There is the situation, Mr. Chairman, concerning the general economic picture of the maritimes and the relative position of agriculture in that picture. That situation is a challenge, a challenge to the responsibility of both federal and provincial authorities, and a challenge to the initiative of the people themselves. We speak with great emphasis at this time of the urgency of developing industry in our part of the country. With that I fully agree. While proceeding in this direction, however, we should make sure that our efforts show balance and co-ordination. A more highly developed agricultural production in accordance with the domestic needs of our local population should be of the essence of a vigorous program toward the goal I have mentioned.

I urge the federal government, through the extended facilities of the Department of Agriculture, to take the lead in giving to the maritime provinces a prosperous and self-sufficient agriculture to meet the needs of the population. When this is achieved I can assure the government that we will have gone a long way toward solving one of the most crucial economic problems of the maritime provinces, namely, unemployment.

I think we can already point to certain successful enterprises in the agricultural field in the maritimes where there has been a departure from traditional farm practices. In the co-operative field, for instance, the maritime co-operative services is proving a distinct success, while in the field of private endeavour there are Canada Foods Limited at Kentville, Nova Scotia, and Groves Limited at Berwick, Nova Scotia, which are operating important fruit and vegetable canning businesses. At Hartland, New Brunswick, there is the McCairn Foods Limited which is operating a successful fruit and vegetable processing plant. I think there are also similar plants in operation in other parts of the maritime provinces. We have also heard in the maritimes of the co-operative enterprise by Nova Scotia farmers to build an abattoir at Halifax. As a distinct result of that project, farmers in that province have already been urged to increase their hog production.

This is but an indication of what could result in every other field of farm production if facilities were made available on a more general basis to maritime farm people. Let us therefore put our heads together with a view to contriving more intensive and more flexible farming practices in order to attain an agricultural production in the maritime provinces which will at least be sufficient to meet the needs of our local population.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I listened very attentively to the statement made earlier this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) regarding support prices on dairy products. That statement is of great interest to farmers in the maritimes because, as I have indicated, dairying is the very backbone of agriculture in the maritimes. And I am sure that dairy farmers will be pleased to hear that the government intends to maintain at 64 cents a pound the support price on butter production.

A certain amount of cheese is also produced in the maritimes. So the minister's statement should cause no trouble in the cheese industry.

However I hardly expect milk powder producers to be as enthusiastic over the statement made by the minister this afternoon. I know that certain plants have just completed large alterations and expanded their facilities for the production of milk powder; and I am sure the minister's statement will be quite a blow to those people.

[Mr. Michaud]

It seems to me that when the Department of Agriculture or the government are contemplating a move such as was announced this afternoon, they should give advance notice to interested parties so as to spare them the difficulties they will now have to face.

(Text):

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to spend a few moments referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia about the way in which western members had betrayed western Canada. I am sorry that the hon. member is not in his seat, but if his colleague would care to go up and get him I would be glad to repeat my remarks while he is in the chamber, because I would prefer he was in the house at the time I am making them.

I can assure the committee that I have not betrayed either my constituents or western Canada. I still live on my farm and in my constituency. I did not leave my people and move to Ottawa. I am still living there with my people. But it seems to me that ever since we came into this house we have had to listen to irresponsible remarks by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

We have only been in power for one year. During that period, however, this government has enacted the Agricultural Stabilization Act. It has amended the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It has also amended the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, made a start on the South Saskatchewan dam project, has amended the P.F.A.A. and authorized subsidiary payments to western grain growers. Prairie farm assistance amounted to $25 million; acreage payments amounted to $41,300,000; the surplus disposal plan for wheat, to $35 million; interest on cash advances, $1 million, and storage charges, $37 million; a total of $139,300,000. And yet we have these irresponsible people in the C.C.F. group getting up and saying we have done nothing. I wonder why they do not take the trouble to look over the figures.

We have today a Prime Minister who knows more about the troubles of western Canada than any previous prime minister. He has representatives here from the farms of western Canada working together with him. We do not meet the press every day with a bunch of irresponsible remarks, but we are working, together with the Prime Minister, for the betterment of agriculture and for the betterment of this country. It is time the people realized what is going on instead of listening to the bunch of rubbish put out by the C.C.F. along the lines of what we hear every day.

The C.C.F. group supports deficiency payments. They are in favour of everything. If we were to give agriculture $5,000, they would give $10,000. If we were to give $5 million, they would give $25 million. They are irresponsible. They have no responsibility to Canada, and they never will have. It is time they realized this themselves. The hon. member for Bow River suggested that the C.C.F. and the C.L.C. would be married off. That would be a sad thing to take place, because if it did it would be too bad for the farmers of western Canada; they would be playing the role of the unwilling bride in that marriage.

Now with regard to deficiency payments. They say we are against it. I am not against deficiency payments. Nobody would be better off than myself because I would get a cheque for $4,500 and my neighbour probably one for $500 or $600. That would be a great sin, would it not? We got last year $41 million to take out west and if we divided it up like a deficiency payment, how much would the small farmer get? Twenty-five per cent of the producers would get 75 per cent of the money. Then they brought down a brief and they want us to go back to 1955, 1956, 1957. Is that the responsibility of this government when the Liberals were in power and the C.C.F. from the western provinces were down here? It is not our responsibility to rectify those mistakes made by the representatives of the people of western Canada in those years.

Then there was talk of betrayal, that we betrayed western Canada. I will tell you who betrayed western Canada. It was Jack Wesson and the Saskatchewan wheat pool. In 1946, Wesson and the Saskatchewan wheat pool put pressure on the government to sign the British wheat agreement. The C.C.F. and the worthy member for Assiniboia were in favour of signing that agreement. When my colleague, the minister of northern affairs, accused them of this the other day, finally the member for Assiniboia said that was not true. Let us go back to the 1946 Hansard when they were discussing the British wheat agreement, and we see the hon. member for Assiniboia speaking, as reported on page 4839 of Hansard of August 15, 1946. He said:

> I agree with the leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell) who stated that we in this party welcome the agreement.

Then we turn over the page and see the member for Assiniboia again speaking. He said as reported on page 4841:

> I welcome the wheat agreement.

That wheat agreement cost the western farmers over $600 million, and now they want this government to give it all back in one year.

We had the march on Ottawa which was carried out very respectably. Why did they not march in 1955 or 1956? It was a different government then and there were a lot of C.C.F. members from Saskatchewan who were interested. No, they said they would wait. Then this year they decided to come down here. They said, "This Diefenbaker government is bringing in a lot of legislation and things will look tough for us, so let's get down there." We are supposed to believe that every member of that delegation was in agreement with deficiency payments. They were not. They came to present to the government and the people of this country the troubles of the farmers of western Canada, and a good 50 per cent of them were satisfied with the acreage payments if only we would pay just a little more. The payment last year was rather small. I had over 21 delegates from my constituency, and out of those 21 there was only one delegate who demanded deficiency payments. But he left, and he left in good spirits and in agreement with me. The rest of my delegates said that they were fairly well satisfied with what we were doing but they were still in trouble. I know they are in trouble in the west, because I am a farmer. They do not need to tell me that. I know we are in trouble because I am a farmer myself.

Then what happened? The march ended in Ottawa; they got off at the station and the member for Rosthern mentioned the greeting they had. Well, Mr. Chairman, my good friend the other night mentioned that there was an eight-ring circus down there. If you, sir, had been down at the station that morning you would have seen it in full force. The Minister of Agriculture was there; the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was there; the Minister of Trade and Commerce was there; and a lot of western members were there. But we were standing back in the station not to embarrass these farmers coming to Ottawa. However, this eight-ring circus was going on. The member for Assiniboia was down by the door; the fat man was there, the thin man was there and they were carrying big C.C.F. signs. I watched those farmers come from the station and a lot of them dropped their heads to get by the ring leader at the door because they were ashamed of any political affiliation with their march on Ottawa. They did not want that. Then we got reports in the newspapers next day about how the C.C.F. met them at the station and it looked like a C.C.F. delegation all the way. Those farmers from western Canada did not want publicity like that. The hon. member for Assiniboia told us how they were pleased about this reception in the committee room. I met a great number of the delegates, and I am telling you, sir, that they were ashamed of that performance at the station, every one of them.

This is some of the publicity. This is what took place. This is from Victor Mackie, the Ottawa correspondent for the Winnipeg Free Press. He had this to say:

> A C.C.F.-hired brass band played Happy Days Are Here Again.
> As delegates began to enter the station from the first train. C.C.F. members of parliament also outjockeyed the cabinet ministers for positions in what amounted to an informal receiving line.
> C.C.F. house leader Hazen Argue commented to a reporter.

Mr. Chairman, that march was not fun. That march was business. Those farmers from western Canada had come down to Ottawa to present to parliament their problems. They were not down for fun but on business. I had a very good meeting with all my delegates. But what happened when they got home? You can see what happened from the papers. Such paper reports as that we need to educate the western members; that eastern members are all right; but I would like to put on record for my own constituency, with your permission, a letter from the Vermilion Board of Trade which says:

> Dear Mr. Smallwood:
> Mr. Karl Marklund, one of the farmer delegates from this district who visited Ottawa recently, addressed our board of trade at its meeting on the 25th of March and gave a very interesting account of the reception the delegates received at Ottawa.
> Mr. Marklund was particularly warm in his praise of the cordial reception you gave to the members of the delegation from this district and others from the west. He stated you "went all out" to assist them to meet various members of the government and they felt you were a good man for the west.
> At the conclusion of Mr. Marklund's remarks our board passed a resolution of appreciation to you, which I hereby convey in this letter.

From another part of my constituency, the F.U.A. wrote me this letter:

> Dear Mr. Smallwood:
> I wish to inform you of a motion passed at our last F.U.A. meeting..... The motion expressed our appreciation for your continued efforts to put forward legislation beneficial to "western agriculture".
> Yours truly,
> Mrs. George N. Osness,
> Secretary.

That is what our farmers in Alberta think of the members down here, yet we have to read all this rubbish which appears in the press because the press are misinformed.

[Mr. Smallwood.]

Mr. Chairman, I did miss one point I wanted to make. The C.C.F. agree with everything in the brief. We agree with deficiency payments and the brief, and I would like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, to go back to what the C.C.F. member from Port Arthur said. As I say, we agree with everything in this brief. We agree; oh, yes, we agree with everything in the brief. The hon. member for Rosthern who recently participated in this debate referred to the payment of $4,500. But let us examine what was said by the hon. member for Port Arthur as reported at page 2732 of Hansard of April 15, 1959:

> As I understand it, we supported the position taken in the brief, which would be a maximum of $1,500.

The hon. member is apparently under the impression that there is a maximum payment of $1,500. But that was for one year and must be multiplied by three which gives a total of $4,500. That illustrates the kind of thinking of which C.C.F. members are guilty of.

I have in my hand a publication called The Western Producer. In my opinion it would be more appropriately entitled, "The Wesson Producer". It is interesting to note that this publication suffered a deficit last year of nearly $160,000. The Saskatchewan wheat pool owns it and this illustrates how they run their business. I am prepared to make another prediction. If hon. gentlemen pick up a copy of this publication next week they will see that it contains an editorial about me.

I am down here working for the family farmer. I am a grain farmer and a mixed farmer. I am in Ottawa to work for the farmer of Canada and of the west.

I should now like to turn to a problem of great concern to the farmer of western Canada. The government expended $139 million on agriculture last year putting it in the hands of western farmers but we still find ourselves caught in a cost price squeeze. Let me place some comparative figures on the record. A combine which cost $5,600 in 1953 cost $9,000 in 1958. An Ontario farmer friend of mine bought a manure spreader for $350 in 1953 and in 1958 the same unit cost $700. A tractor which cost $4,600 in 1953, cost $6,500 in 1958. Freight charges on a tractor in 1948 were $96.47, in 1957 $201.78 and in 1959, $235.41. These examples serve to illustrate the difficulty the farmer experiences in equipping himself for his operation and it must be observed that throughout the period to which I referred during which prices continued to climb, the farmer's income constantly decreased.

The price of grain has not increased. Last year it might have gone up 10 cents a bushel due to better grades but since 1953 it has shown no substantial increase and in fact it has been continually declining. Western farmers are caught in the grip of a vicious cost price squeeze. Western farmers are told that they do not need to buy new machinery. How can we repair our old machinery in view of increasing costs and dwindling returns? I have not many examples of increased prices of repairs to machinery but I might state that a Massey-Harris disc spool which cost $2.25 in 1953 cost $4.35 in 1958. That is what the western farmer is up against today. The price of everything we require is increasing due to freight rates and other things but our products have not increased in price.

I would define a family farmer as a man with a small section of land. Let me give an illustration concerning a farm family on one section of land with 500 acres under cultivation. The farmer is allowed to sell on a 6 bushel quota and would therefore sell 3,000 bushels. For this he would receive a price of perhaps $1.20 per bushel, or $3,600. As against this he must make the following expenditures in round figures: taxes, $600; fuel, $500; casual help, $200; seed and fertilizer, $500; the payment on his farm, $1,200; and estimated repairs on machinery, $600, giving a total of $3,400. If $3,400 is subtracted from $3,600 it is evident that the farmer has only $200 left. That represents his profit on his grain farming for the year. Although it is necessary for a farmer today to raise this grain and to engage in mixed farming, I feel it is unfair that he should be expected to produce this grain with so little return on his operation. In giving the illustration above I did not take into consideration the many small items on which a grain farmer would be required to spend money. The only way a farmer can exist in the west is to go into mixed farming but he should get a greater return on producing grain. These are problems for which adequate solutions must be found.

We must also protect the farm family from contract farming. This is gaining popularity in the pig industry and others. In my constituency last year I would say between 700 and 800 turkeys were raised in the entire area. When I left to come to Ottawa there were four farmers who had 8,000 turkeys. That is just an example of what is taking place. It is the responsibility of this government to find solutions to these difficulties.

In both the east and west I know there are farmers who are becoming too old to remain engaged in active farming and who would like to turn over their farms to younger people. There are many young men coming along who are eager to engage in farming but who have not sufficient capital to acquire a farm. I urge this government to consider the possibility of introducing legislation under which extended credit and long term loans would be made to young farmers to assist them in becoming established in farming. I hope this government will continue the acreage payment the same as last year. It was of some assistance but it was not large enough last year.

It is a sad situation in western Canada today to observe that on a loaf of bread costing 20 cents or 22 cents, that western farmer receives only 3.2 cents. In Alberta a year ago we had bread being shipped by train. One day one of the bakers decided to start something new and so he sent the bread on a truck and put it on the road. Another baker and then another decided to follow suit and so the trend developed. Not being satisfied with that they decided to put large trucks on the road and they hired additional men to drive the trucks. At the first of this year they decided they could not make enough money doing that so the price of bread was increased by 2 cents a loaf in Alberta. The western farmer received no benefit from this increase. I request that the government conduct an inquiry into bakery combines in Canada with a view to exploring their operations and having the western farmer receive a fair return on his grain growing operation to assist him to overcome the cost price squeeze in which he is caught, in other words a two price system.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the hon. member who just resumed his seat and who classified himself as a mixed up farmer, I cannot resist commenting that if one had a fairly weak stomach one might have had some difficulty in keeping the contents down during the course of his remarks. I do not intend to make any comment on the references made by the hon. member to my good friend the hon. member for Assiniboia. I will let him answer the vilifying remarks and character assassination in which the hon. member engaged in the last few moments. I feel that the personal integrity of the member for Assiniboia has been slandered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Hon. gentlemen opposite treat that as a joke. I expect that they look upon most other serious matters as a joke, too, and especially problems concerning farmers.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You tell them all about it; you are a big farmer.

Mr. Lambert: You know so much about it, of course.

Mr. Howard: About what?

Mr. Lambert: The problems of farmers.

Mr. Argue: When are you going to make your speech?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Did the hon. member for Assiniboia write your speech?

Mr. Howard: The difficulty at moments like this is that hon. gentlemen opposite are so eager to snatch an opportunity to say something that they jump all at once and it is impossible to make sense of their remarks and determine if any are deserving of comment. They all jump at a chance to speak and it is impossible to sort out the confused chorus that results.

We have been discussing the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture for approximately four or five days. It would seem to me that the length of the debate would certainly indicate that there is something basically wrong with the attitude of the government toward the farming people. We have had references to the farming problems of the people of the maritime provinces, of Ontario and the prairie provinces, and some reference to the farming people of the province of British Columbia. Many members have entered into the debate. That itself should indicate that everything had not been solved by the Minister of Agriculture and by his friend the Prime Minister.

We have heard some reference to the delegation of farmers who were here recently from the prairie provinces and the reason why the farm delegation was here. I would suggest that the basic difficulty is that they require and need for their own sustenance a fair share of the national wealth. That is primarily what they were interested in. Hon. members on the government side can confuse it as to which way is the best way of doing it, by deficiency payments, by dollar payments per acre on a handout basis, or in other ways, but the basic problem is that they have not sufficient income to maintain themselves, their families and their farms and to keep them up. Obviously, something is wrong or 1,100 to 1,200 farming people from the prairie provinces would not have come here carrying with them a petition signed by over 300,000 people. Surely, they could not have just come down for the trip, as has been indicated by some hon. members.

These complaints that we hear, Mr. Chairman, about the participation of the C.C.F. in providing some sort of welcome for them as they got off the train are very amusing. I suggest it is nothing more than jealousy and sour grapes on the part of hon. members who are evincing nothing today but old Toryism. How many Conservative members were there? I know no one will admit it, of course, but the Conservative members expressed this thought the following morning —and I heard some of them say it—"Gee, I wish we had thought of something like that".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: All right.

Mr. Ricard: Imagination.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps my friends the Conservatives wished they were like the Liberals who did not have anybody there at all.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true.

Mr. Howard: I will say this. The C.C.F. were there, certainly, out in the open with placards, in a sincere, warm way—

An hon. Member: With bands.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says "with bands" but what we did not do was put on a booze party for them.

Mr. Ricard: You had no money.

Mr. Howard: Neither did you give them anything else, and you do not intend to. We did not pour out the liquor; we did not cart them into a back room and try to push aside their complaints and say, "Never mind about the problems of the farmers; have another drink; have another shot of scotch or rye", or whatever it was they had, no sir.

Mr. Henderson: Pretty cheap.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says, "cheap politics". He ought to know about cheap politics; he is sitting in a government with over 200 cheap politicians.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might reconsider that remark.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will reconsider it. I thank you for suggesting it and I hope that your suggestion that I reconsider it will be applied to the hon. member who made the interjection in the first instance; for I am sure that rulings of the Chair must be equally applicable to all members in the house.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Argue: Shame on an equal ruling?

Mr. Howard: That is Toryism for you. They want this ruling to apply to one hon. member but not to somebody else. To those people who raise complaints about the farm delegation and about the participation by the C.C.F., I say again it is nothing but sour grapes and jealousy, and they are promoting this day after day, that farmers did not come down here wanting anything. They did not have any problems when they came here. That is what they are telling us. They do not want any fair share of the national wealth of the country. This is what the Tories tell us. They came down, the 1,100 or 1,200 farmers, on some sort of a holiday with a petition signed by over 300,000 people. This sour grapes and jealousy attitude is in my opinion merely designed to cover up their own inadequacies.

I spoke to a number of people who were here. I suppose every hon. member did. Apparently they broke up into small subcommittees of half a dozen, or something of that nature, and visited every member of parliament and discussed their problems with them. I would say that the general attitude that I obtained from them by the expressions of the ones to whom I spoke indicated that they were utterly disgusted with the Tories who came from the prairie provinces. They were of the opinion that a great number—I am not saying all, naturally it does not apply to all—of the Conservative members of parliament from the prairie provinces are nothing more than apologists for the Minister of Agriculture, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with no great desire to do anything concrete about it, but merely to raise all those side issues about the delegation that came here not wanting something, confusing the issue and hoping that the people will forget about it and John will not have to live up to his promises.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is nothing but a bunch of lies.

Mr. Howard: Did you hear that, Mr. Chairman? As I understood the comment, it was that it was nothing but a bunch of lies.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I agree with the hon. member for Skeena that that is not a parliamentary expression. I would not like to hear it again in the house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think the remark is on Hansard but if it is, the hon. member should withdraw the remark.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will withdraw the remark if it is on Hansard; but the hon. member stated that the majority of the delegation were amazed at the opinions of the western members and at what they were doing down here. He implied that they were doing nothing for western Canada, which is not true.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members can have their points of view, of course.

Mr. Howard: I did not want to insist that the hon. member withdraw the remark. I merely drew it to your attention; but even if he withdraws it he still thinks it, and what is the difference? Whether he is made to withdraw it because of the rules he still carries the same misapprehension in his mind. Calling someone a liar is no substitute for a desire to resolve differences of opinion.

I should like to deal with another matter confronting agricultural people. This matter has gained a considerable amount of prominence both here and in the United States in recent years. It is commonly referred to as vertical integration or contract farming. We have seen substantially this same process develop over the years in other phases of our economy. It is something that is not confined to the agricultural industry or to farmers. For instance, we have seen it develop on the west coast in the fishing industry. I am sure, because of my talks with people from the maritimes, that the same condition exists there. We have seen the same process of vertical integration developing substantially in the logging industry on the west coast where slowly and slowly the small entrepreneur, the small logger, the small operator, had less and less chance to participate in running his own affairs, in running his own business, which was slowly and slowly gobbled up and more control exercised over the operations by larger and larger concerns. This is substantially, I say, what is happening in vertical integration in the agricultural section of our economy.

Slowly these forces, in my opinion, will put many farmers in substantially the same position, although probably not to the same degree and with the same humiliation, as were the sharecroppers in the cotton fields of the United States. There is this slow loss of control over their own destiny, a slow loss of control over the farmer's own right to produce what he thinks should be produced and what he is able to market, a slow loss of control over free marketing and eventually the possibility of loss of ownership of his own buildings and his own land. If this process of vertical integration is allowed to continue unabated the farmer could very easily find himself in the same position as the wage earner, possessing only his own muscular and mental ability but having no ownership of property, land, buildings and equipment.

I hear more smart aleck remarks. I would rather they were made in a loud enough voice for me to hear them although at the same time I know that when hon. members make them they are violating the rules. The government's policy in this respect apparently is to let this process continue, to allow the farmer slowly to lose control over the things he has held dear to him for so many years and to allow the farmer's control of his right to produce what he wants, control of his right to market as he wants, control of his own destiny to filter into the hands of a few small groups of people, many of whom are not even resident in Canada and have no intention of becoming residents of Canada.

I am of the opinion that this can be overcome to a degree in the same way it has been overcome in other sections of the economy. It can be overcome to a degree through the development of co-operatives whereby the farmer will have control over his own vertical integration system, control over his own contract and farming arrangements. Another way is through regulation of private financial and industrial concerns to ensure, in so far as farmers are affected by the activities of such concerns, that the farmers will get the squarest possible deal and will not be placed under the control of somebody else.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate I should like to say a few words about the Minister of Agriculture himself. His constituency adjoins mine, and no matter what side of the house we may be on I think that as members of parliament and representatives of the people of Canada we will all agree that the portfolio of agriculture is not an easy one. The big trouble in dealing with agriculture is that it is like the seven blind men feeling various parts of the elephant which all feel different to them. Agriculture covers so many different items, so many different crops, so many different phases that when you cure one problem you may aggravate something else.

I certainly do not want to get into an argument with the last speaker but he mentioned that there had been a lot said in this debate and he thought there must be something wrong. I would say there is nothing wrong and as a member from western Canada I say there should be a lot of words spoken about agriculture because that is our primary industry. That is how all of us make a living because when the farmer in western Canada does well the businessmen of western Canada also do well.

I should like to deal with a few things that concern my province and constituency having to do with a phase of agriculture called ranching. Sometimes Albertans are accused of being a lot like Texans but they can boast about having some of the finest ranches in Canada. I can tell members who have not visited the area that in the foothhills of the Rocky mountains they will find some of the finest herds of cattle you will see anywhere in Canada and a pound of beef can probably be produced cheaper there than anywhere else in Canada because in many places the cattle can graze all year round.

Therefore, when legislation is brought in or a program is suggested with reference to the production of cattle, what may apply to one section of the country may not apply to another. In many places in Canada, even in some sections of Alberta, cattle have to be barn fed for six or seven months of the year. The people who have to barn feed their cattle are faced with tough competition from the rancher because the rancher's cattle can graze for most of the year.

There is one matter that is of considerable concern to Alberta ranchers at this time, and that is what may happen as a result of diversification in farming. I have discussed the matter with ranchers and many members have suggested that the farmers of western Canada should diversify their production. In the process of diversification many of them have gone into raising cattle. In the last two years at least we have been very fortunate to have a good market for our cattle in the United States. This means, of course, that every ranch is producing every pound of beef possible and where there has been diversification on farms there is also a lot of beef being produced.

There is always a danger when there is overproduction and there is the problem of what will happen if the United States market is cut off. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe referred to the situation when our market for cattle in the United States was cut off in 1920 and 1930. We know exactly what happened to cattle prices in Canada. It is a source of anxiety to the ranchers and other cattle producers of Canada to know that if this market is cut off they will be faced with an immediate problem. However, it bears repeating to refer again to the stabilization legislation. It is sometimes underemphasized that under that legislation there are two price levels. One price is written right into the act and cannot be changed except by act of parliament. It is provided right in the act that the price will never fall below 80 per cent of a 10-year moving average. That is a matter of law and cannot be changed. Then there is the other level which comes into effect when a price level is set for a product by the stabilization board. That has given the ranchers and other cattle producers of Alberta stability and security in their industry and it is something that I think should be mentioned.

There is one thing that I should like to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and also to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Members of parliament will have read about the recent case in British Columbia, I believe, in which the wheat board act and the regulations were interpreted to mean that wheat could not be sold by one farmer in one province to another farmer in another province. This has worked certain hardship, particularly in the case of those farmers who live near the border between Saskatchewan and Alberta. Some of the wheat which cannot be sold under the quota system is sold for feed and bought by feeders of cattle and in that way the surplus is being depleted. But under the wheat board regulations it is legally impossible to sell wheat from one province to another without at least the consent of the wheat board or rather through the wheat board. That is one of the big problems and I think it should be looked into because it does seem that when we provide certain protection for an industry by legislation problems always arise.

The wheat board is not new, of course, because the board was created by this party the last time it was in power, but I always think that new legislation is like a new baby. There are certain changes that must take place. I should like to make this suggestion in respect of this legislation without wanting in any way to harm the sytsem itself whereby the wheat farmer is protected. Perhaps some system could be worked out whereby the law and these regulations could be amended to enable a farmer in one province to sell grain to a farmer in another province. I know of a case in which a man in Saskatchewan wanted to sell wheat to his brother-in-law in Alberta who was producing beef. These regulations made such a transaction impossible. This is one suggestion I make, that the law and the regulations should be amended so that they would not work a hardship on anyone.

Now, returning to my constituency, I would say that when we leave the ranching district we move into the grain producing area. We then meet the problems that have been discussed here. Hundreds of words have been said about wheat. I think George Brittnel, a professor at Saskatchewan, wrote a book on wheat, called "More about Wheat". Perhaps if everyone read it there would not be so many words said about wheat. I should like to say, when dealing with the wheat farmer, that the main problem is moving the surplus wheat from the farm to the markets themselves. It does not matter how you pay out the subsidies. After all, the most important thing is to be able to market the commodity at reasonable prices.

I think I have the honour of representing the district in which the two master farmers of Alberta reside. This part of the Bow River constituency is a great wheat producing area. One of the big problems is to get the grain off the farm into the market. One of the problems the farmers have met in this connection is the distribution of box cars. This particular government set up a commission to investigate the distribution of box cars. I have always been amazed by the fact that one of the largest crops western Canada produced in 1928—there were only two other crops to compete with that record—which was between 500 million and 600 million bushels, was transported to market without too much difficulty. There seemed to be plenty of box cars in 1928 to take the whole crop. It seems to me that today there is some aspect of this problem which we have been overlooking. Surely there is sufficient railway equipment today to enable us to get all the wheat off the farms quicker than we have been doing in the past few years.

If these large farmers could get their wheat to market, even if they could fill their quotas on time, then they would have the necessary capital with which to finance their farm operations. I feel that whatever findings this commission makes, the distribution of box cars is a very important item and that is why I have mentioned it. The supply of box cars to the country sidings should be speeded up.

I have heard a lot of members say a lot of things about agriculture, but it does seem to me that the crux of the whole problem can be set forth in a simple formula. How much will a bushel of wheat or a pound of beef buy? One of the big problems today is the cost of production. I wrote one of the farmers in the Bow River constituency for a list of the equipment which he has on the farm. He is farming 1,500 acres of land and he has equipment which was purchased anywhere from 1947 up to the present. He uses all this equipment because he is a very efficient farmer; he is one of the master farmers in Alberta. The cost of the equipment he has, based on the cost price at the time of purchase, amounts to $37,493.40. If he went to the market today to buy that same equipment it would cost him $57,500. This illustrates one of the problems. If you consider the cost of that equipment at 1953 prices you will find the cost would be about $30,000, whereas in 1958 the cost would jump to $57,000. The cost of farm machinery has almost doubled, and this seems to be one of the problems.

When I was in the library this morning I was interested in looking back over the records and found that a commission was set up by this house in 1937 to inquire into the price of farm machinery. It may be that the time has arrived when this situation should be reviewed. The cost of farm machinery in Canada seems to be out of all proportion. I want to show hon. members, especially those who do not come from western Canada, how the cost of some of these machines has increased. I am one of those who believe that when the farmer is prosperous the whole economy of the country is in a healthy state. I am not one of those people who play one section of the country against the other section, as has been done by some political parties.

As an example let us consider a 14-foot combine. In 1953 it cost $5,750 and today it would cost $9,800. Then, take a swather; in 1953 it cost $948 and today it will cost $1,149, an increase of about $200. I think one of the most startling examples is that of a Caterpillar D-4 diesel bulldozer with a hydraulic lift. It cost about $5,000 in 1940 and today it costs $15,000. These are just typical examples of the increased cost of farm equipment. It seems to me the time has arrived when we should review the prices of farm machinery in order to keep agriculture in a healthy condition. I should like to know, as a member of parliament, how many dollars worth of labour goes into the construction of this Caterpillar D-4. I should like to know how many dollars of profit result from the sale of this item. The cost of this item would have to be worked right back to the cost of the steel. However, I think that could be done and it is time such an investigation by a new commission was undertaken. We need to know the reason for such increases in farm machinery.

There is one other thing I should mention. I believe the purchasers of farm machinery should keep in mind the fact that there is no tariff on farm machinery entering Canada. I ascertained this fact today. This means that a combine has no duty imposed on it. There is no duty imposed on farm machinery entering Canada from the United States. I discussed this question with a member of the customs branch, and he was kind enough to review the list of items I gave him. He said that there were no duties imposed on the list of machines, except two of them. I refer to the list of equipment used on the 1,500-acre farm in Alberta. I have heard many times from political platforms references to the tariff protection given farm machinery, but that just does not exist.

There is one thing about which I am not sure, and I should like to hear an answer to this question if it can be answered. Why does the machinery in the United States cost less? Why does it cost more when it comes into Canada and yet there is no duty imposed upon it? I have heard no answer to this question as yet. I should like, with the permission of the house, to put on Hansard the list of machinery to which I have referred. This shows the list of equiment used on the 1,500-acre farm and also the prices of that equipment in 1953. There are two pages, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member the source of his information?

Mr. Woolliams: This information came direct from the farmer who purchased the equipment, and from an agent in Calgary.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreed that this table should be placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: The tables are as follows:

F.O.B. CALGARY March 3, 1959.

I think when we talk about the cost price squeeze that probably the real squeeze on the farmer is coming from this cost of machinery. This is a squeeze which the farmer feels as a result of the strife between management and labour. I am taking no sides on this question because I am not one who has ever taken part in negotiations between management and labour. I am certainly not going to hold myself out as an expert. We know that the leaders of both parties, Liberal and Conservative, have exhorted management and labour to keep prices down and try to stop this escalator from forever climbing. The farmer is one person who is caught in the squeeze because he cannot pass on the additional cost to the consumer. When the cost of a combine increases by $4,000 in five years, there is no way for him to pass on that increased cost so that he can get back that extra capital expenditure.

I hope the time will never come when control regulations are necessary. I am not one of those who would like to see compulsion introduced because there is something about a free economy which is typical of our Canadian way of life. But it may be that if a farmer has to continue to pay double the price for his machinery every five years there is something to be said for the answer which Senator Kennedy gave to a question which he was asked at a press conference. Senator Kennedy, as no doubt members of this committee know, is a United States democratic senator who is aspiring to the presidency of the United States. This is the question he was asked:

> But you would have the people pay more taxes to help India. President Eisenhower exhorts businessmen not to raise prices and labour not to demand higher wages. Isn't this asking people to go against their selfish interests?

And the answer he gave was:

> I never thought exhortations did much good. I don't think it fair to expect businessmen and labour people to control themselves just because you have made a general request. Unions are in the business of getting more for their people and management is in the business of getting more for itself, and I think government intervention has to be more precise and stronger.

It would seem to me that if this strife between management and labour cannot be brought to an end we may in future have to impose some kind of control, and I know that every hon. member, no matter on what side he sits, would prefer to continue with a free economy. However, agriculture cannot continue to function with prosperity if it is caught in this squeeze, because it is all a question, as I said before, of what a bushel of wheat will buy and what a pound of beef will buy.

Now I should like to say a few words with reference to the remarks made by the leader of the C.C.F. party to the effect that the western Conservative members have betrayed the western farmer. I was fortunate enough to have six men from Bow River forming a part of the farm delegation. One was the master farmer from that area. They knew the problem, and we discussed the problem together as I have discussed it with you, Mr. Chairman, this afternoon. They know that the big problem concerns what a bushel of wheat will buy and what a pound of beef will buy. If we could get costs down, then the price of a bushel of wheat would not be out of line, but it is out of line today in the light of the prices which a farmer has to pay for his machinery and what he has to pay for all the other things he needs to purchase.

When the hon. member for Assiniboia talks about betrayal, I never know whether he is talking about the betrayal of the Regina manifesto or of the Winnipeg manifesto or the Knowles manifesto or the Argue manifesto. I think the western farmer will know where the real betrayal lies when that marriage referred to in the Knowles manifesto is brought about between the C.C.F. party and certain labour groups in this country. Then the farmer will know when his machinery increases in cost just where the betrayal of western Canada took place. I am quite confident that when that marriage of the C.C.F. takes place the C.C.F. members from the four western constituencies will be defeated and the Conservative members who sit on the rump side of the house will be all back in their places.

Mr. McMillan: We have heard some discussion today about wheat farmers, both in western Canada and in Ontario. I think the western wheat farmer, like the farmer in any other part of Canada, is a realist and I do not think his opinions can be changed by a drink of liquor. If they were so entertained by some members of the Conservative party as has been said I do not think it is the business of any of the rest of us.

I have every sympathy for the western farmer, as I have for farmers in all other parts of Canada and certainly unless he is farming on a large scale with modern machinery he is facing considerable difficulties at the present time. After listening to the previous speaker this afternoon I have all the greater sympathy with him, because the hon. member for Bow River has brought home to us the high prices which must be paid for implements and machinery.

I do not intend, however, to discuss western farming. I want to refer to a special type of farming in the Niagara district. I want to refer to fruit farming in Ontario and, more particularly, to peaches. The peach crop in 1958 exceeded the peach crop of 1957 by about 15 per cent. The annual meeting of the Ontario peach growers marketing board was held about eight weeks ago at Grimsby and the secretary of that board reported that last year's peach crop was good and that it had exceeded the 1957 crop by something like 15 per cent. Purchases of peaches by processors in 1958 amounted, however, only to 27,444 tons compared with 30,027 tons in 1957. This was a decrease of 10 per cent. The total value of the crop amounted to $2,227,000, and when one includes the $13 a ton paid by the government under the stabilization plan, this amounts to $605,000 less than in 1957. And even with this $13 taken into account the price obtained for peaches last year was the lowest obtained in years. The same applied to asparagus.

Now previous to 1957 the asparagus crop had been at 23 to 22 cents per pound. In 1957 it fell to 22 cents and 21½ cents. When this government came into power I think they set a deficiency payment of three cents below the 18 cent floor price and the farmers never got any more than 15 cents from the processor after that. They got the 15 cents plus the three cents.

In 1958, the number of peach growers selling to processors in the Niagara district declined by nearly 12½ per cent, from 1,362 in 1957 to 1,195 in 1958. One reason, of course, was the high cost of production and the low price received for peaches. Another reason this year was the closing down of processing plants. Some of these plants were bought out by United States interests and were not opened. In some cases it was not known whether or not these plants would open, and unless peach producers had made other arrangements for selling their crops, in cases where the plants did not open they could not get rid of them and the peaches rotted on the trees.

I think our two governments should cooperate in helping the fruit farmers to build processing plants. The money would not be lost; it could be amortized over a number of years and the fruit and vegetable farmers would be able to sell their products. Moreover, the money would be spent in Canada and avoid the importation of a lot of fruit from the United States and some other countries, fruit which, I think, is of an inferior quality. What I have said with regard to peaches applies in varying degrees to other fruits and to some vegetables. These processing plants could be used for other fruits and for some vegetables, apart from peaches.

I believe that the main problem which faces the farmer is the obtaining of long and short term credit. This applies to vegetable and fruit farmers as well as to farmers in Ontario generally. The fruit and vegetable growers need short term credit for fertilizer spraying, baskets and so on. At the present time they must pay at least 6 per cent for their money. They also need long term credit for the erection of storage facilities, packing sheds and other buildings. And I am sure they would appreciate it if this government would provide them with processing plants. I am sure this money would be returned. I realize that interest rates must be reasonable and that the Minister of Agriculture should see that they are reasonable.

I fail to see, however, that this government could provide any reasonable rates at the present time because, as you know, in the last two loans made the cost yield to the government was around 5 per cent. In fact, one of the loans was over 5 per cent, and when you take into account income tax gimmicks in connection with those loans they were up around 6½ per cent. Therefore, I do not see how the government can lend money to farmers at a very reasonable rate when the net cost of money to them was around 6½ per cent. I would hate to think that my credit had fallen so low that I had to pay as much interest as the Minister of Finance had in that last loan. I would appeal to the minister to help our farmers by way of a more reasonable interest rate in order that they might get adequate financing in this highly competitive field of farming.

I must say one thing to the minister. I am sure the fruit and vegetable growers appreciate the longer application of specific duties during the harvest period of the various crops. I do not know how this will apply in the Niagara district, whether it will tend in itself to keep these processing plants open. If it does not I would appeal to this government to do something along with the provincial government of Ontario for the fruit growers.

I also want to say something about the grades of fruit. Our processors have bought grade A fruit from different fruit growers in the past, but when the processors have imported fruit they have accepted a lower grade at a lower price. I think inferior grades have been getting in across the border. Our inspectors let them in. It does not happen any more now than it did with the former government, but it is happening, and I would appeal to the Minister of Agriculture to see that the people in the department at the border admitting fruit and vegetables see that they come up to a definite grade set by our own producers here in Canada.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to be able to take part in this debate. I would like first to reply to the statement made by the leader of the C.C.F. party to the effect that the Conservative members of western Canada had betrayed the farmers of western Canada. I believe that the greatest betrayal of the farmers took place in 1946 when the British wheat agreement was signed. According to a statement made by Senator T. A. Crerar in 1953 at a Liberal meeting in Winnipeg, the western farmers had lost at that time over $500 million. In 1946 Mr. Coldwell, the then leader of the C.C.F. party, stated he had given some approval to the British wheat agreement. There was nothing wrong with that agreement because it was made in order to help Great Britain, who had made great sacrifices during the war; but where the betrayal came in was that the gift made in the name of Canada was paid for by the farmers of the three western provinces.

When the farmers came to Ottawa last month some of them came to my office, those who came from my constituency of St. Boniface. I told them that their brief had not the proper background, that it had not a proper basis for the demands made. I said that I agreed they had demands to make and that they were not coming here as beggars. I said, "This country owes you at least $500 million." Why was that not mentioned in the brief? The Hon. J. A. MacKinnon, the then minister of trade and commerce, consulted with the western heads of the pools and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in regard to this agreement and they gave it some approval, although the then minister of trade and commerce admitted they had not been consulted as to quantity and price. So this was not a farmers' deal, it was a government deal.

The agreement was signed on July 24, 1946 and it was announced to parliament on the next day, July 25, 1946. It was then a fait accompli, but at that time the then leader of the Conservative party, Mr. John Bracken, and the late Mr. Arthur Ross of Souris, took a definite stand against that deal. They stated it was not fair to the farmers, and that if the farmers were going to sell their grain at 50 cents less than what it was worth in the world market they should be given parity prices.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, when you called it six o'clock I was talking about the great betrayal of the western wheat growers by the Liberal and C.C.F. parties in 1946. I was amazed that in the last march on Ottawa by the western farmers who presented a brief, the greatest ground on which they could have claimed against the government was not even referred to. As I said before the adjournment, in 1953, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 24 of that year, Senator Crerar was reported to have stated that the grain growers of western Canada had lost $500 million under the British wheat agreement and the international wheat agreement.

When the delegation from St. Boniface came to my office I spoke to them about that and they urged me to mention it at the first opportunity and that is why I am raising this question tonight. When the delegation appeared before the committee on agriculture I referred to that point as well. Mr. Harry Marsh of Saskatchewan who had at one time been a director of the wheat pool agreed that if the march had taken place in 1946 it would have been possible for the farmers to obtain at that time what they are seeking now.

I am really surprised that the farmers did not march on Ottawa in 1946 when the Liberal party of that day without any authority and without consultation with the western farmers confiscated part of their income from wheat. It was really a conscription of wealth directed only against the three western provinces.

This afternoon I heard the leader of the C.C.F. party talking about the interests of the western farmers being betrayed by the policies of the Conservative party but the greatest betrayal occurred in 1946 at which time the C.C.F. and Liberal parties worked hand in hand. Mr. Coldwell admitted that he had given some approval to that agreement at that time.

It seems to me that hon. members of the C.C.F. were not concerned at all about the interests of the western farmer. They were concerned only in bringing about an enforced plan and fixed prices and government interference with the affairs of the western farmer. They did not consider what losses the western farmers were taking at that time.

I am surprised that Mr. Wesson, who I understand was also a leader of the wheat pool in 1946, did not look after the interests of the farmers then. Perhaps the organized march on Ottawa was caused by remorse or perhaps he is now repentant for what he did to the farmers in 1946. I am quite surprised that the leader of the C.C.F. party at this time is not interested in asking any questions about the British wheat agreement or about the stand that party took at that time.

Mr. Harkness: He does not like to hear about it.

Mr. Regnier: Yes, indeed. I would invite him to explain the participation of his party in that agreement and tell the committee why they did not try to lead a march on Ottawa at that time when one was required. At that time there was no farmers' union organized in western Canada. Indeed, the very reason for the organization of the farmers' union in the western provinces was that the interests of the farmers were not being properly looked after by the C.C.F. or by the wheat pool organization. The farmers saw the necessity of having another organization and thus established the farmers' union. Personally I am sorry they were not organized before they were. If that had been done what took place in 1946 could have been prevented. Such a thing has never happened to any other class in Canada. No other group has had part of the income from its produce confiscated and given away to another country with the cost of the gift being charged only to one class, namely the wheat growers of the three prairie provinces.

The province of Ontario was exempted. In some years that province has grown as much wheat as the province of Manitoba. Why was not the province of Ontario included? Obviously they knew they could not get away with it for political reasons and therefore it was limited to the three prairies provinces and to only one class. I believe this represented a mortal blow struck at the western farmer. In the course of a few years $500 million was taken away from them. I have taken this figure from Honourable T. A. Crerar who was a member of the Liberal cabinet at one time but who did not approve of it after he ceased to be in the cabinet. He said so in Winnipeg on January 24, 1953, at a Liberal convention, of all places.

In 1946 that great newspaper of western Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press, put up a wonderful fight against the policy of the Liberal party at that time and in defence of the interests of the three western provinces.

I was quite shocked last week when I heard the hon. member for Essex East expressing concern for what was happening at this time to the western farmer. Why did he not show equal concern when his administration was in office at which time he had some authority and power to protect the wheat growers of western Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regnier: Certainly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In 1946 did not the hon. member share with me and with many other Liberals a strong faith and belief in the Liberal party as an active member of the Liberal party at that time?

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall ever live down the shame of it. I remember the great Liberal party of 1946. I had a great deal to do with it. From 1946, except for the last two or three years, I attended Liberal conventions and particularly the Liberal convention in Winnipeg, and made it a point to attend the committee on agriculture where I attacked the Liberal government's policy on agriculture, particularly in regard to the international wheat agreement and the British wheat agreement and this had a great deal to do with my leaving the Liberal party.

Mr. Harkness: You see, it is right from the horse's mouth, Paul.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to place on record the position of the Conservative party in 1946 by quoting some remarks made in this house by the then leader of the Conservative party, Mr. John Bracken. This is to be found at page 4822 of Hansard of August 15, 1946. Mr. John Bracken, made the following comments regarding the British wheat agreement:

It is a bad agreement because it proposes to sell 160 million bushels of wheat to Britain at 50 cents a bushel below the world price. It is either a gift or it is an improvident trade arrangement. If it is a gift, let us say so. But if it is supposed to be an insurance against low prices in the future—if because we take less for our wheat today than it is worth Britain is expected to pay more for our wheat two years from now than the world price when it may be lower, I say that as an insurance that this will be done, it is valueless.

It is a bad bargain also because it will create friction between Britain and Canada. If in two or three years from now the world price of wheat is low and Britain does not come through with a higher price to us than the world price then is, we shall feel that she has reneged on this agreement. On the other hand, if two or three years from now, when the world price of wheat may be low, we press Britain to pay us more than the world price, she will feel that we are unreasonable. So I say that the proposal is altogether likely to create friction between this country and Britain.

The third reason why this is a bad bargain is that it will cause friction with other nations as well. It will invite criticism from the wheat-producing nations, because here we are selling wheat to the greatest wheat importer of the world at 50 cents a bushel below the world price. What are other wheat-producing nations to think of a policy of that kind?

At page 4824 of Hansard of the same date Mr. Bracken said:

Now with respect to the government's wheat policy generally. I make this criticism: it is not fair to the farmers, it is not fair to a quarter of the Canadian people, it is not fair—particularly—to those who are growing wheat. It is not fair because of the price that is offered, $1.35, while there is a possibility that something more will be coming after the end of five years, there is no assurance that there will be. One dollar and thirty-five cents is not a fair price for wheat today. It is not a "parity price", if I may use that hackneyed term. "Parity price" is the name given to a price which is supposed to express a fair price in relation to other things. The parity price now would be about $1.53, but $1.35 is all the farmers are assured, at a time when the world price is nearly half as high again as that. If the farmers of Canada cannot be assured of a parity price now, when the world price is high, what prospect is there of their being assured of parity price when the world price is low, as it is sure to be later on?

If I may stop here, I think Mr. John Bracken gave a real good picture of what was going to happen. I would like to know where the C.C.F. party was at that time when the Conservative leader was talking about parity price? I continue to quote:

The government's policy during the last two or three years has been a policy generally of floors and ceilings. That has reduced the wide fluctuations of prices, and to that extent is good; it has raised the floors and lowered the ceilings. Now there is a modification of that policy. The government comes along with this price of $1.35, which as I have said is less than parity. The policy has been one of floors and ceilings, but now it is one even more of a controlled economy; and when the government starts in to control the economy, then when things do not go right, or any inequity is brought about, the government has no one to blame but itself. This policy is not equitable. It does not assure equity to farmers, and this is one time when the government might have given them that assurance.

As I have said, the government's policy is one of no assurance of parity when the world price is high, and even less assurance when the world price is low. The government's policy is one of making agriculture carry the cost of the loss on this sale. It is not the nation that is carrying it. The nation's economy will suffer if it does not get as much for wheat as it might have got. But the price of the loss will be borne by the farmers. The government may say that the farmers are probably getting enough, but the fact is that this is a contribution by the farmers of Canada and not by the Canadian people as a whole. When you stop to think that on this one commodity the crop is sold at four different prices—wheat for flour at 78 cents, the so-called domestic price of $1.25, the British price of $1.55, and now the effort is being made to sell to other countries at over $2—you will realize that is very much of a hodge-podge, something which is most difficult to administer and does not work out equitably to the producers.

In Hansard for that year hon. members can also read the very good speech of the late member for Souris, Arthur Ross and the good speech of the present Prime Minister against this agreement. I believe I have performed the duty requested of me by the delegates who came from the constituency of St. Boniface by bringing this matter to the attention of the committee. Thank you.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, before I comment on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture I, too, also wish to challenge the hon. member for Assiniboia on the remarks that he passed this afternoon that the western members have betrayed the western farmers. Let us bring this question of betrayal out into the open; let us decide once and for all who is betraying the western farmers and who has betrayed the western farmers.

Regardless of what happens in the next election, whether one member present in the house tonight or present in this government or in this parliament is returned at the next election, I think they can all say, with the exception of one and that one is the hon. member for Assiniboia, that this government has been more sympathetic to western problems than any other government in the past. I think they have given a better hearing to western members than did any other government in the past. I think they can all say that never has a more united effort been put forth on behalf of the western farmers than has been put forth by the members of this government and of this party during the last session and up to date.

I just wonder how sincere this member from western Canada, the hon. member for Assiniboia, this preacher of doom, despair and destruction, has been in his support of the western farmer? How sincere are his colleagues in the group of eight, how sympathetic are they to the western farmers? I just want to read one short excerpt from Hansard of last year containing words uttered by a voice of the party that he represents. It is to be found on page 3509 of Hansard for August 14, 1958 and reads as follows:

> This does not concern resources about which we know nothing. This relates to the breadbasket of this country, and I suggest to the minister that the breadbasket of this country is no longer on the prairies; it is in the boreal forests where we find our pulp and paper resources.

Then there was an interjection by an hon. member who said:

> What does the hon. member for Assiniboia say to that?

Then the hon. member whom I am quoting went on:

> He has just been complaining from behind. I do not mind somewhat overstating this point in relation to what the hon. member for Assiniboia tells me, but I think we have gone on long enough paying such marked attention to the agricultural interests especially to the grain interests.

What solution has the hon. member for Assiniboia put forth on behalf of the farmers? How does he propose to assist farming? How well has he briefed his group of eight? Without referring to Hansard I remember that last year one of his colleagues was speaking on agriculture and asked the western members who had been fighting for the western farmers why we could not solve our problem in the same way that labour solves theirs. He said that when labour encounters an increase in the cost of living all they do is go to the employer and make an arrangement with the employer whereby he raises their salaries. How can the western farmer go to his buyer and say, "My cost of living is going up; I want more money for my grain".

I also suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia should brief the spokesmen for his party when he has duties elsewhere as to what the problems of the western farmers are. I suggest that by the tactics he has been following during this session—not so much during last session—he is doing everything within the power of one man to divide the efforts of the western farmers in obtaining their rights. He professes to be an agrarian. From his numerous speeches we have heard that he is an expert in all fields. He is an expert on external affairs. He is an expert on shipping. He is an expert on labour. He is an expert on finance. In fact, last year when he was criticizing the budget he was asked how he would go about balancing the budget. He said that he would tax the millionaires and multimillionaires and get the money from them. I wonder how long that source would last. I wonder what he would do when it was exhausted. I wonder how long it would be before he got down to the timber barons and I wonder whether there would be seven instead of eight at that time in the little group to your left, Mr. Chairman.

I could say more but I think the remarks I have already made will prove to all Canadians that if he cannot convince that little group of eight he can never hope to convince the people of Canada. What does he hope to gain by his remarks this afternoon, by the co-operation that we as members from the west are getting from him? Is he seeking assistance for the farmers or political gain? I leave it to hon. members to answer that question. I suggest that the people of Canada are not as gullible as the hon. member for Assiniboia believes them to be.

With regard to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said very often, quite often by the group of eight to your left, that the western farmer is not getting his fair share of the national wealth. The term "fair share of the national wealth" is one of many such terms that they use and the reason they use it is that there are no statistics to prove it. I have written to the dominion bureau of statistics to find out what the fair share of the national wealth is so far as the agrarian is concerned. The bureau does not have such figures on its files and is not able to give them.

However, I have heard the minister say that farmers comprise 12 per cent of our population and that that 12 per cent receive 6 per cent of the national income. I suggest to the minister that there is a problem in western Canada when 12 per cent of the people receive only 6 per cent of the national income. There must be something wrong with either the economy of our country or our mode of living. However, in my view the statement of the minister is not entirely correct because in the west at the present time stockmen are enjoying good returns from their cattle. There are a great number of stockmen on the prairies and this brings up the average.

Our concern as western members, and I think I can speak for all western members of this party, is with the situation of the grain farmer. That is the immediate problem. The problem of the grain farmer is that he purchases everything that he needs on a protected market while all the grain he sells is sold on a competitive market. This results in what is known as the cost price squeeze or high cost of production. Before there is a division between eastern and western farmers I would suggest that the problem of the high cost of production applies to the eastern farmers as well as the western farmers. As farmers let us not be divided on that point. As has happened in the past, let us not have eastern farmers fighting western farmers. Let us not have any member of the house, as we heard this afternoon, try to divide the farmers.

In the past members representing several different parties have been sent to the House of Commons and after what I heard this afternoon I can understand why those representing eastern ridings could not understand the western problem. The western members who were sent here could not even agree among themselves. They did not put forward the problem of the western farmer. They were fighting party politics.

For the benefit of eastern members I wish to point out one thing that has bothered the grain farmers of the west for many years. At the present time the people of Canada are buying wheat 15 to 20 cents a bushel cheaper than it can be purchased anywhere else. Let us suppose all Canadian farmers stopped producing wheat and the Canadian people had to buy wheat for home consumption from some other source. They would pay at least 15 to 20 cents a bushel more than they are paying today. Instead of the income of the western or other grain farmer going up, it has been gradually going down. Today the Canadian people are buying wheat cheaper than any person on the North American continent can buy it. This is not a fair situation in an economy that is rising.

For purposes of clarification I suggest that we divide our economy into three parts. We will call the first group labour, the second group management and the third group the consumers. The reason I call the third group consumers is that our western farmers come within that term. I think what applies to all western farmers applies to all consumers. I include eastern farmers in that group.

Now, which one of these three groups receives the most out of our economy today? All the members are supplied with the literature from the labour organizations. We receive the labour magazines, and I think the labour people will admit that within the last 10 years they have increased their net income, over and above the increased cost of living, by 27 per cent. Management, on the other hand, can always look after itself. Whatever it costs management to produce an article, their percentage of profit can always be added to that cost of production and passed along to the consumer.

I would suggest that the consumer group is the only group that has not been protected by legislation. I would suggest that at this session or very soon the government should intervene on behalf of the consumer group. I would suggest also that so far as the farmers who are included in that consumer group are concerned, the minister might give serious consideration to the question of the two price system. I do not think any western member will maintain that the two price system will solve all the problems of western Canada. However, I think we will say that such a system would put western farmers on a firm basis and they would not have to come to the government year after year for assistance.

This two price system has been ignored by certain large farm groups in the west, to which reference was made this afternoon on several occasions. I should like to read a part of an article that was published in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix on April 8, 1959. It was an article about the dean of agriculture in the University of Saskatchewan, Professor Rupert Ramsay. In this article it is stated that Professor Ramsay said the net farm income in Saskatchewan last year was $2,000 per farm. Professor Ramsay said that the prairie farmer had established a case for some kind of additional income. Canadian farmers had difficulty selling in the British market because agricultural prices in the United Kingdom were much lower than in Canada. The only alternative to this problem was to establish a two price system with one price for the domestic market and one for international markets.

Efforts have been made by one member from western Canada, Mr. Chairman, to belittle what other western members have done, particularly in connection with the farmers' march on Ottawa. I want to inform this house that any misunderstanding that has arisen between the marchers and the members from the west has not been in regard to the problems of western Canada. I think we will all agree that there is a serious problem there. Any misunderstanding that arose was in connection with the solution of that problem. They say deficiency payments are the solution, and most of us contend that the two price system would be. The reason we have not supported deficiency payments, as the marchers thought we would and as the hon. member for Assiniboia tried to make out we should, is that while he was elsewhere last year all the western members were here studying the problem. We have studied the problem of deficiency payments and we have come to the conclusion that they will not solve our problem. However, we do believe the two price system will put us well on our way.

I should like to say just a word or two further in regard to the fence-sitting, if you wish to call it that, the hon. member for Assiniboia is doing. He professes now to be the champion of labour. He also professes to be the champion of agriculture, an agrarian. An agrarian is not against tariffs in the east. He is not against good wages for labour. But, when he starts to suffer he must do something. This afternoon the hon. member for Bow River mentioned that there is no tariff on farm machinery. He may be quite correct in his contention, but I wish to point out to him that we know we are paying $150, roughly, per ton for Canadian steel when we could purchase other steel for $100. We do know that the textiles the farmers are using can be purchased for one-third less. When your income starts to get so low you feel that pressure then you are bound to complain and you are bound to look around to try to ascertain the source of that pressure.

I recall that last year there was a strike on the west coast which prevented shipments of our wheat. They say a strike does not hurt anyone. I refer to labour's own words which may be found in a memorandum presented by labour to this government. They say:

> We would simply say that compulsory arbitration is prejudicial to the free play of collective bargaining; it substitutes third party intervention for settlement by the parties themselves; it is a restriction on the very important civil right to strike.

It would appear from this statement that labour is not too concerned with the civil rights of other groups who also feel the results of any strike action. In a democratic country such as we have I would suggest that civil rights must apply to all persons and not to those of any special class, race or hue. We might well ask, what protection does the third party, the consumers' group receive under the present method of negotiation. I suggest they receive none. I wish the hon. member for Assiniboia would listen to this. Labour also states in their memorandum to the government:

> We believe the increased wage earner purchasing power is essential to lift us out of the recession.

How can the hon. member for Assiniboia relate this statement to the declaration of the farm groups who state:

> The drop in the purchasing power of the grain farmers was one of the major causes of the present unemployment problem. When farmers lack money to buy goods and services, other Canadians are deprived of their jobs.

How can he sit on the fence? Let him go one way or the other and inform this house which way he is going. He cannot serve two masters.

Mr. Howard: May I be permitted to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McIntosh: Certainly.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the hon. member would be prepared to advocate or accept a principle of arbitration of price increases along the lines of those which the Prime Minister declared inexcusable?

Mr. McIntosh: I do not profess to set myself up as an authority on arbitration. I do say that I know agricultural problems. I would suggest the hon. member ask his leader whether or not the west would do that.

Mr. Howard: You are the one who made the comment.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to assure the minister that I shall not try his patience for long; I just want to make a few short remarks on the position of farmers in my riding and in the district of Saguenay-Lake St. John.

While listening to the various speeches this afternoon, I noticed that there were problems, not only in our part of the country but also everywhere else in Canada, which obviously confirm the findings of the final report established by the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects, as may be seen on page 149, and I quote:

> Along the south and southeast coast of Nova Scotia, in much of Cape Breton Island, in the central and northeastern sections of New Brunswick, and in the Gaspé, as well as in Newfoundland, many of the farms are hardly above the subsistence level; and this is also true of northern Quebec and northern Ontario.

We also have many agricultural problems in my riding and throughout our district, Mr. Chairman. There are large families working on farms and, as the children grow up, they are to a certain extent attracted by the urban centres and industries and, little by little, because there is no possibility of finding adequate subsistence on the farm for the whole family, the young people leave the farm and increase the number of those who work in factories and offices in the cities of my riding and district.

This does not necessarily mean that young people dislike agriculture. I am certain that those who are born on the land are in many cases very much attracted by it, but today it seems as if the land had some difficulty in providing a living and certain amenities for those who till the soil. I think that it is not enough that the land should provide mere subsistence to those who work it, but that the young people, and the not so young too, should reap a few amenities when living and working on the farm. This, I think, is one of the main problems which must be faced by the farmers in my riding and in the whole area.

To those problems must be added more recent issues like agricultural mechanization, for instance. There are of course, I admit, the Agricultural Credit Board of Quebec and the Canadian Farm Loan Board who help our farmers and agriculturists, but I believe that at least in the case of the federal body—and conditions were about the same under the former administration—the interest rate is somewhat too high for our farmers. Farmers should be able to borrow money at a lower interest rate.

Farmers—those of my constituency, at least—have complained about the enormous difference there is between the cost of production of agricultural machinery and their sale price. I recall, in particular, a farmer of a rural parish close to Jonquiere who explained to me, for instance, how much a potato seeder would cost. He quoted prices to me on production costs and sale price of such a machine, and I believe that, if these figures were right, the situation is rather alarming, not only in our district, but in the whole country.

The minister or his department should try to investigate the discrepancy between the production cost of farm implements and their selling price to the farmers, because as a result of that discrepancy, the farmer is having a bad time today.

I note, for instance, in L'Action Catholique of March 14, 1958, an article from which I shall quote only one paragraph concerning the capital which the farmers must earmark for their farm machinery. I quote:

> Quebec farmers who, from 1941 to 1946, bought a little over 30 million dollars worth of machinery, spent $130 million from 1947 to 1953 to mechanize their farms.

All those problems are being added to the difficulties facing the farmers of my constituency, of the area, and, I believe, of the country as a whole.

We are on the threshold of an era which is not new perhaps—it started some time ago—and I believe the government should endeavour to study the problem in a very special way, in order to come to the rescue of the farmers and develop their interest in their farms. That would avoid, no doubt to a great extent, the exodus to the cities because as farmers move into cities, after working on the farm all their lives, they have no trade nor any specific profession and they have trouble finding jobs. In fact, they are taken as temporary employees in industry, in office work or public buildings, and as soon as that temporary work is over, they go and swell the ranks of the unemployed in the larger centres of the country.

I think the government should look into this problem and try to do something in this field.

At the beginning of my remarks, I told the minister that I would not exercise his patience to any great length, but I should like to close my remarks with a quotation, from the final report of the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects, dealing with economic conditions affecting Canada's farmers. I quote:

> Governments, however, will have a role to play in hastening and facilitating changes that would in any case be brought about by economic forces, and in tempering the winds of change so that individual farmers do not feel too fleeced and forgotten. There will thus be need for government assistance in agriculture over the next 25 years; but the assistance will probably take different forms than in the past.

That is why I have no hesitation in saying that the government should have an aggressive policy in the agricultural field. Gone are the days when grants were made to assist people in clearing their own land, or in building a small house as shelter for the father, mother and two or three children. This is a new era, and in my view, the government should begin to realize the implications of this new era which started not so long ago, and should try to do something to keep farmers on the land.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, since half the constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot that I have the honour to represent in this house is made up of farmers, I owe it to my constituents to bring their claims to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness).

Mr. Chairman, it has often been said and repeated, and quite properly so, that agriculture is the backbone of Canada's economy. If it is not to become a stumbling block for our economic life, it must receive the full amount of attention it requires. As the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) has pointed out, it must be made attractive enough to draw our young people towards the noble profession of farmer. The farmer is the feeder of mankind, and unless steps are taken to direct our young people towards that profession, it will merely go on declining. This, of course, has been understood by the present Conservative government, as evidenced by the particular attention given to agriculture since the government was elected to office.

During the 1957 session, in fact, we enacted the Agricultural Stabilization Act, which has certainly given the farmer a fairer share of the national wealth.

This year, the speech from the throne proposes consideration of further legislation which is very popular among farmers. I refer to the bill on crop insurance, which the Minister of Agriculture will be submitting to the house during this session.

We heard this afternoon the minister's statement on support prices for milk products in Canada. Recently, farmers were getting rather concerned, since they, and more particularly those engaged in the dairy industry, feared that prices would drop. Again, the Minister of Agriculture has shown that he wanted to do something for the farmers by keeping the support prices of agricultural products at about the same level as last year. For example, the support price on butter was maintained at 64 cents a pound. Other dairy products—cheese, milk powder, and so on—were given special consideration. There is no doubt that measure was welcomed by our farmers, since, according to the hon. member for Kent (N.B.), (Mr. Michaud) himself, it will certainly create much satisfaction among farmers and all those engaged in the dairy industry.

Mr. Michaud: With butter only.

Mr. Godin: What is there special about milk powder?

Mr. Boulanger: What about milk powder?

Mr. Ricard: Milk powder has no doubt been given special attention by the government.

As I said a moment ago, the approval given by the hon. member for Kent (N. B.), was so spontaneous and so much in keeping with the facts, that it startled the agricultural critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Michaud: You read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Ricard: You have corrected it, I presume.

Mr. Chairman, I should like also to draw the Minister of Agriculture's attention to a matter which my constituents have asked me to submit to him.

The St. Hyacinthe-Bagot constituency is known as one of the most beautiful and most prosperous farming communities in the province and in the country. There you find breeders of purebred cattle who, each year, win high honours in the various exhibitions that are held in the country. These breeders are alarmed at the devastation caused in their herds each year by brucellosis. Petitions have been signed by farmers, requesting vaccination for their cattle. I therefore urge the Minister of Agriculture to act upon the requests I have received from the U.C.C. and from the St. Hyacinthe agricultural society, in order that brucellosis tests be given as soon as possible in the St. Hyacinthe-Bagot constituency.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to say a few words on vertical integration, which is now being practised to the detriment of farmers. I rejoice with the farmers about the statement made some time ago in this house by the Minister of Agriculture who said that deficiency payments to hog producers would be paid shortly, because, at this time, it is alarming to see that feed companies are doing great harm to farmers. I rejoice, as I said, with farmers about the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture in this regard.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to the Minister of Agriculture a request made by the farmers of my constituency that the price of sugar beets be fixed at $14 a ton. In my constituency, this crop brings returns of about $1 million during a normal year. The constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is the greatest producer of all the constituencies which supply the St. Hilaire sugar refinery.

So, I ask the Minister of Agriculture to give serious consideration to the different matters that I have brought to his attention, and I can assure him that the farmers will be grateful to him.

(Text):

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief comments I would like to make on item 1 of the agricultural estimates, and those comments will relate to the administration of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. First of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture and the members of the staff in his department for the good job they have made of this administration over the past year. All members in this house will recognize that the task of the minister and his officials has been a very difficult one.

There has been much talk and many exhortations from different quarters about holding the price line in our economy. The price line during the last fiscal year has not been held too well, and for that reason I would urge upon the minister and the government the necessity of holding the stabilization price line as it affects farm commodities. We had many instances during the last year of increases being granted in wages in our industries, and in transportation particularly. The other day we completed voting a grant of $20 million to subsidize freight rates so that higher wages could be paid those in the transport field. It is very important that farm prices should not be allowed to drop.

It was one of the undertakings of the party now responsible for our government, an undertaking made both during the last election and before, that they would do their utmost to see that the agricultural interests of this country received a fairer share of the national income. For that reason it is necessary now, to do everything possible to hold the stabilization price line.

Everyone will appreciate the statement of the minister today in connection with dairy products. This has been a very pressing problem. The method of stabilization has not given exactly the results that were desired in the dairy industry. Far-reaching changes have been made and other changes are promised for the future. I do not know whether the over-all results will have the effect of holding the stabilization price line in the dairy industry but I am sure it is the sincere desire of all interested hon. members that this new method will maintain or increase the over-all support.

In connection with soybeans that are grown extensively in the constituency which I represent and in the constituencies to the south and west of it, representations have been made to the government recently requesting that soybeans again be designated a commodity under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and that the price be stabilized for the 1959 crop. I hope it will be possible for the minister and the government to again hold the stabilization price line in relation to soybeans.

We do not grow half enough soybeans in Canada to supply our own requirements. It is felt that if an incentive price could be placed on soybeans it would take acreage out of the production of some other crops such as wheat which are in surplus supply. Not only would the incentive to grow more soybeans have that effect but it would save us up to $15 million or $20 million a year that is spent for the importation of soybeans.

The same conditions apply to sugar beets. We grow but a small percentage of the sugar which we consume in Canada. From the point of view of the creation of jobs as well as from the point of view of conserving our exchange and keeping our money within our own country and promoting our own industry we should increase our production of sugar beets and beet sugar. The sugar beet growers have also requested that sugar beets again be supported for the 1959 crop. I am sure it is the hope of all concerned that the government will be able to hold the stabilization price line in regard to sugar beets or even increase the support price.

Some sections of our canning industry are complaining that imports of canned fruits and vegetables are creating extremely stiff competition within Canada for the canning industries located here. It is to be hoped that the committee which the Minister of Agriculture has set up to inquire into the whole canning industry in Canada will be able to ascertain whether or not the economic climate that now surrounds the canning industry is such as to encourage that industry to expand, at least to the point where it will supply our domestic requirements.

The Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act is only one feature of the over-all program which this government has devised for the creation of better conditions for the Canadian agricultural industry. The farmers themselves can do much to assist in the solution of their economic problems by organizing themselves more closely and efficiently under the farm products marketing acts which have been set up in most of our provinces. If they will take that action, organize themselves effectively and adopt the necessary measures to bring their production into line with our national requirements, it would go a long way toward solving our agricultural problems. It is my opinion—and I offer this as a suggestion to the minister and the government—that the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act should be used in every way possible, not only to stabilize agriculture temporarily but also to encourage farmers to so organize and control their own production and their own destiny.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, we have already had five days of discussion on the first item of the agricultural estimates and I do not propose to take much more of the time of the committee in making my contribution. In any event I certainly do not intend to deliver a diatribe such as was thrown at us this afternoon by the C.C.F. member who represents the constituency of Skeena and who, although a labour man from the Pacific coast, is now apparently one of that party's experts on the problems of western farmers.

I do, however, wish to make a brief comment concerning one or two matters. First of all I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for the great planning that must have taken place in the preparation of these estimates now before us. It has been brought out before but I should like to emphasize again that the minister in his estimates has expenditures of $106,079,852 for this year, expenditures all of direct benefit to our great industry of agriculture. According to page 2 of the estimate book, the estimates for the Department of Agriculture are the sixth highest of all departmental estimates. I believe this indicates very forcibly the great interest this government has in the welfare of farmers all across Canada.

I hold in my hand a very interesting statement on the farm situation, Mr. Chairman. It is a statement by the Leader of the Opposition which I think should be put on the record because it puts the farm problem in its proper perspective. The little pamphlet is entitled: "Statements from the Hon. L. B. Pearson, September-November, 1958, as Reported in the Daily Newspapers". It was circulated and apparently a copy was given to me.

According to a statement in the Edmonton Journal of October 3, 1958, as reported in the publicity from the Liberal party headquarters, the Liberal leader said:

> It is clear that agriculture has not had a fair share of the national income for the past 10 or 15 years.

It goes on to say:

> The government in power at the present time "has a duty to do something about that".

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the Liberal leader says that the former government did not help the farmers and this government should do something about it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this government is doing something about it. Other speakers have given an outline of the long list of things that this government has already done in our long range farm program. Other parts of the program will be introduced in the house in the next few weeks.

While out in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre during the Easter recess I noted press reports implying that western members on the government side were not friendly to the mass delegation. In fact, it was suggested that we were not working in the interests of western agriculture. That is not true, Mr. Chairman. Most of the western government members are farmers themselves, or are directly connected with prairie agriculture. The 47 members from the three prairie provinces realize that we represent the western farmers, as we also represent business and professional groups and labour in our various constituencies. I think we did everything we possibly could to help in the visit of the mass delegation to Ottawa.

This does not mean that all of us agreed with the demands of that mass delegation for deficiency payments. I am not convinced myself that deficiency payments on the wheat, oats and barley delivered in the last three crop years is the most equitable way of distributing any help that this government may see fit to give. I am in the same position as the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose who spoke earlier. If the government gave deficiency payments in the manner suggested in the mass delegation brief on the amount of grain delivered to the elevators in the last three crop years I, too, would receive most of the maximum payment of $4,500 suggested in the brief as the limit to any individual farmer. I know many farmers in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre who would receive only a few hundred dollars by this suggested plan of cash distribution, and I imagine that their needs for cash are as great as mine, or as great as the needs of other farmers who, too, would receive the $4,500 maximum payment.

The problems of agriculture have occupied more of our time at this session than any other problem in Canada. I have stated this before and I certainly believe it. The standing committee on agriculture, of which I am a member, already has had several meetings, and we certainly will have many more meetings as other parts of the government's long range farm program are presented.

The question of the average cost of production for prairie grain farmers has been brought up on many occasions. It is realized that such a cost of production figure is necessary before a definite relationship between farm income and farm expenses can be established.

As an example of how farm costs may vary, I have two recent statements from farmers in the northern section of my own constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. The one farmer from around Watrous has just over 1,000 cultivated acres. His statement shows that in 1955, the first year in which deficiency payments are sought from the government, his total farm receipts—and these are his figures—were $14,873.39; but according to his figures his total operating costs were $17,176.47, without allowing, as he says, for any interest on his investment or any wages for himself. The farm, he says, is strictly a grain farm. Therefore, it fits into the picture of most of the farmers who came down on the delegation. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, in 1955, his total farm receipts were $14,873.39 and his operating costs were $17,176.47. This grain farmer shows in his statement a net loss of $2,302.67. These are his exact figures as he gave them to me, down to the last cent.

In 1956, the second year of demand for deficiency payments, he shows total receipts of $21,082.70 from his farm, and total operating cost of $18,035.73, for a net income this time of $3,056.97.

In 1957, the third year of deficiency payments claimed, his total receipts are shown as $13,748.54 and total operating costs as $16,330.09, or a net loss of $2,591.55.

In 1958, his total receipts were $11,069 and his total operating costs $14,332.12, or a net loss of $3,262.43. This actual statement was presented to me, Mr. Chairman, as an argument for deficiency payments.

For the benefit of the western members who are practical farmers, I will repeat the operating costs as given on this strictly grain farm of 1,050 cultivated acres. His costs include depreciation on machinery but, as he says, make no allowance for interest on his investment or payment of wages to himself. In 1955, total operating costs were $17,176.47; in 1956, $18,035.73; in 1957, $16,330.09; in 1958, $14,332.12. As I say, the farmer states these figures do not include any interest on his investment or any wages to himself.

I make no comment on these operating figures, Mr. Chairman. I myself think they are very high for an efficient grain farmer, but I just put them on the record for the consideration of the committee.

In contrast to this statement for deficiency payments, I have another letter from a farmer near Govan. This letter has been referred to in the house before, I shall read just one brief excerpt from the letter. This farmer writes:

> I am a farmer, farming one section of average land, have no other enterprise but grain growing, so work at my occupation only about six months of the year. Have gathered assets to the value of approximately $60,000 in 18 years and still would be eligible for most of the proposed deficiency payments.

In other words, the maximum of $4,500 for any one farmer. This second letter includes a year by year statement which shows that in 1942 the farmer was a renter on a half section, with no equity in the land he was working. Now, by his own statement, he has clear title to a section of land, has nearly $10,000 worth of machinery, no livestock and 12,000 bushels of grain in store on his farm on December 31, 1958.

I mention these two statements given to me by grain farmers in my own constituency to emphasize the problem of arriving at an average cost of production figure that could have some application for all prairie grain farms. The grain farmer who reported he has had total receipts of $70,774.72 in the past four farming years asks for deficiency payments. The other grain farmer, who has paid for a section of land since 1940, writes in his letter:

> I am of the firm opinion that any farmer operating a section or more of land reasonably efficiently should be in no need of assistance of any kind, excepting crop failure.

I quote these two statements, Mr. Chairman, to illustrate the great divergence in the views of western farmers themselves. I realize that the Department of Trade and Commerce, through the dominion bureau of statistics, is attempting to arrive at a fair figure for an average farm cost of production. I suggest that until we can obtain some such figure we cannot properly solve the farm problem. I think the example of the costs of the two farmers, as given by themselves, proves the need for some fair average figure.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture can help to impress on the bureau of statistics the necessity of quick action in this regard to obtain a fairly accurate cost of production figure. Again, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on the manner in which he is running his department. I am sure that under his leadership Canadian farmers can look forward to better years ahead. As the Liberal leader has suggested, this government is doing something about improving the agricultural situation.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this point of the debate, not as an expert in agriculture, but rather as the representative of a mostly rural constituency. I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) because, when he took on his duties, he was faced with a national agricultural situation that was particularly difficult, and even if, today, everything is not yet perfect, we must admit that the new leadership he has given to the government's farming policy augurs well for the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to launch into elaborate remarks about agriculture; I intend simply to express a few general ideas and a few proposals about problems pertaining to my constituency. Dairying is the chief agricultural industry in my constituency. So, today it was with great satisfaction, that I learned, as did all hon. members, that the price of butter had just been fixed at 64 cents a pound. It is good news for the farmers of my constituency and they will surely rejoice and congratulate the government for it. My colleague, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), has emphasized earlier certain problems which affect the agricultural industry of the province of Quebec, and particularly, the problem of the diseases which often cripple our herds. I can only endorse his remarks and ask, as he did, that the government increase its help programs aimed at protecting dairy herds.

There is also another problem which was emphasized the other day by our colleagues the hon. members for Bellechasse and Charlevoix (Messrs. Dorion and Asselin) a problem which also concerns the farmers of my riding, and that is the pulpwood problem. Those two hon. members have outlined the wrongs done to farmers who were cutting pulpwood on their farms. I can only approve what they said and ask that the necessary arrangements be made so that farmers be favoured in this field as well as in the others.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) referred in a general way to problems which particularly affect farmers. He emphasized in particular the exodus from the farm. It must be said that in our area, just as in many other communities, there is massive desertion of the farms. Different reasons account for this, but they can be related in many cases to the difficulties laid in the path of young men who would like to continue working on the farm. The situation of those young farmers is untenable on account of the very high cost of production which the farmers of the different areas of Canada must meet. The situation causes uneasiness and financial hardship which compel or incite farmers' sons to leave the farm and move to the cities to work in factories.

Mr. Chairman, that situation would certainly not be so bad if, during the last 20 or 22 years, the government had given the same attention to the farm industry as it did to other industrial sectors. Because the interest shown to the farm industry was not as great as that shown to the substantial industrialization which developed throughout Canada during the period I just mentioned, we now see that desertion turn into uneasiness and a most alarming calamity.

Mr. Chairman, mention was made a moment ago of another problem facing the farmers who want to earn their living on a farm, and that is the problem of mechanization; that problem is important because the cost of farm implements which the farmers must purchase if they want to operate their farm according to modern techniques is so high that they cannot meet the excessive price of the farm equipment they have to buy. Again in that field, there is plenty of food for thought; research should be made by the various governments in order to help the farmers meet the requirements of mechanized operation.

In conclusion, I would like to make a suggestion for the benefit of my constituency. My riding of Roberval is known throughout the province of Quebec, and I hope throughout Canada also, as the blueberry riding. It is, moreover, partly to this that we owe the name usually given to us. According to statistics supplied to me by the experimental farm of Normandin, between 1942 and 1956, about 14,220,000 pounds of blueberries were gathered each year representing an annual value of $1,961,641. You can appreciate that this is an extremely important income on which the farmers of my riding have come to rely. It is an important item because it is usually a net income since farmers are able to engage in this extremely profitable occupation at little cost.

During the past years, following research made at the Normandin experimental farm, it was found that the blueberry industry could be one of the most profitable industries for the riding of Roberval and the neighbouring area. But the development of this industry depends on certain research, on certain soil conditions, on soil analysis and on the reclamation of those lands known as "blueberry lands".

That is why, as was stated some time ago by the superintendent of the federal experimental farm in Normandin, the federal government should consider the possibility of setting up, at the experimental station in Normandin, a sub-station to study and analyse the reclamation methods of those blueberry lands, to study the "control" of vegetation which has nothing to do with blueberries, and to look after the "control" of the diseases and insects which threaten blueberry production.

I make this suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture Mr. Chairman, because the farmers in my riding, since my election, have been urging me to to ask the Department of Agriculture to deal especially with this problem. As I mentioned a while ago, this is an important industry bringing as it does to the farmers in my riding a supplementary income which is, at least as far as I know, for a great number of them a convenient way to make both ends meet.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the house any longer. I will have an opportunity to take up this matter again at a later stage when we consider the agricultural estimates. I shall then try to establish a case for some agricultural issues which affect the province of Quebec as a whole as well as the riding I represent in this house.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me even at this late hour to take part in this debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and to draw to the attention of the minister and the house some problems my fellow-citizens of Nickel Belt asked me to submit for their consideration.

I speak especially on behalf of my fellow-citizens who live in the French river area, the valley of Noeville, St. Charles and Alban, as well as the Warren area, Blezard Valley, Chelmsford, the heart of this riding, famous for its potatoes.

Notwithstanding this late hour, I would like to make a few remarks on the problems facing the average farmer in this country. Practically all day, we have heard representations mostly from western members. I agree heartily that the problems they are trying to solve are most important. But I would not like, on account of the serious problems confronting wheat growing in their provinces, to see a lack of interest for the problems facing the average farmer in northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

A while ago, the member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) brought to the attention of this house, and I agree with his remark, that the report on the economic prospects of Canada makes it clear in particular that the farm problems confronting northern Quebec and northern Ontario are probably as serious as in the west.

The people engaged in agriculture in my constituency are average farmers who in fact own but some 80 acres of land. We have noticed, since this government came to power, that our farmers are faced with many problems and I would like to bring to the attention of this house that these troubles are probably due to the promises which were made to the farmers before the last election. In fact, the promise was given, and emphatically, that the Conservative government, if re-elected, would give Canadian farmers a greater share of the national income. After the election, the farmer was therefore justified in believing that the government would bring in the remedies it had mentioned.

But after some amendments were introduced last year to farm legislation farmers increased their production and hardly a year later, we realize that the problems facing us in agriculture as well as in other fields have grown worse.

Today, Mr. Chairman, the minister's statement in the house showed that the direction given by him to agriculture gave rise to certain problems. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) was hardly less than ridiculous, a moment ago, when he said that, according to him, the minister's statement this afternoon indicated that special attention had been given to powdered milk production. But if we look over the minister's statement, we find that he wished rather to stop the assistance given that industry. It is so true that on the last page of his statement, he states that the established price will be granted only in part, until September of this year and stopped completely at that date.

That is why I say that the government is responsible for the crisis in that field. In fact, we read on the first page of the minister's statement that over-production of powdered milk was 103 million pounds, since the total production was 187 million pounds. This is to say that over-production in this country was, in a proportion of over 60 per cent, the result of the department's action.

In the light of those figures, I trust the minister will try, in the future, to avoid creating such a serious problem.

Mr. Chairman, there may be a point which affects more particularly the people in my district and I am speaking of farm financing. Several times last year in this house and at least on one occasion this year, we discussed the question of the average Canadian farmer's financial position.

Mr. Chairman, a moment ago, I heard a government member outline the financial position of the farmer in regard to the rising prices of farm implements.

The problems of inflation and of rising prices in various fields have often been discussed here.

The farmer, who must necessarily renew his machinery, is faced with additional expenses when he comes to buy farm implements which are indispensable to him. That is why I believe he should be, to some extent, granted help similar to that extended more particularly to village dwellers who were able to obtain loans from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In my opinion, the farmer could be granted assistance similar to that granted to citizens who want to set up what we often call a small industry. Our statutes include certain acts which authorize such loans, but the farmer has to rely on his own savings or on those of his family, or again on the good will of some of his friends who are able to lend him money, or still again obtain a loan from a caisse populaire or from a co-operative farm.

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that up to now the institution which probably helped our farmers the most, at least in northern Ontario, is undoubtedly the caisse populaire where, from time to time, they may obtain the necessary loans to help them carry on their production, and provide for the needs of their families.

However, I believe we should establish in this country a farmers' assistance program, so that our caisses populaires would not be the only ones to contribute to the progress of agricultural development.

We may well admire the work of those caisses populaires.

It is recognized that they have greatly helped the farmers, but still, I feel we should set up what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) has termed an industrial expansion bank.

I think the time has come, as pointed out by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, to move towards the establishment of an agricultural expansion bank, bearing in mind particularly that the cost of farm implements is so high and that the cost of running a farm is constantly on the increase. Young farmers could certainly benefit from the establishment of such an expansion bank.

Mr. Chairman, I know that Canada's farmers have always appreciated price supports, which incidentally were established by the Liberal government. The Minister of Agriculture has stated in the house today that the support price on butter will be maintained at the same level. However, it must be remembered that the present support price of 64 cents a pound is hardly better than the 58 cents price set by the Liberals a few years ago.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with my colleagues in urging the Minister of Agriculture to insure a closer check on over-production of certain goods in Canada.

I drew attention a moment ago, for instance, to the fact that the department now faces a problem because, in one particular field, farmers have been allowed to produce a 65 per cent surplus that only the stabilization board could absorb.

(Text):

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, it is indeed a real privilege for me to say a few words at this time concerning the agricultural estimates. Waterloo county is one of Ontario's best agricultural centres and has produced outstanding livestock for many years; on many occasions our farmers have been prize winners at the Toronto exhibition and other prominent fairs. The A. Seiling farms in my home town, Elmira, Ontario, have produced many winners in top competitions. The Waterloo county federation of agriculture, incorporated in 1944, along with junior farmers and other organizations, have made a fine contribution to the welfare of the area and to the whole agricultural economy of our district. As a matter of fact, it has made a fine contribution to the whole of Canada.

One of our present concerns, however, is the limited facilities which are available for hog testing programs. The advanced registry and record of performance testing for swine has done a great deal to raise the standard. In 1934 a station was set up at New Hamburg, Ontario, on the advice of the advanced registry board. In 1938 a 48-pen piggery was opened at Waterloo in my riding. The building program for the advanced registry station was resumed after the second world war, and in 1948 a 60-pen piggery was constructed at the Waterloo station. At the present time the capacity of the Waterloo station is 112 pens. This is an institution which we are proud to have in our riding, and we all know the capable direction which Mr. Ken Cappindale has given it over the last few years.

However, the capacity of the present station at Waterloo appears to be inadequate. In the last few years particularly a considerable number of entries have had to be turned down because of the lack of sufficient facilities. I would strongly suggest to the government that additional quarters be made available or that an entirely new and enlarged station be built.

It has played a most significant part in the breeding and selection of better hogs in the province of Ontario, and it must be increased in size to continue to fulfil this objective. Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture and his department have been ever ready to assist the Canadian farmer. With this in mind I would appreciate if this problem were given serious consideration at an early date.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words—I promise to make them brief—in connection with one or possibly two matters that are not in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. Before doing so I should like to compliment the Minister of Agriculture upon the way in which his department, and he personally, has helped me in my constituency on many problems. I want to say that there is no minister of the crown who has such a difficult position as the Minister of Agriculture. That is particularly true when you have people making such statements as we heard in the house this afternoon. One statement was so irresponsible that you would not think it could come from an hon. member of this house unless he in turn was on the lunatic fringe.

We have gone into various matters. I say "we" because it has been my privilege to sit and listen to certain members of the opposition and those in the far corner who have been making estimates and suggesting increases in the national budget. About every item which has been discussed involved an increase in expenditures. They suggested that such and such had to be increased, and then something else had to be increased, and if you summed up their entire suggestions and placed a monetary value on them you would find that their estimates would probably total in the neighbourhood of $4 billion additional added to a $6.6 billion budget. What can you think of such irresponsible suggestions coming from a group such as that? Would you think their suggestions are for the purpose of giving light to the Canadian people, or do they have a desire to lead astray?

In coming to the next point which I intend to make, that is the cost of farm machinery, the hon. member for Bow River touched on this point this afternoon and I want to elaborate somewhat on it. May I say that in talking with my constituents, the farmers, there is no problem which is more in their minds than the cost of farm machinery. I venture to say that I talked during Easter recess with some 40 or 50 farmers, and I cannot recall one conversation which did not include discussion about farm prices, and about all of those cost items entering into the farmers costs of production. These are the things you talk about when you sit down with a farmer and talk to him across his table over a cup of coffee.

The farmers invariably talked about the cost of farm machinery. The cost-price squeeze may come about as a result either of prices or costs. In other words, costs and prices are like the two blades of scissors; you cannot tell which one is doing the most cutting. So we have talked a lot about prices in the house but we have said little or nothing about costs. Costs are what the farmers are talking about, and I would suggest to the government that they give thorough consideration to the advisability of appointing of a royal commission to make a study of farm machinery costs. That analysis would not conflict with the price spread studies which are being made by Dr. Stewart because that particular investigation deals with the margins which are taken by different handlers of agricultural commodities. The commission which I am recommending would deal specifically with the cost of farm machinery, and I would also suggest to the government that in analysing those costs and hearing evidence they not only ask for evidence from machine companies but also from the farmers themselves.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, after all is said and done, the operation of this commission would focus attention on the most important problem facing the farmers in western Canada, and if it were properly handled and speedily executed it would clear the air and give the farmers an opportunity to see where they stand with respect to farm machinery costs. That commission would also recommend action which this parliament could follow in the next session. I therefore humbly suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he give serious consideration to the creation of such a commission, and in closing I again wish to compliment the minister most sincerely in every respect on the way in which he has so ably handled the affairs of his department.

Mr. Brassard: Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business is for tomorrow and as much of next week as the house leader can indicate?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will continue with these estimates and then take those of the Department of Transport. On Monday we propose to deal with five different motions in connection with committees. One is No. 10 on today's order paper, a motion to refer the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to a standing committee; then No. 11, setting up a committee to deal with the C.N.R. and Trans-Canada Air Lines; then No. 6, setting up a committee to deal with the Indian Act. There will be in Votes and Proceedings tomorrow, I hope, a resolution setting up a radio committee and another one to authorize the standing committee to deal with the elections act. We may have to ask unanimous consent of the house to deal with these on Monday; I believe they will not get on to be actual government orders before Tuesday. Then we will take item No. 7 on today's order paper, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act and then go on with the budget resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Second report of standing committee on marine and fisheries—Mr. English.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the announcement yesterday of the increase in the Bank of Canada rediscount rate to an unprecedented 4.9 per cent, an increase of more than 300 per cent in eight months, and the consequent further disturbing announcement of the increase in the prime lending rate of the chartered banks which raises for Canadians the spectre of higher interest rates generally, as has already been made apparent by other announcements by finance companies, and the need for immediate action by government to roll back interest rates and remove this threat to economic recovery.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia has moved under standing order 26 for leave to present a motion for the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. I note that subsection 6 of the rule provides:

> The right to move the adjournment of the house for the above purposes is subject to the following restrictions:
> (c) the motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session;

Although there has been no separate debate on this specific subject, we have just completed the eight-day budget debate in which this matter was raised and when there was full opportunity to discuss a financial issue of this kind. It seems to me that as the problem which the hon. member desires to debate, the question of high interest rates, is one that has not risen suddenly but has been a phenomenon of the past few months, and a widespread phenomenon, there has been ample opportunity for discussion during the course of the budget debate. My disposition would be to say that this is not a matter for which we should interrupt our proceedings at the present time.

Mr. Argue: So far as your intimation is concerned that this would be out of order because the matter had been discussed previously, I would suggest that is something that cannot be applied to this proceeding. It is a well known rule that if the house makes a decision on a given matter, it is impossible then to raise the same matter again in the same session. However, the mere discussion of any particular subject does not rule out its subsequent discussion at a later time during the session.

So far as the statement that this phenomenon has been going on for a number of months is concerned, of course that is a statement of fact. But it would seem to me that it is particularly urgent at this time because certain finance companies, certain mortgage companies, are announcing that they will take steps now, in the light of a number of previous rises in interest rates, to increase the interest charges they now make. We feel it is extremely urgent at this time to deal with this question because the rate is the highest in history and because it is now affecting interest rates to the ordinary Canadian citizen all across our country.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is one further point I should like to draw to your attention, and it is this. Last night in announcing the business of the house for next week I indicated that we would be discussing the budget resolutions, so there will be ample opportunity when these resolutions come up for a discussion of this nature to take place.

Surely this rule was never intended to enable an hon. member of the house to get up whenever there happened to be a change —for example in the interest rate—and move to adjourn the house. There may be many other similar types of changes that are made from time to time in the course of the administration of public affairs and, as Your Honour said, there have been other changes in the rates. The rates will probably be lowered one of these days, and of course we will not see my hon. friend jumping up to move to adjourn the house on that occasion bceause there would be no political hay to be made in such an event.

I suggest that if it is to be the practice in this house that whenever a change is made motions are moved to adjourn the house, the business of parliament would be made simply impossible. This would seem to be a matter of propaganda, and I suggest the motion should not be allowed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I certainly disagree with the leader of the house that this is a matter of propaganda. On the contrary, it is a very serious matter that will affect the rights of everyone in this country. As the hon. member for Assiniboia has just said, this is an occasion on which the interest rate has reached the highest point ever in the history of this country, and that surely is a serious matter.

I want to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the answer given by the leader of the house does not at all meet the position which has been laid before you. It is not a fact that the budget resolutions will dispose of this matter. It is true that the house leader announced the discussion of the budget resolutions, but as the business of the house is proceeded with the house knows full well that the budget resolutions may not be reached until Wednesday or Thursday or even until the end of next week. And then again, I might ask, when the budget resolutions are reached, which of them deals with the matter that is now before Your Honour for discussion?

Some hon. Members: None.

Mr. Chevrier: It is one thing for the leader of the house to say that the budget resolutions will take care of this matter, but it is another for him to point out the particular matter which will be dealt with when the budget resolutions are brought before the house.

This matter is not only of tremendous importance to the house but it is of equal importance to the people of this country. It is a matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) prior to the orders of the day yesterday, and certainly it should receive the proper discussion to which a matter of this importance is entitled, and that discussion would be carried on under the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that this matter was dealt with within the last few days, in general, in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) as reported at page 2623 of Hansard of April 13, in these words:

"and this house further regrets that the government has failed to present to parliament a planned financial and economic program designed to develop the economic health of the nation by, among other things—

And these are almost the words spoken by the hon. member for Assiniboia today:

—(a) reversing the trend of rising interest rates (b) establishing a capital gains tax".

This question of the rising rate of interest has already been dealt with; and in addition it was our intention on Monday next to move to go into supply. We were prepared to move on Monday in that direction. We were prepared to go ahead, and move to go into supply. The suggestion was made by the opposition that in view of the fact that internal arrangements made it necessary for the Leader of the Opposition to be in another part of the country on that date, the opposition would sooner not have the motion made on Monday. However, in view of the argument which has been advanced I suggest that every opportunity will be given on Monday. We will certainly provide a motion to go into supply, so the argument advanced by the hon. member for Laurier is met. We are not going to have to wait until Wednesday or even Thursday of next week; on Monday we can move to go into supply. I suggest first that the motion made is out of order in that it contravenes the rule that discussion on a matter cannot be brought up twice in the same session, particularly when it is embodied in an amendment, and second that we will give all hon. members every opportunity on Monday to do that which they desire to do.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister has said perhaps I might be permitted to add a word or two. So far as the amendment he mentioned is concerned, that has nothing to do with the matter, because since it was proposed there has been a change in the interest rate. Only yesterday it reached the highest point in our history, and that was not the situation at the time of the amendment. Therefore that argument means nothing.

So far as the Prime Minister's statement that we would have been given an opportunity on Monday to go into supply to discuss this matter, the Prime Minister is quite correct. I asked the leader of the house whether it would be convenient for the government to put the supply motion off until a week from Monday. I made that request, which I thought was a proper one, also before the announcement made yesterday about interest rates. But in view of that announcement and the anxiety displayed by the Prime Minister that this matter should be discussed at once, I would be glad now to withdraw that request and perhaps we could have a supply motion on Monday.

If the motion by the hon. member for Assiniboia is ruled out of order by you, sir, perhaps we could have a supply motion on Monday, because I would not like a request which I made in all good faith and which had nothing to do with the situation which developed yesterday to prevent the house from discussing such an important matter as a tight money policy which has resulted in the high interest rates reached yesterday.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think the question of high interest rates affects all members. I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for saying to the Prime Minister in this house that he would be quite prepared to have a supply motion on Monday so this matter might be dicussed. I believe the Prime Minister's suggestion was a good one, and I think it explodes his argument that a motion along this line is not in order since he has suggested that we have a supply motion on Monday with this very kind of amendment under discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not at all. There was no such suggestion. I said the opportunity would come on Monday, but as far as the rules are concerned the question still remains as to the propriety or regularity of such a motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members for their assistance in this discussion. I have no doubt as to what is the correct disposition of the motion, or the request for leave to adjourn the house. My view is not based on any lack of appreciation of the importance of the issue, but rather on the question of urgency of debate, which is the key to the interpretation of standing order 26. This question of high interest rates has been before the house from time to time. It is true the rate has gone higher in the last week than it was before, but the rate has been the subject of discussion and there has been full opportunity for debate. As was indicated, there will be further opportunity for discussion on this important problem.

I need say nothing more than that in my view this is clearly not something we should undertake at this particular moment.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

IMPENDING FIREMEN'S STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government proposes to intervene in an effort to prevent the strike of Canadian National Railways firemen and enginemen which has been set for May 1; that is, next week.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the question would be more properly directed to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): We have been watching the situation very closely, and in the light of the announcement made yesterday we are contemplating some meetings in the next few days.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Will the minister give consideration to the fact that the head of the union is in Ottawa today conferring with the president of the congress of labour? Would it not be desirable if the Minister of Labour, instead of waiting a few days, acted at once while this official is in Ottawa seeing the head of the congress?

Mr. Starr: I recognize the seriousness of the situation, but I do wish to give the fullest opportunity to the meetings which are being held today.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Because the key to the success or failure of the strike from either the company's point of view or labour's point of view is the attitude of the brotherhood of locomotive engineers, would the minister consider having conversations with officials of that organization at this time to determine their views on the matter?

Mr. Starr: That is being considered.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the very comprehensive and exhaustive report of the Bracken royal commission on the distribution of box cars. I wonder if the minister could say what action he is taking on the recommendations contained in that report, whether he is in the process of discussing this question with the Canadian wheat board, and whether the changes suggested to remove rank discrimination in the distribution of box cars will be implemented?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am very glad to receive the approval of the hon. member for Assiniboia with regard to this report, which is an exhaustive study of the box car situation in western Canada. I thought it would be wise to give ample time to all members of the house, including the hon. member for Assiniboia and the other farmer members of his group, to study this report in full before we enter upon a discussion of the problems involved therein. The wheat board has the report before it now, and in due course the matter will be given consideration.

I might at this stage express my thanks to Mr. Bracken for the exhaustive, comprehensive and useful report which he has produced.

AIR TRANSPORT

NEW ZEALAND—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DISCUSSIONS ON AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any information in connection with the discussions which I understand have recently taken place in Wellington between the Canadian and New Zealand civil aviation authorities?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. On Monday, April 20, as reported at page 2859 of Hansard, I made an announcement regarding the Canada-Australia air agreement of 1946, the possible revision of which was considered during the course of meetings between a Canadian delegation and Australian officials held in Melbourne earlier this month. Subsequently the Canadian delegation went to Wellington where they held similar discussions with the New Zealand civil aviation authorities.

The delegation has reported that their talks, which concluded yesterday, covered a wide range of aviation problems, with particular reference to present and future operations into New Zealand by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. These talks were most beneficial in producing better understanding of the approach to civil aviation problems of the two countries. It has been recognized that further exchanges of views would be in the common interests of both Canada and New Zealand.

In the meantime the New Zealand government has agreed to renew for a further period, that is up to the end of 1959, permission for the operation by Canadian Pacific Air Lines of their weekly service with DC-6B aircraft between Canada and New Zealand, in conjunction with their weekly service to Australia which I mentioned last Monday.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Transport a question arising out of the original statement he made in connection with the air agreement with Australia. Is C.P.A. now operating under the old agreement? What will happen to C.P.A.'s regular service pending the present discussions that apparently have not yet come to a final conclusion?

Mr. Hees: C.P.A.'s regular weekly service will carry on in the meantime, until those talks have been concluded.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPORTED INCREASE IN DISABILITY PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It arises out of the very extensive press coverage which a recent statement of his has had from coast to coast in the last few days. Would the minister enlarge on the statement he made recently to the Ottawa Citizen in Montreal that increases in veterans disability pensions can be expected?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive notice of this question; however, I saw the article in the paper. I might say that the report is much in line with general remarks I have made not only in the house but in the veterans committee to the effect that we were reviewing or intending to review practically all veterans legislation. Hon. members will recall that last year we reviewed three of the acts of the veterans charter, and this year we are reviewing three more. I stated that probably next year we would review the Pension Act and I was asked, of course, what the increase in pensions would be and in reply I said I hoped there might be some increases when we made the review. That is the statement.

As a matter of fact, I am not claiming that I was misquoted, but the article says:

> Mr. Brooks said all 23 acts relating to veterans were being studied and changes would be made to meet current needs.
> Changes in legislation governing disability pensions, with probable increases, were expected to be made before long.

I stated in the committee and I stated in the house, I think at the beginning of this session, that we hope next year to study the pension legislation and there may be a possibility of increasing basic pensions.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY—REPORTED STABBING OF GUARD BY INMATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have given notice to the Minister of Justice of two questions which I intended to pose to him. Perhaps because of his unavoidable absence I may be allowed to put them on the record and he can answer them probably next week.

My first question is, is the minister able to give the house any information regarding the reported stabbing of a Kingston penitentiary guard by an inmate who was a patient in the psychiatric ward, or in so far as the condition of the guard is concerned and the disciplinary treatment, if any, given to this inmate?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORT ON PRODUCTION AND SALE OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my second question is this. Following the statement of the minister, given in answer to a question of mine on February 24, which was that the director of research and investigation of the combines investigation branch expected to be able to transmit a statement of evidence regarding the investigation into the production, purchase and sale of fish in British Columbia to the restrictive trade practices commission within two months, can the minister tell the house whether this statement has been so forwarded and when the restrictive trades practices commission expects to commence the holding of hearings?

IMMIGRATION

NEWSPAPER REPORT THAT RULING DRAFTED BY CIVIL SERVANTS TO EMBARRASS GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Now that she has clarified her position concerning the immigration order in council of March 19, will she make a statement reassuring the house as to her position concerning the unwarranted press attacks on the civil servants in her department in connection with that matter?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the minister from Newfoundland whether he can bring the house up to date on the efforts he is making to avert the lay-offs in the iron mines on Bell island?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is another of these picayune questions the hon. member comes up with from time to time. If he has any questions he can direct them to the minister who has administrative responsibility. It may be humorous; it may indeed be productive of the humour that he intends to create as a result but, sir, it is not in keeping with the traditions of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, some weeks ago Your Honour will recall I asked the minister a similar question and he made a reply without any objection from the Prime Minister, and I was merely asking him to bring the report up to date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. McIlraith: Unemployment is picayune to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a typical observation from the hon. member for Ottawa West.

[Later]:

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Minister of Labour's well-known concern for the maintenance of employment in the country, I wonder whether I might ask him if any member of the government is taking any steps to attempt to avert lay-offs at Bell island?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, every consideration in that regard has been given by members of the government and by the department particularly charged with that responsibility. I want to assure the hon. member that every step has been taken. Consultations have been in progress regarding this matter. We are not in a position yet to see the results of these consultations and approaches, but I want to assure the hon. member also that every possible effort will be made to see that all hardships that may result will be alleviated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister any hope that the lay-offs can be averted?

Mr. Starr: I must admit frankly that I have not much hope that the lay-offs will be averted, simply because we are told that it is the intention of the company to terminate operations at No. 6 mine, and in any event the ore would have run out by the end of the year. That is the information given us.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like, with the unanimous consent of the house, to withdraw Bill C-4, An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act. I do so in order to give hon. members on the government side, who tabled an identical bill which was ruled out of order, an opportunity to discuss such bill.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure this is a matter which should be dealt with at this time, but the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is asking for the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw from the order paper an item which stands under public bills and orders as No. 44:

Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Boulanger for the second reading of Bill C-4, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. Green: Certainly not. The hon. member brought this bill in with a great flourish of trumpets. Now just let him carry it through.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. In view of the fact that we shall now have a supply motion on Monday and probably Tuesday, and not be able to follow the business indicated last night in respect to the establishment of committees, and particularly a joint committee of this house and the other place to deal with Indian affairs, can the minister indicate now when it is expected that this motion will be considered?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The business listed last evening for Monday will be the order of business for next Wednesday.

ROYAL VISIT

SUGGESTED GIFT FOR HER MAJESTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving or would give consideration to the suggestion first put forward I believe by Miss Anne Francis, distinguished broadcaster and commentator, that the government's gift to the Queen on the occasion of her forthcoming visit here might take the form of federal scholarships?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to take away from anyone the kudos which naturally appertains to a suggestion such as that, but my recollection is that the representative group of the council of women advanced the idea, and all I can say is that the nature of the gift to be given to Her Majesty the Queen is receiving the fullest consideration by my colleagues and myself.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE ON MANUFACTURE OF SMALL CARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether, in view of the statement made the day before yesterday by the president of the Chrysler corporation regarding the manufacture in Canada of small cars, he is now in position to particularize as to the government's decision in answer to representations made on Monday last by the united automobile workers, asking the government to arrange for consultations with management at the earliest possible moment to facilitate the manufacture of small cars in Canada so as to provide employment for thousands of people in that industry who are now out of work?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in that position.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When will you be?

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO RESTRICTIONS RESPECTING NEON SIGNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which is very minor, but which involves something that is current. Are there any restraints open to the national capital commission with regard to the placing of large neon signs such as the new one of the E. B. Eddy Company which, according to some protests I have received, detract from a proper capital atmosphere?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that the hon. member put his question on the order paper, as it is not really a matter of urgency which should be answered on the orders of the day. In any event, it asks for legal opinion.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is he yet in a position to say if any agreement has been reached with the government of Ontario concerning the development of the port of Moosonee?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—STATEMENT ON CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me a question with regard to an international conference on lead and zinc and I promised to reply, which I am now prepared to do.

A meeting of the United Nations lead and zinc committee will commence on April 28 in New York. It is expected to last three days and to concentrate its attention upon developments since the previous conference, which was held in Geneva last November. In the first days of the following week there will be an inaugural meeting of a continuing lead and zinc study group which it may be decided shall supersede the existing committee.

The first object of these meetings will be to assess the demand and supply situation in these metals, to endeavour to reach a common understanding regarding present trends, to establish what may be the cause of any difficulties confronting the world industry and to discuss various governments' viewpoints on the necessity and possibility of any remedial action. It would also be appropriate for the conference to give its attention to the possibility of improving the extent and currency of statistical information and to the factors which affect levels of consumption.

The existing surplus situation in these metals was complicated by the action of the United States government in October of last year to restrict imports of lead and zinc in metal and concentrate forms to 80 per cent of the average United States imports during the five years ending in 1957. At the Geneva conference last November this action on the part of the United States was the object of criticism by many members of the conference. The Canadian government's views regarding the United States import quotas are well known to the house. Canadian objections have been expressed in a formal exchange of notes. Canadian rights to compensation for impairment of important tariff concessions by the United States under GATT have been reserved. This matter was also examined in January in the joint United States-Canada committee on trade and economic problems, as reported in the communique issued at the end of those meetings. Our position is unchanged.

The Canadian delegation will again make it clear that Canada is willing to explore the necessity for and possibility of an international agreement, but that to be acceptable to Canada any such agreement must find wide support with all major importing and exporting countries playing their full part.

I have received a number of representations from Canadian industry and I have noted the position taken by the Canadian metal mining association endorsing the stand taken by the Canadian delegation at the Geneva meetings. A strong delegation will attend from Canada comprised of senior official experts and accompanied by leading businessmen from the Canadian industry as advisers.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I thank the minister for the answer he has given to the question. I wonder whether he can tell us the personnel who will comprise the Canadian delegation, at least in so far as the government is concerned?

Mr. Churchill: I regret that I do not have the names in front of me, but I can announce them on Monday.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO REMARK IN DEBATE ON APRIL 23

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make a correction in yesterday's Hansard? I can understand the difficulty because there were a number of interjections. On page 2986 near the top, following two or three other interjections, there is the following:

> Mr. Horner (Acadia): Did the hon. member for Assiniboia write your speech?

Because of the difficulty at the time I did not hear that remark but I would point out that, unlike the Tories, we are not accustomed to having other people write our speeches.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is taking advantage of the Chair by purporting to make a correction when it is not a correction.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration branch—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $747,531.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a largely rural constituency, I could not let the Department of Agriculture estimates go by without saying a few words on the problems of a very important sector of our national economy.

In my first speech here, last year, I outlined the history of colonization in the Saguenay district and, if I remember well, I mentioned that our economy was based largely on agricultural production. With the industrialization which came later on, the surplus of our population found a ready market and formed the elements of a working class still imbued with rural spirit, and which is therefore different from the ordinary working class found in large cities. Agricultural production in the constituency of Chicoutimi is based on the dairy industry, and that is why farmers in my area are particularly affected by surplus production in that field.

Like the hon. member for Kent (N.B.) (Mr. Michaud), I am very grateful to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) for disregarding certain advice that support prices on all dairy products be removed. The considerable surplus of milk powder now glutting the market is precisely a result of a support price fixed at too high a level. That is why I feel that the decision to lower that support price is wise, since it will allow us to dispose of those surpluses, while increasing cheese production for which the market is now excellent.

I am glad to point out here the initiative taken by the Agricultural Co-operative Society of Chicoutimi which, even before being informed of the ministerial decision, had taken steps to cut down its milk powder production and increase its cheese production. Initiatives of that type on the part of private enterprise will no doubt help the government re-establish a fair balance in the production of dairy products.

The Minister of Agriculture must also be congratulated for having granted a subsidy of 25 cents per hundred pounds on all milk delivered to processing plants. To a certain extent, this subsidy will help narrow the gap between the price paid to suppliers for whole milk and the price paid to suppliers at processing plants.

Mr. Chairman, the study of these estimates gives me an opportunity to register a protest, on behalf of Quebec cheese producers who, under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act, are being paid one half cent less per pound than Ontario producers. I realize that such an injustice is not intentional, but that it is the accidental result of statistics compiled for the last ten years. However, I think the minister should introduce the necessary legislation to rectify this abnormal situation where producers living closer to distribution and export outlets are receiving less than those living farther.

Mr. Chairman, a good many farmers in my constituency have to do some woodcutting to earn enough to meet their family's needs. The main demand is for pulpwood, which is bought by the large paper mills. It is known that there is a certain slowdown in the production and sales of pulpwood, but the fact remains that our larger mills could easily absorb the ten thousand odd cords of pulpwood that are cut by our settlers and farmers. Due to certain misunderstandings, sales have slowed down; moreover, a Department of Justice investigation has revealed the existence of a vast conspiration, among the big corporations, to cheat farmers out of this important part of their income. I therefore hope that the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act will also be made applicable to wood that is cut by settlers and farmers, so that in the future, they will be assured of a minimum return for their efforts.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I also, on behalf of my constituents, urge that soil classification and analysis be carried out as soon as possible, as this would enable us to draw up an overall plan for maximum land use. At the present time, because no such plan exists, certain settlers are living on marginal lands that should have remained part of the forest industry, and these people merely eke out a living because their income is comparable to the land prevailing in underdeveloped countries, and they are a problem for all the public and private charity groups.

Then, in order to protect our cattle which represent a major part of our rural inheritance, I wish that necessary steps be taken to fight brucellosis, which is responsible for great losses.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, having expressed my opinion concerning agriculture a few weeks ago, it was certainly not my intention to take part again in the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). However, following the statement he made yesterday, I can't help making a few comments.

First of all, I must say to the minister that we sympathize with him because he seems to be going through a critical period. We wish nevertheless to show him our good will and to put the best of our knowledge at his disposal in order to help him settle the problems which face the farm industry and whose consequences have been felt for some time.

Following the minister's statement, I was most surprised by the speeches made by government members from the province of Quebec. They made certain comments on the minister's statement, and their remarks were mostly congratulatory.

The minister was praised for having granted a 25 cent subsidy for every hundredweight of milk intended to be used for the production of cheese or skim-milk. That is all that was said. No comment was made on the price of milk powder and I think I can even state that not a single member on the government side understood the minister's statement, particularly as far as the price of milk powder is concerned.

As a matter of fact, the minister's statement, of which I am giving only a summary and not a literal translation, is to the effect that the price of milk powder has been reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents per pound, no mention whatever being made of the quality of the product. Only skim milk powder is mentioned in the minister's statement.

However, we know there are two types of milk powder: one produced by the spray process and the other by the roller process. We are just being told that milk powder will be reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents per pound, with no mention of what the price will be for roller processed milk powder. However, Conservative members have praised the minister, without making out what his statement meant. What will be the results of such a policy? I think that the lower price for milk powder will immediately result in the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars for industrialists and manufacturers, since we are told about this lower price for milk powder only six days before the first of May.

Manufacturers have large stocks in their warehouses and tomorrow, that is on May 1, at what price will milk powder be sold? Maybe 5 cents, maybe 6 cents, maybe 8 cents, I hope. The blunt fact is that manufacturers are going to lose hundreds of thousands of dollars. And what about the losses the farmers will sustain?

The minister says that the price of milk powder will be reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents a pound. That does not seem to be serious. He made that statement with disconcerting assurance in about the same frame of mind as the Minister of Finance when he announced his tax boosts.

This policy will have the following effect on farmers: a reduction of 15 cents per hundred pounds of milk powder will be tantamount to a reduction of 40 to 50 cents per hundred pounds of milk.

Last night I got in touch with manufacturers so as to find out what they thought of this policy. It is true that there will be a subsidy of 25 cents per hundredweight, so that, officially, the price of milk powder will be 15 cents. But what happens then to the manufacturer? He will have to take whatever price he can get for his milk powder. Then, he will reduce the price he pays per hundredweight to make up for the lower price he gets for his milk powder.

Manufacturers told me last night that they would lower their purchase price by 40 to 50 cents. This is in addition to last year's price reduction.

Everybody wants to rescue the farmers, to save the Quebec dairy industry! Last year, in our area, milk was selling at $2.90 per hundredweight in the summer and $3 in the winter. Officially, the price should come down to $2.90 on May 1 next. We do hope it is not going to fall below that level.

Now if we examine the purport of the minister's statement and if we try to determine the economic impact of that price change, we find that the government will have to spend from $15 million to $17 million to pay that 25 cent premium per hundred pounds of milk. The spending of $15 to $17 million to protect an economic sector such as agriculture is not too important. What is more serious is what the farmers will be losing. The production of milk in Canada for industrial use is estimated at approximately 7 billion pounds, and we will have to pay 25 cents per hundredweight of milk, which means that the government will have to spend from $15 to $17 million.

On the other hand, if manufacturers of milk powder cut the price by 40 cents to 50 cents per hundredweight of milk, what will be the cost to farmers? Let us take the same quantity of milk and let us reduce its price to 40 cents per hundredweight, and we arrive at an amount of $30 to $32 million; such is the loss farmers will suffer as a consequence of the announcement just made by the Minister of Agriculture. Farmers will thus lose 30 million while getting 17 million dollars. Then the Conservative members will come and say in the house: "We are saving the dairy industry: we are giving farmers 17 million dollars."

The manufacturer is then asked to report to the Minister of Agriculture on the quantity of milk he receives for the production of milk powder or cheese. This is another inconvenience which the manufacturer does not like too much but he will supply those reports willingly because he is quite as interested as the minister, and even more so, in saving the farming class.

Yet, the Catholic Farmers' Union (Union catholique des cultivateurs) had made some suggestions and I am surprised to find that hon. members from the province of Quebec who rose yesterday did not mention those suggestions of the professional farmers association in the province of Quebec. None of them mentioned the wishes of our farming population. That is why I am pleased to inform the house of proposals made in this respect.

I shall quote an item by Mr. Guy Hamel, published in L'Action Catholique. The author reports the words of Mr. Lemoine during a meeting of the joint committee of the U.C.C. and the federated co-operatives with the Minister of Agriculture here in Ottawa. Mr. Lemoine said:

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is Mr. Lemoine their president?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Lemoine is the general president of U.C.C. and he said:

> Mr. Lemoine has pointed out that prices asked in Quebec are not based on western grain prices or on the inefficiency of some producers, but on the average Quebec farm unit.
> "It is not a premium on inefficiency and routine that we want; we merely want the serious farmer to be able to make a living." He added that the dairy producer was the one who, up to now, had cost the least money to the government of Canada and that he should not have to be penalized or forgotten simply because he might have failed to state his case forcibly enough.

The program suggested to the government was something like this. It is outlined in an article by the same writer, published in L'Action Catholique, stating that the contract which the government should sign was a contract with milk powder producers, whereby the government would agree—

> ... to buy unsold production at a floor price if, at the end of each month, the producer can show that he has produced 10 per cent less than the corresponding month of the previous year. Thus the surplus production of milk powder would decrease by 10 per cent and the industry would be forced to diversify its production.
> 2. The government would pay a subsidy to the producers to make up for any loss on the floor price.

Earlier there had been a reference to a subsidy of 40 cents a hundred pounds instead of 25 cents.

> 3. The government would get the industry to sign an agreement to decrease their production of milk powder by 10 per cent a year.
> Thus, the industry would be assured of a reasonable profit margin, and production would be directed towards other sectors at the rate of 10 per cent a year.

That was a wise suggestion, and it would not have complicated the useful production control procedures which are being planned, according to minister's statement of yesterday.

Mr. Chairman, I could comment on many other subjects, but I will only deal with the price support policy in regard to hogs and poultry.

The suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture to change the support price for hogs shows that the price support policy has not achieved the purpose for which that act was passed. After being in effect for two years, that law is already obsolete, and yesterday, the minister broke the very law he proposed himself barely two years ago.

A few months from now, he will be amending the price support legislation on pork so as to lower the price from $25 to $23.65. What, again, will be the result of such a policy? First, the price of pork will drop below the present level, because the government intends to stop buying and storing pork; instead, it will pay compensation to restore the difference between the free market price and the price that will be in force next October, that is $23.65.

The other result will be to destroy the balance between the price of fowl and beef in relation to pork. This will cause a general drop in the price of other products.

However, there is one advantage to this plan: it will protect the professional farmer. The present government's price support policy has caused great harm to the farmers while helping the integrators. And the Minister of Agriculture has shown a serious lack of foresight in enacting this legislation without providing a means of preventing integrators from sharing in the support price policy. I therefore urge him to consider the matter further, with a view to protecting farmers and family farms by ensuring that price supports work not against them, but to their advantage.

We can see what is happening in the agricultural industry. Between 90 and 95 per cent of the production of broilers is dependent on feed manufacturers and operators of meat packing plants. Today, a farmer cannot produce on his own, because production is controlled. I ask the minister to consider the act and to put forth an amendment to give better protection to professional farmers. Last year, the price of broilers was from 16 to 17 cents a pound and in January of this year, from 14 to 16 cents a pound, while the price of turkey varied from 22 to 28 cents a pound, according to grade and weight.

Why should the government not make compensation payments for poultry products like broilers, chickens and turkey? Why does it not prohibit poultry meat imports from the United States?

Last year, we imported $5,408,000 worth of turkey meat or poultry parts; in fact, since 1957, the government has issued 89 import permits for various poultry meats.

I do not know the total quantity of poultry meat that was imported last year, but I have here that of various poultry meats imported under the 89 permits issued between July 1957 to May 30, 1958; we then imported 1,576,000 pounds of poultry meat, apart from the poultry imported since May 1958, when import permits were revoked.

The same goes for broiler chickens. I do not know the quantities of broilers that have been imported, because this kind of imports does not require any permit.

As far as the prospects of the poultry industry are concerned, I must say they are not very promising, since, according to the March edition of L'Actualité économique, the production of broilers would increase by 62 per cent over the same period last year. As far as the production of heavy turkeys is concerned, it will increase by 100 per cent, while that of light turkeys will increase by 4 per cent; it means that during the coming year, the price of poultry will be lower than last year. Besides the price of milk is being reduced as well as the price of pork, etc.

In the last few months the Minister of Agriculture also made statements to the effect that unless farmers curtailed their production, this government would have to take severe steps either by lowering support prices or, if necessary, by controlling production. How could he induce farmers to reduce production at a time when they are forced to increase it in order to lessen production costs which are already too high? When the government asks farmers to reduce their production, does it mean the big farmer or the small farmer, or does it mean the contract farmer?

Has anything been done to dispose of dairy products surpluses, or hog surpluses and especially of milk powder surpluses? Nothing is left undone to solve the problems of western farmers, who are granted subsidies for their wheat production. Recently they received a $40 million grant from the government, to make up for the low prices they get for their grain, and we congratulate the government for doing so.

And yet western farmers are not satisfied, because a number of them will have to quit the farm, as will one third of Quebec farmers a year or two hence, unless farming conditions are improved in this country.

This year, the intention seems to be to have eastern farmers pay certain premiums or grants which we will be required to pay to some industries, coal or gold mining, in particular.

According to Mr. Mel Andal, who appeared before the Senate committee on soil utilization, one third of the 575,000 Canadian farms are uneconomic units, inhabited by 2,746,000 persons. Of that total number, 55,000 farms located in the prairies are made up of less than 130 acres, and their operation cannot provide a decent standard of living for their owners. In addition, there are in the eastern part of this country 187,000 farms comprising less than 70 acres of improved land. The farmers who operate those farms cannot get a return which would enable them to meet the needs of their families.

The best proof of that statement was given the other day at a sitting of the committee on agriculture where the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) asked for detailed information concerning the percentage of western farmers and eastern farmers who pay income tax.

At this stage, I should like to read an article published in La Presse, on April 8, 1959, and I quote:

Statistics show that more than 60 per cent of farmers who pay income tax live in Alberta and Saskatchewan, he said.

Of course, the reference here was to the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Western farmers are rather resentful about it. They can hardly account for the fact that only recently 20,000 Saskatchewan farmers paid this tax while only 780 in Quebec did so.

Mr. J. Gear McEntyre, deputy minister of the Taxation Division in the Department of National Revenue, replied that agriculture in the province of Quebec is just sufficient to provide a livelihood for those engaged in it. Returns were checked, but investigations have borne out that most of the incomes in question were not taxable. According to a survey conducted ten years ago, the average farmer's income in eastern Canada is well below the level of taxable income.

That did not prevent Mr. Fisher from saying that Quebec farmers were making good money cutting pulpwood.

Mr. Chairman, if Quebec farmers do not pay any income tax it is simply because they do not earn enough.

On the other hand, if the hon. member for Port Arthur thinks that our farmers are getting rich cutting wood in the forest in the winter months, I would suggest that he go out to the Abitibi area in Quebec, as well as the maritimes, and see how much those people are getting for their pulpwood.

Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated in Rimouski that a support price would be placed under pulpwood. However, we never hear anything about it any more, and members on the government side who consider themselves economists never say a word about it either.

The farm policy of the Conservative government is a complete wash-out that will lead thousands of farmers into bankruptcy, because of the price reduction affecting all farm products, especially in eastern Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I agree that the present surplus is embarrassing to the Minister of Agriculture. However, that situation is the result of the fine promises made by Conservative candidates during last elections. Farmers had then been promised their share of the national income, and a refund to each family of the excess $120 that the Liberal government was taking out of their pockets each year.

While the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) forecasts a general recovery in every economic and industrial sector, the Conservative government, through its farm policy, is taking the bread out of the mouth of farmers and their families.

On April 14 last, L'Action Catholique published an editorial which sums up my position perfectly, and which says:

The problem of the dairy industry cannot be considered by itself, outside the economic and social context of which it is the key. If there is a depression in that sector, the whole of Quebec's agriculture will be hit by that depression at a time when, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), a general recovery is starting in other sectors of our economy.

Mr. Chairman, I ask all hon. members from the province of Quebec, and others from eastern Canada, to mark the following paragraph:

That present surpluses are a matter of embarrassment for the government is easy to understand. But has any effort been made to dispose of them, that is an effort even remotely comparable to those made on behalf of wheat producers?

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. Harkness: I think I should say something now to dispel the complete misconception which the hon. member who has just spoken evidently has with regard to the new stabilization program for dairy products and with regard to the stabilization program generally.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska indicated clearly that he has not understood the import of the announcement I made yesterday; and in addition, of course, the figures he produced are complete nonsense. They are worse than those produced by the Martin bureau of statistics. They are complete nonsense and bear no relationship to the facts, and for that reason I think I should set the record straight.

The 25 cents per hundred pounds mentioned in the statement yesterday is not being paid to the manufacturers, as the hon. member seems to think. It is being paid to the producers. It will be paid directly to the farmers; therefore as far as people sending milk to the cheese factories are concerned, they will get more money for their milk than they were receiving formerly, instead of taking a loss on it. As far as people delivering milk for general manufacture are concerned, rather than a loss of 40 or 50 cents a hundred pounds the biggest reduction they should get in any circumstances should be 15 cents per hundred pounds, and in many cases there should be no reduction at all. The hon. member evidently does not understand the complexities of the milk business, in addition to failing to understand, perhaps deliberately, the statement I made yesterday.

The hon. member also said that the prices of all agricultural products in Quebec had gone down, apparently in an effort to convey the impression that they had gone down since this government took office. Actually the price of nearly every agricultural product has gone up since this government came to power. If the hon. member will look at the statistics with regard to the prices of agricultural products during the past year as compared to those received when the Liberal government was in power he will find that there has been a very material improvement. He will also find that last year the farmers of Quebec received a larger cash income than they had ever received in any previous year in history. In addition, as I said, the prices they received for most of their products were considerably better than they had been when the Liberals were in power.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? I fully understand the statement he made yesterday and I know full well that 25 cents per hundred pounds of milk will be paid to the farmers. I would like to know whether the manufacturer will have to pay the minimum price for milk or if he will be free to set his own price. I know very well that the farmer will get 25 cents and that the price is not supposed to go down by more than 5 cents a hundred pounds for the manufacture of milk powder. But the manufacturer will not be in a position to sell milk powder at a lower price; consequently he will set the price of milk according to the price of milk powder. That is the way I understand the situation.

Now, the Minister of Agriculture says that the farmer got more cash in 1958 than he ever did in previous years. I admit that the income from the sale of agricultural products has increased in 1958.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Boulanger: Very well, I accept the cheers of the hon. members on the government side. However, I must add that it is not the farmers, but the integrators who got the most money, both in Quebec province and in Ontario.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed the pleasure of asking a question of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger)?

Mr. Boulanger: Please do.

Mr. Pigeon: What action does he suggest to dispose of the overproduction of milk powder that now exists in Canada, and what does he think of milk powder companies who were aware of the present overproduction situation? Were such companies helping the farmers, or were they considering their own interests. I should very much appreciate an answer to that.

Mr. Boulanger: If there had been time, I would have answered the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). If he insists on getting an answer, I shall give him one: let him begin by studying the speech made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) who made some suggestions with regard to the matter, for which I want to commend him.

Mr. Pigeon: What are your suggestions? You did not answer me. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska did not answer my question; this is no answer.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I cannot allow this to develop into an argument. A question was asked, and it was answered.

(Translation):

Mr. Rompre: Mr. Chairman, may I—

Mr. Pigeon: Would it be possible, Mr. Chairman, to get an answer to the question I have asked of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska?

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member cannot enforce an answer.

(Translation):

Mr. Rompre: Mr. Chairman, as the representative of a mostly rural constituency, may I take a few minutes of the time of this committee at this point in the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) to submit a few requests that have been made by farm organizations of my constituency, and, at the same time, to express to the minister my satisfaction for the statements he made yesterday about the support price for the products of the dairy industry.

I believe I am right, Mr. Chairman, in saying this, because the price that will be guaranteed for the next twelve months in this regard meets the wish expressed by the heads of the province of Quebec farm association, and the U.C.C. who recently came to the committee on agriculture to submit their brief, and acknowledged that the government should check the powdered milk production because of the rather heavy stocks of that product.

I also want to express, on behalf of those people in my riding who follow that profession, all my appreciation to the hon. Minister of Agriculture for the generous manner in which he, as well as hon. members of this house and the farmers' unions concerned, co-operated in the study of the suggestions submitted and the brief presented to him, in view of obtaining a stable and proper price level.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Chairman, if other classes in society realize the considerable work which must be done on a farm in order to make it yield enough to allow a family to live in reasonable comfort.

I am myself a farmer's son, living in a parish which is essentially a farming district. I know that, unlike a good many city people who work only five days a week, these people have to toil seven days a week and, in many cases, require the help of other members of the family, even school children, in order to get things done.

For a good many farmers the revenue obtained from the sale of dairy products is not enough; they have to make up for it by seeking work outside the additional revenue they need to survive. Some of them take jobs in logging camps, others earn extra money by raising hogs, poultry or from a maple bush, sometimes also by very carefully making use of their wood lots. Let us stop and consider for a moment the degree of insecurity the farmer has to face, because of possible losses, which quite frequently occur.

Many farmers in my riding were affected this year by the loss of some of their cattle in the outbreak of rabies. I wish to express my appreciation to the minister for the work done to check this disease by having dogs vaccinated. But there is still an enemy that causes great concern: the fox. A great many of my constituents have told me about that animal which remains in the vicinity of farm buildings, even refusing to run away from man, a behaviour which is certainly contrary to its normal wild instincts and denotes symptoms of the disease in its latent form.

While I was in my riding last week-end, I got a phone call from the mayor of St. Gilbert who told me that a farmer had lost an animal which, according to the veterinary, had probably been bitten by a fox that had caused great damage a few days before in the hen-house of that farmer.

I received another letter this week from a St. Augustin farmer who according to the veterinary's report, suffered a similar loss.

I mention those cases, Mr. Chairman, to acquaint the government with this situation and enable it to study the problem which could be solved perhaps by providing a bounty to promote fox hunting.

I made those few remarks so that everyone may realize the plight of this class of workers referred to yesterday by my deskmate in this house, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Rogers) when he said:

(Text):

As a matter of fact, it seems to be an established fact that farm prices are the first to go down and the last to go up.

Well, it really makes you think.

Recently, I received from the secretary of the Quebec district association of Ayrshire cattle breeders, a resolution passed at a general meeting asking the government to give effect to the latest requests for herd "control". According to information given to this house by the minister, this temporary delay has been caused by a shortage of staff. I have no doubt that even if this means increasing the staff, there will be no difficulty involved in giving effect to these requests from the farmers, who are anxious to follow the instructions given by their technical advisors, namely the agronomists, so as to improve their herds. In closing, I wish to express my great appreciation to the government for the attention it has been giving to the farmers, so as to enable them to take their rightful place in Canada's economy.

Mr. Belzile: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will allow me to take up a few minutes of the committee's time to make my humble contribution to this discussion. I should like to make it known to the committee at the outset that I have no intention, in my brief remarks, to indulge in what is commonly known as petty politics.

It is my aim to be as realistic as possible and to examine briefly the various aspects of the difficult problems facing the Minister of Agriculture and the government in the management of the country.

Since my election to this house last May, I have been listening closely to most of the speeches made by hon. members. As far as I am concerned, this is the third time I have had the opportunity to speak.

I listened to the criticism of the opposition; I listened to members from all the provinces of our country who did their utmost to draw attention to their respective problems and those that are common to the whole nation.

Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago, I listened to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) who tried to draw a gloomy picture of agriculture under the Conservative government. And I wish to repeat once more—and I do not want to indulge in politics but only make sure that the fact is recorded that economic crises have not always been the outcome of Conservative governments—that, if at the present time, we have an economic recession which, fortunately, is about to disappear, the Conservatives are not responsible.

Mr. Chairman, a few days before the 1930 election, perhaps some members now sitting in this house were not old enough to realize the economic situation of the time, but the one who is talking to you was then head of a family and was operating a farm.

Prior to the 1930 election—and the Conservatives were not in power at the time, it was the Liberal party, and it had been in power, I believe, since 1921—butter was selling for 18 to 20 cents a pound; eggs, 12 to 15 cents a dozen; pork, 10 to 12 cents a pound; beef, 8 to 10 cents a pound. The worker earned an average salary of $1.50 to $2 a day to provide for the needs of his family.

I do not think the figures I have just quoted are indicative of a fruitful administration, and the legacy it left, after the 1930 election, was not a very enviable economic situation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not like to hand out compliments indiscriminately, but I believe it is worth noting, even briefly, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture deserves congratulations for the ability, the tact and the practical leadership he has shown a few days ago, when he decided to lower the support prices for certain agricultural products, a decision he announced to the house yesterday.

Starting October 1 the price of hogs will be reduced by one dollar and some cents a hundredweight; however, a subsidy equal to the former price will be paid to the average farmer. That is where, Mr. Chairman, we see the value of the system that the Minister of Agriculture is using to discourage and destroy vertical integration, i.e. by discouraging those who make a large business of hog raising and production. Of course, these are private undertakings on which the government has no direct control, because the government cannot stop a large feed manufacturer from setting up hog raising farms able to market an unusual number of pigs each year. But, in a general way, the former system, with fixed support prices far from discouraging integration, favoured it because, no matter how many hogs each producer put on the market, he received a uniform price on the whole, for his product; he received the same support price as the smaller producer.

Not very long ago, Mr. Chairman, I received a letter from a farmer in my riding who hinted in rather broad and uncertain terms, that the farm group, the average producer, who has a family living and makes a living out of farming, that the Minister of Agriculture should adopt a policy that would establish a distinction between the professional producer and the man who takes to hog raising on an integrated basis.

In La Terre de chez nous, on April 8, 1959, there was an editorial by Mr. Louis-Philippe Poulin, entitled "Hog prices policy". Mr. Poulin said in this editorial among other things:

> The application of deficiency payments to a specific number of hogs per farm seems to us to be much more effective, even though such a system gives rise to some problems.

At the outset of his article, the author says:

> The average farmer must derive advantages from it.

In brief, the article of Mr. Poulin is in favour of the policy and of the prices which were announced to us yesterday by the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

With regard to the support price of butter, we all know that this price is maintained at 64 cents a pound. It is my conviction that on account of his wisdom and competence the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not been maintaining the support price of butter at such a level to please those who produce this product. Indeed, he has shown realism, since statistics show that, as of January 1, 1955, we had in stock 91,151,000 pounds of butter, compared with 69,899,000 pounds as of January 1, 1958. If you take into account the fact that our population was 15,803,000 inhabitants in 1955, when our stocks of butter reached 91,151,000 pounds and the fact that our population has now increased to 17,000,000, we can reach the conclusion that present stocks of butter, proportionately and on the basis of the individual average, are much less substantial than they were in 1954 and 1955. In my opinion, the Minister of Agriculture has shown wisdom in continuing to encourage the manufacturers of butter to continue their production. Undoubtedly, neither the farmers nor the producers of butter will get rich on 64 cents a pound. Nevertheless, this price will enable the average farmer to have from his dairy herd, a reasonable if not a big return.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose my hon. friend, the member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) expects me to talk about milk powder. The hon. member's wish will be fulfilled, as I intend to speak on this matter. However, before I undertake a detailed analysis of the matter, I would like to stress the fact that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say that the policy of the hon. Minister of Agriculture as far as powdered milk is concerned, answered a need and showed that he has a good deal of practical common sense when it comes to implementing his price support policy.

Powdered milk is not used very much in Canada. It is also a product for which there is little demand on the export markets and which is perishable. After a few months, it loses much of its value and taste and it would certainly not be wise to maintain its present level of production in Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, it is a known fact that in everything we reap as we sow, and the complication now arising in relation to the price of milk powder is the result of the fact that in 1957, the government then in power, without being even requested to set a minimum price for milk powder, introduced a 17 cent a pound support price. What happened then? In the province of Quebec alone, we saw a score of new industries develop and we saw the work of many co-operative members being sabotaged by people who had set their minds to make money through the processing of milk into powder. We have also farm organizations, butter and cheese co-operatives, being crushed or blotted out. We have seen them disappear and replaced by milk powder producers who had one purpose, that of making money with their plants. That brings me, Mr. Chairman, to what I said a moment ago. We are reaping what we have sown. In 1957, we adopted a policy which did not correspond to a need and, unfortunately, we are reaping today the nefarious effects of that policy which was devoid of practical common sense.

That reminds me, Mr. Chairman, of the story of a fellow going out for a walk on a fine day; caught in a storm and having no umbrella, be must at least partially suffer the nefarious effects of the weather.

Mr. Chairman, there was fair sailing when the Canadian government established a support price for milk powder at 17 cents a pound. Our farmers went ahead producing milk powder at that time, but today, the storm had to come down, because no government with any sense of responsibility can continue to favour production of a commodity which being perishable, is hardly fit for export, and whose output is far in excess of domestic consumption.

Mr. Boulanger: That does not justify the government giving away milk powder.

Mr. Belzile: Mr. Chairman, I must commend the hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick (Mr. Michaud) for the speech he made yesterday in this house. The hon. gentleman showed a lot of common sense; he is a professional farmer like myself, and a credit to his calling. The hon. member was frank enough not to commend the Minister of Agriculture, but to formally state his approval of the healthy policy of the Minister of Agriculture. As recorded on page 2 of the English appendix to Hansard of April 23, 1959, the hon. member said:

> And I am sure that dairy farmers will be pleased to hear that the government intends to maintain at 64 cents a pound the support price on butter production.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, probably in good faith, claims that Conservative members do not understand a thing about agriculture nor about the acute problems which now face the farming industry.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I did not say that government members do not understand the problems of the agricultural industry. I said Conservative members had not understood the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture about milk powder.

Mr. Belzile: Mr. Chairman, until I have proof of the contrary, and until I have read in Hansard the speech of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, I accept his correction.

Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile), but it being one o'clock I must leave the chair.

(Text):

It being one o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Belzile: Mr. Chairman, before recess, I dealt only with the latest statement of the Minister of Agriculture on support prices for agricultural products. I now wish to discuss, as briefly as possible, some problems relating to agriculture in Canada. Before doing so, however, may I once again urge the Minister of Agriculture to maintain his price support policy, which gives encouragement to the agricultural class, to average producers and to heads of families. I also ask the minister to use the strictest methods to curb those who have been practising integration, whether in hog raising, poultry raising or milk powder production. May the minister's policy be such as to deter people who, in the past, have pushed integration too far and have caused untold harm to farmers across Canada.

I think I mentioned, at the beginning of my remarks, that I listened closely to most speeches made in this house since my election to parliament in Ottawa, in May 1958. This has made me realize that the agricultural problem is not the least problem facing the federal government; indeed, it is the government's responsibility to give special consideration to a great many problems.

I have been hearing hon. members from other provinces in western Canada setting forth the demands of their constituents, and I realize, Mr. Chairman, that there are very great problems to be solved in that section of the country. I have also been aware for many years that eastern Canada faces serious problems. When speaking of the west, I presume this should include Manitoba and the other provinces up to the Pacific, including British Columbia; and when speaking of the east we mean Ontario and Quebec right down to the Atlantic.

However, Mr. Chairman, my purpose this afternoon is to discuss the acute problems affecting Canada's far eastern section. By that I mean the area from Quebec city eastward. It may be that many hon. members from western Canada know absolutely nothing about the great natural difficulties which confront the farmers of that area, the far eastern part of Canada, in the discharge of their occupation.

The land of my constituency is not naturally fertile and is often rocky in many areas. The climate is severe; our winters are very cold and very hard. Hon. members might be surprised to know that in my parish, no later than last Monday, I saw snow banks 5 to 7 feet deep along the roads. In fact, at this time of the year, owners of dairy herds still have to keep the herds in the stable and feed them. Summer is very short for the growing season and the grazing season is limited to two months, that is from June 15 to August 15. Thus, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to imagine all the sacrifices and the hard work, the problems of all kinds to which the pioneers in our region were subjected when they had to clear the land to get tillable soil fertile enough to provide a living for the families of eastern Canada.

Those are problems that the federal government must not ignore. Farmers of eastern Canada, farmers in the area east of Quebec city must receive at all times and continue to receive from this government the necessary encouragement to maintain family farming. We do not have many industries and being located as far as we are from large centres, we find transportation a problem. However, it is important that the authorities be made aware of their responsibilities. We must not forsake this region which was conquered with sweat and sacrifice just because it is far from large centres or because the climate is not favourable to agriculture. It is essential that the average farmer, the producer, the head of the family, be in a position to increase his production and receive fair prices for his products.

Our farmers should be made to feel that they can keep their trust in established authority; they must continue giving their children some education; they must continue impressing upon the masses, and upon their daughters and their sons, the patriotic spirit which should be nurtured by every good citizen in this country. The sons of farmers should remain on the land; and that area which, perhaps, has not been conquered as easily as others should again receive encouragement from the federal government and all right-thinking people who want our great country to be prosperous, progressive and happy.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to mention some needs of the farming people in the area I just mentioned. Our soil does not favour seed grain production, and farmers in the eastern part of the province must buy those seeds from producers either in the other eastern parts of this country or in the west. Since, as I said a moment ago, distances are long and freight rates are very high, the Department of Agriculture should consider the possibility of granting subsidies in such a way as to relieve the cost of freight rates for seed grain.

Second, as the soil is not naturally fertile, we must—and I repeat Mr. Chairman, we must—as I am one of those who are concerned with small farming, one of those who buy seed grain and who buy fertilizers—buy fertilizers; but, at the present time, because of freight rates, the cost of those products is very high indeed.

