander of Macedonia, that savage king; not the tyrants of Syracuse; not even the Roman dictators ever held a bludgeon over the heads of their people equal to the threat made by the Prime Minister last evening. Why, sir, he delivered an ultimatum last night to Canada, and as he stood there I was reminded of days during the time of the ancient Roman empire, when the plebeians of that time were whipped by officers and forced to cry out in the market place, "Non habemus regem, nisi Caesarem" in other words, "we shall have no king but Caesar." They were flogged to declare before the world that everything was all right with Rome. Last evening the people of six provinces that are not flaunting the flag of Liberalism were told to cry out, "we shall have no king but the Prime Minister, who sits in Ottawa to-day." That is exactly the message that he tried to inculcate; and now I see a little behind the scenes. Is it any wonder that in districts and constituencies that were not supporting the Prime Minister we found it most difficult to obtain from the Minister of Public Works the needed requirements which would help unemployment in those parts of Canada? This is an absolute corollary to the statement of the Prime Minister. He said last evening something so unusual in the annals of the great Liberal party, something so unusual in the annals of every great party of any country, that we must wipe out this insult if we are true to our principles and to that which we hold highest and dearest. That is, that no matter what party we belong to, the party of power will be impartial and will do what they feel they should do, whether or not the representatives of any part of Canada belong to that party. That is what our party would do, and furthermore I wish to say that if I could not believe that the Conservative party when they come into power would be able to bring back Canada to her righful place within the empire I would unhesitatingly sever my connection with that party. Should this government remain in power longer we shall have gone too far down the precipice and it will be difficult to retrace our steps and build up this country. This offers food for reflection. Unemployment is undoubtedly something which should concern us all; it should be paramount to every other consideration.

The great mass of the ten million people in this country, those who rear their families and give stalwart sons to Canada, are waiting to see what political party is able to build up this Dominion and take from our natural resources that which will enable them to live. What a pallid page is offered for the people of Canada to read in the record of the Liberal party during the last six years! It is a pallid, wane page of weak endeavour and of hopeless incapacity to realize the great possibilities open to them had they been true and faithful to their trust.

When our party returns to power, as I believe it will, it will be for the salvation of Canada and the empire. I have no political bias, but I believe, as the majority of Canadians believe, that the future destiny of Canada, at least for some years to come, is linked and bound up with the Conservative party.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with great pleasure to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Brady). If the force of his argument were equal to the charm of his Irish eloquence, it would be unnecessary for me to rise in my place, but I am afraid that something more needs to be said.

Representing as I do a constituency which is speedily becoming industrialized, I could not permit this opportunity to pass without giving my point of view. At the outset I desire to say that I will endeavour to make my remarks as uncritical as possible, but I would like to use what persuasive powers I have to influence the government to change its attitude on this question. I think that what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) have said is true, that Canada, like most countries, needs to be educated regarding this question. I am afraid that the fact that we are not educated has had some bearing upon the attitude adopted by the government. It seems to me that a government should be a leader of public opinion as well as a follower. I have said already this session that governments tend to follow the line of least resistance, and I am afraid that the unemployed worker belongs to a class which is practically a political nonentity, an unorganized class, and one which has no means of bringing its political power to bear effectively upon this house. Possibly the unemployed themselves are to blame, but it seemed to me a very significant thing when I heard that Tom Moore, the leader of organized labour in this country, was not in favour of any move being taken along the lines of this amendment. Upon that fact I think there hangs a tale. The aristocrat of labour, like the government, has very little real feeling—

Mr. HEENAN: I know the hon. member does not desire to say anything which may be in error. I do not know that Mr. Moore ever has said that or has been accused of saying it. The only reference to that question is the fact that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada endorsed the action of the government in not calling a conference.

Mr. BIRD: Still my point has force, that we have a class of workingmen in Canada which is not organized, a class which finds itself in the queue at the soup kitchen. These men are large in number, but they are not organized; they have no means of making their position felt in the house; they have no one to lobby for them in Ottawa.

The unorganized classes, whether they be farmers or labourers, must learn a lesson: that there is only one way in which they can get justice from the powers that be, namely, through organization. I see very little hope of the unemployed receiving consideration from any government until they become organized so that their diffused power may be focused. There is a good deal of inertia to be overcome among all classes in this country.

A few years ago a prominent public man in the United States said that if ever that country had a revolution it would be produced not by the bolsheviks but by the boneheads. The bonehead constitutes a very large class in any industrialized country, and that class is made up of many varieties. One variety is composed of people who are moved by crass stupidity in regard to social and economic matters. I have actually heard pious people quoting the Scriptures in order to prove that the solution of the unemployment problem was hopeless because the Author of Christianity once upon a time said that the poor will always be with us. That is one kind of attitude which still obtains in almost every industrialized country—a hopeless, stupid outlook upon this question. There is also what I would describe as the Pharisee in modern economic life, the man who says: If a man is unemployed he has nobody to blame but himself; it is his own fault. Does anyone deny we have that class in Canada? You can find in every city and town the man who, with a superior air, says that if a man is unemployed it is his own fault. I remember years ago reading the life of Will Crooks, one of the first labour members at Westminster. That story of Will Crooks' life cured me of that attitude. He was a man representing the best type of British workman who in his young married life walked the streets of London day after day, and only by an extraordinary amount of will power saved himself from going over the precipice and becoming one of London's unemployables.

There are other attitudes which have been taken. There is the attitude taken by the Prime Minister the other day. I know the Prime Minister is not a stupid man; I would not classify him with people who are labouring under traditional views on this question, but just the same his speech was a real disappointment to me, a disappointment all the keener because some of us saw that speech on the background of the Prime Minister's own mind, a mind that is illuminated with modern economic truth; and I say that a speech such as he delivered the other day was on that account all the more lurid in its deficiency. As I analysed the speech as he went along, I found he gave seven arguments against doing anything immediately for the unemployed in this country. Each of those arguments individually was to me very unconvincing. Collectively they lacked logical coherence; there was running through them no thread of reason. I have not time to-night to refer to them in detail and if I had it would possibly be superflous, because others have adequately dealt with them. Some of those arguments were very far-fetched. For instance the Prime Minister said that stressing unemployment conditions would act detrimentally upon the flow of capital to Canada. That is a far-fetched argument; it is an unworthy argument, because, after all, capital does not enter into the same category with suffering human beings. But from another standpoint, as someone said this evening, it is not right, it is not safe, to hide an evil. It is not safe to talk in quiet tones about something that is festering in the body politic. When the Prime Minister said that, he reminded me of the refined old lady who died of gastric trouble. The reason she died was because she always told the doctor she had a pain in the chest; she was ashamed of saying where the pain really was. If we Canadians get into the habit of covering over, glozing over, the social evils that are corroding our national life, the possibilities are that those evils will presently become a focal point that will gradually poison our social life. A labouring class—and I dislike using that term—that is well taken care of, that is relieved of its fears, is in any country one of the things that will attract not only capital but everything else we desire to have as a country.

Some of the Prime Minister's arguments were, if not far-fetched, plausible. I am not going to enter into a discussion in regard to the British North America Act because I think that has been very well dealt with. But there was one argument that struck me as being altogether misplaced and it was this: the Prime Minister said: If we yield to this plea it will mean favouring one class of the community, namely, the labouring class, but the farming class and the professional class will be left out in the cold. I have only one way to answer that and it is this: that the attitude, the spirit, that is out to readjust industrial conditions in this country is the attitude, the spirit that will ultimately adjust farming matters. Fundamentally the farmer and the industrial worker stand upon common ground. Any attempt to divide their interests can be successful only so long as those two classes do not understand wherein their interests lie. In fact, I cannot see any hope for either the farmer or the industrial worker until they understand the common ground upon which they stand. The spirit in which we in this corner are supporting the industrial worker is identical with the spirit in which we support the producer. After all, it is the attitude, the spirit, which counts.

As to responsibility, the Prime Minister, while recognizing the problem, tried to escape the responsibility. As I view the matter, as I have heard the causes of unemployment discussed in this debate, every cause of the condition we have been referring to points to the national parliament. The problem is a national one, in the only sense in which the word "national" can apply. I am not going to enumerate to-night the causes of unemployment because I would be merely going over ground that has already been traversed; but each cause that has been discussed during this debate resolves itself into a question of policy that belongs to the federal parliament. I do not know of any single cause of unemployment that belongs to any particular section. Take it, for instance, from the point of view of the Conservatives to our right. They say that unemployment is due to the policy of low tariffs that is formulated in this house. It seems to me that a Conservative government when in power would, by the very force of its own position, have to formulate a policy for unemployment. They recognize the unemployment problem as originating here. But the same logic applies to my friends the Liberals. However much they try to shirk the inference, we know that the enactment of a fiscal policy either one way or the other will displace labour in this country; there is no question about that. This house wields an instrument which is potent for good or ill to the labouring men. If you raise the tariff, you certainly put men out of work. If you lower the tariff, you certainly put men out of work.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Why?

Mr. BIRD: That question has been answered so frequently that I would have thought my hon. friend's education would have been, by this time, well advanced along that line. We cannot escape the logic of the situation. My hon. friend says that he represents labour in this house, and I accord to him the honour which he claims for himself. Let me read the pronouncement of one of the most outstanding labour men at the present time. In my opinion he is one of the most sincere labour men in Great Britain, a man who has suffered a great deal for his principles. I refer to Hon. Mr. Lansbury. In regard to this very question that my hon. friend has interjected he says, speaking of the Labour government of which he is a member:

> We also tackled the question of free trade and tariff reform, taking our stand that neither of these shibboleths could ever be a solution of the poverty problem. We pointed out that in this land, under free trade and free competition, women, children, even babies were exploited; that slums and workhouses, mental asylums, and all social disorders of our day were the accompaniments both of protection and free trade. We also proved that the state and municipal socialist action was absolutely necessary to curb the terrible social evils which, during the days of free trade and protection had grown up in the great industrial centres owing to the reckless manner in which trade and industry were carried on. We argued that neither tariffs nor free trade do secure decent standards of life for our people.

I think that is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend, because while I accord to him the privilege which he claims of representing labour in Canada, yet at the same time I think the Hon. George Lansbury is an authority equal with his own. I was intending to come to that point a little later.

My purpose at the present time was not to enter into a controversy on the tariff. I was pointing out that the government wields an instrument that may at any moment displace labour in this country. I am not speaking of the eventualities that may happen years from now. Any serious change in fiscal policy almost at once displaces labour from one end of the country to the other, and if this parliament has any human feeling at all it would never presume to make any such change unless it provided for the displacement of labour that would surely be one of the fruits of its policy. We are coming to a time when the people are going to demand such humane consideration on the part of parliaments. They say to parliaments: We are not so much concerned with your policies as with their effects upon human beings. We want protection for human beings.

I want to conclude my remarks by stressing that point. I would like to appeal to the humanity of the Prime Minister. I do not think from what I know of him that an appeal like that will be altogether lost. I am not one who mocks at the idealism of the Prime Minister. I think that it is one of the finest manifestations that we have in Canadian public life. The fact that it may not have borne fruit is a matter for further discussion, but the fact that we have a Prime Minister who does show some comprehensive knowledge of these problems is, I think, something gained. It is a starting point at any rate; but, of course, it ought not to stop there. I would like to appeal to the Prime Minister's idealism. I know that other appeals are perhaps obscured by considerations of party, by presuppositions that really do not relate to the human element. But clearly this is a matter of human importance. Here is something that concerns the immediate well-being of men, women and children.

There are in the final analysis only two kinds of economic theory in existence; there have been only two ever since men have exchanged products with one another. The first theory was crystallized into a doctrine over a hundred years ago, a theory which postulated that the way to make a country great and wealthy was to subordinate the individual to the state, that the only way to build up a country in grandeur, in material possessions, was to forget the individual, to subordinate him to the necessities of the state. The other theory was the reverse. It maintained that the true economics was the economics which subordinated the state of the individual.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That is the protectionist theory.

Mr. BIRD: It is. We will come to that in a little while. The theory of Adam Smith was never a Tory theory until the Tories thought that they had something to gain by it.

The second theory of economics that I mentioned goes back a long way—two thousand years at least. Once upon a time there was a story told near the lake of Galilee about a man who went to seek for hired help in the market place. Going frequently there during the day he found men unemployed. The old hard theory of economics was working unconciously two thousand years ago; men were standing idle in the market place looking for work and looking in vain. But an employer came along—a remarkable thing, it was an employer!—and hired the last man during the afternoon and put him to work, and when the night came this employer paid that labourer the same money as he paid the men who had worked all day. That employer was looking at the human side. This man and his family had to live twenty-four hours, and therefore he must have a day's pay. So "unto this last" that human employer paid the same wages as he did to the fully employed. That is the kind of economics we are trying to put over in parliament. It was almost two thousand years before our industrial system began to take any notice of that; nineteen hundred years of blood and tears that will scarcely bear telling about in any public place. The story of industrial oppression is one that human language is insufficient to depict in all its horror and repulsiveness. For almost nineteen hundred years there was no sign of this human attitude in industrial life until in the middle of the nineteenth century John Ruskin dared the industrial powers of Great Britain and issued his book strikingly named Unto This Last, basing a new system of economics upon the very phrase.

I want to say that any government has got to choose between these two ideals in modern industrial life; either subordinating the individual to the state, worshipping material prosperity; or subordinating the state and all its adjuncts to the well-being of the individual and his family. There is no other choice. In England the doctrine of Ruskin has already had its effect; it has swept Ramsay MacDonald into power, it has swept the Liberal government out of power. Ramsay MacDonald is where he is to-day, in twenty short years he has built up a potent party precisely on Ruskin's social ethics. I do not know whether when in power he is quite as ardent for that ideal as when out of power, but nevertheless the whole reason for the labour party in the old country is in this attitude. This everlasting worshipping of the almighty dollar has got to go. The necessities of the times, the terrible cruelty with which the industrial machine is bearing down upon men, women and children, is demanding a form of government which will change the whole process. A state never was meant to flourish at the expense of the individual, a state was meant to be a function of cooperating individuals; and yet in this house from year's end to year's end we hear nothing but continual bragging about the enhancement of material conditions. The government must have its mind turned to human conditions; it must try to think of progress in domestic terms, in human terms, it must look in a new direction altogether.

After all, this contrast of economic theories has always affected politics. The Liberal party started out as the champion of the individual, it attempted and succeeded in throwing off the shackles of a state that represented privilege, it succeeded in doing that to the everlasting gratitude of the whole human race. But the Liberal party was better than its creed. The Liberal party in freeing the individual also proclaimed the sanctity of the individual. It said that every man counted for one—and latterly it said that every woman counts for one. Well, if every man counted for one, what about these poor unemployed who are seeking work in vain to-night? Liberalism, like other movements, strayed from its first inspiration. Liberalism, having brought political liberty to men and women, forgot that a new duty had risen up above the horizon, the duty of getting men to cooperate for their mutual good. I am afraid that Liberalism as we have it here is in danger just there. It seems to be rather an ironical condition of things that our Conservative friends in the course of history should have adopted the socialistic attitude. I think that is the worst of having two parties historically face to face with each other; one party accepts one extremity, and the other one naturally accepts the other. An hon. member rightly indicated that the Conservative party was the socialistic party. From the time of Burke, the Conservative party has tried to exploit the social idea, it has tried to organize society in the interests of the privileged few, and it has very often succeeded; the rising tide of democracy has been the only limit to it. The Conservative party to-day is exploiting the social idea in favour of the privileged few. The Liberal party is committing the opposite evil. The Liberal party has not risen to the call of the age. This is an age that demands cooperation. Individualism is all right, but individuals left to themselves do not prosper. The Liberal party, if it is to have a future, must appeal to the social instincts of the people, it must give over bragging about prosperity in the material sense, it must concentrate itself upon the betterment of human beings. There is all the difference in the world between the two policies, and I certainly would not be criticising the Liberal party to-night if it showed any clear indication that it was turning its eyes away from this individualism, which in the long run only ends in special privilege because the unorganized organized masses are always the prey of special privilege. As I say, the economic enlightenment of the Prime Minister is certainly to the good. If he were not enlightened, we would have the task of enlightening him. The fact is, however, that he knows as much as I do about it, and more. The only point is, as we have all noticed, that when idealists enter party politics their ideals are left to struggle, and nearly always unsuccessfully, with party exigencies. We have seen it in almost every parliament of Canada; it is one of the great pities of to-day that there should be a form of political organization which when it attempts to make its appearance stultifies idealism. These conditions, however, cannot remain much longer. As far as the farmers of Canada are concerned I believe they are going to come forward with a type of political organization which will express their political aspirations more successfully than has been done in the past. It has not been done with much success in the past, I must admit, but it is only twenty-five years since the inception of the Labour party in England, and during that quarter of a century the Labour party, with its idealism and social ideals has fought with great success against entrenched privilege in England.

Mr. THORSON: Wherein will the new farmers' party differ from the other party?

Mr. BIRD: I am not taking much stock in the new farmers' party. I do not think the solution lies in any particular type of party; I think we have had enough lessons to satisfy us that the attempt to start new and pure parties is doomed to failure. I do say this, however, that the economic organizations of the west, such as the pool organization in Manitoba, have enlisted 37,000 farmers to act in cooperation. We have never experienced a more complete organization in Manitoba than the one we have at the present time. There are 37,000 farmers organized around the ideal of cooperation. In my opinion the farmers of Manitoba can afford to forget about party politics, because they have formed an organization which has more political power than any political party the west will ever produce. I wonder what special privilege will throw the gauntlet down to the cooperating farmers of western Canada; I know of no power in Canada which has sufficient political influence to do it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. A. B. THOMPSON (East Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a clipping from the Toronto Globe of April 3, 1930. It is as follows:

> No fewer than 188 homeless men were given shelter at the local gaol during March. This figure, according to police chief A. L. Church, is without precedent in the town's history.

This extract refers to the town of Orillia, and as that town is in my riding I would like to say that the men here referred to are not residents of Orillia. They are unfortunate men who are travelling from place to place in an attempt to find employment which is denied them. Although guilty of no crime they are forced to spend their nights in gaol. I learned yesterday from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that even if the Dominion government were inclined to grant aid to the different provinces to help the unfortunate unemployed, these men would not receive any assistance. The reason is that they unfortunately live in the province of Ontario, a Conservative province and therefore subject to the exclusion mentioned by the Prime Minister. A man in Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan or New Brunswick would be in a similar plight. However, if a person similarly situated had the good fortune to live in the province of Quebec or Prince Edward Island but was unfortunate enough to be unemployed, he would receive such aid as might be afforded by this government. When have the free men of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and other Conservative provinces lost the right to elect men of their own choice? Since when has the Prime Minister of Canada become so autocratic that he can arbitrarily dictate which provinces shall receive government aid for unemployed, and which provinces shall be refused that aid? Are the citizens of Ontario, the chief contributors to the public funds, to be denied the rights accorded to citizens of other provinces? May I suggest to the Prime Minister that as a public man, no matter how bitter his private views may be with respect to those politically opposed, he should remember the well known motto of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

I take it that one of the first duties of a government is to make such provision that work may be available to citizens of the country whose affairs it administers; that the men who live in that country may have employment and thus be enabled to maintain their homes and support their families. A nation cannot exist without people; people cannot exist without homes; homes cannot be maintained without money, and money can be obtained only by work. I have taken the trouble to look through the speech from the throne delivered at the begining of this session and placed before this house for its consideration, and I look in vain for a proposal which would hold out any hope for the unfortunate unemployed. Such proposals are always welcome, but they would be doubly welcome at this time of unemployment, stress and strain.

I look back upon the record of this government and I find that in many instances it has failed to live up to its responsibilities to the people. The Minister of Labour (Mr.

Heenan) in his speech the other evening said that this government was having a ferry boat built in Canada in order to give work to Canadians. He told us that the government could have had this boat built more cheaply in England than in Canada. I am glad that the government is awakening to the fact that the people expect that every boat which is constructed to carry on the trade and commerce of this country and is the property of the Dominion government shall be built in this country, in Canadian shipyards, by Canadian workmen and with Canadian materials. The pity of it is that this government has been so slow to realize its duty in this regard. Within the past two or three years the government has had constructed abroad, instead of being built in Canada, a fleet of boats for use in the West Indies service. I have here the names of the boats with the cost of construction, as follows:

Lady Somers	$1,737,138
Lady Rodney	1,741,534
Lady Nelson	1,541,230
Lady Hawkins	1,544,757
Lady Drake	1,548,101

That is a total of $8,112,762 which went out of the country, we have the boats, but they have our money. Had a proper patriotic Canadian policy been pursued, these boats would have been built in our own country; we would have the boats, and the money would have been circulated among our own people, giving employment to Canadian labourers and mechanics and providing a market for our merchants as well as for farm products. Some one may say, "Well, the boats would have cost more had they been built in Canada." That is possible, but as far as I am concerned I am in favour of a policy of having all government-owned vessels built in Canada, and in the case of these particular boats I understand that they could have been built in this country for practically the same money.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, nonsense.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. THOMPSON: Well, I understand that quite a large part of the money expended on these boats was spent on extravagant and magnificent interior fittings, which could have been omitted, and boats of equal service could have been built here for practically the same amount. Then, even admitting that they would have cost a little more, that additional money would have been spent among our own people.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think it is only fair to inform my hon. friend that tenders were called for from both British and Canadian shipyards. If I recall correctly, the cost of building these ships in Canada would have been about 40 per cent more than the cost of building them in British yards. The argument used by Canadian National Steamships, who were to operate the ships and who own them, was that the cost of operating the boats at that much of an increase in the cost of construction would involve a heavy toll in respect to rates, and would bring about a national loss. My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that it is advisable to build in Canada, but at that time Canadian National Steamships thought the load would be too heavy.

Mr. THOMPSON: I still stand by my position. Even if these boats had cost more they should have been built in Canada, because the additional money would have been kept in this country and distributed among our own people. We would have given employment to our own workingmen, and that is what the people of Canada want.

How are our Canadian shipyards to be kept in an efficient state if the work which they can reasonably expect to get is sent abroad? There is the matter of repairs to vessels. I understand that a Canadian boat can go into an American port and have necessary repairs done, and when she returns to Canada she pays a duty of 25 per cent on the value of the repairs. On the other hand, if an American boat enters a Canadian port and has certain repairs done, when she returns to the American side she has to pay a duty of 50 per cent on the value of those repairs. Why cannot we have a government that will protect the Canadian workmen to the same extent that the American government protects the American labourer? The people of this country have spent an enormous amount of money in the construction of canals and other aids to navigation, and it is reasonable to expect that wherever possible the Canadian people should get something in return through the construction of ships and repairs to ships in Canada. I am told that in the United States a vessel cannot enter the coastwise trade unless she has been actually built, registered and documented there, but we know that many of our private owners, following the example of this government, have gone across the line and bought ships in that country, bringing them back to enter the trade here in competition with our own boats manufactured in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, contrast the building of these boats abroad with the policy which was pursued by the Conservative government when ships were built for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I understand these boats were practically all built in this country. They cost a lot of money; I believe the total was about $75,000,000, but out of that total $45,000,000 was spent in wages to Canadian workmen from Vancouver to Halifax, while $30,000,000 was spent for the purchase of Canadian material. Employment was given to our own shipyards, and the money was kept in this country. Everybody prospered by it; the labourer, the mechanic, the merchant, the farmer, all profited by this work being done in this country. That is a contrast between the policies pursued by the two different parties. Millions of dollars have been spent abroad in the construction of government-owned ships. In 1929, $31,000,000 was spent on agricultural implements imported from the United States, almost all of which could have been manufactured in this country. Is that the way to help the unemployment situation here? Every day of the year we send out of Canada $2,500,000, chiefly to purchase American manufactured goods that could be made in this country. Is that the way to help the Canadian workman who has a home to maintain and children to clothe and feed? The closing of our woollen mills as a result of the tariff policy of this government threw out of employment men and women who had worked at that business, and also deprived the farmer of a market for his wool. Is that the way to help the unemployment situation? Why cannot we have more buying at home of Canadian manufactured goods? Imagine sending yearly to the United States for manufactured goods $89 for every man, woman and child in Canada! Why not take more pride in our own products; why not more loyalty to the goods manufactured in this country? I can well understand, Mr. Speaker, why there should be unemployment in over-populated countries whose natural resources have been depleted and exhausted, but in this young country of Canada, with its under-population and magnificent natural resources, there is no excuse or reason for that condition existing. If we had a proper fiscal policy, a proper national policy —Canada for the Canadians—unemployment would rapidly disappear and prosperity would return. The people of Canada shortly will be given an opportunity to settle this question, and all signs indicate that they are now realizing their responsibilities. When given that opportunity the people will speak in no uncertain terms, and a new era of prosperity will be ushered in with the advent of a new government. That famous declaration of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that the death knell of protection had been sounded is going to sound the death knell of the present government.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved that the recommendations contained in the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament, presented to the house on the third instant, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn) moved that the first report of the select standing committee on debates be concurred in.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): This report deals with the salaries and organization of the Hansard reporting staff. It appears that the application of the Hansard reporters to the Beatty commission was for some reason or other overlooked, and they were not included in the report of the commission. The work of the Hansard reporter is not that of any ordinary stenographer. He must be an expert reporter, capable of reporting persons whose diction and manner of speaking are altogether unfamiliar to him, at a rate of 250 words or more per minute. He must catch every interruption and note exactly where it comes from, and that without in any way interfering with the taking down of the speech he is reporting. He must also be able to spell the words that we mispronounce, to reconstruct the sentences that we do not construct correctly, to quote correctly the quotations that we misquote, to put sense into the sentences whose meaning we, speaking in haste, do not always make clear. He is also required to edit and make readable the speeches he reports. He must have a wide knowledge of literature and be familiar with a very wide range of subjects. It is true that he works only six months in the year, but he is disqualified by that very fact from taking any other permanent position. There was a time when Hansard reporters could be recruited from the press gallery. That was when the newspapermen took verbatim reports of the speeches delivered in the house. But that day has passed, and the staff can no longer be recruited from that source. Experienced reporters are very very rare, and great difficulty has been found in keeping the staff up to strength. Reporters with the qualifications of a Hansard man are drawing outside the civil service as much as $6,000 a year. There is a vacancy on the staff at present, which it has been found very difficult to fill. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, the committee has considered favourably the request of the Hansard reporters, and we respectfully submit that the salaries be revised according to the schedules given in the report. We are also asking that authority be given to increase the staff, and that recommendations be made to the Civil Service Commission so that when new appointments are requested during the session they can be made within a few days, instead of within a few months as is now the case.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I would like to refer to paragraph (c) of the committee's report, reading as follows:

(c) That the Editor of English Debates and the officer occupying the joint positions of the Editor of French Debates and Parliamentary Reporter be placed in the same class and paid the same remuneration.

I would ask if it is not true that about 90 to 95 per cent of the debates of this house are carried on in English, and if the work of the editor of the English debates is not very much heavier. Why, then, should the editor of the English debates and the editor of the French debates be on the same basis?

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): As a member of the debates committee, I might say that the editor of the French debates of this house fills at the same time the position of a reporter of the proceedings, which the editor of the English debates does not. As both languages are on an equal footing in this house, I think my hon. friend should be thankful that more French is not spoken in the debates, because the sessions would then be very much longer.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I have no objection to the members of the Hansard staff receiving all that they are entitled to. If they are entitled to an increase to a minimum of $3,420, as recommended by the debates committee, I have no objection to that. The only comment I wish to make on that is this: I note with what ease it is possible to give to the higher paid officials working for the government an increase in their salary. Last year the house took considerable time discussing the wages of men who are receiving about eighty or ninety dollars per month. We found it impossible at that time to get any recommendation for an increase in the salaries of these low-paid men, and they are still receiving the same wages that they received last year. In increasing the pay of men or women in the employ of the government, I think we should begin at the bottom instead of at the top, and give the lower paid men at least the minimum salary which they demanded last year of $100 a month.

I understood that when the Beatty report came before parliament, we would have some opportunity of discussing its recommendations as a whole, and not piecemeal in this way. If recommendations are to come from the different committees of the house, it will be almost impossible for us to be given an opportunity of discussing the Beatty report as a whole; we may have to discuss it on half a dozen different occasions. I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, if it is the intention of the government to give the house an opportunity of discussing the report of the Beatty commission, so that I along with others who have an interest in the lower paid men may be enabled to present our views in support of a minimum salary of $100 per month.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to answer the questions put by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps). But may I say that I am always impressed with the speeches of the hon. member for North Winnipeg, and if I cannot be present in the house to hear those speeches I give myself the pleasure of reading the excellent reports in Hansard. I think my hon. friend is perfectly right in desiring to increase the salaries of the low salaried men and women in the service, and he has my hearty support, for I am a labour man in spirit, but their position will be in no way prejudiced by our taking measures to ensure that the present high standard of the reporting staff of this house is maintained. I think nothing too good can be said of the work of the present staff. As the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) very ably pointed out, I think our English speaking friends should be glad to see us French Canadians expressing our views in a tongue other than our own in order that we may be more generally understood. I have noticed on several occasions that many of our English-speaking friends do not always understand speeches delivered in French, and that is the one reason why I and other members on this side address the house in English. Nevertheless we use our mother tongue in the debates, and I think every opportunity should be afforded to have those speeches properly reported in both languages in the future as in the past.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Pouliot) who has just taken his seat and many of his colleagues on their extraordinary ability to speak so fluently and so eloquently in English. I envy them that ability and would I were in the same position with regard to French as they are with respect to English. But that, I take it, does not concern us particularly in considering this report. I object to it, Mr. Speaker, on two grounds: First, that it is mandatory; and secondly, that it is an amendment to the report of the Beatty commission. This house has not yet had an opportunity of considering that report, and until we have had, I think amendments of this character should not be allowed to slip through in this way. I protest against what is virtually an amendment to the Beatty report; and I object to the sentence:

and that steps be taken by the Civil Service Commission to give effect to this recommendation.

being acted on until after we have fully considered the whole report.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to amend Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the usual bill that we introduce every year for the withdrawal from the forest reserves, after examination by our officers, of lands that are considered fit for agricultural purposes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton):

1. What is the number of vessels in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine employed in trade between Canada and Australia, and between Canada and New Zealand?

2. What was the loss, if any, in operation of these vessels during each of the fiscal years 1927 and 1928?

3. What is the rate per hundred pounds on butter between Auckland and Halifax, and between Auckland and Vancouver?

4. What quantity of butter was carried between these ports in Canadian vessels during the years 1927 and 1928?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Australia, 7; New Zealand, 5.

2. As the publication of operating surplus or deficit on individual vessels or on particular services would be information of advantage to competing lines, it is not in the interests of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to bring down this information.

3. Auckland to Halifax, 4 shillings per box of 56 pounds net. Auckland to Vancouver—no service provided.

4. By Canadian Government Merchant Marine: 1927, Auckland to Halifax, 12,520 boxes of 56 pounds, or 313 gross tons; 1928, none. As to other Canadian vessels—no information.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Is the government aware that in the enforcement of the Bankruptcy Act with regard to the farming classes, the assignees have been responsible at times for raising the costs to such a high figure that the mortgagee, for an amount equal to fifty per cent of the value of the property, was forced to lose part of his claim?

2. If so, will any measures be taken so as to determine a fixed amount for fees and costs?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ISLE AUX GRUES MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Has the contract for the mail between Isle aux Grues and Montmagny been definitely awarded?

2. If so, was said contract awarded to the lowest tenderer?

3. What was the amount of the lowest tender?

4. To whom was the contract awarded?

5. What is the contract price?

6. When does the said contract expire?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. VENIOT:

1, 2, and 4.—

Application was made early in 1927, on behalf of the contractor for an increase in pay which the department could not grant without inviting public tenders. Tenders were therefore invited and were due at department April 29, 1927.

The contract in question did not expire until June 30, 1928, and the contractor agreed to continue until its expiration, therefore no action was taken on tenders received.

In view of the fact that the present contractor has rendered good service and considering the difficulties connected with the operation of this service, which might be increased under a new and inexperienced person, the department authorized a renewal for a further term.

3. $595 per annum.

5. $700 per annum.

6. June 30, 1932.

2. Is it the intention of the government to retain in its service those employees: (a) whose positions are abolished by such transfer; (b) whose positions are partly affected by such transfer?

3. Is the government making any provision with respect to the employees who may be affected by the transfer?

4. If so, what is the nature of such provision?

5. Is it the intention of the government: (a) to continue its forest and technical research work; (b) to continue the work of the forest products laboratories?

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—TARIFF TRUCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The latest empire parliamentary report states that at the Tariff Truce conference the dominions were entirely unrepresented. I would like to ask the Prime Minister why Canada was not represented.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret I did not hear the question; if my hon. friend would let it stand I shall endeavour to answer it at the earliest opportunity.

IMMIGRATION ADVERTISEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. WELLINGTON HAY (North Perth): The Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) is in his place, and I would like to direct his attention to two advertisements appearing in The Canadian Gazette, London and Montreal, Thursday, March 20, 1930:

Wanted in Canada, experienced farm families; five hundred British families with farm experience. Assured places on Canadian farms in well settled districts. Wages and houses.

And further:

Single men, farm situations vacant—until filled—for 2,000 able-bodied single men. Wages, with bed and board.

That is an advertisement by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then, on the back of the same periodical is an article sponsored by the Canadian National Railways' Colonization Service. It says:

The Canadian National Railways' Colonization Service advises and assists settlers before they leave Great Britain, meets them on arrival in Canada and places them in farm employment. It also locates farms for those in a position to begin farming for themselves and helps them to make a start.

May I ask for a statement from the minister in reference to these quotations, after the general discussion we had in the house during last session.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): In regard to the remarks of my hon. friend, I may say that the Canadian Pacific Railway have a few families they are placing upon their own lands; I cannot tell you the exact number. They are recruiting in Great Britain. Both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways have been requested long ago to discontinue that type of advertising. We are watching the arrivals of immigrants brought in by the railway companies. It is needless for me to say that at the expiration of the railway agreement it will be stopped immediately.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the hon. minister think that type of advertising should be stopped now?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, it should be. We have asked the railway companies to discontinue altogether that type of advertising.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister, as a result of his remark, if immigration is at a standstill in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, it is not entirely at a standstill. The agreements that were entered into between the British government and the railway companies are being carried out in a very limited manner, for example, there are a few British trainees coming in, but nothing like the number the agreement calls for. Less than 20 per cent of the number provided for in the agreement will arrive in Canada this year.

COAL—FREIGHT RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) if he intends to make an announcement in regard to the application of coal operators of Alberta and eastern British Columbia for the suspension of freight rates on bituminous coal shipped from those areas to Manitoba.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I have not yet been able to get the matter before the government for their consideration.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Friday, April 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, for some days the house has been listening to a discussion arising out of an amendment to the motion to go into supply. That amendment was proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), and was:

> That in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

The unemployment situation in Canada, without referring to what the previous speakers have said, is not a new one. During nine months of the year, we have little or no unemployment, but seasonal unemployment has existed ever since the country had employment of any kind. Nobody will deny that. In my remarks I do not intend to detain the house very long, and hope to cover the subject as briefly as possible, and to state some of the reasons for the situation we have in Canada. I might also venture some opinions as to how it could at least be alleviated, or partially cured. Unemployment is common to all countries in a greater or smaller degree. My hon. friends opposite cite the tariff as the cure and panacea for all ills, unemployment included. On the other hand, the hon. gentlemen who represent the United Farmers of Alberta and the labour element are inclined to believe that the exact opposite is the case, and that a reduction in tariffs would very largely cure unemployment. There has been a general admission on their part that after all perhaps the tariff plays a very small part in the question of unemployment. May I say at once that I do not agree with my hon. friends opposite when they say that increased tariffs would cure unemployment. If that were so, there should be no unemployment, or very little of it, in countries that have in the immediate past increased their tariffs. We know that the United States and Australia have increased their tariffs very materially. It has been stated that because this is a low tariff country we have suffered to a higher degree, but when we come to compare figures we find that the unemployment statistics of Great Britain and the United States compare very favourably on a per capita basis. So I do not agree that increased tariffs provide any remedy for unemployment. I am inclined to argue with my hon. friends opposite that while a reduction in tariff may not be an absolute cure for this situation, yet it helps very materially. This government came into office at a time when there was a very serious condition of unemployment, created not by tariffs but by after-war conditions. On that occasion hon. gentlemen opposite were urging that the government take into consideration the desirability of increasing tariffs for the purpose of alleviating conditions which then existed. I refer to the years 1922 and 1923, but the government took the opposite course and it is needless for me to point out the results of that action.

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that we have no unemployment in Canada; I do not make that assertion at all, but I do say that unemployment does not exist in Canada during the summer season to any degree which might cause alarm. However, there is a season in the year when we always have had and always will have some unemployment in this country.

Referring again to the question of reduction in tariffs, and dealing especially with the situation in Canada and the ability of industry to absorb labour, let me point out that in 1922 we had 750,000 people engaged in industry, with a production valued at two billion five hundred million dollars. In 1929 we had 1,000,000 people engaged in industry, with a production valued at over four billion dollars. So it will be seen that during the years this government has been in office employment has increased from 750,000 to over 1,000,000, while the value of the production has almost doubled.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister mind telling us whether those figures include all the men employed in industry in Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; it is impossible to get a record of all the industries in Canada. These figures refer to industries employing fifteen men or more, and any computation of this character of necessity must be brought in its application. At any rate, we have improved the employment situation, although I do not mean to argue that we have had and will not continue to have unemployment during the winter season.

We have a very peculiar situation in Canada which does not exist to the same extent in the country to our south. There they have not a cessation of all, or at least a great many, of the agencies of employment, as is the case in Canada. Perhaps I might enumerate some of the difficulties we have to face. Let us consider agriculture: I will venture the assertion, which I think cannot be contradicted, that at least three-quarters of the men employed upon the farms of Canada will be out of work for three months during the year. Consider the shipping fleets on the great lakes, and our fishermen on inland waters; every one of these men will be out of employment during the winter months, except for a very small number who may continue fishing through the ice. All the sailors in Canadian bottoms are out of employment for at least three months during the year. In building construction from one end of Canada to the other the same thing applies, and a great many of the employees of the railway systems are affected by this situation also. All maintenance of way men; all those men working on improvements to road beds and other men doing similar work, whose numbers are very large during the summer season, are thrown out of employment for at least three months during the winter. So I think it must be agreed that these large employment agencies throughout Canada must of necessity throw men out of employment during three months of the winter, because of our climatic conditions.

Let me repeat that this condition always has prevailed in Canada and I doubt if it can be changed to any considerable extent. The question has occasioned considerable thought by all men who are engaged in the problem of supplying employment to those who desire to work in this country. I do not think any hon. gentleman will deny that while we are perhaps the most favourably situated country in the world with respect to employment, we have the handicap of a seasonal condition of this character, and it is worthy of note that the situation is not worse than it is at the present time. In the United States and Australia, two countries with which we can reasonably make comparison, the situation is very much worse and, as I have pointed out, both countries adopted the remedy suggested by our hon. friends opposite in the hope of improving their economic conditions and thereby improving their labour conditions.

I do not know that I need go very much further into the question of why we happen to have seasonal unemployment in Canada. I am not able to give the number of men who will be unemployed during the season I have mentioned, but I do not think that is material; I think every one must realize that during that three month period a very large number of the men engaged in the industries I have mentioned will be out of employment.