The government could also grant a fairly substantial subsidy for the transportation of calcereous ameliorators. This is the name given to ground limestone, commonly known as "calco". Added to our soil, that product has given excellent results in the past. But, unfortunately, there again, its cost price, once it gets to our farms, is still too high for many of our farmers. I believe, if I am not carrying my argument too far, that the federal government could perhaps, authorize an investigation of the fertilizer industry—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, as this session progresses and as the minister makes one announcement after another, it becomes more and more clear that the government has abandoned its agricultural policy as set forth in the recent election campaigns. When the Prime Minister was in the opposition for many years he spoke, as did many of the rest of us, in favour of parity prices. It was the policy of the Conservative party before the election in 1957 to establish a system of support prices in this country based on a parity relationship. In the Conservative handbook for the 1957 election it is reported that regular motions have been introduced into the house by Mr. Diefenbaker in order to secure for the farmer a more satisfactory share of the national income.

That is one quotation and I have many others here. I will put a few of them on the record but they are all along the same line. When the Prime Minister spoke on June 8, 1957, he is reported by the Canadian Press as promising that if a Conservative government were elected he would call a September session of parliament to set up a system of floor prices for agricultural products based on parity. Well, we have had some indications this session that the present Minister of Agriculture is basically carrying out the same kind of program that we have had with previous ministers of agriculture. We have had certain support prices for agricultural products; the government has failed to obtain markets for products at the support prices and immediately the support price has been cut. This announcement was made as far as hog support prices are concerned, that there will be a reduction in the floor price October 1 from $25 a hundredweight to $23.65, basis Toronto.

Then there was the announcement yesterday that the government is reducing the floor price of powdered milk from 15 cents to 10 cents a pound, and that a few months from now the support price will be removed altogether. In its place will be paid a 25 cent per hundred pounds of milk deficiency payment under certain conditions. The total of the government's announcements adds up to lower prices for agricultural commodities.

These announcements have not been supported by the farm organizations. This government is not carrying out the recommendations which have been brought to it by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture or the Ontario milk producers and other farm organizations. Soon after the minister's announcement was made yesterday the following press release was made by the Ontario farmers' union.

> Dairy price support levels announced in the House of Commons by agriculture minister Harkness indicate flagrant disregard for the high ideals expressed by the Conservative government in the agricultural prices support legislation enacted in January 1958, said Gordon L. Hill, president of the Ontario farmers' union.

There is Mr. Hill's statement as to what this announcement on dairy support prices means—a flagrant disregard for the high ideals expressed by the Conservative party in the agricultural prices support legislation enacted in January, 1958. The statement goes on:

"While Mr. Harkness is to be commended for changing the system from market price support to the deficiency payment system in the case of skim milk powder, the amount of deficiency payment is negative and completely ignores increasing farm costs", Mr. Hill said. "In the face of rising operating costs Canadian farmers are expected to hold the line on prices for some commodities and to absorb price cuts on others such as milk powder, and a reduction in the price of milk powder is not in line with the objectives of the act. Rising costs for fertilizer, farm implements, mill feeds, freight rates and other goods and services which farmers must buy have created an impossible situation for the dairyman", said Mr. Hill. He stated that concentrating milk producers, who are already living on the depreciation of their assets, will be forced to seek an additional source of income. This will increase the trend to contract farming and vertical integration wihch is already sounding the death knell of the family type farm.

This is the answer to statements of hon. members opposite that their program has been one to assist and promote the small farmer. Mr. Hill says that this policy of the government will increase the trend to contract farming and vertical integration. The statement concludes with the following:

"A disturbing aspect of the whole situation," Mr. Hill continued, "is that the advisory committee to the stabilization board has been completely ignored. What use is an advisory committee that is not consulted?" Mr. Hill asked.

I think this last statement is a very grave reflection on the attitude of the government. I think it is a rather serious indictment of the way the minister considers this legislation in advance when he has, according to Mr. Hill, failed to have the advisory committee consider this question.

Mr. Harkness: I did not hear all the hon. member has said, but if I may comment on what I understand him as saying now I think that Mr. Hill and every member of the advisory committee will bear me out when I tell him that the committee spent three days discussing this matter of price support for dairy products at its last meeting. They have in fact considered this matter and have been considering it throughout the past year. Then, as I say, they spent three days of their last meeting doing so.

Mr. Argue: Could the minister say when the last meeting was held?

Mr. Harkness: I think it was about six weeks or two months ago. I cannot be certain how long ago it was.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate the comment made by the minister. I am not going to dispute it. All I have done is to place in the record the last paragraph of the statement that was issued as a result of the announcement yesterday. Perhaps the wording of the announcement might be considered to mean that the recommendations of the advisory board have not been carried out. That may be what it means, although I do not, myself, think so. I took it as meaning that they were not consulted. The minister shakes his head, and I take it, now, that they held a three-day meeting and put forward certain recommendations with regard to which the minister has not taken action.

I note that the minister has not made any comment on that part of the statement issued by Mr. Hill in which he says that the government's policy has shown flagrant disregard of the high ideals expressed in its agricultural prices support legislation, nor on Mr. Hill's statement that the policy ignores increases in farming costs.

There will have to be a good deal of new thought and new ideas placed in the government's agricultural policy if the small farm is to survive in this country. Under the policy announced by the government—a program of lower and lower price supports for agricultural products—the ordinary family farm in this country is facing increasingly great difficulties. We had hoped that the government would take action in other fields. We had hoped that the government would move in the direction set forth in the brief presented by the farm delegation. We still await an announcement by the government, and as the days go on, and as one member of parliament from the prairie provinces after another goes on the record, it is becoming more and more clear to me that a unanimous decision has been taken by the Conservative members from the three prairie provinces that deficiency payments as outlined in the submission of the farm delegation should be opposed and are not in the interest of western agriculture.

We have the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Wheat, oats and barley are not included under its provisions. The government has purchased a number of commodities under the terms of this act, and I submitted a series of questions, to which the minister has provided answers, as to the quantities of the various commodities which have been supported. I think there is a feeling abroad in this country that supports for agricultural products benefit western Canada almost exclusively. There seems to be a feeling that when a farmer gets something it is always the prairie farmer who is on the receiving end. I think the statistics which the Department of Agriculture has produced in this regard are most revealing, because they show that out of a total of $69,814,000 worth of agricultural products purchased by the board from April 31, 1958 to December 31, 1958, only some $5,862,000 worth were purchased in the three prairie provinces. Thus, whatever the value the act has been so far, and to whatever extent it provides for some support for agricultural producers from the national treasury, it has in the main benefited farmers outside the prairie provinces. I think that is an additional argument in favour of government action at this time to support, by way of deficiency payment, the prices of western grain.

The government has stated that it has an agricultural policy. Members of the government say that there is an agricultural policy designed to help the small farmer, to give the farmer a greater share of the national income, and to provide prices for agricultural producers which are fair and which bear a fair relationship to cost of production. In fact, I think the program is almost the exact opposite. It is a program which has failed to deal with agricultural surpluses; it is a program which merely mimics the program of the previous administration; it is a program without vision; it is a program which means that in the face of agricultural surpluses the government acts to reduce support prices.

When the Prime Minister met the delegates, and when he spoke in this house a year ago on the dollar an acre program, he said the government had a long term policy, and in that long term program he included just about everything but the kitchen sink. Among the matters he included—and upon which we are now awaiting action—were long term farm credit, crop insurance and some other matters. We await legislation on these subjects with interest. We shall study it very carefully when it is brought before this house, and we shall support it on second reading if we think it is in the best interests of the agricultural community.

But while we are waiting for the government to move in the direction of easing farm credit and bringing in an improved farm credit program, may I point out that the government is allowing interest rates in this country to increase? The government is saying: we intend to provide long term farm credit; but on the other hand it says: let the Bank of Canada discount rate go up to 4.97 per cent; let this result in an increase in the prime interest rate for the banks; let this result in the insurance companies and finance companies across this country being able to increase their charges. Is this tight money policy of the present government—the policy which is now in effect—not increasing charges to the agricultural community of this country? Of course it is. The government talks in one way, and acts in another. It has talked in favour of fair prices; it has talked in favour of prices bearing a fair cost relationship, but only yesterday we heard the announcement that the floor price on skinmed milk powder is being reduced.

I think the case which the western producers put before the government was a sound one. I think it was a modest one. It was one which asked for a fair parity price, as the government has promised. It did not ask that all the increases in cost of production should be taken into account, but it said to the government: we want you to take action to maintain the price of wheat, in recent years and today, such as we have enjoyed over an eight-year period from 1947 onwards, and although we shall find it most difficult we are prepared to absorb the increase in the cost ourselves.

In this fair and moderate position which the agricultural producers have taken, when they have looked to this house for members to support them, they have found that the people who have opposed them the most, and consistently opposed them, are the members of parliament from the prairie provinces. They have opposed the case that was put forward by the farm delegation. I do not think I have to quote statements to prove that; Hansard is full of them. The statements are being repeated day after day. Yesterday the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose had this to say, as reported at page 2983 of Hansard:

> We are supposed to believe that every member of that delegation was in agreement with deficiency payments. They were not.

Here is another slur on the farm delegation. This is a slur on the farm delegation that came down here—

An hon. Member: No, it is not.

Mr. Argue: —and met in the Chateau Laurier in conference before they prepared their brief, unanimously supported the brief and presented it to the government. And yet a member from the prairie provinces said that a good 50 per cent of them were satisfied with the acreage payments if only we would pay just a little more. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that statement is just as far wrong and just as misleading as the statement made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson that if you did what the delegation requested all you would do would be to give the farmer with a Cadillac, a Buick. That is a slur, Mr. Chairman, on the agricultural producers of western Canada who are not driving Cadillacs, and the hon. member knows it and, generally speaking, they are not driving Buicks. These people have had an average income in recent years less than the average national income. These extravagant statements are more grist for the mill; this makes good press copy in eastern Canada but it is a false position for the hon. member to put forward and it is completely inaccurate.

In the years when the hon. member for Essex East sat on the other side of the house with his colleagues the members from the prairie provinces had a different line. They would get up in the house and they would get up back home and they would say, "We are really working for the people we represent; we are trying to do the best we can. But, you know, it is the eastern members we cannot convince. If you would come down and help us convince", as the member for Swift Current-Maple Creek used to say, "the eastern members, we would get somewhere". We not only have a new government in office, we have a complete change in the line; we have a complete change in the attitude. According to the prairie farm delegation, the attitude now is that they received a more sympathetic hearing from eastern members than they received from the prairie members.

Mr. Pascoe: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: I think it is true. You find that in one report after another. Here is a report by Robert Moon and Ron. Brown.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: They snicker. I have not the faintest notion what they are laughing about:

> Prairie farm delegates Wednesday were becoming openly hostile to the nature of grain deficiency payment replies given them by their western Conservative M.P.'s.
> Coming on the heels of Prime Minister Diefenbaker's rejection of immediate payments on Tuesday morning, the rebuffs they were meeting from their own western members came as a shocking aftermath.

I scarcely need to quote from this report. Hansard is full of statements of one member in this house from the prairie provinces that deficiency payments are not the answer; that an acreage payment is the best. Therefore, whether they are hostile or whether it is just strong opposition or whether 50 per cent are in favour of what they are supporting, I will leave it to the people who are affected to decide.

I think there would be a chance for deficiency payments if the members from the prairies in this house were anywhere as nearly ranged in favour of the position taken by the farm delegation as the people on the prairies are at this time. I am certain that if the members of parliament from western Canada would say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Agriculture, "We want action; we think the farmers have a case for deficiency payments", something would be done; but as long as the members who represent the farmers who are directly affected stand up in the house and say their case is not a good one, that half of them do not believe in it and it is not something that is advantageous to the average farmer, then, of course, there is little or no hope that this will be done. What is the excuse?

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: I will be very pleased to answer if the hon. member would wait until after the timekeeper over here calls the time. The last time I spoke half of my speech was made up of questions.

These gentlemen say that deficiency payments are not the answer; that if you have a deficiency payment which is paid on the unit of wheat at a certain ceiling, as stated by the brief, you help the big farmers. Oh, how these people want to help the little farmers. Their hearts bleed for the little farmers.

Mr. Pascoe: Does yours?

Mr. Argue: What did they say in the house yesterday? They said, "We want a two-price system; we do not want to get the deficiency payment that is asked for by the western delegates, but we will take a piece of it. We will not take it out of the national treasury but will add it to the price of bread". But when we get the two-price system, if we get it, I ask them if they are going to put a ceiling on the amount that is paid to any farmer who sells wheat, or are they going to do as the Prime Minister said a year ago, that if you increase the price by 50 cents a bushel to provide a two-price system it would add 6½ cents to the price of bread.

If we get a two-price system—and I am in favour of it and have been in favour of it for years—do the hon. members say that they will not use it and pay it out on an acreage basis up to 200 acres? No, I am certain they will pay it on the price of a bushel of wheat, where it should be paid, and that is the whole case that is being put forward by the farm delegation.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the agricultural problems facing this country can be solved. The surplus can be disposed of and I would suggest that a food surplus disposal corporation should be established at this time and properly constituted, with a board that would have the power to undertake to sell all of these products and to dispose of these products by contact; that would have the power to obtain other goods in exchange. Call it a barter system, if you like, which is one of the things that has worked in the United States. This disposal corporation should dispose of some of these products by providing that they be used in the mixing of feeds in Canada. With regard to the surplus of milk and the surplus of butter and other edible food products suitable for human consumption, they could be used as part of the school lunch program in Canada. I think our products can be disposed of. I would suggest instead of this backward looking policy of cutting prices and removing supports, this is the kind of program that should be set forth at the coming meeting in Washington when they are discussing the all-important food for peace program. Food for peace should be something of a co-operative program between nations, and this is the kind of policy that I suggest the Canadian government should advance.

It has been suggested very often, Mr. Chairman, that the sums of money the western delegates have demanded could not be provided. It has been suggested that they have asked for too much. I suggest they have not asked for too much and that they themselves have put forward ways and means by which this money can be obtained. They have come here and have said, "We want a deficiency payment that will guarantee us a certain price for wheat." They have said that to the extent they can get any part of this payment on any other basis they are prepared to reduce their demand. Implement a two-price system and you automatically reduce the deficiency payment asked for by the prairie grain growers. Take action on the exchange rate so that Canadian wheat will be selling on the basis of dollars of equal value to United States dollars. By that means you will increase the price of wheat another four or five cents a bushel. Pay from the national treasury the subsidy that is now charged to the Canadian wheat board, and therefore charged to the farmers, for wheat that is used in the production of flour for export. Extend the payments that are provided for storage at the end of the crop year to cover all grain in public storage and by that means you would add another substantial sum for the western wheat producer. I suggest that these measures would in fact reduce the deficiency payment which the farmer has been asking for by almost 50 per cent.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that the final payment on last year's wheat crop would be announced within the course of a few weeks. I think it should have been announced long ago. I have argued in the agriculture committee and I have argued with support in years gone by that soon after the end of a crop year the inventory should be accounted for, transferred to the next pool account and the farmer paid his money. The farmer should not have to wait month after month after month until the next crop year is almost over before announcement of the final payment is made. With worse drought conditions on the prairies at the present time than at any time since 1937—and we hope they will change—with the farmers so short of money that they felt it necessary to send a mass delegation to Ottawa, I plead with the minister to announce the final payment immediately and in announcing it to take into account the demands of prairie grain producers for deficiency payments and augment the final payment by a deficiency payment.

I have pointed out that the greater portion of the money spent under the Agricultural Stabilization Act has been spent outside the prairie provinces. I do not put that forward by way of criticism at all. It is necessary to support certain agricultural products. If support of these products means that most of the money at any given time goes to a certain part of Canada, I have no objection. But realizing that the Agricultural Stabilization Act has benefited in the main farmers and agricultural producers of central Canada I think the government and parliament would be justified in giving sympathetic consideration to the demands of the mass delegation and in taking action forthwith on those demands.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard the usual sort of tirade, shall I say, which we get from the hon. member for Assiniboia. I regret very much the quite evident attempt he has made to try to raise sectional differences and to make out that one part of Canada is getting more benefit than another from the agricultural policies which the government is pursuing. That is absolutely not the case. As far as the application of the Agricultural Stabilization Act is concerned, every farmer in every part of Canada gets the same benefit from the legislation to the extent hat he engages in the raising of the products covered by that act.

Mr. Argue: I did not say anything different.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member made a great point of the fact that the majority of the money which has been used to purchase commodities under the stabilization act has been expended in a part of the country other than the prairie provinces. That does not mean anything. Where you happen to pick up the goods that you take off the market does not make any difference with respect to the total effect of the benefits produced for the farmers.

By picking up surplus butter, for example, we put into the pockets of Canadian farmers at least $80 million more in 1958 than they would have otherwise had. Where we picked up the extra butter for that purpose in order to take it off the market and to maintain the price of 64 cents which we maintained throughout last year does not make any difference. The attempt to try to make out that it does by saying that $5 million was spent by the stabilization board to purchase commodities in western Canada compared with $60 million odd in eastern Canada is not a valid argument at all. It does not establish in any way whatsoever what the benefit of the stabilization act has been in different parts of Canada.

The hon. member also goes on about the demand for so-called deficiency payments on western grain, which are not deficiency payments at all. What is being asked for is retroactive flat payments.

Mr. Argue: Who is quibbling now?

Mr. Harkness: He says that the demand on the part of western grain producers for this retroactive flat payment would be reduced by the amount of other assistance given. You would think to hear the hon. member talk that we had not given any assistance to western grain growers during the past year. We have assisted them to the tune of approximately $100 million in three ways alone.

In 1958 we provided approximately $41 million in acreage payments, some $37 million in storage charges on grain and $22½ million, as estimated at the moment, by way of prairie farm assistance payments. There is $100 million in three programs alone for the assistance and help of western farmers. As I have said, to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia talk you would think we had done absolutely nothing to assist the western farmers. These are very large subsidies which were paid out in 1958, much larger than were ever provided by any government before in order to assist western farmers in one particular year.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Harkness: Just a minute. The hon. member goes around the country trying to establish as a fact what is a complete myth, that we have not been assisting the western farmer and assisting him very materially since we have been in office.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Sit down.

Mr. Harkness: All right.

Mr. Argue: I do not ask my questions when sitting down. I have the permission of the minister to ask him a question. I appreciate it. I know he does not mind. In referring to these three main subsidies, I wonder whether he meant to say that the amount of $22½ million in prairie farm assistance is provided wholly from the national treasury. Is it not a fact that throughout the history of the legislation approximately half has been paid by the agricultural producers themselves? Is it not also true that two of these programs have been on the statute books for many years?

Mr. Harkness: It certainly is true that two of them have been on the statute books for many years but that does not make any difference as to the amount of money paid out under them during 1958, which is what we are talking about. I am glad the hon. member brought up the point about contributions under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It is quite true that a portion of the $22½ million, around $5 million in 1958, I think, was represented by contributions by the farmers themselves. I do not think I should take the time of the committee to say anything else now except to deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia respecting the stabilization act. He does not seem to understand the way in which the act works in order to benefit farmers.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): He does not want to.

Mr. Harkness: With respect to the reduction in the support price on skim milk powder, he made the statement that support prices are being reduced and that this is contrary to everything that members of the government said in the last two election campaigns, and so on. It is not contrary to those promises at all. He seems to believe that once you establish a price you cannot do anything except raise that price. The price should never be reduced at any time. Once a support price has been set, that should be the price for eternity. If you do anything about that price, you should raise it but, under no circumstances should the price be reduced. This is not common sense, nor is it practicable. There is no country in the world which has a support price program of that nature. When the hon. member talks along those lines, he shows he either understands absolutely nothing about how a price support program works in this or any other country or he is just putting forth propaganda.

Mr. Argue: How about parity prices?

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, the whole principle of support prices is that they will move up and down, depending on market conditions for the commodity, the supply of it and all sorts of other factors. I went into that in detail when the stabilization act was before the house last year. I made no attempt whatever to say anything except that we would vary the prices up and down as you must do under any stabilization act or support price legislation which will work.

In so far as skim milk powder is concerned, the hon. member seems to think we should keep the same price for skim milk powder. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, as well as some other hon. members opposite, seem to be of the same opinion. They seem to believe that we should keep the same price for skim milk powder, no matter how many millions of pounds we have to store, no matter how many millions of pounds we may have to dump in the river or something like that. It has been explained time after time that skim milk powder is not a product you can store indefinitely. It becomes unusable after a certain length of time, and therefore it is not a product that can be stored by the tens of millions of pounds to await the eventual development of a market. You have to dispose of it in a fairly short space of time, otherwise it is going to go bad.

Apparently the hon. member for Assiniboia and a lot of other hon. members in the Liberal party do not care about that at all. They say, maintain the price; go ahead and pile up surpluses by the tens of millions of pounds. Last year, according to the statements put before the house yesterday, we bought something over 100 million pounds of this powder. If we take no action this coming year we will buy another 100 million pounds of it. So long as the stabilization board stands ready to buy every pound of milk powder that is produced at 15 cents a pound, when the world price for this powder is probably around seven or eight cents a pound, there is no question whatever about what will happen. We will continue to buy milk powder which we cannot possibly sell any place and which, our experience has shown, cannot even be given away. Nevertheless, the hon. member for Assiniboia would like us to sit there and continue doing this. This shows how impractical his ideas are, and how little he knows about how a price support program for agricultural products has to be operated, if it is going to operate at all.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister permit a question? Did the farm organization representatives ask the government to increase the price of fluid milk going into the process from 25 cents per hundred pounds to a price of 40 cents, in lieu of the action taken in reducing the price on skim milk?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: The answer to that question is no, as it happens.

Mr. Argue: The farmers union of Ontario have asked for that?

Mr. Harkness: No, they did not ask for that.

Mr. Argue: We will leave it at that.

Mr. Harkness: There is one thing I will say in connection with support prices for dairy products as announced yesterday. We held discussions for several weeks with all the dairy producing groups in this country. We laid the whole situation before them in so far as the supply of skim milk powder, butter, cheese and other dairy products are concerned. We asked for their advice. We asked what they would recommend. We did not proceed with any action so far as support prices for dairy products were concerned without the fullest consultation with all the people concerned. As a result of that consultation we have come up with this program which I believe hon. members will find, in spite of what some members of the opposition are saying, is acceptable to the great majority of dairy farmers.

Just before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank all hon. members who have taken part in this extended debate on item No. 1 of the agriculture estimates. I think we are now in the seventh day of our discussion of this item. I should like to assure hon. members that the suggestions they have put forward will be carefully considered by me and by the members of the Department of Agriculture. I should like to say also that we are glad to get the wide variety of opinions and suggestions which come out during the discussion of the estimates.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to rise on this occasion during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and to congratulate the minister on his fine administration during the past year. During this time he has come in for criticism, often unjust, both in and out of this house. However, I think we are all agreed in our respect for his administrative ability and for his interest and dedication in furthering a fair deal for those who are occupied in the various fields of agriculture.

I am sure that unlike some members in the other parties in this house those on the government side take pride in the success of the prices stabilization act. During the past year the prices stabilization act has cost the govenment something like $15 million. However, the net cost to the government of this act is no measure of the real effectiveness or usefulness of it.

There has been a great deal of talk about dairy products. Let us take butter as one example. It is estimated that if it had not been for the support price on butter and import controls the price of butter would have dropped from 64 cents to 40 cents a pound. Based on an estimate of 340 million pounds of butter produced in 1958, the stabilization act has added more than $80 million to the farmers' cash income. The cost to the treasury in reselling 70 million pounds of butter that was purchased by the board was something over $2 million. However, even if the cost were substantially larger, it would be relatively small compared to the value added to the farmers' income.

Yesterday we were privileged to receive a report of the inquiry into the distribution of railway box cars by Mr. Bracken. Mr. Bracken, as everyone knows, was a distinguished member of this house for years and was also a former premier of Manitoba. He distinguished himself as the head of the commission which inquired into the liquor laws of Manitoba, and his report on that subject has been largely implemented. I am sure that the report which he has presented to us will receive very careful and sympathetic consideration from the government, and I hope his recommendations will be implemented. It was a pleasure also to hear from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the accounts for last year in connection with the sale of wheat are to be concluded, and in the not too distant future the board will be in a position to announce the final payment on this grain.

I should like for a moment to refer to the farm delegation that came to Ottawa recently. Before they arrived I, like many other hon. members, was rather dubious as to what their behaviour would be, but as soon as they arrived our doubts were dispelled. I am sure that all hon. members of this house and everyone in the building from the Prime Minister down to the guards of the House of Commons agree that the behaviour of the members of the farm delegation was exemplary. In fact, one guard told me as the delegation was leaving, "This was the finest group of gentlemen who have ever come to these buildings. Before leaving members of the delegation came and shook hands with us and told us how much they enjoyed their trip to Ottawa."

I was pleased to meet with the 17 delegates from Springfield and we discussed at great length the problems in agriculture with which they are being faced. I believe that one of the most significant accomplishments of this delegation was that it demonstrated to eastern Canada the position of western agriculture. We have heard a great deal about the understanding and good relations that the eastern members displayed to this delegation. I should like to say a few words about the prairie members in this house. I might be forgiven in this respect because I am referring in large part to those who were members of this house in the two sessions of parliament before I myself became a member and I say this because I feel the western members are perhaps a little too modest to say it themselves.

I believe that a good deal of the credit for these good relations should go to the members from the prairies for the understanding which they have prompted in eastern Canada. Never before in Canadian history has there been such a unified voice speaking on behalf of the prairies and the western farmer. In the past we have had four political parties representing the prairies in this house each with a small number of members. This in itself would not have been bad had these members of the various parties joined together to produce a unified point of view from the west. However, they quibbled and quarrelled among themselves and the government of the day tended to ignore the west and paid little attention to the needs of those who live on the prairies. Today for the first time in history there is a unified front on the government side speaking forcefully for the farmer of western Canada and as a result of this great strides have been made in agriculture. It is a tribute to these western members that members from the east have supported all the agricultural legislation that has been brought in by this government and which was primarily of benefit to the west. I can say without fear of contradiction that these prairie members are continuing to work hard. It is not necessary to indulge in platitudes; you need merely look at the accomplishment of this government in agriculture to realize that these members have been working hard on behalf of the western farmers and will continue to work diligently on their behalf.

Since entering this house I have listened patiently to the profuse verbosity which is characteristic of emanations from Her Majesty's loyal opposition. I offer my condolences to the Liberal party on their annihilation on the prairies. I have observed that they have accepted this annihilation graciously. They do not make any presumption of representing or speaking for the prairies. Unlike them, however, the C.C.F. party which also met the same fate in 47 out of 48 seats has not accepted defeat graciously. The lone hon. member of that party from the west has set himself up as the ultimate authority on prairie agriculture and seeks to discredit the rest of the prairie members.

I have listened to the tidal wave of weightless words which are often wafted across this chamber from the confines of the family compact in the corner. In the last few days especially we have often been inundated by an avalanche of insulting invective the value of which is not in keeping with the dignity of this house.

Mr. Argue: You are not supposed to read your speech. There is a rule against that.

Mr. Slogan: I have no doubt as to the desire of the members of the C.C.F. party to serve this country well. However, I would suggest that they read Norman Vincent Peale's book entitled "The Power of Positive Thinking".

In the constituency of Springfield we have a large portion of the fertile Red river valley. In this and other areas as well the majority of farmers are mixed farmers with relatively small farms. More and more of recent years these farmers are engaging in the growing of potatoes. It was therefore with particular pleasure that we welcomed the announcement in the budget of the extension of the duty of 37½ cents on United States potatoes on a year-round basis. I have advocated this measure for some time and indeed made reference to it in my maiden speech.

Previously the Canadian duty on United States potatoes was 37½ cents per hundred pounds from the period June 15 to July 31 while new potatoes were allowed entry free from August 1 to June 14. Potatoes were one of the products on which the tariff board recommended the duty should be placed for the full twelve months of the year and I understand that this was one of the items which was negotiated with the United States authorities when discussions were held regarding fruit and vegetable tariffs.

Considering the crop year as being from July 1 to June 30, the five-year average figure for imports and exports for the period 1953 to 1958 is pretty well in balance, being 1,979,000 hundredweight for imports and 1,937,000 hundredweight for exports. While the five-year average is pretty well in balance there is a marked variation from year to year. For example, while in 1954-55 we exported only 985,000 hundredweight to the United States, we imported 2,907,000 hundredweight from that country. In 1957-58, on the other hand, we exported 3,325,000 hundredweight to the United States and imported 1,523,000 hundredweight from that country.

The situation in the current crop year was of concern to the producers of Manitoba. Their concern can be appreciated if we compare wholesale potato prices at Winnipeg on the basis of a 75 pound bag. As shown in the March issue of "The current review of agricultural conditions in Canada", issued by the federal Department of Agriculture, the Winnipeg local price for Canadian No. 1 potatoes was as follows:

Month	1957-58	1958-59	Decrease
October	1.93	1.35	—58c.
November	2.33	1.41	—92c.
December	2.16	1.43	—73c.
January	2.27	1.43	—84c.
February	2.52	1.42	—1.10

While I am quoting wholesale prices may I say that the price to the producer is substantially lower. The spread in price from producer to consumer is another matter of concern to the farmer. Potato prices this year are substantially lower than those of a year ago, but it was not only the price that caused concern. The inability of the producer to market his product was of great concern to the potato grower, too.

The large United States surplus of potatoes this year caused depressed prices to Canadian producers. On December 26, 1958 United States imports forced Manitoba potato prices down to $1.10 for a 75 pound bag as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of that date. The article went on to say that a provincial department of agriculture spokesman said he believed a price of $1.50 would give a return to the producer which would bear a fair relationship to production costs. As reported in the article he went on to state:

> However, the low shipping charges from the potato-producing areas of Minnesota and North Dakota influence Manitoba prices. Over-production in these areas can force our retail prices down to levels below the cost of production.

During the current marketing season imports have been markedly higher than in 1957-58. From July 1 to November 30, 1958 imports from the United States totalled 586,000 hundredweight compared with 489,000 hundredweight a year earlier. Three hundred and sixty-nine thousand hundredweight of potatoes were imported into western Canada in that period, an increase of 44 per cent over the year previous. Canadian exports of table and seed potatoes from July 1, 1958 to February 20, 1959 totalled 1.7 million hundredweight compared with 2.7 million hundredweight exported during the same period a year earlier. Almost all the decrease was accounted for by reduced shipments to the United States. February 1 stocks of potatoes in the central United States were 52 per cent higher than the year earlier. Total United States stocks, in spite of unusually large disappearance, were 16 per cent higher.

In Canada holdings of potatoes on March 1, 1959 amounted to 9.1 million hundredweight. This was 16 per cent less than they were the year earlier, and in spite of the lower stocks in Canada, as a result of the heavy United States surplus, prices in western Canada began the season lower than in 1957 and have held steadily lower in the 1958-59 marketing period. It was therefore encouraging that the government took this measure to discourage the dumping of United States potatoes into Canada, because the United States farmer enjoys somewhat more favourable conditions of production.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance for the initiative they have shown in bringing in this duty which will tend to make marketing conditions more favourable to domestic growers. At the same time I am sure it is not going to affect the price to the consumer to any extent because of the wide spread between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays. But what it will do is to provide an expanded market for domestically grown potatoes. I would recommend that because of this wide spread perhaps some further measures be taken to give the producer a price which will bear a fair relationship to what the consumer pays, and which bears a fair relationship to his costs of production.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the controversy which has prevailed between the Minister of Agriculture and the member for Assiniboia reflects, I think, pretty well, not only the difficulties that the government has permitted itself to get into but the reason for some of those difficulties. Those of us who were here in the last parliament will well remember the attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture. As a matter of fact when he spoke on this side of the house it was very often very difficult to distinguish his arguments from those of the hon. member for Assiniboia—

Mr. Harkness: Your memory is terribly bad.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —who repeats pretty well today what the minister has said in the past. If the Minister of Agriculture doubts my word all he has to do is to look at the speeches he made from time to time, and in particular at the recommendations made by the present Prime Minister in this pamphlet to which I made reference the other night, the new national policy which on the second last page it urges the people of Canada to adopt in the interests of the farmers of this country. All one has to do is to read these paragraphs, paragraph after paragraph, to see whether or not the main lines of the argument are the same as those made today by the hon. member for Assiniboia and others on this side of the house.

I might mention in particular my hon. friend from Drummond-Arthabaska, who in his very constructive speech today I think clearly indicated that the government in its declaration yesterday of policy for this year with regard to dairy products has failed to satisfy the dairy industry; certainly it had failed to satisfy them to anything like the extent which the minister indicated a few moments ago would be the case.

The minister is confronted almost with a marathon in this first item, and I suggest to him in a friendly way that he is the author of the longevity of this particular phase of the discussion largely because of the attitude which he took in the house yesterday. Before the orders of the day he made an announcement of government policy in respect of a matter which was shortly going to be discussed in the house, at a time in our procedure when the opportunities for debate were limited, without having given the Leader of the Opposition the chance beforehand, as is generally the custom, of knowing what the government was going to declare by way of policy, although one could see from the afternoon papers that the statement made by the minister had been given to others in this building long before the house opened at 2.30 in the afternoon.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to correct that completely inaccurate statement at this moment. No copies of this statement were given to anybody in this chamber or any place else, as far as I am aware, until after I had made the statement in the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. minister says that, of course I accept his word at once; but that does not preclude the possibility that some ingenious person may have gotten that statement without the connivance of the minister, and as a result there were sections of this country that knew of the statement before it had been made in parliament. I therefore suggest that that is not the way to encourage a quick despatch and passage of one's estimates. But I do not hold any rancour against the minister and I want him to know that this last observation is more in the nature of a warning than a statement of intention to hold up unnecessarily his estimates.

The hon. gentleman in the defence he made a few moments ago in answer to the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia, as I have already said, is partly the author of his own trouble. All he has to do is to look at section 7 of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, look at the preamble to that act, and see whether or not he has fully given himself a defence to the attack which has been made on him with regard to the announcement of yesterday and with regard to the administration of the Agricultural Stabilization Act itself. It is worth remembering that section 7 says:

> The board shall from time to time in accordance with this act take such action as is necessary to stabilize the prices of agricultural commodities at their respective prescribed prices, and shall take such action and make such recommendations as are necessary to ensure that the prescribed prices for an agricultural commodity in effect from time to time shall bear a fair relationship to the cost of production of such commodity.

My hon. friend cannot substantiate the fact that the cost of production for dairy products has so changed as to warrant the change in policy that was given in this house yesterday; and unless that can be done my hon. friend cannot be said to have complied with the implications of section 7 of the Act. The Minister of Finance and my hon. friend, from the time that the Minister of Finance issued his white paper prior to budget night, made much of the fact that the farm income for 1958 had increased by a net of 24 per cent. My hon. friend nods his head again. He was proud of that statistic the other day, but I think that one should examine that statement in the light of its true context. And since we have now an admission from the Minister of Agriculture that it is his view that there was a 24 per cent net increase, we might just look at the white paper and see precisely what the Minister of Finance said. He said:

> Accrued net farm income, after a sharp decline in 1957, recovered substantially in 1958 and rose by $234 million or 4 per cent.

That does confirm the nod of the Minister of Agriculture. It is an assertion by the Minister of Finance, who is not in the house today—he is possibly preparing for other duties—but who would, in any event, subscribe to this statement.

But on page 6 of the white paper—and this is something which the Minister of Finance did not point out the other day—there are some very interesting figures, and since they are now on record no one can accuse me of presenting figures that bear my personal authorship. These are the figures of the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to see this change.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I knew the hon. gentleman would be happy, and I am trying to accommodate him as far as I can, consistent with my obligations, in pointing out the many errors into which he has been plunged by the character of his own policy and his failure, sometimes, to realize that there has been a gap between the declaration of that policy and its actual achievement.

Now at page 6 the net income of farm operations from farm production is given for the years 1955, 1956, 1957, and the preliminary figure is given for 1958, and it is interesting to see what those figures show. They read as follows:

These figures appear on page 6 under "National income and gross national product". The conclusion which flows from them is that farm income in 1958 was, indeed, 24 per cent higher than it was in 1957. However, 1957, as the Minister of Agriculture knows, was an unusually bad year, because of crop failure. If we compare 1958 with 1956, the last full year of Liberal administration, we find that farm income was 22 per cent higher in 1956 than in 1958, the year to which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture point with such pride as revealing the achievement of the present government's agricultural policy. And this is without taking price increases into account.

And now we must go one step further. The hon. gentleman will see, from this statement by the Minister of Finance to which I have referred, that farm income in 1958 was lower than it was in 1955. I hope that will put an end to the boast of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Minister of Finance that as a result of government polices there has been a real improvement in agricultural income.

The facts show clearly that in 1958 as compared with 1956, the last full year of Liberal administration, farm income was 22 per cent lower than it had been two years earlier. It is clearly seen, also, that farm income in 1958 was actually lower than it was in 1955. I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture will say now, but I am sure that these figures cannot be challenged. They do, certainly, circumscribe the claims made by the hon. gentleman on behalf of the government.

I do not quarrel with the minister's explanation of the way in which the stabilization act must operate. The principle of flexibility is an essential part of the administration of this important measure, as it was with regard to the parent act of which it is in principle nothing more than an emulation, as the minister admitted a few moments ago. All the many millions of dollars which are put out for the benefit of agriculture in western Canada, and agriculture generally, have flowed for the most part from acts introduced by this party when it held office, and all the hon. gentleman has done is to revise previous measures. There is no new policy for agriculture which has been introduced by this government.

Mr. Harkness: You are quite wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister makes the assertion that I am quite wrong, and he clothes it with all the authority of a carefully prepared argument. A mere assertion, as I told him the other day, is no argument and in any event it is obviously not one which is going to appeal to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. Harkness: That is not what the last election showed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is quite right. The last election resulted exactly as the minister has said. But when the next election comes he will know differently.

The other day I was talking about some of the problems which affect my own area and I want to refer again to them. I should like to thank the hon. member for Lambton-Kent who supported me, without having said so, in my request to the government that there should be a floor price on corn. He will remember, as I do, the ingenious reason given by the Minister of Agriculture why this could not be done. It was, he said, because our corn, unlike corn produced in the United States, had too much moisture as if there were no moisture in the corn grown in the United States—and he gave other reasons why it could not be done, forgetting of course that this had been promised to the farmers in south western Ontario.

I should like the minister, in addition, to give careful consideration to the request made by the soybean growers in our section of the country, and this matter was also referred to the other evening in passing by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. The soybean farmers have been to see the minister, but he was preoccupied and could not receive them. I am not complaining about that, because I know the minister is a busy gentleman. They could not see him, but they did see others in his department, and they did ask for a continuation of the floor price on soybeans. I am joining them in making that request and asking the minister to give careful consideration to these representations.

It will be seen that the production of soybeans in Canada last year was not significantly higher than it has been in the past and that, in itself, should assist the government to give consideration, not only to retaining the floor price on soybeans but in meeting the request of the farmers for an increase in the floor price. It is interesting—and I put this figure on record so that the minister, when he comes to consider my submission, as I know he will in the careful manner with which I know he always gives consideration to my representations—

Mr. Harkness: To everybody's representations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know, but I am asking him to give special consideration to mine, because he has not done so with regard to this particular subject in the past.

I now refer to the average price for soybeans between 1949 and 1958. These have been as follows:

1951	2.75
1952	2.55
1953	2.45
1954	2.40
1955	2.09
1956	2.12
1958	1.89

The floor price at the present time is $2.10. The group who came to Ottawa, headed by Mr. Will Wallace of Woodslee in the riding I represent, asked for an increase in the floor price. They are concerned about this matter, particularly because the floor price in the United States has been cut 25 cents. Whatever may be the justification for that in the United States, the cost of production in Canada does not warrant any similar action in this country, particularly when the minister takes into account the fact that costs of production certainly in our section of the country are rising continually, notwithstanding the minister's statement the other day that he had arrested the rise in production costs.

Mr. Harkness: I never said that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What did my hon. friend say?

Mr. Harkness: I said the cost-price squeeze, which is a different thing altogether.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that is what my hon. friend says now.

Mr. Harkness: That is what I said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what he said at the end of my speech the other day. It is not what he said earlier. Look up Hansard. That is not what he said during the course of the little argument that he and I had on that very matter. In any event, the cost of production today does not warrant a cut in the floor price of soybeans. I sincerely trust that in considering this matter the minister will see that soybeans continue to be classified as a designated commodity under the stabilization act, and that a floor price will again be established. I point out that the growers ask that:

> The prescribed price for soybeans for the 1959 crop be established at not less than 110 per cent of the base price.

They also suggest, and I strongly support this, that:

> The stabilization board do appoint the Ontario soybean growers' association marketing board as their agent for the administration and distribution of any deficiency payments made.

This would mean that the base price on a 10-year average would be $2.30 per bushel. The support price requested is $2.53 per bushel, 110 per cent of the 10-year average. I hope the minister will give this matter his careful consideration. It will have a very important effect in stabilizing—

Mr. Harkness: Will the hon. member permit a question? Has he any idea what percentage of the soybeans producers' return on those beans would come from the general taxpayers' pockets if we put into effect a support price of $2.53?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be very glad to have the minister tell me what it is.

Mr. Harkness: It would be nearly 50 per cent, which I think he will agree is not a reasonable proposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, one would want to examine the facts. The minister makes that statement. That is not what the growers themselves say. It would undoubtedly be a factor that would have to be borne in mind.

Mr. Harkness: It would be between 40 and 50 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am a little disturbed by what the minister says because he may even have in mind something less than $2.10. I tell him that if he does that, particularly in line with the assurances given when over $2.50 was promised during the election in 1958, he will find that the farmers in southwestern Ontario will find additional reason for being dissatisfied with the agricultural policy of this government.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member will permit, I would just like to tell him that I have nothing in mind in connection with this. The stabilization board and the advisory committee have not considered the matter and have not advised me in connection with it. I point out that if this price he is talking about were put into effect the taxpayers, in other words, through the deficiency payments which would have to be made, would be paying about half of the price, between 40 and 50 per cent of the price that the soybean producers would be getting which, I think, he would agree is not a reasonable proportion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say I would want to see all of the facts. What I am doing now is putting forward the case put forward by the soybean growers themselves. I am a little disturbed from what the minister has said about the effect of his declaration with regard to the existing floor price of $2.10 which no one certainly can, in the face of all the circumstances, regard as unfair in the situation.

Then the minister has before the board a request with regard to the sugar beet growers. I ask the minister to take all these things into consideration when he comes to develop his policy for this year with regard to these matters.

Mr. Harkness: I have had letters of thanks from the sugar beet people on the support price put in last year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my hon. friend deserves the thanks, but I am not talking about last year. I am now talking about this year. I will tell him that he will get a letter of thanks from me if he listens to the representations which I am making.

Mr. Harkness: It would be the first one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; I have written to my hon. friend many times. If I did not have occasion to thank him on many occasions it is simply because he did not deserve thanks; but I assure him that if he does listen to my recommendations he will receive my full gratitude.

Before I take my seat I should like to say this. I know the minister is faced with criticisms from this side of the house. The reason for those criticisms rests on the doorstep of hon. gentlemen opposite who for years in this house told the farmers of Canada that the existing agricultural policy was not satisfactory; that the farmers of Canada were not sharing adequately in the income of the nation, and that the only way to rectify this situation was to put hon. gentlemen opposite in power. Hon. gentlemen opposite are now in power and if there are marches on Ottawa and if there are marches to be created in order to assess the effect of the first march; if groups from farm organizations continued to come to Ottawa complaining about the gap between accomplishment and promises, the responsibility lies only on the shoulders of the Prime Minister and members of the government who talked about parity and about deficiency payments in such a way as to give the farmers of this country the feeling that under this government, with its formula, farmers could look for substantial economic improvement in the lot of agriculture. That is the situation. If the Minister of Agriculture would some day, or perhaps in the course of these estimates, simply rise and say: Well, we promised too much; our promises were extravagant; we are now in power and we see that the situation is not what we thought; we now realize that the last government really did do something for the farmers of Canada; if he would take that kind of attitude he would find that his estimates would pass quickly and that he would have less trouble than his continuous and persistent championing of a case that is so obviously faulty and so obviously invalid.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: On what item does the hon. member want to speak?

Mr. Boulanger: Item No. 5. Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, but the item on which I wanted to rise has not been reached yet.

Item agreed to.

7. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $7,187,248.

Mr. Herridge: I do want to say a few words on this item; I think it is the appropriate one. In the Kootenays we have a climate and soil that are ideal for the growing of cherries. Our cherries are of first-class quality. This has been recognized by western Canada, in some parts of the United States and even by prominent fruit people in Great Britain. Nevertheless, our production and quality of cherries have been affected in recent years by a disease known as "little cherry" and a disease known as "brown rot". These diseases have affected the production of cherries particularly in certain areas and they have had a serious effect on replanting because, so far as little cherry disease is concerned, a satisfactory solution has not been found to the problem. I am sure the minister knows what I am talking about because he comes to Kootenay West on occasion for summer holidays and knows some of the orchards I am talking about. I want to read briefly from the report of the royal commission on the tree fruit industry of British Columbia prepared by Dean E. D. MacPhee. I will do so briefly and it will save speaking at length. He has this to say with respect to little cherry on page 188:

> One of the two serious blows to the cherry industry in the Kootenay area was the "little cherry" virus. This disease was first discovered in 1933, but it was not recognized as a virus disease. In 1934, three of the orchards near the point of the original outbreak were showing "little cherry."

I know those orchards quite well.

> By 1940 the disease had spread in an area 20 miles in diameter. It was in 1940 that Mr. W. R. Foster, assistant plant pathologist with the British Columbia department of agriculture, was delegated to study this disease, and in 1941 he determined the cause to be a virus. By 1947 it was found that all of the cherry areas of the Kootenays, except the Deer Park-Renata area, were showing the virus.

That is not quite correct because on my own ranch, which is very limited in area, there is no little cherry disease as yet.

> This rapid spread of "little cherry" in the Kootenays took place in spite of many natural barriers, such as mountain ranges, large lakes, and often considerable distances between orchards.
> In 1946 the federal government set up a sub-laboratory at Creston to study this disease, and these investigations are continuing. Studies have been carried out to determine how the disease is spread, and it is reasonably well established that insects are the carriers of the virus.

I will not read any more but I want to bring this serious question to the attention of the minister again. Before proceeding, I wish to pay tribute to the work done by the officials of the department, particularly the research workers at the Summerland experimental station. However in my opinion you cannot carry on an adequate investigation unless you have sufficient funds. In view of the importance of this industry to the Kootenays, a district particularly well suited for the production of cherries, pears and peaches in some areas, I am asking for a more intensive study of the question so that an economic solution can be found in order that many of our young people will again have faith in planting young cherry orchards which will no doubt produce such fruit as has made the district famous in the past.

There is a general feeling among the cherry growers in our district that the matter has been treated in a sort of piecemeal and timid manner. I bring it to the attention of the minister again, present the views of those persons interested in the re-development of the cherry industry in the Kootenays and urge a full scale attack upon the problem.

The second one is brown rot, a serious disease which we have had for a good number of years. I read again from page 189 of the same report in order to condense my remarks:

> Brown-rot is the second serious disease in the Kootenay area. Brown-rot has been known in the Kootenay area for many decades. The severity of this disease is directly correlated with the degree of summer moisture and the amount of attention growers give their orchards. Unfortunately, since the late forties and during the fifties, there have been a number of cool wet summers, which have caused this disease to develop into epidemic proportions, especially in semi-neglected orchards.

Brown-rot is a disease which is spread by a fungus, the spore of which live over winter for the most part in an infected fruit which has fallen to the ground. These infected fruits are called "mummies". The disease can also be carried over on infected twigs and spurs. The first infection period occurs in the spring from the pink stage of cherry through to the fall of the husk. This period is extremely critical, and it is imperative that developing growth be covered with a protective film of fungicide. Mr. J. E. Swales, district horticulturist for the Kootenay area, points out that from the experience gained in 1957 sprays should be applied at intervals not longer than four days during the blossom period, regardless of weather conditions.

I want to bring to the minister's attention that this disease has been prevalent for many years in the southeastern portion of British Columbia and I believe it has caused serious concern to cherry growers in some sections of eastern Canada, in portions of the United States at times and also in Europe. I have read quite a lot of the literature on the question. Because the disease was not serious in extent until recent years there was no work done by the minister's department with respect to testing in orchards and research of that sort. During the past year control measures have been studied in the Deer Park-Renata area with a considerable degree of success as a result of the co-operation of the personnel from the department and the growers concerned.

In the first place, these investigations should have been carried on before. It was not good enough to allow this disease to reach epidemic proportions under circumstances which are bound to recur in certain seasons, that is, with an excessive amount of rain, hot weather and consequent relative humidity. These are the conditions that produce the spores which produce the brown rot disease.

During the last two or three seasons we have had these conditions in our district during cherry growing and cherry picking times and very large losses have resulted from brown rot. Brown rot is a very insidious disease. You can pick fruit that appears to be in first-class condition, pack it, place it in a reefer car, and before it reaches the Calgary market the crates of cherries will in some cases be covered with a white mould or rot will have developed on the under layers of the cherries in the pack.

I mention this to the minister because it is a very important thing to our growers. I do ask for an extension of the control measures into other orchards and other areas of the district. I ask that the minister's department seek the co-operation of the growers in these control measures and studies to the advantage of the growers concerned at the present time and the long term advantage of the industry and therefore the district.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Kootenay West says, I have indeed enjoyed the scenery and the fruit in the interior of British Columbia in the days when I used to be able to take a summer holiday. I hope that the balance of the session will proceed in such a way that that will be possible again this year. In connection with little cherry, the hon. member has brought this matter to the attention of the government on various occasions for many years past. I can remember him speaking on it on several occasions. I should like to assure him that we are continuing research on the disease at Summerland and also, I believe, at the station we now have at Creston. How much success is being achieved in finding a means of controlling the disease I am sorry I am not able to tell him without having the matter looked up. I have not the information with me at the present time. However, I should like to assure him that we will continue research into the disease with the hope that something will be found which will control it or bring it to an end.

As far as brown rot is concerned, a spray has been developed consisting of sulphur and d.d.t., I believe, which, if applied twice during the period the trees are blossoming, does control brown rot fairly well. Research is still going on at Summerland in connection with brown rot in an attempt to find a better means of either controlling it or stamping it out.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his remarks and I rise again just to say that I overlooked one point I intended to mention when I was speaking before. I think the officials of the department are inclined to hide their light under a bushel. For instance, I found that in the district of Renata, which I know very well, there were a number of cherry growers who were having considerable success in their co-operation with the officials in connection with the sprays the minister has just mentioned. However, when I went to Edgewood, they seemed to have no knowledge of exactly what was happening in the other places. I suggest it would be a good idea if the department issued periodical releases through the local press concerning what is happening with respect to the co-operative studies on brown rot and the progress being made with the studies on little cherry disease. I think this would be helpful.

Mr. Harkness: I thoroughly agree with the hon. member that the result of the research should be put into the hands of the people who can make use of it as rapidly as possible and by the most effective possible means. As the hon. member knows, there is an extension program, I think it is called, by means of which the results of this work are put into the hands of the farmers. This program is primarily one of the things carried on by the province. We do the research and we turn the results of that over to the provincial departments of agriculture and other bodies. By and large they put it into the hands of the people who can make use of it.

In the Okanagan valley there is a joint committee of the provincial department and our own department which attempts to get the results of our research out as rapidly and as effectively as possible. I am sorry to hear that the knowledge of this spray for brown rot apparently did not get to certain cherry growers, and also I presume peach and plumb growers, because those are the three types of trees affected. I would hope that co-operation between the dominion and provincial officials, and the community as a whole, would be such that we would not have lags of this kind.

Mr. Herridge: The information did reach them, but too late for them to take advantage of it during the growing season.

Item agreed to.

10. Agricultural Stabilization Act administration, $103,710.

Mr. Rapp: In rising to take part in this debate on item 10 of the agriculture estimates, which deals with the Agricultural Stabilization Act, I should like to say that this legislation, which was desired by the farmers across Canada and has been in operation for only one year has proven to be excellent legislation. It is regrettable, however, that wheat, oats and barley, being under the jurisdiction of the wheat board now, could not be brought under this stabilization act. All other agricultural commodities are either under the act or could be brought under the act, but our most important products such as wheat, oats and barley are outside the scope of the stabilization act.

I am not prepared to suggest what steps should be taken to bring these grains under the protection of the stabilization act, but as a long range step toward stabilizing prices for western grains a method should be found. There are some other agricultural products that are not under the stabilization act right now which should be brought under it, and I refer particularly to rapeseed. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to give a short history of rapeseed growing in the west.

The growing of rapeseed in Canada on a large scale commenced in 1943. At that time the British, Canadian and United States navies needed supplies of rapeseed oil to be used as marine oil. The Canadian wheat board purchased all rapeseed from the growers during that period at a guaranteed price of six cents per pound. After the war the wheat board discontinued the purchase of rapeseed, and as a result of this the price dropped sharply from a high of six cents per pound to a low of 2.3 cents per pound last year. In 1957, as a result of the heavy wheat surplus, more rapeseed was produced and, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, 629,000 acres were seeded to rapeseed, of which 535,000 acres were in Saskatchewan alone. The output of rapeseed in 1942 was 420,000 pounds, but by 1957 it had increased to 423 million pounds. As I have said, last year the price dropped to a low of 2.3 cents per pound, the lowest price we ever received in the history of the industry. It is for this reason I am requesting that rapeseed should be brought under the stabilization act in order to keep prices in line instead of having them drop to a level that will destroy the producer.

We have no rapeseed surplus as yet, and the way rapeseed oil is being utilized much more could be produced. I have with me a clipping from a newspaper which states that the opportunities for vegetable oil crops are tremendous. It reads:

> Opportunities for expansion of Canadian vegetable oil seed crops were described as "fantastic" and "tremendous" by a spokesman for the edible oil foods industry.
> Robin E. Merry, president of the institute of edible oil foods, speaking at the institute's fifth annual meeting said that within six years Canada will need a billion pounds of foods fats and oil annually to meet the needs of its growing population...
> Unless the increase in Canadian needs of vegetable oils is to continue to be supplied by even greater imports, an all-out program to assist Canadian farmers to convert to soybean and other vegetable oil seed farming must begin at once, said Mr. Merry...
> "We can no longer afford the luxury of obsolete thinking about farming," he said. "Federal and provincial governments appear to be guilty of such thinking and seem to be unaware of the need for positive programs designed to help farmers seize the opportunity for profitable vegetable oil seed farming."

This, Mr. Chairman, is the reason I am asking that rapeseed be brought under the stabilization act. As the member for the Humboldt-Melfort constituency I am aware of the fact that half of the rapeseed grown in Saskatchewan is grown in my constituency. I cannot stand idly by and see the rapeseed industry, which is so vital to the Canadian economy, receive less than fair treatment from our Minister of Agriculture.

I should like to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as well. The fact that rapeseed was grown on acres that would have been otherwise seeded to wheat meant that we were able to reduce the wheat surplus by millions of bushels. Credit must be given to our Minister of Trade and Commerce for making such a creditable attempt to cut the wheat surplus. Unless rapeseed is brought under the stabilization act, thereby giving the growers a fair chance to get a good price, these acres will again be put into wheat, thus increasing our wheat surplus. The only hope the rapeseed producers have at the present time is that parliament will act to bring rapeseed under the stabilization act and thus give the industry a square deal.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the matter of wheat, oats and barley produced in western Canada for the wheat board not being under the stabilization act, which the hon. member mentioned, may I point out that no doubt the hon. gentleman knows this is due to the fact that it is handled by another government board, the wheat board. When the stabilization act was being prepared the wheat pools in western Canada asked that western wheat, oats and barley not be placed under the stabilization act but remain under the wheat board. I think it is certainly wise not to attempt to handle these commodities simultaneously through two government boards.

As far as rapeseed is concerned this is the first request I have ever received to have this commodity placed under the stabilization act. There has been no request up to date, to my knowledge, from any of the producers of rapeseed to the effect that it should be placed under price support. If there are requests of that kind the stabilization board and advisory committee will consider them but again I state we have received none to date.

The request made by the hon. member that rapeseed be placed under this act and his remarks concerning the possibility of producing sufficient rapeseed in Canada to meet Canada's vegetable oil requirements point up again some of the difficulties that are encountered in these matters. We had a recent request by the hon. member for Essex East that soybeans be given a high support price this year. Several other hon. gentlemen mentioned soybeans and the fact that we do not produce nearly as many as we could produce and that the demand for vegetable oil in Canada is larger than our total production of soybeans. It must be remembered that rapeseed oil, sunflower seed oil, flax seed oil and various other oils all interact in terms of production. We could have in Canada a larger production of vegetable oil than we could possibly consume in the country. I just mention this to illustrate the fact that there is a danger in overproduction. The fact that we import a certain amount of soybean oil each year does not indicate that we should proceed to expand our soybean production more or less indefinitely. The same thing applies to rapeseed production or the production of any other oil producing crop. We must look at the picture as a whole and take into consideration the fact that if we expanded production of any of these crops to the extent that expansion could take place in Canada we would meet the entire market and it would make it difficult as far as the production of similar crops is concerned.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I directed a question this morning to the Minister of Agriculture to which I have not had a reply. I asked the minister what would be the price for skim powdered milk, roller processed.

Mr. Harkness: The price for roller processed dried skim milk will be proportionately the same as for the spray processed commodity. It will be two cents under—that is, eight cents—for the roller processed product.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to say on this item. I trust it is the appropriate one on which to mention the question of the marketing of tree fruits. As the minister knows, marketing is the principal problem of tree fruit growers as it is with nearly all agricultural producers.

In British Columbia there has been a great deal done with respect to self help on the part of the growers and their efforts to obtain satisfactory legislation. As a result of years of effort the British Columbia marketing act was brought into being under which we have the tree fruit board. Working under the act and under this board is the organization called Tree Fruits Limited which is the growers' sales agency. Owing to the particular problems that have arisen in recent years with respect to the marketing of tree fruits in general, and particularly apples, there is a growing realization among fruit growers in British Columbia that the problem cannot be met on a provincial basis alone and that it is going to take co-operation within the industry throughout Canada if they are going to market their fruits to the best advantage under any given set of circumstances.

That feeling has been growing for a number of years and it found expression in the last convention of the British Columbia fruit growers' association which was held in Vernon from January 20 to January 22, 1959. That expression was highlighted by the adoption of two resolutions which I want to place on the record because to me and to those persons who have been interested in the tree fruit industry for a number of years they represent a progressive step in the thinking of the persons who have had particularly to do with these problems.

The first resolution that was considered by the convention was a resolution entitled "Co-operation amongst fruit producing areas" which was introduced by the Penticton delegation. They are quite a progressive lot down in Penticton; they come second only to those in the Kootenays. This resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the conquest of the moon has become a real and serious objective of apparently responsible governments, while at the same time the very existence and welfare of those who produce man's food on this planet—notably that of the fruit grower —appear to be of minor concern to those not directly affected, and

Whereas the only effective remedy for the growers' plight must be self help through extended co-operation,

Therefore be it resolved by this 1959 B.C.F.G.A. convention that their governing bodies be instructed to take definite and vigorous steps to bring about such co-operation among the major fruit producing areas of this northern continent that eventually all futile and destructive cut-throat competition may become a thing of the past, and be superseded by some form of orderly marketing such as this organization has demonstrated is feasible among the growers of this province.

To illustrate the comprehensive approach which is developing, I might mention that an amendment was moved to this resolution urging that the words "this northern continent" be deleted and that the word "Canada" be substituted therefor. When that amendment was placed before the convention it was defeated which indicates that the growers realize that not only must we co-operate within the province or within the country in the marketing of agricultural commodities but we have to have some degree of co-operation with the growers in other countries. I believe this is a very forward step.

After that resolution was unanimously adopted, as I understand it, the convention then discussed the next step with respect to what would flow from this co-operation between tree fruit growers in Canada. The convention then passed the following resolution which was put forward by the south and east Kelowna delegation and entitled "Canadian fruit board". It reads as follows:

Whereas the average return for apples for the 1957 crop, even with the deficiency payment, was inadequate to meet the cost of production, and

Whereas our own organization has done all in its power to secure the highest possible returns to the grower but has not been able to do so, not for lack of effort, but due to controlling only one-third of Canada's production in a small contained area,

Therefore be it resolved by this 1959 B.C.F.G.A. convention that we work primarily through the Canadian Horticultural Council to obtain the two things absolutely essential for the economic stability of this industry, and they are:

1. The establishment of a Canadian fruit board to handle the entire national and international selling of our fruit, and

2. A minimum price for our fruit commensurate with the cost of production.

I am particularly interested in the change in thinking that has occurred over the years. Until recent years I was closely associated with the British Columbia fruit growers' association and attended a number of conventions. At one time it was extremely difficult to get any consideration for a national approach to this problem. At that time growers tended to depend on the high quality of the fruit, the fruit packing and the advantage they would receive in competition with some other area in that respect. They found out as a result of experience that regardless of what is done to improve the pack or the efficiency of the organization in general, to meet with success they must co-operate with other fruit growing districts in Canada and with those in the United States to the south of us. They recommend the establishment of a Canadian fruit board. I do urge the minister to give consideration to this new expression of opinion on the part of the British Columbia fruit growers, and I ask that serious study be commenced by the appropriate officials of the minister's department of legislation suitable to meet the particular, and in some way the peculiar needs of the fruit industry in Canada, to the end we establish a Canadian fruit board in due time.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the fruit growers of British Columbia have passed a resolution to put forward their representations, and take action through the Canadian Horticultural Council. We have been encouraging horticulturalists right across Canada to do that ever since I have been in this position in order to get away from the business of regional representations which are often in direct conflict with each other, because they are made by every small section of the country. I found not very long after I became Minister of Agriculture that, for example, the fruit growers of a particular kind in British Columbia wanted action which was diametrically opposed to the action which was being requested at the same time by the growers of that same kind of fruit in Ontario. This seemed to me to be the sort of situation which the fruit growers should thrash out amongst themselves, and therefore we have been trying to encourage them to take these matters up in the horticultural council and come to some agreement amongst themselves before they come to us asking for action. I am glad that the British Columbia fruit growers apparently have adopted a resolution to follow that practice.

Mr. Herridge: So am I.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could have some further clarification from the minister as to what policy the government is going to follow as far as the support price of hogs is concerned. I am wondering if any result has yet been obtained from the study which is going on as to whether the deficiency payment, if it is inaugurated after October 1, will be limited—and I understand that is the thinking of the department and the minister—and what the ceiling may be on the number of hogs on which a deficiency payment may be made. The minister may say that this has not yet been determined, and if that is the situation I hope he will consider very carefully keeping the ceiling at a reasonably high level. I do not think the number of hogs on which a deficiency payment may be made should be so low as to encourage inefficient production or very small farms. I am enthusiastically in favour of removing support prices from great corporations or very large industries engaged in the production of hogs. If vertical integration in the production of hogs is extended, I think the formula outlined by the minister is one way by which it may be discouraged. But I think that in setting the ceiling as to the number of hogs eligible for deficiency payments, the number per farmer should be such as to enable an efficient farmer to make a reasonably good living in the production of hogs. It should not be a system of rationing the production of hogs or a system which will lend itself to a very small quota or number per farm being eligible.

When the minister is replying I wonder if he would comment on the quantity of pork products now held by the board and state whether he feels this is a very large quantity, and how it compares with quantities held by the board in previous years? Would he say whether the surpluses or quantities held by the board are the main reason that the government is considering this new kind of policy to which he referred some weeks ago? I would like some information as to what the plans of the board may be to dispose of this surplus pork, how it will be worked on the market, and in particular whether the quantity now held by the board will be placed on the Canadian market after the time when support prices are removed and in their place put the support price based on a deficiency technique.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as far as the general scheme is concerned I thought I had made that relatively clear in my statement and in my answer to one or two questions in the house afterwards. In any event, the idea is to maintain the support price by means of deficiency payments. I should like to emphasize this point. There seems still to be considerable confusion in some newspaper articles I have read between a support price as opposed to, as represented in these newspaper articles, a deficiency payment, as though they were completely different things. This is not the situation. A deficiency payment is a method of maintaining a support price, and a support price and a deficiency payment are not completely different things, as a considerable number of newspaper writers whose articles I have read in recent weeks seem to indicate.

I have said here several times that we establish a support price. That is the price which the farmer will receive for his product. We ensure he receives that price either by purchasing the product at that price or we give him the difference between the price he actually gets for the product sold on the open market and the support price we have established. We give him that difference by means of a deficiency payment. We can do it in some cases by certain other methods, such as the type of method the western grain farmers asked for, the retroactive flat payment. There are various other methods; but in any event the policy, as soon as it is worked out, will be to maintain the support price which has been announced for the first six months, which is now $25 per hundred pounds basis Montreal and Toronto markets, and for the following six months, $23.65 per hundred pounds basis those same markets, with appropriate differentials on other markets. The hon. member seemed to think we were going to change the method of support from purchasing the article, as we are doing at the present time, to the deficiency payment method when the price change goes into effect. That is not the case. We are going to put this deficiency payment method of supporting a price into effect just as soon as we can assemble the necessary information to determine what number of hogs we should support and have worked out the general administrative changes which will be necessary in order to carry this into effect.

In other words, we do not intend to wait until the end of September before putting this into effect. We shall put this into effect in a month, if we can get the necessary information and can get the administrative machinery set up in that time. I am not saying it will be a month; I expect it will be more like two or three months. In any event I believe it will be before the end of September.

As far as the ceiling on the number of hogs is concerned this is one of the matters with respect to which we require information. I do not know what the ceiling will be and I do not intend to guess at it. One thing I might say in connection with it, is this: the suggestions I receive depend entirely, it would seem, on the number of hogs that the man making the suggestion raises. I have had all kinds of suggestions already, ranging all the way from 50 hogs up to several hundred. Thus, I cannot answer that part of the question now, except to say that the ceiling would be set at a point which I hope will make it possible for the largest number of farmers possible to be able to make a reasonable living out of hog raising.

Mr. Argue: As a main industry?

Mr. Harkness: In some cases, yes. In any event, the only reason we are putting a ceiling on the number of hogs a farmer can deliver is to prevent contract farmers from beating the system. We could just cut out contracts and integrated operations which we know exist and pay the deficiency payments to the other farmers, but if we attempted to do that nothing would be accomplished because all that would happen would be that the hogs would be delivered in different peoples names under contracts of different sizes. So in order to have any control, some limit has to be imposed on everyone. This is really a control measure. It is the only way in which a scheme of this sort could, in practice, be put into effect and accomplish the purpose which we have in mind.

As to the manner in which the pork presently on hand is to be disposed of, I may say that we hope to sell some of it on the Canadian market as the price rises, as I think it undoubtedly will. In other words, if we hold this pork for a certain length of time we expect we will find a market for it. We do not, of course, intend to break the market as the hon. member has suggested. That is one thing we certainly do not wish to do. In addition, I think we have some chance of selling some of this pork abroad. That was one of the reasons I went overseas, last fall, to investigate the possibilities of opening up markets again for our pork in Britain and in other European countries. I think we shall be able to sell some pork in Britain and in Europe during the coming year. I cannot say definitely that we shall be able to do so, but I think there is a fair chance of this happening.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks about the poultry industry in Canada, and particularly, in the province of Quebec. The poultry industry in Quebec is faced with some very difficult problems, mostly in the production of broilers. Last year, and especially last fall, broilers sold for 14 to 16 cents a pound; today, the price is about 17 cents a pound. Now, it is a known fact that it costs about 21 cents to the most efficient producers to produce one pound of broiler, while the cost can run as high as 29 cents for the average producer.

Would the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) consider the opportunity of establishing a deficiency price for poultry meat, and more particularly for broiler meat? I believe that the farmers have made representations on that matter to the minister last fall, besides asking him to reduce the number of export permits for poultry.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: If I may say a word with regard to this question of putting price supports under poultry, particularly broiler chicks in which, I think, the hon. member is particularly interested, I would point out that this is just not a practical possibility. I do not look upon the production of these broilers as a real farm operation, because it is really a factory operation. It does not require a farm. It does not require even a rural atmosphere. It can be carried on in the middle of a city. A man puts up a building, buys several thousand chicks and then feeds them up to three and a half pounds or so. Along those lines he can turn out birds by the thousand every week. It is not a farm operation at all; it is a production line operation, and because practically no ground is required it is the type of operation which can lead to almost unlimited production.

If there were a guaranteed price for broiler chickens in effect in this country there could be produced here ten times as many broiler chickens as we in Canada could possibly eat and, of course, as the hon. member knows, there is no possibility of exporting any quantity of these chickens. In other words, there is no limit to the production which would be possible unless it were the amount of feed available, and we have almost unlimited amounts of feed available. It is, therefore, the type of operation upon which a support price just cannot be placed, because that would encourage unlimited production to take place.

The price difficulties faced by the chicken industry, or the broiler chicken industry at this time have been brought on by the industry itself. They have produced themselves out of their markets. I have warned the producers of broilers and the producers of turkeys for the past year and a half that if they continued to expand production as they were doing they would produce themselves into bankruptcy, and that is exactly what has happened as far as some of the broiler chicken producers are concerned. And that is what will happen to some of the turkey producers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Competition from the United States is very great.

Mr. Harkness: No. As far as turkeys are concerned, as the hon. member knows import control is in effect.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister; but it being five o'clock it is my duty, according to standing orders, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit later today or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of public bills.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Antoine Frechette (Temiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-21, to amend the Representation Act.

He said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is simply to change the name of the electoral district of "Temiscouata" to that of "Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata", because, in my constituency, there are two provincial electoral districts, one named "Riviere-du-Loup" and the other, "Temiscouata". So, at the request of the county councils, I introduced this bill to change the name of "Temiscouata" to that of "Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata".

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): What would be, then, the name of the constituency? Could the hon. member tell us what would be the name of his constituency and what are the reasons for the change he proposes?

Mr. Frechette: At present, my constituency is named Temiscouata—

(Text):

An hon. Member: He has already explained that.

(Translation):

Mr. Frechette: —but from now on, it will be known as "Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata".

(Text):

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FILING OF FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-22, to amend the Companies Act.

He said: Before I go into the details of this bill and the intent behind it, I do wish to point out to hon. members who may disagree with some of the wording that the Companies Act is a very involved act and it is rather difficult for a private member, with the limited resources at his disposal, to bring in a properly worded bill. However, since this is simply second reading, which means approval in principle, I feel that the various legal problems involved can well be dealt with in committee. This is particularly pertinent because there have been no amendments to the Companies Act since 1934, and conditions have changed rather remarkably since 1934.

The purpose of the bill, as shown in the explanatory note, is to prevent public companies taking advantage of the exemption given in section 121 of the Companies Act to private companies—among other requirements, those not having more than 50 shareholders—by which the so-called "family" companies do not have to file annual statements with the Secretary of State. Under the present definitions and section 121 large companies are able to avoid filing annual financial statements by incorporating private companies and becoming shareholders therein.

The Canadian Companies Act, as it now stands, is taken almost word for word from the English companies act, but in 1948 the English companies act was revised and a provision was inserted in that act to cover the point I am trying to cover in this bill.

Generally speaking, there are a lot of other sections in the Companies Act that need revision. It would not hurt it if the Companies Act had a thorough going over.

The intent of the bill is two-fold. First, under the present law a public company, that is a company with more than 50 shareholders, can purchase a private company and operate that private company and in the operation of that private company, although they are forced to divulge facts in regard to the operation of the public company, under the law they do not have to divulge any details in regard to its operation.

This might well be exemplified by a communication which all hon. members received from a gentleman containing an excerpt from the Toronto Star of Friday, April 10, 1959 which details certain happenings at the annual meeting of the Canadian General Electric Company. One of the few Canadian shareholders tried to inquire into the activities of the private companies owned by the public company, Canadian General Electric, and he was unable to get the information he wanted.

I would think it should be rather axiomatic that any law laid down by a government should have for its purpose not only the protection of majority stockholders in a company but, far more important, the protection of the interests of minority shareholders. Under the present Companies Act this just is not so. The majority shareholders can, if they are not receiving the information they want, elect a new board of directors but the minority shareholders are utterly powerless. Actually in one respect the bill does not go far enough because minority shareholders of private companies today have to pay in order to receive financial statements. One of the definitions of a private company is that it shall have not more than 50 shareholders. The expense of printing such statements is not great and minority shareholders should receive these statements as a matter of right.

Although, as I say, that is one purpose of the bill, perhaps the other purpose is of much more public interest, namely the hiding behind the private companies' section of the Companies Act of large corporations which are essentially not private companies but rather public companies. In this respect the problem is to decide in what sense the property of a large business is private and, if it is private, who is entitled to such privacy. Under our present regulations, as I said before, the criterion has been the number of shareholders. In other days that was an indication of the size of the company but that is not so today. In this era of large international corporations with extensive holdings in many countries the criterion of the number of shareholders does not hold good with these wholly owned subsidiaries because the stock of the subsidiary is voted through the directors of the parent corporation. They therefore qualify as to number of shareholders but this is simply begging the question because in all other respects they are properly public companies.

In dealing with the questions of foreign investment in Canada the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects made three recommendations, with the second of which the bill is concerned. The three recommendations are found on page 393 of their report and read as follows:

1. Wherever possible, such concerns—

The reference is to foreign subsidiaries.

—should employ Canadians in senior management and technical positions, should retain Canadian engineering and other professional and service personnel, and should do their purchasing of supplies, materials and equipment in this country.

2. They should publish their financial statements and make full disclosure of the results of their Canadian operations.

3. They should include on their boards of directors a number of independent Canadians and they should sell an appreciable interest in their equity stock to Canadians.

Mention is made of 20 to 25 per cent. In dealing specifically with their second recommendation they had this to say, as found on page 394 of the final report of the commission:

The second objective is that foreign-owned concerns should publish or make available their financial statements showing the results of their operations in Canada. If these concerns, more particularly the larger ones, were owned in Canada, they would be required to supply copies of their financial statements to Canadian shareholders and in this way, if there were more than just a few shareholders, these statements would be made public. Generally speaking the parent concerns publish their own statements in considerable detail in their own countries.

I might add that the requirements with regard to the publication of such statements in the United States, for instance, compared with the requirements in Canada are much more extensive. They require a greater degree of disclosure of company operations and in many respects they are far ahead of what we require under our Companies Act. The commissioners go on to say:

It is not unreasonable therefore that Canadians should wish similar information about the activities of the subsidiaries in this country. Indeed, it is our opinion that the community at large is entitled to be interested in the financial results of the operations of the larger foreign-owned concerns operating in this country, since in many cases these operations have a direct bearing upon economic activity and the level of employment. We do not propose that foreign-owned concerns operating in Canada should be forced to publish their financial statements—

By that they mean the taking of advertisements in newspapers in order to acquaint the public in that manner.

—but we believe it might well be in their best interests to do so voluntarily. Such a step should improve the public relations of such concerns and should allay unjustified suspicions about their operations and activities in Canada.

With regard to the extent of the operations of such subsidiaries, I wish to quote a statement taken from an article by Professor J. E. Smyth, published in the Queen's Quarterly, the autumn issue of 1958, which statement reads as follows:

Until about four years ago the Bank of Canada compiled and published financial data from a sample of Canadian companies; it has since abandoned the series. One of the important limitations of these data was that they were drawn entirely from published financial statements, and that the proportion of Canadian economic activity which was affected by large private companies, for which no statements were available, was so significant as to invalidate any conclusions which might be drawn from the published figures.

If any hon. members are in doubt as to the degree of this control of Canadian industry I should like to read a few percentage figures from the book, "Canada-United States Economic Relations" issued by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. In this regard I am referring to the degree of control and not the degree of 100 per cent ownership. With regard to automobiles and parts, the percentage of that industry controlled by United States residents is 95 per cent and in the case of rubber 84 per cent. No figure is available for electrical apparatus but the figure as to the amount owned is 62 per cent, and the figure for the amount controlled should be similar. In chemicals the figure is 51 per cent; for the petroleum industry 68 per cent; other mining 54 per cent; pulp and paper 45 per cent; smelting and refining of non-ferrous native ores, 55 per cent; all other manufacturing 43 per cent. This table is found on page 104 of the book to which I referred.

Considering these facts it is rather interesting that so often you hear the statement made that labour unions should be forced by law to publish financial statements for the information of their members and the public at large, and the commonly used argument is that the financial affairs of companies and businesses are open to public knowledge and that if this is fair for companies it should also be fair for unions.

Without taking sides pro or con all I wish to say is that what I have said so far should clearly indicate that it is not true that the business affairs of a very large section of Canadian business are open to the public. This goes even a little bit farther, in that it confers on the so-called private companies an advantage over public companies. The statements of operations of public companies are open to their competitors, but the private companies' affairs are secret. For instance, if you take a sampling of industry you will find that the statements of the Ford motor company are available to all the people of Canada, but those of General Motors and Chrysler are not. If you want to look at the pulp and paper industry, you find that the statements of Canadian International Paper are not available but Powell River are. In so far as the meat industry is concerned, we know all about Canada Packers but we know nothing about Swift Canadian. In so far as the oil industry is concerned, we know about the operations of Imperial Oil, but Cities Service, and a host of others are completely secret. In the merchandising field, the statements of Simpson's are available but Eaton's are not. In so far as farm implements are concerned, if you think you are paying too much for your farm implements, you can ascertain how much Massey-Harris is making, but not International Harvester. In the food industry we find that Weston's operations are open to the public, but General Foods, Nabisco, Heinz and a lot of others are not.

This is an added inducement to foreign companies to refuse to allow Canadians to buy stock in the Canadian subsidiary, because if they allow Canadians to buy stock they will lose the benefit of this quirk in the Companies Act which states that a private company has 50 shareholders or less and a public company is one in which there are more than 50 stockholders. This type of thinking is in line with the former legislation which made it an advantage if a company had 95 per cent or more foreign ownership because if the ownership was of that degree greater tax concessions were received It is a type of thinking that is not colonialism, but it is economic feudalism in my opinion.

As I stated at the outset, there are many points which must be considered with a bill such as this. Undoubtedly, the matter is not covered in the way the Department of Justice, for instance, might cover the rectifying of this queer omission in our Companies Act up to the level of national sovereignty, if you like, to which the United Kingdom brought their act in 1948. However, I do not believe any member on this side of the house can quarrel with the intent of the amendment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) has repeatedly pointed out in his speeches that this and other steps, such as those mentioned in the report of the royal commission, are necessary in order to improve Canadian-United States relations and to give recognition to the need for making the operation of these companies more Canadian in nature.

About a week ago the minister of northern affairs delivered a speech in the Chateau Laurier and, from the tenor of his remarks, one would have thought he was speaking on this bill. Speeches made in the United States by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) have indicated they believe that measures such as these are necessary and will, in the end, react not only to the benefit of Canada but the other countries involved. It is unfortunate that in every case I must make reference to the United States, but the fact is they are by far the major owner of our industrial complex. This was clearly indicated by the table I read earlier.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how anyone could quarrel with the intent of this bill. It does not place a liability on any foreign company. It only brings such a company into a position of equality with its more truly Canadian counterpart. It does give to the Canadian people the type of information which is so freely available from the ordinary public companies. As I also stated, this measure does not demand any greater degree of disclosure than is demanded by the United States law.

I do not think there is very much more I can usefully add at this stage, Mr. Speaker. I think that this is simply a companion piece, a sort of trilogy, if you like, because I will have other bills coming forward to take care of some of the other loopholes which I feel should be plugged in order to have this country become a nation in the economic as well as in the political sphere. I have in my hand a pamphlet put out by the Canadian institute of international affairs entitled "Foreign Investment in Canada", by J. M. Smith. He ends up by saying something along these lines, that Canadians have benefited greatly from foreign investment, control notwithstanding, in terms of employment, income and living standards. Yet, as Canadians, we are right to be concerned. Is our economic independence slipping away? At what point, if we are losing our economic independence, will we begin to lose our political independence?

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us agree in principle with the statements which have been made by the hon. member in his excellent introduction to this bill. However, what struck me, in the first instance, was that he did not mention whether or not he had consulted with the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) on this bill. After all, the Companies Act is one of the most important pieces of legislation on our statutes, and I should have thought that this afternoon we would have had the benefit of the advice of the Secretary of State who administers the act. Not once during the hon. member's speech did I hear any reference to any consultation with the officials of the Department of Secretary of State or with the minister. In any event, that is not my responsibility.

I must say that, in so far as the member's statement is concerned, he covered a great deal more ground than is included in his amendment. After all, his amendment relates to only one of the points he mentioned. There is not only the question of public companies incorporating as private companies and thereby avoiding making their statements available, but we have another practice which could have been covered in such a bill. I refer to the fact that companies do not have to disclose a statement of operations for wholly owned subsidiaries, thereby avoiding telling the public the proper financial status of the major company. There are many other facets to this very important clause which the hon. member wishes to amend by this bill.

I do not know if this house is qualified to amend the Companies Act without a thorough examination and until we have some assurance that the officers of the companies branch and the Secretary of State himself have been consulted so that if the intent of this bill were to be enacted as legislation it would have the approval of these gentlemen and also accomplish the things the hon. member who sponsors the bill seeks to have it accomplish.

I shall reserve my detailed remarks for the committee stage, if we should reach that stage on this bill. I know that the hon. member has a great deal of interest in having proper disclosure of the financial status of companies operating in Canada. I agreed entirely with him when he spoke about foreign corporations which do not have to disclose their assets or financial position in Canada because of a lack of proper provisions in our Companies Act. Before agreeing to any amendment I think, when we reach the committee stage, we should have had the full and proper advice of officials.

Companies Act

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my support for the principle and purpose of this bill. In doing so I must first of all congratulate the hon. member for his short, somewhat hesitant but most certain step toward C.C.F. policy in this connection.

I support the purpose of the bill as indicated by the explanatory notes and congratulate the hon. member for his most interesting speech when introducing the bill. Personally I think it is wrong in principle that large companies and corporations are allowed to get around the law by incorporating as private companies or being considered as such because they have 50 shareholders or less when it is obvious to most hon. members of this house that it is done in order to conceal an examination of their affairs by the public.

In my opinion the protection of the shareholders and the public interest requires and demands that all proper publicity should be given to the activities of large corporations and companies in Canada. Their activities are usually related to the development of natural resources and the welfare of large numbers of human beings whether they be shareholders or employees of the company concerned. I feel that every proper publicity should be given with respect to their financial position, their profit and loss position, their expansion intentions and questions of that sort. It is for that reason I heartedly endorse the hon. member's efforts in this direction by the introduction of this bill.

However, as the previous speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) said, it is a large step. The Companies Act is a most important and complex act. I believe the matter should receive very careful consideration to make certain that we amend the act to best advantage having in view all the circumstances. Therefore, to that end I would suggest that it would be a good idea and one which should win the approval of the sponsor for this bill to be sent to the appropriate committee of this house where the Secretary of State, officials of the companies branch and representatives from other sections of the community could give evidence and thus enable the committee to ensure that either this bill or a similar piece of legislation does the job intended by the hon. member who has introduced this measure.

Because of the importance of the matter I hope the bill will go to a vote before this private members' hour is concluded and I personally would suggest that someone should move an amendment to the effect that the bill be referred to the appropriate committee.

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I, like the two hon. gentlemen who preceded me in this debate, feel that a certain amount of congratulations should be extended to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) for the fine way in which he introduced this measure. Although I cannot concur with everything he has said, in large part I must agree.

I should like first to make some reference to the quotations he cited from the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects. He quoted from pages 393 and 394 which consists of that part of the report dealing with foreign investment in Canada.

What the hon. gentleman says about our requiring some control over foreign investment in Canada is absolutely correct and I believe all those who have participated in this debate concurred in that statement. I should like to read from page 392 of the report of the Gordon Commission:

> —we believe the main objectives of Canadians in this matter should be; first, to see a larger share of foreign capital invested in the form of bonds and mortgages, which do not involve control of large sectors of the economy; second, to see that the part of foreign investment which is invested in the resource and manufacturing industries is associated in some degree with Canadian capital and Canadian interests—

In my opinion it is impossible to implement the Gordon recommendations merely by making a slight amendment to the Companies Act. In the first place, there have been no amendments to the act since 1934 notwithstanding the reference in the explanatory notes on the right hand page of the bill as printed.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this point?

Mr. Creaghan: Yes.

Mr. Broome: What part of the explanatory notes implies that there has been?

Mr. Creaghan: I know the hon. member mentioned the year 1934 in his opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, but the explanatory notes imply that amendments may have been made since then. The English companies act was revised in 1948 and referring to this in the second paragraph of the explanatory note the hon. member's bill states:

> The Canadian act was amended in some respects to follow the 1948 English revision; but this provision was not adopted.

This indicates that the mover of the bill is aware of the English revision of 1948 which probably was justified in that country because, unlike Canada, England does not rely in large part on foreign investment.

I think it would be of some interest to the house if I made reference to the fact that in both the Canadian and English companies acts the definitions of a private company are identical at the present time. Both acts place restrictions on the right to transfer shares. Both impose a restriction of a total of 50 shareholders and in both acts a company is given no right to request that the public subscribe to its shares.

Mr. Speaker, I have made that statement to bring to the attention of the house that the amendment suggested is not in any way in conflict with the English act; we have identical legislation at the present time. Section 121 of the act is reprinted in the bill which we are discussing today in identical form, with the addition of the folowing words:

—exempted by subsection (2A)—

In other words, if Bill No. C-22 is adopted it will not be making a change in the law in so far as public companies are concerned but it will be making a drastic change in what has been referred to as private companies. In England they have a similar section to section 121. A public company or a private company in England must give 21 days' notice to its shareholders; an English company must also give 21 days' notice to debenture holders. However, we have not that compulsion in Canada.

Personally I have no objection to compelling Canadian private companies to send out their financial statements to their shareholders. There are only 50 shareholders in any case, and in most instances the shareholders are very familiar with the financial statements. In fact, our present act, by section 121 (3), gives the shareholder of a private company, if he is one of the 50, the right to request a financial statement, and it must be mailed to him within a period of seven days. However, there is a small penalty: The shareholder can be obligated to pay 10 cents a folio, or 100 words, for the preparation of the financial report.

As far as I am concerned I have no objection to the bill in so far as a private company being obligated to send out free of charge to its shareholders its financial statement. I have no objection to the statements which have been made by the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). However, there is one basic point which I think all of us at all times should be concerned with if we want to keep free enterprise alive in this country of ours. This bill assumes that the internal affairs of a federal private company are of public interest even when there is no questien of this private company going to the public to borrow money or of asking it to subscribe in any way to its security issues. In my opinion this matter concerns the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian association of chartered accountants.

If we adopted the bill in its present form I suggest we would be creating three types of companies in Canada. In the first place we would be left with the public company, the large company in which anybody can buy shares. In the second place the private company, that is the family company which has not more than 50 shareholders, would remain in existence with the same privileges as it has today. The third type of company would be a new creature of fiction. We would be creating a private company which, like the one just mentioned, would not have more than 50 shareholders but it would have to comply with section 121 of the act and the bill we are discussing.

The bill has four conditions, and it is these four conditions I am chiefly concerned with. In the first place the conditions are objectionable because the restrictions or exceptions are cumulative in effect and it would be impractical for anybody to administer the same. The first clause of the bill reads:

(a) No body corporate is the holder of any of the shares or debentures.

Now, if a body corporate became a holder of a share or shares of a private company, that company would then become this new type of company, the third type which I mentioned a moment ago. That could happen very easily in many of the family industries or companies of Canada. It could happen, for example, if a legitimate private company of not more than 50 shareholders went to a bank, borrowed money, and was compelled to put up some of its shares for security. In other words, if a private company went to a bank and the bank insisted on a transfer of shares for security purposes, naturally that company would fall within the ambit of this legislation and would be obligated to comply with section 121. It would then mean that the financial report of that company would be filed in the office of the Secretary of State and the information contained therein would be public in nature, which is certainly contrary to the principe of a private company.

The same thing would happen if any one of the 50 shareholders in a private company registered his shares in a holding company or if he sold them to an incorporated investment dealer for transfer to another person. The same objection which I have just mentioned would be applicable to clauses (b) and (c) which follow.

The last clause (d) is also weak and I suggest, as was also suggested by the hon. member, it is merely a question of bad drafting. However, I feel it should be pointed out, that in Canada today in order to be a director of a Canadian company it is necessary to be an individual, while section (d) says:

no body corporate is a director—

That, I suggest, is merely bad drafting.

What I am also very much concerned about is the objection raised by the hon. member for Ottawa East: Do we know whether or not the Department of the Secretary of State could administer this act if it was adopted in its present form or in some type of amended form? In the first place, it would require a tremendous increase in the staff. The Secretary of State would have to keep a list of all shareholders of every private company and record every individual notice of transfer of shareholdings. He would probably be compelled to hire a large number of inspectors who would be travelling across Canada visiting the head offices of these private companies. I suggest to hon. members that before this bill is passed the Department of the Secretary of State and the solicitors concerned would have to make an exhaustive study and probably introduce a series of amendments in order to make Bill No. C-22 operative.

Personally, I am not at all concerned about requiring private companies to distribute automatically their financial statements to shareholders and to perform this service free of charge. It would not cost them very much. They are obliged to prepare statements by the Companies Act; it would just be a matter of having them mimeographed and distributed.

One point which has not been mentioned is this: because certain things work well in England or in a foreign country this fact alone is no indication that they would work equally well in Canada. I say this because in England, for example, there is just one jurisdiction which can issue letters patent while in Canada there are 11 jurisdictions which have authority to issue letters patent to corporations.

As far as I am concerned, this bill in its present form or in any form which the House of Commons should amend it would always remain ineffective unless we were assured beforehand that all the ten individual authorities would follow suit.

I suggest that before the house votes on this measure it should be studied by the federal-provincial committee which will be meeting again this spring to study the uniformity of Canadian company law. At the present time a draft uniform companies act has been prepared. It has been circulated to the various attorneys general, and has been studied by the Canadian Bar Association. I understand that this revised act will be reviewed when this federal-provincial committee meets again some time next month. After study by that committee the measure could possibly be introduced in a better form and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce where delegations could present briefs and the members of the committee could receive the benefit of the expert advice which is available in the capital city.

I wish to emphasize once again that I am in complete accord with the recommendations of the Gordon report. I am opposed to the influx of United States capital into this country in its present form by means of which it can obtain control of the equity stock in new and growing Canadian companies. However, I do not feel that this bill could correct the situation. I believe this matter requires to be dealt with in separate legislation in the form of a bill which would be drafted in such a way as to have some control over the flow of United States or other foreign currency into this country.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): When the sponsor of this bill, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) sat down, I felt myself to be very much like the wife of a man who had imagined himself to be a refrigerator. This couple had taken their unfortunate problem to a psychiatrist, and the psychiatrist eventually took the wife aside to see how things were proceeding. She said that things were not going too badly, although her husband still imagined himself to be a refrigerator and slept with his mouth open, very much like a refrigerator door. The psychiatrist asked if this was particularly annoying, and the wife said: "Yes, the little light keeps me awake".

When the hon. member sat down and closed his mouth I am afraid the light went out for the person who is now addressing you. It seems to me that the bill presented by the hon. member has two specific purposes. The first is to tighten up the provisions which relate to private companies. The second seems to be some roundabout method of taking a swipe at the growing United States control of some Canadian companies. For the purpose of completing the record, it might be of interest to read into the record just exactly what a private company is now, as defined by the Companies Act in chapter 53 of the latest edition of the Revised Statutes of Canada. There are three particular matters which help to define what a private company is. The first, of course, is that the right to transfer its shares is restricted. Second, the number of shareholders is limited to 50 and, third, any invitation to the public to subscribe for any shares or debentures is prohibited. The definition is set forth more explicitly and much more fully in the interpretation section of the act, section 3 (j).

To these factors which now make up a private company, the hon. member has introduced others which are set forth in the second paragraph of Bill No. C-22 now before us for our consideration. I am wondering if he does have in mind the correcting of one ill, where, by the use of hanky-panky and legal ritual, some companies are able to classify themselves as private companies and thus avoid making any disclosure, while other companies are public companies doing the same type of business and must, therefore, make those disclosures. Perhaps he would be better advised even at this stage to consider withdrawing this particular measure and bringing in something which would effect a new definition of what exactly is a private company.

With regard to the other point which, I gather, is concerned with the prevention of United States domination of the Canadian economy, I would say that this bill is really of little use along that line. It would certainly make apparent the extent of the control exercised by United States capital in this country, but it would not change the present situation one bit, and therefore I wonder if the hon. member is really serving the purpose he wishes to serve by means of this bill.

Those are the two reservations I have about this measure. I am afraid that I do not understand it as well as I should. It seems to me that the Companies Act is a difficult field to enter. I hope some brave soul will tackle it one day, refine it, streamline it and even write it in basic English. I appreciate the sincerity of the hon. member, and would be prepared to vote for this bill. However, I see that the hour of the voting has come; perhaps it is now past, and I hope we can achieve in committee the notable objectives which he has in mind.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question No. 332—Mr. Argue:

1. As at March 31, 1959 or nearest available date, how many Canadian citizens were employed at bases in Newfoundland under lease to the United States?

2. Are these employees eligible to receive superannuation or retirement allowance upon their retirement?

3. If not, has the Canadian government approached the United States government with a view to making provision for an adequate pension plan for these people comparable to that provided for United States citizens employed at these bases?

4. If not, has the Canadian government considered the possibility of making alternative provision whereby these employees might become eligible for a superannuation plan?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister and Acting Secretary of state for External Affairs):

1. 4,324 as of March 31, 1959.

The employees are not known to have made arrangements for any other retirement benefit scheme with those United States military services by whom they are employed.

3. The government has not made any proposals to the United States government on the matter of retirement benefits for this particular segment of the Canadian labour force but stands ready to offer whatever assistance it can in any reasonable initiative which the employees may take with the United States military services concerned.

4. These persons are not eligible for Canadian government superannuation benefits since they are not employees of the Canadian government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 27, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GERMANY—TABLING OF SOVIET NOTE AND CANADIAN REPLY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on March 4 I informed the house that on March 2 a note addressed to the government of Canada by the Soviet government had been received, concerning the possibility of negotiations taking place on problems connected with or relating to Germany. This Soviet note did not contain anything of significance which was not to be found in the notes which were addressed on the same date to the United Kingdom, the United States and France.

The Canadian government in its reply to the Soviet note, which reply was given on April 24, expressed support for the proposals put forward by the western powers, and accepted by the Soviet government, which would lead shortly to negotiations in Geneva at the level of foreign ministers. The note stated that in view of the imminence of these negotiations the Canadian government did not consider it would be of value to comment in detail on the matters raised in the Soviet note. The hope was expressed, however, that the Soviet government will treat the coming negotiations as a real opportunity to achieve a lessening of international tension, and to settle some of the pressing problems on a basis that will take into account the legitimate interests of all concerned.

For the information of the house I should like to table copies of the Soviet note and the Canadian reply.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I am sure the house will welcome the tabling of these documents by the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether or not the Canadian reply in any way dealt with the latest proposal put forward by Her Majesty's government with regard to the new proposal for inspection, and if not, can the Prime Minister say whether or not Canada has been made aware of this proposal?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in general the note dealt with the matters set out in the Soviet note. With respect to the other matter raised by the hon. member for Essex East, I wish to say that the Soviet union, we regret, has not accepted the recent proposal. I take it what the hon. member has in mind is the proposal of the United States consolidating the progress so far made at Geneva?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was referring to the latest proposal announced over the week end by the Prime Minister, with regard to the occasions when inspection teams would proceed into the territory of the countries concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as that matter is concerned naturally—it was not delivered until Friday night—our reply did not deal with that particular phase. I thought the hon. member had in mind particularly the situation respecting the consolidation of progress already made in connection with nuclear tests.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister answer the other part of my question, which was whether or not Canada has received an intimation from Her Majesty's government about this new proposal, and is the Prime Minister in a position to make any comment in regard to it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the first part of the question is concerned, naturally there has been information given.

With respect to the latter part of the question, I think the representations in general are acceptable and indeed offer a new vista of hope for a solution of the problem provided, of course, that these views are accepted, even in part, by the Soviet union when the foreign ministers' conference takes place on May 11.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group are interested in the Prime Minister's statement. We welcome his tabling of these very interesting documents. As a party we are interested in a continuance of negotiations to the end that progress can be made toward peace in the world. We shall peruse these documents with interest.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to raise the rate of remuneration of insurable employment; to increase the rates of contributions to be paid on behalf of insured persons and employers; to add new grounds for extension of the qualifying periods; to provide a new schedule of rates of benefits consequential on the new table of contributions; to provide that the maximum benefits, under the heading "duration of benefit", will be increased from 36 times to 52 times the weekly benefit rate; to establish a new schedule of allowable earnings; and to provide for other related matters.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION NO. 105 CONCERNING THE ABOLITION OF FORCED LABOUR

On the order: Government notices of motion:

Mr. Starr: Stand.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

IMPENDING FIREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the Minister of Labour if he thinks he can usefully report to the house regarding his reported conversations this morning with management and labour in connection with the threatened strike on the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we met this morning with Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways and Mr. Gamble, chairman of the negotiating committee of the brotherhood, together with three other members of that union. Up until one o'clock we were discussing the matters in dispute as outlined in the conciliation board report, and we have adjourned until four o'clock.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, it would be premature on my part to make any remarks about the discussions that are going on. We hope some settlement can be reached between the two parties in this dispute.

STEEL

REPRESENTATIONS BY UNITED STEEL WORKERS OF AMERICA FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a submission from the united steel workers of America asking for a public inquiry into the steel industry to determine whether steel companies have been justified in further increasing steel prices? Can the Prime Minister say what consideration has been given to the conducting of such a public inquiry?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, such a representation was received. Since it has been received there have been one or more meetings between representatives of the steel workers and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I would ask the minister to reply in general to the question asked.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add to what the Prime Minister has said and say that a brief and an appendix to the brief have been put before us. I had a separate meeting with the representatives of the united steel workers. They raised with me a particular problem with regard to a statistical survey which would relate wages to productivity, and that has been under consideration by the dominion bureau of statistics. The whole brief has been given careful study, and we are continuing to look into matters raised therein.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he could give the house a report on the civil defence conference with the provinces which took place last Friday.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of her intention to ask this question. I might point out that all provincial governments, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, were represented by at least one minister and one or more officials. The federal government was represented by the Prime Minister, who addressed the conference at the morning session and stressed the need for decisive action in the field of civil defence, by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Justice and myself, and for part of the time by the Minister of Defence Production and the two Ministers without Portfolio.

The purpose of the conference was to discuss with the provinces the proposed allocation of certain federal functions to national defence, to national health and welfare, to the R.C.M.P. and the emergency measures organization in the privy council office, and to obtain their views on the responsibilities which it is proposed to leave in provincial and local hands with increased federal technical and advisory services, as well as greater financial assistance. The allocation of the federal responsibilities was discussed with the provinces in considerable detail, and I can say to the house without reservation that in their broad outlines these new arrangements appealed to the provinces as being sensible and reasonable in every way.

We also discussed with the provinces the areas of responsibility which will remain in their hands and those of the municipal or regional civil defence organizations maintained under provincial direction. I think I can say that provincial reactions to all features of the federal proposals were favourable; particularly to the federal government's offer to increase the federal contribution to approved or local civil defence projects from 50 per cent, where this now applies, to 75 per cent.

Provincial ministers will now discuss these various questions with their colleagues, and we hope to have the official reactions of their governments at an early date. In the meantime it is the government's intention to proceed with the reallocation of purely federal functions to the departments and agencies I have mentioned.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a supplementary question. Can he say whether or not the federal government now has a definite policy on evacuation? If so, was that policy announced to the provinces? Also, has the federal government a policy with regard to shelters, and was that likewise discussed with the provinces?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Both these subjects were discussed briefly with the provinces, and as indicated at that time top priority was going to be given to these matters at the policy committee level.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AUTOMATION—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE TO STUDY EFFECTS ON EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, which provides him with an opportunity to be a star performer this afternoon.

Have various labour organizations urged the government to establish a committee composed of representatives of government, labour and industry to investigate the effects of automation on employment and to recommend appropriate measures to deal with the situation? If so, what consideration is being given by the government to these recommendations?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for having given me notice of this question. In answer I wish to say that we have received such recommendations, and that a committee was set up in 1957 composed of representatives of labour and management, and including in addition experts from the government service and universities. The committee will be holding a meeting next month. I may say that while no formal recommendations have been received, this committee has tendered very valuable advice and suggestions to the officials of my department who are presently engaged in the study of automation.

PAYMENT OF TRANSPORTATION COSTS FOR UNEMPLOYED WORKERS IN LABOUR SURPLUS AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister advise the house if it is still the policy of his department to pay transportation fares for groups of unemployed workers in one province who are able to secure employment in another province?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, providing there is an order in council declaring the area from which the workers are moved to be a labour surplus area.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY—STATEMENT ON STABBING OF GUARD BY INMATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Skeena asked me a question which concerned the condition of a penitentiary guard at Kingston who had been stabbed, and the disciplinary action intended for the inmate who stabbed him.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

I am informed that on Thursday morning one of the officers on duty in the psychiatric ward of Kingston penitentiary was stabbed in the back by an inmate who was himself a patient in that ward. The instrument used was a piece of a chisel which had been sharpened. Fortunately the injury did not affect a vital part, and the officer is in satisfactory condition in one of the local hospitals.

With regard to disciplinary action, reports on the inmate involved are being obtained from the psychiatrist, and a decision as to the action to be taken will be made after these reports have been considered.

REPORTED STATEMENT ON EXERCISE OF CLEMENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising from press articles relative to the rights of parliament and the commutation of sentences by the cabinet. To assist the minister I should like to quote a paragraph containing words purporting to be those of Mr. Justice A. M. Manson in Kamloops, British Columbia, as follows:

> Within recent times there has been commutation in 90 per cent of the cases. I have no hesitation in saying that is wrong—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member asking about the exercise of the right of clemency?

Mr. Godin: No, Mr. Speaker, my point is not as to the exercise or the merits of clemency.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member put his question. He is not supposed to read extracts or give any factual statement more than is necessary to found his question.

Mr. Godin: It is my impression, Mr. Speaker, that the cabinet at the present time has on numerous occasions—perhaps in 90 per cent of the cases—commuted the death penalty to life imprisonment which infringes—

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the hon. member's question?

Mr. Godin: I should like to know the policy of the government concerning this alleged abuse of the right of parliament, which should decide—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know of any alleged abuse of the right of parliament. There has been no factual background laid for a question of that kind. As I indicated the other day, the exercise of the prerogative of clemency is not the responsibility of the House of Commons and has never been a subject matter for questions at this stage.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may be permitted to say something on this subject. I believe what the hon. member was seeking to do through the question and statement he has already made was to point out to the Minister of Justice a statement purported to be made by Mr. Justice Manson. The hon. member was asking the Minister of Justice if he would comment on that statement, which alleged that the right of parliament in respect of the commutation of the death sentence in capital cases was being infringed.

Mr. Speaker: I rather thought that was what the hon. member was trying to do. This does not seem to me to be appropriate. I am afraid he cannot found a question on that basis.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the Minister of Justice a somewhat different question. The question I would ask the minister is this. Does the Minister of Justice agree with Mr. Justice Manson that the rights of parliament have been infringed?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that Your Honour has already ruled that questions on this subject are out of order, and of course the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was as out of order as was the hon. member who first tried to ask the question. But since the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as he frequently does, has succeeded in slipping a question in contrary to the rules of the house—

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. gentleman for the compliment.

Mr. Fulton: —I would only say to him that I have not seen the report of Mr. Justice Manson's comments. If he did in fact make such comments he would be commenting on something entirely outside his sphere of authority and jurisdiction, and I do not intend to transgress either the rules of the house or the rules of common sense by commenting on a statement which, if made, went beyond the authority of the one making it.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON PRODUCTION AND SALE OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Skeena asked a question relating to the Combines Investigation Act and inquired when the statement of evidence regarding the investigation into the production, purchase and sale of fish in British Columbia would be forwarded to the restrictive trade practices commission.

I am glad to be able to advise the hon. gentleman that although the statement has not actually been forwarded, the director expects this to be done in the very near future, since it is now in the course of being mimeographed for that purpose.

As to when the restrictive trade practices commission will hold the final hearings, I am not in a position to say, since this date will have to be worked out by the commission with the different parties when they receive the statement.

ATOMIC ENERGY

NUCLEAR TESTS—INQUIRY AS TO U. K. AND U. S. PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any further information to give to the house with regard to the statement which he made last week in reply to my question on nuclear testing.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman advised me of his intention to ask this question, and I might perhaps answer it by referring to the progress being made at Geneva, which indicates that there is little hope of the Soviet union agreeing to the cessation of nuclear tests in the atmosphere up to a height of 30 miles and the establishment of a control system to verify compliance with the agreement.

With regard to the proposal made by Prime Minister Macmillan, there is some encouragement in the reaction of Mr. Khrushchev to that suggestion. As the house knows, his view was that in order to overcome the deadlock at Geneva the nations might agree on a maximum number of annual inspection trips which might be permitted in each country to sites of unidentified but suspected nuclear explosions. When the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom was in Ottawa on his last visit he discussed this matter with me. I hope that as a result of the further discussion of this matter and the general reaction shown by Mr. Khrushchev, in the proposal in question there might be achieved a substantial field for agreement.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the reply of Mr. Khrushchev and the reported conversations the Prime Minister had with Mr. Macmillan, he is in a position to tell the house whether any formal position has been taken by the governments of the United States and France?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as I know there has been no formal position taken. Of course there has been the suggestion that the viewpoint is not entirely or substantially agreeable to one or more of the nations concerned.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED C.N.R. CAMPAIGN TO ATTRACT U.S. CORPORATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport; I sent notice to him earlier. Can the minister advise whether Canadian National Railways is at present engaged in a campaign directed to executives of United States corporations and designed to attract industry to Canada, especially that portion of Canada near the railway lines of the company?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. However, it was delivered only just before I came into the house, and for that reason quite naturally I have not been able to get in touch with the management of the Canadian National. I will do so and give the hon. member an answer as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT BALANCE IN FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of Canadian Press reports which appeared in most Canadian newspapers on Saturday, April 25, to the effect that the unemployment insurance fund was now around $600 million and still slipping, can the minister advise the house of the last figure available as to the balance to the credit of this fund?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister has the information it might save time, but this is properly a question for the order paper. It is seeking purely statistical information.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, the question was directed in order to correct the figure in Saturday's papers, which I think is incorrect.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I agree with you that the question should be put on the order paper, and I would suggest to the hon. member that he advise the newspaper in which he read the report that the figure is incorrect.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

BRITISH COLUMBIA

REPORTED EXCHANGE OF LAND WITH U.S. FOR PANHANDLE CORRIDOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister, and I have sent him notice. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to an article in the April 25 edition of the Financial Post to the effect that the premier of British Columbia is intending to trade a portion of northern British Columbia to the United States in exchange for a corridor through the Alaska panhandle? If so, will he comment on this report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman sent me the clippings in question, and from an examination it appears to me that the status of the matter as reported in the press is that a member of the legislature of British Columbia has made a statement; but there is no indication, as I read it, that any attention is going to be given to the matter until the return of the premier of British Columbia from his vacation.

As the house knows, there are a number of bills on this general subject before the United States congress. One of these, I understand, would authorize the leasing on long term to Canada of a corridor through the Alaska panhandle. It is not considered very likely that the bill will be passed.

With regard to the general question of whether British Columbia is constitutionally capable of entering into an exchange arrangement, without expressing a legal viewpoint on the matter, not having consulted the law officers of the crown, I must say that I do express unequivocal doubts as to the constitutionality of such a move.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—FURTHER STATEMENT ON CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Ottawa West asked if I would give the house a list of the personnel attending the United Nations lead and zinc conference which opens in New York tomorrow.

The Canadian delegation will be led by Denis Harvey, director of the commodities branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who also led the delegation to the lead and zinc conference at Geneva and the copper and lead and zinc conferences in London in September. He will be accompanied by J. M. Rochon, chief of the metals and minerals division, J. R. Downs of the international trade relations branch, both of the Department of Trade and Commerce, D. B. Fraser of the minerals resources division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, L. D. Hudon of the economic and international affairs division of the Department of Finance and J. G. Hadwen, second secretary of the permanent mission of Canada to the United Nations in New York.

There will be an important group of industry advisers accompanying the mission, including C. O. Buchanan of Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, M. A. Cooper of Manitou-Barvue Mines Limited, J. F. M. Douglas of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company Limited, G. A. Gordon of Canadian Exploration Limited, R. Hendricks of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company Limited, C. C. Muir of Waite Amulet Mines Limited and A. O. Wolff of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask a supplementary question. Are there no trade union members on the delegation?

Mr. Churchill: The delegation was not selected by the government at all, with the exception of the representatives from the various departments.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

DEBT MANAGEMENT AND MONETARY POLICY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it would be well, at the outset of my remarks on this motion, if I were to recall to the minds of hon. members the reason we are dealing with a motion to go into committee of supply this afternoon when it was indicated on Thursday that we would be dealing today with certain other matters on the order paper. It will be remembered that on Thursday evening the house leader announced in some detail the expected order of business for Monday and Tuesday, which had been arranged through the usual channels. At the opening of the house on Friday morning the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) sought to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the announcement made the day before of an increase in the Bank of Canada rediscount rate to an unprecedented 4.9 per cent.

In the course of the discussion which followed with respect to whether or not the motion to adjourn the house was in order the Prime Minister announced that the government would go ahead today with a supply motion. It will be recalled that that announcement was made notwithstanding that it had previously been arranged that the next supply motion would not be proceeded with until next Monday.

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, in giving this explanation I think the hon. member should make it accurate and full. The Prime Minister's statement was only made after the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), speaking on behalf of the official opposition, had made a rather bitter statement in which he used these words—

Mr. McIlraith: I was going to quote them exactly.

Mr. Green: He said:

> It is a matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Welland prior to the orders of the day yesterday, and certainly it should receive the proper discussion to which a matter of this importance is entitled, and that discussion would be carried on under the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

The Prime Minister's statement was only made after the strongest—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have some rights. There is no point of order.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this discussion is entirely out of order. The motion is to go into committee of supply, and I take it that it is open to the hon. member who has the floor to launch into a fairly broad range of subjects but not into something that is past history and is clear on the records of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: In framing my proposed amendment, which I hope to come to in due course, I was seeking to explain exactly one part that will be involved in the motion. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I was taking no objection whatever to the proceedings on Friday. I was not dealing with that at all. The Minister of Public Works was completely out of order, as a matter of fact, and he interrupted me as I proposed to quote the exact words the Prime Minister used. I think the point will be clear if I may be permitted to make my statement, and I shall quote those words. This has to do with the framing of my own proposed amendment.

Mr. Speaker: If what the hon. member is saying leads up to an explanation of his motion, then I ask him to proceed.

Mr. McIlraith: It does, Mr. Speaker; that is the whole point. Now, so there will be no confusion in the mind of the house leader—

Mr. Green: There is no confusion in my mind; it is only in yours.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I doubt that.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, we will see where the confusion is. The exact statement of the Prime Minister is to be found at page 3012 of Hansard for April 24, 1959:

> However, in view of the argument which has been advanced I suggest that every opportunity will be given on Monday. We will certainly provide a motion to go into supply, so the argument advanced by the hon. member for Laurier is met.

Then, what was that argument? The argument was based on two main points. One was the importance of the matter. The hon. member for Laurier said it was > —a very serious matter that will affect the rights of everyone in this country.

This was one point. The other was in answer to an argument put forward by the Minister of Public Works that an opportunity would be provided to discuss this matter on the budget resolutions. It was at that point that the Prime Minister announced there would be a supply motion, and made the announcement in the terms I have indicated.

Now, what I propose to do is take the Prime Minister at his word and deal with this, among other subjects, on the supply motion that is now moved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The question of discussion requires that the hon. member also read what I said at page 3013, which clarifies the situation.

Mr. McIlraith: I will read as much as the Prime Minister likes. I quoted the remarks he made when he first spoke, as recorded at page 3012. He said:

> However, in view of the argument which has been advanced I suggest that every opportunity will be given on Monday. We will certainly provide a motion to go into supply, so the argument advanced by the hon. member for Laurier is met.

Perhaps I do not need to quote the remainder of what appears on page 3012. At page 3013 he said:

> No, not at all. There was no such suggestion. I said the opportunity would come on Monday, but as far as the rules are concerned the question still remains as to the propriety or regularity of such a motion.

Well, I see nothing in that which adds to or detracts from what I said.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Green: Again on a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member is omitting to read the last sentence of the statement by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on page 3013, which says:

> —since he has suggested that we have a supply motion on Monday with this very kind of amendment under discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. This intervention by the Minister of Public Works now is not in order. The hon. gentleman is making a speech, and these interruptions are certainly outside the rules of this house.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that it will surprise no one when I say that I take a somewhat different approach to this matter from that taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I think that is a reasonable assumption, and surely the Minister of Public Works will not argue that is out of order, or raise another question of privilege. While our grievance, as I say, includes the subject matter sought to be raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia on Friday, it is on wider and somewhat different grounds. The motion I propose to move at the close of my remarks will however give that hon. member ample scope for the observations he may wish to make.

What I propose to do is to ask the house to express its regret at the ill-conceived and irresponsible action of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy. We believe that these ill-conceived and irresponsible actions have had many unfortunate consequences for the Canadian people. One of those consequences, of course, is to be found in the rise, since the budget debate was concluded, in the bank rate to an unprecedented 4.97 per cent on April 23. This is the matter the hon. member for Assiniboia sought to raise on Friday.

However, as I said, that is only one of the unfortunate circumstances of the management, or perhaps I should say mismanagement, by the present government of its monetary policies. Perhaps I should say something at the very outset, in developing this subject, about the biggest operation of all in debt management in the past year, or since the present government came into office; that is the conversion loan. I should say something about the errors in concept and the inequities associated with that refunding operation. It will be recalled that the conversion loan was undertaken to replace the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth victory loans which were to mature in January, 1959; June, 1960; February, 1962; October, 1963, and September, 1966.

It will be recalled further that all these victory loans bore interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. With the exception of a right which holders of the fifth and sixth victory loan bonds had to subscribe for a new short term issue maturing in December, 1961, at 3 per cent, the new bonds were to mature in 1965, 1972 and 1983, and they were to bear interest at 3¾ per cent; 4¼ per cent; and 4½ per cent, respectively.

In the first place the minister, in explaining the inclusion of these victory loans in his refinancing plan, dealt with maturities and pointed out that there was a call feature included in the last three issues. He argued from that fact, if I understood him correctly, that the maturities did not really extend up to eight years but rather, for all practical purposes, should be considered as three years. Well, that was, as I have said, his reason for including the last three victory loans, the seventh, eighth and ninth; and it was wrong. There was an error in calculation on his part in assuming that any investor would consider the maturity of those loans as all coming within three years; in other words, in assuming that any investor would consider that those bonds would be called at the end of three years.

He explained that interest rates were rising. At the same time, in making that explanation he was trying to suggest that the government would withdraw from circulation bonds which bore the lower rate of interest, namely 3 per cent. No investor would expect that to happen. No prudent government would do it unless there was some other very substantial reason for doing it. Therefore he was wrong in his assumption that the investor would assume that those bonds had an effective term of only three years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the assessment the market puts on them.

Mr. McIlraith: I am just arguing the point; I am trying to interpret the minister very accurately and carefully. I have checked his speeches. In any event, there was a very easy way of removing that doubt and fear from the investors' minds. Since the minister knew the current interest rate was higher, he could have removed the fear by the simple announcement that he did not propose to call those bonds, that the government was not going to call those bonds. We would then be in the position where the bonds would mature on the dates indicated on the bonds. The minister's treatment of them on any other basis was quite wrong. It could easily have been corrected by that simple announcement on his part. That was the first serious error the minister made concerning the conversion operation.

Then, of course, in connection with the conversion operation there is the whole matter of cost. I hope the minister will follow these figures; I think I have taken them accurately from his own statements. It will be recalled that the conversion loan cost by way of cash adjustments the sum of $42,500,000; by way of issuing fees the sum of $7 million; by way of commission to sales agents the sum of $20 million; by way of advertising the sum of $1,500,000, and by way of administrative costs the sum of $1,225,000. It will be recalled also that the added annual interest charge on the moneys being borrowed is in those early years some $58 million; that is by way of added interest charge alone. In addition to this additional interest charge there is the additional annual amortization charge. I admit a little confusion in getting what that is from the minister's figures, but I take it to be approximately $7,500,000. In other words the cost in added annual charges is something of the order of $65 million a year.

To show how needless part of this added cost was I should like to point out one feature pertaining to the ninth victory loan. If it had not been converted but had been left to carry on until maturity in the ordinary way, the interest charges saved on this portion of the national debt borrowings would have been $165 million; that is, $165 million in interest alone less than the amount the government agreed to pay by reconverting that issue. This is to me an enormous sum of money to add to the tax structure of this country, to put as a burden on the taxpayers because of the mistake in judgment of the Minister of Finance in including this victory loan in the conversion operation.

I am aware that the interest rates were rising at the time the conversion loan was undertaken. I do not for a minute deny that they were rising here and in the United States, but this question remains open to be settled. In my view there is no doubt at all but that some part of this increase in the interest charge is the minister's own responsibility, due to his failure to adopt proper monetary policies and in the general budgetary field since he took office in June of 1957. This raises the interesting point as to whether or not the minister should have undertaken the conversion loan at the time he did; or, indeed, if he was going to undertake it then, surely he owed a duty to the country and to the taxpayers to have more appreciation of the part his own responsibility as Minister of Finance and his own actions as Minister of Finance would have on the interest rate. That is particularly true as far as it pertains to his management of the national accounts.

He may well ask—perhaps he will not argue it—how did his actions have any bearing on the rise in interest rates? They certainly did, because you go back in these things to what seems to be one prime factor, namely the confidence of the investing public in his administration. I cannot help but recall to his mind now the impact of his failure to deliver a budget in the first parliament in which he had any responsibility as Minister of Finance, his complete failure to deliver any budget during that whole parliament when the Conservative party was assuming office for the first time in 22 years. He would not express his views on monetary policy, or expound his views as to the national accounts and what should be done with respect to these matters. That undoubtedly did much to destroy the confidence of investors in Canadian government securities.

Perhaps I need not pursue this, but I can follow through with his actions time after time in the almost two years during which he has had the responsibility of Minister of Finance. Indeed, in this I do not wish to single out the Minister of Finance only. It is a responsibility that must be shared by his colleagues in other departments with respect to these budgetary and financial matters.

There is another interesting facet to this. There is the whole attitude of neglect of this subject by the present government. For some reason, which I for my part have never been able to understand, the Tories seem to regard this subject as not worthy of the most serious attention. They treat it as if it was something less than a very big and difficult subject confronting them. As an illustration of that I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that in the budget of 1958 the minister devoted a good deal of his time to the subject of debt management, with no inkling of what was coming. Just after that he switched quite suddenly from anything he had said on the subject of debt management and announced a conversion loan. It was to be on such a scale that he used on one occasion the term "gigantic"; in any case, it was to be very large. The lack of confidence in government bonds has been contributed to in large measure by the government's own actions and by the continuing prospect under the present government of successive deficits.

There is another feature about the high interest charges on such a large operation as the conversion loan, and that is that it has saddled this country with a base interest rate of some 4½ per cent for the next 25 years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What does the hon. member mean by a base rate? The hon. member does not mean it is an average rate?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: No, I do not suggest an average rate. I mean the government, having undertaken such a large conversion operation in issuing these long term bonds at a 4½ per cent interest rate, if it was unnecessary to do it on such a large scale at that rate, or if that rate was contributed to by the government's own actions in its management of related matters, then it has the effect of making it difficult for governments to borrow easily below that rate within that term. It does tend, I think you will agree, to raise the whole basis on which government borrowings will be carried on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. gentleman be a little more fair and relate the interest rate to the maturity in question? A 25-year maturity in these circumstances is not comparable with a shorter maturity.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not see that is differing in fact from anything I am stating. The minister's point is not a point of order or of privilege. If the minister wants to argue that he will have his opportunity to do so. In the meantime it is my argument. These things are somewhat technical, and if I make any error in factual matters at any point I am happy to have him interrupt me; otherwise I do not think he should interrupt just for the purpose of stating an argument he may wish to advance.

There is another serious error in this whole conversion loan operation, and that is the effect of the government's policy in having the Bank of Canada undertake to buy the victory loan bonds at par; that is, at the time the conversion was being undertaken. It will be recalled that this whole operation was undertaken when the New York bond market had gone down sharply, or was in the process of going down, and the Canadian market was following in the same general trend. The government, in my view, made a serious error in establishing an artificial market for the victory loan bonds which it was seeking to convert. The creation of this artificial market at that time had very serious repercussions, and I will seek to develop those later in my argument. As a result, great numbers of holders of victory loan bonds did not convert their bonds into the new bonds but sold them for cash, and by that method took what I think I can show was a windfall capital profit of a very sizable nature. In some cases I guess it was five or six points, but a very substantial matter. That was made possible by the action of the government, and it was really in effect a capital bonus to those persons who were astute enough to see what the government's policy was. It was a bonus to those persons who did not contribute to achieving the objective of the conversion operation.

Then during the operation another facet was that the Bank of Canada, by purchasing these bonds from individual holders, did so at prices, as I have said, higher than those which had been prevailing in the market, in fact at prices which were fairly sharply higher. It was a purely artificial level which applied to these victory bond holders. At the same time the government was attracting the savings of other less experienced Canadians who, due to the pressure of the campaign, were induced to invest their savings in government bonds at prices which subsequently have been shown to bear no relation to the real market value, because they were held above the real value by this artificial means. These people who took the windfall I have spoken about can now buy the new bonds under the conversion loan at a much lower rate, and they have been put in that position by not answering the appeal of the government in this very important matter.

Now, how many Canadians, under the urging of the advertising campaign and other propaganda used and paid for by the government, bought these higher interest bearing bonds at par? Unfortunately some of them have gone down as low as $92.50; they are down very low. It seems to me on that account alone that the government should indeed have a very bad conscience in having placed these artificially high values on the bonds. It seems to me that is something about which the government should concern itself in great measure.

There is another phase to this. It seems to me that because these bond prices were established at an artificially high level for the purpose of the bond conversion—an artificially high level bearing in mind the depressed condition of the bond market at that time—and because the issues I have mentioned were included in the conversion operation although they had several years to run that the conversion was bound to be a failure notwithstanding the language of the Minister of Finance. When I say it was bound to be a failure, I mean not so much in the premise of the number of bonds converted—that is not the point I am seeking to make—but in the light of the objectives of the conversion loan. As I indicated a moment ago, during the conversion loan the Bank of Canada acquired a very large volume of victory bonds for cash. The reason for that I have indicated; it was simply because they fixed an artificially high value at that time.

In order to curb the consequent increase in the cash reserves of the chartered banks, and because of the acquisition of these victory bonds, the Bank of Canada had to sell treasury bills and short term bonds on the market. I want to develop this thesis a little further. The Bank of Canada at the end of the period during which the conversion loan was offered converted large amounts of its victory bonds into new long term conversion issues. As a consequence the average term of its portfolio was largely changed by being very substantially lengthened. In a moment I want to take the actual figures.

I am glad to see the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell) is interested in this matter. I think it is something he appreciates and follows most attentively, and I appreciate his interest in it. As a consequence of what I have described, the average term of the Bank of Canada's portfolio was substantially lengthened. I will give figures in a moment to prove this contention. This, it will be seen, materially reduced the capacity of the Bank of Canada to carry out open market operations in short term securities.

Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that as at December 31, 1958, the Bank of Canada held $1,326 million worth of bonds with a maturity date over ten years, which was some $1,113 million more than it held at the beginning of the year. This information will be found, if the minister wishes to check my figures, on page 91 of the Bank of Canada statistical summary for March, 1959. He will see there that at the end of December 1957 the bank's holdings of maturities of a term longer than ten years were $213.3 million but that at the end of December, 1958 the Bank of Canada's holdings of such maturities had increased to $1,326.4 million—an increase by more than six times in the course of a year. That is, the bank's holdings of bonds having maturity terms of more than ten years was multiplied more than six times in the period between the end of December 1957 and the end of December 1958.

In this connection I want to suggest one thing to the Minister of Finance. He spoke about the victory loan bonds overhanging the market. Let me suggest to him that it is these very large holdings of long term bonds by the Bank of Canada which are overhanging the market today. These long term bonds in the Bank of Canada's portfolio are a dead weight overhanging the market. They are, to a considerable extent, undermining confidence in the stability of long term bonds and in the level of bond yields. I think the minister will agree with that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I disagree entirely as to the effect.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, the facts speak for themselves. If the minister wants to draw a different conclusion it is open to him to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is a prejudiced witness.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, investors in Canada consider that they do constitute a dead weight hanging over the market today, and in their minds at least this is a matter of some consequence.

There is another consequence of this wholly unsuccessful conversion loan that I wish to draw to the attention of the house, namely the undue expansion of the money supply. It is clear from the Bank of Canada's report that in order to carry out the loan of May 1, the loan of $950 million, it was necessary to expand the money supply by a substantial amount. That is how I read the Bank of Canada report. This loan was a prelude to the conversion loan and both loans had the same characteristic; that is, that the money supply was expanded in order to facilitate each of them. During the period of the conversion loan the money supply, that is the total currency and chartered bank deposits, expanded from some $12,385 million to $13,098 million—an increase of some $713 million in two months.

The story of this increase in the money supply will be found in considerable detail at page 99 of the March statistical summary of the Bank of Canada. The figures are quite interesting. They certainly support the thesis I am advancing, and I think they are capable of no other interpretation than that these two bond issues brought about a direct and very sharp increase in the money supply, an increase which might be described, as unprecedented in peacetime.

Whatever the views of the Minister of Finance may be in this connection, the investors have shown a pronounced lack of confidence in the bond market. The hon. gentleman has claimed that his loan issues have had the effect of stabilizing the bond market. My view is that they have had the very opposite effect and that the minister's claim is totally unfounded. The effect of the conversion loan was to undermine confidence in the bond market.

There is another interesting facet of this subject. The Bank of Canada has been obliged to take active steps to support the market for the long term conversion loan. Such an operation could not be successfully carried out at a time when there is an underlying lack of confidence in the market without the bank acquiring, and ending up with, large holdings. That is exactly what took place last fall, and during the fall months the money supply was further expanded by some $300 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Last fall?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I have the figures here and I can put them on record.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are wrong about that.

Mr. McIlraith: No, I am right. I can put the figures on record and perhaps, if the minister is in doubt about them, I should do so.

The total currency and chartered bank deposits, as indicated at page 99 of the March statistical summary issued by the Bank of Canada, is shown on December 31, 1957 as being $11,923 million, and the total at December 31, 1958, is shown as being $13,247 million. I used the term "last fall". If the minister will look at the figure for the end of September he will find it stood at some $13,022 million, and that at the end of October it was $13,347 million or an increase, in a 31-day period, of some $325 million. I do not know how there could be stronger evidence in support of my statement than that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member said "the fall". The fact is that from the first of October there was no increase in the money supply at all.

Mr. McIlraith: Let me repeat the figures, Mr. Speaker, because I think the minister has not followed the details given in the statistical summary. At the end of September the figure for the total currency and chartered banks deposits stood at some $13,022 million. At the end of October the figure was some $13,347 million. That is an increase of $325 million in the 31 days of October alone. I do not know what could be more pronounced than that. What the minister has apparently lost sight of is the fact that later on in the year the money supply remained comparatively constant. If he will bring his figure up to the last date I have here, March 25, he will find that it is some $13,219 million. This shows that to support the conversion issue itself the government in effect had to increase the money supply. I think the minister will agree with this conclusion which may be drawn from the figures I have just quoted.

Apparently confronted with the dilemma of having to continue to support this long term conversion issue the bank withdrew its support and let the conversion issue find its own level. Let me point out that when it got itself into the position I have described the bank, considering the obligations imposed on it by the law, withdrew its support. How those bonds went down. It was a pretty cruel blow to the individual bondholders who had accepted at their face value the very stirring and rousing appeals made by the government for them to convert to those issues. Their reward was a reduction in price in some cases to as low as $92.50.

I always understood that one of the prime objectives of this loan was to clear the decks to enable the government to finance its cash deficit of some $1.4 billion of additional money which it required to raise. I think that is a fair statement. The government would have liked to finance that additional new borrowing by selling bonds to the general public and to avoid sharp and abnormal increases in the money supply. I believe that is a fair statement of the objectives. However, as I have indicated, in order to dispose of the May 1 issue and make the conversion loan appear to be a success according to the way the Minister of Finance viewed it, the government did the very thing it tried to avoid. It expanded the money supply to the extent of some $1,467 million between the end of March and the end of October; that is in the period it was financing the bond issue of May 1 and the conversion loan.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does my hon. friend say that the government expanded the money supply?

Mr. McIlraith: Technically it was done through the Bank of Canada. That was the effect of this policy. The government produced this situation by its wholly wrong concept of what should be done with respect to the conversion loan. I say that is certainly a direct consequence of the government's action in following the course it did in the circumstances existing at that time. This matter of financing bonds by creating a new money supply is a dangerous proposition. In my view this situation was brought about largely by the government's own action, its whole monetary policy, its sins of omission and commission, its public policies, as well as its mishandling of the national accounts. The point I want to make clear is that the conversion loan resulted in this expanded money supply and did the very thing it was supposed to avoid. In other words it failed in its major objectives.

Another thing it did in addition to what I have mentioned is that it failed completely to restore the confidence of the investing public. For instance, in October and December the government offered new bond issues. If the minister will check the figures he will find that those operations resulted in a loss to the bond buyers. I think he will agree that prices have gone down on those issues.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But that does not mean a loss.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is certainly not a gain.

Mr. McIlraith: Of major significance is the fact that it is not the kind of thing that creates confidence in the investing public. It tends to make the investing public lose confidence in this government's method of handling monetary policies and in this bond issue. That atmosphere of disillusionment among the people who would normally invest in bonds is a very serious thing. It spread generally among individual bond buyers, corporation treasurers, insurance companies, the holders of bonds generally; and in my judgment based on reading their accounts it spread through the commercial banks all across the country. As I have said, it was due to a considerable degree to the raising of hopes by government spokesmen and the subsequent dashing of those hopes after the bonds had been purchased.

Let me illustrate my point. I believe the government itself has been somewhat infected by the loss of confidence in what it is doing. We observe that the government has done some unusual things in bond financing. Allow me to deal with one of them. I am seeking to illustrate the uncertainty of the government's policy in the monetary field. Let me take the bond issue maturing April 1, 1960. It was a $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent issue, issued at $97.90 and the effective yield, I believe, was 4.76 per cent. It was issued for a term of thirteen months. Permit me to point out a little side repercussion of that bond issue which also tended to undermine confidence in the government's policy in this field.

The effective yield may be stated to be 4.76 per cent, but the effective yield to an investor who is in the 50 per cent income tax bracket is something quite different again. The yield provided by that bond is exactly the same as if such an investor bought at par a bond bearing an interest coupon of 6.6 per cent per annum. If anyone doubts how that works out I could place it on the record, but I believe it is quite clear. If you take the portion of the increase in capital within the thirteen months—that is 12/13 of that figure—and take that portion of the net gain of the purchaser together with the interest which he has at the end of the year, after taking his 50 per cent income tax off, you will find he is in the same circumstances as if he had bought a bond at par but having a yield of 6.6 per cent. In my opinion that is something that the government should not be proud of. It is not the kind of thing that creates confidence in investors although to a few investors it is a very fortunate circumstance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Liberal government did it many times.

Mr. McIlraith: The Liberal government did not do it many times. I want to clear up that canard once and for all. I expected that interjection. If the minister will check the records he will find that when the Liberal government issued bonds below their face value, as indeed it did on many occasions, the bonds were of long term, the interest rate was lower and there was no such windfall to be made out of them. There were no 13-month or other short term bonds of that sort issued in that way by the Liberal government. I am glad the minister interjected because it gives me the opportunity to answer that canard once and for all.

There is another side to the operation of this particular issue of bonds. The minister does not explain that by that method the tax collecting authority, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), receives a little less in tax collections than he would if interest were payable on the whole gain of the persons who bought the bonds. Therefore, in effect the tax load is distributed over those persons who did not buy the bonds because they are in the smaller income tax brackets. Surely the minister is not very proud or happy about that.

As I have said, the general public have been losing confidence in the government's ability in this field. They have lost all confidence in the worth of the bonds under present government management. That seems to me to be a very serious thing. These people were promised a good thing in buying these bonds. They were subjected to an abnormally intensive selling program. Perhaps it could be more appropriately described as ballyhoo but in any event there was a very strong, intensive selling program. The people were told that it was in the national interest to convert and that it would fight inflation. Surely in all this there was some implication that the bonds would maintain their value.

But we find now that the measures used in this whole transaction not only did not fight inflation but were directly inflationary. The fear of inflation has not subsided. The national interest in this respect has not been served by the conversion loan. Rather, the national interest has been dealt a cruel blow by this aspect of the conversion loan.

I indicated that we have had a very substantial increase in the money supply. In addition, I want to point out that for all practical purposes new borrowings in the year 1958 amounted to $1,360 million. As set out on page 7 of the Bank of Canada report, that amount is made up of some $1,250 million in new direct and guaranteed securities and to be added to that is the figure of $110 million representing the reduction in the holdings in government accounts. The minister can argue whether the correct figure should be $1,250 million or $1,360 million; it is open to argument but the explanation is to be found on page 7 of the Bank of Canada report. In any event, it is a very large figure.

But during the same period of time when the increase in borrowings was taking place the money supply increased by $1,324 million, from $11,923 million at December 31, 1957 to $13,247 million at December 31, 1958. The increase of $1,324 million in the money supply is very close to the amount of new government borrowings. In fact, it is almost identical. In the light of that fact, I confess I was completely unable to understand the argument of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget speech this year when he tended to indicate that government borrowings over the year as a whole had been achieved largely in a non-inflationary manner. So that the minister will understand my reasoning I refer him to his own budget speech, page 2415 of Hansard, where he will find he made that statement. I do not know anything that could be more inflationary than an increase in the money supply of that magnitude at that time, an increase in the money supply almost identical with the total borrowings of the government in the same period.

The government has produced another economic paradox by its monetary operations. At the same time as the sharp increase in the money supply, which many would term as easy money, we have had a sharp and very large increase in the interest rate. In popular terms we have what may be called easy money and dear money both at the same time. We have today the highest bank rate in the country's history with all its implications, all its ramifications with respect to government borrowings in the future, the high interest charges that will have to be paid on such borrowings and the effect it will have on provincial and municipal borrowings and borrowings by the private sector of the economy.

My goodness, when the members of the present government were in opposition I used to hear them argue about the evils and consequences of high interest rates. I often wonder what they think about that matter now. I will not embarrass them today with all their arguments on the subject but they are many. Indeed, if they believed those arguments they must be having a very unpleasant time now.

But we have this paradox. The last treasury bill rate announced was 4.72 per cent, an all-time high. I want to point out that the rate is very high compared with the United States rate. I want to emphasize the widening of the gap between the Canadian and the United States rates. I also wish to suggest to the minister that if he chooses to answer he might deal with the extent to which the widening gap is due to a loss of confidence by the Canadian people in the government of our country. I should also like him to contemplate the adverse effects on our economy that the widening gap, in addition to the high rate, may have. Incidentally, the last rate I have for United States treasury bills is 3.10 per cent compared with 4.72 per cent in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the date?

Mr. McIlraith: I have it noted on my copy of the last weekly supplement. I will give you the date in a moment; I have it here. I have not got it in my hand, but I think I can find it later. It was 3.07 per cent the previous date, but I think it has gone up from 3.07 per cent to 3.10 per cent.

I want now to take the minister back to the argument which he advanced in referring to the conversion loan as the foundation for a sound debt management operation. If indeed it was such a foundation, then I want to point out that that foundation has failed miserably. It has contributed to an increase in the money supply to unprecedented high levels and to increasing the interest rate to an unprecedented high level. It is really a foundation to inflation, pure and simple.

The minister talked about reduced federal borrowings to leave room for existing dominion-provincial financing. I can only point out to him that if that is what he is planning to do by his monetary policies, then by his own actions he has left to the provinces and municipalities the right to borrow at extremely high interest rates. They are simply not in a position to do so.

I take the minister's position to be, as he has indicated, that he believes that the rate of personal savings in 1959 will be lower and as we proceed on the road to recovery the business sector will require more funds. If business conditions improve, and I for one certainly hope they do, it is reasonable to expect some liquidation of holdings of bonds by corporations and banks.

In addition to that, the government itself has to face the current requirements of 1959-60. Perhaps before I deal with these current requirements I should point out to the minister another instance of what has taken place under his policy, and that is the virtual removal from the Bank of Canada portfolio of short term treasury bill holdings. If he will look at page 91 of the March statistical summary he will find that during the time when there was a very sharp increase taking place in long term holdings, that is holdings of bonds having maturity of over 10 years, there was a correspondingly sharp reduction in the holdings of treasury bills. This summary indicates that from the end of March, which was just prior to the first borrowings of last year, the Bank of Canada's holding of treasury bills dropped from some $480 million, and dropped almost continuously and regularly, to a low of $6 million at the end of January, 1959. Since then, they have only increased slightly to $161 million at the end of March.

He will find also that their holdings of short term bonds, that is two years and under, have dropped from some $1,009 million at the end of April to some $91 million at the end of March of this year. There has been a similar but smaller drop in the holdings of bonds with maturities from two to five years. In other words, the bank has switched its portfolio to these long term bonds, so that they overhang the market. The bank has taken away from itself the ability to meet its requirements easily to support certain short term issues. The minister will see the seriousness of that dilemma. Incidentally, if he doubts what I have said about the loss of confidence in government bonds, if he will take the corresponding table which I do not propose to put on the record, for holdings by private individuals, he will see that of the total increase of bonds in the hands of the public almost exactly 50 per cent is in Canada savings bonds and short term treasury bills. The public have put themselves in a position where they can deal with short term securities and liquidate them as they see fit.

I was speaking of the requirements for the current year, and in speaking about that I think I must rely on the figures—I hope the minister will just catch these figures before he goes out—given by the minister in his budget speech, when he said that following the replacement of the cash deficit he will possibly have a budgetary and capital deficit of some $850 million. In addition to that, there are the bond maturities for this year, and if we include the maturities of April 1, 1960 the day after the end of the fiscal year the total will be $1,735 million. In other words, the country is confronted with finding this year by way of replacement of existing maturities and for new purposes, additional sums to the amount of $2,585 million, a very large sum indeed.

Well, you may ask how did we get ourselves into this horrible condition? I suggest that same question has been asked in other places but has not been answered here. For instance, we find that the United States was concerned about some of these problems as far back as a year ago. We find that on August 18, 1958, Mr. Henry Hazlitt, as reported in Newsweek, in talking about inflation had this to say:

> It is time to ask some blunt questions of congress and the administration. Do you ever expect the debt to be paid off? Do you ever intend even to reduce it? If so, at what rate? Under what conditions? Are the conditions likely to be realized? Do you intend to pay off either principal or interest in dollars of even present (48 cent) purchasing power, or do you mean to keep short-changing the government's creditors by further depreciation?

Mr. Speaker, in that jurisdiction the President of the United States did indicate that he is seeking to balance the budget; he did indicate other policies that would seek to deal with the problem. In Canada there are also others concerned with this problem. On Saturday I received the eighty-ninth annual report of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada. I find that in dealing with economic matters generally the president had something to say in his report which in my judgment is equally applicable to the problem we are discussing today, namely the minister's actions in the field of monetary policy. I would like to place the quotation on Hansard. The president had this to say:

> What can be done toward building a sound national economic policy?

Then, he answered his own question in this way:

> First, aim at improving the psychological atmosphere by making clear that every effort will be made to return sound dollars for the money our governments are now borrowing. This calls for action, not merely exhortation. It is a matter of honesty as well as economic good sense. A heavy responsibility rests on the federal government in this regard, for it is the only debtor which can exercise direct influence over the value of the currency in which its obligations will be repaid.

Mr. Speaker, the government has got itself into this position mainly through its own actions. To meet the problem that confronts us by way of borrowing the minister has told us that he expects the Canada savings bonds will yield about $250 million; but the big question outstanding is as to the policy to be applied in providing for the rest of the requirements. I will admit that the minister is facing a real dilemma. He can either increase the money supply or he can, I suppose, offer still higher interest rates for new government bonds. Let me point out it is quite clear that the governor of the Bank of Canada is opposed to an increase in the money supply at this stage. If we look at page 9 of the annual report we will find this statement:

> The central bank must continue to emphasize its major and essential role of regulating the rate of change in overall monetary supplies in such manner as is consistent with and, so far as monetary action can, will contribute to, sound and sustained economic growth under stable prices.
> I believe that monetary policy must strengthen and reaffirm its determination to remain true to the basic principles of sound money.

Certainly that is not what was done last year. It is certain that any material increase in the money supply will produce greater inflation and rising prices. I can only hope that the Minister of Finance will agree with the reasoning of the governor of the Bank of Canada and that the bond issue will not be created out of an increased money supply.

The other method, of course, is providing money by borrowing by paying a further increase in bond yield and that, I think, is going to be pretty unacceptable to the taxpayers and pretty unacceptable to the government.

Mr. Green: Are you in favour of it?

Mr. McIlraith: I am in complete accord with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) that I am not always authorized to speak for the government, and certainly not for this present government.

Higher interest rates have as a necessary corollary to other borrowings that they would discourage private investors, that is private investors who would be borrowers, and they would also put the provinces and municipalities in a wholly intolerable position. This is the dilemma the government is in, largely through its own doing.

There is another method, I suppose, which could be used in dealing with this problem, and it has to do with the demands for money credit allocation. Quite a bit is said about this in the Bank of Canada report at page 7 and onward and I should like to quote some of it:

> If recovery and growth proceed very strongly the demand for money to finance apparently desirable projects—both the desirability and the number of which multiply rapidly under such circumstances—may once again increase more rapidly than the supply of savings and of loanable funds. Under such conditions also the demand for capital and credit for speculative or non-productive purposes would increase and become a strong competitor for money.

I think there can be nothing but agreement with this statement. Then the report goes on, on the next page, to point out that if such scarcity of funds develops it is the government's responsibility and not the bank's to take whatever measures that are taken designed to alleviate the credit squeeze which could victimize any segment of the borrowers or any certain group of borrowers. His exact words can be found on page 9 of the report, and I have no desire to quote them other than the very last sentence where he says:

> Regardless of the desirability or feasibility of these measures, they are outside the powers of the Bank of Canada.

There is, of course, always another method that could be used and it is interesting to note that Mr. Fraser Robertson, in writing on this subject in the Globe and Mail of April 16, had this to say:

> Bluntly, that means that if the government cannot get money, or have money provided for what it considers necessary purposes, on a voluntary basis, it will use coercion.

There is a fourth method, of course, namely that of coercion. I think the implications of such government control over the capital market are not something that we, or anyone in the house, contemplate without the greatest concern, and I would hope that all would agree that this method is to be avoided. Yet the government has created a situation by its own actions which invites questions like these to be raised. It has not outlined to parliament its plans for dealing with our financial difficulties.

Surely, the government, having created the highest deficit in our peacetime history, with the announced intention of having the second highest deficit in the current fiscal year, and with nothing to indicate other than recurring deficits; having created the highest debt charges in the history of Canada; having increased the money supply by the greatest amount in any peacetime year and created doubt in the investing public's minds by these inflationary methods of doing its financing in the last fiscal year; having created the highest interest rates for years and years; having done all these things through its policies owes it to the country and to this house to outline its program and policy in the field of debt management, and its monetary policies.

These difficulties in which we find ourselves in this respect today are, as I have sought to indicate, largely of the government's doings. They have been substantially contributed to by them. I believe that the government is subject to censure for its ill-conceived and irresponsible actions in this field.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), that:

> All the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy which have been characterized by:
> 1. The errors and inequities associated with the conversion loan:
> 2. The highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established;
> 3. The largest expansion of the money supply in any year since the war;
> 4. The greatest increase in peacetime in the national debt;
> 5. The highest public debt charges in Canada's history."

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to a point of order, if I may, before the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) rises. It is in submission quite clear that the amendment which has just been submitted by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) repeats in large measure the amendment which was introduced in this house on April 13 by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) on the budget. I do not say it repeats it in full but it repeats a good deal of it. Because it repeats a good deal of it, I submit it is clearly out of order. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the language of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on April 13, which is to be found in Hansard at page 2619, the second column:

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets the bad faith of the government, which sought and secured support from the Canadian people on a program of lower taxes, reduced expenditures and a balanced budget, and which has now produced, in flagrant disregard of pre-election promises, a budget calling for higher taxes, record expenditures and a large deficit."

Mr. Speaker, we have noted, of course, that in his remarks leading up to his amendment the hon. member for Ottawa West has simply threshed straw which was threshed for eight days in this chamber in the course of the budget debate. These matters were touched on from time to time in discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Touched on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Examine, if you will, the language of this amendment. It touches on the conversion loan, the Bank of Canada rate, the expansion of money supply, the increase in the national debt, and then the highest public debt charges in Canada's history. These are all matters associated, Mr. Speaker, with the subject of the attempted indictment in the amendment of April 13: the higher taxes, the record expenditures and the large deficit. Surely, Mr. Speaker, however much effort has been expended to try to devise today an amendment which will somehow steer clear of repetition of any part of the amendment of April 13, the draftsman of this amendment has not succeeded.

For an amendment to be out of order on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary, in the light of former decisions, that it should cover entirely the language and purport of the amendment of April 13. It is sufficient if it covers part of the area covered by the amendment of April 13. This amendment certainly does, Mr. Speaker. One cannot discuss any of these matters without trespassing again upon the realm of the budget debate and the language, as well as the purport, of the amendment of April 13. Mr. Speaker, in the light of the fact that at least part of the area covered by the amendment of April 13 is covered by today's amendment and that amendment of April 13 was rejected by the house by vote last week, in my respectful submission the present amendment is out of order and I ask it be so ruled.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to say a word or two on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming): I should like to point out that if we look at the terms of the amendment proposed by the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and then compare it with the amendment proposed by the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), as found on page 2619 of Hansard for April 13, it is my humble submission that each of the five complaints of the member for Ottawa West could obtain even if you had lower taxes, lower expenditures and a balanced budget. There might be some question as to No. 4, the greatest increase in peacetime in the national debt. However, may I point out that you could have a balanced budget and at the same time have heavy government borrowings on behalf of crown corporations. Such borrowings do not come into the picture as far as a balanced budget is concerned. So each of the five complaints in the amendment of the Liberal party could obtain even with lower taxes, lower expenditures and a balanced budget. Therefore it is our contention that the amendment is not out of order.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to your attention one matter which seems to have been missed in the argument. The budget has to do with the national accounts and their administration by the government. It is a motion to go into committee of ways and means and is the traditional period in which the minister accounts for the receipts and disbursements of the government. The amendment today has nothing to do with that subject at all and is not couched in language capable of giving it that interpretation. Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the fact that if the argument of the Minister of Finance were to be accepted no further subject matter of any kind could be brought before the house, because in some way or another the subject would have some relationship to something in the budget. It would be utterly impossible to bring any motion before the house for that reason.

However, I would like to draw your attention to the proposed amendment itself. The amendment is concerned with the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy. Surely it cannot be held that that is the same thing as lower taxes, reduced expenditures and a balanced budget, all of which were talked about in the amendment moved in the course of the budget debate. It is a wholly different subject, Mr. Speaker.

It is true that the mismanagement we allege in debt financing could indirectly affect the budget, but it is a wholly different subject matter. The amendment is one dealing with the field of debt management and monetary policy. Then the amendment gives a list by way of illustration of some of the incidents of mismanagement in that field.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I add a word on the point of order? The main portion of this amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) is:

> This house regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy which have been characterized by—

And then it goes on to list five so-called examples. But the essence of the amendment is contained in the first three lines. Surely that is an amendment to the budget. The purpose of the budget debate is to discuss these very things and, particularly, monetary policy. That is the essence of a budget debate, and in the attack which was made during the budget debate by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) he took in effect exactly the same position as that which the hon. member for Ottawa West is taking today. In fact there has been a great deal of repetition in the speech which the hon. member for Ottawa West made this afternoon of what was said during the budget debate. If an amendment of this type, which is really a budgetary amendment, can be moved now, I would suggest that a similar amendment could be moved on the next supply motion simply by using words other than "debt management" and "monetary policy". Surely that was never the intention. The rules of the house provide for one budget debate which is supposed to deal with monetary policy. That debate has been held, and it finished only last week. Now we have another amendment put forward by the opposition which, in effect, I suggest is nothing more or less than a budget amendment and which, as such, is out of order.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to make a few observations based on those which have just been made by the leader of the house. The motion which is made by the minister of finance when he introduces the budget is, as Your Honour knows, that Your Honour should leave the chair. To say that anything said during the budget debate is decided by the house is, of course, not in accordance with the established rules. The amendments to the budget are therefore all that can be considered as limiting the freedom to go into supply, that is, amendments to the budget and any other matters which have already been settled by the house, and it seems to me that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) have sufficiently disposed of the argument made by the Minister of Finance that there is any conflict between this motion and the motion moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. The minister did, of course, refer only to that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, there was also the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was the amendment to the amendment, but there was no conflict there, it seems to me, either. But if Your Honour is satisfied there is no need for further argument I will be very glad to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I had rather thought, in view of the discussion which took place in the house on Friday, that the house had itself come to the conclusion that a discussion on the problem of interest rates could be expected today, and that caused me some difficulty, because there was a fairly specific subamendment about interest rates which was moved in the course of the budget debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): April 13.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. And then again, this present amendment does not take that course. There is no mention of interest rates in the amendment as submitted. Therefore, I suppose that that approach to the subject—that this was a debate which the house was expecting—really does not apply.

The point of order that we are entering upon a repetition of matters which have been decided must, I think, be judged in the light of what the procedure is on supply motions. Supply motions give a great deal of latitude for attack on the policy of the government on a fairly broad front, and I think that almost any supply motion would involve monetary and financial problems in some degree. But I am not satisfied from what the hon. minister has said that this amendment cannot be distinguished from the debate which took place on the budget. The budget deals with ways and means. It deals with taxation and expenditures, and the balance of the two. In other words, it is basically a taxation debate. This motion, to my mind, introduces the problem of public debt and public debt management, and it does not seem to me that the two fields entirely correspond. They overlap, it is true, but they are not co-equal, in the sense that the policy of the government with regard to the conversion loan is carried out entirely outside the budget resolutions and reflects independent actions of the government under authority which parliament has previously given.

As I look at the resolution it seems to refer to debt management and monetary policy basically, and the five instances cited have to do with the conversion loan, the public debt, the bank rate, which is not directly involved in the budget—I see I am in error in saying that interest is not involved, because the bank rate is a matter of interest—the expansion of money supply—something which could be independent of the budget debate and budget resolutions—the national debt itself, and public debt charges.

I would think there is scope for a debate on public debt management as distinct from the other fiscal policies which are involved in the budget. In any event, I would be disposed to consider the amendment liberally in view, first of all, of the fact that this is a supply motion and, second, in view of what was said in this house on Friday. In that light I would hope that the opposition to this resolution would not be pressed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to two points, first to the amendment to the amendment which was moved in the budget debate on April 13 and which also covered part of the ground that is sought to be covered in the amendment now submitted. That subamendment reads, as recorded in Hansard at page 2623:

> That . . . this house further regrets that the government has failed to present to parliament a planned financial and economic program designed to develop the economic health of the nation by, among other things, (a) reversing the trend of rising interest rates—

That question is presented again today.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, we have presented to us an attempt at an indictment based upon the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established, which is part and parcel of the same complaint which was made in the C.C.F. subamendment moved in the budget debate.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to what happened last Friday, may I point out that while some things were said about a discussion today, the Prime Minister, as reported at page 3013, was very careful to point out that the rules must, of course, apply with regard to any motion that might be introduced. Here are his words as reported in Hansard in the first column of that page. After the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) had attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) what he called a suggestion that we should have a supply motion on Monday on the particular kind of amendment now under discussion, that is, an amendment relating to interest, the Prime Minister replied:

> No, not at all. There was no such suggestion. I said that opportunity would come on Monday, but as far as the rules are concerned the question still remains as to the propriety or regularity of such a motion.

There cannot be any suggestion that so far as this present amendment is concerned there was any agreement on the part of the Prime Minister or anyone else in this house to waive the rules of this house in regard to what is propriety and order on an amendment of this kind.

With great respect it is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that the ground in regard to the issue as to rising interest rates has already been covered by these two previous amendments which have been disposed of by vote of the house.

The final point I should like to mention is as to whether this present matter of debt management was embraced within the scope of the budget. With great respect I submit that was very much a part of the budget presentation. There will be found at page 2411 of the budget speech as recorded in Hansard a section extending over two and a half pages devoted to that very subject. The heading there is "Debt Management". That subject certainly was discussed in the course of the budget debate. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) also had something to say about it. This, it seems to me, disposes of any suggestion that we are here today breaking new ground and that the amendment now submitted breaks new ground that was not included within the scope of both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment during the budget debate.

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to accept the latter argument of the minister that anything to be said on this amendment could have been said on the budget debate but that does not say this amendment is out of order; it points up certain and particular problems.

As I recall the budget debate the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) was the only hon. member who spoke for any length on the conversion loan and he was in order in speaking there, but this amendment focuses the attention of the house on monetary policy in the sense of the national debt and its management as well as certain other things of a specific character.

I have doubts about the second item in the amendment which refers to the highest bank rate. As I said, I expected that was the course this amendment would take and I realize that anything said on Friday, unless there is an order of the house, does not absolve me from the responsibility of dealing with this amendment on its merits today. I should think the house would understand from what I have said that I am disposed to regard this as a suitable amendment and to let it proceed reserving the right to limit the discussion under the second item of the amendment, because, as the minister has pointed out, we have had a specific amendment accusing the government of failure to act against high interest rates which is what is involved, I take it, in the clause "highest bank rates since the Bank of Canada was established". It may be possible to distinguish those. I would allow the debate to proceed and reserve the right to intervene if I feel that it is becoming a repetition of the budget debate.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and particularly to those comments referring to the one facet of our fiscal problems that concerns us at the present time. I would say that in general this group can support this amendment but I want to make some qualifications with respect to clause 3 of the amendment which reads as follows:

> —the largest expansion of the money supply in any year since the war.

Under our present unplanned economy unrelated to monetary and fiscal policies, that is an evil. In the opinion of this group the expansion of the money supply would be quite a safe proposal if it were related to a planned economic policy and the planned development of this country. With that qualification we in this group can support this amendment.

I was somewhat interested in the failure of the hon. member for Ottawa West to make any alternative proposals with respect to his criticism of the government's fiscal policy.

I am one who is rather inclined to symbolize ideas, groups and things of that sort. While he was speaking I could not help thinking that all three parties in this house could be well represented or symbolized by certain animals. I would say the Progressive Conservatives would be well represented by the porcupine. As we know, they are inclined to climb a tree, look down on the rest of the world and shed their quills when annoyed, as the minister does on occasion. I would say the Liberals would be well represented by the rabbit. They are quite harmless, quite neutral and not given to construction or things of that sort. They are nice as a pet, particularly for children and people with immature minds. So far as our group is concerned it is obvious that there is only one animal by which it could be represented and that is the beaver. It is always building.

As I look over at the Minister of Finance I have memories of him when he was in opposition. At that time I used to regard him as a sort of symbolized connoisseur of the evils of waste and extravagance, high interest rates, high taxes and consequent inflation. I used to think of him as the lion rampant of the opposition roaring his demands for the remedy of these evils. According to the records, the last time I heard him roar in this respect was in the budget debate on March 21, 1957. Anyone taking the time to go back and read that debate will be most interested in observing how the minister has changed his tune. He is singing quite a different tune today, now that he has assumed the responsibility of the portfolio of Minister of Finance.

When I witness his present mellow meekness which represents such a marked change, his pallid smile in the face of opposition criticism, it appears to me that the former lion rampant of the opposition has become the minister quiescent. The minister has our sympathy and what we shall do this afternoon is to present constructive alternatives designed to bail the minister out of his very difficult situation. I want him to understand that our policy and program will be presented with the best intentions and in the best spirit.

It may be asked why the minister has our sympathy. He has it because he is the victim of circumstances, caught in the vise of the inherent contradictions of capitalism —I am now speaking as a democractic socialist—and also in the contradictions of the speeches he made while in opposition and those he has made as Minister of Finance. He is caught also by his party's philosophy, election problems and present policies which policies permitted the gain of $165 million by certain people who benefited by the conversion loan and also the looting of the public wealth of this country by certain persons who buy stock and make no contribution to the wealth of Canada at the same time. The minister is also caught in the vise of fixed interest charges, statutory payments and also the present recession and unemployment problems for which this government is not entirely without responsibility.

In the opinion of this group all this results from a system which leaves genuine economic control in the hands of a few people without direct responsibility to all the people in this country. Proof of this I think is clearly provided in the recent price increases, exceeding the tax increases, on the part of certain people who have things to sell in Canada whose actions in this regard were deplored even by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). I wonder what some of the same people would say if all wage earners in this country demanded an automatic increase in wages equal to the increase in taxes and the increase in the cost of living occasioned by the increase in prices by these people who accept no social responsibility to the country as a whole.

There is no question but that unemployment and inflation are the two current, major national problems. As a result of this amendment I intend to deal with the problem of inflation which is more correctly termed a debasement of currency. Whom does it affect? It is a very serious problem at this time which I think is being underestimated in some quarters. It affects all the working people of the country and the real value of their wages. It has affected farm costs and prices and we realized from the representations made by the delegation which came from the prairie provinces recently. It has affected our small business people. It has affected our young people trying to obtain an education. A good many young Canadians were unable to return to universities last fall because they could not obtain employment last summer. It has certainly affected the standard of living of our senior citizens. I am sure all members of the house have had representations in that connection.

To illustrate that point I want to read very briefly from an article in the Ottawa Citizen of Thursday, August 16 entitled "Welfare Report; 273,000 Ontario Aged In Impoverished State". It reads in part as follows:

> Between 180,000 and 273,000 of Ontario residents over 60 are living below a subsistence level, it was estimated yesterday.

This is largely occasioned at the present time by the increases in the cost of living and the low standard of their allowances. I think we should all recognize the fact that persons of small means, small earning power, small income are always much more seriously affected by inflation or debasement of currency than persons of larger means or big business. Why? Because big business, industrialists or manufacturers, almost always have their entire wealth invested in natural resources or in equity capital which gives them ownership and control of the plants in question. That is why tremendous inflation occured in Germany after the first world war. The Krupps and others, the warmongers generally, suffered nothing. Their interest was in equity shares in their plants. The working people of that country suffered tremendously, and that was one reason why Hitler obtained their support at a later time.

Inflation or debasement of currency is caused by irresponsible, unplanned development, a lack of direction and tempo of investment, government fiscal policy, monopoly regulated prices, which has actually happened at the present time as I will demonstrate later, and lack of markets. Before proceeding with concrete proposals, as a democratic socialist I do wish to mention a few axioms with respect to inflation which we consider is an eruption of capitalism, a periodic disease because of the lack of control by governments of the economic system of the country which they are supposed to govern. I think we should not forget these axioms.

The first, in my opinion, is that value is determined by the amount of necessary labour incorporated in the production of the required amount of a commodity. Second, the production of any commodity over the required quantity does not add any value by way of the excess. For instance, the production of 1,000 tons of potatoes if the market requires only 500 tons will realize only the value of 500 tons. Inflation is not caused by high prices or high wages. Monopolies may vary the price to a limited degree. High monopoly prices tend to reduce the turnover and turnover is one of the most important objects of monopoly. If a commodity is sold above its value, money changes hands at less than its value. The commodity owner, if selling above value, takes a larger share of surplus value at the expense of the buyer capitalist. Sellers of labour power have excess included in their wages, as they have taxes. The eruption in capitalism, known as high prices or inflation, is the immediate effect of debasement of currency.

When we are dealing with this very complicated and difficult question I think we should remember some of these fundamental axioms. We do not suggest for a moment that this problem is an easy one which can be solved over night. We do maintain that, given correct policies, we can gradually work toward a solution of the problem. There are two major schools of thought when it comes to the question of inflation or the present situation which has developed through inflation. The classical school of thought—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member? There was a debate on the failure of the government to take effective steps to combat inflation on an amendment moved by the leader of the hon. member's group to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and that amendment was negatived. On a supply motion there was also a debate involving inflation. I would hope that the hon. member could relate his discussion of this problem to the public debt and the items in the amendment.

Mr. Herridge: I intend to do that, Mr. Speaker. I am dealing with inflation at the present time before proceeding to another argument having to do particularly with the largest increase in the money supply in any year since the war. Then I intend to put forward specific proposals. As a matter of fact, it is very hard to deal with monetary problems and policy without covering some previous ground that is related. I was saying that the classical economist sees the remedy to the situation in the arrested development of the economy, the restriction of the growth of social welfare services, a measure of unemployment and high interest rates. That is the classical approach to the situation we are experiencing at the present time.

What is the approach of democratic socialists? While we are conscious of the effect of inflation and the difficulties surrounding the problem, we believe it can be remedied by planned fiscal and economic policies and the planned direction and tempo of investment, which we think is very necessary. There is serious concern with this problem by a wide section of the community. I am sure all members realize that from their correspondence since the session commenced. Such correspondence largely relates, of course, to the increase in the cost of living. In that connection I want to quote from a few articles in various newspapers relating to this subject. I should like to read just the first paragraph from an interesting article in the Manchester Guardian of Saturday, February 14, 1959. It indicates the attitude of other countries toward the circumstances existing in Canada at this time. This is what the article has to say in part:

> Canada has been since the war one of the most rapidly developing free countries in the world, and her natural resources make her future economic potential almost boundless. But she is approaching a dangerous cross-roads. Too few of her leaders seem to appreciate, or to be willing to give public warning of, her growing monetary and financial problems.

That is from a very substantial newspaper. I want to quote a comment on an article in Saturday Night entitled, "How the Banks Can Halt Inflation." I think it is a very good illustration of how government policy has permitted the banks to benefit from the present situation. It reads as follows:

An enlightening article on "How the Banks Can Halt Inflation" appeared in the February issue of Saturday Night. It was from the pen of Kenneth Gouldie. He relates how, prior to 1954, chartered banks were permitted by law to lend $10 in credit for every dollar held by the bank. That was the legal minimum cash reserve ratio. He goes on to tell how the Bank Act was amended in 1954 providing that the minimum reserve ratio be reduced from 10 per cent to 8 per cent. The writer then goes on to tell us exactly what happened as a result of this change and incidentally lets some light in on the way bankers become rich.

The Saturday Night article says: "During the first half of 1954 the mean cash reserve of the chartered banks amounted to a total of $894 million and the average amount of deposits (every loan being in fact a deposit) was $8,940 million. But in July of that year, after the legal minimum cash reserve ratio had been reduced to 8 per cent the banks could legally lend $11,170 million."

But that was not all that happened by reducing the reserve. Here is how Saturday Night tells it: "By consenting to reduction of the cash reserve ratio from 10 to 8 per cent, parliament then, in effect, made a gift worth $223 million to the shareholders of the chartered banks for which, in the higher prices of everything which Canadians have since bought and now buy, they have paid and are still paying."

I cannot blame the present government for that action. Now that shows that government policy has an effect on the cost of living. There have been some other articles with respect to other persons who have an effect on the cost of living. I want to quote briefly from an article from the Ottawa Citizen of March 24, 1959 entitled "Price Increases and Inflation". It is quite brief. At one point, this article reads:

But one of the questions now being raised most consistently in hearings here is that the big steel and auto industries themselves may be equally to blame for unnecessary prices rises, which have helped the inflationary spiral. This view may have some application in Canada, too...

The more conservative economists have been unwilling to assess any blame to industry, but even some of them have admitted that the concentrated heavy industries, by their use of "administered prices", have contributed to the unique situation of the past two years, inflation in the midst of a severe recession. The theory of "administered prices" is that the few dominant corporations in the industry itself have the major control over pricing, rather than the market-place control by supply and demand.

And one noted economist, Gardner C. Means, who with Adolf A. Berle wrote a revolutionary volume on big business in the 1930's, "The Modern Corporation and Private Property", has been testifying to an increasingly interested group of senators that this is an entirely new type of inflation—an administered price inflation.

The heart of the Means thesis, which he buttresses with all kinds of charts and statistics, is that when big price increases come in the concentrated heavy industries like steel, rather than in the more competitive durable goods industries, it is largely because of administered pricing, and the effect of this rolls through all sections of the economy.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is getting quite a distance away from the amendment. I appreciate what he said about the difficulty there was in discussing monetary policy, and how easy it is for one to wander into many fields. However, there is nothing about prices and inflation in the amendment. The only question in relation to inflation is the money supply, and if he wants to relate his discussion to money supply, he may proceed.

Mr. Herridge: I am coming right now to money supply; I am closer to it than I have ever been in my life before. I do want to emphasize that this indicates there is a possibility of regulated prices by large industries, such as steel, and I think we have to consider that in considering our proposals.

I want to mention a brief that was presented to the government on behalf of the united steelworkers of America concerning steel prices in Canada. On page 2 they suggest the government should require steel producers to make public the actual prices and price changes for all of their products.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member does not seem to be paying very much attention to what I have said. He is going on to discuss the question of prices.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, if you allow me to continue I can be right there. Now I come to money supply. I am just relating the actions of these companies to the effect on our cost of living and the price increases suffered by persons generally. This amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West deals with the question of the largest expansion in money supply in any year since the war and the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established. I want to deal with those aspects of the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

In order to buttress my argument, I do want to quote from Mr. Reginald McKenna in the Monetary Times of April, 1959. This is a very respectable organ, I should think, from a government point of view. This is what he has to say:

History has shown that apart perhaps from wars and religious intolerance no single factor has been more productive of misery and misfortune than the high degree of variability in the general price level. This may sound like an extravagant statement, but so far from being of the nature of a demagogic outburst it is clearly demonstrable from the course of events in various countries ever since money became an important element in the life of civilized communities. A stable price level is a thing to be desired, second only to international and domestic peace.—Reginald McKenna, chairman (president of Midland Bank Ltd.).

Monetary Policy

This is a statement by Sir Josiah Stamp, and I mention this to indicate the use of this very outstanding opinion on monetary policy; I am very interested in quoting from what Sir Josiah Stamp had to say because, on one occasion, I wrote him and he sent me a copy of a book he wrote entitled, "Christianity and the Economic and Social Order". This is what Sir Josiah Stamp had to say:

> When I have said quite seriously, as I have done on a number of occasions, that the problem of price level is the most important single problem of our age, I have been accused either of exaggeration or flippancy. What about trade depression in the basic industries, unemployment, labour unrest, class hatred, high taxation and the rest. My answer is that the problem of the price level is fundamental to a solution of them all.

This matter has been of great interest lately in the United States. I want to quote from the Congressional Record of February 26 of this year. There was a long debate on this question, but I shall read only from one or two statements. This is a speech by the Hon. Chester Bowles in the house of representatives, and at one point he says:

> But one point, at least, is clear: If we are to succeed in our efforts to secure peace in the world and prosperity for our own people, we cannot afford to wait for the least likely development of all—for the problems themselves to grow smaller. Instead both we and our economy must grow to meet them.

Then he goes on to say:

> These men have honestly convinced themselves that the American people and their congress must choose between rapid growth with inflation on the one hand or minimal growth with stable prices and some unemployment on the other.

These are the persons advocating a classical approach to inflation. Then, he continues:

> —I deeply believe that those among us who assume that we must accept a slow rate of expansion with some unemployment as the best means of preventing inflation, are gravely misjudging the problems which we face.

He goes on to criticize the whole approach and to suggest some regulation of the monetary system and of the economy, although somewhat limited in its extent. We all know, that former President Lincoln made some strong statements concerning monetary policy and the purpose and place of money in our society. He said on one occasion:

> To what extent has the government a responsibility to protect the currency of the nation?
> Money is the creature of law and the creation of the original issue of money should be maintained as an exclusive monopoly of national government.
> The monetary needs of increasing numbers of people advancing toward higher standards of living can and should be met by the government. The circulation of a medium of exchange issued and backed by the government can be properly regulated and redundancy of issue avoided by withdrawing from circulation such amounts as may be necessary by taxation, re-deposit and otherwise.
> The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of government, but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

Then, I want to mention again the words of a former prime minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King who said:

> Until the control and issue of money is restored to the government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

We in this group, Mr. Speaker, certainly support this statement, as we have in the past. In our opinion the present situation provides the government with a creative opportunity. We in this group suggest the necessity for a planned national development policy, but at the same time we recognize the fact that the natural resources are under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the fact that co-operation with the provinces in a program of this type is essential. We believe that is absolutely the first essential with respect to overcoming the situation we are faced with at the present time. We believe the federal government should give leadership in that direction.

Then we believe it is necessary to have a planned fiscal policy. In this connection we believe a national development plan and the accumulation of capital for this purpose should be established. Capital could be provided by bond issues, by obtaining the savings of the people, and this is completely non-inflationary. It is a matter that will have to be explored by this government to its ultimate possibilities and limits.

What has been done to secure the co-operation of the people of this country in support of a national development policy by lending their moneys themselves for projects for which they would be directly concerned? In that connection I think it would be a good idea to appeal to people's local loyalty. You could have a national loan for the South Saskatchewan dam, a national loan for maritime dams, or for maritime development. We have not started to mobilize the resources or to attract the interest of the Canadian people in this direction. We could secure some capital by taxing where appropriate—this is not inflationary—toward a development policy, and we could use national credit through the Bank of Canada under circumstances that will not create inflation. In order not to create inflation it must be directly related to a planned economic policy and to the rate of production.

As socialists we urge the government to consider our common sense proposals which have been proven by experience. We are not just getting up here and talking Utopian nonsense from the government members' point of view, or a lot of tommyrot. The ideas we are expounding and do expound from time to time with respect to these problems have been proved by experience.

In this connection I want to bring to the attention of hon. members a book entitled: "Norway The Planned Revival", written by Miss Alice Bourneuf. I read this book with great interest, and I recommend it to the members of the house. I may say I was led to search into this problem by my great admiration for the Norwegians both in peace and in war, and I have friends who are Norwegians. I am one of those who recognizes that they have made a great contribution to Canadian development. I have always looked upon the Norwegians as Englishmen who failed to come over from Norway with their brothers to Britain prior to the Roman invasion. I want to bring this to the attention of the house, and to read briefly from the cover blurb:

Her emphasis is on the over-all national accounts aspect of the plans—the program for total investment, private and public consumption, output increases, and import surpluses to be financed with aid or credits. And since monetary, fiscal, and wage-price policies were an important part of Norwegian economic planning, the book devotes considerable time to an analysis of the stabilization program—

This is the sort of program we are suggesting the government should undertake at the present time. I continue:

—the gradual easing of inflationary pressures, the importance of high public savings, and the measures which led to a very high rate of private savings. Also discussed in detail is the problem of maintaining some degree of price-wage stability in spite of rapidly rising import prices, the 1949 devaluation, over-full employment, and a domestic price and wage level held down by means of subsidies and price controls.

Norway's experience is important not only in and for itself, but as a pilot study for other countries engaged in economic planning.

I bring this to the attention of the Minister of Finance. I would like to see him give some consideration to the outline in this book of the policies of the Norwegian government, which is a labour government, a democratic socialist government that has been engaged in socialist planning and the maintenance of real freedom both in the economic and political spheres. In this connection I want to read a short paragraph or two from this book. From page 210 I read this:

One obvious fact is that Norway eliminated inflationary pressures in the consumer section only by a strong combination of fiscal policy, price-wage policy, and policy on the use of resources for consumption. The heavy reliance on fiscal and price-wage policies to keep the controlled price system from getting too far out of line with disposable incomes, and gradually to bring it more into line, was of the utmost importance. Fiscal and wage policies are less manageable in many countries.

Then, on page 211, the writer goes on to say:

One last point to be made in connection with the progress toward elimination of suppressed inflation in Norway is that over-all economic planning clearly helped in meeting a difficult situation. When the whole period from 1946 to 1956 is considered, national budgeting for resource uses appears to have contributed to the handling of a series of difficult problems and critical situations.

I would like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and also hon. members to read this book. It is a very interesting study and demonstrates what can be done when the government takes hold of and makes itself wholly responsible for the control of the economic system. This is something the C.C.F. has suggested on many occasions. There have been difficult situations to meet in all countries, and there have been difficulties every where with respect to inflationary pressure since the war. This has applied to Norway, but the government took action on voluntary price reductions. I should like to read this:

The Norwegian price directorate has received reports from four major industrial and business organizations on the results of efforts to put through voluntary price reductions, as urged by the government.

They did that through the co-operation of business itself. They established a committee representing government, industry, labour and the farmers, as I said, to suggest means of controlling the price-wage spiral. I quote:

The report strongly advocates the establishment of a permanent co-operation council to watch Norwegian economic developments and to offer such proposals as it might deem necessary.

Moreover, efforts should be made to co-ordinate price and wage negotiations through a co-operation council in which the government, wage-earners, employers and agriculture would be represented.

That has been the approach of the democratic socialist government of Norway, and it has met with considerable success to date. Surely we in Canada with our greater natural resources and opportunities can approach this problem along similar lines. Therefore we suggest similar planning be undertaken in Canada, with co-operation between the government, wage-earners, employers and agriculture, and as a result of that co-operation it is our opinion that we would get a stabilization of prices and wages which would be of great benefit to the working people of this country.

Mr. Morris: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Herridge: All right.

Mr. Morris: Does the hon. member carry a similar affection for the economic control of the workers of Sweden?

Mr. Herridge: I am afraid I did not hear my friend's question.

Mr. Morris: I say, does the hon. member carry a similar affection for the regulated economic life of Sweden?

Mr. Herridge: The government of Sweden has somewhat different policies, possibly, from the government of Norway, but basically they are alike. I would suggest that if the government of Canada had conserved our human and natural resources as well as the government of Sweden has in the past, the Canadian people would be much better off today.

Mr. Morris: Is the hon. member aware that the government of Sweden has announced it will not be able, because of its regulated economic life, to finance any further social adjustments for a period of ten years?

Mr. Herridge: Possibly the hon. gentleman does not realize the level of social services provided in Sweden at the present time. There are a great many other countries which have a long way to go to catch up.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that the policy I have outlined in these brief remarks on national planning and development related to governmental control of the issue of currency, plus co-operation between the government, industry, labour and agriculture, will be a great step forward. We believe these proposals will lead toward a planned development of our resources, a stable fiscal policy, full employment and security for all Canadians. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"this house further regrets the failure of the government to assume full responsibility for the control of credit, and particularly, its failure to establish a national investment board."

Mr. Speaker: I am not very clear how the subamendment relates to the amendment. Would the hon. member moving this subamendment indicate where the control of credit and the establishment of a national investment board is related to the points covered by the amendment?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the amendment moved by the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) deals with the high bank rate, which affects all Canadians; the expansion of money supply, which affects all Canadians; the increase in the debt and also in the charges. We move this subamendment because of the belief that if the government had complete control over the issue of credit it would have a beneficial effect on the conditions complained of in the amendment itself.

Mr. Speaker: The point I want clarified, if the hon. member would be good enough, is this. The amendment regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy characterized by, amongst other things, the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established. I ask the hon. member what item in the amendment involves the control of credit referred to in the subamendment? The subamendment also alleges a failure to establish a national investment board, and before I allow or disallow the subamendment I would like to know what relationship it has to the main amendment.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, on looking over the amendment we notice that no approach seems to have been made as to what action ought to have been taken by the government. The amendment regrets a number of things resulting from government policy, and therefore we move an additional amendment whereby we hope to supply the answer to the complaints. While we acknowledge the existence of the five points listed in the Liberal amendment, we feel as a responsible group that we have an alternative to offer. In our opinion the establishment of a national investment board would eliminate the complaints contained in the Liberal amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member says, but it seems to me that the establishment of a national investment board to control investment funds is an entirely new subject and not one which can readily be discussed in conjunction with the amendment, which relates basically to debt management and monetary policy, an increase in the national debt and an increase in the bank rate.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, if I may say one word, this matter of investment of course is very interesting, but I would call your attention to the fact that the original motion moved has to do with the expansion of the money supply. It has to do both directly and indirectly with the matter of investment of money, and that comes into every point. The subamendment moved by the C.C.F. party regrets the failure to establish an investment board. Item No. 3 of the Liberal amendment definitely ties in with the question of an investment board on the question of finance.

Mr. Speaker: The first part of the proposed subamendment seems to me to be fully covered in the amendment itself, and therefore any discussion relating to the control of credit in so far as it is relevant to the main amendment can take place. But with all respect, it seems to me that the establishment of a national investment board deals with an entirely unrelated subject. I feel it should be possible to confine this debate to the subjects relevant to the amendment, which could not be done if the proposed subamendment were accepted, and therefore I declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in referring to the way in which the government has handled our debt I wish first of all to refer briefly to what I consider to be the greatest financial fiasco in the history of our country, namely the conversion loan. Our people will feel the effect of this loan for a generation.

I have said previously in this house that less than 55 per cent of those bonds were in fact being extended over a longer term. Over 45 per cent of those victory bonds must again be dealt with as they have been converted into short term loans maturing in either 1961 or 1965, and both issues come due before the ninth victory loan would have come due and been ready for conversion. The 1961 loan amounting to $1 billion will need to be converted during the lifetime of this parliament, and the 1965 loan amounting to over $1.2 billion will come due in the year I have mentioned, and will need to be converted during the lifetime of the next parliament. I think we have paid a very high price in order to get just slightly over half of these bonds extended to bonds of a longer due date. We have heard all kinds of prices mentioned, and a figure of over $70 million has been named as the cost of that conversion.

At the time of the conversion, I well recall saying that I could not condone the expenditure of over $16 million for the printing bureau, especially if there was any irregularity, and none was proved. I told the minister that in extra debt charges his conversion policy would be costing the people of Canada the equivalent of one printing bureau every three months for a generation, or one almost every mile from here to Montreal. The minister told me then that I was irresponsible. Well, let us see how irresponsible I was. Including the cost of the loan—over $70 million —and the extra interest, the minister, had he been building printing bureaux, would, starting at Eastview, have completed four, with another four nearing completion. By the fall he would be starting work on four more, and be 12 miles out of the city toward Montreal with 23 years yet to go. And this would represent only part of the cost, because on the other side of the road he would also have as many other imposing structures, progressively more ornate as you go east representing the extra interest our people have to pay for provincial, municipal and other loans because of that conversion program.

Every new sidewalk, new school, new hospital, sewer or road will cost more because of that conversion loan. As an example, the city of Welland and the township of Crowland in my own county are building a new hospital; the two municipalities are underwriting a substantial share of the cost. When they come to sell debentures they will get some concept of what that conversion loan and the fiscal policy of this government have done to them. A good many municipalities have not built new projects since the time of the conversion loan. They will be going on the market soon to borrow money, and at that point they will speedily realize what this conversion loan and what the other activities of this government have cost the people of Canada. If we turn to table 48, page 87, of the budgetary papers it will be seen that the minister is in big business. In the last fiscal year the total amount of securities issued was $9.2 billion. Renewals or conversions amounted to $6.8 billion, and the amount issued for new cash was $2.4 billion. The trouble is that so much of the new borrowing by this government to meet deficits and other expenditures was on short term. The issues are again right on top of us to finance again in this current year and in the year which lies ahead.

The minister talked a great deal about the victory loans, amounting to $6.4 billion, overhanging the market. He has now worked himself into a position where, as will be seen from an examination of the budgetary papers, he has over $7 billion overhanging the market between now and the end of 1966 when the ninth victory bond was due—I am including the new borrowing which he must make this year to cover the deficit and other budgetary loans. This calculation does not, however, include the $1.59 billion of treasury bills which was increased by $70 million last year in order to get more cash, or new borrowings, or the deficit in succeeding years.

As I said before, the total amount of bonds issued in the last fiscal year by conversion for new cash amounted to 9.2 billion. If nearly $1.6 billion of three months treasury bills is added to this hon. members will see that the minister has been fooling around with over half our total debt, and this costs money, as is evidenced by the conversion loan itself. Truly this government's greed for cash is insatiable. In spite of their promises, they had to get more money.

The minister has told us that as far as he can judge the Canadian public has been well informed about the situation with regard to our debt and the money we have to raise. Well, the overspending in deficits and the depletion in government accounts amount to more than twice the total budget for 1939. The "moderate increase" in taxes of $352 million—and this is the only time I will refer to the budget—is 75 per cent of the total budget of 1939, with an estimated deficit amounting to some $400 million which is, itself, not far off the total 1939 budget.

This year the estimates are away up again, and there seems no end to the increase in spending. The government is taking so much of our earnings, and competing so strongly for money which the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards have to find on the open market in competition with the government to finance their legitimate needs, that the future cannot possibly be regarded with confidence. There surely must be a limit to all this. At the time of the conversion loan, the minister said one result would be that the provinces and the municipalities would be able to get money at better advantage, by which he meant at more satisfactory rates of interest. But in his last pronouncement, the minister did not go out on a limb. He merely said he wanted to leave more room for the provinces and municipalities to borrow money. I am afraid he has not left them much room unless they pay very high rates.

If the minister had sold his short term bonds at par around a rate commensurate with present yields instead of putting in income tax gimmicks costing our treasury a net 6.6 per cent when sold to corporations he would have a more stable market. Bond buyers are holding back in full knowledge of the number of bonds the minister must finance, waiting to see what gimmicks might be in store for them. Surely, the minister is directly responsible for creating an irregular and unsatisfactory bond market.

The next time the minister has a bond issue with gimmicks I think he should make the bonds available in smaller denominations to the small businessmen. The last bonds were sold in denominations of $1,000, $5,000, $100,000 and $1 million. The small businessmen might as well get in on the benefits at this time because they will be shown no discrimination when the bill is to be paid. The next bond issue should not be handled on the basis of a 15-minute rush. As the minister said, at the time of the last loan the books were opened and closed in 15 minutes. Certainly the ordinary man did not get much chance to get a bond even if he had $1,000, the amount of the lowest denomination.

At any time I have heard the minister speak in the budget debate or on any other occasion he has nearly always justified the high interest rates in Canada on the basis of those in the United States. Let us review what has been done in that country. There were three issues in the United States sold immediately prior to our conversion loan bond issue. They were in May and June of 1958. The United States treasury sold $1 billion worth of bonds representing only one-third of 1 per cent of their total debt in 27-year 3¼ per cent bonds slightly above par. They were 50 cents for each $100 above par. There was so much criticism of the United States treasury over this high interest rate of 3¼ per cent that the treasury went into shorter term bonds. On June 15, 1958 they had to refund $9.5 billion of notes and bonds coming due. They did this in two parcels which I will describe. They floated $1.8 billion in 11-month 1¼ per cent certificates. The larger one involved the sum of $7.4 billion which was floated in 6-year 8-month bonds to yield 2.58 per cent. They were doing this at a time when we were getting rid of the 8th and 9th series of bonds. At the corresponding time they sold new bonds to return to the buyer 2.58 per cent. These were sold to the public at 50 cents per $100 above par. The whole issue was sold and this left $356 million that had to be redeemed for cash. The point is that our 4½ per cent bonds were 1¼ per cent in yield over the comparatively small amount sold by the United States treasury at 3¼ per cent and for which they were severely criticized, and 1⅞ or nearly 2 per cent over the larger United States 2⅝ per cent issue.

It is true that United States short term money is up; in fact, the figure of 4 per cent was mentioned in today's Globe and Mail. It may be pointed out, however, that our last short term 13-month loan sold in February, with its income tax gimmicks, cost our government 6.6 per cent net when sold to big corporations. This is still considerably more than 2 per cent over United States short term loans. We surely want to keep ahead of the United States.

One bad feature in connection with our borrowings is the lack of stability on the part of the Department of Finance. Most of our bonds were selling on the market to yield slightly under 5 per cent and then the minister offered $200 million of bonds in two issues, both of which carried income tax gimmicks. As I said before the shorter term 13-month bonds because of the income tax gimmicks returned 6.6 per cent. This is bad in itself but there is another bad aspect of this. Because of these sudden upward jumps in interest rates the people who have money to invest in the bond market are sitting back waiting to see if any new income tax gimmicks might come their way. No one buying a bond returning a high interest rate wants to see his bond go down as a result of the Department of Finance offering a bond at a higher interest rate. Many of the bond buyers are afraid of this. Both the man buying a $50 bond and the man buying a $1 million bond do not want to see their bonds go down in price next month.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, nobody in this country can deny that we are approaching or are in some form of financial crisis. Last Thursday I asked the Minister of Finance this question, as found at page 2968 of Hansard:

Is it true that the new treasury bill rate is now 4.72 per cent, and that the bank rate has reached another unprecedented record high of close to 5 per cent?

His answer was:

I have not the precise figure for this week's rates, but I would say that the movement in the rate on treasury bills lately has been attributable directly to the tremendous demands for commercial loans which are being made at this time on the chartered banks, reflecting the very great expansion in the economy of this country which is under way at present.

I would say that these rate increases were depressing financial news to the people of the country. The minister evidently did not know how many percentage points rise had occurred in the treasury bill rate. This rate sets the bank rate which is .25 above it, and it also in effect sets the commercial rate which now stands at 5¾ per cent. These rates have a tremendous effect on the business tempo in our country.

I realize that there has been some industrial pick-up, I think about two points, but if it is to be sustained and if it is to progress we must have money at reasonable rates in order that it may do so. If there ever was a time when a pick-up of the business tempo was needed it is now because we have so many people unemployed. Yet the minister did not know what the interest rates were at a time when later that day and the following morning they made headline news in the papers across our country. The minister should do all he can to stimulate an industrial pick-up. The time has come when the minister should take the people of Canada into his confidence. They have the right to expect honest and straightforward statements as to our fiscal policy and not misleading ones such as have been given by the minister, three examples of which I referred to in the budget debate.

Nothing will precipitate a crisis faster than lack of candour on the part of the minister. Doubt is worse than reality. In February, as you know, our short term bonds were sold, as I said before, on a basis actually costing the government 6.6 per cent but most of our bonds were selling on the Canadian market to yield between 4.75 and 5 per cent. I think there must be something seriously wrong with our fiscal policy when the Minister of Finance finds it necessary to put out bonds at such a high rate and such a high cost to the government of our country. I said before that our money was costing us more and therefore our bonds are selling lower than bonds of most countries of the western free world.

Federal government borrowings are the senior security in our country. In my lifetime they have always been considered to be the best and safest investment and they have always sold to give a lower yield than provincial and municipal bonds. This is not so today because many equivalent maturities of most provincial and provincial guaranteed bonds are selling either on a par with or slightly above Canadian government bonds. I said in the speech from the throne debate that the minister would soon be competing with our cities, towns, and townships for money, and that has come about at the present time. Even at present many of our fellow Canadians are willing to buy some of these debentures ahead of the senior maturities of our country and I know that some of our municipalities do not have to pay 6.6 per cent. They get their money cheaper than that.

Why is this so? It has never been the case in our country that municipalities have been able to obtain money as cheaply as the Dominion of Canada. The reason must be that many investors have greater faith in municipal councils and the way they manage their affairs. This has occurred only during the time that the present minister has been in office.

The Conservative party has never been outstanding in their handling of financial matters in Canada. Only twice since confederation have they had a surplus of more than $1 million, once in this century and once in the last century. It is true that they had two other surpluses but they were both less than $1 million. Altogether their past surpluses did not amount to over $15 million, and the government has been overspending by that amount in every week of the last fiscal year.

After all, what can we expect? The government has no fiscal policy. It has no long term or short term fiscal policy. They go along day by day and I think their consciences are plagued by their promises. They deal with financial problems one at a time but unfortunately debt, deficits and poor financing are not easily dismissed. They stay to plague them. I know that the firing of a sub-postmaster and the firing of a lot of men who worked on the Arrow project are matters that the government hopes the people will soon forget but certainly their fiscal policy stays with them and it has become a nightmare.

I am not going to refer extensively to what the minister said in the budget debate, but as found at page 2889 of Hansard of April 21, 1959 the minister did say this:

> If we had been elected earlier unquestionably we could have saved this country money by eliminating waste and extravagance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say at this point that it seems to me that the hon. member is reverting to the budget debate rather than dealing with the question before us.

Mr. McMillan: I will not do so further except to quote one sentence with reference to capital. I was really glad to hear the minister say this in the budget debate. The minister said: "Capital in this country is not unlimited." I think that refers to something we are debating. He also said:

> Our policy has been, as hon. members know, to resist as far as lies within our power the payment of high interest rates on federal borrowings.

For the life of me I cannot understand that statement after the conversion loan fiasco and after the loans at 6.6 per cent with respect to which the bonds were sold, as I said before, to corporations, most of whom would be paying 50 per cent or more income tax. I think it is over 50 per cent now when you take in the old age pension part of it. When the minister gets into trouble he seems to blame the United States but I have already put on the record today some facts as to how the United States has handled its loans. I think I put on the record here today that the United States, certainly before the conversion loan, was able to obtain money cheaper, often up to 2 per cent.

There was no mention by the minister of the British budget. I do not suppose I should mention the British budget, but this year Britain was able to grant tax reductions amounting to about $1 billion, with an indicated surplus of $102 million.

One reason back of our trouble in this country is the lack of foreign investment. It is certainly not coming into the country as fast as it used to come. One reason for this is the anti-Americanism which was created in this country and stirred up on many Tory platforms and by some of the Tory press. It certainly was so in my part of the country. I saw in the newspapers a story about a broker from Montreal who said he used to have a lot of Canadian bond buyers from the United States, but since the conversion loan he has not had any. I have cited before in this house how unpopular our bonds are in New York. I refer to the fact that one week one lone Canadian $1,000 bond was sold on the New York market during a week as against $375,000 worth of Australian bonds. During the week following that, not one Canadian bond was sold, while practically the same number of Australian bonds were sold. I know a few Canadians personally who used to buy our bonds but now they not only do not buy our bonds but they have sold the ones they bought at a loss.

Even the unemployment insurance commission fund, over which the minister has control, I understand took a loss of $10,115,-171.51 in the government bonds they had to sell within the last year. I am surprised that the minister would be forced to take such a loss in one of the government accounts. I am often asked by people from the United States when I meet them, "What kind of government have you in Canada, anyhow?" I can only reply in the words used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) when he was asked in Chicago about the diversion of trade and the anti-Americanism he said, "That was only election talk". Unfortunately, the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce do not catch up with the publicity in the United States press emanating from Ottawa about the diversion of 15 per cent of the trade and the criticism of United States investments in Canada. The average citizen of the United States, therefore, who might help us by buying bonds or who might invest some money in Canada, does not do so. He merely asks, "What kind of government have you in Canada, anyhow?" Even I wonder. After all this anti-Americanism, after all the great pronouncements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) about maintaining our sovereignty in Canada our government leases oil and gas rights on three million acres to corporations, 90 per cent of which were either United States corporations or United States controlled.

The press has referred to this time in our history as a strange interlude, as being unpredictable and not knowing where we are going. Certainly, this government is strange and their actions seem to be stranger than fiction. I hear the minister is going to the Department of External Affairs. I wish him well, and I would say that the department is badly in need of a head at the present time. I think the minister will do well there because lately he has demonstrated more tact and patience than I thought was possible. In my opinion, he has many admirable qualities and accomplishments, although I do not believe mathematics is one of them. I congratulate the minister upon his work and his industry, but I regret that our fiscal policy is in such a mess that our Prime Minister feels it is necessary to move him.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that many of the mayors and aldermen of the municipalities of Canada were shocked when they read in the newspapers over the week end that in the future the rate of interest for money would be 5¾ per cent. Municipal debentures at 5½ or 5¾ per cent will cripple the Canadian municipalities and discourage the undertaking of public works throughout the whole of Canada. A $2 million debenture at 5¾ per cent would cost a municipality $115,000 a year in interest alone. If the population were approximately 9,000 in that municipality, the cost per year for interest charges only would amount to $12.78 per person or $63.90 per year for an average family of five. A municipality with a total taxable valuation of $25 million would have to collect from the proprietor of an immovable valued at $20,000 an annual tax of $92 for interest alone. This amount would be over and above the ordinary taxes levied.

If the ordinary municipal tax imposed on this property were $360, adding $92 would raise the taxes to $452, an increase of 25.5 per cent. At the present time it is very difficult to borrow money at less than 5½ or 5¾ per cent. I have here a clipping from a newspaper in which the city of Kitchener is inviting tenders for debentures and the maturity rates are 5½ per cent, one to ten years; 5½ per cent, one to fifteen years, and 5½ per cent, one to fifteen years. In one of the latest booklets issued by a broker in Montreal it is indicated that the rate of interest for municipal hospital and school debentures is 5 to 5¾ per cent.

Now an interest rate of 5¾ per cent is the highest rate in recent years. It was at this rate in August, 1957 and it dropped to 5¼ per cent in February, 1958. It rose to 5½ per cent in March, 1959 and at the end of this April it rose again to 5¾ per cent. Now the increase in the cost of wages and salaries, as a result of the increased cost of living, plus the higher cost of the necessary equipment, placed the municipalities of Canada in a very difficult situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member seems to be addressing his remarks to the problem of interest on municipal borrowings. There is no mention of that in the amendment before the house, and I should like to remind him that on the first supply motion during this session a subamendment called for consideration at a conference of such federal proposals to reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings, which subamendment was negatived by the house. It seems to me that only a limited reference to the effect of the bank rate on municipal borrowings would be in order at this time. In fact, it is only section 2 relating to the bank rate which seems to permit any discussion at all. I hope the hon. member will keep more closely to the matter before the house.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder if I might speak to the point Your Honour has just made. The governing part of the amendment before the house is what I would think should really be discussed at this time. It reads as follows:

> This house regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy—

Points 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 are descriptive only and are by no means all inclusive of the effects of the government's debt management and monetary policy.

What the hon. gentleman is seeking to do is quite obviously, I submit with great respect, to show that as a result of the government's debt management and monetary policies municipal financing has been rendered more difficult. The effect of the government's monetary policy is to provoke the kind of situation to which the hon. gentleman has just directed our attention.

With regard to the specific characteristic in No. 2, it should be noted that the bank rate does not preclude a discussion of the matter of interest rates, I submit, within the proper context of the question because the highest bank rate is not what we mean by interest rate. The bank rate is something which may have a determining factor on what the interest rate is but by itself it is not to be regarded as meaning the same thing as the interest rate.

I would submit with respect that the hon. gentleman deserves the latitude he is seeking because he is seeking to show that the situation confronting municipal financing is the product of the government's monetary policy and debt management.

Mr. Speaker: May I say this with respect to what the hon. member for Essex East has submitted? If the amendment had simply the first paragraph it would scarcely have been admissible because the term "monetary policy" is too broad, and would take us back over the ground of the budget debate which we have just finished. Therefore I regard the amendment, which deals with debt management and monetary policy, to be limited by the five specific items which follows; otherwise it seems to me that it overlaps a good part of what has been discussed in other debates during this session. Therefore I feel that the discussion should be restricted to the specific items one to five which are specified as the aspects of debt management and monetary policy which the house is to discuss.

Now with respect to the line which has been taken by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. He goes directly over ground which has been debated in the house, and that is the reason why I felt in discussing municipal and provincial finances, and this government's attitude towards the problem, he was repeating a previous debate, and more properly should have made his speech at that time rather than this time. I do not feel that I should allow a wide range of debate on the amendment before the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Would Your Honour hear another word on this point? It seems to me that the governing word in the motion moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) is the verb "regrets". The house is asked to regret what we on this side of the house feel to have been the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy. It seems to me my hon. friend from Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) is pointing out to the house one reason why he feels the house should regret this. He feels that the interest rates which municipalities are now having to pay are a direct result of the debt management of the government, and from his point of view that is the most regrettable feature of it, though I should not anticipate his speech. It seems to me that this is quite different from the motion that was decided by the house earlier. The house was asked earlier to take some specific action about this interest; but I apprehend that my hon. friend is not asking the house to take any specific course of action but to express regret about the subject, and he has given his reason why we should regret that. All of us have our own reasons for regretting it.

An hon. Member: The last election.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Speaker: All I can say in amplification of what I said before is that the house refused to regret the matter that was before the house on the previous supply motion.

Mr. Bourque: If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, the sheet which I hold in my hand refers not only to municipal debentures but to hospitals, schools, churches and all the different people who have to borrow money. A rate of 5¾ per cent is going to be a very serious handicap to all of these organizations. In my municipality, if I may say so, in 1947, we paid $515,568 in wages, and now in 1959 we are paying—

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member did not misunderstand me. I have not accepted the proposition which has been made that we can go into a discussion of municipal and provincial debt. I do not want to suggest what the hon. member should say as he has to make his own speech but it seems to me that municipal borrowing is a subject which has been covered before and voted on by the house, and there should not be any more than a passing reference to it. The hon. member should confine himself to the matter before the house.

Mr. Bourque: This interest of 5¾ per cent is going to have a serious effect on employment in the province of Quebec because municipalities and all of these other organizations borrow to create work and to build. On March 22, 1958 we had 222,000 unemployed in the province of Quebec. On March 21, 1959 we had 215,000. If we could borrow money at a reasonable rate we could build all kinds of things which would create work and it would enable the unemployment figure to go down. At the rate of 5¾ per cent it is practically impossible because the costs are too high.

The new rate of 5¾ per cent is going to have a serious effect on the finance charges on automobiles and appliances, and it will place a heavy burden on the average citizen who, through unemployment, illness or a bad investment has to borrow through regular channels.

The stockbrokers and investment houses will certainly suffer from this high rate of interest. It is going to place a heavy burden on their shoulders, and I am sure the number of investors will become fewer and fewer as time goes on.

This high rate of interest will curtail the exports of Canadian goods, and it will add to the cost of manufacture. Already the Canadian production and shipment of newsprint in the first three months of the year is at 1,469,000 tons and 1,335,000 tons which is still 1.7 per cent and 3.3 per cent below the 1958 level. The Alberta production of crude oil in April has fallen to around 300,000 barrels a day, after being in excess of 400,000 barrels during the first two months of the year.

I have a lot of statistics, but in deference to your ruling, I suppose I had better let them go. That will be all.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I shall do my utmost to remain within your decree. I notice there have been a large number of rulings today. It is with a little bit of difficulty that we have to debate the amendment to the supply motion which is now before the house. I would like to begin by reading into the record the amendment that is now before us, as moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

> This house regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy which have been characterized by:
> 1. The errors and inequities associated with the conversion loan;
> 2. The highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established;
> 3. The largest expansion of the money supply in any year since the war;
> 4. The greatest increase in peacetime in the national debt;
> 5. The highest public debt charges in Canada's history.

We in our group, Mr. Speaker, admit the complaints that the Liberal spokesman raised. We admit that there have been ill-conceived and irresponsible actions on the part of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy. It is our contention that since the days of the hungry thirties, the years 1930 to 1935, the Conservatives have learned nothing, and that all the remedies they have to offer to meet head on the problem in an attempt to reverse the trend of an ever-worsening recession in Canada are higher taxes, higher tariffs and higher interest rates. I regret very much that the Liberals did not lodge any complaint in their amendment about the lack of action. They mentioned the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the matter of debt management and monetary policies, and we agree that whatever action has been taken by the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), has been irresponsible and ill-conceived. However, we very much regret that there was no proposal offered in the amendment that might have suggested a solution to the difficulty that the amendment complains about.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman has that regret, why does he not fill that vacuum?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is a sharp enough observer in this house to realize very well indeed that our subamendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That does not preclude another.

Mr. Regier: Therefore our proposals as to a remedy may not be debated at this time. However, to get back to the Conservatives, as I indicated before, since 1935 they have learned nothing; hence the reason for the complaints at the present time.

The over-all approach which I can only assume is being taken by the Conservative government at this time is that matters will right themselves. I regret that my colleague, the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), had to file his documents with the Hansard office a little while ago and I therefore have not with me the copy of the speech rendered to the house of representatives in Washington by the Honourable Chester Bowles, where he warned in unmistakable terms that if we are going to adopt the philosophy that our problems will resolve themselves, we are headed for serious trouble indeed. I imagine that applies in the United States of America equally as well as here in Canada. The only way out of our difficulties is for the government to see the problems and to resolve upon a course of action. It is our contention that almost any plan of action would be preferable to lack of action and to a philosophy of letting sleeping dogs lie and matters will adjust themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to review the complaints that we note in the amendment. I see that the first one is a complaint that the government's policy in regard to management of debt and monetary matters has been characterized by errors and inequities associated with the conversion loan. Our complaint about the conversion loan is, first of all, that the rate of interest offered was needlessly high. As evidence we call attention to the activities on the money markets of Canada. If the rate which had been offered had been realistic at the time and in line with market conditions, government of Canada bonds would not have suddenly leaped ahead as they did, especially victory bonds.

Our next complaint on the conversion loan is that with regard to the new bonds which have been issued—I have particular reference now to the 4½ per cent, 25-year bonds—they were non-callable. We feel that action was most irresponsible. We also complain that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) appeared on a national network of radio and television and urged the people, the taxpayers of Canada, to have confidence in the bonds that were then being offered. However, what they did not inform the people of Canada was that these conversion bonds were going to be subject to the fluctuations of the money market of the country. We feel that the people of Canada have been taken for a ride.

Those honest citizens of Canada who accepted our Prime Minister and Minister of Finance at their word at that time and invested in these conversion bonds now find, through circumstances not then foreseen, that they have to market these bonds at a lower figure. I have today's copy of an Ottawa newspaper in my hand, and the financial page of that newspaper shows that anyone who now has to sell those bonds can obtain only 94 cents on the dollar. I feel the people of Canada suffered a delusion of the worst order. A man so highly respected as the Prime Minister, with the next in line in public respect the Minister of Finance—or he ought to be—appeared on television and appealed to the people of Canada to have faith and confidence in these bonds, and less than six months later, despite the lure of the cash bonus offered at the time, they now have to sell those bonds at 94 cents on the dollar.

No wonder the people of Canada are becoming very cynical indeed, and are losing confidence in the parliament of Canada. Regardless of what the Right Hon. C. D. Howe may have done to cause a decline in public confidence in the parliament of Canada, this action on the part of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance was far worse than anything which the Right Hon. C. D. Howe ever did in my time in this parliament. They assured the people of Canada that they had nothing to fear and encouraged them to buy these conversion bonds and then, six months later, they had to inform them that, regrettably and due to circumstances beyond their control, if they were obliged to sell them they could get only 94 cents on the dollar.

I should like to ask at this time—and I am glad to see the Prime Minister in his seat—who is really running this country, anyway, is it the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, or is it the moneylenders? There is a growing number of people who believe, and I would say not without reason, that this government is in hock to the moneylenders of Canada and does not know what to do about the situation and lacks the intestinal fortitude to take such action as they might take if they were really interested in the welfare of this nation.

Who does not remember the claims which the minister made at the time of the conversion? The hon. gentleman said it was necessary to clear the decks, as it were, and remove from the money market these early maturing and short term obligations of the federal government. We all know what happened. No sooner was the bond conversion campaign over than the Minister of Finance himself flooded the market once again as it had never been flooded before with short term offerings, thereby making it almost impossible for our ten provincial governments and for our municipalities to market their securities adequately. And yet the Minister of Finance assured us time after time that his bond conversion deal would make it easier for other levels of government to market their securities. He informed us at the time that the bond conversion program would be anti-inflationary. We at that time, and I admit it, agreed that it might, indeed, be anti-inflationary. However, in the light of what happened later, events now make us realize that this bond conversion deal was not anti-inflationary, and that we have had inflation with us ever since.

The Minister of Finance told us that this deal would provide a solid basis for federal operations in the future. All we need to do is look at the money market and we will realize that the hon. gentleman has failed to provide the solid basis for which he had hoped. When the Canadian public loses its faith in the integrity of government and in the financial policy conducted by members of the government, that is more dangerous to the economy than any other single factor.

This government seems to be following a policy of expediency rather than a policy of planning; it seems to be following a thoroughly Machiavellian approach; it seems to be saying: "Let us see what we can get away with now, and never worry about next year until it shows up." The investors of Canada are not fooled. They were not fooled by the Minister of Finance last year when he launched his conversion plan. They were not fooled by the budget, and all hon. members need to do to verify this contention is to look at what happened to the 1983 4½ per cent bond. I am sure that the Minister of Finance hoped that his budget would lead to the restoration of a feeling of confidence among investors and that the market would show an improvement as far as federal borrowings were concerned. All I know is that the 1983 4½ per cent offering was $94.50 and that today it is only $94 on $100.

The investors of Canada were not fooled. It is true that the brokerage houses called the conversion bond deal a tremendous success, and so it was—it was a tremendous success for the brokerage houses. But for the government of Canada and for the Canadian people it was not a tremendous success. All it means is that the Minister of Finance is now placed in such a position that he does not know where to turn. He has to market over $2,000 million of bonds this year, and he does not know where he is going to do that. Meanwhile the people of Canada are being bled by excessively high interest rates.

The interest rate about which the amendment complains is the highest rate since the Bank of Canada was established, and this at the hands of a government which won an election on its pledge to moderate the tight money policy of the former government. Week after week I asked the minister to explain the reason for the rising rates on government borrowings, and the minister continually replied to the effect that the rate on government borrowings, especially the rate on government treasury bills, was influenced and determined by rates in the United States. He also informed me on several occasions that I ought to pay some attention to what was happening on the money markets of Canada and the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the rise in rates on Dominion of Canada treasury bills, we see that they have risen to a marked extent. The figures with regard to this were filed by my colleague, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), on April 14 last and are to be found on page 2672 of Hansard. The rate rose from 3.25 per cent on January 7 to 4.42 per cent on April 8 last.

This increase of 1.17 per cent in the interest rate on the borrowings of the federal government since January 1 would mean, if it were applied to the whole of the bonded indebtedness of all governments and institutions of Canada, and added levy on the taxpayers of Canada of $379,723,500. An investor can buy federal government bonds on the market today and his yield would be in excess of 5 per cent. But if we take these rates which the Minister of Finance has produced on federal government indebtedness to reach the exceptionally high rate of 5 per cent, then the people of Canada on the bonded indebtedness of institutions, municipal corporations, provincial governments and the federal government will have to bear an annual interest levy of some $1,600 million or, on the bonded indebtedness of this government alone, $800 million a year. That is $50 per capita. Taking all the bonded indebtedness of Canada into consideration it means a levy of $100 per capita.

We complain about our huge expenditures for national defence. That is a subject about which no one in this house knows very much. We always hesitate when we attack defence expenditures lest we be branded as irresponsible. Here we have an instance of an expenditure on the part of the government that almost equals our defence expenditure. We maintain it is needlessly high and the result of most irresponsible action on the part of this government. When the government finds itself in the position of paying to the moneylenders of Canada 13 per cent of its income at a time when the government should assume complete authority over the issue of currency and credit within the nation, there is something radically wrong.

The next complaint I find in the amendment is a complaint about the expansion of the money supply that has taken place over the past year. As the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) mentioned this afternoon, we in this group do not necessarily regard the expansion of the money supply as an evil if—and I emphasize "if"—it is accompanied by adequate measures to combat inflation. There might well be a need for an expansion of the money supply but it should be accomplished without inflation occurring simultaneously.

In paragraph 4 of the amendment there is a complaint about the rise in the national debt of the country. We in this group also do not regard a rise in the debt of Canada as necessarily evil where it may be required. However, we would attach the important condition that as our obligations rise we must see a comparable rise in our ability to repay those obligations. We regret that we have observed a rise in the debt of the federal government without a corresponding rise in the productivity of the Canadian economy. We must agree, therefore, with that part of the amendment expressing regret over the rise in the debt of the nation.

The last item in the amendment complains about the charges on the debt of the country. The interest charges paid by the Minister of Finance at the present time are in excess of $600 million a year. I have not had time to examine the facts so I do not know how this corresponds, but I believe the amount paid by the minister in interest charges is considerably in excess of the amount paid annually on all old age pensions in Canada and I believe it is almost equal to the amount paid by the government annually in the form of family allowances. We feel that a considerable saving might have been made in this regard.

The cost to the Canadian people of the present policies of the government in regard to high interest rates is fantastic. It will add to the tax burden of every Canadian. The action—and more especially the lack of action—on the part of this government will cause municipal and provincial taxes to rise and will, as the minister admitted in the budget, cause an increase in federal taxes. It will mean in effect that our municipalities and provinces will be unable to take action concerning much needed services and activities of this nature will of necessity be curtailed.

One of the most shameful things that has happened in Canada took place about a month ago when the old age pensioners were blamed for tax increases. I believe that the monetary policies of this government rather than the old age pensioners are to be blamed. High interest rates result in increased costs of production and make worse the cost-price squeeze. At this time when we are particularly concerned about unemployment I regret that the actions and the lack of action on the part of this government in the field of monetary policy generally and specifically with respect to interest charges is causing a slowdown of the industrial development of Canada. When you think of automation especially you will realize the important relationship this has to the ever-increasing number of unemployed from one end of the country to the other. When industrial enterprises are faced with high carrying charges and capital costs there is a tendency to delay and postpone any planned industrial expansion that may have been contemplated and jobs that might have been provided to the unemployed do not come into existence.

We also regret the influence that the policies of the government have on the buying power of the average Canadian. This has a tremendous effect on the home market which is, after all, our most important market. When you take away from the purchasing power of the people in order to meet these high interest charges you interfere with the ability of Canadians to provide themselves with the necessities of life.

The Liberals in this house have complained that the actions of the government were wrong and we in this group agree that the little action the government has taken to meet the problems of the day has been unwise, especially in relation to monetary policy and more specifically in relation to interest charges. The government follows a policy of sitting it out, waiting it out and letting problems resolve themselves. We regret that the only action the government will see fit to take will be in the application of the outmoded Tory policies of the hungry thirties.

In the main, however, we complain about the lack of policy which we contend might be remedied by this parliament assuming control of the currency and credit of the nation. I know that the Prime Minister is a westerner. I only wish that at an early date we would have the announcement of the appointment of a new secretary of state for external affairs. While the knowledge of the Prime Minister with respect to economics may be weak I have sufficient confidence in him as a westerner to entertain some hope that he may be amenable to the advice of modern economists. I would like to see him seize the responsibility that is his and aid the people of Canada by implementing our proposal that this parliament must assume complete responsibility for the issuance of all currency, for the control of all credit and more specifically for the early establishment of a national investment board in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say I feel deeply flattered by the compliment that was paid today by the Liberal opposition in renewing to all intents and purposes the budget debate. I sat through the budget debate for eight days. I inflicted upon the house a very long speech to begin with and then last Tuesday inflicted upon the house a rather long reply to the Liberal amendment. Now they are back again today extending in effect the budget debate and I am afraid the house will have to submit to a speech from me on this third occasion.

We have in effect seen here an extension of the budget debate today, Mr. Speaker, because while I will not renew the argument that was addressed to you on the subject of whether the amendment was in order I will point out that everything that has been said today has touched on something that was said at one time or another during the budget debate, and something that relates to matters that the house must concern itself with in any budget debate. Indeed, the speeches have abounded with references, direct or indirect, to the budget and to things that were said in the course of the budget debate.

As I have on other occasions, Mr. Speaker, I express regret at the utter absence on the part of the official opposition of anything constructive in their approach to the matters they discussed today. They have not put forward one single constructive idea in this debate. There have been plenty, of course, that were destructive. They were under no inhibitions or restraints or restrictions in the things they had to say that pilloried the credit of Canada. Apparently the responsibility which they bear as members of parliament in discussing matters that mean a great deal to the welfare of Canada is something that is of small concern to them. I will say this for the C.C.F., that at least they tried to put forward some ideas. However mistaken, however misjudged, however wrong those ideas were, they at least tried to put forward their ideas, but from the official opposition we have yet to hear one single inkling of how they would approach these problems.

They have talked about the problems, as was the case in the debate that ended last week. They have magnified and exaggerated the problems out of all recognition, but never once did they allow to escape from their lips a single constructive utterance or inkling or suggestion of how they would approach these problems. We will look in vain to that quarter for any suggestion as to how these problems should be met.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. I submit to Your Honour that there is a rule of the house against tedious repetition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, no member of the house should know that rule better than the hon. gentleman because no one breaks it more than he does.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not tedious.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So, Mr. Speaker, I dismiss this latest interruption from the talkative member by quoting the words of scripture, "Physician, heal thyself".

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman would not say my speeches were tedious.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I said they were only tedious I would be more than generous and polite to him. So, Mr. Speaker, I say in review that this kind of performance on the part of the official opposition is not a responsible performance in this house. When they can, by their tactics of exaggeration, make any problem that Canada faces today look grim, how happy they are. Indeed, they are not happy until they exaggerate these problems beyond recognition.

There is nothing that has been said today thus far that is going to help Canada's credit. There is not one thing that has been said by a member of the opposition in this debate that is going to help Canada meet her financial problems on better terms or to improve in any respect Canada's position. Such is the test of the performance by hon. members opposite.

It is regrettable that, whether by calculated design or accident or their failure to grasp the problem, they have a confused approach to these questions. I do not pretend for one minute that I shall be able to assist them out of their confusion but in my remarks in the course of this debate I shall try as best I can to set the record straight and remove some of the error and confusion and clouding of issues that have been caused by hon. members of the opposition opposite.

It is no secret that a government must have money. Governments have no secret source of money. They must turn to the people for it. There is no magic source available to governments. What are the sources open to governments that need cash? They can raise it by taxation, they can raise it by borrowing or they can, if they were so disposed, create money by turning loose the printing presses.

I do not need to say to the house that the government has no intention whatever now or any other time, I take it, of debauching the currency of the country by resorting to the printing press. Such things have been advocated in the house in past years, but it is no part of our approach to financial problems to resort to that kind of destructive expedient. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with the necessity of finding money for the necessary purposes of government, either by taxation or by borrowing.

The borrowings of the government of Canada take several forms. First of all, there are treasury bills which are issued each week. The government invites tenders each week for a stipulated amount of money and, according to our current practice, these treasury bills expire in 91 days. In the United States they have treasury bills of various maturities. Our practice in this country in recent years has been to issue treasury bills for the uniform period of 91 days. We also issue bonds and, without trying to draw exact lines, bonds are classified in the market according to those of short duration, medium and long, and, of course, the approach to each of these classes of maturities is governed by the return involved. Very often we find a measurable difference in return in these various classes of maturities. The market at any one time may favour one class of government obligation as against another or others and from time to time there will be a shift in the public reception of the different classes of offerings.

I think I should begin this reply, Mr. Speaker, by a reference to what actually has occurred in the money market of Canada. We have had a money market in this country now for approximately the last four years. Money markets are not greatly different from commodity markets in this respect, that they are governed, not entirely but very largely, by the law of supply and demand. Obviously if the demand is large in relation to supply the return on borrowings must be larger because the earning power of money is greater. Alternatively, when the supply is large in relation to demand, the earning power of money will be reduced and borrowing can then be had at lower rates of interest. Interest is simply a means we have of measuring the value of money as a return on the use of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us put some facts straight at the outset. We are told here in this house that the rates that the government of Canada must pay on borrowings have been rising and, indeed, have reached record proportions. It is one thing to talk about treasury bills, and it is another thing to talk in generalities. Hon. members opposite today, when they have launched out on the subject of treasury bill rates, have either confused themselves or by typical sophistry jumped into an area of generalities from that point concerning interest rates in general. We should put some facts straight. It is true that last Thursday the Bank of Canada rate reached a record 4.97 per cent. This is somewhat larger than the rate was about 20 months ago.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in the year 1957, before we came into office, interest rates were moving up. Indeed, from 1955 forward interest rates in general were moving upwards. This is not a phenomenon that has suddenly emerged since June 21, 1957, and attempts by speakers to leave that impression of course are not only nonsensical but they are contrary to fact. Effective interest rates began to rise in this country measurably in 1955; they were rising steadily in the early part of 1957. It was only after the new government had been in office about two months that the change came about and interest rates then began to recede. Interest rates, from that point on, dropped steadily. I am speaking now particularly of the treasury bill rate and the Bank of Canada rate associated with it. These rates dropped steadily until the spring of 1958, and then in 1958 the treasury bill rate began to rise again.

While there were fluctuations up and down, the interest rate today on treasury bills is higher than it has been in these past times. It is not a great deal higher than it was in the summer of 1957, but it is admittedly higher. Let us look at some of these figures, Mr. Speaker. On the three-month treasury bills, the rate in the summer of 1957, August, was 4.08; at the end of 1957, the rate had dropped to 3.60.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the minister would permit a question on that figure? I have the Bank of Canada statistical summary before me, and the rates seem to be a little different. I wonder if he would give me the statistical authority? I am not questioning his figure, but I should like to have the same one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member should be aware of the fact that the treasury bill rate as reported on page 111 of the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada for March, 1959 selects the weekly rate for the last week of the month. Now the weekly rate for the last week of the month of August, which was August 28 of that year, was 4.03 per cent, but the rate during that month reached 4.08 per cent.

By December 31, 1957, the rate as I have indicated had dropped to 3.60 per cent; by April 21, 1958 it had dropped to 1.37 and it reached its low in July, 1958, when the rate dropped to .87 per cent, the lowest for years, a rate of less than 1 per cent. Then, as I have indicated, a rise began in the late summer of 1958, and the rate has moved up gradually, just as it did in the United States. We have a rate on November 19, 1958 of 3 per cent; December 31, 1958, 3.49 per cent; and on April 24, 1959, 4.72 per cent. This is the treasury bill rate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite have chosen, without any more factual basis than that, to picture this country as going to the bow-wows, as though we were heading straight for a crisis. Let us see this matter in its true proportions. No minister of finance, no government enjoys paying any more for the money it has to borrow than it must pay. Believe me, there is no pleasure in paying high interest rates. The fact is that these are weekly offerings. The treasury bill rate is the most volatile rate amongst all government obligations, and the fluctuations in the rate can at least be understood in relation to this fact, which has some comfort in it, that these rates exist for only three months. When reductions occur, the reductions in rate are quickly felt and the government is in a position to take immediate advantage of them because they are weekly offerings.

What are some of the other movements in interest rates? We have been told here today that the country is going to perdition because the chartered bank prime rate has risen, as of today, to 5¾ per cent. Mr. Speaker, again let us, while not taking any satisfaction out of the fact that this rate has gone up, see this in its true relationship. This rate has gone back to what it was in the summer of 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: What did you say about it then?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had this to say, that we inherited a situation from our predecessors, who were very generous in bequeathing problems to us that they did not have either the courage or competence to handle.

Mr. Pickersgill: More tedious repetition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You would think from their talking today that a rise in interest rates had never occurred before. Let us look at what happened in the regime of these gentlemen who are so boastful today. Let us just go back to 1945. These figures that I give now are the prime interest rate charged by the chartered banks of Canada.

From 1945 to April 23, 1956 the rate was 4½ per cent. On April 23, 1956 it was moved up to 5 per cent. On August 20, 1956 it was moved up to 5¼ per cent. On October 22, 1956 it was moved up to 5½ per cent. On August 26, 1957 it was moved up to 5¾ per cent. On December 2, 1957 it went down to 5½ per cent. On February 17, 1958 it went down to 5¼ per cent. On March 8, 1959 it went up to 5½ per cent. On April 27 it went up to 5¾ per cent.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, seen in the light of these figures, while we may not like it—and I do not suppose any of us do like to see this present rise in interest rates—the fact is that it is a rise that brings us back to the figure that was reached over 20 months ago, and that following that, through the late part of 1957 and the first half of 1958, the rate went down. This is a rate that has fluctuated frequently according to conditions.

We are told it is deplorable that the Bank of Canada rate should have risen. The Bank of Canada sometime ago chose to set its rate in terms of a formula attached to the treasury bill rate. This was not always the case. For years the Bank of Canada set a rate. That rate stood at 2 per cent from October, 1950 to February 14, 1955. It was then reduced to 1½ per cent. It was raised to 2 per cent on August 5, 1955; to 2¼ per cent on October 12, 1955; to 2¾ per cent on November 18, 1955; to 3 per cent on April 4, 1956; to 3¼ per cent on August 9, 1956; and to 3½ per cent on October 17, 1956.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will you note that in the days when hon. members opposite were in power the rate set by the Bank of Canada advanced from 1½ per cent in February, 1955 to 3½ per cent in October, 1956. In other words, the treasury bill rate rose by 2 per cent within a space of some 20 months. It advanced from 1½ per cent to 3½ per cent, a rise, if you want to measure it in percentage terms, of 133 per cent in terms of the rate prevailing in February, 1955. That was the extent of the rise in the treasury bill rate before we came into office while the rate was still set by the Bank of Canada without reference to the treasury bill rates.

Then, the Bank of Canada, on November 1, 1956 set its rates in terms of a formula attached to the treasury bill rate. In other words, from that point on the Bank of Canada did not attempt to set on its own account the rate on its loans. It simply accepted week by week the treasury bill rate and added a quarter of 1 per cent to it. That was the decision of the Bank of Canada. Whether the government of that day or the minister of finance of that day expressed any opinion on that subject outside the house, we do not know. We do know that he was chary about expressing any opinion on the subject in the house. The Bank of Canada did give its reasons for establishing its rate at that time in terms of this formula. Let us bear in mind that the government of Canada does not establish the Bank of Canada rate.

There are matters within the subject of the amendment that fall within the responsibility of government; there are things that fall within the responsibility of the Bank of Canada. The government is responsible for fiscal policy. The Bank of Canada, by an act of the parliament of Canada, is responsible for monetary policy, and this bank rate, as it is called, is set each week by the Bank of Canada in the exercise of its statutory powers.

I should like to place on Hansard simply for the information of the house, without either attacking or defending it, the reasons given by the Bank of Canada for attaching the bank rate to the treasury bill rate. I am reading now, from the press release issued by the Bank of Canada on November 1, 1956:

> The Bank of Canada announced today that it was carrying a step further the policy announced in February 1955 of making its bank rate more flexible and responsive to changing conditions in the short-term money market. Henceforth and until further notice the bank rate, which is the minimum rate at which the central bank is prepared as a lender of last resort to make very short term loans to chartered banks and money market dealers will be at a fixed margin of one-quarter of one per cent above the latest weekly average tender rate for 91-day treasury bills. The average tender rates on treasury bills today was 3.34 per cent, a decline of .03 per cent as compared with a week ago. Accordingly the bank rate until next Thursday will be 3.59 per cent.
> As indicated on several occasions by the bank, the bank rate is not changed arbitrarily or with a view to bringing about other interest rate changes. On the contrary, it has been desired since the development of the money market in Canada in late 1954 and early 1955 that the bank rate should be kept in line with other interest rates and should move when they do, but usually not otherwise. The present technical change in the method of setting the bank rate from week to week is intended to clarify this relationship and remove what has evidently been a source of some public misunderstanding.

Interest rates are determined in the market by the interplay between the supply of and the demand for loanable funds. Transactions take place every day in considerable volume; yields on marketable securities may change by small amounts from day to day, according to changes in the views of holders and of prospective buyers of various categories of securities as to the prices at which they are prepared to sell or buy. In general, interest rates have been rising for nearly two years because of a great growth in demand to borrow money, or to raise money by selling securities. The supply of money has increased, but the demand for it has grown even faster.

The bank rate has been increased from time to time in Canada as in other countries in line with this movement in market rates of interest. It would be clearly undesirable that banks and dealers should be able to borrow from the central bank at a lower cost than the yield on the most liquid form of government securities. Such an encouragement to borrowing from the central bank would be apt to induce an inflationary increase in the volume of money.

Changes in bank rate in the past two years have taken place in steps of one-quarter per cent or one-half per cent. One result of having the bank rate change by smaller amounts each week in closer touch with other short-term interest rates is that it will direct public attention more to the basic factors in the monetary situation, that is, changes in the supply of and demand for money.

Then, further down:

If at any time it appears that the treasury bill rate is not the best indicator of market conditions or if it is found that a different margin between market rates and bank rate would be more suitable, or that a change in monetary conditions should be more strikingly signalized, a change in the practice will be made and announced. For the time being, however, it is proposed, as indicated, to keep the bank rate at a fixed margin of one-quarter of one per cent above the average rate at the most recent weekly tender for government of Canada treasury bills, the rate which is made public at approximately 1 p.m. each Thursday immediately following the tender.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the minister whether he approves of this technique followed by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, whether I approve or not matters not at all, because this is a rate which is set by the Bank of Canada under the power conferred upon it by parliament.

I draw attention to two facts in this statement. The first is that the bank has stated that if at any time it is satisfied that the treasury bill rate is not the best indicator of market conditions, or if it is found that a different margin between market rates and bank rate would be more suitable, or that a change in monetary conditions should be more strikingly signalized, they can and will make a change in the basis of establishing the bank rate and will announce the changes. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that they have not made any change since this basis of establishing the bank rate was first adopted on November 1, 1956, and as far as I know the bank does not contemplate any departure from that formula.

The other factor to which I draw attention in this press release of November 1, 1956 by the Bank of Canada is this. They are drawing attention to the reason why in their view the bank rate must always be above the rate charged by the most liquid of government securities, which of course is to all intents and purposes the treasury bill. They are saying in effect that if the bank rate were ever established at a rate lower than the treasury bill rate, immediately it would become profitable for the chartered banks to borrow from the Bank of Canada at that lower rate and then purchase treasury bills at the higher rate, and in that way gain an easy profit. That is a clear and understandable reason for establishing the bank rate in terms higher than the rate on the treasury bills.

This subject has been developed further. In order that this matter may be clearly understood, I would like to give to the house some extracts from the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada for the year 1956. I begin first of all at page 45. Here the report speaks of the bank rate:

Since the Bank of Canada acts in the role of lender of last resort, its lending rates should not be as low as the interest rate on the most liquid form of security in the market, namely treasury bills. If the treasury bill rate were to rise above the bank rate for any length of time, so that the cost of borrowing from the bank was less than the return on treasury bills, there would be an incentive to rely on Bank of Canada advances rather than to use the money market. Prior to November 1, 1956 the bank had followed the practice of keeping its lending rate above the treasury bill rate by raising the bank rate at intervals of some months whenever the treasury bill rate approached or temporarily exceeded the previous level of the bank rate. In 1956 the bank rate was increased from 2¾ per cent to 3 per cent on April 4, to 3¼ per cent on August 9 and to 3½ per cent on October 17. This procedure gave rise to some misunderstanding; in some quarters it was apparently thought that the central bank was setting or fixing or controlling interest rates of all kinds by its action in changing and publishing its own minimum lending rate. (The actual influence of the central bank on interest rates is discussed in a subsequent section.)

The simplest method of ensuring that the bank rate will always be higher than the treasury bill rate is to keep it at some specified and published margin above the treasury bill rate, whatever the latter may be. This method was adopted on November 1 when the bank announced that it would thereafter until further notice adjust its lending rate once a week in order to maintain it at a level of ¼ of one per cent above the average rate on treasury bills at the most recent tender or auction of treasury bills. At the close of the year the bank rate was 3.92 per cent.

Another reason for adopting the new method of determining the bank rate was that weekly changes in the treasury bill rate are relatively small in either direction and the fact that such changes occur weekly has become well understood. On the other hand, unexpected, unpredictable, infrequent and relatively large changes in the bank's lending rate under the previous system were known to have a disturbing effect on business in general and on all persons who might be contemplating the making of investments or entering into business arrangements involving credit and rates of interest. No difficulties of this sort have been reported since the adoption of the new system.

If, with changing circumstances, the new system of determining the bank rate were to be found to be undesirable for any reason, the bank could, of course, again change the basis on which it sets its rate.

Then, I turn to another subject dealt with in this report of the governor for the year 1956. At page 48 the governor deals with the subject of "the Bank of Canada and interest rates", as follows:

Basically, interest rates are determined by the strength of demand for borrowed funds and the availability of the funds from willing lenders. The influence of the central bank (as described below) does not arise from changes in the bank rate which, as already indicated, tend to follow market changes, but rather from the operations which the bank undertakes in order to affect the money supply and from the effect of the resulting changes in the supply of money.

The central bank, like other institutions operating in the capital market, buys and sells government securities and bids from treasury bills at the weekly tender. These and other day-to-day operations of the bank, including its lending to banks and money market dealers, have an influence on the level of interest rates, generally in the direction of resisting rather than inducing or adding to movements of interest rates. In other words the bank will normally be buying government securities on a declining market and selling on a rising market.

In its day-to-day operations the bank generally offers some resistance to changes in interest rates (in either direction) in the interests of maintaining orderly conditions in financial markets. However the bank has always made it quite clear that the establishment or maintenance of any particular level of interest rates is not an objective of central bank policy. Its basic objective, as laid down by statute, is to manage the supply of money, that is, the total amount of currency and bank deposits, with a view to contributing both to economic growth and to general stability of prices.

The management of the supply of money is a complex matter, mainly because there are no firm relationships between the level of total expenditures in the economy, or even the total use of credit, and the total supply of money. There are several reasons for the absence of such relationships. Of the total amount of bank deposits, part is held by the owners for actual working balances and part is held by the owners as a form of liquid reserve. This is true in the case of both savings deposits and demand deposits. However, the proportions of the total held for each of these purposes may vary considerably from one period to another. The amount of total bank deposits which is actually used for making current payments may rise even though there is no growth in total bank deposits. Moreover, bank deposits are only one of a variety of financial planes in which the public can hold its funds—there are also treasury bills, other short-term notes, stocks, bonds and mortgages, many of which are quite liquid—and in some periods the proportion of the total held in the form of bank deposits may be considerably different from that in other periods. Similarly, the chartered banks are but one of a number of sources of credit, and the public may be able to obtain a much larger proportion of its total requirements of borrowed funds from non-bank sources in some periods than in others. One way of describing the situation is to say that there are variations in the rate of use of the supply of money or in the "velocity of circulation" of money.

The central bank has no direct influence on such changes but it must take them into account in managing the total supply of money. The effect of many of these changes cannot be measured statistically, and this means that the monetary management cannot be conducted on the basis of any formula. While it can be said that in general an increase in the supply of money operates in the direction of easing the availability of credit and that a decrease operates in the opposite direction, the actual size of the changes which take place must be kept continually under review in the light of the performance of the economy.

In some periods, such as 1954, when the rate of increase in the aggregate demand for goods and services tends to lag behind the rate of increase in Canada's productive capacity, the objective of encouraging the continuation of growth, as well as general stability of prices, requires that the supply of money be plentiful so as to encourage the growth of demand. In such periods the competition for borrowed funds is less keen and interest rates tend to fall. In other periods, such as 1956, the rate of increase in the demand for goods and services may exceed the rate of increase in output, and in order to discourage the development of inflationary pressures at a time when productive capacity is being fully utilized the objective of monetary policy is then to moderate the rate of growth in the money supply. In these circumstances the competition for the supply of loanable funds is keen and interest rates tend to rise.

A policy of maintaining any particular level of interest rates, or of preventing anything more than minor movements, regardless of economic and financial conditions, would require the abandonment of the bank's main objectives. In periods when the demand for funds was growing rapidly it would have to increase the supply of money to whatever extent was necessary to prevent a rise in interest rates. Prices would be bound to rise under such conditions and the demand for money would go on increasing. Such a policy would require the bank to expand the money supply at an accelerating rate, thus adding greatly to inflationary forces.

I pass over the balance of that section and come just to the final paragraph under that heading "The Bank of Canada and Interest Rates".

The Bank of Canada from time to time buys or sells government securities, or varies its holdings at time of maturities and new issues. This may be done for reasons of adjusting the money supply, or in the interests of maintaining orderly conditions in the securities market. For the latter purpose the bank acts as a stabilizing influence, to a degree, by buying at times of selling pressure in the market, and selling at times of buying pressure in the market, on such a scale as to minimize short-run, day-to-day fluctuations but not so as to prevent longer-run tendencies based on real changes in supply and demand. On balance, the bank has been a buyer of government securities throughout the period of falling bond prices, that is, of rising interest rates.

I have read that extract with a view to placing before the house the bank's statement containing its view as to its function in relation to the movement of the interest rate and the supply of money. There has undoubtedly been a good deal of misunderstanding on the subject of the operations of the bank in this particular field, and I have read this statement at some length, because it is as far as I know the clearest and most comprehensive statement which the Bank of Canada has issued at any time as to the function which the bank performs in connection with interest rates and their fluctuations.

I spoke of the interaction in the money market which we have had in Canada since the end of 1954 of the forces of supply and demand. The demand for money is, of course, measured by the total effective borrowing from all sections of the country—borrowings, made by the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments, business and persons—the whole gamut of borrowings in a free economy.

What are the factors which govern the supply of money? The two elements in money supply are currency in circulation and bank deposits. The bank deposits represent, of course, the total sum of money placed on deposit at any particular time with the chartered banks. The other element of money supply is currency in circulation, and the volume of currency in circulation in Canada is determined by the Bank of Canada and by the Bank of Canada alone. This is something strictly within the sphere of monetary action and this power, by the Bank of Canada Act, has been vested in the Bank of Canada. I wish to make it quite clear that the government, as such, does not exercise control over the money supply or over the amount of money in circulation.

The powers and responsibilities of the bank have been clearly defined. The Bank of Canada Act defines them in three sections to which I should like to make reference. In section 18, subsection (3), the act provides:

> The bank shall at all times make public the minimum rate at which it is prepared to make loans or advances.

That is the provision under which the bank derives its power and authority to establish the bank rate. The Bank of Canada rate is simply the minimum rate at which the Bank of Canada is prepared, as a lender of last resort, to make loans or advances.

Section 21 (1) of the act provides that the bank shall have the sole right to issue notes payable to bearer on demand and intended for circulation in Canada, and that such notes shall be the first charge upon the assets of the bank. From this provision the Bank of Canada derives its exclusive power to issue notes and in that way to determine the volume of currency in circulation.

There have been questions as to the relationship between the Bank of Canada and the government. Section 20 (1) of the act provides as follows:

> (1) The bank shall act as fiscal agent of the government of Canada without charge and, subject to the provisions of this act, by agreement, may also act as banker or fiscal agent of the government of any province.

There you have the provision under which the Bank of Canada operates as the fiscal agent of the government. And in subsection 2 there is the provision:

> The bank, if and when required by the minister so to do, shall act as agent for the government of Canada in the payment of interest and principal and generally in respect of the management of the public debt of Canada.

In that respect it is clear that the function of the bank is that of agent, and that the government holds the responsibility before parliament and within the powers given to it by parliament in relation to the management of the public debt of Canada. The bank acts as the government's agent in this regard.

Perhaps I have sufficiently sketched the provisions under which the Bank of Canada operates and the respective functions of the bank and of the government in the fiscal field, in the management of the public debt and in the field of monetary action. And then there is, of course, the field where their reponsibilities are mingled and they act in association.

I have made these remarks at more length than I would have wished with a view to clarifying, if I may, the question of responsibility in this situation, because this amendment that has been moved today seeks to place upon the government the whole responsibility for the interest rates that exist in the market at the present time.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, we see an attempt in this amendment to say that because of the actions taken by the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy certain things have happened. Hon. members opposite are quite entitled to hold the government responsible for debt management with respect to that period during which the government has been in office, but I would point out that in the matter of monetary policy this parliament has placed the responsibility and indeed the power in the hands of the Bank of Canada.

The government does not exercise any sway in the field of monetary policy. The right to issue currency is vested exclusively in the Bank of Canada. Notwithstanding this fact, this misguided amendment seeks to hold the government responsible for all that has happened in the field of monetary action.

On the face of it this amendment is obviously quite misdirected. It was framed by someone who has not read the statutes enacted by this parliament. I shall have something to say in detail about the five elements that are set forth in the amendment, but I draw your attention, sir, to the fact that these are put forward in the amendment as illustrations of the results of government action in the field of debt management and monetary policy. If these five illustrations have no more validity than the general statement which precedes them then they will need a great deal to buttress them because they are founded upon a statement that is utterly at variance with the law enacted by this parliament.

I have said that this government will meet its responsibility in relation to the public debt of Canada. That is our responsibility and we shall face that responsibility. We are not, however, to be held responsible in a field where parliament has vested the determination of the Bank of Canada rate, under section 18 of the act, and the issuance of currency, under section 21 of the act, in the Bank of Canada.

Let us now look a little closer at these five illustrations. The first refers to the conversion loan. I shall have something to say about that, but perhaps I should leave those remarks until tomorrow because of the length of time that was spent on this subject today by several hon. members opposite.

The second paragraph of the amendment makes reference to the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established. I point out to you that the government of Canada has no responsibility whatever for the establishment of the Bank of Canada rate. In pursuance of powers conferred upon it and responsibilities vested in it by the parliament of Canada the Bank of Canada has established the bank rate.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may be permitted to ask a question at this point. Since the bank rate is fixed in the way in which the minister has described by its relationship to the bids on treasury bills, would the minister deny that government policies have some effect on the amounts being bid for treasury bills?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if this amendment had spoken of the treasury bill rate it would have spoken about something that lies within the area of government action, but this misdirected amendment which as I have said was obviously drawn by someone who had not read the statute law enacted by this parliament does not speak of the treasury bill rate; it talks instead about the Bank of Canada rate...

Mr. Pickersgill: Which is established by the treasury bill rate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton):...which is something over which this government has no control. The Bank of Canada has chosen to set this Bank of Canada rate by a formula based upon the treasury bill rate. If this amendment had talked about the treasury bill rate it would in my submission have been clear on this point and would have been dealing with something which is within the proper sphere of government action.

Mr. Pickersgill: "Plus cela change, plus c'est la même chose."

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The realm of action of the Bank of Canada in relation to treasury bill rates, as was made clear in the statement I read from the governor's report of 1956, consists of the purchase or sale of treasury bills. I wish to register that fact now and having made that comment may I call it ten o'clock and move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COMMITTEES OF INQUIRY, INDIAN ACT

Question No. 354—Mr. Howard:

1. Have any committees of inquiry been appointed since 1951, pursuant to section 112 of the Indian Act?

2. If so, what were the names and addresses of the members so appointed, and what reports, if any, were made?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes.

2. On March 6, 1956, a committee comprising His Honour Chief Judge N. V. Buchanan, Edmonton, Alberta; John Rodgers, Michel Indian reserve, Alberta; and L. L. Brown, Ottawa, was appointed to inquire into an application for enfranchisement made by the Michel band of Indians of the province of Alberta. The committee's report, dated January 11, 1957, recommending enfranchisement for the band, was approved and the Michel band was enfranchised by order in council P.C. No. 1958-375 dated March 18, 1958.

On March 7, 1956, a committee comprising Hon. Mr. Justice J. O. Wilson, Vancouver, B.C.; Edwin Ryan, Metlakatla, B.C.; and L. L. Brown, Ottawa, was appointed to inquire into an application for enfranchisement made by the Metlakatla band of Indians of the province of British Columbia. The committee's report, dated July 23, 1956, recommended against the enfranchisement of the band and in consequence the application from the Metlakatla band was not approved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOOD FOR PEACE CONFERENCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on April 17 I made a statement about the forthcoming food for peace conference and stated that a little later I would place before the house the composition of the Canadian delegation.

This ministerial meeting will take place in Washington on the 4th and 5th of May and the Canadian government will be represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. The delegation will also include Mr. McNamara, chief commissioner of the wheat board, and government officials from the departments of trade and commerce, finance, agriculture and external affairs, as well as from the Canadian embassy in Washington.

The chairman of the Canadian delegation to the meeting of officials which is now taking place in Washington is Mr. G. R. Paterson, chief of the agricultural and fisheries branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who will be assisted by officials of the departments concerned, the wheat board and the Canadian embassy in Washington.

GERMANY—STATEMENT ON CANADA'S POSITION RESPECTING NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on April 22 I gave the house an account of the stage that had been reached in the preparations by the four western powers for the negotiations with the Soviet union which are to commence in Geneva on May 11. I mentioned on that occasion that a committee of experts from the United States, the United Kingdom, France and West Germany was engaged in compiling draft proposals for the western side. That work has been completed.

Yesterday in the United Kingdom House of Commons the foreign secretary, Mr. Lloyd, gave an account of the hopes and expectations for the Geneva meeting. It is apparent from a reading of his speech that as yet it has not been found possible to go into detail about the exact negotiating position of the western countries. However, Mr. Lloyd was able to say enough to show that the United Kingdom, in its thinking on the problems to be examined in Geneva, is following much the same viewpoint as that expressed on behalf of the Canadian government. We have been aware of the similarity of our views as a result of discussions with the United Kingdom Prime Minister and Mr. Lloyd when they were in Ottawa recently.

Specifically, the Canadian government is associated in public, as it has already been in private, with the United Kingdom belief in the need for real negotiations, and we give complete support to the three major aims which Mr. Lloyd set forth. The western powers should try to achieve some progress first toward the reunification of Germany on acceptable terms. Canada reaffirms the right of the people of West Berlin to choose their own system of society along with satisfactory arrangements for free access to that city. As well, there should be a reduction in tension and an improvement of stability in Europe.

These three aims represent in general the viewpoint expressed by Mr. Lloyd. There are formidable difficulties in the way of achieving them. It may turn out that the foreign ministers' conference at Geneva and the summit meeting which it is expected will follow may be but the beginning of a series of consultations with the Soviet union on these vital problems. That in itself would be an advance. As the western foreign ministers are about to begin the final preparations I think the house would want me to assure them that they have the full understanding of this house and of the Canadian people in the task that faces them.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT FOLLOWING DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Would the minister tell the house whether he saw the premier of Nova Scotia yesterday, and whether he has anything to say about the long term coal policy of the government?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Laurier for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The best I can do, I think, under the circumstances is to read the press release issued yesterday afternoon after the conference:

A conference was held today between representatives of the government of the province of Nova Scotia and that of Canada to consider the scope of the study into the long term problems of the coal industry, which was promised by the Prime Minister when he announced the subvention program for the current year.

Representing the province of Nova Scotia were Premier Robert L. Stanfield and Hon. E. A. Manson, minister of mines, who met with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Minister of National Revenue and Mr. Wilbur Uren, chairman of the dominion coal board.

The conference considered the industrial as well as the mining problems of the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia. There was agreement as to the importance of the coal industry, and the urgency of conducting such a study in order that a solution could be reached of the problems which have confronted this industry for such a long period of time. It was agreed that the improvisation and uncertainty which has dogged the lives of those associated with the industry should be removed in so far as possible.

There was also a full expression of views between the parties concerned and the ministers will report to their respective governments where the matter will be further considered by their colleagues.

It was emphasized by spokesmen in the group that this was simply a preliminary meeting to be followed by further consultations in the near future.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, sir. Has any consideration been given to those who will be undertaking this study?

Mr. Comtois: We will consider the matter, Mr. Speaker, and as soon as we reach a decision the house will be informed.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I would like to ask a supplementary question. Have there been any discussions between members or officials of the government of British Columbia and members of the federal government with respect to the difficulties of the coal mining industry in that province?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

DRIED POLLOCK—REPORTED CEILING PRICE SET BY JAMAICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which I sent to his office at 11.45 this forenoon. In view of recent action by the government of Jamaica in placing a low ceiling of 13½ cents at the retail level on dry pollock, and this at a time when Canadian exporters have over 4 million pounds of this commodity on hand, what action, if any, is being taken by the government to protect this market for our Canadian producers?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, notice of the question of the hon. member was duly received at 11.45 a.m. The answer had already been prepared, because a week ago we were aware of this situation. On April 21 we were advised of the Jamaican government's intention to place a retail price ceiling of one shilling per pound on dry salted pollock. Immediately on receipt of this information our trade commissioner in Jamaica was instructed to make strong representations to the Jamaican authorities. The trade commissioner has now advised us that effective April 27 the retail price ceiling on dry salt pollock has been removed.

It is my understanding that the Jamaican minister of trade and industry will be meeting tomorrow with fish importers in Jamaica to work out new conditions covering the importation of salt fish. I can assure the house that the strongest representations will be made by our trade commissioner in Jamaica to ensure that Canadian exporters continue to enjoy favourable terms of access to this important and traditional market. It would be unfortunate if discriminatory action were taken by the Jamaican authorities which would lead in any way to a deterioration in the close and friendly relations between Canada and Jamaica.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DESTRUCTION OF ARROW AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether all Avro Arrows other than the first five have been destroyed?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The disposal of the Avro Arrow is, as I stated in the house last week, a matter which comes under the direction of the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Hellyer: May I direct the same question to the Minister of Defence Production?

Some hon. Members: He is not here.

Mr. Hellyer: I know, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Defence does not wish to mislead the house and the country, and I am sure he is aware—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister aware that No. 6, the first mark II Arrow, has not yet been destroyed?

Mr. Pearkes: As I stated, the disposal of the Avro Arrow is under the direction of the Minister of Defence Production, and I have no knowledge whether No. 6 has or has not been destroyed.

Mr. Hellyer: May I direct my question to the Acting Minister of Defence Production. Or, if he is absent, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that No. 6 is still in existence, will the minister order that it be not destroyed but that it be completed and then test flown in order to win the world's air speed record for this country?

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister will intervene and save the No. 6 mark II Arrow in order that it may be completed and test flown?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will naturally take under consideration any suggestions that come from the hon. gentleman, and give them the weight they deserve.

Mr. Hellyer: This one will have to be given rather urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister inquired of the United States air force about the possibility of the first five or six Arrows being used as flying test beds?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication from officials of the government of the United States regarding the employment of the Avro Arrow for test purposes.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the department taken any initiative in this respect? I understand that some doubt exists as to what should be done with these aircraft.

Mr. Pearkes: The government has taken the initiative in trying to find some useful purpose for the Avro Arrows that have been completed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have two questions for the Minister of Labour, notice of which has been given him.

In view of the fact that the Dominion Steel and Coal Company have announced that they will be closing down No. 6 mine at Bell Island on May 1, thereby placing 575 miners out of work, would the minister tell the house what steps have been taken to meet this situation?

Further, is the minister prepared to say whether consideration will be given to declaring Bell Island a labour surplus area, thereby making it possible for financial assistance to be given to those miners to secure work elsewhere?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. My department has been very active in attempting to ease the situation of those affected by this lay-off. Our officials from both Moncton and St. John's, Newfoundland, have visited Bell Island, and the process of registering and interviewing the men is now under way. I may say that we have had indications from at least two mining companies in Ontario that they require over 200 men for jobs which would be available to those miners who are able to take them.

In answer to the second question I may say that this area has been declared a labour surplus area, and that movement expenses will be paid.

INDUSTRY

STATEMENT ON REPORTED C.N.R. CAMPAIGN TO ATTRACT U.S. CORPORATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked a question regarding the reported campaign by the Canadian National Railways to attract United States industry to Canada.

The management of the railways advise me that for many years its industrial development branch has offered a specialized service to industry designed to assist plant location and expansion. This program is mainly directed to Canadian industry. As part of its endeavours to make Canada and the Canadian National Railways economically attractive to industry, there is currently a direct mail campaign being aimed at a carefully chosen list of senior executives of United States firms, with a view to interesting them in building plants in Canada and also informing them of the industrial location services provided by the railway. This is not a new venture but merely a different approach, as direct mail was considered to be more economic and effective.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question I wonder if I might ask how the minister reconciles this wooing of United States industry by the Canadian National Railways with the stated policy of his party that there is already too much United States domination of Canadian industry?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows very well this party has never been against United States industry coming to Canada and employing Canadians, providing jobs for Canadians and making it possible for the standard of living of Canadians to be enhanced through increased employment of that kind.

A. V. ROE COMPANY

REPORTED LOSS OF SKILLED WORKERS TO U. S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, notice of which went to him just before 2.30. My question arises out of a report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that 1,000 former Avro workers have applied for United States visas, indicating that these highly skilled personnel may be lost to Canada. Can the minister now say whether steps are presently being taken by his department to the end that jobs may be found at an early date for the remaining unemployed persons in this industry, thereby retaining for Canada their highly developed skills?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out when these lay-offs took place, all the facilities of the national employment service offices were being utilized in this effort, and they are still being utilized to the fullest extent. It is difficult to say how soon all these men will be placed, but we are doing everything we possibly can to this end.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether prospective employers are still reluctant to hire Avro workers on the basis that these workers may soon be recalled to the industry, or whether that situation has been overcome?

Mr. Starr: I have not had a recent report on that aspect of the question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON ALLEGED STRIFE AND INTRIGUE IN SELECTION OF PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on March 13 and again on April 21 the hon. member for Skeena asked whether my attention had been drawn to a newspaper article to the effect that strife and intrigue is being created in the selection of federal government employees through the actions of officials in various departments, and whether I could make any comment on that report.

The only comment I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that no complaint of this character has ever been made to me by the professional institute of the public service of Canada, the civil service employees' associations or the civil service commission, which latter body is responsible for the maintenance of the merit system in the civil service of Canada.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REPORTED FEDERAL REFUSAL TO PROSECUTE UNDER LABOUR CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which was given to him. Would the minister explain a statement made by Mr. J. Graham, general chairman of the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen, Canadian Pacific Railway lines, to the effect that his request to the Minister of Labour to prosecute the C.P.R. under the federal labour code, because of violations of both labour control and the law by the railway, was refused for reasons which he described as sounding "spurious"?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. In answer I want to advise him that I did indeed receive such a letter from Mr. Graham, the general chairman of the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen, along the lines indicated by the hon. member.

The letter was then referred to my officials, since it dealt with matters of a technical nature. Their reply was to the effect that the points raised by Mr. Graham were of a nature normally dealt with under grievance procedures.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR MOVEMENT OF TOUGH AND DAMP GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the house whether he has anything further to add to the answers previously given regarding the movement of tough and damp grain in the northeastern corner of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter which is of considerable concern to the producers of that area, and every effort has been made to meet their requirements. The wheat board has advised me now that while very little space is available for local deliveries at the points in northeastern Saskatchewan which are affected, there are outstanding shipping orders in the hands of the elevator agents for 30 cars, 12 cars and 15 cars, respectively, for three areas, Hudson Bay, Veillardville and Erwood. As navigation at the lakehead has just opened, grain to that destination will be moving more freely from now on, and it is anticipated by the Canadian wheat board that the railway company will be in a position to furnish box cars in fulfilment of the outstanding orders and additional orders commencing within a few days. As space becomes available for further deliveries by producers, delivery quotas will be increased accordingly.

The shipment of tough and damp grain to lakehead terminals will be continued by the board on a first priority basis, and the board expects that opportunity will be provided to market most of the tough and damp grain in the area during the course of the next few weeks.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question. I appreciate the action that the minister has indicated is being taken. Can he say whether any thought is being given to providing additional or emergency quotas over the general quota this year, if that is necessary to move the grain before it does in fact spoil?

Mr. Churchill: Consideration will be given to that, Mr. Speaker, if there is some difficulty in moving the grain during the course of the next two weeks, but with the opening of navigation in the great lakes I think there will be storage space available and this movement will continue as planned.

SUPPLY

The house resumed from Monday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. McIlraith.

DEBT MANAGEMENT AND MONETARY POLICY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the course of my brief introductory remarks last evening I laid some emphasis on one or two points. The first was in reference to the bank rate, that is to say the Bank of Canada rate. I had pointed out that that is a rate established by the Bank of Canada under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act, and the government has no power over the rate that is established by the Bank of Canada. I had given some indication, Mr. Speaker, of what I think is a fairly widely recognized fact, that in Canada and some other countries with relatively new central banks the bank rate, that is to say the rate established by the central bank only, has exerted no direct or strong influence on market rates. Its movement has rather reflected changes in market rates and market conditions, and could never have been properly considered a cause of those rates and conditions.

I had also pointed, Mr. Speaker, to the fluctuations that have occurred in various rates. I had pointed out that in this country the rise in interest rates began not recently but in 1955, and that in the summer of 1957 a decline in interest rates set in which lasted for nearly a year, until the spring of 1958. We have been, since that time, in a period of rising interest rates in company with some other countries.

I pointed out also, Mr. Speaker, the extent to which the prime rate established by the chartered banks of Canada has fluctuated. I pointed out that the rise to 5¾ per cent which became effective yesterday simply returned that rate to the figure it had reached at the peak of the movement in interest rates in the summer of 1957, climaxing at that time a rise in interest rates that had then continued, broadly speaking, for two and one half years.

I am sure I do not need to say to the house that the government has no jurisdiction whatever over the prime rate established by the chartered banks. Section 91 of the Bank Act is quite clear in its provisions in this regard. It prohibits the banks from charging any rate of interest or any rate of discount exceeding 6 per cent per annum. It does not give the government any power whatever over the rate established by the banks. Therefore in pointing to that rate hon. members in the opposition who have sought to make something of it are simply pointing to something over which the government has been given no jurisdiction or measure of control by parliament.

Now, sir, having mentioned these points again, let me pass on to further observations on the theme upon which I touched last night, as to the effect of the operation of the law of supply and demand in the money market. I had indicated that when this law is left alone it operates in the same way the law of supply and demand operates in the commodity markets. When the supply factors are stronger than the demand factors, then obviously the price goes down, in this case interest rates. On the other hand, when the demand factors are in the ascendant over the supply factors, then the price goes up, in this case the price of money being interest.

One would have thought, sir, listening to the speeches that were made by opposition members yesterday, that something extraordinary had happened, something that was quite unprecedented. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that hon. members opposite, as I pointed out last night, chose for their favourite illustration the treasury bill rate, which is the rate which has shown, in the period from the summer of 1957 to the spring of 1958, the sharpest drop in interest rates and since that time the sharpest rise. It is the most volatile of all government securities in its response to factors at work in the market affecting interest rates. One does not find in the case of any of the government bond issues movements in interest rates to compare with those which did occur in those two periods in the treasury bill rate.

I could give the house detailed figures, but I do not wish to weary the house. However, whether one looks at short, medium or long term bonds, the fact is that in one of these cases have the movements in interest rates been as sharp as in the case of treasury bills, and that is obviously the reason hon. members of the opposition, in seeking to exaggerate this situation out of all recognition, have chosen to talk about the treasury bill rate and have completely glossed over the position in regard to bonds. The fact is also that hon. members of the opposition, in speaking yesterday left the impression that this situation is confined to our country. I am sure the house is not going to be so easily misled. We are, in this respect, experiencing a problem that is shared with other countries.

I gave the figures last night showing the rise in the treasury bill rate. Let us look at the United States. One hon. member opposite yesterday pictured the United States as enjoying reduced rates on its borrowings. Well, Mr. Speaker, here are the figures on United States treasury bills, beginning with the first of this year. The opening rate on a treasury bill issue of the United States for this year, January 7, was 2.68 per cent. Their last offering, on April 22, went out at 3.11 per cent.

The rise, as hon. members will see, was .43 per cent, and that condition has been similar to the one we find in the United Kingdom. Basic conditions in the United Kingdom may be somewhat different at present from those on this continent, but with respect to the treasury bill rate we see, though not to the same extent, nevertheless the same general condition. The opening treasury bill rate in the United Kingdom this year, on January 7, was 3.14 per cent. The last issue, on April 22, went out at 3.28 per cent. This rise is smaller, it is true, nevertheless it is a rise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the rate in Canada on treasury bills has, in its movements, paralleled the movements that have occurred in other countries. If the treasury bill rate, which is only one rate, has moved farther in this period than in these other countries, there are good reasons for it, and I think reasons that commend themselves to this house and to the country. I point out also that much sharper rises than we have experienced in this country in our treasury bill rate have occurred in other countries. Look at the experience in the United Kingdom in 1957. On July 31, the treasury bill rate in that country was 3.82 per cent, and by September 25 the rate had jumped to 6.6 per cent.

When hon. members opposite talk about the jump in our rate, it would be well if these things were seen in their true perspective. The fact is that the treasury bill rate in this country, since the beginning of 1959, has jumped just 1.47 per cent. We are not at all happy that this increase has occurred but, Mr. Speaker, it is well, in all honesty, that the facts should be understood and that the kind of misleading impression that was created yesterday should not be permitted to linger. I have indicated also that when the treasury bill rate recedes, we derive immediate benefit from the reduction because of the weekly offerings.

Now, sir, we are told that we have influenced rates on bonds and on treasury bills. It is undoubtedly a fact, Mr. Speaker, that a government would like to affect those rates to its advantages as it may be able. No government likes to pay more than it must for the money it must borrow to meet the purposes of government. What has been our record, Mr. Speaker? Our record has been this. In the matter of issuance of bonds we have taken advantage of the decline in interest rates which, as I pointed out, set in in the summer of 1957, and we took advantage of that right through until the rate began to rise again in the late spring of 1958.

Here have been our issues, Mr. Speaker, and I give the effective rates. On October 1, 1957, we put out an issue of $400 million of 3 per cent short term bonds, and the effective rate was 4.81 per cent. On the same date we also put out $300 million of two year bonds with an effective rate of 4.99 per cent. Note, Mr. Speaker, what had happened by the time the next issue was put out; already the interest rate had declined. On December 15, 1957 we put out an issue of $250 million of 3 per cent, approximately two year bonds at a rate of 3.81 per cent. Between October 1 and December 15 our borrowing rate on these two year bonds had declined by over 1 per cent. We also put out on December 15 a 3 per cent issue of longer term bonds maturing in 1960 carrying a yield of 3.85 per cent.

By May of 1958 interest rates had declined still further, and we were able to take advantage of that decline. On May 1 we put out four issues totalling $950 million, the maturities falling due in 1959, 1961, 1970 and 1978, and the actual yields to final maturity respectively were 2.94 per cent, 3.35 per cent, 3.71 per cent and 4.01 per cent.

The house will see, Mr. Speaker, that in that very substantial issue of $950 million we were enjoying the benefit of the decline in interest rates. It is also an illustration of the fact that the preference of the market at that time was for the shorter maturities, and we were able to borrow in the shorter range at substantially lower rates than in the longest maturity.

Then we move forward to July 15. We issued another $400 million on July 15 maturing at the end of 1958, and they were put out at a rate of 2½ per cent. I will pass over the conversion loans for the present because I will be coming back to them later. On October 1 we put out two issues aggregating $600 million, these maturing in 1959 and 1960 respectively. Here the yield to maturity was 2.77 per cent and 2.96 per cent respectively. The house will see what advantage we were enjoying from the decline in interest rates.

Then on December 15 we put out a loan of $300 million maturing at the end of 1959, at a rate of 3.77 per cent. In the fall of 1958 interest rates, in response to conditions about which I shall have something more to say, had begun to rise. That rise continued into 1959, as the house well knows. On January 1 we put out an issue of $100 million maturing in 1963 at an effective rate of 4.34 per cent. On March 1 we put out two issues totalling $200 million, both maturing in 1960, one in April and the other in December, the effective yield to maturity being 4.76 per cent and 4.94 per cent respectively.

It is well, I think, that these facts should be placed on the record to correct the misleading impression that was created yesterday by hon. members opposite. They have taken no little satisfaction in their speeches over the fact that interest rates have risen in recent months. They seem to gloat and glory in the fact that interest rates have risen and that the government, like every other borrower in Canada, has had to pay higher interest rates. Where were these voluble members a year ago, Mr. Speaker? Where were they with their speeches in the days when interest rates were receding and the government was enjoying in its borrowings the advantage of these substantially lower interest rates? Did we hear talk from them then about the strength the government had imparted to confidence in Canada? Oh, no, not these hon. members; no, they save what they have to say on the subject for the days when they can gloat and glory in the higher cost that the government, along with every other borrower in Canada, has to pay under the conditions that exist today. Such is the test, such is the mark of their sense of responsibility to Canada.

Let me address myself now, Mr. Speaker, to the situation which has been created today in which all borrowers have had to face higher interest charges. The situation we have today is a striking reflection of the operation of the forces of supply and demand in the economy, and it is a very interesting reflection of the strength of the expansive forces in the economy today. When we are asking these questions about the respective strengths of the forces of supply and demand in the money market I suggest that we begin with demand, and then I shall have something to say about supply.

On the demand side the most striking force at work in our economy in these recent times has been the strength of the recovery in the Canadian economy and the expansion of the forces of recovery at work in the Canadian economy at the present time. I do not expect hon. members opposite to like that fact.

Mr. Hellyer: It is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They just do not like any talk about recovery in the Canadian economy—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and they did not have the fairness yesterday to bring this factor into the discussion. In that way they gloss completely over the most important factor at work today influencing the relative play of the forces of supply and demand.

How is demand evidenced? Demand is evidenced in a very striking way, in bank loans. The banks do not hold their funds idle. They seek to employ them; and in order to keep their funds as liquid as possible they invest them in government of Canada bonds and in treasury bills, depending upon when they desire their maturities in the interests of liquidity.

Mr. Hellyer: Elementary, my dear Watson.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is elementary, I have had to resort to elementary approaches for the benefit of hon. members opposite, to put a stop to the way they have been trying to mislead the house and the country on this issue.

Mr. Hellyer: Why don't you tell us about your big deficits?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say, Mr. Speaker, that the banks of Canada have been called upon to meet an extraordinary demand for bank loans. The situation has attracted widespread attention in recent times. Mr. Speaker, here are the figures of loans of the chartered banks in recent weeks. At the beginning of this year the total of chartered bank loans was $5,402 million. By April 15 that figure had jumped to $5,658 million. Sir, that is an increase in bank loans of $256 million since the beginning of this year, 1959. And look, sir, if you will, at the way in which this increase has occurred. On April 1 the total of these loans outstanding was $5,528 million. Within a week—and I pointed this out a week ago in my speech—by April 8 that total had jumped to $5,629 million; that is an increase of $101 million in bank loans in one week. The following week, Mr. Speaker, by April 15 a jump of another $29 million occurred in outstanding bank loans.

Mr. Speaker, having regard to the function of the banks in our system, to provide credit to meet commercial necessities, we see mirrored in these figures of bank loans the extent to which recovery is going on in the Canadian ecoonmy today. It is going on at an extraordinary rate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Could he give the comparable figures for the same months in 1957 and 1956?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can give them for 1957 and 1958, if my hon. friend will be content with those.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In 1957 the total of bank loans at the commencement of the year was $5,411 million. At April 22 it was $5,448 million. The rise in 1957 was only $37 million. Let us move forward to 1958. The total of bank loans outstanding at the opening of the year 1958 was $5,405 million. At April 22 it was $5,247 million. It had contracted in those first four months of 1958 by $158 million whereas, as I have pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, in this year, 1959, the expansion in the total of bank loans has been $256 million. I appreciate my hon. friend asking that question, because it gives me the opportunity of bringing out that interesting contrast which so clearly illustrates the extent of recovery of the economy of the country this year as compared with the conditions of a year ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit one further question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will ask another like the last one I would be delighted.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is in fact almost exactly like the last one. Could the minister give for those same three years the demands which the government has made in the way of loans, just in order to illustrate this factor of demand? I want the amount which the government has borrowed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already given the figure of demand in terms of all of the issues of government bonds by this government since it came into office in the summer of 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: But that does not answer my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can go back and give the figures of issues of the government of which he was a member, if he has forgotten them. Perhaps he would like to forget that as well as some other features of the administration of his government.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister did not quite understand my question. I wanted the figures for precisely the same three months that the minister was using for purposes of illustration; that is to say, those issues between January 1 and April 22 for those three years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I will be glad to get that information for my hon. friend, or any other information that will be of assistance to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how have the banks met this extraordinary demand for commercial loans? As I have said, the banks do not keep cash sitting idly around. They have to keep their money profitably employed. Just what happens in the face of an extraordinary demand like this on the banks? The fact is that the banks liquidate their holdings of securities in order to provide themselves with cash. The figures I am about to give the house now will illustrate the extent to which the banks have been realizing on their treasury bills, or taking their cash out of those bills as they mature week by week, and also reducing their holdings of government of Canada bonds by selling some of these bonds in the market in order to put themselves in cash to meet this extraordinary demand for commercial loans. Here you have the reason why there has been pressure on the rate on treasury bills and the rate on government bonds in the market. It is because there has been selling by these institutions in order to put themselves in cash to meet the extraordinarily heavy demand for commercial loans arising out of the extent of recovery in this country.

Here are the figures. I do not wish to weary the house with a multitude of figures; perhaps it will suffice if I indicate to the house at this point the changes from week to week in the bank holdings of (a) bonds and (b) treasury bills, say from the beginning of February. Here are the figures, then, on bonds, showing the fluctuations from week to week. In the first week in February the banks showed an increase over the last week in January of $5 million in their total holdings of government of Canada bonds. The next week they were down $19 million. The next week they were about the same. The next week they were down $25 million. The next week they were up $41 million; the next week, down $4 million; the next week, up $16 million. Then, sir, will you note these next four weeks; down $15 million; down $19 million; down $57 million; down $54 million. If you wish to know why there has been pressure on the bond market and why this pressure has been reflected in rising interest rates, you have only to look at those figures of realizations by the chartered banks of their holdings of Dominion of Canada bonds.

Then let us look at the movement in their holdings of treasury bills; this is again for the same period. The first week in February showed an increase over the last week in January of $28 million. Then watch the next weeks. The second week, down $46 million; the next week, down $29 million; the next week, down $48 million; the next week, up $12 million; the next week, down $28 million; the next week, down $18 million; the next week, down $22 million; the next week, up $15 million; the next week, down $29 million; the next week, down $15 million.

Mr. Speaker, that succession of reductions illustrates as well as any figures can the essential facts in this situation, which are these. The banks have been liquidating their holdings of government bonds and treasury bills in order to put themselves in cash to meet the demands for commercial loans.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the minister would clarify that point. Dealing with commercial loans he used a figure which, I take it, was based on the situation early in January, early in the year. He gave the composite figures, but in giving the holdings of the chartered banks he started with the first week in February, which represented their peak over the last series of months. Is there any significance about not taking the corresponding dates for the two sets of figures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no. I can go on giving more figures if the house wishes them. The fact is that this significant reduction in the holdings of government of Canada bonds and treasury bills began at the end of the first week in February, and from that time on with only rare interruptions we have seen this process of liquidation continuing. The reason for this can be seen in the increase in the total number of bank loans outstanding, an increase which illustrates the extent of recovery in Canada.

This is again a reflection of the forces of supply and demand at work in the economy, and those hon. members of this house who are prepared to be fair in their approach to this problem can take some satisfaction from the fact that the demand factor at work in the Canadian economy today is so strong, and that it is a reflection of the forces of recovery at work in the economy. This fact was completely glossed over yesterday by hon. members opposite and was cheerfully ignored by them while they chose to dwell upon the more unfavourable factors of any situation that they found available for their purpose.

The total of bank loans has a further interest for this house. As hon. members are aware we, as a government, have urged the banks to lend, and lend substantially, under the provisions of the National Housing Act in order to assist in home construction, and in that way to spur employment in this country. Well, the chartered banks have responded, and I wish to indicate the way in which the needs of our housing program have also created demands upon the available cash resources of the banks. Here I give the figures of insured residential mortgages held by the banks. I begin with June, 1957 as a significant date, and the house will note a steady rise in investment by the chartered banks of Canada in insured residential mortgages under the National Housing Act.

When we came to office in June, 1957 the chartered banks were holding a total of $501 million of these mortgages. By January, 1958 that figure had risen to $591 million; by January, 1959 to $791 million; by March 25, 1959 to $823 million, and by April 15, the last date for which figures are available, to $828 million. Here again is a factor in demand which I think will give satisfaction to the house and to the country.

I have spoken about the forces of demand at work in the money market today. Let me turn now to the forces affecting supply. I am sure I do not need to remind the house that Canada is a country which chronically suffers from a shortage of capital. It is a young country with tremendous resources to be developed. It needs capital for the development of those resources. Canada is the largest net importer of capital in the world, not just on a per capita basis but on a national, an absolute, basis. There is an impression in some parts of the world that because Canada has a high standard of living, Canada must have available a substantial volume or surplus of capital. That is not so. I had frequent occasion in the talks I had with governments in Asia last autumn to point out that fact. Canada is the largest importer of capital in the world.

What are the sources of capital? In the first place, savings are an important source of capital, the savings of persons and the savings of corporations. The other source, so far as Canada is concerned, is the capital imported from foreign sources. We need to give encouragement to individuals and corporations to practise the virtue of saving in order to create capital so they may rely on themselves and in that way help to sustain the growth of the economy. And when socialist members of this house seek to crush the corporations in this country, they should bear in mind that corporations are themselves a source of capital, and that if the corporations are to be crushed there will be so much less capital available for the expansion of the economy and the creation of more jobs for Canadians.

As far as foreign sources of capital are concerned, we may wish as Canadians that we had available from domestic sources all the capital we need and that we did not stand in need of foreign capital. However, we are not in that happy situation. We do need this foreign capital; and therefore we must—and this is the policy of this government—create a climate hospitable to foreign capital investment.

What has been the course of the movement of capital into Canada? In 1956 the total of capital movement into Canada measured by the balance of international payments was $1,372 million. In 1957 it was $1,366 million. In 1958, notwithstanding the economic situation we experienced, especially in the earlier part of the year, foreign capital came into Canada to the extent of $1,112 million. And while one cannot prophesy with any certainty what may be the amount of foreign capital coming into this country in this year of 1959, it is quite evident from the figures I have given that there is no substantial reduction in the volume of such capital entering Canada. Therefore we may look with reasonable confidence for the continuation of a substantial volume of foreign capital coming into Canada for investment.

We shall, of course, have to bear in mind what effect this will have on exchange rates. The Canadian dollar has been at a premium since 1952. To some Canadians this is a matter of pride. It is a matter of economic advantage to people who have to meet obligations in terms of United States dollars. It helps some Canadians, and it works to the disadvantage of others. When the Canadian dollar is at a premium in relation to the United States dollar, the import of foreign goods into Canada is facilitated. An obstacle, to the extent of the premium, is placed in the way of exports of Canadian goods to other countries. Similarly, in relation to the movement of capital, the inward movement of United States capital into Canada has the effect of boosting the premium on the United States dollar, and this is what we have to bear in mind. The outward movement of capital from Canada to the United States, or the return of capital to that country, would of course have the effect of reducing the premium on the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. We need United States capital on proper terms, and the premium is the price that is being paid at the present time. One regrets the fact that it works to the disadvantage of exporters. This is not a matter of government choice at all; this is a matter of the operation of the free forces in a free economy.

Let me now address myself directly to the question of supply within Canada to meet the extraordinarily heavy demand at the present time. Last night I spoke of the components of money supply in Canada. I pointed out that they consist of currency in circulation and deposits in the chartered banks. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that there is something heinous about the increase in the money supply that occurred in the year 1958. Certainly and admittedly a substantial increase occurred in the money supply in Canada in that year.

At the end of 1958 the money supply was $13,247 million and at the end of 1957 it was $11,923 million. The increase in money supply in 1958 in Canada was $1,324 million. But, Mr. Speaker, there was a very good reason for that increase in money supply in Canada last year. I say to you that if the money supply had not increased in Canada in 1958 the first persons to be critical of the fact that it had not increased would have been hon. gentlemen opposite, the members of the official opposition.

The fact is that the amount of currency was increased last year and the chartered bank deposits of Canadians increased last year. Apparently that is a matter of regret to hon. gentlemen in the official opposition. These increased, however, not because the government decreed any increase in currency or in money supply. The Bank of Canada, as I pointed out last night, has the authority and is the only body in Canada that has the authority to determine the volume of currency issued. What the government did in the parallel field of fiscal action was to take steps with a view to imparting vigour to the Canadian economy. We deliberately budgeted for a deficit last year with a view to giving impetus and strength to the forces of recovery at work in the economy.

Let us look at what has happened since October 1 of last year. Hon. gentlemen in the official opposition who have something critical to say about the increased money supply should have been saying it in 1958 when such criticisms would have had some relevancy to the conditions then existing; but oh, no, these Rip van Winkles wake up in 1959 and discover a situation existed in 1958 which, if you please, ceased to exist on October 1, 1958.

Mr. Hellyer: How are you enjoying your slumber at this moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The situation has been substantially different since. Indeed, the money supply in Canada has contracted since then. I give you just the figures from December to April 15. The figure for the money supply in Canada on April 15 was $13,205 million. There was an actual drop of $42 million in that 3½-month period.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question. Would the minister care to tell us what kind of capital was the increase in the money supply of last year in the amount of something over $1 billion to which he referred.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is money supply. The hon. gentleman will have to distinguish as best he can between capital and money supply. This is money supply measured in terms of the combined total of currency in circulation and deposits in the chartered banks. What hon. members in the opposition had to say about this matter yesterday is stale. They were complaining about a condition which ceased to exist on October 1, 1958. Indeed, as I have indicated, the money supply has been dropping in recent months.

As to the future, I am not going to attempt any prophecy as to what is likely to be the trend in the volume of money supply. I do know that the Bank of Canada watches this situation very closely, and in whatever may be done in this respect I am sure the house would expect a balance to be preserved between the needs of expanding business on the one hand—the forces of recovery—and on the other hand restraints against the dangers of inflation.

There is one other possible source of supply to which I shall give just a word of comment. It is the bank reserves. The government has no control whatever over bank reserves; I wish to make that abundantly clear. It is the Bank Act of this country which in section 71 lays down the requirements imposed by parliament upon the chartered banks of Canada in relation to the maintenance of their cash reserves. Section 71, subsection 1 reads:

> 71. (1) The bank shall maintain a cash reserve in the form of a deposit with the Bank of Canada and of Bank of Canada notes held by the bank, and such reserve shall be not less on the average during any month than 8 per cent, or such other percentage as may be fixed by the Bank of Canada under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act, of such of its deposit liabilities as are payable in Canadian currency.

That is the statutory obligation of the banks, to maintain a cash reserve of 8 per cent measured in terms of deposit liabilities. In addition to that figure the banks of this country have for the past three years maintained an additional reserve of 7 per cent which has been held in the form of treasury bills and day to day loans. The reserves of the banks in the period since this government came into office reached their peak in May of 1958, when the average liquid asset ratio of all the chartered banks reached 18.1 per cent. From that time, as the forces of recovery have gathered more and more momentum, that figure has been reduced and the last figure available at April 22 showed that the over-all average liquid asset ratio of bank reserves, had dropped to 15.48 per cent, a very substantial reduction since the high of May, 1958.

If hon. members opposite are going to deal fairly with this question when they criticize the situation of today they will have to tell the house what their position is in relation to money supply, the creation of an increase in money supply, and what their position is in regard to bank reserves. They have not said a word about those subjects, and I think we well know why. If the 7 per cent reserve that the banks hold in terms of treasury bills and day to day loans were reduced it would result in a liquidation of treasury bills and more pressure on the treasury bill rate in this country. But hon. members opposite did not have the frankness to face up to that fact yesterday or even to acknowledge it. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that anyone in this house is going to propose that the Bank Act of this country should be amended to reduce the requirement under section 71 that the banks should hold an 8 per cent reserve in cash.

I should like to turn now to what I think is a very interesting commentary upon the kind of speeches we listened to yesterday from hon. members of the opposition. They gloried in the increase in interest rates, and they gloried also in whatever signs of weakness they could find in the bond market. They would have left the impression, had they been able to do so, that this is a new phenomenon and that it has not occurred before. Well, Mr. Speaker, I know the house is not going to be misled by that type of erring propaganda on the part of the opposition, but let me place on the record some interesting figures illustrating the way bond prices went in the days of the Liberal government.

I am going to compare two dates, March 29, 1955, with June 21, 1957, when that Liberal government went out of office, and I am going to give the house seven or eight outstanding Canadian bond issues so the house can see what happened to the quoted values of those Canada bonds in the market between those two dates. Three per cents, due May 1, 1958, dropped from 103.35 to 98.90, a loss of 4.45; 3 per cents, due October 1, 1963, dropped from 102.45 to 90.625, a drop of 11.825; 3 per cents, due September 1, 1966, dropped from 102.50 to 88.375, a drop of 14.125; 2¾ per cents due June 15, 1968, dropped from 99.50 to 84.75, a drop of 14.75; 3¼ per cents, due June 1, 1976, dropped from 102.125 to 87.25, a drop of 14.875; 3¾ per cents, due June 15, 1978, dropped from 108.50 to 94.50, a drop of 14; 3¼ per cents, due October 1, 1979, dropped from 102.125 to 86.875, a drop of 15.25; and the 3 per cent perpetuals dropped from 96.625 to 79.75, a drop of 16.875.

All these drops Mr. Speaker, occurred before we ever came into office, and you will see, therefore, how hollow in the mouths of hon. members opposite rings the cry about the weakness of the bond market and the rise in interest rates, and the talk about the loss of confidence in government of Canada issues. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker; if there was loss of confidence it occurred in that period from 1955 to 1957, infinitely more significantly than in any period since.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question? Will he tell us whether during that period the government was a net borrower in the market?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the entire period I am not prepared to make a quick answer to that question. There were periods when the government was a net borrower; there were periods when the position was reversed.

The figures I have given, Mr. Speaker, were for government of Canada bonds, but I think it is worth reflecting also upon what happened to the values in the market of outstanding provincial issues in this period of Liberal rule. Again I have the figures for the two dates, March 29, 1955 and June 21, 1957. Alberta, 2⅞ per cents, due March 1, 1970 dropped from 98.50 to 84.50, a drop of 14; British Columbia 3 per cents, due December 15, 1969 dropped from 98.25 to 83, a drop of 15.25; Manitoba 4¼ per cents, due October 1, 1968 dropped from 107 to 93.25, a drop of 13.75; New Brunswick 4½ per cents, due February 2, 1965 dropped from 106 to 95, a drop of 11 points; Nova Scotia 3¼ per cents, due November 15, 1970 dropped from 99 to 84, a drop of 15 points; Ontario 4 per cents due June 30, 1972 dropped from 106.75 to 91.25, a drop of 15.50; Quebec 3 per cents, due July 1, 1969 dropped from 97.25 to 84.75, a drop of 12.50; Saskatchewan 3¼ per cents, due April 15, 1972 dropped from 97.75 to 81.75, a drop of 16 points.

In the face of that unhappy record, Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the opposition undertake to say any evidence of weakness in the bond market today, or any evidence of increase in interest rates, in the face of the extraordinary demand for commercial credit today, is the responsibility of the present government, and that the people have lost confidence in government of Canada credit because of some failure on the part of the present government. Let them clean their own house before they undertake to level empty, baseless charges of that kind against others.

I have drawn attention to the fact that the field of monetary action belongs to the Bank of Canada; the field of fiscal action belongs to the government. I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the increase in money supply in 1958 was accompanied by deficit financing, deliberate deficit financing on the part of the government, all done with a view to stimulating the forces of recovery in the economy. Today recovery is clearly under way, and the policy in regard to money supply was moderated as from the first day of October so as to permit recovery to proceed but without inflation. Similarly, in the present budget fiscal policy was modified by the government with the same object in view, to avoid inflation while at the same time putting no obstacle in the way of the recovery movement in the Canadian economy.

This requires the best judgment that the Bank of Canada on the one hand and the government on the other can muster; but,

Mr. Speaker, let hon. members be fair about it and recognize where responsibility rests and the extent to which the conditions that exist today are attributable to the steps taken to stimulate recovery in Canada. They do not want recovery; that seems to be the net effect of their observations here today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yesterday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have not had a chance to speak today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, they have made some interjections and asked some questions which are of the same old, tiresome sort, but are quite in keeping with those irresponsible statements that were made by them yesterday.

We have drawn attention to the fact, and it is significant in relation to the factors about which hon. members sought to complain yesterday, that the government this year is going to be reducing substantially its borrowings of new money from the Canadian markets. We have substantial maturities to meet. I do not need to dwell on them. Hon. members opposite like to remind the house of them every day. But we have, by the expedients put before the house in the budget, taken steps to reduce substantially the demand that we will be making upon the supply this year to finance the government deficit.

As I pointed out in the budget speech, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman realizes, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out to me the other day, that it is contrary to the rules of the house to quote from another debate in the same session. Since the rules have been rigidly enforced against this side of the house, I trust Your Honour will enforce them against the minister as well.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What a power of anticipation! I was not going to quote—

Mr. Pickersgill: You were going to read the table.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not going to read the table, at all.

An hon. Member: Are you psychic?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Psychic John, I think, had better be renamed—

Mr. Pickersgill: Just anticipation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —as the man with the broken crystal ball.

As I pointed out, with a good response to our Canada savings bond campaign next autumn our own market borrowings in 1959-60, should be less than one-half of the $1,220 million which we borrowed in the market in the fiscal year 1958-59.

There is one other subject, to which I am obliged by the amendment to turn; not that I enjoy making a speech of such length as this, far from it. However, hon. members opposite in their amendment sought to embrace every possible subject that in their ingenuity they could think up for the occasion. If I may use common language, they have taken in the whole waterfront in this amendment and they have obliged me to speak on these subjects at some length.

Amongst the many matters of which they complain in this extraordinary fake amendment of theirs is the conversion loan. It is significant, I think, that they have not chosen to condemn the conversion loan. What they have talked about instead has been one aspect of it, or two at the most. They talked about "the errors and inequities" associated with the conversion loan. I would have thought that if hon. members opposite had any pretence to fortitude they would have come out and said they did not like the conversion loan and invited the house to condemn the conversion loan. However, courage failed them at that point; courage fled, and what they resorted to was a reference to what they called the "errors and inequities" associated with the conversion loan. There were no errors or inequities associated with the conversion loan.

Mr. Chevrier: Just blunders.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) had been here yesterday perhaps he would have supplied what was lacking in this amendment. He would have had the courage to come out and condemn the conversion loan in this amendment instead of taking part in this hide and seek game that his colleagues played yesterday with this subject.