In 1923 we had a conference at which we discussed this very question, and at that conference some suggestions were made which have been adopted by this government. One suggestion was that the government of Canada should, so far as it could conveniently be done, extend its building construction programs into the winter season. I am going to make the suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that that be done to a greater degree, but before I do so may I deal with the matter of immigration.

I happen to be for the moment the acting minister of that department, and have to do with immigration matters. It has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that the federal government should step into the field of provincial activity and assist in dealing with unemployment because it has brought into this country during the past few years immigrants from the various countries of the world which has added to the difficulty we find ourselves in during the winter seasons. There is no doubt that in any given community the stranger will be the first to suffer from unemployment. He is the first man to be out of work because he does not know conditions; he is not acquainted with the avenues through which he may seek employment and for that reason he is very liable to be found in reasonably sized numbers in any body of unemployed. After he is established and becomes a citizen he is in a better position to provide for himself during the winter season. I do not think it should be said that because of these conditions no one should be allowed into a country like Canada with its sparse population, or that we should say to the world, as some of our sister dominions have said, that we cannot accommodate any more people within our midst. I think that would be going a considerable distance, but I do believe that we should reduce immigration to the minimum in order to be able to face our present and future difficulties.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What would that minimum be?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a very difficult question to answer. If my hon. friend were minister of immigration, having to deal with individual cases where good reasons are given for the entry of friends and relatives of people already in Canada, people who are comfortably off and in a position to take care of their friends, and who are prepared to take care of them so that they would not drift into the ranks of the unemployed, I—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is not contending that there has been any drastic opposition to that class of immigration?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am simply stating my position to my hon. friend. The doors cannot be closed absolutely as there is that class of immigration to be considered. A considerable number of immigrants would come within that class, and I for one believe that it is right and proper that they be admitted. I shall continue to admit them until we have an arrangement with the provinces which I hope will be brought about, whereby they will undertake the responsibility of saying who shall and who shall not come into their midst.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about the entry of those outside of relatives and friends?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The answer I made the other day to a question raised during the orders of the day still stands. We have an arrangement for the admission of 1,100 or 1,200 trainees, but the greatest difficulty is being experienced in placing even one half of that number, and we are asking that it be reduced to the very minimum. We are also insisting that they be placed where they will not take the place of labour which could be supplied by Canada itself, and they are all being placed on farms.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What about the 8,000 Europeans coming into Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot give a definite answer to my hon. friend except to say that this agreement was made a year ago by my predecessor, when the present situation was not anticipated. The agreement, so far as the bringing in of people is concerned, will expire on May 31. Where people in this country decide to bring friends or relatives from central Europe and where they are in an economic position to take care of such immigrants, I permit them to come in.

Mr. BENNETT: Regardless of the financial position of the immigrant?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In every case they have some financial backing themselves.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the department have certain knowledge as to where those people will go after they enter the country?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, they are all going on farms. We have been endeavouring to make an arrangement with the provinces whereby they will accept the responsibility of stating to us the number and the nationality of immigrants which they can absorb into their communities. As far as the federal government is concerned, we are putting no bar in the way of people coming from the old land or from the preferred northern countries provided they are physically and mentally fit, are able to pay their own passage and have sufficient money to maintain themselves for a reasonable time after arrival in this country. I do not believe that the provinces will put any bar in the way of immigration of that character. The deputy minister of the department has visited practically all the provinces of Canada, as a matter of fact he is to-day interviewing the Premier of Nova Scotia. He will then have completed interviews with all the provinces, which so far have expressed a willingness to accept the responsibility provided the federal government will undertake to carry on recruiting, to deport when necessary, and to provide the machinery for the securing of such immigrants as are desired by the different provinces. The provinces, on their part, will give us the number and classes of people which they can absorb.

Largely at the request of the provinces, a conference was arranged to discuss this matter. It is to be held early in June so that arrangements may be completed in ample time for application to next year's immigration. I hope that the charge will not be laid at our door that we are contributing to the difficulties of any given province by the bringing in of immigrants. It seems to me that this arrangement is the logical, reasonable and sound thing to do, having in mind that the federal government will no longer have control of the lands and the natural resouces of the western provinces.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) calls for immediate action with regard to unemployment. It is unnecessary for me to reiterate the stand of the government which was given to the house by the Prime Minister, and which was stated last fall by the government, that this government stands ready to assist any province which finds itself in a position where it is unable to cope with the situation. No such request has been made to this government, and may I say that I agree most heartily with the statement of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who stood in his place the other day and stated most emphatically that he realized that while the initial responsibility rested upon the municipalities and the secondary responsibility was upon the provincial governments, he felt that the federal government could not as well escape responsibility. Upon that occasion he appealed to the federal government to come to the rescue of the poor unemployed. I hate to call such a suggestion absurd, but no one expected the federal government to hand its moneys over to the provincial government in order that the latter might spend them. I am just as much interested as any other hon. member in the welfare of any individual who is out of employment, but no one has so far suggested that the municipalities and the provincial governments are not taking care of the situation, nor have the provincial governments so far stated that owing to their inability, people are not receiving needed assistance.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What does the minister mean by "inability"? Where is the limit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a matter for the provincial governments themselves to decide. The federal government stands in exactly the same position as it did last fall; we believe with the hon. member for South Wellington that the matter is a municipal responsibility. If it is too great for the municipalities, then the province must come to the rescue. If it becomes too great for the province, under existing conditions they appeal to the federal government, and in the past when the matter was dealt with in this way, it was dealt with on the basis of one-third from the municipality, one-third from the province, and one-third from the federal government.

Mr. MANION: In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, what would be the use of any province under a Conservative government appealing to this government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say to my hon. friend is that he will have to judge us by our past.

Mr. MANION: Not by your statements.

Mr. SHORT: The country will decide.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are quite willing to let the country decide; we will take our chances with the country. May I say to my hon. friend from Fort William: in the past this government, in connection with old age pensions, farm loans—and these are in the very immediate past—adopted a policy of cooperation with the provincial governments. As regards unemployment, if we are to hand money of the taxpayers of Canada over to the provinces, surely we have a right to make some inquiries as to its disposition.

Mr. MANION: Or as to their politics.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say nothing about their politics.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister said that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Generally speaking, I think it is a safe and sane policy for any government to pursue to spend under their own direction the money they collect from the taxpayers. No one can quarrel with that, and I think it is a safe and sound proposition. That has been the position of the government in the past and I have no doubt it will be the position of the government in the future.

Having dealt with the question of immigration, I want to suggest what I think would assist very materially in relieving the seasonal unemployment which we have for at least three months of the year. During the winter season the government has carried on in almost every large city of Canada public works under its control, in this way giving employment to men who would otherwise have been out of work. We followed out the policy suggested in the conference of 1923. I should like to see that enlarged. I believe it is possible under modern conditions to carry on in almost every part of Canada building construction during the winter months with very little added cost. I would suggest that the provinces, the municipalities and the railway companies who are large employers of labour, could very well decide that one-half of the money expended in building construction should be expended during the three months that I have mentioned, the off season.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the federal government be prepared to pay a share of the additional cost of winter construction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have to bear the responsibility of our own winter construction. Why should my hon. friend ask the federal government to assume one-third of the cost of construction of a public building for a province which is doing exactly the same thing as the federal government is doing in a country like Canada? I do not follow his argument.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Only because the minister suggests it is their policy to ask the provinces to carry on winter construction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am suggesting this merely as a remedy. If someone does not suggest a remedy, no remedy will be forthcoming. The same thing may apply to municipalities. Is there any reason why municipalities should not construct their sewer works in the winter time? We have all seen them doing this. In Ottawa we have had no difficulty in employing men all winter in building a cement wall along the Rideau canal, which is outside work. We have done this every winter for the past four or five years, giving employment to 100 or 125 men during the cold weather. If it is costing a little more money, the federal government has to pay the bill. Very much more could be done in the way of winter employment if the municipalities, the provincial governments and particularly the two great railway systems were to extend their building programs. A large proportion of the outside construction of the Confederation building was carried on during the winter, but I do not believe it has cost the contractor very much more because of that. That kind of thing can be applied all over Canada and it will help a great deal toward absorbing the unemployed in these various activities.

The National railways were requested to give employment to many men who otherwise would have been discharged this winter, and I hope it has not cost the National railways any considerable amount of money to carry out that policy. These men were largely out of employment because our wheat crop did not move and a large proportion of that crop has still to move. The government requested the National railways not to discharge those men but to keep them on during the winter season, and this has helped very materially to relieve the unemployment situation.

If I can speak quite apart from my ministerial responsibilities, I would respectfully suggest, if I may put it in that way, that the municipalities and the provincial governments might go so far, if it were necessary, as to enact legislation so as to carry out the program I have outlined. If this were done it would mean much to the country. A more adequate system of registration will have to be inaugurated and that is one of the matters I want to bring before the conference with respect to immigration. In this way, if men who have settled in any given municipality or any particular part of the country, move from that locality into a city, as they frequently do from farms, railways and elsewhere, it will be possible to fix the responsibility of the municipality from which they come. Something of that kind would help materially to prevent some of the cities from being made the Mecca of many of our unemployed who do not rightfully belong in them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This year in my city of Winnipeg hundreds of men were discharged from the Canadian Pacific who had to be maintained by the city. The city went so far as to send a bill to the Canadian Pacific. Is there any reason why the federal government could not legislate so that the railways would have to take care of their own employees during those three or four months?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was coming to that very point. I know how impossible it is to say to a farmer, for example: You must do something for the men you discharge in the fall and do not need until next spring. Perhaps it is a little difficult to say to the railroads and other large employers of labour: You must provide continuous employment for your workers. I think I am safe in saying that generally in our merchant marine in Canada we hear very little about unemployment, and yet the sailors who make up that splendid body of men must be out of employment for four months every year. It is possible that the wages they receive in the summer months carry them through the winter season. I am not familiar enough with the circumstances to know, but I do know that we hear very little from them, and I see no reason why the same conditions should not apply on the railways and with other large employers of labour, who have of necessity to employ a larger number of men during the summer than during the winter season.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would not that require legislation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am unable to answer my hon. friend with respect to that. I am not attempting to cure the unemployment situation but am suggesting attacking it first where it is most acute, with our municipalities and within the provincial arena, and of course, as it applies to the railway companies. So far as we are aware, no serious situation exists in eastern Canada. The serious situation, if it can be called such, exists from here westward. While it may be said that the situation is a little more acute just now than in other years, both in the United States and Canada, the fact remains that every year in both countries there is a considerable degree of unemployment during the off-season, and it is to cover the off-season period that I am offering these suggestions to the house.

As I say, we will have a conference on immigration, which is one of the things that it is claimed has some effect on unemployment, and I see no reason why this question should not be discussed at that conference. It might be well to bring together the presidents of the two railway companies and other large employers of labour, who are interested in this question as we are interested, and are desirous of alleviating what is a more or less serious situation for some of those who are unemployed every winter. The provinces will also be represented at that conference. The municipalities largely will not. I do not claim that it is the responsibility of the federal government, but we wish to be helpful as far as we can in this matter, as in other matters, and to have the question discussed, to see how far we can go in proposing schemes that will be effective in reducing unemployment in this country, having regard particularly to the industries that are employing a large number of workers, some of whom find themselves out of employment during the three months I have mentioned.

That is all that I have to contribute to the debate, Mr. Speaker. I feel that it has wandered very far afield. I have been sitting here listening for some practical suggestions that would cure unemployment, but so far very little has been said along that line. I offer these suggestions, not as something entirely new, but as going further perhaps than has ever been proposed before in connection with making it obligatory that work that can be performed during the winter seasons shall be done then. May I say, in conclusion, that if the debate continues, I do hope that hon. members who speak will remember that this is not a political question, and that they will not speak with the hope of getting some political kudos out of it, but will rather confine themselves to what they believe will be practical remedies for a situation that we shall find existent in this country for three months every year.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Who does the minister think should bear the expense of maintaining the deportees while they are awaiting deportation? Secondly, when did the government insert the words, "Unable to bear the cost"? As it was before, it said that when an emergent condition exists the Dominion government would step in. The wording now makes it very different.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I confess that I do not see very much difference. There may be an emergent condition and the provinces may be able to take care of it, but when a province admits that it is unable to take care of it, it is apparent that it is a very emergent situation.

With respect to deportees, the moment that we are notified and take action for the deportation of an individual, we pay the expenses, and in some cases we have paid them where it would appear that there may have been some laxity on our part in dealing with the matter.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In these deportation cases, we do not get one cent until the men leave the station. We have to maintain them up till then.

Mr. BENNETT: The question I desire to ask the minister is this: What legislative body would have the authority to compel construction to be carried on during the winter?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It would only be provincial in character, and anything effective in that connection would have to be enacted by the province.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the province possibly enact legislation that would affect control of the railroads?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not say that. The provincial authorities would have complete control over the operations in their own province other than perhaps in connection with the railways, which are a national undertaking and have a dominion charter, but anything dealing with the railways would have to be enacted by the federal government.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, there was one remark made by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) with which I can agree, and that was one of his concluding remarks that this debate has wandered far afield. Having read the amendment, which reads that in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment, the minister himself proceeded to wander into a dissertation on immigration and fiscal policies. In so far as he contributed anything to the question, his contribution I think may be classified under three heads. First, there was the admission that we have an unemployment problem with us, seasonal unemployment permanently. Second, that the problem is primarily a provincial and a municipal one. The third part of his speech was very much the same as the Prime Minister's, and consisted in giving good advice. The Prime Minister himself took the same stand as the minister, that the question is primarily a provincial one, and he sought to justify his position by reference to the British North America Act. I feel that issue can well be taken with the Prime Minister in that statement. He quoted section 92 of the British North America Act, which gives legislative powers to the various provincial governments, but he neglected to read to the house section 91 of the same act. In order to understand the reference in section 92, it is essential, I feel, that section 91 should be read to the house in so far as it appertains: It reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces;

Then it goes on to enumerate the specific powers given to the Dominion government. But the essential point to remember is this, that the powers of the legislatures of the provinces are circumscribed, they are tied hard and fast by definite statements contained in section 92. Any power which is not delegated to the provincial legislatures belongs to the federal legislature; in other words what we call the residuum of power resides in this parliament, and not in the legislatures of the various provinces.

Now, under what subsection of section 92 did the Prime Minister seek to justify his position that the question was primarily a provincial one? Taking them in turn, the first of these subsections he relied on was No. 7:

> The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

In other words, under that subsection, he is going to bring the question of unemployment within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures; that is, he classes unemployment with charitable institutions, because that is all that subsection deals with. He treats unemployment essentially as a matter of charity, whereas in the later part of his speech he refers to Industry and Humanity, the book written by himself, where he places unemployment upon an altogether different plane. He is not consistent in the two parts of his speech. Either he is correct in Industry and Humanity and incorrect in his speech; or he is incorrect in Industry and Humanity and correct in his speech. I submit that by no stretch of the imagination can the problem of unemployment, strictly construed, be brought within the purview of the provincial legislatures under the provisions of subsection 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act.

Let us take the next subsection which he invoked, No. 8:

> Municipal institutions in the province.

The Prime Minister well knows that that subsection means that the provincial legislatures are the bodies which are empowered to create institutions of municipal government; they pass what are known as municipal acts conferring powers on municipal institutions. When he argues that because unemployment is primarily a municipal matter, and that as the municipality receives its powers from the provincial government, it is therefore a provincial matter, he begs the question altogether. He is simply saying it is a municipal question; the province gives the municipality power; therefore it is not a federal question. The subsection has not the slightest bearing on the question of unemployment from a legal standpoint.

Let us go on to the next subsection that he relies on:

13. Property and civil rights in the province.

He proceeds to state that unemployment is a matter of contract between the employer and the employees, and that a contract is a matter of property and civil rights. But surely, sir, unemployment is the very negation of contract, it is the very opposite of property and civil rights. There is no contract. Consequently it cannot for one moment come within the classification of property and civil rights.

Let us take the last subsection that he quoted to justify his position from a legal standpoint:

16. Generally, all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this proposition before the Prime Minister. Let us suppose for one moment that the government of this country reduces the duty on coal and so allows it to come in from the United States and Russia, and as a result 5,000 miners in the island of Cape Breton are put out of employment. Is that purely a local matter? Is it a matter merely of local concern? True, primarily the locality would be concerned in seeing that those men are kept from starvation. But who is responsible? Does not the responsibility rest where the cause is produced? Is not that the answer to the whole question of unemployment? Unemployment primarily means that there is some breakdown—perhaps not a breakdown, but that the economic structure of the country is not functioning in a balanced manner. The economic structure of the country is wholly under the control of this parliament. Subsection 2 of section 91 of the British North America Act enumerates the regulation of trade and commerce as one of the powers of this parliament. That regulation belongs entirely to the federal and not to the provincial authorities; the latter have no right whatever to interfere in it.

Let us assume, to carry my argument a step further, that the Dominion enacted regulations respecting trade and commerce which threw men out of employment in British Columbia or in some other province. Is not the action taken by the Dominion parliament the cause of that unemployment? If so, why should responsibility rest on the immediate localities where the unemployment occurs, which locality had nothing whatever to do in throwing those men out of work? Suppose the Prime Minister in his wisdom decided there should be some readjustment of the economic structure and the readjustment meant prosperity in some parts of the country but worked a hardship in others. Where there was hardship—where there was unemployment—would it not be the responsibility of the federal authorities to take care of that unemployment? And would the Prime Minister say it was a vicious principle to devote money which was taken from the prosperous to help out the needy in those localities adversely affected?

When you analyze the situation, Mr. Speaker, you must come to the conclusion that the problem is primarily federal. I doubt very much whether the provinces could pass legislation respecting unemployment which would be held by the courts of this country to be intra vires. Surely it is not within the sphere of the provinces under the British North America Act. The lead should come from this government. They may use the machinery of the municipalities, but the lead must be given by the Dominion. Take this illustration. Last week I was in the city of Brantford. They have there a number of unemployed people. Those people were brought out here by the instrumentality of the government under what is known as the assisted passage scheme. They were to be placed on farms, but instead they were placed on the outskirts of the city, and to-day they are getting their bread and butter from the city authorities. Whose is the responsibility in that case? Does it belong to the local authorities, or does not the responsibility morally rest upon the Dominion government? I submit, sir, that when you view the whole situation by and large you must come to the conclusion that the problem is a federal one, and the country must look to the federal authorities for a solution of the problem, whatever that solution may be.

Now, what arguments did the Prime Minister use in addition to the argument of unemployment being a provincial matter? His next argument was that we were doing a disservice to this country in mentioning the fact that there was serious unemployment in Canada to-day. He argued, as did the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who has just taken his seat, that there was no serious unemployment, that the unemployment was merely seasonal. Any person who travels across Canada to-day cannot come to the conclusion that unemployment is merely normal, for there is unemployment in every province in some degree, in some provinces worse than in others, and it certainly is not the usual seasonal unemployment such as we have had during the last three or four winters. The Prime Minister says we are doing a disservice to the country in mentioning the fact. Why? Because he said, if we mention it, it means that foreign capital will not come in here, and consequently to that extent we shall not be able to cure the situation. He expects us apparently to say that the country is prosperous, that there is no unemployment, no matter what may be the actual conditions. What would happen if that same principle were carried into private life? If I went to the Prime Minister and induced him to put capital in my business on the strength of my statement that it was in a flourishing state, while really it was not, and he lost his capital, I venture to say he would hale me into court on a charge of obtaining money by false pretenses. And, sir, applying the same moral principles to the conduct of the nation's affairs, then it behooves us to tell people who contemplate investing their capital here what are the actual conditions respecting unemployment. If we do not do that we are departing a long way from the high moral principles the Prime Minister enunciated a few weeks ago.

In addition, what did the Prime Minister say? The remainder of his speech consisted in quotations from Industry and Humanity, and in giving advice to the provincial governments and to various corporations. In effect, it consisted in this: "We stand ready to give you the benefit of our advice when you ask for it; we will not help you or give a cent to any Tory government, but we will give our advice." I suppose he would give the provinces a copy of his book, if they asked for it. That was the purport of the speech made by the Prime Minister in reference to this question. No doubt he will say I have misinterpreted it, but we know the right hon. gentleman is very often misinterpreted. In fact, he lays himself open to misinterpretation with surprising frequency. For instance, some few years ago he had occasion to make a statement about his activities in connection with labour during a period of his life. He referred to that period in the remarks he made in his speech of Thursday last when he was dealing with his book called Industry and Humanity. He stated, very heatedly, that he had never resided in the United States. No doubt the right hon. gentleman is legally correct, but may I point out that in respect to these matters he deliberately lays himself open to misinterpretation. I have in my hand a copy of Hansard for the year 1920, and I find that in that year the right hon. gentleman made a statement giving his credentials which he placed upon Hansard. The statement contains his credentials for certain years of his life, and in connection with them we note two things. The first is that there are some six credentials; all were obtained from persons resident in the United States, and the second is that while he was supposed to be employed at mitigating or helping the cause of labour, every single one of those credentials is from an official of some great corporation in the United States. It is not an accident, because it is quite obvious the hon. gentleman solicited those credentials. He admits that in one case he wrote a circular letter to obtain them. If he circularized labour, which he was supposed to have assisted, either labour made no representations or the Prime Minister did not place them on Hansard.

May I draw the attention of the house to these credentials and testimonials. There are six of them, and the first appears on page 1410 of Hansard, in the year 1920. It is a letter from J. F. Welborn, the president of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, Denver, Colorado, and is dated December 20, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the letter.

Mr. ERNST: The letter deals with the services rendered by the right hon. gentleman to that corporation. I have only forty minutes in which to make my speech, but I shall give the page number of Hansard so that any hon. member may read it if he so desires.

The next letter is from Mr. J. W. Powell, the vice-president of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Limited, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. This letter is dated September 22, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read that letter.

Mr. ERNST: That letter appears on page 1412. The next testimonial the right hon. gentleman produced is from E. G. Grace, the president of the Bethlehem Steel Company, South Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and it is dated September 26, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read that letter.

Mr. ERNST: My right hon. friend can refresh his memory by looking at them tonight, if he so desires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know what is in them.

Mr. ERNST: The next credential is from Richard H. Rice, acting manager of the General Electric Company, at West Lynn, Massachusetts. The letter is dated September 29, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask my hon. friend to read that letter.

Mr. ERNST: The next letter is from W. L. Petrikin, the president of the Great Western Sugar Company, Denver, Colorado.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that it is a rule in debate that an hon. member should not refer to a communication unless he is prepared to read it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in Hansard.

Mr. ERNST: They are already on the pages of Hansard and are available for hon. members in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. members are content not to have them read, well and good.

Mr. ERNST: If I could obtain an extension of time I would be glad to read them, but I have only forty minutes, and would not have sufficient time. The next letter is one that my hon. friend must be proud of. It is from R. W. Stewart, the gentleman who apparently was ousted from the Standard Oil Company of Indiana by Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member would read that letter.

Mr. ERNST: It is from one of the officials of a great corporation, and tells of the wonderful services the Prime Minister rendered labour. The letter is dated October 7, 1919. My object in drawing these matters to the attention of the house is to point out that the right hon. gentleman frequently leaves himself open to misinterpretation. Is it not reasonable to infer when we have a statement of credentials covering the activities of the Prime Minister for a period of four years, and not containing a single credential from this country, that he had not been in this country? We will have to accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman when he says he was a resident of Canada during all that time. I am merely pointing out that he leaves himself open to misinterpretation in that, as in other respects. He leaves himself open to further misinterpretation when he solicits testimonials and receives none from labour, whom he purports to have helped.

I have dealt with the reasons given by the Prime Minister as to why he could not support the amendment before the house.

We shall now turn to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), and find his position on the subject. The Minister of Labour addressed this house for three hours in an attempt to tell us that there was unemployment under previous Conservative governments; apart from that he said nothing. True, he made some sneering references to the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, the premier of Ontario. I must say, however, that so far as his contribution to this debate is concerned, it has amounted to nothing. As has been pointed out in this house, however, he did say something in the city of London. His remarks are reported in the London Advertiser of Saturday, March 15, 1930. He is reported to have made a statement in regard to unemployment insurance. He has informed the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that he stands behind the report as it appears in the London Advertiser, and I wish to direct again the attention of the minister to the report as it appears in that paper. I ask him if he did or did not make the statement as it is quoted? The first paragraph reads:

> The Dominion government is ready to assist the provinces in establishing unemployment insurance for Canada on a contributing basis, announced the Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour in an address to an audience that filled Hyman hall last night. In making this important pronouncement Mr. Heenan said, "As far as I am concerned I will make every effort and the Prime Minister will back me up to see that the labouring man, who is out of work for any period of the year, will have a right to expect and to receive a share of the profits he helped to make.

Did the Minister of Labour make that statement as reported?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, I did.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. minister says he did, and the result is that we reach a very unfortunate position for the Minister of Labour in view of the fact that the Prime Minister took a diametrically different stand. Later on in the speech of the Minister of Labour we find the word "assist." The Prime Minister has distinctly said in this house that he would not give a five cent piece to any Tory government. I interpret the remarks of the Prime Minister—and I hope I am not misinterpreting them—that he will not give one penny to any of the provinces, unless it is to one of the western provinces. In view of that fact, Mr. Speaker, we have one pronouncement from the Minister of Labour in London, Ontario, and another from the Prime Minister in this house. But worse than that, the Minister of Labour says he has the support of the Prime Minister.

Mr. HEENAN: May I ask a question. Are there not more ways of giving assistance than by making donations?

Mr. ERNST: The only other way I know of is that the Prime Minister might give a copy of his book. I take the word "assist" to mean what it is commonly understood to mean, and as any audience of labouring men would interpret it, financial assistance. In the speech as reported here the Minister of Labour tells an audience of labouring men in effect that there would be financial assistance. What becomes of cabinet solidarity? We find the Minister of Labour making in the city of London a statement diametrically opposed to that made by the Prime Minister in this house. I will not use the word "misrepresent"; it is a nasty word and I believe it is unparliamentary but, sir, I will say the Minister of Labour deliberately misinterpreted the views of the government on the question for the purpose of getting a few votes in the city of London and elsewhere. Thus we have another illustration of this government forgetting one of the cardinal principles of responsible government, the principle of cabinet solidarity.

This is not the only illustration we have had; if it were the first perhaps it might not cause so much comment. We had the same thing happen with regard to the liquor export bill, with respect to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler). The same cardinal principle was forgotten, and we have the same situation all over Canada with regard to tariffs, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) when he made his address on this subject. For instance, we have our friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar) who, I believe, purports to be an out and out free trader, and we have the Minister of National Revenue who campaigns Ontario as a protectionist. Down in my part of the country some gentlemen belonging to the party opposite are free traders, while some say they stand for "a tariff for revenue." I have not been able to understand what that means, unless it means to import as much as we can in order to get an increased revenue from the tariff. I have never heard a reasonable explanation of that term.

So we have the spectacle of one minister saying one thing in one place and another minister saying another thing in another place, with cardinal principles forgotten and vote-catching on every hand. How long can this country tolerate a spectacle of that kind under our Canadian institutions of government? How long can we have the Minister of Railways preaching free trade in the west while the Minister of National Revenue is a protectionist in Ontario? The result is exactly what you might expect, a species of tariff paralysis. The government cannot move in any direction, no matter how hard it tries; some one is always hanging on to its coat tails and pulling in the opposite direction. The government keeps moving simply in a circle, while the needs of industry are forgotten in the needs of political exigency. You get exactly the result you might expect to get. To-day industries here and there—I am not speaking of the farmers but of manufacturing plants—are idle; the Minister of the Interior can find plenty of cases in this province where men are out of employment because goods are being imported from foreign countries. Men are walking the streets and getting their bread from the municipalities, and the Prime Minister says the municipalities should feed them.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the government of this country two things are essential; first, the principle of cabinet solidarity, and second, that a government which talks about its policies shall have some definite policy rather than the policy of helpless drifting.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, there has been unemployment since time immemorial. The worst I remember was directly after the American civil war, when Ontario and Quebec were invaded by armies of men who were willing to do any kind of manual labour for their bed and board.

I was amused the other evening by the remarks of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall). He flayed the Minister of Labour to the best of his ability, even accusing him of using bad grammar. While he spoke I thought that if his teachers and professors could have heard him they would have wept for his own inaccuracies and mistakes. The hon. member went on to claim that the Prime Minister was not what he should be, and so on. I want to tell my hon. friend that I happened to be in the United States during the last presidential election, and while I was there I heard some prominent people arguing about magazine interviews with the two candidates. While they were speaking I said, "How would your candidates compare with the Prime Minister of Canada?" For a few moments they stopped their argument, and both said, "We have no such men over here. We had to appeal to the gentleman who is now the Prime Minister of Canada to come to this country at a very strenuous period of its history." They referred to a time when capital and labour were at swords' points throughout the land, and the American government wanted a man who could cope with the situation. Princeton, Harvard and Yale universities were questioned, and each institution gave the name of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. He went to that country and saved hundreds of millions of dollars by starting industry working again; strikes were stopped almost entirely and capital and labour declared peace. That was a work worth while.

Then the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said there was an immediate need for this government to vote $500,000, $1,000,000, $2,000,000 and finally $3,000,000 for the relief of unemployment. Ever since I came into this house I have been in favour of making all criminals work for their living; I have opposed keeping people in prison in idleness. I would not give any money to ablebodied men who are able to eat their three meals a day. Surely we can find work for them to do somewhere. In the state of Vermont they are providing work in the beautifying of the sides of the highways, the removal of eyesores and obstacles and all that sort of thing. There is plenty of work in this country. I should like to ask the hon. member for South Wellington if he does not agree with me that to give money promiscuously throughout the country would be equal to the dole system in England, which has practically destroyed that country. I would not be guilty of doing such a thing as that. I am sure the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) would agree with me, if they were in their seats. The thrifty man who has managed to accumulate some means does not desire to give his money to loafers.

Of course, I would not see a mother or a child suffer for food, but I say that able-bodied men in this country should not be fed at the expense of any government, unless they work. Certainly we can find work somewhere; we could build a trans-Canada highway across Canada, if necessary, but I never would vote for any measure which would grant money to idle able-bodied men. I believe, with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that men loafing six weeks become hoboes, and men loafing six months in many cases become criminals. I believe that is altogether too true. I think laziness is a habit; after a time an idle person begins to hate work and will not support his family. Even criminals in prisons would work, if I had my way about it. They could do something; they could be taken on the land in the summer and help till the soil. It is a terrible thing to keep these criminals there in idleness, the young and old together, the criminal who has committed a minor offence herded in with the hardened criminal. That is a terrible state of affairs, and I would not allow it nor would I vote any money to be spent in supporting that class of people. There is enough labour to be performed in this country. If the people who are without labour would work in conjunction with the municipalities and with the provinces, perhaps this thing could be worked out if the promise was given only to assist those who would work.

Who is to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways and other great corporations are not to get people from foreign countries? The presidents of those great railways have said for years that our railway and canal systems and the other great institutions of this country require at least a population of 15,000,000. When the United States was getting together its great population no immigration barriers were raised. People came to the United States from the utmost parts of the world. They came from many countries where the return with a thousand dollars would enable them to live in comfort for the remainder of their lives. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has great tracts of land which were granted to them before they built that railway, and they cannot sell it to Canadian people. Canadians do not want to work upon the land because their sons and daughters have been educated to enjoy the amusements and frivolities of the cities. They must have those amusements even although they have no money; they figure that they can commit some crime to put something into their own pockets, or get into somebody else's pockets. This country cannot be developed without that vigorous class of people from Scandinavia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Germany. We have some wonderful examples of what those people can do, and settlements can be found in the province of Ontario which demonstrates the thriftiness of that class of people.

Our people seem to have gone money crazy. Most of the girls in the country say openly that they will not marry anyone but a millionaire. If that state of mind continues, the birth rate will be controlled because that class of people do not want to be bothered with children.

The United States allowed people to enter that country without the least restriction. For many years on an average of 1,000,000 people annually arrived at Ellis island. Many of those people arrived in the early part of the year and returned home in the fall to remain there during the winter months. But that was possible because transportation by both land and sea was very cheap. People went on the land fifty, sixty and seventy years ago to obtain a living, but to-day their only thoughts seem to be as to how they can enrich themselves. They become unhappy and troublesome and do not possess that love of country which would give them the desire to stay on the land and reap the return of an enhanced value. I have met people from the United States who settled on the land forty or fifty years ago and who are now able to rent their farms at such a price per acre as to provide them with world tours, from which they return once a year to collect their rents. They were a fine class of old country gentlemen, who lived quietly and biologically; they kept themselves free from disease and foolishness by sane life on the land. I am told that there are settlements in Ontario and in the northwest of people who have gone to those localities and who have stayed there. I do not know whether or not they built the so-called dug-outs, or whether or not they built pole houses with thatched roofs, but they became thrifty, they own their land and have money with which to buy additional acres. That is the class of people we must get to populate this wonderful and magnificent country. Our boys and girls will not consider a life which requires so much labour and which deprives them of the amusements and frivolities of city life. They want to have automobiles and spend their time running and gadding about the country.

This may not be the time to mention this subject, but I was told by an aviator in Montreal—by the way, I believe in aviation, although I do not care to go up myself at the present time—that out of twenty-eight accidents which occurred last year in Canada, twenty-seven were caused by the man at the controls. I will not mention this terrible accident here in Ottawa, outside of saying that my friend knew that aviator very well. It will be necessary to enact more stringent laws than we have to-day, governing the licensing of air pilots. If we had enough Lindberghs in this country there would be very few accidents, and if I remember rightly, Lindbergh was a Scandinavian. I think his mother came over from Norway or Sweden, and she is now teaching in the state of Michigan. They said Lindbergh was crazy, but he did not prove to be so crazy when he left America to cross that boundless and ice-covered territory for Europe. If Lindbergh were in this city to-day, and had the time I would not hesitate one moment to go up in the air with him. Tests should be made of those men who are to guide these ships of the air. They should live according to all biological rules, and not be excessive in anything. They should not partake of any stimulants, and should be clean livers. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that these remarks would apply to the relief of unemployment.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Unemployment is caused largely by the great increase in inventions. Many newly invented machines are doing the work of several people, but there is one class of people who come from the old country, for which there is a great need—domestic servants. In the eastern townships there is a continual waiting list for this class of immigrant, and it is almost impossible to obtain a domestic who will remain a domestic for any great time.

Men cannot be found who do not insist on employment for the full year. Generally speaking, the farmer can employ only one man and woman for the entire year, although he may need additional help during the summer season. In olden times there were plenty of unmarried men who would remain with the farmer or the lumber man during the slack season for a nominal amount plus his board. But there is no more of that; they say: "If I cannot get the big pay I got when you needed me, I will not work for the small pay when you have not much for me to do." Domestic service is one of the best employments in this country for an uneducated girl, because she gets her board and generally she has as good a room as any member of the family; in fact, she is usually regarded as one of the family. If she is getting $5 or $6 a week, she does not realize that her room may be worth $5 or $6 a week and surely her board is worth as much. If she were to go to a city for employment and secured a job at $15 a week, she would hardly be getting as much as she does as a domestic. But she thinks she does not have as much liberty as the girl in the city. Perhaps not, but by staying on as a domestic and learning what a wife's duties should be she has a much better chance to become a healthy girl and a good wife and mother.

To come back to the unemployment question, it seems to me so silly—because, as I said at the beginning, unemployment has been with us from time immemorial—to raise all this hue and cry and berate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) made against our esteemed minister bitter charges which were very different from what the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) had to say about the minister. I do not believe any hon. member in his heart of hearts would defame the Minister of Labour; nor do I think in their right minds they would make against the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) accusation not befitting at least a young member

As regards this contention over matters that cannot be controlled there is but one remedy, and that is for the government to carry on public works and to give a fair remuneration to the people employed on them. These works are diversified in character; there are wharves, rip-rapping to keep the rivers in their proper channels, public buildings and highways. I cannot believe it would be a good policy for the government to construct national highways, although the United States are giving vast sums to the different states, and they call the roads so assisted government or state roads. We have in this country many places that can be beautified and made productive by the expenditure of money, let it come whence it may. In this way we could give work to our people who wish to work, and if we have in Canada foreigners who do not want to work, I would have them deported. The period within which they can be deported is five years and we have in this country some vicious men who should have been deported before that period elapsed. About every week when I am in Montreal I see quite a number of people who have just come to Canada, and I am glad to see them come if they will help to develop our wealth; because we heard it said during and after the war that we needed people to develop our natural resources and to help to pay our national debt. Surely if we can get people who will cost the country nothing to bring them here, it is a good idea. Everyone is pretty well agreed that assisted immigration should stop, and I believe no more money should be spent in that effort. Everyone knows that Australia is not very alluring at the present time. There were a few years when Australia was attracting more people, but she is at present in a bad financial position; England does not seem to be getting much better, while Germany and some other countries are getting worse. I do not say that we want a Mussolini to rule in this country, but in Italy the chief ruler makes the people stay on the land.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. BALDWIN: That is a fact. Mussolini does not allow people who are living on a farm to leave it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In this country many people want to remain on the land and they are not allowed to remain there.

Mr. BALDWIN: Has the mortgage been foreclosed?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly.

Mr. BALDWIN: A man who would do that is hardhearted. I have many mortgages, but I have never yet intimated to a man that he should get off the land. I would rather give a man a farm than foreclose him, because the courts are all in sympathy with the man you are foreclosing and you would not foreclose many men before you would get sick of your job.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Probably in the hon. member's province the farmers are not obliged to pay 8 per cent interest on farm mortgages.

Mr. BALDWIN: A good many years ago, in all the border states as you went across the Mississippi right out to the Pacific coast, the ruling rate of interest was from 10 to 12 per cent. It is not many years since you could lend money in Oregon at 8 per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is what has driven thousands off the land in the United States.

Mr. BALDWIN: That is characteristic in newer sections that are not so well established. The west is a long way off, thousands of miles. The wealthy people in New England lent their money in the middle western states, for instance, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Minnesota, and the Dakotas, and many banks were ruined. When a bank was ruined there was no hope of getting the money back; but if a person lent money out there and saw it was no use to dispossess the farmer but that it was better to hold the land, pay the taxes and wait for better times, he was all right, because the value of land doubled, trebled and quadrupled and the eastern investor who was not avaricious got his money back years later. It is characteristic of America at least that interest has been high to the people on the western frontier, right to the Pacific coast. But I am sorry to learn that in this age of community spirit, with only ten banks now throughout Canada, our people in the west have to pay more than 7 per cent. Seven per cent is the ruling rate of interest throughout the east except to people who can command large sums of money, and of course such people can hypothecate gilt-edged securities and secure money for 6 per cent. Thirteen years ago, when I came to the house, I remember statements being made that the rate of interest was 10 and sometimes 12 per cent, so that conditions have been alleviated to some extent if the rate has been reduced to 8 per cent. I believe, however, that rate will be reduced before very long. The grafters, gamblers and brokers in the United States the year before the collapse of the stock market were getting practically all the money in that country and paying 7 and 8 per cent for it, while legitimate business went begging or even went into bankruptcy on account of not being able to secure money. Now, with money at 3 or 4 per cent in New York, the situation is different and I suppose interest rates will become easier.

As regards immigration—

Mr. CAMPBELL: Tell us about unemployment.

Mr. BALDWIN: For sixty years the situation has been just the same as it is in 1930. And here we are with a beautiful April shower this morning to release the frost from old mother earth and start her blossoming in all her glory. Is there any reason why people should hang around the cities unemployed? I would vote for a law to make an able-bodied man work.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What if he wants to work and cannot get it?