I am obliged to say something about this conversion loan. This subject was discussed quite a few times in this house during the last session, and on one or two occasions in this session, but if hon. members opposite insist upon a further discussion then I am happy to accommodate them. I shall make some general comments, Mr. Speaker, about the features of the loan and the conditions associated with it before I come down to deal with some of the statements that were uttered here yesterday.

The conversion loan of 1958 was the greatest financial operation in Canada's history. It was a very great success, and indeed far exceeded our expectations. I should like to remind the house of the conditions in the summer of 1958 under which this enterprise was undertaken. In April, 1958 the rising trend in bond prices was arrested and indications of economic recovery appeared, with their prospective concomitant of a growing demand for money from non-government sources. In the United States worry about the size of the government's deficit and borrowing requirements and fears of inflation emerged at an early stage, and a sharp and continuing decline in bond prices set in. The last reduction in the discount rate of federal reserve banks of the United States was made on April 18. Bond prices in that country hit their peak on April 21. A decline then set in which was temporarily interrupted in the latter half of May, but then continued with little interruption until October. A further decline of bond prices began in the last week of November, and hon. members are familiar with what has happened since that time.

It was not to be expected that Canadian bond prices would always follow United States bond prices, even in direction over short intervals, let alone in degree of movement. But undoubtedly developments in the United States are bound, soon or later, to have a weighty influence on developments in Canada; and so it was in 1958. The average maturity of public debt had been shortening for several years, both in the United States and Canada. The large volume of securities falling due for repayment each year was a matter of concern to fiscal authorities in both countries and a serious handicap to the sale of new issues for cash in a period of government deficits. By the end of June the market atmosphere was very unfavourable to new financing.

While the government of Canada needed large sums of new money in the immediate future funds could be obtained as a last resort from the banks, with the Bank of Canada providing increased cash reserves to the chartered banks, but after the large scale purchase of government securities by the banks and corresponding monetary expansion in the preceding 12 months this would have been regarded as dangerously inflationary, unless other steps could be taken simultaneously to deal with the public debt structure and make possible the sale of future issues of government bonds to non-bank investors. At the same time some way had to be found to reduce the heavy proportion of short term bonds and increase substantially the proportion of long term bonds.

The five victory loans totalling $6,416 million had ultimate maturity dates between January 1, 1959 and September 1, 1966. In addition, all these issues were callable on or before September 1, 1961. This prospect, in addition to the non-victory loan maturities and the need for heavy new borrowings, made debt reorganization imperative if a high degree of confusion and demoralization of the bond market was to be avoided, and a sound basis created for financing Canada's expansion and development.

Conversion of all five victory loan issues was more equitable, more efficient and less costly than a piecemeal approach could possibly have been. Fundamental to the project was the idea that it would be easier to sell the public long term bonds in exchange for bonds which they already held than to sell them long term bonds for cash. The prospects of cash requirements of the Canadian government for several years ahead were also a major consideration. It was urgently important to improve the government's debt structure, to reduce the overhang of refinancing which would have to be done in addition to new money financing and to put as much of the government's debt as possible on a long term basis.

The terms of the conversion loan were developed on the best advice having regard to the objective, the erosion which had occurred in the market and the measures necessary to attract public investment in the long term sector. The conversion loan was an overwhelming success. A total of more than $5,803 million, or more than 90 per cent of the outstanding victory bonds, was converted.

The interest rates set on the new conversion loan bonds reflected market yields prevailing at the time while taking into account the size of the operation. Exaggerated and distorted statements have been made as to the burden which these higher conversion loan interest rates will impose. Such statements, and we have heard many of them in the house, all of them mistaken and misleading, erroneously assume that each victory loan issue could have been refunded at maturity at a 3 per cent interest rate. The evidence is all to the contrary, especially having regard to the fact that the overhang on the market would still have persisted. Rates at the time of such refundings would almost certainly have been higher than is now the case.

The coupon rate on all of the victory loans was 3 per cent. The average coupon rate on all of the bonds converted is now 4 per cent. Since 61 per cent of the conversion went into the 14-year and 25-year maturities and since, having regard to call dates, all of the victory loans were of three years or less maturity, this is a very satisfactory average coupon rate. The interest payable on the $6,416 million of bonds before conversion was $192,480,000. It is now $250,705,000, an increase of $58,225,000 or about 30 per cent.

The conversion loan was a constructive and stabilizing factor in the market, particularly in the long term sector. The benefits of its influence accrue to provincial and municipal borrowers who would otherwise have had to face a high rate structure inevitably resulting from the uncertainty and imminence of these huge maturities overhanging the market.

I have said that the conversion operation was an overwhelming success. It has earned the outspoken admiration of the governments of other countries. This success was achieved with the full co-operation of the Bank of Canada. Before conversion only 17 per cent of the government of Canada's debt, other than savings bonds, was in maturities over ten years. After the conversion fully 43 per cent was in such maturities. Before conversion 39 per cent of the debt, other than savings bonds, was in market issues with maturities of less than two years. After the conversion 25 per cent was in such issues. The average maturity of the public debt, other than savings bonds, was lengthened from 6⅙ years to 10½ years in Canada and became double the comparable average maturity in the United States.

While prices of government bonds have declined in recent months, the benefits of the conversion loan operation continue. I should like to add a comment on the market price quotations of these new conversion bonds. I think it is fair that in making this comparison we compare the rates prevailing in the market prior to the time the conversion loan operation was launched with those prevailing in the market on these issues in the autumn following.

The government at no time said that it would support current market prices on the conversion loan. While the Bank of Canada, acting as the government's fiscal agent, normally operates in a manner to stabilize the after-market for a short period for each new loan, it is not the government's policy to support the bond market over longer periods.

The government's obligation is to pay a fixed rate of interest on the conversion loan bonds and redeem them in full at maturity. Far from having given any indication of supporting the market price of the conversion loan, the government expressly disclaimed any such undertaking in the House of Commons. I point, Mr. Speaker, in this connection to the question asked in the house by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) last September and my answer to his question. It is the play of the forces in the market which determines the day to day price of bonds. It happens that largely as a result of the continued erosion of the United States bond market there were weakening effects on market offerings for government issues in Canada evident in the autumn and winter of 1958-59. There is no way of insulating the Canadian bond market from such influences, but had it not been for the constructive effects of the refunding represented by the conversion loan and its overwhelming success the Canadian market would have undoubtedly displayed much more weakness than has been evident since.

The fact clearly emerges that the decline in the bond market in recent months is in no sense attributable to the conversion loan but has occurred in spite of it. With the exception of the period during the conversion loan campaign and immediately following the decline in government bond prices in Canada has paralleled but has not been as extensive as the decline in the United States. Here I offer the comparison that I mentioned a moment ago, Mr. Speaker. In the longest term category United States bonds declined 12½ points from April to December, 1958 while Canada's dropped 11½ points. In the mid-term field the decline in Canada was distinctly less than in the United States. Thus United States 68's declined 10½ points in this period while Canada's 68's declined less than 7½ points. The removal of the bulk of the Canada 3's of 1963 and 1966 from the market as a result of the conversion operation is the chief reason for this relevant and striking difference in mid-term bond price changes.

In Canada the longest victory loan, the 3 per cent of 1966, was not completely converted, and its market price declined over the period in question, that is to say, from April to December, 1958, from 97.50 in April to 94.50 in early July and to 92.13 at the end of December, a decline of about 5½ points. However, the typical holder of this victory bond converted into the new 4¼ per cent 1972's or 4½ per cent 1983's which on December 31 traded at 95.63—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask my hon. friend a question? I have to leave the house. I would be very interested in knowing whether the very short statement that my hon. friend has been reading for the last half hour is one of his own speeches. Would he kindly identify the document?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is always kind in his observations. I am referring to papers in my possession containing some factual statements which I hope will interest him and which I hope will engage his serious attention and study, for no one needs this information more than he.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend do what I am sure he is prepared to do, accommodate himself to the rules of the house and identify the document? Who is the author? How can we find the document to verify whether my hon. friend has read it all correctly? I am sure he would not leave anything out but he has been reading a long time and we would want to know that he has not missed any significant words. Who is the author? What is the publication?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I happen to be reading from some papers in my own file and I identify them as my papers in my file.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to a point of order. I submit that it is a rule of the house that speeches cannot be read even if they are described by hon. gentlemen as "my papers out of my files". If an hon. member of this house chooses to read a document, under the rules he must indicate who the author of that document is, where it has been published and where it can be obtained by other hon. members, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is not exempt from the rules which apply to the rest of us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Minister of Finance observes the rules of the house, and it is a pity that the voluble member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) does not. Mr. Speaker, all hon. members will realize that the members of the official opposition will have reason to tremble in their places if the rule of this house in regard to the reading of speeches is enforced. We will be hearing a great deal less of Professor Lamontagne's writings.

Mr. Robichaud: Shame on you! You cannot take it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have just heard the Gloucester edition of Professor Lamontagne.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I raised a serious point of order for Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend flatters me. I do not pretend to be able to carry all of these figures in my head at any one time. Therefore I continue with the assistance of the papers which I have in front of me and which contain the copious figures which I commend to my hon. friend, whose speeches would profit by being factually based upon correct figures.

The typical holder of the victory loan bond of 1966, converted into the new 4¼ per cent—

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I interrupt this two-day marathon speech and get a ruling on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is indeed preferable not to read speeches in their entirety. However, though it has been decided to enforce this ruling at the present session, it has been found almost impossible to force hon. members on both sides of the house to deliver their speeches without some assistance, and consequently a certain tolerance has been permitted in this particular matter. With regard to the point of order raised today, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is carrying on a lengthy speech which is fully documented, and he is making frequent reference to various documents. It is obvious that it would be difficult for him to give the precise contents of the documents to which he is referring unless he were reading the same. I think that to permit the hon. Minister of Finance to carry on with his comments is possibly the best way to hasten the business of the house today. I also think that the interjections which have been raised by the hon. members of the opposition are not really so serious that they deserve the very solemn ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, does Your Honour not think that the point of tolerance has been passed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it might so seem to an intolerant member like the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I substitute "long-suffering"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No one has inflicted more suffering on the house than good old Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Robichaud: They will not stand for such long speeches in external affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to say, when I was so frequently interrupted, that the typical holder of the victory bond of 1966, converted into the new 4¼ per cent of 1972 or the 4½ per cent of 1983, which at the end of 1958 traded at $95.63. He was then in a position where his new bond thus was about one point higher than his old bond just before the conversion, and was paying him 50 per cent more interest. The American holder of the last United States victory loan bond, the 2½ per cent bond of 1972, on the other hand, watched the market price of his bond decline from $97.38 in April to $85.81 at the year end, a total decline of more than 11½ points over the period, and at the end of that time he still possessed a bond paying only 2½ per cent interest.

It only remains to be added that in the 11-month period January to November new issues of provincial government bonds in 1958 payable in Canadian dollars equalled in amount those of 1957 and were 60 per cent larger than in 1956; marketings of new issues of municipal bonds payable in Canadian dollars were 74 per cent larger in 1958 than in 1957 and 32 per cent larger than in 1956. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that the things which have been said by hon. members of the opposition opposite about the conversion loan bonds just have not tallied with the facts.

Mr. Speaker, their first reaction in this house was a very proper one. You remember what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said when the conversion loan was announced in this house on July 14, 1958. Here is what he said, as reported at page 2203 of Hansard for that date, in reply to this announcement:

> Mr. Speaker, the minister has indeed made a very important statement, a statement on an operation which was forecast in this morning's press and which, indeed, in its detail is in the afternoon press. As the minister has said, the Canada conversion loan 1958, will be the largest operation of its kind in our history, even in our wartime history. He has emphasized quite rightly that for it to be successful it will require the enthusiastic co-operation of everybody concerned, and as I said in my contribution to the budget debate, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will hope that he will get that co-operation and all Canadians must hope that this operation will be a success.
> We in this country are entering upon some very difficult and complicated financing and re-financing moves which the minister has outlined to the house previously, and this is the first and a very important stage in what he himself has called a major financial operation. I repeat that we as Canadians must all hope that this operation will be a success and that, above all, the stability of our currency will be maintained throughout the operation.

Mr. Speaker, I commend that statement on the part of the Leader of the Opposition. It was a proper and patriotic reaction to the announcement which was made on that day. But compare that statement with the kind of statements we have listened to in this house yesterday and on previous occasions from members of the opposition opposite deriding the conversion loan. All I have to say on that subject is that the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition on July 14, 1958 was a responsible statement. The kind of statements we have heard from hon. members opposite since that time have been woefully irresponsible statements.

Mr. Speaker, we are now in the position where we have removed the overhang of those five maturities from the market. We heard some extraordinary arguments yesterday from the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). He said that the eighth and ninth victory loan issues really should not be regarded as earlier maturities than 1963 and 1966 because we should have announced that the call feature would not be exercised. The hon. member will have to give a good deal better explanation than that in order to satisfy people dealing in the market that a bond which is callable at an earlier date is not to be treated as one capable of maturity at an earlier date.

The hon. gentleman talked about the cost of the campaign. Well, let us not forget that here we accomplished a very substantial saving by rolling five refunding operations into one, and this tremendous operation which converted over $5.8 billion of outstanding government maturities gave us all the economies which flowed from rolling five campaigns into one.

I have spoken of the tremendous response of the public, of the envy of other countries of what Canada was able to do.

We know that the interest which is payable on these bonds has been grossly misrepresented by hon. members opposite. They keep talking about a rate of 4½ per cent. It is always 4½ per cent. I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the rate of 4½ per cent applied to only one of the four maturities and that the average rate, over-all, on the four maturities under the conversions that were actually made was 4 per cent. In the light of rates today we may be very thankful that we were able to convert this tremendous proportion of the outstanding Canadian victory bonds at a rate as favourable as the interest rate at which we converted that vast sum last summer. We could not do it at that rate today; we may be thankful that this was accomplished when it was.

What are the benefits which have flowed from that operation? We have heard all this talk about an increase in interest rates. Hon. members opposite always proceed on the blithe but hopelessly irrational assumption that if these bonds had been permitted to go to maturity they could have been renewed, refunded, or converted, at the same rate of 3 per cent. What a hopeless error! Is there no knowledge in the possession of hon. members opposite? Must their imagination always be directed toward destructive purposes? I think most of the school children in high schools in this country well know that the kind of assumption which underlay all the speeches made by hon. members opposite on this point is completely erroneous. Interest rates were rising anyway, and we are fortunate that we were able to complete this tremendous operation when we did.

Then we heard the hon. member for Ottawa West advance his amazing argument about capital gain. Well, there was indeed a cash adjustment payment made to holders of victory loan bonds who would convert, and there had to be this cash adjustment in order to equalize the five outstanding victory loan issues which were quoted in the market at various rates. Differences in maturity dates create differences in market values, and in converting them all to the same basis we had to equalize these differences in the quoted market valuations of these five issues. That is the reason the cash adjustments were made. We are told now that we put too high a value on the bonds. What hon. members are really complaining about is the success which attended this conversion loan operation. They are saying now: would it not have been better not to have given such good terms? Mr. Speaker, had we not given those terms we could not have converted over 90 per cent of these issues.

Then there was the complaint about the enlargement of the money supply at the time this was done. Why did the hon. member for Ottawa West not say that we did borrow from the banks during the period between July and the end of the year? Why did he not say that we kept out of the market during that period when the conversion loan campaign was proceeding? And as for the enlargement of the money supply, why did the hon. member not say to the house that while we did borrow a substantial amount from the bank in July of last year, all of it was paid back before the end of 1958? But the hon. member did not say that. He talked about the enlargement of the money supply in the summer. He did not talk about the contraction caused by the return to the banks of the borrowed money by the end of 1958. We hear only part of the story at any time from hon. members opposite.

Then we had the statement from the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) that only 55 per cent of the bonds had been extended in maturity. We have heard everything now. The fact is that every bond that was turned in was turned in for one of a later maturity. Those who held the last two victory bonds were not, of course, permitted to convert into the short first two of the four maturities offered in the conversion issue. This led the hon. member for Welland into making the extraordinary statement he did, a statement which would mislead anybody who would pay any attention to it. Let us put the facts alongside that misleading statement. The fact is that everyone who turned in a bond and converted it took in return a bond for a later maturity than the bond which was turned in.

I have spoken of the effect of the conversion loan in resisting the rising interest rates and declining values in the bond market in the last eight months of 1958. It is true that the Bank of Canada withdrew its support from the conversion issue at the end of October. That is not a government responsibility. I wish to make that perfectly clear. That was not done by the government; that was done by the Bank of Canada.

Then the hon. member for Ottawa West went on to say that people had suffered capital losses. Mr. Speaker, no one who has held his conversion loan bonds has suffered one copper of capital loss, neither will he suffer one copper of capital loss if he holds his bonds. What the hon. member for Ottawa West is trying to say is that anybody who sold his bonds on the market since the conversion would have sustained a loss. Well, yes —but we never promised that we would support that market. On the contrary, I point to the statement I made in this house in the first week of September, 1958, as the complete answer to that baseless assertion.

Did hon. members opposite consider telling this house what position we would have been in—not only the government, but Canada as a whole—if we had not undertaken that conversion operation last year and if we had arrived in January of this year facing, along with our other obligations, a maturity of $950 million of the fifth victory loan? They did not, and they never attempted to answer that question. They make all these assumptions, but they dodge the facts.

Nor have hon. members opposite faced the fact that as a result of the lengthening of the term of the outstanding Canadian debt we have introduced into the Canadian debt a measure of management and control which has not been present for many a year and which could not possibly have been achieved but for the success of the conversion loan campaign.

Why do not hon. members opposite, who have bleated at times about inflation, be frank and admit that the effect of the conversion loan was anti-inflationary? I quote a couple of sentences, if I may be permitted by the sensitive members opposite to do so, from the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada for the year 1958 at page 5:

> It must be remembered that important and valuable benefits were achieved by the success of the conversion loan campaign through the lengthening of the term of the debt. The reform of the structure of the government debt, and the contribution it made to improving conditions for the sale of future issues of government bonds to non-bank investors, were important elements in monetary policy in the broadest sense and an essential anti-inflationary achievement.

Those are not my words. Those are the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada. The results of the conversion loan campaign were constructive, they were beneficial and they were fair.

Mr. McIlraith: Just before the minister leaves the quotation he has placed on the record, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask if that was not the conclusion of a longer paragraph where the Bank of Canada report had just spoken about the money supply and was explaining what you might call the good side of the conversion loan? In other words, would the minister not agree that he has taken this statement out of context?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not taken that statement out of context at all.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, you have.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have taken the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada which are directly relevant to the point I am discussing. The hon. member for Laurier says, "Yes, you have". I do not suppose he has even read the report of the Bank of Canada. If he had he should know more about it and would not make such an empty, baseless assertion.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member for Laurier had made a contribution it would be much better than that made by the hon. member who now has the floor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the statement I have read by the governor of the Bank of Canada is directly on the point of the effects of the conversion loan campaign. He points here to the beneficial effects of the conversion loan campaign as well as to its anti-inflationary consequences in relation to another aspect of it.

I would leave this subject of the conversion loan campaign with only one further comment. It is to answer the entirely erroneous and misleading statements that have been made about the cost of the enterprise in terms of commissions. The commissions were normal or less than normal commissions on the sales of government bonds. On the 3 per cent 3¼-year issue the commission we paid was ¼ of 1 per cent. On the 3¾ per cent 7-year bond issue the commission was ½ of 1 per cent. On the 4¼ per cent 14-year bond issue the commission was ¾ of 1 per cent. On the 4½ per cent 25-year bond issue the commission was 1 per cent. The issuing fee on all maturities was ¼ of 1 per cent.

I remind the house that no sales commission or issuing fee was paid on bonds converted by the Bank of Canada, government accounts or chartered banks for their head office portfolios. Furthermore, there was an exempt list of about 2,500 names, including all the large corporate investors in Canada who were exempt on a co-operative basis by the investment dealers under the direction of a national committee and the commissions paid on sales to that very large exempt list were paid at the rate of ¼ of 1 per cent on the 3¼-year bond issue and ½ of 1 per cent on all other maturities. It remains only to add that the average rate on the total was less than that paid on Canada savings bonds.

There is one other, and I believe only one other, of the many misleading statements made yesterday which I should detain the house now to answer. The hon. member for Ottawa West evidently prided himself on being fully prepared for something that he knew I was going to say. You will find at the bottom of page 3069 of Hansard of yesterday that the hon. member was holding forth on the subject of the issuance of bonds by the government of Canada at a discount. If you look at the top of page 3070 you will find an interjection of mine in these words:

> The Liberal government did it many times.

The hon. member for Ottawa West promptly retorted:

> The Liberal government did not do it many times. I want to clear up that canard once and for all. I expected that interjection. If the minister will check the records he will find that when the Liberal government issued bonds below their face value, as indeed it did on many occasions, the bonds were of long term, the interest rate was lower and there was no such windfall to be made on them. There were no 13-month or other short term bonds of that sort issued in that way by the Liberal government.

It will be observed that the hon. member began to introduce numerous qualifications in his statement. The further along he went the more qualifications he introduced.

What are the facts? Here are some of the facts to which I alluded on an earlier occasion. The former Liberal government on November 15, 1935 put out an issue of $55 million of bonds maturing June 1, 1955 at 3 per cent and at the discount price of 98.75. On June 1, 1935 they put out an issue of $40 million of bonds maturing June 1, 1955 bearing interest at 3 per cent, at the discount price of 98.50. On June 15, 1950 they put out an issue of $350 million of bonds maturing June 15, 1968 bearing interest at 2¾ per cent, at the discount price of 99.50.

On January 15, 1953 they put out an issue of $100 million of bonds maturing January 15, 1978 at an interest rate of 3¾ per cent and a discount price of 97. On June 1, 1954 they put out an issue of $300 million maturing June 1, 1976 at 3¼ per cent, at a discount price of 99. On September 15, 1956 they put out an issue of $250 million of bonds maturing March 15, 1998 at an interest rate of 3¾ per cent, at a discount price of 97. Does that look as though the Liberal government put out issues at a discount or not?

Mr. McIlraith: It proves my point precisely.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But what is the hon. member's point?

Mr. McIlraith: If you will just read page 3070 of Hansard of yesterday's date you will find that those discounts were only put out on longer term issues with the exception of the very first one to which the minister referred which was brought out in 1935 at a time when the income tax had nothing like the impact it has had since world war II.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his interjection. I anticipated that he would say this and that is the reason I came prepared with the figures on the Liberal issues on discounts in the short term field.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Later. I do not wish to be interrupted in replying to this mistaken observation of the hon. member for Ottawa West. I should like to put him right and not leave him in suspense any longer.

Mr. Denis: Do not take more than two days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have here the figures. On November 1, 1950 the former government put out an issue of bonds maturing July 1, 1956—that was 5 years and 8 months—a total of $400 million of bonds bearing an interest rate of 2¼ per cent and a discount price of 99.375. On June 15, 1950 they put out an issue of $395 million of bonds maturing December 15, 1954—in other words, 4 years and 6 months—at an interest rate of 2 per cent and a discount price of 99.80. On March 1, 1950 they put out an issue of $325 million of bonds maturing March 1, 1953—in other words, a 3-year issue—bearing an interest rate of 1½ per cent and a discount price of 99.30.

On November 1, 1950, they put out an issue of $300 million of bonds maturing November 1, 1952. You will observe this was a 2-year issue. The interest rate was 1¾ per cent and the discount price 99.70. On November 1, 1951 they put out an issue of $200 million of bonds maturing November 1, 1953—in other words a 2-year issue—bearing an interest rate of 2 per cent and a discount price of 99.15. On November 1, 1952 they put out an issue of $150 million of bonds maturing December 15, 1954—in other words an issue of 2 years, 1½ months—bearing an interest rate of 2 per cent and a discount price of 97.75.

On November 1, 1952 they put out an issue of $300 million of bonds maturing November 1, 1953—in other words, a 1-year issue—bearing an interest rate of 2 per cent and a discount price of 99.05. On November 1, 1953 they put out an issue of $300 million of bonds maturing May 1, 1958—in other words, 4 years and 6 months—bearing an interest rate of 3 per cent and a discount price of 97.15.

On November 1, 1953 they put out an issue of $400 million, maturing July 1, 1955—in other words, one year and eight months—2¼ per cent coupon, and a discount price of 98; on March 1, 1953 they put out an issue of $200 million, maturing July 1, 1955—in other words two years and four months—at a coupon rate of 2¼ per cent, and a discount price of 97.85; on March 1, 1953 they put out an issue of $100 million, maturing July 1, 1954—in other words one year and four months—at a coupon rate of 2 per cent and a discount price of 98.75.

On October 1, 1954 they put out an issue of $700 million, maturing October 1, 1957—in other words a three-year issue—a 2 per cent issue and a discount price of 99.75; on June 1, 1954 they put out an issue of $550 million, maturing December 15, 1956—in other words, an issue of two years and six and one-half months—at a coupon rate of 2¼ per cent and a discount price of 99.70; on December 15, 1956 they put out an issue of $250 million of bonds, maturing December 15, 1957—in other words a one year issue—at a coupon rate of 2¼ per cent and a discount price of 98; on December 15, 1956 they put out an issue of $150 million, maturing June 15, 1957—in other words a six months issue—at 2¼ per cent, at a discount price of 99.125.

I hope the faulty memory, the failing memory of the hon. member for Ottawa West has now been corrected with this factual assistance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister now permit my question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister the corresponding figures for the period from 1921 to 1930? I find this so interesting that I am sure the house would like to hear them all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the hon. member's interest persists he will demonstrate sufficient industry to consult the records for those figures. If he is no longer capable of locating them, then I will be only too pleased to obtain them for him. I always like to do what should be done to assist those who are advancing in years and suffering decrepitude.

We are now faced with an amendment in which the hon. members opposite in one of their most extraordinary flights into the realm of Liberal fiction have—

Mr. Denis: Not vision.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said "fiction". The hon. member knows about fiction. What he knows about vision is jolly little; he knows plenty about fiction.

This is what they now invite the house to say in expressing itself. They are asking the house, if you please, to censure the government for what they say has been our failure in the field of debt management and monetary policy. I pointed out that the field of monetary policy does not lie within our control. We are responsible for fiscal policy and will bear our responsibility. But the hon. members opposite who are not familiar with the statutes in this respect have chosen then to go on to say that they have complaints about the conversion loan, about the Bank of Canada interest rate, about money supply, about the national debt and about the public debt charges.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I have succeeded in my endeavours to make it clear to the house that the situation in which we find ourselves today, that this rise in interest rates is attributable to conditions that are contributing, and contributing very substantially, to the forces of recovery at work in the Canadian economy today. What hon. members opposite are really irked about is not the slight increase in the interest rates or the situation in the bond market today. What irks hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, as has been clearly proven by their approach to this question today and on other occasions, is the fact that under the far-sighted action, the constructive action, the vigorous action for which the Canadian government I hope is entitled to its fair share of credit, measures have been concerted which are bringing about in the Canadian economy today that recovery which is sought, I think, by most Canadians even if hon. members opposite in the opposition do not seem to like it and seem to try to deride it and speak it down at every opportunity. Mr. Speaker, if they want to oppose the recovery of the Canadian economy why have they not the minimal courage to come out and say so in a straightforward way instead of introducing these smoke-screen, fake amendments?

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, if I were unkind I would say that while listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) speak today and yesterday I could not help but think of the filibustering tactics which the Conservatives are known to have used in the past where they read into the record everything but the telephone directory. In spite of the long and very laborious speech that the minister has made I doubt very much whether he has convinced anyone of the points he was trying to make.

In the opening remarks of this very laborious, lengthy and unconvincing speech, the Minister of Finance said this, as reported at page 3092 of Hansard, when speaking of the Liberals:

> They were under no inhibitions or restraints or restrictions in the things they had to say that pilloried the credit of Canada. Apparently the responsibility which they bear as members of parliament in discussing matters that mean a great deal to the welfare of Canada is something that is of small concern to them.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, there is a definite improvement in the approach of the Minister of Finance to such a question, a great improvement. Under the old formula the Minister of Finance would rant and rave and state that by bringing on such a debate the Liberal opposition was again playing the role of prophets of doom and gloom and that we in fact rejoice because the government's monetary policy has proven to be a failure, and that we were happy to have the bank rates at the highest point they have ever been in the history of Canada and that we were glad that there were marked indications of the lack of confidence in the government bond market.

Although the approach of the Minister of Finance may have improved, it is still ridiculous and unjust for the Minister of Finance to say that the situation in which we find ourselves today, where the economic welfare of the Canadian people is at stake, is one which is of little concern to any member in this house. As a matter of fact it is because we are very much concerned with the economic welfare of the Canadian people that we have introduced this debate. Because we fear that the monetary policies and the deficit and debt management of this government are unsound, we will in fact prove that the government was wrong and indeed there is ample cause for us to complain and to criticize the government.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we would be remiss if, under those conditions, we did not bring to the attention of the people of Canada the monetary pitfalls into which the government apparently is leading us. Since it is quite difficult, and understandably so, for the government to be impartial in its interpretation of the results of its own administration, it is the responsibility of the members of the opposition to keep the Canadian people informed of the problems and dangers they are now facing, and the mistakes the government has made in its debt management policy. It is our duty also to warn the Canadian people of the consequences that the administration may bring upon our whole economy.

The government has been reproaching the members of the opposition for bringing to the attention of the public the dangers that we face, for instance, in relation to the question of inflation. I am not alone in saying that it is not only the right but the obligation of members of the opposition to bring these important factors to the attention of the public. I should like to quote an article that appeared in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of April 23. This article was written by Hon. Robert Anderson, secretary of the treasury of the United States. He has this to say about inflation:

> There are those who say that in this period of stability no voice should be raised about the dangers of inflation. There are those who say that the realities of the moment should shield us from the disturbing prospects of what future inflation might produce. There are those who say that if we warn against future dangers we are contributors to the inflationary process.
> What would they have us do? Would they have us ignore the future consequences of what we now propose or do? Such a doctrine must be alien to those of you who have the responsibility of keeping the nation informed as to the problems of today and equally alert to the problems of tomorrow.

What the government has been preaching, and what the Minister of Finance has been preaching, has been to discourage us from bringing the facts to the attention of the Canadian public, when they are not flattering to the government. It would be unwise, indeed, for Canada not to be warned that the monetary policies and debt management of this government have already created and are creating a disquieting monetary problem in Canada today, the consequences of which we may feel even stronger in the relatively near future.

When we speak of debt management and monetary policies we are, of course, inclined to remember the great conversion loan which, as the minister reminded us this afternoon, was the greatest conversion loan in the history of Canada. He still insists that this great conversion loan was a colossal success. We also recall the eloquence with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance spoke over the nation-wide TV hookup when they were acting as bond salesmen. We recall the appeal they made at that time to the patriotism of the Canadian people. They said the Canadian people could do in peacetime what they had done in time of war. The conversion loan was the only way to arrest the creeping inflation that was being felt at that time. If the Canadian people subscribed to this loan they would not only be helping Canada but they would be helping themselves because the high interest rate would make them more financially secure. This conversion loan would also be a help to the provinces and municipalities in their borrowings. We might read into the record an item that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of July 15, 1958 which was entitled, "Sound Money Policy—The Prime Minister". It reads:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker tonight urged victory bond holders to participate in the huge bond conversion campaign with the same spirit and determination that brought distinction to Canada in the second world war.
> He emphasized, in speaking over the largest radio and television network ever set up in Canada, that there was no element of compulsion in the bond-swap plan.
>
> Holders of victory loan bonds didn't have to trade for the new, higher-yield conversion bonds if they didn't want to.
> But he argued that the conversion of some $6,400 million in victory bonds, together with other federal operations being planned and undertaken, "will make it possible for our nation to embark on a new era of peacetime prosperity far and beyond anything we have ever known".
> The conversion was "in every sense anti-inflationary," he added as he and Finance Minister Fleming joined forces to explain the conversion plan to the public. It was in line with a "sound money" policy, not involving any new borrowings by the government.

Later in the article, we find this:

> Mr. Fleming said the conversion loan will "simplify our debt structure" and make for more orderly debt management, easing the way to financing of future developments without creating inflation.
> This great mass of $6,500 million of short term bonds (the victory bonds) overhanging the bond market has produced a feeling of uncertainty in the minds of both borrowers and lenders.
> This uncertainty has made borrowing more difficult and more costly to the provinces and municipalities and to other borrowers. I am sure that when we have successfully refunded this great mass of bonds and spread them out over a much longer period of time, a healthier tone and much greater confidence will develop in the bond market.
> This will benefit not only the dominion government but also the provinces, the municipalities and directly or indirectly all other classes of borrowers as well.

According to the minister this conversion loan has proven to be a colossal success. I am not an expert in these financial matters nor are the 17 million Canadian people. It seems to me that the real test of whether or not this conversion loan was a success is to examine whether or not the government achieved the objective it had in mind when the conversion loan campaign was launched. Have we actually embarked on a new era of prosperity, the like of which we have never seen in the country? Are higher interest rates the new Conservative barometer which indicates a new prosperity we are having? Have increased interest rates made it more easy for the municipalities and provinces to be able to extricate themselves from the financial plight in which they are now placed?

It is evident now that the conversion loan was not a well thought out plan which the government had conceived in order to stabilize our economy and in order to stop inflation. It was no such thing. It was another political expedient and the government embarked on this method in order to face the great deficits that it foresaw not only for this year but for several years to come. Whether or not the government admits it, up to now the conversion loan has been a failure because it has not achieved the objectives which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance set forth with respect to the loan. The very fact that the bank rate increased after the anti-inflationary budget, as some people call it, was brought down a short time ago is complete indication that we have very little hope that the conversion loan will be a success in the future.

In his statement on television as part of his effort to sell the conversion loan the Prime Minister stated that the conversion loan was in every sense anti-inflationary. As a matter of fact, even for an amateur it was quite difficult to understand how the conversion loan would be anti-inflationary because in order to sell the bonds the government decided to pay an interest rate the like of which had never been paid before. Of course, if federal government bonds were bearing high interest rates all other bonds would indeed have to carry higher interest rates. To my mind that has started the ball of inflation rolling with even greater rapidity than before.

But there is another thing which I believe was inflationary and it is something which I think we might well stop to consider. The government fixed an artificial price on the bonds and bonds that were worth $94 on the market were being sold for $100. Those people who are greatly experienced in the matter of bonds, who have been dealing with bonds all their lives, indeed foresaw a wonderful opportunity whereby they would sell their bonds for $100, a price they had never hoped to get, and reinvest their gain in shorter term bonds. As a matter of fact, $371 million was "disinvested" in this way.

But the great majority of people who held bonds, the people to whom the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance appealed on television, the people to whom the Prime Minister gave assurances that Canadian bonds including victory bonds had the strength of the rock of Gibraltar, were a little dismayed, because of their inexperience in dealing with bonds, to see that the value of their bonds kept declining. As a result, they sold their bonds for $92.50, having lost confidence in the government and in the victory loan bonds. I am beginning to wonder whether there is not something absolutely immoral and economically unsound about fixing an artificial price for a bond which has no relation to its real market value.

In order to facilitate the flotation of the conversion loan the government also expanded its money supply so that the conversion loan, which was supposed to be anti-inflationary, was accompanied by an alarming increase in the money supply. In my opinion, since the Conservatives have had the responsibility of office the government has created every penny it has borrowed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What nonsense!

Mr. Cardin: This, of course, is no different from the straight printing of currency. For the more than 20 months from the end of July, 1957 to April 1, 1959 the entire increase in the government debt, including savings bonds, has been paralleled by an increase in the money supply. During that period the gross debt increased by $1,764 million and the money supply was increased by $1,795 million. Moreover, the increase in the marketable debt, that is, gross debt less savings bonds, has been $1,187 million which corresponds to an increase of $1,217 million in the holdings of the Bank of Canada and the commercial banks. This means that the Conservative government has in fact decided to monetize its deficit.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member tell me how the government can operate in the field of monetary policy?

Mr. Cardin: As a matter of fact, it has acted in the field of monetary policy—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government?

Mr. Cardin: —and what I have just said is in fact the result of the government's administration in this field.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister does not understand. He is hard of hearing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Laurier does not understand the difference between fiscal and monetary policy or the difference between the government and the Bank of Canada and their respective responsibilities.

Mr. Chevrier: I can explain it to you very quickly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were not here last night.

Mr. Chevrier: No, but I have listened to a lot of guff from you this afternoon.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is it over your head?

Mr. Cardin: As I say, I think it is clear that the Conservative government has in fact decided to monetize its deficit. I admit that I had to look into the matter of monetization and in my research I came across an article in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of April 23 by the secretary of the treasury of the United States, Robert B. Anderson, and this is what he says:

> The fact that fiscal matters are little understood, even by some rather prominent and otherwise well informed people, was brought home to me one day when a visitor in my office remarked: "You talk of the dangers of monetization of the debt, Mr. Secretary. You know I just don't believe there is such a danger, probably because I don't quite understand what monetization means."

The Hon. Robert Anderson gave this explanation:

> I said this to my visitor: "Now suppose I wanted to write cheques of $100 million starting tomorrow morning but the treasury was out of money. If I called up a bank and said, 'will you loan me $100 million at 3½ per cent for six months if I send you over a note to that effect,' the banker would probably say, 'yes, I will.'
> Where would he get the $100 million with which to credit the account of the United States treasury? Would he take it from the account of someone else? No, certainly not. He would merely create that much money, subject to reserve requirements, by crediting our account in that sum and accepting the government's note as an asset. When I had finished writing cheques for $100 million the operation would have added that sum to the money supply. Now certainly that approaches the same degree of monetization as if I had called down to the bureau of engraving and printing and said: 'Please print me up $100 million worth of greenbacks which I can pay out tomorrow.' "

That is exactly what the government has done. The government has paralleled the increase in our national debt by an equal increase in our money supply, and to my mind that is a classic definition of inflation.

Then, of course, it is also quite difficult to understand how, according to the Minister of Finance, the highest bank rates in Canada's history can be helpful to the provinces and the municipalities. We recall all the speeches that were made by members of the government and all the crocodile tears that were shed about the financial plight of the provinces and the municipalities and the fact that they were so greatly in debt it was very difficult for them to get out. We also remember the promises that were made that the provinces and the municipalities would have a greater share of the tax dollar and that borrowings would be made far more easy. It seems to me that the increase in the bank rate and the increase in rates generally will make it virtually impossible for the provinces and municipalities to extricate themselves from the financial plight they are in.

As a matter of fact, this particular increase can only ensure the provinces and the municipalities that they are going to stay with their debt. Promises made were to the effect, "We will allow you a greater share of the tax dollar; We will facilitate your borrowing powers," but as a matter of fact the action of the government means that the federal government will collect the tax and the municipalities and the provinces will have to borrow at higher interest rates.

I would like to quote also from the Montreal Gazette, an article which I think is quite accurate and which reflects very much my own way of thinking. It is an article by Mr. John Meyer in the Gazette for July 16, 1958:

> The federal government is exchanging one set of fixed charges, the interest it must pay on victory bonds outstanding, for another, higher, set.
> At the same time, it has established a higher base cost for credit. All other borrowing must now conform to these new rates at a subsequent higher cost to the borrowers.

The next paragraph is entitled, "Tough on Taxpayers":

> The higher cost of borrowing, in so far as governments are concerned, means an increase in the fixed charges which taxpayers must meet. It means that more of the tax revenue must now be committed to payment of interest rates, leaving less for other purposes.
> The higher cost of borrowing means too that the possibilities of tax reduction are that much more limited.

As a matter of fact, we really know now that that turned out to be very true. I continue:

> It means further that the proceeds of borrowing by corporations are reduced by the higher interest rates they must pay. Some corporations will be forced, undoubtedly, to postpone their borrowing or, alternatively, increase the amount: neither is desirable.
> Finally, it will mean an increased American demand for Canadian dollars as junior governments and corporations try to reduce their borrowing costs by borrowing at the lower interest rates prevailing in the United States.
> And that demand for Canadian funds will push an already high premium higher still, to the further disadvantage of Canadian producers for export and domestic consumption alike.

Does this sound, as though we were entering into a new era of prosperity, the like of which we have never seen before? Does this sound as though we were entering upon a sound monetary policy? The conversion loan and all that goes with it was supposed to be anti-inflationary in every respect. I do not believe that anyone can come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister did, and as the Minister of Finance has today when he claims his conversion loan was indeed a complete success.

Before finishing there is something I would like to read into the record which I believe is important at this time. It is an extract from a television broadcast that was made on April 21, 1959. I believe this transcription to be correct. It was taken from the sound track directly. However, if it is not correct I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance will correct me, and I wish to be fair about this.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. member who took it? Did my hon. friend take it?

Mr. Cardin: No, I did not take it, but it was taken from the sound track.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Who did take it?

Mr. Cardin: I could not tell my hon. friend who took it, but it was taken by a machine and transcribed by one of the stenographers. However, if the hon. minister feels it is not correct then I shall be happy to have his correction. During the conversation questions were asked of the minister. One of these questions, asked by Mr. Blakely, was:

> But governments can also contribute to high costs. I know that the Conservatives argued this most forcefully for about 22 years. They used to say, what's wrong with this Liberal government? They say that if you spend your own money it is inflationary, but if they take it from you and spend it for you, why then, it is non-inflationary. What nonsense this is. Are you not doing the same thing here?

Then the Minister of Finance:

> No, no, no, no. You are quoting the things that we said in the days in opposition, when the government of that day was making a virtue of taking money from people, not to meet the exigencies of balancing the budget or even coming close to it or in view to reducing a deficit. But they were taking money far more than what was needed to meet the ordinary expenses of government on the theory that they could do a better job of managing the expenditure and handling of the people's money than they could do themselves, and we never have been of that opinion and I hope we never will.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I could make the very obvious observation that it must take an incredible amount of gall, sanctimony and cockiness for the Minister of Finance to make such a self-accusing and boomerang statement so soon after the "We knew it all" budget that he brought down just a few weeks ago. But if this statement means anything at all it means that the government does not intend to budget for a surplus in order to reduce the national debt, and that the government proposes to continue to balance the increase in the national debt by an increase in the money supply. As I said before, I think that is absolutely inflationary and detrimental to the Canadian economy.

The last thing I should like to mention, is this. In his remarks the minister asked that the Liberal opposition should make some constructive suggestions. We feel a little as though it would be almost impertinent on the part of the Liberal opposition to make any suggestion to the Conservative government who, in 1957, had, according to them, all the answers and all the solutions.

An hon. Member: Give them the chance and they will hang themselves.

Mr. Cardin: I would say, that I am a little surprised now to hear, after 20 months in office, the Minister of Finance calling on the Liberals for help in order to get himself out of the predicament he has put himself into. But if we were to make suggestions from this side of the house, then we would have to start right from the beginning. First of all, the Liberals would not have made the extravagant promises which the Conservatives made, and not having made the promises we would not have such a great debt. Not having the great debt we would not have had to borrow so much. Not having had to borrow so much we would not have had to raise the interest rate so high. Not having had to raise the interest rate so high we would not have had to have such an increase in the supply of money. Not having had to have such an increase in the supply of money, we would not have had as much inflation. Not having as much inflation we could go back to the very useful method of budgeting for a surplus when there was the danger of inflation, and bugeting for a deficit when there was a danger of recession.

I will admit that this method, which proved to be so successful in the past, is not as spectacular or as fancy as the Conservative's great conversion loan, but it certainly had one distinct advantage—it worked.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): In his long introductory remarks last evening and in his two-hour marathon speech this afternoon, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has insisted that the government has no influence on the rate established by the Bank of Canada for the chartered banks. And then he told us that interest rates have now returned to those of the summer of 1957, but he was very careful to add that the government has no jurisdiction over them. He next accused members of the opposition of flaring up when interest rates are rising, and of saying nothing when interest rates were going down. We know where the Minister of Finance was when the rates were going down, and we know where he is when the rates are going up. In fact, when the rates were going down the minister, both inside and outside this house, took credit, or gave credit to the government, for the decline in the rates, and I should like to remind him at this time of the reply he gave in this chamber a little over a year ago on January 31, 1958, as reported on page 4089 of Hansard, when he was asked a question by the then hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): May I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Can he inform the house if this change from a tight money position has been the result of some action by the government, and what the action has been?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been action on the part of the government. I do not say that the reduction is attributable entirely to the government's action, but it certainly is in line with government policy, and is in part attributable to it. The fact is that we have been seeking to bring about, with the means open to us, a reduction in this rate. I am not at liberty, and it has never been the practice, to indicate to the house all the government operations or the operations of the fiscal agent of the government in these matters, but I can assure my hon. friend that this reduction, which I am happy to report this morning, is fully in line with government policy.

Those were the words of the Minister of Finance when interest rates were going down.

Mr. Pickersgill: But that was before the election.

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, fortunately for them it was before the election. But what is the minister's new doctrine in this respect? The doctrine which he expressed last evening was that the government is responsible for fiscal policy and that the Bank of Canada is responsible for monetary policy, including the bank rate. This is a complete vindication of what Mr. Harris was saying when he was minister of finance. It is, in fact, exactly what he used to say. What a change has come about in the attitude taken by the minister. He contends that our amendment seeks to hold the government responsible for all that has happened in the field of monetary action. That is not so. We certainly did not do this in our amendment, and I will come to that later on. But that is certainly what the minister was doing when he was sitting on this side of the house as the hon. member for Eglinton. Does this mean that the minister, then, had not read the statute law enacted by this parliament, as he accused some of the members on this side of the house of not doing when he spoke last evening and this afternoon? It certainly would appear so if we are to judge the minister by the statements he made when he was sitting on the opposition side.

I am sure that no one who followed the remarks made by the minister could fail to realize that the hon. gentleman has completely missed the nature of our indictment. He is trying to avoid his responsibilities and trying to blame the Bank of Canada for what is happening today in the field of debt management and monetary policy. It is typical of the attitude of the present government to lay all their troubles on the shoulders of someone else, if not on the shoulders of the previous administration, then on those of the Bank of Canada. What does our indictment really seek to do? We blame the government for the mistakes and inequities associated with the conversion loan, which was a failure notwithstanding the statement made this afternoon by the minister himself. We blame the government for the error it made when it offered to buy victory bonds at par, thereby inducing well-informed people not to convert. We blame the government for including the seventh, eighth and ninth victory issues in the operation, thereby giving a scope to the procedure which was quite unnecessary and ill-timed in the light of the depressed condition of the market.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question? Are we to infer from his remarks that he approves of the conversion loan as applied to the fifth and sixth victory loans?

Mr. Robichaud: If there was a necessity to convert those loans, the hon. gentleman was in a better position to obtain this information than any member on the opposition side.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. Robichaud: We have heard a great deal from the minister, and it is only right that private members should now have a chance to express their opinions.

We accuse the government of behaving without regard for equity in excluding from the operation other bond holders who were not offered the same generous conditions, and we also accuse the government of failure to restore confidence in the bond market, as is evident from what is happening today; failure to prevent a substantial increase in the money supply, and failure to extend the term of the debt held by the public.

What were the results of those errors and this lack of equity? What has been the result of this costly failure? The conversion operation, as has been said by other hon. members, is costing an additional $350 million to the Canadian taxpayer. It has contributed to higher interest rates in Canada, rates which impose a new burden on provinces, municipalities and other small borrowers. Is the Bank of Canada to blame for the conversion loan and its failure? Certainly not. Who appeared on television trying to persuade Canadians to invest in their country's future? Was it not the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance, as stated this afternoon by my colleague from Richelieu-Vercheres? We are blaming this government for the highest interest rates we have had since the bank was established.

We know, of course, that the bank has complete authority to determine its own rate and we think the bank was perfectly justified and remains justified in fixing its rate at ¼ of 1 per cent higher than the treasury bill rate because otherwise it could easily be accused of subsidizing the commercial banks. But since this perfectly sensible relationship exists, the government is at least indirectly responsible for the present highest bank rate in our history. It is certainly responsible for the treasury bill rate. While it is true, as the minister said, that in percentage terms the treasury bill rate rose by 133 per cent within a space of 20 months when the Liberals were in office, it is equally true that under this Conservative government since the end of July 1958, in less than 10 months, the same rate increased by more than 550 per cent from 0.87 per cent to 4.95 or 4.97 per cent. Who is to blame for this? The bank or the government?

We blame this government for the largest expansion of money supply in any year since the war. The minister said that the bank is responsible for the money supply and that the government assumes responsibility for debt management. We contend, however, that the substantial expansion of the money supply was not decided on economic grounds and on the basis of a sound monetary policy.

I recall that when speaking in this house on November 14, 1957, the Minister of Finance enumerated some of the problems which he said the present government had inherited from its predecessor. Among those problems he mentioned the rising cost of living, the highest interest rates in a generation, the tightness of money and credit conditions, a substantial measure of unemployment considerably larger than in the previous year and "very disturbed" dominion-provincial relations, to use the minister's own words. He also mentioned that the provinces and municipalities were complaining about the injustices received at the hands of the Liberal government. He also referred to the fact that the public till was practically empty. If the public till was practically empty in June of 1957, what is it today after less than two years of Conservative administration? The public debt of this country has been substantially increased. We will have a deficit of $1½ billion in less than two years of Conservative administration.

The amendment introduced yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) clearly expresses the regret of this house for the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy. The errors and inadequacies associated with the conversion loan of last fall have been dealt with at length yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan). It is no wonder that Canada is faced today with the highest public debt charges ever experienced in this country. How could it be otherwise when there are added costs of between $60 million and $70 million for the conversion loan not including the extra interest which the taxpayers are asked to pay. Today the till is not only empty but its bottom is falling apart and the Canadian taxpayers are being asked to replenish a deficit of over $1½ billion. This is a part of the record of the present government in the last one and a half years.

I was rather amazed last evening to compare the remarks made by the Minister of Finance with those he made on November 14, 1957, as reported at page 1162 of Hansard. I quote the minister's own words as follows:

> I am happy to say to you, sir, as I said on a similar occasion several days ago, that the threat of inflation in Canada has now been checked.

What a discrepancy exists between the statement made by the minister on that occasion and the warning contained in the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance being his statement of accounts for the year 1958. What confusion exists in this regard. May I be permitted to follow the example of the minister and quote not from the 1956 report but from the 1958 report of the Bank of Canada where we find on page 10 a most interesting statement. The minister can rest at ease because I shall limit myself to the reading of one paragraph and not quote 15 paragraphs as he did last evening in the course of his remarks. On page 10 we find the following words:

> In a country like Canada, which is greatly influenced by conditions in foreign markets, it is of course impossible to insulate our economy entirely from the contagion of inflationary influences originating abroad. We can, however, by our own actions restrain inflationary factors of domestic origin and prevent them from getting out of control. If we fail in this, our costs of production will rise above those of other countries with which we trade or with which we compete in foreign markets, with serious consequences for everyone in Canada. We in Canada can also exert our efforts in the international field towards achieving conditions of durable economic growth and monetary stability throughout the world.

Here we had a warning from the governor of the Bank of Canada to the effect that the threat of inflation was far from being checked as the minister claimed it was on November 14 of 1957.

Let me place on the record a further statement made by the minister in November 1957. This has to do directly with the bank rate situation. Again, at page 1162 of Hansard of November 14, 1957, we find a statement by the minister in these words:

In this house two days ago I referred to the fact that in the past two months interest rates paid by this country on its treasury bills had dropped by 3/10 of 1 per cent. I am happy to report that in the weekly issue of treasury bills today we have achieved a further reduction which now brings the reduction in the last two months to 4/10 of 1 per cent.

It was the minister who claimed "We have achieved a further reduction" on that occasion but today when the rates are going up he tells us that the government has no responsibility and that it is the responsibility of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member distinguish between treasury bill rates and Bank of Canada rates?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I point out that the distinction has been made two or three times in the course of this debate—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have missed it.

Mr. Robichaud: —by hon. members who have spoken and it was made by the minister himself in his lengthy marathon speech.

The minister clearly stated and I repeat again:

I am happy to report that in the weekly issue of treasury bills today we have achieved a further reduction—

When things are going well the minister is prepared to take full credit but when the rates go up—and this was especially true when the Liberals were in power—the minister blames someone else. He used to say the Liberal government was responsible when the rates went up during the time we were in office but today when we have a Conservative government the minister tells us when the rates go up it is the responsibility of the Bank of Canada. The minister admitted this last evening when he stated as reported at page 3099 of Hansard of April 27:

The government does not exercise any sway in the field of monetary policy.

Those are the minister's own words. He went on to say:

The right to issue currency is vested exclusively in the Bank of Canada. Notwithstanding this fact this misguided amendment—

That is how the minister characterized our amendment. I continue:

—seeks to hold the government responsible for all that has happened in the field of monetary action.

How clearly he expressed his opinion when he stated further on:

I point out to you that the government of Canada has no responsibility whatever for the establishment of the Bank of Canada rate.

Again, Mr. Speaker, no responsibility when the rates are going up but all the responsibility and credit when the rates are going down; this is another proof of the inconsistency of the Minister of Finance who is prepared to take the credit when the rates are going down but relegates the responsibility to where it belongs when the rates are going up.

It is not very long ago since we heard the Minister of Finance state in this house that the monetary policy of the present government was helping the municipalities by making it easier for them to borrow. In other words, faced with the largest expansion of the monetary system in any year since the war, with the largest increases in peacetime in the national debt, the highest public interest charges in Canada's history and the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established, the Minister of Finance tells the provincial governments and the municipalities: "We will tax; we will collect, but you can borrow". He is very careful, however, not to mention that these municipalities will have to borrow under the highest interest rate in many generations; thus adding further to their heavy burden of taxation.

How different is the attitude of the Minister of Finance today compared with statements which he made previously either in this house or outside of this house! I mentioned a while ago some of the statements he made in his first year as Minister of Finance. It is true that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) has claimed that there is a difference between statements made outside this house and those made inside the house. Other members of the present government have made the same claim. They make a difference between statements made as pre-election promises and accomplished facts when they have the responsibility of power. How can the minister account for the statement he made on February 23, 1958, when he said:

We have eased the burdens of the municipal governments by bringing about easier credit and lower interest rates.

How can he account for the statement he made at St. Paul, Quebec, and at Montmagny on September 28, 1958, exactly seven months ago when he said:

> Credit is much easier; the provinces and municipalities in their financial operations will derive much benefit from this conversion operation.

It is now true that the benefits which were mentioned by the Minister of Finance have turned out today to be the highest interest rates in Canada's history.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are not.

Mr. Robichaud: It was on July 14, 1958, in an announcement over the radio and TV about the Canada conversion loan that the Minister of Finance said:

> Through this Canada conversion loan, the government is reaffirming its determination to follow policies that will maintain the soundness of our currency and the purchasing power of your dollar.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Robichaud: And again, when referring to higher interest rates, one could but recall that statement—

Mr. Regnier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is reading his speech.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member was not in the house this afternoon when the same point was raised and the Speaker ruled very clearly on the issue at that time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): There is a difference between the Minister of Finance making a technical speech and an hon. member making a speech.

Mr. Speaker: The point has been raised by the hon. member that the hon. member for Gloucester is reading his speech. The hon. member for Gloucester knows that the practices do not permit the reading of his speech verbatim, and the house will rely on him not to breach such a practice.

Mr. Chevrier: May I simply and respectfully draw to your attention the ruling which was made prior to this speech being made when the minister rose and spoke this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: I was not aware that such a ruling had been made. The ruling of the house is that in introducing technical and difficult matters, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), or other persons making principal speeches, are allowed to follow their text more closely than other members are expected to do. I have not heard the hon. member for Gloucester. He can tell us what he is doing and then we shall proceed.

Mr. Robichaud: I have substantial notes, Mr. Speaker, and I have been reading some quotations from press reports and radio and television talks by the minister himself, and these had to be quoted verbatim. I have given the reference, the dates and the places where the remarks and the statements have been made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which the minister did not do.

Mr. Robichaud: Again I want to refer to the statement which was made about higher interest rates. One could not but recall the statement which was made in Calgary on March 14, 1958, by the Prime Minister when he claimed that:

> Interest rates had fallen sharply as a result of government action since last June, from a high of 4.33 per cent to 2.89 per cent in recent weeks.

Again the Prime Minister was taking full credit for the reduction when he said the reduction had come about "as a result of government action since last June". Today the Minister of Finance and his government are dodging the responsibility when the interest rates are on the way up and are the highest in Canada's history.

Again, when speaking in Halifax on March 24, 1958, the Prime Minister in referring to finance, said, and I quote from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 25, 1958:

> This government reversed the tight monetary policy of the Liberals and the interest rates have been decreased from 4.3 to 2.8 per cent.

The taxpayers today have not forgotten his federal election telecast on May 22, 1957, when the Prime Minister said:

> "I think I might summarize our general view in this regard. We feel that the action taken by the government—and after all it was the government that took the action,"—said the Prime Minister, "in restricting credit, raising interest rates and the like, has not been effective."

Following the example of his Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister himself—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps this would be a convenient place for the hon. member to interrupt himself.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Why do you not mark the page so you will know where to begin?

Mr. Pickersgill: He will also know where to end.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock, I had just brought to the attention of the house a statement made by the Prime Minister on May 27, 1957. He said, "We feel that the action taken by the government—and after all it was the government that took the action—in restricting credit, raising interest rates and the like, has not been effective." In this case the Prime Minister followed the example of his Minister of Finance who was blaming the raising of interest rates on the previous government, but he will not take the responsibility for similar or even larger increases under his own administration.

It was the same Prime Minister who, as reported in the London Free Press of June 7, 1957, said in Woodstock, Ontario:

> The Conservative party in the house had insisted that the government itself first of all should cut its unnecessary expenditures, should reduce the high cost of big government. The Conservative party had urged tax reductions to stimulate production and sales of Canadian products—not higher interest rates which curtailed production and made Canadian products costlier and more difficult to sell.

Now, what is the effect today of the policies of the present government in the field of debt management? If the government has any responsibility at all, is it not contributing, directly as well as indirectly, by hidden taxation and by these high public debt charges to increasing consumer charges and adding to inflation?

The amendment which was introduced yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) mentioned five points of indictment. The first one reads:

> This house regrets the ill-conceived and irresponsible actions of the government in the field of debt management and monetary policy which have been characterized by:
> 1. The errors and inequities associated with the conversion loan;

We have heard the Minister of Finance speak for over two hours and a half, but he has not convinced this house or given any worthwhile explanation as to why the seventh, eighth and ninth victory loans were converted. The errors and inequities in connection with this conversion loan were also extended through the establishment of an artificial market for victory bonds by the action of the Bank of Canada. In fact, the Bank of Canada bought the major portion of the bonds and allowed the bondholders who did not convert to make windfall gains. This resulted in a failure to restore confidence in the bond market, and today the country is facing evidence of this in the falling value of government bonds.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

The second point in the amendment reads:

> 2. The highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established;

This point was not denied by the Minister of Finance. Is it not a fact that Canada today is facing the highest bank rate since the Bank of Canada was established? The minister admitted the interest rate was based on the treasury bill rate. In fact, he admitted that the Bank of Canada added ¼ of 1 per cent to the treasury bill rate in order to set its interest rate. What did the Minister of Finance tell us about the actions that had been taken by this government to reduce the interest rate on treasury bills? He told us absolutely nothing. He had plenty of time to do it. As I mentioned before, he spoke for over 2½ hours, but he did not indicate any action taken by this government to reduce the treasury bill rate.

The third point in the amendment reads:

> 3. The largest expansion of the monetary supply in any year since the war;

Again, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did not deny this charge. Is it true or is it false that we have today the largest expansion of money supply in any year since the war? I am quite sure no one has heard the Minister of Finance call this assertion rubbish, nonsense or rot, so we must assume that the minister admits that today we have the largest expansion of the money supply in any year since the war.

The fourth point was:

> 4. The greatest increase in peacetime in the national debt;

Again, this assertion was not denied by the Minister of Finance. We on this side of the house feel this is only the start because the greatest increase in the national debt occurred after only 18 months of Conservative administration. What will it be when this government has been in power for three or four years?

An hon. Member: Ten.

Mr. Robichaud: I hear one member say "ten". I hope, for the good of the country, we will not have to face such a situation.

The fifth point was:

> 5. The highest public debt charges in Canada's history.

Is this right or wrong? If it had been wrong we would have heard the Minister of Finance interjecting "nonsense" or "it is not true". The fact that the minister did not call it nonsense shows he agrees with this statement. Oh, I know that the Minister without Portfolio for Newfoundland would say, "So what; what is the difference?" It makes a big difference to the taxpayers of this country.

What are the requirements which the Minister of Finance will have to face in the years ahead? The minister will have to again face a deficit in the year 1959-60 of over $850 million. The minister will have to provide refunding for $1,735 million before April 2, 1960. How is he going to raise the money? There are only three courses of action open to him. The first one is to increase the money supply. The second one is to increase the interest rate on government bonds, and thus make them more attractive. His third course —well, we hope he never has to take this course—would be to use force or coercion to get the money he requires. The minister did not have time to deal with this most important question in his long speech.

How is he going to get these requirements for 1959-60 which amount to well over $2.5 billion? Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance, in his swan song this afternoon, did not see fit to give us this information.

We on this side of the house are sincerely hoping that it will not be the end of the Minister of Finance. Rumours are circulating that the Prime Minister has better days ahead for the present Minister of Finance but we also realize the predicament of the Prime Minister in trying to find a successor for the present minister. I know that someone may say, "Well, maybe it could be the Minister of Justice". We all recall the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as reported in the Vancouver Sun of March 29, 1958:

> Justice minister Fulton said Friday night the Bank of Canada will be made more responsible to parliament if the Conservatives are re-elected in the federal balloting Monday.

In view of the present policy of the government we cannot see how the minister can qualify. We have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees). The Minister of Transport does not believe too much in budgets. After all, has he not said that very little is accomplished by budgets? We know that the government of this country needs a budget and with the Minister of Transport as minister of finance we might have to do without one.

Then there is the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) who believes in two kinds of promises, those made inside the house and those made outside the house. It would be unfortunate if the Prime Minister had such a man as minister of finance because he could not trust the promises or statements he made outside the house. Then we have the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), but I think it would be too much of a task for the Solicitor General because it would be imposing capital punishment on himself.

We also have the two ministers without portfolio. Maybe the Prime Minister will choose them. They could act together, be given certain responsibilities for a change and without additional cost to the treasury because they would share the task. With regard to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton), who has just taken his seat, I am afraid that his vision might be too much for the country to face because the deficits which would be the result of his vision would be almost unbelievable. As far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) is concerned, we might be against him taking the office because, as I said a while ago, we want a budget. The Minister of Trade and Commerce might want to keep the budget secret and we would be up against it again. The budget might be one of those hidden reports which are so hard to get and if he ever produced it we might have to go to the national Liberal federation to get copies of it.

Mr. Speaker: It being 8.15 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment now before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN MEMBERS' INDEMNITIES

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance, and I am very pleased to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in the house. This is a subject to which I have given considerable thought, and it is one which is of interest to all hon. members in this house. It concerns the question of the inadequate recompense paid to members of parliament in the present economic circumstances.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am making these remarks as an individual and that I have had no consultation with my party colleagues in regard to them. I feel this is a grievance which will need to be examined, and need to be examined fairly soon. This particular parliament happens to contain a higher proportion of younger men than was found in most previous parliaments and it is upon these younger men, I think, that the cost of living, and of performing the duties of a member of parliament, bears most hardly. It is true that there are a number of gentlemen who are members of parliament who do not need the extra increment which might come from a change, but the majority of members or, at least, many of them, are suffering at the present time from being involved in expenses so high that they do not allow them to carry on a proper family life and discharge their duties properly.

I know it can be said that each one of us got himself into this position and that we can get ourselves out of it. I know this is true, and I know, also, that there are many hon. members of this house who are now thinking of ways and means of getting themselves out of it without disturbing the loyalties which they have built up in their constituents. It seems to me that this is a serious question, when there are so many hon. members who are wondering how they can continue in present circumstances. It seems to me that if we want to keep the best and most active people here we will have to pay them more. And if people say to me, as no doubt some of my constituents will say to me "You are probably being overpaid now", I am willing to stand up and tell them "It is time you paid us what we are worth for the job we are doing." I hope other hon. members will say the same to their constituents.

I do not wish to go on developing this subject at the moment. If nothing is done this session, I firmly intend to put a resolution on the order paper next session asking that the government consider establishing a salary of at least $12,000 plus expense accounts paid to, at least, $3,000 a year. At any rate, that will open up the discussion. However, I hope that in view of the opinion generally held by the majority of hon. members in this house the government will give very serious consideration to the whole problem.

I cannot leave this topic without saying one word in passing about the gentlemen who report on the activities of this house and upon the doings of the members of parliament. It always seems to me that there is a tendency on their part to ridicule members of parliament and politicians in general as always looking for something extra which, perhaps, they do not deserve. I hope some of them will get down to work and do some research into the facts. Perhaps they would then find out how burdensome the situation has become for members of parliament at the present time. I think it would not be difficult to produce some actual evidence which would bear out what I have said tonight.

It is customary, when raising a grievance such as this, for anyone concerned to follow on. All hon. members have the opportunity —it is like asking a supplementary question —and if there is agreement with what I have said, I hope this opportunity will be taken to express it.

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I agree with the comments of a member of the C.C.F. party. Still less do I agree with the philosophy adopted, or the stand taken by the C.C.F. group in this house, but I may say that I am in complete agreement with the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher).

I should think offhand that many hon. members of this house if indeed not the majority of them are in agreement with the hon. member's remarks, but whether or not they will stand up and say anything at this point is another question. The possibility of any increase in our salaries or expense allowances is probably a matter for the government to decide. I am a new member of this house and perhaps I am being somewhat presumptuous in getting up and stating my views and making reference to my own circumstances. As a young man out of this house I perhaps might not be making enough money per se. Nevertheless if the press or other interested people in Canada would care to take a second look at the amount of money it costs us to come down to parliament to serve as members of this house I believe they would be quite prepared to say we should be allowed an increase whether it be in the form of an increased car allowance, or an increment in regard to expense allowances, a salary increase or whatever form it may take.

May I say only this with respect to my own position. I came out of law school only three years ago. Emerging from school I found myself in debt. Since becoming a member of parliament and coming to Ottawa to represent the people of my constituency—which was represented formerly by a member of the C.C.F. party—I have found myself further in debt than I was before. I say this for the benefit of the cabinet which I see here in appropriate numbers tonight. I say this only in recognition of the heavy duties imposed on our cabinet ministers. If those hon. gentlemen were free to state their cases this evening they would probably agree with my remarks. I do not like to use the word "underpaid" in reference to members of parliament and of the cabinet but I am sure hon. gentlemen would agree with me that they are not reimbursed to the full extent of the expenses imposed on them by their duties in office.

It is with these few words that I as a member of the Conservative party support the hon. member for Port Arthur. As a new member of this house perhaps my remarks will be taken the wrong way but I have spoken this evening as a young man who has recently come into the house and perhaps my circumstances are somewhat similar to those of the hon. member for Port Arthur. I wholeheartedly support everything he has said tonight.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Here is another poor law student.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate rising on the same point?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Stormont.

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that the previous speaker in this debate is a roommate of mine, I want to make it clear that there has been no collusion between us even though I am rising to address myself to the same subject.

I wish to commend the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) for his courage and integrity in raising this matter. One factor we should consider is this. We in North America are living in a capitalistic and commercial economy where there is a price tag on everything. There exists here a tendency to judge things according to the value on the price tag and the attention accorded hon. members of this house is largely dependent on the amount that is paid them.

Although this is beyond my personal sphere of concern I believe the same thing applies to members of the judiciary. I believe that the most drastically underpaid and underestimated persons in this country are members of the judiciary. It should be remembered that originally they were accorded the status of law lords with all the perquisites involved under the British system of law.

Then next to members of the judiciary I would say that men in public life, Canadian politicians, are the most underpaid and underestimated group. When I think that the manager of an innocuous little manufacturing concern is probably earning five or six times the amount paid the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of this country I am appalled. It is a fantastic situation when one considers the relative responsibilities and capabilities of the two men. For that reason alone, if for no other, I believe that the matter of the remuneration paid to those in public life should be the subject of a thorough investigation.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO AID FISHERMEN

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on a very different grievance. I am rising to speak primarily on behalf of my own constituents who in the main, I can assure the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) and those other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, have very much lower incomes than we in this house have and have no tax-free expense accounts or anything of that sort.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: In saying that I am not implying any kind of criticism of what was said by these hon. members at all. I am merely seeking to draw attention to the fact that the fishing industry, which I think unfortunately and regrettably in this country still has perhaps a lower average income than any other industry in Canada although it is the oldest industry in the nation, there was in part of the community where fishing is the main occupation a very regrettable failure of the fisheries last year. I am going to try in the most uncontroversial way I am capable of, to make an appeal to the government and particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—and I am very glad he is here this evening—on behalf of this group of citizens.

In order to found my grievance I should like briefly to refer to a question which was asked by my friend the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker) on April 14. He directed his question to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). I will not even read the question. It had to do with price supports. I should, however, like to read one paragraph of the minister's answer as reported at page 2659 of Hansard of April 14, in which the minister said:

[Mr. Campbell.]

> I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has in mind chiefly the problem which everyone admits existed in Newfoundland last year. The fisheries prices support board held special meetings last September in Halifax and St. John's to look into the problem of the income of the Newfoundland fishermen who fish cod to be processed into dried salt cod. The advice of the fisheries prices support board was that the problem in Newfoundland was one of catch failure rather than of prices—

I believe the minister was completely right in expressing that view. If it is not contrary to the rules to say so I should like to state that although the minister and I do not agree politically I do appreciate—and I think all hon. members who are interested in the fisheries appreciate—the genuine interest that the minister has shown in the fishermen ever since he became Minister of Fisheries. I believe the minister has done everything he could be reasonably expected to do within the sphere of his department to help the fishermen and we appreciate it. I am glad to have the chance to say so. I made this comment in the committee but I am very glad to say so in this chamber if I am not transgressing the rules of the house.

This problem is one that the minister rightly pointed out in the committee. I know I should not be talking about the proceedings of the committee and I am not going to break the rules of the house by referring to it in detail. The minister pointed out that to deal with this problem was something for the cabinet and quite beyond the scope of one minister. That, of course, is quite right.

I should like to recall to the Prime Minister's mind what I am sure I do not need to do because I am sure it is very much in his mind, but I wish simply to remind him of what he said in another context in the house on August 30 of last year when he was speaking about agricultural policy. He made this statement which I am sure everyone in the house accepts in principle:

> What we are trying to do is establish a concept of national policy designed to ensure equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

Now I must say I was also encouraged to make my plea this evening by certain words used by the Prime Minister on television the other evening about the province, for part of which I am a member. I would just like to recall to hon. members' minds the words used by the Prime Minister—a very brief part of them:

> There should be neither doubt nor misunderstanding about the equality of Newfoundland's status in the Canadian partnership. That equality exists as a right of our newest province's membership in the Canadian confederation. It is the earnest hope of my government that the differences may be settled as quickly as possible so that we may get together,—

And these are the words I especially want to draw to the attention of the house:

—and achieve together the raising of the general standard of living of the province and its people to that which we covet for all Canadians.

This is a problem about which I wrote to the Prime Minister a suggestion last October. I am not going to enter into any recriminations at all but the suggestion I made at that time did not commend itself to the government and it is now no longer possible for them to do anything about it. As a result of the fact that at least half the fishermen on the northeast coast of Newfoundland did not qualify for unemployment insurance because of the failure of the fisheries most of them have been driven on to relief. Most of those who did not qualify, and even some of those who did qualify for the minimum benefits, have been driven on to relief—that is at a lower scale—during this winter and many of them because of the stormy season and the other difficulties found themselves at the end of the season with cod traps that were in a bad state of repair, or cod traps that were lost entirely.

What the fishermen need if they are to be self-sufficient this year is enough money—and it would not be very much—to buy twine to fix up their traps or, in some cases where their traps are lost, enough money to get new traps so that they can go fishing and earn their own living this summer when we hope there will be a good fishery again.

Since fisheries are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government, this is not a big problem in its dimensions in relation to the country as a whole. I know it applies to certain parts of Newfoundland, perhaps to most; but at any rate to the Atlantic side of Newfoundland. I believe it applies to the Magdalen islands and possibly to the Quebec-Labrador area, but there is an hon. member who represents that constituency and he can speak for himself, and perhaps to one or two limited areas in Nova Scotia. But there are those areas, and there is a problem.

It is a problem that I am sure if I put it in certain terms the Prime Minister and a good many hon. members will understand; it is the kind of problem that existed in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, particularly in Saskatchewan, in 1937, and in one or two other years, namely the problem of seed grain, when the farmers had such poor crops that many of them did not have enough grain to reseed their fields. The provincial governments lend money to the farmers and those loans were underwritten by the federal government. There, of course, there was a divided jurisdiction under the constitution. Here there is an undivided jurisdiction. The appeal I am making to the government is in one way or another, by one device or another, to make this very small sum available by way of loan. I am not suggesting that it be a gift, or anything of that sort. It could be easily administered by the excellent officers of the Department of Fisheries who know the fishermen intimately. The loan could be made perhaps without interest until the end of the season but to bear interest thereafter.

I would not like to hazard a guess as to how much it would be, but the Minister of Fisheries would probably have some notion. I think it would be ridiculous for me to make a guess.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Make an estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I am sure it would be well below $100,000. It is a problem, a human problem. These people are Canadians like the rest of us. They are faced with a difficulty in a primary industry, and it does seem to me, being reminded of this problem and reminded, as I tried to remind the Prime Minister of the analogy which he and I knew so well over 20 years ago, I hope it would appeal to the Prime Minister, as I am sure it would to the Minister of Fisheries and that perhaps—I do not ask for any immediate answer—the government would take it into consideration.

Mr. Howard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Gladly.

Mr. Howard: I ask it because in his introductory remarks he may have left the wrong impression when he referred to the question raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur. My question is, is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate now writing the biography of Mackenzie King for love or money?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a personal question, sir. I do not know whether I should answer or not, but I am writing it for money. I have to earn my living and, as a private member of parliament, I have always taken the view —it is perhaps an old-fashioned and Liberal view, but I think it is a view that the Prime Minister would probably share—that being a private member of parliament is not and should not be a full-time occupation. And though I would not object at all to being called a professional politician, I do still think that one can represent the people better by being—and I notice Your Honour is going to call me to order—an ordinary citizen than a professional. But I thought that the question had to do with the question which is much closer to my heart than the one asked by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word to what was said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In my own riding a great many of the fishermen are still suffering from the effects of the almost total failure of the fishery last year. This applies to Green bay, White Bay south and White Bay north, and Labrador south, particularly where very few fishermen caught enough to qualify for unemployment insurance. They caught so few fish that many of them were on relief and are still on relief. This condition is due to no fault of their own but to the failure of the fisheries. The fish simply disappeared from the coasts of Newfoundland last year. This is a poor background for a start on the new season's activities.

As has been said before, there was no special assistance to help meet what was an economic disaster to many fishermen in Newfoundland. At the present time the fishermen are beginning to outfit for the fisheries. They have to prepare their boats, replace twine, replace nets and some have to procure traps. All in all it is a considerable expense which has to be met at this time of the year if the fishermen are to be able properly to prosecute the fisheries and catch enough fish to earn a living. We hope that this year the fish will be there for them to catch.

In many instances the economic plight of the fishermen is such that they have no money and are unable to obtain credit from their merchants with which to purchase the needed materials. Unless something is done they will find themselves next fall in the same position as they were last fall. In addition to the particular plight, due to the failure of the fisheries, the fishermen of Labrador and northern Newfoundland suffered another disaster this past winter when high winds and heavy seas destroyed much fishing property; stages and fishing wharves were washed away and it is doubtful whether they can be replaced in time to prosecute the fishery unless something is forthcoming in the way of governmental help. The provincial government is sending down twine for nets and helping out to some extent in Labrador. I believe that if a proper job is to be done in helping the fishermen to reestablish themselves for this year's fishery they will need the assistance of the federal government.

I should like to say a word of tribute to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). I would say that all the fishermen in Newfoundland appreciate his sincere and earnest endeavours on their behalf. It is generally recognized that he has taken his job very seriously and that he has at heart the interests of the fishermen, not only as important economic factors but also in the humanitarian sense.

I should like to add a word or two about those parts of the province of Newfoundland where the fisheries have been industrialized. You do not have these same recurring economic crises in those parts. It is true that this year every part of the province has been affected by the total failure of the fishery last year. However, generally speaking, wherever industrialization has taken place the fishermen are in better circumstances and find it easier to continue their operations; easier to obtain credit where necessary and generally speaking their earning power, too, is closer to that of the people in similar jobs.

I should like to mention one particular place and that is the port of St. Anthony in the northern part of Newfoundland where the fresh fish plant burned down several years ago. Ever since this great northern town has been to some extent economically depressed. At the same time St. Anthony is close to prolific fishing grounds and fishermen from isolated places are moving in to settle in St. Anthony. I would hope that the minister would take a long and careful look at the plight of this important fishing town. I would like to say a word about the moneys which have been spent by the federal and provincial governments to encourage the industrialization of the fisheries. These investments have paid dividends already and in the future they will pay richer dividends, not only in money but in human happiness.

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): In view of the poor fishery last year and the lack of employment during the past winter, I strongly support the remarks of the previous speakers who have spoken on this matter. We have approximately 17,500 fishermen in Newfoundland, many of whom were unable to get unemployment insurance benefits last year because of the failure of our fishery. There was a shortage of winter work as well, and yet in spite of all this it seems that this year we will have more men prosecuting the fishery than ever before.

Now, I agree wholeheartedly with the winter works program, but because of climatic conditions in Newfoundland we did not benefit from that program to the same extent as the other provinces. Last year the federal government approved the construction of 20 community fish stages in Newfoundland at a cost of approximately $500,000. It was impossible to build these stages because of the stormy weather and heavy seas, so the program had to be abandoned. I feel that consideration should be given to doing as much of this type of work as possible during the early summer and spring, because this would give our fishermen an opportunity to get money to assist them in buying lines, twines and ropes to repair their traps and trawls. They would get assistance in purchasing the materials required for making repairs to the boats and stages.

I feel also, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Public Works should give serious consideration to doing some of the work on wharves and launchways in the spring rather than in the fall. If this were done, as I said previously, the men would have some money in the spring to assist them in financing their operations and thus making it unnecessary for them to depend upon the merchants to give them supplies for fishing.

I should like to add my tribute to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) and also to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) for their interest in Newfoundland. I hope that their interest will continue to grow. I feel both of these ministers have the welfare of Newfoundland at heart, and I hope that they will continue to give consideration to our fishermen who are working so hard and so long in an attempt to get a living. At the present time more than 30 per cent of the working class in Newfoundland are without employment, and I think that every assistance should be given them to earn a dollar which is so badly needed.

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. members for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) and Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker) with regard to the plight of the Newfoundland fishery, and more especially and what is perhaps of greater concern of us, the plight of the Newfoundland fishermen. This question is a complex one. It has been perplexing the governments down through the years. One has but to look briefly at the history of Newfoundland to see that the economy, up to perhaps a few years ago, was based solely on fish; it was a one-product economy. The folly of this economic condition became evident in Newfoundland during the world-wide depression in 1933, for at that time we found ourselves unable to sell our fish in the world markets. Of course, the results of that were catastrophic.

Now, I am one, sir, who is of the opinion that the future of Newfoundland, and to a very large extent the future of Canada's tenth province, will ultimately depend on the attitudes and policies of this government and the provincial government toward the fishery of Newfoundland. Whatever else can be said about industrialization, our forest resources and our mineral resources, the world will always require food. As we all know, fish is a high protein food and fish is one thing we have in abundance in Newfoundland.

Without being partisan on this subject, Mr. Speaker, and I do not mean to be, although the temptation is great, I am reminded of the provincial election campaign in Newfoundland in 1951 when we heard much about industrialization; the great new factories, the growing industrialization; the great Latvian industrialist, and what have you.

At that time the Newfoundland premier went to the province to ask for a mandate for his industrialization program. One slogan used in that campaign was, "We will take 10,000 fishermen out of the fishing boats and put them into plants." This situation came about at a time when the Newfoundland fisherman, as a result of the prosperity of the second great war, was tending to get away from his fishing boat and to take more lucrative employment at United States bases in Newfoundland and other construction projects that had been started in the province as a result of union. This was hardly an encouragement to the fishermen of the day to go back to that industry which I maintain is our mainstay.

At one time there were several settlements in my constituency which were fishing headquarters, the most prosperous fishing communities in Newfoundland. The fisherman had his own cod trap and perhaps he had his own boat. He caught his fish and had his own plot of land in his backyard. He could supply himself with enough supplemental agricultural products to take care of his own needs over the winter and if he could get a good price for his fish he had a good year. In other words, the Newfoundland fisherman at that time was independent. He did not depend on unemployment insurance. He did not depend on family allowances. He did not depend on social security. He depended on his own sweat and toil, as did his forefathers, to get a living from the sea and he was a better man for it.

What do you find today if you go into these same settlements? You will find the little potato field grown over with weeds. He no longer keeps dairy cattle or poultry to supply his own needs. His fishing gear is rotting. His nets have rotted away and in some cases the people have not even bothered to request that the wharf be rebuilt. I maintain this is a sad plight for a region that was considered the fishing centre of the world. Perhaps the day will come again when Newfoundland can point with justifiable pride to its fishery and lead the world in that very important industry.

I support the views put forward by the three hon. members from Newfoundland who sit opposite but I am sure they did not mean to suggest that the government will be able to pull a trick out of a magic hat and come up with the answer to this very complex problem. Having in mind the comments that have been made this evening and bearing in mind the unfortunate circumstance of the failure of the Newfoundland fishery last year, perhaps the result will be a reappraisal of what was at one time a great industry. We hope it will perhaps result in our taking a more realistic approach to this primary industry because in the final analysis, as has been suggested before, this is not a problem of economics but a human problem. It is a problem of whether or not a great number of Canadian citizens will be able to continue proudly the task of the fisherman as their forefathers did before them and as I am sure Newfoundland fishermen will do in years to come.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, you may well wonder why a member from the west coast of Canada should interpose in the discussion of the grievance that has been raised. However, it does cause us considerable concern when the pulpwood and fish of Newfoundland are able to compete so successfully in world markets with the same products produced in British Columbia. Most of the population of my riding are engaged in the lumber industry. However, I also have a large number of people who are engaged in what I take to be the main occupation of the people of Newfoundland—they make their living from the sea.

There are a few things concerning Newfoundland that we completely fail to understand. We are the first to admit that if there was a failure of the Newfoundland fishery last year the nation owes to those fishermen whatever assistance Canada can afford to render. I do not want any misunderstanding about that. If there has been an unfortunate fishing season, then the Canadian people as a whole should lend a brotherly hand to those most affected.

As I have said, there are a number of things that we cannot fully understand. We understand that in round figures the population of Newfoundland is 450,000. We understand also that 180,000 are under the age of 16 and in receipt of family allowances. That leaves a total population of those 16 years and over of 270,000. Assuming that half of them are wives, that leaves a total of 135,000 males 16 years and over. We also understand that there are 123,000 unemployed in Newfoundland. That leaves a net balance of 12,000 working people. Assuming that five per cent of the population are entitled to the old age pension, that leaves a working force of less than zero.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member is coming to the subject by a roundabout method but it seems very roundabout. The grievance raised originally by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had to do with the cod fishermen of Newfoundland and more specifically with the possibility of lending them money to help them restore their traps and gear. I am afraid I have allowed the discussion to range a little too broadly. This is not a general debate on fisheries nor on Newfoundland.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I was about to make my main point. We regret very much that when our cod fishermen on the west coast receive eight cents a pound Newfoundland fishermen only receive two cents a pound for the same kind of fish. It is our contention that one of the basic problems of the Newfoundland fishermen is their inability to help themselves. We feel that they have been exploited over the years by the fishing companies operating in that province. I know that certain ministers of the government have been very much concerned and have in their own way attempted to aid the fishermen of Newfoundland to help themselves and to organize in such a way that they will be masters of their own destiny. I only wondered at this point as to what the hon. members who had participated in this debate had done in years past to help the fishermen of Newfoundland to become masters of their own destiny and to bring them from the bondage of slavery which is now taking place, indeed which has always taken place, amongst the people who sold their souls to the company store, namely the fishing companies.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have often wondered if the people of Canada in general appreciate the value of fisheries to this country and sufficiently understand its trials and problems. In the first place, the fishing industry is one of our great export industries. It is worth $90 million to $100 million a year to our economy. Most of the fish which is caught and processed is sold abroad, chiefly throughout the eastern seaboard of the United States. It is an export industry which is growing very fast. I think it is safe to say that it is one of the brightest industries in the Atlantic provinces. It is modernizing itself every day. Costs are kept down in producing the product; and our fishermen are learning new techniques and advancing as fast as they can.

Before I go any further to discuss the matter raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to a group which I think is perhaps the most courageous of Canadians. They are both courageous and self-reliant, and in two ways. First, they face a great physical hardship in earning their living. They leave the shore in small boats to go on the high seas to catch their product. Physically they are brave men and courageous. They are strong Canadians.

Secondy, in an economic sense I think it should be pointed out that our fishermen are amongst the most self-reliant and independent of Canadians. Other industries come before the government asking for tariff protection and other aid. In the case of the fishermen we have men who catch their product and put it on the markets of the world without help from anybody. The fisherman does not ask for tariff protection. He is prepared to keep his costs down and fight the battle on the straight basis of economic supply and demand. The fishermen whom I know on the Atlantic coast in my province, particularly in my own constituency, are men who bring their product to the shore, process it and put it on the markets of the United States in competition with every other nation.

Fish caught off the shores of my riding are processed at plants at Louisburg, Petit de Grat and Cheticamp and finds its way across the whole continent, even as far as Texas and to markets in Chicago.

There we have a prime example of a Canadian product being able to enter and compete in a foreign market without help. Again I say that I believe the fishermen, in the way their industry is growing and in their economic self-reliance, are an example to all Canadians. Look to the Canadian fisherman to see how we can pick up a market and expand an industry if we are ready to compete and meet another man's costs in order to put our products on the markets of the world.

I would like to digress for a moment and pay tribute to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) for the help he has given the fishing industry in my riding. My people feel that never before in our history has there been such co-operation from the Department of Public Works. Never before have we had such assistance to build much needed harbour facilities; for dredging and for many other things the fisherman needs in order to carry on his work. Again, I would like to join the other hon. members who have spoken in expressing my thanks to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) for the interest he takes in his department and for his closeness to the fishermen and their problems. It is a great tribute to him that on all sides of this house members rise in their places to congratulate him. We all appreciate his sincerity and tenacity in meeting the problems of the fishing industry.

Request for Aid to Fishermen

While the fisherman is certainly self-reliant and works hard, asking no quarter from anyone, he is a Canadian who has much less of life than many others. He is a man who takes great gambles. He takes gambles not only physically on the sea but also on his market. The great fluctuations in the price of fish and consequently in the income of the fisherman is a vital matter which should be faced by this house, and I think all members would like to see continuing attempts made to solve that problem.

In the past year we have seen, as other hon. members have mentioned, a great shortage of fish off the Atlantic coast, and as a result prices were high and for the catches which were brought to shore a good profit was available. But it is very common to see more fish caught and produced than the market can absorb. It is much more common to see low prices than sufficiently good prices, although we hope the future will show a general increase in prices as the market grows. But I would suggest that some more help be provided for the fishing industry in this respect; it would be of great value to this very important industry to effect greater stabilization of good market prices.

The fishing industry is unique in this respect, that there is really no large units of production in the industry. It is not carried on by large companies but by small companies and small units of fishermen, such as co-ops and others. The result is that there is no concerted, well organized attempt to advertise and to market fish on this continent. We are modernizing very fast our methods of catching and producing fish, but I feel there are many more things we could be doing in selling. I submit that one of our chief problems is too much competition among all these small companies which at times causes gluts on the market and great instability in price.

I think it would be very worthwhile and greatly appreciated by the fishermen of our Atlantic provinces if some effort were made by the government, under the benevolent guidance of the Minister of Fisheries, to bring together many of these small companies which are competing in the great United States market in a common selling program. The United States is our chief market for fish. These small companies might be brought into a joint advertising program whereby they would contribute to a special program, and with help by the government in the way of an advertising grant there would be great advantage in such a program. We all know that other industries, such as the appliance and automobile industries, plan more in respect to selling sometimes than they do in producing. Our problem in the fishing industry has been that we have neglected to properly sell our product. Oftentimes this important food product which should be much more widely used, does not find a sufficient market to absorb it. Over the years ahead I would suggest to the minister that he try to help organize the proper advertising and marketing of fish chiefly in the United States of America. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I should note that the United States fisheries are also an important competitor in their home market, and it might be an example of how our two nations should work together in economic matters if leadership were provided by Canada to bring together not only Canadian but United States companies into an organization which would market fish and provide the joint market that there should be for this product.

Another problem which arises in my riding, and I am sure in many more as well, is that while we are developing fast into a modern and growing industry, while our dragger fleets are increasing, and modern fish plants are replacing the older system, we are in danger of neglecting that great body of fishermen who fish out from the shore in small boats. The inshore fisherman is being replaced by the dragger, and I have no doubt that in the years to come the industry will tend more and more toward larger boats and modern plants. At the same time there are in my riding a great number of inshore fishermen, and these men find that small draggers coming in, particularly at night, destroy or carry off their gear. The damage thus done to the inshore fisherman in a single night can be almost irreparable. I know that the minister is doing everything he can to meet this problem and preserve a proper balance between the inshore fishermen and the draggers. Every effort should be made to see that as the draggers and trawlers increase, the inshore fisherman is protected, because the latter does make a significant contribution toward the catching and marketing of fish and represents a most important sector of the economy.

In conclusion I wish to endorse warmly the remarks which have been made by other hon. members tonight. I hope that the country as a whole will appreciate the problems which the fishermen face and do all that can be done to help them in their job of catching and marketing a vital Canadian product in very difficult circumstances, and to help in bringing greater stability to the industry.

Hon. L. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I intend to be very brief because this is a problem which I have very much in mind and I look forward to being able to discuss it further on my estimates. Besides I do not wish to talk at any length tonight and crowd out other hon. members who may have grievances to raise on other subjects.

However, I do wish to say that I myself, and everyone in the government, in addition to the officials of my department, are very much aware of the problem which existed in Newfoundland last year due to the failure of the catch. The effects are still being felt, especially on the northeast coast of Newfoundland. I may say, as has already been said tonight, that the problem is not merely an economic one; it is a humanitarian one, because in many of these outport settlements where the fishermen live there is no alternative employment available, and it is very difficult to provide any alternative employment since they are situated in a one-economy area where there is nothing else to which to turn. I do not have the figures with me, but I may say that the number of fishermen who were not qualified for unemployment insurance last winter was not by any means as high as most of us feared it might be. I think the percentage which qualified in the winter just past showed a decline of somewhere between 12 and 15 per cent. I realize, of course, that in some areas it was much worse, and I do not want to fall into the error of the statistician who was drowned in a lake, the average depth of which was two feet. I know there were some areas where the catch was a failure and where almost all the fishermen failed to qualify.

The government has endeavoured to play its share in relieving this situation by embarking on a program of stage building, the procurement of materials and the building of wharves. This work was carried on even through the winter as far as was possible under the weather conditions. Although this is of little assistance to fishermen who experienced a catch failure, we are continuing to provide salt assistance to help the fishermen who cure their cod and produce dry salt codfish.

As far as special loans to fishermen are concerned—loans to enable them to engage in the industry at a reasonable level—I may say that there have been times when the governments of the maritime provinces—two of them, at least—have approached the federal government in a similar situation where the fishermen had had quantities of gear destroyed by storms. The two levels of government did, between them, make loans to fishermen in certain circumstances. This was some years ago, and I may say that the federal government of that day had a somewhat unhappy experience because they found that the recipients of the loans looked upon them as grants, and in many cases they were never repaid. Those who did repay the loans looked upon themselves as having been gypped, and felt that honesty was not the best policy. I mention this only so that the house should realize that the problem is not a simple one. It is a very thorny one indeed. I do not want to say more at the present time except that, of course, as hon. members are aware, the Fishermen's Loan Act is in operation and there are some cases where that act might meet the needs of the fishermen involved.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION BY MINISTER TO OBTAIN PARTICIPATION BY QUEBEC

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the government a grievance that concerns not only the people of my riding but those of the whole province of Quebec. I therefore ask the government if they could not enter into negotiations with the Quebec government so that the unemployed in Quebec might qualify for benefits under the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Mr. Speaker, I note that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) is in his seat. May I therefore ask him if he personally could not initiate talks with Quebec cabinet members with a view to reaching an agreement so that people in Quebec may so qualify.

Everybody knows—at least all my colleagues are aware of the fact—that the Unemployment Assistance Act provides financial assistance for persons who are no longer entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. That legislation also makes it possible to give assistance to unemployed persons who could not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment is not the subject matter of this debate, but I want to mention by the way, as I did last week, that in the four constituencies of the Saguenay-Lake St. John district one family head out of four is out of work. I don't know just how many do not receive unemployment insurance benefits, or will soon no longer qualify, but there is now a great deal of suffering in my riding and I ask all members, no matter to what party they belong, to forget their political differences and to urge the federal government, as I urged it many times in this house, to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec in order to reach an agreement on the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker, I see there are still a few minutes left before closing the discussion on that matter and I would like to give an opportunity to speak to some other hon. colleagues. Perhaps, one of the Conservative members would support the proposal I have made to the government, that is to work out an agreement whereby the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act would extend to our fellow citizens in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, in submitting a very important grievance, my colleague the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) appealed to the Conservative members who seem to believe that there is no unemployment in their constituencies. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not a Conservative member but I may say that there is unemployment in my constituency. I therefore heartily support the appeal made by my colleague for Lapointe in order that our workers, more particularly those of the larger cities like Montreal and others, may qualify for unemployment assistance. My constituency has a great many citizens who have not received unemployment insurance benefits for three or four months and, in view of the accumulating expenses that family heads must meet to provide for their families, I believe that there might be other steps that could be taken. However, I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) should give serious consideration to this grievance, one made without ulterior motive, and solely for the general welfare of our workers, even if the suggestion came from someone in the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, it has been claimed that business is picking up and that more jobs are available but I can assure you that in a constituency of workers, like the one I represent, the unemployment situation is still alarming. Many family heads are still unemployed, and I would be very happy if the Minister of Labour would make a thorough study of the situation.

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I readily support the grievance raised by my colleague from Lapointe (Mr. Brassard), as well as the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Loiselle).

Request Quebec Accept Federal Aid

It is true that the constituency I represent is not wholly a labour riding. However, there is, in my district, a rather high percentage of family men who are not receiving unemployment insurance benefits because they do not have enough insurance stamps or because their stamps are used up.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to imagine a family head who, overnight, is not only deprived of his daily revenue, but of his unemployment insurance benefits as well. The whole family feels it and I believe this to be a main cause of the kind of social problems that jeopardize society. Another inevitable result is an immediate decrease in the taxpayer's buying power. Of course it is also very damaging to our economy, as stated by hon. members who spoke before and it might be opportune and proper for the federal government to take steps and make some suggestions to the government of the province of Quebec so that the workers in my province—

(Text):

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I inquire whether or not this is actually a grievance against the federal government? The hon. member appears to be addressing his remarks to the fact that the province of Quebec is not participating in the unemployment assistance program.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand the grievance it is to urge the government to extend its efforts to bring the province of Quebec under the unemployment assistance scheme. That, of course, is a matter of agreement between the two governments, as I understand the legislation. As the federal government is a party to the arrangement I would think it would be in order to discuss the matter as a grievance.

Mr. Racine: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

That is a problem prevailing in Quebec. Just now we heard hon. members deal with the problem of fisheries in Newfoundland. Now the issue I am referring to is of great significance to people back home, and I dare hope that the federal government will take steps in order to come to an agreement with the Quebec government, which would allow the unemployed who are no longer entitled to unemployment benefits to avail themselves of the advantages offered by this legislation, which would certainly not fail to give a great many families their daily bread.

[Mr. Racine.]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise another point but not tonight, because I am afraid it would be out of order. Yet, I think that if an agreement were concluded to this effect, a certain number of our bush-workers who are now employed in the United States could benefit from this legislation, not only in the riding I represent, but in the greater part of eastern Quebec province.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I waited a few moments before taking the floor to deal with this matter, in order to allow some of the fifty Conservative members from Quebec to support the proposal made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard). In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is no question, at this stage, of encroaching upon autonomy. There are times in life, for instance, when a family is suffering from hunger, where autonomy is an obstacle to the moral and material health of the people of a province. The citizens of the province of Quebec are entitled to benefit from the sums of money spent by the federal government, since that money was obtained from the taxpayers of the province of Quebec as well as from those of the other provinces.

This is then a formal request from the Liberal members from Quebec—since no Conservative member dared take the floor to deal with that question—urging the minister to get in touch with the Quebec leaders, by telephone, telegraph or in person, if need be. In fact, the present government is sending missions to England, is it not? And yet Quebec is not so far away. I understood, during the last federal election, that the Conservative candidates were sympathetically inclined toward the leader of the Union Nationale. There was enough agreement between them to tell the population, for instance, in connection with the Colombo plan, that the Liberals were about to give everything to the foreigners, and that the same trend applied in several fields.

I shall not insist on that for I might be accused of being out of order, which happens in any case each time we try to tell hon. members opposite the truth and remind them of their election promises . . .

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I follow the hon. member correctly he seems to be directing his grievance in the wrong direction. The opportunity given is to present grievances against the government of Canada, the government which sits here. The grievance would then necessarily relate to its action or lack of action with respect to the unemployment assistance scheme and not the action or lack of action of some other government or individual or party.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your ruling.

In that case, I shall use a different approach. Let me tell my friends opposite that in Montreal alone we had more than 85,000 unemployed this winter. The celebrated winter works program encouraged by the federal government brought only $45,000 which, according to the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Lessard) meant 50 cents for each unemployed for a whole year. This applies only to those who are registered and who are entitled to unemployment benefits. How can we determine the number of those who do not get these benefits, who do not qualify for them, or who have exhausted their benefits? I believe that their number might be surprising.

I can readily understand that Conservative members from the province of Quebec interrupting me to say that there are none, because they do not visit their constituencies. They do not go out and meet their constituents; and yet, they were elected for that purpose, to find jobs for their constituents, since they promised that after the elections there would be no more unemployment here in Canada.

Therefore, I invite the Conservative members to approach the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) and, if he agrees to my request, I am sure that the province of Quebec in particular, and Canada as a whole, will benefit by this commendable action. It would give him another opportunity to make friends again with the premier of the province of Quebec. And at the same time, other grants could be discussed which would be of some assistance to the unemployed of the province of Quebec which, ever since the Conservatives took over, holds the very poor record of being the province with the greatest number of unemployed in Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the government should welcome this suggestion. We are often asked to put forward constructive suggestions. Here is one that is so simple that it can be understood by the lowliest Conservative member from Quebec, unless he deliberately confuses the issue—as was done this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) with regard to his budget—or unless he talks for three days and so confuses the issue that the Canadian people will be unable to make it out, or that no further suggestions can be offered.

I therefore ask Conservative members from the province of Quebec, whether the fact that Quebec receives unemployment assistance is an encroachment on its autonomy. If a single one of them has this view, I ask him to rise in his place and to declare it to this house. Otherwise, I ask him to give us his support and to request the minister to urge upon the premier of Quebec to accept that share of unemployment assistance to which the province of Quebec is entitled, because, contrary to what some people claim, Quebec is a province like the others, and it is entitled to its share of unemployment assistance since it is required to pay its share of federal taxes.

I feel sure that such a gesture on the part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare would be deeply appreciated by the Liberals. Personally, I thank him very much in advance, and I hope that tomorrow he will get in touch with the premier of the province of Quebec in the best interests of the people.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I might just say a word on this so-called grievance. It is not a grievance whatsoever against the federal government. The various acts of the parliament of Canada in which the provinces may participate and which are cost-sharing pieces of legislation are available to the provinces. This is known, and far be it from this government to try to dictate to any province in Canada, Quebec or any other province, what it must do or should do.

The case is simply this. Legislation is available for participation by the provinces if they wish to take advantage of it. We do not try to dictate to any province and we have not tried to dictate to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Denis: I do not know whether the minister is talking about what I just said. I never said—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not entitled to make another speech. If there is some correction or some misunderstanding relating to him personally which he wishes to make, yes, but not to debate this matter further.

Mr. Denis: I want to correct what the minister is trying to say about what I said. I did not say anything about dictating. May I ask the minister a question? Did I or any Liberal members of parliament ever ask the minister to dictate to the province of Quebec? All I asked was that they get in touch with each other and try to understand each other.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister should listen and he would not make that kind of statement.

Mr. Monteith: I listened to it during my estimates last year and I suspect I shall again this year. I am quite happy to sit and listen, but I do not wish the misapprehension to be left with the house that we are trying to tell the provinces what they must do.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the scruple shown by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)—he is less scrupulous in other fields—but it should be remembered just the same that government members, whether from the province of Quebec or from the other provinces, did promise during the 1958 election to solve everything, including the unemployment problem—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roberge: —including federal-provincial relations—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roberge: —including unemployment assistance.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roberge: We are not asking the government to dictate to the province of Quebec any more than to any other province, to participate in this plan; we are merely asking the ministers who represent the province of Quebec in this house, as well as the Conservative members from the province of Quebec, to use their influence with their provincial colleagues to bring the province of Quebec to participate in it.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be a misapprehension that grievances may be directed against other private members of the house. I assure hon. members that this is not an opportunity for directing grievances to private members because of their conduct or their actions. The grievance procedure is basically to direct it toward the government before supply is voted, to call the government to account for its deeds and its misdeeds.

Mr. Roberge: I appreciate very much your remarks. May I say that we understand the procedure, and we would appreciate it very much if the province of Quebec were to share in this plan.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

68. Departmental administration, $7,507,609.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

214. Departmental administration, $3,380,550.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

318. General administration, $9,335,045.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow, and can we get some idea what it will be for the succeeding days of the week?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 10 on today's order paper, which is a motion to refer the estimates of northern affairs and national resources to a standing committee; then, item No. 11, to set up a special committee on the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines; then, item No. 7, to set up a joint committee on the Indian Act; then, item No. 19, to set up a committee on broadcasting. Then item No. 18, the motion having to do with the standing committee on privileges and elections; then item No. 8, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; then the budget resolutions in the following order: income tax, Old Age Security Act, Excise Act, Excise Tax Act and Customs Tariff. We may go into the estimates later in the week, and if so they will be the estimates of the Department of Agriculture followed by those of the Department of Labour.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMANTS, GALT., ONT.

Question No. 360—Mr. Anderson:

1. How many persons were registered as qualified claimants for benefits at the unemployment insurance commission office at Galt, Ontario (a) on April 17, 1959; (b) on April 17, 1958?
2. How many qualified claimants were entitled to regular benefits on (a) April 17, 1959; (b) April 17, 1958?
3. How many were entitled to seasonal benefits on (a) April 17, 1959; (b) April 17, 1958?

5. How many of the total number of qualified claimants on April 17, 1958 were (a) male; (b) female?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

Counts of claimants currently reporting are made at the end of each month only.

It is not possible to separate those who are qualified from those who are not because there are always a number of claims in process whose qualification or otherwise cannot be determined until the processing is completed.

The following figures, therefore, represent the number of claimants currently reporting at the Galt local office as at 31 March in each of the years shown:

1. Total claimants reporting; (a) 1503; (b) 2489.

2. Claimants having regular claims; (a) 1015; (b) 2024.

3. Claimants having seasonal claims; (a) 488; (b) 465.

4. Claimants reporting as in 1 (a) above; (a) male 972; (b) female 531.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ARGUE—REPORTED REMARKS BY MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S WEST

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects all members of this house. It has to do with the report of the speech made the night before last, appearing in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen, by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne) from Newfoundland. My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think really involves two questions, but I would like to deal with both of them while I am on my feet. This article reads in part as follows:

> Tall, soft-spoken Hon. William Browne said last night Premier Smallwood's action in decertifying the international woodworkers of America in Newfoundland, and establishing a government union seems to be working out well for the loggers.
> Representative of the island province, and one of two cabinet ministers without portfolio, he says the union formed by Mr. Smallwood to replace the I.W.A. isn't the first government-formed union in the province.
> The fishermen's union, set up similarly, has been successful—
> "Other government-formed unions have performed well, and it's possible this will work satisfactorily"—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member indicate what sort of privilege he is referring to before he goes too far in reading this report?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, my privilege has to do with the statement of the minister that the union in Newfoundland is working well, as compared with the answer given in this house by the Prime Minister when he was asked whether the government is considering the disallowance of the controversial legislation in Newfoundland. I think you will agree if you will allow me to proceed, Mr. Speaker, that I am presenting a very definite question of privilege. The Prime Minister told this house when we asked him if this matter of disallowance was under consideration that the cabinet was giving consideration to the whole question. On March 10, in reply to a further question which I asked him, the Prime Minister replied:

> Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that that is a matter of government decision, and I am not going to anticipate the date of that decision.

My question of privilege is this. The Prime Minister has said the cabinet is considering the disallowance of this act, whereas the Minister without Portfolio says the act is working well. Cabinet solidarity requires that that be the position of the government—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is apparently making the point that if he detects any lack of solidarity in the cabinet, that is a matter of privilege affecting the house. I do not think that is so.

Mr. Argue: My question of privilege is this. The Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland has in fact made the statement, if this report is correct, that the government felt this legislation as passed in Newfoundland is good legislation, and therefore—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Since the hon. gentleman has said as much as he has I will give the floor to the Prime Minister in order that he may comment, if he wishes, on the alleged matter of privilege. I see nothing which affects the privileges of the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): My comment is this. The hon. gentleman appears to believe that the soundness of a question of privilege is measured by the loudness of the voice. There is, I submit, no question of privilege here. The answer that was given on the occasion to which he referred was the answer of the government with respect to the legislation. Any observation which may have been made—and I do not know anything about such an observation—has nothing to do with the question of allowance or disallowance.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the question of privilege which the hon. member has raised does not seem to me to reflect in any way on the privileges of the house or of any member of the house, and I would therefore ask him not to pursue it.

Mr. Argue: I rise, now, on my second question of privilege. It has to do with a statement of the same hon. gentleman and a quotation in the newspaper saying that a letter was written by him to the Newfoundland minister of municipal affairs, B. J. Abbott, asking whether the Conservative government could nominate two candidates to the seven-member St. John's housing authority.

My question of privilege is based on the discussion we had in this chamber on April 22 and Your Honour's ruling that a cabinet minister in this hon. member's position was not able, or would not be able, to take responsibility for official communications. I submit that within the terms of the newspaper report it would appear that the hon. gentleman in question was writing a letter which came into the hands, if not directly, then indirectly—I take it would be directly—of the minister of municipal affairs in Newfoundland, Mr. B. J. Abbott, asking whether the federal government could nominate two Conservative members of the seven-member St. John's housing authority. I believe this type of letter is not the kind of private correspondence to which Your Honour alluded the other day in making your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can, of course, take what view he likes about that, but what he is asserting is that the conduct of the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland is in some way an infringement of the privileges of the house or of the members of the house. In my view what the minister has done does not reflect in any way on any person in this house or on anything this house has done. He is free as other hon. members are to conduct himself as he sees fit outside the house, subject to being called to account as a member of the government in accordance with our usual practice.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order you have raised I would refer Your Honour to the words you used as recorded at page 2927 of Hansard of April 22, on which occasion you said:

> I take the view that the word "official" as it is used in the citation quoted by the hon. member for Laurier means official in the sense of being responsible for a department.

My point of privilege is this. I feel that if a cabinet minister with the full authority of the government can write to a province on behalf of the government, as I take it he was doing, it should be the prerogative of this house to have produced this correspondence which was written in an official capacity.

Mr. Speaker: That is something I am not called upon to decide now. If the hon. member moves to have the correspondence produced the house will deal with the motion in the ordinary way. It is not a matter of privilege.

STARRED QUESTIONS

COST OF OLD AGE SECURITY REPORT

Question No. 58—Mr. McMillan:

What was the total cost of the preparation of Professor Clark's report on old age security, including Professor Clark's fees, printing, etc.?

[Mr. Argue.]

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in response to this question may I advise that as of April 29, 1959—and we know of no additional accounts to come in—the payments to Dr. R. M. Clark were as follows. There was a payment of $20,025 as fees, and $5,962.91 for disbursements. The cost of the printing of the report was $1,259.60, making a total of $27,247.51. In addition to the above there were certain travelling expenses incurred by members of the research and statistics division of my department in assisting Dr. Clark in certain aspects of his work.

CANADA-U.S. JOINT DEFENCE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Question No. 65—Mr. Hellyer:

1. How many meetings of the Canada-United States committee on joint defence have been held since September 1, 1957?
2. Where have any such meetings been held, and on what dates?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canada-United States committee on joint defence was not established until September 2, 1958. Since then one meeting has been held. That meeting was held in Paris, France on December 15, 1958. As the hon. gentleman no doubt recalls, we were advised in a press release issued at the conclusion of that meeting in Paris that a decision was reached to hold the next meeting of the committee in Washington in mid 1959.

OIL AND MINERAL DEVELOPMENT ACREAGE, NORTHERN CANADA

Question No. 67—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Were 75 million acres recently taken up in Northern Canada for oil and mineral development?
2. If so, by whom?
3. What percentage has been assigned to (a) Canadian corporations; (b) United States corporations and Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies; (c) British corporations; (d) others?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this question is in three parts. At the conclusion of my oral answer I should like to ask permission of the house to have the answer to the second part of the question printed in Hansard, because it consists of a list of names of companies that could just as well be printed as part of my answer.

The answer to the first part of the question concerning whether 75 million acres were recently taken up in northern Canada for oil and mineral development is as follows. It is not altogether clear what the hon. member means by the word "recently". For example, at July 1, 1957, the number of permits issued in all previous years totalled 652 and the acreage covered by these and the two oil reservations, Eagle Plain and Peel Plateau, totalled 34,559,570 acres. By March 31, 1959, the number of permits had grown to 1,780 and total acreage to 85,980,529. This activity has all been on the mainland, that is in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon.

Very recently, however, interest has been shown in the Arctic islands and in the sea bed and subsoil of the continental shelf off Canada's northern coast. If the hon. member refers to this more recent activity the strict answer to his first question is no, since up to the present no permits have been granted in the Arctic islands or the continental shelf. However, applications for permits are being received and recorded according to priority of submission and exploratory licences, valid for one year, are being issued. These applications which a few weeks ago passed the 75,000,000 acre mark now cover a total of 86,517,364 acres.

The answer to part 2 is: The individuals and companies who have applied for permits in respect of these 86,517,364 acres are as follows:

The answer to part 3 is as follows. The applicants for these 86,517,364 acres, classified as requested, are as follows:

(a) Canadian individuals and corporations, 68.74 per cent (59,467,174 acres);
(b) U. S. corporations, 14.72 per cent (12,738,186 acres);

(c) British corporations (or Canadian subsidiaries of British corporations) 3.21 per cent (2,777,452 acres);

I hope, Mr. Speaker, this answer will get the same attention in the news that the erroneous statements made recently by an hon. member on this matter received.

Question No. 69—Mr. McMillan:

What is the present average yield at price to the government, including all costs, on all borrowings made since July 1, 1957, and including the conversion loan of 1958?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I suggest that this question stand, and I also suggest that the hon. member who asked it rephrase his question in the interests of clarity. It is very hard to understand from this question precisely what it is he seeks.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND AND OTHER PROVINCES

Question No. 68—Mr. Tucker:

1. How much has Newfoundland received from the federal government since April 1, 1949, including the amounts for the current year?

2. How much of this amount was in unconditional grants and what is the official description of such grants?

3. How much of this amount was in conditional grants, what is the official description of each such grant and how much is included in each such grant?

4. How much of the total amount was for other purposes, what were those purposes and how much was provided for each?

5. What are the comparable amounts and purposes of similar payments in each of the above mentioned categories in (a) Nova Scotia; (b) New Brunswick; (c) Prince Edward Island; (d) Manitoba; (e) Saskatchewan?

NEWFOUNDLAND—PAYMENTS TO AND REVENUE FROM

Question No. 339—Mr. Van Horne:

In the last twelve months for which complete figures are available, how much money was received from Newfoundland from all sources, and how much money was received by Newfoundland from the federal government from all sources?

C.M.H.C. AND VETERANS AFFAIRS—LEGAL SERVICES, OXFORD COUNTY, ONT.

Question No. 363—Mr. Badanai:

1. Has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Veterans Affairs (Veterans Land Act) utilized the services of any solicitors in Oxford county, Ontario during the last three months?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

IMPENDING FIREMEN'S STRIKE—STATEMENT ON SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Before putting the question may I commend the minister on the part he has taken in averting a strike against the Canadian National Railways by the brotherhood of firemen. Can the minister tell the house upon what terms the strike was averted? If this is too broad, perhaps he can tell the house upon what principles the strike was averted.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The best way I could answer it would be to read the memorandum of agreement to the house, which covers it entirely:

Summary of discussions with representatives of the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen on the recommendations contained in the Montpetit conciliation board report:

1. The brotherhood is prepared to accept the unanimous recommendations of the board.

2. The brotherhood is prepared to accept in principle the recommendations of the board with respect to "arbitraries".

Clauses with respect to the amendment of the agreements to provide for the payment on a minute basis by the company for the time required for the performance of actual services shall be included in the agreements on the understanding that the schedule of increases in basic rates of pay in all classes of service, excluding locomotive engineers in Newfoundland, as given in clause 13 of letter dated April 14, 1959, addressed to Mr. W. E. Gamble, vice president, brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen, and signed by Mr. S. F. Dingle, vice president, Canadian National Railways, shall be amended as follows: 2 per cent effective April 1, 1958, 5 per cent effective May 1, 1959, 1½ per cent effective August 1, 1959, 1 per cent effective April 1, 1960, except that in the case of firemen in yard service in the western region the scale of the increases shall be as follows: 2 per cent effective April 1, 1958, 7½ per cent effective May 1, 1959.

It is understood that the recommendations will not apply with respect to the employment of engineers in Newfoundland. The application of arbitraries to these engineers will be negotiated without reference to the recommendation of the board as it applies to firemen.

The brotherhood is not prepared to accept the recommendation of the board on the proposal covering terminal delay. The company agrees to waive this recommendation on the understanding that the present rule respecting booking rest shall remain at 12 hours.

The brotherhood is prepared to accept the recommendations of the board on the subject of mileage regulations.

The company shall be under no obligation to hire new employees for service as firemen or helpers on diesel locomotives in freight or yard service in accordance with the recommendations of the board. When in the sole discretion of the management the requirements of the service are such that a helper is required in the operation of a diesel locomotive in freight or yard service such helper shall be taken from the existing seniority ranks of firemen-helpers.

Firemen presently employed as shown on existing seniority lists of firemen in diesel operations in freight or yard service will be retained as firemen-helpers until death, retirement or promotion, subject to all customary rules and regulations covering the running trades and in particular those rules relating to physical fitness and discipline.

This was signed by Mr. Gamble, Mr. Donald Gordon and myself.

Mr. Chevrier: I am prompted to ask the minister another question, if the house will allow me. Does the minister not think that if he had been allowed to intervene in another dispute involving a crown corporation, the C.B.C., it could have been settled as quickly as this and a great deal of hardship could have been avoided?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: A hypothetical question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Laurier will appreciate that the question is argumentative and also hypothetical. It might be better if it were reserved for the estimates or some other more appropriate time.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, if I may say so it is certainly not hypothetical. It refers to something that has taken place already.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if he can tell us what progress has been made in the negotiations with regard to the labour-management dispute at the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): There is fairly good progress being made now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question, if I may put it in a supplementary way, was "what progress".

Mr. Starr: I said "fairly good progress."

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ISSUE OF STAMP COMMEMORATING ASSOCIATED COUNTRY WOMEN OF THE WORLD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to dip into the pool of wisdom of the Postmaster General to ask this question. In view of the Canadian government's intention to honour the Associated Country Women of the World with the issue of a new 5 cent commemorative stamp on May 13 next, and in view of the unusual and widespread interest in this issue—a good number of ladies have expressed their appreciation to me, and I am a person who is always interested when the ladies are interested—will the minister inform the house of the arrangements made for the distribution of this stamp and, in particular, its distribution from Stoney Creek, Ontario, the location of the first women's institute in Canada?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of this question, which, however, did not include some of the remarks he just made. Arrangements for the distribution of this stamp are exactly the same as those for all stamps at the present time. This means that a quantity is sent to each post office in Canada and placed on sale on the first day of issue, which in this case is May 13. However, there are collectors who like to have these stamps on a special cover mailed on the first day on which the stamp is available. This service, which normally is handled through the headquarters of the post office in Ottawa, is also going to be carried on voluntarily and independently by the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada at Stoney Creek, Ontario. It is a plan they have worked out in connection with their members and which has nothing whatsoever to do with the government.

AIRPORTS

BOUNDARY BAY, B.C.—AVAILABILITY FOR USE BY LIGHT AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister clarify the position of his department regarding the possible availability of all or some part of the R.C.A.F. airport at Boundary Bay, B.C., for use by light aircraft?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. This matter has also been the subject of inquiries by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) and other members. The Department of National Defence is co-operating with the Department of Transport in consideration of the provision of alternative facilities for light aircraft in the lower mainland of British Columbia. One of the locations under consideration is Boundary Bay, but before any move of the military establishment there could be made an alternative location would have to be found. Various sites are now being examined and the necessary tests are being made. Some of these technical tests must be carried out over an extended period. For this reason it is impossible at this time to say when the Department of National Defence could move.

REPORTED PRICE FIXING IN AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Has he been informed that, according to some farmers' unions, manufacturers of farm implements have agreed to establish fixed prices on their goods?

If so, will the Minister of Justice order an investigation into this matter?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know that, from time to time, it has been suggested to the combines investigation branch and others to look into all kinds of matters with regard to the sale of farm machinery, but I must inform the hon. member that the combines investigation branch has received no complaint indicating breach of the Combines Investigation Act. Consequently, no investigation in this matter is being considered.

If the hon. member or anyone else has reason to believe that there has been some collusion with regard to prices, I would suggest that he forward this information to the combines investigation branch.

TRADE

OIL—REPORTED LIFTING OF U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIAN IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask the minister whether he has seen the press reports this morning to the effect that the restrictions against Canadian oil will be lifted effective July 1. Can the minister tell the house whether this report is accurate?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject was raised in the house on March 18, when the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question in somewhat the same terms, based also on a press report which had appeared on that date.

I have seen the reports which appeared in the Globe and Mail and the Gazette this morning. Again I think these are speculative reports based on consideration of the situation as we have presented it from time to time to the authorities of the United States with regard to these mandatory controls on oils. I hope these reports indicate that some action will be forthcoming. However, at the moment I have no confirmation with regard to the accuracy of these reports that appeared this morning.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not think he might supplement his hopes by further action on his part and on the part of his colleagues directed toward that objective?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is well aware that action can be expected very quickly on the part of this government, as we have shown on so many occasions.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED UNDERCOVER ACTIVITY RESPECTING FINNISH ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I have sent him notice, but I have reworded it in order to bring it into line with what I imagine would be your ruling. It stems from a story by Pierre Berton appearing in the Toronto Star on the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Has the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as the Berton story indicates, tried to place an undercover agent in the Finnish organization in Canada, in the person of the lady referred to in the story? The second part of the question is this. Does the Royal Canadian Mounted Police recommend to the citizenship officials that membership in the Finnish organization of Canada should be a negative factor in any application for citizenship?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to send me notice of his intention to ask me these questions. I can only answer the first part of the question by saying that the government has consistently followed the policy of complete reticence concerning security work, which in such a case means that it must refuse either to acknowledge or deny allegations about the employment of secret sources for intelligence work.

The answer to the second part of the question is that the government has also consistently followed the policy of refraining from any comment, except in time of emergency, that would in any way identify an organization as either desirable or undesirable from a point of view implied in the hon. member's question.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has yet completed the studies of the proposals made by the Manitoba government for financial assistance in the proposed flood control program for the city of Winnipeg?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, knowing the interest of the hon. gentleman in this question I am sorry that I am unable to go further than I went on a previous occasion.

SHIPPING

TRAFFIC TIE-UP CAUSED BY COLLISION OF VESSEL AND BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister whether he is aware of the collision which took place last night between the steamer Prescott, I believe, and the bridge over the Beauharnois canal, which has tied up traffic? I am particularly interested because this is one of the first ships to go east on its way down to Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports. Can the minister tell the house what was the cause of the collision.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. I am advised that the vessel Prescott, which got into difficulty last evening in the Beauharnois canal, was cleared at 11.23 a.m. today and that no damage was suffered by the vessel or the bridge.

The failure of the lift span to rise was apparently due to the blowing of a fuse. When the captain of the vessel, having arrived at the limit of the approach, did not receive the green light he dropped anchor and the vessel came to rest across the channel in front of the bridge abutment. Officers of the St. Lawrence authority have been directed to make a complete report.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Now that the minister's estimates have been called, can he inform the house when the white paper will be distributed?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): All going well, I expect that it will be tabled tomorrow.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That items numbered 261 to 293, inclusive, and items numbered 476 and 477, as listed in the main estimates of 1959-1960, relating to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, while I realize that this motion is not debatable, I hope the house will allow me to make just this short statement which really is a reiteration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want the hon. member to proceed under a misapprehension. This motion, being properly on the order paper by notice, is a debatable motion within reasonable limits.

Mr. Chevrier: In that case I thank Mr. Speaker for reminding me of a rule of the house with which I should have been more familiar. I did not want to speak at any length on this motion; I simply wanted to reiterate the position which has already been taken by the opposition on previous occasions.

My only purpose in rising was to say, first, that we on this side think the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources should remain in the house for discussion in the usual manner, and should not be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to a standing committee. We think it is a loss of time to refer these estimates to a committee, because after the departmental officers have been heard in committee there will be another opportunity in the house for the same kind of consideration of the estimates that has taken place in the committee.

In addition, I repeat to the government what has already been said, that unfortunately for us on this side of the house we feel there are too many such committees, and we also feel it is impossible for us to fulfill our duties in this house as they should be fulfilled and attend the meetings of these committees at the same time. Now, I know the house leader has some very strong views on this, and I am not making this statement in order to secure from him the kind of reply we sometimes get. I am making this statement because it is a source of hardship to some of our members who are on two and even three committees to run from one to the other and in addition do the work in the house, and then sometimes be accused, perhaps not in this house but outside of this house, of being members of committees but not regularly attending those committees. Certainly that accusation, were it directed at me, at times would have some foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up the time of the house unduly. I simply wanted to reiterate this position, and I am sorry the government has seen fit to withdraw these estimates and refer them to the committee on mines and forests.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to support the motion to refer the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to a standing committee of this house. We feel that such a committee will be able to do very useful work. We do not think that it is taking away from the House of Commons any privileges which we have. It is a well established rule, and I might say a well established custom, that when the estimates come back from the committee, where they have been discussed, further consideration is given to the estimates when they are put through parliament in the regular way.

Our objection to the government's procedure as far as committees are concerned is that very often we find it impossible to attend sittings of the house and of the various committees when they meet while the house itself is in session. In so far as this can be avoided we think it is preferable that members of parliament shall be able to attend the sittings of the House of Commons and not at times feel that they must forego attending the business in this house in order to attend one of the committees.

These departmental estimates which will be considered are very important. This is the department that relates, to a very large extent, to the great vision of which we have heard so much, and it is mainly to this department that Canadians look for action by the government to develop the Canadian north, to make certain our sovereignty over our territories is retained and strengthened and made abundantly clear to all the world. We feel that a thorough study by a committee of this house can lead to a strengthening of Canadian sovereignty over this very important part of our nation and our last remaining frontier.

This government has set itself up before the Canadian people as one which will see that Canadian sovereignty will be strengthened. That is a commendable position to take, and we are very pleased to support the minister and his department in that respect. However, there are many reports which indicate that knowledge of Canada's northland today is greatly wanting. As a matter of fact we are told by eminent scientists that Canada is not only not doing its share in developing our north, but that the knowledge which this department obtains about our north is derived in many respects from information that can be obtained in publications of the U.S.S.R.

This is a disturbing situation. I am certain that the government of Canada would get full support from the Canadian nation in taking bold steps to provide further research and exploration of our northland to make certain it is abundantly clear to all the world that we are protecting our sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, we think under this department the government should consider implementing the recommendations of the Massey report. We think the government should act on the recommendations concerning amendments that would provide a new arrangement for the administration of our national museum. We think the whole administration of our museum is something to which this committee should give very exact and detailed attention. We feel that recent events surrounding the administration of the museum suggest that the present legal basis on which the administration of the museum rests is not satisfactory. The legal basis upon which the administration of the museum rests, as hon. members know, is merely one section in the act providing for the establishment and administration of this department itself. The section dealing with the museum reads as follows; it is to be found in chapter 4 of the statutes of Canada, 1953-54:

> The minister has the control, management and administration of the national museum of Canada, and shall collect, classify and arrange for exhibition in the museum of such specimens as are necessary to afford complete and exact knowledge of the geology, mineralogy, palaeontology, archaeology, ethnology and fauna and flora of Canada.

We do not think, Mr. Speaker, that is a satisfactory legal basis for our museum. We feel that the former administration took some action, at least, that was desirable, in introducing legislation into this house.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether before he proceeds further the hon. member would indicate whether he has in mind dealing with the affairs of the department in general, because the motion does not seem to me to open up a general debate on the workings of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The motion seeks to refer certain items to a sessional committee rather than deal with them in another way, and I think reference to the working of the department ought to be limited to consideration of the reasons for and against dealing with this matter in the way suggested.

I know that on occasion the house has permitted fairly extensive debate on some of these motions, but to my mind the motion is one to arrange the business of the house and should not open up a general debate. That is why I inquire what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Argue: My understanding was that this was a debatable motion. I do not wish to proceed to a detailed discussion of these items. I was merely raising some matters which I thought were of general importance, and which might be considered by the committee. I feel that since these matters are of such grave importance to the Canadian nation it is quite appropriate to support this motion by suggesting some points to which the committee might give consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is perhaps the limit of the debate which is open on this motion. It seems to me that the motion before us is whether these particular items should go to a standing committee rather than be dealt with by the whole house in committee of supply, and that is really a procedural question.

Mr. Argue: I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish, either, to delay unduly the passage of this motion, and I think I can say to Your Honour—though this is no comment on the procedure we shall be following—that it is not the intention of this group to carry on a protracted discussion of all these items. However, in our study of this resolution we felt that there were certain matters which should be brought to the attention of the house as subjects to which this committee should give consideration.

I may say in that regard that, as we all know, committees of this house are able to call witnesses, and that members of committees are able to direct questions to those witnesses. I think this is a procedure which is necessary in regard to the affairs of this department and in regard to the examination of the various matters which will be taken into account. I said a few moments ago that certain questions as far as the museum and its operation are concerned should be considered by the committee. The opportunity should be taken to have witnesses from the national museum appear before the committee so the general administration of this institution might be considered.

The strength of any nation depends to a very large extent on the development of a distinctive culture and a distinctive cultural background, and I believe that to a large extent the very entity of Canada as a nation is determined by various branches over which this department has responsibility. I feel that this committee, by calling appropriate witnesses, should attempt to determine whether Canadian sovereignty has in fact been undermined by the lack of effective development of the Canadian north. If the answer is in the affirmative, an attempt should be made to find out to what extent our national sovereignty has been affected.

I do not wish to deal with this subject in detail, but I can tell the minister—indeed, this is something he well knows—that there have been many questions regarding the operation of the national museum. There is a fear among many people who are qualified to speak on its administration and its work that it is to some extent, to a substantial extent—to a much greater extent than is desirable—influenced by citizens of the United States.

The minister, in reply to a question in this house, told us of the very long delay which took place in obtaining permission from United States authorities for a Canadian citizen to proceed to the north in order to undertake certain work. That situation was something we all regretted, something about which parliament was ashamed. We are pleased to have been given an assurance that such long delays brought about by this kind of procedure will not be our experience in the future. I am not a member of this committee, Mr. Speaker, though when this matter is under consideration I hope I will be able to sit in on the proceedings.

There is one question which I feel should be raised, and that is the question of Canada's representation at certain international conferences. I have in mind the circum-polar conference at Copenhagan last year, when Canada had one representative, an employee of the Canadian government, a man who has worked in Canada, attached to the department of northern affairs, since June 24, 1949, and who is a citizen of the United States. I think it is to our discredit that at an important international conference attended by representatives of all nations the person who spoke for Canada should be a citizen of another country.

I believe the department the minister is administering is one of the most important departments of the government. I believe the minister is very hard working. From the statements he has made both in parliament and to the press since he took office I believe he is conscientious. I know he is taking a very detailed interest in the administration of his department, and I am hopeful that this committee, as a result of its inquiries, may be able to make to the minister recommendations and representations which will lead to the strengthening of the cultural life of this nation and to the strengthening of Canadian sovereignty over all our territories in order that Canada, after this session has ended and after we have dealt with all these subjects, may be in a much stronger position than it is now as far as our national sovereignty is concerned. I hope it will be made clear that while we are happy to co-operate with other nations at all times in joint projects which are of value to us, Canada in her representations and in her actions will always use those safeguards which are necessary to make sure that the national welfare is a matter of first consideration.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my opinion briefly on the subject of the reference of these estimates to a committee. Like my leader and in contrast to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) I believe the growing importance of this department and the branches connected with it almost makes it imperative that the estimates be sent to a committee for study. There is also the fact that more and more Canadians recognize the importance of this department and are concerned with the development of Canada and the maintenance of Canadian control in that development.

Mr. Grafftey: You are repeating the same things your leader said. You are being pleonastic.

Mr. Argue: Take a trip to New York.

Mr. Herridge: Are the people in the barnyard at the other end of the chamber quite finished?

Mr. Grafftey: You are being redundant. You are repeating the same things said by your leader.

Mr. Fulton: He will probably say them better, though.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member is guilty of all-consuming redundancy.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to a speech made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources at the annual dinner of the Canadian institute of mining and metallurgy held at the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal on April 14, 1959. I have no hesitation in saying that I have read this speech and think it is a jolly good one. I was very pleased to become acquainted with the minister's point of view in respect to a number of things about which I am concerned. In that connection I wish very briefly to quote one paragraph of the speech.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. All hon. members of this house are hoping to get away from Ottawa before the end of the summer. Could I ask what possible relevancy the remarks of my hon. friend have at the present time on a motion to refer? His remarks are completely irrelevant and no one knows that better than my hon. friend who is an authority on this subject.

Mr. Argue: Closure again.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house for approximately four minutes.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to say this. On these motions to transfer items to a committee there have been fairly extensive debates from time to time in the past but there is nothing in the motion itself to warrant an extensive debate. In my view the matter is a procedural one. It is a decision of the house to deal with certain items of the estimates in a special committee rather than in committee of supply and to make the necessary order. That raises the question of whether certain items might more properly be discussed in committee of the whole house or before the special committee but I would think debate should be limited very strictly to the discussion of the relative convenience of dealing with these matters. I do not think it is improper to suggest the kind of matter with which the committee would have to deal but to debate these matters, to my mind, is to duplicate debate.

The committee is set up for hearing representations on these matters which the hon. member is discussing. It will be its duty to do so. It will then report back, and the committee of supply will have the privilege of dealing with them again. Unless we are to multiply debate and unless the house otherwise decides, we should restrict ourselves at this time. I believe these debates have taken place in the past with the general acquiescence of the house. In my view, however, the debate should be closely confined to the essentials of the matter before the house which is whether or not these items shall be transferred.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, you have already made that ruling but hon. members opposite in the C.C.F. party continually flout your rulings. This is the second time Your Honour has made the same ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I did not stop the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) again although that matter is now closed. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) assures me that he wants only two or three minutes to discuss this matter and if he will confine himself in that respect I do not think I can rule him out of order.

Mr. Herridge: I would have been finished long ago if the hon. member had not unfairly accused me of unnecessary repetition and unusual verbosity. My only object in rising is to point out the necessity of sending these estimates to the committee for two reasons, the importance of the question of the development and control of national resources—

Mr. Grafftey: Your leader already said that.

Mr. Herridge: —and also to demonstrate the importance of the reference of one branch of this department in which I am particularly interested, the forest branch. There is a tremendous need to give to the committee a full opportunity to have appear before it representatives of the forest industry so they may present their views. Now, with the indulgence of the hon. member I shall continue for about three minutes and then I shall conclude.

Before I was rather abruptly and somewhat rudely interrupted by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) I was going to quote from what I consider an excellent speech made by the minister on the date to which I made reference. At page 15 of the transcript of his remarks we find these words:

> Yes, I could continue almost indefinitely with expressions of pride in our achievements; but I prefer a more sobering note. In many segments of the mining industry—indeed throughout most of our national economy—we have become excessively dependent upon American business and the American market. Let us face this fact.
> No other nation in the free world is as exposed as Canada to the all-pervasive influence of another nation; and it is slight consolation that becoming an extension of the American way of life is preferable to certain other alternatives. We want to maintain our Canadian identity.

I happen to know with respect to the forest industry that they would welcome the opportunity to appear before the committee and give their views in relation to their problems. I hope the officials of the forest branch will also have an opportunity to appear because the questions of forest economics, forest research, fire protection, forest management and education concerning these fields are of vital importance. The committee should have an opportunity to hear from officials of the department but I rise particularly to emphasize the need to obtain witnesses on these questions, men with experience, operators who have had much experience in the forest industry of Canada. We should obtain these people from the various provinces so hon. members of the committee will get as much information as possible before they form their views as to the things that are best needed to correct the situation that faces them with respect to the hazards of the destruction of forests by fire, pests, insects and things of that sort.

I believe I have been quite modest in my remarks but I did want to emphasize those two definite reasons for having these estimates go before the committee. I trust the committee will not hasten its work but will take plenty of time to hear from the important people who have something vital to say to the hon. members of this committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I just follow the example given by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) in trying to curtail this debate. If Your Honour will look at rule 37 (1) of the standing orders you will observe that it provides that no hon. member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation. The second part of the standing order also covers this. Having made the motion, I think that ought to suffice.

Mr. Green: I think it is covered by the second part which provides that a reply shall be allowed to an hon. member who moves a subsequent motion but not to the mover of an amendment, the previous question or an instruction to a committee.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word on the point raised by the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Chevrier). Citation 166, subparagraph 3, at page 139 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads as follows:

> 166. (3) By a substantive motion—

That is the only kind of motion for which reply is allowed except, of course, on the second reading of the bill. I continue:

> By a substantive motion is meant a motion not incidental to a proceeding before the house and which can be dealt with by amendment or by the distinct vote of the house.

It seems to me, sir, that if this motion is not incidental to a proceeding in the house it is nothing at all and therefore the right of reply does not exist in this case.

Mr. Speaker: There are two points involved in whether or not this is a substantive motion. It has been regarded as a substantive motion in our practice here, because this type of motion has been used to introduce a debate on external affairs, for example, and the minister introducing the motion has been allowed the right of reply, so that to that degree there is a precedent for what the minister is doing. I admit that the wording of the comment in citation 166 of Beauchesne would indicate that this is not a substantive motion.

The other point is that where in moving a motion a member has not spoken, the house by courtesy, if not legally, has permitted him the right to speak at the end of the proceedings. I may be mistaken in this. In any event, as I am in some doubt, if the house will allow me to reserve the matter I will give thought to it and perhaps the house will allow the minister to make his remarks now.

Mr. Pickersgill: By unanimous consent.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I really have very little to say and I intend to take very little time this afternoon, but I would like to point out to hon. members that in asking that these estimates be referred to a standing committee we are merely trying to improve the efficiency of the work undertaken by the House of Commons.

It should be clearly remembered that these estimates will come back to the house where they will be dealt with in the ordinary way just as though they had never been referred to a committee. But there is this great advantage in sending them to a committee. There officials can be called and can be cross-examined, which cannot be done in the house. Also, as the hon. member for Kootenay West, (Mr. Herridge) has suggested it might be found wise by the members of the committee to call outside witnesses, and that could not be done in the house. These are only two of the reasons why we believe that it is in the best interests of the business of the house that these estimates should go to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters.

There is one other reason why we have tried this plan. As you will realize, Your Honour, it was first adopted a year or so ago. This course had not been followed by the former government with regard to the estimates of this particular department although it had been followed with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and followed with great success. One reason why we are sending the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to this standing committee is that the work of these two departments should come particularly under the scrutiny of this standing committee of the house. For some reason or another the former government at no time made any use of this standing committee. The committee was set up at each session and I presume a chairman was appointed, and then the committee did nothing at all, never met.

Mr. Herridge: It was a living corpse for 15 years.

Mr. Green: I do not know about it being a living corpse; it was a corpse, anyway.

The work actually done by this standing committee on the estimates of these two departments has been very much worth while. I need only refer hon. members to the work this committee has done during this present session on the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). With the co-operation of members of all parties, the estimates of that department have been given a very thorough examination. I am certain that there will be beneficial results to the department as well as to the members who have been taking part in the work of this committee.

The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has much the same type of jurisdiction as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Here again there are many questions to be considered, some of which have been outlined today by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the hon. member for Kootenay West. We believe it is a department the estimates of which lend themselves particularly well to a careful scrutiny in a standing committee and it is with these thoughts in mind that the government is asking support for this motion to refer the estimates to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, AIRLINES AND SHIPPING OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways, airlines, and shipping owned and controlled by the government, be appointed to consider the accounts, estimates and bills relating to the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time, and that notwithstanding standing order 67 in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee shall consist of 26 members.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Hees: A very short one. This is the motion to appoint a sessional committee on railways, airlines and shipping. As the house knows, it has been the practice for many years to have a committee sit to consider the accounts of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines. Following approval of this motion, it is my intention to ask leave of the house to submit a motion which will name the members and refer to the committee the reports dealing with the Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines which have already been tabled, together with the items of estimates that are to be reviewed by the committee.

I might add that it is planned to have the committee start its sittings on Tuesday, May 5, for the consideration of the reports concerning the Canadian National as the first business.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this is the annual motion which seeks the establishment of the committee on railways, airlines and shipping, and it does give the house an opportunity to consider in a general way, although not perhaps in a particular manner, some of the subjects which the committee will be dealing with in due course. It has been the practice in the house from time to time, on a motion such as this, to allow hon. members to speak in a general way upon the subjects which are of particular interest to the Canadian National Railways and to Trans-Canada Air Lines, and on other matters which come within the purview of either the one or the other crown corporation.

I have no intention of dealing today with other railway matters but with the permission of the house I should like to refer as briefly as I can to a number of matters which in my opinion deserve the attention of the house. I should like to begin my remarks by saying that in the motion which seeks the establishment of the committee again we see the name, "Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships." The unhappy story of the liquidation of this fleet by the government is still fresh in our minds and I must say that the amount of information we have received from the minister on this subject is unfortunately too little. We have received very little information about the activities of this crown corporation since it was in fact liquidated during the course of last year, other than through newspaper items. It would strike me that that is not the manner in which information of that nature should be imparted to the house. However, as the minister has stated, we shall have an opportunity in due course to examine the position of this crown corporation when the committee is established.

It is my intention today to talk about those subjects which come within the actual purview of Canadian National Railways because it seems to me that before the establishment of the committee there is a great deal to be gained by a discussion and a public examination of the facts as well as a brief scrutiny of the government's record in this connection. The first thing I should like to do is to go back to the budget speech of the Hon. Walter Harris delivered on March 14, 1957, and to remind the house of what was said by him on that occasion. His words will be found at page 2219 of Hansard of that date, and I quote:

> One of the matters discussed in the Gordon report is the handicap which the Atlantic provinces have to contend with due to difficulties of transportation, and to post-war increases in railway freight rates. A good deal has been done in recent years in an effort to offset the higher costs of marketing the products of the Atlantic region caused by the long distances between the region and its markets in other parts of Canada, and to improve the means of communication within the region itself. For example, we have paid more in freight subventions so as to facilitate a greater movement of maritime coal to central Canada, and to enable maritime agriculture to obtain cheaper supplies of western feed grains. We have also spent substantial amounts for the improvement of shipping services and to meet the deficits incurred in coastal shipping.
> In the view of the government we should now undertake a fresh and comprehensive examination of the entire transportation situation of the Atlantic provinces in order to determine what changes could conribute toward the economic welfare of the region. Among other questions, we should consider how best to supplement or improve some of the present means of transport in order to improve the transportation system generally. In this way it might be possible for the Atlantic region to get more value from the present level of federal expenditures in this field and from any increased funds that might become available.

I draw particular attention to the conclusion which Mr. Harris drew on that occasion.

> It is therefore the government's intention to launch an immediate review of the maritime transportation problem in general, and thereafter to put forward proposals as soon as feasible.

The point I wish to make at this time is that an immediate review of the maritimes' transportation problem was initiated by the government of which I at one time was a member and steps were taken forthwith after this statement in Mr. Harris' budget speech to get under way a comprehensive inquiry into the subject of transportation in the Atlantic provinces. Part of the work was to be undertaken by the management of the Canadian National Railways and part was to be done by the officials of the Department of Transport and if outside assistance should be required my understanding was that it was made quite clear that that would be obtained. It was anticipated that of necessity resort would be had to such assistance as was requisite in carrying out the study and inquiry mentioned in the budget speech in order that the examination of this subject would be carried on as efficiently and as quickly as possible.

Two years have now elapsed since the announcement was made in the house that such an inquiry was to be undertaken and despite the importance of the inquiry the investigation seems no further advanced now than when Mr. Harris made his statement in the house in 1957. Knowing the officials of the Department of Transport and the management of Canadian National Railways, I am sure that progress in this direction has been made and I can only express regret that the minister has not seen fit to take the house into his confidence and inform the house what has been done with reference to that investigation. What progress has been made? What inquiry has been undertaken? What difficulties, if any, have been encountered with respect to this matter? What solutions have been arrived at and what proposals have been submitted? Instead of doing so, the minister has passed over this important subject in silence.

I should like to give the house some general idea of what was in the mind of Mr. Harris when this proposal was advanced. In the first place, we know that Canadian National Railways provides extensive services by sea to the many outports of Newfoundland. A passing glance at any timetable of that railway is sufficient to give an idea of the extent of these services though no timetable could give any idea of their magnitude, the complexity of operation or the difficulties which must be overcome in providing this kind of service. Transportation, I need hardly tell the house, is of vital concern to Newfoundlanders and their interest in this subject as well as their hopes were raised in large measure by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself. I would remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) of the statement of the Prime Minister in St. John's, Newfoundland, on April 15, 1957, as contained in the Globe and Mail of April 16, 1957. I quote:

Newfoundland's narrow gauge railway should be converted to the standard gauge because the present line retards development, adds to the cost of transportation and therefore makes it more difficult for Newfoundland industries to compete in domestic mainland markets on the same basis as other provinces.

As the minister knows, that is a problem of extreme importance to the province of Newfoundand. I know that the minister has been there. I know he has been at Gander and has perhaps made an examination of the railway. He will understand how important this problem is to the people of Newfoundland. Has any investigation been made of the cost of transforming the narrow gauge railway to a standard gauge railway? What will the cost of that transformation be? Is it possible, either here or elsewhere, to get from the minister a statement of the progress which has been made with respect to that problem as well as in respect of the statement which was made earlier by the Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1957.

I turn now to another problem which is of extreme importance to the province of Newfoundland, namely the car ferry service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques in Newfoundland. That question is of equal importance to the province. I have no doubt that this vessel will fully live up to the expectations we had when we planned her construction. Her entry into service was frustrated by conditions which were not anticipated when the decision to build the ferry was taken. However, it is now a fact that the vessel is in operation. The vessel is in service and is operating between the two ports. For a time it operated between North Sydney and Argentia because of certain difficulties which existed at Port aux Basques. However, I have been led to believe that for the most part those difficulties have disappeared.

Nevertheless, a number of questions still arise. Is the service which the William Carson is providing now adequate? Does the accommodation which it provides fully meet all the needs of the traffic or, as many people affirm, does the traffic exceed the volume which was anticipated when the plans for her construction were made and when the William Carson was designed? Does the position of this ferry vessel meet the present needs of the island? We must remember that the construction of a vessel takes a long period of time. Plans and specifications must be prepared. These things cannot be done in a hurry, particularly for a ship such as this one which must operate during all seasons and under difficult climatic and weather conditions. I feel that these are questions which should be asked of the minister. Is the question of the adequacy of the facilities under serious consideration at this time? Has the Canadian National Railways estimated the traffic that will be available within the next few years, let us say within the next two, three or four years, for instance; and will the William Carson be adequate to meet all the needs, actual and prospective?

I turn now to another transportation problem which affects particularly the Canadian National Railways and has to do with the services between the mainland and Prince Edward Island, in particular between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward Island. Under the terms of the constitution it is clearly set out that transportation services must be provided by the central government. Over the years that responsibility has been fulfilled by the Department of Transport. As hon. members know, there are two ferries which operate between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. There is the Abegweit which was built some years ago—it was an up-to-date ferry at the time—and there is also an additional ferry service that has been provided by means of the Prince Nova. However, I am informed that in recent years, because of the growth of traffic, this ferry service has been outgrown and the most optimistic estimates indicate that these two services are not sufficient at the present time. Hence, one of the questions that comes immediately to mind is this. What has the government in mind having regard to the future requirements of transportation between the mainland and Prince Edward Island.

A causeway between Borden, Prince Edward Island and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, has been under consideration for some time. I do not want to add to the length of this discussion by putting on Hansard what was said on this subject at one time by the former minister of public works, Hon. Mr. Winters. Those who want to see it can find it at page 1020 of Hansard of February 6, 1957. Apropos of that question, let me simply say that I know the Department of Public Works has taken steps to assess the possibility of obtaining suitable rock for the building of the causeway although the results of its inquiry has not led to any final conclusion.

The subject of the causeway was mentioned at great length during two election campaigns. It was mentioned not only by those of us who support the Liberal party but by those who support the Conservative party. At a time when the present Prime Minister had no responsibility for a subject of this nature, at Saskatoon on May 27, 1957, referring to certain promises which the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, had made, particularly when he said that he would make no promises, he stated:

> Each day in every part of Canada the magnitude of the promises is increasing . . . increases for civil servants and the armed services, a causeway across the Atlantic to Prince Edward Island . . . railroads into northern Quebec . . . improvements to Montreal harbour.

These words will be found in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of May 28, 1957.

I find that the words of the Prime Minister do not seem to indicate that he favoured the construction of the causeway, because he describes it as being "across the Atlantic to Prince Edward Island". But we well know that the position of the Prime Minister is flexible and that his attitude at Saskatoon can be flexed somewhat from the position he would take if he were speaking in Prince Edward Island. At all events, more flexibility developed in the mind of the Prime Minister because before the 1958 election campaign began he announced in Ottawa, on February 5, 1958, that the government had ordered an engineering study of the proposed causeway between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. In fact, this project was rather touted as being a positive step by the government to reduce unemployment. At all events, the announcement said that the preliminary engineering study for the causeway would cost an estimated $200,000 and that it would determine the effects of the causeway on tidal conditions and fisheries in the area. Then, in the announcement to the press, the Prime Minister described the prospective works as:

> —a great national program which will swing into action immediately and will be part of his party's national development policy promised in the general election campaign in 1957.

This statement can be found in the Montreal Star of February 5, 1958. The point I wish to make here, Mr. Speaker, is that in this budget for 1959-60 there is nothing for the causeway. It is that fact which makes it necessary that consideration be given forthwith to the whole question of providing adequate facilities for efficient means of communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island.

If the government is really sincere in the promises which it has made about the engineering study of the causeway, surely there would have been something in the main estimates to deal with this matter so that a start can be made on the causeway without any undue delay; but nothing is to be found in the estimates for that purpose.

Therefore it comes to me as a natural question, I think, to ask the minister what consideration is being given to the existing ferry services and the provision of one or more vessels to share the operation of transportation facilities with the Abegweit?

Surely the Department of Transport has this matter under study and consideration. If the position is the same as it was some years ago when I was on the other side of the house, then I have no doubt that the minister and the Canadian National Railways are receiving all kinds of representations from those who live in those provinces. Therefore it would strike me that if there is nothing in the estimates for this fiscal year to carry out the undertaking made by the government, then at least we should get some statement on the part of the minister.

I pass on now to another subject in that area, and that is the Yarmouth-Bar Harbour ferry. That was a ferry which was established some years ago and which has been put into operation. I think the minister should tell the house what success that service is obtaining. I do not speak now from the financial aspect so much as I do from the aspect of transportation. What I would like to know is what amount of traffic is developing? Has the traffic reached the estimate which was anticipated at the time the service was put into effect? Is the amount of passenger, freight and other services which were had in mind at that time developing? Are the rates conducive to the fullest use of the service? Is it really achieving the purpose which was had in mind at the time, namely that of getting for Nova Scotia a greater number of tourists? Is it bringing in new sources of revenue to Nova Scotia? And what is even more important, is the growth of the traffic which has taken place since the inauguration of this service sufficiently imposing to warrant an expansion of the service? In other words, do we need another vessel? Is it desirable to inaugurate a new service which will better meet these particular needs of transportation in Nova Scotia? I hope the minister will either now or when the special committee is formed and meets bring the house up to date on this matter.

There is another important subject, about which we have heard very little in recent months, and that is the question of the extension of existing railway facilities into Great Slave lake. Both in the 1957 and the 1958 session the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) showed what seemed to be an encouraging interest in the subject. However, the two ministers were not always in complete harmony when they advised hon. members of the progress which was being made, and I think it is no exaggeration to say that we were left in some doubt as to the seriousness of the consideration that was being given to the planning of this project. Nearly 12 months have elapsed now since this subject was discussed, and I would hope the matter had now progressed sufficiently that we could get an informative and complete statement from the Minister of Transport who after all has something to do with this important subject and who is in charge of the provision of transportation facilities in this country.

It seems to me that the Minister of Transport should tell the house what actual progress has been made toward the development of a railway to Great Slave lake. Have the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who operate the Northern Alberta railways, made a report to the government or to the minister in connection with this project? Do they find that the traffic in prospect justifies the investment of the substantial sums of money which are involved, or do they expect the government to provide a large subsidy in order to make the project self-sustaining, in accordance with the usual practice which railroads follow in order to determine the wisdom of investing in such a project? It seems to me that the construction of a railroad at this time, if it can be justified economically, is the kind of project which would be supported by the Canadian people at a time like the present, and that the minister should take the first opportunity and the first advantage to acquaint hon. members with the government's plan.

This is not a matter simply of rising in the house and saying that the policy of the government will be made known in due course. I think it has reached the stage now where it is a matter of privilege to the hon. members of this house to know where the matter stands. No information whatever has been given, although it was mentioned in the speech from the throne in the session of 1958 and it was mentioned also from time to time in discussions in this house. It is a matter of national concern. It is a matter which falls to be determined not only by the government but by one of its crown agencies, the Canadian National Railways and the least the government can do is to give to the house a frank and straightforward statement in advising the house of the progress which is being made, if any, in respect to this proposed railway, which as the house knows has attracted a great deal of public attention.

Now I come to another matter of interest more particularly to the province which I represent. It concerns a railway which has been discussed before in this house. I raised this matter on one occasion and I believe it was raised by other members too. Mr. Jean-Claude Lessard, a former deputy minister of transport, in a brief which was presented to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects in November of 1956, and which is contained in one of the interim reports of the royal commission, deals with the subject of transportation at some length and with great efficiency.

He divides his brief to the royal commission into many parts, but I want to deal with only a small part, that concerning railway transportation, which can be found at page 128 of the submission. On that page there are suggested to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects five possible future railway projects in the north. While I have no intention of burdening the house with all of these, there is one I would like to draw attention to, particularly the attention of the Minister of Transport, and that is the last recommendation made by Mr. Lessard concerning the construction of a line east from lac St. Jean or Murray Bay in Quebec and the possible extension of such a line to Labrador.

I have before me a map of that part of the north shore of the province of Quebec and the lac St. Jean area, and while I know that there are very often, among railway officers, two views with reference to the route which a railway should follow—perhaps that appertains here; I am not in a position to know—I think this recommendation was to the effect that the railway should follow the north shore in order to link Murray Bay with Seven Islands and then on to Labrador, so as to serve this area and the other settlements which are growing with tremendous rapidity on the north shore because of the development of natural resources.

The other alternative, and one which many railway officers seem to think is more appropriate, is that the railway should run some miles north of the gulf so that there would be two lines of settlement, one along the shore and the other inland, some miles from the shore. If the latter alternative were adopted there would then be a line going east from lac St. Jean, connecting with Seven Islands and then on to Labrador.

The point I wish to make is that I do not believe any study has yet been carried out and I refrain from putting forward any suggestions other than to bring to the attention of the house the submission which was made by Mr. Lessard at that time. I think the minister and the government would be doing Canada a service if they would conduct a survey into the possibility of constructing a railway to assist the development of this fast-growing area.

Of course, as the minister knows, he has received many representations from people residing in the Gaspe area for the development and the extension of that railway. I remember that when I sat on the other side of the house three alternatives were under consideration. Two of them, if I remember well, were extremely costly, but one was of such nature that it could be considered by both the Canadian National Railways and the government. Whether there has been some change in that situation or not I am unable to say, but I do think that the minister should, at an appropriate time, if not in the course of this debate, be good enough to bring the house up to date as to what has transpired with reference to the railway in the Gaspe peninsula.

I should not like to conclude my remarks at this time without saying a few words in connection with the general problem of the Canadian National Railways. I doubt if ever before railways have been faced with problems of such magnitude or with such far-reaching consequences as seem to be the daily lot of Canadian and United States railroads. On the one hand they are faced with competition—extremely stiff and difficult competition on an ever-widening scale—from the trucking industry which has the advantage of being able to pick up goods quickly and to ship them to their destination with equal rapidity. This is a particularly difficult form of competition for the railways to meet, and the development of more and more first rate highways in Canada has naturally meant that competition from trucks has become increasingly sharp and more devastating in its effects on railway revenues.

At the same time, the railroads have had to meet the demands for higher wages, which, not unnaturally, have been put forward by the labour forces of the railroads in Canada, and the increases in average wages which have taken place in other fields, particularly in the durable goods industry, have made it necessary for the railroads to follow the same general pattern and to agree, unwillingly perhaps because of their own problems, to increasing what is probably the largest element in their costs of operation.

At the same time, and although the railways have modernized their equipment, the economies in operation which have resulted have to some extent been offset by increases in their fixed charges because of higher capital investment required to operate modern equipment. And all the while this process of attrition has been going on involving on the one hand the carriage of fewer goods and on the other the loss of passengers to business and private automobiles.

I assume the statement I have just made has had a lot to do with the position in which the Canadian National Railways finds itself, and which is exhibited in the report for the calendar year 1958 tabled some weeks ago. The situation has unquestionably been difficult for the railways, and the situation of the Canadian National Railways is no exception; it is no exception to what railways in the United States have encountered. We have already had an opportunity to discuss the interim assistance which the house, through a subsidy measure of $20 million is going to give to the railways, but nonetheless I hope the government will lose no time in trying to get to the root of the problem which faces the industry at this time.

The Prime Minister and the minister himself has announced that we can expect soon the appointment of a royal commission to deal with this problem. This was announced, too, by the acting leader of the house some months ago. I hope the scope of this inquiry will be broad enough to cover some of these difficult problems which face the managements of the Canadian National and other railways in Canada.

I would conclude, now, by saying just one word in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines. I know that all hon. members will take satisfaction from the fact that Trans-Canada Air Lines has again this year reported a small profit, and we shall welcome the opportunity of reviewing its activities when the committee sits. However, I would be derelict in my duty as a member of the opposition if I did not point out that the competition in transcontinental air service to be provided resulting from the decision of the air transport board allowing Canadian Pacific Air Lines to operate one transcontinental flight in each direction per day, is a long, long way from the rather rosy prospects which the minister portrayed before the last election. When in opposition he favoured outright competition and the putting to death of the sacred cow called Trans-Canada Air Lines. After he attained the position of minister of transport and a sense of responsibility was thrust upon him his words became more ambiguous but he did leave with the people of Canada the positive impression that there was to be all-out competition in air services. What has taken place is an entirely different thing. The decision to allow one flight in each direction per day certainly falls a long way short of what Canadians were led to believe.

I want to make it abundantly clear that I do not in any way criticize the decision of the air transport board. What I am criticizing is the positive attitude adopted by the minister in former times and the virtual complete reversal of that attitude in recent months. I suppose this is another example of the flexibility which I mentioned earlier. It certainly makes for a convenient way of dealing with problems to be so flexible in one's approach to those problems that the statements of yesterday can be forgotten as early as tomorrow.

We on this side of the house welcome the opportunity to discuss the operation of two of these crown agencies which have contributed so much to the transportation services of our country. In supporting the motion I am sure that the house will be anxious to hear the evidence which will be submitted in due course before the committee.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the point of flexibility in so far as the minister is concerned, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) described it, has been very noticeable to us all. The only thing I would wonder about is that the hon. member for Laurier should criticize that because it just seems to indicate that perhaps the policies of the government with which he was associated were not really so bad if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is going down the line with them.

As far as Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Trans-Canada Air Lines are concerned, I wonder if in giving this franchise to Canadian Pacific Air Lines we are not opening up the same kind of invidious comparison that has gone on through the years between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian National Railways. Here is a case where Canadian Pacific Air Lines has been given a run on which it should be able to do very well; at least, it is a transcontinental run between major cities, which is fine. I am sure, however, that very shortly in our committee meetings when we are reviewing the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines we will be hearing about how well Canadian Pacific Air Lines are able to do. As one reads through old committee reports one discovers those words were often used by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition.

They said that if you could only compare the cost of United States Airlines with T.C.A. you would see what a white elephant or sacred cow this was. The minister himself used to make a point of that.

In recent months evidence has been coming more and more to the fore that United States Airlines are being more heavily subsidized than almost any other airlines in the world and the number of small airlines that have been in difficulty in that country illustrates that in this form of transportation you cannot go far without some form of subsidization if the airlines are going to operate general purpose services into many communities where there is no high income available such as Canadian Pacific Air Lines is getting.

One point we need to remember is that unless Canadian Pacific Air Lines is willing to accept or is given routes that are as questionable from an economic point of view as some that Trans-Canada Air Lines has to carry it will in future appear to have a much more satisfactory economic basis than T.C.A. and we will have perpetuated in the air the very bad comparisons we have had made between the C.P.R. and C.N.R. To a certain degree the C.P.R. is hamstrung as is the C.N.R. in so far as redundant lines are concerned but not nearly so much and it has not had to accept the capital debt structure that the C.N.R. has nor has it had to accept lines such as the C.N.R. had foisted upon it when Newfoundland came into confederation. This has led to much criticism especially on the part of those people who love to prate about economic efficiency and the virtues of the free enterprise system.

The main problem so far as the railway industry is concerned is still one of the other means of transportation cutting in upon its long-held business and forcing it more and more into the position where it handles long-haul low value commodity traffic and loses out on the high value short-haul traffic. It is almost entirely losing out in the passenger service field. In fact, all the indications are that the future is extremely pessimistic and that more and more we are going to have passenger service provided on the basis of that rather damnable phrase, the public interest, rather than on the basis of economic reasoning. This is one more argument that when we set up a royal commission the terms of reference should be very broad so that inquiry will be possible into passenger service provided by other facilities that are available.

The key problem as far as employees on the Canadian National Railways are concerned is well known to me. I feel that I can speak on this subject with as much authority as anyone in the house since there are four Canadian National Railways divisional points in my constituency and two more within twenty miles. The problem is that the morale of the employees is very low at the present time. I know that the settlement of the dispute involving the firemen will be a contribution toward raising their morale but the whole future of railway employees is extremely indefinite.

I might remark in passing that there is one group that has never had the publicity or recognition enjoyed by other groups concerning the tremendous impact upon their phase of railroading and that is the maintenance of way employees. The running trades and the changes that are involved thereto have tended to attract much more interest. The fact is, however, that on section after section across the country these people have been pulled out of their jobs and no longer have employment. Their whole means of livelihood has been removed. They have lost their homes and the investment they had in the communities where they lived and worked. This is due to the introduction of revolutionary mechanical equipment and a whole new concept of looking after the rails. With the introduction of steel wheels in the next few years in place of what we now have there will be very few carmen across the whole system. We will have a great reduction in what are referred to as "bad order cars" that at one time gave a considerable amount of employment in divisional points across the country.

Just out of Toronto we have an indication of the effect of perhaps the most revolutionary change. That is the fact that now the brakemen and conductors on freight run through for two divisions from the Mimico yards to Capreol. This is a precursor of what is going to happen at the end of 1961 when we will have central traffic control all the way from Winnipeg to Toronto. It means there will be a tendency to run all freight crews for two divisions; in other words, for 240 or 260 miles instead of the present 125 miles.

There is also going to be a tremendous drive—and I think it will be much more embittered than the one in relation to firemen—to do away with the rearend brakemen. This will be feasible in practical terms when central traffic control is in effect and when radio communications of a standard that can be relied upon have been established between the caboose and the engine. All these factors are having a serious effect on the morale of employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Let me give one specific example. The railway divisional point at Hornepayne in my constituency is losing most of its dispatchers and quite a few of its operators. There is a whole new kind of management being introduced called area management, which is going to sit, in this case, at Capreol. These are all advances in the tremendous drive of the Canadian National Railways in the last decade to improve the efficiency of its service. For example, it is quite possible that within a couple of years the Canadian National Railways will be able to give freight service from Toronto to Winnipeg in 36 hours, which was unthinkable a short time ago.

If these moves are necessary they are all to the good; but concomitant with that you have this tremendous unrest because the employees have no conception of what their individual futures are and what the futures are of their communities. It is all very well to say that this is progress and that lots of people have been affected by the industrial revolution, and that the blacksmith has disappeared. But this is not very satisfactory to people who are committed to a line of work and have their roots down in so many communities that the railroaders have. One of the crying needs is for both railways—but especially the Canadian National Railways—to spell out their future program in terms of its effects upon personnel and upon communities and for this parliament to determine and decide what responsibility the railways have as employers in so far as those communities are concerned. Many of them, in effect, are going to fall away completely. Is there a responsibility in this particular regard?

In connection with the firemen's strike or threatened strike, one of the things that amused me was the feeling that the public right across the country has been against the firemen. This is true as a generality but it is not true in the local divisional points. I have a petition from Hornepayne which indicates that nearly every adult signed it, insisting that the firemen should be kept because those people in those communities are very conscious of what is going to happen to the communities as a result of those shifts. First, there is the shift of the firemen. Then there is the wiping out of divisional points and a drastic reduction in section forces, and future reductions in operating crews as a result of central traffic control.

It is easy enough to say that these people are being purely selfish, but this happens to be the nature of human beings. Human beings stand up and protest against something that is going to rob them of their livelihood and what they have invested in communities. We have had all kinds of examples in the federal field where the government has come to the rescue or to the partial aid of such communities and it seems to me it is about time, with the kinds of revolutions which are taking place in the railway transportation picture, that this should become an issue and of concern to the government. I am not saying that it has to be necessarily the responsibility of the government, but there needs to be some analysis of these points.

[Mr. Fisher.]

One of the frustrating things that is going to happen when we get into this committee and get talking to Mr. Gordon and Mr. Dingle and asking them questions is that they are going to say, "It does not do any good to explain to the employees what the future is. All it does is to get their backs up prematurely." Furthermore, Mr. Gordon is going to go on and say that you cannot spell out these things too completely, and certainly he is going to steer completely away from accepting any responsibility for the dislocation in so far as the railway as a corporation is concerned.

One of the things that I am most dissatisfied with in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways is the inability of anyone to discover what their retraining program means in terms of dislocation or of dislocated workers.

I get most scarifying reports from railway personnel. I had one yesterday about a section of track along the north line of the C.N.R. where I understand there are hundreds of rails under which there are 4-inch shims, as a result of the very hard winter we had. Every time there is a wreck, such as the one we had recently west of Sudbury, in which I understand a number of western members of parliament were marooned for many hours, the cry goes out right away, here was a broken rail. The story I have is that it was a broken rail that was not discovered. There was not proper inspection because there were not enough inspection crews going along to spot this. Most of these stories are probably untrue, but it is all a reflection of this tremendous loss of confidence on the part of the personnel of the Canadian National Railways.

On the management side, I know their feeling is that one of the things that hamstrings them in making a proper, perhaps the best kind, of arrangement in the light of changing circumstances is the very rigidity of union agreements. I know an instance where one machinist with 29 years seniority was laid off; his job is through. There are other places on the system where there are much younger men working, but he cannot take advantage of those places because the union contracts set out very definite limits where he can move, and the boundaries of the agreement under which he is employed. This sort of thing is something that calls for a tremendous amount of give and take on the part of both management and the union.

I feel that here is a place where the Canadian National Railways has to take much more initiative in the working out of better relations. In my conversation with railroaders the outstanding thing I find is that there is a very deep suspicion of management. I think myself that much of it is unfounded and could be wiped completely away if there were franker and better relations on a continuing basis between the railways, the workers and the public as a whole who are involved in those railway communities. This is why I would hope that when this committee is working on the annual report of the Canadian National Railways we shall be able to get Mr. Gordon to say something on this point, or at least to acknowledge that this bad morale situation exists at the present time.

One cannot really see the picture of the Canadian National Railways without looking at the picture of the Canadian Pacific railway. I am sure the contrast between the two roads this year will be brought out by members of the government on the committee. It will be pointed out that last year the Canadian Pacific railway was able to pay dividends that represent roughly somewhere between 3 per cent and 5 per cent on the capital involved; whereas our government railways went $51 million in the hole.

One of the things that we really need presented much more clearly—I almost feel it is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport to do it—is some sort of separation of the Canadian Pacific railway income so that we can see more clearly at least a comparison with the Canadian National Railways. I know there are historical tables; I know the statistics put out by the dominion bureau of statistics are very thorough, but there are a number of factors in the Canadian Pacific railway setup that do not apply to the Canadian National Railways setup, and yet the accusation or the common belief is that the Canadian Pacific railway is able to do a so much better job. There is little recognition of the extra burdens and difficulties that the Canadian National Railways have.

The review given by the hon. member for Laurier on the railway problems was, I think, an excellent one. I think he could have added something which has been said here before, namely that our basic difficulty in the transportation field in Canada is that we have never been able to make up our minds as to whether we want a private enterprise kind of transportation or a public enterprise kind of transportation. We have something that is neither and yet in some people's minds it is one thing and in other people's minds it is another thing.

I only hope that by the time this kind of resolution appears in the house again we shall have a royal commission report which will have looked into this whole matter of transportation and the relationship of the railways to water, road and air shipping interests and that they will have enunciated a national policy on transportation which will make much more sense than what we are doing in this particular field today.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, when I have spoken about Canadian National Railways in the past I have made some critical comments, particularly with regard to the service between Toronto and Ottawa. I dealt with the matter a couple of years ago and more or less regaled the house for a while with a description of the service. Everybody seemed to enjoy it because it struck them as being absolutely correct and true. I elaborated on the matter and I got an answer from the divisional superintendent in the Ottawa papers in which he admitted that everything I said was true but went on to say that not very much could be done about it. I thought that was a very poor answer for an organization in the business of rendering a service.

However, it must also be remembered that the service I am talking about is a joint effort on the part of the C.N.R. and C.P.R. but inasmuch as C.N.R. tracks are used most of the criticism can be directed to the administration responsible for the operation of that line. I outlined the service, the type of cars and the condition of the stations, as I saw it. In fact, I called it more or less a glorified freight service. Freight service seemed to be the most important and passenger service seemed to be the least important. I also mentioned that the morale of C.N.R. employees was not as good as it might be and that there was general dissatisfaction with the administration.

Some hon. members took exception because I singled out the president of the C.N.R. for attack. I criticized the service and I related his value or worth to the company to the service that was being given. Last year I made similar comments elaborating on what I have just mentioned. I made some comments about his value to the company and what I thought he was worth. What I had to say did not go over very well with members of the opposition. May I say here that I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is doing an exceptionally fine job but the president of the C.N.R. is more or less running things and the minister cannot do very much about it. I would naturally expect that the minister would have to defend his officials. The minister is giving good administration and no doubt follows the dictates of his own judgment and conscience.

I was rather surprised and amused at the reaction of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) to my remarks. The hon. member for Cartier more or less implied that I was looking for the president's job but that was the farthest thought from my mind as I have no affinity for railroading, but neither has the president. All I was trying to do was to improve the service, and since my criticism there has been a slight improvement but there is room for a lot more. More consideration should be given to the passengers and in my view if you want to make the service more profitable the first step is to give more consideration to the passengers accommodation at the terminals.

To get back to the observations made by the hon. members I mentioned, they said that I had been unfair to the president's past performance. In fact, they mentioned the very valuable services that the gentleman in question had given. They said that during the war years he did such a tremendous job that he became one of the outstanding officials in Canada and that he could never be replaced or equalled. This was a revelation to me because I always thought that the man who won the war was C. D. Howe but now I understand that the president of the C.N.R. is the man who won the war. Nonetheless, I found out that when you gouge one of the opposition's sacred cows they become quite concerned about it, but other than that they all recognized but would not admit that what I said was true.

I have not given up my determination to strive for better service between Ottawa and Toronto or any other points where the service is not up to standard. Therefore I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of members of the house again the views of these people who feel themselves aggrieved. In that regard may I say that many people commented that what I said was true and that there could not be any objection taken to it. If offering criticism from year to year will improve the service you can count on yours truly to keep on doing so until we get the service from the railways the country is entitled to.

When I referred to the salary of the president of the C.N.R. it was said that he had had another job in the United States offered to him at a tremendous increase in salary. If that was the case then it is my opinion that he was very foolish not to take it because no one in this country is indispensable and he can be replaced even from within the system itself. Having made this comment on the situation with regard to the service, I will let the house and the people know next year if there is any further improvement.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two very brief comments to make with respect to the operation of the Canadian National Railways in so far as that railway and its potential expansion affect the constituency from which I come and the northern part of British Columbia. The C.N.R. north line runs from Jasper to its terminus at Prince Rupert through the constituencies of Skeena and Cariboo. In recent years there has been quite a bit of discussion about the extension of the railway system, not in an east-west direction, but in a north-south direction. The suggestion is that there should be an extension of railway service northwest from the present line of the C.N.R. through the northern part of British Columbia to connect with Yukon and Alaska.

The Pacific Great Eastern railway fits into this picture because there has been some discussion about the extension of this provincially owned railway into that particular region. It has been suggested that the P.G.E. itself could be extended or that service could be provided by installation of the so-called monorail system of the Wenner-Gren foundation although the latter proposal has been pretty well washed out of the picture. If it is not washed out in one sense it is at least potentially washed out because the power development on the Peace river will flood certain portions of the P.G.E. roadbed which was going to be used for the monorail system.

But if any consideration is being given, and I think it should be, to the possibility of extending railway facilities north to Alaska and the Yukon I suggest that the most logical place for the extension to start from is near the community of Hazelton which is the most northerly point on the present C.N.R. north line. A natural valley extends north from there right through to the Yukon and the whole area has been topographically surveyed. The mineral wealth is practically unknown. Forest wealth, hydro-electric power, oil and other natural resources are in abundance in the northern part of British Columbia and are practically untouched. Apart from the necessity of extending rail lines to assist in opening up the country, apart from having a north and south rail line for purposes of defence, there is the question of developing the potential mineral and industrial wealth.

The fact is that one of the largest coal deposits in Canada lies up in that part of the country. I refer to the Groundhog coal field which is estimated to have over 1 billion tons in an area of some 1,200 square miles.

This field has been untouched and would be of tremendous value not only to a railroad but to anything else in that area requiring fuel coal. It would be a tremendous impetus to the whole question of the vision that our friends opposite have in developing the north in the roads to resources program. There could easily be fitted into it a railroad to resources scheme if the C.N.R. would just get off its fanny, do some survey work and take some concrete steps towards this objective.

Before I sit down I should like to make one comment with regard to the feeling which exists among the employees of the C.N.R. towards the president of that railway. Many others in the house have made comments about this matter but I would say one thing. If there is not confidence, generally speaking, among the majority of employees in any corporation, whether it be publicly owned or privately owned, or in any organization, then there is not harmony. The majority of railway employees with whom I have spoken have relatively little confidence or faith in the present president of the Canadian National Railways. Unless that faith and that confidence are capable of being generated by or on behalf of the person who is the president of the Canadian National Railways I suggest that we are going to continue to have difficulties plaguing the internal harmony of the employees and the internal harmonious relationships between the employees and the management of the railway. I am not suggesting that, out of a clear blue sky, we should replace the person who is at present president of the Canadian National Railways, or at least do so in an out of hand way. But in so far as the employees of the railway themselves are concerned, I suggest that if you had as president of that railway someone who knew railroading, something which is necessary for efficient operation, you would have much more harmonious relationships between employees and management and among the employees themselves, something which would lead to more efficient operation of the railway.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for a study of the estimates relating to the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and Trans-Canada Air Lines. This committee will have an opportunity to study some of the services provided by the C.N.R. in Canada. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) gave some extremely interesting and, as I thought, some factual comments on the attitude of the employees of the C.N.R. toward certain modernization procedures and so on. I should like to give my impression of the reaction of consumers or of the general public to some of the things that are being requested by the C.N.R.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this motion would be greatly improved if it were possible to have brought before this committee not only officials of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. but officials of the C.P.R. and C.P.A. There is another standing committee of this house which has the opportunity to consider a certain provision introduced by the government which will relieve some of the burden of freight rates in the country. There is no provision by which members of parliament can inquire into the operations of the Canadian Pacific railway or Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I feel that this resolution would be improved if it were expanded so that members of this committee would have an opportunity to review the general operations of transportation facilities in this country.

The railway companies of this country, the C.N.R. and C.P.R.—and my remarks now must be related to the C.N.R.—are endeavouring to remove as many station agents as possible in order, of course, to make savings for the railway companies. It may soon come about, as far as our ordinary smaller villages are concerned, that a railway agent will be as prehistoric as a dinosaur. One of the aggravating things for a member of parliament, Mr. Speaker, is to have brought to his attention a great number of requests relating to the removal of station agents about which, in ordinary circumstances, in the majority of cases he is able to do little. These applications to remove a railway station agent are taken to the board of transport commissioners and there is no opportunity for members of parliament to make any representations to the C.P.R. There is, of course, some opportunity to make certain representations to the C.N.R.

In addition to the removal of station agents in a wholesale manner—and this is particularly true in the prairie provinces—it is now reported that the railways are about to embark on a policy of the removal of certain railway trackage and the abandonment of certain railway lines. This policy has caused great concern in the communities that may be affected. If we were able, under this motion, to have brought before this committee not only the president of the C.N.R. who has been roundly criticized in the house this afternoon, but the president of the C.P.R., in order to find out why the C.P.R. is not giving essential services which I feel it is failing to give and should provide, I think it would be an advantage. I think the publicly owned system is put in a disadvantageous position by being brought into the spotlight of public scrutiny when its competitor, the C.P.R., is not obliged to appear in the same spotlight. With regard to other questions such as that of freight rates, the president of the C.N.R. is prone to follow the example set by the C.P.R. I should like to see the authority of this committee extended so that we could have brought before the committee the president of the C.P.R., the person who is giving, much more than the C.N.R., leadership in the railway associations in this country, in many instances in directions that I feel should not be followed.

There has been some discussion already this afternoon of things that should be taken into consideration by way of improvement. I have had some critical things to say about the premier of the province of Newfoundland. I want to agree with those who have said that consideration should be given by the C.N.R. to providing a standard gauge railway in the province of Newfoundland. I had the privilege of visiting that province last fall and I found a great deal of criticism being voiced with regard to the inadequate service provided by this railway. The people of that province are most anxious that the C.N.R. give to them the same kind of service as that which is provided to other provinces in our nation.

I had the opportunity also to visit Prince Edward Island. There is a unanimous complaint in that province about the type of ferry that is provided between the island and the mainland. As the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) pointed out, there are two old ferries now in service. Very often they are out of service because they are in need of repair. The people of the island were led to believe by the Conservative party that they had a program which would result in the building of a causeway. I think it is high time that the necessary inquiry be made to see whether or not a causeway is a feasible undertaking. I think that in addition to the improvement of services which would be provided for Prince Edward Island it would satisfy the very natural desire to have facilities to reach the mainland in a quick and efficient manner. The people of the island feel that to some extent they are isolated because of this inadequate service. They certainly request the government to take action in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National Railways is forced to provide certain services that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company does not have to provide. To some extent it is unable to compete in an equitable manner with the C.P.R. The same can be said of Trans-Canada Air Lines. Although Trans-Canada has in many instances a monopoly, nevertheless it is requested to provide services on lines which do not provide a net revenue. I would suggest that if we are to have an adequate over-all transportation policy in this country, and if members of parliament are to be given the kind of jurisdiction that should be theirs, namely that of discussing and inquiring into all railway matters, the government would be well advised to bring in an amendment to this resolution which would provide for wider scope and would give the committee authority to inquire into the whole railway system of our country as well as our airlines system.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister not going to reply to some of these questions?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question as to whether I am in a position to reply, the hon. member covered a very wide field and posed a tremendous number of questions which would probably take over an hour to even try to answer. I think the proper place to answer those questions is in the committee which will start sitting next Tuesday morning. In attendance will be the president of the railway and various officials, and all questions can be answered then.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. minister could answer them in a much shorter time.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS, BUDGETS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the sessional committee on railways, airlines and shipping consist of Messrs. Badanai, Bourbonnais, Brassard (Lapointe), Broome, Carter, Chevrier, Chown, Creaghan, Drysdale, Fisher, Fraser, Granger, Grills, Horner (Jasper-Edson), Kennedy, McPhillips, McWilliam, Martini, Mitchell, Monteith (Verdun), Pascoe, Robinson, Rowe, Smallwood, Smith (Simcoe North) and Tassé; and that the annual reports for 1958 of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, Canadian National Railways securities trust, auditors' report to parliament in respect of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled on April 14; the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for 1958, the auditors' report to parliament on Trans-Canada Air Lines for 1958, tabled on April 10; and the budgets for 1959 of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines, tabled on April 20, be referred to the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping; and that items numbered 410—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals; 411—

Newfoundland ferry and terminals; and 419—Maritime Freight Rates Act, as listed in the main estimates of 1959-60, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the said committee, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to introduce this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, just one question. Has the hon. minister forgotten to include the budget of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if I did then certainly the hon. member is right in correcting me. I did not know that I had missed it, but if I did it should be included.

Mr. Speaker: The motion deals with the budgets for 1959 of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines, tabled on April 20. Has the hon. minister leave to insert in the motion the budget of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I may be permitted to ask one other question. Is there any such budget?

Mr. Chevrier (Laurier): If the minister is agreeable I think the motion should be amended to include the budget of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I believe it should be included, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

INDIAN ACT

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved:

That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, chapter 149, R.S.C., 1952, and amendments thereto, and to suggest such amendments as they may deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, on the social and economic status of the Indians;

That twenty-four members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the house as members of the said committee, and that Standing Order 67(1) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses under oath; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time; and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that Standing Order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems advisable some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to make any extended remarks in the introduction of this motion, because I think most members of the house are anxious to see this committee established and proceed with the work which will be given to it. However, I might just briefly trace some history which is probably well known to the members of the house, but for the purposes of the record I think it should be repeated. I might recall that in 1946 parliament appointed a joint committee of both houses to examine and consider the Indian Act and report upon Indian administration. This committee studied the various aspects of Indian affairs during the 1946, 1947 and 1948 sessions of parliament, and it completed its work with its final report in June, 1948.

Over 400 briefs were filled, and 122 witnesses, both Indian and non-Indian, were heard. It was the most exhaustive review of Indian affairs undertaken by a parliamentary committee up to that time. As a result of the recommendations of the joint committee, a complete revision of the Indian Act was carried out and a new act was passed in 1951. I think it would be true to say that the deliberations of the committee and subsequent revision of the Indian Act stimulated a great deal of interest in the affairs of Indians among people in all walks of life. Since then there has continued to be a marked awareness of, and increased interest in, the position and future of the Indians. This is a most welcome development.

Ten years have now passed since the joint committee submitted its report, and it would seem appropriate to again have a committee of both houses review the Indian Act to find out how it is working out in practice and to suggest such changes as may be deemed advisable. It would also seem desirable to have a review of Indian administration in general, and in particular the social and economic status of the Indians. The problems facing Indians in changing times are many and varied, and, I believe require periodic review and study such as can be given by a parliamentary committee. We hope we will then be in a better position to consider such measures as may be necessary to improve the welfare of the Indians and facilitate the administration of their affairs.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On this occasion I agree completely with what the hon. lady has said, and, having said that, I think we ought to pass her motion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the amiability just expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) will certainly not be disturbed as far as those of us in the C.C.F. are concerned. I do not mean the feeling between the minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but the feeling of amicability which we in this group share toward this proposal to set up a committee to consider Indian affairs, a proposal which, we believe, will receive the support of everybody in this house.

Ever since notice of the intention to establish such a committee was placed on the order paper on February 9 we, together with others interested, have been anxiously awaiting the time when the matter would be proceeded with. Of course, the native Indian people have been more anxious than anyone to see the committee finally set up, in the hope that solutions might be forthcoming to the many problems affecting the Indian population. I have had numerous letters from members of Indian bands in my own constituency and others in British Columbia with respect to some of the questions which they hope may be dealt with by the committee.

The minister made reference to the joint committee which was established in 1946, the committee which met in that year and in subsequent years and whose work culminated in the 1951 amendments to the Indian Act. I hope the committee which is now contemplated, or one similar to it, will have the opportunity to meet during future sessions of this parliament, because I do not think it would be possible, within what we expect will be the few short months left of this session, to complete the exhaustive study of Indian affairs which must necessarily be made, and deal with all the problems in detail. This committee could, in my opinion, make a far greater contribution toward the welfare of Indians than any other agency or group if it approaches the whole question with some imagination, as I am sure it will, and with a keen desire to find solutions to the problems presented to it.

It may be, of course, that eventually there will be no need to have an Indian Act or an Indian affairs branch. It may be a time will come when our native Indian people will be on an equal footing with non-Indians throughout the country, a time when there will be no differentiation between peoples of Indian extraction and people from any other group. In the meantime I think it would be well to indicate some specific fields of interest with which the committee might concern itself. I should like to suggest some of these fields of interest; not in a critical way, but merely as a guide, as was done in 1946 when a similar committee was established. I should like to mention a number of topics which might well be considered in order that the committee, when it meets, may have some specific ideas concerning the people it might most profitably meet and the fields into which its inquiries can be directed.

In this regard I have an amendment to suggest to the motion. As I said earlier, I do not move it in any critical spirit or with the intention of detracting in any way from the contents of the motion which the hon. lady has put forward. The motion merely suggests that certain specific fields of interest should be included in the deliberations of the committee when it comes to examine Indian affairs. I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin):

That the motion be amended as follows: At the end of paragraph one add the following: "including,

1. The liability of Indians to pay taxes,
2. The eligibility of Indians to vote at dominion elections,
3. The operation of Indian day and residential schools and the relationship between the Indian affairs branch and other educational groups, agencies and organizations regarding the education of Indians.
4. The relationship between the Indian affairs branch and the various provinces and municipalities,
5. The responsibilities of, and remuneration to band councils,
6. The relationship between the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and Indians resident in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and
7. Any other matter or thing pertaining to the advancement of Indians which will lead to a more complete participation in all phases of society which, in the opinion of the Committee, should be dealt with.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may now proceed; and relate some of my remarks to the amendment. The key to success in the future so far as Indians and Indian affairs are concerned is to be found in enlightenment and understanding and a mutual desire to work together for the advancement of our native population. But it is also to be found, and to an equally great extent, in the manner of our co-operation. When I use the word "co-operation" I mean it to be all-inclusive. There is little doubt that there will be co-operation between all the members of the committee which the government contemplates setting up. But you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that one of the paragraphs in the amendment I have moved, namely paragraph 4, concerns the relationship between the Indian affairs branch and the various provinces and municipalities.

The provinces and municipalities are slowly being required to play a much larger role in Indian affairs than was the case ten or 12 years ago. What I have in mind is their jurisdictional responsibility and co-operation between municipalities who experience Indian problems day to day more so than does the federal parliament or more so, let us say, than does the Indian affairs branch, and that the co-operation of these groups and elements is most necessary with the various Indian organizations—naturally provincial ones—and other agencies which are interested in and concerned with Indian affairs. The amendment which I suggest, I would reiterate, is not made in the sense that most amendments are made in, that is in the sense of being critical of something or detracting from something or being advanced in a negative way.

This amendment is designed to set out what I think should be suggestions about some of the major and important questions in relation to Indian people and to give some guidance not only to the committee but more particularly to the many Indian bands and Indian councils and the provinces and municipalities which are affected by Indian affairs and are certainly interested in them.

Mr. Speaker: I have been considering the relevancy of the amendment which is proposed and before putting it I should be glad to hear if any hon. member has any assistance to give me as to the relevancy of the proposed parts of the motion by way of amendment.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without inquiring into the various clauses of the proposed amendment, a copy of which has been given to me, may I say it seems to me that the whole scope of this amendment is covered in the words of the original motion:

> —investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, on the social and economic status of the Indians.

I think what the hon. member is trying to achieve is already contained in the very broad phraseology that is used in the original motion.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I may comment on that phase of it, I do not think there is any doubt that the terms of the original resolution with respect to Indian administration and the social and economic status of the Indians are broad enough, as the minister said, but I wonder if that precludes specific suggestions concerning some of the things that could be contained within those broad aspects or considerations. It is in that light that I suggest this is an attempt to particularize some of the phases that are probably of greater importance than some of the other phases of Indian affairs.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the remarks of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) which are entirely relevant. This amendment attempts to particularize in some paragraphs the general terms of the main motion. We all realize the dangers of particularizing in these matters. By trying to particularize you sometimes restrict the operations of the committee through using specific terms because then the committee is limited to those specific terms. Therefore I think as a matter of policy and for the good of the committee the amendment is not one which should be accepted by the house.

On a point of order I would refer Your Honour to a citation in Beauchesne's 4th edition which no doubt Your Honour already has before him. I allude to citation No. 291 where Beauchesne says:

> 291. When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee,—

Which is the case here. I continue:

> —a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice.

As I said some of these paragraphs simply particularize the general terms of the resolution. Then too, we have reference to the relationship between Indian affairs and the department and the Indian affairs branch and various provinces and municipalities which I think is going rather farther than the terms of the resolution. We then find reference to the eligibility of Indians in relation to voting in federal elections. There is on the order paper, although I do not know where it stands, a motion to set up the elections committee of this house. I am under the impression that it is soon to be called. Certainly this is a matter pertaining to that committee. Without further elaboration I suggest that because of citation 291, and possibly because of other citations as well, the proposed amendment is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: My concern with the proposed amendment was rather along the line that the minister has just mentioned in that it was already included in the main motion. If it is fully covered it is, of course, redundant and not needed but it does specify certain things that are perhaps additional. My concern with this amendment is that it seems to go broadly into other fields. For instance, it raises the question of the liability of Indians to pay taxes. That seems to me to be a matter of taxation policy and quite removed from the Indian Act. Then there is also the question of voting. I am not sure how far that is dealt with by the Indian Act. Those items are so broadly different from the general inquiry into the Indian Act that it seems to me in the light of citation 291 which indicates that a new matter can be introduced only by notice I cannot really be disposed to accept the amendment. If the hon. member has anything to say in reply to that I shall hear him briefly.

Mr. Howard: One comment, if I may. With respect to your reference to the liability of Indians to pay taxes I would submit there is reference in the Indian Act to the payment of taxes by native Indians and to the exemption of Indians from such payment. I submit the committee is competent to deal with this subject which falls within its jurisdiction. The subject does not wander into the other field of general taxation.

There is also reference in the Indian Act to the eligibility of Indians to vote in dominion elections. The act sets up the procedure which is connected with their liability to pay taxes. They may vote under certain circumstances but are restricted from voting under others.

I wish to make reference to citation 291. As I understood the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), he said this amendment was expanding upon the contents of the original motion and inasmuch as it did expand it would require notice. I realize I may be getting myself into another difficulty by arguing along these lines but I would submit that this amendment is not expansive of the contents of the motion itself which I say and which the minister indicated is written in the broadest possible terms and authorizes the committee to investigate into Indian administration in general and in particular into the social and economic status of the Indians.

I submit that each aspect of the contents of the amendment relates to the economic and social status of Indians in one way or another. I also submit the amendment does not expand the broad general approach set out in the motion but is rather designed to particularize some of the things which would fall within those broad general terms.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member and both ministers for their assistance on this rather novel point. Amendments usually do not take in as much territory as the proposed amendment. I think that is a difficulty which is insuperable.

I would refer also to citation 293 of Beauchesne dealing with a motion that a select committee be appointed to examine a rise in the cost of living and an amendment that the committee be empowered to examine the efforts of government policy in lessening agricultural production on which occasion the Speaker ruled as follows:

> Though I find this amendment relevant to the main motion, I cannot yet overlook the fact that questions of policy are so complex that they should not be moved as corollaries to the appointment of such a committee as the one now proposed. It is against all parliamentary usage to refer questions of policy to a fact-finding committee.

Farther on, he says:

> When an amendment is irregular in one particular, the whole of it is not admissible and must be ruled out of order.

A good part of this amendment is a repetition of the main motion, which I think would cover what the hon. member has in mind. I am concerned about the departures from the Indian Act which are involved in the question of taxation, which is not referred to this committee. I understand Indians are exempt from taxation. To ask this committee to inquire whether they should or should not be taxed while on the reserve seems to me to be outside of the scope of the motion and would require notice. Therefore, with regret I cannot accept the amendment of the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: May I pose a question, sir? This question is a bit irregular. Are we to take it, then, that the committee when established will not be able to deal with the questions in the amendment?

Mr. Speaker: The committee will have before it the interest of the hon. member in all of these things, and it will cover them as they desire.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to move in connection with this motion. It stems from the situation in my own region. In order to examine some of the very large problems which are spelled out in the resolution, I feel that the committee will have to do a considerable amount of travelling, and in that particular aspect it will be necessary, for practical purposes, for the committee to break up into certain subcommittees. I think especially of one area with over 200 Indians which is about 350 miles north of Port Arthur, and another one about 500 miles from Port Arthur, which have very special problems. I am not suggesting that this committee will necessarily go into this type of work, or that any subcommittees will do so, but I am sure there are examples of this across the country where an intimate personal contact on the part of members of the committee will be useful.

Since citation 294 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, says that a committee does not have power to appoint subcommittees except under special circumstances, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) an amendment to paragraph 3 by inserting after the word "power" in the first line, the following:

To appoint from its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary to deal with specific phases of the problem aforesaid;

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member who wishes to present this amendment considered citation 291, which has already been read, to this effect:

When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee, a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice.

It seems to me the amendment which the hon. member is proposing attempts to enlarge the powers of the committee, and it will therefore be rejected.

BROADCASTING

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider radio and television broadcasting together with the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and to review the operations, policies and aims of the corporation and its revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters herein referred to, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to meet while the house is sitting;

That the committee shall consist of 35 members;

That standing orders 66 and 67 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, there are just two brief points that I should like to put on Hansard in relation to this motion to establish a committee on broadcasting. First, I would like to recall the statement made by the minister, which appears at page 4046 of Hansard of August 25, 1958, when he said this:

On behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, I would say that if it is requested at the next session of parliament, we will shortly after the session begins set up a special committee of the house to deal with radio and broadcasting generally. All these matters can be referred to that committee, and perhaps the committee can watch the organization take shape and form and grow during the session rather than speculate, which is all we can do now concerning the operation of the bill.

These words were uttered in August of last year to the effect that if the committee was asked for it would be established immediately. On three occasions, namely on January 26, 1959, on January 27, 1959, and on February 6, 1959 I asked that this committee be set up, the first time by putting the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), so that certain matters which were then of an important and pertinent nature could be discussed. Always the request for the establishment of the committee was refused or put off. I do not think the house should be treated to two kinds of promises: one undertaking that is fulfilled and another undertaking that is not, and that is deemed to be fulfilled as and when the minister, the government or the other side of the house thinks it should be. I thought this should go on record so that it would be clearly shown that, notwithstanding the request made by myself and many other hon. members for the establishment of this committee to deal with certain pertinent matters, the committee was not established.

All I need say is that we welcome the establishment of this committee, but we would have felt a great deal happier had it been established a long time ago.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we look forward to this committee. We have shared the disappointment of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) that it was not got under way before this, especially in the light of those optimistic remarks made by the minister when the bill itself was before the house last year, which instituted a new system of broadcasting. I think one of the greatest disappointments of everyone interested in broadcasting and telecasting has been the very slow way in which the board of broadcast governors has got under way. I think of one point. They still have not prepared any regulations in so far as political telecasting is concerned. According to my analysis they have made no attempts—

Mr. Nowlan: And have no intention of doing so.

Mr. Fisher: The minister says that they have no intention of doing so. Someone needs to do something about it. I know they have largely followed the old C.B.C. regulations in so far as radio political broadcasting is concerned.

One other disappointment in connection with its performance is the repetition of the C.B.C. policy, which more than one station operator has regretted, of setting out their regulations in mimeographed form, a very clumsy way. Obviously they are going to be added to on an ad hoc basis. It is a most unbusinesslike method.

I know this is not the place to make criticisms of the performance of the board of broadcast governors but I think that in the committee we do want to take a close look at the board, perhaps not least because of the rather equivocal position that group took with regard to calling representatives of certain radio stations before it. We had this complete flummox and misunderstanding about what the purpose of these licence hearings was and I know that in my particular region there was a great deal of misunderstanding and hard feelings consequent upon the issue of the call.

If, as was originally suggested, these stations were being summoned in a sense to account because of certain kinds of programming then it should have been stated instead of having the back-tracking in this regard that did take place because it was obvious to most observers—certainly it could be seen from the press—that these particular stations had certainly given indications as to why their programming could be condemned or reassessed in the light of the issuance of the licences.

So far as the committee is concerned, we would hope that the matter of the committee having the power to meet while the house is sitting will not be extended, as in the case of some of the other select committees, so that we will be sitting right through from nine o'clock in the morning until the report of the C.B.C., for example, has been disposed of. With the number of committees we have coming at the present time I think it would be well to limit ourselves to morning and afternoon sittings at the most.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has always been a favorite sniping target of past parliamentary committees and the amazing thing to anyone who has observed the operations of these committees is how year after year—the committee has met on the average of once every second year over a period of ten years—the conclusions reached by the committee roughly dovetailed with the report of the Massey commission and the Fowler commission that we needed this kind of institution and that there was a role for the C.B.C. in a country such as ours.

It seems to me that we will need information both from the C.B.C. and the board of broadcast governors about a most important question that has been claimed to be government policy. I refer to the matter of licences for television stations in those areas that already have C.B.C. television stations. I trust that when we get to work on the problem in the committee we will not be faced with the usual slough-off, as happens in so many committees, that this is strictly a question of government policy and that it is not for a committee of the house to become exercised about it. It seems to me that this is the forum where we need to go into this particular question, and I certainly believe that we have to start with the position of the C.B.C. as the officers of that corporation can enunciate it from the point of view of what their position is going to be in the face of competition. Otherwise it seems to me that the government will be operating in the dark when it does come to hand out these plums, and I think that everyone agrees that in the main they are going to be plums.

I must compliment the minister with regard to his general stand on radio and television broadcasting since it has been his responsibility. One hates to draw odorous comparisons with the previous situation but it does seem to me that, compared with the previous minister, he has certainly given a little more leeway to the corporation. With regard to the board of broadcast governors, I do not know what sort of relationship he has had with them but they certainly seem to have been able to fumble and bumble along on their own which would indicate that the minister did not stick his nose into things.

Whatever relationships he may have with the committee, I hope that he will be continuously liberal in a general sense and perhaps a bit more liberal than he has been in another committee before which he has appeared where in my view he has tended to draw perhaps too sharp a line between government policy and what one may expect by way of an answer from deputy ministers.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

REFERENCE OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) (for the Secretary of State) moved:

That the standing committee on privileges and elections be empowered to study the Canada Elections Act, and the several amendments thereto suggested by the chief electoral officer; and to report to the house such proposals relating to the said act as the committee may deem to be advisable.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow and Friday as well?

Mr. Green: We shall carry on with the business I announced last night, commencing with the resolution dealing with federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SPECIFICATION WRITERS AND CONSTRUCTION CONSULTANTS

Question No. 327—Mr. Herridge:

1. How many specification writers are employed by the Department of National Defence, and at what salary in each case, for (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force?

2. How many consultants for construction projects have been hired, during the past five years, for the (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force, and how many of these consultants are presently employed and at what dates do their contracts terminate?

3. What percentage of the designs for any buildings has been prepared by private consultants, during the past five years, for the (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force?

4. Have any construction contractors for the Department of National Defence complained of slipshod methods in the preparation of construction specifications during the past twelve months?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. (a) The R.C.N. does not employ personnel specifically for specification writing. All specifications are prepared by engineers and architects on the staff of the civil engineer in chief as part of their design work.

(b) 3.

	1	$6480-$7200
	1	$5700-$6180

(c) 4.

	1	$7500-$8580
	2	$6420-$7200
	1	$6210-$6660

	Consultants retained during last 5 years	Presently employed	All contracts will have terminated by
(a)	36	12	January 1960
(b)	113	37	April 1960
(c)	127	35	January 1960

3. (a) 36 per cent est., (b) 95 per cent est., (c) 35 per cent est.

4. The Canadian construction association has complained about the number of modifications to D.N.D. standard specifications, a condition brought about by changes in construction methods and materials since the original specifications were prepared. The services' design branches are now incorporating addenda within the body of the main specifications and it is anticipated this will alleviate the condition leading to such complaints.

Questions

INTERSERVICE EQUIVALENTS BOARD

Question No. 349—Mr. Herridge:

1. Who are the members of the interservice equivalents board, and what was the total expenditure for salaries of (a) members of the board; (b) staff; (c) travelling expenses, for the year 1958?

2. What are the functions of the interservice equivalents board, and to whom is it directly responsible?

3. Has the board issued an equivalent certificate for a door closer named the Briton? If so, how many certificates for this product have been issued during the years 1957-58, and how many door closers does this represent?

4. What is the cost of the Briton door closer?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. The members of the interservice equivalents board are as follows: Air Commodore R. B. Whiting, Chairman, R.C.A.F. member; Capt. J. B. Roper, R.C.N. member; Brig. H. L. Meuser, Army member; Mr. A. M. Fordyce, D.R.B. member; Mr. W. Loynes, A.D.M. (C&P).

(a) The members of the board receive no salaries for service as members.

(b) Total salaries for staff, $45,805.

(c) Total travelling expenses for staff, $133.30.

2. The functions of the interservice equivalents board were described in detail in a paper tabled on Friday, July 25, 1958 during the proceedings of the standing committee on estimates. (See appendix H—pp. 567-69) The board is responsible to the assistant deputy minister for construction and properties, Department of National Defence.

3. Yes, 68 certificates approving Briton door closers were issued to various firms in 1957 and 1958. It is not possible to give the exact number of Briton door closers represented by the certificates issued. To obtain this information would require an inspection of all the buildings on all the sites for which the approvals had been given.

4. The cost of the Briton door closer varies according to size and competitive circumstances. The cost of the Briton door closers used in D.N.D. buildings range from approximately $10.50 to $13.50.

ARMOURY PURCHASE, SACKVILLE, N.B.

Question No. 352—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Did the Department of National Defence or other government agency purchase a building in the town of Sackville, New Brunswick, for use as an armoury?

2. If so, from whom was it purchased?

3. What was the amount paid for the building?

4. Were there other expenses in connection with this purchase? If so, to whom, and in what amounts were moneys paid?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. The Department of National Defence purchased the Stratton Motors building located at the corner of Main street and Allison avenue, in the town of Sackville, N.B.

2. The building was purchased from Mrs. Ethel M. Wood, Sackville, N.B.

3. The amount paid was $28,500.

4. There were no additional expenses in connection with this purchase other than the legal fees payable to the agent of the Department of Justice. This account has not yet been received.

BRITON DOOR CLOSER—GERMAN SILVER HINGES

Question No. 356—Mr. Herridge:

1. Has the Briton door closer been tested by the Department of Public Works? If so, was it found unsatisfactory?

2. Has the inter-service equivalents board issued a certificate of equivalency for German silver hinges, in lieu of stainless steel hinges manufactured in Canada?

3. Has the use of German silver hinges received the approval of the appropriate construction officials of the army?

Answer by: Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State):

1. (a) Yes. (b) No.
2. No.
3. No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Second, third and fourth reports of standing committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Dinsdale.

TRADE

OIL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF REMOVAL OF U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON CERTAIN IMPORTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the United States since July of 1957 has restricted imports of oil, first by what was known as the voluntary oil imports program and, since March 10, 1959, by mandatory controls. This government has consistently maintained and repeatedly emphasized to the government of the United States that we could not recognize that such controls were consistent with the mutual security interest of Canada and the United States and with the economic co-operation which must underlie such a vital common interest.

I am pleased, therefore to be able to tell the house that the United States government has today announced the exemption from import restrictions of crude oil, unfinished oils, and finished petroleum products which enter the United States by pipe line, motor carrier or rail from the country in which they are produced. Under the terms of the United States government decision the exemption will become effective as of June 1 next.

I wish to take this occasion to express the Canadian government's satisfaction at the decision which has been taken and announced by the United States. I am glad to recognize that it is the consequence of a desire on the part of the United States administration to reach agreement with Canada in the solution of a difficult problem.

The exemption will be of direct benefit to the export sales of Canadian crude oil and products. As important, if not more, is the benefit which will follow in terms of a normal, healthy development of the Canadian petroleum industry, which is thus restored to its appropriate place as an important and natural supplier of the North American markets.

In addition to its intrinsic importance for the future of the Canadian oil industry, the decision is also of significance in terms of our general relations with the United States in that it removes a source of distressing irritation and reflects a degree of co-operation and sensible development of resources which is so necessary for the economic prosperity and mutual defence of our two countries.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house will have heard with great satisfaction from the Prime Minister of the decision of the United States government to lift the restriction on the export from Canada to the United States of this very important product. We all hope this may be followed by an increase in our exports of oil to the United States and in an encouragement to the development of this industry.

Perhaps I am not right in this assumption, but I assume from the Prime Minister's statement that the action taken by the government of the United States affects Canadian oil and not imports of oil from other countries in this hemisphere. If that assumption is correct perhaps I may be permitted to ask the Prime Minister whether as a result of the discussions and negotiations that have been carried on in Washington, Canada's hands are tied in any way in regard to any action which we may feel obliged to take in the future concerning imports of oil from, say, Venezuela.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this announcement by the Prime Minister is a welcome one. I believe that parliament as a whole has supported the representations the government of Canada has made to the United States. We have supported the government in these actions, and we are fully confident of the fact that because parliament spoke with one voice this had some bearing on the important results announced today.

This announcement is of importance to the Canadian oil industry and to the oil industry of western Canada in particular. In recent months there have been serious cut-backs in production. There has been a reluctance on the part of oil companies to continue exploration at a rapid pace. We hope this will restore morale to the oil industry and mean an expanded exploration and development program. We believe it should result in increased markets for Canadian oil.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition I think is answered by the fact that the exception covers the products I mentioned which enter the United States by pipe line, motor carrier or rail from the country in which they are produced.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON STORING AND CONTROL IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether any agreement has been reached with the United States in regard to the storing and control of nuclear weapons on Canadian soil.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to welcome the hon. member's return after his enforced absence from the house. I assure him that the whole subject will be dealt with very shortly on an occasion other than on orders of the day.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF WHITE PAPER IN ENGLISH AND FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I understand that he said yesterday the white paper on national defence would be tabled today. I should like to ask him if he would inform the house whether French and English copies of that report will be made available simultaneously.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the white paper on national defence was placed in the hands of the Clerk of the house today, and it will be distributed to hon. members by the distribution office some time today. Unfortunately, although the translation has been completed, the printing of the French edition is not yet complete. As soon as it is finished it will be distributed to the members.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING INADEQUATE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette that a 15,000-ton vessel dented two hull plates, scraped her sides and lost part of her deck railing in negotiating the canals and locks. Can the minister comment on the statement by Captain MacDermid of the Grace Line freighter Santa Regina to the effect that unless changes are made in the seaway canals and locks, which are so narrow and inadequate, ocean vessels may have to be redesigned to avoid damaging their hulls and superstructures in the cramped facilities of the seaway?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would say it is all a matter of ocean-going skippers becoming as skilled as lake-going skippers in navigating their ships through the seaway.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER EXTENSION OF BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I understand the government is in receipt of telegrams from the Vancouver and district labour council and affiliated unions expressing concern at unemployment insurance supplementary benefits being cut off on May 15. This is the purport of the telegrams. Can the minister inform the house of government policy on this matter, and will provision be made for continuing assistance if employment is not available?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, no consideration has been given to that suggestion as yet.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the statement by the Minister of Labour that no consideration is being given to the matter, will the Minister of Labour inform the house—if supplementary benefits are cut off on May 15 and no employment is available—what the government expects these men and women to live on?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour a supplementary question to that put by the hon. member for Vancouver East in regard to representations made to the Prime Minister in the matter of a continuation of supplementary unemployment insurance benefits. The minister said no consideration has been given that matter. In view of the fact that we shall soon be confronted with the 15th day of May, will the government give consideration to this request?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, this government, for the first time any government has ever taken such action, extended seasonal benefits by two months last year and again for six weeks on a temporary basis when conditions demanded it; whereas the former government would not even extend it by even one month.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They did not face the unemployment levels now before us.

Mr. Starr: Those conditions existed in 1954 and 1955. The members of this house and the people of this country have a great deal of confidence in this government, and we will see that the proper thing is done to look after the people.

Mr. Chevrier: Not nearly as much as you think.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for what he has said, but he has not yet answered my question. In view of the fact that there are now over 522,000 men and women out of work in Canada, will my hon. friend tell the house whether or not the government will give consideration to the request made to the Prime Minister by the Vancouver and district labour council?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, this government gives consideration to every request, as has been pointed out. On every occasion when requests have been brought to the attention of this government, action has been taken.

Mr. Winch: Based on the remarks of the minister a few moments ago, if these people are cut off from benefits on May 15, what do they live on as far as government policy is concerned?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is carrying on an argument on this question.

COAL

REPORTED LAY-OFFS IN ALBERTA MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. A few days having passed since I asked a question in reference to some men being laid off in Drumheller as a result of the abandonment of two mines, what consideration if any has been given this matter by the minister's department up to date?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out to the hon. member the other day, my officials are doing everything possible to assist those miners who have lost their jobs in the Drumheller coal mines. There are approximately 300 of that type of miner. Every effort is being made to find alternative employment wherever this can be located. I have declared this area a labour surplus area, so that arrangements can be made to pay removal expenses of those miners, their wives, families and household effects, who wish to take jobs in other areas. This is not compulsory on anyone who does not wish to so move.

FINANCE

REPORTED INCREASE IN BANK RATE SINCE APRIL 28

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Will the minister advise the house whether bank rates have increased since he spoke in the house on Tuesday last?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the weekly rate on treasury bills today is 4.76 compared with last week's rate of 4.72. It is practically the same as last week's.

Mr. Cardin: It did increase.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman wishes to gloat over the increase I presume he will continue to do so, as his colleagues have in the past.

Mr. Chevrier: You should not get angry over a question like that.

SHIPPING

P.E.I.-NFLD.—REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY ON STEAMSHIP SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister if his department is giving consideration to a request from the Newfoundland board of trade for a subsidy on a steamship service between Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and, if so, what is the attitude of the department?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): We are giving consideration to that request, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED UNFAVOURABLE PUBLICITY IN U. K. NEWSPAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. As an immigrant who came from Great Britain in the same year as the Minister of National Defence, but who has not done nearly as well as he, and as one who is proud to be a Canadian, I am very concerned, as I think a number of other members are, about the series of articles recently published by the English newspaper The People with respect to conditions in Canada, supplemented by pictures taken I believe in 1955. Would the minister inform the house of the steps being taken by her department to correct the false impression of conditions in Canada created by these articles?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have been greatly concerned over what we consider to be the totally false picture painted by this newspaper. A representative of the paper is in Canada at present and the facilities of my department have been made available to him so that he may properly assess the facts as they are. We hope the stories he will write will be somewhat different from those he has written in the past.

I should also like to say that I am grateful to the members of the press gallery having connections with other United Kingdom papers who have offered the facilities of their newspapers in an effort to set the story straight. I believe that through this medium we will eventually get across to the people of the United Kingdom the facts as they are.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ELEVATOR SERVICE FOR MEMBERS DURING RINGING OF BELLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I understand it is not proper to interrogate the Speaker, and in line with the usual custom I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he has noticed the growing annoyance of members of the house because the old rule is not being observed that when the bells ring calling us into the house for its opening or for a vote, first priority on the elevators should go to members of the house. Will the minister look into the existing situation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): This really comes under His Honour, I believe. However, I will be very glad to do what I can.

LIVESTOCK

BOISSEVAIN, MAN.—CERTIFICATION TO HANDLE REGISTERED STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, notice of which I have given him. Has any progress been made in having the port of Boissevain certified to handle registered livestock shipped through there? In view of the approaching summer season this matter is assuming some urgency.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Canadian livestock inspection facilities are in the process of being built at Boissevain, Manitoba, close to the United States border, and when these facilities are ready they will be available to the United States department of agriculture veterinary officials for the inspection of Canadian cattle moving to the United States. The United States authorities have not yet agreed to provide regular veterinary inspection services at Boissevain. However, when the Canadian inspection facilities are available the United States veterinarians will travel to Boissevain at the request of the United States importers to make the inspection of Canadian cattle moving to the United States. Expenses and time charges made by the United States animal inspection service for this inspection away from a regular United States inspection port are chargeable to the owner of the livestock being examined for admittance to the United States.

As soon as our new inspection facilities at Boissevain are ready for use we intend to again write the United States department of agriculture officials requesting that they provide part-time inspection facilities on prescribed days at Boissevain.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. Does he hope to have these facilities at Boissevain ready by May 14?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate seems to be so interested in affairs in Manitoba at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I lived there for 30 years.

Mr. Harkness: Apparently he has some particular interest there which has not been disclosed to the house.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): They ran him out.

Mr. Harkness: In any event, this matter has been under consideration for well over a year now, and progress has been made in getting something satisfactory to the people there into operation.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PACIFIC PRESS LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, of which notice was given earlier this morning. Is the minister able to give the house any information regarding the status of the investigation by the combines investigation branch into the operations of Pacific Press Limited of Vancouver?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): In accord with the usual practice, I must answer this question in rather general terms; and say, I am not in a position to give the house any information regarding the state of this investigation, except that I have not yet received any report from the restrictive trade practices commission; but if and when I do receive such a report it will be published, as required by the act, in the usual way.

REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret not having given him notice, but since he is so conversant with the operations and responsibilities of his department I feel sure he can answer extemporaneously.

In view of the unanimous recommendation of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons that the question of capital punishment should be reviewed, and in view of the statement by Mr. Justice Manson denouncing the use of the Queen's clemency to commute death penalties to life imprisonment as an abrogation of the authority of parliament—with which statement I may say, sir, I completely disagree—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Up to this point the hon. member has been out of order, so perhaps he can bring himself in order by asking his question.

Mr. Winch: I was right there when you rose, Mr. Speaker. My question, therefore, is, will the minister inform the house whether consideration has been given or will be given to reconstituting the joint committee for the purpose of further considering this most important, controversial and complex matter?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I can tell the hon. gentleman that up to the present time no consideration has been given to reconstituting that committee, and in view of the complaints we have already heard from the opposition about the number of committees on which they have to serve I should think it is not likely that any consideration will be given to that suggestion at this session.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TELEVISION

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF LOWER MAINLAND STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Since over 60 per cent of the population of British Columbia live in the lower mainland area, where there is no private television station, and since $1,500,000 per year is spent by British Columbians on advertising over the Bellingham, United States, television station, would the minister give consideration to granting a private television licence for a station in the lower mainland area of British Columbia, preferably in the New Westminster-Surrey district?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The short answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, is no, because of course I have no control over the issuance of television licences. This matter comes under the control of the board of broadcast governors. Therefore I have no opinion in this matter, but in fairness to the house, and with Your Honour's permission, I may take 30 seconds because I know many members are interested in this matter.

I find that there are no regulations respecting television in Canada. I have asked the board of broadcast governors to draft regulations respecting television in Canada so that if and when the board of broadcast governors see fit to consider or grant applications for additional television stations wherever they may be, the applicants will at least know the rules and regulations with which they will have to comply, and will not have to complain about the fact that someone has changed the rules in the middle of the game. I am advised by the board of broadcast governors that they hope the regulations will shortly be drafted in preliminary form and finished in the very near future, and once they have been published and promulgated the government will then give consideration to lifting the present restrictions on competing television stations in Canada.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask Your Honour if it is now permissible to discuss this question now, at this moment, because this matter was raised by members of the opposition on a previous occasion and the minister has taken this opportunity, in answering a question, to debate this matter. I might say there are many members on this side of the house who would like to enter the debate.

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the minister, he asked leave of the house to make the short statement he did make, and no objection was taken. Therefore I assumed the house gave its consent.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I here and now take objection to the form of the question, although of course it might be important to the hon. member. I take objection to the form of the question and to the manner in which the answer was given, because this is the very kind of question which has been prevented from being asked from this side of the house and, with respect, the rules should apply to both sides of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I will note what the hon. member has said. The question has been asked, and the answer was no.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to support what the hon. member for Laurier has said. We had a discussion yesterday on this very topic, and the only comment we had from the minister was a brief interjection.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

FURTHER EXTENSION OF INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 11, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for a further period of one year the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, when we last had this resolution before us on March 11, in the dying minutes of the day the minister made an appeal to the house, as recorded on page 1854 of Hansard, to agree to the passing of this resolution. At the time I indicated we were not yet prepared to allow the resolution to pass so the minister might introduce the bill, because looking at the wording of the resolution it is obvious that once the bill is before us we will be limited very much indeed in our debate on the matter. Once the bill is before us we will be limited to the terms which are outlined in the bill. Looking at the resolution, it says:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act—

There is a feeling in our group that the word "expedient" in this context is of importance. I looked up the word in the dictionary, and I found that "expedient" may mean that "it is advisable". However, I also noticed in one dictionary that in the days of William Shakespeare the word "expedient" could be interpreted as "hasty". I believe that the Elizabethan interpretation of the word "expedient" ought to apply here. I would prefer to say that the resolution ought to read: "Resolved that because of the lack of policy and the unwillingness to fulfil election pledges, it is regrettable that it is expedient that this measure now be introduced."

I realize that a ruling has been given that we may not at this time debate the advisability of calling together a formal dominion-provincial conference. The minister has indicated that there is to be a meeting of the finance ministers of the ten provincial governments himself, and to that end the minister has indicated on the orders of the day that he has now employed a roving ambassador who is interviewing the ten provincial finance ministers.

I hope that before the resolution is adopted the minister is going to indicate to the house what kind of reception this roving ambassador has received and when we may expect the meeting of the finance ministers. We feel that the government has ignored its election pledges, that it is carrying on the old policy, and that it is employing an ad hoc philosophy in regard to the financial resources of the various levels of government. We in our group feel that there ought to be developing in Canada the idea that the federal government should begin to share the responsibilities that are faced by various levels of government in the year 1959. We prefer a sharing of responsibilities attitude to the approach that used to be expounded by the Conservatives when in opposition, which was one of the federal government relinquishing certain sources of revenue in favour of other levels of government.

We should like to ask the minister this question. On what basis is this resolution founded? Why does he ask the house to continue the old arrangement? I have indicated before that what the minister is now asking is not in line with his election speeches. We notice—and it is with agreement on our part—that the government has provided for extraordinary grants for a number of our Canadian provinces, namely Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. We notice also, and with extreme pleasure, that the federal government under the auspices of the Prime Minister has at long last agreed to share the cost of a major undertaking in the province of Saskatchewan. I refer, of course, to the building of the dam. We also note with some agreement that the federal government is willing to share responsibility in the field of unemployment by way of its winter works program, that the federal government has also agreed to help in the development of natural resources, and has itself evolved a roads to resources program. We hear—and we hear this only by way of the "grapevine" —that the federal government is about to undertake a sharing of some responsibilities with the government of Manitoba, and we hope an announcement in that regard will not be very long delayed.

This problem which faces our ten provincial governments and all our municipal governments is a very serious one. Since March 11, when this question was last under discussion, we have received information regarding the expected revenues and expenditures of each of our provincial governments. We have also read a good deal in our home town newspapers about the budgets of our municipal governments. It causes us a great deal of concern when we realize that our municipal governments, almost without exception, have found it necessary to raise the mill rate.

I know the advice the Prime Minister gave to the municipalities last October was that if they did not wish to raise their mill rates, maybe they ought to raise their assessments. That is advice which I think could be exploded by any 14 or 15-year old in Canada. However, we regret that our municipalities, by reason of the niggardliness of this federal government, are in the position where they must either raise their mill rates or their assessments. I may say that many municipalities and provinces are giving very serious consideration to the imposition of a retail sales tax in order that they may be able to meet their obligations. I understand that in the province of Manitoba, unless there is an extraordinary announcement on the part of the national government, a sales tax will be imposed after May 14.

I should like at this point to read the receipts by way of taxation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957. I notice that the federal government received the sum of $5,019 million. Our provinces were able to collect $733 million, and our municipal governments were able to raise the sum of $923 million. In other words, of all the taxes levied upon Canadians 75 per cent went to the Minister of Finance here in Ottawa, our ten ministers of finance in the provinces collected 11 per cent, and our municipalities collected 14 per cent.

Now let us look at what happened in the year 1937. We see that in that year the federal government did not receive 75 per cent of the taxes the Canadian people had to pay. They received only 47 per cent. Our provincial governments did not receive 11 per cent. They got twice as much; they received 22 per cent of the taxpayers' dollar. In the same year, 1937, our municipalities received 31 per cent, as compared with 14 per cent in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957. Thus we see that there has been a real change in the apportionment of the money which the Canadian people pay in taxes. The federal government has received an ever-growing share of that money, and other levels of government which have been faced with increasing responsibilities have received a lesser percentage.

We believe there ought to be a growing willingness on the part of the government of Canada to enter into agreements with other levels of government in assuming a part of the burden. I notice that in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957 in the important field of transportation, while the provinces incurred expenditures amounting to $591 million the federal government spent only $27 million. In other words, this government spent only 4.5 per cent of the money which was spent by the various Canadian governments in improving our roads and highways. In the field of health, while the provincial governments had to spend $326 million expenditures by the federal government in this sphere amounted to only $37 million, or 11 per cent. I could list social welfare, education and resources and, in the second case, the figures show that the federal government paid only 1.3 per cent of the total expenditures on education.

It is our contention that the resolution is inadequate in that it makes no new arrangements whereby other levels of government have any reason to look forward to a new deal at the hands of the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, in a recent nation-wide telecast the Prime Minister of Canada made the following statement:

> I find that since confederation Newfoundland has received a total of $300 million from the federal government including the amounts for the current year.

In view of that statement by the Prime Minister I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would be good enough to give the committee the total amounts under all headings paid to each of the other nine provinces for the same period, including the amounts for the current year. I should like to emphasize that I am not interested in a breakdown of these figures, but just the total amounts.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, for a number of years that very significant matter of federal-provincial agreements has been discussed in this house. We all admit that the subsidies paid to the provinces by the government are justified. Criticism is mainly aimed at the way those subsidies are distributed. Now, the method of distribution was attacked at the time our hon. friends opposite were sitting on this side of the house, and the promises they have been making since 1957 would lead the people of Canada, and particularly in Quebec, to believe that there would be great changes in the approach to this matter.

Indeed, after the Conservative government came into power on October 18, 1957, the Solicitor General and member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) stated in this house, in answer to a question:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend that I am still opposed to subsidies such as were proposed by the former government.

A little later he added:

> I want to tell him that proposals of the federal government are not yet known, but I am convinced that they will be made on a very different basis from those of the former government.

Consequently, I cannot blame the Solicitor General very much for believing this. He had followed the various discussions held in the house and, in view of the speeches made by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), at the time he was sitting in the opposition, everything pointed to a very different approach when the Conservatives would come into power, for on July 23, 1956, as shown on page 6296 of the official record, the present Minister of Finance said:

> I ask the government to take a responsible attitude in this matter and recognize the imperative needs of the provincial and municipal governments. This formula is at best a makeshift; it is no solution of the problem. What is needed is a government with a realistic and sympathetic appreciation of the responsibilities and burdens and problems of the provinces and a wholesome respect for the constitutional position of the provinces and the constitutional rights they possess, as well as the responsibilities they bear.

In the light of that statement made by the present Finance Minister when he was sitting in the opposition, it will be seen that, according to him, the Liberal government of the day did not sufficiently consult the provinces before taking a decision. At that time he wanted more federal-provincial conferences. Yet, since the Conservative government took power, the provinces have been called in only once. Indeed, after provincial officials had met for a couple of days in Ottawa, they were told: "Now go home and study the position; draw up some suggestions and we shall call you in again later and you may then submit them."

Since then, no action was taken to call a further federal-provincial conference to discuss that important problem. And yet, during the 1956 session, as recorded on page 699 of Hansard, the present Minister of Finance stated:

> Would the Minister permit a question? Has the government given consideration to the resumption of the federal-provincial conference on constitutional questions?

It can be seen, therefore, that the present Minister of Finance, who was then so interested in calling a federal-provincial conference when the Liberal party was in power, has completely lost track of the opinions he expressed at the time, since, on July 23, 1956, as recorded on page 6287 of Hansard, he stated:

> The house is now asked to carry into legislative form and effect the formula which was the essence of the federal government proposals. We are asked to do so with full knowledge that no provincial government has yet given its approval to those proposals and indeed with full knowledge that there has been widespread disapproval of the government proposals on the ground of their inadequacy.

A little farther on, he added:

> If we look at the constitution with regard to the history of the intervening 89 years, we must recognize at once, as fairminded men and women, that the provinces in these common fields of taxation have at least equal rights with the dominion.

Again it was he who, when sitting on this side of the house, denounced the Liberal government's policy. Yet, we know that when the Liberal party was running the country, it never imposed its will on the provinces and never acted without first consulting them, to establish what should be done. There might have been times when the governments concerned failed to reach full agreement, but each time, at least, the provinces were consulted; they were not informed of a decision by a mere telegram or announcement in the speech from the throne.

Here is a further statement of the hon. member for Eglinton, during the 1956 session, as recorded on page 6289 of Hansard:

> Sir, there have been premiers who have said that so far as the so-called conference this year was concerned, it was really no conference at all.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, it was still he who said that the Conservative government had called a federal-provincial conference, he who then criticized the Liberal government about such a conference, because there had not been full agreement, who criticized the Liberal government's attitude in saying that it was no conference at all. How would the present Minister of Finance describe the federal-provincial conference he called hardly a year and half ago, when the provinces were required—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I do not wish to interrupt the speech of the hon. gentleman, but when this resolution was under debate on March 11 a question arose as to whether it was in order to make references to proposals for a dominion-provincial conference, and a ruling was made at that time that it was not in order to refer to that subject in view of the extended debate that had taken place on that same subject in this house on February 9 and 10, culminating in a decision of the house on the evening of February 10 on an amendment to a supply motion. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that from the time of that ruling on March 11 the debate proceeded on the basis that reference to the subject of a dominion-provincial conference was out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will keep that in mind.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

(Text):

On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Seeing that you have your hearing aid may I be permitted to continue in French?

(Translation):

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the way the Minister of Finance's approach to the problem is so narrow as to be unacceptable.

The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the federal provincial tax sharing arrangement act—

It deals with matters which must be related to the sharing of taxes between the federal government and the provinces. It therefore follows that such agreements cannot be made in the manner announced by the minister, either by telegram or in the speech from the throne. But we can also rightly claim, as did the minister himself when he used to sit on this side of the house, that in this matter a federal-provincial conference is essential to the good relations between the federal government and the provinces. I say that if he tries to curtail the debate on that matter he would be enforcing closure, and I do not think that the chairman could agree to that at this time.

The matter of federal-provincial relations is intimately related to federal-provincial conferences.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member must realize that the Chair is bound strictly by the rules of the house. Since a resolution dealing with a federal-provincial conference was discussed on February 9 and 10, the hon. member cannot discuss a matter that has already been discussed. I am sure the hon. member must realize that. I say once again the Chair does not make the rules; it interprets them, and I shall have to ask the hon. member not to debate a federal-provincial conference since it has already been discussed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I point out to you, sir, that the strictness of the ruling you have just given does not seem to be in conformity with the rules or the practice of this house. I am not addressing myself now to the point made by the Minister of Finance. An hon. member in a subsequent debate, after another matter had been decided, is certainly not precluded from making reference discussed but which has some relevancy to to the subject matter which may have been the point under immediate discussion.

To say that the hon. member who is now speaking cannot refer to the failure of the government to call a dominion-provincial conference is surely stretching the rules of the house far beyond their literal meaning and far beyond what was ever intended. I submit with confidence that the hon. member has the right to refer to the fact that the government has not called a conference and that it should call a conference. He has no right to make a full speech on that subject, but to preclude him from making reference to it is I think doing mischief to the rule referred to by the Minister of Finance.

The Deputy Chairman: I would refer the hon. member to citation 148 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

This is exactly the point I was trying to make to the hon. member. I realize that there may have to be references to it, but not a debate on the question of a federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I may say so, sir, you have underlined the very important words:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded—

That is clear; that is the rule to which the minister directed our attention. But then it goes on to say:

—and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

It is not being offered again. That is not what the hon. member is doing. He is discussing the resolution before us, which has to do with the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements. Surely under this he can refer to the failure of the government to do certain things which would have made more effective the very purpose contemplated in the resolution now before the house.

All that the hon. member has been doing is to refer in passing to this conference and to the failure of the government to carry out its promise to call the provinces together for the very purpose of this resolution. We could not have debate of any kind in this house if we were to be restricted in the manner suggested by you, sir, a few moments ago.

The Deputy Chairman: I am not suggesting the hon. member cannot refer to it, but he cannot enter into a debate on it. I was listening to him quite closely, and I was getting the impression that he was going to debate it. I hope the hon. member will bear that in mind.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I was just about through dealing with this matter. I merely sought to show up the many inconsistencies between the words and deeds of the Minister of Finance and his government. Besides, he said, and I quote from page 6292 of Hansard for July 23, 1956:

Let no one underestimate the importance of the provinces and municipalities in the field of government of this country. They are the governments that are closest to the people. Anyone who has had experience of municipal government and has entered the federal field is well aware of the fact that is the form of the government that is closest to the people.

We are so aware.

It is a form of government much older than our federal form of government in this country.

As you see, Mr. Chairman, the action being taken today is in total contradiction with the statements made by the ministers when they were on this side of the house. Indeed, in the last elections, and particularly in the province of Quebec, Conservative candidates promised great changes in the handling of federal-provincial relations. Foremost among them were the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley). I am not blaming them, I do not say they acted in bad faith, nor would I say that the Conservative members in this house were acting in bad faith when they promised constant improvements, but I do say they were misled, just as an enormous sector of the public was misled, by the promises of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), who went about the country saying that everything was wrong and that henceforth everything would be different.

Those people believed in what they had been told, but the promises made were not kept. So now, with the party system we have in Canada, they can hardly rise in the house and express total disapproval of the government's position. They can express their views in a caucus, but it remains a secret with the caucus, and the public has no way of knowing what has been said there. Just the same, I pity those people, because it is hard on them to see that their government has not kept the promises made before and during the elections. I wonder how the Minister of Finance can rise in this house and speak as he does if he has gone over his past speeches in the federal parliament.

How can the minister come here and deny by his actions his words uttered in this house? But then, he is not the only one. During the 1956 session, the present Prime Minister, head of this government, had this to say, and I quote from page 2917 of Hansard for April 13 of that year:

Mr. Chairman, I want to join the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in his reference to the necessity for action being taken to overcome hazards—

—which we find everywhere. And he added:

I should like to have the minister reply, realizing that this a national problem, and indicate why the national government should not give deed by convening a conference with the provinces and municipalities to consider the adoption of an effective slum clearance program throughout the dominion.

Therefore there are indeed many problems which must be considered in conjunction with the provinces.

When the Liberal party was managing this country, it called provincial conferences to study those problems. Today, there are no more conferences. As a matter of fact, certain views are being forced upon the provinces. They are told: "Take it or leave it; that is all you can do". When we ask the Minister to approach the provinces and see if they want to accept such and such a position with regard to some problem, we are told that the government does not want to interfere in provincial matters, but that the provinces will be called in conference and their requests looked into. Such an attitude is a far cry from the one the Minister of Finance used to advocate when he was sitting on this side of the house.

The right hon. Prime Minister, as we may see on page 6369 of Hansard for the year 1956, stated at that time:

> Why these short-term meetings? Why these gatherings of a day or two? Why do we not have a meeting of the federal authorities, the provincial authorities and the municipalities? Call it a constitutional convention, if you like, without the power of amendment of the constitution in respect of those fudamental rights which are inherent in the constitution, but why not have a gathering designed to bring about the reconsideration of a problem which for the last 13 years or so has become increasingly complex?

And further:

> Why should the municipal authorities be required to provide the necessary services in the way of roads and so on for federal government institutions without that government paying full taxation? Why should the municipalities be required to pay 10 per cent sales tax on their needs, apart from the exceptions in connection with fire and road machinery costing over $1,000 per unit?

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the issue—the whole municipal and provincial issue that faces us when we speak of taxation. Yet, the present minister who had been so critical now seems completely incapable of acting on his own suggestion.

Moreover, during the same session in 1956, some time before the Conservative party came to power, the Prime Minister stated:

> What is the position of the municipalities? I do not want to go into particulars; let me just say that, at the present time, municipalities throughout Canada are finding it almost impossible to get by.

And conditions as they were then cannot be settled. As long as the question of federal-provincial relations is not completely solved, the position of municipalities will not be settled either.

And yet, due to the inefficiency of the present government, municipalities have to spend extravagant sums of money in order to provide for the families of the unemployed who are getting no unemployment insurance benefits, not having worked long enough, or having used up their stamps.

Mr. Chairman, those problems must be settled. And the federal government will have to convene the provinces. Whether it be a federal-provincial conference, a meeting with the provinces, or a discussion with the provinces, the name does not matter; the important thing is that the federal government should begin to think about its responsibility, which is not limited to saying that 13 per cent in tax return will be granted to the provinces for another year.

Mr. Chairman, the plight of the provinces is more serious than it seems to be admitted. And we sense some danger in the increase in taxation. Besides, the Prime Minister agreed with us in 1956, when he said, as reported on page 6371 of Hansard of that year:

> I have before me a table showing the increases in expenditures by municipalities for education and for general services. All these are eastern municipalities, but we, in the west, find ourselves in the same position. The percentage of increases as between 1951 to 1954 are as follows:

And that percentage has increased still more since that time.

> Scarborough 62.07 per cent, 42.78 per cent.

Those are situations which, in some provinces, can only be settled by the provincial government. For instance, in the province of Quebec, schools are not the responsibility of the municipal governments, but of the schoolboards, which are under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. Unless this rise is stopped, our schoolboards will be driven to bankruptcy, precisely because this government will have failed to carry out its promises and because no understanding will have been reached with the federal government to find some means of raising the funds needed to keep the schoolboards from going bankrupt. In the city of Hull, in fact, there is a constant deficit, and we are always forced to seek help from Quebec, just as other schoolboards are doing. The Quebec government is doing its best, but probably lacks means to do more. This, incidentally, was indicated by the premier of Quebec just a few weeks ago.

We realize that the premier of Quebec is inclined to be rather demanding in his proposals, but we also know that some of his proposals would at least warrant a hearing. Unfortunately, this government refuses to consider proposals not only from Quebec but from the other provinces.

The premier of Ontario complained a short time ago that the government had hinted, if not promised, that his province would get an additional amount of $100 million. He complained bitterly that the government had failed to carry out this agreement or promise. Yet the premier of Ontario had surely done his best to put this government in the saddle, because he was hoping for much more from the government, precisely because of the speeches made by the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. Today however, those two ministers remain strangely silent and dare not speak up, ashamed as they are of all the promises they made and of the little action that has followed.

We recognize, Mr. Chairman, that problems have changed and have become more difficult; we recognize that Canada is no longer the small colony that it was 50 years ago; we realize that the needs are greater and are constantly increasing with Canada's emergence as an international power; we acknowledge our responsibilities to the United Nations; we acknowledge our responsibility to keep troops in Germany and France; we acknowledge the responsibility we had of sending troops to Korea; we acknowledge the responsibility we had of sending troops in the last world war. We also recognize our responsibilities with respect to NATO and to all the problems facing the world; we recognize that in joining the Colombo plan, we willingly accepted responsibilities, quite simply as a matter of charity and because the more favoured nations have a duty to help underdeveloped countries.

We have responsibilities with respect to education. Whether or not we accept the principle of helping education, directly or indirectly, whether or not this is a direct responsibility of the provinces, it makes no difference. We still have a responsibility in this field. If this is a matter under provincial jurisdiction, it is nevertheless a responsibility of ours to give them more for educational purposes and at various stages of education. We have responsibilities with respect to the social legislation of our country. The federal government has its responsibilities and, directly or indirectly, it has to meet them. We have responsibilities in regard to unemployment insurance, which requires more and more money. Increased unemployment brings about other responsibilities with respect to hospital insurance. All this points out to the increased responsibilities of the federal government in the last few years. Therefore, the federal government needs more revenue than in the past; however, this does not mean that the federal government can completely ignore the provinces. Provinces, too, have their rights. There is no supreme government in Canada.

Each provincial government has its own rights and the federal government should approach the situation in that spirit. It should do nothing that could be prejudicial to the other governments of the country. The federal government has no right to take decisions without consulting the provinces. Yet, that is what has been done since this government is in power. Provinces have not been consulted about anything, though, in my opinion the taxation problem is possibly the greatest single problem facing this country today. However, in spite of all the glittering promises which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the present Minister of Finance made when they were sitting on this side of the house, and especially those they made during the election campaigns, they keep silent now, and I can assure you, Sir, that they will not solve the problems that we have brought to their attention. They will simply wait and say: "We believe we should wait another year before proceeding with the revision of the act, or with further study of the problem in conjunction with the provinces."

Mr. Chairman, if the present government again waits as long as it has since it took power, we are forced to the conclusion that we will never reach an agreement and that, next year, the house will again have to deal with this same bill to extend the present fiscal agreements for another year, simply because the government lacks the courage to face its obligations.

Mr. Chairman, I say that there is in this government less determination than we have known for many years, because the man who is heading it, the Right Hon. Prime Minister, though a past master of electioneering lacks the courage of his convictions in the administrative field. To my mind, the Prime Minister looks genuinely pitiful when meeting provincial representatives. If he had the courage of his convictions, he would respect today the words he said when he was sitting on this side of the house.

The same goes for the present Minister of Finance and those people who are trying to run the country their own way, without even caring to take the advice of anyone. Those people are really to be pitied.

Mr. Chairman, we shall be celebrating shortly the centenary of confederation. Would it not be the finest gift we could give the Canadian citizens to ask the present government to convene the provinces in order to study not only the fiscal problem, but also the matter of a thorough review of the 1867 constitution?

Mr. Chairman, we know that in 1867, Canada was a small colony and that its population was small. Its expansion was far from being what we know it to be today. The rural population, which was then 70 per cent, is now only 35 per cent of the whole population. Problems and needs are now different. At the time, people were satisfied with a horse and buggy, and narrow barely passable roads. Today, we need modern highways. In fact the federal government was forced to help provinces and municipalities to rush the completion of the trans-Canada highway. Let us not forget, sir, that this was the work of the Liberal party.

In the light of all the problems that face us today, could we not justifiably say to the federal government: "Instead of merely introducing a bill to extend present agreements for another year, you should have the courage of your convictions and call a conference of the provinces so as to make a thorough study of the problem of Canada's constitution, in the light of the present situation, and of federal and provincial responsibilities."

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if the federal government wanted to go to the trouble of calling a provincial conference, it would receive the approval of all parties in the house, for all here agree that this problem, which has been with us for some years now, will become even more acute in years to come. To do this, what we need is not an election-minded man, but a statesman. And that is what we are looking for now.

Mr. Chairman, you no doubt recall Mr. Disraeli's idea of the difference between a statesman and a politician. Mr. Disraeli, a true Conservative, used to say that a politician prepares the next election, while the statesman prepares the next generation.

Mr. Asselin: Then you can surely not qualify as a statesman.

Mr. Caron: It is a responsibility of the present government to prepare the next generation. And may I say to my hon. friend who has just interrupted me that I may be a politician—I never claimed to be anything else—but I ask those who like to think of themselves as statesmen to act like statesmen, and to do the things that statesmen do, because, according to what has been done so far, they have shown themselves to be good politicians in preparing for elections, but that they surely failed in preparing the next generation.

(Text):

Mr. Winch: I wish it were possible, Mr. Chairman, and I think it would be profitable, for those in this house to have an honest, heart to heart and down to earth conversation on the entire question of federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements. I think it would be for the good of Canada if that could be done without reference to points of order, previous decisions and precedents. In my opinion one of the most difficult problems facing the various governments of our country today is that of having sufficient revenue, from old or new sources, to meet the new and varying responsibilities with which they are faced.

I am firmly of the belief that the provinces and municipalities have a very good case in asking for a reasonable and logical basis for the sharing of taxation. I had the privilege, Mr. Chairman, of being the leader of the opposition in British Columbia when the first tax-sharing arrangement was made between the federal government and the provinces of Canada. I can well remember the thinking in the British Columbia legislature at that time. What was noted then I think should be noted here this afternoon, when we are discussing the resolution now before us.

There can be no question but that the provinces, under the British North America Act, were given and still have the right of direct taxation. It was the provinces which exercised that right in the first instance by the introduction of the income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. Because of the exigencies of world war I Sir Robert Borden, then prime minister, moved the federal government into the field of direct taxation under the over-all section of the British North America Act.

To the best of my knowledge there was an indication given at that time by the federal government under Sir Robert Borden that this move of the federal government in the field of direct taxation was made only because of the exigencies of war and there was no intention of remaining in that which was accepted as being a provincial tax field.

However, the federal government having got its foot in the door of the provincial field of taxation never got its foot out. It has not only stayed in continuously and consistently, but in 1941 it got more than a foot in the door; it shoved all the way in when, because of the exigencies of another world war, it introduced an arrangement between the federal and provincial governments whereby the tax was levied by one government only but there was a sharing by two.

I fully realize that in the original introduction of this method in 1941 it was understood, and I think it still is, that a basis was provided upon which a province may withdraw; but I know that the majority of the provinces of Canada realize that people do not like being taxed twice or having to fill out two forms if one will do the job. Therefore the federal government is in a very strong position in that regard. Mr. Chairman, I honestly believe that the federal government when it considers, as it is now considering, a continuation for a further year of the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements it has more than a moral responsibility in this matter. In fact, the federal government is an interloper in this field of taxation, although under one general clause they have the right of so taxing. I admit that never will the federal government be able to remove itself from that field of taxation; but I do think there is a moral responsibility to remember the statements made by Sir Robert Borden back in the time of the first world war that it was only a temporary measure; and remember too the arguments used to the provinces in 1941 as to why they should give up their rights of taxation in the direct field and operate jointly with the federal government.

There is also something which is perhaps of more paramount importance than that, and that is that when the fathers of confederation drafted the British North America Act, brilliant as they were, and brilliant as is the document which became the constitution of Canada, they could not have anticipated or foreseen the economy of Canada or the new responsibilities of government for the next hundred years. I feel that all members of this house, whether cabinet ministers or hon. members, are dodging the issue and refusing to face up to facts. We must recognize that in making a federal-provincial tax-sharing agreement it has to be done with an understanding of the new responsibilities of all forms of government and the need for money in order to meet these responsibilities which were not foreseen 100 years ago.

[Mr. Winch.]

I know there are many who think that the British North America Act is something which is sacrosanct and, like the sacred cows in India, completely untouchable. Mr. Chairman, we are not going to be able to appreciate fully federal-provincial taxation agreements unless we recognize the need now for the clarification of the responsibilities of the three levels of government and how they are going to be able to meet their financial responsibilities. That will in my estimation, in the long run, most definitely require not only understanding between governments but also revision of the British North America Act.

Whether we like to name it as such or not, we are rapidly moving into a welfare state society. Because the allocation of responsibilities, quite understandably, could not have been foreseen 100 years ago, we find today between federal, provincial and municipal levels of government an absolute hodgepodge of security measures and responsibilities which makes it almost impossible for a municipal government, a provincial government or a federal government to know quite where they are going or how to finance themselves.

May I very briefly outline the situation in which the governments find themselves today? If it is a question of workmen's compensation, that is a provincial responsibility. If it is mothers' pensions, that is a provincial responsibility. If it is welfare, the responsibility for that has been changing over the years but now it is a federal, provincial and municipal responsibility. A municipality does not know where it stands because its position is determined by the province. If it is family allowances, that is a federal responsibility. If it is unemployment, that is federal. Unemployment insurance payments are the responsibility of the employer, the employee and the federal government. If it is old age pensions, for the over 70's it is federal, but under 70 it is federal and provincial. Now in our normal and understandable development we have reached a hodgepodge of security measures where the responsibility in one case is provincial, in another dominion and provincial, and in yet another dominion, provincial and municipal.

Surely the point I am trying to make is understandable to all. We have reached the point where we are entering into a welfare state and building up progressively, as we must do, a system of security measures, but on an unrealistic basis. We must understand that what applied 100 years ago does not apply now and there must be found some method or means of allocating responsibility, and with responsibility the ability to pay for those responsibilities. That is something, Mr. Chairman, which I think must be considered in the very near future by the government of Canada and any provincial government which calls itself a responsible government.

But because that situation has not yet come about and, undoubtedly, it will be some time before it does, we must extend a considerable measure of sincere understanding to the municipalities and to the provinces, because in this coming year they have to rely to a great extent on measures taken by this House of Commons in connection with tax-sharing arrangements. I can understand the unhappiness felt by the provinces in this regard, in the light of the fact that there is to be no change in the basis of tax-sharing in the coming year as compared with the basis of sharing revenues in the past year. The responsibilities of the provinces and of the municipalities are increasing, yet the means open to them for collecting money through taxes continue to be limited as before. The federal government has the broad field of taxation to cover, and is not exercising its prerogative of collecting money from sources where it can be collected, such as racketeers and profiteers. This is an avenue not open to the provincial governments and to the municipalities, and for this reason the dominion government has an even greater responsibility for assisting other levels of government.

It must be remembered, too, that the responsibility for taking the initiative in these matters lies with the federal government. It is the federal government which must do the basic thinking, and initiate the studies which are required if the sharing of taxation revenue in the light of governmental responsibilities is to be placed on a scientific and constitutional basis. This is, in my view, an added reason why the provincial governments are entitled to more consideration than it would appear they are to be given judging from the motion which is now before us. I do not object to being called a politician, because I think that is an honourable word, but I venture to say it is high time that the government showed a little more statesmanship in dealing with this particular subject, since statesmanship is now something which is most needed in Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, the matter of federal-provincial relations is a very important one, it is even a vital matter for our country, for the provinces and also for the municipalities and school boards. In short, it is of vital importance for all Canadian citizens whatever province they come from, because the federal policy in this field with regard to the provinces may affect the entire economy of this country; it will, indeed, have repercussions on the means the provinces, municipalities and school boards have of fulfilling their obligations with regard to the people.

The members of the government now in power, when they were sitting on this side of the house, felt strongly about federal-provincial relations. They also felt strongly on the matter during the 1957 election. Even in 1956, during the national convention of the Conservative party, a manifesto was prepared with regard to practically all matters concerning the federal government, the provinces and municipalities as well as the school boards. But the manifesto was never made public. There had been prepared, so it seems, a press release which was held back. However, this is what we find on page 4 of that manifesto with regard to federal-provincial relations. I quote:

> We have full confidence in the federal system of government such as it is outlined in the British North America Act which divides responsibilities and obligations between the federal government and the provinces. That system is jeopardized by the exaggerated centralization practised by the present federal government. In order to restore a just balance between the Dominion and the provinces, we shall ensure;

Then comes a series of steps that are advocated, but I shall read only two. Paragraph (d) reads:

> The working out, after consulting with the provinces, of a lasting solution to the problem of fiscal relations between the federal government and the provinces.

And paragraph (e) says:

> We also are of the opinion that provincial governments and municipal councils should have sufficient financial means to carry out their constitutional responsibilities and meet the ever growing needs for education and public services in order to ensure the constant development of their economic productivity.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, that manifesto never was released. Various reasons were given by some groups, but the fact remains that the public never was informed of the resolutions in this field which had been passed during the convention which elected the present Prime Minister leader of the Conservative party.

There is also the Minister of Finance who spoke very feelingly, when sitting on this side of the house, about federal-provincial relations. My colleague from Hull (Mr. Caron) recalled some of his words. I too should like to recall one in particular, which he said when the house was considering, in 1956, the new money-sharing project with the provinces. It was the project introduced by the hon. Mr. Harris. On page 6287 of Hansard of July 23, 1956, there appears the following, which was spoken at the time by the present Minister of Finance, then member for Eglinton.

> The question that we ought to ask ourselves is similar to that which my leader put before the house when he spoke a week ago. To paraphrase it, I would say the question before us is whether or not at this time there is evidence that the proposals of the government, and in particular this formula, will satisfactorily meet the demands which are actually now imposed upon provincial governments, municipal councils and boards of education throughout Canada and particularly whether they will be adequate over the five-year period during which the new scheme is intended to be in effect.
> As to the details of the formula, suffice it to say at this point that it is an actuarial maze to most people. The formula itself would undoubtedly confuse most citizens. Talk of tax equalization payments, provincial revenue stabilization payments, tax rental agreements, gross national product, average personal income, and other expressions in which this formula abounds make it very difficult for the average citizen to appreciate the niceties of the formula.

Mr. Chairman, since the Minister of Finance took over his portfolio, he must have had some opportunity of studying the formula, and he must have understood it very well for he has kept using it.

And later on, the hon. member for Eglinton said, as recorded on page 6297 of Hansard of the same date:

> Therefore, sir, apart from all other considerations, some of which I have mentioned, I give this house in conclusion ten reasons why, because of its utter inadequacy, we of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, cannot support this bill and why we shall on second reading vote against it.

And do you know what those ten reasons were, Mr. Chairman? When I read that, I was expecting very sound reasons, something really solid; but the hon. member for Eglinton merely said: First, it makes inadequate provision for Prince Edward Island. He then went on to enumerate the nine other provinces, after Prince-Edward Island. Those are rather insignificant and childish reasons to oppose the equalization formula, such as it was introduced in 1956.

During the 1957 campaign, the matter of federal-provincial relations was raised. I shall not take much of the time of the house, because I only wish to quote two or three promises made at that time, when the former Liberal administration was accused of having treated the provinces with arrogance, of having failed entirely to settle the question of federal-provincial relations, and of having taken only unilateral action in that regard.

Here is what the Prime Minister said on May 27, 1957, at Saskatoon, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 28, 1957:

(Text):

> Any new decision, he added, would be based not on the Liberal policy of a grasping greed for dollars but only on the basis of agreement by all the provinces. "They are all equal", he underlined.

(Translation):

On May 7, 1957 in Hull, according to Le Droit for the next day, the present Prime Minister had this to say:

> The Leader of the Opposition said that he has noticed the same uneasiness in all the municipalities of western Quebec, where he met no less than 20 mayors who are all faced with increasingly acute financial problems.
> The new Conservative leader pledged that, as soon as his party is elected to power he will call a federal-provincial conference to revamp the tax sharing system between the central government and the provinces and municipalities.

On May 22, 1957, the present Prime Minister made a speech in Victoria—that is he spoke on May 21 but the report was published the next day in the Victoria Times. And this is what he said:

(Text):

> The plight of the municipalities is becoming tragic because there is a constant increase in federal taxes. Now the federal government takes the attitude that there is no responsibility on them to assure that the municipalities shall have the right to discharge their responsibilities—
> The municipalities find themselves unable to carry on because they are being restricted of the sources of revenue.
> The premiers of many provinces, he said, had complained there was no recognition of their fiscal needs.
> Even the city of Victoria has to pay outrageous rates of interest today. Taxation is falling more and more on local residents in our municipalities.
>
> The time has come for a meeting of the provinces and the federal government, with the municipalities present, to discuss these problems.
> We intend to convene such a meeting in the spirit of confederation. If action is not taken we shall find ourselves in a position in five years' time where the municipalities will be bankrupt or unable to carry out their responsibilities.

(Translation):

I will quote only a few of his promises, because we already have two full books of them and soon we will probably have to make up a third one because there are Conservative members who, at certain by-election campaigns, go out and add to the innumerable promises that were made in 1957 and 1958.

In a speech he made in Massey Hall, in Toronto, at the start of the 1957 campaign—on April 25, 1957 to be more precise—the Prime Minister had this to say:

(Text):

We believe there can be no national unity in this nation until there is a realization that the federal-provincial matters have handcuffed the provinces of this nation; have denied the municipalities adequate sources of revenue; have placed the provinces and the municipalities in a position where they cannot discharge their constitutional responsibilities or permitting the necessary development in their own territorial confines of the natural resources that there are. We believe the provinces and municipalities must have the financial resources to carry out those responsibilities. We believe in the federal system of government. We believe that its preservation is essential to Canadian unity. We believe the federal system is today being challenged by the centralization complex of the St. Laurent government and that a healthy division and balance of revenues as between the federal and provincial governments must be assured.

We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination as displayed by the present government, but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

(Translation):

That is the kind of statements and promises made to the nation by the Prime Minister, both as leader of the opposition and in 1958, after he had become Prime Minister of this country.

I do not suppose we can discuss federal provincial relations without being allowed at the same time to discuss the matter of a federal-provincial conference. If opposition members are refused a chance to deal with this matter, it means that the government is not to be blamed for trying to settle the problems of federal-provincial relations on a unilateral basis, that is to say on its own terms. There can be no question of settling the problem of federal-provincial relations without consulting the other provinces. We have heard all kinds of statements, all kinds of promises in this regard. We were promised a conference. There has been a sham federal-provincial conference, where the government listened and then said that the conference should be guided by a spirit of co-operation. Le Devoir for September 18, 1957 reported as follows:

The Prime Minister had then stated that the next conference might be final or might simply clear the way for another conference where more work would be done.

"The provinces will have their say on the matters to be discussed and on the date of the discussions", the Prime Minister added. "We shall be guided by a spirit of co-operation. The provinces will have the privilege of making recommendations on the most desirable action."

The Prime Minister's office has added that this latter statement was contained in the invitations subsequently sent to the premiers of the ten provinces.

The press release simply states that the next conference will be called "to discuss a review of tax sharing arrangements".

The Prime Minister listened. The Minister of Finance listened. And when everything was over, the Minister of Finance spoke to the representatives of the various provinces and said: "Gentlemen, we understand your problems, but all your demands would require $1½ billion from the federal treasury".

There is the kind of co-operation we had been promised in the 1957 and 1958 election campaigns.

A conference had been announced for 1958. Then there were telegrams. If I may refer to a phrase used by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), this was not a matter of having the knife at one's throat, but I think it was even worse, because in that telegram, the provinces were not even asked for their views.

The speech from the throne referred somewhat tersely to federal provincial relations. There was talk of co-operation. What is the government waiting for to call a federal provincial conference?

I would like to quote the remarks that the hon. Minister of Finance made on April 28, 1954 when he used to sit on this side of the house.

As can be seen on page 4213 of the official record, the hon. member for Eglinton said:

It is imperative that there be called a dominion-provincial conference. Only the Prime Minister of Canada can call a dominion-provincial conference. The agenda for that conference must include this whole field of taxing powers and responsibilities. It must take due account of the necessity of honouring and respecting, both in the letter and in the spirit, all existing agreements. It must seek in the long run, under the proper auspices and with a patriotic Canadian spirit, to secure a better deal than any of the provinces have had as yet. It would mean an end, Mr. Speaker, to a situation such as that which now has arisen and for which this federal government must accept responsibility.

In the same speech, the hon. member for Eglinton stated another reason which, to my mind, has demagogic overtones. As a matter of fact, we further find on that same page of Hansard dated April 28, 1954, that the hon. member had this to say:

Is it not a strange contradiction, is it not an amazing commentary on the attitude of the government opposite, that at this very moment at

Geneva representatives of the Canadian government are sitting around a table with representatives of communist governments, Russia and China, to discuss matters of at least common concern, yet the Canadian government will not bring itself to sit down with fellow Canadians representative of the provinces to discuss matters of common concern?

I think the hon. member might have given sufficiently good reasons at that time to ask that a federal-provincial conference be called, without having to resort to concepts that might rouse all sorts of feelings and thoughts amongst Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, one of the favourite defenses that this government and its ministers resort to when we accuse them of failing to do their duty or to keep their promises, is to tell us, after picking up a sheet of paper and asking their secretaries to do some careful research work: "In such and such a year, you did exactly the same thing in another field."

Mr. Chairman, when is this government going to stop behaving this way? It is behaving like a 15 year old boy who, on being called down by his father for staying out till 11 o'clock or midnight the night before, answers: "My big brother who is 30 didn't get in till four this morning".

This government has no business recalling what we did when we were in power. On two occasions, the Canadian people rendered its judgment. There is no purpose in recalling the fact and perpetually harping on the former Liberal administration's actions when it was administering the country. However, Mr. Chairman, there will be an appeal against the decision the people have rendered on two occasions since 1957, and when that appeal is heard, the present government, including the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, will be judged according to their own actions and not according to the deeds of the former Liberal administration when it was at the helm in Ottawa.

Mr. Chairman, present developments in the field of federal-provincial relations repeat themselves in many other fields and departments of the federal government.

Everybody remembers the decision which affected more than 14,000 workers in Toronto last February and, at this point, I want to read out a sentence from an item published in the Globe and Mail of February 23, 1959, with regard to this administration's decision and I quote:

(Text):

This weakness has been apparent since the government assumed office 20 months ago; but never, in that time, has it been so dramatically disclosed.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, what is happening at the present time is not limited to the field of fiscal relations; it also applies in several other fields. We could even apply to the present government much more aptly and truthfully today what the present Minister of Finance said of the Liberal government in 1957 when he was sitting in the opposition. In fact, as recorded on page 2559 of Hansard of March 21, 1957, speaking of the Liberal government, the hon. member for Eglinton said:

—a government floundering in the welter of its own incompetence, errors, contradictions and arrogance! These are the fruits of this government; and in the words of Holy Writ, ye shall know them by their fruits.

Mr. Chairman, government members often accuse us of merely criticizing. I should therefore like to close my brief remarks with a suggestion to the government. The field of federal-provincial relations is a very complex one; it must require the federal government's daily attention. I do not believe we can solve those complex questions in a two-day conference held each year or every three years, unless we manage to develop some organization or even a department whose sole duties would consist in studying those matters and keeping in touch with the ten provinces of Canada. That is a question of vital importance to the federal government and the ten provinces, as well as to the municipalities and school boards.

It seems to me the government should consider that suggestion. Besides, I do not claim credit for the idea, for I have heard it expressed by other colleagues on many occasions. However, I am of the opinion that if the government seriously wished to consider the opportunity of setting up a department of federal-provincial relations, there would be no need for calling a conference every two or five years to tell the provincial representatives: "We understand your problems, but we can't do any more than this".

If the government set up a department of federal-provincial relations, it would gain much more co-operation, not only in the field of taxation but also with regard to public works and education, as well as in sectors of common concern to the federal and provincial governments.

I sincerely thank the Minister of Finance for listening to my humble remarks and I hope he will take them into consideration.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, our friends in the official opposition have chosen the occasion of the debate on this resolution to bring up the whole problem of fiscal relations between the federal government and the provinces. If the discussion had remained within the terms of the resolution, a debate of such scope would not normally have been allowed. Personally, I have no intention of exhausting the subject, or of expressing all my thoughts on the matter. I shall only make a few remarks which are prompted by the speeches made this afternoon in the house by the hon. members for Hull (Mr. Caron) and for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard).

Mr. Chairman, I must say at the outset that I am rather surprised at the statements made by the hon. members for Hull and Lapointe, because they prove the former government's fiscal formula to have been a failure.

An hon. Member: Then, why are you using it?

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I shall deal with that question in a moment.

I claim that the remarks of those hon. members show that the system has proved a failure, because at the present time no province is satisfied with it. The fact is that this very complex problem cannot be solved through a simple conference, as the hon. member for Lapointe agreed a moment ago.

When the central government convened the provincial representatives in 1957, it listened to their proposals, but soon realized that there were such differences of opinion between them that it became necessary to go very deeply into that problem.

In other words, the present system has shown that fiscal centralization can never really work in Canada, a country with a federative regime. The important thing would be to find a formula which would hand back the provinces their responsibilities in fiscal matters. That responsibility is essential so that provinces can fully exercise their rights in the field of legislation. Those responsible for the present situation, though they do not like to be told, are the Liberals. They are the ones who during the war, took over the main sources of revenue and who, after the war was over, refused to restore them to the provinces. They are the ones too who, having got hold of those considerable revenues, surreptitiously invaded many other exclusive provincial fields.

Today those people are watching our attempts to solve the problem, and realizing how they messed up the whole thing, how they complicated the fiscal system in this country, they keep telling us: just try to untangle the skein.

The problem of fiscal relations between Ottawa and the provinces reminds me of an iceberg, only a tenth of which shows above the surface. Actually, Mr. Chairman, the government must be put in a position where, through this legislation, it can keep on arranging meetings and other preliminary talks between the Minister of Finance and the provincial ministers to a new federal-provincial conference, in order to find a lasting formula and not only expedients. It is to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that once that durable formula is found, it will recognize two principles. First of all, the maximum fiscal responsibility of the provinces. If all provinces were equally empowered to levy revenue, there would be no serious problem involved in allowing them to raise the funds needed to meet their obligations under the constitution. It would only be a matter of distributing the various taxes between the federal government and the provinces. The difficulty today is that several provinces are unable to raise the funds they need, and therefore have to be helped financially. Of course the present system was an attempt to settle this problem, but it considers such assistance as a basic rule rather than an exceptional and temporary one. However, subsidies to the provinces should not be considered as a permanent feature. First, a way should be sought to enable the legislatures to raise their own funds, before asking Ottawa to grant them money that is collected across Canada by the central government, and for which the legislatures are not responsible to the people.

The second principle is that we must recognize the necessity of helping the economically weaker provinces. But this, again, must be a temporary rule. I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that eventually the solution found by this government will rest on those two principles, and then we shall be back to the true spirit of Confederation.

The system devised by the Liberals over 14 years ago has created a bad habit. It is known that several provinces, rather than increase their own tax rates, come here and ask the federal government for subsidies to supplement their budget. This practice is the result of the system adopted by the Liberals, and it is really the basic obstacle to a settlement of the problem. That is why I think we must proceed slowly, and as suggested in this resolution, extend the present system for a period of one year while granting the provinces a further three per cent. But the very fact the government is seeking permission to extend the system for a single year is an indication that it does not intend to maintain a system which, again, has proved inadequate and which truly shackles the fiscal responsibility of the provinces, and which must necessarily be discarded. I truly believe that the spirit of confederation requires that the provinces be sovereign and be able to use their taxation powers. Again, the present system does not allow this.

(Text):

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a brief word or two on this admittedly complex subject of dominion-provincial fiscal relations. I want to comment on only one phase of the resolution. The resolution provides us with the opportunity to bring to the attention of the house and the country another broken promise of the government. All Canadians remember the Conservative election and pre-election promises to call at once a dominion-provincial conference to improve the existing agreements with the provinces and to settle this matter on a long term basis. Hansard is filled with the utterances of hon. members opposite on this subject when they sat on this side of the house and newspaper files across the country are loaded with statements on the matter. But I can do better than that. I can read from an interesting document I have here. This is a statement of policy of the Conservative party and that aspect of its dealing with federal-provincial fiscal relations, as found in paragraph (d), reads as follows:

[Mr. Flynn.]

We will provide for the development in conference with the provinces of a long-term solution of dominion-provincial fiscal relations.

Two elections and almost two years later what has happened? This promised Utopia in federal-provincial fiscal arrangements has not been delivered. In fact, with the passing of the second election the ministry is suddenly strangely silent on this very important subject.

Most Canadians are familiar with the series of incidents over these last two years. At a politically appropriate time the provincial premiers were called to Ottawa with appropriate publicity. Pleasantries were exchanged, some speeches were made, several pictures were taken and more promises were made to meet again soon. There the story seemed to end.

It is true that a small election bone was thrown to the provinces in the unusual form of telegrams, again with appropriate publicity, just conveniently prior to the March 31, 1958 election. However, these election bones shrunk from the time they were promised, which was before the election, to the time they were delivered, which, of course, was after the election. I am thinking now of the Ontario story. The promise there was something of the order of $22 million or $23 million and I understand that when delivery was made the amount was substantially less due in part, of course, to the economic slow-down for which the government must assume a fair share of the responsibility.

This Ontario story is indeed an interesting one. It was a romance born of political expediency and frustrated ambition. Canadians living in Ontario particularly remember clearly the political shenanigans between Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Frost. They co-operated to lead the voters in Ontario down the primrose path. Most people remember those happy, reckless days of love and mutual appreciation for each other. Today, the two principal stars of the show, each for his own reasons, would like the public to forget their earlier alliance and avowed aims to correct the wrongs in the field of federal-provincial relations.

Perhaps I should, for the benefit of those who might need their memories refreshed, refer briefly to a couple of items on this subject. There is one appearing in the Globe and Mail, which is scarcely a Liberal organ, under the heading, "Frost Views PM as new FDR". This article goes on to say:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker, Premier Frost and the Conservative members of the Ontario legislature had a love feast over lobster and other cold delicacies yesterday at Queen's park.

By the time they reached the coffee and the end of two short, so-called non-political talks, the two leaders had cemented the mutual security pact born of last year's campaign and, equally important, last June's victory.

What they were doing for each other, they said, they were really only doing for Ontario and Canada.

The luncheon was a re-run of one held last February and MPP's who attended both said they detected an ever greater air of cordiality.

Along the same vein, to substantiate this alliance and to enter into the spirit of it, I would quote what the Prime Minister said about the premier of Ontario. This is taken from the Montreal Star of February 18, 1958. He said:

"Your co-operation, your counsel, your advice and, above all, your wisdom, has meant more to me than I can ever possibly pay an adequate tribute to."

It was a case of love in a cold climate as snow swirled in the stingingly-cold wind outside.

Then, the article continues:

But the political climate couldn't have been warmer.

We all remember Premier Frost's demands for an extra $100 million. I do not need to detain the house on that particular point. We all remember Premier Frost's appearances. We can all think of one in particular in which he turned to the present Prime Minister and said, "There sits the man who will give Ontario its just dues; there sits the man from whom we will get this $100 million." There were statements of this kind. In order to avoid any misunderstanding about that, I should like to quote briefly from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail after the election. This refers to the $100 million, which was still Ontario's aim. It reads:

> Premier Frost still expects to get the balance of the $100 million he suggested to Ottawa last year would be a fair division of tax revenue.
> He forecast yesterday that the dominion-provincial conference which adjourned last November will be resumed before July 1 and that Ontario's just needs would be satisfied.

What has happened since March 31, 1958? I suggest that if Premier Frost had wanted a conference one could easily have been held. If the Prime Minister had wanted a conference one could easily have been held, as promised.

Now, what can one conclude from all this? Is Mr. Frost waiting to slide through another election, hoping the voters will not remember this hoax? Is the Prime Minister waiting for important provincial elections to be held before disposing of this matter? Who knows? Is there to be a new approach or will we simply be called upon, as we are in this resolution, to extend this arrangement a year at a time? After almost two years in office the Conservative government has failed to do what they said they would do if given the opportunity to form a government.

There is another aspect of this matter upon which I should like to speak briefly. Before the elections the Conservatives said they would leave more room in the direct taxation field for the provinces. Let us look at what has happened. In the field of corporation taxes we find that before the Conservatives took office this tax rate was 47 per cent. The provinces were returned 9 per cent or practically one-fifth, and the federal government retained 38 per cent. Today, after the election, as a result of the recent Conservative budget, the provinces will receive proportionately less in the field of direct taxes. With the election safely behind them, they have moved in the opposite direction. The provinces will still receive only 9 per cent, in spite of the increase in the rate of tax on corporate income to 50 per cent, and the federal government will retain 41 per cent. This is just another example of broken Conservative promises.

The Minister of Finance, by increasing the federal government's slice in this particular field of direct taxation in his budget, has given us a peek at new government policy. You will remember the minister advised us in his budget speech that the federal government would be borrowing less in 1959-60 than last year. He indicated that this would leave more money available for the provinces and municipalities to borrow. Apparently a new Conservative government policy on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements has emerged. What they are saying, in effect, is: We will tax more, and you borrow more. This is a further example of broken promises.

Mr. Batten: I should like to make a few observations on this resolution. If I understood the translation of what was say by the hon. member for Quebec South, he referred to the arrangements made by the previous administration as a fiasco. Well, there was at least an arrangement under which the provinces knew what they were going to get, and there was no need for an annual resolution such as the one we have before us now. The provinces knew what they were going to get, and they knew that further conference had been called. If this was a fiasco, Mr. Chairman, I think it could be well said that after two elections and after almost two years this government has done very little to improve the situation.

Mr. Brooks: It certainly improved the situation in Newfoundland.

Mr. Batten: I will refer to that in a few minutes.

When this resolution was introduced the Minister of Finance said that the purpose of the resolution was clear and simple. I certainly believe the purpose of the resolution is clear, but I do not believe it is that simple. I am sure that this resolution is one that is of deep concern to the provinces across this country. They have to bring down their budgets and arrange for their year's work. There is some of this work that will take more than one year, and yet they are dependent on the federal government for payments to be made to them based on an annual resolution in parliament. They have no assurance that these payments are going to be made. After all, this government is not one that is noted for observing its election promises or even its contractual obligations, for that matter. The provinces have no guarantee, therefore, that these payments are going to continue.

I believe the time has arrived when this government should meet with the provinces and decide on some arrangement that will at least give the provinces a fairly long term outlook and enable them to arrange their own affairs. There is no need to go into the long list of election promises. We all know what they were. In fact, the government has now become so embarrassed by the continued repetition of those promises that they have decided to divide them into two classes; those that are not so sacred and those that are sacred; those that are made outside the House of Commons and those that are made inside. It is a little bit difficult to see what use the members of the cabinet will be able to make of such an argument, but I think it is understandable.

Then there were the promises before the election of 1957 and before the election of 1958. We all know what happened. There was the so-called conference, called in November, 1957, and then we had the famous, or infamous, telegrams of the Minister of Finance, and then later the take it or leave it attitude of the government by declaring an increase of 3 per cent on the income tax arrangements. At the conference held in November I remember the Prime Minister said that this would be no take it or leave it attitude; but when a similar resolution came before this house on January 25 last year the provinces were told it was going to be increased from 10 to 13 per cent for one year. There was no agreement; it was just a unilateral action and could not be described as anything but a take it or leave it attitude.

On February 9 exactly the same resolution was introduced by the Minister of Finance. Again there was no agreement between the central government and the provinces; it was a decision made by the central government, and as far as the provinces were concerned they could take it or leave it. I believe we live in a country where it is absolutely imperative that there should be sharing of responsibilities between the central government and the governments of the different provinces. There is no sharing of responsibility in a resolution of this type. As I said before this is nothing more than a unilateral action and the provinces have to like it or lump it.

As far as the maritime provinces are concerned I agree that special grants have been made to them, and I would be one of the first to commend the government for the action it has taken in this respect. But let me say this. These grants have been made not by agreement with the provinces of Canada. I think there is a tremendous difference between making grants to provinces unilaterally and making grants to provinces by agreement. I think agreement between the central government and the provinces is necessary and desirable, and just giving handouts to different provinces, no matter how welcome they may be, is not the proper way to do the job.

Last year, I think on January 25, when the Minister of Finance introduced a similar measure he said it was an interim measure, and an interim measure only. Those words are to be found on page 3796 of Hansard for January 25, 1958. Yet here we are a year later still talking about the interim measure. I think it is about time we had some sort of meeting with the provinces to find out what agreement can be reached in order to solve the very pressing problems which now face different provinces across the country. I believe that the way this thing is being handled by the government is one example of the piecemeal policy they have adopted for nearly two years now. They have no long term guiding policy; if they have there has been no announcement of it, and there has certainly been no sign of it. They are approaching many of the very important problems in this country on a temporary footing, just to solve the problem for now and avoid the responsibility of having to make any long range policy by which the present government can be guided, by which the governments of the different provinces can be guided, and by which the people of this country can be guided.

Mr. Chairman, everybody recognizes that this is not a simple problem. It is indeed a very complicated one, and I think it is for that reason that more effort should be made by the present government to tackle this problem in some sensible way. Certainly there is no permanent arrangement. I do not think there is any permanent arrangement which can be made between the central government and the provinces in this particular problem. I think it is one which can be solved only for a short period of time, and then further meetings must be held in order to arrive at some arrangement which will carry on for a few more years. But I do not think it is possible to find a permanent solution. It seems to me that the method by which the government is handling this question is nothing more than asking parliament every year for an annual reprieve from their election promises and from their responsibility to the people of this country.

We live in a country which has its central government and its different provincial governments. We live in a country which is governed by unity within multiplicity, and until all parts of this country have their fair share of the great things with which this country is endowed there will always be parts of the country which will be particularly well off and other parts which will not be so well off. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I say that this country will only be a good place for some of us to live in when it is a good place for all of us to live in.

(Translation):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the introduction of the budget, I had not intended to speak on this matter, but when I saw the strange table on page 2410 of Hansard, I decided to look closely into these so-called federal contributions to the provinces. I shall demonstrate that this table indicates an utter disregard for provincial autonomy.

I hope that Conservative members from the province of Quebec will remain in the house to hear the remarks I intend to make later on in my mother tongue. If they have the patience to listen, I will prove to them that the attitude of the present government toward the provinces is paternalistic and quite different from the one which, during the election campaign, their party had pledged itself to take.

I will also make a few comments about the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Flynn).

(Text):

Now I will continue. In order to save the Minister of Finance from the temptation of raising points of order which are not really points of order, I intend to read part of the resolution to show why I am completely within the ambit of this resolution.

Resolved—

I may say I am not resolved about this; very far from it.

—that it is expedient to introduce a measure—

They are the governing words of the resolution, that it is expedient to introduce a measure. Mr. Chairman, you just cannot have a one-sided debate; at least not in the kind of parliament we have in a free country under British parliamentary institutions. If you are able to argue that it is expedient, you are likewise able to argue it is inexpedient. I propose to argue that as long as the government has the kind of attitude to the provincial governments that it has demonstrated since it came into office it is not expedient year after year, as my hon. friend from Humber-St. George's said so well a moment ago, to give the government an annual reprieve from its promises. That is a phrase which I wish I might have coined myself, and on which I compliment the hon. member. It expresses very neatly what we are being asked to do, and what we will be asked to do again, I predict, as long as the government has—and here I quote the hon. member for Eglinton when he was on this side of the house—"a servile majority". As long as that obtains we will have to do this in 1960 and again in 1961, and then possibly, but only possibly, they may call a conference before the election of 1962 or the expiry of this set of agreements in order to give some more election promises. But more likely the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be, will send out another lot of telegrams telling the provinces that things will be the same as before; or if things go on the way they have been going financially since this government came into office conditions will probably be a good deal worse.

Now I want to examine, as I indicated in my opening remarks, this table which the minister put on record in Hansard on April 9 at page 2410 and which he was pleased to describe as the federal contributions to the provinces in millions of dollars. Let us see what this government, which pretended to be a champion of provincial rights, calls a federal contribution to the provinces. It calls the statutory subsidies a federal contribution to the provinces. But they are nothing of the kind. This is a solemn obligation which was placed upon the treasury of this country as one of the terms of confederation. It is not a contribution at all. A contribution is something which we, in this parliament, have the freedom to give or not to give; it is not something which is a constitutional obligation, though I am not sure that the present government understands the difference, judging by some recent announcements about which I intend to say no more at this time.

Next, we have tax rental and abatement, and I hope the hon. member for Quebec South is listening to this. What are tax abatements? A tax abatement is an amount by which the federal tax is reduced in order to allow a provincial government to collect its own taxes. In other words, what the minister is claiming in this table is that the taxes which the legislature of Quebec imposes and collects are federal contributions. I do not think Mr. Duplessis ever made so extravagant a claim as that. The idea that money which is collected by a province on its own responsibility and put into its own treasury could ever be called a federal contribution is almost too far-fetched to be credible.

Let us turn, now, to tax rental. What is a tax rental? It is a certain sum paid to a province for relinquishing temporarily its right to impose a similar tax. It belongs to the province, and when we were in power we always said that it belonged to the province; it was in no sense the property of this parliament or of the federal government. All that happened was that as a matter of convenience to the taxpayers in the provinces which desired it—and only in the provinces which desired it—taxes could be imposed by this parliament, collected by the minister of national revenue and then paid over to the provinces. But it was always the property of the province, and we never said anything different. And now we have this government, which claims to be the champion of the provinces, calling that a contribution to the provinces. Of course, it is nothing of the kind.

Next, we have this 50 per cent share of income tax on power utilities. Here again we have a tax which, it is true, is collected by the federal government. It is collected only on those utilities which are privately owned, because the publicly owned utilities are not taxed, and it was felt that it was unfair that the federal authority should receive the full tax on the privately owned ones when it did not tax the publicly owned ones. For this reason it was agreed to split this revenue between the two governments. This money had never belonged to us and we, while in office, never said it did, for the reason that the provinces, had they so wished, could have collected it directly themselves. Here is another example of what might be called the Diefenbaker largesse, and again this largesse is just as phoney as most of the other promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

And then we have the term 29 award to Newfoundland which the minister said had been paid, although later he had to admit he was only going to pay when parliament so decided and I hope that it will not be long before this has been done.

If we look again at this list we find two more items, equalization and stabilization, to which I will refer in more detail later, but first I wish first to deal briefly with these so-called conditional payments. I do not intend to go into detail with regard to them because I do not wish to take too long. What are these conditional payments? They represent sums appropriated by this parliament, mostly under Liberal initiatives, for very good causes such as agriculture, health, hospital insurance, welfare, vocational training, highways, resources development and slum clearance, and when we appropriated money for slum clearance we did not use it as an excuse to interfere in provincial administration.

These are fields in which, in our wisdom, we in this parliament, or in previous parliaments, decided it would be advantageous to spend money collected from the taxpayers of Canada. And we said we would spend it if the provinces would match the money. This is not a contribution made by the government to the provincial treasuries at all. It does not help the provinces with their normal financing in any way whatever. Indeed, as the late Angus Macdonald and as Mr. Douglas Campbell, the former premier of Manitoba, frequently pointed out, they often forced a province to go ahead with things at a time when there might be some doubt about their ability to pay for them at the time.

The main point is that this is not a contribution to the provinces. These payments are a very good thing, of course, in every one of the cases I have mentioned, and I say so because they were all brought in by Liberal governments. But they were things done for the benefit of the Canadian people; they were not done for the provinces, and to call these payments contributions to the provinces is just another indication of this centralizing mentality, this attitude that the government is the source of everything, and that it gives everything, whereas, of course, there is no giving involved at all.

Then we have this third category—the most absurd of all—the university grants. Mr. Chairman, university grants do not go to the provinces; they do not go to the provincial treasuries. Indeed, the provincial governments have nothing to do with them, except to the extent that they say which institutions are universities. In no way whatever are university grants related to the provinces. These payments are contributions made for very good and sufficient reasons, and I have no doubt this government also believes that to be the case, because it has increased them by 50 per cent. I am glad the government has done that, although I doubt whether the hon. member for Quebec South would say so, or some of his colleagues who, having got elected on the pledge that they would abolish university grants, came here and voted to increase them by 50 per cent. However, I think they are a good thing, and this is an increase in expenditure which was a great deal more justified than most of the other increases which have brought our expenditures to unprecedented heights—

An hon. Member: What about old age pensions?

Mr. Pickersgill: —such as all the money paid to McKim's and all the additions to travelling expenses. But I do not intend to be diverted from my speech into making the speech of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. Next on this list, in paragraph C, we have "grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal government property". This is described as a contribution to the provinces, and it is so ridiculous that it is not even worth wasting words upon. We have left, in the whole of this table, just three items: equalization payments, stabilization payments and the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants.

Dominion-Provincial Relations

Everywhere I have been I have given the government full credit for the Atlantic provinces grants. I think they are a good thing. I wish we had felt that we had been able to make them when we were in office. But I would remind hon. members that between 1956 and 1957 the increases, not in grants or contributions but in the share of the taxation that went to the provinces of this country as a result of Mr. Harris' new deal, were very much higher than the Atlantic provinces grants. In fact, they were three or four times as great, though the Atlantic provinces grants were a good and needful thing and I give the government full credit for them.

The equalization payments and the stabilization payments are, of course, grants to the provinces. That, I admit, and I admit it with the more enthusiasm because this was a Liberal achievement, one of the greatest Liberal achievements of our domestic policy, and, I may say, one which was opposed bitterly by the Tory party from start to finish. Mr. Drew did his utmost when he was premier of Ontario to prevent it. He attacked it unsuccessfully all the time he was Leader of the Opposition. My friend the hon. member for Lapointe this afternoon recalled the attitude that the hon. member for Eglinton expressed in this house as recently as 1956. Indeed, this whole equalization policy was a policy which the Tory party was pledged to end. The Solicitor General said that this basis of grants was a wicked thing and as soon as his government got into office they would change the whole basis but we have not heard much on that subject from the Solicitor General since he became a minister of the crown. Of course, we understand the rules of cabinet solidarity; at least some ministers observe it.

In the year 1957-58 the amount of the equalization payment was $136 million and the amount of the stabilization payment was $3,400,000; that is to say, a total of approximately $140 million. That represented some small increase over the previous year in the equalization feature—a very small increase indeed—but the bulk of that $140 million was the direct result of the formula in the tax-sharing law as it was enacted by this parliament in 1956 when the Liberals were in office. There has been only a small increase in these payments to the provinces apart from the Atlantic provinces grants since this government came into office. In fact, the word "contributions" is used rather than "payments" and indeed if they were payments it might have been another matter, but the only contributions since this government came into power apart from the Atlantic provinces grants were the equalization features of the 3 per cent we are talking about today and the equalization aspect of this is, of course, a relatively small proportion of the total amount which I have not taken the time to work out but which no doubt the minister could give to the committee.

In order to indicate how very different that is from what the minister said the members of his party were going to do, let me remind the committee of one or two things he said as recently as last year. I have here extracts from several speeches and broadcasts he made. Perhaps I should read this to the hon. member for Quebec South. This is an extract from a speech made by the Minister of Finance on the French television network program, "Les Affaires de l'État", on November 24, 1958. This was after the election. It was even after the Montmagny by-election. As closely as I can make out it is an exact repetition and an accurate translation of what was said in the Montmagny by-election and that is perhaps why it was repeated. It reads as follows:

(Translation):

In the same way, we have respected provincial rights. We have injected into federal-provincial relations a new spirit of co-operation and respect. And so it is estimated that under the new tax-sharing formula with the provinces—

The new formula is exactly the same Liberal formula.

—the new tax-sharing formula with the provinces, Quebec will receive $19 million more than under the Liberal government.

(Text):

Again claiming that the taxes that Quebec collects itself are a contribution from this generous government. I continue:

(Translation):

We have increased the provincial share of each tax dollar paid by the Canadians, thus reducing proportionately the federal share.

(Text):

That was before the budget; it is all changed now and in fact it is just the reverse. I continue:

(Translation):

Unlike the Liberals, we are not—

(Text):

That is a real joke. I continue:

(Translation):

—we are not centralizers, but constitutionals.

(Text):

That was also before the Prime Minister's statement of March 25, this claim that the Conservatives were constitutional. I do not want to sit down without saying a word or two about what was said a while ago by the hon. member for Quebec South. He said that the Liberal scheme was impossible and unsatisfactory. Why? Why was this Liberal scheme unsatisfactory? What was the great reason? He said:

(Translation):

None of the provinces are satisfied.

(Text):

I think that is evident. It is still true and in 1962 it will still be true and when the hon. member and I are both dead it will still be true. There would be something dead about any federal state in which both national and provincial authorities were fully satisfied with the fiscal relations, because the people who are elected to look after provincial affairs have a responsibility to do the best they can for the people of their province and they are never really going to admit they have enough money to do it, especially when they think they can get the money from the generous Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman need not think that a new formula is going to change that very much.

What will be disturbing to many people and I am sure it was extremely disturbing to the friends of the hon. member for Quebec South and those of the Minister of Finance in the province of Manitoba was something else he said. He trotted out the old Tory idea which I thought the Prime Minister buried during the 1957 election when he spoke in Manitoba. He did not talk about it in Ontario but when he was in Manitoba he apparently got in a funk and declared, "We believe in equalization, too. We are just as much in favour of equalization as the Liberals are." Here we have the hon. member for Quebec South coming back with the old doctrine under which they would divide up the tax fields and let the provinces collect their own taxes and the federal government collect its own taxes and everybody would be happy. I will tell the hon. member that if the people in Quebec did the arithmetic they would not be very happy about this doctrine but I am not now talking about Quebec, I am talking about Manitoba where more than any place this doctrine of equalization was devised by Mr. Bracken and Mr. Garson many years ago when we had the problems that we had in the thirties in the western provinces.