Mr. BALDWIN: Those are world conditions, my dear man, and you and I cannot do anything about them. I have trouble in getting help to work for me. I have been here two months and my son has written me several letters in that time saying that he cannot get help to start the mill. As a matter of fact, there are more people looking for work and praying that they won't find it than my hon. friend imagines. There are people who want to live and die in laziness. The farmers of this country are working fifteen and sixteen hours a day. Those are my hours, but I would work only nine or ten hours a day if I could get help to relieve me in my store and in my mill and in the woods. Conditions are such that people will not stay in the rural sections of the country. Some woman wants to get out and show her finery, and she does not care how she gets it, by hook or crook.

I am glad the chain stores are developing in this country. The old-time merchants who sell goods on credit now have to compete with the Atlantic and Pacific, the Stop and Shop, the Dominion Stores, and all the other chain stores. It is going to be a good thing for the country. We merchants have lost hundreds of thousands of dollars trusting goods to everybody that wanted them. Some would claim to be sick for six months and would be getting goods on credit, and then when you finally refused any more credit, I have had one say, "I have not been sick a day this winter." He did not tell me that; he was afraid to, but he would send some member of his family. Finally when spring came I would tell such people: It is time for you to get out and shift for yourself.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Tell us about unemployment.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am telling you some of the conditions I meet with. I have already spoken about servant girls. I have had two or three from England, and I assisted them over. The last one had high ambitions. She wanted to be a nurse. She thought Canada was the size of England, and that the little Baldwin mills must be right close to Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver, that she could jump in a trolley car and reach them in no time. Naturally she was disappointed. My wife told me that she was a lady of attainments. I lent her sixty dollars to go to Vancouver, and she repaid me every cent. Another one, without attainments, wrote me from Windsor saying that she could not get into the United States and would be deported. She wrote me for twenty-five dollars, and I replied; "If you had stayed at my place, you would have had $150 in the savings bank and would not need to borrow."

Mr. POULIOT: Did she get the twenty five dollars?

Mr. BALDWIN: Most emphatically she did not. The Lord helps those who help themselves. I do not put myself on a par with the Almighty, but I like to see people do something for themselves. My hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) asks me how I would deal with unemployment. I will tell him: Get to work. You cannot put any energy into sissified, pussyfooting and spineless people. If you knock them down, they might get up and come at you. There is no other way under the sun. You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink, and so long as men can stay around the city and town and sponge their living, many of them will not work. There are several ways of begging. There is the polite way of living on your friends, borrowing money from them. That is simply giving your money away because they do not intend to pay you back. The sum of $337,000 has gone out of my office here in the last six years and I never expect to see a red cent back, but my philanthropy is a little less now than it was then. I have learned a considerable amount about human nature, and the man you help most is the one who will evade you, who will not speak well of you, and at election day probably will be the last man to vote for you.

There is no way in which we can sit here and legislate to make people work. Legislation will not stop unemployment. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) wants $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 taken out of the treasury to relieve unemployment. I would not let a woman or child go hungry in this country, and there are hundreds of thousands of other people who feel just the same way, but I would not vote to help an able-bodied loafer. I would make him work if there was any law in this country to make him do it. I know from my own experience that it is easier to do your own work than to get any of that class to do it for you. I think our Minister of Labour is doing all that any minister of labour could do. I notice that my thrifty friend from Halifax (Mr. Black) and my hon. friend from Lincoln, who I understand have accumulated a good deal of this world's goods, are not jumping to their feet and saying: Grab the money out of the treasury to relieve this awful unemployment situation. I have not heard a word from them, not one, and I do not think we shall hear from them in this debate. Are we never going to think of the people in this country who toil and labour and delve, working overtime? If they have accumulated money by their own hard work, are we going to tax it out of them to the last cent? There were too many in the last war who stayed at home and said: We will spend the last dollar. They had a flippant tongue, but no capital, and were mighty glad not to go to the front. I know that class, even ministers of the gospel. It is not laughable.

When we talk about alleviating unemployment, there are old rookeries in Montreal and other cities that we could get rid of and put up public buildings there. I do not want to repeat what has been said about not giving a five cent piece to a Tory government, but I will say this, that if the Tories were in power they would not give a five cent piece to a Liberal government. I was never a very bigoted politician, and I believe there are good people and bad in every party. It may be suggested that one way of relieving unemployment would be to tear down our old, unwholesome buildings and embellish the sites with new and beautiful structures. But then the government would have to go into the rental business, and people who moved in would say: This is government property and we should live here free. There are a lot of people too lazy to work who think they are quite capable of running the country. I do not suppose there is a member here who is not asked by some of his constituents now and again: What are you doing up there in Ottawa? And then they proceed to tell him how parliament should be conducted. Whole multitudes think they should get into the civil service and have soft jobs because a few Toms, Dicks and Harrys under the old patronage system got into the service, although they were as illiterate as jack rabbits.

It takes money to alleviate unemployment. I believe a trans-Canada road would be a good investment, if it could be undertaken. It should be built as far north as possible, say, up by the Hudson Bay railway, so you would hold tourists from across the line the maximum time. Up there they would find it cool and breezy. But I would not allow them to bring in more than a thousand cigars and ten thousand cigarettes. I have known some pretty smart customs officers who thought tourists should not bring in a carload of cigarettes and cigars, but these officers were found fault with because—

Mr. SPEAKER: Time.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (West Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, because of climatic conditions it would be both unreasonable and unjust to charge the government with responsibility for all unemployment in Canada at this time: but where such unemployment is caused directly or indirectly by reason of government policy or lack of policy, then it seems to me that the government should accept responsibility. It is only in connection with the bearing that government policy has on unemployment that I should like to add a few words to this debate.

I regret very much that the Minister of Health (Mr. King) has absented himself from the house, because he is the minister from British Columbia representing East Kootenay, and I simply make this reference in passing for the reason that throughout the province of British Columbia to-day there is no district in which unemployment conditions are more deplorably distressing than in the district which the minister represents. Up until a few weeks ago the coal mines in Fernie were getting out about sixty carloads of coal daily; then conditions changed and the production was curtailed to the extent that fully one half of the coal miners are out of employment to-day and the other half are working only part time. I have before me the Nelson news, the daily paper in that district, which gives details of the actual conditions under the heading:

Fernie miners' children hungry—three hundred miners unemployed following mine shut down—all credit stopped.

Conditions there were so bad that the various communities were called upon to endorse a resolution which was sent to the government. It was sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also to the minister from British Columbia (Mr. King, Kootenay), and I can assure them that those worried wage earners and the distressed mothers and hungry children cannot be satisfied by the usual reply the government give, that "they will take the matter under consideration." The matter became so critical that the miners and people of Fernie called a mass meeting at which they passed the following resolution:

Whereas we have reasons to believe that the Crowsnest Pass Coal Company is controlled by American capital, and whereas we have reasons to believe that at a recent meeting of President Hoover and the chief industrialists of the United States, the slogan of "Buy U.S.A. products" was adopted, and whereas through the adoption of such a slogan the Great Northern Railway cancelled all orders for coal with the Crowsnest Pass Coal Company causing three hundred men to be laid off by the said coal company,

Therefore be it resolved that we the Fernie miners now assembled request the federal government to investigate the now distressing conditions prevailing in the mining district of Fernie,

Be it further resolved the Fernie miners request the federal government to assist in sending in immediate relief and thus relieving the distress now prevailing amongst the miners of the Fernie district.

No. (2), that we request the federal government to stop all immigration until all residents of Canada be employed permanently.

No. (3), that we ask that the moneys now being used for immigration be utilized as a subsidy for freighting coal from Alberta and southeastern British Columbia and so find employment for unemployed miners in this district.

It is interesting to look back to see just how the present conditions were anticipated some years ago. I find that in 1925 the right hon. Arthur Meighen introduced the following resolution:

That to enable the products of the western and maritime provinces to reach more readily the markets, the special transportation burdens borne by these provinces should be shared by the Dominion, either by contribution to long haul freight costs, or by assistance in some other form.

Strange to say the minister from British Columbia, who represents federal policies in that province, voted against the resolution. It will be interesting to see what explanation he will make when he reaches Fernie in a few days. No doubt he is on the way there for the purpose of fixing up his political fences, but he will have so many questions to answer in relation to his stand on matters which are close to the hearts of the people of British Columbia, that I really think it will be rather embarrassing for him.

I want also to put on Hansard a resolution passed at a meeting of the Sandon miners' union last January:

[Mr. Esling.]

Whereas; The present immigration policy of the Canadian government has a detrimental effect upon the Canadian workers, and,

Whereas; All cities in Canada are burdened with unemployment and a large number of them are forced to establish relief work and soup kitchens; we, the members of Sandon Miners' Union, in meeting assembled, contend that no nation can survive on soup kitchens, thus lowering our standard of living, and,

Whereas; The prairie provinces have stated definitely their opposition to assisted immigration, and steamship or railway subsidized immigration, as they have now a surplus of unemployed. Therefore, be it

Resolved; That we demand that all immigration to Canada be immediately discontinued, and that the government take immediate steps to establish unemployment insurance, and be it further

Resolved; That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Premier of Canada, the Ministers of Immigration and Labour, Jas. S. Woodsworth, M.P., W. K. Esling, M.P., and the Hon. J. H. King.

They, too, recognize the fact that the immigration policy of this government is contributing to unemployment, and it will be seen they ask that immigration be restricted and the policy of unemployment insurance established by the government. I repeat that I regret the minister is not here to state his attitude in connection with these problems.

At this time I shall refer to another matter which is directly connected with government policy, namely, the position of the man on the land. I refer to the man who purchased land, cleared it, planted his crops and hoped to receive some return from his investment and labour. On three different occasions the Minister of Health voted in favour of permitting the entry into Canada of surplus farm products. The strange thing is that the minister seemed to blow hot and cold; when he went through British Columbia he talked one way, and in the House of Commons he voted another way. His statements to the people of West Kootenay and East Kootenay are not borne out by his vote in this house. Having voted to permit the influx of these surplus farm products, he went into the Okanagan district and said that the Dominion government was fully alive to the situation created by the lack of anti-glut duty on vegetables. It seems incredible that any minister of the government could hope to ride two horses at once, but we find that to be the policy of the minister from British Columbia.

There is another question of policy arising out of the matter of highways. There is no doubt in the world that the construction of highways would have absorbed much of the present unemployment. To my mind there is nothing which the people of British Columbia would welcome more than highway construction, and there is no doubt that it should result in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. In the year 1919, the government contributed $20,000,000 for that purpose, and the resolution of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) merely asked for a continuation of that grant, so that the provinces could carry on the work. Surely such a building program would have materially relieved the present unemployment situation, and opposition to such contributions must necessarily be the policy of every Liberal candidate in the coming election. The minister from British Columbia voted against any aid to highways.

Hon. members in this house will no doubt remember the resolution of the member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). He asked for the immediate construction of a Pacific coast outlet from the Peace River district. He did not stipulate a specific route, but asked that the best possible route should be taken. He did not tie the government down to anything in particular, but merely advocated construction by the best possible route. In this connection we find the minister from British Columbia going into the city of Vancouver and other cities along the coast, and telling the people how enthusiastic he was about the Pacific coast outlet, when only two or three months previously he had gone on record in this house as being opposed to it.

I wish to make some remarks about the Doukhobors. I do not touch upon this subject for the purpose of amusement, because we have had enough amusement in connection with this very serious situation. The position of the matter is serious, particularly in its relation to unemployment. The Doukhobor settlements are fast growing communities. In those districts we find two or three Canadian citizens who may have put all they owned into a piece of ground ten or twenty acres in extent; they have planted an orchard and have made a living. The Doukhobors have come in and bought the property of one of the settlers, with the result that the other two move away. Canadians will not live alongside of these people; they do not want to, and nobody wants them to, I told you before of an instance where a whole Doukhobor family was working nude in the field, and the wife of the neighbouring farmer was compelled to submit to the embarrassment caused by such conduct. These people are not only making it impossible for the Canadian farmers, vegetable growers and others to compete with them, but they are entering other fields of industry. I may tell you that the late Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Mr. Forke, sent to British Columbia and received a special report on Doukhobor activities. In that report there is information as to how men were being driven off the land because the Doukhobors had no hours of work, no wages to consider, and their products were turned over in competition with those of the local farmers. To-day we find the Doukhobors are an important factor in the pole and tie industry. In 1928 there were 31,000,000 feet of poles cut in British Columbia. Of that total 21,000,000 feet were shipped, and much of this was controlled by the Doukhobors. Surely when we realize that these people have entered into the different fields of industry in competition with Canadian labour, we appreciate the fact that we have another reason for unemployment. I wish to refer to the policy of the government in regard to these people, and to point out that although they were admitted to this country as far back as 1898 and bonused to come here, they were excluded by the Conservative government in 1912. Things progressed very well until 1926, when the minister from British Columbia, conscious of the competition which existed, joined the government in passing an order in council throwing down the bars and inviting more Doukhobors to come in. I shall be keenly interested to learn how he will explain this matter when he goes before his constituents. This is a policy which each Liberal candidate in the Dominion of Canada must accept when he enters the coming election. We find the minister from British Columbia absolutely out of step with all the policies in the immediate interests of the people in his constituency.

In regard to these matters I want to fortify my contention by specifying certain matters in respect of which the minister's attitude is on record in Hansard, so that there can be no controversy about it. In the first place we find the minister on record as being opposed to grants for the Pacific coast outlet from the Peace River district. We find him opposed to technical education. He has placed himself on record on three different occasions as being in favour of the importation of surplus farm products at glut prices, and he is also on record as being opposed to giving the returned men the benefit of the doubt in their applications for pension, in cases where disability has occurred after discharge. We find him on three further occasions opposed to the abolition of the sales tax on boots, shoes and clothing; these are commodities which the unemployed must buy. He is on record as being opposed to federal aid for the construction of highways, and he is in opposition also to any contribution in connection with long haul freight costs on western products. Western products are products of British Columbia, and products of the coal mines at Fernie; and he is therefore on record as being in opposition to any contribution to long haul freight costs on Fernie coal. There is another paragraph in the resolution which places him on record as being opposed to any other kind of assistance in the marketing of Fernie coal, so I am sure the minister will have a very pleasant time fixing up his political fences when he reaches home again.

I have referred to these questions purely as matters of policy affecting unemployment. There is no doubt that the minister, together with every other Liberal candidate at the next election, will have a hard time explaining just what are the policies of this government, and why he supports so many government measures which are contrary to the interests and welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, before I come to my remarks, which will be rather short, I should like to refer to some of the points brought up by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton). It seems to me he did not attempt to deal with that part of unemployment which affects the municipalities and which has become a burden to them. He mentioned seasonal unemployment with regard to fishermen and sailors. I come from a constituency in which there are very many of these two classes of people, and I find that we have very little trouble with them. They are employed in the summer; they count the summer as their year of employment, and they are no burden and no menace to the municipalities.

Then the minister suggested that the municipalities might take upon themselves the construction of sewers and work of that kind during the winter. I might remind the minister that this already has been done by almost every municipality in Ontario. He also referred to the fact that building operations might be extended into the winter, but the men who are engaged in the construction of buildings do not enter into the question of unemployment. From the statistics issued by the department here at Ottawa it will be seen that the list of unemployed does not contain any union men so that the references of the minister to the fishermen and the sailors, the construction of sewers and the extension of building operations do not really go to the point at all.

This amendment has occasioned quite a lengthy discussion, which indicates that the subject is a live one in many parts of this great Dominion; that it is not only a matter of local interest but that it has a wider aspect. The hon. member who moved the amendment evidently had this wider aspect in mind when he moved his amendment, but those hon. members who have spoken for the government have put the question on a very low plane. The speech of the Minister of Labour indicated that this was merely a question of party politics, but as we all know that is not the case.

Reference has been made to the calling of a conference to discuss this matter, and it was thought that such a conference, if called, would have done a great deal towards the solution of the problem of unemployment. However, the government refused to call such a conference, and nothing has been done. So far as I can see, nothing but good would result from such a meeting; you cannot enter into discussion of this great question without taking many interests into consideration, and surely the calling together of men representing different interests all over the Dominion would bring about at least a sincere consideration of the question. However the government has chosen to disregard that suggestion and has ignored the wider aspect of this grave question.

I know the Minister of Labour has a really warm heart and would turn from his way to help the poor, hungry people of this country, but in the provincial legislature, where I knew him very well, as well as in this parliament, evidently he fell in with very poor company. At all events, he has been unable to influence this government It may be that he had the wrong password in approaching the mercy seat; he may have taken the great book Industry and Humanity with him; but I am afraid that book has been given the wrong title—it should be called Industry and Party Politics.

The Prime Minister has refused the amendment, and I think during the course of his speech he made the greatest slip of his political career. Prime Ministers always have been looked upon rather as the fathers of the people, persons to whom suffering men and women can come and relate their miseries. However, our Prime Minister of to-day has lost that human touch; the working man of Canada now must assume his party toga, put on his party stripe and approach the throne if he wants a job. This has been the case in Ottawa; working men have paid their dollar fee, secured a badge and card, and then have been sent down to the party leaders to see about it. Even now that Liberal working man in Ontario is forgotten by the Prime Minister, who says he will not give one five-cent piece to any Tory government for unemployment. The Prime Minister must mean by that, if he means anything, that the Liberal working man of Ontario must go to Prince Edward Island or to Quebec if he wishes to receive any aid from the federal government. The Prime Minister has hoisted his flag and sounded his slogan, which is "Vote Liberal or starve".

In answer to the Prime Minister, however, who has laid this great burden first upon the municipalities and then upon the provinces, and who has been seeking out funk-hole after funk-hole in which to shelter himself, I would say that funk-holing will not relieve him of his great responsibility in connection with this matter. There are very strong associations relating this question to the federal government. The Department of Trade and Commerce has been referred to; the making of treaties, with their consequent effect upon the people of this country, has been brought up also, and I shall not discuss it further. The fiscal policy of the government has affected unemployment. I would like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to this fact; in my constituency at least two industries have been forced to cease operations because of the fiscal policy of this government. What is the position of a man who has been put out of work because of this fiscal policy? First, he may become idle; second, he can move over and take the other man's job; or, third, he may migrate. Whatever course is followed, unemployment is produced by an act of this government. The great textile industry has been affected, and one plant in my constituency which filled a great need in providing mixed employment has closed its doors. These employees have the choice of idleness, taking the other man's job, or migrating.

The effect of immigration upon unemployment has been mentioned, and I do not intend to discuss that phase any further. Unemployment lies at the root of practically every social problem in this or any other country, and the present government cannot escape responsibility. Crime increases during the days of unemployment, and such crime always affects to a great extent the life of the community. I do not think that any citizen of our land would not prefer to have a full dinner pail rather than free government rations in a penitentiary, jail or prison.

The great number of unemployed are not affected by the excuse offered by the government that much is being done for the returned man. The returned man claims as his right that which has been done for him, and that fact cannot be offered as an excuse to the unemployed. The government having refused to discuss or consider the wider aspects of this question of unemployment as brought out by the amendment, we are driven to this course; the only thing remaining for us to do is to bring to the attention of the government some local matters which are affecting unemployment in our different constituencies. Although I do not agree entirely with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), he has said that seasonal unemployment affects every constituency where the labouring man is to be found. There is much that the government could do to relieve this situation. It is quite true that the railway companies have been urged to continue construction work, and that the manufacturers of locomotives and cars have been asked to keep their plants running, but the government should go a step farther and see that the work is continued throughout the winter time. Contracts have been given in my own city which could just as easily have been started in December as in February.

It has been claimed that the government is rendering assistance through the large construction works being carried on. In most cases of this kind a large mass of labour is moved from some unknown point into the locality where the work is under construction, to the disadvantage and to the ousting of local labour. That situation applies to every large construction work carried on by the government. The government should see that local labour receives the benefit or its share of such work.

This government has given contracts for the construction outside of this country of many necessities which could be manufactured within the country. I take my stand with the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson), who mentioned the building of ships. When the claim was made that these ships could have been constructed in Canada, the only reply given by the Minister of the Interior was, "Oh, nonsense." Does the hon. minister believe that the Canadian workman has an inferiority complex, and thinks that this work cannot be done in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: They wanted to build the navy here.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The only reply we received was, Oh, nonsense. We were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it would cost 40 per cent more, but if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) were to use the same method as practised in giving coal contracts, this difficulty could be overcome. I have before me a return brought down this year which shows that tenders were called for coal supplies. The friend of the government was not the lowest tenderer, and what did they do? He was given two successive chances to bring his tender down below the lowest tenderer. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce would adopt that method, many articles at present manufactured outside of the country could be built in Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce must know of the investment in shipyard equipment, and he should realize that something should be done for this industry. Over $100,000,000 is invested in this industry; we have dry docks, and we are extending others to accommodate larger ships, but if ships required for Canada are not built in Canada, what chance has that industry to develop? Is this $100,000,000 to be thrown away, and are the efforts made to build up this industry to be ignored?

Surely the government can give some further consideration to this industry, which in turn affects a great many other industries. Our steel mills, the carpentry trade, our railroads, are interlocked; in fact, I do not think there is any industry which affects so many other industries as does that of shipbuilding. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce would only give our shipyards a chance to repair Canadian ships he would be doing something. Year after year, I have brought to the attention of this government the difference between the attitude taken by the United States on this question and the attitude taken by Canada. When an American ship comes to a Canadian port to undergo repairs, she is taxed 50 per cent of the cost of the repairs when she returns to her home country, but Canada does not make the same provision. If the directorates of our steamship companies were placed on the same plane as they are in the United States, then we would have more ships built in Canada and more repair work would be carried on in our dry docks.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Before six o'clock I had pointed out that the amendment implied a consideration of the wider view of unemployment; that the suggestion of a conference was merely an attempt to crystallize the Canadian view; that it would gather together people with many varied interests and would be followed by beneficial results, and without any injury, even though it failed to effect a complete cure. The government, however, refused to consider the wider aspects of this subject and chose to discuss it from the lower plane of party politics; and perhaps the lowest plane was reached by the Prime Minister when he avowed—not once; but repeated that he would not give five cents to any Tory government for unemployment. The slogan, therefore, in the next election will no doubt be: Vote Liberal or starve. It has remained, therefore, for us to point out where unemployment could be reduced by government action, and before six o'clock I had been discussing shipbuilding and repairs to shipping in this province.

I had pointed out how the United States protected her shipbuilding and ship repairing. Perhaps I can best indicate in a few words the interest they take in the matter of providing employment for their people in this work by saying that under the United States law no ships may engage in coastwise trade unless they are built, owned and documented in the United States of America; while, for many years, the Canadian fleet has not been a credit to Canada or to our national industry. Secondly, on repairs to American vessels made in Canadian yards the United States collects fifty per cent duty at the first port of call. Canada's rates on repairs to Canadian vessels in American yards is twenty-five per cent only, and that is payable only if and when the vessel reenters Canadian coastwise trade within a year. The house will readily see, therefore, that American vessels will take care to have all their repairs done in American repair yards, and that very little of it will come to Canadian yards. But if the government are alive to the interests of Canadian workingmen they can see to it that these repair yards of ours, as they are on the inland lakes at least, get their fair share of repair work. That would affect beneficially several constituencies in this province. As I said at the beginning, the government having refused to consider the wider aspects of this question of unemployment, we must come down to these local conditions, drawing them to the government's attention and requesting the government to take an interest in the protection of Canadian workingmen.

Closely allied with that subject has been the government's refusal to assist in technical education. With ship repair yards in this country actively engaged, we can provide employment for a great many of our workingmen; but with technical education I think we can do very much better. I look upon unemployment, as has been pointed out so many times in this debate, as a fluctuation.

Men in this country are drawing away from what you would call pick and shovel work to employment demanding more in the way of technical education; we have a very large field for their technical skill, and as a result a small field for those without technical training. That condition could be corrected by taking care to give the boys who are growing up to the age of manhood a technical education that would at least lead them into the fields of technical work and fit them for those skilled occupations for which there is a greater demand in this country.

I am not going to take further time. I have drawn the attention of the government to these conditions which are, I confess, local to my own constituency, and pointed out how the government could provide employment for many men. I would ask the government seriously to consider that technical education has a great deal to do with unemployment in this country, and I think that any federal government would be well repaid for any expenditure that it made for this purpose. The government would be well repaid to look at this thing from a humane standpoint. I know that there are a good many warm-hearted men amongst the ministers; I know that our friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) if he were only free from the company he is with, would look at this question from the humane side, instead of supporting the laying out of great parks and public squares and the beautifying of capitals, not only in this country, but elsewhere. If the government would only look behind all this beauty and see the frantic condition of the unemployed father and mother, and the pitiful condition of the hungry children and emaciated boys and girls, if they would only consider the plight of the boys and girls handicapped by the want of food and care, I feel that I should not appeal to them in vain. We want a big, strong, healthy population, and we have the country and the stock to produce it, but if this unemployment situation continues, if the government lets our boys and girls go hungry and obliges them to stay away from school for want of clothing, then there will be produced a condition in this country that it will take a lifetime to bring back to normal. Above all, when we bear in mind the vital issues at stake, we should not be concerned whether this is a municipal, a provincial or a federal matter; we should view it from the standpoint of the future of Canada, and deal with it in the interests of our boys and girls, the coming men and women of this country.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, like many other members, personally I am very tired of this debate, and were it not for the fact that there is a great deal of unemployment in my own constituency, I would not take up the time of the house by speaking to-night. I am sure most of us are rather sympathetic with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is anxious to get the house into committee of supply. But in my constituency there are a large number of unemployed men, particularly in the coal mining area. When I was there last December I found most of the men were working only one day in the week and occasionally two days. There are five large mines in the district, and I think that statement generally would apply to them all. I find on inquiry from the bureau of statistics that last year —1929—the Hillcrest Collieries worked 192 days; the International Coal and Coke Company mine at Coleman worked 190 days; the McGillivray Creek Coal and Coke Company mine worked 210 days; the West Canadian Collieries Greenhill mine worked 176 days, and at Bellevue 173 days. This means that if a miner worked every day the mine was open at Bellevue he would get 173 days' work in the year. That man must be on hand ready to answer the call of the mine whistle every workday in the year if he wishes to get in that 173 days' work. Taking all the mines together they averaged only 188 working days in each mine.

This is a very important industry. The output of this district,—and it is practically confined to these five mines—in 1928 was 1,639,000 tons. Bearing in mind what I have just said, that one of these mines worked 173 days in the year, I should like to give to the house some figures as to the wages these miners earned. I am quoting from an article entitled Mining Conditions in Alberta, which appeared in The Canadian Unionist of February, 1930. It is written by Frank Wheatley, Vice-President of the All-Canadian Congress of Labour and President of the Mine Workers' Union of Canada. He says:

> Contract miners earn as much as eight to ten dollars per day, and as little as $5.40 per day in the organized sections of the coalfield. In the unorganized sections wages are often as low as $2.50 per day, and these low rates are as inimical to the interests of the coal-owners as a whole as they are to the welfare of the miners who receive them. The day-wage scale runs from $4.20 for outside labourers to $5.50 for skilled workers, such as carpenters, mechanics, etc. Labourers inside the mine are paid $4.45; horse drivers, $4.90 to $5.25; miners, timber-men and track-layers, $5.40 to $5.57.

Any miner who worked 173 days at $4.20 per day would earn a total of $726.60 in the whole year. The highest paid labourer outside the mines is paid $5.50 a day, and if he worked 173 days he would earn $951.50. This man must hold himself in readiness to work any weekday in the whole year to earn this amount. Most of these men have families to keep. Personally I do not think anyone in this house would say that any of these miners could possibly keep his family for a year on that amount.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Mine Workers' Union of Canada at Coleman, dated January 14, 1930, so this is comparatively recent information as to the situation there. He says:

> The International mine is working on an average of two days per week, and there are around 200 men employed.

I may add that when that mine is working at full capacity in the summer time it employs from 400 to 500 men. He continues:

> The McGillivray mine is working with 250 men. The miners' union has spent about $1,800 on relief.

That is, the miners' union at Coleman.

> The companies have not donated a cent in cash, but through our efforts we got about 25 married men at the International mine and 13 married men at the McGillivray mine temporary work.

I am only quoting briefly from this letter as I do not wish to take up too much time. The writer goes on to say:

> There is no indication that work has or will improve in the near future and although we have obtained temporary relief for the majority of married men at the present moment we have still a serious state of affairs confronting us. There are between 60 and 70 single men in the camp who have done no work since July and we cannot get the authorities to do anything for them. The union has reached its limit in this direction and what is to become of them is a problem. The majority of them are immigrants brought to this country under the present immigration policy supposedly for another class of labour, but drifted into the mining camps thus creating the present situation.

That is one of the grounds on which I wish to bring the attention of the federal government to the situation existing there. The problem is due largely to our immigration policy or lack of policy. I want again to emphasize one point in this letter. The writer says:

> There are between 60 and 70 single men in the camp who have done no work since July.

That is six months. You might wonder how these men have lived. Let me relate the experience of an immigrant that I met in Coleman. He came to Canada in 1928, taking advantage of a harvester excursion from England. He worked in railway construction gangs for a few weeks in the fall of 1928 and was finally sent to Coleman by the employment office at Calgary. When he interviewed the gentleman whose name had been given to him by the employment officer, he said he did not want any men for three weeks. This man and two others who went with him stayed at Coleman for three months before they secured any work at all, and during that time they were boarded by a Chinaman who runs a boarding house there. These men said to me, frankly, they did not know how they could have existed if it had not been for the bigheartedness of the Chinaman in furnishing them with board and meal tickets for the three months before they got work.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in outlining the policy of the government towards the question of unemployment relief said that the first duty of providing such relief must fall on the municipalities. I want to show the government how impossible it is for a municipality like Coleman to take care of the unemployed that are there at the present day. In this town seventy per cent of the taxes are levied on the homes of the miners themselves. Now, if the miners are working on the average only 188 days in the year at wages such as I have quoted, how is it possible for that town to take care of the local unemployment situation? It may be possible for the larger municipalities to take care of a problem such as this, but it is not possible for small municipalities, such as those in these mining districts. In this case, the municipality, I believe, have spent $1,000 in relief work. They gave work for the purpose of assisting these men who were in need of relief. Yet that thousand dollars is only a drop in the bucket to what was really required. The miners themselves have suggested a remedy for the situation as it there exists. I may say that over 90 per cent of the coal produced in this bituminous coal district is taken by the railway companies; in this particular case I think it is practically all taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The railway companies take the bulk of their coal during the months of April, May, June and July; sometimes they begin taking it out in the month of March. Because of an immigration policy under which a large number of the miners have come from the old country under the guise of agricultural labourers, the mining companies have been able to put on as many workers as they wished. They work the mines to full capacity, and are able to fiill the orders of the railway company in four or five months of the year; for the remaining six or seven months the work slackens down to one or two days a week. The suggestion of the miners is that if a conference were arranged between the operators of the mines and the railway company, the railway company might be persuaded to spread their orders over a longer term of months. The miners' union passed a resolution last November dealing with this matter, and I think I shall take a few minutes to read it so that it may be recorded on Hansard. It is as follows:

Whereas the period of time worked by the coal miners of the Crowsnest Pass mining district of Alberta is yearly becoming less though each year a larger tonnage of coal is produced;

And whereas it has been the practice of the coal mining companies to employ many hundreds of transient miners for a few months of the year to meet the orders for storage coal required by the Canadian Pacific Railway from that district, with the result that those workmen engaged in the mining industry permanently are not able to obtain sufficient work during the balance of the year to secure a living for themselves and their families causing the expenditures of much money by the provincial government, municipal councils, and the trade unions for relief purposes;

Therefore be it resolved that repesentations be made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on whose railway system 90 per cent of the coal productions from the said mining district is used, asking this company to so regulate their orders for coal that the productions may be spread over a longer period of the year, thus enabling those persons permanently required to man the industry throughout the year to obtain a livelihood without further having to seek relief from various sources; and, failing satisfactory adjustment along the lines suggested, that the federal and provincial governments be requested to institute a measure of control within the industry through the appointment of a body similar to the present railway commission under whose direction such mismanagement shall be corrected.

This matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). I first brought it to his attention last year and received his hearty cooperation. It might fairly be said that due to his efforts the situation at the present time is better than it wold have been had he not intervened. At this time I wish to ask the Minister of Labour to go a little farther and to try to arrange such a conference as has been suggested. I think that the operators and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should both be represented at this conference, and it is my opinion that the federal government might take the initiative in arranging it. The men who are keeping up these towns and keeping up their schools are what might be called the permanent employees of these mining companies. I think in all fairness the work should be confined largely to them, and it could be done without any great inconvenience to the railway company. I ask the Minister of Labour to urge upon this government the necessity for initiating such a conference. May I point out to the Minister of Labour the seriousness of the situation at the present time? Because of the small crop which had to be handled last year I understand that this year the railway companies are asking tenders for half a million tons less coal than they took in 1929, and if no action such as is suggested is taken we will have more unemployment than we had last year.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) asked this afternoon for some concrete suggestions. It is my intention to accede to his request, and to put some suggestions before the government. The operators of the bituminous coal mines in Alberta and eastern British Columbia have estimated that 465,000 tons of American bituminous coal are consumed annually in the province of Manitoba; this figure does not include the coal consumed by the railway companies. I am informed that the Canadian Pacific Railway is using Canadian coal as far east as Kenora, and I make that statement because someone said yesterday that American coal was being used as far as Moose Jaw.

Mr. ADSHEAD: You are referring to Alberta coal.

Mr. COOTE: Yes. These operators have made formal application to the Federal Government for a subvention of the freight rate to the extent of one-fifth of a cent per ton mile on bituminous soal shipped from Alberta and eastern British Columbia and sold in the area east of the Manitoba-Saskatchewan boundary. The application is very short, and I shall put it on Hansard:

Whereas the Dominion government recognizes the advantage to the Dominion of Canada as a whole by an extension of the markets in Canada for Canadian coal;

And whereas this recognition is now being made in a practical way by a subvention of freight rates on shipments of Nova Scotia coal to markets in Ontario and Quebec, and by a subvention of freight rates on Alberta domestic coal sent to Ontario market;

And whereas Alberta bituminous coal is now receiving no such subvention or assistance;

And whereas the bituminous coal mining industry in Alberta is in a very serious plight because of the lack of markets, which naturally is causing a great deal of distress among the employees connected with the industry;

And whereas Alberta bituminous coal cannot now be marketed in Manitoba and eastward on account of competition with United States coal;

And whereas a substantial market exists in Manitoba and eastward;

Be it resolved that the Dominion government be informed of our situation and approached for a subvention of freight of one-fifth of a cent per ton mile—the same as Nova Scotia—for all bituminous coal shipped from Alberta and sold in the area east of the Manitoba-Saskatchewan boundary.

A subsequent memorandum was presented to the government. I shall not take up the time of the house to read it fully, but I shall quote briefly from page 3:

In connection with our request we wish it to be clearly understood that the subvention asked for is with reference to the displacement of United States coal only and does not contemplate a straight subvention on all coal shipped to Manitoba from Alberta and eastern British Columbia. Similar arrangements to those employed for the movement of Nova Scotia coal under order in council P.C. 539 could be made for the province of Manitoba and thereby avoid any interference with the present movement of coal to Manitoba from the west.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Kenora is in Ontario; do they not get a cost rate for coal?

Mr. COOTE: They do not, as far as I know; all that coal is going to the railways. I do not think any of this coal is going east of Winnipeg except what is used by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The operators in Alberta are paying a very heavy freight rate on their product to Winnipeg. The rate from Bellevue to Winnipeg is $5.10 per ton. That is a distance of 841 miles. The cost from Fernie to Winnipeg is $5.30 per ton.

I should like to repeat something I said a moment ago: This year the Canadian Pacific coal requirements will be something over half a million tons less than they were a year ago, and certainly that will cut down employment a good deal. Just here I might quote one sentence from a letter which I received from one of the operators recently. He said:

You will readily understand that the subvention is absolutely necessary if we are even going to approximate last year's working time and if that fails, there is going to be more distress among the workers than ever.

I should like to mention also, Mr. Speaker, that I have received numerous telegrams and letters from the different locals of the miners' union in that area, all asking that this subvention be granted. I believe the secretary of the operators' association wrote to the minister suggesting that this arrangement might be made for a period of three years, which would give the operators time to prove that their coal is just as good as some of the American coal which finds so much favour in the Winnipeg market. The word "Pocahontas" when used in connection with bituminous coal, seems to be like the word "Keen's" when applied to mustard; we know there are other good brands of coal on the market, but if a person can say "this is Pocahontas coal" it seems to sell right away. I believe that if this subvention could be granted for a period of three years Canadian bituminous coal would establish itself in Winnipeg.

Some objection may be taken to this proposal because of the cost it will entail, and I recognize the fact that this matter should be carefully considered on that account. However, I should like to direct attention to the fact that up to the year 1924 the government received $1,051,000 in royalties from the mines I have mentioned. I do not know what these royalties would amount to since that year, but from rentals, royalties and the sale of certain coal lands, the government received from the companies in that district practically $1,500,000 up to the year 1924. I am sorry my figures are not up to date.

Then I have one other suggestion to make in regard to the coal industry. I think it will be generally admitted that in no other industry in Canada, taking it over a long period of years, has there been so much unemployment on the average as there has been in the coal industry. I am going to suggest to the government, in addition to the two suggestions I have made already, that they appoint a royal commission to investigate this coal industry. This was done in Great Britain some years ago, and I think it is largely as a result of that action that the present government in the old country have introduced some very drastic changes affecting the coal industry there. The appointment of this commission has been requested by the All Canadian Congress of Labour and also by the Mine Workers' Union of Canada. I have both resolutions here; the one passed by the All Canadian Congress of Labour reads as follows:

Whereas for a decade the Canadian coal mining industry has been subjected to such abnormal depression as to reduce the mining community to extreme poverty, due largely to the lack of coordination of supply and demand, with waste of labour power and natural resources; be it

Resolved that this congress call upon the government to appoint a royal commission to investigate conditions in the industry and to find a remedy.

I wish to quote briefly from an editorial which appeared in the Canadian Unionist, with regard to this proposal. The editorial states:

A careful inquiry by a royal commission might therefore point the way to such improvements in organization as would not only raise the mine worker from the coolie status but also add immeasurably to the wealth of the country.

The state of the coal mining industry has recently been given close study by the government of Great Britain, and reorganization of both production and distribution has been decided on, with restraint of wasteful competition, as the most practicable immediate reform. On a smaller scale, the industry in Canada is in much the same condition as in Great Britain, and it is believed that an official inquiry, by a royal commission, would be the most effective means af ascertaining the cause of the present distress among the miners and of evolving a remedy.

Now I wish to quote the resolution passed by the Mine Workers' Union of Canada, which is as follows:

We request that a royal commission be appointed immediately with a view to stabilizing the coal industry as a whole, by investigating the living conditions, sanitation, discrimination against outside purchasing of goods and necessities, "closed" or "company owned" towns, cost of living in the coal camps as compared with the cities, marketing and distribution of coal, etc., all with a view of alleviating the present distress and poverty among the miners and their families in Alberta and eastern British Columbia.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you that there is real distress among many of our miners. Recently I received a letter which told of the conditions in one town, where the miners were so poor they were not able to pay for their milk. The milkman notified the mounted police that he was not going to deliver milk to a large number of these families any longer, as he said he must have money for his milk in order to pay for the feed he gave his dairy cows. One cannot blame the milkman, but if the miners are in such dire circumstances that they cannot afford to purchase milk for their children, I think this government might very well appoint a royal commission to examine thoroughly into the coal industry and make such recommendation as they may see fit for the improvement of the status of the people engaged in that industry. I think the responsibility in this case is primarily on the Dominion rather than on the provincial government, because as I see the situation in Alberta the trouble has been caused largely through the unfortunate results of our immigration policy. The majority of the men who consider themselves capable miners are immigrants, and I think a majority of these immigrants came to this country under the guise of agricultural labourers. I think there is no question at all but that the present situation has been brought about largely as a result of our immigration policy. Therefore I do not feel that I should make any apology whatever for asking the Dominion government to take the responsibility of dealing with this whole question of relief to the unemployed miners, rather than to ask the province to assume that responsibility.

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words with regard to the amendment now before the house. This is a very important matter which seriously affects my constituency, which is largely made up of miners and labourers.

Several theories have been advanced in the hope of solving this unemployment problem. A few days ago, in looking over some literature, I came across a theory which I thought might be applicable to my constituency, and perhaps to some others throughout the country. It was called the theory of underconsumption, or the failure of consumption to keep up with the swelling current of production. The writer thought this was the best solution of this unemployment problem, and certainly it has to do with conditions which exist in my own constituency.

Some two months ago a conference was held between the operators and the miners over a question of wages, and after a great deal of deliberation they decided upon a contract. A referendum was taken a few days ago and the contract was upheld by quite a large majority, so that to-day the people of Nova Scotia have a contract rate which will continue for two years. But where is the employment to come from to provide those wages? We could produce more coal in Cape Breton if we had a market. Last summer our principal pit was working with but a single shift, and this year our mines have been working only one day and a half per week, simply because we did not have markets for the coal we could produce. I feel that I am perfectly justified in placing the blame for this state of affairs upon the fiscal policy of the Dominion government.

In 1929 we imported into Canada 4,019,917 tons of anthracite coal, and 13,707,543 tons of bituminous coal. When such a flood of coal is imported into a coal producing country like Canada, is it any wonder that the operators, and also the men dependent upon their industry for work, are discouraged? That importation represents $2,000,000 in wages, and it means less employment for our Canadian workmen. But the government is doing absolutely nothing to relieve this situation, or to prevent the enormous inflow of coal, and therefore I think I have a perfect right to put the blame upon the government fiscal policy.

Had the government fully implemented the report of the Duncan commission, considerable assistance would have been given to the maritime provinces. For many years we in the maritime provinces have been trying to have coke ovens erected throughout the country, and have tried to educate the Canadian people in the use of coke instead of hard coal. A bill to that effect was presented in this house, but nothing ever came of it. How can we expect to do anything when coke is allowed to enter this country free of duty, as well as American coal to be used in the manufacture of coke. Can we expect any help from a government which permits such conditions to exist?

I believe that if this government would offer assistance to the provinces it would be accepted. My own province has enacted the Women's Allowance Act, which allows $60 to $70 per month to any woman who is unable to work and support her children. If the Dominion government would take the lead in this matter, it would assist the provinces very materially, but after hearing the remarks made a few days ago by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the effect that he would not vote five cents to a Tory government, I do not see where there is much chance of our receiving any assistance towards the relief of unemployment. However, Mr. Speaker, there is always a bright side to everything. The bright side to this question is the knowledge that within a very short time we will have a government that will see that justice is done to the provinces of the Dominion irrespective of their political faith.

Unemployment would be reduced through the use of our own raw materials, instead of their being sent out to the United States. Why not manufacture the finished article with our own material and use the labour of our own people? Some hon. member has said that the United States, which is a high protection country, has a great deal of unemployment. I can well understand why that is true, because a great number of those unemployed are Canadians who left their homes to look for work in other countries. The United States has taken a stand in this matter. The city of Detroit, where there are a great number of Canadians, has taken a definite stand on the subject. There are many people in that city from Cape Breton, and I have many letters telling of the inability to obtain work, in many cases the writers not having the fare to come back again. Many nurses in the hospitals of Detroit have been dismissed, although I have heard since that some have been reinstated on account of their efficiency. The United States cannot be blamed for taking this stand. They say: "We cannot give you foreigners any work, we must protect our own people. Surely you have a government in Canada and you can obtain work there. Go back to your government and ask them to give you work; do not come to us." The United States government are protecting their people, and our government should protect our people.

Some hon. member has mentioned the displacement of the workman by the machine. Scientific inventions are found to-day in practically every industrial centre. It would be hard to find to-day an old fashioned handpick miner in our mining districts. The only solution of this problem is more factories and industrial centres. We should build up our highways, and carry on other construction work, so that our men could obtain employment. Whatever solution is offered for this problem, the government of the day must take the lead, whether it be by the appointment of a commission or the creation of industries to provide work. The majoriy of our workingmen want work; they do not want charity. How can we do this? It could be done by the development of the great resources in which Canada abounds. Perhaps we will always have more or less unemployment, but if this condition can be relieved to any extent it is our duty to offer that relief. The hidden wealth of this great country of ours should be brought to light to provide work for our workingmen. They want work but they are unable to obtain it. It seems strange that this government cannot afford a certain amount of employment to our own people so that they need not go to foreign countries in search of employment. If that were done, then we could say in perfect truth that we are not able to say to-day—Canada for Canadians.

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am in absolute accord with both the spirit and the letter of the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I believe the government should not only take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment at present existing in certain sections of Canada, but strive to work out some formula to anticipate the grave question of unemployment which it and all succeeding governments will encounter in this country from time to time. As the hon. member for North Winnipeg very properly said, it is always our most vital question. I had no doubt that in respect to this matter the government would trot out and hide behind the British North America Act, as it usually does, and which it did on this occasion; nevertheless, the problem of unemployment is still to be solved.

I am a firm believer in protecting the working classes in this country. This seems to me to be one of the greatest national questions we have to deal with. Like all matters of social legislation, it is important, far-reaching and expensive, and I believe the attempt to shoulder these heavy responsibilities on the provinces is unjust and grossly unfair. Take, for instance, the question of old age pensions. All heartily agree with the principle of old age pensions and are anxious to have the legislation enacting it implemented in the nine provinces of Canada. But how can that be fairly adjusted in a provincial way when the cost to one province is as high as 35 per cent of its total revenue, the cost to another only 10 per cent, and the cost to other provinces, I understand, in western Canada, as low as 2 per cent? The house may think what it likes, but it is quite apparent that this is the happy day of advanced social legislation for our working classes. That being admittedly the case, some of the smaller provinces are not financially capable of keeping pace with this very worthy legislation to assist our working people.

Old age pensions and unemployment are questions that must be dealt with sooner or later if we are to have a happy and contented country. In my opinion—and I am giving my own opinion—the only way in which they can be effectively dealt with is nationally. The government will say: Why, if you saddle us with aid to highways, aid to technical education, public health and matters pertaining to social legislation, you will exhaust our treasury. My answer to that is that under the British North America Act the federal authority is vested with all the elastic sources of revenue and can so regulate its revenues to meet any financial exigencies. The provinces cannot do that. In the final accounting a tax removed from a province and imposed by the federal authority works no injustice to any taxpayer. The burden is none the heavier, and I am of opinion that the only effective and successful way of giving the working classes in Canada a real chance to enjoy the privileges and advantages of modern social legislation is to place those matters of which I have spoken under federal control and authority.

It seems to me that altogether too much stress is laid upon the division of the burden of taxation as between the federal and provincial authorities in hewing so close to the line of technical interpretation of the British North America Act. If a citizen of a province who is also a citizen of the Dominion is relieved of a provincial tax and that burden is absorbed by the federal government, no injustice is worked. The citizen does not pay any more, but it certainly would have the effect of standardizing, harmonizing and equalizing civilization and advancement in all the provinces, which, after all, make up the Dominion.

We have under the present allotment of jurisdiction under the British North America Act between the federal and provincial authorities, two very unfortunate sets of circumstances: first, the financial inequalities of the provinces; secondly, the more financially fortunate of the provinces being able to provide legislative relief of a social character to their citizens, which relief is denied in other provinces. This creates a state of unfairness and inequality that is unhealthy and the very antithesis of what I understand to be a united and contented Canada. Could anything be more anomalous than to find in one province the citizens enjoying, say old age pensions, unemployment insurance, mother's allowance, minimum wage laws, eight-hour day and other rights, and in another province of the same Canada, the same confederacy, the same union, the citizens enjoying none of these benefits? That state of affairs can be tolerated only so long, just long enough to break both the spirit and the letter of confederation.

Questions of a national character must of necessity be dealt with by the federal authorities and I consider the question of unemployment fundamentally and primarily one of national import. In this connection my mind goes back to the treaty of peace signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, where the following will be found as part of that great document. I am quoting part XIII of the treaty, section 1, which reads:

> Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;
> And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required; as. for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply—

And, mark you, Mr. Speaker,

—the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries.

Following that, article 387 of the treaty sets up a permanent organization for the promotion of the objects set forth above, and in the annex to chapter IV of article 424, it specifies the place of the first meeting as Washington and it supplies for that meeting the agenda which includes among other things the application of the principle of the eight-hour day or the forty-eight hour week, the question of preventing or providing against unemployment. It goes on to mention many other matters of social legislation of importance in this connection. Section 2 of article 427, under "General Principles of the Treaty of Peace", reads as follows:

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognize that differences of climate, habits and customs of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance.

Then it goes on to enunciate nine such principles, most of which were enumerated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the speech that he delivered the other day. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would any sane person contend for one minute that these important and worthy matters of social legislation are not national in character? Furthermore, the provinces as such were not signatories to the treaty of Versailles. The federal authority had that grave duty to perform, and having gone that far should continue responsibility and make some effort to conform to their sacred pronouncements and their national obligations.

[Mr. R. K. Smith.]

Back in 1922 I had the privilege of appearing before a Senate committee on unemployment, and I was greatly impressed with the evidence of one of the representatives of labour whose name I have for the moment forgotten. He said in part that while the war was in progress and recruits were being sought, solemn pledges were freely given that when the war was over and victory had been won, there would be a general reconstruction and reestablishment of people and conditions in this country. What class, he asked, needed reconstruction and reestablishment? Certainly not the wealthy. It was meant for one class and one classe alone, the one that needed it —the working class. Perhaps if there had been a measure at least of conscription of wealth as well as of men during the war, we would be in a better position to attain that ideal to-day.

I believe, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when this vital problem so seriously affecting our working classes should be treated in a spirit of national consciousness and righteousness, from a broad and uniform viewpoint, and with the fact always staring us in the face that our commitments are clear and great, our obligations unfulfilled, and as a consequence our national honour at stake.

Mr. T. E. SIMPSON (West Algoma): In rising to support the amendment of my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), I believe that the question of unemployment is one in which every hon. member of this house should be particularly interested. I believe that the people of this country are anxious that a solution of this problem should be found. They realize that the greatest asset of any nation is its citizenship, that the men who carry the dinner pail, the working men, are those who are largely responsible for producing the wealth of any country, and that a government that does not provide a policy that will enable these working men to be gainfully employed is not measuring up to its full responsibility.

I entirely agree with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in his statement this afternoon that in a country such as Canada we are bound to have a certain amount of seasonal unemployment. I cannot agree with him, however, when he states that the men who are employed during the season of navigation are found among the ranks of the unemployed when navigation is closed, and that they are seeking assistance during the winter months. It is true that many of them are unemployed during the winter months, but we find very few of them seeking assistance, because they figure that the wages which they receive during the season of navigation will be quite ample to take care of them during the winter months.

Mr. CANTLEY: They are fresh water sailors anyway.

Mr. SIMPSON: Yes. That we have an abnormal unemployment situation at the present time has been admitted, I think, by practically every hon. gentleman who has participated in this discussion, with the exception of the Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have had speaking in this debate representatives from the west and from as far east as Sydney, Cape Breton, and we have heard them describe the conditions of unemployment in their particular localities. Some of them cited cases of extreme hardship. Yet we find that the ministers who have spoken have offered no real solution for this unemployment problem.

What is the resolution before the house? It simply asks that immediate action be taken by the government to deal with the question of unemployment. A broad resolution, a resolution one would imagine that should be accepted unanimously by this house; but we find the Prime Minister devoting the greater portion of his speech to an endeavour to prove that we are enjoying great prosperity in the Dominion of Canada and that there is no abnormal unemployment situation. We have the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), more familiar with the labour situation because of the position that he occupies as head of that department, admitting that we have more than the ordinary amount of unemployment, but offering no solution. Both of them, as well as the Minister of the Interior, are going to vote against this amendment if it comes to a vote, thus shelving the question for the time being, washing their hands of all responsibility and passing the responsibility over to the municipalities and the provinces.

There can be no doubt that the municipalities and the provinces have some responsibility in connection with unemployment, but in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the federal government also has responsibility in connection with the unemployment situation as we find it to-day. If under a policy of immigration such as this government has maintained, immigrants are brought into this country and find their way into various municipalities without those municipalities asking for them, and where there is no work for them to do, will anyone contend that it is the responsibility of those municipalities either to find work for those immigrants or to care for them until such time as work can be found for them? That surely is a responsibility that should rest upon the government that admitted those immigrants to this country.

My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) in the course of his excellent speech stated that in one of the western provinces at least sixty-one per cent of those who were receiving relief were immigrants. The Manitoba Free Press, in an editorial, states that of the number registering for assistance in the city of Vancouver, seventy per cent are immigrants. Surely the federal government have some responsibility to those who have come in as immigrants and are to-day a public charge.

I am opposed to the present system of immigration. I do not believe this country should spend, as it has been spending during the last several years, an average of over $3,000,000 annually for the purpose of bringing in immigrants, when at the same time our own citizens have been leaving the country by the tens of thousands, following our raw material over to the United States in order to secure employment in fabricating it into the finished product, much of which is shipped back into this country. What we need is a policy to provide more jobs for our own people. Once that is done there will be no difficulty about immigration. Once we have more jobs than we have Canadians to fill them, you will find desirable immigrants rapping at your door asking for admission. Then you will not need to spend any money on advertisements such as those my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hay) read to the house this afternoon.

Might I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government is responsible for unemployment from another aspect? The fiscal policy of this government, their policy of tinkering with the tariff, has been responsible for a certain amount of the unemployment that we are suffering from at the present time. Take, for example, agricultural implements and automobiles. The trade treaties that this government have negotiated and their downward revisions of the tariff have made it easier for the products of other countries to come in here and compete with the products of Canadian labour. Let me draw the attention of the house to the effect of the policy of the government in reducing the duty on agricultural implements, which they provided for in the budget of 1924. Immediately after the budget had been presented to the house a deputation composed of manufacturers of agricultural implements—including our present ambassador in Washington, Mr. Massey—appeared before the government and pleaded for some relief, stating that the proposed reduction of duties would ruin their industry. They succeeded in getting relief, the government making provision for the free entry of all the steel that goes into the manufacture of agricultural implements, and for a drawback of duty on many other commodities entering into their manufacture. What was the result? An increase in the import of agricultural implements from the United States in the fiscal year of 1929 over 1925 of about $33,722,000; the imports for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925 being $6,428,549 and for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, $40,150,020. Who got the benefit? The workmen in the United States, because the farmers in this country did not reap any benefit as a result of the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. My hon. friend from London (Mr. White) in a speech he delivered in the session of 1928—the very year for which these figures are given, the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929—quoted the prices of agricultural implements from the price lists of the International Harvester Company, which showed conclusively that notwithstanding the reduction in the duty no benefit had accrued to our farmers by way of a reduction in the price of their implements. Then let us take the reduction of the duty on automobiles in 1926. When the reduction was announced in the budget our automobile manufacturers appeared before the government and stated that the reduction would ruin their industry. The government treated them just as they had treated the agricultural implement manufacturers—gave them a drawback of the duty on some of their raw materials, and the remainder of it admitted free of duty. This reduction of duty produced a similar effect, the increase in our imports for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, over the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, amounting to $41,314,000; or a total increase in the imports of these two items alone of $75,036,000.

Figuring on the basis laid down by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) last session, when he stated that for every dollar of value of the manufactured article fifty cents represented labour, and taking an average wage of $1,500 a year, these additional purchases from the United States would have provided employment in this country for 25,000 workmen, and those workmen could comfortably support a city of 125,000 population. And it must be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that I have taken into account only the raw material that entered into the manufacture of these agricultural implements and automobiles. Their raw material is the finished product of other manufacturers in this country, for instance, the finished product of the primary steel manufacturer. I could cite the conditions obtaining in that industry at the present time, but I refrain from doing so.

I submit, sir, that having regard to the figures that I have given the policy of this government has a direct bearing on the unemployment situation as we find it to-day and therefore we might very reasonably expect the government to accept the amendment as proposed by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg; but they are passing the responsibility on to the provinces. A question of this nature should be treated on its merits, it should be above partisanship, but we find the Minister of Labour trying to blame the premier of Ontario for not proceeding more rapidly with highway construction, claiming that that would have provided against a certain amount of unemployment; but the Minister of Labour himself voted with the Prime Minister against the resolution that was moved in this house to grant federal assistance to the construction of highways, particularly the completion of the trans-Canada highway. I think everyone will admit that if that work had been proceeded with it would certainly have provided employment for a considerable number of men.

I must say I was amazed at the statement the Prime Minister made in this house the other day. He said that so far as the government was concerned with respect to this question of unemployment it would not give a five cent piece to any province where there was a Tory government. Was there ever an exhibition of more extreme partisanship than that indicated by the statement of the right hon. gentleman? Instead of treating this great humanitarian question on its merits he tells the people of five provinces of this Dominion that because in the exercise of their citizenship in a free country they decided to elect Conservative governments, they cannot expect from this government a five cent piece for the relief of unemployment. I suppose that is the reason the government turned down the proposals for assistance in the construction of highways and for technical education. The people of Canada have the right to expect something better than that from their Prime Minister. I submit that this government, by reason of its immigration and fiscal policies, is largely responsible for the unemployment problem as it exists to-day; for that reason they should accept this amendment and assume their full responsibility as a government to deal with this question.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): I do not intend to take up much of the time of this house in speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), but I feel it incumbent upon me to say something in regard to it, and to make a few humble suggestions to the house as to what I consider would remedy or alleviate the unemployment situation in Canada.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) referred to the steel and coal industry of Nova Scotia. May I point out to the house that four years ago, in 1926, the Duncan commission made its report to parliament, and in that report it recommended that the steel and coal industries should receive the favourable consideration of this government. After four years of waiting the government has failed to implement the recommendations contained in the Duncan report with regard to these two very important industries. I can tell the house that the steel workers of Canada, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia, are becoming restless, and as a proof of that statement I am going to read to you an article not from the Tory press but from the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, April 4, 1930. It is a Canadian Press despatch and is as follows:

A resolution urging that adequate tariff protection be afforded the steel industry in order to give employment to citizens of Canada, reduce privation and alleviate the unemployment situation which is singularly acute, has been forwarded to Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Premier of Canada, and members of his cabinet by the general works committee of the employees representation plan, representing over three thousand steel workers employed by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company.

I ask you, sir, if that is not worthy of the consideration of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of this government? We have heard a resolution from the workers praying that the government do something to alleviate the unemployment situation in this country. On Friday last the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson) pointed out that ships for the Canadian government to be used in Canadian trade and industry might well be built in Canada. During the course of the hon. gentleman's remarks he was interrupted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), but in a gentlemanly fashion. The minister on that occasion pointed out that it would cost nearly 40 per cent more to build these ships in Canadian shipyards. May I say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is my friend, and I admire him in many ways; on that occasion he was making a statement in favour of protection, and I am told the minister is a protectionist. He pointed out that it would cost 40 per cent more, and in my opinion he made an argument for a 40 per cent tariff on foreign built ships. If we pay a higher rate for ships built in Canada, where does the difference in cost arise? The materials are purchased in our own country, the ship from the keel up is built of materials produced in our own country, and the building of the ship gives employment to vast numbers of workmen in the steel and iron trades, the different metal industries, the furnishing industry, the electrical industry and all other industries which contribute their proportion towards the building of a ship. Do not forget that the most important thing of all is that you are giving employment to thousands of Canadian workmen, and instead of sending your money abroad you are keeping it at home. By the building of those ships in Canada we are buying our own materials from our own citizens, and are giving employment to our native workmen. I ask, sir, if that is not one of the best arguments with respect to the amendment now before the house. I may say that I pointed out this fact to the government during the debate in this house on June 10 of last year, and at that time I advocated that Canadian ships required for the Canadian government and its different departments should be built in Canadian shipyards.

A couple of months after my return to Halifax the International Association of Machinists on August 22, 1929, passed a resolution in the following words:

We wish to call your attention to the matter of steel shipbuilding in Canada. You will readily understand that the federal government is responsible for furnishing transportation facilities for our commerce, both on land and water. It has been the policy of all Dominion governments to subsidize our railways, both by grants of lands and moneys. They have been very successful in inducing companies to erect plants to construct locomotives and passenger cars of the largest types built anywhere, and at the present time we have two of the largest railway systems in the world, which are able to get all their rolling stock built in Canada.

Now we wish to get your assistance in inducing the Dominion government to have all ships, whether passenger or freight, that are used by the railway systems and government departments, built in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway system has had a number of ships built in Great Britain at a cost of over $50,000,000. The Canadian National Steamships, a government concern, had five ships built at a cost of $8,000,000, and have given contracts for three more ships to cost $5,000,000, all of which are to be built in Great Britain.

This means that over $63,000,000 of Canadian moneys have been sent across to Great Britain to build ships, when, if these ships had been built in Canada, it would mean that the amount of money would have been put into the pockets of shipyard workers of Canada.

It is easy to see the reason for this policy of having ships built in Great Britain. The standard of living is higher in Canada, because the Canadian worker demands and receives higher wages. A comparison of Canadian and United States methods in having ships built is suggested. The United States government, in placing contracts for the carrying of United States mail stipulates that they must be carried on ships built in the United States, and they have cooperated with the steamship companies in placing orders for ships in the United States shipyards. Some of the steamship companies have paid over twice as much for ships to be built in United States shipyards rather than send their orders to Great Britain or Germany.

If the Americans can do that, why cannot the Canadian government and Canadian companies do that which tends to keep the money in circulation in Canada? Therefore be it resolved that we adopt the following resolution:

Whereas, during the Great War the building of steel ships was found to be possible in Canada. and taking into consideration the immense resources of this country, the development of which is reaching enormous proportions;

Be it further resolved, that the trades and labour organizations use every effort to bring pressure to bear upon the government to take the necessary steps to encourage the steel shipbuilding industry in Canada.

That is a union, sir, in my own city of Halifax. They are not wrong in their views and they are not sectional in their outlook either. I should like to point out that similar resolutions have been adopted by unions in Quebec and Ontario. I have another resolution here, which is dated at Halifax, March 15, of the present year:

Felix P. Quinn, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.
Dear Sir:

I have been instructed by Halifax Lodge No. 765, International Association of Machinists, to forward to you the following resolution.

Whereas the increased business activity of the maritime provinces especially between the mainland and Prince Edward Island calls for greater transportation facilities on the Canadian National railway and demands the building of a car ferry to be equipped with facilities for the transportation of automobiles which the present car ferry does not possess.

And whereas there are shipbuilding firms with yards equipped for building ships such as the car ferry required in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, it is for this reason that Halifax Lodge No. 765, International Association of Machinists wish to place themselves on record as protesting against the placing of the contract to build the car ferry to any firm of shipbuilders outside the maritime provinces.

Respectfully yours,
E. J. Rudge,
Recording Secretary Lodge No. 765, International Association of Machinists.

In the discussion of a few days ago the question of the Prince Edward car ferry was dealt with by the Minister of Labour, who told us that that contract had been awarded to a firm in Quebec at a very much higher figure than the government would have had to pay in Great Britain or some other European country. I can quite appreciate that statement; I know how true it is and I must congratulate the minister, if he had anything to do with having that contract placed in a Canadian shipyard. I regret very much, however, that since the steamer was to ply between two of the maritime ports, the contract was not placed with the Halifax shipyards, because I understand that the difference in the contract price was only some $5,000 or $6,000. Having regard to that fact, I hope the contract price will be adhered to. I hope we will not have a situation similar to that which arose a few days ago, when we were dealing with the estimates for the province of Quebec having to do with harbours and rivers. There was an item of some $27,000 for some firm in Quebec, and when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) was asked for an explanation of the item he told the committee it was because that amount of loss had been sustained by the firm under a contract with the government. If after the ship is completed this shipbuilding company comes to the house with a request for a grant from the government to cover a loss sustained under that contract, if I am here I will bring the matter to the attention of every hon. member. That would be unfair competition; if firms are allowed to tender and contract with this government at an unreasonably low figure, in the hope of coming back to parliament and asking for a subsequent grant to make up the loss, I contend that it is a very poor principle and a very unbusinesslike way for the government to deal with such matters.

With regard to the resolution passed by the Halifax branch of the machinists' union, I may point out that under date of February 22 a memorandum on the need of tariff protection for the shipbuilding industry of Canada, addressed to the federal government and members of parliament by Gaspard Langlois, president of the Shipworkers' Union of Lauzon, Quebec, along similar lines, appeared in the Montreal Gazette. Towards the end of the article I find the following:

The shipbuilding industry of Canada is going through a very serious crisis, says Mr. Langlois. Former prosperous yards have hardly sufficient work to justify their maintenance. And while Canadian shipyards are nearly silent, Canadian companies are constantly awarding shipbuilding contracts to other countries.

I point this out to the government for their consideration, and ask them whether the unemployment situation would not have been greatly alleviated if these contracts for Canadian ships had been placed with Canadian shipyards. The article continues:

> Nearly $100,000,000, it is said, has been invested in the effort to reestablish shipbuilding in Canada: most of it has been sunk, apparently. Of course, the effort to revive Canadian shipbuilding involved considerable investment in subsidiary industries, which, also is all at sea.
>
> The hope of the Lauzon workers that the "Canadian shipbuilder will be given protection equal to that enjoyed by his neighbour the American shipbuilder" is not, unfortunately, likely to be realized while the present government is in power, anyway.

I must admit that I share the views of that gentleman.

I listened to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) telling the house that in his opinion the tariff would not remedy the situation, and he made the statement that high tariff countries were not without their unemployment problems. Let me point out to him the difference between England and France. England is a low tariff country, and has nearly 2,000,000 people unemployed at the present time. Contrast that situation with France which is a high tariff country, and which has only 1,500 unemployed. France is a country with five times the population of Canada but with only 1,500 unemployed, of which about 1,200 are in the city of Paris. I give those figures on the best authority; I have taken them from the latest issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, which is issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the administration of the Hon. James Malsolm. On page 512 is an article by Hercule Barré, the Canadian trade commissioner, dealing with the commercial and financial situation in France. He says:

> According to official figures on February 18, the number of unemployed in France totalled 1,521, of which 1,134 were in the Paris district.

If a protectionist tariff is so beneficial for France, then this government should consider whether a similar protectionist tariff would not be favourable for this country and tend toward the relief of unemployment in the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) the other day pointed out that the trend in the west was toward protection. I believe that the trend in the whole of Canada is toward protection. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) showed me a report which stated that the Liberal candidate for that constituency had declared that he was for protection, and that the Liberal candidate for the constituency of Vancouver-Burrard also had declared himself a protectionist and had denounced the new tariff amendments of the United States. The workingmen of Canada want protection for the industries which give them employment, but I am afraid that they will look in vain for relief from a government which has failed after four years to implement the recommendations of the Duncan report with regard to coal and steel. These workingmen will have to wait because of their failure to provide adequate protection to our industries, particularly to shipbuilding. A remedy can hardly be expected from a government which lacks solidarity and which is so diversified with regard to its fiscal policy. That remedy will be lacking so long as we have a prime minister who holds such narrow views as were displayed when he told this house and this country that he would not allow his government to give a single five cent piece to any province which had a Tory premier.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have decided at this late moment to take part in this discussion because of some of the speeches to which I have listened to-night. Perhaps I am in a happier situation than the majority of the members of this House of Commons, for I represent a constituency which has enjoyed more prosperity during the last two years than at any period since confederation.

The situation which has been depicted with so much gloom by our Conservative friends is but a temporary one. Considerable improvement had taken place during the season of 1929 when compared with the conditions which existed in 1921, when this government took over the reins of office. During the summer season of 1929 this country enjoyed the greatest era of prosperity that it had known since confederation. Never in the history of this nation have we enjoyed greater prosperity, greater development and greater contentment, and nowhere else in the world could a labouring class be found who enjoyed a higher standing of living than did the people of Canada during the year 1929. A reaction occurred late in the fall arising from conditions over which no government could have control. Shortly after that reaction occurred we were told by the leading financiers, bankers and industrialists, both in the public press and elsewhere, that Canada was enjoying the greatest prosperity of any civilized country in the world. The causes of that reaction are known to every hon. member on the other side of the house. The main cause was the inability to move the wheat crop of 1929, an abnormal situation for which no government could make provision. That situation was intensified by the stock market crash which occurred in the United States, another cause which could not be foreseen or prevented. This condition arose during our period of seasonal unemployment and it will disappear within the course of the next few months. I am sure that our Conservative friends dread to see the result of the Liberal policy as it will apply to conditions in Canada after this temporary period of depression.

We have heard a great deal about the situation in the United States as well as in Canada, but I think the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has depicted a situation which should give more concern to hon. members than the temporary condition now existing in this country. The unemployment in Canada is not to be compared with the unemployment which prevails in every other part of the world. I have before me an article which appeared in the Literary Digest of March 29, in which conditions in other parts of the world are clearly set forth. This article shows quite definitely that the conditions in other countries are much worse than those in Canada. The article, which is entitled A World of the Workless, reads as follows:

In every big industrial country of the world the tragic tide of unemployment is said to be rising rapidly.

A few years ago, we are told, it was estimated that the total of unemployed was 20,000,000. The figure now is believed to be nearly 30,000,000. So declares the London Daily Herald, a labour organ and the official newspaper of the Labour party.

Recent reports from America and Germany, it adds, coupled with the serious situation in Britain, have emphasized the fact that the crisis extends over the globe.

Japan is no exception, for business depression is widespread there, factories are shutting down, and this newspaper continues:

"A short time ago the late government estimated the total workless at 300,000. To-day the figure exceeds 800,000, and it is forecast that the million mark will quickly be passed.

Labour organizations in Japan are drafting remedial measures, and the government is preparing a scheme of unemployment insurance.

As in Japan, so elsewhere. The latest estimates of the unemployed in the United States vary, but some put the total at the enormous figure of 6,000,000.

Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labour, says the 'danger point' has been reached. He declares that 22 per cent of organized labour is idle, and that 43 per cent of the building workers are out of work."

If we turn to Europe, the Daily Herald goes on to say, we find a similar condition. At the end of December, it informs us, Germany had 4,583,000 idle organized workers.

During a week in February, it is pointed out, no fewer than 30,000 were added to the Germans receiving unemployment benefit. We read then:

[Mr. Lapierre.]

"Italy, whose industrial activity is comparatively small, has nearly half a million workers recorded as unemployed.

France is the only known exception among countries which have large-scale industry, though here the peculiar circumstances make comparison difficult."

I wish to call the attention of some of my hon friends to the peculiar situation existing in France at the present time:

"No recent figures are available for Russia. the latest were for October, 1928, when nearly two millions of the 11,000,000 organized workers were idle.

Claims have been made that industry in Russia will absorb 5,000,000 new workers in the next two years, but that is not fact but prophecy."

Economists have suggested that the unemployment was temporary, and that when the world has settled down to postwar conditions, production and trade would right themselves. That view is now discredited, and the outlook is regarded with apprehension.

That depicts the worldwide situation at the present moment with regard to labour, leaving Canada in a far better industrial and financial position than any other country in the civilized world.

We have heard a great deal about conditions in the United States. Some of my hon. friends on the other side, using the old familiar slogan, were still harping on Canadians leaving to go to the United States. I am now quoting from the same periodical, the Literary Digest of March 22 of this year, as follows:

Washington reports two elderly women, a policeman and half a dozen demonstrators hurt, and thirteen persons arrested when police used tear gas and blackjacks to suppress a riot which followed a Communist demonstration in front of the White House.

Cleveland reports more than 100 injured by flying police-clubs when "a cursing, jeering crowd of 10,000" battled several hundred police "after a Communist unemployment demonstration had been conducted without violence of any kind."

Detroit reports fourteen persons, including one policeman, sent to hospitals, and thirty-one arrested when mounted police prevented an unemployment rally.

Pittsburgh reports five men sent to hospitals, severely beaten, and twelve arrested when a Communist parade broke up in a riot.

Milwaukee reports forty-two men and youths arrested when police intervened in a demonstration by 1,500 unemployed men, and then raided Communist headquarters.

Seattle reports one man injured, and twelve arrested when police dispersed a crowd of 500, led by Communists.

Buffalo reports four Communist speakers arrested when they refused to leave Lafayette square, where a Red demonstration had been planned.

New Haven reports police thwarted three attempts by a group of Communists to storm the city hall to present an employment petition to the mayor.

Chicago, Philadelphia, and San Francisco report Communist parades held without disorder.

That is the situation into which a high protective tariff has brought the United States, and had the same policy been put into force in Canada a similar condition would have been created here. But what I have been quoting so far has been from United States periodicals. I will now quote from the Standard of March 22 in which are given the results of an interview with R. W. Gould, Secretary of the Canadian Manufacurers' Association. The article, which is headed "Conditions are bad in States, says R. W. Gould," reads:

Conditions in the United States after the bad break last fall improved, but another set back has occurred from which a slow recovery is now being made, reported R. W. Gould, secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in an interview with The Standard this morning upon his return from New York and Boston, Mass.

Undoubtedly, he said, a great deal of unemployment exists and there have been frequent demonstrations by the jobless.

Mr. Gould surveyed the general industrial position and found a far from happy situation in a number of cases. For instance, at Boston, he heard that the cotton trade is in a pretty bad way with many mills closing down with the intention of reopening in the south.

The boot and shoe situation is also very unsatisfactory, he said. The trade is hard hit by competition from Czechoslovakia, he added. Strangely enough this competition is caused largely by Americans who obtained their experience in Boston and have gone to Slovakia and opened plants there. Labour is cheap and they are pressing hard the American home producers.

The outlook is bad also in the silk and hosiery industries, declared Mr. Gould. This is due largely, he commented, to the disorganized condition of the industries themselves.

The fishing industry, he found, has been fairly steady with both catches and markets good. Some 14 new super trawlers are being built he ascertained and will be launched in the next few months. The Americans, he added, have an eye on the Canadian market.

The tariff situation, he stated, is very disturbing.

In view of the situation which prevails in Washington at present, are we Liberals not justified in claiming for the Liberal party a policy that has at least maintained a certain amount of prosperity and avoided the grave condition now existing in the United States? Has not the policy which the Liberal party enunciated at its convention in 1919 been carried out to the extent of giving us the most prosperous era this country has ever experienced?

In view of those facts, difficult as our situation is at the present time, I feel that the government is fully able to cope with it, and the people of Canada who realize this condition of affairs will see to it, when the time comes, that the government are returned to power with a larger majority than they at present have in the house.

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate I will not detain the house very long, but the unemployment situation in the border cities is, I believe, more acute in proportion to population than in any other part of Canada; and we also have an international labour situation. One reason why we have so many unemployed in the winter season I trace back to 1926 when the government changed the duties on automobiles. By its action it forced the automobile industry to adopt United States methods of mass production. Let me illustrate what I mean. If a company planned to manufacture 50,000 cars they would order all their materials; when ready to start they would employ three shifts, each working eight hours a day, push forward the work as quickly as possible, then lay off two shifts and keep the remaining shift going for three days a week. That has been the situation in the border cities for the last two years; indeed some of the industries practically closed up. This means throwing out of employment 5,000 to 6,000 men. We have another situation in regard to which I cannot do better than quote a paragraph from the Border Cities Star of January 30 of this year. It says:

Our greatest difficulty, of course, lies in the fact that the border cities seem to be a mecca for a large part of all the unemployed men in Canada. This is due, probably, to two or three factors. We are widely known as the centre of the Canadian automotive industry, and the automotive industry, it is just as well known, pays attractive wages. Secondly, our community has had an unusually rapid progress and the news of our expansion has travelled everywhere. Thirdly, we are next door to the United States, and large numbers of people come here from Europe and from all over Canada with the idea of eventually getting across the line. While they are here, of course, they clog the local labour market.

Our charitable institutions and our towns and cities are taxed to the utmost in taking care of the unemployed during the winter. We have down there the Good Fellows, who raise a very large sum every year to take care of the poor. The city of Windsor also spends a large amount each year for the same purpose. In January last the city was taking care of 400 families, providing them with groceries, milk and fuel.

I claim that under such conditions they may reasonably expect some help from the federal government because of the fact that these conditions are caused by the bringing into this country of immigrants by the federal government, and by the change of tariff in the automobile industry which the government made in 1926.

I would urge upon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) and the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) that they be very careful how they handle the situation on the border. For instance, an order in council was passed on the 7th day of August last, one paragraph of which provides that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization may admit any contract labourer if satisfied that his labour or services are required in Canada. The principle seems to be entirely right, but in practice it is not always followed. For instance, if the combination lock of a safe or vault cannot be opened and an expert has to be called in from Detroit, when he comes over with his tools he is turned back by the immigration officer. Only the other day a man came over from Detroit to do some work for the Ford Motor Company. He had his tools with him, and he was refused admittance into this country. The result was that it was broadcast from a Detroit radio station that night that one American who was going over to Canada to do a day's work had been turned back at the border, and it was pointed out that 8,000 Canadians crossed the border daily to work in Detroit. Many institutions in Detroit are only looking for an opportunity to dismiss Canadians and employ Americans. Let me quote from a letter that I received in this connection from Windsor:

> Jerry Buckley (Station WMBC) announced over the radio that an American citizen who had obtained a job with the Ford Motor Company of Canada, on bringing his tools over to go to work, was not allowed to proceed but was turned back to the United States. One of the immigration officers at this port on being asked the question, how they handle these matters, if an American citizen came to Windsor to seek work, stated he would be turned back immediately. In view of the fact that 8,000 Canadians cross the border every day and work in Detroit, and only a few Americans work in this country, think it very inadvisable to follow this policy of turning American citizens back. Think it will do us more harm than good.

That letter was dated the 15th of March. He writes again on the 20th of March, on the letterhead of the Ford Motor Company:

> Will say that I am vitally interested in this as I work in Detroit and the matter was called to my attention where I worked, that I had a lot of nerve coming over there and working when their citizens are not allowed to secure work in Windsor. I do not know how you feel about the matter, but if you feel as I do, hope you will take this matter up with the Minister of Immigration.

Then he goes on to say:

> With 8,000 Canadians crossing the border every day and working in Detroit, I think it rather foolish to keep any American citizens from securing work in Windsor. If they can get work here they are smarter than I am, as I have never been able to get work here, and I take my hat off to any man who can get work here.
> (Signed) M. C. McCullough.

I know that our immigration laws have to be carried out, but to my mind this regulation with regard to contract labour should apply only to numbers of men who are brought over on contract, because occasions often arise when an expert is required in connection with the installation of machinery or something of that kind, and there can be no objection to allowing such a man to enter for a day's work or so.