I can tell the hon. member that any politician, no matter what party he belongs to, who goes out and tells the people in Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or even Alberta, I suspect, that equalization is going to be done away with and the provinces can raise their own revenues—

Mr. Flynn: I did not say that.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman wants to tell us what he did say, he can correct me as soon as I am finished. What I understood him to say was that temporary aid would be given to the poorer provinces when they needed it but that it should be temporary. The plain fact is that at least six of the provinces in this country all the time, if they have to depend upon the taxes that they can collect within their own borders, will not be able to give decent Canadian services to their people. That is the whole reason for equalization. That is why we did it and that is why we Liberals are proud of it. We believe that if Canadians are going to have an equal citizenship they must have at least a rough approach to equality of services and opportunities.

This notion that in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Newfoundland or even in Quebec you can impose a level of taxation and raise enough money there to provide provincial services without imposing punitive taxation upon the people is just not a fact. Of course, it can be done in Ontario. Why? It can be done in Ontario because of the protective tariffs and many other economic advantages that Ontario now has, not all of which are natural advantages, though many of them are.

What was the system we had at the beginning of confederation? Why do we have those statutory subsidies mentioned in that table? We have them because in 1867 Quebec would not have entered into confederation without statutory subsidies. Nova Scotia got them raised within three years of confederation. New Brunswick would not have come in without the statutory subsidies. The only people who would have been satisfied with this system of having provincial revenue raised exclusively through taxation were the people of Ontario. For a long time they will continue to be the only province where that would work. Unless we want to have disunity, division and inequities in this country, that would not be tolerable at all.

Although I do not think it is expedient to be asking us here in this parliament every year to pass this same resolution and do this same thing, I do say that the fundamental policy, of which this resolution is a small amelioration, a very small amelioration, as I think I have shown in what I have said, is fundamentally and basically a good policy; and the best reason for contending that it is, is the fact that after two years in office the ingenious and hard-working Minister of Finance, with all those commitments behind him and all those promises behind him, has not been able to devise anything better.

This government will not meet the provincial governments in conference. Why? Because they have nothing new to suggest, and they have now called—and I refer to the speech from the throne, and there was no motion about this subject, sir, since you are beginning to get restive—they are going to ask civil servants of the federal government and the provincial governments to try to get together and work out some ideas for them.

Where are those wonderful ideas that the Solicitor General had before the election that were going to sweep this rotten Liberal system out of existence and put something better in its place? Where is this better thing? It is just another vision, sir, and it is worth about as much as the rest of the vision.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, if I am permitted to answer the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I will say that what I proposed was a formula based on two principles: the first one, maximum fiscal responsibility; and, the second, federal aid to the poorer provinces in the form of a subsidiary measure on a temporary basis; but "temporary" may be as long as needed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I did the hon. member much injustice.

Mr. Flynn: I am more optimistic on the future of Newfoundland than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate seems to be.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is the point of his speech this: the policy of this government is identical with that of the Liberal party so far this particular question is concerned?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I did not say the policy was identical. I do not think they have any policy. They are simply continuing to use our formula because it is a good one and because they have not been able to think of anything better.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I feel that at this time dominion-provincial relations are at a very low ebb. I think the government is getting a decided bad reaction from the provinces, not only because of what the government is doing but the manner in which it is being done.

The resolution which is before us at this time will carry into effect for another year the motion and the provisions which are being followed at the present time. We had expected that, as a result of many promises made in the recent election campaign, there would have been a new arrangement worked out on a satisfactory basis with the provinces by mutual agreement in a way which would improve provincial financing. Before the election the government seemed to keep in mind the long complaints that the provinces have had as to the need of additional revenue, and seemed to take the feelings of the provinces into account; but immediately the election was over the government's consideration for the welfare of provincial governments seemed to come to an end.

On January 25, 1958, as reported at page 3795 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance, in announcing the formula that is today being discussed, had this to say:

> The estimated cost to federal treasury is over $62 million. This is an interim measure pending reconvening of dominion-provincial conference to seek fiscal settlements.

This was the message that was sent out to the provinces. We are waiting, Canada is waiting, for this solemn commitment to be fulfilled. Instead of the government having brought about an agreement, if possible by mutual discussion, by mutual arrangement, the government at this time has sent an ambassador, a civil servant, out to interview officials of provincial governments. This is a unique way, to say the least, to carry on federal-provincial relations. I am certain that no provincial government has asked that this method be followed. I am certain that this type of action by the government is not one that will inspire confidence from the provinces.

We have asked in this house on previous occasions what progress has been made as a result of this one-man ambassador's travels across the country. At this time when we are discussing very large sums of money the minister owes it to the house to give us a progress report, to tell us when, if ever, we are going to be able to get away from this ad hoc method of handling federal-provincial relations.

The present formula that is being proposed by this resolution and that will be continued has a number of faults, one of which from the standpoint of have not provinces and those whose revenues are most inadequate to meet their needs is that the amounts are too low. The second very strong criticism is that although the percentage is fixed there has been no raising of the floor under these grants, so that although the Minister of Finance outlined in the house last year the amount of money that he forecast the provinces would receive because of the increased percentage that was being provided, these increases have not materialized.

One of the main considerations in federal-provincial relations and federal-provincial conferences in the past has been to place under provincial revenues floors that would be maintained in times of falling revenues. That has not been done in this case. Therefore, the budgets of provincial governments become subject to the failure of the federal government to maintain a buoyant income, and when the federal government fails to provide full employment, full production and an increasing gross national product, provincial revenues suffer. If the government would place a 95 per cent floor under this additional amount as compared with the former amount it would provide a greater measure of stability for the finances of provincial governments.

The crying need in Canada today is to provide stability of provincial revenues and to provide the provinces with the kind of revenues they need to maintain the services that are their responsibility. Having regard to the way our federal constitution is drafted, responsibility for most of the main services rests with the provinces. They have the responsibility but the federal government has the ability to raise revenues out of all proportion to the responsibilities of the federal government. Having regard to the services that the provinces must provide, the federal government should act in order to give Canadians in every province the opportunity to enjoy the same level of services that is enjoyed in some provinces.

The action of the government in failing to consult the provinces on a high level basis, its failure to consult the premiers of the provinces, has not been well received. The minister has had certain correspondence with various provincial premiers, and as far as federal-provincial relations are concerned the government's attitude seems to be the same kind of attitude that is prevailing in other quarters. Instead of consultation, instead of mutual arrangements, the federal government says: "You can take it or leave it."

With regard to discussions with the provinces I suggest that the minister himself is guilty of using the kind of language that does not improve federal-provincial relations. Correspondence took place with regard to this particular formula with the premier of Saskatchewan, and the Minister of Finance, replying to a letter written to him by the Hon. T. C. Douglas, premier of Saskatchewan, said in part in a letter dated July 7, 1958:

> My dear premier:
> I acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 23. Notwithstanding your mistaken comments, my letter of June 17 is entirely clear and in accord with the facts. While I doubt if I can usefully add anything to what I previously said, perhaps in view of your apparent misunderstanding of the question some further clarification might have value.
> The 1958 amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act is likewise perfectly clear. I therefore find it extremely difficult to believe that one of your knowledge and experience would find it capable of misinterpretation, particularly in view of the explanation given not only in parliament but through subsequent correspondence.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the language contained in this letter was intemperate, uncalled for and that if it were designed to interfere with normal federal-provincial relations it could not have been drafted in a manner better calculated to achieve that regrettable result. There is much talk of the minister being transferred to another portfolio, that of the Department of External Affairs. I would hope that the new training he is being subjected to would result in an improvement in his attitude so that this kind of language is not used. I do not think that abusive language to a premier of a province is something that should be condoned by parliament or by any member of the House of Commons. It is time that the federal government learned from statements made in the past. Although the statement I am about to refer to was made by the Prime Minister in 1956, it could well have been a comment on federal-provincial relations at this time. This is what he said on July 24, 1956:

> I believe this. I think it is fair to say that the attitude taken by the government at the last conference was an arbitrary one. The government simply said, "These are the terms." No opportunity was given for amendment or for amelioration of any terms. The recipe for a division of taxation was as final as the laws of the Medes and the Persians, and how similar that attitude was to the attitude of the government in this house, which is that power makes perfect anything they do.

Instead of taking action on the resolution at this time, the government should be placing before parliament new proposals agreed to by the provinces after full consultation, proposals designed to relieve some of the very heavy burdens now being borne by the provinces, designed to bring about an economy with full employment and full production, designed to strengthen the economic and democratic fabric of the nation.

Federal-provincial relations are at a low ebb. They have been damaged. I hope that the government will reconvene a federal-provincial conference and that it will cease to to delegate to a departmental official a role that in fact should be borne by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the resolution carries, may I point out that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked the minister some questions earlier this afternoon based on certain figures that were given by the Prime Minister in a television broadcast the other day. These figures purported to show how much in contributions, if I may use a word used by the minister, the government of Newfoundland and the people of Newfoundland had received from the federal treasury since confederation, that is, since April 1, 1949. I know that the minister cannot provide these figures right now but it does seem to me that this information should be provided. I believe there was an order for return passed yesterday asking for somewhat similar information but the information should be provided now so that we will have it when the bill comes before the house. It should not be any more difficult to prepare it for the other provinces than it was for Newfoundland and I suggest that to prepare it for one province and not for the other provinces and not to make it available to all members equally is not a very satisfactory position in which to leave the matter. I wonder whether the minister can assure us that the material will be ready.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I cannot give any such assurance. The material has not been prepared with respect to the other provinces. It would be quite a formidable task to prepare it. It is hoped that the bill to be founded on the resolution will be passed soon because until it is passed we are not in a position to make any payments to the provinces in respect of the additional 3 per cent of the yield from the personal income tax which the bill would authorize.

I may point out, Mr. Chairman, that the statement the hon. gentleman refers to is a statement made outside the house. It is something that is not in the context of this legislation. It relates to a great many other things as well and it is not relevant. The kind of statement he wants goes far beyond the context of the present measure.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite astonished to hear this reply coming from the hon. member for Eglinton, and I call him that for obvious reasons because, in language that I do not intend to attempt to emulate, we heard charge after charge ring through this house from the day the hon. gentleman was first elected about the denial to parliament of information.

Here is basic information about federal-provincial fiscal relations which the minister must have prepared, or which his department must have prepared, for the Prime Minister. This information was used by the Prime Minister outside the house in a television broadcast, and was designed to influence public opinion. However, when we, as members of the house, ask for similar information about the other provinces, the minister says he is too busy and it takes too long to prepare; that it is very important to get this legislation through in a hurry. He says we are not entitled to have that relevant information, and it is relevant information. Surely, if we are asked to form an opinion as to whether or not additional moneys should be paid to the provinces, the basic information about what they are getting now should be in the possession of the committee.

In a matter of finance, above everything else, where the control of the house over expenditure is the very stuff of which the history of our institutions is made, it is an absolutely incredible position for the Minister of Finance to take. I hope he will reconsider it. I am quite sure that the difficulties of preparing this information would be no greater than the difficulty of assembling the information in that table that was put before us, which I examined this afternoon. It seems to me that the minister should reconsider, and remember those eloquent words he used to use about the rights of parliament.

Mr. Regier: I wonder, now that a considerable length of time has elapsed since this resolution was introduced, and since the minister has now had an ambassador interview the ministers of finance in the provinces, whether the minister would be able to supply the committee with a report on the ambassador's visit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would be able to do that at the proper time, but that leads us into the question of a conference, which has been ruled out of order in the present debate. At the proper time I will be happy

Mr. Regier: Looking over the wording of the resolution, it starts: "Resolved, that it is expedient—". I was wondering whether or not the minister would be able to report that as a result of the visit to the provincial ministers of finance most of our provincial governments would agree that it is expedient at this time to have this resolution dealt with?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this consultation was not directly related to the present measure. It was related to the proposal for the holding of a conference between provincial treasurers on the one hand and the Minister of Finance on the other, to be followed by the studies that have been discussed earlier at the official level. This does not hinge on the present measure.

Mr. Regier: I have another matter about which I should like to question the minister. Is it reasonable to expect that if we endorse this resolution there may be an announcement within a matter of a week or so that, over and beyond the provisions of this resolution, there will be a new cost-sharing arrangement announced by the federal government in relation to Manitoba?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What does the hon. gentleman mean by "cost-sharing arrangement"? We are here dealing with a proposal that the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements be enlarged so the provincial must have prepared, or which his department share of the yield from the personal income tax would be increased from 10 per cent to 13 per cent. As the house is well aware, this is the change that is proposed by the federal government for this fiscal year, and this is the only one that affects the unconditional grants payable under the Federal-Provincial Tax-sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Regier: I think I am within my rights in asking the minister at this time, when he asks for the endorsation of this resolution, whether it is within his knowledge that the government of Canada is intending, within a limited number of days, to make an announcement in regard to assistance to a province over and above what is contained in this resolution.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has quite rightly said that this resolution precedes a bill which will be introduced to enlarge the provincial share of the income tax from 10 per cent to 13 per cent. In that sense it affects the grants to the provinces. Now, any consideration which this committee gives to the proposed bill would be affected by a very pertinent factor, namely the grants that are being received now by the provinces from the federal government. As my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, has pointed out, a statement has been made by the Prime Minister outside of this house in which he said the total amount of $300 million had been received by one province since confederation, including the amount for the current year. This has a bearing on this resolution, as it will have a bearing on our consideration of the bill.

A request has been made, and surely it is a proper request, that we should have that information for the other provinces before we consider the bill. An impression has been created by this statement outside the house that one province is being treated fairly and equitably in regard to the amount of money it has received. We would like to have that information confirmed by the minister. We would like to have the same information in respect of the other provinces. I cannot really believe that this kind of information, which apparently has been secured for one province, could not be secured for the other provinces. I do not want to hold up the resolution at this time, but I do want to let the minister know that we will expect this information when we come to consider the bill. We hope to have it before us at that time.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-41, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals on taxable income in excess of $3000 be increased by two percentage points and that for the 1959 taxation year each of the graduated rates of tax applicable to individuals on taxable income in excess of $3000 be increased by one percentage point.

2. That with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1959 the 45 per cent rate of tax on taxable income in excess of $25,000 be increased to 47 per cent and the 43 per cent rate of tax on taxable income in excess of $25,000 applicable to corporations deriving more than half their gross revenue from the sale for delivery in Canada of electrical energy, gas or steam be increased to 45 per cent.

3. That commencing January 1, 1959 the definition of medical expenses exclude those amounts which the taxpayer is not required to pay because they are paid with the assistance of the government of Canada under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

4. That amounts paid on or after January 1, 1959 for iliostomy and colostomy pads, crutches, trusses for hernia and rocking beds for poliomyelitis patients be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

5. That for the 1959 and subsequent taxation years an individual be allowed to deduct in computing income, in addition to the amounts now permitted by the act, any amount received by him out of a pension fund or plan upon withdrawal or retirement from employment or upon the winding up of the fund, not exceeding the portion thereof that is paid in the year, or within 60 days after the end of the year, as a contribution to a registered pension fund or plan or as a premium under a registered retirement savings plan.

6. That with respect to deaths occurring after April 9, 1959 the exemption for a portion of a death benefit paid by an employer upon or after the death of an officer or employee in recognition of his service be changed from an amount equal to the employee's remuneration for the last 90 days in the office or employment to an exemption for an amount equal to the remuneration of the employee for the last 12 months in the office or employment or the amount of $10,000 whichever is the lesser.

7. That for 1960 and subsequent taxation years there shall be included as income from an office or employment the amount of the benefit which an employee derives by virtue of the payment by his employer of a premium under a group life insurance plan to provide the employee with life insurance coverage to the extent that it is in excess of $25,000.

8. That the time within which a notice of objection to an assessment issued after February 8, 1959 must be served be increased from 60 to 90 days from the day of mailing of the notice of assessment.

9. That the privilege of qualifying as a foreign business corporation be withdrawn except for those corporations that were so qualified for the 1958 taxation year.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, is the minister to make any comment beyond his budget address?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think there is nothing new to be mentioned in connection with this opening paragraph. When we come down to paragraph 9, Mr. Chairman, I will have an amendment to propose to it. If I may make a suggestion in the interest of orderly procedure, while there is just one resolution to amend the Income Tax Act it might contribute to orderly discussion in the committee if you were to call the paragraphs seriatim.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable that the paragraph be discussed seriatim?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do recall the discussion of last year with respect to relevancy and order, and I think I would agree with the minister that providing there is at all times adherence to relevancy it is desirable that an attempt be made for speakers to keep to the individual paragraphs in the resolution in seriatim. My understanding is that in recent years we consider that we have in nine parts a resolution as a whole. The only difficulty I can think of is that some member might come in a bit late and feel that his rights had not been properly respected. I personally would address myself to the resolution in its separate nine parts.

Mr. Chairman, we have, of course, very recently completed a formal debate on the budget. I think that in particular the first two paragraphs of this resolution, Nos. 1 and 2, highlight and pinpoint the general criticism which was advanced to the budget speech of the minister, which I think can be most appropriately advanced to these particular paragraphs. The general phrases, if one were to summarize, which seem most effectively to indicate the feeling of the opposition, and indeed the public as a whole, are that these paragraphs pinpoint the nature of betrayal and the nature of bad faith when one relates the proposals we are now asked to deal with in detail to the promises spree which we heard in two recent elections. In other words, we are today at the point where the promises of yesterday are the deficits and taxes of today.

If there were any key promises of this government that I think most members of the public have in mind and which helped bring the government to power, surely they were the seemingly clear pledges that the government would not be increasing taxes but on the contrary would be reducing taxes. In other words, we are asked here in the first two paragraphs to raise the tax rates on individual incomes and on corporation incomes, and I suggest that this is a complete reversal of everything that was advanced to the public by this government. We have a very keen recollection of how my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and those associated with him, not only in the house but on the election platforms, blasted their opponents over and over again claiming that their predecessors were spending too much and taxing too much. We have in this resolution to amend the Income Tax Act an application of new taxes which involves an increased take from the public by way of income tax of 12½ per cent.

I have raised the question before and I raise it again now in the hope that the minister will comment upon it. I would like his comments as to whether or not these proposals may not do the very opposite of what is desired with respect to our economy. I am thinking that these increases in taxes to the extent that they are advocated may actually brake the re-employment that is the desire of everybody, and indeed could very much backfire on the economy of the country at this present stage. I think the minister shares my respect for a certain non-partisan organization that considers tax matters. I refer to the Canadian tax foundation, the director of which is a former very highly respected member of the Department of Finance, Mr. Harvey Perry, even prior to the minister's budget proposals, said and I quote "already taxes are at such a level that they influence, and usually in a detrimental way, almost every aspect of our economy."

The conspicuous thing about the financial proposals which have come from the minister and his government at this present time is that they do not seem to have the recipe which we heard so much about in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958. The Prime Minister has confessed to the trades and labour council and to the municipalities and other delegations since he has assumed office that there was no such recipe which, on the other hand, he indicated he had, namely that you could have a great amount of candy in connection with government administration and not pay for it. I ask the Minister of Finance in his subsequent remarks tonight to indicate his views upon these tax increases in relation to higher prices, more inflation, and the threat to exports; and in particular one thing which is concerning us all at the present time, and that is whether we are, as a result of a built-in tax expense, being taxed out of sales.

I indicated to the minister on budget night that it was a very startling thing to find him budgeting seemingly with mirrors, in that within a very short space of time he had ceased boasting about tax reductions of $178 million in 1957 and was, in this 1959 budget, proposing tax increases of double that amount—$2 increase for every $1 decrease. Increases in taxes in a full year, he says will be $352 million. The most startling thing about it all is that none of these proposals seem to jibe in any way with the long held views which the minister has so long and often expressed in this house. We recall that in the past few weeks we have heard some surprising and cynical remarks from occupants of the treasury benches about the subject of promises, and there seemed to be some priority in connection with their promises, depending on whether they were made inside or outside the House of Commons. But both inside and outside the house the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have gone on record with respect to disapproving tax increases. Their fiscal policies are on record, and have been on record for a great number of years.

I raise this question of money left over for capital expenditure because it seems to me that the fillip that we might expect at the present time, and which would give us the greatest opportunity for the re-employment of those who are now unemployed, could very properly come from the private segment of our economy. This seems to be a view which the minister himself shared in recent times. I would remind the hon. gentleman that on March 27, 1956, as reported at page 2648 of Hansard, he said this:

> Canada needs capital. We need capital created out of the savings of the people. That is one reason why the government ought to be making resolute efforts to reduce the burden of taxation on the Canadian people.

I think the finance minister should tell this house why his views seemed to have changed in such a short period of time.

During the budget debate we heard spokesmen of the ministry indicate that a certain amount of economic surgery and unpleasantness was necessary in present circumstances. The Minister of National Revenue suggested that men and women did not always expect from their government policies which involve flavoursome potions and painless surgery. But that is not what this administration said to the Canadian people in the two recent election campaigns. The most charitable thing I can say to the finance minister and to his associates is that perhaps they were so naive and so disrespectful of economic laws that they actually believed that the advantages which they promised could be achieved without increases in taxation. Either the government must admit that they possessed this naivety—a naivety amounting almost to stupidity—or, on the other hand, they did believe that through high pressure selling they could take the Canadian people as, shall we say, saps, and persuade them to accept the kind of economics they presented to them. But events are catching up with this government and we now see very clearly the cost of the so-called vision.

In the budget debate I did make reference to the new taxes whose imposition the minister was prepared to advocate at the sales tax or consumers' tax level. I find that with respect to the sales tax for old age pensioners, the minister's proposal means that another $93 million would accrue to the treasury from the 1 per cent increase. He expects another $46 million from new imposts on the excise taxes. In other words, a total of $139 million out of $352 million comes from tax on spending. We have already seen how quickly proposals of this kind can be triggered into eventual cost burdens on the consumers in this country, burdens which are far greater than the actual dollar value of the taxes themselves. The Prime Minister exploded over this matter in the House of Commons when replying to a question addressed to him by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Well, these increases might be inexcusable, but the Prime Minister offered no remedy with respect to them. The pages of Hansard over the past ten years are full of statements by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance indicating that this would be the inevitable result of an increase in this particular type of taxation on consumers spending.

I hope that before we conclude our discussion of items one and two, the minister will very carefully explain to this committee why he feels that measures to increase this type of taxation can be advanced by him without the consequences which he himself in the past said were so unfortunate from the point of view of inflation and spiralling costs.

Mr. Herridge: I may say at the outset that the members of this group intend to discuss the items themselves, and not to enter into a general debate on the income tax provisions and similar subjects. I rise on item one to bring to the attention of the minister two or three matters which I have raised in this committee in previous years and which have come to my notice as a result of considerable correspondence from a large number of people who are concerned about the questions I intend to raise.

The first matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention is that while we note that no general increases in exemptions for income tax purposes have been provided, we in the C.C.F. party do feel that there was an opportunity to assist certain groups of people who are obliged to bear extra expense because of their situation or the conditions under which they live. The first are those working people who live some distance away from their places of employment. This problem becomes ever more acute with the growth of our cities and the necessity which so many people find of moving into suburban areas in order to obtain suitable housing and so on. We feel that some provision should be made for the exemption of at least a portion of the extra expense occasioned by travel in such circumstances.

In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, there are a number of working people who are obliged to travel as far as 30 miles to work each day. This is necessary because they have to live at some distance from their places of employment in order to find satisfactory living conditions for their families. I do urge the minister to give some consideration to allowing at least a portion of this travel expenditure to be exempted for income tax purposes.

The second group from whom I have heard is a group of disability pensioners, and I suggest it would be possible for the minister to assist these pensioners and war veterans without great expense to the treasury while performing a service of particular value to these handicapped persons. I have particular reference to amputees.

I know of several cases where these people are required to hire a taxi to go to their employment because they cannot drive a car or where they are required to use a motor vehicle because they are unable to walk and things of that sort. These men who suffer these disabilities should receive some consideration because of the extra expenses they have to incur in travelling. I bring that to the attention of the minister and would like to have his comments later on in the evening. I have received a number of letters about this matter. The suggestion appealed to me because it seemed to me that the minister could do something for these unfortunate persons who have difficulty meeting the increased cost of living because of disability incurred in the service of their country.

I have also had representations from people with respect to the allowance costs incurred for non-licensed ambulances or methods of transportation used by persons who have to be taken to hospital where it is impossible to employ a licensed ambulance. I know that in a constituency such as I represent, and there must be many others in the same position, if a man is injured in the woods it is sometimes necessary to hire a launch to take him a distance of 20 or 30 miles and then hire a car to take him a distance which in some cases is up to 100 miles, or hire some other form of conveyance. I mentioned last year a case where we had to put an injured man on horseback and take him over the hills for some considerable distance. These are expensive forms of travel. Of course, no one considers expense when taking an injured person to hospital when he is stricken in the woods, the hills or the mines. I have met many people who believe that some consideration should be given by the minister to those much higher costs incurred for performing what is in effect an ambulance service compared with those that have to be paid by persons who can obtain licensed ambulances because they are close to cities where distances are shorter and so on. I urge the minister to give further consideration to this and I should like to hear his comments about those suggestions.

I have received many letters criticizing the limitation of $100 for charitable donations. The argument used in those cases is that it does not properly recognize persons with charitable instincts whether they are donating to churches, hospitals or other charitable causes. There should be provision for a larger exemption in this respect or provision for the amount a person donates to these good causes. That is all I have to say at this point and I shall look forward to hearing the minister's comments later.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the first of these resolutions we have before us tonight is the first concrete indication we have had that the bills are coming in. They are to be met in part through income tax increases and other taxes. These will serve to meet them only in part because some of them will be merely absorbed in the deficit for next year which is still something over $400 million.

When the Prime Minister was speaking on "The Nation's Business" over television on April 20 last, he had something to say about these increases in income and other taxes. I shall quote what the Prime Minister said from the circulated text of his broadcast:

> We have put into effect many of the human betterment measures which people have asked for. These have already cost large sums of money and will continue at a high level in the current year.

I agree that they have cost large sums of money and that they certainly will continue at a high level, but some of us remember how these costs were to be met out of the waste and extravagance of previous government expenditures amounting to something approaching $500 million in the estimation of various Conservatives. They said then that these costs for what the Prime Minister calls human betterment measures would be met out of the waste and extravagance of the Liberal administration. In his broadcast the Prime Minister went on to say:

> The tax increases in this year's budget—

The increase in the first resolution is an important part of them. I continue:

> The tax increases in this year's budget are directly related to the human betterment expenditures. In total, however, the tax increases are much less than the additional payments to alleviate the effects of the recession. The budget is up by $245 million in taxes in the current fiscal year.

I think the minister will support this statement. The increase in taxation for a full year will come to well over $245 million; according to our calculations it will perhaps be $340 million or $350 million. However, leaving that difference aside for the moment, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Even so, the income rates will be lower than when our government assumed office.

Perhaps the minister will confirm that in his remarks. The Prime Minister continued:

> On the other hand we will be paying out this year $550 million more to Canadians in national health insurance, welfare and social security payments than in 1956-57, the last year before we came into office. That is to say, twice as much as the tax increases.

"Twice as much as the tax increases," says the Prime Minister using a figure of $550 million and including in that sum payments for national health insurance which employees and employers contribute to and only part of which comes from the government. It is therefore quite a misleading calculation to say the least. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> The $550 million does not include additional expenditures which will be made for unemployment insurance as a result of the extension of these benefits to more people and for longer periods. Here alone, the additional costs will be $200 million more than in 1956-57. This will bring the total of human betterment measure payments to more than three times the amount of the tax increases.

I would like to see if the minister confirms that the increase in human betterment payments this year will be over $1 billion because the increase in taxes for a full year will be $350 million.

This was the statement made a few weeks ago to the public. The Prime Minister concluded this part of his statement with the following words:

> These heavy demands for social and individual security measures to meet the recession effects have resulted in a projected deficit for the current year.

Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the reason given by the Prime Minister for these heavy demands for social and individual security measures. He said, as he said previously, they are to meet the recession. That is the purpose, according to the Prime Minister, of these additional social security demands, to meet the recession effects. Are we to draw from that that when these recession effects are over—and the minister says we are on the way out of the recession—these heavy demands for social and individual security measures which have been made to meet the recession are to be withdrawn and this social security program about which the Prime Minister boasted in the early part of his statement is to be reconsidered again?

Perhaps when the time comes the minister will deal with these two matters; the statement made over the air that there have been additional payments for human betterment this year of over $1 billion and the statement made that these heavy demands for social security and other increased payments in this form were made to meet recession effects. Perhaps he will tell us what is to be done about them when the recession disappears as we all hope it will?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in my part of the country the land is of no use until the brush is removed but there is no provision under which the costs of the removal of brush from the land are deductible from income tax. I would urge the minister to give this matter serious consideration and shall look forward to hearing his comments on this subject.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph one?

Mr. Howard: I gather that the minister will possibly make comment on some of the things that have been mentioned; therefore I would like to leave this thought with him. I hope he may be able to reply to it, since he is thoroughly familiar with the question that I am about to mention, it having been brought to his attention in a formal way on other occasions. I make reference to the question which my friend from Kootenay West raised, notably travelling expenses of industrial workers. The expenses incurred by such people may vary from one part of the country to another and certainly may vary according to the work that a person does; but I should like to relate the problems that the workers on the west coast of British Columbia are confronted with, because of the extraordinarily high travelling expenses they have to meet.

The logging industry on the coast of British Columbia is classified or considered as being a seasonal one. There is during the winter months of December, January and February, depending on the severity of the winter, a shut-down of the logging industry. Then, in the summer months, depending again on the weather, how dry it is and how low the humidity is, there is a possibility of a shut-down. The summer closures or shut-downs take place at the insistence of the provincial government. Where there is excessively low humidity they may institute forest closure which means that all of the logging camps in the area affected must close down. A logger finding himself confronted with these two problems has in effect at the start of the winter to pay his fare from Vancouver, where most of the hiring is done and then out to the logging camp initially to get started in the spring. If the forest closure comes along, which happened in 1951 in particular and again last year, sometime probably in June, the logger finds that he has to pay his fare back again to Vancouver and then from Vancouver out to the camp again when the forest closure is lifted, and back to Vancouver again when the winter season sets in, say, in the month of January. Therefore, he finds he has to make four single trips or two round trips from the camp at which he is to Vancouver where, as I said, most of the hiring is done. This is an excessively high penalty that he has to pay to become employed and keep employed.

Certainly, I think some consideration should be given in so far as being able to deduct the travelling expenses that a logger, and other industrial workers like him have to incur in order to get out to the job where they are working and back to town again, especially when their travelling is no fault of their own, when it is occasioned by weather, by governmental action in closing the forests or by curtailment of production, as happens from time to time and the camp closes down. Especially in these cases he should have the right to make certain deductions on his income tax return for the money that he spends in getting out to work and providing income for himself and his family.

Also the loggers—again I mention them only because I am personally familiar with their difficulties but this applies to construction workers as well; it applies to miners and it applies to other types of industrial workers—find themselves in this position. Most of the logging camps—I would say 90 per cent of them—have no accommodation for families, or very little. Those that do have accommodation for families are concentrated in the lower portion of Vancouver island where there are quite a number of roads and access transportation is more readily available than it is in the upcoast camps. Practically all of the upper coast camps do not have accommodation for a man and his family. Consequently, practically all of the loggers have to maintain their wives and children, say, in Vancouver or in the Fraser valley, in Westminster. I know many in Burnaby.

Loggers who live there who have to go up to the upcoast camps in order to work find also that they have to pay board and lodging charges to the company for whom they work. They are in effect maintaining two homes, again through no fault of their own. Many of them that I know personally would like to move their families with them where they are working but the policy of the company, the places where the camp is located, the lack of transportation facilities, road, rail or ship, and so on, make it impossible for the person to locate himself and his family at the particular logging camp. Some provision should be made whereby in these circumstances he is able to make a deduction for income tax purposes of the extra money he has to pay out, first to provide board and lodging for himself in the logging camp and second to maintain a home where his wife and family live, which is some place else.

Third, and probably I would consider this the least important of the three, the necessary deductions which I think should be allowed relate to clothing for industrial workers. The argument, of course, which says that this is probably not so important as the other two is that we all have to buy special clothing of some kind. For instance, probably the Minister of Finance has a larger number of blue ties than do loggers in the logging camps or the miners under ground. I imagine we can assume that part of the outlay of the Minister of Finance for clothing should be a deductible expense, depending on the number of blue suits and ties he has. But there are some types of workers who, because of the type of work they are in, have to expend money for particular types of protective clothing which are not required elsewhere. For instances, miners underground need hard hats. They need rubber clothing or sweater clothing to keep dry and they are required also by law to have safety-toed or steel-toed boots.

The loggers out in the bush are in the same position. The compensation regulations require them to wear a certain type of boot to log with on the coast. The logger has to have a cork boot. They have to wear hard hats. They also need other extra types of clothing, depending on the weather. Other types of workmen need special types of gloves, depending on the industry in which they are working. Consideration should be given to these factors also, especially when we look at the cost of some of these protective pieces of clothing which are required by law. A pair of logger's cork boots, for instance, which might last, if he is lucky and does not have to wear them in country that has too much rock in it or is too rough, a logging season, costs somewhere in the neighbourhood of $33 to $35 a pair. If, as we gather from newspaper articles, there is a trend by boot manufacturers to increase their prices, the price of cork boots will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $40 a pair. Many people have to get specially made cork shoes because of the impairment they may have in their feet, and so on. The cost of a pair of such shoes may range as high as $50 or $60 and they last probably only for one season.

I think special consideration should be given to those three items. While I have mentioned loggers particularly, I only do so because of familiarity with them and I am not in any way intending to leave the impression that other industrial workers are in a less favourable position. Certainly they have somewhat the same costs for somewhat the same reasons.

This matter has been brought to the attention of the present minister and to the attention of his predecessor. I know that other hon. members are familiar with the problem and have discussed it with other people. It is obvious that no provision is to be made in these amendments but I would certainly appreciate an indication from the minister as to what action he contemplates in this regard and I hope that the action will be more than the usual statement that the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing this resolution I should like to point out that great emphasis has been placed in the last number of years on the field of higher education. In that regard I should like to suggest that because the summer work period for students is short some consideration should be given to exempting them from income tax on their earnings in order to encourage them to work. In other words, we should eliminate any retarding factor with regard to their going to work during the summer holidays. I have discussed this problem with quite a number of hon. members and people attending universities and they feel that some consideration should be given to this particular factor as far as income tax is concerned.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the idea just put forward by the hon. member for Moose Mountain. I know that all hon. members are interested in the subject of higher education. It is not too long ago, in fact earlier this year, that a brief was presented to the government by the Canadian association of medical students and internes in association with the national federation of Canadian university students. As a preamble to the brief the following statement by Dr. J. Cyril James, principal and vice-chancellor of McGill University, is quoted:

> A young Canadian from a family of modest circumstances has less chance of getting a university education today than a youth in any other country with which I am familiar. It underlines the fact that Canadians have fewer opportunities to obtain a university education.

That is a very serious observation, one which I think we have a responsibility to do something about. The brief goes on to give some statistics. It points out that only 7.2 per cent of students of university age in Canada go on to attend university despite the fact that more than 30 per cent of any given age group being deemed suitable university material. The brief sets out that of those who leave school before completing their education fully 50 per cent do so for financial reasons. The brief elaborates on the difficulties students have in earning sufficient money during the summer to pay their expenses and says that about 80 per cent have to have support from their parents or their spouse. They go on to suggest that without any contravention of the British North America Act the Minister of Finance could assist students in obtaining a university education by making certain amendments to the Income Tax Act and providing for certain deductions from taxable income. The five suggestions they make in their brief are:

> 1. The cost of tuition for the student in full time attendance at a Canadian college or university should be deductible from the taxable income of the student or from the taxable income of the person paying this expense, whether that person be parent, guardian or spouse.
> 2. The cost of books and instruments for the student in full time attendance at a Canadian college or university should be deductible from the taxable income of the student or from the taxable income of the person paying this expense, whether that person be parent, guardian or spouse.
> 3. The present amount which a student in full time attendance at a Canadian college or university may earn and still be claimed as an exemption on the income tax return of parent or guardian should be increased from $950 to $1,100.
> 4. The exemption which the parent or guardian of a student in full time attendance at a Canadian college or university may claim, as exemption for the student, should be increased, when this exemption is applicable, to $1,000 from the present $500.
> 5. The spouse of a student in full time attendance at a Canadian college or university should be allowed an exemption of $1000 for the student provided that the student not earn more than $1,100 in which case the exemption would be reduced by the amount earned over $1,100 subtracted from $1,000.

The brief and its recommendations were very carefully thought out by a group of interested students who will themselves reap no benefit but who have at heart the interests of those who will succeed them in academic life. I urge the Minister of Finance to consider these recommendations and to see if he cannot at least accept them partially. I also urge the support of all members of the house, particularly all Progressive Conservative members, for the suggestions put forward in this brief.

On the subject of the changes in taxation, Mr. Chairman, we know that the Progressive Conservative party has always claimed to be consistent in its viewpoint. Therefore I think we might examine the record for a moment to see the nature of their consistency. I have here a document entitled, "What the Progressive Conservative party Stands For." It is a resume of the resolutions adopted by that party at their national convention in December, 1956. Under the heading "Taxation and Trade" the first resolution passed reads as follows:

> The Progressive Conservative party will reduce taxation to a level that will result in a balanced budget and eliminate huge surpluses—

They have certainly eliminated the huge surplus already.

> —of revenue over expenditure to the end that the individual taxpayer will be given relief from the crushing burden he has been carrying and our producers will be enabled to meet competition better in foreign markets through lower prices for their products.

I think the resolution was excellent, and I am sure the Minister of Finance would be well advised to try to live up to it more closely than he has been able to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman tell me whether the document he is reading from is not a secret document?

Mr. Hellyer: I think it has been withdrawn from publication under orders from the present leader of the Progressive Conservative party.

An hon. Member: Let's have a duet.

Mr. Hodgson: Why don't you sing us a song?

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you for the applause. During the election campaign of 1957 the Prime Minister had some other things to say about taxation. The following is part of a report of an address he made in Toronto:

> "It is time", he said, "to take the unrepentant taxmasters off the backs of the Canadian people. . . . The government seems to think it is good for the souls of the Canadian people to overtax them and to have honest Canadians pushed around and pilloried by income tax snoopers. The views of the ivory tower boys seem to be that if you spend your money it makes inflation but if the government takes it from you and spends it, no harm is done."

He went on to say:

> When the Conservative party forms the government of this country a session of parliament will be called to reduce taxation.

An hon. Member: They were.

Mr. Hellyer: Someone said that there was. What is necessary is a postcript to the effect that another session of parliament would be called to put them back up again.

Then, at Quebec on April 27, 1957, the Prime Minister made a statement. The newspaper article reads:

> The Liberal government was concentrating taxing power in Ottawa and if that trend continued it would dilute provincial rights as effectively as if the constitution were amended.
> Mr. Diefenbaker called the Liberal party "the high tax party" and reiterated his promise that a Conservative government, if elected June 10, will call an immediate session of parliament "to reduce such taxation as can be reduced".
> "Don't you think you have been overtaxed long enough by this government?" he asked.

An hon. Member: They must have.

Mr. Hellyer: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian people may feel that they have been overtaxed by the present government, and if the Minister of Finance does not show greater consistency between those views put forth by himself and his leader in the days when they were on this side of the house and those which they are putting forward at the present time on the other side of the house, he can expect the Canadian people to pass the same verdict on his administration that he requested them to pass when we were over there.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think there are a few further observations that ought to be made in connection with the increases in taxes which are now proposed by the Minister of Finance. These increases ought to be related to the situation, as the hon. member for Trinity has just pointed out, described by the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and others concerning the kind of rectification that they would provide if they were given an opportunity of sitting on the ministerial benches.

As the hon. member for Trinity has reminded us, the Conservatives made their appeal to the people in the two last federal elections on the ground that they would provide a reduction in taxation. Undoubtedly that had an important effect on the judgment of the Canadian people. Long before the elections, in session after session, hon. gentlemen opposite complained about the levels of taxation in Canada. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has pointed out that, confronted with the present situation, we should examine the consequences of the administrative policy of the government. The Leader of the Opposition has reminded us of the statement made by the Prime Minister in a recent speech which he made over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television network on Monday, April 20. I remind the Minister of Finance of certain words in that speech which are to be found on page 3 of the text. The Prime Minister said:

> We have put into effect many of the human betterment measures which people have asked for.

Now that, of course, is not an accurate statement. The government did amend certain social welfare legislation, and that is a matter of record. But the fact is that over 90 per cent of the benefits of existing social welfare measures were established by the previous administration under Liberal auspices. It is inaccurate for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that they have put into effect many of the human betterment measures which people have asked for.

Then, the second sentence—

Mr. Nesbitt: We raised the old age pension.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that they did raise the old age pension. Yes, the present old age pension is $55 and hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for $9 of that, while Liberal administrations are responsible for $46. It is true that my hon. friends have raised old age pensions, but it must not be forgotten that if the budgetary recommendations that will shortly be considered by this committee are put into effect, then what this government did when it raised old age pensions is now being taken away by additional taxation which they said was not necessary in order to provide the increases in social benefits.

Then, the Prime Minister goes on to say:

> In total, however, the tax increases are much less than the additional payments to alleviate the effects of the recession.

Then, he says:

> The tax increases in this year's budget are directly related to these human betterment expenditures.

That is not the fact; undoubtedly, some of the tax increases are due to some of the matters relating to programs for human betterment.

Mr. Broome: Such as hospital insurance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Introduced by a Liberal administration, and placed on the statute books of this country by a Liberal administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite are now going about the country, not having provided one single social measure, taking credit for something that was put on the statute books by a Liberal government, and which hon. gentlemen opposed.

Now, the fact is that we are called upon to deal with a proposal for increased expenditures and increased taxes in consequence, expenditures which, session after session, hon. members opposite criticized and said were unnecessary. I regret to say it, but perhaps there was no greater critic of many of these expenditures than the Minister of Finance, who dealt with item after item in the various departmental estimates and complained about the cost of this or that particular item. Yet, what do we find on an analysis of the expenditures proposed in the estimates for 1958-59 as compared with those of 1959-60? I propose to examine a few of these items on a comparative basis to ascertain the extent to which this government, dedicated to the principle of reduction of expenditures and at the same time enthusiastically dedicated to the principle of tax reductions, was able to achieve its stated objective.

The increase in taxes is, first of all, the dominant fact of the moment. In the face of this it will be interesting to examine, as I now propose to do, the extent to which hon. gentlemen opposite, by their administrative policies, have been able to carry out their election promises in regard to these items, as well as the demands which they repeatedly made during the sessions of this parliament over the course of the last decade.

Hon. gentlemen opposite used to complain about the level of professional and special services. The government of Canada was spending too much of the money that parliament was voting on professional services. In the estimates for 1958-59, professional services are 92.9 as compared with the increase in the estimates for 1959-60 to 96.7. In other words, there is an increase in professional services of 3.8 per cent.

Then, when we come to travelling and removal expenses, we find the same thing. Oh, the criticisms that were levelled against every minister who presented his estimates before the period when hon. gentlemen opposite came into office; too much money was being spent on travel by officials, by ministers and by others. Let us examine the situation now. In the 1958-59 estimates the percentage for travel and removal expenditures was 57.7, and in the estimates for 1959-60, they totalled 66.8 an increase of 9.1. This government was going to cut down on travel expenses of all kinds, but the first full year of office the Minister of Finance is estimating for an increase in this particular expenditure of 9.1. Hon. gentlemen are now confronted with a demand for an increase in taxes, and this is one reason, among others, that there is some necessity for the government to impose additional taxation to meet these additional expenditures which hon. gentlemen opposite said they would reduce.

Then we come to postage. We were told that the government would save all kinds of money if it would encourage a policy of thrift in the amount that was spent on postage in all government departments. In 1958-59, 5.9 was spent on postage, and in the estimates for 1959-60, 6.0, an increase is proposed of close to 1 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: Point one per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I said.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, you did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What did I say?

Mr. Macdonnell: One per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I thank the hon. Minister without Portfolio for discharging his without portfolio ministerial duties.

Then we come to exhibits, advertising, films. We all recall how the Minister of Finance used to fulminate on this subject. Too much money was being spent by all government departments on pamphlets and films. A great saving could be effected and consequently taxes would be reduced if only the government did not spend so much on all kinds of pamphlets, films and so on. Well, in the estimates for 1958-59, the figure is 11.8, and the same figure represents the expenditures in the estimates for 1959-60, but there is no reduction, although the Minister of Finance when a private member of this house said that this was one area where much reduction could be effected.

Well do I remember how on one particular night the then Minister of Finance was joined by his colleague and seat mate, the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, when he took up pamphlet after pamphlet of the Department of National Health and Welfare. One which I remember was entitled "Recreation Pays Dividends". That caused much mirth at the time. I do not know whether there has been any reduction in the pamphlets of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am not suggesting that there should be. I believe they were all very useful, but what hon. gentlemen forget is that they said that was one very important place where reductions in expenditure could take place.

Then materials and supplies. Too much was being spent by government departments on materials and supplies of all kinds. The situation in 1958-59 was that the expenditure was 179.5, and in the estimates for 1959-60 it was 181.5, an increase of 2 per cent. No reduction there. Too much money was being spent by the government, we were told by the Minister of Finance, in all kinds of unnecessary maintenance work, repairs and upkeep. In the main estimates for 1958-59 the expenditures represent 165.0, and in 1959-60 these repairs and maintenance charges have gone up to 183.5, an increase of 18.5.

One could go on into various other comparisons to indicate the extent to which pledges made by hon. gentlemen, and demands made by hon. gentlemen when in opposition, are not being implemented by them when they now have the opportunity of so doing. Then of course hon. gentlemen complained about the large numbers of people employed in the public service. Too many people were employed to serve the government of Canada; that was the charge of hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, the number of additional men and women serving in the public service is close to 5,000.

Mr. Benidickson: It is nearer 9,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Close to 5,000 was the last figure I saw, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance says no. It may be higher than that; perhaps I am underestimating.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend never underestimates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister will find one of his colleagues, in outlining during the course of his speech the efficiency of the public service, referred to an increase of something around 5,000. My hon. friend keeps shaking his head; no doubt he will produce the figures. If he cannot produce the figures contradicting this statement, I can only say to him that if there is an increase in taxes it is because this government has not reduced expenditure as it said it would, and on that account, instead of being able to present the people with a promise fulfilled to reduce expenditures, it is called upon to increase taxation as the result of its failure to observe the principles of thrift and economy which it espoused for so many years when it sat on this side of the house.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, after the organ in full symphony I hope you will not mind a toot or two on a whistle! I would like to support very strongly the remarks made by the hon. member for Trinity in relation to some alleviation of or consideration for the problems of people who are going to university, and especially the recognition by the Income Tax Act of the special burdens they have. As I have heard recently about the Conservative party being positive, I thought I would introduce a little of that positive approach into this debate. The only coherent statement I have encountered of the Conservative position today is in the pamphlet "Conservative Concepts", which was published this year and which I hope most of my Conservative friends have read. There appears in this pamphlet a very good article written by an academician, W. L. Morton, called "Canadian Conservatism Now". He stresses a sound philosophy for Conservatism and asks can such a program applicable to present circumstances in Canada be deduced from such an attempt to sketch a Conservative philosophy for our time? He says he believes so, and then lists nine points, and point No. 6 is the one to which I want to draw the particular attention of the Minister of Finance. It is:

> The massive support of the able in education and of research in all fields of knowledge.

At the conclusion of his nine points he says:

> You will note that I do not ask that anyone pass a law, except to reform the Senate. I do ask that Conservatives should have a definite concept of government, that they should endeavour to substitute enlightened administration for hasty law-making, an stop the diarrhoea of legislation which now drains parliament of its vitality.

All we are asking for here is for enlightened administration in so far as income tax allowances for university students are concerned. I hope all hon. members read this pamphlet. It contains, as I say, the only coherent statement of Canadian Conservatism I have ever encountered. The case has already been made to the Minister of Finance in connection with medical students, and I think the national federation of Canadian university students has met the medical students' case in this particular regard. I hope that some time in the next year this what is in effect very small concession in terms of revenue for the crown will be granted. I would hope that some of the younger members on the government side who have spoken up rather boldly for increased aid to education would press this point. I know that most hon. members are probably speaking on this matter in caucus, and if they come out into the open and speak on it here it might have some influence on the minister. I do hope these students will get some assistance in this particular field.

Mr. Winch: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to an item which is small in the over-all budget picture but one which is, nevertheless, important to individuals. It has been brought to my notice by two trade union groups. As the minister knows, if the Minister of National Revenue hopes to collect any income tax from workers. the workers have to receive pay cheques, and there are many workers who must have tools in order to earn pay cheques. Take the situation of a journeyman auto mechanic. He has to have tools worth in the neighbourhood of $500-700. A journeyman electrician must possess equipment worth between $300 and $500 and that is a very large outlay for a working man. These people believe, and I also believe, that consideration should be given to allowing the deduction for income tax purposes of the heavy expenditure necessary on tools, and I hope the minister will see if this can be brought about.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Essex East has put on record some reasons which indicate why we are being asked to increase taxation in the manner shown in the resolutions, and to indicate that this increase is not necessitated entirely by considerations of human betterment as the Prime Minister suggested in his broadcast. There is one other reason why an increase in the income tax is required, and that will be apparent on a comparison of the main estimates of 1956-57, the last full year of Liberal administration, with the main estimates of 1959-60. If hon. members are in a position to look at the sheet entitled "Summary of Standard Objects of Expenditures and Special Categories" which was attached to the estimates and then compare it with the similar sheet attached to the estimates for 1959-60, they will find that the item "Interest on Public Debt etc." has increased by $155,500 million, and that is another explanation of why we are being asked to increase the income tax at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it meets the wishes of the committee I propose to deal now with those points which have been raised before we proceed with the other paragraphs of the resolution under discussion. I think it will meet with the convenience of the house if I deal with the individual points which have been the subjects of questions.

The first point was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to the transportation of persons to and from their places of employment. That point was further developed by other hon. members, and the hon. member for Skeena raised the question in particular as applied to loggers.

I think I may say that all the subjects of these individual questions are matters which have been submitted to the department from time to time and which have been carefully studied by the department. Once in a while, in these debates, some point will arise which is novel, but in the vast majority of cases the points which are, quite properly, raised are matters which have already been submitted to the department for consideration either by hon. members or by interested persons or organizations. I may say in regard to all these matters which have been the subject of questions tonight that they have been studied by the department.

As to requests for further exemptions in particular cases, I simply remind hon. members that in a year when it is found necessary to raise taxes the conditions are hardly appropriate for extending exemptions in individual cases unless those cases are very clear, and I think hon. members will agree that the cases which have been submitted tonight are difficult rather than clear cases. I would say at once that the search for elimination of any discriminatory features in our tax legislature must continue in all circumstances, but while views may differ in regard to some of these individual circumstances, I must say that the type of year we are now facing is certainly not conducive to seeing a clear issue with regard to some of the individual cases which were raised.

As to transportation, in the first place it is very difficult to draw a line. That is a persistent difficulty. One can say in general, or in theory, that if a man lives at a distance from his work the cost of transportation incurred moving to work and back to his home is an expenditure laid out for the purpose of earning his income. But if one examines that situation a little more closely, one finds that this situation applies in a varying degree to practically everyone, and where are we to draw the line? It must be borne in mind, too, that the place of residence is, in the case of most income earners, a matter of choice. One man may choose to live at a distance from his work and he may thereby succeed in lowering his housing costs, but when it is necessary, as it is in tax legislation, to legislate for the generality of cases, the difficulties of trying to introduce exemptions or permit reductions for the purpose of transportation will, I think, be apparent to hon. members, and it will be realized that they present some very thorny problems.

As to the loggers, the hon. member for Skeena acknowledged in his opening remarks that conditions varied in different parts of the country and here again we must legislate for the generality of interest. This is one of the difficulties of any tax legislation; we must always seek to enact rules which are capable of an equitable general application.

As to the loggers, the question was raised, first of all, in reference to transportation. I think I cannot usefully add anything to what I have said already on that matter of transportation. The next point in reference to loggers which was raised by the hon. member for Skeena concerned protective clothing. This has some relationship also to the question of tools which was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Here again, one can theorize and come up with a striking superficial case for an exemption on the ground that a person must have certain types of clothing, or must be equipped with certain tools in order to practise his trade and earn income from so doing. But again I think hon. members will realize on analysis that a thorny difficulty arises over the problem of drawing a line. Everybody owns tools of some kind or another. The people who own tools make use of them. This use may be directly related to earning an income or may be directly related to the saving of expenditure. These tools may be put to a variety of uses. Similarly, in reference to clothing, while it may be possible to theorize about some types of clothing being of a protective nature and not for general use, here again the problem arises as to where to draw the line, because many kinds of what are called protective clothing, whether clothing, shoes or facilities of other kinds, are capable of other uses, either initially or at some stage of their lives. These are just a few of the difficulties one experiences in trying to apply the general rules of taxation to individual cases.

I believe I may lead on from that point to the question that was raised about university students. I may tell the committee that we have received a number of briefs from different groups of university students that do not all ask for the same thing. The hon. member for Trinity read from one brief. We have had other briefs that have submitted requests rather different in scope from the one from which he read.

Let us look in detail at some of these proposals. One was in regard to earnings. We have a problem here, Mr. Chairman. Everybody wishes to see those who are capable of absorbing university education and appreciate it and are prepared to exert themselves for it have the opportunities to obtain that education. In this respect I am simply saying what my predecessors have said on this very subject when it was raised in previous sessions before the change of government. Here I may remind the hon. member for Trinity that he sat on this side of the house supporting a government in which the minister of finance had to face something not unlike what we have had to face in this respect and there were no complaints raised at that time by the hon. member and others of his party when my predecessors in this office were giving reasons why they felt they could not go farther in assisting university students.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister would not want to convey the impression that there were no changes made during that period. There were some concessions made by the former minister in his last budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall touch on those. When the hon. member asks for further changes let me remind him that further changes were rejected by my predecessors. What is the situation in regard to the earnings of university students? In respect of their earnings they are treated like other persons in this country. A single person may have an exemption of $1,100 if he takes the standard exemption for charitable donations and dues within the scope of the $100 exemption. We have been asked to extend that. I might point out that an extension would mean creating a special class of taxpayer. Under our tax legislation it would mean giving to university students a preferred tax position not enjoyed by anybody else in this country so far as income is concerned. This is a matter that is not to be undertaken lightly.

One must face up to this situation. In the case of young persons leaving high school one may go on to university and another may be obliged to go and work for two or three years to earn enough money to assist him through university. Are we then to say that the person who is not in a financial position that would permit him to proceed immediately to a university education should be taxed as much as anybody else but the person who is in a position of being able to go directly to university should as far as his summer earnings are concerned be in a better position than the man who has to go out and earn a living? Those are weighty and serious considerations.

I have received communications proposing that the parents of university students should have some further exemption not extended to any other class of dependents. Here again hon. members are aware that under the Income Tax Act the parent of a university student is permitted to claim the $500 exemption in respect of that dependent university child while attending university regardless of age.

Here again one must look at the class features of a situation of this kind. One does not wish to create discriminations. Here is a parent of a dependent child who is not able to go to university and yet the law says that in that case that parent shall be entitled to a $500 exemption and no more. Is it to be regarded as fair and equitable that the child of a father who is in a position to send him to university should thereby enjoy some higher amount of exemption? It has been proposed that this sum should be increased substantially. I think that hon. members on reflection will realize that much as we wish to see every opportunity extended to university students to obtain their education we must be careful as to the methods we choose to assist them lest we thereby create discriminations and advantages that are of a discriminatory nature. That is something against which we must be on our guard.

As to books, one may say again a university student has to have books but then there are lots of other people in the country who have to have books and they are not entitled to income tax exemption for them.

These are some of the difficulties with which we have been confronted especially in a year when we have been obliged to propose increases in the general rates of taxation. I may say that this is not a new problem nor is it one, I am sure, divorced from the personal experience of a good many hon. members in this committee. A large number have had the experience of being university students themselves and know what this problem is and some have also had the experience of being the parents of university students and know what the problems are in that respect.

The tax position in this respect has been advanced. It is now permitted to any dependent to earn $950 in any year before the parent loses the $500 exemption in respect of that dependent. It is true that there are some university students who under present conditions are able to earn more than $950 in a summer and if they do the parent loses the $500 exemption. If they go further and earn $1,100 or more then they become taxable in respect to the excess over the $1,100. I will say with some assurance, however, looking at my friend and classmate of university days, the hon. member for Essex East, that if we had been able in our summers to earn the sums university students are able to earn today we would have considered ourselves very well off. In those days we did not earn more than a fraction of the sums we are discussing today.

Mr. Pearson: But how high were university fees in those days?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is true that university fees have risen. The cost of education and the cost of maintaining a student at university have risen.

Mr. Hellyer: You are comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to some of the deputations I have received from university student groups I may say that I have been told that they regard it as their right to have such tax advantages extended to them as to enable them to complete their university education out of their earnings and not have any indebtedness in respect of their education at the end of it. I find that a little difficult to follow because I believe the experience of those of us here who were university students, certainly in the days when the Leader of the Opposition was our distinguished lecturer, was that there were not many students then who finished their university course without having incurred some debt which they had to work off in the early days of their earning careers.

I am not making any final statement on this subject but I am pointing out the difficulties which are bound to arise when any proposals are made for extending assistance of a special nature to any particular group, and in this case to the university students, however worthy they may be.

One other matter was raised by the hon. member for Cariboo. It was the subject of clearing brush off the land. This, of course, is an aspect of farm improvement. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that in regard to clearing and brushing farm lands the rule is that the clearing of the land of brush, stones, trees and the like is capital expenditure. These are regarded as permanent improvements to the land and it is for that reason that they are not deducted from income as they would be if they were current operating expenses. This is the situation as it applies to the owner of the land.

The situation is somewhat different with respect to the tenant of land who is clearing it. The tenant who makes such expenditures is in a different position because his expenditure is not of a permanent nature, depending upon the particular circumstances of his tenancy and notably the duration of it. These may be expenses deductible in the year made, or they may be amortized over the term of his lease.

I pass now, Mr. Chairman, to some of the remarks of a more general nature. Here we have for I think the third time a resumption of the budget debate in its main aspects. I would not wish to impose upon the committee a repetition of the remarks I made on Tuesday, April 21, in replying to the main opposition amendment to the budget. These matters were all reviewed there. In the speeches made tonight by the hon. member for Essex East and by the Leader of the Opposition we heard and saw the same old straw being threshed. Nothing new was raised by these members tonight. We went over that in the budget debate in the eight days of speeches, half of which came from the opposition, and again this week we have had a resumption of it in a debate on a supply motion; but hon. members opposite seem to think they establish a point by repeating erroneous statements or incomplete statements, and we have heard a good deal of that tonight.

May I first deal with a question that was seriously asked tonight by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, which was his opening subject. It is the question as to whether the tax increases may not result in some increases in the cost of production. Mr. Chairman, here I draw attention again to the places where these increases, these necessary increases, have been imposed. Hon. members opposite talk about a comparison of the reductions which were made in 1957 and again in 1958 with the increases which are proposed in the present budget. In my remarks on April 21 I drew attention to the fact that the reductions which were proposed and brought about in 1957 and 1958 in terms of today's economy, in terms of today's incomes, in terms of today's numbers of taxpayers, are worth to the taxpayers, not the figure that they amounted to when we introduced them but a larger figure. They are worth today an estimated $230 million. The increase in taxes for the present fiscal year amounts to $245 million, but I draw attention to the places where the reductions were made on the one hand, and the places where the increases were made on the other.

The reductions were made for the purpose of benefiting principally the persons in low income brackets. In December, 1957 the proposed increases in the exemptions for dependent children of family allowance age, were from $150 to $250 per annum. For those over family allowance age the increase in exemption was from $400 to $500 per annum. We reduced the rate of tax on the first $1,000 of taxable income by 2 percentage points: we reduced the rate of tax on the second $1,000 of taxable income by one point. That is where the benefit of the reductions was concentrated. In our reductions of tax on business we concentrated on the small corporations. Then, the other reductions we brought about were brought about on smaller estates, on municipalities, on many other persons or enterprises that hon. members will recall from the reductions of 1957 and 1958.

Now, when in the face of the budgetary situation with which we were confronted, we found it necessary to propose taxes we were careful to propose that those taxes be applied where they would hurt least. That is the reason why in the case of the increases in the income tax we have been careful to propose these only with respect to taxable income in excess of $3,000 per annum; that is to say, in the case of the married taxpayer with dependent children, it means that there will not be a cent of additional income tax unless his income is above, in an average case, $6,500.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will recall that in the budget speech I drew attention to the fact, in a series of illustrations there, that taking the average married person with two dependents, with the decrease in taxes in 1957 and 1958 and the limited increase in 1959, he is better off unless his income is over $7,500 per annum.

In connection with the first paragraph of the resolution for amendment of the Income Tax Act now under discussion, Mr. Chairman, I remind you that the change proposed in this paragraph will have no effect whatever on 3,800,000 of Canada's 4,600,000 income taxpayers. That, I think is, the principal answer to the question of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

It is true that in relation to the proposals we made for augmenting the sources of revenue, the contributions to the old age security fund, the three increases that were proposed of one point on each of the three taxes, personal income tax, corporation tax and sales tax, this does involve an increase of 1 per cent in the tax on the commodities that are subject to the sales tax. But I remind hon. members that this tax was defended by my predecessor, Mr. Abbott, as an eminently fair tax for this purpose.

Mr. Pickersgill: In these comparisons the minister was making between the reductions in 1957 and the increases now did he include the new 1 per cent levy on incomes for the social security tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, they were included, $2.50 per month.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman say then that for three-quarters of the taxpayers and including the social security levy there is no change this year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said they were better off than they were before we came into office back in the dark days when the former government was in office. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised a question also about what we see in the press these days concerning certain increases in prices. It may well be that there are increases in prices being announced now on different commodities that are being associated with—

Mr. Benidickson: Triggered off.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —the increase in the sales tax, but I think that in this regard the hon. member will be fair enough to recognize that the increase in the sales tax warrants an increase of 1 per cent—this is what we are dealing with—as applied to the generality of commodities that are subject to the sales tax, and where increases are being announced these days in excess of that sum, or approximately that proportion, the excess increase is not attributable to the increase in tax.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question? Does he realize that in what he is saying he is not being consistent because when he was on this side of the house he pointed out time and again that when there is an increase at the manufacturer's level the retailer applies a percentage mark-up so that the net result to the purchaser is a greater increase than the amount of the increase in the sales tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is because of that fact that I was careful to add the words I did at the end of my last sentence when I referred to the amount of the tax or that approximate amount. There are mark-ups and that is why I have made allowance for that fact in my answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. But some of the increases I have heard of that have gone beyond this figure obviously are not attributable to the increase in the tax at all.

Mr. Benidickson: But you started them going.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to the other commodity taxes, I think the hon. gentleman will agree that here it is a matter of personal choice whether—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am very sorry but I have to advise the minister that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to ask the minister a question so that he can go on. The question I would ask is this. Does the minister consider—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would assume that the committee is agreeable to the minister continuing.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would much rather hear the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I have a right to ask my question because the minister has exhausted his time and I am a member of the house. I am quite willing to give the minister a chance to speak again by asking a question. My question is this. Does the minister consider that these price increases that were not, as he said, attributable to the tax increase were, in the words of his leader, inexcusable?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would consider as inexcusable any attempt to raise a price and attribute the price increase to the increase in tax where it is not in fact attributable to the increase in tax.

Mr. Benidickson: You predicted this would happen.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall endeavour to be brief with regard to some of the other general assertions made here tonight although I do not think the committee expects me to thresh straw again and again that has already been threshed in the course of the last two and a half weeks of debate in this house.

Mr. Hellyer: Brevity is not one of your many fine qualities.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, I could be briefer if hon. members opposite would not go on repeating the same speeches containing the same old errors all the time. I first of all take up the remark of the Leader of the Opposition that the debt this year is going to be in excess of $400 million. He knows the figure is $393 million.

Mr. Pearson: Leaving out social security.

Mr. Benidickson: Plus $42 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, and the Leader of the Opposition knows very well how that is being handled and that it is completely in keeping with the way my predecessors have done it in certain years when he was a member of a government that did the very same thing.

Mr. Pearson: How many years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman unhappily has forgotten—

Mr. Pearson: No such thing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —some of these things when conditions were comparable, and now that we are moving to put the fund in balance I think he will say, if he will be frank, that this is the proper way to do it and, as I indicated in the budget speech, we will bring the fund into balance within probably the next two and a half years.

Then he talks about the $500 million by way of reductions in expenditures. He had better get his dates straightened out, Mr. Chairman, and be quite frank and forthright with the house with regard to this matter because he has used this figure on several occasions. This goes back to the year 1953 and the general election of that year.

Mr. Pearson: And 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The leader of the opposition of those days, in going into the election campaign, said that if the people would give him a mandate he would bring about a reduction of $500 million in government taxation, and he showed how it could be done. He said it would be done by a reduction of $200 million in the expenditures of the Department of National Defence and $300 million by eliminating these unplanned surpluses. We were told then by the former government that it could not be done and yet within a matter of a year and a half the reduction in the expenditures of the Department of National Defence had been brought about. The very thing that hon. members opposite said could not be done was done and the fact that they were driven to do it proved that we were right in saying what we did. We were asked about additional payments this year. I dealt with that in detail when I replied in the house on April 21 to the opposition amendment on this subject.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to words of the Prime Minister in a television broadcast recently having to do with expenditures made to meet the recession and asked if some meaning should be read into the words "to meet the recession." Everybody here knows that the increases that have been brought about on the initiative of this government with the support of the house in the various rates of social security payments, old age pensions, old age assistance, pensions for the blind, pensions for the disabled, veterans benefits of numerous kinds, have been written into the statutes of the country, and no one is going to take seriously the suggestion thrown out by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pearson: It was not a suggestion; it was a quotation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that there is something sinister about such a reference. These increases have been made part of the statute law of this country and I think the Leader of the Opposition will be fair enough to recognize that. As I pointed out in the budget speech of April 9 these payments, which are of a transfer nature, have contributed very greatly to meeting the recession by stimulating consumer purchasing. Even through the recession consumer purchasing was rising and that has been one of the leading elements among the forces that have brought us through the recession and now have planted Canada's feet firmly on the path of recovery.

Mr. Benidickson: Could I ask the minister a question? On December 6, 1957, when he introduced these increases, did he use the words "possible recession"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Possible recession?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, in December, 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is my friend asking about the word "possible"?

Mr. Benidickson: Or "recession".

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no recession at that time, according to the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were expenditures introduced directly for the purpose of meeting the recession by providing employment. There were increases in these transfer payments, the rates of social security payments, which are designed to assist in meeting problems of persons, principally of very low income, who were the recipients of these pensions. These have greatly assisted in meeting the problem of the recession.

If hon. members opposite are looking for figures, Mr. Chairman, why do they gloss over the figure of $750 million in relation to the housing program? This was a tremendous undertaking through which the government provided funds to assist in the construction of housing in Canada which resulted in the rate of house construction in Canada in 1958 reaching an all-time record.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; the minister has brought into the discussion what I am supposed to have quoted from the Prime Minister's broadcast. He has paraphrased it. I think the exact words should be put on the record so I could not be accused of misrepresenting what the Prime Minister said.

This is the second reference in his broadcast to the purpose of these social security increases, that is to help cure the recession. He said, and I am quoting from the text of the broadcast which the Prime Minister gave. This is the actual text of what the Prime Minister said, and this will appear in the text which I gave to my hon. friend:

> These heavy demands for social and individual security measures to meet the recession effects have resulted in a projected deficit for the current year.

This is an accurate quotation on my part, and the deduction I drew from it I think was quite fair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let there be no doubt in the mind of anyone about the expression used. My quarrel is with the inference or meaning that the Leader of the Opposition is purporting to read into this statement, which I think is quite unjustified. He was good enough to send me his copy of the text. The Prime Minister, on this page which has been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East, has been talking about a great many things. He talks about the big housing program, the $750 million spent on that; he talks about the winter works program; unemployment insurance benefits; human betterment measures; and then he goes on to national health expenditures, welfare and social security payments. He refers to these payments of various kinds about which he has been talking and then he says:

> This will bring the total of human betterment payments this year to more than three times the amount of the tax increases. These heavy demands for social and individual security measures to meet the recession effects have resulted in a projected deficit for the current year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When I was speaking on this subject I drew attention to the fact that we had, even as compared with last year—one does not have to go back to 1956-57, the last full year of the former government—increased very substantially our expenditures on this social security program and human betterment program.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member permit me to ask him to read that sentence in which the Prime Minister attributes the rise in taxes to the government's program of human betterment; that is the sentence about which we are complaining.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend has forgotten the sentence in question. Is it the last one, about the deficit? The Prime Minister said:

> These heavy demands for social and individual security measures to meet the recession effects have resulted in a projected deficit for the current year.

Is that the sentence?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The other sentence is:

> The tax increases in this year's budget are directly related to these human betterment expenditures. In total however, the tax increases are much less than the additional payments to alleviate the effects of the recession.

My hon. friend indicates he would like me to read again the sentence that I just read. It reads:

> The tax increases in this year's budget are directly related to these human betterment expenditures.

Of course, they are related to them. We would not have been confronted with this deficit this year if we had not been making these substantially increased expenditures on human betterment, and because our deficit would have been so large this year we felt, in regard to the general inflationary dangers, it was necessary to budget for a reduction in that deficit. Therefore, we proposed an increase in taxes. The matter is perfectly plain and open for all to see. I am surprised that an acute hon. member like the hon. member for Essex East has somehow or other failed to grasp this. There was a time when the hon. member for Essex East would have grasped the point. He could have done it. I can remember the time when he was not nearly so slow about picking up points as he has sought to impress the house tonight that he is. There were days when he was regarded as a person of somewhat acute intelligence. While I realize that perhaps my hon. friend has not applied that acute intelligence of his perhaps as directly to the problem as he should have, and has not devoted as much time and thought to the problem as he might have—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us stick to the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —nevertheless, I think we will all have to be a little dubious about the show he put on here of not being able to see through this simple equation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister forgotten that these social security increases were made in the autumn of 1957, and the Prime Minister did not discover the recession until he read the hidden report in the house on January 20, 1958?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, these increased benefits for the people of Canada were brought into effect on November 15, 1957, and I think the government can claim some credit for moving swiftly to meet the deficiencies left to us by our predecessors in the matter of the social security program. We have no apology to make for having moved swiftly to remedy these deficiencies.

Mr. Benidickson: Have you any apology for hiding the eventual bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, we have not hidden the bill and therefore we have no apology to make. I leave that to those who hid reports and other interesting things the people of Canada should have had.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I simply remind hon. members of the vast collection of human betterment measures that the government has sponsored. They are referred to in part II of the white paper. The various payments are mentioned, the health grants, hospital construction, health insurance program and many others. I am sure that these meet with the approval of the majority of the members of this house.

Mr. Pearson: Before the committee rises may I, on behalf of the official opposition, express our appreciation to the minister for his patience this afternoon under difficult circumstances of personal bereavement. I should like to assure him of our sympathy. Perhaps I might repeat that we would have been quite willing to agree to a change in the order of business which would have permitted him to be out of the house today. We greatly appreciate his carrying on in the way he did.

Mr. Argue: I should like to add to the words used by the Leader of the Opposition the sincere sympathy of the C.C.F. group on learning of the passing of the minister's brother. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, we were quite prepared to go on with some other order of business. I should like to tell the minister, most sincerely, that our thoughts are with him at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do thank the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia for their very kind words which, I assure them, I deeply appreciate. I should not have risen at this time to say anything, except that I should like to make a matter of record the kindness that was extended to me this afternoon by both hon. gentlemen in expressing their willingness to have the order of business for the day changed to accommodate the circumstances in which I found myself today. This was a willing and voluntary offer on their part and I am very grateful to them for it. In receiving it I did say to them that I felt the business of the house announced last night should not be disturbed, as I had no wish to impose upon the house.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the leader of the house if he could indicate the business for tomorrow; and if he could indicate any of the business for next week it would be appreciated.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with the agricultural estimates and then take those of the Department of Labour. I cannot give the house the business for Monday yet. I will try to let hon. members know tomorrow morning.

At ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 1, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF FIRST JOINT MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. Speaker: May I have leave of the house to table in English and in French the report of the first joint meeting of the group of congressmen, senators and members of the House of Representatives of the United States and of Canadian parliamentarians which was held in Washington on January 9 and 10 last, which group adopted the name "Canada-United States interparliamentary group". Hon. members are familiar in general with what took place, but this report is submitted on behalf of the Canadian group.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I suggest that this report be printed as an appendix to Hansard. I feel it is not out of the way for me to say that you and the Speaker of the Senate and the other hon. members of this committee in co-operation with the representatives of the United States government laid the foundations for a most effective organization for the extension of mutual knowledge and understanding between our countries. Because of the importance of this report I trust that the house will agree with the suggestions I make.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very appropriate suggestion that this report be printed as an appendix to Hansard, dealing as it does with the first meeting of a committee which we hope through its work will make an effective contribution to better relations between our two countries.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that this report be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of document above referred to, see appendix, pages 3272-4.]

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

STATEMENT ON CHANGES IN U.S. ARMED FORCES PROCUREMENT REGULATIONS

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on "buy American" regulations. As a result of our discussions with United States authorities regarding production sharing, the United States government has now made important changes in its armed services procurement regulations. These changes relate to the application of the buy American act to United States defence purchases in Canada. Their effect will be to give Canadian defence industry a much greater opportunity to share in the production of military equipment for the United States armed forces.

Under the new regulations the three United States services have adopted a common approach, and Canadian businessmen will no longer need to keep themselves informed on three different interpretations of the buy American act.

The key provision of this new approach is that Canadian supplies which relate to specific programs of mutual interest to the two governments will be exempt from all the limitations which are normally imposed under the buy American act. Canadian proposals to supply these goods to the United States services will be accepted on the same basis as American bids, giving Canadian sources an equal opportunity with American sources to compete for these orders.

The programs and equipment to which this total exemption will apply are being identified by the United States services in close consultation with my own officials. They will be designated in lists which will be issued by each of the services individually. It is our expectation that these lists will encompass such a wide range of items that Canadian defence industry will find ample scope to participate. These lists will be kept open, and it is the intention that they should be modified from time to time on the basis of continuing consultation.

Canadian manufacturers who are interested in supplying products which are not on the exempt lists will also find their opportunities improved under the new regulations. Canadian tenders or proposals to supply such goods have usually, in the past, been subject to the addition of several percentage differentials in the comparison of bids. Henceforth only the United States tariff will be added to a Canadian bid where non-exempt items are involved.

A third feature of the new regulations is that the total exemption from the buy American restrictions will also apply to any component parts of the equipment included in the exempt lists. This means that Canadian manufactures of such components, including a large number of our smaller industries, may find opportunities for taking part in these programs regardless of whether the prime contracts are awarded to Canadian or American firms. Canadian manufacturers of components may in fact find opportunities for sales to United States contractors even outside the range of exempt equipment. Under the regulations any United States defence contractor supplying non-exempt goods may buy up to 50 per cent of the material content of those goods from Canada and still enjoy the status of a domestic source.

I regard these new regulations as further evidence of the growing co-operation between Canada and the United States in defence production sharing, and welcome the promise they give of a greater share for Canadian defence industry in programs designed for our common defence.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members of the house will have listened with great interest to the statement made by the minister, and will hope that the changes which have been made in the regulations will work out in practice so that Canadian industry will be able to share in the production of military equipment for the United States armed forces, as I understand from the minister is intended. Perhaps this statement may serve to remove some of the anxiety created by certain statements from Washington by members of the administration there, that this sharing was to take place only in respect of the production of military equipment for use by United States armed forces in Canada.

Perhaps I might also add, Mr. Speaker, that this change underlines the desirability of following up these matters in Washington through appropriate agencies of the Canadian government there. The minister will no doubt recall that in former years there was a special office for the purpose attached to the Canadian embassy, I think, in Washington, and this change underlines the importance of facilities of that kind in Washington which can be of great assistance to Canadian industry.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, any move that will bring about an increased proportion of defence production orders for Canadian firms is, of course, welcome. The value of the changes that have been made will be known only in the course of time. Whether or not Canadian firms, being much smaller than United States firms, will in fact be able to compete on an equal basis is something that we shall have to determine in the light of events in the future. We would prefer some general arrangement whereby Canadian industries would be assured a proportionate share of production orders, and we hope that the relaxation of these restrictions will lead to that end.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. The minister told us this morning that the exemptions from the buy American act would apply to specific requirements of mutual interest to the two governments. My question is this. Who will determine which projects are of mutual interest to the two governments?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): As I said in the statement, Mr. Speaker, members of the defence department in the United States with officials of my department.

PENITENTIARY ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR USE OF DORMITORIES BY INMATES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-42, to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the relevant section of the Penitentiary Act that the bill seeks to amend is subsection 4 of section 66, which says that every inmate "shall, except in case of sickness, be kept in a cell by himself at night." There is no provision in the act to vary this arrangement, but for quite a number of years now the arrangement has been varied and dormitories have been in use in our penitentiaries. The amendment merely seeks to give the minister and the commissioner of penitentiaries statutory authority to do what they have been doing for the past number of years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO LIMITATIONS ON FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat a question which I asked the Prime Minister yesterday and which no doubt he then took as notice. In the discussions leading up to the removal of restrictions on imports of Canadian oil into the United States have any undertakings, formal or informal, been given by the Canadian government that would in any way limit Canada's freedom of action in regard to the importation of oil from Venezuela and the movement of oil from western Canada to eastern markets in the future?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is a simple negative; no.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and I certainly apologize for sending him notice late. That was occasioned by my attending two steering committees and the inspiration coming somewhat late in the morning. In view of the reported remarks of the Prime Minister in the Gazette of April 30 when replying to the brief on human rights presented by the association for civil liberties and 33 national and regional organizations, which report reads as follows:

He said those who are "loud in their protestations" for a constitutional amendment belong to "the group" who never brought before parliament the United Nations declaration of human rights between 1948, when it was adopted, and 1957.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I raise this point of order hoping for some assistance as to whether it is regular to ask a question of this kind on a matter which is on the order paper for debate in the near future.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, you misunderstood my question. That is not it at all. In view of the Prime Minister's 1948 criticism of the former Liberal government and its failure to bring the United Nations declaration of human rights before parliament—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: —would the Prime Minister inform the house when he intends to remedy his long-standing grievance in this respect?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the bill of rights legislation is before the house the whole question can be discussed, and I think the answer will then be apparent.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER MEETINGS WITH WESTERN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, notice of which was sent to him earlier. Will the Prime Minister tell the house if any further meetings have been arranged between the government and representatives of the western farm delegation that came to Ottawa on March 10 last? If not, can the Prime Minister say why not and, if so, can the Prime Minister indicate when such a meeting will be held and what is the intended purpose of the meeting?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the liaison committee of the various organizations which were joined together in the representations made here some time ago has been in touch with the government in order to have another meeting with representatives of that committee to consider further the views then expressed, and to discuss certain other matters of interest to western agriculture. It has now been agreed that the government will meet with these representatives on Tuesday, May 26.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether the proposals made in the original brief presented on March 11 are still under consideration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the liaison committee intends to discuss certain questions that were raised at that time when it meets with the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that, after a long time, the innocuous white paper has now been filed, can he inform us when his estimates are coming before this house?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my estimates will be brought before the house at a time which is convenient to the leader of the house.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the leader of the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question should originally have been addressed to the leader of the house. If he wants to repeat it I daresay he will get the same answer.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, that shows the ineptitude of the government. May I now address my question to the leader of the house. In view of the fact that the white paper on defence has now been filed, is the house leader in a position to inform us as to when he anticipates calling the estimates of that department?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a good deal depends on how many speeches the hon. member makes in the next few days.

NATIONAL REVENUE

BOUNDARY BAY, B.C.—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL CUSTOMS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): With increased travel from Vancouver to United States points, can the Minister of National Revenue say whether arrangements have been made to provide additional customs service at Boundary Bay during the summer months? I understand that the office at this point is closed late in the evening at the present time.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and others have spoken to me about this matter. We discussed it last week, and I can tell him that as a result of these discussions and discussions with officials of the department, arrangements have been made to have the office open on the highway at Boundary Bay from May 15 to September 15 on a 24-hour basis. The office at the Bay itself will be operated during the usual hours and will close at eleven o'clock.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE ON MANUFACTURE OF SMALL CARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he can now tell the house what decision the government has reached with regard to the proposals made by the united automobile workers urging the government to enter into discussions with the Canadian automobile industry for the purpose of seeing whether or not it is disposed to manufacture small cars in Canada rather than in another country, thereby giving additional work to Canadian workmen?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No decision on this matter has as yet been reached.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope it will soon be reached.

[Mr. Winch.]

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

R.C.M.P. REINFORCEMENTS, NFLD.—PROTESTS OVER FEDERAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On April 23, over a week ago, I asked the Prime Minister how soon he hoped to be in a position to comply with an order of the house asking for certain communications which have been addressed to him with respect to the mounted police in Newfoundland. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> I shall certainly have that looked into, Mr. Speaker.

I wonder if the Prime Minister can now indicate when the return can be expected.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry I cannot answer definitely. Just as soon as the hon. member brought this to my attention I asked for immediate action. I must say I expected that by this time these communications would have been available. I will make another try.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Justice about a similar order to which he was asked to make a return?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that there was a great deal of correspondence about this matter, both unfavourable and favourable, and the reproduction of the correspondence with the limited staff available in the minister's office will take an appreciable time. We are doing our best to comply with the order of the house at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, sir, the motion asks only for the protests—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and while no doubt the hon. gentleman would like to produce other correspondence, I suggest he comply with the order of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point of order has not arisen as yet.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

10. Agricultural Stabilization Act administration, $103,710.

Mr. Argue: Vote No. 10 is for the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I have had produced for me some statistics as to the quantity of agricultural products being held by the board under this act. I am wondering if the minister could produce for the committee the quantities of various products that are presently being held by the board. There are some very substantial quantities, representing some $70 million or thereabouts as at the end of December. I wonder if the minister has some up to date figures, and whether he could tell the committee just what position the board is taking so far as the disposal of these various products is concerned.

Mr. Harkness: The latest figures I have in my folder are those I had for the information of the committee some three weeks ago. This particular return was dated April 6, and as of that time the amounts of commodities held by the board were as follows: butter, 50,400,000 pounds; dry skim milk, 64,010,000; eggs, in shell, 154,000 cases; B.C. tomatoes, 86,000 cases; raspberries, B.C., frozen, 2,900,000 pounds; raspberries, B.C., in SO_2, 291,000 pounds; hogs, pork cuts, 48,100,000 pounds.

Mr. Argue: There seems to have been a huge increase in the quantity of shell eggs on hand as compared with December 31. The record I have for December 31, 1958, shows the board held 3,108 cases of shell eggs at that date. The minister now says the quantity has risen to 154,000 cases. I wonder if he could give us the quantity of shell eggs held by the board a year ago? In other words, could he give us some idea whether or not this is an abnormal quantity which is being held at this time?

The quantity of pork products on hand on December 31, 1958, was 8,405,251 pounds. If I understand the minister correctly the quantity on hand today is in excess of 48 million pounds, an increase of six times in a period of a very few months. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the reason for this tremendous accumulation of pork products, and say whether this is the reason the government is changing its buying supports. Does the government feel that the board has now on hand an unumanageable quantitiy of pork products; can he explain whether this quantity of 48 million pounds may be increased in the near future, and can he also tell the committee what method the government intends to adopt in order to dispose of it?

Mr. Harkness: As far as eggs are concerned, we have just in the last month or a little longer come into the heavy production season. This is the period of the year during which we are taking the surplus off the market and when we are required to buy eggs. During the fall and winter months production is, of course, down, and we are not required to buy, in normal circumstances at least. As far as a comparison with last year is concerned, egg production has increased quite materially. We have not the figures showing by what percentage production has increased this year over last year, but it is up by a considerable amount. Thus we have been buying more eggs this year than we were buying last year.

As far as pork cuts are concerned, the hon. member is aware, of course, that during recent months we have had the heaviest run of hogs on the Canadian market that we have ever had in peacetime, almost as high as we had during the war, in 1944, when the raising of hogs was being encouraged by every means possible in order to produce food for Britain and help the war effort. The result of this extremely heavy run of hogs has been a great deal more pork coming on the market than the market could absorb, and thus we have been obliged during recent weeks to buy heavily in order to maintain the support price of $25 a hundred. The run will now, of course, begin to slow down, and during July and August we should be able to dispose of some of the pork we now hold.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could comment on the quantity of eggs which the board now holds and say whether it poses great difficulties for the board. The floor prices on eggs, in my opinion are very low, particularly when the producer is a long distance from the central markets, and when farmers are unable to take their eggs directly to a candling station the prices paid to producers are very low. As a consumer, during the session in Ottawa I find that grade A large are usually between 55 cents and 60 cents a dozen. However, the farmers in my constituency are selling fresh ungraded eggs at between 18 cents and 20 cents a dozen. There certainly seems to be something wrong with our whole pricing and transportation policy when the producers in one area are getting only 18 cents a dozen and the consumers in another are paying three times that sum.

I hope that at the very least the government will maintain the floor price on eggs. We are seeing a very substantial erosion of the floor prices under this act as is clear from recent announcements. The trend now seems to be toward lower support prices, and I should appreciate any assurance the minister can give me that the surplus of eggs on hand is not unmanageable and that at least for the next 12 months, or for a given period, the present floor price will be the minimum.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member is well aware, I am not in a position to give any assurance of the kind he has just mentioned. When the support price on eggs is decided it will be announced in the house, and that will be in a week or so. As I say, I am not in a position to announce it now. I may say that the advisory committee to the stabilization board met yesterday and is meeting again today, and eggs happen to be one of the things they are considering and with regard to which we will be getting their advice. That will be today, I imagine.

The price for the coming year will be announced in the house some time next week, I expect, or at least in the week following.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Assiniboia made a statement which I think can only mislead the poultry industry. I am not saying he intended to do that, but that could be the only possible result. I am referring to his statement that there must be something wrong with the system when producers are getting 18 cents a dozen and consumers are paying 50 cents a dozen.

The main thing to remember is that these are not the same eggs, not the same graded eggs. The producer in Saskatchewan is getting 30 cents a dozen for his grade A large eggs, and we are buying those eggs in Montreal and Toronto, packed in wooden cases and so forth at 44 cents a dozen, with appropriate differentials on account of freight to other points. In any event, the producer of these large eggs is getting 30 cents a dozen, and these eggs are selling, as the hon. member mentioned with regard to his experience in Ottawa, at prices from 50 cents to 55 cents a dozen.

Those are grade A large eggs. The eggs which are sold in Saskatchewan at 18 cents a dozen are ungraded, as the hon. member said, and in a very large number of cases they contain a considerable proportion of grade B eggs, cracked eggs and so on I might add that for grade B eggs there is, in effect, no real market in Canada; the producers have to take more or less what anybody will give them. Bakers buy them for use in bakery products, but there is really no market which will give any return for them.

In Saskatchewan, unfortunately, the proportion of eggs which meet grade A standards is very small in comparison with other provinces. I do not have the exact figures here but I know, speaking from memory, that in the eastern provinces grade A eggs constitute 90 per cent and upwards of the total production whereas in Saskatchewan they run at 50 per cent and in some cases at only 25 per cent. Therefore the people who deliver eggs of poor quality really have no right to complain when they do not receive grade A large prices, because they are producing a different grade of egg altogether.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could say what regulations are in effect to assure the producer that he is being paid a price based on an accurate grade. I have seen in the newspapers instances where people in western Canada have purchased eggs out of the packing company warehouse, and for example cases of grade A eggs have been resold to the very same company and the majority of eggs have been graded as B, C or rots.

I have often said this and I repeat it now; that no matter what criticism one makes from time to time of our method of handling grain there is at least a good grading system and the producer has some protection. What protection is there for the egg producer when he ships a case of eggs? Where is the assurance that he is not being deprived of a price for his eggs based on the minister's floor price because his eggs have been undergraded? Is there any policing arrangement? Are there inspectors to make certain not just that the board buys eggs of the proper grade but that the producer is given an accurate grade and is paid whatever price there may be, low as it is?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we have inspectors who inspect regularly all of the egg grading stations in Canada. Very seldom do they find that eggs are being improperly graded. Of course there are bound to be some cases where eggs have been improperly graded just as there are cases where people complain that their wheat has been improperly graded, and so on. The number of cases that our inspectors find in which eggs are being improperly graded is very small.

We have had complaints along the line the hon. member mentioned. I have had several people write and tell me that this is what happened. However, I have yet to receive what you might call conclusive proof adduced in connection with this matter though, as I said, there is no question but that mistakes are bound to be made sometimes. At a particular egg grading station eggs might be consistently undergraded for a time, but our inspectors inspect regularly and find very few cases of this type.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, when an egg buying firm undergrades eggs, does it break any Canadian law? Could the minister reply to my question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: What law?

Mr. Harkness: The provincial grading legislation and our federal Agricultural Products Standards Act.

Mr. Argue: Has there ever been a prosecution under the federal standards act for the improper grading of eggs and, if so, when?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that action would be taken under the provincial statute.

Mr. Argue: There is the trouble, you see. The taxpayers of this country put up the money to keep a floor price under eggs and this government is doing what the former government did in this field and about which the Conservative members criticized them most strongly namely providing a floor price to the packers rather than to the producers of eggs. Under the policy of this government the packing companies in some instances, I would suggest on the face of the minister's statement, are undergrading eggs. These companies are underwritten by the taxpayers, and the producer has no recourse under any federal statute. He cannot claim against the packer who is beating and gypping him as far as egg grades are concerned.

Mr. Lambert: That is a serious accusation.

Mr. Argue: That is not a serious accusation but a statement of fact. I have had many businessmen in our communities bring to me local receipts which showed that a very insignificant percentage of eggs are being graded A, a ridiculously low percentage. While there may be producers of eggs who are not as careful as they should be and who do not produce anywhere near the 90 per cent of grade A eggs which the minister says are produced in the province of Ontario, nevertheless I do not believe that when a local dealer is handling hundreds upon hundreds of cases of eggs there could possibly be an almost absence of grade A eggs. As the minister has stated, there is no recourse under the law by which the producer can make a claim for proper egg grading and proper prices.

I brought to the minister's attention on a previous occasion the alleged combine by the western egg producers' association. I was pleased that steps were taken at least with respect to grade A extra large eggs to provide that the packers should pay on any eggs that are graded A extra large the support price that was intended. I hope the minister, instead of taking offence at what I have been saying, will look into the question and see whether or not penalties could be provided under the stabilization act or some other legislation that would assure that the floors that are paid from the national treasury result in fair prices being paid to the producers.

This kind of situation does not apply to grain. A farmer may believe that the grade he receives is wrong. He has the right to send a sample to the board of grain commissioners which will give him the correct grade, and it is the obligation of the elevator companies to buy the grain at the official grade set by the board. There should be some kind of tribunal or board to which farmers could send their eggs in cases of dispute for a proper and official grading. I am convinced that if this were available to the producer of eggs the companies that I suspect are undergrading eggs in many instances would give the producer an accurate grade.

Not only do we have an interest as members of parliament in seeing that people are paid on the basis of accurate grades, but we have a second interest in seeing that the floor price legislation under which certain federal moneys are paid results in the greatest possible benefit to the producer and not to any organization that is buying and selling eggs.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think there is any real difficulty as far as I have been able to determine with respect to the grading of eggs. What the hon. member has just been asking should be available and in effect is available. If a producer is not satisfied with the grade he is getting on his eggs he may call on our inspector. Our inspector will check those eggs and how they are graded on a regular basis at the request of the producer. While there may have been a few cases of this sort I believe they are few. Those who offend are prosecuted under the standards act and under the provincial legislation. Our inspectors also act as inspectors under the provincial legislation. If they find contraventions they report to the attorney general of the province concerned.

The things the hon. member has requested already exist in large part in effect. In addition the farmers of western Canada who make these complaints have it within their own hands to a very large extent to ensure that they get reasonable treatment by changing the management of their own farm co-operatives, because the great bulk of the eggs in western Canada are handled by the co-operatives, and if the farmers who deal with them and who belong to them are not satisfied with the way in which their eggs are being graded by these co-operatives what they should do is change the management.

Mr. Argue: Now that the minister has his officials in front of him I would like to get from him the percentage of eggs purchased from co-operatives in the prairie provinces as compared with the percentage of eggs purchased from non-co-operatives.

Mr. Harkness: We have not the exact figures here, but my officials tell me that it would be at least 60 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): About 60 per cent comes from commercial units; is that not the situation?

Mr. Harkness: Sixty per cent is handled by those co-operatives.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. I have here a statement by Mr. Pearsall in a speech which he delivered before the dairy council on September 30 in which he said, speaking of the difficulties of establishing floor prices, "admitting of course that the cost of production is an important factor in establishing such prices". Then he goes to say that this is not the only criteria and he observes at least 60 per cent of Canadian eggs come from commercial units.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, but that is for Canada as a whole. We are talking about the prairie provinces, where the bulk of the eggs is handled by farmers' co-operatives.

Mr. Argue: I hope the officials, either through the minister or privately, can give me the exact proportion of eggs which are handled by the various co-operatives.

Mr. Harkness: I shall be glad to have the officials assemble the information and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister. I do not think it is an answer, though, to say that the farmers have it in their own hands to support their co-operatives or to change their management if they are not satisfied with what is being done. Co-operatives serve a very useful purpose, but a co-operative organization is not a substitute for a general system of fair grades outlined in a federal statute and enforced by federal law. We would not be happy at all as producers on the prairies if we had to depend entirely for our grades on the fact that we have one of the best co-operative marketing organizations in the world. Because those organizations are composed of human beings, they have their difficulties, and there are many disputes between agents of co-operatives and the producers who own the co-operatives.

What we need is a system of grades that is properly enforced. The minister can give all the excuses he likes about there not being any system of grades and that these eggs are sold on an ungraded basis, and he can say that the producers on the prairies and the producers in Saskatchewan have not the facilities and the trained personnel and perhaps do not take the same care as producers of eggs in some other provinces do. But I think it is something of a disgrace to our system of handling eggs in this country that producers are in fact paid 18 cents a dozen for what are very good eggs and the consumer has to pay 55 cents or 60 cents a dozen in other parts of Canada. There are many people living in the cities on the prairies who will travel 50 or 100 miles to buy the ungraded eggs to which the minister and I have referred in order to make the great saving that exists between the price paid to the producer and the price paid by the consumer.

The minister has said that the quantity of hogs coming on the market in Canada is larger now than at any time during the war.

Mr. Harkness: No, I did not say that. I said it was larger than at any time in peace time, and was getting up toward being as high as in the very high delivery period in 1944, during the war.

Mr. Argue: I think that is what I said.

Mr. Harkness: No, you said that I said it was higher than during the war.

Mr. Argue: No. I withdraw that; it is not what I meant to say.

Mr. Harkness: That is what you did say.

Mr. Argue: I meant to say it was higher than at any time since the peak during the war. The minister now says it is the highest of any marketing during peacetime. The legislation under which hog prices are supported is an act to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities. Section 2, subparagraph (i) outlines the various commodities as follows:

> 2. (1) In this act,
> (a) "agricultural commodity" means
> (i) any of the following commodities produced in Canada, namely, cattle, hogs and sheep; butter, cheese and eggs; and wheat, oats and barley not produced in the designated area as defined in the Canadian Wheat Board Act; hereinafter called "named commodity";

Section 8 of the act outlines how the base price will be established. It reads as follows:

> (1) In each year the board shall establish the base price for each agricultural commodity, or the grade, quality, variety, class, type or form thereof, the price of which is to be stabilized under this act.
> (2) The base price of an agricultural commodity shall be the average price at representative markets as determined by the board for the 10 years immediately preceding the year in which the base price is established.

My point is this. The minister has decided that the guaranteed price for hogs shall come down to the minimum provided in this act beginning October 1. The government has further decided that this price shall be guaranteed to the producers by using the technique of deficiency payments. The matter I wish to draw to the minister's attention is that part of his statement wherein he said that very large commercial producers of hogs would not be guaranteed this floor price under the act. The minister is going to define as very large corporations, I take it, something we ordinarily call vertical integration.

I am not disagreeing with the policy—I want to make that clear—as far as removing any guarantee to huge corporations that may be producing hogs is concerned; but from a reading of the act it would seem to me that this would require a change or an amendment to the act before it could be done. As I read the act—and I am asking the minister for his comments; I am not a legal expert and I may be in error in my reading of the act—it says that there are certain named commodities for which floor prices shall always be guaranteed. There are nine of them. One of the main commodities is hogs.

Further on the act sets out how these floor prices shall be established. They are established by a particular formula, and the minister has said that by applying that formula the guaranteed price will be $23.65 per hundredweight, basis Toronto and Montreal. My point is this. If under the act a particular commodity has to be guaranteed, and if under the act it is to be guaranteed at a certain price, is it not beyond the power of the minister and the government under the act as it now stands to withhold that guaranteed price from certain producers for certain reasons?

I would like some comment from the minister. I would think a better way to do it than by regulation, if that is a legal way, would be to have a proper amendment to the act. As I said, I do not object to the general principle the minister outlined in his statement on future policy, but I am wondering whether or not this act will require an amendment in order for it to be done legally under it.

Mr. Harkness: I had the same doubts in my mind as to whether or not this could be done under the act, so I referred the matter to the Department of Justice. I have received opinions that it is possible to do this under the act as it stands. However, I have referred the matter to justice again to make absolutely sure that this is the case. If there is any question from the legal point of view with regard to the power to do this under the act as it stands I will, of course, bring in an amendment to the act, but the advice I have had so far is that this can be done under the act as it stands.

Mr. Argue: What worries me about this particular point is that if it is considered to be legal by the Department of Justice then it will be left in the hands of the minister, the department and the board to decide on what quantities the guaranteed prices set forth in the act will be paid. There may not be any argument raised in the house when the minister decides the formula on which the floor prices will be paid and the people who are to be excluded, but if the principle is established that the department can remove any particular quantity of agricultural products from the mandatory provisions of the act does that not leave a gaping hole in the act, and may it not lead to the removal of the very guarantees that we expected the act to provide?

I do not know what the minister intends to do, and I am certain he will not do what I am about to suggest because I have more faith in him than to think he would. But let us suppose that at some time a minister of agriculture and the department should say, "We will not pay the floor price to any producer who sells more than 50 hogs." For all practical purposes, except to the extent of a tiny relief payment, the basic guarantees of the act would then have been removed. In my opinion the language of the act is clear that nine commodities shall be guaranteed, and that the floors under these commodities shall be guaranteed by means of a certain formula.

I do not know whether the provisions of the act allow the department to remove certain quantities of these products from the application of the act, but I would think the Department of Justice would be taking a cautious and correct view if it said that the named commodities in the act must stand, that the floor prices set forth in the act must stand, and that any changes for the purpose of restricting payments to certain organizations or people should be made by amendment of the act which would bring before the House of Commons the exact policy the government has in mind.

I will be the first to support any amendment which will remove from the provisions of the act the big packing companies that may be going into the production of hogs and the corporations that are going into farming, but I will oppose any amendment to the act that does not allow a bona fide farmer operating a family farm unit to engage exclusively in the production of hogs and have his full production as an individual producer guaranteed under the act. The vertical integration that is taking place in this country is bringing about a collectivization of Canadian agriculture that could be just as bad as the collective farms in the Soviet union as far as the restriction of the freedom of individual producers is concerned.

Mr. Bigg: We are glad to hear that.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend says he is glad to hear that. I am not glad to have to say it because—

Mr. Bigg: What about your remarks about Soviet Russia?

Mr. Argue: Whenever my hon. friend agrees with me I appreciate his support, but I do not think that having our agricultural production in huge units and making hired employees out of people who would ordinarily be farmers will help the person who is a hired employee or help the consumers of this country. The people who complain about paying support prices to the agricultural producers, the people who say they are handouts, that they are give-aways and that we should stop subsidizing inefficient farms and producers, should bear in mind that under existing conditions consumers are getting food at relatively low prices so far as the return to the producer is concerned. The time when consumers will be forced to pay fantastic prices will be, if it is allowed, when vertical integration takes place and the great monopolies and big chain food stores have corralled the production facilities and extended their growing monopoly of the retail business to agricultural production. At that time the prices of food will go through the roof.

I have seen agricultural producers operating their businesses. I have seen big units trying to operate in the production of food. I have seen the huge retail chain stores with their tremendous parking lots and other facilities, and I am convinced that if the individual proprietor is efficient and is given a chance, if he is not elbowed out of existence, he will compete successfully with these giant corporations at every turn. I think the individual unit is the most efficient. I appreciate that the minister has referred this matter to the Department of Justice, and I hope the government and the Department of Justice will have a very careful look at the act and will not make any decision that will provide an escape hatch whereby the basic floor prices under the act can be taken away from those producers who, when the act was originally introduced, we were told deserved protection.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take much time on this item. We have just listened to a great blast on agriculture in general and the stabilization act in particular. I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia and have tried to follow his line of reasoning, but the only conclusion I can come to is that he was throwing a bunch of figures and facts in the air and trying to create the biggest muddle, the biggest jumble, he could for those who are trying to administer the act and provide some concrete benefits under it for the small farmers in particular.

On the one hand he stated that he does not want to see any support given to those producers who are taking any part in vertical integration. I gather that under no circumstances does he want to see them supported. Yet he has stated that he does not want to see any limit placed on the number of hogs.

Mr. Argue: From an individual producer.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He has not suggested what the number of hogs should be or given the minister any advice as to what the limit should be on the number of hogs with respect to which the support price should be paid. He has not said that because he does not want to help anybody in bringing about beneficial legislation. He has stated, and this came as a surprise to me, that he has a deadly fear of the farms in western Canada turning into nothing more than collective farms. This has surprised me, coming from a C.C.F. member, because such a statement is a far cry from the Regina manifesto, as I understand it.

Mr. Argue: Oh, go soak your head.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): As I said, the hon. member has offered no solutions to the problem. He has just thrown out a bunch of figures and tried to muddle the issue. I sincerely hope that too much weight will not be given to his remarks because, as I have said, he reached no conclusions; he tried to benefit no one, and just left himself in a position from which he could attack anybody or anything.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to be as brief as possible, but I do want to say a few words in connection with the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) at the close of last Friday's debate.

Speaking of agriculture in the province of Quebec in particular—since he was answering my questions—the Minister of Agriculture said:

> If I may say a word with regard to this question of putting price supports under poultry, particularly broiler chicks in which, I think, the hon. member is particularly interested, I would point out that this is just not a practical possibility. I do not look upon the production of these broilers as a real farm operation, because it is really a factory operation. It does not require a farm. It does not require even a rural atmosphere. It can be carried on in the middle of a city. A man puts up a building, buys several thousand chicks and then feeds them up to three and a half pounds or so. Along those lines he can turn out birds by the thousand every week. It is not a farm operation at all; it is a production line operation, and because practically no ground is required it is the type of operation which can lead to almost unlimited production.

This statement by the Minister of Agriculture about the Canadian poultry industry, especially in eastern Canada since the broiler industry is centered chiefly in Ontario and Quebec, which accounts for more than 50 per cent of the whole Canadian production, —is illogical.

It was a bit of a shock to me to hear the Minister of Agriculture make such a statement, in the wake of what has been said by economists and people interested in Quebec farming. I was shocked, and that is why, in stating the case for Quebec farmers, I want to say that the poultry industry of that province, as indeed in Ontario, is a sector of family farm activity. If the Quebec poultry industry is destroyed, part of the farmers engaged in that industry will be wiped out.

On family farms, there are various types of production and poultry raising is a very valuable branch of it, because it can be left in the care of the farm youngsters or even the farmer's wife. However, under present conditions, it can be said that poultry raising has practically disappeared from family farms, because the trend is to integration. Protection is being afforded not to the farmers, but to integrators, as I said last week, and as the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has just said again today. However, Quebec farmers do not take the same view of the problem as the Minister of Agriculture. So on September 11, 1958, a farm delegation called on the minister to tell him of the plight of the poultry industry, and in its brief, it was stated that Canada had imported three million pounds of poultry from the United States, with a consequent drop in the price of poultry.

The brief further stated that the price of poultry, which was 24 cents a pound in June 1958, was down to 20 cents a pound in early September, because of larger imports of U.S. poultry. That was why farmers submitted a brief to the department, asking for greater protection for Canadian poultry producers and for a review of the customs tariff. In any case, the delegation recognized that it was difficult to change our customs tariff without inviting reprisals on the part of the United States. In the same brief, the farmers made the following suggestions to the hon. minister:

> In the meantime, as an emergency measure, we would suggest that you place temporary restrictions on U.S. import of chicken, with a floor price of about 16 cents a pound (live weight). A price of 16 cents would not be such as to encourage production, nor would it force the Canadian government to buy considerable quantities of chickens to take care of the possible surplus production.
> On the other hand, we are convinced that control on imports of chicken, similar to that which exists at present with regard to turkey meat, would result in no scarcity of chicken which might be detrimental to consumers, since for the forthcoming months, at least, production will surely be sufficient to meet market requirements.

Mr. Chairman, I think this request by farmers was quite logical. They were asking for a control on chicken imports, similar to that on turkey imports.

Fairly recently, on February 11, 1959, the farmers of my constituency—and I know that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has received many requests from farmers making representations similar to those made by the delegation which came to Ottawa on September 11, 1958—have asked for a tariff revision, as well as for the establishment of a control on imports of poultry meat.

It seems to me that the latter request is quite justified because last year we imported 6.2 million pounds of chicken, large and small, compared to 1.4 million pounds in 1957, that is five times more than the previous year. Those massive imports have caused an alarming drop in prices of Canadian chicken. They contributed to a 100 per cent increase of stocks on January 1 as compared to the previous year. This, to my mind, is bound to ruin Canadian chicken farmers, and particularly broiler producers.

Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when he says that our regulations or statutes should contain a section preventing packers and the large feed manufacturers to engage in the production of either poultry, eggs or hogs. I am pleased, on this occasion, to commend the Minister of Agriculture for having amended his policy regarding the stabilization of pork prices by preventing integrators to benefit from its advantages in the future.

If we do not change our laws in respect of poultry price regulations I am convinced that a good many of our farmers, whose family life depends on that industry, will be obliged to leave their homes within a few years from now. On the other hand, if we pass legislation to protect that industry, I am certain that the hon. minister's efforts in this direction will be appreciated and we, on this side of the house, shall be happy to commend him.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is misinformed when he says that poultry raising is primarily a family farm business in Quebec. We had some survey made in connection with this business of raising poultry, particularly raising broilers, which is the big business as far as raising chickens is concerned at the present time. We discovered that something over 90 per cent of all these chickens produced are produced under controlled or integrated farming arrangements. That is the reason I have no intention whatever of putting a support under broiler chickens. Just about 90 per cent of the production is on a contract basis or a vertical integration basis. This is one industry in Canada in which vertical integration and contract farming combined have almost completely taken over the industry. There is therefore no justification, in my opinion, for a support price for these broiler chickens.

As far as the imports are concerned, they are so small in comparison to our total production that they could not possibly have any material effect on the price. The reason the price of broiler chickens, fowl and poultry generally is away down from what it was is that in spite of repeated warnings, the producers have produced far more than the market will absorb. The importation is down actually. The importation is not up on poultry of all kinds; it is down. In 1956 the importation of poultry from the United States amounted to 22 million pounds; in 1957 it was 12,270,000 pounds; in 1958 it was 12,045,000 pounds. It is true that the importation of broiler chickens last year was 6,102,000 pounds as compared with 1,313,000 pounds in 1957. However for other types of poultry the figures were down materially from those of the year before.

Therefore as to poultry imports on the whole—and you must take the whole picture; you just cannot take broiler chickens; you must take all the types of poultry which are dealt in or traded in—if you take them all together, as I say, imports from the United States are down in 1958 in comparison with those in 1957, and they are away down in comparison with those of 1956.

However, production in Canada has gone up terrifically, as I pointed out previously. The production of fowl of all kinds in 1957 was 279 million pounds. That was about twice as much as it had been about three years earlier. About three years earlier it was about half that figure. In 1958 it went up again from 279 million pounds to 346,861,000 pounds, an increase of 67 million pounds in the one year. The worst of it is that this situation is continuing in 1959. I have the figures here to March 7 for 1958 and for 1959. In 1958 to March 7 production was 39,585,000 pounds, but to March 7 in 1959 it is 50,171,000 pounds. In other words production is just shooting up and up. If there were such a thing as a support price we would not have one tenth of the cold storage capacity required to hold the chickens that would be produced.

As I said last Friday, these things can be produced almost without limit. We have a terrific quantity of feed in this country. There is no limit, except the amount of available feed, on the amount of chickens that can be produced. If there were a guaranteed price which made the raising of them profitable, as I say, we would not have anything like the necessary cold storage facilities in which to hold what would be produced. It is the type of thing for which it is absolutely impossible to put in a support price. It is the very last thing in the world for which you can even contemplate putting one in.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I know that in Quebec, and also, I think, in Ontario the production of broilers and other poultry is 90 per cent integrated. And that is just the point. If we keep integrating it, what will happen to our farmers? What will happen to our small farmers in Eastern Canada? That is why we are asking the Minister of Agriculture to draft the legislation so as to protect the small farmer rather than the integrator.

If we start integrating the poultry industry, then we shall integrate the pork industry, and later the same process will be applied to other branches of the industry. What, then, will happen to our agricultural parishes, from a social and economic point of view? It will be a disaster for Canada.

That is why I ask the minister to draft the act so as to give back poultry raising to the farmer. Farmers and poultry producers have considerably increased their production, I admit. And it is easy for any industrialist to do so. If the poultry industry was left in the hands of our farmers, there would not be such an increase in production as has been noted for the past year or two.

As for poultry imports, they have declined from 22 million pounds in 1956 to 12 million in 1958. I am all for this decrease, but we are still importing 12 million pounds too much from the United States. If that quantity of poultry had been sold by our people, the price would not have come down as it did last September, and as it is still coming down now. In early March, broilers sold at 16 to 17 cents a pound, while it is recognized that the cost is about 21 cents, and even the Poultry Producers' Association maintains it to be 22.8 cents.

That is why I am strongly opposed to the policy of the Department of Agriculture with regard to the poultry industry.

(Text):

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, my constituency of Athabasca is largely composed of family farms. These family farmers are not unreasonable in the requests they make of the government. They would prefer that there be no government control whatsoever on agriculture. However, the government is in control of some of the aspects of agriculture.

I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I think the family farmers in northern Alberta would like to see. A good many of them raise hogs and they know, as well as the hon. member for Assiniboia and everybody else in this house knows, that hogs reproduce very rapidly. If you put a high support price on hogs we shall have, and in fact we do have, overproduction. These family farmers know that if there is overproduction the price of hogs falls rapidly, and it has fallen. It has fallen to the support price and it is going below the support price, and if the present production of hogs continues it will go considerably lower. Everybody in this country knows that, particularly the small farmer.

They know also that one of the causes of overproduction is vertical integration. They are not only worried about it; they are alarmed about it, and if this situation continues the pig producers on the small family farms will be out of business. I am not here just to criticize the present policy; I am here to advance what I think is a constructive idea for the settling of this problem. If we intend to support the price of hogs we have to support it at a price at which a farmer can make a decent profit out of his operation, and he cannot make it in competition with big business.

It is wrong to say that the small farmer does not know how many pigs he should be producing on the family farm. He is a man of experience. It is to the farmers and to the farm unions that we should turn for advice. We know how many hogs we need, within reasonable limits. I am asking for a quota to be set and placed on family farms in the light of our foreseeable market. If we look at the United States where they have support prices regardless of markets, and follow that practice, we are in for trouble, deep and expensive trouble. These farmers have common sense and they know that if we are overproducing hogs they are going to suffer in the end. They may get 25 cents a pound this year, but next year they are going to get 14 cents.

We are trying to stabilize the price of hogs by means of our stabilization measure, and that measure has not produced the results we had hoped it would produce. Instead, it has resulted in overproduction and lower prices. We must reach the point where the farmers themselves are consulted about the number of pigs they are to produce. I suggest that if the farm unions of Canada got together they could set this quota and they could also suggest a price, and if this price were right it would make hog production a successful business arrangement on a small farm. We have got to do this sooner or later, so we might as well do it now.

I know this government intend to take some action with regard to this matter. They have already announced that they intend to lower the support price. This alarms me. I do not like it, and I think the answer is a reasonable quota and a reasonable price. I go on record as saying this, and I know I am backed by the farm unions of Alberta. I am backed also by dozens and dozens of small farmers who are willing to accept a quota providing it gives them a decent return for their labour.

As far as markets are concerned, we will regain some of the markets of the world when we produce more grade A hogs, and I suggest to the government that we should raise the bonus on grade A hogs. The small farmer can raise grade A hogs just as well as the large producer, and he will do so if the price is right.

Mr. Regier: I know it is the minister's intention to introduce a measure of discrimination within this act against producers who can be classed as carrying on a vertically integrated operation. As the member for Assiniboia has indicated, he endorses the proposed action of the minister. However, I should like, in adding my plea to that of the hon. member for Assiniboia, to suggest that any discrimination in the operation of this act should be brought before parliament, and that it be done with the consent of the House of Commons. I note that section 11 of the act reads in part:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purpose and provisions of this act—

If we look at the purpose as outlined in the act itself we do not see any room for the practice of any discrimination whatsoever with regard to the nine commodities named, and if the minister is able to practise the discrimination which he is proposing by means of regulation, I believe the hon. gentleman himself will agree that this could in the years ahead lead to misuse. For example, the day may come when a minister of agriculture might, by regulation, decide that the floor price shall not be paid in the northern half of Alberta. Or the minister might decide that the floor price shall not be paid to such producers as are of a certain racial extraction, and so on.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are stretching your imagination.

Mr. Regier: The preservation of the rights of Canadians is, to me, a very important matter, and while the hon. member for Acadia was interrupting I recalled that his own province of Alberta has legislation which discriminates against people of certain religious convictions. Let us not believe that it is beyond us to practise discrimination here in Canada, because it could happen here exactly as it has happened in other areas of the world. I do appeal to the minister that if he intends to practise any discrimination—and I agree that he ought to—against those who are engaged in vertical production, it should be done after full discussion and debate in parliament and should form part of the legislation, and should not be carried out by means of regulations made by the governor in council.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could tell us what use is made of the advisory committee set up under the agricultural prices stabilization act? A few days ago we were discussing in this house the government's new floor prices for certain dairy products. I have read into the record the public statement issued by Mr. Gordon Hill, president of the Ontario farm union, and I got the impression from the minister that this whole question had been discussed with the advisory committee even if the approval of the committee had not been obtained.

However, I have been informed that when the advisory committee last met its members expected to be reconvened in order to discuss the government's proposals as far as the dairy industry is concerned, but that this meeting did not in fact take place. The minister now says there is a meeting under way, but I do believe these meetings should take place before important changes in legislation are announced, and I think that in every possible case the minister should have the approval of the organizations which are represented by members of that advisory committee.

I do not think the comments of the hon. member for Acadia are really worth mentioning at this time. This young man seems inclined to go along with everything the government is doing. He seems to think that any proposal put forward by a member of the opposition is automatically suspect and wrong.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There was no proposal forthcoming from you.

Mr. Argue: There was a definite proposal.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I failed to hear it.

Mr. Argue: There was a definite proposal. I cannot help it if my hon. friend cannot hear or if when he hears he cannot understand and because he cannot understand he is unable to express himself. That is, of course, a very understandable and regrettable position my young friend happens to be in.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Pass the hat to him.

Mr. Argue: As the minister puts on record the various statistics of agricultural production in this country and the huge quantities of agricultural products now held by the stabilization board, it becomes increasingly apparent that the agricultural industry is in great peril. Unless the government changes its policy, which has led to lower and lower floor prices, there will be a very serious crisis in the agricultural industry resulting in still lower prices in the near future.

The quantities of poultry products that have been produced are growing. The minister's statement indicated that we are producing more hogs now than at any time since the period during the war when great encouragement was given to the industry to produce hogs as part of a patriotic war effort. This demonstrates to me, though perhaps not to other hon. members of this committee, the absolute necessity of doing something to increase the price for grain to agricultural producers on the prairies. This lack of adequate prices for wheat oats and barley has given an impetus to the tremendous increase in meat production in our country. If no action is taken on the plea made by the delegation that came to Ottawa two months ago the worries, troubles and tribulations of the minister will be greatly multiplied.

Since we are all advising each other I would offer some advice to the minister. I advise him to take another look at the stand he has taken so adamantly in opposition to deficiency payments on western grain. If the western grain producer does not receive some degree of encouragement and assurance by way of a price increase then, being the person in possession of the cheapest grains of any agricultural producer in Canada, he will turn more and more to the production of beef, cattle, hogs and other agricultural commodities and turn a significant percentage of the production of grain on the prairies into the production of increased quantities of livestock and livestock products. We will then have the agricultural producers outside of the prairies facing a crisis the like of which they have not seen at least since the early thirties.

It is not sufficient to have certain proposals and legislation to cover products other than grain outside the prairie provinces. It is essential now for the minister whose estimates we are considering and for other members of the cabinet to take a new and sympathetic look at the request of the farm delegation to improve prices for wheat, oats and barley on the prairies. The western grain producer, not because he wants to as a first choice but because he is being driven to it through low prices for grain, will turn to the production of meat and will place the agricultural industry in the rest of Canada in the direst peril.

If hon. members of this committee representing constituencies in Quebec and Ontario are prepared to see prairie producers go into the production of commodities other than grain at a much accelerated rate they are merely saying they are prepared to sacrifice the agricultural industry in their provinces. That is the great peril facing this nation, increasing agricultural production that is forcing down the prices of various farm commodities, with the grain producer going more and more into the production of livestock and livestock products, if no action is taken by the government at this time, thus putting the agricultural industry outside the prairies in even greater peril than it is in today.

I therefore make a plea to the Minister of Agriculture and the other members of the cabinet to reconsider their adamant position taken on previous occasions in respect of the request for deficiency payments on prairie wheat, oats and barley.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should answer the question concerning the advisory committee. The advisory committee met yesterday and are meeting today. I do not know if they will complete their deliberations today, but they hope to do so. I may also say they met back in March and have been meeting on the average every two or three months since the present stabilization act came into operation. There is provision in the estimates for funds to cover at least four meetings a year of this committee.

With respect to the statement made by Mr. Hill, to which the hon. member referred, Mr. Hill was in error in that connection. If the hon. member happens to meet him today and speaks to him he will learn that Mr. Hill's impression was not shared by other members of the advisory committee with respect to having another meeting before the support prices for dairy products for the coming year were announced. A meeting was held for two or three days in March, and practically all that time was spent considering the level of supports for dairy products. The meeting was almost entirely given over to a discussion of that subject. There was no statement made that there would be another meeting before the announcement was made; in fact just the reverse was the case. Members of the advisory committee were told that this announcement would have to be made within a few weeks' time and that as soon as dairy groups of all kinds had been consulted in connection with the matter the announcement would be forthcoming.

The understanding of the hon. member for Assiniboia concerning the reason for a great increase in the production of certain agricultural products is at fault. The fact that there is a great deal of grain in western Canada is not the reason; the increase stems from improvements in technological processes of all kinds, improvements in genetics and breeding and so forth. Because of the great improvements that have been made in breeds of animals of all sorts and breeds of seeds—hybrid corn is a classic example—it has been possible to produce a great deal more than was the case 10, 15 or 25 years ago. This terrific increase in agricultural production is not characteristic only of Canada, but may be found in all highly developed countries of the world and is due essentially to improvement in methods, breeding and so on. As a result we are getting much bigger yields, as far as some products are concerned, than was the case before. We are getting fowl and livestock of all kinds which make more efficient use of their feed than was the case before; thus we can produce more cheaply as a result, and so on.

Mr. Argue: I do not want the statement just made by the minister to pass unchallenged. I agree immediately that there have been certain very definite improvements in techniques and that operators are able to handle larger units of production, all of which have resulted in increases in the rate of production.

I have not the statistics on my desk, but perhaps the minister's officials have, to show the very rapid increase in the production of cattle and hogs in the last couple of years. I do not think this is the result of any improvement in techniques at all. That has very little to do with it. The fact of the matter is that because of marketing conditions and because of prices, farmers said that if they were going to stay in the business of farming at all they would have to produce cattle and hogs. There was no recent development in production techniques that encouraged this very rapid increase in the production of cattle and hogs. There have been improvements in the techniques of poultry production, but I do not think the minister himself would claim that the doubling and almost tripling, I think, in about four years in the production of poultry has to do, in the main, with any techniques that have developed within the last four years that were not available at any time immediately prior to four years ago.

I know improved techniques have resulted in increased production, but the basic reason our producers are producing more cattle and hogs today is the fact that there are people on the prairies who are not able to make an adequate living in the production and marketing of grain, notwithstanding the statistics the minister has placed on the record, and they are now going into the production of hogs and cattle in a very large way.

I am sure the minister can get from his officials the increase in the population of cattle and hogs in the last two years, but I do not think he will say this tremendous increase is the result of any great improvement in techniques. The cow still gives birth to one calf a year on the average. If the rancher is able to do it there may be a few supplements he can feed to his calves to put on a few extra pounds of beef but certainly, as far as numbers are concerned, there is no great improvement in techniques which would lead me to believe that this is the reason for such tremendous increases. It is an economic reason, it is a price reason, and it is because the government has failed to do anything in response to the very strong requests which have been made by western grain producers.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the minister a question regarding poultry. Owing to the increase in production in 1958, and owing to the removal of import restrictions last June 13, will the minister consider putting this import restriction in effect in 1959?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Rapp: Can the minister inform the committee whether soybeans, cotton seed or corn come under the stabilization legislation? Are they covered under the stabilization act?

Mr. Harkness: There are 23 commodities which have been under the stabilization act during the past year. One of these was soybeans. Corn was not covered last year. I will just read the commodities which were covered: butter, cheese, dry skim milk, hogs, steers, lambs, wool, eggs, soybeans, sugar beets, tomatoes, asparagus, wheat, oats and barley outside of the wheat board area, raspberries, apricots, apples, honey, peaches, potatoes.

Item agreed to.

11. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $235,500.

Mr. Howard: I want to make a few remarks on this item. First I should like to bring a few statistics to the committee with respect to the dollar value of fish and fish products, to give some indication of the importance of fish and fisheries in our economy and also in our diet.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; these are agricultural estimates. I do not think the hon. member should take the time under these estimates to go into the prices of fish, the quantities of fish produced and so forth. I think he should reserve that for the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Howard: If I may speak on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would just say that the objection the minister has raised probably is correct, but it really points up how ridiculous and foolish it is to have grants, subsidies and payments for cold storage plants to store fish and fish products contained in an estimate under the Department of Agriculture. I want to introduce my remarks in this way to get to the application of subsidies under the Department of Agriculture and under the minister's jurisdicton as they apply to cold storage facilities for fish and fish products. I hope the minister's objection is an indication that he wants to abandon this jurisdiction which he now has and transfer it to the Department of Fisheries, where it could be more properly and more adequately dealt with.

If I could preface my comments about the application of subsidies on fish cold storage plants I would like to point out that up until I believe some time near the middle of 1958—it may have been in the spring months of 1958—the amount of subsidy was limited to one-third of the capital cost of the total cold storage plant.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock the minister and I were discussing a fishing problem. I am sure the minister will recall that during last session he and I entered into a discussion of this same subject matter. I hope our discussion today will not result in the same sort of anger and difference of opinion that occurred last time. Up to approximately the middle of 1958 the subsidy paid by the Department of Agriculture toward the capital cost of cold storage facilities was limited to one-third of such cost. Some time around the middle of 1958 a further limitation was placed on the subsidy making it either one-third of the capital cost or $50,000, whichever was the lesser.

As I understood the reasons given by the minister he said that there was an abundance of cold storage facilities in Canada and that all we would be doing by retaining the one-third principle would be putting public money into the building of cold storage facilities when there was already an abundance and the facilities already in existence were not being used to anywhere near capacity. I believe the minister gave some figures indicating that use ranged as low as 50 per cent in a number of cases.

The objection I take to the application of the subsidy and to the change made last year is this. First, I do not think that the granting of subsidies to cold storage warehouses used for the storage of fish or fisheries products should come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. If I may interpret the minister's remarks on the point of order he raised earlier, or perhaps misinterpret them as he may say later, I think that subconsciously he may feel that I have a valid point in this regard.

I attempted to get some information about the percentage of occupancy of existing cold storage facilities to determine whether, as the minister said, the percentage of occupancy was low and whether the low percentage of occupancy applied equally in the case of cold storage facilities for fisheries products and agricultural products. To that end I entered into correspondence with the minister and subsequently placed a question on the order paper which was answered on January 27. The answer appears on page 422 of Hansard and I should like to refer to the information contained therein. I inquired as to the number of cold storage warehouses used for fish products, the number used for agricultural products and so on. The answer given was that of the total number there were 249 warehouses that stored in the main fish and fisheries products; 1,969 storing in the main agricultural products; and another 850 classified as general and used for storing a variety of products.

We see from these figures that the ratio of cold storage warehouses in existence in Canada is almost eight to one in favour of those storing agricultural products over those storing fisheries products, not taking into account the warehouses classified as general and storing a variety of products. I attempted to determine the percentage of occupancy of these various types of cold storage facilities and the answer I received, as found on page 422, was as follows:

> The dominion bureau of statistics do not require cold storage warehouses to report what percentage of the space is occupied. They do require, however, a statement of the quantities of certain goods in storage and this information is published in various forms, many of which are on a monthly basis. The Department of Agriculture receives voluntary confidential reports showing the percentage occupancy of warehouses which represent about one-third of the total available refrigerated space in Canada.

The answer then proceeds to deal with the percentages I submit there is no indication that a differentiation is made between cold storage facilities for agricultural products and cold storage facilities for fisheries products. I certainly hope it is not the case but I am almost sure that where the number of such plants used for fisheries products is relatively minor numerically compared with the number used for agricultural products—the ratio is one to eight—the consideration given to the minor phase of the problem is not the type of consideration that probably should be given to it. I do not say that is the case in this instance but I rather suspect that fisheries products cold storage facilities were lumped together in the whole consideration of cold storage facilities when the decision was made to reduce the amount of the subsidy. The reason given was that there was too much space and it was not being used to the degree that it should be, and I suspect that the decision was based primarily on the total picture of cold storage warehouses and not on a break-down of the percentage of use for fisheries products and the percentage of use for agricultural products.

I also raised this matter in the standing committee on marine and fisheries when the committee was considering the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. I took up this point with the Minister of Fisheries and while his answer may not be a definite commitment I think it indicates that the argument I am making has a great deal of justification and that there should be a transfer of jurisdiction from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Fisheries with respect to cold storage facilities for fisheries products. I should like to read the answer of the Minister of Fisheries in its entirety so that I cannot be accused of extracting something from it to support my particular point of view. As found on page 68 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 4, of the standing committee on marine fisheries, Tuesday, April 14, following the same general remarks made by me then as I am making now, the Minister of Fisheries said:

> Mr. Chairman, I agree with Mr. Howard that when a relatively small item is bulked with a large one, the total picture may not reflect statistically the situation with regard to the smaller segment. Of course, I am not in a position to give an answer at the present time to the suggestion. However, I can say that it certainly will be considered. I appreciate the members of the committee raising this question because it appears to have merit which at least makes it worthy of consideration.

I wish to wind up with a question. Has the Minister of Agriculture been in consultation with his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, in connection with this problem of transferring the jurisdiction on this matter of cold storage facilities for fisheries products to the Department of Fisheries? If he has not been in such consultation, will he undertake to confer with the hon. gentleman who sits just a few seats from him? In this way fisheries products may receive the degree of consideration in connection with cold storage facilities in the future to which I think they are entitled, that is that they be considered purely and simply in the light of the requirements of fisheries products and not be lumped into consideration of facilities for agricultural products and other things?

Mr. Harkness: I would just say that I have not discussed this matter with the Minister of Fisheries, but I will be glad to do so.

Mr. Howard: I may say that was substantially the answer I got at the last session when I raised the question of transfer. The Minister of Agriculture then indicated he would be quite glad to talk to the Minister of Fisheries. I know both of these gentlemen are busy, but surely it should not take almost a year to get around to talking about this matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong unduly the debate on this item, but as I represent a constituency where there are many poultry producers, I wish to associate myself with the hon. members for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) who this morning called the minister's attention to the restrictions which the government should impose on the importation of chicken and poultry in general from the United States.

I myself received several complaints—

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. We have completed the discussion of that matter and we are now on subsidies for cold storage facilities. I do not believe we can revive the discussion on the Agricultural Stabilization Act on this item for cold storage facilities.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that, this morning, I rose to speak on item 10. Therefore, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think, Mr. Chairman, that we are not yet through discussing the item concerning farm products, and I believe there is some misunderstanding.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I just have item No. 11 in front of me. I understood item No. 10 was passed, and the hon. member for Skeena discussed item No. 11 before lunch.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was there not an argument on that? Did not the hon. member for Skeena argue that he had a right to discuss this subject, even though it concerned cold storage, because he was dealing with one of the products that could be covered by the stabilization act?

Mr. Harkness: There is no question about it, item No. 10 was carried. Item No. 11 was called, and the hon. member for Skeena got up and spoke on item No. 11. I think there is no question about it.

Mr. Dupuis: This morning when we were on item 10 I was going to stand up. The hon. member for Skeena started to talk while we were still on item No. 10.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, item No. 10 was called and carried by the Chair. Then, the Chair called item No. 11, whereupon the hon. member for Skeena stood up and began to speak on item No. 11.

Mr. Caron: The hon. member asked for permission to revert to item No. 10. Permission has been asked before and granted.

The Deputy Chairman: If the committee wishes to revert to item No. 10 it can do so, but it must be by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: If we follow this procedure, Mr. Chairman, we will never have any orderly discussion of these items. As the hon. member for Essex East well knows, this practice has not been followed at any time in this committee. I would be quite willing, if there is time at the end of the estimates and unanimous consent is given, to allow the hon. member to make some remarks. However,

I feel we should carry through with the discussion of these estimates in an orderly way.

The Deputy Chairman: As the hon. gentleman did not get unanimous consent to revert to item 10, we are now on item No. 11.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I have the indulgence of this committee, in this generous mood, for one minute? There is an obvious misunderstanding. If Your Honour says the item has been carried, we accept Your Honour's direction, but the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who is the spokesman for this group on matters of agriculture—

Mr. Ricard: We thought you were.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and who is recognized throughout the house as a very fair-minded member, was under the impression that the item had not been carried. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was in the house, and he had the same understanding as the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville is one of the newer members of this house. He represents a constituency in which there are a lot of farmers, and he has a point which he thinks should be emphasized in one of his first pronouncements in this chamber on agriculture.

I think under the circumstances the committee, in this mood of generosity, would want to accede to the request made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough and others on the opposite side, to allow this rather important and initial speech to be made.

The Deputy Chairman: I am not sure the hon. member for Essex East knows that I do not make the rules. I asked the committee if they would give unanimous consent to revert to item No. 10, and unanimous consent was not given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think they would this time.

The Deputy Chairman: I have no other recourse but to say we are now on item No. 11.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could you construe your earlier impression as being wrong and ask the committee if they would give unanimous consent? I think they would.

The Deputy Chairman: There is no indication to the Chair that the committee would change its mind.

Mr. Howard: I would have liked to have an opportunity to discuss the point of order which was raised earlier because my name was brought into it. I can quite understand the confusion which existed. Unfortunately, the Minister of Agriculture has indicated we cannot go back to that subject. I wonder if he could, on item No. 11, indicate when he might sit down with the Minister of Fisheries, and the Minister of Finance I imagine because money would be involved, to discuss the transfer of jurisdiction over these cold storage facilities to the Department of Fisheries? Would he indicate also what technical matters stand in the way, in so far as additional legislation being required or some other arrangement by which this objective could be attained? Could it be done by order in council, and so on?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the Cold Storage Act provides for subsidies for cold storage facilities for any purpose. It happens that the act is being administered at the moment by the Department of Agriculture because most of the products stored are agricultural products. Of course, any change in the present set-up would require a change in the act. I might say that at one time there was a subsidy system under the Department of Fisheries and one under the Department of Agriculture. In the interests of economy and more efficient administration they were merged into one act. This was done long before any period that I was in the house, but I understand that is what happened. They have been administered under the one act since that time; and it happens that at the moment the Department of Agriculture is responsible for administering this act.

Mr. Howard: Dealing with the last point first, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. In the light of developments now I think probably we should look upon that merging which took place of those two jurisdictions as being an erroneous one. The statistics show and the answers given by the minister indicate that he is not in a position to give the adequate consideration that should be given to fisheries products cold storage facilities. A year ago we discussed this question when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were before the house last session. The minister then said, "It is a good idea; we will take it into consideration; I will chat with the Minister of Fisheries about it". Now, a year later, we find that he still says the same thing. Is this not an indication that he is just going to go on and on giving consideration to this matter and saying that he will chat with somebody else about it, and not getting around to doing it?

Legislation is required if such a transfer is desirable. It can only come about by cabinet decision. Initially there must be consultation between the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Agriculture. Surely they are still on speaking terms and are able to discuss these questions. It might come about in that way. It requires legislation. But I suggest that this promise which was given to the house a year ago is one which the Minister of National Revenue would say should be kept. I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture should sit down with the Minister of Fisheries and discuss the question immediately and, if possible, introduce legislation at this session in order to cope with the problem instead of allowing us to wait another year and go around again on the old merry-go-round, when we will ask the Minister of Agriculture the same question and get the same sort of answer, "We will take it into consideration". As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, that seems to be sloughing off a responsibility, when we get from the minister the same type of answer which in effect means that no action is going to be taken and also that the type of consideration that should be given to fisheries products cold storage facilities is not being given. Because the Minister of Agriculture has that small item relating to fish in the vast operations of his department it is quite easy for him to overlook it, and certainly he has overlooked it because he has not even the statistical information on which to base his decision.

Dairy products division—

12. Operation and maintenance, $901,306.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks about ROP tests in the province of Quebec, and put on the record a resolution addressed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) on January 29, 1959. It is a very short one, and reads as follows:

Whereas breeders of registered livestock consider ROP tests a necessity and,

Considering the work done by animal husbandry specialists, agronomists, breeders associations and breeders themselves, and

Because of the results achieved through general co-operation to increase the yield of our dairy cattle as a result of proper selection based on official records of performance,

Be it resolved that the Quebec Ayrshire Breeders Association make strong representations to the Minister of Agriculture for Canada, following the decision not to increase the number of herds under ROP control.

Such a restriction has a paralysing effect first on the stock breeder who is a beginner and it curtails the results of the selective registry policy followed by our organization.

As a matter of fact, local farmers, more especially purebred livestock breeders, have been complaining over the past year that they cannot have control services for their dairy herds.

[Mr. Howard.]

Today in the Bois Franc area there are at least 875 farmers organized into three livestock breeders clubs and two Holstein, Ayrshire livestock breeders clubs, including many purebred livestock breeders the importance of which is well established. Under the regulation governing registry, no bull can be certified or recognized by the association if the dam has not the ROP qualifications and is not classified according to its breed type. Such measure regarding restrictions to the registration stops automatically the whole plan designed to promote the production of purebred cattle.

This will eventually hurt the breeding stock markets.

There are in the constituencies of Drummond-Arthabaska and Megantic, and in most of the constituency of Lotbiniere, breeders' associations which are recognized as the best breeders of registered livestock in the province of Quebec.

Each year our breeders sell more than $400,000,000 worth of cross-bred and purebred stock for production and breeding purposes, such as dairy cows, stock heifers and bulls.

Furthermore, I would draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that the department of agriculture of the province of Quebec makes grants available for the exclusive purchase of certified bulls and heifers, out of certified dams. It is therefore essential to let the breeders freely control their production without any restrictions. In fact, for a few years now, Quebec experimental farms and agronomists have been doing a good deal of educational work aimed at improving cattle raising in my area. And now an attempt is being made to hinder the work already done to improve the production.

Many farmers have asked that inspection services be extended to their dairy herds, but unfortunately they were turned down by the department.

I think there is no sense in restricting those services after all the educational work designed to promote our livestock industry.

It is for this reason that I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he intends to make inspectors available for those thriving farmers who want to improve their pure-bred stock.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: This statement which the hon. member has just made that applications for record of performance inspection are being refused because the department does not wish to extend the work is completely incorrect.

The actual fact of the matter is that there has been, on the part of farmers, a constantly increasing awareness of the value of these record of performance inspections and of getting their herds on record of performance. As a result there has been quite a rapid increase in the number of applications on the part of farmers to have their herds included. We just have not had sufficient staff to meet all these demands. We have asked for 20 new positions in order that we shall be able to extend the work and to take in the people who have now applied for it. Those new positions will be provided for, we expect, in the supplementary estimates which will be brought down before the end of the session. The only reason why all these applications for service have not been accepted is that if we had done so we would not have been able to make a sufficient number of inspections and, probably, the whole of the work would have been disrupted. The only way in which we can keep up with these applications is by increasing the number of the staff, and this we are in the process of doing.

Mr. Boulanger: I do not see why it should take so long to give satisfaction to our farmers. One case was brought to my attention of a farmer making an application last November. This was refused. He wrote again in February and received a similar answer. We have many young people in Quebec who are anxious to improve their cattle, and if they cannot buy good heifers and bulls, they cannot improve their stock. I might point out, also, that our department of agriculture in Quebec offers a premium for high standards, and these delays prevent this premium being earned. I think the minister should work out some solution as quickly as possible.

13. Grants and other assistance in accordance with the Cheese and Cheese Factory Improvement Act, $985,676.

Mr. Roberge: I think this is a suitable place for me to make some remarks with regard to maple products.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Roberge: I am waiting to see whether I am in order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think that is item 14, fruit and vegetable division including maple products and honey.

Mr. Caron: No, it is the second part of item 13.

Mr. Harkness: I think there has been a misprint in the book and the number "13" is higher than it should be. This reference to maple products and so forth is under item 13.

The Deputy Chairman: In the resolution here it comes under 14. I think the number "14" should be opposite the word "fruit".

Mr. Caron: Is this not the edition which has been given to all members of this committee? I do not think we can take a chance, because the minister might say the item had been passed.

Mr. Harkness: Go ahead and have the discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: If it is agreeable to the committee we can discuss this question of maple products and honey which I have here under item 14, under item 13.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roberge: Last year in this house—it was probably in this committee—I urged the Minister of Agriculture to look into the possibility of devising, in co-operation with the provinces which are most affected, a campaign of publicity in favour of maple products.

Not very long ago—in the last two weeks, in fact—producers of maple products did organize a festival called the maple products festival, and this was the first time to my knowledge in the history of Quebec or, indeed, in the history of Canada, that a festival of maple products has been held in our province. I had the good fortune to be invited to attend that festival and although, as I say, this was the first time that such an occasion has been arranged in Canada it has been the practice for a long while in the United States. Festivals have been held in Vermont and in Ohio but never in Quebec. I attended last Sunday. Plessisville is only a very small town, but many people from surrounding areas took the opportunity to visit the festival.

(Translation):

Last Sunday, Mr. Chairman, the maple products festival was attended by nearly 10,000 persons.

I now want to come back to what I said earlier. Last year and again this year I advocated a publicity campaign to promote sales and exports of maple syrup and maple sugar. However the Plessisville maple industry producers had to organize their own festival. I therefore pay tribute to them for having succeeded in attracting to Plessisville, in my constituency, six to seven thousand people from outside of my riding, who did not know about maple products. It is the first time such a festival takes place in the province of Quebec and in Canada for that matter.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order!

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I only wish to point out to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) that since maple products are an important part of our agriculture, it is essential to see that those products are sold, not only in Canada, but also in other countries, namely in the United States.

Therefore, in my riding, we have organized a festival to promote the sale of maple products.

I hope that the Minister of Agriculture, in co operation with the Quebec department of agriculture, particularly with the department responsible for the sale of maple products, will see that maple products are sold in other countries and in western Canada, thereby adding substantially each spring to the income of maple producers of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a few questions relating to grants to cheese factories the amounts of which are listed as a lump sum in the details. Would the minister give us a breakdown of this figure and an explanation of the method used in the payment of premiums on high quality cheese?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the subsidy under the Cheese and Cheese Factory Improvement Act is 50 per cent of the cost of amalgamating two or more cheese factories in order to make a more efficient factory or $60,000 as a maximum, whichever of those is the lesser. As far as premium payments on cheese are concerned there is a payment of two cents if it scores 94 or better, and a payment of one cent if it scores 93.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I shall have to look back to an earlier vote this time merely for the purpose of illustrating what is shown here. On page 101 there is listed a number of cold storage warehouses and the names of companies to which subsidies are to be paid as well as the amount. On page 101 there appears a list of cold storage companies by provinces indicating the amount of subsidy that would be given under the Cold Storage Act. In the preparation of future estimates would it be possible to have the same sort of breakdown with respect to other subsidies and especially those for cheese factories? Is the appropriation for the subsidies listed here for cheese factories those that are already approved?