Now I want to show the other side of the case. It is the case of a man who worked with the Hudson-Essex motor car company for four and a half years in Detroit. He was an inspector, and he was discharged because he lived in Windsor and could not produce American citizenship papers. He receives a notice to report at the employment office, and I have here a copy of his discharge certificate, as reproduced in the Border Cities Star of April 1, 1930. It shows that his ability and deportment were good, and that his last operation was working as an inspector. I might point out that 16,000 Hudson-Essex motor cars were shipped into Canada during the past year, valued at least at $15,000,000 I think it a very short-sighted policy on the part of any company doing that much business in Canada to discharge a few Canadians who might be working in their plant at Detroit. As far as doing any work on their cars on this side of the line is concerned, they do not even put Canadian air in the tires. I remember that in 1928 I drew to the attention of the then Minister of Finance a statement that he made in the house in 1926, to the effect that the change made in the tariff at that time would force these motor companies to manufacture in Canada. The opposite has been the case so far as the Hudson motor company is concerned. I should like to put on Hansard this article from the Border Cities Star of April 1, 1930:

> Hudson-Essex Man is Fired
> Because He Lives In Canada, A. G. Guest Is Informed
> Off Roll For Good
> Must Move to Detroit And Become U. S. Citizen To Get Consideration
> Refuting statements of the Hudson Motor Car Company of Detroit that it was showing no discrimination in laying off Canadian workers, E. Grant Guest, who lives on highway No. 3 near Windsor, to-day stated that he had been told his services were no longer wanted because he was a Canadian.

First Notice March 15

Mr. Guest after working almost continunously for the Hudson company since August 4, 1925, was summarily ordered to report to the company employment office on March 15. "Report to the employment office with citizenship papers," the notice stated.

As Mr. Guest explained to the employment office officials, he had no citizenship papers and had not moved to Detroit as he had no previous notice.

"I explained the situation to Mr. Tholl, one of the men in the employment office, and after I had done so he concluded the interview by saying, 'That will be all,'" Mr. Guest declared. "The next day with no warning I received a notice that I was being laid off."

The notice which Mr. Guest brought to The Star office stated the reason for termination of his employment was "Readjustment of working force to provide work for Detroiters."

Superiors Regretful

Mr. Guest said the foreman and other immediate superiors were indignant at the treatment he received but knowing the futility of any attempt to keep him on the payroll did not dare to make an open protest to the motor company executives.

"There are five other men I know of in the same predicament," Mr. Guest explained. "It means that after working five years to learn the Hudson method of doing things I am thrown out of a job with less chance of getting another position than if I had not been a steady worker and had floated from one plant to another."

Mr. Guest said he had not worked for any other company since going to work for the Hudson organization almost five years ago. He said that he had worked for five months in the old Paige factory in Detroit before working for the Hudson company.

"On March 15 I went to see Mr. Holmwood in charge of employment, but he told me that I would never be reemployed as long as I lived in Canada," Mr. Guest said. "I was told that not only would I have to live in Detroit but would have to have first citizenship papers before I could be reemployed. I asked if it would be possible that in event of improved business conditions within three or four years if I could be re-hired, and Mr. Holmwood said that if it came to the place where the company was forced to go out and hire men in the streets, my reemployment might be considered, but as the order stood at present it was impossible to employ me."

Passes Up Detroit

Mr. Guest, who is 31 years old and married, said that he had made efforts to obtain employment in Border Cities plants without success, but had not endeavored to find another job in Detroit as he felt it would be futile in view of the orders there not to hire any Canadians, and also because of the few men being hired. He worked in the Jefferson plant of the Hudson Company as a paint inspector in the body trimming department when let out, but when the Hudson company was working three production lines instead of two as at present he was a gang work leader. On his card stating he had been dismissed he was credited with "good" ability and deportment, the highest ranking possible.

Mr. Guest said he did not know what he could do for employment. Counting on his work with the Hudson company as permanent he had not made any previous plans to work elsewhere.

Another serious feature of the unemployment in the border cities is that hundreds and hundreds of men have lost their homes, some that were half paid for; in fact in many cases it is the second home that they have lost. Many industries to-day will not hire men over 40 to 45 years of age, their excuse being that the compensation act forces them to do this. This means that in a few years we shall have a serious problem on our hands in connection with old age pensions or unemployment insurance. I would strongly urge the government to take steps to help out the situation, at least next year, if they cannot do so this year. The federal authorities collect a handsome revenue in Windsor, the excise and customs amounting to over $30,000,000 for the past twelve months, and the post office receipts $386,000. In view of this, and of the fact that unemployment in the border cities is not altogether due to local causes over which the municipalities might have control, I think the government should deal with the situation as a national problem.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations on this matter because of its vast importance to the lives and happiness of so many people throughout Canada, a considerable number of whom reside in my constituency. We have all had occasion, unfortunately, to witness the difficulties of many of our working people in their efforts to find employment. It is a pitiable condition of life, and it appeals to me in particular because of its human side. I have had men come into my office in Vancouver whom I have known for years to be in regular employment, honest, respectable men, seeking an honest day's work. These men are the victims of the economic depression through which the country is passing, and it seems to me that there does devolve on the government a responsibility which they cannot escape.

The question before parliament is, what has the government done to meet that responsibility? Has the government done anything? We have been presented with an impressive array of statistical data, we have heard ingenious arguments, and the government and its supporters have even tried to convince us that there is no unemployment in the country.

But notwithstanding the data and arguments, we all realize that there is an appalling amount of unemployment throughout the Dominion. It may be said that unemployment is a world-wide condition, and to some extent this is true. We know that the economic pendulum swings alternately from prosperity to depression and back again to prosperity, and in my opinion it is incumbent on governments to provide for the periods of depression so that those least able to help themselves may be tided over until the pendulum does swing back to prosperity.

We have heard several solutions offered to deal with this problem of unemployment. I propose to deal only with one of those solutions—unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance would help the victim of world conditions, with the creation of which he has had nothing to do but for which he suffers acutely, to provide the necessaries of life for his wife and family, to feed and clothe them, and thus mitigate their sufferings until there is another period of prosperity in which he will be able to participate. I was very much interested the other evening—and I take this occasion to remark upon the matter because I had something to do with it—I was very much interested, nay, I was astonished, to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggest a denial of his assertion on a former occasion, that the old age pension scheme involved a vicious principle. It happened that I asked the question when he was speaking on another subject, but I wish to reassert what is contained in Hansard; it shows that the Prime Minister did say that the granting of money for old age pensions was a vicious principle. We need have no doubt upon that question, because Hansard records it in clear, cold print.

I think the most amazing statement in the annals of statesmanship and political history in this country was made the other day when the Prime Minister gave utterance to a statement of political depravity which is surpassed only by his lack of policy on the question of unemployment. He told us that he was not disposed to make contributions to Tory governments in Canada. It seems to me that the function of a party in power is to govern the country and to formulate public policies; it is not the duty of a government to assume that extreme degree of partisanship which causes its leader, the Prime Minister, to tell the Canadian public that if any section of the people fail to carry out the partisan political policies which he has dictated, it will be incumbent upon him, as a Mussolini or a man of similar dictatorial powers, to punish them because they happen to desire a political party of different persuasion. It should not be the policy of the federal government to punish provinces by refusing to cooperate with them financially on matters which would merit the favourable consideration of an ordinary prime minister and government.

With respect to the question before the house, I may tell hon. members that I have taken the opportunity to read the budget debates, and particularly the speeches of the Prime Minister from 1922 up to the present time, in connection with the various budgets presented. So far as fiscal policies are concerned one can find in those speeches the most inconsistent statements it is possible to conceive. The net result of the observations by the Prime Minister in years gone by is that his fiscal policy exists for the producers and the consumers, but as far as I have been able to ascertain, if you eliminated from Canada the producers and the consumers you would not have many people left. In his speech on the budget in 1928 the Prime Minister placed on record an extended list of reductions in the tariff. This list, which covers a great number of pages in Hansard, was placed by the Prime Minister at the end of his speech as a sort of addendum. Now, I find it most significant that at the present time we have a powerful factor in this cabinet in the person of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is a declared low tariff man. We have the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who formerly sounded "the death knell of protection;" but it is to be noted that that bell has not been sounded during more recent sessions. There is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who is a declared free trader. There is our friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Crerar); out of consideration for the Prime Minister I will not refer to the speeches of the Minister of Railways while he was leader of the Progressive party. The hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred constitute a very powerful circle in the government forces. They are declared free traders or low tariff men, and in my opinion part of the difficulty in regard to unemployment has been brought about by the government being wedded to a theory rather than concerned about the exigencies of business conditions. This condition exists to such an extent that in our trade with the United States we are buying from them $900,000,000 worth of goods per year, mostly manufactured products. We are selling them raw products to the extent of $500,000,000 per year. Those hon. members who analyze the trade statistics of Canada will find a very interesting situation. I refer to this matter at the present time because I anticipated that the Prime Minister and his colleagues will proceed to Great Britain to attend the economic conference, unless the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) attends in his place, which of course depends upon the Prime Minister's decision as to an election. In view of the coming conference it may be interesting to know that since confederation we have sold to Great Britain, in excess of what we have purchased, the enormous figure of $5,800,000,000 worth of goods, but we have purchased from the United States in excess of our sales to them, the enormous amount of $5,400,000,000 worth of goods. The attitude of the Prime Minister and his government is that they shall reduce their tariff rates, that they shall allow more manufactured goods from the United States to enter this country and to displace industries, thereby depriving Canadian working people of occupations in which they might otherwise be engaged. The outcome of the next election is something to which hon. gentlemen on this side of the house are looking forward with considerable interest. It is said that the Prime Minister is framing a protectionist budget. I do not know how my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior would greet such a situation, neither do I know how it would affect other members of the cabinet. Conditions in this country in respect to industry and unemployment are such that a protectionist budget is the one thing that would help Canada. I do not believe, however, that it will be the Prime Minister and his government that will bring in such a policy; I believe it will be the hon. gentleman who is at present leader of the opposition, as the head of the government in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We hear that repeatedly.

Mr. LADNER: I notice the Minister of the Interior does not repeat his slogan respecting the death knell of protection. I would like to draw the attention of the government to some facts which they should bear in mind in the framing of their fiscal policy, which has a direct relationship to the present question of unemployment. I will outline the situation as I see it. In the province of Ontario there is one-third of the population of Canada; in the province of Quebec there is slightly over one-quarter; in the maritime provinces there is one-ninth of the population, and the remainder are in western Canada. If you examine the occupations in which these people are engaged you will find that in the year 1927 Canada produced about $3,500,000,000 worth of manufactured products, and of that amount about $2,000,000,000 worth were produced in Ontario and $1,000,000,000 in the province of Quebec. There were $3,000,000,000 worth produced in these two provinces out of a total of $3,500,000,000. The three western provinces produced about $246,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, and British Columbia about $243,000,000 worth. When you consider the agricultural products you will find that the total production in Canada for the last year for which I have official figures was $1,800,000,000 worth, representing about one-half of the value of the manufactured goods produced. Those figures are interesting, but they are not generally known. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec in the year 1928 produced $811,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and the three western provinces produced $847,000,000 worth. So it will be seen that our production, industrial and agricultural, is by far the most important. The next largest class is that of forest products, which aggregate about $464,000,000. The exportable surplus of wheat and flour in Canada is valued at about $500,000,000 yearly. We all know that our friends from the prairies, for whom I have the greatest good will and consideration, gave expression to their economic problems through political activity which resulted in the formation of the Progressive party, which sent sixty-five members to Ottawa. A large number of those members, including the former Minister of Immigration, Senator Forke, were enticed by the Prime Minister to join his party. The fact is that $500,000,000 worth of grain and flour, which is exported from this country and sold on the markets of the world, to-day determines the fiscal policy of this country so far as tariffs are concerned. That is exactly what is happening, and if you will look at the trade figures you will find that our total production for the last fiscal year for which I have the figures was valued at $6,100,000,000. So the situation, in brief, is this: The $500,000,000 worth of wheat and flour represent 8 per cent of the total production of Canada, yet that 8 per cent is the guiding force in the councils of the Liberal party to-day. In my judgment it is an unsound situation, both from an economic and national point of view. I do not suggest that we should place a protective tariff upon the articles which enter into the production of flour and grain, but I do suggest that, generally speaking, we should place the tariff upon a productive basis which will protect the industrial and agricultural life of this country and enable us to conserve our home market, providing employment for the people of this country and facilitating our exports to foreign markets. It seems to me that, from a purely economic point of view, the day has come when the people of this country will realize the relationship of these different activities and what has to be done to maintain our industrial, agricultural and economic life, and also to maintain a national consciousness. When we have a policy which will measure up to these requirements, with a statesmanlike conception of what is best for this country, we shall have taken a step forward which will greatly assist in alleviating the conditions which have brought about the economic depression of to-day, and which has occasioned the unemployment prevalent throughout the country, about which there has been so much discussion in this parliament.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, with the suggestion that if the government continues with this death knell policy, which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was so fond of advocating; if the Prime Minister takes another step in political depravity such as he took a few days ago; if he continues to add to his inner circle of free traders and low tariff men; if he ignores the economic needs of this country, the people of Canada will deliver a reprimand which will result in the formation of a government which appreciates our economic conditions and which has a true conception of national policy and of statesmanship. Then once again we shall have that prosperity to which this country is entitled.

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the state of affairs, to-day, created by unemployment is a problem that every nation in the world has to deal with. Our neighbours, the United States, if we are to place any faith in their press are in no better position than we are. According to the New York Sun of last Saturday, there are, at present, about 5,000,000 unemployed in the United States. To what must we ascribe this state of things? It must be as a whole, attributed, in my opinion, to overproduction of industries.

Our rural districts also have their unemployed. At this period of the year, the farmer marks time until the land is in a fit condition to sow. To-day, the manufacturer in the city only produces during four or five days per week, owing to the overproduction of the last two years. Without being in a precarious state, it is undeniable that our cities have produced too much during the last few years, hence the present state of things. Why have we, to-day, unemployment in Canada? For the very reason that we have been overproducing like many other nations.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. Speaker, joy and sorrow are to-day and to-morrow. Periodically there is much adjustment to be made. If we look in the past, we note that about every seven or eight years the economic pendulum must be regulated. If we look back to the year 1914, we observe that during that summer, previous to the declaration of war, the Canadian artisan was in quest of work, even at a dollar per day. I know this to be a fact because I, myself, employ many hands. In 1914, the Canadian artisan was not always employed, even at one dollar per day. What happened in 1919 and 1920? When conditions were adjusting themselves, in 1919 and 1920, during nearly two years the Canadian artisan could not find sufficient work even to pay for his board. During those years, out of a total of 1,000 men, we could but employ 20 per cent of them. What happened to the others? They had to return to their homes and patiently wait until economic conditions adjusted themselves again. I therefore conclude, sir, that the present government is no more to blame for unemployment in Canada to-day, than the Conservative government was to blame in 1914 and 1920; if it is necessary to wait until economic conditions adjust themselves. Periodically, the entire world overproduces, hence the unfortunate situation we are at present facing. Are conditions, to-day, any worse than those of 1920 and 1921? No, sir. During that period the regulating of economic conditions lasted almost two years; the overproduction being so great that the artisan could not find work.

We are living, sir, in a country where natural resources are abundant. Our people, at times, seem to think that prosperity will always reign, and when they earn big wages, they are not always thrifty. This stage of readjustment must return periodically; it is at present taking place.

Added to this overproduction which brings on this readjustment just mentioned, speculative tendencies must be reckoned with. Last year a large number of Canadians engaged wildly in speculation. What was the result? The losses sustained nearly everywhere were the cause of a general depression, the purchasing power of the dollar fell from 40 to 50 per cent; and. owing to overproduction, goods were not sold and remained in bond.

Last week sir, to my astonishment, a kind of prearranged delegation came to interview the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in order to request him to permit the reorganization of a company in the neighbouring city. I was astonished to learn that these gentlemen had not addressed themselves to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr.

Bennett), for, if I remember right, the hon. leader of the opposition held, some time past, interests in that neighbouring city plant, I mean the E. B. Eddy Co. One of those who took part in the delegation said to me last week: "We would like to see the E. B. Eddy plant open its doors in order to give us work." What has the Prime Minister got to do with the Eddy Co.? Should they not instead have submitted their case to the leader of the opposition?

The merging or amalgamation of companies sometimes does great harm to the working class. Take, as an instance, the Eddy concern. What was the outcome of its merger with the Berthier company? Some hundreds of employees were thrown out of work in the city of Hull. And why? Often the manufacturer is not satisfied with 5 per cent interest, he expects one per cent more regardless of the effect it may have on the workman. These trusts therefore tend to increase unemployment in this country. I understand that laws exist against trusts in Canada. Why do we not ask the government to enforce them as much as possible? All company mergers create a larger number of unemployed: Whether it is through the board of directors or officials employed, etc., the merger having taken place, many employees are thrown out of work. I do not wish to refer only to large industries, trade mergers such as chain stores, paper industries or any other merger; they are all inimical to the interests of the wage earners.

Are there no other means to remedy this state of things? I say there are. We may perhaps find one of these remedies in the better understanding between the manufacturer and his employees. If the manufacturers could come to a better understanding with their employees, they would certainly improve the situation. Why does not the manufacturer contribute more to the welfare of his employees? Why not pay them a fixed amount per month instead of so much per hour? Many industries employ their workers by the year, while others seem only willing to employ them at so much per hour, so as to make the greatest possible profit. The match factories, the woollen and cotton mills as well as the paper industry could certainly employ their workers during the entire year. Is it not a fact, even if the workmen were employed but five days per week, all industries being on an equal footing and obliged to pay their workers weekly or monthly, that it would be possible to keep the doors of these industries open and give the employees more comfort in life?

The comparison may seem somewhat farfetched, but is it not a fact that in the lumber industry, for instance, the proprietor must feed his horses seven days a week? Is he not forced to keep his modern machinery in good condition seven days a week? Well, sir, why not treat the human labour in the same way, at least during six days a week? I am strongly in favour of these improvements providing that all employers in this country be placed on an equal footing. I want the workman to enjoy all the comforts possible and to be given as much care as we give to modern machinery. As I have just stated, if we are to feed the horse seven days a week, why should not the human being receive the same treatment, for seven days per week.

I know many employers who hold my views; there are of course others who think differently. Who are the latter? They are, sir, people who have no other thought than that of the mighty dollar. Many employers hold my views, because they believe that there are other considerations than that of money which count in this world. Living themselves in comfort they are willing to help their fellow-creatures to live in a decent way. I wish to add that if such an understanding existed between capital and labour, all would benefit by it.

On motion of Mr. McGibbon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Third report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Hay.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Annual report of the Canadian National Railways for the year ending December 31, 1929—Mr. Crerar.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Young (Weyburn), for the concurrence in the first report of the select standing committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would move that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

RUSSIAN ANTHRACITE COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) what steps, if any, is the government taking, or does it propose to take, to prevent the entry into Canada of anthracite coal produced in Russia under conditions of sweated labour at a cost of a rouble a day, equivalent to eighteen cents, as mentioned in the House of Commons in London yesterday by Sir Newton Moore?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. I might say the government had read the statement of Sir Newton Moore and we are taking steps to ascertain the facts. When we have the facts before us the matter will be given careful consideration.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Might I ask the Prime Minister if steps will be taken to establish a trade commissioner in Russia in order that the government may ascertain the facts?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That also will have to receive consideration.

RADIO BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) if it is his intention to bring down before the Easter recess legislation in connection with the radio report.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The matter is going to be referred to a special committee, which will be appointed in a day or two.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand from the statement of the minister that there will be no bill introduced into the house?

Mr. CARDIN: Not at present. The report itself will be referred to the committee.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF MR. HEAPS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, April 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heaps.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) now before the house is that some immediate action be taken by this parliament to solve the question of unemployment in Canada. That there is unemployment in Canada I think probably no one will deny. That there are many causes for this unemployment I think we all admit, and some of the causes I hope to discuss this afternoon.

Chief among these causes, sir, and the one that I want to emphasize first, is that responsibility for the grave condition of unemployment in Canada to-day can be laid mainly at the door of this government. This government has lost its vision; it has lacked courage and it has had no definite policy. There has been no unity in the fiscal system sponsored by the present government. Under these conditions how can we expect to have an aggressive government, one that would shape its policy so as to give industry a chance and make employment plentiful. We might cast our eyes backwards for the short period of ten years and recall the time when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went up and down the country seeking election. At that time he painted a new heaven and a new earth for the people of this country, if they would only put him in power. After having been there ten years we find that the picture has faded and the vision has disappeared. To-day we have a condition of affairs which is probably worse than it has been for the last ten or fifteen years. Not only the Prime Minister, but his cabinet as well is involved.

Sitting near the right hon. gentleman I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We are told that he is weighing in his left hand a protectionist budget and in his right hand a free trade budget. He has been unable to decide which to give the country in order best to meet the political expediency of his party. As a result of this, interest in business is lagging and unemployment in Canada is on the increase. Then, there is the great protectionist the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler). I think everyone in the house will remember when he stood in his place about a year ago and gave that patriotic Canadian speech for which he received the applause of nearly every hon. member. But alas to-day we find that the idol has fallen and that his feet were clay. Next we have the Minister of Railways (Mr. Crerar), and at this time I pause to offer him my personal congratulations upon his return to the House of Commons and to the government. In addition to that I extend congratulations to my leader (Mr. Bennett) the member for West Calgary, that the Minister of Railways has joined the present government. I have watched the career of the hon. gentleman for thirteen years. I have seen him partially destroy at least two parties, and now he has joined the funeral march which will help to bury the present government. I remember when in 1919 he left the Union government, because its policy of protection was too high; I remember when he was in the old museum as leader of the Progressive party. I remember how he led that party for a few months or a year and then let it drift to the tender mercies of the present leader of that party. After wandering for a time through the wilderness he has returned to his first love; he has joined the present Liberal party and he has taken the portfolio of Minister of Railways and Canals.

Then, sir, we have the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). We all know how he has gone up to the attic and brought down the old bundle of hay called free trade. We know how the hon. gentleman has clasped it to his heart and sounded the death knell of a protective policy for this country. That is not all, Mr. Speaker. Following that we have the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) who has assumed the portfolio which ought to be one of the most important offices in this government. The machinery under the control of the hon. gentleman is in a dilapidated condition; the cylinders are missing, the gears are stripped and the tires are deflated. He has attempted the military tactics which we used in the army of knowing nothing, hearing nothing, seeing nothing and doing nothing. Consequently when we consider the aggregation of men who call themselves a cabinet, when we consider the diversified ideas they have as to the fiscal policy of this country, and the fact that they have been in office for the last eight or ten years, can we wonder that to-day business is stagnant, unemployment is increasing and hard times again exist in the Dominion of Canada.

While I was considering the cause of the present conditions I turned up the book which was written by the Prime Minister, and on page 518 I read the following words, which are very significant when we consider the present situation in this house and in the Dominion of Canada:

> There is a crafty opportunism which would prefer that principles and rules should not be too definitely stated, an unprincipled strategy that is continually shifting its position in order to avoid impending responsibilities, or repudiating principles that some immediate temporary advantage may be gained. Such practices are destructive of the very foundations of industrial justice. Law and order cannot exist without stability; and stability cannot endure where opportunism prevails.

I wondered as I read that paragraph if the Prime Minister was speaking as a prophet because certainly to-day the voice of history has recorded the accuracy of that prophecy, as it applies to the present government. They have been opportunists from the day they came into office, and we know that one thing they have always lacked has been stability in their policy of government.

I have said that there is unemployment in this country to-day. I would like to ask this house if it is not the duty of every country to furnish employment for its people. Every man and woman in Canada who is not a parasite and who wishes work should be given the opportunity. When we consider that this country is not able to supply work for at least one hundred thousand people, to say nothing of the 700,000 that the policy of the government has driven out of Canada, I ask, what have been the results of such a policy? What policy have they at the present time?

The late John Bright in speaking in the British House of Commons charged the government of the day with the duties which he thought belonged to the government of the country. In effect, he said that the life of every nation rested in the cottage and unless the light of their legislation and the beauty of their statesmanship could shine there they had not learned the lesson of government, and their people could not be a happy people or their nation a great nation.

Applying that test to the government of the day, assuming it to be a fair measure by which we can judge the results of the last ten years, I ask the Prime Minister and his government, what are the conditions in this country to-day? A few days ago the Prime Minister made a statement in this house similar to one that he made before the representatives of the cities of western Canada when they attended before him in connection with unemployment. He stated on those occasions that there was no unemployment in Canada at the present time—or at least no unusual unemployment. I have in my hands a statement prepared by the Department of Labour covering the province of Ontario. It deals with such cities as Belleville, Brantford, Chatham, Cobalt, Fort William, Guelph, Hamilton, Kingston, Kitchener, London, Niagara Falls, North Bay, Oshawa, Pembroke, Peterborough, Port Arthur, St. Catharines, St. Thomas, Toronto and Windsor, a cross section of the entire province, and it indicates that to-day there are some 43,000 people unemployed, which is about 100 per cent more than were unemployed at this time last year. In view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I ask you whether the Prime Minister has taken the proper attitude towards this question in refusing assistance in order to relieve this emergency which exists throughout Canada.

Just for a moment, sir, I should like to refer to what was done in the United States by President Hoover. This is not new to most hon. members, but probably they have not realized the magnitude of the result. You will remember that when the stock market crash occurred last fall President Hoover called together all the heads of industry from the different states of the union and encouraged them to do everything they could to tide over the unemployment situation and the business depression that was then in view. It may be news to hon. gentlemen to learn that as a result of that conference no less than six billion dollars is being spent in the United States at present which would not have been spent had it not been for the leadership given by President Hoover.

We on this side of the house have not been backward in giving advice and indicating remedies to this government. We have brought to their notice the question of the construction of a transcontinental highway which, if it had been undertaken, would have absorbed a great deal of the unemployed; we have brought up the question of technical education which, though it would not bring any immediate relief, would at least indicate the path industry might take in the future which eventually would have a marked effect upon the employment situation. We have brought up the matter of the New Zealand treaty under which the importations of butter this year probably will amount to some fifty million pounds. That much labour has been taken away from the farms of Canada, and it must be remembered that this treaty affects not only butter but the allied beef and pork industries. It has been stated that there are 500,000 less hogs on the farms to-day than was the case a few years ago. If the government had taken steps to remedy these conditions, sir, we might not be in such a deplorable condition at the present time.

In my riding there is a small town, sir, where we have an industry which has been shut down for the first time in fifty years. The other day I asked the proprietor how many people he employed, and he said he usually had 70 or 80 people working for him. I have looked up the importations of woollens, and I find that the millions of dollars' worth which have been imported would keep 200 mills of that capacity going the year round. With a proper application of the policy which we should have in this country could we not increase employment to a very considerable extent? I also have in my hand a despatch which states that maple flooring has been dumped in the city of Windsor at $58 per thousand feet, duty paid, which is the equivalent to a price of about $43 per thousand in the United States. I desire particularly to bring this to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. I am told that this flooring is sold in the United States at present for $69 per thousand, but it is dumped into this country at a total cost of $58 and the result is that many of our mills are idle or working only half time. That is another way in which this government could take some action to provide work in this country for our own labourers. Why must we hand over these benefits to the United States? I say it is too great a price to pay, even as a gesture to that country. We want this work done in our own country; we want it kept for our own people, and if we had a proper policy we would not have the unemployment which is so prevalent to-day.

While going to the city of Toronto from my own town two weeks ago I was talking to a gentleman who is in the manufacturing business. He manufactures small show cases such as you see in cigar shops filled with flash lights, Tuckett cigars, and so on, and he had been manufacturing those show cases in this country for a great many years. A few months ago he received an order from the United States for 125,000 of these cases, and when he sent over his first shipment he was met with a duty of 27½ per cent. By the time he got to the border with his second shipment, however, he found that the duty had gone up to 60 per cent, which made it prohibitive. In effect they said, "These goods can be made in this country, and they must be made here by United States workmen." I submit, sir, that that is a sound policy for the United States and it would be a good policy for Canada as well, because it would keep work in this country for our own men and women.

I was very much surprised this morning, when I picked up the newspaper, to see that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) had, in a very mild manner it is true, repudiated the statement of his leader the other day that he would not give five cents to the unemployed in any province which had a Tory government.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He did not say that.

Mr. McGIBBON: I wonder if we have now a third leader in the Liberal party. I was wondering whether the Minister of the Interior or the Prime Minister was speaking for the party, but apparently the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has taken that task upon himself. I have referred to the lack of a policy and to the lack of unity in the cabinet; the other night we heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour flatly contradict each other on the matter of unemployment insurance, so I am beginning to wonder if the leadership of the Liberal party is at the head or at the tail, or whether it is back in the constituency of Weyburn. I was also impressed, in reading the paper the other night, with the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) in Brampton, in the course of which he had to apolozize for his leader. Was he authorized to tell the people that the Prime Minister had made that statement in a moment of anger? Was he authorized to say that he made it after being provoked by the members on this side of the house, when Hansard will show that there were no interruptions up to that time? The Prime Minister asked this house not to interrupt him, and Hansard of that day will show that there were practically no interruptions up to the time the Prime Minister made what I think was a very deliberate and intended statement, that the unemployed of any province under a Tory administration would not receive five cents from this government. After hearing that statement I wondered whether or not there was any humanity in the heart of a prime minister who would refuse the men, women and children of this country any assistance because for the time being they happen to be living under the rule of a Conservative government. I could not help but think of those days in past history when the Christians were slaughtered to make a Roman holiday, and wondered if that state of affairs were to be repeated in Canada under the rule of the right hon. the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister intend to prevent the unemployed of this country from offering their prayers to the Divine Being, and to ask them to cast their eyes towards him and towards his government and say: Give us this day our daily bread. Does he want the unemployed of this country to bow down and worship at the altar of Liberalism in order that they may receive some sustenance for their starving wives and children.

Who pays the taxes of this country? The returns for the income and customs taxes, as well as for the Post Office Department, will show that the province of Ontario pays a considerable proportion into the treasury of the hon. Prime Minister. Who authorized him to say to the people of this country in general, and to the people of the province of Ontario in particular that although they have contributed heavily to the treasury of this country this government will not give their unemployed a dollar for bread? If we had not been here in the house and heard that statement, or had not received a confirmation from those who were present, it would be hard to believe that a prime minister could stand in his place in the House of Commons and issue such a message to the people of Canada. However, there is an election appearing on the political horizon, and the people of Canada will remember that when they were hungry they were refused bread, and they will mark their disapproval towards this government in no uncertain way.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, from the very outset of this debate, I have repeatedly heard that unemployment, instead of being, properly speaking, an international problem, is a national one for Canada. I do not deny—and one must yield to evidence—that there exists unemployment in our midst; however, I also believe, and this on very conclusive statistics, that unemployment is to-day an international problem.

When an interesting question crops up in the house, unfailingly the poor worker is dragged into the discussion. The worker, so to speak, is nothing else to-day than a political football which is tossed to and fro by the contending factions for power, in this country.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Perusing the statistics of the world press, I find in the London Daily Herald, the official organ of the English Labour party, that the United States have 6,000,000 unemployed; Germany, 4,500,000; Russia, 2,000,000; Great Britain, 1,500,000; Japan, 800,000; Italy, 500,000; and that about 18,000,000 unemployed are scattered among the nations of the world.

It is, sir, but reasonable to use in a discussion of this kind, some common sense, to step out, so to speak, from the political arena in order to help more efficiently this very worker which we so much desire to protect.

To bring some order to a debate of this kind, since unemployment is regarded as an important question of the hour—it is always a question of the hour since we must love one another—it is well to investigate first what are the causes of unemployment.

The primary cause met with is the system in practice since a number of years of "rationalizing" industry. What is this new system which inevitably casts on the street a great number of city workers? It is the merger taking place, to-day, under the wing of large commercial and financial trusts, the merger of badly equipped industries with those posesssing up to date machinery. I represent the largest labour division of the city of Montreal and I know what is happening to those various industries. The economic reorganization of Europe which took place during the after-war period, prevents to-day certain countries manufacturing articles, sold previously in large quantities, from selling their overproduction on those same markets which they controlled in the past. If we examine the primary cause, so to speak, of unemployment in England, what do we find? In Wales especially we find a succession of strikes taking place. We note that it is the lack of coal markets abroad which brought on those numerous strikes and consequently, as a logical sequence, caused the decrease of work in the large English dock-yards. The celebrated economist, Keynes, of England, recently stated that the cause of unemployment in that country, was the result of the English money system reverting to the gold standard. Following the period of inflation the English money market went through a period of depression which, after depriving the small industries of the necessary capital, inevitably led to the unemployment of a large number of people who previously were employed in those small English factories.

What is Canada's position to-day? Canada, owing to the sale on the English market of foreign wheat shipped from the Argentine Republic, France, Transylvania, etc., finds it, at present, impossible to ship abroad the surplus of her crop. What was the result in my own riding of this state of things which, I hope, will only be temporary? Two of the largest wheat elevators in the city of Montreal are in the Hochelaga division. During last summer many labourers found themselves without work owing to the impossibility of selling our wheat abroad. We cannot force Europe, after all, to consume our wheat if she does not need it. These people found themselves on the street because we could not ship abroad the surplus of our crop. The dockers were obliged to go without work, as well as the employees of our large railway companies. The Angus shops are located in my riding and so are the employees of the various departments of these shops; the employees of the repair shop complain that they work only part of the time because the cars are not in use and need no repairs.

[Mr. St-Père.]

For instance, take the employees of our great railway systems. Let us be honest enough to admit openly the facts: it is well known, to-day, that our large railway companies are endeavouring to improve and centralize more and more their system, to utilize as means of traction the most powerful locomotives which, to-day, draw as many as eighty to one hundred cars, thus replacing three ordinary locomotives and thereby depriving of work about twelve persons daily, as we must remember that these persons work in two shifts.

This moreover does away with brakesmen, freight train conductors, etc. The enumeration would be endless and I have but forty minutes at my disposal.

Let us now turn to the people who have a trade. I have in my riding large mills known as the Dominion Textile. It has the reputation of paying small wages to its employees, notwithstanding that it enjoys a good protective tariff. A girl weaver who, a few years ago, had charge of five looms, can to-day take charge of about twenty. Thus four persons are dispensed with in each group of workers. One can therefore figure out from a given number of people employed, who previously had work in the weaving department, how many have been dispensed with owing to the improvement on machinery.

Let us now consider construction activities It is well known that in our large cities, with the exception of certain big companies who own up to date equipment, there exist no small carpentry or general construction contractors who own the necessary equipment to undertake during the winter months concrete foundation works, etc. so that at the end of the autumn, owing to uncontrollable circumstances, there are still a large number of trade workers who are deprived of work. No one is without knowing that.

I could enumerate a number of industries where similar conditions exist. For instance, in the boot and shoe industry, the perfection of machinery with regard to quantity production, eliminates a great number of workers.

There seems, in this house, a preference shown for United States statistics in supporting an argument and laying down a principle in a positive manner. Let me quote from a report of the Bureau of Labour statistics in the United States so as to show in what way modern machinery has increased production. The increases range from 24 per cent in the boot and shoe industry to 178 per cent in aut mobiles and 292 per cent in the manufacture of automobile tires. From 1904 to 1927, the automobile workers have increased their output by 600 per cent. Four industries averaged 170 per cent increase from 1899 to 1927. Blast furnace workers contributed 360 per cent; steel mill hands, 230 per cent; petroleum refiners 200 per cent; and the leather tanners 50 per cent. And, what might be of interest to a great number in this House who are interested in the paper industry, is that from 1925 to 1927, the increase in the output of our pulp and paper mills has been 10 per cent.

Secretary Davies of the Labour Department of the United States states that the American industries produce to-day 25 per cent more than two years ago and employ 3,000,000 workers less. Let those who take such an interest in the great labour movement and those who simulate such a deep love for the workman, preaching to him the sermon on the mount, put into practice the good advices that the sermon contains, let them all listen to what the Executive Committee of the American Federation of Labour declared a short time ago; their report states: that in the first half of the year 1929, there were in the United States about 500,000 fewer wage earners engaged in industry than in 1919, and about 1,000,000 less than in 1920.

There is another cause which has greatly contributed to unemployment in this country, and though I may shock many, I shall certainly not let the opportunity slip by of pointing it out, because many of my constituents have been the victims. Unlimited immigration from foreign countries, it matters not whether this immigration comes to us from the British Isles or from elsewhere; I shall even go further, for I maintain that immigration from the British Isles has been the principal cause of unemployment, at least in the province of Quebec. I cannot understand by virtue of what false reasoning resting on a misinterpretation of patriotism, one so often forgets that the first right to work in this country belongs to Canadians. Hardly has the immigrant from the British Isles set foot on the wharves, in Montreal or Quebec, that he is invited to replace in our factories a French, Irish, English or Scotch Canadian, whose ancestors have been living in this country for nearly 200 years. I am glad to note that the Government has taken the necessary steps to put an end to this invasion.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Let us not circumscribe the cause of unemployment to industries only. There also exists what the Americans have agreed, for some time past, to call technological unemployment. There is in this House quite a number of business men. In their own offices, these gentlemen always relying on the principles that improvement is the keynote in business, have been quick to note that the addressograph, mimeograph and etc. have contributed largely in dispensing with the service of numerous employees.

After having pointed out a few causes of unemployment, it is well to look for, if not an infallible cure, at least a remedy to be used in decreasing unemployment. I appeal in this matter to the members of this House who are manufacturers. I also take the opportunity of pointing out to the artisans—those who attend our technical institutions, hoping to become foremen of workshops or even great industrial leaders—the views of Senator Couzens of the United States, who, starting from a simple worker's bench, became the partner of Mr. Ford in his immense plant in the United States and to-day looked upon as one of the wealthiest men in the American republic. This is the advice given by Mr. Couzens to solve the unemployment problem:

> Senator James Couzens of Michigan, probably one of the richest men in the United States Senate, declared lately in the Survey-Graphic Magazine: "If every industry were to pay its men by the year instead of by the hour or the day, industry would find a way to stabilize its production so that it got its money's worth.
> Competent management finds a way to go through periods of depression and it can find a way to help its workers through them."
> There are many industries in this country which have stabilized dividends. There are great railroads, great utility companies which send their quarterly dividends to their stockholders whether times are good or bad.

Professor Squires deplores the lack of co-operation among the employees so as to minimize the crisis of unemployment.

Here are two other views which certainly deserve to be noted:

> "Business crises and unemployment are as preventable as smallpox" declared Edward A. Filene of Boston, one of the leading merchants of the country. "The old idea that wages come out of profits was all wrong," said Mr. Filene. It's a good business to pay higher wages than you have to.
>
> What pays is to make prices as low and wages as high as possible. The "new capitalism" understands that business can prosper only when employee and the public are prosperous. High wages pay—and they don't come out of profits. "Only 20 per cent," he says, "of American business understand the truth of the 'new capitalism' but the other 80 per cent will be put out of business if they don't learn it."

Mr. Henry S. Dennison, manufacturer, of Farmingham, Massachusetts, states:

> The old idea was that you got rich by making others poor. The new idea is that you get rich by making others richer.

Many other means have been suggested to counteract the crisis of unemployment. The railway employees of the United States are clamouring for the week of five days; the employees of the large steel corporations in the United States are disatisfied with the wages, at present, paid to them, basing their contentions on the services they render to those large corporations. This is what is now happening in the United States in connection with the wages paid to the employees of the United States Steel Corporation:

The United States Steel Corporation made a peace-time record of prosperity in 1919. After paying all operating expenses, paying interest on bonds outstanding and premiums on bonds retired; after allowing for Federal taxes and setting aside more than $63,000,000 for depreciation of plants and depletion of ore reserves, the Steel Trust still had $197,592,000 net profits.

This is a gain of more than $84,000,000 over the net profits of 1928. It is stated to be about $20 per share of common stock outstanding.

But the article adds: steel prosperity is for steel owners only. No workers need apply for an increase of wages.

Big wages are better than big profits in providing employment. High wages help a hundred families where high dividends help one.

My allotted time, sir, is short, I must therefore be brief. What would be the great remedy to guard against unemployment, taking into consideration the quotations I have just given and without returning to the system of private industry which, undoubtedly, would tend much more to put into practice the sermon on the mount? I state, with all the seriousness that a Christian must bring into the discussion of such problems, that it would be necessary to christianize anew industries and trusts; that it would be necessary to inform these great organizations, which have shareholders spread all over North America, that it is their duty, like that of those who in the past were at the head of private industries, to consider their employees not as slaves but as members of the large Christian community. These people should practise what a large manufacturer in the north of France told his employees: "that he worked to earn and earned to give."

Far be it from my thoughts to set at variance capital and labour. That would be the last of the doctrines I would advocate in my riding. But for heaven's sake, when orders pour in by the thousands, when these large manufacturers divide among themselves enormous dividends in prosperous times, let them have the foresight to place in their reserves sums that they could later use to relieve their employees in times of crisis.

The great cure, say our Conservative friends, would be a protective tariff which, at present, is supposed to be doing wonders in the United States, notwithstanding that American statisticians themselves state that 24,000,000 Americans are, at present, suffering hardships, in spite of the high tariff wall the United States surrounds itself against foreign products.

[Mr. St-Père.]

In Germany to-day—it is an understood thing—big companies split large dividends among themselves, but unemployment tends to so greatly increase that the People's Party have lately advised Field Marshal Von Hindenberg, President of the cabinet, to impose what they call a "sacrifice tax," that is to increase by 10 per cent the income tax. With regard to insurance against unemployment, it is suggested to increase the premium by half of one per cent, because the funds are exhausted. In order to guard against all inexpediencies arising from the world-wide business crisis, they are considering taxing tobacco, soft drinks and numerous other articles of first necessity, taxes which will further burden the masses. I do not think it necessary to dwell any further on the subject; however, at the risk of being looked upon as a dictator, let me quote the views of Mussolini: "Parliaments are not in a position to solve the unemployment problem, but this great question should be referred to a commission of experts, and this has already been done in Italy, under the name of "Corporazioni" comprising representatives of all classes of society who are studying this great problem free from all political considerations."

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, support the amendment to the motion to go into committee of ways and means, for the following reasons: first its adoption would mean a vote of non-confidence in a government which has done a great deal for the labouring classes; secondly, it secures but a small pittance for our unemployed; lastly it would be but a poor remedy for the present depression which our opponents wish to make use of for political purposes. I am a member of the Committee on Industrial and International Relations of the House. Last year when the question of unemployment cropped up it was decided to suggest to the government that they should come to an understanding with the provinces. Were I asked my views with reference to social insurance, I have no hesitation in saying that a well conceived and wisely applied insurance against unemployment, would be very beneficial to our working classes; but not insurance under the control of a political body, as that created by Lloyd George, in England, when under the stress of an after-war opportunist movement, he made all the English people participate in the insurance benefits derived from the covenanters. I am in favour of an insurance against unemployment in which would participate government, industry owners and workers, as requested by the Trade and Labour Congress and the Catholic Unions, and which would be of a nature to satisfy entirely all our workers besides relieving the unemployment crisis. Even then, I revert to my first statement, and say to the manufacturers: If you wish the workers to contribute to this insurance fund against unemployment, pay them reasonable wages. There lies the solution of the whole problem, sir, and I trust this will take place before long and will help to assure to the working classes of this country a fair share of prosperity and justice to which they are entitled.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): I have listened with much interest to the splendid speech delivered by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père). It is a fine oratorical achievement and an irrefutable answer to the statements of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon). May I now, sir, refer, in answer to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), to the Labour Gazette, at page 193 of the February issue, 1930. This is what the Labour Gazette has to say:

As is customary at the beginning of the year, employment on January 1, 1930, showed a pronounced curtailment which involved practically the same proportion of the aggregate staffs as that indicated on January 1, 1929 and 1928. Activity in recent months has been at an exceptionally high level, so that many employers took the opportunity of closing their entire plants during the holiday season for necessary repairs and inventories, as well as to provide a vacation for their staffs. However, the situation continued better than on the corresponding date any other year since the record was instituted in 1920.

Following up this statement, let me again refer to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, in connection with the Maritime Provinces. The Labour Gazette adds:

In contrast with the losses usually recorded at the beginning of the year, there was an increase in employment in the Maritime Provinces; this occurred chiefly in transportation, and was due to the opening of the winter posts.

I dare not compare the idealistic views of the hon. members on your left, Sir, with the masterful statements that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a few days ago, on economic conditions in Canada.

Before, sir, making a few comments, I wish to state first that the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) is an unfair presentation of economic conditions, such as they exist in Canada.

Foreign capital invested in our national enterprises is on the increase. For the year 1929, our output from the mines increased by $20,500,000 over that of 1928.

The province of Quebec alone, last year, showed an increase of nearly $8,000,000. Is it possible to conclude with such excellent results that unemployment is greater in this country? In Montreal alone, industries, in 1927, were paying in wages the sum of $113,-797,512. The number of employees, men and women, was 98,353. I took these figures from the Agricultural and Industrial Review, in the April issue, 1930. The same review adds that the figures for the years 1928 and 1929 will be much higher, thanks to an extraordinary industrial expansion.

I alluded to a few private industries. Were I to enter into further detatils for the purpose of establishing, always by official statistics, that the prosperity of our large basic industries does not justify the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I would never end. It would have been better for the hon. member, on his recent trip to Montreal, to investigate at the very sources, to visit the large plants of the metropolis and its port. His views on Montreal would have been fairer to the people of that large city, and more satisfactory for him to relate. Perhaps he would have refrained from moving this amendment which, beside making this House lose precious moments, will have no practical result.

I have been a constant admirer of the champions of the people who sweat, toil and suffer hardships. With pride have I always championed their cause on all occasions and in all places where I was privileged to do so. I am aware that the fate of the workers is intimately linked to our economic evolution in all fields of activities. But I have already stated, and now repeat it, among the basic industries of Canada, there is one which our governments must never lose sight of. Agriculture gives bread to all men, women and children in whatsoever country we find the human race. Agriculture employs 60 per cent of Canada's toilers; manufactures, forests, mines and fisheries 40 per cent. If nothing must be neglected to assist these industries, let us always bear in mind the one which makes for our prosperity as a nation. Let us find both work for the city artisans and the toilers of the land. To attain that end is it necessary to have recourse to the so-called remedy concocted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps)? Not so. All true Canadians have courage, perseverance and valiance. Inspired by a generous policy, let us still broaden our program of construction for the city workers. Let us further encourage our industries. To the man on the land, let us give the necessary grants to promote agriculture. The present government, in 1929 alone, increased its agriculture subsidies to $118,000,000. It was only just, it was a sound policy. However, all must not hinge on subsidies. Modern methods of farming demand training. Moreover, cooperation is a sure pledge of success. Let us direct our best initiatives towards this end and towards obtaining results from our efforts.

Let me conclude my remarks by stating that personally my entire confidence reposes in this government, which for nearly ten years has never ceased applying itself to improving our finances.

In a speech which was a credit to this parliament and country, the right hon. Prime Minister eloquently depicted the work accomplished in the last decade. The constant reducing of the public debt, the cutting down of taxes, the increase of our production, the progress of trade and industry, all bear witness to the sound administration which presides over our destinies. The stabilization and progress of Canada's finances during the after-war period, testify to the magnificent effort which Canadians must acknowledge.

I am well aware that the hon. members of the opposition, are endeavouring to close the eyes of the ratepayer to this actual state of prosperity. This of course is a part played by all oppositions. However, when the people will be called upon to choose between the wholesome deeds of one party and the misdeeds of the other; when the Canadian people will be called upon to give their verdict on the present political situation; will it be possible for them to ignore our economic progress and new prerogatives as a nation?

Mr. MANION: I was paired with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler).

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question is on the main motion.

Main motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: As regards the declaration of pairs, I pointed out on a former occasion during this session that a list of the pairs is given to the clerk, who registers them. The house does not officially recognize pairs.

Mr. MANION: I should like to put myself on record, Mr. Speaker, because the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), with whom I was paired, is out of the house. I wish to state that had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BELL (St. John-Albert): I was paired with the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. McDiarmid). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. HAY: I was paired with the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I was paired with the Minister of National Health (Mr. King). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BOWMAN: I was paired with the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Hodgins). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. McPHEE: I was paired with the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was paired with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. MALONEY: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Guerin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast): I was paired with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McGIBBON: I was paired with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. PRICE: I was paired with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. COWAN: I was paired with the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Allan). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SHORT: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Foster). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let me read what May says:

> There can be no parliamentary recognition of this practice (pairing), although it has never been expressly condemned; and it is therefore conducted privately by individual members, or arranged by the gentlemen known as the "Whips" who are entrusted by their political parties with the office of collecting their respective forces on a division.

The whips give a list of the pairs to the clerk of the house. That saves much time.

Mr. SHORT: I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that although I have a regular pair duly registered with the official whip, it has never appeared in Hansard when a vote was taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

SUPPLY

CIVIL GOVERNMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Office of the Secretary of the Governor General—salaries, $34,500; contingencies, including house allowance of $1,500 per annum to the Secretary to the Governor General, $72,500.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This is the same amount as was requested last year, with the exception of a slight increase to cover two statutory increases. There is a reduction in contingencies of $15,000.

Item agreed to.

Privy Council—salaries, $55,110; contingencies, $7,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the Prime Minister explain what the vote of $7,000 for contingencies is for, and how much was spent under this head last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is for printing and stationery, telegrams and items of the kind. The vote for salaries is $60 less this year.

Item agreed to.

External Affairs—salaries, $103,855; contingencies, $72,500.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the Prime Minister explain the increase in salaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is really a decrease in the total vote. There is a slight increase in salaries and a larger decrease in contingencies. The increase in salaries is made up chiefly, I think, of statutory increases. The decrease in contingencies is accounted for by the lower amount required for cables and telegrams. I am afraid it is too small.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Apparently there is an increase of three on the staff—last year thirty-three, this year thirty-six. What are they, may I ask?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is provision for an additional clerk, an additional stenographer and one secretary.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Speaker.]

London—salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $2,000 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chap, 15, R.S.C., $117,260.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister what is the total cost of the upkeep of the London office? I remember last session we were rather at cross purposes and in stating the amount when I was discussing the budget I put it much below what it actually was. I understand that there are other departments of the government which contribute money to the London office, and I should like to know the total cost of the office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figure in the estimates, $117,260, covers the salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for all of the offices that are included in Canada House where the High Commissioner has his office. There is an additional expenditure of $34,000 made by the Department of Public Works for the maintenance of the building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do they not also rent another building?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not the High Commissioner's office.

Mr. BENNETT: They rent a part of the Sun Life building.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the Department of Health and Pensions has an office in the Sun Life building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then apart from the amount contributed by the public works department, do I understand there is no other expense to Canada in the maintenance of the High Commissioner's office in London? The $34,000 from public works and the $117,260 in this vote represent the total?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The $34,000 contributed by the public works department and the $117,260 for salaries and expenses, I understand, cover the entire cost. I might mention that the following departments of the Canadian government are represented in the Canada building together with the High Commissioner's office: immigration, trade and commerce, agriculture, customs, soldiers' civil re-establishment, Secretary of State. There are other offices not in the Canada building for archives and air.

Mr. GEARY: Are these departments charged with rental outside this amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am advised not.

Mr. GEARY: No charge is made to them at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not for those housed in the High Commissioner's office.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand part of this building is occupied as living quarters by some of the officials, and that in consequence you have to go out and rent other quarters. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe for a time the secretary occupied part of the space on the top floor, but I understand he has not occupied it for some time past. Since Mr. Larkin's death my impression is that word came from the secretary that it might better suit his convenience and the convenience of the office if he returned temporarily to the particular quarters which he had formerly occupied, and he may be there at the moment; but if he is, it is purely temporary occupation.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, while I do not wish to criticize this particular vote, in my opinion the country is not getting the full advantage it should get from having this office in the old country. All the men who have filled the position of High Commissioner have done so with a great deal of credit and cost to themselves and no doubt they did the best they could for Canada; but I think if the country is to get the full benefit of this vote there should be some reorganization and expansion of the functions of the office. A large number of the duties of this office at present are of a social nature at the expense of the economic, and these duties have been increasing in the past year. When I compare the work that is being done by Australia House in the interests of the commonwealth with that done by Canada House for this Dominion, I find that Australia House is doing all the window dressing in trade and migration and is taking a prominent part in helping to solve the problems of the empire. In order to bring the products of Australia before the people of the old country and the advantages it offers to immigrants, Australia House has opened sub-agencies throughout the motherland while ours is in London alone. I am told that at the trade exhibition held in England last year Canada was not very well represented, and that Australia, New Zealand and the other dominions got a great deal more advertising. The old country papers that I read reported that Australia was doing all the window dressing as regards immigration, and opening new avenues of trade, and so on. I think Canada House might be doing educational work with respect to marketing Canadian goods and products along economic lines. Since the 26th of January we have had representatives in London at a peace parley. You would almost think it was a six-power instead of a five-power parley. We are gradually interfering in the affairs of Europe generally. It will be noticed that the total vote for the Department of External Affairs now is over $610,000. With this present government it seems to be all external and nothing internal—we are posing as a nation when we are not a nation at all. I regret the death of the late High Commissioner. I am afraid he was not appreciated as a public servant should be. He was a man of high ideals and imbued with a strong sense of public duty. He did a great deal of good work for Canada both at home and in Great Britain. I am not criticizing the work done by him. I believe a lot of good work was done by him to advertise Canada and bring British capital here, but I believe a great deal more could be done in this connection by expanding the functions of the office. What is Canada House doing to-day? What is the function of the High Commissioner's office at the present time Doctor Skelton in his report to the Minister says that the duties of the office are growing, and they are taking on work that they did not do before. I do not know that it is the duty of the High Commissioner to visit every province in Canada and tell what he is doing in London. I think he should devote the whole of his attention to promoting the interests of Canada in the old land. This Australian House has been doing a great deal of missionary work which Canada House does not do. It is doing a great deal towards advertising Australia and towards promoting trade between Australia and Great Britain. It has taken up the new problems which have arisen out of unemployment, and is checking immigration with the old land. On the other hand the immigrants who arrive in Toronto are left stranded. We have the case of a man with his wife and family in distressed circumstances; their particular case finds its way to the newspapers, and when we inquire who was responsible for bringing them here the Immigration department denies all responsibility. The governmental agencies should be coordinated and should cooperate with each other. If Canada House is to exist it should assume new functions, and should check its work not only throughout the continent, but in Great Britain. In my opinion there are many other matters which might be taken up by Canada House. If the duties of that agency were less of a social character and directed more towards problems of economy, we would receive greater value from Canada House than we have received in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. MacKenzie King) a question. An inquiry reached me the other day as to whether or not the official salary of the High Commissioner for Canada is subject to income tax in Great Britain. I was unable to give a definite answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My understanding is that all High Commissioners have recently been exempted from the payment of income tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Do they pay a tax at home?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid I cannot answer that.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know, either, but I was asked that question.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I be allowed to say that when I was High Commissioner I always paid an income tax in Canada on my salary but not on the contingencies. I may say that the income tax commissioners in Great Britain thought that the High Commissioner should pay a tax in that country, but I objected to it. I brought the matter before the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Although the officials considered that under the law the High Commissioner was liable in Great Britain for income tax on his salary, I considered that such payment was not fair; I took the ground that it would be the Canadian government who would have to pay the tax, in case payment was insisted upon. I said that, as the High Commissioner paid income tax in Canada, he would naturally consider that the Dominion should pay any income tax in Great Britain, and that such a payment would be inconsistent with the position of the Dominion of Canada. The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed with me, and the Treasury thereupon arranged to pay to the income tax commissioners the amount for which they considered the High Commissioner might be legally liable in Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Washington—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $100,000.

Mr. KAISER: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries I would like to make a few observations. We realize that it is a new thing for Canada to have entered this field and to have formed embassies and legations in other countries. Nevertheless we have the right to inquire into results and costs which arise in this country through the maintenance of these institutions. I would like to point out that Canada, with a population of 10,000,000 people, is maintaining a legation at Washington at a cost of $100,000 per year. In some respects we are not a great country; in other respects we are. As compared for instance with the United States of America we are not a wealthy country. The United States is maintaining legations and embassies in other countries, and the thing that strikes me as being rather strange is that this country is spending $100,000 at Washington, yet Washington, representing the great wealth of the United States, exercises a certain degree of economy when she sends her delegates and ministers plenipotentiary to other countries. I have learned that the United States has appropriated $24,000 for this service in Canada, as compared with our $100,000 for a similar purpose at Washington. Our neighbour maintains institutions of a similar character in various capitals and at different costs. In Paris her institution costs $97,000 per year; in London it costs $82,750; in Berlin, $70,000; in Tokyo, $65,000; in Rome, $45,000, and in Madrid, $52,500. These are the figures of the great American union which has stepped out into the world in the same way as we have done, and at these various capitals her expenditures, as compared with those of this country, are very much limited. I asked the authorities in Great Britain to tell me the costs of her legations, but I was not able to get them in particular. I find, however, in a general way that the largest amount she pays for a minister plenipotentiary is £2,500; it runs from that figure down to £2,000. I have not been able to find where other countries which have had representatives abroad for many years have spent sums as large as we have spent for the maintenance of legations. Why we are called upon to set aside an appropriation of this size I am not in a position to say. I am disturbed also by the fact that never in my memory have we had so many troubles with the United States as we have had during the term of this costly legation. There have been labour troubles, tariff troubles, liquor troubles, and other troubles more than we have ever had before in the same space of time. I do not say that they are caused because we have a legation, but the fact is that they do exist.

At this moment we are faced with what I consider to be one of the greatest obstacles to business we ever had to face; I refer to the new tariff proposals of the United States. Fifty-nine other countries of the world have complained about this tariff, but I have failed to read where Canada's minister plenipotentiary has taken a similar action on behalf of this country. We are told that the minister made representations and that he concerned himself with the matter, but so far as I can see nothing has been done. I realize that this tariff which now confronts this country will perhaps bring up the whole question of our attitude and our business relationship with the United States, and I want to say that I do not think anyone in that country should complain if Canada looks after her own interests any more than we complain when the United States does the same thing. My point is that our discussion should be purely along business lines, and surely we have a right to complain of the business activities of the United States when those activities affect our trade, as they promise to do. Our personal feelings toward that country should be kept entirely apart from business, and I know of no one who entertains anything but a feeling of reasonably good will towards the people of that great country.

That brings to my mind a little item which I read in the Globe of December 5, 1929. This is the report of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister of Canada at London, Ontario, which speech I also heard over the radio as it was being delivered. Many of the matters dealt with by the Prime Minister on that occasion were handled with exquisite skill; many of his sentiments quite appealed to me, but nevertheless the Prime Minister gave utterance to an expression which so shocked me that I left the radio and wrote it down in order to confirm it the following day. Now I want to read this to the Prime Minister and ask him how it sounds when spoken by someone else:

> In vigorous terms, he condemned those who, in the interests of protection in Canada, would make enmity between Canadians and Americans. "If protection requires, in order to further its position, the working of ill will against another nation; if it necessitates arousing a prejudice in any other nation, then I think there must be something inherently wrong with the protection. I believe those who really need protection in this country can defend it on economic grounds."

No one can doubt for a moment to what political party the Prime Minister referred when he uttered those words; unquestionably he meant the Conservative party in Canada. Then follows the sentence which I desire to read to the Prime Minister, because he was speaking of the old Conservative families of the province of Ontario:

> I cannot think of anything more unpatriotic than that men or women, day in, day out, in their homes, with little children about, or elsewhere, should, by word of mouth, do what they can to foster in the minds of these little children an enmity towards a nation that is going to be their neighbour when they grow into manhood.

In my practice as a physician I have spent in any one year more days and nights in Conservative homes than the Prime Minister has spent during his life time, and I want to tell him that in all my experience I never heard such expressions uttered in any of those homes. That statement does not express our attitude towards the people of the United States. Many of our ancestors came from that country, and many of our relatives are there to-day. Not long ago I traced the descendants of my great grandfather; they numbered some five hundred, of whom about 150 are now in the United States, many of them holding good positions. Can the Prime Minister imagine that we in Canada kick the cradles of our children and teach them lessons of ill will and enmity towards our own brothers and sisters and friends in the United States? We have no other desire than to live beside these people on terms of good will; I protest against this statement and brand it as being absolutely untrue.

Now I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he knows that 500,000 Americans—Shriners—are coming to Canada in June of this year on a pilgrimage of good will, and that they are to be met by 300,000 Canadians. They had the whole of Canada from which to select a place of meeting; they could have gone anywhere from Prince Albert to Nova Scotia, but they are coming to the Tory province of Ontario and the Tory city of Toronto, where they will be met and welcomed on behalf of Canada by Hon. George S. Henry, a Tory cabinet minister of the Tory government of Ontario. They are going to erect a shrine, a monument of good will, which is to cost $600,000. That is going to be erected in Toronto, in the constituency of Parkdale, represented by Mr. David Spence, the most pronounced Tory constituency in all Canada. So according to the Prime Minister this monument of good will between these two people will be erected in the midst of the very people who "kick" their cradles every night and chant to their children a hymn of ill will towards the United States. On behalf of hundreds and thousands of Conservative people in Ontario, I desire to protest against that statement which so grossly misrepresented the true situation. Simply because, when confronted with tremendous business difficulties which must be faced if we desire to remain a nation, we fix our policy to suit ourselves, we are to be told that we harbour the spirit of ill will towards these people. I have no desire to discuss the matter further, except to say that I think that statement of the Prime Minister was one of a very shocking nature. If he can show me where such a spirit exists in the old Tory homes of Ontario, then he will have shown me something which I have been unable to find in forty years of medical practice.

I think this vote should be analyzed. I am not so certain but that Mr. Massey is doing good work. I know that he gives splendid entertainments to the high class people who go to Washington from Canada; he is a magnificent entertainer, but this is being done at the expense of the common people of Canada and I am not so sure that we are obtaining full value for the money expended.

Item agreed to.

Tokyo—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $80,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who decides the standard of expenditure in connection with these legations? I am informed by members of the Canadian community at Tokyo that although they are delighted in having a Canadian representative there they feel that this country must have lots of money judging by the amount which is flowing around at the present time. Could the Prime Minister give us the classification of this $80,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend that in a world capital like Tokyo, where there are a large number of legations and embassies, a certain standard has prevailed for a considerable time as between the different countries. We have sought in a modest way to follow that standard. From the point of view of numbers we have perhaps the smallest legation in Tokyo. I do not think my hon. friend will find in any particular that the salary paid to any official is above that paid, for example, by the British government to an official holding a like position in the British embassy. As a matter of fact, the salaries paid are considerably lower than those paid by Great Britain for similar classes of service.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the committee have the classifications under which the amount is paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This vote is made up as follows:

[Mr. Kaiser.]

Salaries	$28,000
Allowances	28,000
Telegraph, telephones and postage	2,600
Printing and stationery	2,000
Travelling	3,500
Rent, fuel and light	7,150

There is an additional amount to cover newspapers, office furnishings and sundries, which amount to a little over $8,000, making a total of $80,000. The premises rented include offices in the business part of the city and a residence for the minister in the residential section. The payment for residence is included in the allowances.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I protest against this new embassy idea which the government has started in several countries of the world. Canada is the only country within the British Empire, except the Irish Free State, which is appointing these ambassadors. There are six dominions at the present time, and when India obtains her status there will be seven. I do not desire to mention Washington, but probably one speech will cover all places.

This vote is absolutely unnecessary. The Hon. Mr. Marler is the present ambassador and minister extraordinary. He is extraordinary enough because he was a member of the cabinet for about four or five minutes. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has referred to the fact that that gentleman was a director of a distillery in his constituency and ran against him for public office. He was defeated, but he is now a great ambassador over in Japan. In this connection the Toronto Globe says:

Hon. Herbert M. Marler, who goes as Canadian minister to Japan, will have to walk warily when doing business with the polished and efficient gentlemen who represent the eastern kingdom. It is not the easiest place in the world for a greenhorn to start "diplomating."

We were supposed to receive a new magna charta from the imperial conference. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) ably represented us there as a Dominion statesman, and he has become imbued with this new international statesmanship. That seems to be spreading all over the house. They used to go in twos and threes; now they go in threes and fours, and by next year they will be going in tens and twelves to become imbued with this spirit at these conferences. Doctor Skelton, the deputy minister, writes a very flowery departmental report regarding these embassies. I do not know what he is doctor of, unless it be of external affairs. I do not know that he is a medical doctor, but I do know that he is a very fine citizen, a Queen's university graduate, but has gone too far on status. This supposed magna charta which we were to receive from the imperial conference has undermined the unity of the British Empire. It was to be brought before this house when they arrived back with their carpet bags, but it was found that it might interfere with the rights of the minority in this country, and that was the last we heard of it—it was silently interred. In my opinion dominion status is hardly distinguishable from complete separation, in fact, that is what it is. At Washington we were the first overseas dominion to blaze the trail. It was a new venture, a new departure. Now we have an ambassador at Tokyo and another at Paris. Later on we shall have one at Rome, one at Constantinople and one by one we shall have ambassadors in all the countries bordering on the seven seas.

Where is this all going to land this country? It is going to land it in a policy of empire disunity. Canada was the first dominion to have an embassy at Washington and then the Irish Free State appointed one. Formerly we had a British Ambassador representing the seven dominions including India and he used to act for us all. Now in matters of imperial policy Canada has a legation at Washington. She has there now one whom, I hear, is shortly to go to London. The net result of his work at Washington has been that the United States have gone to work and are raising the tariff against Canada at every opportunity. That is how they are treating this country. When one reads Doctor Skelton's report of the wonderful things done at Washington by Mr. Massey one is reminded of the lines:

> And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew.

But his work has amounted to nothing as far as the good of this country is concerned. He goes up and down the United States making speeches, and Mr. Marler did the same thing when he crossed Canada in a blaze of glory, addressing boards of trade, empire clubs and Canadian clubs. I do not belong to any of these clubs and I do not want to belong to them. These Canadian clubs are no more Canadian than Empire clubs are imperial, but when it is a question of standing up for the unity of the British empire in matters of policy, these clubs are found wanting.

The net result of Mr. Massey's life work in the United States is that their exports to Canada from the United States have increased by leaps and bounds. Their exports to Canada are almost $200,000,000 more than they were when Mr. Massey went to the United States two or three years ago, and congress is working night and day tinkering with the tariff against this country, and Mr. Massey has not prevented this economic war against Canada. All that he is doing is getting degrees from different universities from California to the Atlantic; in fact he is becoming very popular, like the Prime Minister, by degrees, but his work has been an absolute failure so far as the people of Canada are concerned.

Boiled down, what does all this mean? It means that we are just like the Irish Free State. Is the Irish Free State in the empire? I would say no. What have they done? They have changed their flag; they will not have the union jack and they have put up the old rebel flag. They have removed the king's head from the coinage and from the postage stamps. They have refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the privy council. They have refused to appoint king's counsel to the courts. In fact, they have refused to acknowledge the king at all and at Geneva they have refused to have anything to do with Great Britain and the other dominions on empire policies. When Great Britain asks for concerted action, that is the answer they get from the Irish Free State. The government have a separate ambassador at Washington and we are making our own treaties with the United States. They have one at Tokyo and we are making our own treaties with Japan, and other countries. In 1925 a committee was appointed in Canada of seven gentlemen to change the flag and to abolish appeals to the privy council. Under the new status the Governor General is a mere viceroy, and if he appealed to Downing street, he would be told to follow the advice of our cabinet which is the only body who can advise him. We have before the house to-day a resolution from Geneva about an international court, a court with no power to act and enforce, and that could do nothing to carry out its functions if it had any. What is going to be the result of all this? It will simply mean that Canada will be a separate country independent of the motherland. Formerly in Tokyo our trade commissioners were doing all the work that was necessary in that country.

The Pacific question is not one which should be taken up in the haphazard manner in which it is being handled by Mr. Marler representing this government. In the first place in regard to the Pacific question Canada rescinded the treaty with Japan, and has refused also to keep step with the other sister dominions, New Zealand and Australia. The government has refused to aid England in the establishment of a naval base at Singapore for the protection of British interests in the Pacific, although New Zealand and Australia gave large sums of money for that particular base which in the future will be the Gibraltar of British naval interests in the Pacific. The government has scrapped all that and now they have appointed Mr. Marler as ambassador at Tokyo. What has he done? I have read some of the speeches which this gentleman has delivered in the city of Toronto and other places about his work and even as good a Liberal paper as the Globe criticizes him. The Globe says:

It is a new path that is being blazed. We are told it is made necessary by the new dominion status. Canada, however, is the first dominion to lay aside temerity and embark on the voyage of discovery and experiment by appointing ministers to the United States, France and Japan. She therefore will have to answer to the other dominions of the commonwealth if the undertaking is a failure from the empire standpoint. She has gone much further even than the Irish Free State.

Just how many competent commentators as the Prime Minister of Australia during the Great war view Canada's departure with fear, it is not easy to learn. It is not customary for public men in other parts of the empire to speak out as freely as he has done about a sister dominion, and therefore the thoughts he expressed a few weeks ago may be more representative than we realize. "If we examine the position closely," he wrote, with particular reference to Washington, "we shall find some disturbing facts. Nations are so inter-dependent to-day that what anyone does reacts more or less seriously upon all, and this is most particularly true of the nations within the British commonwealth, for between them the relations are, of course, much more intimate than are those existing between other nations. Every act and every word of the United States reacts upon the world at large. And naturally we desire that her policy shall proceed along lines compatible with the welfare, not merely of Canada, but of the empire as a whole. But the circumstances of the different dominions vary materially; a policy which serves the immediate interests of Canada—or that seemed to the Canadian people to do so—might prejudice the other dominions or Britain."

For example, what Mr. Marler may do in Japan may prejudice Australian or New Zealand trade and interests in the Pacific, and we are acting without our sister dominions and without any unison. In this way what unity has the empire on such an important matter as the Pacific question is to-day? The Globe continues:

What Canada and the Free State have done, all the dominions may do. Before long the influence of these two dominions may so prejudice the interests of other dominions that they will have to appoint representatives of their own. Then there would be six—with India, seven—British ambassadors at the court of Washington. Some may contend that the British ambassador would speak for all. But this is the very point at issue. Not only has Washington three British ambassadors where formerly there had been one, but these approach questions from widely different angles and on different principles. How can the British ambassador speak for Canada and the Irish Free State unless he and their representatives can agree upon the one policy? And if they can do so, the Canadian and the Irishman will surely have no justification for attending the court. Canada has appointed her own ambassador, it is said, because the British ambassador cannot conserve her interests. And this applies perhaps with no less force to the representative of the Irish Free State. Therefore they could not be unanimous, or only when Britain and the other dominions accepted Canada's and (or) the Irish Free State's policy. In other words, the empire can speak with one voice only if Britain and the other Dominions and India subordinate their interests to the interests of Canada and the Irish Free State. And this is what certainly will happen.

It will readily be understood that this diplomatic disunity will land the British Empire in all kinds of trouble. We have representatives in Europe to-day trying to pacify Europe while the Prime Minister has a five-cent policy to pacify the unemployed in this country. We have over at Geneva a small standing army of diplomats, sometimes headed by my friend the doctor, talking peace from the house tops, when there is no peace and where millions of men are being armed in Europe to-day.

The Hon. Mr. Marler made several political speeches on his way to Japan, and no doubt he approves the government's stand because the government shelters itself behind a Torres Vedras policy of legations for all foreign countries separate from the British ambassador.

This policy was never approved by the people of Canada, and I venture to say that it does not command the support of forty per cent of our people. It is simply dividing us from the British Empire in the matter of external affairs. The London Spectator suggests that the speeches of General Jan Smuts, former South African prime minister, regarding the Commonwealth of Nations, when he was in Canada recently, were warnings as prophetic as they were timely. The Spectator says:

It seems to us that the report has ignored the reminder which Lord Balfour was careful to give in 1926, that equality of status does not necessarily mean equality of function.

The conference (on removal of anomalies existing between Dominion and British legislation) seems to have asked itself in reference to each question: "Is this law consistent with absolute equality in every respect?" When they could not say yes, they proposed that the whole law should forthwith be rewritten. Such a method is to encourage a morbid nationalism, of which General Smuts complained. If, in pursuit of pedantic nationalism, unity disappears, one of the greatest causes in the world is sacrificed. The commonwealth is now held together by only one real tie, the crown. To encourage, as the conference does, every Prime Minister of every dominion to tender his independent advice to the sovereign is to put an unbearable strain upon the monarchy.

Fortunately, the report is no more than a body of suggestions for the imperial conference, which when it comes to deal with them, will find itself on the broad road to establishment of a permanent imperial control and authority. We do not mean there will be any kind of full imperial conference always sitting at London, but there might well be a permanent secretariat. Advice to His Majesty must somehow be sorted out and unified before it is presented to him as the advice of his ministers.

One of the main things the kaiser of Germany depended on when he declared war was a disunited British empire. He was depending on civil war between the north and south of Ireland, and on unsettled conditions in Canada and throughout the rest of the empire, but when the war came he found the dominions and the empire united. There is a strong public opinion in Canada, as I see it, against this policy of the government of appointing ambassadors to the different capitals of the world. It has never been approved by this house, let alone by the people of Canada. It is a policy that does not in my opinion commend itself to the wisdom of the people of this country. We have a declaration on the order paper to-day of the permanent court of international justice. There are so many of these declarations being signed on our behalf by our respected government leader in the senate at Geneva, that it almost seems to me that we shall soon be signing a declaration of independence from the motherland; we shall be going just about as far as the people of the United States did in their celebrated declaration of independence.

Speaking at Vancouver on November 14, Canadian Pacific despatch to the Toronto Star, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> The establishment of Canadian legations in France, United States and Japan was a good thing for the British empire as well as Canada, Prime Minister Mackenzie King declared in addressing the Board of Trade dinner here to-night. Misunderstandings between a foreign country and any part of the empire must eventually affect all other parts.
> Placing Canada's and the empire's position in a true light before other peoples, would tend to prevent misunderstandings, it would demonstrate to the world a community of nations united under the one crown, a crown "broad based upon a people's will."
>
> Mr. King's speech was confined for the most part to Canada's diplomatic relations. The key position this country occupied in developing friendship and good-will among the nations of the world, was laid before the large audience.
> "I would like to say how sorry we are that Mr. William Phillips, the first minister of the United States at Ottawa, has for personal reasons felt it necessary to resign from the diplomatic service," Mr. King stated. Mr. Phillips had been a true friend of his country and a true friend of Canada. Both countries were the richer as the result of his service.

I shall not detain the committee further. Here is a vote for $80,000 for Toyko, an increase of $5,000 over last year. What kind of building we have there I do not know, but I venture to say that three or four years from now we shall be spending two or three million dollars for all these embassies the world over. What good are we getting from this representation? It is simply showing to the people of Japan that in so far as the British Empire is concerned we are not a united people. We have disunity in diplomacy, and disunity as regards the policy of the empire in the Pacific, with Australia, New Zealand and the other dominions taking different stands. The whole thing will lead to disorder and chaos. It can have no good results for this magnificent empire. The empire cannot last if this goes on much further. Are we going to have a minister to Turkey? Are we going to send a representative to Russia? Are we going to transfer Mr. Marler to Russia or Turkey? We have ambassadors now in London, Washington, Paris, Tokyo and Geneva costing us $610,000 a year. Wait till you see the vote next year. Mr. Marler is not going to be content to live in rented quarters. He will want a palace costing as they do in Japan, two or three or four million dollars before he gets through. There are rumours that he is to leave Tokyo and heading for Washington, and another of our magnificent diplomats is said to be heading for London from Washington. The taxpayers of this country have to pay for it all, and they have nothing to say about it, nor have their representatives. But I warn the Prime Minister that there will be a rude awakening some day. We are meddling with the affairs of every country in Europe. We are signing peace pacts and agreements over the heads of the British government. Where is it all going to end? It is going to land us eventually outside of the British Empire, land us in all kinds of trouble. Here we are spending $610,000, and we have not a nickel for our own unemployed. Charity should begin at home, even in diplomacy. For all the good the Washington office has done, it might as well be closed up. It has been nothing but a trouble-maker between the two countries. making trouble all the time. What has it ever done about the St. Lawrence waterway or Chicago diversion, or the non-enforcement of the Rush-Bagot treaty, or the Jay treaty? My hon. friend from East Essex, speaking of unemployment the other day, told us that Canadians were being turned back at the American border, and only yesterday I noticed that the member for West Belfast told of Englishmen and Canadians being turned out of their jobs in the United States, and the British government has agreed to help and repatriate them and also repatriate Canadians. What is our legation doing about it? All our legation in Washington amounts to is very largely a social legation. That is all it ever was and ever will be. We have a lot of novices in diplomacy at Washington and Tokyo. They know nothing about diplomacy, and we are sending them where they come up against the experienced ambassadors of other countries.

Before the committee on industrial and international relations the other day, it was urged that chairs be established in universities to promote the cause of peace, at a cost of from $600,000 to $1,000,000 a year. The average student when he gets through university is too busy looking for a job to bother about world courts and ministers extraordinary to Tokyo and Constantinople and all these other places. Sixty per cent of the graduates of the faculty of applied science at Toronto university recently went to the United States or other foreign countries and of the class in medicine, forty-five per cent went to the United States. Where are you going to get the students to train? Mr. Massey and Mr. Marler can learn a lot about diplomacy, and they should have learnt something about it before they left the shores of Canada. I wish to protest against this vote. If there was one country in the world that we should have left alone, it was Japan. We should never have sent an ambassador there over the head of the British government because the Pacific question will be a very troublesome one in the future, and we want a united empire on Pacific policies. I was in the city of Vancouver in 1927, some time ago when special editions of the Saturday night papers came out with the startling headline "War with China." People out there were wondering what would become of our Pacific relations in view of the fact that Canada had not done its part in regard to naval matters. The Pacific is too troublesome a question for us to deal with. The last war bordered on the Atlantic; it may well be that the next war will be in all probability on the Pacific. I know some members across the chamber are beginning to wag their heads and doubt the wisdom of establishing these legations. Many prominent Liberals and also the newspapers have the same view, and the Toronto Globe backs up the position I take that this is a new departure which is bound to bring disunion instead of union to the British Empire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, there is just one thing the last speaker (Mr. Church) has said with which I agree, and that is, we do not really know very much about the policy of the government in the orient. It does seem to me, now that we are entering upon a new phase of our national development and are appointing ambassadors abroad, there ought to be some opportunity of discussing Canadian policy, at least of hearing what Canadian policy in the east really is. We have spent a week now in discussing one aspect of domestic policy, we have a great many opportunities for doing that; but it would not seem at the present time as if we had any opportunity of knowing just what our ambassador at Tokyo is supposed to advocate. I have not heard yet whether we have developed a policy for the east. I know it is unfortunate to have to ask the question on an estimate of this character, but I do not know any other place where we can ask such a question. It seems to me something that the house and the country ought to know.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the right hon. Prime Minister answers, there are some matters also which I think might well be discussed in connection with the Tokyo legation, and as it is six o'clock I would ask if we are going on with these estimates after eight o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we can discuss them after recess.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 32, respecting The Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company—Mr. Parent.