Mr. Harkness: That is right. Both cold storage warehouses and potato warehouses that are given subsidies are listed by name. I do not know why that is not done in relation to cheese factories. Apparently it is a practice that has been followed for some time. If the hon. member wants a list of the cheese factories I have it here and could give it to him.

Mr. Howard: I just wondered why the difference.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know nor do my officials.

Mr. Howard: As the minister indicated the subsidy to the cheese factories is 50 per cent of the cost or $60,000 whichever is the lesser. How long has that arrangement been in effect?

Mr. Harkness: The 50 per cent subsidy goes back to the beginning of the act. I do not know when it came into effect but I think it was back in the thirties. The limitation of $60,000 was put on shortly after the $50,000 limitation was put on cold storage warehouses.

Mr. Howard: Is there any possibility of a group wanting to build facilities for fisheries products getting any assistance under the Cheese and Cheese Factory Improvement Act?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Howard: They get more money that way.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, with my usual economy of language I want to make a few remarks on this item. I do not wish to be repetitious because I have spoken on the first item and dealt with a number of things that concern my constituents. I wish to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the last convention of the British Columbia fruit growers' association resolved that two things were absolutely essential to the economic stability of the fruit industry of British Columbia; first, the establishment of a Canadian fruit board to handle the entire national and international selling of fruit—and I presume the minister will be discussing this question with the Canadian Horticultural Council in days to come—and, second, the need for a minimum price for fruit commensurate with the cost of production. In that connection the minister knows there has been some difference of opinion between the association and himself or officials of his department as to the true cost of the production of certain fruit for which assistance was being applied.

In my opinion and in the opinion of a number of growers to whom I have spoken there should be some system of obtaining costs that are arrived at by agreement between the industry and the government. Although there were some cost studies made some years ago with respect to the cost of production of apples and other orchard products in British Columbia there are no exact figures with respect to fruit at this time. Could the minister inform the committee what is being done in the way of research to establish the cost of production of these fruits on a basis that would be acceptable to the producers and the government? That is something requiring a great deal of attention if the stabilization act is to be effective and satisfactory in days to come.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, under the economics branch of the department we have been carrying on cost of production studies with respect to a number of commodities. Those on which we have been concentrating are commodities that are mandatory under the stabilization act and in respect of which, I think the hon. member will agree, it is most essential that something definite should be arrived at as soon as possible. Our cost of production studies have been pretty well confined so far to those mandatory commodities and as a result we have not been carrying on up to date cost of production studies in regard to fruit, as far as I am aware. That is something that will come later.

Mr. Herridge: Just a suggestion, Mr. Chairman. Does the minister not think it possible to have some of the staff at the Summerland experimental station do this work? They are in close touch with the circumstances, the conditions and the industry. In the opinion of the growers it is important that the cost of production be established on a basis satisfactory to all concerned and that a satisfactory formula be established.

Mr. Harkness: The Summerland experimental station is manned by scientists whose field is botany and so forth, not economics. Economic studies of this kind are carried on by the economics branch within their field, just the same as botanical studies are carried on by the botanists. You cannot expect a scientist who is a botanist to go into the economics branch, or vice versa. The cost of production studies in regard to things along this line would be carried on by the economics branch in British Columbia rather than by the botanists and so on that we have in Ottawa.

15. Assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions approved by governor in council, $25,000.

Mr. Howard: I understood the minister to say a while ago that the appropriation toward the construction of potato warehouses was also listed by the name of the company or group receiving the subsidy.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I can be charged with an error in regard to that. I thought they were listed as well as the cold storages. I have not checked for the moment. If the hon. member has checked and they are not there, apparently they are not listed. The number of those has been very small. As a matter of fact, in the 14 years that I believe the act has been in existence up to last year, there were, if my memory is not inaccurate, only something in the neighbourhood of 15 or 16 of these particular warehouses built. Last year there was quite an increase in interest in this and we got applications for quite a number, and that is why the amount provided is so much increased over the previous year. The previous year is not in there. The sum of $70,000 was spent last year. I have forgotten what it was the year before that but it was much less than that. I am informed that it was only $7,000 the year before, and $70,000 last year. The estimate was made up for $25,000 on the assumption that the interest would fall back again. Instead of that it has come on so that we shall have to have a supplementary estimate to cover the remainder of this item.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I notice that this item reads:

Assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council.

Does this mean that there are no written rules or regulations by which it can be determined who is qualified and who is not to apply for such a grant? Can application be made by individuals or do those grants apply only to public bodies or farm organizations?

Mr. Harkness: There are written regulations; there is a regular order in council. It is order in council P.C. 2017 of April 20, 1950, and it authorizes assistance to producer groups; in other words, groups of farmers who wish to construct the necessary facilities on the following basis: one, that producer groups pay at least 25 per cent of the cost; and, two, the federal government and provincial governments concerned share equally in the remainder of the cost.

Health of animals division—

16. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $6,957,334.

Mr. Boulanger: How many counties in Quebec and in each of the provinces have been certified?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member wants the number which have now been certified: Prince Edward Island, 3; Nova Scotia, 6; New Brunswick, 8; Quebec, 1; Ontario, 6; Saskatchewan, 2; British Columbia, 4. In addition to that there have been accepted for testing the following numbers. These are the ones that have been tested and are being tested: Prince Edward Island, 3; Nova Scotia, 8; New Brunswick, 15; Quebec, 8; Ontario, 35; Manitoba, 21; Saskatchewan, 173; Alberta, 4; British Columbia, 7. These latter figures, of course, include the first group of figures which I gave; in other words, that is the number of areas that have been accepted for testing. Work is being carried on and the last list includes the numbers which have been completed and which I gave first.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: As I said a few moments ago, we are in a Quebec area of large scale breeding of certified livestock, and farmers are asking for supervision and control of this disease more particularly so in the riding of Arthabaska where there is a good export market for purebred stock and dairy cows.

Under present conditions producers are handicapped when they want to export cattle to the United States. I realize that the U.S. can accept animals from accredited herds; just the same farmers have to wait 90 days for results of the tests, which impedes the marketing of cattle, particularly that of dairy cows, in that district. Farmers are therefore anxious for the department to step up its campaign for the early control of that disease.

I see that in the province of Quebec, there is a riding where animals are certified, and that control work is being done in seven others. That would be eight in all. We are trailing the other provinces in the matter of inspection and control of that disease and I ask the minister to step up departmental activity aimed at controlling this disease.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I should say that we go ahead in order to inspect the herds and thereupon to certify the county after the reactors have been destroyed and so forth, only upon the application of the minister of agriculture of the province concerned. We cannot move into the province and do this work except on the request of the province.

Mr. Boulanger: Has the minister had requests from the province of Quebec to increase the inspection?

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Harkness: I should like to assure the hon. member that we take on all of those as and when requested. As the requests come in we start on the inspection.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Then, if 35 ridings asked for inspection, the minister would be ready to accept and to ask his men to go ahead with the required tuberculin testing.

How many applications did he get since last year, during 1958? I see that 8 ridings in Quebec are mentioned, 35 in Ontario, 15 in New Brunswick, 8 in Nova Scotia and so on. There are quite a number of cattle out our way and applications have been made only for 7 ridings. Did the minister receive applications for more districts than those where inspection is now proceeding?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. If, as the hon. member says, we received requests from 30 or 35 counties we would start the inspection work and carry it on as rapidly as we could. We would, of course, be handicapped as we always are by the shortage of veterinarians, but what we do under those circumstances is employ local veterinarians on a fee basis to carry on this work for the department. As long as there are local veterinarians in any county we can get the work started and carry it on.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to ask a supplementary question. If a member of the House of Commons asked the Department of Agriculture to make an inspection in his own riding would the minister consider such a request even though the provincial department of agriculture had not made such a request to the minister or to the department?

Mr. Harkness: No, we could not consider such a request at all. Under the dominion-provincial agreement governing this matter the request has to come from the province.

Mr. Southam: The problem of brucellosis eradication has been quite pronounced in Saskatchewan for years and it is particularly important now with the increased economic value of cattle. Agricultural statistics for that province indicate that for the year 1956-57 the value of livestock lost through this disease was approximately $2½ million. Of course, the problem has been aggravated, as the Minister of Agriculture has just stated, due to the dearth of veterinarians. Because of the fact that quite a large number of our farm boys attend university in Saskatoon during the winter, I wonder whether some encouragement could be given to them to obtain instruction in order to assist the veterinarians by doing the lay work in connection with the eradication program. I know of one particular area last year where the extent of brucellosis rose to 39 per cent, which is quite a discouraging factor. Could some encouragement be given to these men in order that they may assist the veterinarians?

Mr. Harkness: We permit veterinarians to hire helpers or assistants to draw the blood, thus enabling this work to be carried on much more rapidly than would otherwise be the case. However, this does not apply in the province of Quebec because the veterinary act there does not make such provision. In other words, the drawing of the blood has to be done by a veterinary under the Quebec provincial act but in the other provinces it can be done by a man who is really a technician. He is trained in drawing the blood and he sends it to the veterinarian who makes the test. That, of course, greatly increases the speed with which tests can be done.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have one question with regard to the Bang's disease vaccination program in Alberta. Does the federal government contribute anything to the program there?

Mr. Harkness: We supply the vaccine free to the province.

Mr. Caron: If there are only seven counties in the province of Quebec—

Mr. Harkness: Eight.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You said seven including the first one.

Mr. Harkness: It is eight.

Mr. Caron: Well, we will say eight. It is the same thing for the purpose of my question. As the minister said, the request has to come from the department of agriculture in the province of Quebec or in any other province. Therefore, if there are only eight counties being covered in the province of Quebec the federal Department of Agriculture cannot be blamed because you are waiting for requests from the government of Quebec. That is the exact reason.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

21. Supervision of race track betting, $591,315.

Mr. Howard: I see that under this item the Minister of Agriculture is involved in sin to a certain degree, if you classify horse racing or race track betting under that heading. Can the minister give us an indication as to what way officials of his department are involved in the supervising of race track betting? I imagine they do not deal with the corner cigar stores because they do not come under your jurisdiction, but what is the situation with respect to race track betting?

Mr. Harkness: In this connection the hon. member for Kootenay West will realize—

Mr. Herridge: Don't blame me.

Mr. Harkness: —that I am in exactly the same position as one of the old racing parsons in England. I do not consider that I am involved in sin at all, through the fact that the department supervises race track betting. In fact, I consider the position to be just the reverse. The situation is that under the Criminal Code the Department of Agriculture is responsible for supervising parimutuel betting at race tracks, which is permitted by the Criminal Code. For that purpose we use the R.C.M.P. to supervise each race track when it is in operation. In Ottawa we have a small staff of three men who have general charge and supervision of race track betting operations and who give directions to the R.C.M.P. who attend at each track to collect the records and make sure we get our percentage of the gate, which is used in turn to pay for the supervision. The purpose is to ensure that the customer at the parimutuel plant gets a fair return on his bet; in other words, that there is no hanky-panky in connection with the parimutuel operation.

In addition, we carry out urinary and salivary tests on the horses to ensure that they have not been doped, thus, of course, changing what would otherwise be the odds in any race and the probability of a particular horse winning. We also operate the photo-finish equipment and what is called the eye in the sky in order to have a photographic record so that there can be no question as to which horse won a particular race. The percentage of the gate that we get is one-half of one per cent and the money so collected is used for these supervisory activities.

Mr. Howard: The minister did not indicate whether he gets any hot tips in this process and if he follows them up, but I take it from his remarks that there is a certain amount of income received. In effect the federal government gets a rake-off, somewhat like the house in a poker game. I am using these terms which are totally unfamiliar to me although I have heard them used before. What is the percentage of the take, how is it computed and what happens to the money? Does it go to the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue and is it then credited against the expenditures made by the Department of Agriculture? What is the relationship?

Mr. Harkness: As I said a minute ago, we get one half of one per cent of the money wagered. This money goes into the consolidated revenue fund and then the amount of money we expend has to be voted. That is the purpose of this vote. The amount we collect is approximately the same as the amount we expend. The point is that there is no reason why the taxpayers in general should pay the cost of this supervision at race tracks. That is why we take a half of one per cent, so that the operation itself will pay for the supervision rather than the general taxpayers having to pay for it.

Mr. Howard: I am sure that the same general principle could be applied to quite a number of activities in which various government agencies are involved and whose purpose is to protect the general public. We get involved in protecting the public from the unscrupulous acts of certain individuals or corporations with respect to their pricing policies and so on and I wonder why the same principle could not be applied.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say that I appreciate the position of the minister and I have heard a good many patrons of the sport of kings compliment the work done by the Department of Agriculture in preventing sin at the race tracks in this respect.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to ask just one brief question. The minister has told us that there is a staff of three Royal Canadian Mounted policemen in Ottawa supervising this work throughout the country. I wonder if these gentlemen, or any member of their staff, make an inspection from time to time of these places throughout the country in which the races take place?

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member has misunderstood. We have three people on the permanent staff here in Ottawa who have responsibility for the supervision of this race track betting. They keep the records and make sure that the general supervisory work is carried out. The actual work at each particular track is carried out by a mounted policeman. There are three people in the central office, and then they employ mounted policemen at each of the tracks during the time the race is being run. The mounted policeman who is doing this work in Calgary, for instance, is not the same one who does the work in Toronto.

Mr. Howard: I should like to pursue this a little further. Did I understand correctly that the income resulting to the crown from supervising this sort of activity is one-half of one per cent of the amount of money bet?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Howard: This would indicate that there is probably $100 million per year wagered at the race tracks.

22. Grants to agricultural fairs, exhibitions and museums in accordance with regulations of the governor in council; payments pursuant to agreements in force on March 31, 1959, with exhibitions covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and a grant of $50,000 to the royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $923,600.

Mr. Roberge: This item has to do with agricultural fairs, exhibitions and museums. At page 111 in the details of the estimates we find that there are grants for class A and class B fairs, as well as grants to winter and spring fairs. I should like to ask the minister if he would consider a grant to the maple syrup spring fair?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, these grants are made to fairs which have been in operation for at least three years and which have had a prize list which we can demonstrate has been paid for that period. In so far as the class A fair is concerned, it must have had a prize list of $5,000 which was paid for each of the last three years. In so far as a class B fair is concerned, the prize list must be $3,000. Any fairs which are smaller than that do not qualify for the grant.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to ask the minister one question which has a relationship to this item. As the minister is aware, the hon. member for Fort William and I come from a region which is isolated and, in a sense, has its own market. One of the things which we have been asked a number of times was whether or not we could get a picture of the total aid in various forms which comes to our particular region from the Department of Agriculture.

We have fairs at the lakehead, and I am not asking for information about the aid which comes to those fairs. I am asking a general question of the minister, would it be possible for him or his officials to give us a picture of all the funds that may be going annually in support of the various agricultural activities in our particular region?

Mr. Harkness: In so far as the fair is concerned, Fort William is a class B fair and so would get a capital grant of $10,000. They are eligible also for an annual grant of about $2,000 toward operations. In so far as being able to say what assistance we have given to Fort William and that immediate area, say under the stabilization act,

I think it is almost impossible to pinpoint that with any degree of accuracy. When it comes to any specific grants, such as those to fairs, we can easily give the figures. In so far as what you might call general benefits are concerned which come from the various acts which apply to agriculture all over the country, it is almost impossible to say how much of each of these grants goes to a particular area.

Mr. Fisher: Does the minister think we could get any kind of appraisal of specific things like the fair vote, and then a general amount for the various legislative items connected with agriculture which may apply, in order to give us some sort of idea of the assistance we are getting from the Department of Agriculture in our farm field?

Mr. Harkness: The officials before me say they will attempt to make an appraisal of that kind and send it to the hon. member. We do not guarantee that it is accurate; it would be a guess.

24. Grants to agricultural organizations as detailed in the estimates, $224,250.

Mr. Herridge: I do want to say a word or two on this item because I have noticed, for the first time, that there is an amount for the federated women's institutes of Canada of $10,000. I must say that I am delighted to see this grant included in the estimates this year. I think I must say such a grant is long overdue for such a worthy organization. These women's institutes were commenced, I understand, at Stoney Creek in 1897. Provision was made for an organization of rural women to work for the welfare of rural women and the communities in which they live. I understand it followed the example set by the farmers' institute. It is very nice to know that on this occasion the ladies followed the example of the men.

I know that so far as my own district is concerned the women's institutes were established in 1909. My own mother was a very active person in the women's institutes in the interior of British Columbia. Since that time I have always taken a great interest in the work they have done and have admired the organization for making a tremendous contribution to the communities in which their activities take place.

Then in 1919 the federated women's institutes of Canada was established, which showed the continuing growth of the organization. I understand that today there are approximately 3,000 branches of the institute in Canada with approximately 100,000 members. The germ of the idea came from British Columbia, and in 1937 the associated countrywomen of the world was organized, and of that international body the federated women's institutes of Canada are a constituent society. This great organization, which has not received too much publicity throughout the years in my opinion, has done more work with less money than any other organization in the country for the welfare of Canada as a whole. It has carried on, giving effect to its motto, "For Home and Country".

I know that in the early days this organization dealt with the questions of domestic science, home management and was active in local projects. In the communities in my area they look after cemeteries, local needs welfare of school children and things of that sort. They took the lead in working for equal rights for women. I am sure there are some members here from British Columbia who will remember the late Mrs. Ralph Smith who was very active in those days and who, with the support of the institute, obtained some improvement in the legislation in British Columbia which was of benefit to the women of that province. Since that time, their activities have widened. They are interested in national women's problems, problems that affect women in general.

Now they are greatly interested in international problems. I understand they are supporting the Food and Agricultural Organization, UNESCO and many other worthwhile organizations like that. I may tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I was never so pleased to support a vote as I am to support this one for $10,000 which is little enough for this magnificent organization of women in Canada.

I have witnessed how versatile they are. I remember very well what happened when one of the small communities in our district was threatened by forest fire and would possibly have been destroyed had it not been for the organization of women's institute in seeing that the tools were provided and taken to the fire guards and that refreshments were provided over a day or so that the men could continue to fight the fire. It was a very close squeak but finally this community in question was saved as a result of the organization and co-operation of the women's institute.

I can tell you something else, and I must not take long in doing so. However, this vote arouses my interest and my support. As you may know, the women's institute in my district was the first organization in Canada, as far as I know, to establish midwifery by telephone. I remember an isolated rancher whose wife was going to have a child miles away from anywhere. His wife told him to phone the women's institute. They got in touch with an elderly member of the women's institute at the other end of the telephone miles away and she instructed the husband what to do. That new Canadian was born and is now a resident of my district and possibly he votes for me. In any event, I just give these as two illustrations of the value of the work of the women's institutes in the local field. I could go on at great length, with these early stories of the women's institutes but I do not wish to detain the committee. However, in conclusion I want to say that I am sure all members of this committee will give whole hearted support to this small grant of $10,000 to this organization which has done so much for Canada since 1897.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to rise on item 23 but you passed over it very quickly. I want to ask a question in connection with item No. 23. I should like to ask the reason for the reduction in the grant to the royal winter fair in Toronto. Was it for some special event last year? What is the usual grant to the royal winter fair?

Mr. Harkness: The only reason for the reduction is that the royal winter fair have not yet completed their plans. They informed us that they did not think they would be able to do more than spend upwards of $15,000 on the preparation of plans and so forth as far as this year was concerned. Therefore, in order to avoid having in the estimates an item of a quarter of a million dollars, which was in last year but was not used—and which was just unnecessarily padding the estimates and gave to the committee actually an improper picture—this amount was put in. I asked the royal winter fair people how much they were actually going to spend. They said this would probably be the amount, and that is the amount I put in rather than a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. McMillan: Is there any other grant made to the royal winter fair?

Mr. Harkness: An annual grant of $50,000 is made but this is part of a special grant which was given to the royal winter fair some considerable time ago and which they have not yet taken up.

Mr. McMillan: Would it get more if it needed it later on?

Mr. Harkness: This grant is in order to improve their livestock facilities at Toronto. They were given a total grant of $1 million. They have not yet expended this money. They expected last year to spend about a quarter of a million dollars. That is why $250,000 was put into the estimates last year. But then they ran into difficulty, I think because of the new extension of the Queen Elizabeth way or the four-lane highway which is to go into Toronto in that area. This four-lane highway took up some of the land, as I understand it, on which they were going to construct these new buildings. Therefore they were obliged to cancel those plans and are in the process of making new ones now. That is the reason for the hold-up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister would perhaps wish to deal with the question put by the hon. member for Welland. The royal winter fair is one of the great institutions of its kind, not only in Ontario but, I suppose, in the world. If the directors of the royal winter fair felt that the moneys now appropriated were insufficient for their purposes I take it from the question—although I am not clear from the answer—that more moneys would be appropriated by way of a special supplementary estimate later on.

Mr. Harkness: As I say, the agreement was made to provide them with $1 million to extend their facilities. As the hon. member says, this is the big winter fair in Canada. It is the showplace of Canadian agriculture in Canada. On that account it was made this special grant. I do not think the directors of the royal winter fair are going to need more than the amount that is in the estimates this year. That is why this amount is in rather than the greater amount.

Mr. Charlton: I could not possibly let this opportunity pass without saying just a word agreeing in part at least with the hon. member for Kootenay West. It is not often that I can agree with what he says, but on this occasion I certainly can do so with regard to the federated women's institutes of Canada and this grant to them of $10,000. I am sure it is not the first time, however, that this grant has been given. On a previous occasion I am sure this same grant was made to the women's institutes of Canada. I believe that was on the occasion of the meeting here some few years ago of the federated women's institutes of the world. In addition, I want to point out that while the first women's institute was formed at Stoney Creek, I have the honour to have in my constituency the birthplace of the lady who started this institution, namely Adelaide Hunter Hoodless. It is situated within a mile and one-half of my own home at St. George, Ontario. I should like to add that the site of her birthplace is being marked this year by the archaeological and historical sites board of the province of Ontario. It will be quite an occasion. I think it is to be held on June 12.

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps I had better just say that I was glad to put in this grant for the women's institutes and get it accepted as a regular grant amongst these other grants in this department. This is the first time that this has been the case. The women's institutes received a special grant on the occasion mentioned by the hon. member some years ago. But this is the first time that they have ever been put in for a regular grant, although they have been asking for this grant for many years. I was extremely glad finally to succeed in getting this institution accepted as one which should have an annual grant.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to know whether there are in the country other organizations which have applied for grants and if so, whether their requests were refused? Are these grants which are listed on page 112 fixed annual grants or are they determined by the minister or by his officials or on the recommendation of the officials to the minister?

Mr. Harkness: They are not fixed. They can be changed annually. In most cases they have been arrived at as a result of discussions with the organization concerned and a determination made of what appeared to be a reasonable sort of grant for the dominion government to make to the particular institution concerned. As I said, the women's institutes have now been asking for many years for an annual grant and it was always refused. Eventually I managed to get the treasury board to agree that this was the type of institution which should have a grant under this particular item. That is why the $10,000 is in for that particular institution. As to what other institutions may have asked for grants and been refused, I do not know. I cannot recall any that have been refused since I have been Minister of Agriculture but I have no doubt that over the years there have been organizations which asked for grants and did not get them.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister, in connection with this grant of $50,000 to the Canadian national livestock records, where these records are kept. Are they kept here in Ottawa?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, they are kept here in Ottawa in the Canadian national livestock record office. It is on Queen street.

Mr. McMillan: Is that for the whole of Canada?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, that is for all Canada, and we make a grant toward the carrying on of this work.

25. Quality premiums on high grade hog carcasses and administration costs, $6,500,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the minister's attention to certain commercial practices encountered in some Quebec ridings, particularly in Bagot, Shefford and Richelieu counties where, for a couple of years, sharpers have been taking in local farmers. Those crooked businessmen come down to our parishes as alleged cattle buyers. At first they put on an act of big operators: they buy up poultry, butcher cattle and hogs. For their first order they make out a cheque which is generally honoured. However, on the second order the cheque bounces. The farmer then goes up to the operator and asks why the cheque came back. He is told some fancy yarn and given a second cheque with the promise that this one will be accepted by the bank. Unfortunately, the cheque is not accepted. Thus, we have seen farmers particularly in the district of Bagot lose $500, $1,500 and even $3,000.

An investigation by the Catholic Farmers' Union revealed that its members in the district of Bagot and neighbourhood had lost $50,000, while those from Drummond and Arthabaska lost nearly half a million dollars to those sharpers.

I therefore ask the minister to investigate, or have an investigation made, into those shameful practices.

May I make a suggestion? He might for instance require a cattle dealer to deposit a 15 day guarantee equal to the amount of the transaction, as is done in the case of butter factories. Nowadays a butter maker who wants to go into business has to supply a guarantee equal to the value of his merchandise for a period of two or three weeks or even a month. Therefore, I consider that for the protection of farmers, a guarantee bond should be required of those dealers.

I realize it might be difficult to require such guarantees from existing firms, especially the larger ones, but I am confident that departmental officials can develop a formula that would answer farmers' requirements, especially in areas where there are small industries in more or less solid financial position.

This is the plea I am making to the Minister of Agriculture. Could he set up an inquiry into those shameful practices and would it be possible to demand a guarantee from those who want to engage in the slaughtering of hogs, the poultry or livestock trade in general?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I hope the hon. member realizes—and if not, the hon. member for Essex East, who is in the legal business, will enlighten him—that these are matters of provincial responsibility. The dominion government does not issue licences to people to deal in livestock, and it would be beyond our jurisdiction to do so. These matters of property and civil rights are, in general, in the hands of the provinces. Fraudulent practices and similar actions, when they exist, should be prosecuted by the provincial attorneys general concerned. They are not matters with which the dominion Department of Agriculture can deal.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I thank the minister for this information. However, I know he has influence with the Quebec department of agriculture, and I know too that he has many sympathizers here in this house. I therefore ask him to urge upon the provincial government to apply the policy I have just recommended to him.

I am a bit surprised to note that, during the consideration of the various items on agriculture, not one Quebec Conservative member stood up for Quebec farmers. We have to do it all ourselves. I am not complaining about it. I don't mind doing it at all, but just the same I would have liked to hear the version of Quebec Conservative members. In any case, I would ask them to get in touch with the premier, Mr. Duplessis or Mr. Barre, minister of agriculture for the province of Quebec, and suggest that some legislation may be introduced to protect Quebec farmers and especially the small farmers.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must ask him to refrain from dealing with provincial matters when discussing this item.

Mr. Harkness: I think I might also point out that the hon. member is being very unfair, in the remarks he has just made, in connection with members on the government side of the house from the province of Quebec. A large number of members from that province on the government side have taken part in this debate or, I should say, in the examination of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture which is now going on for the seventh or the eighth day.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) has just put on the record certain remarks that I certainly cannot let go unnoticed. Moreover, since he suggested that I take part in the discussion, I should like to inform the house that the unscrupulous dealers he referred to do not operate in my constituency. And, for the information of my hon. friend, I would say it would be preferable—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I asked the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska to refrain from discussing provincial matters, and I hope the hon. member who now has the floor will do the same thing.

Mr. Ricard: I should like you to give me the same chance as you gave the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, because my riding is certainly affected by the words he used. We are harmless merchants, and the people to whom the hon. member was referring are now, as he ought to know, in jail. Moreover, they were not from my riding.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, since it has been suggested to me throughout my constituency I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to cutting out the premium on grade B hogs and increasing the premium on grade A a like amount in an effort to raise the quality of the bacon which the hog areas are producing?

Mr. Harkness: That proposal has been made by various people and organizations along with other proposals and the department has all these proposals under consideration at this time.

27. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $20,000,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief remarks on this item with regard to the distribution of animal feeds in the province of Quebec, and particularly in the Sorel district. In fact, farmers in this district are complaining that they can no longer purchase grain from elevators located in Sorel. I think the owners of these elevators are more interested in handling grain for transshipment purposes than for delivery to farmers.

Some ten constituencies north and south of the St. Lawrence river are entirely dependent on grain elevators in Sorel for their supplies. Last year, farmers had a hard time getting even small quantities of grain from these elevators. This has caused hardship to livestock breeders in the district, because that is where the farmers can get the cheapest grain, taking transportation costs into account.

I therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) whether the North American Elevator Company Limited, which owns these elevators, is authorized to deliver grain to farmers in the Sorel area, and if not, I should like to know why.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am not clear as to what the situation is about which the hon. member complains. This item, however, covers the subsidy we pay on the movement of grain from the western provinces down east or to British Columbia. The question of whether a particular elevator will or will not deliver grain at a farmer's farm does not come under this item at all nor indeed is it a matter within the purview of the Department of Agriculture. We have nothing to do with whether a particular concern delivers grain to a farmer's farm. I should think that would be entirely governed by the law of the province or perhaps it would be a business decision of the company concerned.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions in respect of this item under which we are asked to vote $20 million for freight assistance on feed grain. At this time I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a few matters of importance to my area. I have in my hand a fairly recent communication from the Department of Agriculture a portion of which I should like to place on the record:

> As you know, when we agreed to pay freight assistance on movement out of the British Columbia-Peace River block into other areas of British Columbia, this was the first time we had paid assistance on movement in a province. We did have some reservations about opening up this precedent, but felt that it was completely illogical to pay freight assistance on British Columbia-Peace River grain if it moved via Alberta but not if it moved directly. The British Columbia-Peace River block has always been a part of the western grain-producing area for the purpose of our freight assistance regulations, and therefore we undertook to pay on direct movement over the Pacific Great Eastern.
> The Creston-Wynndel area has never been a part of the western grain-producing area for the purpose of our freight assistance regulations, although I realize that it is a designated area under the wheat board.

At the present time the area in which I live is producing one-half a million bushels of wheat annually. In the over-all picture of Canadian wheat production that is not very large but it is considerable in relation to the output of this area. We are having considerable difficulty in getting our wheat to market due to our geographic location and because of various toll bridges and, incidentally, the fact that we do not have the trans-Canada highway. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention that had the trans-Canada highway been put through the southern section of the province I believe many of our problems would have been removed. Last autumn a news story appeared in local newspapers which caused considerable interest. The press release read:

> British Columbia grain growers will get a federal freight subsidy on feeds shipped to other British Columbia farmers from Peace River and Creston areas.
> At present freight rates, the assistance will be $7.90 a ton from Peace River points, $5.90 from Creston.
> This compares with $6.50 from Calgary and $7.90 from Edmonton, the maximum.

This news item was later refuted by the department. I would request that some consideration be given to the agricultural problems of our area. Not very long ago we had to have a permit before feed grains could be shipped out of our area to coastal markets which involved delay, but thanks to the minister and his department this problem has now been resolved satisfactorily and through their co-operation we are now able to get permits practically on a moment's notice.

A major cause of concern in the constituency of Kootenay East is that we experience difficulty in getting our wheat into the Vancouver market. At the present time a certain degree of discrimination exists against this area of British Columbia. If the assistance referred to in this estimate is to apply to feed grains anywhere in Canada then my area should receive some consideration.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this subsidy for the movement of feed grains is for interprovincial movements and not for movements within a province. That is the reason why the subsidy is not paid on the movement of grain from Creston or Wynndel to other points in British Columbia. Any grain moved from Creston to Ontario would be eligible for assistance. We do not, however, pay the subsidy on wheat moving between Creston and the Okanagan valley or from Kootenay East to Kootenay West which is not very far away. If we did so, the entire subsidy system in respect to the movement of feed grains would have to be completely changed.

At the present time we have received complaints from the corn growers in Ontario over the fact that this subsidy is paid. Some people in Ontario want this subsidy abolished because it puts them at a disadvantage so far as the sale of their corn, wheat or other grains is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister agree with the submission made by the corn growers?

Mr. Harkness: No, I do not. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and all agricultural organizations except those representing solely wheat and corn growers have pressed us to keep this subsidy in operation. If you started to pay a subsidy within a province it would mean you would be saying, in effect, "We will pay the charges on all movements of grain for feeding purposes."

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, would the minister be good enough to answer one question. Can an eastern farmer purchase grain direct from the wheat board or does he have to purchase from a wheat concern?

Mr. Harkness: As long as he takes a carload he can get it direct from the wheat board; but, of course, the wheat board does not sell except in carload lots.

Mr. Argue: Is that quite correct? The wheat board always has an agent through which they sell.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, technically.

Mr. Argue: I think there is an intermediary; it cannot be made out to the wheat board as such.

Mr. Harkness: That is correct.

28. Agricultural lime assistance, $700,000.

Mr. McMillan: Where is this lime used? Is it used in western Canada?

Mr. Harkness: So far as I know, it applies to all the eastern provinces and British Columbia. In other words, the only place to which it does not apply in Canada is the three prairie provinces.

Mr. McMillan: Why is that?

Mr. Harkness: Of course, in those provinces they do not use lime; there is no need for lime.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. McMillan: Why is it that the details show only $500,000 in the fiscal year 1957-58; $900,000 in 1958-59; and $700,000 for this year? Does it mean that they overspent the amount by $400,000?

Mr. Lennard: They are using more lime.

Mr. Harkness: The answer first of all is that we authorized an increase in the rate of assistance, and in addition to that there was an increase in the amount of lime used last year and thus assisted under the program.

Item agreed to.

30. Poultry division, $1,130,289.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with this item, I notice underneath it the following, "Appropriations not required for 1959-60, $40,-511,300." What is meant by that?

Mr. Harkness: That is the acreage payment which we made last year in the three prairie provinces and which has not been provided for in the estimates this year.

31. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $5,153,000.

Mr. Herridge: As the minister knows, he has had repeated requests for years for an amendment to this act to make it apply on a statutory basis to all provinces in Canada. A great deal of interest is taken in this question in British Columbia because the good work which is being done under the act in the prairie provinces and, to a limited extent, I understand, by estimates in other provinces but not by statute, is generally recognized. Can the minister inform the committee whether the government is giving consideration to widening the application of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all provinces in Canada so that they will enjoy the same opportunities?

Mr. Broome: Before the minister answers I would like to add my voice to what has been said by the hon. member. I know we do have several projects going on which are carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. As the hon. member says, these are being carried on under special provisions of the act. If the act were amended to include all of the provinces a great deal of good could be done in British Columbia. You could also change the name of the act from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to "Western Farm Assistance Act", or something along that line.

Mr. Korchinski: I should like to say a few words to the Minister of Agriculture. I hope that he can extend the jurisdiction of the act. Because of the way the act is constituted at the present time some of the areas in my constituency are not covered. This, of course, presents quite a problem to some of the people because there is a considerable amount of diversification going on and many of these people depend on dugouts for their water supply. If they are to diversify they must have water. In some areas certain portions of the municipalities are not covered. This creates a difficulty for the people within the boundaries of a particular municipality.

In addition, I might suggest to the minister that the present rate of compensation paid should be increased. The original intent was to compensate for part of the construction of dugouts and dams. Since then the cost of construction has gone up considerably. Perhaps the time has come when we should take another look at this, and a higher rate of compensation be paid.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as far as the last point is concerned, we increased the rate of help given for dugouts, small irrigation projects and so forth, effective April 1 of this year. At the present time the amount of assistance available for a dugout is $250 rather than $125 which had existed; $300 for one of the small dams in place of $150; and $600 for an irrigation project in place of the $350 which had prevailed before. In other words, the scale of assistance has been practically doubled. As far as dugouts and dams are concerned it was doubled. For the other it was almost doubled. For larger excavations we pay up to seven cents a yard for excavation work in place of the four and one-half cents which had prevailed before.

Now, as far as extending the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all parts of Canada is concerned, to begin with I think perhaps I had better point out that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was brought into existence to do exactly as the act says, namely to rehabilitate certain areas in western Canada, the dry areas of the southern prairies. The provisions of the act were limited to those drier areas. That is why there is the line of demarcation in the western provinces. The areas south of that line are eligible for P.F.R.A. work and benefits, and the areas north of it are not. There has been, of course, constant pressure on to extend that line northwards, and there has been some justification, I think, in certain areas particularly for extending it northwards because drier conditions began to prevail in some areas where they had not prevailed previously. Therefore, there has been some extension of the line northwards.

The work which has been carried on in British Columbia was not carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; it was carried on under special votes appearing in the estimates from time to time. However, it was done by the P.F.R.A. personnel, but it was not part of the prairie farm rehabilitation activities actually or strictly speaking.

Now, as hon. members know, we have a study going on, on a project to put into effect a national soil and water conservation program. We had a conference on this with representatives from all the provinces a few months ago, and it was decided at that conference that this was a thing which would take a considerable amount of preparation in order to get down to anything which would be practical and workable. As a result, it was decided to hold a full-scale conference in 1960. In the meantime, the provincial and dominion officials concerned —it carries over into several departments in both the dominion government on the one hand and the provincial governments on the other—would make the necessary research and preparatory work. As a result of that conference I hope we shall be able to bring into being something in the nature of what you might call a national soil and water authority or organization, which probably would then absorb the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act program as part of its activities. I think that is the way in which the things will move rather than to expand the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act into other provinces.

Mr. Herridge: I was very interested in hearing the minister's explanation when replying to the requests of various members for the extension of the application of the act to all provinces. The minister knows that in my constituency there is a district known as the Slocan valley which has been somewhat depopulated because of certain tendencies on the part of some of the citizens of the district that are not very well appreciated by the other section of the community. Consequently the valley is not producing what it was even 40 years ago.

At the request of the Slocan valley agricultural development association I wrote the minister asking if the federal government would undertake surveys of the acreage, soil, suitability of the soil for certain crops and so on in the valley and the minister replied that favourable consideration would be given to such a request if an application or representations were made by the government of British Columbia. Should that occur, could that sort of thing be undertaken even prior to the development of the legislation the minister has just mentioned?

Mr. Harkness: It could only be undertaken if it were covered by a special vote in the estimates. If the hon. member will look at the estimates he will see one or two special votes. There is a special vote of $150,000 for diking and cutoffs in respect of the Assiniboine and Qu'Appelle rivers. Under the vote for major irrigation and reclamation projects certain projects are named which can be covered in this way but they do not come under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. In the same way supervision of the building of the South Saskatchewan dam is being carried on by personnel of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration but as far as the cost and legislative authority are concerned they are covered by the vote for major irrigation projects.

Mr. Argue: I have a very brief comment having to do with the statement the minister has just made that the amount for which a farmer may be eligible with respect to the construction of a dugout has been increased from $125 to $250. I want to thank the minister because in my opinion this is a very timely move. I think such action should have taken place long ago. I am not holding the minister responsible for the fact that it was not taken long ago because the amount of $125 is the sum that has been paid for many years under a former administration.

With conditions on the prairies extremely dry at the present time and with the development of a very substantial livestock industry, the provision of water becomes a greater and greater problem. Beyond question the agricultural producers on the prairies will welcome the statement of the minister with regard to the increase in the amount that a farmer may receive when a dugout or small dam is constructed. In my opinion what the government has now done is to take into account the very great increase in excavation costs over the years. In view of the increased costs and in view of the great necessity of adequate water supplies, unquestionably this is an essential increase.

Mr. Ormiston: I should like to ask the minister a question regarding the construction of dugouts adjacent to populated localities. As he probably knows, in my area extensive use has been made of P.F.R.A. facilities and I think quite a bit of flexibility has been apparent. I am wondering whether there has been any change of policy during the last couple of years regarding the construction of dugouts in areas such as I have mentioned.

Mr. Harkness: As far as I have been concerned in administering the act I have had regard to the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which lays down very definitely that money expended for dugouts or other purposes under the act must be for the benefit and advantage of agriculture. Wherever it was established that a dugout or a small dam was going to be for the advantage of agriculture in a particular area and was justified on agricultural grounds I have been quite ready to go ahead and authorize its construction in so far as we have had personnel and money available for the purpose. However, I have had a very large number of requests from towns and villages throughout western Canada to construct town water supply systems, in some cases even sewage systems, and in every case I have refused because projects of that sort are not covered by the act and I have no authority under the legislation to expend the taxpayers' money for these purposes.

32. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the western provinces, including payments in respect of the South Saskatchewan river project to be made in accordance with the agreement that was entered into between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Saskatchewan on the 25th day of July, 1958, $14,649,128.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on item 32 which pertains to irrigation and reclamation I should like to be permitted to relate to the house some of the observations I made and impressions I gained last summer when I visited the Taber district of Alberta. Much irrigation has been done in this district. On the day in question a rare opportunity presented itself to me when, on the kind invitation of the district engineer, Mr. Ellaf Olofson, I joined a group of P.F.R.A. engineers and technicians in a tour of inspection of irrigation projects and testing plots. This, I understand, is done about once a month in order to provide P.F.R.A. personnel with an opportunity to familiarize themselves with some of the new methods and latest discoveries in the field of irrigation and reclamation.

I found the tour most interesting and very informative. Although I am a dry land farmer myself, the short inspection tour convinced me of the merits of irrigation and the benefits a farmer can derive from the use of water. One outstanding example was the farm of a young American who had only come to Alberta in 1957. He came originally from a place in the United States where much irrigation is practised, and that is one reason why he wanted to settle in a district in Alberta where irrigation is carried on at the present time. The other reason was the price he would have had to pay for irrigated land in the United States. Here he could buy the same amount of land for about one-tenth of the price he would have had to pay in the United States.

From what I could see this farmer knew irrigation inside out and his first crop last year justifies my statement. He pointed out to us that he had not had enough time to put irrigation to work by growing row crops such as sugar beets and so he had had to be content to grow flax in his first year. The day we were there he was harvesting his flax and according to his estimate it was running about 35 bushels to the acre. It may be of interest to hon. members to know that at present the price of flax is about $3 a bushel. I must say I have never seen a better crop or better sample of flax anywhere.

He told us that he only irrigated his land twice during the year, but the outstanding feature was the method he had applied. It is the so-called corrugated irrigation method which is supposed to be the least expensive and one that requires little labour. If I may be permitted, I should like to try to describe to you this corrugated irrigation process.

The land to be sown to crop is prepared in the usual manner up to the point where it is ready for the drill. Then, the whole field is corrugated with an implement that looks very much like a rod weeder except that there is no rod. There is one row of stiff cultivator shanks spaced about 30 inches apart, instead of rods. There are 8-inch shovels attached to these shanks, and these shovels look very much like miniature irrigation ditchers. This is the implement that is used to ditch the field. This process leaves the whole surface of the field marked with little ditches about eight inches wide, three to four inches deep and, of course, 30 inches apart. The farmer then sows his crop in the ordinary way, running in the same direction as the ditches. One would think that while irrigating a corrugated field some seeds in these ditches would be washed out or drowned. However, from what I could observe there appeared to be just as many stalks in the ditches as in other parts of the fields.

The other place to which we were taken during this tour was a livestock farm or what we would call a cattle feed lot. It, too, was an irrigated farm but instead of having cattle grazing in a pasture the procedure is reversed and the grass is brought to the feed lot for the cattle. The pasture is divided into a number of parcels of equal size. These parcels are used in a revolving order. When the grass is high enough in the first parcel, it is cut and loaded into trucks, all in one operation, and taken to these feed lots. After the grass has been taken off a parcel, the field is irrigated and fertilized if this is required. Then, the operation is moved to the second parcel. This method of pasturing cattle, which is called mechanical grazing, is very economical. Much less land is required and the land can be irrigated and fertilized whenever that is needed. If ordinary pasturing practices were followed this would not be possible because the cattle would be allowed to roam around in the fields. The feeder cattle make much more rapid weight gains and in much less time. All this means a great saving to the farmer in time and money.

In conclusion, I should like to say that in my opinion the P.F.R.A. with its competent staff of engineers and technicians, has done a commendable job in the field of irrigation and reclamation, as well as in other fields. As a result of all this, farmers who can apply themselves to irrigation farming can do this more economically now as a result of the research experience which is passed on to them. It is my firm belief that irrigation should be extended wherever this is possible in Canada. It is an investment in the future of Canada's agriculture.

Mr. Dumas: I wonder if the minister would give the committee a summary of the work done to date in respect of the South Saskatchewan river project?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, by the end of last year we had let six contracts. One of them was for an access road; one was for the substructure for a construction bridge; one was for an abutment on one side of the river, a big earth-moving job; one was for the construction of administrative headquarters for the P.F.R.A. personnel who will be supervising this job. The construction area was provided with sewers, water and so forth so that it could be used by the construction companies in establishing their camps, and so on.

Since that time, we have given out two other contracts. One contract is for the processing of the aggregate, and this was a contract for $812,000. This is to get the aggregate mixture, the crushed stone, gravel and so forth, ready for the concrete work. Another contract was for the construction of a north access road, that is coming in from the north. The first access road was to come in from the east. Those are the contracts that have been let to date. There will be a number of other contracts let during the next month or two months.

Mr. Dumas: What is the estimated amount of the contracts for the access roads?

Mr. Harkness: For the access roads; the first one was $172,469; that was the east access road.

Mr. Dumas: Was that included in the first six contracts?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Dumas: There are now eight contracts?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, with an aggregate of $5.5 million.

Mr. Dumas: I noticed in the estimates, page 122, there is provision for $8.61 million, which is the estimated expenditure for the South Saskatchewan river development project. Is that the total amount for the fiscal year or is there another amount included in this item on page 123?

Mr. Harkness: No, that is the estimated amount which we will expend during this fiscal year.

Mr. Argue: The progress that is being made toward the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam, and the general project, is most welcome. I think the people of Saskatchewan are pleased that this project will, in due course, be completed. I am certain history will show that it was one of the far-sighted policies that has been proceeded with on a joint, co-operative basis between the Saskatchewan government and the federal government. While it was necessary for the federal government to agree before construction could take place, the position of the Saskatchewan government for many years has been that this is a worth-while project and should have been proceeded with long ago. Therefore, because of the co-operative attitude of both governments this project is now under way.

I have a question I should like to raise, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this project. I believe the Minister of Agriculture is very familiar with this general question. I refer to the wage rates that will be paid to workers performing services on that project. Most of the workers involved, no doubt, will be working for the contractors, but there is concern amongst the labouring groups that the wages paid on the South Saskatchewan project will not conform to the general wage rates paid similar labour in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to say that the matter of wage rates is handled by the Department of Labour, therefore, I think the time for him to ask these questions is on the estimates of the Department of Labour which follow immediately after the Department of Agriculture. I have had nothing to do with the matter of wage rates. It has been handled by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Argue: So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to delay the passage of these estimates beyond today. I do know a great deal of the correspondence in regard to this question has come to the Minister of Agriculture. I am quite prepared to discuss it at a later stage with the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Harkness: I referred all the letters to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Argue: I hope the Minister of Labour has taken action in this regard, and that the wages that are paid by contractors will not be low wages, nor will they be the lower wages that are general in the area where the dam is to be constructed.

As hon. members can well realize, the wages that are usually paid in outlying communities are lower than the wages that are paid in the larger urban communities. There will be a great many workers attached to this project. I shall accept the minister's advice. I shall take the matter up with the Minister of Labour when his estimates are before the house. I hope that I can get a satisfactory answer from him. I should be quite happy to have him give us the information now. Certainly this is a situation that requires action by the government.

Mr. Howard: In the details on page 122 I notice that there are two listings which are rather hard to follow. For instance, about half way down the page there is listed "Lillooet river reclamation (Pemberton)". I imagine that is the Pemberton valley in British Columbia. It is under item (13) or one of the items under (13) and it is listed at $150,000. Then right following that, under the heading "Further details for major irrigation and reclamation projects in the western provinces" we again find listed "Lillooet river reclamation (Pemberton), $150,000". By looking quickly at these details, it would appear to me that all of the items listed in one section are just re-listed again farther down.

Mr. Harkness: It is just a different type of breakdown for the convenience of hon. members.

Mr. Howard: So that they will be able to see the actual projects?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Howard: There are two in British Columbia. One is the Lillooet river reclamation (Pemberton) and the other one is the British Columbia fruit lands irrigation.

36. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $630,069.

Mr. Argue: On item 36 dealing with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a request that was sent to the Minister of Agriculture some time ago by Mr. Harry Riviere, who is secretary of the rural municipality of Brokenshell, at Trossachs. His suggestion to the minister was an excellent one, I thought. It had to do with the practice of the office of the prairie farm assistance officials. He made the point to the minister that when an area has been surveyed as to whether or not it will be eligible for prairie farm assistance, the result of that survey should be made available to each farmer who has signed a crop report but is subsequently declared ineligible for payment. He points out—and I think from my own experience I can agree with him wholeheartedly—that in a given area that has been inspected, a farmer who has signed a crop report and hopes he will be eligible for prairie farm assistance but who is subsequently found under the act to be ineligible, does not find this out by any direct communication from the office but merely hears it very often from some of his neighbours who are eligible and who receive cheques. Then the farmers who have been shut out under the provisions of the act immediately begin writing to the office criticizing the department and asked for reinspection and so on. His suggestion was that there should be a short note sent out. It could be a mimeographed note, probably, that could be used as a standard thing. There might have to be a number of various forms but it certainly would not have to be a new letter in each case. His suggestion was that producers who have had their crops inspected or their yields inspected should be notified when they are ineligible for payment.

I know the minister has had that letter among the many letters he receives. I do not know whether he has given it any further consideration since he has received it. However, to my mind it was a constructive suggestion. There may be some obvious objection to that kind of practice; I would not know. However, I certainly feel that it is something that should be given sympathetic consideration.

Mr. Harkness: I gave consideration to it. I made some inquiries as to how many letters this procedure would involve. I think it ran to somewhere between 100,000 and 150,000 letters. Of course, the administrative cost of this procedure would be considerable. It is a thing which I think we might handle by sending letters out only to the people in a particular municipality who are not paid.

Mr. Argue: Oh, yes; that is right. There is no need to send a letter to a man who is going to be paid. He gets his cheque and a little note with it, which was the practice initiated by the previous administration so that the provincial government would not get any credit for it and that is perfectly understandable. He gets a little note saying, "This payment comes to you from the federal government". I have no objection to that procedure. We might as well keep our people as well informed as we can. Certainly there would be no need to send a letter to people who are getting a cheque. The cheque itself is information enough for people who are eligible. But for those who are ineligible—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a result of your speech, the minister would like to send cheques to everybody.

Mr. Argue: I should be happy to see that but I am not nearly as optimistic as is my friend the hon. member for Essex East. But in fairness to the Minister of Agriculture, may I say this, and it is nice to end a discussion of the estimates of the department on a kindly note. I can say without fear of successful contradiction that the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in recent months has shown a great improvement over its administration in former years. If the Leader of the Opposition says that that is not a friendly note, if he would check with the farmers who have been receiving cheques he would find that they consider it a friendly thing and a correct thing because certain amendments that were brought into the act on a previous occasion have made it possible for more producers who have crop failures and are entitled to benefit under the act to receive payment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member not agree that the administration under Mr. Gardiner perhaps has never been excelled?

Mr. Argue: I do not agree with that statement. I would say it has never been excelled as a political machine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: In other respects, it has been excelled. After this government has been in office for a few years—and we hope it is not too long— they may have learned some of the tricks that the former minister of agriculture used to use.

I want to say to the minister that if he would accept my suggestion he would get less criticism of his department. The farmers today are pleased that more of them—although not as many as they would wish because the matter is still not on an individual basis—who have a crop failure are in fact able to get payment.

Mr. Bigg: I have just one point to make.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Pearson: Five o'clock.

Mr. Bigg: There is one small point I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. There are farmers who have permit books and who are paying in under P.F.A.A. but they will never be eligible for payment under P.F.A.A. because they could never be included in a six-section group. They have made representations to me that they think it would be only fair that, if they were not eligible for payment, their payment books should be marked specially so that they will not be obliged to make payment or so that they can get reimbursement. It is impossible for them to benefit under this act and they should like to be removed from the paying end.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That concludes the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of public bills pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

LUTHERAN CHURCH—CANADA

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-18, to incorporate Lutheran Church—Canada.

He said: As sponsor of this measure it is my privilege to provide information to this house and reasons why, in my submission, favourable consideration should be given to its passage. This bill seeks to give corporate status to the members of this Lutheran church in Canada who are adherents to the Missouri synod. In the early years, and up to the present time, members of this church have been organized into three districts, namely, Ontario, Manitoba-Saskatchewan, and Alberta-British Columbia. These three bodies have done the preliminary work with a view to becoming one body, and are now seeking incorporation. In addition to those belonging to the three groups I have mentioned, there are others who have, because of proximity to other Lutheran churches in the United States, been affiliated in the United States districts. These will also be included in the body now being incorporated.

At the present time this church is affiliated with the Missouri synod of the church in the United States, but preparations are now being made for the establishment of an independent Canadian body in the future. The church has congregations in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Television and radio coverage is provided in all the provinces. At present there are about 333 congregations and 76,000 baptized members.

Mr. Speaker, the object of the corporation shall be:

[Mr. Bigg.]

(a) to promote, maintain, superintend and carry on in accordance with the faith, doctrines, constitution, acts and rulings of the corporation any or all of the work of that body;

(b) to advance and increase the diffusion of the faith of the corporation in all lawful ways;

(c) to organize, establish, maintain and carry on residences, missions, churches, places of worship, parsonages, orphanages, homes for the aged, rest homes and institutions and agencies for promoting, teaching, propagating and disseminating the Lutheran faith and doctrine and for training persons for the said purposes;

(d) to promote, organize, establish, maintain and carry on social service, welfare and guidance institutions and agencies;

(e) to promote education, instruction and culture, and to organize, establish, maintain and carry on schools, colleges, academies, seminaries, institutions of learning, recreational halls, centers and agencies, and industrial, technical and agricultural institutes and farms;

(f) to promote charity and to care for the poor, and to organize, establish, maintain and carry on charitable institutions, hospitals, clinics, dispensaries and cemeteries;

(g) to organize, establish, maintain and carry on libraries and houses and agencies for printing, publishing and disseminating literature, news papers, periodicals and works of education, religion, art and science;

(h) to promote the spiritual welfare of all the congregations and mission fields of the corporation.

As a member of this church, and on behalf of all its members I would appreciate the approval of this bill by the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

EXPORT FINANCE CORPORATION OF CANADA LIMITED

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-17, to incorporate Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate a company under the name of the Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited. The objects of the corporation would be to finance the exchange of commodities between Canada and other nations of the world, and to facilitate the overseas trade of Canada by extending credit for the export of various agricultural and manufactured products.

The general lending policy of the corporation would be two-fold: first, assistance to Canadian companies and exporters in financing exports of these products which I have mentioned and, second, the provision of loans to foreign governments, corporations and importers for financing the purchase of Canadian materials, equipment and services as they are required in the development of industry and natural resources abroad.

Applicants for loans would be required to show a good credit standing, and in addition the assured ability to obtain the dollar exchange necessary to service the loan. Loans would be made only for specific purposes, that is, loan commitments would be entered into only upon the borrower providing ample evidence that the proceeds would be used for the purchase of Canadian products, goods or services.

Most of the important exporting countries of the world are assisted in their export trade by similar lending agencies either governmental or private. Since Canada has in recent years become increasingly dependent on her export trade, it is most important that our export business be given every encouragement in the increasingly competitive world markets. The corporation will provide financing facilities such as have been available in England through various merchant guilds that have operated in that country for many decades and which contributed so much toward making England one of the world's great trading nations.

This particular field of export financing is normally beyond the scope of the Canadian chartered banks because it presumes the granting of credits on a much more extended basis than that exercised by the banks. The corporation's services are intended to complement but not compete with those presently offered by the chartered banks. While it is intended that the corporation will enter all aspects of export-import financing, including the granting of long term credit, it will not entertain any type of financing obtainable from a chartered bank in Canada.

The chartered banks have not wanted to make long term loans of this nature because there is no agency presently operating in Canada where the banks could discount these loans. Perhaps it is not generally recognized that while the federal government will insure credit extended to foreign buyers it does not provide the credit. The establishment of a financing agency such as is proposed in this bill which will trade in these credits as well as providing them should meet a definite need in Canada for the continued development of her export market in agricultural and manufactured products.

It is contemplated that the corporation would entertain proper loans for sums as low as $500. It is not proposed that a maximum figure should be established and should any single transaction or series of transactions call for a higher amount of financing than the corporation is willing to entertain it might form a financing syndicate with other lenders in order that the total financial assistance required could be furnished.

It is not anticipated that instalment financing would mature in a period any greater than five years. However, the corporation would be willing to participate with others ready to accept maturities for longer periods. With regard to the financing of projects or developments, maturities might extend up as far as 20 years. The interest rates to be charged by the corporation would vary from transaction to transaction and from country to country depending on the financial terms, the credit of the borrower and the guarantees furnished.

It is proposed that the corporation would have a capitalization of $50 million represented by 10 million shares of the par value of $5 each and it appears at the present time that some of the chartered banks of Canada, if not all of such banks, will be subscribers to the capital of the corporation. I have also been advised that when the capital stock of the corporation is offered for sale the public will be given the opportunity to subscribe and take up the remainder of any such offering.

The bill, of course, will be referred to the appropriate committee where hon. members will have ample opportunity to discuss it fully with its sponsors who will sit in with committee members to give a full explanation with respect to each clause and answer any and all questions in regard to the general policy of the corporation. The chairman of the standing committee on banking and commerce of the other place, had the following remarks to make with regard to the testimony of the witnesses that appeared before the committee:

> We had before us in the committee representatives of several banks. I particularly recall Mr. E. Ernst, assistant general manager of the Bank of Montreal, who said that in his view this bill was sound in principle and would fill a gap in our financing of exports. He thought it would be of great value to Canadian industry. Mr. Arthur Mayne, associate general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada, supported that view. Mr. K. W. Taylor, deputy minister of finance, indicated to the committee that there was a definite field for the kind of thing contemplated in this bill and which does not now exist in financing in Canada. Mr. Hugh Aitken, president of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, was very strong in his statement as to the purpose which a company of this kind could serve. He indicated there would be no conflict between the operations of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and this new corporation, if and when it is incorporated.

The chairman of the committee then went on to say:

> In the course of our consideration of the bill in committee, we had before us not only these bankers and other men I have already mentioned, but also a Mr. Stanger, who was one of the promoters of the bill. We also had Mr. Hurter, the head of a very large engineering firm with engineering operations in various parts of the world, who was able to cite chapter and verse from contracts and tenders that had been invited from various parts of the world, this year, last year and the year before. The nature of the capital goods required was such that Canada could have been in the competitive market, but the terms presented difficulties. For instance, Egypt wanted five years' credit in relation to certain capital goods, and although some manufacturers in Canada considered the invitation tender, not one was in a position to take on the job, because not one could get the financing. I say this corporation is intended to fill that need. Whether it will do so completely, or at all, will depend upon how skillfully it is operated once it is incorporated and gets going.

After having read the report of the committee, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate that body on the excellent job they did in scrutinizing this bill and for the suggestions they made that formed the basis of the amendments that brought this bill up to the excellent standard and form in which it is now presented to this house.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few brief comments in seconding this motion. The company which seeks incorporation will fulfil a very great need that exists at the present time in respect to the field of foreign exports. Many of our Canadian companies have been under a great handicap in competing for foreign trade because many of the foreign purchasers, like our local consumers, are purchasing on credit and although the Export Credits Insurance Corporation has been of great assistance in guaranteeing the credit to other companies it has not assisted our companies by being able to turn their sales into cash and thus enabling them to continue the financing of further business. Therefore, this company will fulfil a need which, as the sponsor said, the commercial banks are not able to do.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that this company will be able to purchase or discount foreign trade papers which are received by Canadian companies in their selling of goods, and it will also be able to give credit assistance to foreign buyers of goods and services. I think we see here a very definite note running through the whole bill of emphasis on assisting those who wish to buy Canadian goods or set up companies in other countries using Canadian materials. I understand that at the present time there are such countries as Ceylon, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Pakistan, South Africa, Indonesia, Malaya, Egypt, Uruguay requesting certain capital and consumer goods, and they wish to buy those on credit. They cannot do so in Canada. Our companies cannot sell to those countries under the present international arrangement, as far as credit is concerned, with our own banking facilities. This company will provide such facilities.

I think this company is to be commended on its leadership and private initiative in providing a need in our private enterprise, permitting our companies to sell their goods abroad without waiting upon government action in this connection. The interested parties are banding together to fulfil this great need in our export trade.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the bill before the house this afternoon marks a very significant development in Canada's trading relationships with the rest of the world. As I listened to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) who sponsored the bill, outlining the discussion that took place in the other place it seemed remarkable to me that we have been so long delayed in having private participation in this important activity. During recent years the whole trading position of Canada with respect to the rest of the world has changed dramatically, and there has been a golden opportunity for private initiative and enterprise to take a constructive role. Yet it has remained until this occasion for the first halting steps to take place in this worthwhile field of endeavour.

During the past decade or so the government of Canada has taken on many activities to facilitate Canada's trading position with respect to the rest of the world, but there has been a vacuum in this area. It seems to me this is going to be merely the beginning of a further step forward in Canada's trading position.

As a western member I am especially interested in this development, of course, because many of the economic problems that are ours on the prairies can only be resolved as we move as a nation, as a government and as private citizens, to develop and expand our trading activities in other parts of the world.

We in the west have surplus agricultural products to contend with from time to time. Of course, this applies to other agricultural areas in Canada. It seems to me, that the activities of this new Export Finance Corporation can be very usefully directed toward helping in a small way to correct the economic imbalance of the prairies.

As I understand the remarks of the hon. member who sponsors this bill, it relates itself to agricultural products as well as to manufactured articles and industrial articles generally. It also seems to me that this is about the best kind of credit for export and import purposes that could be made available. We have in Canada as a crown activity the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. I presume that any loans taken up by both exporters and importers under the operations of this company will be insurable by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. This suggests that there is absolutely no risk involved at all for those who want the facilities of this corporation. When that fact is generally known I am sure it will be a further incentive to those who wish to make use of the financial operations of the corporation.

I notice that in the reference to the interest rates the observation is made that these will be flexible; that there is no fixed interest charge for the operations of loans under this corporation. I would only suggest, that I trust the interest rates will be reasonable and in line with prevailing rates. It seems to me that any financial activity is discouraged or encouraged largely by the interest rates established. In view of the flexibility that is available to those who will be carrying on the operations of this corporation I would presume that they will take an entirely reasonable approach. I hope, too, that the inauguration of this company will be just the beginning of similar activities along these lines.

If Canada is to correct the imbalance of her trading relations that have developed in a move toward the position of a world trader, it is going to require all the ingenuity and all the energy of private citizens everywhere, as well as the operations already supported by the government of Canada.

Again, I would say that as a member from western Canada it would seem to me that this is a large contribution to make in encouraging our agricultural industry, in assisting toward diversification and thus resolving one of our basic problems, and also —and perhaps this is even more important because it is a new aspect of industrial activity on the prairies—encouraging the growing activities of our manufacturing industries in the west by providing further outlets for their products in the foreign markets of the world.

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join other hon. members in congratulating the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir). I was particularly interested in his statement concerning one of the witnesses who appeared before the investigating committee of the other place, a highly trained and qualified engineer who said that the advertising of Canadian engineering skill abroad had opened up tremendous export opportunities to Canadian manufacturing concerns but unfortunately because of the credit restrictions which are naturally imposed by Canadian banking firms the manufacturers have been unable to take advantage of these opportunities in foreign countries. The establishment of such a company is provided for by the bill, a company which will advance to manufacturing concerns possibly very large amounts of money, will give the Canadian people a greater degree of employment than they have had in the past. A lot of these projects referred to by the hon. member involve large orders for machinery and equipment and naturally under present regulations the manufacturer cannot afford to extend long term credit to the country ordering the goods.

Under the bill the Export Finance Corporation of Canada will be permitted to advance to manufacturers the capital expenditures required. Testimony was given by the same person before the committee of the other place that in the past two years somewhere between $6 million and $28 million in orders for heavy equipment had been lost to Canadian industry simply because we had no such credit corporation.

In France and Germany bankers, machinery suppliers, general contractors and engineering firms have pooled their resources to establish a revolving fund and in this way have overcome the problem. In his evidence this man stated that they had investigated an order for machinery in Brazil, machinery which could have been made in Canada involving approximately $12 million. That is a tremendous amount of money for a single order. He also stated that he had discovered that there was strong good will toward Canada and Canadians especially in the so-called underdeveloped nations. He also went on to refer to a tremendous order in Chile involving some $17 million which could have been manufactured in Canada but because of the lack of credit facilities to the companies concerned was lost. There was a recent engineering project in Mexico City and the authorities there were quite willing to place the order with Canadian manufacturers even at a higher figure than would have been the case elsewhere but although approximately $15 million was involved the order was lost by Canadian manufacturers and employees.

The capitalization is only $50 million and I feel sure that within the next two years we will find that with respect to heavy industry alone this sum will be oversubscribed. I admit, as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) says, that perhaps the company is not running too much of a risk because of our Export Credits Insurance Act. However, any venture involving such large sums carries with it a certain amount of risk and I am not prepared to quarrel with this company at all with respect to any reasonable sum which they will charge for the use of the money, nor am I prepared to quarrel with the government's present policy with regard to the Export Credits Insurance Act.

We must remember that immediately south of us in the United States there is a government agency which looks after most large orders involving the export of machinery. I refer to the United States export-import bank. From what I have read in the newspapers I understand that in the past some difficulties have been encountered by business in floating loans through the Canadian government agency. However, with this private corporation in operation there will at least be no political implications whatsoever.

I would expect that with this corporation in operation there would be more processing of our raw materials before export. I certainly agree wholeheartedly with the sponsor of the bill that this is an excellent move and that it would be a good thing for the house to pass the bill.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-17, to incorporate Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited, involves such an important principle and is of such purport that it should have been introduced as a government measure for the establishment of a crown corporation or agency. However, in view of the fact that the government has given no indication of any such intention and has nothing in mind as far as we know that would cover the provisions of this bill and in view of the fact that there is a need for such an operation, let me say as clearly as I can, since everybody seems to support the bill and nobody objects to it, let us put it to a vote.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this group of bills we are considering today brings us a little over the halfway mark in the amount of work in this particular field that will confront the House of Commons this session. There are a few points with which I should like to deal this afternoon in moving the second reading of these bills, points which are directly related to individual cases that are to be found amongst the group we are considering.

Since the house earlier today heard hymns of praise from various members in favour of the women's institutes, I should like to refer to something absolutely new that has crept into the divorce practice in the province which sends its cases to us. For the first time, so far as I am aware, we have had the appearance of lady detectives before a parliamentary committee. These charming creatures ordinarily operate in civil life, in one instance as a saleslady and in the other instance as a photographer. They have chosen to supplement their income by doing a bit of investigating. They appeared, for those members who are curious, in those cases presented in the 180th report of the committee of the other place which deals with these cases.

It might be refreshing, Mr. Speaker, to put into the record some brief extracts from the testimony of these ladies.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCleave: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. member got photographs of the ladies that he would like to put in Hansard?

Mr. McCleave: No, but I daresay they would be very photogenic. It is difficult, under the circumstances, to read the testimony of one of these private eyes because she uses such phrases as, "I says", and other mutilations of the English language which seem to suggest a greater familiarity with the work of Mickey Spillane than with the ordinary rules of grammar.

However, I did not intend to comment on that, but rather to answer the point I am sure most of the members of the house will be asking and that is, how did these ladies turn out as witnesses? It must be said for them that they brought their cases to a very successful conclusion. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that there are certain rules of law which frown on hearsay evidence and which, in short, tend to keep witnesses right to the point of the case. I must say that the ladies did manage to put a great deal of hearsay evidence on the record before the committee of the other place. I can only presume that the gentlemen who heard the evidence were extraordinarily gallant that day and gave a certain leeway to these lady detectives.

For example, I might say that the elder of the lady detectives was waiting outside an apartment where the rendezvous was taking place between the respondent and the co-respondent. This is the evidence she gave to the Senate committee, and I cite this as an example of the kind of hearsay evidence that crept into the record:

> Around 6, not more after 6, I saw that man coming around the street and he came through the building and he went to his apartment, same apartment; and we sat down and wait; it was a warm, warm day in August. I said, "Well, we can have lunch; they will have their supper, I suppose;"—

That is quite irrelevant, but the senators allowed it to go on the record. Then, they had a cup of tea and came back a few minutes afterwards. By this time it was 7.30 and the ladies waited around till 10 or 11 at night. Then, they marched in upon their quarry at 11.30. Then, continuing to quote from the testimony of the elder of the two detectives, I read:

> —I said to my witness, "It is O.K.; it is late enough"; because it is a big apartment, of course, and I knew before that.

They went in, and carried out this investigation very well. Indeed, they acted just like men detectives. Once the door was opened, one of them stuck her foot in it so it could not be closed, and they both marched in. The younger lady detective got a little bit excited and did not make all the notes she should have made as to what was observed. While both of them were lady detectives, they did not seem to be agreed as to the nightdress that was worn by the co-respondent. One said she had a nightgown or the top part of pyjamas, but the other one was not sure.

This case is one of several in which certain people connected therewith have taken up detective occupations at night, forsaking such ordinary occupations as lingerie salesman, insurance adjuster and other jobs. There have been any number who have appeared before parliament to give evidence in cases, including several in the group of cases we are considering now. Quite a number of these amateur detectives do not have licences issued by either the provincial or municipal authorities in Quebec. This, to me, seems to be a growing practice. Anybody in Montreal can try his hand at playing detective, without going through the legal formalities of being licensed to do so. I merely draw this to the attention of the people in Quebec because they may wish to consider this problem.

Also included in the cases before us this afternoon are several which indicate that there may be a new pattern developing in the city of Montreal, a sort of new switch on the motel and hotel type of case that has bothered parliament for some years. In making a check of these cases to try to analyse the pattern developing I found the same lawyers, the same firm of detectives and sometimes the same hotels or motels were involved. However, I came upon a curious set of cases in this particular batch in which the same lawyer, the same detectives were always involved; the evidence was very much the same, but in each case the rendezvous had occurred in some young lady's apartment. It was not the same young lady in each case, but it was an apartment. It seems to me that the people down there who connive and contrive at these particular cases have hit upon this as a new modus operandi to try to pull the wool over the eyes of the members in the other place and the members in this House of Commons. It would seem they make arrangements with the young women so that the husband goes to an apartment instead of a hotel or a motel. This will be an extraordinarily difficult thing to check, but nonetheless it seems to have developed into a set pattern. There may be attempts to impose on parliament—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit another question? Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether he is moving the adoption of these bills or speaking against them?

Mr. McCleave: The answer to this question could lead me into a very philosophic discussion about the role of the chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

The practice was developed years ago of having the chairman on the committee act as sponsor for all these bills. It made things somewhat easier than would be the case with lawyers or petitioners running around badgering members of parliament to sponsor particular bills before parliament. I am in a curious position. My name is down as sponsor for each one of these divorce bills. Three hundred or so of these bills were dealt with last year and I suspect that 400 will be dealt with this year. I conscientiously go through them so that if other members should raise questions about them I will be able to give some assistance to the house or to the committee if we are in committee on them.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Winch: Does not the sponsor have to stand behind every fact of the bill that he introduces?

Mr. McCleave: I hope not.

Mr. Winch: It would be most interesting if the hon. member could do that.

Mr. McCleave: If that is my position as sponsor, I would have no recourse than to walk out of the House of Commons. I could not in conscience say that it was my duty to stand behind every statement of fact or every statement of a witness before the committee of the other place nor do I conceive that to be my duty either.

Mr. Winch: You could not do it anyway.

Mr. McCleave: As I see it, the position of myself, both as sponsor and as chairman of the committee which has to deal with these cases, is that when I speak to the house I must speak more in the role of chairman than as sponsor. Perhaps I am wrong, but that is the way I see it.

There is a case here, namely Bill SD-178, in which the co-respondent and the respondent went to a motel on what one detective described as an extremely snowy night. I think that case will deserve particular consideration in committee. It seems to have a rather unpleasant odour about it. But in accordance with the practice of the house, which is on second reading to treat more with the principle than with the particulars of the individual bill, I am asking that these bills be given second reading. We shall have an opportunity to consider the more difficult cases in our committee where, I might say, we are already holding up the eleven bills for special consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on looking at the clock, it appears to me that it is now six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must be looking at a different clock. Pursuant to standing order 105, the said bills stand referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Frechette, seconded by Mr. Richard (Kamouraska), moved that Bill

C-21, an act to amend the Representation Act, be now read the third time and passed. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there was an understanding that these other orders would not be proceeded with and that we would call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to give us the business for Monday and for as much as possible of next week so that we can be prepared to deal with it?

Mr. Green: On Monday we shall continue the debate on the budget resolutions in the order which I gave the other evening. That would be followed by the resolution concerning the Unemployment Insurance Act. I cannot give the business for each day definitely but this will at least be the manner in which we start off. When estimates are called next week they will be the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it definitely the intention to go on with the budget resolutions on both Monday and Tuesday? If the minister could indicate that intention it would be of great convenience to us on this side of the house.

Mr. Green: If they are not finished on Monday we would go on with them on Tuesday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

REPORT OF FIRST MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Held in Washington, D.C.,
January 9 and 10, 1959

On August 12, 1958, the House of Commons gave unanimous approval to a proposal of the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Prime minister, in the following terms:

My proposal is that I should request the Speaker of this honourable house, in consultation with his colleague in the other place, to establish a committee of members of both houses and for all parties, for the purpose of exploring jointly with appropriate representatives of the executive and legislative branches of the government of the United States the means whereby increased systematic discussions between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern may be provided.

Similar authorizations were given in the Canadian Senate and in the congress of the United States of America. Correspondance and preliminary discussion began in September but it was found that a first group meeting for organization purposes could not take place conveniently until after the congressional elections in November, 1958. Accordingly, the first interparliamentary group meeting was planned for and held in Washington on January 9 and 10, 1959, immediately after the opening of the 86th congress and immediately before the opening of the second session of the 24th parliament.

Representation

United States Group

The United States group was made up of four Republicans and four Democrats, four of whom were Senators and were selected as a subcommittee of the Senate committee on foreign relations, namely, Senator George D. Aiken, Republican from Vermont and chairman of the Senate group, Senator Homer E. Capehart, Republican from Indiana, Senator Wayne L. Morse, Democrat from Oregon and Senator Michael J. Mansfield, Democrat from Montana. The four from the House of Representatives were named by the house committee on foreign affairs and comprised: Mrs. Edna F. Kelly, congresswoman from New York, Democrat, who was chairman of the house group, Frank M. Coffin, congressman from Maine, Democrat, Walter H. Judd, congressman from Minnesota, Republican, and Chester Earl Morrow, congressman from New Hampshire, Republican.

Canadian Group

Although there were only eight in the United States group they generously consented to a Canadian group of nine which would permit a more balanced representation of both Canadian houses and all three Canadian political parties. Accordingly the Canadian group was constituted with the approval of all party leaders as follows:

From the Senate, Hon. Mark Drouin, Speaker of the Senate, Hon. Wm. R. Brunt of Hanover, Ontario (P.C.), Hon. Sydney John Smith of Kamloops, B.C. (Lib.), and from the House of Commons, Hon. Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, member for Laurier (Lib.), Hazen Argue, member for Assiniboia (C.C.F.), Wm. L. Houck, member for Niagara Falls (Lib.), Erik Nielsen, member for Yukon, (P.C.), and Richard D. Thrasher, member for Essex South (P.C.).

Washington Meeting

The Canadian group left Ottawa at 4 p.m. on Thursday, January 8, by Department of Transport Viscount aircraft and arrived at Washington at 6 p.m. where they were met by a number of members of the American group and conducted to the Mayflower hotel where they were accommodated until their return by similar transport on Sunday morning, January 11. The Canadians were accompanied by their wives and by three members of the Canadian parliamentary press gallery.

Reception in Washington

The Canadian delegation was received with the greatest cordiality and shown the highest consideration by the President, the State Department and both houses of congress as well as by the Canadian embassy. The highlights were:

Friday, January 9

9:00 a.m.—The President of the United States received both delegations, wives and reporters at the White House.

12:00 noon—Attendance of the Canadian delegation at a joint session of congress for the state of union address by the President of the United States.

1.30 p.m.—Luncheon, Speaker's dining room, house side of the Capitol attended by many congressmen including the chairman of most of the standing committees.

3.00 p.m.—Reception of Canadian delegation on the floor of the Senate at which short speeches of welcome were made by sixteen U.S. senators. The text of these speeches appears as an appendix to Hansard of January 23, 1959, at page 288.

6.30 p.m.—Reception given by the Canadian chargé d'affaires, a.i., A. E. Ritchie at the Canadian chancery, attended by both delegations and many guests from congress and the State Department.

8.00 p.m.—Dinner at the Mayflower hotel at which the chairmen of the Senate foreign relations committee and the house foreign affairs committee were hosts.

Saturday, January 10

1.00 p.m.—Lunch in the old supreme court room on the Senate side of the Capitol, attended by senators and congressmen, including Speaker Rayburn.

6.00 p.m.—State Department reception for both delegations and other guests in the President's guest house.

Business Sessions

The two delegations met in business sessions on the afternoon on Friday, January 9, at which Congresswoman Edna Kelly was chairman, and on the morning of Saturday, January 10, at which Senator George D. Aiken was chairman. Press releases were given at the end of each business session and there was a short meeting with the representatives of the press on Saturday afternoon.

Recommendations of Conference

The conference unanimously agreed to make the following recommendations to their respective bodies:

Name

A suitable name for this and subsequent meetings would be: "Canada-United States interparliamentary group" or "United States-Canada interparliamentary group", depending on which country was host.

Future Meetings

Future meetings between the legislators of both countries were both feasible and desirable. There should be at least two such meetings each year, one in each country. The next meeting should be held in Canada at the end of June, at the time of the official opening of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Canada—U.S. Interparliamentary Group

Organization

Organization of meetings should be in the hands of a small steering committee, composed at first of the present group, but subject to change in accordance with the following principles:

(a) There should be equal numbers from each country;

(b) Eight was possibly a suitable number for this committee, but notification could be given by either side if it wished to change the number or composition of its representation on the steering committee;

(c) Each would keep the other informed of its wishes in this matter.

Staff

There should be a joint relationship between the staffs of the two groups to arrange schedules and make other administrative provisions. Appropriate staff would be provided by each group as required. Experts on each side would not sit in on discussions.

Financing

Each group would pay its own transportation to the host country and hotel bills. The host country would pay other expenses. This arrangement would be subject to revision if meetings did not alternate between the two countries.

Character of Meetings

It was agreed that substantially larger numbers of congressmen and parliamentarians should participate in future meetings, that such meetings should not always be held in Washington and Ottawa, and that the group might divide into smaller parties on occasion and visit areas of special interest. It was suggested that at the next meeting twenty-four from each country would be an appropriate number. It was agreed that the meetings should be informal in character and that the purpose was to exchange information and to promote better understanding of our common interests, and accomplishments, as well as our differences and difficulties, rather than to arrive at binding decisions. It was understood that neither group would have authority to commit or bind its respective legislatures or government.

Agenda for Discussion

Without attempting to settle an agenda for the next meeting in June the following topics for discussion were suggested: defence relationships, trade problems, boundary water issues, wheat disposal, investment policies, defence production arrangements as under the Hyde Park agreement, fisheries problems and joint action for peace.

Canada—U.S. Interparliamentary Group

Agenda Committee

It was agreed that an agenda committee composed of Senators Aiken and Drouin, Speaker Michener and Congresswoman Edna Kelly should be given the responsibility of settling the agenda for the next meeting. The agenda would be made up of:

1. The topics selected by the agenda committee.

2. Such additional topics as the agenda committee might place on the agenda on written request from delegates given one month prior to the date of the next meeting.

3. Any other business which there was time to discuss after the set agenda had been disposed of.

Ground Rules

For the conference in Washington, the delegates agreed on the following rules which, subject to change, would be appropriate for future meetings:

1. The host country would provide the chairmen for the business sessions.

2. Business sessions are to be held in camera, that is, without the press or experts or any staff except one or two secretaries from each side present for the purpose of preparing summaries of the discussion and drafting press releases for approval.

3. Delegates will be free to say what matters were discussed in the business meetings but shall not attribute any statement to any delegate.

4. Press releases will be issued at the close of the business meetings or conference outlining in a general way the course of the discussions.

5. Each group will be free to report on the conference to its authorizing committee or legislature, as well as to its state department and government.

On behalf of the Canadian group, April 29, 1959.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. JOHN'S HOUSING AUTHORITY—FEDERAL NOMINEES

Motion No. 98—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of any letter or letters exchanged since January 1, 1959, between the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland and the minister of municipal affairs of Newfoundland, regarding the appointment of federal nominees to the St. John's housing authority.

He said: For the purpose of rewording this motion, I would ask that it be withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Motion No. 99—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

For a copy of all communications exchanged between any member of the government on the one hand, and organizations representative of workers on the other, in connection with the recent appointment of a commissioner to the unemployment insurance commission.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the motion is agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—REPORTED RETIREMENT OF GENERAL PARTRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government was consulted by General Partridge or by the United States authorities about the forthcoming retirement of General Partridge as commander of NORAD, a retirement which has been reported to be the consequence of a major policy dispute.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer might well be given by the Minister of National Defence, and I pass the question to him.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, according to the NORAD agreement the governments of both the United States and Canada must be consulted before an appointment is made to the post of commander or deputy commander of NORAD. I have reason to believe that the retirement of General Partridge is imminent not because of any dispute as to policy but because he is reaching the period of retirement from his appointment. I have no announcement to make today as to the definite date of his retirement or as to his successor.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister aware that in a recent press conference the United States secretary of defence said that he expected and hoped General Partridge would continue in his command of NORAD after the normal retirement date, which I think is July 31?

REPORTED STATEMENT BY NORAD COMMANDER RESPECTING BOMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of the National Defence whether he would comment on a statement that General Partridge, commander of NORAD, made before the United States house of representatives that—and I am going to quote from the report of that statement as it appeared in the press:

> —the Russians will still be relying on bombers some years from now, will use supersonic rather than subsonic aircraft for this purpose and that therefore we must continue to have jet supersonic interceptors.

May I also ask the minister whether the Canadian government was consulted or informed in advance by General Partridge before giving this statement to congress?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of his intention to ask this question. The quotation the hon. member has used is from a newspaper report, and rather than being a direct quotation from the evidence given by General Partridge before the congressional committee it is an interpretation of the general remarks which were made by the general.

Under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that General Partridge is a United States officer called before the United States congressional committee, I do not feel that it would be proper for me to make any comments on the statement which he is alleged to have made last February.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED APPOINTMENT TO COMMISSION WITHOUT CONSULTATION WITH ORGANIZED LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the controversy surrounding the appointment of Mr. A. F. MacArthur to the unemployment insurance commission. Will the minister comment on the allegation that by proposing the name of Mr. MacArthur as early as January 20 without any prior consultation with organized labour, and by his subsequent appointment without the support of either the Canadian Labour Congress or the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be making more statements of fact than he is asking questions. I suggest that he ask the question he wishes to ask.

Mr. Argue: I rewrote this three times, Mr. Speaker, trying to condense it as much as I could. I am asking the minister, in view of the foregoing, has the government contravened paragraph 2 of subsection 4 of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Then there is a further question. In view of the subsequent resignation of three leading trade unionists from the unemployment insurance advisory committee, is the minister prepared to reopen negotiations with the C.L.C. and the C.C.C.L. in the hope of reaching an agreement with these organizations, so essential to the satisfactory operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Assiniboia was good enough to send me notice of his intention to ask this question about two minutes ago.

Mr. Argue: You have had it for months; you can answer it.

Mr. Starr: The question is in two parts, and in order to give a proper explanation I would ask the house to permit me to make a statement which will answer the first part of this question.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to make a rather extended answer to this question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: Last Friday I announced the appointment of Alastair F. MacArthur, former president of the Ontario federation of labour, as labour representative on the unemployment insurance commission. This appointment has since been described by Mr. Claude Jodoin, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, as "political patronage" and a violation of the consultative clause in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I deny both these charges, Mr. Speaker. First, on the principle of consultation, I may say I discussed the whole matter with Mr. Jodoin on January 30. Again, I may say there was considerable correspondence on the matter in which I asked Mr. Jodoin for nominations and in which he submitted three names. The names submitted by Mr. Jodoin were presented to cabinet and were given the fullest consideration. In addition the name of Mr. MacArthur was submitted, as I had told Mr. Jodoin it would be. Thus, Mr. Speaker, there was full consultation with Mr. Jodoin all along the line. The principle of consultation was carried out and will continue to be carried out. However, it must be made clear that no single group will have an exclusive power of veto over cabinet appointments.

As to Mr. MacArthur's political affiliation, Mr. Speaker, I believe he has already made a statement attesting that he has not been a member of any political party. This should be sufficient. I may say that the question of political affiliation was first brought forward not by myself but by Mr. Jodoin. I may say also that I never questioned the political affiliations of his nominees.

I maintain that Mr. MacArthur's record in the labour movement is the best answer to the charge. As president of the Ontario federation of labour from 1946 to 1956 Mr. MacArthur achieved distinguished eminence in the ranks of labour, and in 1954 was one of three candidates for leadership of the Trades and Labour Congress. He was defeated by Mr. Jodoin. As international representative of the office employees he is familiar with the opinions of labour and the needs of labour. I am sure he will serve with distinction on the unemployment insurance commission. Mr. MacArthur's appointment compares favourably with this government's appointment of Mr. Cleve Kidd to the royal commission on price spreads and the appointment of Mr. Eugene Forsey to the board of broadcast governors. Neither of these men could be described as supporters of the Conservative party.

Over the week end I received and accepted, as a consequence of this appointment, the resignations of Mr. George Burt, Mr. A. Andras and Mr. Jean Marchand from the unemployment insurance advisory committee. Mr. Burt is head of the united automobile workers; Mr. Andras is chief of the legislation department of the congress; and Mr. Marchand is secretary general of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. Like Mr. Jodoin's three nominees for this appointment, all have a record of close affiliation with a political group—not the Progressive Conservative party. I say that political considerations were not absent in these resignations.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that Mr. MacArthur was appointed in the sincere conviction that, having in mind the suitability of all the names put forward—and there were five in all—he would do the best possible job in the interests of organized labour. No other consideration was involved. Already I am pleased to say that I have had ample evidence that it is in this light that this appointment is being viewed by representative labour groups in this country.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: I should be glad if the hon. member for Assiniboia will permit me to answer the second part of this question. The answer to the second part is no.

Mr. Argue: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the indulgence of the house. Since this was a rather lengthy statement that might ordinarily have been made on motions, I should like to make one or two brief comments.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: The house gave consent to a rather extended answer to a question. I consider that it would be appropriate to ask a supplementary question in order to explain it, but if there is to be any debate I think it should be reserved until this matter comes before the house, as it will later this week.

Mr. Argue: Although hon. members opposite may think I might make some comment on the political accusations—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Argue: —I do not intend to do that. In my opinion the principle of the Unemployment Insurance Act—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member for Assiniboia understood me. I regard this procedure as a question and an answer. Anything which follows should be in the nature of a supplementary question in order to elucidate some part of the answer which is not clear. Otherwise I do not regard it as a statement which calls for comment.

Mr. Argue: I misunderstood your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and for that misunderstanding I apologize. My question to the minister is this. How can he consider that consultation took place as provided by the Unemployment Insurance Act, when in a private conversation with the president of the Canadian Labour Congress the minister intimated to the president the man the minister wished to nominate to this position? Is it not an absence of good faith when the minister initially says that Mr. MacArthur is the man he would like to appoint, and follows this through by ignoring the names submitted by the Canadian Labour Congress? That is not consultation, Mr. Speaker; that is compulsion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask a supplementary question arising out of the minister's statement. Would the minister comment on the following words which appear in the letter from Mr. Jodoin to the minister:

Even before you wrote me on February 5, even before you asked the congress to submit its nominees, you had advised me of your intention to recommend the appointment of Mr. A. F. MacArthur.

Mr. Starr: In looking over the various representatives in the labour field who I thought would give leadership in the unemployment insurance commission, I was struck with the qualification of Mr. MacArthur and I submitted his name for consideration by Mr. Jodoin as to whether the qualifications were sufficient in his estimation. We had a full discussion on this matter and I told Mr. Jodoin that along with the nominees who would be submitted by himself for consideration, the name of Mr. MacArthur would be included. In addition to that the railway brotherhood, on their own initiative, submitted another name that was also considered to the fullest extent.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, might I ask a further supplementary question. Did the president of the Canadian Labour Congress ask, by telegrams dated March 24 and April 29, for an interview with the Prime Minister and the ministry to discuss this appointment? Was any reply sent to the telegrams and, if so, what was its nature?

Mr. Starr: I did receive such a telegram from Mr. Jodoin. I am quoting from memory now, but he did ask at the end of the telegram for an appointment with the Prime Minister, which I did not consider to be necessary.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. INTERFERENCE WITH CANADIAN TRUCKS IN TRANSIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Canadian government protested to the United States government about the interference by United States authorities with Canadian trucks in transit from British Columbia to other parts of Canada via the state of Washington? If so, what was the nature and result of such protests?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving notice of this question. I think possibly in order that the record may be clear I might be permitted to refer in general to what actually took place, and also to the representation to the United States which was made by the government.

On February 19, Gill-Pix Express Lines were stopped by United States customs from passing their trucks in bond through the United States because they were suspected of transporting goods being imported from mainland China. The company made representations to the United States authorities, and at a later date the problem was drawn to the attention of the Department of External Affairs by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

A letter was sent from the department to the United States embassy pointing out that the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, that is the general agreement on tariffs and trade, provided that there should be freedom of transit through the territory of each contracting party regardless of the place of origin of the goods being transported. The United States embassy was asked why this provision did not ensure the right of Canadian trucking firms to pass their trucks through the United States in bond regardless of the origin of the goods being shipped.

The United States embassy has since replied to the letter from the department and indicated that since the beginning of the Korean hostilities there had been an embargo by the United States authorities on all commercial relations between the United States and mainland China, including the use of transit facilities for goods from mainland China. It is, I understand, the view of the United States authorities that the action they have been taken is in accordance with the general agreement on tariffs and trade, article XXI, which reads in part:

> Nothing in the agreement shall be construed . . . to prevent any contracting party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests . . . taken in time of war or other emergency in international relations—

That is the end of the quotation, in part, from the general agreement. The emergency which is deemed by the United States to be in existence is the emergency which originated with the Korean war. The wording of this provision of GATT seems to make it clear that each contracting party is the sole judge of what is to be regarded as the protection of its own security interests within its own country.

However, full consideration is being given as to what action can be appropriately taken by the Canadian authorities in the circumstances. The matter has been brought to the attention of the United States authorities and Canada's viewpoint has been expressed. That viewpoint is that while there is in fact the section of GATT on which reliance is placed, it is the opinion of the Canadian government that the action taken does not fall within the ambit of the section in question.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of what he has just said in reference to United States security, I think it would be of interest to all of us if the Prime Minister would find out how United States security is involved in transporting in bond from one Canadian port to another soya sauce and shrimps.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman should be capable of devising his own answer to that question.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FARM AND FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the unprecedented rise in the Bank of Canada rediscount rate and the chartered banks' very high prime rate of interest. Can the minister say whether or not chartered bank loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act at 5 per cent are being made in the same volume as they have been in the past, or are they being curtailed because of more attractive lending rates for other purposes?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been no curtailment. So far as I am aware the lending operations by the banks are proceeding. I have had no report to the contrary, but I shall be glad to make inquiries.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals on taxable income in excess of $3,000 be increased by two percentage points and that for the 1959 taxation year each of the graduated rates of tax applicable to individuals on taxable income in excess of $3,000 be increased by one percentage point.

2. That with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1959 the 45 per cent rate of tax on taxable income in excess of $25,000 be increased to 47 per cent and the 43 per cent rate of tax on taxable income in excess of $25,000 applicable to corporations deriving more than half their gross revenue from the sale for delivery in Canada of electrical energy, gas or steam be increased to 45 per cent.

3. That commencing January 1, 1959 the definition of medical expenses exclude those amounts which the taxpayer is not required to pay because they are paid with the assistance of the government of Canada under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

4. That amounts paid on or after January 1, 1959 for iliostomy and colostomy pads, crutches, trusses for hernia and rocking beds for poliomyelitis patients be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

5. That for the 1959 and subsequent taxation years an individual be allowed to deduct in computing income, in addition to the amounts now permitted by the act, any amount received by him out of a pension fund or plan upon withdrawal or retirement from employment or upon the winding up of the fund, not exceeding the portion thereof that is paid in the year, or within 60 days after the end of the year, as a contribution to a registered pension fund or plan or as a premium under a registered retirement savings plan.

6. That with respect to deaths occurring after April 9, 1959 the exemption for a portion of a death benefit paid by an employer upon or after the death of an officer or employee in recognition of his service be changed from an amount equal to the employee's remuneration for the last 90 days in the office or employment to an exemption for an amount equal to the remuneration of the employee for the last 12 months in the office or employment of the amount of $10,000 whichever is the lesser.

7. That for 1960 and subsequent taxation years there shall be included as income from an office or employment the amount of the benefit which an employee derives by virtue of the payment by his employer of a premium under a group life insurance plan to provide the employee with life insurance coverage to the extent that it is in excess of $25,000.

8. That the time within which a notice of objection to an assessment issued after February 8, 1959 must be served be increased from 60 to 90 days from the day of mailing of the notice of assessment.

9. That the privilege of qualifying as a foreign business corporation be withdrawn except for those corporations that were so qualified for the 1958 taxation year.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the committee completed its discussion of paragraph 1 of the Income Tax Act resolutions. Is there any discussion of paragraph 2?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I may be mistaken but I was under the impression that we had not completely dealt with paragraph 1 and I wished to say a word or two on it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. gentleman begins, Mr. Chairman, may I say that my understanding is that paragraph 1 had not been completed by the committee.

Mr. Argue: The chairman has agreed to allow him to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but we could not hear.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman in listening to the comments the minister made specifically in reply to questions raised regarding income tax deductions for transportation costs and for board and lodging where a person has to work and maintain two homes, and for protective work clothing, I came to the conclusion that the Liberal government was the most inept one we have had for many years. The more I listened to my friend the hon. member for Essex East the more I became convinced that the Tory government is just about as bad, because over the years with respect to these very valid submissions regarding deductions for working people they have replied that the matter was under study, that briefs had already been presented, that they were fully aware of the situation, and remarks of that nature.

The minister made a most astounding comment about this the other day, when he said in effect that as far as deductible transportation costs are concerned the time is not now ripe to do this; that we cannot do it in view of the increase in the deficit, the extended borrowings of the government, the increased taxation it has been necessary to impose, and so on. Because of the inability of the minister and his government to cope with these problems he now says that the working man will have to suffer a little longer because the government cannot do these things now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Howard: No, the minister would not commit himself in such direct words, but that is in effect what the minister said and that is the interpretation many working people will place upon his remarks. Certainly he made reference to the increase in debt that has taken place under his administration. He made reference to the increased taxation, and that is certainly the responsibility of the minister and his colleagues. He also made reference to the declining economy and the other difficulties experienced since he became minister and his colleagues formed the government. There is no question at all but that the working man will have to suffer a little longer under onerous taxation and will not be able to get these justifiable deductions.

The minister made much use of the word "discrimination" and explained how he and his government were concerned with the elimination of discriminatory taxation measures. The minister was not so careful about the question of discrimination in the session preceding the 1958 election, because at that time under his guidance changes were made in the Income Tax Act which cannot be described as other than discriminatory. The amendments made at that time applied to one group of workers only and not to others. I refer to the changes made with respect to construction employees. What could be more discriminatory and inequitable than that?

I should like to relate the manner in which these amendments were applied. They relate to construction employees, and this situation could arise and probably has arisen. I refer again to logging camps. An employee driving a cat, a bulldozer, working on construction in a logging camp, could fall within the provisions of the act relating to deductions, exemptions, and so on. Another employee working for the same company, driving exactly the same type of bulldozer, exactly the same size, horsepower and everything else, skidding logs out of the bush, would not be allowed such deductions. What could be more discriminatory than that? Certainly if the minister had been more careful in what he was doing prior to the 1958 election, and had not been concerned so much with gathering votes for the Conservatives, we would not have had this kind of inequality that exists today.

What we are asking him to do is to extend the same principle that he endorsed and adopted just a little over a year ago. We are asking him to extend that self-same principle to other groups of workmen in this country. The answer is that the time is not now ripe. When we take this answer with his answers to other proposals we are not too clear on just what is meant, but it is just not acceptable. Certainly it is not acceptable to the working people involved.

If the minister would consult one of his own supporters—I am not sure whether he is in the committee at the moment—if the minister would consult the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who also knows the logging industry very well, having worked in that industry for a number of years, he would get a clear definition and a clear explanation of the effect of the taxation provisions that he says he cannot change. He would get a clear explanation of the effects on the loggers. He does not have to take my word for the tremendously high expenses of the loggers. I am referring to them at the moment because of my familiarity with the high transportation costs of loggers. The minister could get from one of his colleagues in his own party a clear explanation of the extra expenses that workingmen have to bear because provision is not made in the logging industry, in the construction and other camps for families. There are members of the minister's own party who will explain to him in a clear and lucid way the necessity of making these particular deductions that I have been advocating.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the budget resolutions I want to say first that I think the increased taxes are very high. If we commit excesses in life, whether physical or financial, there comes a day of reckoning, and the day of reckoning for this government has come. This is the second evidence we have of the day of reckoning. The first evidence we had was the increase in the interest rates, and that increase is still going on. Today the minister is handing the Canadian people part of the bill. He is handing them a little less than half the bill, because there is still some $400 million left to pay at some later date.

The minister has said that the tax increases are moderate. They may seem moderate because he has been dealing with billions, but they are very sizable indeed, and they are taking the corporations for a ride. The tax is equal to the highest income tax they have paid at any recent time in peacetime. After all, the extra bill of $352 million is very large indeed. It is equal to about 75 per cent of the total budget in 1939, and over and above that he has $400 million left for which he has given an I.O.U. which exceeds three-quarters of the total budget for 1939.

It is hard to conceive that this government will ever pay any part of that $400 million, because the sum total of the surpluses or savings of the Conservative party since confederation is less than the interest on that $400 million for only one year. In other words, the interest on that $400 million for a year will be $16 million at 4 per cent and their total surpluses since confederation have amounted to only $15 million. The Conservatives have always been the party of debts and deficits, but the old line Tory was a piker when you consider him in relation to the present Diefenbaker Tories, if the present Minister of Finance is to be taken as a criterion. But even he has slowed up lately, and I think he has slowed up because the people have refused to give him money as rapidly as he requires it.

The increase in personal and corporation income tax amounts to $60 million this year, and this is just enough to pay off that part of the conversion loan that did not need to be converted but was converted. Next year the added revenue from the corporation tax and the personal income tax will amount to $110 million. This year it takes $106 million extra to service our debt, and next year nobody knows how much it will amount to. It certainly will be away up. Hon. members can see that the increase in the corporation tax and the personal income tax will not at any time quite measure up to the amount required to service the increase in the public debt. As hon. members know, that has been made up of our deficits and by the minister fooling around with bonds and converting them before they needed to be converted.

We hear all kinds of stories about the minister leaving the portfolio of finance. If he does he will leave this financial mess on the lap of the Prime Minister, and Fleming's folly will become Diefenbaker's debt.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are not talking about taxation in general. At the present time, we are talking about the Income Tax Act. It would be appreciated by the Chair if the hon. member would limit his remarks to the resolution under discussion at the present time and not extend them into something else.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I accept your ruling except that the other night the Minister of Finance, in speaking on this very same resolution, referred to the clearing of brush from land. He referred to housing; he referred to the dark days of the last administration, and he also referred to the high intelligence of the hon. member for Essex East. Certainly the other speakers in the debate were allowed to go on and traverse more than you are allowing me to discuss at the present time. If you say I cannot touch on interest rates I will forgo that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, so the point may be clearly understood and for the benefit of other hon. members who may choose to speak on this resolution, I think while there was a good deal of latitude taken by hon. members who spoke on this resolution on Thursday evening, the hon. member is now going into a field which is quite beyond what would be in order on this resolution, because he is now trespassing on a field on which the house has already spoken at the present session.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that a week ago today we had a supply motion and an amendment was introduced, to be found at page 3073 of Hansard, which included among other things the conversion loan, the bank rate, expansion of the money supply, the national debt and public debt charges, and in a vote on April 28 the house dealt with that amendment and defeated it. So it seems to me that for that reason debate on this question is precluded. It is not a question of latitude in debate last Thursday evening. It is a question of this subject, on which the hon. member is now proposing to speak, having been decided by the house six days ago.

The Chairman: I must remind hon. members that sins of omission committed at a previous sitting of the house would not justify the Chair in allowing debate on the question under discussion at present to become irrelevant. We cannot debate all over again what has already been debated at length in the house. If only for the sake of preventing constant repetition it is quite important that we adhere to the rule of relevancy as much as possible. It is appreciated by the Chair that it is quite easy in a debate such as the present one, involving the discussion of resolutions which offer a great deal of scope and cover all kinds of matters, to wander afield to some extent, but it would be appreciated by the Chair if hon. members would try as best they can to limit their remarks to the resolution under discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to dispute the ruling you have made. I agree with your ruling in essence and I do not think the house will want to see a debate on this resolution such as was had on the budget or again on the motion to go into supply. Surely it is not our intention to do that. But may I point out with respect to Your Honour that what the hon. member for Welland was doing was to discuss interest so far as the tax yield is concerned, and if he limits himself to that aspect of the matter I submit that he is perfectly in order.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I intend to go back to the resolution itself, but I just wanted to say that the increases in the income and corporation taxes were almost exactly enough to take care of the increased charges on our national debt. The Minister of Finance has given us three reasons for the rise in interest rates and, in so far as that affects the money that we should raise, I think he should tell us which one is right. In other words, the other night he spent an hour or so telling us that the government had nothing to do with the rise in interest rates. In the budget speech he said that too many bonds on the market created an upward pressure on interest rates. Again, last November he came into the house and said that the government had achieved a decrease in interest rates. He has given us these three explanations. He should get up and tell us which one is right. They cannot all be right.

In my opinion he has lost the art of achievement, and having lost that art I can well realize why the Prime Minister would think he would be a good secretary of state for external affairs. It is unfortunate that the minister has to raise taxes at this time, particularly when the government promised that taxes would be reduced. They went all over the country, certainly all over Ontario, and said they were going to increase social benefits and reduce taxes. Any time I heard them on the radio that was what they were saying. They said that when the Liberals were in power they were collecting too much in taxes, but now they are collecting more themselves.

The corporation income tax is increased. That was referred to the other night, and if I can close my remarks by dealing with corporation income tax I will not speak on paragraph No. 2 of the resolution unless I am restricted now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, may I suggest to the hon. member that it might be more convenient to discuss the corporation tax on the next item. At the outset it was agreed by the committee, I believe, that it would make for an orderly discussion if the paragraphs of the resolution were called one at a time, and that matter obviously touches on the second paragraph.

Mr. McMillan: I agree.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed to paragraph 2?

Mr. Benidickson: No, I do not think that is fair. I think the Minister of Finance will agree that on Thursday night I was as fair as anybody could possibly be when I suggested that in past sessions on such resolutions it had been indicated by the Chair that in committee we must consider with the strictest of relevancy the individual items as worded in the resolution. In my own remarks I confined myself to items that were enumerated in the resolution. The committee was allowed to wander. I suggested that we do as has been done in past years and that at a certain stage we confine our attention to subsidiary paragraphs in the resolution.

That was not done. Mr. Chairman, you are not the chairman who was here on Thursday night, but because of what went on the year before I did have some words with him after the event which I am sure he will not mind me speaking about. The hon. member for Welland is discussing the proposal that we increases taxes on personal and corporation income, and in subsequent paragraphs there are other forms of taxation all involving a considerable amount of money.

The hon. member for Welland was asserting that had certain improvident actions not been taken these new imposts might not have been necessary, and I say this is a very relevant matter for the committee to discuss because personal income taxes are to be raised by $54 million and corporation taxes by $56 million under these two paragraphs of the general resolution.

I only ask for consistency. If the committee as a whole is prepared to direct its attention solely to paragraph 1 of the resolution I think that is satisfactory, but the hon. member for Welland has said very properly that one of the reasons for imposing additional taxation is the improvident and unnecessary spending such as occurred with respect to the conversion loan and under other headings.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, when the resolution came up the other night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River did stick to paragraph No. 1, but no other member who spoke did so. That is why I wanted to get a ruling from the Chair as to whether I can go on and speak about corporation taxes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I draw attention to what was said at the outset of the discussion on the evening of April 30, at page 3209 of Hansard. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River opened the discussion by asking me if I had any comment to make beyond the budget address. In reply I said:

> Mr. Chairman, I think there is nothing new to be mentioned in connection with this opening paragraph. When we come down to paragraph 9, Mr. Chairman, I will have an amendment to propose to it. If I may make a suggestion in the interest of orderly procedure, while there is just one resolution to amend the Income Tax Act it might contribute to orderly discussion in the committee if you were to call the paragraphs seriatim.

Then the deputy chairman said:

> Is the committee agreeable that the paragraphs be discussed seriatim?

I understood, Mr. Chairman, that was the basis upon which we proceeded. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River then spoke, and on page 3212 of Hansard for that date you will see that the chairman asked:

> Is there any further discussion on paragraph 1?

My understanding was that the suggestion of following the paragraphs one by one in the order in which they are printed commended itself to the committee as one that would make for orderly procedure. The first paragraph, of course, relates to the proposed increase in personal income tax, the second paragraph to the proposed increase in the corporation tax. If it is, as indicated, the intention of the hon. member for Welland to discuss the corporation tax, I would think it would contribute to orderly discussion if we could take one paragraph at a time and make sure that before we launched into a discussion of the proposed changes in the corporation tax we had cleared up the proposed changes in the personal income tax. Otherwise, if we are going to scatter our observations widely over the various matters covered by these nine paragraphs I do not think we are going to have an orderly and consecutive discussion. This is not a suggestion that will curtail debate.

Mr. Winch: May I add that it was the understanding of this group that the paragraphs were going to be taken seriatim, and if any change were made in that understanding then certainly we would like to know about it.

The Chairman: It is the understanding of the Chair that each paragraph is to be discussed separately. Actually the Chair does not wish to be too severe on anyone during this debate, but for the sake of orderly discussion each matter should be discussed in separate form.

In answer to the request of the hon. member for Welland I can only say that we should try to discuss each item as it is listed here. In other words, if he would discuss the personal income tax before the corporation tax, then we would have an orderly discussion. Whether or not the Chair rules that what the hon. member is saying is out of order depends entirely upon what the hon. member may say. However, for the sake of orderly procedure we should cover each item thoroughly, and it would be appreciated if hon. members adhered to this ruling.

Mr. McMillan: I shall be glad to delay my remarks, Mr. Chairman; however, I would say that if I had been allowed to go on for two minutes we would have saved time.

Mr. Howard: There is one question I should like to address to the minister, if I may, before we proceed. It concerns item 1 and is related to the question I discussed the other evening, that is the exemptions or deductions for certain classes of workers. I find in volume 2 of Hansard for 1957-58, starting right at the bottom of page 2004 and extending on to page 2005, there are some remarks by the minister regarding one of the proposed changes in the Income Tax Act as it related to construction employees. I would preface my question by reading the remarks of the minister in explanation of this change. He said:

> Briefly it will provide that if the construction site is so distant that the worker cannot reasonably be expected to return daily to his normal place of residence where he maintains a home in which he lives with his wife or some dependent person, then the construction employee will not be required to include in his income for tax purposes the value of the free board and lodging or reasonable allowances paid to him to cover expenses of meals and lodging, or the value of travelling expenses paid by the employer in transporting him to the site and back home again.

I wonder what the present view of the minister would be. In commenting on these proposals the other day he said that the suggestion as to what was required was not too clear. Would the minister comment on the difficulties if the provision which already exists in the act with regard to construction employees were to be extended to include other employees who are in precisely the same position?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will read the whole of the debate during the fall session of 1957 he will find that there was quite an extensive discussion preceding the amendment that is now to be found as section 5, subsection 2 of the Income Tax Act. It was quite clear at that time that in the face of the strong representations that had been made and in the light of the history of the way in which the claims of construction workers in respect of travelling expenses had been handled by my predecessors, there was a case for introducing this particular amendment giving the right to construction workers to claim exemptions. The hon. member will see there a reference to the fact that this exemption had been accorded to construction workers until the previous year. We were, in effect, dealing with a situation where a practice which had been in existence for a long time was in the course of being reversed under a decision that had been made before we came into office, and having regard to that long history and the strong representations that had been made, not only by the construction industry but by unions of workers in that industry, we asked parliament to enact a provision which would have the effect of maintaining a practice that had obtained until 1957.

Parliament gave effect to that proposal. The case of the logging workers was raised at that time. I tried to make it very clear that there would be difficulty in applying this new legislation, and that there would be borderline cases which would make it almost of necessity a provision difficult of application and that we would be guided by experience. It was made clear that the position of the logging worker and our experience in the application of section 5, subsection 2 of the act would be studied to see if this matter could be worked out in the end in a way that would avoid any possibility of discrimination.

Now, I might say that in general the view that was expressed at that time has been largely borne out in practice. The section has been widely resorted to by numbers of persons who are construction workers. There have been borderline cases and there have been some difficulties. The Department of National Revenue has proceeded to give a reasonable interpretation to the provisions enacted when this matter was last under discussion.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that our experience has not yet reached the point where we could undertake to ask that even comparable provisions, let alone similar provisions, could be entertained in favour of certain other groups of workers. The legislation to which I referred does not permit a worker to deduct his own expenses. The legislation rather provides that he is not obliged to bring into his income payments that are provided by his employer for transportation, meals and lodging.

Mr. Howard: If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I was confused over the application of the legislation. That is the way I understood it applied, as just indicated by the minister. But if this provision had been in effect, as the minister said, for a number of years and then was altered in 1957, I take it, and then revised again or revived—probably that is the right word—by the amendment to the Income Tax Act in the 1957-58 session, surely after it had been in effect for that period of time the department should have had sufficient experience to allow them to extend the self-same principle to other types of employees. I cannot see too much difficulty about it.

I will relate again the instance in a logging camp. Under the application of the section—and I am talking about the west coast of British Columbia again because of my familiarity with the situation there—if a person goes out to work as a bulldozer operator on the construction phase of a logging camp's operation, he then comes within the provision just related by the minister. But if that same person happens to go out to work and drives the same type of bulldozer, exactly the same operation, but performs some other duties such as dragging logs out of the bush, he does not come under it. What could be more discriminatory than that situation?

What would be the difficulty in applying the self-same provision which applies to construction employees to, say, cook and bunkhouse workers or cooks, bakers and so on in logging camp cook houses who receive, with respect to free board and lodging, exactly the same consideration as do construction employees, yet have to pay tax on it? What is the difficulty in extending it to a person in a mining camp where there are bunkhouses and so on? I do not refer to some of the more settled camps where large numbers of families live and which in effect are settled cities or towns. I refer to those out in the hills far from community life, transportation and so on where they have bunkhouses, where exactly the same type of situation exists, where a person can be a construction employee and receive the benefits just outlined by the minister. He may get transferred to another job and be in precisely the same position with respect to board and lodging and transportation, yet not receive the benefits under that provision.

After the many years of experience which the department has had in administering, as the minister said, the application of this arrangement to construction employees, surely they have been derelict in their duty if they have not been able to find out how to apply it to other types of employees. I would appreciate a fuller explanation by the minister as to what difficulties he is talking about which stand in the way of extending this provision to other types of employees.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From the hon. member's own remarks it is quite evident that he is aware that if it were extended to loggers as a group we could not stop there, but would be obliged to extend it to other groups and it would just go on and on. Where the line would ever be drawn I do not for the life of me know. I referred to a particular situation which gave rise to the amendment that was introduced in late 1957 because of the history that preceded it. Here was a situation in which in the past the act had been administered in such a way that construction workers had not been required to bring into their income payments received by them from their employers by way of transportation, meals and lodging. That was a particular situation. The representations which we had received and which commended themselves to parliament a year and a half ago were put on that basis, namely the construction worker. At that time we had representations made by some hon. members who said, "Why do you not apply this provision to the logging worker?" We went into this matter at some length. The discussion was extended at that time. I would invite my hon. friend to refer to that discussion, where these matters were discussed from both sides of the house.

The fact is that the situation is not any easier from the point of view of enforcement than we contemplated it might be. The immediate context, I would remind the hon. member, was a history under which construction workers had not been required to include in their income transportation, board and lodging. Again that was a situation that had an immediate context as well, because this matter was brought to a head in relation to construction workers employed on one of the defence lines; I think it was the mid-Canada line at that time.

We had representations after that. Some organizations came to us and said, "If this provision is not capable of general application, then you ought to take it away from the construction workers". We had representations to that effect from some labour organizations. We felt that, parliament having enacted this particular provision, under the circumstances the matter should be given an opportunity for a fair test, and that is the situation that exists now.

Mr. Howard: If I may, I should like to make one other comment on that matter. The other evening, when the broader application of the suggestions I had to make was being discussed —notably transportation, clothing, maintenance of two homes and so on—for deduction purposes, the minister then said it was impossible to legislate for a select group of workers. He did not want to have any part of that suggestion because that was discrimination. He now turns around and says, "We believe in discrimination; we believe in legislating for a select group of workers as opposed to other workers".

That is precisely what he is saying. He has set up a preferred group of workers in so far as income tax provisions are concerned, notably construction employees. I am not decrying the fact that that should happen. I am merely saying that it does not seem sensible, especially after this provision has been in effect for so many years and especially after the minister said that he does not believe in discrimination and could not possibly make any provision in respect to loggers, miners and all these other types of employees who find that these excessive costs must be met. When he said he could not legislate discriminatorily in that way it does not seem sensible for him to turn around and justify the maintenance of something which has been in effect for so many years and which is in effect discriminatory against all other types of employee.

It is just silly. Surely the minister can apply himself or the officials of his department can apply themselves more directly to this problem in the hope of finding a solution to it. It does not seem impossible. If the minister would sit down and concern himself more with the application of this provision than he does with these other questions, or would get some of the officials in his department to apply themselves to the problem, it is not insurmountable. If that had been done at the time of the reinstatement of the provision for construction employees; if a start had been made on it then, I am sure that at this stage we could have had an acceptably workable statutory provision which would put working class people on a fairly equitable basis, instead of setting up a preferred group and discriminating against the rest. The minister speaks out of both sides of his mouth. He says he does not believe in discrimination and cannot legislate for a select group of employees, and then turns around and says that in this case he should do so.

Mr. Winch: May I add a word or two. I believe the Minister of Finance is a family man. No doubt he likes to be with his family once in a while, and he realizes the cost of being separated for a long time. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I think this is perhaps what the hon. member for Port Arthur had in mind the other day when he spoke about salaries for members of parliament, but we are not discussing that matter at the moment.

We are now discussing a situation where, particularly on the west coast of this country, because of our economy workers are separated from their families when engaged in industry and construction, in our fisheries, in logging and in mining. When one is separated from one's family there is a big cost in transportation involved, and one is actually placed in the position of maintaining two homes at one time. He has to maintain the home where his family is and the place where he works and pays board.

That is why I started out by saying that I understood the Minister of Finance was a family man and would like to see his wife and kiddies once in a while. Then as his kiddies grow up and become men and women, he would like to see his grandchildren. Is it not therefore understandable that the people in a province which contributes a good deal in monetary value to the treasury of this country, because they are engaged in logging, mining and construction, also do not like maintaining two family homes and like to be able to get home once in a while? Surely the Minister of Finance will agree that having worked out certain rights for employees in the construction industry two years ago, he should now apply the same general principle to those engaged in the logging and mining industries of British Columbia.

I was going to ask the Minister of Finance if he would just get that red blood flowing a little faster through his veins and see if he could not during the course of this session extend such opportunities to the workers of British Columbia and other provinces to enable them to see their families more often, and grant them some relief by way of a greater deduction if in the course of their employment they have to maintain, as so many do in British Columbia, two homes and not just one.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this very subject I recall very well the minister introducing his views on, I think, December 6, 1957 as to the entitlement of construction workers to income tax exemption for expenses while away from home. It may be a coincidence, or just the income tax season, but within the last week I have received two letters from constituents who feel that this thing is not working out as expected, and I hope the minister, who I think has some sincere desire to be helpful in this matter, will really give it a look, because I think he will be impressed by the kind of letters I have received. One reads in this way:

> Mr. Diefenbaker, when making his pre-election campaign speeches, made a statement to the effect that effective January 1, 1958, board and lodging paid by men living away from home working on construction jobs would be deductible for income tax purposes. With having tried this deduction before only to have it disallowed, I was very pleased that this one idea had been brought into being.
> My husband had been working for the Ontario hydro in the construction division until being laid off last October. He was working away from home. He received his T4 slips—

Then the writer of the letter goes on to quote from a hydroelectric bulletin sent to employees referring to section 23 with respect to board and lodging receipts, and so on, and there is an inference that the employee must be a householder. But she is disillusioned; the claim for deduction has been denied.

Mr. Chairman, I had another letter, as it happens in the same mail, which reads in part as follows:

> I work in the construction trade and am away from my home a great deal of the time. We are required to pay for board and lodgings when away, which is in effect supporting two homes, since I have a wife and family living in Kenora.
>
> Now, my question is this: should not the amount of money deducted from a man's wages for board and lodgings—

In accordance with the intention of the government—

> —be deductible by him on his income for tax purposes?

As I say, it may be the season, but it is significant that something is going wrong with the administration. I will be very pleased to pass these letters to the minister, but I think all the fanfare that was made with respect to these matters indicates something should be done. The Ontario hydro has taken great pains to publicize this new concession with respect to tax laws, and these people now find that at the individual tax offices they are not getting the practical result that seemed to be indicated in the announcement of the minister in December, 1957 and in the speeches of the Prime Minister subsequently during the 1958 election campaign.

I therefore think the matter should be looked into. The other night the minister gave us some advice about the difficulties of the finance minister when he is confronted with discrimination, and he mentioned the possibility that in doing something in one direction he may set a precedent and be obliged to do it in others. This was part of the difficulty that faced the former administration, and I am acquainted with that. None the less the minister advertised his intended generosity to the high heavens in this respect, and it just so happened that within two weeks I have had these two letters from constituents who say that in actual practical experience it does not seem to be working out to their advantage and in accordance with expectations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman will agree that never at any time did we make any promise or hold out any assurance or representation that we would go beyond the case of the construction worker.

Mr. Benidickson: These were both letters, I might add, from construction workers. I have not burdened the minister by reading the extract from the official publication of the Ontario hydroelectric commission after the minister made this decision, but I could. It is in the letter which I indicated I would send to the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if reference is had to what I said on December 6, 1957 as reported at pages 2004 and 2005 of Hansard, it is made quite clear there that we were referring to construction workers and construction workers only. The language of the clause that was introduced to carry out the proposal then announced is restrictive in terms. It applies only to the man who has a spouse or a person dependent upon him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, and who has that self-contained domestic establishment from which his work separates him.

The passages that the hon. member has read from the two letters he has received give no inkling whatever as to the grounds upon which the claim in each case may have been disallowed, but if the hon. gentleman agrees to send the letters we will be glad to make inquiries through the Department of National Revenue to ascertain the grounds upon which it was found that in those particular cases the individuals concerned did not qualify under the terms of section 5, subsection 2 of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Benidickson: At least one of the writers, Mr. Chairman, has taken the pains to look up the statutes. I have not burdened the committee by reading the letter in full but in that letter she has outlined the point that my hon. friend raises; that is, the necessity of there being a householder. In addition, she also outlines that the people for whom she speaks—not only her husband but others—were working in the construction division of the Ontario hydro and have been denied this year the out of town expenses which they thought they would be allowed as a result of the much advertised change made by the minister in December, 1957.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to ask a question of the Minister of Finance concerning a problem that came to my attention for the first time two or three weeks ago and about which I did not know before. I raise it at this time because we are dealing with the Income Tax Act and this has bothered me for the past few weeks.

The minister as a member of parliament and a man of the world knows that it sometimes happens that a man may be sentenced to prison for life or a person may be insane for life. Under Canadian divorce laws the husband or wife of such a person cannot obtain a divorce in order to live a normal life and it sometimes happens that they become involved in what is known as a common law way of living with a person to whom they are not or cannot be married due to circumstances beyond their control. As far as my knowledge goes a common law wife is recognized in most circumstances under provincial laws. As a matter of fact, I do not know of any law in British Columbia under which a common law wife is not recognized. I do not, of course, mean a common law wife of a few weeks or months; I refer to a common law arrangement over a period of years as a result of which there are children.

I may have been abysmally lacking in knowledge of the federal law but it was not until two weeks ago that I became aware that a common law spouse is not recognized as a dependent of the breadwinner under the Income Tax Act. I believe this places a heavy and unnecessary burden on the person who seeks to live a normal life and for reasons that are perhaps totally beyond his or her control and they enter into a common law arrangement. Under the Income Tax Act he is charged as a single person although he may have lived for years as a married person.

Such a case came to my attention. The Department of National Revenue is seeking back taxation for a period of six years against an individual who has maintained a home with his common law wife throughout that period. The department claims that he filed a false return over the years in claiming as a dependent the woman with whom he has lived for six years. He is a working man and is now being hit very hard taxation wise.

I raised this matter in the select standing committee of this house and was told that it is a matter of law. Law relating to income tax is not decided by the Minister of National Revenue but by the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister if it is not possible to recognize common law wives as dependents in reasonable circumstances for income tax purposes. Nearly all provinces recognize common law situations under certain circumstances.

Because I know how some people like to twist things I want to make it clear that I am not advocating common law arrangements but as mature adults we must recognize that these arrangements appear reasonable for those seeking a normal way of life under certain circumstances. Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if it is not possible to give some consideration to this matter. I appreciate that the minister has to deal with important principles in the main but the height and strength of a good man is sometimes measured by his sympathetic attention to minorities and difficult problems. Is there any possible way of some provision being made in relation to the matter which I now draw to the minister's attention?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, when the Income Tax Act refers to marriage or spouses or husbands or wives it refers to those who have that quality under the law. This statute does not take account of any illicit relationships in that regard. In the case of children, of course, an illegitimate child could qualify as a dependent under this act, but in the case of the woman in such a relationship she could not be treated as a wife for the purposes of this act. The hon. gentleman asks if this could be changed. Yes, parliament could change it, but that is not proposed.

Mr. Winch: I quite understand what the minister says but I do not think he would like the idea to go about that the people involved in these arrangements really wish to live outside the law. I believe the minister knows there are many people in Canada who because of circumstances have to live in a certain way in order to achieve a reasonably normal life. Sometimes I think they are more moral than those who live within the law. If the Income Tax Act is drawn in such a way that it views as illicit anyone who is not married within the law and excludes them from deductibility in terms of income tax, I should like to hear what the Minister of Finance would say concerning all the provincial laws which recognize the status of people of good morality who are required to live outside the law.

Mr. Howard: The minister is jumping back and forth between what he classified as illicit arrangements and what I classify as necessary tax arrangements. Earlier I raised a problem about a tax deduction for transportation, board and lodging and the maintenance of two homes and the special protective clothing required by some working men. Could the minister give us an indication of what studies have been made in this respect, how extensive the studies have been and if there is an agency in his department that has studied this question would he tell us the name of the agency? I should also like to know if he is aware of any other studies that have been made and when we might reasonably expect to have a more clear and definite answer regarding the possibility of instituting such taxation deduction arrangements as those to which I referred?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I cannot give any indication to the hon. gentleman as to when, if ever, some proposal may be brought forward in this respect. That would not be proper with respect to any possibility of future tax policy. So far as the question is concerned, we have had some representations, but I must say not very many and not recently, on the subject. Where those representations have been received they have been reviewed to see if there was any new material in them. So far as the application of the present section is concerned as applied to construction workers, of course the Department of National Revenue is gaining more experience all the time with the application of that section and the problems of administration that arise in connection with it.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to the exemption of municipal property tax? The minister will recall that some members of the government side when they were in opposition, I think including His Honour the Speaker, advocated that very thing when they sat on this side. I am just wondering whether the minister has given any consideration to such a proposal, or if he will consider it now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That proposal has been made from time to time over the years, Mr. Chairman. Naturally, all these proposals are reviewed from time to time, but we have not seen fit to bring forward to the house any proposal on the subject.

Pararaph 1 agreed to.

On paragraph 2.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Welland had something to raise on this paragraph.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, the corporation income tax is increased by two percentage points, and when you add this increase to the increase of one per cent on the old age pension fund you have a very high corporation tax indeed. My colleagues have put on the record—I think it was the other night—information which shows that these taxes, along with the sales tax, tend to increase the price of production and the cost of living. We have already had evidence of the increase in the cost of living. I know it is always easy to shove extra taxes on corporations because their voices are relatively few. In our free enterprise system we should not tax them out of existence. Every action or tax on the corporation tends to increase the cost of production, and certainly we know now that our production costs in this country are very high and we cannot compete in many competitive markets of the world. In fact, we find that we cannot compete in many instances in our own market. This puts many men out of jobs.

It takes some thousands of dollars in investment to put one man at work at a steady job, and unless we leave our corporations with some money for expansion I would like to ask the minister who is going to invest money to give our unemployed work? Certainly not any program of the government like the winter works program!

The talk and actions of this government have not made a climate favourable for foreign investment and particularly United States investment. Therefore, there is nothing left for us to do but to encourage our industries and to have healthy industries which will produce more jobs with security. I know that our government has about a 50 per cent interest in the earnings of our companies and corporations but it has no interest in any of the liabilities. We note that the other day it was announced that the minister had lost $10 million of the unemployment insurance account by selling bonds at a loss. I predict that the Unemployment Insurance Act will be amended—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. Surely, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to go into a discussion of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The committee knows very well that legislation will be introduced on this subject shortly, and surely it is highly improper now to anticipate discussion on the resolution to precede amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. McMillan: I will leave that act, except to say that I imagine industry and working men will be called upon to pick up that $10 million, as well as many others.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a resolution on the order paper.

The Deputy Chairman: I advise the hon. member that he is out of order.

Mr. McMillan: I realize that in the past industry has exploited labour but most industrial heads that I know in my part of the country have good labour relations, and they take an interest in the labouring man. I have often got the impression from speeches in this house—and certainly I am not referring only to the government members but to some members on this side as well—that big corporations are something like an octopus; they hold back the development of our country in some ways. Our big corporations pay very high local taxes and high provincial taxes, and certainly they are now paying the highest federal tax. Contrary to the opinion held by many people, many of their shareholders are small shareholders. If you take the Bell Telephone Company, for instance, some shareholders have as low as 25 shares and others as low as 10 shares. I am not taking the part of the corporations here, but in order to save ourselves I think we must help them; we must promote their welfare so that they in turn can provide jobs with the money they make and invest in expansion of their plants.

I think the minister in this resolution is just going in the opposite direction. Our corporations should be left as much money as we can leave them under our tax structure. The minister is taxing them at the highest rate and is leaving a heavy cloud over their heads because they will have to assume their share of the $400 million which is being borrowed and carried as a deficit to be paid in future years. Also, when they borrow money to carry on their operations they must pay more because of the fiscal policy of this government. We know that this government paid 6.6 per cent net to the corporations when they bought their bonds; therefore, industry has to pay a lot—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Surely, we had a decision made by the house on interest rates last Tuesday night. We do not have to have it debated all the rest of the session, surely.

Mr. McMillan: I will close, Mr. Chairman, by saying I regret that it has come to the time when the farmer and the grocer can go to the bank and borrow money cheaper than the Dominion of Canada can.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph 2?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should just like to correct the hon. gentleman on two of the many erroneous statements he has made. He intimated that foreign capital was not coming into Canada. I would like to remind him that in the year 1958 foreign capital did enter Canada to the extent of $1,112 million. He is also completely wrong in the statement he made earlier that the corporation tax rate now proposed in the present resolution is the highest ever. The highest ever was in 1952 under the previous administration when the rate was 52 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order. The minister has been rising repeatedly to interrupt the hon. member for Welland. When the hon. member rises on a point of order he keeps on repeating exactly what he said before. I think in fairness to the hon. member, when he is on his feet and raises a point of order at least he should be listened to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not hear or see the hon. member rising on a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: He rose twice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He did not make himself heard in my hearing on a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: It is quite clear what he was doing and he was heard in this area.

Mr. McMillan: I said "in recent peacetime history"; at least, I hope I said that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The year 1952 was recent history and it was peacetime history and that was the year when the corporation rate was the highest, and it was not under the present administration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman forget Korea?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let us get the facts straight. The proposal now to raise the rate on corporation income is not the highest in history.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance pretends to correct the record. Let the Minister of Finance be reminded that in 1952 this country was engaged in an operation that most people called the Korean war. The hon. member for Welland said "in peacetime history" and what the hon. member for Welland said was perfectly correct.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, for purposes of clarification, because I admit my mind is not clear on this matter of the increase in corporation taxes, does it bear any relationship to the dominion-provincial taxation agreements? Does it have any effect on the special sections? What I have in mind particularly is the logging tax.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer is in the negative. This does not affect the logging tax. There is no further differential created in any respect.

Mr. Winch: Is there no special arrangement on the five-ten basis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this has no effect whatever on the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act as to the division of the yield from the corporation income tax or the right of tax abatement in the case of provinces which choose to levy their own corporation taxes.

Paragraph 2 agreed to.

On paragraph 3.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I must say that when I listened to the budget debate, if it is still proper to refer to the budget debate in the presence of the Minister of Finance, I thought that the provision the minister suggested was not unreasonable, but I have been thinking about it a bit since and it does seem to me that in most of these hospital schemes, including the one in this province, the participants pay a premium. It does not seem to me that there is any difference between paying a premium to the provincial government and paying a premium to Blue Cross. It is money out of your pocket, and I fail to understand why the view should be taken, if the service provided is contributed to in any way by the taxes paid by taxpayers on levies that are imposed by this parliament, that these expenditures should not be counted as medical expenses whereas those people who can afford semi-private or private service, which they get as a result of having paid premiums rather than paying directly, continue to get exemption.

I must say that on further reflection I am very far indeed from being convinced that this is in any way an equitable provision. Moreover, as we all know, the means of financing these hospital schemes vary greatly from province to province, and it does seem to me that the minister should give us a fuller explanation of his reasons than has been given up to now. I am not saying I am opposing this. I am saying I am worried about the equity of it and I think we ought to have a further explanation from the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gave the reasons for this in the budget speech at page 2421. It is easy enough for the hon. member to pick out the province of Ontario and say that in this province the provincial share of the cost of hospital insurance is contributed by an individual's premium and therefore it is ascertainable and there is a receipt which can be produced. But we have to have a rule here capable of general and equitable application in all provinces. There are provinces where the provincial share of the cost of hospital insurance is not provided by way of a personal premium. For instance, in British Columbia and Nova Scotia the plan is financed by a sales tax and there is no possibility of isolating for the individual the portion of the tax he pays that is attributable to the cost in his case of the hospital insurance. Therefore, to have an equitable rule capable of application in all provinces we come forward with this proposal.

We examined this whole situation very carefully and because of the diversity of ways in which the financing of the provincial share of the cost of hospital insurance is approached in different provinces the proposal here contained is the only one that was found to be capable of general application on an equitable basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it has general application. That is precisely my point. Even in the province of Ontario if I apprehend the provincial law correctly—I may not but I think I do—hospital insurance is not universal. That means that those persons who are not covered by hospital insurance and who still are subscribers to Blue Cross will be able to count their hospital expenses and the rest of the people who pay a premium to the province will not. If I am wrong about that, I am wrong. I do not pretend to know all the intricacies of all provincial laws. Moreover, I imagine that in some of the provinces this is an even more generalized provision. I can see that the minister might have provided, although I think it would have worked some hardships, that in the case of general ward care or its equivalent the cost should not be deductible but it does not seem to me that the fact that you belong to a private scheme should make it possible for you to deduct and the fact that you come under a public scheme should not because those people who belong to private schemes are still treated in hospitals to which the federal government in most cases makes or has made a contribution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The situation is clear. What is proposed in this paragraph is that the taxpayer should not be entitled to have the benefit twice. In other words, to the extent that his hospital bill is paid by this scheme of public insurance to which the federal government has contributed he may not claim that portion of his hospital expense for inclusion among his medical expenses to be deducted from his income if in excess of 3 per cent of his income.

Never has it been the rule that premiums could be deducted. The only deduction ever permitted was the hospital bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite. I understand that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Department of National Revenue did permit the deduction of the hospital bill that may have been paid by a private insurance company or some other form of insurance coverage. To the extent to which a hospital bill is not paid by or under a scheme of hospital insurance to which the federal government is contributing—obviously that is one under the act—then the individual who is charged still has a right to claim as a deductible medical expense the balance of his hospital account. There is nothing here that takes anything from him in that respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister has understood my point at all. I did not say or suggest that the premium should de deducted. I say if you pay a premium to Blue Cross or to some private company—I presume Blue Cross is not involved in this any more so perhaps I should say the Metropolitan Life or some other company that does give this kind of insurance—rather than coming under the Ontario hospital scheme, then if you have a hospital bill you can deduct the whole hospital bill although you may go to the Toronto General hospital and get exactly the same benefit as if you were under the federal scheme. That is precisely the point that I say is inequitable. If the minister will tell me my facts are wrong I will be very quickly convinced but if my facts are right, if my premise is right, the conclusion is that one person has the right to deduct his whole hospital bill and the other person has not. As I say, it seems to me that in these circumstances it is not fair in those provinces where the scheme is not universal. That is the point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again I must say that the rule is quite clear. In a province where the scheme is not universal because it is not compulsory the individual who stays outside the scheme and pays his full hospital bill may deduct that full hospital bill just as an individual may in the province of Quebec, a province which thus far has not entered into the national scheme.

Mr. Winch: That is the very point; I am glad the Minister of Finance got to it. I, too, have been very much disturbed after reading this paragraph 3. The more I have studied it, the more disturbed I have become, and I think the Minister of Finance, a few minutes ago, actually proved that this provision is discriminatory. Paragraph 3 of the resolution reads:

> That commencing January 1, 1959 the definition of medical expenses exclude those amounts which the taxpayer is not required to pay because they are paid with the assistance of the government of Canada under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

The Minister of Finance has made what I consider to be two very important admissions. He says that after a great deal of study and consideration this proposal we now have before us was the only way in which there could be fairness under the Income Tax Act in connection with the deductibility of hospital costs. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that is not correct. We now have in the majority of the ten provinces a national hospitalization plan under which a certain contribution is paid by the federal government on a varying basis. There are at least two provinces in which there is no such plan. In view of this, the only basis of fairness is to allow deductibility under the Income Tax Act for all hospital costs, whether the person is under one plan or another.

However, I think the major point is that which was mentioned by the minister when he sat down just a minute ago. As I understood him, he made it clear that in the province of Quebec, where there is no contractual arrangement between the federal government and the provincial government, anyone who goes into hospital will be entitled to deduct all their hospital costs for income tax purposes.

However, under paragraph 3, this will not apply to the province of British Columbia because the federal government is paying, if I am correct, 40 per cent of the hospital costs. The people of British Columbia are paying indirectly the entire cost, but directly they are paying 60 per cent of the cost. They are paying directly 60 per cent because the federal government is only paying 40 per cent. No provision is being made, in this proposal, for the people who go into hospital in British Columbia whereby they would receive any consideration for the fact that they are paying 60 per cent, although the proposal would allow 100 per cent deductibility to residents of provinces that have not entered into a contractual arrangement with the federal government under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. On the basis of the minister's own statement, therefore, this is discriminatory legislation and discriminatory taxation.

Surely, that was not basically in the mind of the Minister of Finance. I know the problems that face the minister as a result of some provinces entering into contractual arrangements with the federal government under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. There is a difference in the way the scheme is being handled in each province. British Columbia was the second province to enter into a hospital plan. In the early days the cost of this plan was covered by the payment of premiums, but a later government adopted a two per cent sales tax to cover the cost. We now have a five per cent sales tax in British Columbia, two per cent of which is to pay for the hospitalization plan. May I point out also, that even although the province of British Columbia entered into this arrangement with the federal government, there has been no decrease in the sales tax. The people of British Columbia, therefore, are still paying the full two per cent sales tax to cover the cost of the hospitalization plan.

In addition to that, they have to pay co-insurance in British Columbia, something which I believe is not known in any other province. Even although a person is completely covered by the British Columbia plan, when you go to hospital you can be darn near unconscious but you cannot get into your room or into the operating room until you pay in advance $1 per day. I rather gathered from what the minister said that, because a person going into hospital in British Columbia has to pay this $1 per day, although he is covered by the federal and provincial plan that person can deduct this $1 per day from income tax. British Columbia being the only province that has a system of co-insurance, which means that for every day you are in hospital you have to pay $1 out of your own pocket, will that amount be deductible under income tax regulations?

As I read this amendment, that amount should be deductible. What I do want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, is this: This amendment proposed in paragraph 3 of the resolution is discriminatory. I say that the Minister of Finance cannot get away from it because if a province has not any contractual arrangement with the federal government, then anybody going into hospital in that province is allowed to deduct 100 per cent of the hospital costs for income tax purposes. If a person in a province in which the federal government has an agreement goes to hospital, although the federal government only pays 40 to 50 per cent of the cost, that citizen cannot deduct one cent of hospital costs for income tax purposes. If the minister means what he says, that there should be no discrimination, then, difficult as the administration may be, he should allow deductibility for income tax purposes of the 40 per cent or 60 per cent of hospital costs which are not covered by the federal contribution. If that is not done, then there can be no question but that there is discrimination.

Not only is there discrimination in that regard but, in my opinion what is perhaps even of more importance, there is discrimination against the people of the province who are progressive and want to go along the line of a provincial or a federal-provincial hospital plan. This section gives aid, comfort and money to provinces which are regressive and not progressive and makes the progressive people and governments pay a penalty. Surely that is not the view of the minister who talks so much about the vision and the progressiveness of his government.

There can be no question that all the problems will not and cannot be solved until there is a complete national hospital and medical plan throughout the country. But as that matter is not coming up for consideration this year, we are obliged to consider the matter on the basis of section 3 of the present Income Tax Act resolutions. In no way, Mr. Chairman, can I see that there is no discrimination. Discrimination is there. Surely the money in any amount paid as a cost of hospitalization, whether it is a private contribution, a premium contribution or a sales tax contribution within or without a federal-dominion arrangement, should enable the payee to have the hospital bill considered as deductible under the Income Tax Act.

May I also add there something which I think we all know, namely that hospital bills are not the only ones incurred when one is ill. There are other medical bills. If there ever is a time when a person needs help, it is when he is in ill health. Medical bills can actually break a person. Surely we can give them a financial break on a hospital basis and maintain the old system of deductibility—on the present basis there is discrimination and you cannot get away from it—until such time as this government or a future government has the vision and the courage to institute national-provincial medical health insurance coverage for all the people of this nation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has in effect asked the government not to amend this present budget proposal but to undertake the amendment of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Let me, if I can, clarify the purpose of the right to deduct expenses incurred by way of medical costs. Here is a sentence I used in the budget speech as found at page 2421 of Hansard:

> The exemptions granted under the Income Tax Act for medical expenses are clearly intended to relieve the individual taxpayer who has a burden of unusual medical expenses.

Under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, under the scheme of federal contribution to the cost, the proportion that the federal government contributes of the total cost in any province varies from province to province. Surely we cannot be expected in a budget resolution to change that situation and place all provinces on an even footing. For instance, I think the highest proportion that the federal government contributes is in the case of Newfoundland which receives from the federal government substantially more than 50 per cent of the cost of the provision of hospital insurance and diagnostic services. Other provinces, such as the one from which the hon. member comes and Ontario, do not receive as much as 50 per cent.

But here we are dealing with a tax resolution and the tax resolution is perfectly equitable in its application. The fact that the people of any particular province as a whole choose to have a greater social benefit is, in my respectful submission, no argument that they should be entitled to claim an income tax benefit when they collect the social benefit. Here we are dealing with a situation created by a federal statute and the method here proposed is an equitable proposal in dealing with the tax problem with which we are now confronted.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Winch: I am speaking of my own province. In view of the fact that in British Columbia the federal government will be contributing 40 per cent, can a person going into hospital in British Columbia claim 60 per cent of his hospital costs as a reduction from income tax—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Winch: —because you are paying only 40 per cent of the bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Winch: They lose everything.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact that the federal government makes a contribution to that particular hospital bill under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will, under this proposal, have the effect of eliminating that particular hospital account from the deductible medical expenses.