Bill No. 33, respecting The Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company—Mr. Bradette.

PINE HILL DIVINITY HALL

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George), for Mr. Black (Halifax), moved the second reading of Bill No. 54, to incorporate Pine Hill Divinity Hall.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Speaker, I think we should have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the bill had better stand, since the hon. member sponsoring it is not here.

Bill stands.

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 20, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed any further I desire to move that the bill be now reported.

On section 1—Part of law of England on July 15, 1870, made law of Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am prepared to support the first clause, but I do so on the understanding that at a later stage an amendment will be moved making this law applicable to the province of Ontario only upon request of the province through its legislature or by order of the lieutenant-governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Such action would be unconstitutional.

An hon. MEMBER: Only with the consent of the provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Inasmuch as this proposed Bill No. 20 is to change the divorce law or to make a new law, I think that the wording should be changed. I move therefore, seconded by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan):

That the bill be amended by striking out all the words after "be" in the twelfth line of section No. 1, and substituting therefor the words "in force in the province of Ontario."

This simply clarifies the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I moved that the bill be reported, and on a point of order I would like the ruling of the chair. Before I rose you had read the title to the bill and marginal note.

Mr. CAHAN: We have been unable to hear the statement of the hon. member, or the terms of the amendment he is moving. I think we should have an explanation, so that we may know upon what question we are voting.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) moved that the bill be reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have not considered it yet.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion was made as soon as it was called.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the bill was properly before the committee my hon. friend rose and moved that the bill be reported. I read clause No. 1, after which the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) intervened. Standing order 76, subsection 774, states:

The bill is considered clause by clause. The chairman usually calls out the number of each clause and reads the marginal note, but he should give the clause at length when it is demanded by the committee.

That had not been done when the motion was made by my hon. friend. My ruling is therefore that the bill was not properly before the committee when the motion was made.

Mr. GARDINER: To which motion do you refer, the motion to report or the motion to amend?

The CHAIRMAN: The motion to report.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment has been just handed in. It is as follows:

That the bill be amended by striking out all the words after "be" in the twelfth line of section No. 1, and substituting therefor the words, "in force in the province of Ontario."

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I should like to direct attention to the fact that there is no twelfth line in section 1; there are only ten lines in the section.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): That is a very small matter; I made a mistake. It is the twelfth line of that page.

Mr. CAHAN: It is the ninth line of the section.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr Chairman, some of us are interested in this bill, but as yet we have not heard the amendment or the explanation for it.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is:

That the bill be amended by striking out all the words after "be" in the twelfth line of section No. 1, and substituting therefor the words, "in force in the province of Ontario."

Mr. CAHAN: It is quite obvious there is no twelfth line in section 1.

Mr. McMILLAN: The difficulty is that when you see the figure 10 it appears to relate to section 1, but does not, and that causes the confusion.

Mr. BROWN: We are interested in the effect of the amendment, rather than in the number of the particular line.

Mr. DUNNING: What does the amendment mean?

Mr SMITH (Stormont): At the present time the bill says:

. . . . shall be the law of the province as to dissolution of marriage and as to annulment of marriage.

I think those words are superfluous; they make it appear as though we are creating a new way of obtaining divorce in the province of Ontario, and by striking out those words and having the section read "shall be in force in the province of Ontario" the matter is clarified. It does not change the bill in any way

Mr. HANSON: Does the hon. gentleman propose to delete all the words after the word "be" in that section?

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Yes. That is line 9 of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: Instead of line twelve of section 1 the amendment should read line twelve of the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not see the purpose of this amendment. The hon. member says that this act shall apply to the province of Ontario only, but the preamble of the bill itself states that it applies only to Ontario, and I think that should cover the point. The amendment would appear to be entirely superfluous.

Mr. BENNETT: The amendment at least is in accordance with the principles that governed in the western provinces. The privy council held that the act of 1870 applied as of the 15th day of July, 1870, and this amendment declares that that statute of England shall be in force in the province of Ontario, instead of saying that the law shall be so and so. I think that does clarify the situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the amendment is an improvement as far as the drafting of the bill is concerned, but I should like to know why July 15, 1870, is taken. I quite understand that with regard to the western provinces this date should apply as far as the laws of England are concerned, but why apply that to Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT: The reason is that then there would be uniformity with respect to jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But apart from making it uniform with the western provinces there is no special reason for saying that the laws of England of 1870 shall be in force.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because the divorce act of England was passed in 1857. Lord Westbury, then Sir Richard Bethell, worked it through the House of Commons, against the protests of Mr. Gladstone, as perhaps the minister will recall in view of the fact that Mr. Gladstone took much the same view as he has taken. July 15, 1870, is merely an arbitrary date fixed by the statute that brought the western provinces into confederation, and in order that it may not be said that we are giving more extended powers to the Ontario court than those conferred on other divorce courts by this parliament. In British Columbia the same statute is in force, but not as of the same date.

Mr. BROWN: Then the legislation of 1925 would apply to Ontario as well as to the western provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: The effect will be to have the statute, as it now applies to the western provinces, apply to Ontario.

Mr. CANNON: The section also says:

. . . . and in so far as it has not been repealed, as to the province, by any act of the parliament of the United Kingdom. . . .

How could an act of the United Kingdom repeal the laws of England so far as Ontario is concerned?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the meaning, as the Solicitor General will see, is that since in England there has been an amendment to the act of 1857, as the hon. gentleman will perhaps recall, this is to make certain that the amending act in England has no force in Ontario, but that the statute of 1857, which is in force in the western provinces, shall be the statute in force in Ontario, without any extension of the powers conferred by later legislation.

Mr. CANNON: Will it be the law as it was in 1870, or the law as it has been amended since?

Mr. BENNETT: It will be the law as it was in 1870.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Mr. ARTHURS: Before this section carries I should like to point out what I have pointed out before, that any argument in favour of this bill would apply equally to other parts of the Dominion. Apparently there are three strong arguments in favour of this bill; the first is that the Senate is incompetent or has not the necessary facilities for granting divorce; the second is the question of jurisdiction, and the third is the question of cost. All these arguments would apply equally to other parts of Canada, and if we are to legislate in this matter for the province of Ontario I contend that the act should be made to apply to all those parts of Canada where the law of 1870 does not apply at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Meaning Quebec?

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes, meaning Quebec or Prince Edward Island.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is this difference: all the members from Quebec are opposed to this bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: And a portion of the members from Ontario also are opposed to it.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

On section 3—Short title.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I desire to move, seconded by Mr. McMillan:

That the bill be amended by inserting the following therein as section 3 of the bill and renumbering section 3 as section 4:

3. Upon receipt by Secretary of State of Canada of a duly certified copy of an order in council passed by the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Ontario—

Mr. ERNST: That is a political fol-de-rol.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): I will read it again:

That the bill be amended by inserting the following therein as section 3 of the bill, and renumbering section 3 as section 4:

3. Upon receipt by Secretary of State of Canada of a duly certified copy of an order in council passed by the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Ontario requesting that this act be brought into force in that province, the governor in council may, by proclamation, declare that this act shall come into force on a day to be named in the said proclamation, not less than three months after the date of the receipt of such request by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: We should understand the meaning of this amendment, as it places within the discretion of this government the decision whether or not this measure shall be brought into effect. The province of Ontario could consent to the mode or the manner provided by this amendment, and then the governor in council of Canada would have the option of deciding at his own discretion whether or not by proclamation the bill should be brought into force and effect. If I understand this amendment correctly, unless the governor in council brings this bill into force and effect within a certain time it remains null and void for all time.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RYCKMAN: I absolutely—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): I have not yet explained the amendment. The main objection of the Ontario members who oppose this bill is that a divorce court is being forced upon Ontario. The result of this amendment would be that such a court would not be forced upon Ontario unless they asked for it, and until they passed legislation which would enable them to do so. There is nothing new about this amendment, because I drew it up in 1928 when I first agreed to sponsor a divorce bill. In the few remarks I made a week or two ago I mentioned that these amendments would be offered when the bill came up for second reading. It is not, as an hon. gentleman has said, political propaganda; it is simply a desire to satisfy those Ontario members who have opposed the measure.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why do you not try to satisfy those in favour of it?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am absolutely opposed to this amendment. In the first place, I do not believe that the parliament of Canada has any jurisdiction to give effect to such an amendment. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has sat silent and listened to this proposal made by one of his supporters, a proposal which suggests that legislation passed by this house shall be subject to a decision of the provincial legislature in Toronto—

Mr. BENNETT: And he would not give a nickel to that province.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —a Tory government to whom, it has been suggested, the Prime Minister would not give a thing. He would not recognize the government of the province of Ontario when it comes to a nickel, yet when it comes to deciding—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —this very important question of divorce—

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. members do not like that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —the Prime Minister has not one word to say.

An hon. MEMBER: It is simply passing the buck.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is no question but that the proposal of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) is unconstitutional. There are hon. members in this house who have a realization of the duty which they have to perform, and they are not willing to take dictation in regard to this matter from any province, even the province of Ontario where good government prevails. I for one am not prepared to surrender the right of deciding by my vote in this house what shall be done in regard to this question of divorce. Let me emphasize that I am as much opposed as any hon. member in this house to the easier granting of divorces, but I realize that this question has been treated by the house almost with ridicule. We have seen the travesty of the granting of divorces by this house. This is not a question of the merits of divorce—I address my remarks to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—it is not a question of whether it is right or wrong, but rather a question of the method, of the plan, and of what shall be done with these cases. Even those hon. members who are opposed to divorce must realize that the present method of granting these decrees is nothing less than a joke, if I may be pardoned for using that word. We ask that this question be considered under the same terms as is a question of right or wrong, or a question of justice as between man and man—before the courts. I object to an amendment being introduced which is absolutely contrary to the rules of this parliament. The amendment means that those of us who come from the province of Ontario are being asked to surrender our right to pronounce upon this matter. Others from Ontario may be willing to surrender that right, but we will not consent to our privileges as members of this parliament being usurped by an amendment framed to meet the approval of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, I feel it to be my duty to oppose this amendment. If there is one thing which has been made clear by the discussion upon this question, it is the fact that divorce has been committed to this parliament. In passing this bill through its second reading we have decided the principle that divorces should be handled by the courts of Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: As delegated by this parliament.

Mr. BROWN: As delegated by this parliament. I agree absolutely with the reported statement of the premier of Ontario as it came to us in that circular from the Anglican council, that it is not his business at the present time to interfere in this matter. As has been made abundantly clear, the duty has been delegated to us. It has been said in some quarters that we are forcing this upon Ontario against the wishes of the people of that province. Even supposing that were true, we are still doing it in the exercise of our proper functions as members of the parliament of Canada. I do not think there can be any doubt upon that point. But are we forcing it upon Ontario in opposition to the majority of the members from that province? It would be very interesting to look at the vote as it was recorded the other night. We voted on an amendment. That amendment was defeated by a majority of thirteen. Then we voted on the second reading of the bill and that motion was carried by a majority of thirteen. If you look over the vote, and if I have not made a mistake, the number of members from Ontario who voted in favour of that bill was just thirteen more than the number who voted against it, so that practically speaking we can count out all the other members who voted and say that the majority of the members from Ontario have decided in favour of the bill. I feel very strongly on this matter and I shall conceive it my duty to vote against the amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill proposes to vest in the provincial courts of Ontario certain jurisdiction with respect to the adjudication of matters which are at present in the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Parliament has the right to do this; it has the right to impose on provincial courts duties in federal matters. There was a time when the right of the federal parliament to do this was discussed and challenged, and the matter was submitted to the courts; but since the decision of the privy council in the case of Valin vs. Langlois with regard to controverted elections in Montmorency, it is generally accepted that parliament has the right to take such action. Such is not the case, for instance, in the United States, where congress has no right to impose burdens or duties on state courts, but in Canada I claim that we have that right. In doing so, however, I think to some extent we are interfering, though we have the right to do so, with the administration of justice in the provinces, especially in a case like this when it has been represented to us in the house that we are forcing a divorce court upon a province the majority of the people of which are opposed to such a step being taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I say that it has been represented to us.

Mr. BENNETT: The only way to know is by what this house says.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not sure about that. I have heard the hon. member for South Huron on this side and the hon. member for North Huron on the other side say that they cannot find in their constituencies anybody who is in favour of such a court. Surely the expression of views of these two members is entitled to consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: They can vote against the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it not a good move on the part of the hon. member for Stormont to provide that before this legislation comes into force, the province of Ontario should in some way express its views with regard to the matter?

Mr. BENNETT: It has done so through its members here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I remember my hon. friend was not so keen in saying that the province had pronounced on the question when on the first vote the majority of the Ontario members voted against the bill. I did not hear my hon. friend say that the province had expressed its views at that time. This is a matter regarding a moral issue, something which goes deep into the hearts and souls of the people. It is a big social, moral and religious issue in the opinion of many people in that province. Why not, before this legislation comes into force, have the province of Ontario express its views through its leading representatives provincially, because we are enacting a law not for the whole of Canada but for Ontario alone.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: An hon. member spoke about Quebec a few minutes ago. We do not want this to be forced upon Quebec any more than we want it to be forced on Ontario. It is because I would not want a similar law to be forced upon an unwilling province such as Quebec which will never agree to this law, that I do not want it to be forced upon Ontario in the same way. What is the harm in this amendment? As I said, this is a moral issue, and after all there are precedents along the same lines in the statutes of Canada. There is the Canada Temperance Act, for instance. The probihition of importation of liquor is a federal matter entirely, but we have placed in the statute books a law stating that we will prohibit imports of liquor into any province only after that province, by order in council furnished to the Secretary of State of Canada, has expressed a willingness that we should do so. The Juvenile Delinquents Act is another statute which deals with a social policy, and there again the act comes into force in any province only after an order in council has been passed by the provincial authorities asking us to put it into force. In the Lord's Day Act, another measure dealing with a moral and social question, parliament has enacted a law, but it has taken good care to say that no prosecution shall be instituted except with the approval and consent of the attorney general of the province in which the prosecution is to be taken. There are many precedents for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Stormont. I do not like the amendment; I do not like the bill; I am opposed to the principle of the bill, but I say at least we should accept the amendment and not force this measure upon an unwilling province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am opposed to the bill, and I am also opposed to the amendment. The question of marriage and divorce is under the jurisdiction of parliament; we shall have to assume the responsibility in the matter and I am not going to try to evade that responsibility. I will not agree to subordinating the jurisdiction of parliament to that of any of our provincial legislatures. I am satisfied that I am right when I say that every matter within the jurisdiction of this parliament can properly be determined by the members here, and that they for all federal purposes represent in this house every province in the Dominion. We have the responsibility. It looks as if this bill would carry. Well, then, let us stand up and vote according to what we think right in the matter. Do not get out from under; stand up and vote according to your conscience. Do not pass the responsibility on to a body that has no responsibility to us in the matter at all. This parliament has the jurisdiction. Now let it act. I am heartily against the bill and heartily against the amendment.

Mr. MALONEY: I feel with the Minister of Justice and my hon. friend from South

Wellington that this bill is within the competence of the federal parliament. Where was the mover of this amendment, my hon. friend from Stormont, last year? What was the gist of his motion last year? And in connection with the withdrawal of that motion at that time, what was the statement of the Prime Minister? That he at this session would introduce a measure which would take this question out of politics. Where is the Prime Minister to-day? He was absent when two or three votes on this question were being taken; whether intentionally or not, I would not be harsh enough to say, but nevertheless when the final bell rang he gave a vote for the bill on the condition that an amendment would be made to it that it should not come into force until the government of the province of Ontario had requested it. Why should he pass the buck to the province of Ontario? If he is in favour of this bill, why not be manly and bold enough to come out and say so openly? The province of Ontario does not desire this measure. It is being forced on the province of Ontario by those who are not residents of Ontario, by members of this house from outside Ontario—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And members for Ontario.

Mr. MALONEY: They are endeavouring to force this bill on the province. The bill was killed once, but they have brought it back again, and to-night we are dealing with the remains. For my part I refuse to vote either for the bill or for the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Stormont, because I believe the amendment is simply passing the buck. It is insincere, and is moved purely for political purposes.

Mr. COTNAM: I am utterly opposed to the principle of divorce. I am opposed to the bill, and I am opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Stormont. The Prime Minister of this country last year when this legislation was before the house gave a solemn pledge and promise to the members of this house and to the country that at this session of parliament he would introduce legislation to deal with this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COTNAM: Instead of that, for some reason best known to himself, he has seen fit only to vote a couple of times on this bill, although he gave a solemn promise that he would deal with the matter this year in the house. He gave that promise to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but to this day he has not seen fit to come forward and tell the house just exactly what he intends to do or what he wants to do on this question. I believe that the present amendment is simply an effort on the part of the government to sidestep its duties and responsibilities with regard to this whole question of divorce. It is the same old trick of trying to sidestep the issue and shelve off the responsibility on some other person, instead of facing the issue fairly and squarely here. The province of Ontario has never asked for divorce courts that I am aware of. There is not a citizen in the constituency I have the honour to represent who has ever asked that Ontario shall have a divorce court, and as long as I am in this house I am prepared to support the views of the constituency that I have the honour to represent, whether my constituents be Liberal or Conservative. I do not happen to be in the position of the Prime Minister, who does not care a five-cent piece if they happen to be Conservative. It is my intention to face this issue squarely and to vote for both Liberals and Conservatives in my constituency, who I believe are opposed to the principle of the bill itself and to this shelving proposition of the hon. member for Stormont.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think I need reiterate my views on this question; for ten years I have voted and spoken in the same way with regard to it. I agree with the hon. member for North Renfrew when he says that this measure is being forced upon the province of Ontario by people who are living outside the province. There are not enough votes in this house from the province of Ontario to carry the measure. I protest against its being forced on the province by people living outside, and I will continue to protest against such a course. I do think that there ought to be a spirit of sportsmanship in this house and that when a minority is defeated it ought to give in to the majority. For ten years, I say, I have opposed such a measure as this. For the first time we are beaten. The bill has been given its second reading by a majority of the house, even if members from the province of Ontario have also voted for it. I feel that the amendment of the hon. member for Stormont is nothing but a piece of subterfuge whereby hon. members can get under the table and shirk their responsibility, play more or less the parts of cowards, and not come out and register their votes as they ought to register them either for or against this measure. What is to be gained by this? We have heard from the premier of Ontario that he will not ask for a divorce court; then I ask those who are attempting to force the measure upon the province, what is there to be gained by carrying an amendment which means nothing? In my parliamentary career, Mr. Chairman, I have never yet reached that stage where I would be a party to killing my own bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. McGIBBON: Who said carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead, doctor.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think, Mr. Chairman, we have reached the stage where we ought to consider the position of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is the leader of the government. A year ago he gave his promise to the house that he would offer a solution of this question. Now I ask him and I ask the house: Have we not, as members, a right to know what his solution is? I admit it is a troublesome question to some of us who do not believe in divorce. It is probably a still more troublesome question to members of the government who draw their support solidly from one province which is so absolutely opposed to divorce. After all, governments are made to govern, and I submit that this government should have the courage of its convictions, that the Prime Minister should redeem his promise and give us a solution of this question. So far as I am concerned, sir, my stand is well known. I will vote against the amendment, I will vote against the bill, and I will vote against everything in connection with it.

Mr. McMILLAN: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN: Until there is order in the chamber I shall certainly stand. I submit at the outset, in view of the fact that a number of my warm personal friends have endeavoured to interrupt to such an extent that I would not be allowed to express myself, that I am within the judgment of the house when I assert that I have never wasted very much time here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMILLAN: For that reason, if for no other, I do not see why hon. members should not be able to sit in silence and listen to me as I have always been in the habit of listening to them. I claim that right for every member and I do hope it will be accorded me.

An hon. MEMBER: Time wasted.

An hon. MEMBER: Talk on the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman is not addressing himself to the amendment before the house.

Mr. McMILLAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. IRVINE: Ruling?

Mr. McMILLAN: Mr. Chairman, it is your duty to decide the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) who has the floor, was asking the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) to assist him in keeping order in the chamber.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order. If you are going to rule on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, do so. I object to your comment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. McMILLAN: From the discussion so far as it has proceeded I do think that the members of this house have not really grasped the point of the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN: I do not need to tell the house that I have always been opposed to the principle of the bill, and I want to say further that I have had more commendation from my constituents in South Huron—

An hon. MEMBER: They are only fooling you.

Mr. McMILLAN: —over the stand I have taken on the matter of divorce than on any other matter which I have discussed from the floor of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMILLAN: My constituents are in earnest in this matter, and they know I would not take the stand I have taken on this question if I was not conscientious in the matter.

Now, sir, as I say, I do not think hon. members have grasped the real meaning of this amendment. Let me read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. McMILLAN: Let me read it:

That the bill be amended by inserting the following therein as section 3 of the bill, and renumbering section 3 as section 4:

An hon. MEMBER: Applesauce.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN: Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not to be expected that I can proceed, because it is impossible for me to make myself heard, in view of the noise in the chamber.

Progress reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills being exhausted, the house will now revert to committee of supply.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Tokyo—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $80,000.

The CHAIRMAN: We shall continue with the consideration of item No. 242, as it appears at page 63 of the estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was asking the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give us an idea as to what the minister at Tokyo is doing, and of what his establishment consists. We would like to know the personnel and the salaries that are paid. I also directed the Prime Minister's attention to the fact mentioned by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the situation in the Pacific is one of great seriousness, and it might be well to have a statement from the Prime Minister as to the policy of the Dominion government in the orient and the Pacific. It has been customary for ministers of foreign affairs to indicate their policies of administration in connection with matters of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware, the legation at Tokyo has been established for only a few months. Naturally at the beginning we desire to move cautiously, and not be precipitate in any course taken. The purpose of establishing a legation at Tokyo is similar to the purpose of establishing legations at Washington and Paris, namely that of having in Japan a representative of the government of Canada who can be of assistance in seeking to further those objects which will help to maintain friendly relations between that country and our own. The legation will be on the lookout through the minister and his staff for all possible causes of friction, or differences that may arise at any time; and the minister will keep our government informed of the courses of action best calculated to avoid friction or difficulty arising; he will do whatever may be possible to maintain friendly relations. Broadly, from a political standpoint, these are the objects of the legation at Tokyo as elsewhere.

In connection with any country's relations with other countries, at certain stages of a nation's development, the most important of all questions is undoubtedly the promotion of trade. The promotion of trade in foreign countries particularly depends in a very considerable measure upon the political relationship existing between one country and another. One of the main objects in having a minister in Tokyo was to insure the relations between this country and Japan being such that there would be every likelihood of continuous increased trade with the countries in the far east. There has been a commercial representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Japan for some time past. As hon. gentlemen know, however, a commercial representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce would not have diplomatic standing in a foreign country. He is simply a departmental officer; the effectiveness of his position becomes materially enhanced when there is a minister in the country with him who has authority to speak to the government of that country in the name of his own country. The commercial representative in Japan of the Department of Trade and Commerce has been attached to the legation since the legation was opened; he has acted as commercial secretary. In that way the minister is brought into close relationship with commercial developments between this country and Japan, and the commercial representative has the advantage which arises through close association with the minister. There are some administrative duties which have to be performed, they may be expected to increase with the years. Happily, at the present time relations between this country and Japan are of the most friendly nature. As a matter of fact, I do not know of any serious issue between the two countries. One question namely that of the migration of immigrants from Japan to Canada, has always been a more or less difficult problem, but I believe the arrangements which have been made will eliminate that particular question from the arena of international difficulties.

Mr. BENNETT: Has that been reduced to writing?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made a statement at the last session of parliament in which I set out the particulars of the arrangement. It was thought desirable that the statement should be made to parliament in that form. The record appears in Hansard; the statement was made intentionally in that form. One of the important features of the immigration arrangement between Japan and Canada is that passports must be signed or viséd by designated officials. The viséing of passports for Japanese coming to Canada is part of the function of the legation, in many instances it may involve in advance the searching of individual records and the ascertaining of specific facts and information. As hon. members know, an important conference has been recently held in the Orient dealing with Pacific relations. Canada was represented at that conference by some of her best known citizens. I believe those who represented Canada found the presence of a legation in Tokyo extremely helpful. They found that the legation placed them in a position where they could very quickly become acquainted with those matters which from a Canadian point of view deserved careful consideration. The minister has very wisely sought to familiarize himself with political and economic conditions in Japan before attempting other duties, and his time up to the present has been devoted to the establishment of the legation on the right principles and in accordance with correct methods of procedure. From time to time special questions may come up, and as they do they will be dealt with individually. I do not know that it is possible to state a policy for Canada with respect to the Orient other than that of seeking in every particular to maintain the most friendly relations with the peoples of that portion of the world. It is the duty of the legation to see that no problem arises as between Japan and ourselves which through diplomatic handling can be prevented. With relation to problems which concern countries other than Canada and Japan, problems which have an imperial significance—if we wish to use that phrase—or a world significance, I would say that the relation of the Canadian minister in Japan to the British ambassador would be the same as the relation of Canada's minister at Washington to the British ambassador in that city. We have been told repeatedly by Sir Esme Howard, former British ambassador at Washington, that he found the establishment of the Canadian legation there, and in particular the presence of Hon. Mr. Massey, of the utmost assistance. He believes that the whole British relationship has been materially strengthened as a result of Canada having opened a legation in Washington and through the helpful cooperation there has been between the Canadian minister and the British ambassador. I believe the same will prove to be equally true in Tokyo.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask whether the jurisdiction of the minister in Tokyo extends in any degree at all to China or other adjacent countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, the Orient covers a lot of ground. The relations between Japan and China are a factor in questions which may arise even as between Japan and this country. We have thought it advisable to have the Canadian minister, while in the Orient, pay a visit to China with a view to advising the government upon features which he thinks should be brought to our attention with respect to that country as well. I may say that when Sir Austen Chamberlain, at the time Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was in this city and we were discussing the question of the opening of a legation in Tokyo, he expressed to me the view that in his opinion it would be very helpful to the Canadian minister at Tokyo to visit China, and he stated that in the event of that course being thought desirable the British government would facilitate the movements of the Canadian minister in every way possible. At the time it seemed to me the idea was a good one, and it has been acted upon to a certain extent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask further if it is the intention of the government to propose a revision of the treaty, or the drafting of a new treaty, between this country and China.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter has not thus far been considered.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the right hon. Prime Minister for the information he has given, but I should like to know something about the constitution of the legation. As I understand it from what the Prime Minister has said, and as I have gathered from what I have read, it is quite clear that the real value of the minister at Tokyo at the moment is that by virtue of his position, being a representative of Canada on the political side, he is enabled to obtain access to governmental departments that a mere trade commissioner could not so speedily secure. From what I have read of the operations of our present minister at Tokyo since he went there, I should judge that his time has been principally taken up in the promotion of trade, and that in promoting trade his one service is that by virtue of the dignity which attaches to the position he is given the right of access to officials who would be denied to one engaged as a representative of trade only, and the minister thereby has extended the sphere of influence of Canadian exporters. So far as I can find out that seems to be a fair statement of the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has stated the position as it is at present very fairly, although I should not restrict the minister's functions and services as much as he has done. The presence of the minister in Tokyo, perhaps more than anything else, has brought this country to the attention of the government, the large financial and commercial interests, and the people of Japan. That is a phase of our representation in the Orient which I think is quite important. I believe it is true that the presence of the minister in Japan has made it possible for numbers of persons in this country to become acquainted with individuals and firms in Japan by correspondence and in other ways and with opportunities so far as furthering Canada's interest in the Orient is concerned, which otherwise would not have been possible.

With respect to the establishment, the personnel consists of the minister, the Hon. Herbert Marler and a secretariat of three. Mr. Langley is the first secretary, and he is also the representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Mr. H. L. Keenleyside, is also a first secretary, and Mr. K. P. Kirkwood is third secretary. There is a clerical staff of three stenographers; there is a Japanese translator and an assistant; a Japanese stenographer and a messenger and office boy, who I imagine are also Japanese.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the salaries, if you please?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister receives a salary of $12,000, which is the amount paid the ministers at Washington and Paris and the High Commissioner in London. The minister receives also an allowance of $10,000 out of which he must meet the expenses of his residence and living. He is also allowed $3,000 for a car. The two first secretaries each receive a salary of $4,000, and they each will have an allowance of $4,000. The third secretary receives a salary of $2,580 and an allowance of $1,500. The salary of the commercial first secretary is paid by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: How much is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is $4,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: To whom is that paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is paid Mr. Langley, the first secretary.

Mr. BENNETT: Is he the commercial secretary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he has the trade figures for Japan for the last three years, just to give us a comparison of the exports and imports over that period.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I have not the figures here.

Mr. MANION: Then perhaps the right hon. gentleman can tell me if the balance of trade in our favour has increased in the past year or whether our trade relations have become any more favourable as far as Canada is concerned during the past year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact that it was September before the minister reached Tokyo. He has been there now just a little over six months, and I doubt very much if the figures are available for such a recent period.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, $25,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the Prime Minister explain this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the Canadian office at Geneva, which has been in existence for some years. An increase of $2,500 has been necessitated by additional clerical work.

Mr. MANION: The nomenclature of the vote seems to have been altered each year. I have been trying to check up the votes for the last three or four years for the League of Nations, and I find this year that vote No. 243 covers the salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer; vote No. 244 covers Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations; vote No. 245 covers the expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly, council and commissions of the League of Nations, and vote No. 246 covers the publications of the League of Nations. The total of those votes amounts to something over $233,000. In making a rough check of the votes for previous years, I find the vote for salaries and expenses to be roughly as follows:

1927	$10,000
1928	12,000
1929	21,000
1930	22,500
1931	25,000

Although I have made this computation very hurriedly, I think it is correct. It shows that from 1921 to 1931 there has been an increase from $10,000 to $25,000. The same thing is true with regard to the vote for the League of Nations, that vote having increased from $150,000 for 1927 to $184,000 for this year. It would appear that the votes are being increased each year, and as a member of this house I would like to know why. I cannot see why this vote should be increased over last year, and I would like to have an explanation from the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of my hon. friend will be best answered perhaps by my reading a paragraph from the report of the Department of External Affairs. This paragraph will indicate how the work of the Canadian advisory office at Geneva has been increased. It reads:

> The work of the Canadian Advisory Office at Geneva as the established channel of communication between the government of Canada and the League of Nations, has continued to grow with the development of the league's activities and the responsibilities involved in the place in the league's organizations which has been attained by the Dominion. As a temporary member of the council and as a member of the governing body of the International Labour Office, Canada is called upon to participate in all the important conferences and administrative activities of the league. In addition to assisting at meetings of the council and of the assembly, the Canadian Advisory Officer has represented Canada in the meetings of the preparatory disarmament commission, the conference on revision of the Red Cross convention, commissions for the preparation of the convention on private manufacture and supervision of manufacture of arms, and the conference for the suppression of counterfeiting. The advisory officer represented the Minister of Labour at the sessions of the governing body of the International Labour Office and acted as a delegate at the sessions of the International Labour Conference. Reports on the various questions before the league have been forwarded and an increasing measure of information as to league activities furnished Canadian correspondents and the growing number of Canadians who visit Geneva.

As is shown by the paragraph which I have just quoted, Canada's representation at Geneva has become quite as important as that of any other country. Adequate representation has necessitated some slight additional expenditure. The division of the items is made simply to enable members of this house to estimate better what the activities are of the particular officers, and the work to which parliament is being asked to appropriate moneys.

Mr. MANION: I do not claim particularly that there is too much being spent, but it does strike me as strange that every time we open up an office of any kind—the Prime Minister has had a longer experience in civil service affairs than I have—whether it be in Canada, Geneva, Washington or elsewhere, the expenses of such office keep on increasing. Geneva is a considerable distance from Canada, and I would suggest that it might be well for the government, whether it is this government or the one which will succeed it, to check up the expenses of offices such as this. In reading the newspapers of England, the United States and Canada, I have seen protests against the expenses of the League of Nations. Most of those complaints were upon the ground that an immense civil service organization was being built up without any control being exercised. Considering the distance Geneva is from Canada, it is very easy to add a few extra clerks, secretaries and other assistants to the personnel, and hire a few extra automobiles without any check-up being made. Perhaps it is our duty to pay, but we should not permit the building up of such organizations without some check-up being made.

A hurried estimate of the expenditure for last year shows that they amounted to $215,000 for the Geneva vote, while the total for this year amounts to $233,000. I am quite certain that an examination of the votes for previous years will show that they have increased as the years went by. I suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister that the office at Geneva be informed that the people of Canada feel that unless it is absolutely necessary we should not have to go on increasing year by year the amount of money voted for that office. To a large extent this is true also with regard to the offices at Tokyo, Washington and other places. The sooner these outside offices are informed that this parliament is checking their expenses—at least in a general way; it would be very difficult to check them in detail—the better it will be for Canada as well as for the offices concerned. I for one desire to put myself on record as being opposed to this continual increase in the cost of running these offices, because after all the people have to pay the bills. A check-up of the civil service in Canada will show that there is a continual growth from year to year, and the expenses of that growth are sufficient without a continual increase in the cost of a little civil service outside of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The votes with respect to Geneva are the same this year as they were last year, with the exception of the vote covering the salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, which vote has been increased by $2,500, to cover the additional clerk which I have already mentioned, and the vote covering Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations, which has been increased by $12,445.80. That is an increase, however, which we are not in a position to control. Our percentage of the expenditure of the League of Nations is something like 3½ per cent, and there has been an increase in the total expenses of the league due to certain new activities in which the league has become interested. There is, for example, an inquiry into certain diseases in Latin-American countries, the carrying out of the recommendations of the economic conference of 1927, conference on the codification of international law, the strengthening of the narcotic law, and in addition there is the contribution which the different countries are making to new buildings for the League of Nations. All of that accounts for part of the increase in the amount, but it is a division of the total expenses of the league which is made by the League of Nations itself, and not an expenditure which we are in a position to control except to the extent to which we can make our voice heard for economy at the league itself. With respect to the voice of Canada in the matter of league expenditure, I think I can assure my hon. friend that it has been on the side of economy and not of extravagance.

Mr. MANION: I quite agree that the Prime Minister is right in saying that the large increase is due to Canada's contribution to the League of Nations, and to a certain extent his statement that we have not much control over that is also correct. But I repeat that I read some months ago that France was protesting against the continual increase in her expenditure in connection with the League of Nations. I do not think we need be too proud to take the same attitude, because the expense in connection with the item of which the Prime Minister spoke, over which in a sense we have no control, has increased from $150,000 in 1928 to $184,000 three years later. The only way in which that expense can be kept down for all countries is for Canada to take its attitude through its representatives at Geneva, just as France, England and other countries should take their attitude through their representatives at the same place. In these days of high expenditures, neither France, England nor any other country can afford to pay more than it has to; and of course that applies to Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: While I have always been an advocate of economy, there is true economy and false economy. I think at an earlier stage in the session I gave the figures showing that the military expenditures of the countries of the world for one year would run the League of Nations for six hundred years. If we really want to save money I would suggest to the hon. member for Fort William that we can cut it off the estimates of the Department of National Defence and with good economy add it to the expenditure that is being made at Geneva. It was my great privilege to see something of the work that was being done by the Canadian office in Geneva last fall.

Mr. MANION: I hope that was not the cause of the increased expense.

Miss MACPHAIL: I hope not. Before dinner the hon. member for Toronto Northwest said that we had a whole army at Geneva. We have six Canadians in the Canadian office and I must admit that they are a host in themselves. Doctor Riddell, the head of the office, Colonel Georges Vanier and Mr. E. D. McGreer were, I thought, about as fine types of Canadians as could be found anywhere and they were doing serious work for Canada. What is more, they were doing it enthusiastically, and this cannot always be said of members of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Let the hon. member speak for herself.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not the least enthusiastic member of the house.

Mr. RYCKMAN: How could they be anything else to the hon. member?

Miss MACPHAIL: The office that we have at Geneva is really very beautiful, but it is not expensive, because thinking it was so beautiful I expected it would be expensive, so I asked what the rent was and I found it was amazingly low. I spent a good deal of time in the office with the three young women and the men I mentioned. I felt they were trying their very best to hold down expenses and spending only what money needed to be spent to do good work for Canada in Geneva.

I feel also that countries that have offices at Geneva are in a much better position while the assembly is in session than countries that do not have offices there. I am not trying to assist the Minister of External Affairs, but it seems quite reasonable that the expenditures would increase while we have a seat on the council of the League of Nations. I do not care to say anything more under this particular item, except this: let us not start economy on the peace end of our activities; let us begin to economize when the estimates of the Department of National Defence come up and then I will enlist the services of my good friend the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend probably thinks we should cut down the navy too.

Miss MACPHAIL: Certainly.

Mr. MANION: I will vote with her to cut down the navy. I do not wish to be misunderstood as opposing our contribution to the League of Nations. I still take my attitude, with all due deference to the lady who has just taken her seat, that we might just as well be as economical as we can at Geneva and be as economical as we can at home. I did not have the advantage she had of visiting those offices or I might be defending the Prime Minister in this matter too.

Miss MACPHAIL: That may come also.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I note that Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1930, is $184,000. Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us the nations that contributed sums in excess of Canada's contribution?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that Canada stands about tenth on the list.

Mr. BENNETT: The International Postal Union schedule governs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is correct. I could not name the countries offhand, but I imagine my hon. friend will be able to surmise what they are.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Am I then correct in saying that there were nine other nations that contributed more than the amount contributed by Canada to the League of Nations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the understanding.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to be in the position of always criticizing the League of Nations, but I should like to find out something about it. Who compose the league? What does it do? What are its functions? Who are Canada's delegates? There is a labour delegation that goes over there and there are ladies going over there. Mrs. Mary Ellen Smith, who was supposed to be an impartial representative, went over there and when she came back she toured Canada addressing Liberal associations and criticizing the head of the party in this corner of the house. I am becoming alarmed at these expenditures. Canada is contributing the largest amount per capita of any member of the league. The mother country last year paid $395,000 to the League of Nations. I quote this from the Mail and Empire of a despatch from London of the 22nd March:

> It cost Great Britain $100,000 for the re-establishment of its embassy in Moscow, according to the civil estimates issued to-day. Other estimates dealing with foreign affairs showed that Britain's contribution to the League of Nations increased during the year from $355,000 to $395,000 annually, this country paying 10.65 per cent of the total league expenses, not, however, including the international labour organizations.

That is what the mother country is expending. Is this country increasing its expenditures? I think the amount is $284,000 when it is totalled up. This money is absolutely wasted. The government are busying themselves in every capital in Europe about foreign affairs and they cannot attend to their own home affairs. They are spending $450,000,000 in this parliament. Charity begins at home. A five cent policy is the cheap politics of the head of the Department of External Affairs towards his own people. He may read from Industry and Humanity all he likes, but charity begins at home. I want to read one or two paragraphs to show what actually goes on at the league on which we are spending so much money. I am quoting from the League of Nations, First Impressions, by George Bernard Shaw in the Empire Review. He thus describes his first visit to the league in 1928:

> When my presence at Geneva during the annual assembly of the League of Nations was mentioned in the press, I received several letters, of which the following is a fair sample:
>
> "I cannot help being rather surprised and shocked to read that you 'sit on the bench of mockers and hypocrites' . . . . In this country every little child knows that the League of Nations is only a bluff and nothing but an instrument for the policy of the allied forces . . . . I really am at a loss to understand why you don't feel your responsibility as a mental tutor of the world, when taking such a step as taking part in the comedy of Geneva, which is a tragedy for every country that does not find mercy in the eyes of the world's high C finance."
> This letter is not a stateman's utterance. It is a crude expression of the popular impatience which sees no more in the league than an instrument for the instantaneous extirpation of war, and is ready to throw it on the scrap-heap the moment it becomes clear that no such operation is possible, and that the big powers have not, and never have had, any intention of relinquishing any jot of their sovereignty, or depending on any sort of strength and security other than military.

Roughly and generally it is a fact that the pacifist oratory at the assembly is Christmas card platitude at best and humbug at worst. The permanent departments of the league have to fight hard to defeat the frequent attempts to sabotage it by the big powers through their deciduous members.

Whilst I was there the press was keeping the public amused, not to say gulled, by gossip about the assembly meetings, at which nothing happens but pious speeches which might have been delivered fifty years ago.

We have two hardy perennials at the league, the leader of the Senate Hon. Raoul Dandurand, and Sir George Foster. They seem to be two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one as to the league. I have heard in this house some of our delegates talking about our maritime ports. When they go over to the league for a nice trip they do not leave our maritime ports. No, they sail on the George Washington and other fine steamers from the port of New York. That is how much these favourite statesmen care about our maritime ports. I quote again:

It was so impossible to listen to them, or to keep awake during the subsequent inevitable translations, that the audience had to be kept in its place by a regulation, physically enforced,—

I wish we had this regulation in this house. Mr. Shaw continues:

—that no visitor should be allowed to leave the hall except during the five minutes set apart for that purpose between speech and translation. Fortunately, the young ladies of the Secretariat, who have plenty of dramatic sense, arrange the platform in such a way that the president, the speakers, and the bureau are packed low down before a broad tableau curtain which, being in three pieces, provides most effective dramatic entrances right and left of the centre. When a young lady secretary has a new dress, or for any other reason feels that she is looking her best, she waits until the speaker—possibly a Chinese gentleman carefully plodding through a paper written in his best French—has reduced half the public galleries to distraction and the other half to stertorous slumber, when she suddenly, but gracefully, snatches the curtains apart and stands revealed, a captivating mannequin, whilst she pretends to look round with a pair of sparkling eyes for her principal on the bureau. The effect is electric; the audience wakes up and passes with a flash from listless desperation to tense fascination, to the great encouragement of the speaker who, with his back to the vision beautiful, fondly believes he has got them at last.

That is the kind of thing, cheap political vaudeville, that goes on at the League of Nations. We have been reading in the papers of a peace parley of five powers, but it is really six powers. Canada is represented there, this great nation with its wonderful fleet and its wonderful contribution to the league, the heaviest contribution of any country. Canada is represented at the peace parley by Colonel Ralston, the Minister of National Defence. He was wired to the other day to come home, but he did not come. He has asked to see the thing through. The Prime Minister of France, when asked by newspaper men why he was leaving the parley at London for Paris, said, "I cannot spend all day looking out of my hotel window however fine the weather may be," and outside he asked the reporters for a cigarette. The United States report says he was tired of it, and it was reported that our representative was also getting tired of it. The net result should be that our Minister of National Defence should be asked to come home and allow the mother country to look after European affairs. What we should be doing is to attend to the functions of this parliament and be passing legislation for the benefit of the working classes of this country. Let us do something practical, but we spend more than half our time trying to prove that Canada is a nation and that the league is the cure for all the ills of the human race. Dear knows what our representative at the peace parley is going to bring back in his club bag. The Minister of Justice brought back a wonderful new magna charta by which we were to be released from the tyranny forever of Downing street and have as an adviser a governor general who would make speeches just like a member of parliament does and cease being a governor, only a viceroy. The delegates to the league are all politicians. They are selected after the fashion of the Prime Minister when he is dealing with unemployment. He separates the sheep from the goats. No Tories are ever allowed to represent Canada at the league.

The first item under the heading of Geneva is for the salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian Advisory Officer. He is a doctor, of what I don't know yet. Everybody connected with External Affairs is a doctor. What he is a doctor of I do not know. Some of the quack cures of these doctors on external affairs have been hurting this country and the British Empire. Who does the Canadian Advisory Officer advise? Does he advise parliament? A doctor advised the industrial and international relations committee to put up $600,000 to $1,000,000 for chairs in our universities to teach our young people something about foreign affairs and to get the international formulae. I have one hundred and twenty-five students of Toronto universities that I am trying to get a job for now. Mr. Cyrus Eaton, the great Cleveland financier and philanthropist, went to Cleveland in his student days at McMaster and stayed there when he graduated. He would not be one of those who would stay at home and imbibe this magnificent dream of our new status, this international diplomacy which everybody gets so fed up on. Every child in the schools is to be given a copy, if you please, so that he may learn what our magnificent diplomats are doing at the League of Nations. Our university students, over fifty per cent of them, go to the States and other foreign countries. We are thus exporting our greatest assets, our clever students.

I have asked who composes the league. We have had twelve years of nothing but peace pacts and agreements and speeches, and what has been the result? It has been the utter failure of open diplomacy, which Mr. Woodrow Wilson so strongly, and so disastrously for the peace of Europe, advocated. Will Italy have anything to do with the league? Mussolini calls it a lot of horse play; that is the phrase of the Prime Minister of Italy. Will Germany or Russia have anything to do with it? Russia is mobilizing millions of men and marching on China, equipped with tanks and all modern military equipment. I quote from the January, 1930, number of the English Review:

> At present, while peace is chattered about in the suburbs of Western Europe, anarchy is spreading over vast tracts of territory. Millions of men are under arms; millions of homes are in constant peril of loot and desecration. Before 1914 these things would have roused the conscience of Europe. To-day Europe is so conscious of its moral superiority and unswerving devotion to peace that it will not move a finger. It will only sign pacts and pass resolutions. These war books reflect this evil mood. They are teaching people that all the good things in life come easily and automatically and that all the evil is due to the interference of politicians and soldiers with the peaceful evolution of society. That is a lie. One glance round the world to-day proves it so. But the literary coteries who are booming their books will not take that one glance. They must be taught to do so.

There are a whole lot of sensible people in this country who do not believe in the league, who have lost confidence in it. The league has been a nice, pleasant annual gathering, providing an enjoyable trip overseas on the most modern ships, sailing out of the port of New York instead of out of our St. Lawrence and maritime ports, for a lot of favourites of the government, and all the flatterers of the government took passage. The boys have a nice pleasant trip and imbibe the higher statesmanship of Geneva and all its vanities. What do they do when they go over there? They run up a lot of bills and nobody knows what they are for. Where is the Auditor General, what is he doing about this particular department? Have you ever seen a statement of the expenses of this league? I have looked for such a statement in vain. Let me enumerate these expenses:

> Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1930, including secretariat, International Labour Organization and permanent court of international justice, $184,227.

A permanent court of international justice for what? To help pacify Europe? What we want in this country is a court of justice that will give the working class a chance in Canada, that will give them bread instead of a stone. Here is another item:

> Expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly, council and commissions of the League of Nations, $21,000.

Who are these delegates? What political party do they belong to? Are they supporters of the government? Of course they are; that is the reason they get the trip. Then we have these expenses for publications:

> Publications of League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada, $3,000.

That is $3,000 thrown away. The whole vote of about $243,000 is money that might be spent to much better purpose in giving relief to our women and children suffering in the cities and towns of this country. This expenditure would not be so bad if it was helping remove the risk of war, but the Prime Minister of France says that that risk is just as great as it ever was. The amount of money this league is spending is going up by leaps and bounds. This afternoon I was referring to the ultimate disunion of the empire as the outcome of the policy of this government. To-day in Washington there is the representative of the Irish Free State and our own representative. Not only is this government interfering in Europe, it is interfering in the Pacific too.

But to return to Europe. It is only about a week ago that the Prime Minister laid on the table Senator Dandurand's declaration with respect to the optional clause. He said it could be put down on a foolscap sheet of paper. It should have been made on April Fool's day. Senator Dandurand holds up his right hand and makes that declaration in relation to the optional clause. If Canada got out of Europe altogether and our government contented itself with trying to govern Canada instead of Europe, this country would be far better governed than it is to-day. There are a few matters on the front page of to-day's paper that might well engage the attention of this particular department; one being the dismissal of British subjects from their jobs in the United States. Why has not that been brought to the attention of the League of Nations? The American people do not belong to the league. They started the league and then they said they would not have anything to do with it. Now they are going to build a canal of their own down through New York state, and there will be no deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway owing to the way Canada has run away from the St. Lawrence. What is the government doing about that? Would it not be better for our representative in Washington to get busy about something practical? These leagues never were of much use. After the great Napoleonic wars ending in 1815 the Holy Alliance was formed by the emperors of Austria and Russia and the king of Prussia, but it came to nothing. The United States covenanted to protect Belgium, but they did not do anything to carry out that covenant. The Persians, the Greeks and the Romans all had leagues, but to no purpose. I have never yet heard of a league that did anything to justify its existence. I fail to see what benefit the government is getting from this expenditure. The League of Nations has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. If we spent one half of the time on the economic problems confronting this country that is spent on this League of Nations—if Canada would only mind her own business and keep out of Europe, it would be far better for the Dominion and the empire. When Laurier took office our national expenditure was $36,000,000; to-day it is about $450,000,000—roughly half a billion dollars, although our population is very little more than we had in 1896. The government is simply spending money like water. It would be much better if they spent this money in helping the motherland keep up her navy. I venture to say that anybody who wants to be a delegate at Geneva had better get a promise from the government at once, because I believe the league will blow itself up if you give it time. We are paying to become a nation. Here is a paragraph about the league from the Morning Post:

> The anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar yesterday serves as the peg on which the Morning Post to-days hangs its leading editorial on "Naval Necessities." Referring especially to Canada, the newspaper said: "Canada owes both her existence and her liberties in the first place to the Royal Navy, and then to that balance of power which maintains the British Empire in the new world as in the old. Let that balance be destroyed and how long, despite all pacts and treaties, would any part of that Empire rest secure?
> "Canada is growing mightily, not only in industry and agriculture, but in commerce. Her ships are even now bringing to her people the fruits, sugar and other tropical commodities of the West Indies. For the protection of that traffic her naval provision of two destroyers is almost ludicrously inadequate. Her vast grain trade, her sea carriage east, west and south—these owe their security to the existence of the Royal Navy under whose benignant shade Canada has grown and prospered.
> "These things are taken so much as a matter of course as to be ignored in the outlook of most of the Dominions. Yet it remains true that the trade of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have no other security than the fleet which they seldom see, but of which the very existence is a perpetual restraint to any potential enemy. The ideal of peace in an unarmed world is not served by ignoring the truth."

It would be far better for Canada if we devoted the money we are spending on the League of Nations as a contribution towards the British fleet. That is the only real League of Nations; all other leagues are mere moonshine. The British navy has been the only league that has protected civilization and humanity for the past century. I am not going to move a reduction of the vote because I think it should be cut out altogether. I would give the League of Nations as much as the Prime Minister would give to unemployment—five cents; and that would be too much.

Mr. ROBINSON: Before the vote passes, Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion to make to the Prime Minister. I think it is an opportune time to draw his attention to the fact that Greece is celebrating the hundredth anniversary of her independence, and Great Britain and the United States have sent their congratulations to that country. I would suggest that Canada might follow their example.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer a suggestion. It is only recently that we in Canada have been under the necessity of dealing with foreign affairs. So far there does not seem to be any machinery set up by which we can secure an intelligent discussion of these matters. We have no established procedure. It does seem to me that not merely should these items of expenditure in connection with the league be brought before the house but also the various policies that are being discussed in the league should come under review. The other day in the committee on industrial and international relations someone asked what we knew with regard to the rights of minorities. Senator Dandurand has been very active in regard to this matter and I fancy there is no country which takes a keener interest than we do in the rights of minorities. So far as I know, however, there has been no discussion in this house in regard to the matter, and no policy has been worked out. It may be that Senator Dandurand is working along the very best lines, but we have had no report other than what has been published in the records of the league. I submit to the Prime Minister there ought to be some very definite means adopted whereby consideration could be given to these affairs. We have set up a committee on industrial and international relations. It was on the suggestion of the Prime Minister that the second part was added and the committee given jurisdiction over international relations, but that phase of the work has never been taken seriously. This year for the first time a reference has been made to that committee, when it was asked to consider the motion of the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I do not know whether that committee as now constituted is the proper place to deal with external affairs or whether it might be desirable to have a separate committee. When there are so many matters of importance to be considered it might be well to have a separate committee. As we are aware, the United States senate committee on foreign affairs is very influential, and I can see no reason why we should not have a committee of that nature in connection with this house. I hope the Prime Minister will understand that I am in sympathy with an extension of work along these lines, but I consider that we should have better opportunities of becoming informed, and we should have some voice in the determination of policies relating to external affairs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the item carries I would like to have a statement from the Prime Minister. I wish to ask if we will have an opportunity at this session of the house to discuss Canada's foreign policies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not control either the procedure or the proceedings of the house. With the best of intentions I tried last session to meet my hon. friend on a difficult matter, but apparently I have not been able to accomplish my purpose either to his liking or to the liking of some other hon. members. I hesitate to promise anything which it may be impossible to fulfil. As far as external affairs are concerned, the same opportunities are afforded for discussion of that subject as are afforded for the discussion of any other subject which may be considered by parliament. As to fixing a specific time I confess I find it somewhat difficult to undertake anything of that nature.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that the question raised by my friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) is worthy of the consideration of those who may represent Canada next year at the assembly? As the Prime Minister no doubt knows, there are half a dozen committees of the assembly, one of which deals with financial matters and the consideration of such questions as the division of expenses, what the total budget shall be, and things of that nature. It is very necessary that our representative on the financial committee should pay particular attention to the question that has been raised by the member for Fort William. The hon. member has said that there is a gradual increase from year to year in the expense of the league, and particularly in Canada's share of those expenses. I am of the opinion that the league is doing good work, but unless the matter is very carefully handled this country may be asked to pay more than its just share. In that connection I see no reason why the Prime Minister should not instruct our representative on the financial committee so that he may be able to consider the financial side of the question with greater care.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be only too ready to act on the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not very well satisfied with the situation as it has been left by the Prime Minister. In this item we have, for instance, grants made to the international labour office. I am keenly interested in what has been going on in connection with that office. There is no real opportunity under an item of this character to discuss in detail what the international labour office has been doing. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) is not present to-night and we are deprived of the information he could give us as to what has been done. He is not here to answer any questions or criticism that we may have to offer. I do not think anybody would suggest that this is a suitable opportunity to discuss matters of that kind. I do not want to be put in the position of having to move the adjournment of the house or to make a motion upon going into supply. I hope such procedure will not be necessary. I want it clear that I am making no threat, but I do not think that a private member on this side of the house ought to be placed in the position where he has to move the adjournment of the house or make a motion upon going into supply before he can get consideration of matters of this kind. They are of sufficient importance to merit consideration by this house, and it is for that reason I appeal to the Prime Minister and ask that in some way they should be brought before the house. Would it not be possible to set aside a particular date for the discussion of league affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that about ten days have elapsed since I made the motion that the house go into supply to consider the estimates of the Department of External Affairs? As the hon. member knows, the consideration of the estimates is the opportune time to discuss any matter pertaining thereto. I deliberately brought on my estimates early in the session so that the fullest opportunity would be given to hon. members to discuss external affairs. In other years the criticism has been made that the estimates for this department have been considered at a time so late in the session that there was not opportunity for full discussion. This year they have been brought on at an early date, and for ten days past the house has been aware of the fact that these estimates would be considered just as soon as the house went into committee of supply. I cannot think of a better opportunity to discuss matters relating to the League of Nations than when the items in the estimates which affect the league are being considered. If my hon. friend can suggest a better opportunity that that afforded by supply, I would like to have his suggestion. It seems to me that supply affords the best of all opportunities. I may say that there will be two or three matters relating to League of Nations affairs which will come before the house shortly. There is one on the order paper at the present time relating to the optional clause. There are other matters, one of which relates to the approval of the protocol for the revision of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, and another relating to the approval of the protocol for the accession of the United States to the protocol of signature of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. These matters will afford opportunities for further discussions. I think the house will permit considerable latitude on any one of these subjects. There is no desire in any way to restrict consideration of these important matters.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am considerably troubled by these items we are voting for external affairs. I am convinced that we are paying more than any other nation receiving similar service. I think the figures for London, Washington, Paris, Tokyo and Geneva are much in excess of what the work could be done for. I do not think any other nation pays as much for the upkeep of any legation as we pay in the case of Washington, especially if we take into account the interest on the money we have invested there. It may be that the United States pays more with respect to Paris, but I should like to know if the Prime Minister can tell us of any nation which pays more for Tokyo than we pay. As far as Geneva is concerned it is proposed to expend this year about $235,000, and I do not believe we get value for it. It is not a question of "keeping up with the Joneses;" in these items we are running far ahead of them and setting a pace. Canada is the most extravagant of the nations with regard to its external affairs. When I think of the debate which just finished to-day; when I remember that we have no money for unemployment, it seems a shame. We have these sums of $117,000, $100,000, $80,000, $233,000 and so on, but nothing for the unemployed. I want to ask the Prime Minister if something cannot be done, while he is at the head of the government, to economize in these matters. I know something about these trips abroad; at one time I crossed the ocean with some delegates who were going to attend the League of Nations, and they regarded it as a great joy trip.

I will tell you what I am satisfied I could do. I could take the sum of $50,000 and put a man in London who could take care of all Canadian interests there; for $25,000 I could put a man in Washington who would look after the situation there. You could allow the same sum for Paris and Tokyo, and it would be sufficient. If we were on the job; if we were desirous of advancing the interests of this country instead of being anxious to give people pleasant jobs and nice trips, we could take care of the financial interests, the foreign trade and the international relations of this country in a way that would benefit Canada, at a very much less cost than that which is now involved. It is appalling to me to see Canada paying these immense sums. If I am wrong I should like the Prime Minister to tell me what nations are paying more for similar services than we pay. There is no answer. I happen to know a gentleman who was recently appointed United States ambassador at Warsaw, and certainly in that case there was no appropriation like this. I remember that two years ago the complaint was made that we were trying to "keep up with the Joneses." I do not want anyone to outstep us in the race, but I object to our country setting the pace for all the others, and that is the position in which we are placing ourselves now in view of the amounts we are asked to vote for external affairs. I object, Mr. Chairman; we could do the business of the country more economically and more effectively at much less expense; at least that certainly is my opinion.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly, council and commissions of the League of Nations, $21,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just here I should like to say a word of commendation to the government for having placed the last delegation on what appears to me to be the proper footing; that is, the delegation was not composed entirely of supporters of the government. I believe Sir George Foster and Miss Macphail were members of that delegation, and they represent parties other than the Liberal party. We have a precedent for an action of that kind, since last year Lord Cecil was appointed a member of the British Empire delegation as representing the government of Great Britain. It strikes me that in these matters of such great interest to the country we should rise above narrow party lines. After all when it comes to matters of international importance we are all Canadians, and it seems to me the government should be commended for having taken action along this line.

Mr. RYCKMAN: All prepared to take trips together at the expense of the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not think that is the idea; it seems to me this is a bigger thing than merely joy riding. I must confess that for a long time I was not tremendously enthusiastic about the league because it seemed to me simply a league of victors and was so circumscribed in its powers that it did not amount to a very great deal. However, as the years have gone by, within somewhat narrow limits, it is true, the league has done very good work, and as a matter of fact it is the only international organization in existence. I think any thoughtful student of world affairs must come to the conclusion that to-day we cannot go along just within our own national limits; we must have some form of world organization if we are to prevent world wars in the future. Therefore I urge that we should support the League of Nations. If we recognize that Canada must play a part in the League of Nations, then we cannot talk in a cheap way about our delegates to that league taking a joy ride. One might just as well say that when we come to Ottawa to attend the sessions of this Dominion parliament and to look after the business of the country we are taking a joy ride. I think we must recognize that the league is coming to be something of a world parliament; we should choose our representatives just as carefully, and they should take their duties just as seriously, as is the case with representatives in our own legislative bodies. Our delegates have been in attendance at the league; they have come in contact with some of the world leaders and discussed some of the world problems, but there is no opportunity for them to present anything in the shape of a report to other members who have not had the opportunity of going to Geneva. Again I do not know just how this could be done. Some of us have discussed matters with them privately with a view to getting information. I do not suggest that most of us have anything to contribute, but rather that we should receive information as to what is going on, and then possibly have a chance to pass judgment on the policies which have been brought forward.

Miss MACPHAIL: Since the matter has been brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I want to say something about my appreciation of the action of the government in sending a parliamentary delegation to the League of Nations last September. I feel slightly embarrased in doing so, because I was one of the group sent. I did not accept the offer of the government as meaning that I would be given a joy ride. That it would be an excursion which would afford me pleasure was of course the case, but that was not the reason I accepted the offer. Hon. members will recall that last year I made the suggestion that the delegation sent to the meeting of the league should be non-partisan. The government acted upon my suggestion with alacrity, and I was taken more or less by surprise as the government does not often take my suggestions seriously. Sir George Foster was appointed to go, not because he was a Conservative, I take it, but because he had done very excellent work for peace and for the League of Nations. I was asked to go, possibly because I had been interested in this subject—I hope that was the reason. When Sir George Foster, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), Senator Dandurand and myself arrived in Geneva, we found that we were not Liberals, Tories or Independents—we were Canadians. The treatment accorded to us by the members of the governing party was all that it could possibly have been. Sir George Foster and myself were treated as well as if we had been Liberals—but we were not and that perhaps is something to be thankful for—and I want to say publicly that I think this government deserves credit, not because they appointed us but because they appointed those who were not of their own party, and having done that they treated us as well as though we had been of their own party.

Until I visited Geneva I was something like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I was not a particular enthusiast for the League of Nations. I believed that it was a cumbersome machine which had in this country some advocates who were not very devoted to the interests of the common folks. This view led me to become skeptical of the work being done, but after my visit I have been convinced that it is accomplishing most excellent results. I would make a suggestion to this government, if they should be the government in power when the next appointments are made, that they send the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). This may seem like a drastic suggestion, but drastic action is necessary. I am sure that he would come back an enthusiast for the league. I found that those who went to scoff remained to pray.

The suggestion has been made that this trip was a joy ride, and I think it was particularly applied to me. I resent that, not because it was applied to me but because it was applied to a Canadian who was acting as a delegate to the League of Nations. If any Canadians have gone to Geneva in the past thinking of their trip as a holiday, they should be severely censured. To learn the workings of the cumbersome machinery of this parliament is not an easy task or one that can be learned rapidly, and it is more difficult to become familiar with the assembly and the committees of the League of Nations.

I would like to offer a few practical suggestions. First of all, I think the government should make the appointments as early as possible, so that those who are appointed may inform themselves on the subjects to be brought before the league. To do that takes considerable reading and time. It seems to me to be rather an insult to the greatness of the work of the league to send people who are ill-prepared. We had almost no time in which to prepare ourselves. There may have been some who had these subjects at their finger tips, but I assure the committee that I was not in that category.

Another suggestion I would make is that the authority should not be centred in the head of the delegation. In making this suggestion I am not insinuating that the gentleman who headed the delegation was not very able or exceptionally well informed, but if the authority was diffused among the members of the delegation and each one made responsible for certain items on the agenda they would then feel a responsibility to inform themselves regarding particular items, and to discharge their duties to a degree which they cannot feel when they are not in the last analysis fully responsible. My next suggestion may amuse the committee, but I think there should be continuity in the delegation. The committee may think that I have a desire to be sent back to Geneva, but it will realize that if the members of this House of Commons were changed every year, with the exception of one or two, there would be considerable difficulty in doing even reasonably good work. New delegates are appointed each year and it is only by the time they have to depart that they are able to learn the run of things.

As Canadians, and particularly as members of this House of Commons, I think we should rid our minds of all thoughts that attending the assembly of the league is a joy ride. I would like to see the Minister of External Affairs attend the assembly of the league each year, but as he is also the Prime Minister, I realize that that would be impossible. However, someone closely attached to the Department of External Affairs and responsible to that department, such as the under secretary, should attend these meetings. Eight prime ministers and twenty ministers of external affairs attended the tenth assembly of the league.

I think that every facility should be granted to acquaint the parliament of Canada and the people of Canada with what the delegates have seen and what they have done.

I think the delegates before they leave Canada should be well acquainted with the mind of the cabinet in regard to the matters appearing upon the agenda. Another necessary qualification for this work is an understanding of the French language. I was never so sorry that I could not speak French as I was when I attended the league this year. It does seem a pity that more Canadians do not become acquainted with our two languages.

I make these suggestions in good faith because I feel that if they are acted upon, the work at Geneva will be vastly improved. We have a tremendous work to do there. We are the only member of the league from the North American continent. When I realized the number of seats held by South America, and the great importance Europe attaches to itself in the work of the league, I was convinced that we have not been living up to our full responsibility to this new community, the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to express my thanks to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for drawing the attention of the house and of the country to the composition of Canada's representation at Geneva at the assembly of the league last year. He drew attention particularly to the fact that the delegation was not composed merely of members of one political party. I think the delegation represented, so far as it was possible so to do, pretty much all shades of opinion in parliament. May I say to the hon. member for Southeast Grey that the government felt that the country as a whole would appreciate there being on the representation from Canada a woman representative, and that we could think of no one who could more appropriately represent the women of Canada than the first woman member in the House of Commons? If there was ever any doubt as to the wisdom of the choice, that doubt was dispelled the moment my hon. friend accepted the invitation, attended the League of Nations and made known her impressions and views with respect to its work. The suggestions which have been made to-night by her are, I think, entirely to the point. They are all of a character that, I believe, should receive and, I may say, will be given very careful attention.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There are two advantages that we may expect to derive from the League of Nations and from the fact that we send representatives there. The first is the contribution which we through our representatives make to the work and the undertakings of the league. As has been suggested, it is very important that those who go there should be well equipped in every way with information in advance as to the agenda, and should be assigned some particular part in the work that is to be done. The other advantage to be derived from sending representatives to the league is the information which is brought back to us and which is disseminated amongst the Canadian people as to the work, objects and accomplishments of the league. When we refer a matter to any committee of the house it is quite in order to expect and receive from that committee a report. While listening to the discussion I was thinking it would be to our advantage if, when these delegates return, we had a report as to the situation as they see it from the Canadian standpoint. So far as I know no such written report has ever been made by the delegates from Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A sixty page report was submitted to parliament more than a month ago.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): From the Canadian delegation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not seen it yet. It has not come to my mail box. That is after all the line along which we shall get the best results, namely, by making known the objects, work and accomplishments of the league and the part which our representatives have taken in its work. If such a report is available it should be given very wide distribution and should be made known to all who are interested in the work of the league.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report was tabled and the announcement thereof appeared in the votes and proceedings. Copies were distributed.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Copies may have been distributed amongst the members, but that is not the distribution I have in mind. I have in mind a much wider distribution than that, because that, after all, will touch only the fringe of the situation and will not reach many organizations and people who are deeply interested in this work.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to endorse the statement made by the hon. member for Leeds as to the interest taken in reports given by members of the delegation to Geneva on their return to Canada and the advisability of a wide distribution of those reports. It was my good fortune last year to be asked to address many meetings on this question, and I always found the people more interested in the proceedings at Geneva and the work of the League of Nations than on any other question. Wherever I had an opportunity to speak to the Canadian people on the matter, they were keenly interested in knowing how the work was conducted, about the people who came from other countries, their objects and particularly their outlook.

One thing that interested them more than anything else was the spirit which is evident at Geneva in the gatherings of the assembly and things of that sort. Sometimes in such conferences as that which is now proceeding in London and that which takes place annually in Geneva in the assembly and council of the league, there is apparently a great deal of talk and not so much work done. The old farm saying, "Much cry and little wool," is, in the minds of some people, applicable, but the same thing is true of every parliamentary gathering. It is unquestionably true of this house.

Mr. MANION: Let the hon. member speak for himself.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am speaking for myself, and I would like to associate my hon. friend with me in speaking for ourselves. This however is more apparent than real. In a gathering such as this, where men and women come from all parts of Canada and their opinions are so diverse, it is necessary to do much talking and to delay proceedings a long time until matters are threshed out. The same thing is true in committees. In Geneva the business is conducted in the same way and according to the same principle but on a much larger scale. There were many women delegates at the assembly last year—

Miss MACPHAIL: Ten.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I thought there were more than that. There were eight or ten on the committee on which I had the pleasure of sitting. As they come from all parts of the world, represent almost all the highly civilized countries, and discuss very important affairs, it is inevitable that much time must be taken in and much thought given to the carrying on of the work of the assembly.

It is not correct to say that the assembly is a holiday in itself. Through the hot weather of the month of September in Geneva, in poorly ventilated halls with very little fresh air coming in, sitting under very difficult circumstances—which will be remedied as soon as the new parliamentary buildings are completed—the delegates stuck to their work, not from three o'clock in the afternoon but from ten o'clock in the morning and in committees for long stretches of time on end. I can assure this committee that anyone who sat in the assembly or in the committees and paid attention to the work that was being carried on certainly worked hard. The parliament of the nations that meets at Geneva is unquestionably becoming the most important political gathering in the world. Canada gets not only the benefit of which the hon. member for Leeds spoke, that is of learning through the delegates what goes on there and how it is done, but also a good deal of benefit from the wholesome advertising she should get and has been able to get all through the years during the ten assemblies of the league. One of the fine things that a Canadian meets in Geneva is the high regard in which this country is held by the assembly of the league and by the men who come there year after year from the various countries. This is due I think to the class of members who have been sent there from the earliest days of the league down to the present time, with due allowance for modesty on the part of some of us who happened to be there on one occasion.

My only regret is that more members of parliament have not been able to go and that I did not know more about the league in previous years and in the session during the year in which it was my good fortune to be asked by the government to be one of the representatives at Geneva. It is well worth while to study the work of the league, to render what assistance we can by word, thought and influence in this country and to keep in touch with the work that is being carried on there. Whenever possible we should endeavour to visit Geneva and see how the work of the nations is being conducted. It is a big thing, a growing thing. The spirit that is evident at Geneva is extremely strong. I had never had an opportunity before to realize how necessary and wise it was for men and women to talk and work and keep on talking and working even when apparently they were not coming to a solution of their difficulties. I happened to be on the fifth committee, which dealt, amongst other things, with narcotics. During the first meeting of the committee the delegates of certain countries in Europe made statements that their governments had last year voluntarily instructed the manufacturers of narcotics that they must cut down their output to a certain figure. They did this voluntarily. The Canadian delegation thought that this would be a good time to introduce a resolution looking to a conference of all the manufacturing countries, with perhaps some of the victim countries, in order to secure a limitation of the manufacture of narcotics, and then ration them in order to avoid suffering on the part of those who needed them, and avoid also the contraband manufacturing of narcotics. The Canadian delegation announced to the British delegation that they had this in mind. The British delegation had introducted a resolution of that character five years before, but had not succeeded in getting it passed. It was evident that the British delegation wished to reintroduce such a resolution at that time, and in cooperation with the Canadian delegation the resolution was introduced. At sitting after sitting of the committee that question was fought over. Everybody wanted to do something about it, but it was difficult to come to an agreement as to terms. The resolution was moved and many amendments were considered. At times it looked to some of the delegates from other countries that the situation was hopeless. But finally, after a drafting committee had been appointed, and had done much work, a solution was arrived at; a resolution was passed unanimously calling for a conference, to be held shortly, of all the manufacturing nations, with at least an equal number of the victim nations, in order to secure a reduction in the manufacture of narcotics and their rationing so as not to increase the price, and also to take steps to guard against what happened in this country in connection with a reduction in the manufacturing of another article, and its subsequent illicit manufacture and sale. My experience on that committee indicated the wisdom and the necessity of continued discussion with a view to reaching an amicable solution. Of course, that is not new; we do it in committees of this house all the time, and much of the important work of the League of Nations is done in committees, just as is the case in this parliament.

Mr. GEARY: When we come to the next vote we shall find an item that seems to have been overlooked by a number of those who have spoken. In addition to the publications of the League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament, we subscribe for the publications of the Empire Parliamentary Association. These reports and publications come to our letter boxes in such numbers that unless one follows them closely he is very likely to pass over them. But as the hon. member for Southeast Grey will agree, it is not difficult, if one takes advantage of what is offered just in these publications of the League of Nations and of the Empire Parliamentary Association, to keep fairly well abreast of the general current of affairs, and at least to know what is going on and what is going to be dealt with by the league in the assembly and otherwise. I think that that is money well spent. Perhaps I am a little ahead, Mr. Chairman, in discussing that vote.

We have a League of Nations society in Canada, which is doing its best to increase its membership. It has a publication called Interdependence. If the people of this country only realized it, there are publications available which will enable anybody who chooses to take advantage of them to keep fairly well abreast of what is going on in the league. Up until the last ten years we probably took more of an academic interest in these matters because we were a little far afield, but since the war we have been drawn more into the current of events and we feel somewhat of the interest the Britisher is bound to have every day he reads of foreign affairs in his morning paper. I do not think that the press in Canada up to the last two or three years have carried items of foreign news to any great extent and it is not to be wondered at that the people of Canada have not felt bound to take a great deal of interest in foreign affairs. But the great war brought us into the swirl of events, and as time goes on we shall be drawn farther afield than we have been up to this time.

I am very glad to have heard what my hon. friend from Southeast Grey has said about the league and her experiences there. I should like to say that that is no different from any other trip. If one wants to work, one works; and if one wants to make a joyride of it, one can do so. The League of Nations being of the importance it is, and Canada taking part in it to the great extent it does, I would not for a moment consider cutting down our activities in that regard, but rather I think we should seek to further our connection with the work.

Mr. MANION: I wish to say a word or two on a question not dealing with the league at all, but dealing with external affairs. It is of some importance, and perhaps may be said on this item as well as on any other.

There is an organization called the Parliamentary Economic Conference which, except for the interval of the war, has been meeting yearly for the past twenty or twenty-five years. Last fall it met in Berlin, Germany, and some sixty-two or sixty-three countries were represented. The majority of the representatives pay their own expenses. I am not suggesting that this is an opportunity for this government or any government to spend more money. I am pointing out that it is an economic conference of a good deal of importance, attended by some sixty-two countries. At the last meeting Great Britain had some twenty-five representatives. Canada had no representative present; at least, she would not have had a representative had not a member of this house of parliament been in London at that time and been asked by Sir Howard d'Egville, the secretary of the Empire Parliamentary Association, to represent Canada. He hesitated to go, pointing out that he was not even a supporter of the government, but it was represented to him that this was a parliamentary organization that had nothing to do with governments and was not political in any way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who was the representative?

Mr. MANION: I was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was not the Minister of National Revenue present at that conference?

Mr. MANION: No, there was no other representative of Canada present, and I went only incidentally. I had not intended to mention my name until the Prime Minister asked for it.

The Parliamentary Economic Conference is a business organization dealing, for instance, with such subjects as the rationalization of industry and matters of that kind. It covers a large field. It is an organization which should be attended by business men, and I am sure that we have in this country outstanding business men who would be glad to represent Canada at the annual meeting of that conference. It is, I think, of some importance. I do not know that it would be of any great value, except that it would have its value in contacts and in a certain amount of advertising for our country, so many countries being represented at the conference. As I said, Great Britain had twenty-five delegates, and there were also representatives from Japan and various other countries. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that it might be well for the Department of External Affairs to get in touch with Sir Howard d'Egville and see if Canada cannot be represented at future conferences, not at the expense of this country at all, but by prominent business men of Canada who would be glad to attend at their own expense. Most of the representatives of Great Britain went at their own expense. While some of the countries pay the expenses of their delegates, I think the majority do not. I offer that suggestion for the consideration of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to give the details making up the item of $21,000 for expenses of the Canadian delegates to the assembly?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These were travelling and other incidental expenses. I do not appear to have them in detail.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot find the amounts to each delegate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will appear in the Auditor General's report for the different years.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should like to get the information. I may not be careful enough in searching, but I cannot find the information. I should like to know how the $21,000 is split up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: About two-thirds of the expense is incurred in connection with the work of the assembly and about one-third in connection with the work of the council and the commissions. There are travelling expenses, hotel expenses, and other incidental expenses.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I really must request an answer, because vote 245 is set out as:

Expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly, council and commissions of the League of Nations, $21,000.

I want to know who were the delegates and how much was paid to each one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The delegates were the Right Hon. Sir George Foster, the Hon. Philippe Roy, Miss Agnes Macphail, M.P. and Mr. Malcolm McLean, M.P. Probably I should have mentioned first Hon. Senator Dandurand, Hon. J. C. Elliott, and Hon. W. D. Euler. They composed the delegation to the last assembly. I cannot say at the moment who the delegates to the next assembly will be. Their expenses altogether amount to $12,000.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should like to know how those expenses are distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As near as I can give my hon. friend the particulars, the expenses were: Senator Dandurand, $2,500; Hon. J. C. Elliott, $2,515.93; Hon. W. D. Euler, $2,000; Sir George Foster, $1,680; Hon. Philippe Roy, $846;—of course Mr. Roy was in Europe at the time—Miss Agnes Macphail, $1,658; Mr. Malcolm McLean, $1,817. With respect to the expenses of the three ministers the first mentioned I may say that in connection with the work of the league a custom prevails whereby each country extends some form of hospitality to representatives of other nations, the expenses incurred in connection therewith so far as Canada is concerned are distributed amongst the ministers who represent Canada. That would account for the larger amounts charged against the ministers as compared with the other delegates.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before we pass from external affairs, although it does not come directly under this item, would the Prime Minister give us a statement with regard to our present relationship to Russia? How far have we established connections now that relations have been established between Great Britain and Russia? To be more specific, if, for example, a Canadian wishes to go to Russia can he obtain a passport here, or must he obtain it through the British authorities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as relations between Canada and Russia are concerned, they are similar to those existing between Canada and any other country, other than those in which we have legations. We have legations only in the United States, France, and Japan; we have not legations, in nor do we receive diplomatic representatives from, any other countries than those three. Russia in that regard is in exactly the same relationship to Canada as, say, Italy or Austria or Germany.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did we not break our relationship with Russia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There had been a special diplomatic privilege given to Russia. That was discontinued. Russia at that time under a special treaty negotiated with Great Britain to which this country had become a party, had a position of advantage, diplomatically, relative to that granted to any other country. A change was made in that regard. as my hon. friend knows, when the treaty was abrogated. That, however, has left Russia, so far as receiving diplomatic missions by Canada is concerned, simply in the same position as any other country, save the three I have mentioned. If any one from Canada wishes to visit Russia he can obtain a passport from the passport office at Ottawa. To admit him to Russia, it would have to be viséd, I believe, by Russian authorities.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is Russia represented at the League of Nations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think not.

Mr. MANION: I understood the leader of the opposition wished one item to be held over

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the next item.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Regarding this particular item, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) suggested there should be a wider distribution of literature with respect to the league. I know of no way in which it can be done more effectively than by the League of Nations Society. Ordinary membership of the society costs only a dollar a year, but that does not pay the expenses incident to distributing the bulletins and other papers sent out to the ordinary members. The more help the government gives to the society the more they will be able to distribute this literature to their ordinary members. That is the cheapest and simplest way of securing that distribution.