Mr. Robichaud: I want to join with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Vancouver East in protesting strongly against the inclusion of this amendment in the Income Tax Act. The province of New Brunswick will be directly affected by the amendment. In fact, in order to cover the province's share of the hospital insurance scheme, the citizens of New Brunswick will be obliged to pay $50 per year per family and those who want to retain the supplementary hospital benefits to cover the semi-private rate under the Blue Cross system will be obliged to pay another $30 a year, making a total of $80. Under the old plan before the hospital insurance scheme came into effect, or as it is now until July 1 when the hospital insurance scheme will come into effect in New Brunswick, under the Blue Cross system a family pays a total of $72 a year, which is $8 less than they will be obliged to pay when the hospital insurance scheme comes into force. Under the present scheme they are allowed to deduct medical expenses exceeding three per cent of their net salary, an advantage which they will not have under the new system.

Notwithstanding what the minister has just said, I assert that this amendment is an injustice to the taxpayers of New Brunswick. It deprives them of a privilege which they now enjoy under the present system. If the minister wants to be logical and if he still wants to insist that the share paid by the federal government should not be deductible, the residents of New Brunswick should at least be allowed to deduct 50 per cent of their medical expenses over and above the three per cent of their net salary, which would be the same as they are at present allowed under the Blue Cross system. The present amendment, if accepted, will create an additional burden for a large percentage of the taxpayers of New Brunswick. Again I wish to protest against this amendment. I think it should be withdrawn or at least amended in order to affect only the federal share of the amount paid to hospitals and be in agreement with the arguments advanced by the minister.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulty the department has in dealing with paragraph 3. It is pretty hard to see how the department can treat people fairly in all provinces when they pay different premiums. I think the minister announced a while ago, if I understood him rightly, that premiums were not deductible. For example, in Ontario we have to pay a premium, and I would like to ask one question at this point. Supposing a person in Ontario took out an insurance policy for which he paid a premium of $50, the approximate amount he has to pay in this participating scheme. If he had a bill of $200, would he be able to deduct it? If it was taken over, he would not be able to deduct it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the deductibility, where it applies, applies only to the hospital account not to the premium. It has never applied to the premium. If the hospital account is one to which the federal government makes no contributions under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, then of course that hospital account is deductible in full as a deductible medical expense. On the other hand, if it is an account which is paid under the provisions of that act, then it will not be deductible.

As to the point raised by the hon. member for Gloucester, I think it is well to keep a sense of proportion in these matters. The federal government this year is putting up no less than $160 million as its share of the cost under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. This present resolution will take away from the taxpayers this year the right to make deductions which are estimated to be worth to them $3 million; or in a full year, to be worth $9 million. As I say, we must keep a sense of proportion in relation to the situation before we look at this resolution out of all context and perspective.

When the hon. member for Gloucester speaks—

Mr. Winch: Could I ask a question at this point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I may be permitted to finish first. When the hon. member for Gloucester speaks about the people of his province of New Brunswick being entitled to deduct their hospital premium, I might point out that the people in the adjoining province of Nova Scotia do not pay an individual premium but are obliged to pay a provincial sales tax in order to provide the means of financing the provincial share of the hospital insurance in that province. If the hon. member remembers that he will realize that the scheme we put forward in the present resolution is the only one which is capable of equitable application to all the provinces.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I now ask a question. In view of the fact that under paragraph 3 we are dealing with the ill health of people, which means heavy financial responsibilities, could I ask the minister why he deems it necessary to make the scheme retroactive?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, you have to have a starting point, and January 1 is the logical starting point. Otherwise you have a broken period during the year. You would have a year for medical expense deductions different from the year in respect of which you calculate the income.

Mr. Winch: Then how does the minister explain that in certain other cases which he has in mind he is starting them in July and not in January?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the case of commodity taxes they always become effective at midnight on budget night. In the case of income taxes, normally a convenient date is selected, as for instance January 1 or July 1. In the case of some of these income taxes we have made them effective July 1, in other cases January 1.

Mr. Winch: In view of the fact that the minister is making some effective July 1, as much as I oppose the entire principle here, is there any reason why this one should not be July 1?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this tax applies to the individual, and for the individual the tax year is always the calendar year. Therefore it is only proper that this provision should apply from January 1. We are not going back to 1958. That might have been proposed, but we are proposing rather to start on January 1.

Mr. Winch: How about January 1, 1960?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then you would be carrying on a discriminatory and quite unworkable situation, because in some provinces you have the situation which I talked about where the provincial share is paid by means of a sales tax. In other cases the provincial share is paid by an individual premium, and as the national system of hospital insurance came into effect for most provinces during various periods in 1958, I think it is clear that the convenient, appropriate and proper date to bring this change into effect with justice to all provinces concerned is January 1, 1959.

Mr. Robichaud: Is the minister aware that in the province of New Brunswick after July 1 the residents will have automatically to drop the Blue Cross scheme and will be called upon to pay $8 more than they were paying before this scheme came into effect, and this notwithstanding the contribution of $160 million from the federal government? So it is certainly of no benefit to the residents of New Brunswick who were contributing to the Blue Cross scheme.

The Chairman: Does that conclude discussion on paragraph 3?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I know the Minister of Finance gets as tired as I do about referring to some of our back debates, but the minister was always one who had some doubt as to the merit of even having in our income tax this 3 per cent saving clause. We apparently will continue to have it, but under new circumstances. I suggest to the minister that perhaps he should look back upon his former pronouncements advocating the elimination of this so-called floor. I am not going to put it on Hansard today but I would like to direct his attention to what he had to say on August 6, 1956 in this regard, where he advocated the elimination of the 3 per cent provision, and also felt that a greater number of particular drug items should be considered by the income tax administration with regard to income tax deductions.

Mr. Chairman, the thing which prompts me to draw this to the attention of the minister at the moment is that I think we should all recognize that if in a majority of cases the actual cost of hospitalization itself is no longer to be regarded as a portion of this over-all cost to the taxpayer on medical expense, perhaps the minister should take a further look at his ideas to the end that with regard to the items of entitlement he should be more generous than he has been hitherto.

I welcome the next paragraph and I do not wish to intrude on the rules by referring to it in detail. May I point out, however, that some items are being added to that restricted list that are entitled to consideration in the matter of an expenditure for health purposes by a taxpayer. If the actual cost of hospitalization is to be disregarded I suggest that this perhaps might reinforce the argument the minister himself used on this side of the house some years ago to the effect that there should not be any restriction at all with respect to the total of medical bills.

When we add under circumstances such as are being advanced to us now the elimination of something very big affecting nearly all taxpayers on the one hand, and then add something applicable to the odd individual such as is the case in the next paragraph, important though it may be, I think we are not arriving at a solution that is realistic. I suggest to the minister that he should have another look to see whether or not the premiums themselves should not be an item that is regarded as a tax deduction in aggregate.

I suggest that the floor of 3 per cent, or whatever it is called, should have another look taken at it. The minister always advocated this over the years. There is all the more reason for doing it if hospital bills are to be disregarded because they are the major item in the calculation of a taxpayer's expenditures in this realm in a calendar year.

I wonder if the minister would care to indicate to the committee whether or not this has been given consideration when he is disallowing the items that would be most important for perhaps 95 per cent of claimants, namely hospitalization charges in provinces which receive some form of federal government assistance in the payment of hospitalization costs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should like first to observe that the point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River with regard to the 3 per cent has no bearing whatever on the question we have been discussing and which is the purpose of the resolution, namely to determine that certain hospitalization costs to which the federal government contributes under the provisions of the act that is named shall not be deductible.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to ask the minister if he does not agree that in past years he voted for the elimination of this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am coming to the point about the 3 per cent. I am observing in the first place, Mr. Chairman, that the point raised has nothing whatever to do with the question we have been discussing here. It has no bearing whatever on the third paragraph of this resolution or the proposal contained in it.

As to the 3 per cent I would observe this. I have not forgotten what was said in former years but in a year when it is necessary to increase the income tax it is obviously quite impossible to consider changes of the nature proposed by the hon. gentleman.

On the third point, however, I may say that we have been moving steadily last year and this year toward the enlargement of the scope of the definition of deductible medical expenses. Last year you will remember that we introduced three very substantial additions to the list of medical expenses: prescribed drugs, eye glasses and ambulance charges. Three important additions indeed were made to the list and there were included certain other aids required by disabled persons.

In the next paragraph to which I trust we will be coming shortly we are proposing a further enlargement of the definition of deductible medical expenses as applied to certain aids for persons suffering from certain disabilities.

Mr. Benidickson: That was just my point, Mr. Chairman. I have here Hansard of June 17, 1958, including the resolutions that the minister had in mind last year which were in a similar category, at which time there was some enlargement of the particular items that would be considered for tax exemption in aggregate. My point was that if you take away the base which for most people would be hospital expenses, these resolutions of 1958 and the one contained in paragraph 4 to which we will be referring, really have little point or merit.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that this paragraph had to be put in and that this change in the act had to be made to avoid discrimination. That is just nonsense. There is no discrimination at the present time. Nothing the minister has said has removed from my mind the feeling that this is introducing a discrimination between the privately insured person and the publicly insured person and I believe the minister confirmed that by his answer to the hon. member for Welland when he said the hospital bill of the privately insured person would be deductible in full and the hospital bill of the publicly insured person would not. This is purely and simply a device for getting extra revenue and it should be recognized as such. All this talk about discrimination has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member was never more mistaken in his life than in his concluding remarks. This has been approached on the basis of a facing up to a problem which has arisen and which has to be settled now in view of the fact that this federal statute has now come into effect involving various dates with respect to different provinces. The decision has to be made now. It is not made as a means of increasing revenue but as a means of grappling with a problem which if not faced up to would leave a chaotic situation with different rules applicable to different provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is utter nonsense and the minister knows it, or at least should know it. If he does not know it he should not be Minister of Finance. There was no discrimination or difficulty so long as all hospital bills could be deducted if they came within the rules. The fact that the scheme started at different times in different provinces has nothing to do with the case and the method by which it is paid for has nothing to do with the case.

Once the principle is admitted that a person can insure against this risk and still submit his hospital bill, then if one kind of insurance enables you to make a claim under the Income Tax Act and the other does not, there is discrimination. It does not matter whether you pay a 5 per cent sales tax as you do in British Columbia where you pay a great deal more for hospital insurance than in some other provinces or whether you pay your own bills as you do in Quebec, the plain fact is there is no discrimination as between taxpayers as long as everybody everywhere in Canada is allowed to deduct his hospital bill. That is a simple, common, universal rule and that is the law now. The only possible legitimate excuse for doing this is to get more revenue and if it gets no more revenue I think the minister should drop it. I am perfectly sure, however, that it will get considerably more revenue. For the minister to get up and create all these ridiculous smokescreens that have nothing to do with the facts surrounding this situation seems to me to be an insult to the intelligence of hon. members of the committee.

Paragraph 3 agreed to.

On paragraph 4.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have my medical knowledge added to. Would the Minister of Finance be good enough to explain to me what iliostomy and colostomy pads are? I am sorry but I do not know what this is all about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The iliostomy and colostomy pads referred to here are pads used in the course of post-operative treatment particularly in cancer cases.

Mr. Winch: Thank you. I should like very sincerely to ask the minister to make a change in this paragraph. Part of the paragraph reads: "—and rocking beds for poliomyelitis patients be included". I want to assure the Minister of Finance that those rocking beds are most certainly of great value to those who suffer from poliomyelitis; but because of my interest in these matters I can assure him from my own personal knowledge in British Columbia, and in Ontario, that rocking beds have a most useful therapeutic value and are perhaps used more by those who suffer from rheumatoid arthritis and rheumatic and arthritic conditions. I am sorry that our doctor member from Welland and others are not in the committee at the moment. It is my opinion that these rocking beds are used more by those who have rheumatic and arthritic conditions than they are by those who suffer from poliomyelitis.

I rise, not so much because of my own study of this matter but in the past few years I have had the matter brought very much to my attention. The therapeutic value of the rocking bed to those who suffer from arthritic conditions, and especially rheumatoid arthritis, is a wonderful medical advance which has been made in recent years. I ask the Minister of Finance whether he would bring in an amendment and not restrict the deductibility of the cost of those beds. I know that they are expensive and I would ask that he extend the deductibility beyond those who suffer from poliomyelitis and add it to those who have rheumatoid arthritis or something of that serious nature. I hope the minister will take it into consideration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I wish to be quite sure that the hon. member is actually referring to rocking beds and not to vibrators in various forms. I know vibrators are used in connection with the treatment of certain forms of arthritis; but when this resolution was drafted our understanding was that the rocking bed was used as an ancillary to the iron lung as a means of assisting the breathing of the poliomyelitis sufferer and that is the reason it appears in this form. We can look into it and see whether the rocking bed is used for other patients but our understanding when this provision was drafted was that the rocking bed was used, as I said, for poliomyelitis patients and those alone.

Mr. Winch: No sir.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We can look into it, Mr. Chairman, before the bill is introduced.

Mr. Winch: I was using the rocking bed as a layman's term. I was not referring to it in connection with the iron lung. I was referring to an actual complete bed which is now available in Canada and also in the United States about which I myself know a great deal. The layman's term is a rocking bed, because it is a full length, stretch out bed. You may call it a vibrator if you like; I do not care what you call it. All I ask is that the minister take it under advisement and include it as an exemption under the Income Tax Act, because I am certain that it is going to come more and more into use and it is going to help more and more those people who suffer from arthritis. I know, sir. My mother died just a few weeks ago and I know what this kind of thing means to many arthritics. They are expensive. I would ask that consideration be given to including it in the deductions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already indicated we will have a look at this before the bill is introduced.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the department and the minister on adding these five or six further items which are deductible for income tax purposes. I should also like to draw the attention of the department to something else which I think could be included in this same group. As you know, sir, such a medication or preparation as insulin for years has been a deductible product and it still is. Of course, along with insulin a diabetic has to use certain other types of medication, shall I say, or testing apparatus. They have to use this in the control of the disease. I am speaking particularly of testing tablets and testing tapes which are used for the purpose and actually have to be purchased by a diabetic. When they come into my pharmacy they cannot understand why I can give them a receipt for the insulin but I cannot give them a receipt for those testing tapes or testing tablets which they have to use every day in urinalysis tests for testing the albumen as it is deposited. They also have to use a hypodermic needle in the administration of insulin, which they feel should also be deductible. They also go so far as to say that the dietary scale which they have to use to measure their portions of food possibly to even up their intake and also to help in the control of this disease should be deductible. I feel that these people are worthy of consideration because of the types of medication or testing apparatus they have to use. I think I can speak from knowledge. If there were any hon. gentlemen in the house who are members of the medical profession I think they would agree most wholeheartedly with what I have to say. Any preparations along this line, Mr. Chairman; I can think of two—possibly there are more—at the present time, two types of tablets which are prescribed by the medical profession for beginners who may eventually become diabetics. You might say that the beginners are diabetics. The tablets to which I refer, and which are being prescribed by the medical profession to patients who come to me, are called orinase and mobenal. Both appear in tablet form and are taken by mouth.

I can give an insulin user a receipt for income tax deductions but I cannot give a receipt to the users of those tablets for income tax purposes, because the act specifies insulin and insulin alone. I would ask the minister to consider this because I feel it is necessary. The people who take these tablets may eventually have to go on to insulin but at the present time they are helped by the use of these tablets. I bring this to the attention of the minister. I feel it could be easily added or the act could be changed so that the testing apparatus for the diabetic and also the new tablets which are being prescribed could be deducted.

Mr. Winch: May I add a word to that? I am glad that a member of the pharmacy profession has raised this because I have also been asked by citizens from Vancouver to raise the identical matter. Medical science progresses but unfortunately costs in many instances do not come down. There is a trend now from using a needle to taking the medicine orally but it is still very expensive. The diabetic still has to have his dosage whether he gets it by needle or by mouth. I want to add my voice to what has been said by the member who just spoke. Why does the Income Tax Act say that if you take the drug by needle the expense can be deducted but if you take it by mouth, even though it is for the same purpose, it is not deductible? The whole attitude is completely ridiculous and asinine and I hope the minister will bring in the required change. I am certain, as the hon. member has just said and as every medical man will say, that it is a logical and reasonable request.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The remarks of the hon. members have been noted and, of course, these subjects are being studied from year to year. I do point out, however, that with respect to hypodermic needles or some of the other means of administering insulin or other medicaments hon. members will require to bear in mind that these needles are capable of use for other purposes as well quite outside the purposes of this section, and care must be taken in these respects not to introduce into the definition of medical expenses various medical appliances that are capable of other uses.

Mr. Winch: I am very sorry that the Minister of Finance spoke in that way because the remarks made by the previous speaker and myself dealt wholly and solely with diabetics. Prescriptions for diabetes must be obtained from a doctor whether the medicine is to be administered by a needle or taken orally.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is a doctor's prescription it is within the scope of the definition now, but we have had representations respecting the inclusion of needles and means of administering hypodermic injections and there we have been up against the situation that such appliances are capable of other uses as well. We are considering these matters all the time.

Mr. Winch: It takes so long.

Mr. Mitchell: Objection has been taken to hypodermic needles and I agree with the minister that we sell them for many other purposes as well. But I should like him to consider particularly the testing that is necessary for the diabetic. Without having a test he does not know what is the proper amount of insulin to take. The other point I should like to emphasize has to do with these tablets taken by mouth. They are not deductible because the act refers to insulin but while they are not insulin they are used for the same disease.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That will be looked into.

Paragraph 4 agreed to.

On paragraph 5.

Mr. Benidickson: I think perhaps it would help us if the minister would amplify his intentions with respect to this paragraph. I know that there will be details in the bill but the language of the bill is always very complicated.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Paragraph five of the present resolution provides that in future an individual will not be required to include in his income any lump sum that he receives out of an employees' pension plan upon severance of employment to the extent that he uses that lump sum payment within the year or within sixty days after the end of the year as a contribution into a new pension plan or as a premium under a registered retirement savings plan. If an employee leaves his employment where he has been a member of a pension plan he usually receives a lump sum representing the return of his contributions into the pension plan. This lump sum payment may also contain all or part of the employer's contribution into the pension plan.

Under the present law this lump sum payment is liable for tax in the year in which it is received and it is because we consider that inequitable that we are moving now in the terms of paragraph five. In those cases where the employee transfers from the pension plan of a former employer to that of a new employer and there is a direct transfer of all the funds to the credit of the employee from the former employer's pension plan to that of the new employer, the Department of National Revenue has not in practice regarded the transfer to be a payment to the employee and consequently no tax problem has arisen. But in cases where there is no direct transfer from the former employer to the new employer it is quite clear that difficulties are going to arise before very long, and that is why we are moving now to make this provision that where, in the terms of paragraph five, an amount is received out of a pension fund or plan upon withdrawal or retirement from employment or upon the winding up of the fund the individual is not required to include in income the portion of the fund that is paid in the year, or within 60 days after the end of the year, as a contribution to a registered retirement pension fund or plan or as a premium under a registered retirement savings plan. In other words, to the extent that he uses the withdrawal from the fund within that year or within 60 days of the end of the year by putting it into a new pension plan, whether it is a pension plan under a new employer or one of the registered retirement savings plans, then that sum withdrawn is not going to be regarded as income.

Mr. Benidickson: That seems to have merit. In addition, has it some element designed to encourage mobility of labour with respect to pension plans and so on?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not say that it will encourage mobility but it will mean that an individual who wishes to change his employment will not, to the extent that he brings himself within this new provision, forfeit his tax position. As long as his contribution was in the fund he was not taxable but if on severance of employment he withdrew his share of the fund, which might include something from the employer, and it did not go directly into the new fund, he would be liable to tax on that withdrawal as the act stands today.

Mr. Winch: I must say that we most certainly welcome this change in the act as explained by the minister. We sincerely hope that this is only a first step. We trust it is an indication that the department and the government have recognized the importance of introducing new legislation with respect to portable pensions. I have no hesitation in saying that one of the next steps in the realm of security in Canada should be to deal with portable pensions because in some provinces in particular people go from one industry to another, one job to another, and as a general rule they have up till now lost all their pension rights.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit me to say that I am afraid this is a matter beyond federal jurisdiction. We can deal only with the question of pension rights so far as taxes are concerned, but when it comes to questions of rights of individuals in pension plans that obviously is a matter of property and civil rights and under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Winch: I would not deny the influence of the federal government or the Minister of Finance when, in the House of Commons at this session, he introduces an amendment to the Income Tax Act giving an indication that the transference of pension funds is a good thing. He says that under certain circumstances, as Minister of Finance, he is not going to include it for income tax purposes, and this will help a person build up his own future security. I think it is a good rule. I hope it is an indication of the recognition of portable pensions. I hope that since the Minister of Finance has now made his move the provinces will follow suit with the additional legislation required.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister has any figures to show how many persons are taking advantage of that admirable provision which was made by Mr. Harris in his last budget for these retirement savings plans for the self-employed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no statistics available at the present time. It may be that some will be available by the end of the year, based upon a sampling of the 1958 returns.

Paragraph 5 agreed to.

On paragraph 6.

Mr. Benidickson: On No. 6, Mr. Chairman, would the minister outline to the committee what has been the practice of the administration in the absence of the proposed law?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The current practice simply conforms to the provisions of the old section 139, subsection (1) (j) (ii). This is the provision in the interpretation section of the act that is applied to death benefits, and in effect it permits payment by the employer, without income tax liability, of an amount equal to the remuneration of the officer or employee, to his widow or legal representative of a sum equivalent to his remuneration for the last 90 days in the office or employment. I think my hon. friend is familiar with this provision. It has been in the act for some time. It is the one that was inserted originally to give encouragement to the payment by employers on the death of an employee or officer of a sum not exceeding the equivalent of three months' salary or remuneration as a recognition of services rendered in the lifetime of the deceased employee.

Mr. Benidickson: Now this amount would be limited to $10,000, regardless—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but we are proposing to enlarge the three months' period to twelve months. If the house approves of this proposal, we will place an over-all ceiling of $10,000 on the payment so that advantage will not be taken of this in the case of persons with very large salaries. For instance, at the present time it is possible, under this three months' provision, in the case of a senior executive of a large corporation, let us say with a salary of $100,000, to make tax free a payment of $25,000. We are proposing to enlarge this provision laterally in order to benefit more people and encourage the making of provision in proper cases by an employer for the widow or dependents of a deceased employee, up to 12 months' salary, but in doing so we think it proper to propose that a ceiling of $10,000 be placed on the total.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, if the law was not to be evaded, a retired employee would have to provide evidence of departure from the business concerned—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this applies only in the case of his death.

Paragraph 6 agreed to.

Paragraphs 7 and 8 agreed to.

On paragraph 9.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I indicated earlier there would be an amendment here. Several days ago I gave a copy of the proposed amendment to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to move the amendment, which is as follows:

That paragraph 9 of the income tax resolution be amended by adding thereto the following words: "or in the case of corporations incorporated prior to April 10, 1959 that did not have a 1958 taxation year, that so qualify for the first fiscal period ending after 1958."

This paragraph will now read:

9. That the privilege of qualifying as a foreign business corporation be withdrawn except for those corporations that were so qualified for the 1958 taxation year or in the case of corporations incorporated prior to April 10, 1959 that did not have a 1958 taxation year, that so qualify for the first fiscal period ending after 1958.

Mr. Pearkes: I so move.

Mr. Benidickson: This particular amendment is one about which people with much more knowledge in this field than I have have expressed some surprise after reading about the minister's intention. I think we should have the fullest possible statement from him as to the advantages of the amendment. Even a week ago the Financial Post described this amendment as an enigma; they just could not understand the merits of it. I assure the committee and the minister that I am very naive in matters of this kind.

In order to explain properly to other members of the committee who may have similar difficulties to mine, all I can say is that I am familiar with such well known Canadian corporations as Brazilian Traction and some others who perform no active business in Canada but have their incorporation here in Canada. They have officers and head offices and the like in Canada, but hitherto they have not been subject to the normal rules of taxation because they are not competitive businesses in our country. The thing that has concerned me after a reading of this resolution is that corporations of this kind, whether on a large scale or small, having their business headquarters in Canada, with personnel who perhaps have a Canadian background and which contribute something to the commercial life of this country but without competing with other Canadian corporations—I can think of accountants, lawyers and even individual employees at the head office level—have been encouraged to establish in Canada.

When I find myself in association with the Financial Post in saying that they are in complete ignorance of any reason for this kind of amendment to the law; when, on the face of it, one would have thought we had some advantages to gain and we cannot see the advantages of changing the past set-up, I think a full explanation is due the committee from the minister and I am sure he will give it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Gladly, Mr. Chairman. This resolution is designed to introduce changes in the provisions of section 71 of the act. Section 71 of the Income Tax Act provides:

> 71. (1) No tax is payable under this part upon the taxable income of a corporation for a taxation year when it was a foreign business corporation.

No corporation is incorporated in the first instance, whether under federal or provincial charter or letters patent, which is to begin with a foreign business corporation; but under quite detailed rules that are laid down in section 71 in its various clauses it is possible for a corporation to qualify in a tax sense as a foreign business corporation. If it does so, it obtains great tax advantages under the act. For instance, it has no corporate income in Canada subject to the normal corporation income tax here because its income is earned outside of Canada. In the ordinary case, unless this corporation pays a dividend to a non-resident corporation which controlled its stock—in which case there would be a five per cent tax deducted—there would not be any revenue accruing to the federal treasury from this particular company, expect to the extent to which it may employ a few people in its skeleton organization and some personal income tax is collected upon their salaries. But so far as the corporation is concerned, unless it pays a dividend to the parent corporation abroad, the Canadian government collects no tax from this corporation.

As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has indicated, it is quite true that there are some important and highly regarded corporations which, under the Income Tax Act, are regarded as foreign business corporations. They have qualified. But, Mr. Chairman, we are concerned lest the provisions of section 71 should be used either to create in Canada a tax haven or as a means of tax avoidance. I am not saying that is being done at the present time but from our studies of the section and its quite detailed provisions we are concerned lest in the future advantage should be taken of certain features of the provisions of section 71 for these purposes. Therefore we have approached this matter on the basis of not taking away from any existing corporation any rights it has in this respect. We began by saying that any corporation that had qualified as a foreign business corporation up to the end of 1958 would be entitled to enjoy in the future the same benefits as it enjoyed prior to the budget as a foreign business corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: And you have amended it as of budget night.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then the question arises as to what happens in the case of a corporation that may not have been incorporated before 1959, or may not have yet qualified in respect of its fiscal period commencing in 1958. That is the purpose of the amendment, namely to make sure that we are not taking away anything that any corporation may have acquired by way of right up to the moment of the introduction of the budget. Therefore, in the result, the resolution in amended form takes nothing away from any existing corporation which may have qualified. Second, it takes away from no existing corporation any right or opportunity that it may have to qualify in respect of the business it was doing up to the date of the introduction of the budget or the next day following. We are therefore taking nothing away from anybody. There is no retroactive operation whatever in this intended provision. By closing the class now under the existing provision we are taking what we regard as a desirable step to prevent use being made of the section in the future for either of the two purposes with which we are concerned.

Our study of the situation is not going to end with the adoption of the resolution or the bill if the committee approves it. We intend to go on studying this situation. But it is requisite, Mr. Chairman, that during this period of study we should make sure that when people are put on notice we do not have a flood of people coming in seeking to qualify in this period while the matter is under study. I think my hon. friend will agree that when we are not taking anything away from anybody, in order to permit unimpeded study of this problem to proceed the class be closed now. I again emphasize the fact that we are not taking away from any corporation anything that it has today. We are taking nothing away from it as to its right to qualify during this period of 1959 up to April 10.

Mr. Benidickson: I appreciate what the minister says when he makes the point that there is nothing retroactively damaging to existing corporations in the resolution proposed. But I again come back to the point that I do not understand the merit to the crown or to the country. What harm are we trying to avoid from past practice? I see nothing but advantage in the few instances that have come to my attention. I think it is a matter of pride for most Canadians that a company like Brazilian Traction calls itself a Canadian corporation. I am not complaining about any of their policies. I am not familiar with them. We know it is a large enterprise abroad. The situation is rather the reverse of one that we sometimes complain of, namely that we have foreign corporations of too much magnitude running things in our country. It shows that Canadians are prepared to invest and take an interest everywhere in the world. I have no intimate knowledge of one or two of these illustrations, but within the last few days or so I have been told that it has been to the advantage of, shall we say, a parent Canadian oil company which has no intention of utilizing its Canadian business operations in world trade; but because of patriotism and connections, shall we say, in some of our cities and associations with lawyers, accountants and professional men expert in the oil business residing in our country, they have felt that if they were to expand it was desirable that they have a Canadian corporation that would be operating exclusively outside this country and entitled to the very thing that has built up some of these other countries. What is the advantage of that?

I have also heard about certain international trading organizations that I think we would want to encourage. We want Canadians to be internationally-minded, and so on, and I am told that some enterprising Canadians who have substantial main enterprises in Canada still, being sufficiently Canadian-minded, decided if they were going to expand their international or worldwide activity they would like to see that new corporations have a Canadian charter, even though its business would be entirely outside of this country. I am persuaded that an enterprise of that kind initiated by Canadians is of benefit to Canada. I am persuaded that it does give employment to a number of ancilliary performers at the head office level, but I just have not had from the minister, as I see it, any explanation of the deleterious effects, if any, which have come to this country or to our tax position from the companies which admittedly are not going to be affected but which have carried on in this way with Canadian head offices in the past.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not suggesting for a minute that any Canadian corporation that has qualified as a foreign business corporation has abused the law in any respect whatever, but I know my hon. friend would not expect me to enlarge on the subject of how this section of the act in its present form might be used by someone as a means of maintaining in Canada a tax haven or as a means of avoidance of tax. I do not wish to enlarge on that subject here at this time; I think the reason is obvious.

Our approach, therefore, is this—and this is repetition. We do not take anything away which anybody has now, but we are saying that in this forthcoming period we are blocking any possibilities of the section being put to a use that parliament may not have intended. In this period we will go further with our studies of the matter.

In the meantime I think my hon. friend will recall that there is no yield from such corporations to the federal treasury whatever. Because their business is carried on abroad in order to qualify as a foreign business corporation there is no corporate income tax payable by them to Canada.

My hon. friend put the case of a Canadian parent corporation setting up such a corporation in Canada. In that case if any dividend is paid by the subsidiary, which is the foreign business corporation, to the parent, there is no tax on the dividend. I put the other case where a foreign corporation—a parent corporation abroad—chooses to form in Canada one of these foreign business corporations; in that case there would be a 5 per cent tax withheld for the benefit of the Canadian treasury from dividends payable by the Canadian subsidiary to the parent corporation abroad. But if it is a Canadian parent corporation forming this corporation in Canada, there would be no tax deduction at all.

Therefore, this is a very important tax concession. Any corporation can, if it qualifies as a parent business corporation under section 71, derive thereby important tax advantages, and while there may be advantages to Canada in terms of employment of a few people at head office, in many cases simply a skeleton staff and no more, we think that before we should allow this situation to continue where we have concern about the possibility of the section being used in the two ways I have indicated we should close the door now and leave it closed until another form of legislation is introduced which will not be capable of being misused in either the two ways I have indicated.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am by no means satisfied. The minister indicates that anybody who so far is incorporated and given the tax arrangement that he thinks should be denied in the future has not particularly abused the situation, but the minister has given me no instance of where it has resulted in some loss to the treasury. He is now proposing to do something new. Obviously, then, any little advice which he gives to this committee about the opportunities open to these people will not affect them. He has a big majority behind him and he will probably put through this proposed change in the legislation. But I do think that without naming any companies or anything of that kind he should indicate to this committee what is the possible loophole or loss—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have tried to do that. I say that under the terms of the present act there is a possibility that it can be used as a tax haven with no benefit to Canada, and it may also be used for tax avoidance.

Mr. Benidickson: Taking those last few words and sticking to them, can we not correct our present statute to avoid that without saying we should not have any more Brazilian Traction companies operating in Canada, or should not have any more of the international trading companies which I have heard about out in Vancouver trying to cultivate business in an admirable way for Canada in the Far East, and things of that kind where the operation is under Canadian leadership? That in turn is giving employment at the head office level at least to a great number of Canadians. I have not any personal experience with these corporations.

The minister and I have been engaged in this forum for some years and my experience in business has been as curtailed as sometimes his has been. But I am sure that some of our colleagues in the profession of law and some of the people we know in the accounting profession and others would feel that it is absolutely wrong to think that services which could be performed by companies of his kind who are doing all their business outside Canada would be forced to go, shall we say, to Indonesia or some other place to incorporate and make sure that down in Indonesia they used the accountants and lawyers and the other people. I do not think we have had an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have tried to give it three times now, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this paragraph passes I think someone on this side of the house will have to take some exception to the very extraordinary principle enunciated by the minister in respect to this paragraph. If I may put what he said in my own words, the minister has told us that if the law were left as it is now some dire and dreadful things might happen but that we were not competent to know what those things would be, that they are so secret they must be kept from parliament and that we would have to adopt this recommendation on faith.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister can reinterpret or tell us what he did mean when he rises to reply. If the Minister of National Defence had come in and said that his department was doing in the national research council or the defence research board some very secret research work into a very secret weapon the committee might have accepted that, but for the Minister of Finance to come in here and say that if the law is left as it is it might result in Canada becoming a tax haven or it might result in tax evasion, and then to say "but I am not going to tell you how that could happen and you will have to accept it on faith", is to propose a doctrine that I believe is quite preposterous.

It is parliament, after all, that is being asked to pass this tax legislation. Surely members of parliament are entitled to know why the minister thinks there is this dreadful danger in leaving the law as it now is. He has told us absolutely nothing, has given us no information. He said we must accept on faith; father knows best.

This all-wise government—and here I am paraphrasing things that used to be said by the hon. member for Eglinton about the former administration—this all-wise, all-knowing, arrogant government knows what is going to happen in the future and we are expected to take it on faith. As I understood it, that was the gist of the minister's argument for this proposed amendment. It seems to me that is something parliament should not be asked to do at all. We should be told why this change is proposed. After all, there could be no danger because, as my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out before dinner, the government has a large enough majority so that it is quite sure that in the end, if it insists, this resolution will be passed and therefore the law will no longer be, if the minister has his way, in the state it was before. Therefore this argument of secrecy has no validity.

It seems to me that the minister should take parliament into his confidence and give us the information on which he is asking us to change the law that seems to have done no Canadian any harm and that the minister himself admitted has done no harm in the past. I submit it is his duty to inform parliament and that the minister should explain precisely what it is that he fears and what he feels is going to be against the public interest if he wants us to agree to change this part of the law.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we have just heard a very finished demonstration of misinterpretation of what I had to say. I will go over the ground again in the hope that this time my words will be clearer to the hon. gentleman and there will be no possible danger of misinterpretation.

What I said, Mr. Chairman, was that section 71 is a quite complicated section. It has been amended by parliament in the past and the two dangers that after no little study of this question we see are that the section can be used, with no advantage to Canada, as an occasion for making Canada a tax haven for those who wish to come here and use this jurisdiction simply as a tax haven, and on the other hand that it may be used for tax evasion.

I do not think hon. members wish me to point out in this section where we see the possibility of these dangers. On the best advice available to the government and to the Minister of Finance in preparing these budget proposals there are possible loopholes in this section which might be used for these purposes. I do not think it is the wish of parliament that Canada should be used without any advantage to Canada simply as a tax haven for those who do their business abroad or that it should be used in any situation for the purpose of tax evasion. That is the situation expressed quite simply.

The resolution in the amended form that is proposed takes nothing away from any corporation that has acquired rights under it or that has in respect of the period since the first of this year found itself in circumstances where it might qualify in respect of its 1959 taxation period. Those rights remain untouched by this proposed resolution. We are proposing, however, that the right to qualify as a foreign business corporation should not accrue hereafter to any corporation which has not already entitled itself under section 71 to be treated as a foreign business corporation or in the circumstances in which it has found itself since January 1 of this year has acquired the means of qualifying as a foreign business corporation in respect of this present taxation period.

We are asking the committee for that reason to close the door at that point because there is a very serious question as to whether any more foreign business corporations are going to be of any advantage to Canada anyway. The foreign business corporation by definition is a corporation that simply is incorporated here and carries on its business outside Canada entirely. Hon. members will observe this if they look at the provisions of section 71. Such a corporation becomes subject to no corporation tax here because it does not do any business in Canada but it enjoys the benefit of the laws of Canada and the protection of Canadian laws without paying us any revenue. We therefore think this situation is one that calls for some review and we propose that no more corporations not yet entitled to qualify as foreign business corporations should be in a position to do so hereafter until at least this whole situation has been carefully reviewed. That is the reason, Mr. Chairman, why a resolution is proposed which will if approved by the committee prevent more corporations coming into existence and acquiring these favoured rights under our income tax legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, just before the dinner recess the minister indicated to the committee that from his point of view he thought he had explained to me three times the reasons for this proposal. I am no expert in this field, but during the dinner recess I made a number of inquiries among people whom I regard as having a great deal of experience in matters of this kind. They tell me that they are just as much in the dark as was the Financial Post for any explanation as to the reason for this tax change. I am told that they had the same general impression that I had, that while those corporations do not particularly pay taxes to Canada, they did seem to contribute in a broad way substantial advantages in that their head offices were in Canada. They have employees paying personal income taxes here and they could not think of a thing that was detrimental to Canada in the activities of the corporations that they were conducting.

I still have not got from the minister any indication of what loss, either in revenue, in integrity or in proper activity there is in adherence to the law as we have had it up to now. While the minister brought up the question of some kind of security and not wanting to indicate loopholes to taxpayers either in the past or to come, he was completely disregarding the fact that every taxpayer of this kind has been protected up to this particular time and other taxpayers from this time on will be denied any right that they will regard as a loophole. What are those loopholes? What are those advantages to the foreign corporations that are disadvantages to the crown?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me give an example. Hon. members opposite wish to know the loopholes.

Mr. Pickersgill: We want to know the reason.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They wish to know the loopholes that we see in this legislation. Let me give you a possible case, Mr. Chairman. Let us take a situation in which natural resources of Canada are involved in export. A foreign business corporation, we will say, is set up as a selling agent in connection with the export of some Canadian natural resource. The foreign business corporation, we will say, purchases from the Canadian producer at the going price and is able to sell at a very much higher price in the country to which the goods are exported because of the particular demand for the product there.

The profit that is made is not subject to tax in Canada and it is not subject to tax in any other country. When the time comes to distribute the profits of the foreign business corporation, let us say it moves its residence outside of Canada so that no tax is payable on the distribution of the profits. If we consider that the general rule is that residents of Canada must pay Canadian income tax on their income from sources in Canada and from sources outside Canada, I put it to the committee that it is just not proper that all taxes should be avoided in this way through resort to the expedient of a foreign business corporation.

Canada has tax conventions with certain foreign countries. In some of those conventions it is provided that selling agents of Canadian corporations operating in those foreign countries shall not be subject to income tax unless there is a permanent establishment such as a selling office or the location of salesmen who have power to contract in those foreign countries. Where the selling agent is set up as a separate company it might qualify as a foreign business corporation, take advantage of the tax convention and also be free from tax in Canada. Therefore, you see, Mr. Chairman, that here you have all the makings of a situation in which Canada becomes a tax haven and where Canada derives no benefit whatever.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asks what harm are they doing if they set up an office here and employ a skeleton staff? They may not be doing any positive harm. The fact is they are enjoying very substantial tax advantages in Canada, and we think it is better, when those corporations in the situation I have indicated do not bring any advantage to Canada, they should not enjoy a special tax advantage. It would be very much better in those cases if such corporations were here not as foreign business corporations but were here and paid taxes in Canada in the same way as other corporations and individuals do.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I continue to plead no great knowledge of the instances of individual companies but, as I said this afternoon, we do think of a large foreign corporation in Canada with which most of us are familiar, and I think of Brazilian Traction.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This will take nothing from Brazilian Traction.

Mr. Benidickson: No, it will not because in their case you exempt them. But why are you preventing that happening in the future? I recall that under the Export Credits Insurance Act and some other legislation Canadians have enjoyed a great deal of employment and prosperity as a result of the interest in a company of this kind with headquarters in Canada doing business on foreign soil. This has been a great advantage to our economy. I do not speak at all for any particular officers of the company; they are better known to my friend than they are to me. Is this going to stop this kind of thing happening in the future? A Canadian organization with a Canadian head office formed a company which grew into large size and in recent years bought a tremendous amount of supplies from Canada because of the natural alliance that it had from head office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I remind my hon. friend that we are not creating any impediment in this provision in the way of incorporating any company that wishes to do business that way. Any such intended incorporation is as free to proceed to incorporation tomorrow as it was prior to the introduction of the budget, even if this resolution is adopted. But this is a question of whether a corporation in those circumstances shall be entitled to enjoy the very advantageous tax position that foreign business corporations now enjoy under section 71.

My hon. friend asks me about making changes. Well, this change that is now proposed in section 71 is not the first time that section 71 has been altered. I remind my hon. friend that an amendment was introduced to section 71 by the former government in 1955 when he was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. That amendment had the effect of narrowing the provisions in order to create one more barrier that any corporation must overcome in order to qualify. It was in 1955 that it was provided in clause 71 (2) (d) that the foreign business corporation was to derive not more than 10 per cent of its gross profits from the leasing or operation by it of a ship or aircraft. That is different in kind from what we are doing here but it is a sample of the way in which the rules have been changed. It cannot be pretended that the rules have not been changed hitherto.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not suggesting that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What we are doing here, instead of changing the rules that apply to any existing corporation, is to say in effect that we are not going to make any change affecting them but we are going to say that no more corporations may qualify for the tax advantage. They can be incorporated, they can go into business, they can create in so doing any of the advantages to the economy of this country that my hon. friend sees accruing from the incorporation in Canada of a foreign business corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: What would the loss have been to the city of Toronto, from which my hon. friend comes, if Brazilian Traction had not had its head office in Toronto in recent years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My answer to that is that we take nothing away from any corporation that has qualified.

Mr. Pickersgill: But you prevent anything like that happening in the future.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not for all time. There are a number of these corporations in existence now and the issue here is whether a very valuable tax advantage should be conferred on corporations which happen to qualify under section 71 without any return to Canada. If there were some compensating advantage to Canada from the benefit that is extended to such corporations under Canada's laws—protection, indeed, life itself in the case of these corporations—then there might be some point to it, but if corporations in the future are going to be permitted to acquire this favoured position it will have to be on the basis of their being required to submit to the payment of some return for this advantage.

Mr. Benidickson: You will drive them out.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph 9 as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Benidickson: On division.

Resolution agreed to on division.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Old Age Security Act to provide:

1. That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years the rate of old age security tax every individual shall be required to pay on his taxable income be increased from 2 per cent with a maximum of $60 to 3 per cent with a maximum of $90 and that for the 1959 taxation year the rate shall be 2.5 per cent with a maximum of $75.

2. That with respect to income of corporations, other than non-resident-owned investment corporations, earned on and after January 1, 1959 the rate of old age security tax be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent of taxable income.

3. That the rate of old age security tax on the sale price of goods be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent and that any enactment founded upon this paragraph be deemed to have come into force on the 10th day of April, 1959.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraph one?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the point I want to make very evident to the committee is that when this increase is proposed it is contrary to the arrangements that were made in 1951 when this plan was presented to parliament. At that time, particularly with respect to sales tax, the government of the day decided to absorb two per cent of the sales tax rather than see it advance as a consumer cost across the line. That is the point I want to emphasize to the committee tonight.

Despite all the words that we have heard from the Minister of Finance in past years, he is raising the sales tax to a record high. The last time there was an attempt to put the old age security fund into balance between outgo and taxes the government of that day absorbed two per cent of the then existing 10 per cent sales tax, and I think that would have been the proper course for the minister at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph one? Is there any discussion on paragraph two? Is there any discussion on paragraph three? Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Benidickson: On division.

Resolution agreed to on division.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act to provide:

1. That the duty of excise on spirits distilled in Canada be increased from $12 to $13 per proof gallon.

2. That the duty of excise on Canadian brandy be increased from $10 to $11 per proof gallon.

3. That the duty of excise on cigars be increased from $1 per 1000 to $2 per 1000.

4. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the 10th day of April, 1959.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraph one?

Mr. Winch: I do not think we can discuss the paragraphs separately because they involve one principle. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question that nobody else seems to want to ask. How far does he think he can go with respect to excise duties on distilled spirits? If my memory is correct, the provinces and the federal governmeint now receive about 80 cents out of every retail dollar spent on distilled spirits. It is my understanding that out of the 80 cents the federal government now receives 43 cents. I believe that somebody should ask the Minister of Finance this question and I am the one who is going to do it. When the provinces and the federal government now receive 80 cents out of every retail dollar, with the federal government receiving 43 cents, how far does the minister think he should go in increasing the tax on distilled spirits when the increase has to be paid by the person who likes to buy a drink?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, somone on this side of the house asked what my qualifications were as a witness for the purpose of answering this question. The price at which liquor sells in any province is established, of course, by the provincial liquor outlet, normally the liquor commission of the province. I do not attempt to be able to quote the retail price or to be able to give the hon. gentleman the proportion of tax that is contained in that price. When he says "tax" that would mean presumably both the federal tax and the provincial mark-up. I can give to my hon. friend the figures as to the amount of tax. I can tell him what the tax will be on a 25-ounce bottle of whisky, 70 per cent proof if it starts with a manufacturer's selling price of $1.40 before any taxes. In recent years this has borne a total of excise duties and sales taxes of $1.58, and under this proposed increase the aggregate excise duty and sales tax will be advanced to $1.73.

In the budget speech I pointed out that the increase in the excise duty would amount to about 12 cents per 25-ounce bottle. The addition of the increased sales tax will bring the aggregate increase of both excise and sales taxes, according to my calculation, to 15 cents per 25-ounce bottle.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a question and I am sure the minister will regard it as a very ignorant question. I am asking it purely for information. I notice that this Excise Act imposes a levy on spirits distilled in Canada and on Canadian brandy. I presume that somewhere or other there is an impost on imports—I would be surprised if a Tory government put an impost only on goods made in Canada—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would let me finish my question. My question is, what is the historical reason for the impost on imports being in a different act of parliament from this one, and where is the other impost found?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the corresponding levy on spirits imported from abroad will be found in the Customs Tariff. To answer the hon. gentleman's second question, there are two kinds of duties. There are excise duties and there are customs duties. The excise duties are levied upon certain Canadian products. The customs duties are levied on certain imported products.

As the hon. gentleman knows, the Excise Act is an act which levies excise duties upon alcohol in various forms, and we will be turning to the Customs Tariff for the corresponding levies by way of customs duties on corresponding imports. Then, we come to the Excise Tax Act, and there we have the statute under which the sales tax is imposed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, Mr. Chairman—the minister seems in a very amiable mood and I am anxious to continue my education—if the minister would tell me what is the difference between an excise duty and an excise tax? Perhaps I should ask the Minister of National Revenue who collects them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Broadly speaking, an excise duty is levied at the time that the goods pass out of some form of government control, out of bond, for example. The excise tax is the type of tax that is levied at some stage as the goods pass freely from hand to hand. For instance, the sales tax as we know is levied at the manufacturer's or producer's level. The excise duty is levied before the goods are permitted to move into circulation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know that neither the minister or I use cigars or cigarettes, but I was really puzzled as to why cigars came under the Excise Act and cigarettes under the Excise Tax Act. Is it because cigars go into bond and cigarettes do not, or is there some other reason?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, cigars and cigarettes are under both acts.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why has the minister raised the tax under one act for cigars and under the other act for cigarettes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the reasons that will appear here, Mr. Chairman; in the one case it is the excise duty on cigars that is being raised from $1 per thousand to $2 per thousand, and in the case of cigarettes it is the excise tax on each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package that is being increased from 2 to 2½ cents.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can read just as well as the minister can. What I asked him was why he increased the duty in one case and the tax in another, if they both come under both acts? There must have been some reason?

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was the simplest way of achieving the increase in revenue that was required, and in the most equitable manner possible.

Mr. Winch: I understood we were going through these resolutions paragraph by paragraph, but we have gone from the Excise Act at the top of page 5 to the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate insisted on a rapid education, so we have been moving forward perhaps a little too swiftly. Perhaps we had better return to the earlier items again.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion?

Resolution agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide:

1. That the excise tax on each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package be increased from 2 cents to 2½ cents;
2. That the wording of the exemption from sales tax for "stock conditioners, condiments and feed supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds" in Schedule III be changed to read:

"Feed supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof";

3. That the exemption from sales tax for tanks for collecting milk be extended to include complete parts thereof including materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such tanks and parts;

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

4. That the definition of "producer or manufacturer" be extended to include any person who packages toilet articles, preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals for sale except where they are packaged by a retailer in his retail premises for sale therefrom directly to consumers or users;
5. That the definition of "manufacturer or producer" be extended to include any person who markets, except by sale at retail directly to consumers or users, toilet articles, preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals manufactured under his own brand;
6. That the sales tax be imposed, levied and collected on goods purchased or imported by a licensed wholesaler and retained for his own use or for rental to others;
7. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the 10th day of April, 1959; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

On paragraph 1.

Mr. Winch: My argument is the same as on the previous resolution, but it is a little more emphatic because there are a great many more who smoke than there are who drink. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance —I know he is a non-drinker and a non-smoker—why he has to penalize those who like to have a smoke.

I have tried to make a study of the situation, and it is my understanding that prior to the introduction of this resolution the federal tax on a package of 20 cigarettes was 17.7 cents or 54 per cent of the ordinary retail price. It is now being increased. I used to roll my own cigarettes many years ago, but I did not like them. I am going to ask the Minister of Finance why, when he is already receiving 17.7 cents per package of 20 or 54 per cent of the retail price, it is necessary to increase this tax. Do not forget it is the average person in Canada who will pay the tax, the men, women—

Mr. Pickersgill: And children.

Mr. Winch: That is right, the men, women and children. Why do you think you need more than the 17.7 cents per package of 20 cigarettes? I know that you are so sacrosanct that I hate even to talk to you. I cannot believe that you have not any sin. When there are other avenues of taxation open, such as income tax on lawyers and others who we know make millions without taxes, why do you increase the tax on men, women and children who smoke?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quite overwhelmed by the presentation the hon. gentleman has made of his case. It is extremely touching indeed. The fact is that we must have some additional revenue. Apparently the hon. gentleman regards taxes as a penalty, at any rate if they are levied on cigarettes. By the same token, if that reasoning is sound, I suppose any tax levied on anything is something of a penalty. Against that argument I have to put before the hon. gentleman the view that however we may look at taxes, whether darkly or otherwise, no one has found a way of financing the services that governments must provide and are expected to provide nowadays, apart from levying taxes for the purpose.

If the hon. member thinks that we should have chosen something else, may I say that I am not aware of anything else in the way of a tax that could be said to be painless. The hon. member speaks about income tax. In the course of discussion on the budget and since then we have been told that there is nothing painless about the income tax. Hence I cannot see a distinction in kind or any fundamental difference between a tax on this particular commodity and other kinds of taxes that may be regarded as necessary for the purpose of raising revenue.

As to the extent of the levy, the proposed increase actually amounts to a bare fraction under two cents a package. With the increase in the sales tax it comes out to 2.2 cents per package. On a package of 20 that means about one-ninth of a cent per cigarette. I cannot really regard this as a crushing imposition. I refer to the addition of one-ninth of a cent on each cigarette.

Mr. Winch: Put it on the basis of the tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rate that will be in effect now is certainly not the highest rate that has been levied on cigarettes in the past. During the war the tax on a package of 20 cigarettes reached 21.7 cents. Effective April 10, 1951, it was increased by our predecessors in office to 25.21 cents per pack. I am speaking of taxes only, the combination of excise tax, excise duty and sales tax.

Mr. Winch: I thought we were at peace and in Conservative prosperity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, we are. That is why I think the hon. member can well afford to pay one-ninth of a cent more by way of tax per cigarette. I think he will enjoy it that much more realizing that he is contributing something toward paying the cost of the substantial social security measures which this government has introduced for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: The prosperity is going up in smoke.

Mr. Winch: Do the members of the minister's own party not also smoke?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I mentioned, the total of federal tax was advanced on April 10, 1951, to 25.1 cents per pack. On April 8, 1952, a year later, it was reduced, but it remained at 22.1 cents per pack for another year until the eve of the 1953 election when it was reduced further to 17.7 cents per pack of 20 cigarettes, which tax has been in effect for the past six years. There we have the story, Mr. Chairman.

The tax on cigarettes or cigars is not nearly as heavy in this country as it is in some other countries. There was a time when we, when in opposition, pointed out to the government of the day, with respect to this record high tax they imposed on cigarettes, that they were putting a premium on smuggling. When the cigarette tax was at its peak it was known that there was a good deal of smuggling going on. But the situation has quite drastically changed since that time. In those days there was a wide differential between the price of a package of cigarettes in the United States and the price of a package of cigarettes in Canada. The difference was so wide that there was a great incentive to smuggle. But that gap or that differential has been greatly narrowed since that time as a result of the increase of taxes in the United States. Today the differential is so much smaller that it is not anticipated that this modest increase in the tax on Canadian cigarettes or the cigarettes sold in Canada will be any encouragement to smuggling.

In addition, there are provinces which themselves levy provincial taxes on cigarettes.

All things considered, this tax was regarded as being as painless a way of finding needed revenues as any that could be resorted to. I hope that my hon. friend, in paying one-ninth of a cent additional tax per cigarette, will derive satisfaction from the fact that he is thereby increasing the revenues that will be used for the purpose of sustaining the social security program and other measures of a kind that the people of Canada seem to desire.

Mr. Knowles: I want to address a few words to the minister with respect to this problem, probably from a slightly different angle. The people in my area who are in the tobacco-growing business are quite concerned about the increase in excise tax. As the minister has indicated, they well remember the results that followed from the increase back in 1951 when the law of diminishing returns set in to the extent that growers in the area suffered a decrease in production of some three million pounds. Of course, as in any other industry, when there is a reduction in production, when you are not working at peak capacity, the result is a certain amount of inefficiency. There again the people are quite concerned lest this condition might set in again.

To many Canadians this increase is just a statistic but to the farmers of Norfolk who grow the crop it is a threat to their maximum production. To many hon. members and people throughout Canada tobacco probably is considered a luxury. I suppose when it was completely an import product brought into Canada it was a luxury. However, today the people in my area who brought a poor sandy soil back into a condition of productivity, so that they are now able to earn a reasonable living, do not consider it a luxury at all. Neither do they consider it a luxury when they compare their income to the income the federal treasury receives from tobacco. Nor do they consider it a luxury when they consider the tremendous amount of capital investment in land and equipment and the high cost of growing an acre of tobacco, which is something over $500 an acre, and also the tedious hours of hard labour. On top of all that, we have many hazards such as wind, hail and frost which in one year can bring total disaster to a season's work.

Therefore we are vitally concerned in it from the standpoint of the economic condition of the area, not only to the farmers but to surrounding businesses as well. The question I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister is that we would like some assurance from him that the law of diminishing returns will not set in.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a little to what has been said by the hon. member from my native county of Norfolk. I would like to add a little to the history given to us by the Minister of Finance as well. What the Minister of Finance did not tell us was that the hon. member from Norfolk and the present Minister of Transport attended a meeting in Norfolk county, a meeting which was reported in the Simcoe Reformer on June 5, 1957. The heading of this account of the meeting in the Simcoe Reformer is: "Excessive Tobacco, Income Taxes Blasted by Speaker at Conservative Rally Here." Then the report goes on:

> Speaking on behalf of J. Evans Knowles, Progressive Conservative candidate for Norfolk county, George Hees, Member of Parliament for Toronto-Broadview, said that the Conservative party is on the move and going some place, while at the same time the Liberal government was made up of old men in an old party—
> "They keep extolling their work of the past"—

And so on. I am not going to read all this stuff because, Mr. Chairman, you will call me to order in a moment. I would like to come to a quotation of Mr. Hees, the present Minister of Transport, where he says:

> "Tobacco I am sure is the most highly taxed commodity and has been shown rank discrimination with regard to taxation."

That was the tax which the minister said was low, the Liberal tax. In the light of these remarks, I would hate to think what the Minister of Transport, if he were not bound by cabinet solidarity, would say about this latest increase. I think I had better repeat this for the benefit of the minister and other members opposite as another striking example of the way this government has kept its promises:

> "Tobacco I am sure is the most highly taxed commodity and has been shown rank discrimination with regard to taxation."

Then he went on:

> If the taxes were lowered on tobacco—

This is the present Minister of Transport speaking in 1957—

> —more tobacco products would be sold and therefore the gross intake would be greater.

The Minister of Finance apparently does not believe this and does not agree with the economic philosophy of his colleague, the Minister of Transport.

> This has been proved when some time ago the price of cigarettes was raised. You all know what happened. The sales dropped off and consequently the gross intake. The tax was lowered and up went the sales and the intake.

Then the minister went on to hold out the same hopes about automobiles, and you remember what the minister did to them.

That was not the only occasion upon which high hopes were held out, and the Minister of Transport was not the only one who held them out. On February 18, 1958 the Hamilton Spectator carried this account of a meeting the Prime Minister had at Brantford:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker blew a warm blast of optimism over this sub-zero city last night.

I imagine the news that the cigarette tax was going to be raised blew a cold blast over that optimism. I forgot to read the heading of this article, and perhaps I should read it for the benefit of the hon. member for Norfolk, the hon. member for Elgin, who is not here, and the hon. member for—

Mr. MacLean (Queen's): The hon. member for Elgin is here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I beg the hon. member's pardon; I was thinking of the hon. member for Oxford. The hon. member for Oxford is not here.

An hon. Member: Yes he is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the hon. member for Kent, who is no doubt here and will speak for himself, and the hon. member for Essex South and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I am sure he is delighted with these increases in the cigarette taxes. Now, this report is only a year ago, before the election. This is the kind of thing that the tobacco growers of this country were being treated to. This is the heading: "Optimistic Prime Minister Hints PC's Would Trim Tobacco Taxes". I imagine the average person on reading that would think by "trim" was meant taking something off. I suppose the word could be used in the opposite sense of putting more trimming on in the form of additional tax.

Mr. Robichaud: Trimming the taxpayers' pockets.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, and also in another sense, as the hon. member for Gloucester has reminded me, of trimming the taxpayer. Perhaps that is what the Prime Minister had in mind. Here is what the Prime Minister is quoted as having said:

"The tobacco industry has asked for some action, and we are having the question looked into—"

You know the way the Prime Minister is always looking into things—

"—to ascertain what action should be taken to assist the tobacco growers to achieve fair and reasonable returns", said Mr. Diefenbaker, who is a non-smoker.

I really do not know what that has to do with the subject.

Mr. MacInnis: You are a non-smoker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, that is true.

Mr. MacInnis: Then why mention it?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Cape Breton South like Pontius Pilate stays not for an answer, but I will give one. I mentioned it to show how disinterested I was, because as far as my pocket is concerned it does not matter to me what the tax on cigarettes is. But I am a strong believer in governments keeping their promises and in public men carrying out their promises.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: There certainly could be no more glaring example anywhere than in this particular case, because if there is one industry which was singled out both in 1957 and 1958 and told the Liberals had discriminated against it, and given the impression, as I have shown here from this article, that this government was going to do the opposite, it was the tobacco growers as the hon. member for Norfolk well knows. I understand he actually had his picture taken with the Prime Minister holding up a package of cigarettes and telling the growers of the wonderful things which would be done for them. But I will stick to the text which I have before me. I have not got the pictures here but I do have these words attributed to the Prime Minister:

"The tobacco industry has asked for some action and we are having the question looked into to ascertain what action should be taken to assist the tobacco growers to achieve fair and reasonable return," said Mr. Diefenbaker, who is a non-smoker.

He added: "The tobacco industry has not received the consideration it has deserved".

Apparently it has now got the consideration which the Minister of Finance thinks it deserves and it has got it in the form of an increase in the tax. I could go through a lot of other clippings. Apparently this hinting went on in a good many places in western Ontario during those two election campaigns, but it does not seem to me that the number of the promises, which were made outside the house and therefore would be the kind of second class promises that the Minister of National Revenue referred to the other day, makes any difference. I am sure that the hon. member for Norfolk and his constituents believed that when the Prime Minister talked about some kind of action, that kind of action was going to be the kind of action that the tobacco growers expected and not the exact opposite.

It is true that you can twist these words around and argue that the Prime Minister was really warning then that the tobacco growers and tobacco consumers were going to have to pay the cost of his extravagance. That is perhaps what he really warned them of in this rather veiled language. I am sure, however, that all the electors in the tobacco districts of Ontario, every constituency of which returned a Tory member, are going to feel pretty disillusioned about any further promises emanating from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I cannot deny myself the pleasure of saying something in immediate succession in the course of debate to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The carpet of the chamber is already wet in front of him with the crocodile tears that gushed forth from his eyes. This outburst has come from an hon. member as spokesman of a party which in 1951 raised the tax on cigarettes to 25.1 cents a package.

Mr. Pickersgill: During the war.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under pressure of demand from the Conservative opposition of that time that government the following year reduced the price to 22.1 cents per package. It was under pressure from the Conservative opposition of that day—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I know that the minister does not want to be unfair—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the Liberal party then proceeded to reduce the price—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member said he is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, my question of privilege is that the minister said I was a member of the government in 1951-1952. I was not a member of any government in 1951-52.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if I said that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member of the government of that time, of course I overstated the fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: You misstated the fact.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member accepted outwardly the role of being a member of the government somewhat later, not thereby evidently increasing his influence. Having regard to the extent to which he seemed to have influenced the strategy of the government in those times I think I am not unfair to the hon. member in ascribing to him a great deal of the responsibility for the blunders and the unjust impositions of that former government even before he accepted a portfolio in the government.

I pointed to the fact that he is spokesman for a party whose government at that time had raised the tax on cigarettes to 25.1 cents per pack and it was the Conservative opposition that demanded that the tax be reduced. Similarly the following year in 1952, and again in 1953, it was the Conservative party, in opposition in those days, which forms the government today that was responsible for keeping up year in and year out the demand that the unfair impositions that the Liberal government was imposing upon the tobacco industry should be eased.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now you are putting them on again.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have indicated why in this present situation with the need for finding further revenues to combat the dangers of inflation, to reduce the deficit and to enable the government to go forward with this recovery program that is gaining momentum day by day and bringing more impetus to the Canadian economy as it proceeds, it is necessary that we recommend to the committee certain increases in taxes now.

No one has pleaded in this chamber the cause of the tobacco grower more effectively, more eloquently or more earnestly than the hon. member for Norfolk. He has been ably supported, as I can testify from my discussions with them, by the hon. members who represent that cluster of ridings in western Ontario in which tobacco is grown on a substantial scale, including the hon. member for Elgin, the hon. member for Oxford and other hon. members whose voices have been heard and listened to on this subject.

The question has been raised as to whether this very modest increase in the tax on cigarettes and the modest increase in the tax on cigars may have the effect of hurting the interests of the tobacco growers. I do not believe that these very slight increases will have any such effect. We are not in the situation we were in a few years ago.

I have pointed to what happened in the smuggling of United States cigarettes into Canada in the days when the Liberal party was boosting the tax on cigarettes to all-time record heights, and the smuggling went on. If we look at the figures of consumption with respect to cigarettes and have regard to the fact that we have not applied the increase in taxes on tobacco in all forms, I believe hon. members may be re-assured in this regard.

We were careful to confine the increases to tobacco in two forms, cigars and cigarettes. As to cigarettes, may I remind hon. members of the fact that a very heavy increase both in absolute consumption and per capita consumption in cigarettes has occurred in these recent years.

In 1952 when the former government was keeping the tax on cigarettes at a substantially higher figure than it will be under this present budget there were consumed in Canada 18 billion cigarettes, to give the committee round figures. It is estimated that in 1958 the consumption of cigarettes in Canada had increased in round figures to 33 billion. In those six years there had been an increase of nearly 15 billion in the number of cigarettes consumed in Canada and in terms of percentage an increase of 80 per cent in 1958 over the consumption in 1952. Those are absolute figures.

Some hon. member may say there was an increase in population in that period, and that is true. Therefore I give the committee, Mr. Chairman, the per capita figures of consumption of cigarettes in Canada for the same period. In 1952 the per capita consumption of cigarettes in Canada was 1,258. By 1958 that had increased to 1,925. This represents an increase of 667 cigarettes per capita and a percentage increase of 53 per cent in 1958 over 1952.

In the light of the harsh treatment they received under the Liberal government I can well understand why tobacco growers should be vigilant and concerned about any change in their tax treatment. I believe that it is undeniable, however, in the light of these figures that no modest increase of one-ninth of a cent per cigarette is going to make any impression on these growing figures. I think, therefore, that the tobacco growers of this country can feel quite reassured that this increase is so slight so as to not pose any threat whatever to their interests.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let one or two observations and especially those of a personal nature made by the minister pass without comment. I do not take the slightest exception to these exaggerated and complimentary references the minister pays to the role I occupied in this country before I became a member of the government but as everyone knows I had no responsibility for preparing any budget even when I was a member of the government except at the very last when I took the collective responsibility that all ministers do.

But even if I did, I would like to remind the committee that the prime minister of that day did not go around before the election promising that the taxes would be reduced and then within 13 months increase them. That is the difference between the Liberal government and the Tory government. The minister knows perfectly well why the tax and other taxes were increased in 1951 and 1952. He knows perfectly well it was because this country was engaged in a war in the Pacific and in the vast rearmament connected with the North Atlantic treaty and for no other reason, and he knows that just as quickly as possible those imposts were reduced.

It is not for me to say whether or not it was too high in 1951, and whether the government was wise to reduce it in 1952 and again in 1953. I imagine they were, but I am sure that those reductions in 1952 and 1953 gave a good deal more pleasure to the people of my native county of Norfolk and other counties round about than this increase they have had and, I repeat, after they had been told at Brantford by the Prime Minister when he was Prime Minister—and I shall read from this same clipping from the Hamilton Spectator:

> The tobacco industry has asked for some action, and we are having the question looked into to ascertain what action should be taken to assist the tobacco growers.

This is what they were promised only a year ago in order to get their votes, and this is what they are getting.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have had an opportunity for over 26 years to listen to ministers of finance, both provincial and federal, and never in those 26 years did I listen to so much financial eyewash as we have had from the present Minister of Finance in the past few minutes. It is almost inconceivable that the Minister of Finance would have the temerity and audacity to rise in his place and say what he said a few moments ago. He implied—as a matter of fact I can take no other interpretation from it—that all the great works that the government has in mind with respect to social security are tied to this increase in taxation on tobacco. Well, of course, although in the emotionalism of the Minister of Finance that may have been the point, the fact is we spent this afternoon and part of this evening on the Income Tax Act under which authority has been given for increases in taxation.

Of course, the tobacco tax can have no reference whatsoever to old age pension payments, because that also is very carefully covered in the budget, in the resolution and in the bill which will follow. You know, Mr. Chairman, I will admit I have to admire the suavity and—

Mr. Fisher: Gall.

Mr. Winch: No, I am a gentleman; I would not say gall.

An hon. Member: Probity.

Mr. Winch: I admire the approach of the Minister of Finance. He is one of the most Machiavellian ministers of finance I have yet heard. He can reduce millions of dollars down to one-ninth of one cent. That is very clever, Mr. Chairman, but it is not honesty.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Winch: One second, now; it is true, but not honest. You know why it is not honest? It is true in the presentation of the increase of taxation on one cigarette but it is not honest because it does not give the real picture as to the taxation. I said I gave all respect to a great Machiavellian Minister of Finance but he has not yet answered and I challenge him to answer why. In about two minutes I am going to go out and give the minister one-ninth of one cent increase in the cost of a cigarette because I am going to have a smoke.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Do you think you have earned it?

Mr. Winch: The important fact is that prior to the speech of the Minister of Finance, through the Minister of National Revenue, he was receiving 54 cents out of every dollar spent in the retail market on cigarettes. He now says his increase is only one-ninth of one cent on a cigarette, but up until now he has been receiving 54 cents out of every dollar spent on cigarettes by the Canadian public. Not being satisfied with 54 cents out of every dollar, he wants to raise the tax so that he gets 56 cents out of every dollar spent on cigarettes. He speaks of one-ninth of one cent increase on a cigarette. I think the public should know that he is not satisfied with 54 cents out of every dollar; he wants more than that. Surely, there is a limit to what even a minister of finance should ask for as a return.

The minister does not smoke, but the majority of the people of Canada do. Why does he think he has to hit them harder and harder? I do not know why. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, when I see what is happening to the increased taxes on spirits, and to go back to this I must have your permission to speak on what we have already decided, where the government is going to increase the tax so much, I have a dirty, sneaking hunch that very carefully the Minister of Finance is coming pretty close to public ownership because he has taken about everything there is, anyway. He may as well own it and take it all.

Mr. Bigg: That is your platform, not ours.

Mr. Winch: I was hoping somebody would say that, because, having regard to the way liquor and cigarettes are taxed, you may as well take it all and receive it all. That is the actual situation now, but you have not the intestinal fortitude to own up to it. You are taxing so much now on certain items that you may as well take it all anyway. I do want to say most sincerely that the attitude of the Minister of Finance in going so far as to increase the tax on cigarettes is not fair. He should deal with the amount his government is receiving. I say most sincerely that the 54 per cent already being collected on the sale of cigarettes should be enough for a private enterprise government to collect. I would ask that consideration be given to letting the average citizen enjoy his smokes and his liquor too, if you wish, without the government collecting any more unless the government has the fortitude to come out and say that they will take over both of them under public ownership.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask one question of the minister. On December 20, 1957 the Minister of National Revenue said that he was recommending a change in the regulations governing the exemption from tax of cigarettes on fishing vessels. Up till that time the tax was not imposed if the vessels were out of port for 15 days and he said he was reducing it to 10 days. This was a pretty slender implementation of the very high hopes held out on the east coast by members of the Conservative party in the 1957 election but one has to admit that they did do a little something about it. I wonder whether the minister can assure us that at least that small concession is not being taken away at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The proposed change in the act will not affect the regulations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate that but I was asking the minister if he could give us the assurance that there was no thought of changing that regulation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly have heard of none and I do not believe there is any thought of making any such change.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a very few words about this matter. As the representative of a constituency which is at the very heart of the flue-cured and cigar tobacco producing area of Quebec, I feel sure that this increase is only temporary and that in the near future, perhaps next year, the minister will reconsider his policy, and cut the excise tax on cigar and cigarette tobaccos.

It is too bad that, under the Liberal administration, the excise tax on cigar and cigarette tobaccos went up by 100 per cent.

I am equally sure that nobody is more anxious than the Minister of Finance to help the tobacco grower. So I would ask him to consider the possibility of raising the tariff on cigar tobaccos imported from the United States or Cuba.

The most unfortunate part of it, under the former administration, was that customs duties on non-manufactured cigar tobacco were considerably lowered. For instance, in 1936, the rate on unstemmed cigar tobacco leaves was 40 cents a pound and on stemmed tobacco 60 cents a pound. On January 1, 1948, the custom duty on unstemmed tobacco went down to 20 cents a pound, and to 30 cents a pound, for stemmed tobacco. On October 17, 1948, duty rates on unstemmed and stemmed tobacco were decreased to 15 cents and 22½ cents respectively. On June 30, 1956, the customs duty on unstemmed tobacco and stemmed tobacco went down to 12½ and 20 cents a pound respectively.

Mr. Chairman, I may assure you that I have witnessed the effect of those lowered customs duty rates. Cigar tobacco producers in the province of Quebec came to Ottawa on various occasions and made representations to the government of the day, asking that the customs duties be raised. But they were always turned down.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking the Minister of Finance to study the possibility of raising customs duties in respect of tobacco imported from the United States and Cuba.

I know that the excise tax increase on tobacco is only a temporary one. The present government incurred a slight deficit due to the poor administration which preceded it, but I am satisfied that the budgetary position, and the balance of the budget will be restored under the present administration, because we have at the head of the finance department a most able and efficient man.

Before concluding my brief remarks, Mr. Chairman, I again ask the Minister of Finance to consider whether it would be possible to increase customs duties on imported tobacco and within the near future, to abolish excise duties on cigars while lowering the excise tax on cigarettes.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I listened very closely and with much interest to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). I noted that the hon. member supported the opposition, in the sense that he was so opposed to the increased excise tax on cigarettes that he had the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) practically promise that the increase was only temporary, which means that it would be removed next year, if we are to believe the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Like members of the present government, when the hon. member is in a tight spot, he talks about the misdeeds of the previous government. On the other hand, when he wishes to speak well of his own party, he readily reverts to the times of Sir John A. Macdonald. However, few Conservative members from the province of Quebec will boast of their traditional ties with the administration of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm complained of the fact that, under the Liberal administration, some associations asked for a cut in customs duties on cigar tobacco—

Mr. Pigeon: They asked that the duty be raised.

Mr. Denis: Those associations are said to have asked that the customs duties be raised.

Now, I understand this government has been in power for twenty months. It went through two elections with considerable success. Then, how is it the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, with his influence, has not been able to convince the present government to raise the customs duties? People come here in this house and complain, discuss taxation, and quote figures applying to the past five, six and even ten years. They talk about the past, but not about the present—

An hon. Member: They should be talking about the future.

Mr. Denis: Why does not the government act as if it were alive at this moment and as if it were really running the country, not only in relation to the past, but in relation to the present? When will it finally quit accusing every one except itself? And when will it stop boasting?

The hon. Minister of Finance asked us a moment ago to support this motion, stating that it will only involve a minor increase. The hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm said there was only a "small deficit". Would you call $617,000,000 a small deficit? As the member who spoke before me has indicated, it is really a 56 per cent tax on the price of cigarettes.

Furthermore, in replying to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), the hon. Minister of Finance completely evaded the issue. He simply said that the Conservative government had made many promises, and that not only had such promises not been kept but that the government had actually taken opposite steps. We have heard the Minister of Finance say that taxes were raised in 1952, and again in 1953 and 1954. He quoted percentage ratios, etc., and gave that as an answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In short, I am convinced he spoke for about 15 minutes without replying to the objections and criticisms raised by the hon. member. Every time this government is in trouble, the minister avoids replying to questions. He speaks for three hours, and quotes masses of figures so that no one will be able to make heads or tails out of it. The fact remains that he has raised the tax after promising to reduce it.

Is it not a fact that this famous customs duty is still the same, and that there has been no increase, despite anything the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm may say? What is their purpose in accusing the former administration of doing worse, or just as bad, when they had promised to do better? They have been in power twenty months; so they have had time to correct any past mistakes.

This tax increase is the responsibility of the Conservative government. I therefore ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to swallow his pill, and if because there is no increase in the customs duty on tobacco, and his constituents have to suffer hardship through the fault of his government, let him take the responsibility.

(Text):

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I am considerably surprised that the Minister of Finance would propose this change in the law. I realize that he needs the revenue very much but I thought, in view of what he had said in previous years and what his colleagues had said, he was thoroughly conversant with the law of diminishing returns. I thought he would benefit from the experience of his predecessors who found that sometimes when taxes are increased this results in a lower yield to the government than would have been returned had the taxes remained at a lower level.

It was with considerable surprise, therefore, that we listened to the minister tell us in his budget speech that he was going to repeat something that in earlier years he told us was a mistake and which again tonight he told us was a mistake. This is something about which he spoke very strongly and very vigorously in earlier days and which he characterized as another error and more fumbling on the part of the then administration. Still he walks right into the same trap. We are additionally surprised because of the sentiments expressed by members of the government during the election campaign. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has mentioned some of the things that were said in the tobacco growing district. I have another quotation here which I should like to put on the record. This is from the Globe and Mail and the dateline is Brantford, February 17, 1958. It reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker last night dropped a clear hint that the taxes on cigarettes, cigars and tobacco soon may be cut.
> He told an audience of 1,400 that no industry in Canada suffers a greater degree of taxation than the tobacco industry—
> To the Brantford audience, living on the northern fringe of Ontario's tobacco belt—where production has jumped from 63,000 acres in 1943 to 120,000 in 1956—the Prime Minister's hint appeared an effective vote catcher.

The Minister of Finance has told us tonight that the hon. member for Norfolk has made representations on behalf of the tobacco growing industry, and that they had listened to him. Obviously he did not speak loudly enough or clearly enough to get through to the Minister of Finance. It is, therefore, necessary for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and myself, because we are also natives of Norfolk county, to come to his assistance. I should like to move:

> That paragraph 1 be striken out of the resolution and that the following paragraphs be renumbered accordingly.
> [Mr. Denis.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously, such an amendment is out of order; it is a straight negative.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the point raised by the Minister of Finance. The minister says this amendment is a straight negative. The minister knows, of course, quite well that this is a resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act and all these seven paragraphs compose the one resolution. He knows quite well that the effect of striking out one paragraph is not to negative the resolution but is merely to reduce the amount of the total change in the tax, the amount of increase in the tax. I think even the minister will admit that one of the rights of parliament that is perhaps more sacred than any other is the right to vote taxes or to vote against taxes. The suggestion that it is incompetent to any member to vote that a part of the tax be reduced is surely too preposterous for the Chair to entertain. This would be the effect of the amendment. We are not asking the committee to strike out the whole thing; we are asking them to strike out one paragraph to reduce the amount of the increase. I submit, sir, that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we have been taking up each of these resolutions paragraph by paragraph. What is before the committee now is paragraph 1 of the resolution respecting the Excise Tax Act. What is introduced now by the hon. member for Trinity is an amendment to strike out paragraph 1 which is now under discussion, and to renumber the balance of the paragraphs. With respect to the matter now before the committee, which is the paragraph, obviously the amendment is straight negative and therefore out of order.

The Chairman: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity is that paragraph 1 be striken out of the resolution and the following paragraphs be renumbered accordingly. After consulting Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 221, citation 265, I find it reads:

> No member other than a minister of the crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the house enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

If the purpose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity is that taxes may be reduced, then in my opinion the amendment is in order. If the purpose is that the tax may be removed altogether by removing paragraph 1, then the amendment is not in order.

Mr. Hellyer: If I may say a word on the point of order—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Trinity should explain more clearly the purpose of his amendment.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not remove or eliminate the tax on cigarettes. All it does is to reduce the proposed increase in taxes contained in this resolution, and as such it is merely part of the proposed total increase in taxation presented to the committee by the minister. Consequently it is in effect a reduction in taxation and therefore clearly falls within the last part of the citation from Beauchesne, and is in my opinion in order.

Mr. Aiken: May I refer you, Mr. Chairman, to paragraph 202, page 170, subsection (15):

(15) An amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

I would submit that in this particular case to agree to this motion would be to split the motion and thus be in breach of this particular clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, may I say that this amendment does not say anything about the other paragraphs, whether they are approved or disapproved. The resolution before the committee is a single resolution. The word "resolved" appears only once. The hon. member for Trinity has moved that the first paragraph, which is a part and only a part of the total increase in taxes proposed, should be stricken out. He is not moving that the rest of the taxes be stricken out. It therefore seems to me that it is in strict conformity with the citation that Your Honour read:

This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

The administration has proposed to increase the excise tax in a number of ways. We are suggesting that in one of these ways the increase should not take place and therefore the total should be reduced.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an extremely ingenious argument that has just been addressed to you, Mr. Chairman. You invited the hon. member for Trinity to explain the purpose of his amendment. He says that he wishes to eliminate the proposed tax increase in paragraph 1. He does not deal with his attitude toward the remaining paragraphs in the resolution. Then along comes the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and says, "Oh, this is just one resolution. We are just dealing with one change in one aspect of the resolution". But, Mr. Chairman, this is intended to evade the point of your question. Unless the purpose of the amendment is to adopt the balance of the resolution, there is no escape from the point I have addressed to you, namely that this is in effect a negative because we are dealing only with the first paragraph thus far. That is what was called.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If this can be done on the first paragraph, then when we come to paragraph 2 the hon. gentlemen could move to strike out paragraph No. 2 and rearrange the numbering. Then when we come to paragraph 3, they could move to strike it out and renumber the other paragraphs. Then when we come to paragraph No. 4, they could move to strike it out and renumber the balance. Then when we come to paragraph 5, they could move to strike it out and renumber the remaining ones. They could do the same with regard to paragraph 6 and paragraph 7. In that way they would have established seven different negatives. Obviously that procedure defies reason. It defies the rules of the house.

The plainest rule of the house is that no amendment can be introduced which is in effect a negative to a motion. It is a most ingenious argument to say, "We are dealing only with one part of this resolution and the rest of it stands". But, Mr. Chairman, the rest of it does not stand. They are reserving the right to come along and do the same thing with regard to every other paragraph. Surely that is the answer to what they are saying.

I give you the citation in Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 222. It is citation 266 subparagraph (4) which reads as follows:

(4) It is not in order to move the deletion of a particular clause in an excise tax resolution because it alters the balance of ways and means. Chairman's decision confirmed by the house on a division—

That was in 1951. I well remember the case because the situation there was that an opposition member moved to strike out a certain proposed tax and the motion was ruled out of order. Then an attempt was made by an ingenious member to overcome that difficulty by saying, "Oh, we will take this tax off and we will put on another in its place so that the balance of ways and means shall not be disturbed." That procedure was ruled not to save the situation. It was ruled out of order. I suggest that this amendment, a much clearer case than that in 1951, is out of order because it is clearly a negative.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be allowed to reply to what my hon. friend has said, Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to your attention the fact that if the minister's argument were to be accepted, we on this side of the house could at no time move to reduce a tax as has been done by the hon. member for Trinity. After all, surely there are still some rights left on this side of the house. What we are doing in effect is making a motion to leave the tax exactly where it was before this resolution was introduced and to leave the remaining paragraphs of that resolution exactly as they are, renumbering them as the amendment states. I think the situation is covered clearly, not only by citation 265, the latter part of which you have brought to the attention of the committee, but also by citation 244, subsection (2), where motions and amendments of this nature have been held to be in order. If the argument of the minister were to be accepted, we on this side of the house could never make a motion to reduce a tax; and I am sure that is not the intention of those who made the rules of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend wishes to establish the fact that he is against the proposed increase, then under the rules of the house he divides the house on this motion. There is no excuse whatever for introducing an amendment that is in effect a straight negative.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not like the division. That is the trouble.

Mr. Lambert: With respect, Mr. Chairman, may I point out to hon. members opposite that we are here dealing with a ways and means resolution. They have been quoting from Beauchesne on matters dealing with other types of motions. I would respectfully submit that citation 266 is the only one that is germane. We are dealing with a ways and means resolution. Therefore citation 266 (4) as cited by the minister is completely applicable and that should be the ruling.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, may I say this. The only way in which a tax change can be made is by a ways and means resolution. What the hon. member is saying is that the citation which Your Honour read as the most relevant one does not mean anything at all. It is impossible that Your Honour could have been so mistaken.

Mr. Chairman: Order. This point of procedure has somewhat complicated my existence tonight. Many points of view on this matter have been expressed. It is my opinion that, in accordance with paragraph 265 (1), this duty members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration. Actually, it is my personal opinion that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Trinity has been badly framed and is not explicit enough. For instance, it is quite obvious that if paragraph 1 were eliminated by the committee, the succeeding paragraphs would move up one, that paragraph 2 would become paragraph 1 and so on. If actually the desire of the hon. member for Trinity and his colleagues in the opposition is that the taxes be reduced to their former level, their amendment should have been written in such a way as to imply as much.

As I understand it at present, there have been many decisions on this matter of an amendment in the past which are similar to this one. I have in front of me a ruling which was made in the House of Commons in Westminster, and there are other rulings available which may be somewhat contradictory. Therefore, if it is agreeable to the house I would like to consult over this matter and render a decision tomorrow based on the various facts and authorities which will be collected. Shall we then proceed with paragraph 2 and revert to paragraph 1 tomorrow when such decision will have been reached?

Mr. Hellyer: That suggestion will be agreeable to us, Mr. Chairman.

Paragraph stands.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 agreed.

On paragraph 4.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraph 4?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to reiterate what I said in the budget speech about the changing of the tax level from the manufacturer to the packager, and about the discrimination between certain types of retail outlets. With this in view anything I may say refers to the cosmetic field, the same as it does to the pharmaceutical field. A level of the tax where you put the packager into the manufacturers' level is creating discrimination between retail outlets. Should a retailer be able to buy in sufficient quantities from the manufacturer and pay the sales tax at his level, he would naturally be paying 11 per cent tax. But when the packager who is now classified as a manufacturer buys the same product from the manufacturer and turns it out to his retail outlet plus his own costs, he would have to include it in his costs and turn it over to a retail outlet not within his own company. I am speaking of a wholesaler when I say this. He must take into account in his packaging the cost of his bottle, his label, his labour and his control. I am advised by one of the largest retailing and wholesale outfits in Canada, certainly one of the largest under the same roof in the North American continent, that the cost to his retail outlet will be exactly doubled. For argument's sake, if the cost of tablets, say, at the manufacturing level, was $1, by the time he would receive and package them the cost would increase to $2. Therefore the pass-on would be 22 cents as against 11 cents in the case of $1.

I am reiterating what I said, Mr. Chairman, in the budget debate, that this tax is discriminatory as between certain types of outlets. I am now speaking about where there is no wholesaler in between a manufacturer and his retail outlet. In other words, certain large organizations would buy in the necessary quantities required from the manufacturer. They could do their packaging in their own warehouse or in their retail store, it would make no difference. It would still be under the same organization, and they in turn could sell to the consumer at manufacturer's cost or his 11 per cent mark-up. He would have an advantage over the packager, whom I will call the wholesaler, who would have to add the extra tax to his cost of doing business before it is passed on to his retail outlet over which he has no control.

I claim that this is discrimination and is to the advantage of the larger organizations, and certainly to the disadvantage of the smaller retailer. Any way you look at it, Mr. Chairman, the cost of this merchandise to the eventual consumer is increased. If it goes through a wholesaler who is now classified as a packager and in the same category as a manufacturer, the tax is collected at a higher level. Therefore the tax being passed on naturally has to be at a higher level to the person who is retailing it to his customer.

I do not think the minister feels this is the proper approach to this, because it is favouring some sides of the retail outlet and is discriminating against others who have not the in-between facilities, shall I say, that the larger retailer would have. There is many an outlet from coast to coast, Mr. Chairman, which has one purchasing unit and does not need to pass on the tax through a wholesaler but instead passes it on through its own organization, whether they package it in their own warehouse or in their own retail outlet, be it at Vancouver or Halifax. They are not in the same category as the so-called packager who is being classified as a manufacturer, but the tax is assessed at the manufacturers' or packagers' cost rather than at the retailers' cost, which seems to me is an increase in tax of over 100 per cent.

Progress reported.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire of the house leader what the business of the house is for tomorrow and the rest of the week.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with the discussion of budget resolutions, and then take item No. 13, which is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then we will take the two veterans affairs bills which have come back from the standing committee on veterans affairs, items Nos. 2 and 3 on today's order paper. Then we will take item No. 8, the second reading of an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; items Nos. 11 and 12, two resolutions, one having to do with the Defence Services Pension Act, and the other with the pensions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think we will be taking labour estimates on Thursday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT—LOAN APPLICATIONS

Question No. 383—Mr. Argue:

1. How many applications have been made since January 1, 1958 for loans under the terms of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act?
2. What were the names of the applicants and the amounts of the loans requested in each case?
3. What action was taken on each application, and what were the reasons given for such action?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1. Five.

2. Avon Coal Co. Ltd., Minto, N.B., $620,000; Crawford Contractors Ltd., Minto, N.B., $140,000; Four Star Collieries Ltd., Bras d'Or, N.S., $42,000; V. C. McMann Ltd., Minto, N.B., $28,017; D. W. & R. A. Mills Ltd., Minto, N.B., $1,149,000.

3. Loans, as applied for were granted to the Avon Coal Co., Ltd., Crawford Contractors Ltd., Four Star Collieries Ltd., and V. C. McMann Ltd. These loans were granted for the reasons that the applications met all requirements of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act. Granting the application of D. W. & R. A. Mills Ltd., was not recommended because the applicant, at the time of consideration, did not meet all requirements under the act. The applicant was informed that an application at a later date, when all requirements were met, would receive full consideration.

IMMIGRATION

ONTARIO—STATEMENT ON WELFARE ASSISTANCE AND HOSPITALIZATION FOR IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to inform hon. members of an announcement which is being made this afternoon jointly by Hon. Louis P. Cecile, minister of public welfare of Ontario, and myself concerning the welfare of immigrants residing in Ontario.

As hon. members know, an agreement was signed in March, 1952 whereby the Ontario department of public welfare and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration shared equally the costs of certain welfare assistance and hospitalization in the case of immigrants who had less than one year's residence in Canada and became indigent through accident or illness.

Hospitalization costs will continue to be shared under the agreement of March, 1952 although in the light of the federally sponsored provincial hospital insurance plan this aspect of the agreement is under discussion with the provincial authorities with a view to possible amendment.

In the case of welfare and in the interests of improved administrative practice, Ontario has agreed as of May 1 to treat immigrants in Canada less than one year the same as other persons in that province under the terms of the Ontario general welfare assistance act, and to share with the federal government such expenses as are applicable under the agreement in force under the federal Unemployment Assistance Act rather than through a separate agreement.

This new arrangement provides that should the need arise an immigrant in Ontario, regardless of length of residence, will be entitled to all the social and welfare benefits available under provincial legislation, including direct relief under the Ontario welfare assistance act, and immigrants will be treated exactly the same as other persons resident in that province. The proviso that an immigrant must become indigent through accident or illness, which applied in the case of the earlier agreement, has been removed. This in our opinion will greatly assist newcomers who occasionally after their arrival in this country require social and welfare benefits. My department and the national employment service will continue, as in the past, to assist immigrants in their establishment in employment and integration into the Canadian community.

Ontario becomes the first province to accept this responsibility in respect of welfare which affects the majority of immigrants, as something slightly in excess of 50 per cent of the immigrants who come to this country establish themselves in that province. I may add that negotiations have been initiated with some of the other provinces with a view to concluding similar arrangements.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I am sure that the sporting nature of the house will understand the joy that attended the minister in making this particular announcement in the light of the misfortune that pursued her with respect to that order in council which militated so decidedly against so many immigrants.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): However, in this new arrangement, the minister has been assisted by the government of the province of Ontario. I suspect, of course, that it is only by mere coincidence that the announcement is made a day after the premier of that province had announced his intention to ask for a further mandate for his government. Not only is this obviously a pre-election arrangement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And this is a pre-election speech.

Mr. Speaker: The comment which is acceptable at this time relates to the subject matter of the statement, not to the circumstances attendant upon it whether real or fancied. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would confine himself to the subject matter of the statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You would not expect me to allow this occasion to pass without putting the minister in the favourable position in which this particular announcement puts her, in the light of the situation attendant upon the unfortunate order in council of some time ago. May I say the minister has made an important announcement. The last observation I know she would want me to make is that whatever social benefits these immigrants will have will be largely due to legislation introduced by Liberal governments.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa, May 5, 1959

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, May 5, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,

Lionel Massey
Secretary to the Governor General (Administrative)

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to advise the house as to when he proposes to name a secretary of state for external affairs.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I am in a position to do so the announcement will be made. In that connection I might refer the hon. gentleman to the immortal words of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) when, speaking in the House of Commons on April 2, 1946, he dealt with a similar situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he would remind me of my immortal words?

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question of the Prime Minister supplementary to the one I asked at the beginning of the orders of the day. In view of the fact that I have now had an opportunity of perusing the immortal words of the hon. member for Essex East in 1946, may I ask the Prime Minister whether those words are an indication of the policy that is to be followed by the government in 1959 in respect of this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is of course no; but I thought I ought to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East the words he spoke on an occasion when he was preaching for a call. At that time he felt that the portfolios of secretary of state for external affairs and prime minister should be kept by one person. I do not share that view today and the appointment will be made as soon as convenient. I thought it only fair, for the edification of the hon. gentleman, to point out exactly what he had said on another occasion.

Mr. Pearson: Will the Prime Minister not agree that the words of the hon. member for Essex East on that occasion were abundantly justified by the personalities and circumstances involved?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not want to join in that and accept entirely the point of view of the hon. gentleman as totally unprejudiced.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Since the Prime Minister is in such a good mood, may I ask him if he had not spent a very happy week end reading those immortal words?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; they came to me some days ago and I have been awaiting the opportunity to pass on those words to the hon. gentleman.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the reply just given by the Prime Minister, and in view of the statement you made a moment ago to the effect that tonight we shall proceed to the other place for the royal assent to certain bills, I ask the Prime Minister or the leader of the house, the Minister of Public Works, if this march to the other house will constitute another stage in the appointment of parliamentary secretaries?

(Text):

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say that whether or not the suspicions of the hon. gentleman may bear any practical results will be ascertained in the next few days.

SHIPPING

VANCOUVER—REPORTED FAILURE TO RESPOND TO SOS FROM NORWEGIAN FREIGHTER "FERNGULF"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to newspaper reports of the explosion which occurred on the Norwegian freighter Ferngulf at 4.15 on Friday afternoon outside Vancouver harbour, resulting in the captain sending an SOS at 4.23 and again at 4.37 because men were burned and dying? If so, will the Minister of Transport investigate as to why an SOS sent from a ship on fire within sight of Canada's third largest city was not immediately responded to with all possible medical and fire fighting equipment? May I at the same time ask if the Minister of Transport would also comment on the reported statement of the port manager of Vancouver this morning of the need for a coastguard service.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my department is well aware of the unfortunate accident. We are looking into it. I have had no indication of the reported statement made by the port manager.

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I have a supplementary question. I wish to assure the house that there is great interest in this matter in western Canada. Pending completion of the investigation, can the minister say whether vessels owned by Canadian National Steamships and the national harbour board could meet a distress signal in a similar situation?

Mr. Hees: As I said, Mr. Speaker, my deparmental officials are looking into the whole situation.

FREIGHT RATES

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF PROPOSED ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him if he will be in a position soon to announce the terms and the scope of the royal commission on transportation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I hope to do that shortly.

HARBOURS

LAKEHEAD—INQUIRY AS TO INACTIVITY OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Because of the serious concern at the Canadian lakehead over the inadequacy of grain facilities for handling ocean ships, and the fact that the lakehead harbour commission has not yet become active, can the minister explain what is the hold-up in making the harbour commission active in order that it can face and act on these particular problems?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would think the hon. member would get the answer quickest by finding out from his people back home.

Mr. Fisher: I have a supplementary question. The lakehead harbour commission is under federal jurisdiction. I should like to know why this commission is not active as yet.

Mr. Hees: I have no idea why it is not active. The commission was set up some time ago, and as far as I know there is no reason why it should not be active and getting on with the job as it was fully expected it would some time ago.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Have the government as yet received the final report of the Borden royal commission on the marketing of oil? If they have not yet received it, can he indicate to the house when it might be available?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I communicated with the chairman of the royal commission on energy, and he advised me that while it was expected that the commission would be able to complete its report by the end of this month, there will be a lapse of several further weeks before the report is delivered to the governor in council. Consideration, of course, has to be given by the commission to substantial changes in the world and Canadian positions in connection with crude oil, and the exemption of Canadian crude from United States import quotas which becomes effective June 1.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Would the Prime Minister say whether before dealing with the resolution setting up an energy board we will have available to us the final report of the Borden commission on energy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the information I have just given, and following my communication with the chairman of the board, it is apparent that the rest of the report will not be available when the legislation is introduced to set up the board.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister any further information to impart to the house about the hearings of the Borden commission on coal in the eastern provinces?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry I cannot give any further information about that matter.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS LEADERS—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice arising out of a report in this morning's press that he informed the members of the association of Canadian advertisers yesterday that certain amendments to the anti-combines law will be introduced this session, and that the government was giving specific study to legislation to outlaw loss leader selling and legislation dealing with related problems. Would the minister bring the house up to date on any statements made outside of this house, and say whether these amendments will be introduced?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not up to date but if he will be good enough to consult the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of the session he will discover that it was announced as the intention of the government to introduce amendments to the anti-combines legislation.

Mr. Argue: I would inform the minister that the speech from the throne did not spell out what amendments were to be made to the anti-combines legislation, and I would appreciate a reply to the second part of my question, as to whether the amendments the government has in mind also deal with resale price maintenance?

Mr. Fulton: As far I understand it the problem of loss leaders and the problem of resale price maintenance are inextricably intertwined.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask the minister if the proposed legislation will arrest the "osmotic" principle in order to prevent large business absorbing small retailers?

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend will have to await the presentation of the legislation which will be introduced later this session.

CRIMINAL CODE

REPORTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING SUSPENSION OF DRIVING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether he would care to comment on the statement made, according to certain radio reports, by the deputy attorney general of Ontario, who announced that the Minister of Justice proposed to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code having to do with the suspension of licences of motor car drivers.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I do not think I am in a position to make any definite statement on that subject. I have had discussions with the attorney general of Ontario in connection with this and other matters relating to the Criminal Code and we shall, I expect, shortly be introducing a number of amendments to the Criminal Code which will deal with this among other subjects.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

APPOINTMENT TO COMMISSION—CONSULTATION WITH C.C.C.L.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister inform the house if the Canadian Catholic Confederation of Labour was consulted in regard to the appointment of a commissioner to the Unemployment Insurance Commission? If so, what kind of talks were held, and where?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hope I heard the hon. member's question correctly. Communication was had with the Canadian federation of catholic unions in Quebec, and a reply was received by telegram that they concurred in the recommendations of the Canadian Labour Congress.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MANITOBA—FEDERAL AID IN PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of his answer to the leader of the official opposition some weeks ago to the effect that consultations were taking place between the right hon. gentleman and the premier of the province of Manitoba, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to inform this house whether we may expect an announcement before May 14, as to possible extraordinary financial aid to projects in Manitoba.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not know what "extraordinary financial aid" means, but stripping the question of that portion—that decorative portion—I may say that no decision has yet been reached.

PRICE SPREADS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell the house when the government expects to receive the report of the royal commission on price spreads?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry, but I am unable to answer that question directly. I shall get in touch with the chairman at once, and hope to be able to give an answer shortly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—EFFECT OF U.S. REGULATION UPON PASSAGE OF GOODS IN BOND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government investigated in the St. Lawrence the effect on shipping of the regulation to which he referred to yesterday dealing with trucks in bond?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Naturally the entire field has been looked into. As no doubt the hon. gentleman has read in the press, the situation on the St. Lawrence waterway will naturally be the subject of discussion in the event that there is anything in the nature of a search or interference with the cargoes of ships using that waterway.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL REVENUE

REFERENCE TO BLUE BOOK RESPECTING PENSION PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of my continuing curiosity about government regulations for pension plans.

As over three months have elapsed since the minister informed the house that the administrative tortoise responsible for the preparation of the long-expected blue book on pension plans was near the finish line, would the minister inform the house when he is expected to cross that line by the publication of this long-awaited book?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am sure that our mutual and venerable friend to which the hon. member has just referred will be greatly heartened when I tell it of the solicitude which the hon. member is showing with regard to its progress along the difficult road on which it embarked some considerable time ago. I can tell the hon. member that it is very near the finish line; it has gone around the last curve and the finish line is in sight, and in order that there may be no doubt about it in the mind of the hon. member I think I will ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to have cameramen present to take a picture as it crosses the line.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—EFFECT OF INCREASED INTEREST RATES ON LOW COST HOUSING RENTALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister comment on the statement released by a Metro Toronto housing company that increases in the last five years in the borrowing rate from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the present peak of 5⅛ per cent have caused a 72 per cent increase in rental rates on apartments for elderly citizens? Can the minister say what consideration has been given to the request that a standard rate of 3 per cent for such loans be established in order that low cost housing may be available to our elderly citizens?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive the notice of the hon. member's question in time to get a detailed answer from the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, I did notice this same newspaper article myself, and it refers to limited dividend housing. That type of housing is not subsidized by the federal government at all. This fact, of course, answers the last part of my hon. friend's question, which was whether consideration was being given to reducing the rate to 3 per cent.

Then with regard to the allegation in this article that increases in interest on money loaned by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have brought about a great increase in rents, the statement is not accurate at all. The article states that some years ago suites were renting at $29 a month, and any that were then renting at that rate should still be renting at the same rate. There has been some increase in the interest rate, but I am informed that such increase would account for an increase of only about $3 in the rental. The remainder of the increase in rentals which are now being charged arises from an increase of about $8 a month in operating costs, and an increase in the payments being made to the other bodies which have put money into this housing. The increased rate on federal money would account for only $3 a month.

FISHERIES

LAKE SUPERIOR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LAMPREY EEL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Fisheries if he would make a statement in the near future as to what the program will be to deal with the lamprey eel situation in lake Superior during the coming summer?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this question can be discussed at some considerable length on my estimates. I do not think it is a question that can be suitably answered on the orders of the day, but I shall be glad to discuss it when my estimates are before the house.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I may ask the Prime Minister if he expects soon to be in a position to recommend the appointment of a chairman of the civil service commission, in view of the many important problems now before that commission?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, sir.

[Mr. Green.]

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide:

1. that the excise tax on each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package be increased from 2 cents to 2½ cents;

2. that the wording of the exemption from sales tax for "stock conditioners, condiments and feed supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds" in schedule III be changed to read:

"Feed supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof";

3. that the exemption from sales tax for tanks for collecting milk be extended to include complete parts therefor including materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such tanks and parts;

4. that the definition of "producer or manufacturer" be extended to include any person who packages toilet articles, preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals for sale except where they are packaged by a retailer in his retail premises for sale therefrom directly to consumers or users;

5. that the definition of "manufacturer or producer" be extended to include any person who markets, except by sale at retail directly to consumers or users, toilet articles, preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals manufactured under his own brand;

6. that the sales tax be imposed, levied and collected on goods purchased or imported by a licensed wholesaler and retained for his own use or for rental to others;

7. that any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to to have come into force on the 10th day of April, 1959;

and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

The Chairman: Order. We were discussing paragraph 4. Is there any discussion?

Paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

The Chairman: We shall now turn to paragraph 1.

Mr. Benidickson: Are we going to hear your ruling with respect to this resolution?

The Chairman: Order. After lengthy deliberation we have finally come to a ruling. I must tell the committee that it is rather a lengthy document, and I shall appreciate their kindness in listening to it. Yesterday when paragraph 1 of the Excise Tax Act resolution was being considered by the committee, the hon. member for Trinity proposed the following amendment:

That paragraph 1 be stricken out of the resolution and that the following paragraphs be renumbered accordingly.

The Minister of Finance then raised a point of order to the effect that the amendment was out of order in that it was a straight negative. He also suggested that it would be possible to propose a similar amendment on each subsequent paragraph of the resolution and thereby effect a negative of the whole resolution. Later on in the discussion the minister, in support of his point of order, quoted section 4 of citation 266 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, to the effect that the amendment, if carried, "would alter the balance of ways and means".

With regard to the first point raised by the Minister of Finance, I agree with him that the amendment if carried would be a negative of the proposal contained in paragraph 1 of the resolution. However, in a careful review of the authorities I am unable to find any support for his contention that such an amendment is irregular. In this regard citation 201 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "that", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.
> A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

In view of the latter part of the foregoing citation and in the absence of any authority to the contrary, I am inclined to say that the amendment as to form is not irregular.

The second point raised by the minister, namely that the deletion of clause 1 of the resolution is not in order because it alters the balance of ways and means, is one which has been raised time and again during the past 10 or 15 years, and in several cases rulings to that effect have been appealed to the house. The authority for these rulings was initially contained in citation 500 of Beauchesne's third edition, and as a result of the use of this citation a ruling was made in 1951 which now appears as section 4 of citation 266 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. This section reads as follows:

> It is not in order to move deletion of a particular clause in an excise tax resolution because it alters the balance of ways and means. Chairman's decision confirmed by the house on a division.

It will be noted that the ruling made by the chairman of the committee of ways and means in 1951 rested entirely on the premise that the amendment would alter the balance of ways and means. In concluding his ruling, as reported on page 2662 of Hansard, May 3, 1951, the then chairman said:

> We are agreed all along the line except on that one point. If the hon. member will look at citation 500 of Beauchesne, third edition, he will see why it would be very difficult for the chairman in the Canadian house at least to agree with him that a complicated question can be divided by a member moving that a certain portion of the resolution be deleted. Citation 500 says very clearly that it must not affect the balance of ways and means. Certainly the hon. member will admit that if this amendment should carry, deleting the first paragraph which provides that the rate of the general sales tax shall be increased from eight per cent to ten per cent, the balance of ways and means would be altered. Therefore I would have no alternative but to declare the amendment out of order.

As the meaning of the phrase "must not affect the balance of ways and means for the service of the year" presented something of a mystery, and because the repeated use of it seemed to present an insuperable barrier to the moving of amendments by private members; and moreover, since the phrase was extracted in the first instance from May's thirteenth edition, the Clerk of our house sought the advice of the clerk of the British house in regard to the validity of the principle enunciated in the phrase.

If I may have the indulgence of the committee a little longer I should like to quote several paragraphs from the letter written in reply by the clerk of the British house. This letter is dated January 23, 1959, and I quote from it as follows:

> I would like straight away to express my respectful agreement with the ruling of your chairman to the effect that an amendment to reduce a tax is in order.

This paragraph, I should say, refers to a ruling made in 1957. The clerk of the British house continues:

> If that were not so, the position would be that the house could reduce a tax to nothing by rejecting the proposal for imposing it but could not moderate the original proposal or ever initiate any moderation once the tax was in existence. That has never been the position at Westminster as is shown by the proceedings in committee on any finance bill.
>
> A committee which is considering a "charge", whether upon the people or upon the revenue, has either to approve, disapprove or reduce that "charge" but may not extend it either in amount or in the area of its operation. (See May 16th edition, pages 772 and 801).
> I now turn to the words "must not affect the balance of ways and means for the service of the year". The use made of this quotation seems to me to illustrate the danger of taking words out of their context and I venture to quote the whole passage:
> "Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee: but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty; the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown."

Although I do not propose to quote the passage in full I think a reference to the historical passage on pages 704 and 705 of the 16th edition is necessary fully to comprehend the statement of the present practice which is set out on pages 801 and 802 of the same edition. I think from this it is clear that the passage cited from page 544 of the 13th edition referred to a practice of substituting one charge for another providing the total amount of taxation remained unaltered, and that this practice is now obsolete.

The reference to the thirteenth edition in this paragraph is citation 500 of Beauchesne's third edition. The clerk's letter ends with this paragraph:

In conclusion, to insist that the house can only accept or reject but not modify the financial proposals of the government, which is in fact what the minister was claiming, seems to me a great extension of the financial powers of the crown and to be one which has never been, or is likely to be, accepted by the House of Commons at Westminster.

I regret very much having taken so much of the committee's time with my lengthy statement but in view of the importance of this question I considered it incumbent upon me to deal at length with this problem.

Accordingly, under the circumstances I feel impelled to rule that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Trinity is in order. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Hellyer) negatived: Yeas, 28; nays, 121.

Mr. Regier: I rise to a point of order. I noticed that a number of members entered the chamber while the vote was in the process of being taken. I have particular reference to the hon. member for Stanstead. I feel this is a blot on our democracy, that a member should enter this chamber and cast a ballot without having heard the issue under discussion, and without even knowing what he is voting upon—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are worse than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

The Chairman: On this particular point of order I must, in fact, agree that it is quite out of order for members to enter, walk out of or across the house or make any noise or disturbance while the Speaker or the Chairman is putting the question. Consequently it was quite out of order for the various members to move in and out of the chamber while the question was being put.

[The Chairman.]

It was also completely out of order for the hon. gentlemen on my immediate left to be making as much noise and disturbing the order of the chamber as they were while the question was being put.

Mr. Regier: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. You mentioned the members to your immediate left. I hope you will absolve me from being one of the members accused, because I kept silent until after the vote.

Mr. Argue: Further to the point of order, Mr. Chairman; is it not a well known rule of this house that not only has a member no right to come in when the vote is being taken, but that if he should rise in his place and have his vote counted, his vote should be removed from the total? I have no idea, myself, whether or not the hon. member for Stanstead came in while the vote was being taken. I did not see him. But if in the opinion of the Chair he did come in while the vote was being taken, his vote should be removed from the total.

The Chairman: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia is quite correct. Members who come in while the vote is being taken should not be counted in the final vote. However, in the present instance I did not see those members who were coming in while the vote was being taken.

I should like to say a further word concerning the noise and disturbance by various members to my left. I did not direct my remarks to any one member in particular, but I directed my remarks to the members on my immediate left who were the ones actually making the noise and causing the disturbance. They know who they are. It would be appreciated by the Chair if from now on they respected the order which must reign in this chamber.

Resolution agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved,

(a) that it is expedient to amend the english version of the Customs Tariff by adding to section two thereof the following subsection:

(3) The word "machinery" wherever it appears in this Act shall be read and construed as "machines";

(b) that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff by striking out section 13 and substituting the following therefor:

13. (1) The minister may order that, in lieu of the ad valorem rate of duty or the free rate of duty, the specific duty provided for in tariff items 87, 92, 94, 95 and 95a shall apply to goods described in the order imported through ports in a region or part of Canada during such period or periods as may be fixed by the minister.

(2) If before, the coming into operation of an order under subsection (1), a person purchased goods for importation through a port in a region or part of Canada specified in the order, in the expectation in good faith that the ad valorem rate of duty or the free rate of duty would apply to the goods, and at the time of the coming into operation of the order the goods were in transit to the purchaser in Canada, the ad valorem rate of duty or the free rate of duty shall apply to the goods, notwithstanding the order.

Mr. Benidickson: This is an innocent looking resolution, but I think it has implications that are worthy of a fuller explanation than was given by the minister in his budget address. The first part of the resolution concerns the definition of the word "machinery" and "machines". The minister did, of course, refer to this at page 2424 of Hansard for April 9. He summed up his comments by saying:

Thus, there will be no change.

I am not satisfied about this, Mr. Chairman. I should like a more complete explanation from the minister. We have here specifically six types of machines which are to be deemed machines or machinery made in Canada, and the minister has indicated to the house that this involves no change. I should like the minister to give the greatest possible explanation of the reason for this change in definition because I believe at least two of the items to which reference is made, and I think of soft drink and hoist machines, actually were the subject of appeals to the tariff board as to whether or not they were in fact machinery that was made in Canada. I understand the tariff board ruled that they were not. In any event I think paragraph (a), which places a new subsection 3 to section 2 of the Customs Tariff requires more explanation from the minister before we are asked to amend the statute.

Now, if he would like me to deal with this whole resolution, the next amendment is to section 13 of the Customs Tariff. Again I should like a full explanation from the minister as to the reason for this very substantial change in the wording of our statute, and particularly whether or not under the proposed amendments the Minister of National Revenue will have discretion in the matter of imposing higher duties than we would normally contemplate and the number of weeks that will be referred to as the special seasonal period for the various items in the schedule.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest we deal with the two parts of the resolution separately, that is to say part (a) and part (b). They relate to two different subject matters. I believe you called part (a), Mr. Chairman, and it will contribute to more orderly discussion if we can deal with them separately, if that meets with your approval.

Then, Mr. Chairman, if I may take up the point the hon. gentleman was raising with respect to part (a) of the resolution, I would say this concerns a matter of definition, and a matter of definition only. I think the hon. gentleman has confused this matter of definition in resolution 1 (a) with provisions that are to be found in resolution No. 4 at pages 24 and 25 of the printed booklet of ways and means resolutions. We will be coming to those in due course, Mr. Chairman. Those are to be found under item 427 on pages 24 and 25. where certain machines are set out in detail, but the present resolution concerns definition and definition only.

I may say that the problem does not arise in the French version of the Customs Tariff. The English version uses the words "machine" and "machinery" apparently almost indiscriminately, certainly with no clear line of distinction evident. On the other hand the French version uses the one word "machine". What is proposed here is an amendment to the English version of the Customs Tariff Act, and the English version alone.

Lacking any definition or reconciliation in the act of the two words "machine" and "machinery", it seemed to us that it was highly desirable, for the reasons I set forth in the budget speech, that it should be made quite clear in the act what is meant. In ordinary English use the word "machine" suggests at once some individual machine that is capable of some independent operation. The word "machinery" is a broader word. It connotes something in the nature of a mechanical system which might involve the connecting together and operation together of what might otherwise be regarded as a number of individual machines.

Here is the problem, Mr. Chairman. Because this distinction, which I suppose would be apparent to most persons using these words in the English language, does not explain the use of these two words in the customs tariff, we are proposing in this resolution that the word "machinery" is to be given the meaning of "machine" in order that where the word "machinery" is used in the act, it shall be quite clear that it embraces the individual machines which may be part of a mechanical system.

I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River will recall that in the budget speech I referred by way of illustration to the machines that are enumerated under item 427 of the tariff, which we will be coming to under resolution No. 4. If it would be of assistance to hon. members I could just make that reference for purposes of illustration, because we will be coming to the changes that are proposed in item 427 when we reach the fourth resolution.

There are two items in the tariff under which most imports of machines are classified. Item 427 covers machinery which is ruled by the customs authorities to be "of a class or kind made in Canada" and carries relatively high duties. The other item, 427a, covers machinery which is ruled by customs to be "of a class or kind not made in Canada" and carries relatively low rates of duties. Both these items refer to machinery. Consequently it might be argued that a group of machines whose operation is linked together in one way or another should all be classified under one item or the other as machinery. In this case, if one of the machines in the group was of a class or kind not made in Canada, then the whole group would carry the lower rate of duty notwithstanding the fact that all the other machines in the group were ruled to be made in Canada. This change is proposed in order to make it clear that each machine must be classified on the basis of its particular made in Canada status.

Mr. Benidickson: Just having reference to the last few remarks of the minister may I say this. I take it that this question of whether or not a machine would be deemed to be made in Canada and thus be subject, as the minister says, to a higher rate of duty, would have some practical relationship to the size of the machine. In the rewording, is consideration being given to sizing in a realistic way? In other words, when these six particular items are selected as machinery deemed to be made in Canada, it is possible that machinery of a certain size is not made in Canada, but if required by an importer, he would have to pay an extremely heavy rate of duty on it simply because of a change in description in the tariff item and the suggestion that it is now deemed to be made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No change is proposed in the criteria by which it is established that a machine is or is not of a class or kind made in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on resolution 1 (a)? Is there any discussion on resolution 1 (b)?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to part (b) there is an amendment which I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to move. It is one which applies strictly to the second resolution relating to fruits and vegetables, but there is an incidental amendment required to resolution 1 (b) in addition to the proposed new wording of section 13 (1) of the act. The amendment simply strikes out of the proposed wording of section 13 (1) the reference to tariff item 95a.

The reason for this is as follows. There will be actually three amendments arising out of this point I am about to mention now. I gave copies to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I should say that this is one of three amendments all pertaining to the same matter. It concerns the placing of muskmelons in the same category as cantaloupes in the fruit and vegetable item to which we will be coming under resolution No. 2. This one is simply incidental.

I might say that following the conclusion of negotiations with the United States respecting the proposed changes in the tariff items on fruits and vegetables, the resolution was brought forward in the present form with the understanding that in this form it was fully acceptable to the United States following our negotiations pursuant to the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. They have drawn to our attention their understanding that muskmelons were to be treated in the same category as cantaloupes for this purpose. We have no serious quarrel with them on this point.

I might explain to the committee what the difference will amount to. In the original budget resolution it was proposed that cantaloupes should be free of duty during the off season and that muskmelons would continue to be dutiable at 10 per cent during the off season. It is now proposed in this series of three amendments to introduce duty free entry in the off season for both cantaloupes and muskmelons by making provision for muskmelons in the same item as cantaloupes. The three amendments that are necessitated are the ones I have just mentioned. There will be another in resolution 2(b) respecting item 95, and the third will be in resolution 2(c) which will propose the deletion of item 95a, which relates to muskmelons. I may say for the assurance of hon. members that the Canadian horticultural council was consulted on this subject and offered no objections.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think the minister has answered the question which I think has greatest relevancy at this stage of the debate. He is proposing to substitute new wording for the existing section 13 of the Customs Tariff. In particular this involves—and this is of great interest to the public and to the house—ministerial discretion of a very important nature in the matter of setting rates of duty on these articles which go on the tables of our families across the land.

I asked the minister whether or not we would have in the new statute something to provide some restriction on the ministerial discretion, namely such as the words in the existing section 13, subsection 2. This is rather confusing because there has been an alteration of the points in Nos. 1 and 2. They have been interchanged, and so on. But the minister's discretion under the existing statute, as I understand it, was not to exceed for each regional part of Canada the number of weeks mentioned in the individual items. That to me means that if there were an in season extra duty with respect to some of these vegetables, shall we say for 12 weeks, the minister's discretion was to be limited on each of the vegetable items to that extent. I do not see in the resolution an indication that it is proposed that the minister should be similarly restricted, according to the new phraseology.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I overlooked the point raised by the hon. member, and in my remarks concentrated upon the amendment. The hon. member raised this point, and it is a proper question. The view of the Department of Justice is that the proposed amendment will make no difference whatever as applied to ministerial discretion. In other words, if the house approves the present amendment there will be no change whatever created in the ministerial discretion now provided in the existing act in relation to this matter of applying special seasonal duties on a regional basis.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, while it is not to be spelled out in the new statute, the Department of Justice has indicated that the minister will still be confined in his discretion to the particular number of calendar weeks which are referred to in the particular items in the Customs Tariff schedule. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, as I see it this is the clause we are asked to agree to in principle which will amend the Customs Tariff, as proposed by the minister in the budget address and, as detailed in the many items which are now before us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I correctly understand the point raised by the hon. gentleman, but this particular resolution, No. 1 (b), has quite limited application. It applies simply to section 13 of the act and varies the language of that section having reference to certain changes that follow in the later resolutions.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the minister has understood me. I have noticed that as a result of our endorsing the principle contained in section 1 (b), "Resolved, that it is expedient", we are faced with amendments which are detailed from page 7 right through to page 36. Therefore this is a clause which introduces the whole question of whether or not it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if I may say so I think my hon. friend is quite wrong. The proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff are in different form from the resolutions proposing amendments to the other four statutes with which we have already dealt in the sittings of this committee. In other cases there was simply one resolution with respect to all the amendments to each act. The one resolution was divided into various paragraphs. But under the Customs Tariff, Mr. Chairman, we have a series of separate resolutions; there are five in all. The fifth one is consequential. There are four principal ones, but they are all separate and distinct in their nature. For instance, No. 1 (a) embraces the definition which has been approved, and then part (b) is the amendment to section 13 of the act. Resolution No. 2, to which we shall be coming, embraces the changes in the tariffs on fruits and vegetables, and also the amendment to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act of 1932, which is consequential upon the proposed changes in the tariff on fruits and vegetables. Then the third resolution, which begins about two-thirds of the way down page 16, embraces the package which is submitted to the house following our negotiations with respect to the restoration of the full preferential margin on those woollen goods on which the tariff was changed a year ago. In this same resolution No. 3 hon. members will see the concessions which are being made as part of the package agreement arising out of these negotiations. Then resolution No. 4 deals with a great number of miscellaneous items. Resolution No. 5 is the usual and consequential resolution respecting the dates on which the various proposed changes come into effect.

Mr. Regier: I think, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister misunderstood my intent. I would like to express my appreciation of his outlining to me the various detailed proposals which we will be asked to approve. However, I wish to add a few words as to the overriding question of whether or not it is expedient at this time for the government or the minister to amend the Customs Tariff as a whole. I believe the minister will agree with me that this is the only place at which I can say something which has a general application to the specific matters he is proposing to amend at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is well that we should clarify this point now. We have already adopted resolution 1 (a). The hon. member is proceeding now to discuss resolution 1 (b) and he is proposing, as I infer from his remarks, something of a general discussion. I would have thought Mr. Chairman, that the proper place for that was in the budget debate. We are here dealing with a series of specific resolutions proposing specific amendments to the Customs Tariff. I would have thought that discussion of each of these should be relevant to the particular item.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I hope we will not spend any more time on this. However, I was being kind to the minister. I realize at once that resolutions 1 (a) is a matter having to do with terminology and that really the operative clause is 1 (b). The minister, in answer to something which was said by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River a while ago, indicated that he himself regarded 1 (a) as being a matter concerned only with terminology and having very little to do with the overriding principles.

We in this group are not necessarily opposed to each and every one of the amendments which are being offered to the Customs Tariff, but we have a feeling, and we have had it for a number of years, that what the minister is attempting to do, and what he was attempting to do last year, by offering us a multitudinous array of amendments as to detail is attempting to apply axle grease to an intercontinental ballistic missile, and that the amendments in their entirety are completely outmoded in the day and age in which we now live.

We realize that the over-all effect of all these amendments must amount to one thing and one thing only, as was the case a year ago, and that is a higher level of tariffs. I know the minister can haul out all kinds of arguments pointing to where he is in effect reducing tariffs. He did this a year ago. However, in the main a year ago he raised the tariffs and he raised the cost of living to the Canadian consumer. All one need do is look at the expectations, as announced in the budget, and then at the figure actually realized. The minister cannot deny that he is expecting more revenue in the current fiscal year than he obtained in the preceding fiscal year from the changes or amendments in the Customs Tariff which he is proposing.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do deny that. As I stated in the budget speech, there is no material effect contemplated in the yield from the Customs Tariff as a result of the proposed changes. I am excepting, of course, those that correspond to the Excise Act changes which were discussed last night.

May I remind the hon. member of the statistics I gave the house in the budget speech as reported in Hansard on page 2422, in the second column, where I said:

> It might be of interest to note that 142 tariff items and subitems are affected by the resolutions. In the case of 32 items the rates of duty are being increased. In the case of 40 items the rates are being reduced. In the case of nine items, all involving fruits and vegetables, rates are being both increased and decreased depending on the season. Finally, there are 61 items for which rates of duty are left unchanged and for which the changes proposed are, for the most part, purely formal.

So I think the hon. member will realize that on balance, while one cannot always give changes of this kind equal weight, the result in the total is as much to reduce the tariff as to increase it. And so far as revenue is concerned, apart from those duties affecting spirits which I mentioned last night, we do not, as I indicated in the budget speech, expect any material effect whatever on the revenue from the Customs Tariff as a result of the enactment of the proposed changes.

Mr. Regier: Well, may I inform the minister that a year ago we were faced with a proposition along very similar lines to the amendments to the Customs Tariff which are proposed this year, and the hon. gentleman on that occasion went to considerable length to impress the committee with the fact that the Customs Tariff was being reduced in more cases than it was being increased. However, I notice from the budget papers, as they are reproduced in Hansard of Thursday, April 9, that whereas the forecast of revenues from customs import duties was $450 million, the revenues actually received amounted to $486 million. In other words the revenues exceeded the minister's announced expectations by the sum of $36 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But that had nothing to do with the changes in the tariff. We have to make a forecast using the best judgment we can as to what may be the yield from the customs duties having regard to the imports which may be expected. We came reasonably close, but to the extent that the result does not tally precisely with the forecast, that is not attributable to the changes in the tariff but to the over-all effects of imports.

Mr. Regier: All I can say in reply is that in a year when our imports were well below expectations we had the minister underestimating the results of the operation of the Customs Tariff by some 7 per cent. Last year we suffered a decline in imports of a radical nature, yet despite this decline there was this substantial underestimate. If our imports had remained at a normal level, or if they had continued to increase, the minister would have been very much further out in his estimates than he was.

I can understand the minister being out in his estimates to a reasonable extent. However, at a time when imports were declining, and after the minister had left an impression throughout Canada that he had been able to reduce import tariffs more than he had raised them, one would have expected a decline in net revenue under the Customs Tariff rather than receipts $36 million over and above the expectations of the department.

I do not think we can ride several horses at once. This government is either reducing tariffs, or it is leaving them as they are, or it is raising tariffs. There is a feeling abroad now that the Tories have learned nothing since the hungry thirties, and that by one means or another they are continuing to behave as if our economic salvation as Canadians lay in higher tariff rates. The minister may haul out all kinds of details and say, look at the number of items on which I have reduced the tariff. However, if he raises the tariff on a few key commodities he raises the cost of living for all Canadian consumers, and the total effect is a rise in the tariff revenue.

Only a year ago the minister underlined the pressing need to raise the Customs Tariff on British woollens. I was out in rural Ontario over the week end, and I drove past an idle plant in Hespeler. I was told that this plant was at one time the greatest woollen textile factory in the whole British commonwealth of nations. Yet despite the aid which the minister sought to give the industry a year ago by amending the Customs Tariff, that plant has since had to close down. One of our most enterprising industries in that whole area of west central Ontario has had to shut its doors, despite the fact that the minister added to the cost of living of all Canadians who have to buy textiles by the amendments he offered a year ago.

I know the minister realizes that he is somewhat isolated in the world of today in his approach to the Customs Tariff, because hardly anywhere in the whole world, except in the United States and the Dominion of Canada, does one find this age-old approach, this seeking of a solution to our problems based on high tariffs versus low tariffs.

Most modern nations of the world today have adopted the policy of assessing their import needs and their export requirements, and for that purpose have established import and export boards. They live in a planned and in a sensible way, instead of continuing this nonsensical farce of attempting to make some people in Canada believe that we are a high tariff people, and making other people in Canada believe we are opposed to high tariffs. The net result of this ridiculous economic nationalism that we have been sowing the seeds of for a number of years now in Canada has always in all history resulted in unemployment, misery, poverty, want and, in many instances, world war.

If the minister, rather than making these proposed amendments, were to offer an overall amendment whereby we might ally ourselves with the European economic union now being formed, he would be breaking new ground, he would be making a real contribution to the restoration of Canadian prosperity. If the minister had a word to say, or an amendment to offer, in regard to enhancing our trade with the British West Indies rather than sitting idly by and offering them congratulatory things—

The Chairman: The hon. member is completely out of order. At present he is making a budget speech and is straying really all over the field. At the present time we are discussing one specific resolution and I must ask the hon. member to adhere to the resolution being discussed and make his other remarks at some other time when there is more latitude in the debate.

Mr. Regier: All I can say is that the amendment reads that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff. It is my contention that it is not wise or expedient that we amend the Customs Tariffs in the manner in which the minister is indicating in all the pages that follow, and with all respect to your ruling, I can do no other than say that I have to find myself in disagreement with your ruling. I do not like the minister's continued insistence on what he considers to be the rules of this house in order to block effective debate.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the amendment as amended? All those in favour of the amendment please indicate.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to the (b) paragraph of this resolution, I can understand that. The minister has cleared up one point that I had raised when I compared the new phraseology with the old. I am not proposing to debate the merits of this at this time since we shall have an opportunity to do that on the presentation of the bill, but I realize that there has been a change in the key tariff item numbers which necessitated the amendment of this particular section of the existing act. I should like to hear from the minister a little better explanation of why he has completely revamped the language of the section and has gone far beyond just simply substituting for the old tariff item numbers the new ones that result from the tariff board report and the resolutions which are to follow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the proposed new language is a drafting improvement on the language of the existing section 13; it is very much clearer. It does not change the essence of the old provisions at all as applied to ministerial discretion, which is the point the hon. member raised earlier.

It is in this section 13 of the Customs Act that we find provided the authority for the regional application of the seasonal duties on fruits and vegetables. As hon. members are aware, many of those products are first available from domestic production on the west coast. Then, somewhat later they are available in Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes or the Atlantic areas. In certain instances they are produced in only one region of Canada; for example, apricots in British Columbia. Of course, in some areas, owing to poor growing conditions, there will be a short crop in a particular region. It is for these reasons that the special seasonal duties have been applied, with statutory authority, on a regional basis, the three regions being, first, the maritime provinces; second, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; and, third, the provinces west of Ontario.

The proposed new wording of section 13 introduces no change in the powers of the minister, but it is a most desirable clarification of the language of the existing section 13. I think my hon. friend will realize this is a matter of drafting in the interests of clarification. I think on study he will agree that the proposed new language is a decided improvement on the old language.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not want to be unduly suspicious. I wanted an assurance along those lines that that is the sole reason for the very extensive changes in the language of the old section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that that is the only effect of the changed language of section 13.

The Chairman: Shall section 13 (1) as amended carry?

Section 13 (1) as amended agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

The Chairman: We shall now deal with resolution 2 on page 7:

2. Resolved,—

(a) that schedule A to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932 be amended by striking out tariff item 106 and the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite that item, and by inserting therein the following item, enumeration of goods and rates of duty:

Tariff Item		Tariff Rates on Goods the Produce or Manufacture of New Zealand
106.	Fruits, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
	(1) Apricots	1½ cts. per pound
	(2) Cherries	1½ cts. per pound
	(3) Peaches	1¼ cts. per pound
	(4) Pears	1 ct. per pound
	(6) Prunes	1½ cts. per pound
	(8) N.o.p.	1 ct. per pound

(b) that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 83b, 84, 85, 87, 89, 90e, 92, 93, 95, 99d, 105i, 106 and 505c, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

The Chairman: Shall item 106 carry?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the order of calling these we do not call item 106 but resolution 2 (a), the (a) part of resolution No. 2 being the one that proposes an amendment of schedule A to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act? Then, if that is adopted I suggest that you call part (b), which is to be found on the same page.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think there would be general agreement with the minister's suggestion except that the whole package of resolution No. 2 does deal with the fruit and vegetable division. It is true that paragraph (a) relates specifically to the necessary change that the minister has already explained in the New Zealand trade agreement, but I know there are a few hon. members who would perhaps just simply like to deal with the fruit and vegetable matter as a package. I do not think it will delay debate in the committee. I myself have no desire to labour individual items, but I know that one of my colleagues was just about to speak in a particular way about the fruit and vegetable matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whatever may meet the convenience of the committee in that respect is satisfactory. Perhaps I should point out that part (a) is a consequential amendment. Part (b) of resolution No. 2 is the one that embraces the tariff changes in the fruit and vegetable items. It was necessary when we were making these changes to introduce a change in the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act and that is the reason for the introduction of part (a) of this resolution.

In the hope of possibly being of assistance to hon. members, perhaps I might say a word in relation to this question. Resolution No. 2 is the main resolution dealing with the tariff changes arising out of negotiations respecting fruits and vegetables. Hon. members will recall that in November, 1957 I tabled a report of the tariff board on fruits and vegetables. In each case where the tariff board had recommended an increase in duty the item concerned was bound under a trade agreement and it was necesary, therefore, to negotiate with the countries concerned. Hon. members will realize that to offer satisfaction to other countries for these tariff increases Canada had either to offer compensation to them by way of reductions in the duty under other tariff items in which they were interested or else face the possibility of retaliatory action through increased tariffs against Canadian exports to these other countries. The United States is Canada's chief supplier of these products and both the increases and decreases negotiated with the United States are contained in part (b) of this resolution. Last year I was asked, in cases where we negotiated with a country and arrived in the end at a package with some increases and some decreases, that we show them in that form, and that is what we have sought to do in this case.

Mr. Benidickson: The trading is all confined to the fruit and vegetable items.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Resolution No. 2 embraces the entire result of our negotiations with the United States respecting fruits and vegetables. There are two items which are not fruits and vegetables and when we come to them in due course I will be glad to point them out. Similarly, when we come to resolution No. 3 hon. members will see there that we have included in the resolution the concessions that we gave in the course of the negotiations respecting woollens to the other countries concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought it gave a better picture this year than we have had.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members will have noted that part (a) of the resolution relates to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act and these changes have come about in an interesting way. The general agreement on tariffs and trade precludes the creation of new or increased margins of preference. Consequently where we are increasing the most-favoured-nation rate of duty it is also necessary to make corresponding increases in the preferential rates of duties in order to avoid the creation of any new preference or any enlargement of the existing margin of preference.

The increases in the duties on the canned fruits listed in part (a) of this resolution correspond exactly with the increases which are proposed in the most-favoured-nation rate of duty in part (b). The items for canned pears, 106, sub 4, and canned fruit n.o.p., 106, sub 8, appear in this resolution simply because they are being renumbered. There is no change in the rates of duty. I might mention that there appear to have been no imports of canned peaches, canned apricots, canned cherries or canned prunes from New Zealand into Canada since the New Zealand trade agreement was signed in 1932.

The government has, of course, consulted with the government of New Zealand and we have their agreement to the changes proposed in part (a) of the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: Was there a quid pro quo necessary?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. In the same way in part (b) we have the changes resulting from the negotiations with the United States. There is a part (c) to this resolution as well. It contains changes all of a purely formal nature. I have already referred to the changes in the numbering of the tariff items concerning canned fruit. In fact, there have been a great many changes made in the numbering of the tariff items throughout the fruit and vegetable section of the tariff and the changes proposed in part (c) of the resolution all arise out of renumbering of the items. In some cases the wording has been altered but in no case is there any change in the rate of duty.

Mr. Carter: I want to thank the minister for consenting to the discussion of parts (a) and (b) at the same time. I think it will save time and also eliminate some amount of repetition. We have before us now a resolution proposing tariff changes in a number of tariff items dealing with fruits and vegetables, fresh, frozen and canned, and including both domestic and imported varieties. The minister has just repeated what he told us in his budget presentation, that these changes flow from a report of the tariff board which was tabled in November of 1957. Elsewhere in his budget presentation I believe he also indicated that these changes will not result in any net gain in revenue and are more of a protective nature than anything else. He confirmed this point when he said, as found on page 2423 of Hansard of April 9:

> Turning to the canned and frozen products there are modest increases of duty consequential upon the increased protection received by the fresh products.

A few minutes ago the minister referred to three separate regions of Canada, the west coast, central Canada and the maritime provinces. In the province from which I come conditions are such that we should be considered as a separate region. Conditions there are totally different from those that obtain anywhere on the mainland. I realize how difficult it is for the government to lay down one single rule that will bear evenly on all sections of a large country like Canada. While it is difficult to see how anyone is going to benefit from this extra protection, certainly no consumer anywhere in Canada will benefit and in the case of my province it is going to constitute a real hardship.

In Newfoundland we already have the highest cost of living in all Canada and the effect of these tariff changes will be to push it higher still. One of our main complaints as a province since confederating with Canada has been and still is that we are a captive market forced to buy on the mainland and particularly in the central provinces. This, however, does not hold true in the case of fresh fruits and vegetables. As far as Newfoundland is concerned, this protection will not benefit mainland producers at all because we are not able to buy in that market in any case. The reasons for that are obvious. In the first place, our population is scattered around a 6,000-mile coastline and is broken up into about 1,300 isolated settlements. There are no refrigeration facilities for storage of fresh fruits and vegetables, and there is a lack of transportation facilities as well.

We are handicapped also by the fact that we have a narrow gauge railway which prevents our importers from buying in carload lots. A fruit vendor in Halifax can buy a carload of fruit originating in California or Florida and have it delivered to his door in Halifax. This is impossible for the Newfoundland merchant because our narrow gauge railway prevents it. Instead, we are forced to buy from brokers in Montreal and this, in itself, makes the cost of fruits and vegetables much higher than in the maritime provinces. In addition to that, we have to go to the extra expense of packaging the goods and pay for the extra handling involved in unloading the foods from trains to the boat, then unloading them from the boat into railway cars again for transportation to the centres of distribution and from there to the smaller settlements.

This extra packaging must be of the same quality as that required for export, which is much more expensive than the packaging required for the domestic market on the mainland. If all that were not enough, we find that the Maritime Freight Rates Act apparently does not apply to fruits imported into Canada through maritime ports. I have just had a case brought to my attention where a buyer in Newfoundland bought a carload of fruit in South Africa and had it routed through Saint John, New Brunswick. He then found that instead of the special maritime freight rates applying from Saint John, New Brunswick to Newfoundland, he had to pay an extra 20 per cent freight charge and another 7½ per cent terminal charge. We are greatly handicapped, therefore, with respect to fresh fruits and vegetables. Even in St. John's and the large urban centres of our province, fruits and vegetables are at least double the cost in the maritime provinces and are sometimes three or four times as expensive as they are in central Canada.

Now, for these reasons, our Newfoundland people have to rely to a large extent on canned products, particularly canned fruits and vegetables. We have been told that fruits are essential to health. They are a source of minerals and vitamins necessary for the maintenance of health, particularly for the health of children. The only way in which we can maintain a balanced diet in that respect is by the use of canned products. We all know that tariff changes result in price increases that are much greater than the amount of the tariff itself. We have had proof of that recently when a two cent increase in the tax on a package of cigarettes resulted in a four cent increase in the retail price. The result of this tariff change on tinned fruits in particular, plus the other taxes applicable, will prevent our Newfoundland fishermen from obtaining these essential foods at all because they will be priced right out of his pocket.

Apart from that, we have heard a lot from the present government about their intention of encouraging commonwealth trade. Since a great deal of our imported fruit in Newfoundland comes from New Zealand, South Africa and other commonwealth countries, these tariff increases seem to be a peculiar way of achieving that objective. In view of the problems which I have outlined to the minister, I would be most grateful if he would look into the matter to see if it would be possible to create a fourth region which would at least take into account the particular conditions which obtain in my province. I have particular reference to the way in which the fishermen and poorer people living in the isolated settlements of my province may be affected.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The remarks of the hon. member will be brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue who has the power, under section 13 of the act with which we dealt in the first resolution, to establish regions.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, the members of parliament from the Niagara district have always been greatly interested in the tariff on fruits and vegetables. I was reading the debates in May, 1926, in which the Hon. J. D. Chaplin, who was then the member for Lincoln, was talking about the difficulty the producers had in disposing of their fruits and vegetables at favourable prices when fruit from the United States was coming in and was very competitive. He was the minister of trade and commerce in the Meighen administration. During that time, and afterwards, there were only minor changes in the tariff.

In May, 1930 Hon. Charles Dunning brought in a budget and made a real attempt at that time to apply a specific duty over specific periods of time that would correspond to the harvest time of different fruits and vegetables. In presenting his budget at that time he said, and I will paraphrase it, that a combination of specific and ad valorem duties would meet the urgent needs of the growers, acute instability of prices, and at the same time guarantee to consumers at all seasons of the year supplies of these products at reasonable prices. The specific seasonal duties were applied to practically all fruits and vegetables grown in Canada and the application of them has been continued up to the present time.

I have often said in this house that these particular periods for the application of specific duties do not correspond to the harvesting periods of the different fruits and vegetables. One of the reasons for this is that producers have developed different varieties of fruits and vegetables that ripen over a longer time. Another reason is the modern development of cold storage facilities. In other words, importers are able to bring in fruits and vegetables from the United States ahead of the time for the application of the specific duty, those fruits and vegetables could be placed in Canadian cold storage and would be very competitive with our fruits and vegetables when they come on the market. Then, too, at the end of the season the United States producers are able to keep their fruits and vegetables in cold storage in the United States, then bring them in to Canada in competition with our fruits and vegetables at that particular time at the end of our season.

I think there is no doubt but that the prolonging of the period during which the specific duty may apply to the different fruits and vegetables will have a marked effect in eliminating competition, particularly from the United States. I think our fruit and vegetable farmers in the Niagara district, and in other parts of Canada, will be pleased with these amendments to the Customs Tariff.

I have raised this matter previously here in the House of Commons. I know that these arrangements have been made through GATT. I am not sufficiently informed to pass any judgment on the effect of the increase or decrease of duty on any particular fruit or vegetable. In his budget speech I think the minister said that certain negotiations were under way now and I think he said that some were concluded or virtually concluded. I should like to ask him whether they have all been concluded.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those respecting fruits and vegetables have been concluded.

The Chairman: Shall paragraph 2 (a) carry?

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

(b) that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 83b, 84, 85, 87, 89, 90e, 92, 93, 95, 99d, 105i, 106 and 505c, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Mr. Benidickson: Just in a broad way in connection with subparagraph (b), will the minister just highlight for the committee some of the major changes. I am thinking particularly of the extensions proposed in the seasonal specific duty application. I also recollect that, the day after the budget, I read the Hamilton Spectator and it indicated that potatoes had gone up, for instance, 4½ cents overnight on a ten-pound package. What are some of the major items in the household budget that are affected in the proposals?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that we are now on paragraph 2 (b), Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: The question was raised about the change in the tariff on potatoes. I think you will find that there is a tariff now all year round on potatoes whereas previously there was a free period.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the budget speech on April 9, at page 2423, I indicated the highlights of the proposed changes in the tariff on fruits and vegetables. If the hon. member looks in the first column, the second paragraph, he will see that I drew attention there to three of the most important changes. I said this:

> The duty on potatoes, table and seed, new and old, will hereafter, as recommended by the tariff board, be 37½ cents per cwt. throughout the year.

Mr. Benidickson: That would account for this press report on April 10, the day after the budget, that potatoes were up 4½ cents.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the press report in question; and without having an opportunity to examine it I would not wish to make any comment upon it.

I also drew attention to the fact that our seasonal duty applying to imported peaches remains at 1½ cents a pound but it will hereafter be in force for 14 instead of 9 weeks each year. Then in the third place, with respect to apples, I said we were moving to complete reciprocity with the United States and that the duty on imported apples will hereafter be ¼ cent a pound all the year round, instead of free for ten weeks and ⅜ cent a pound for the rest of the year. Then further, in several later paragraphs, I outlined the principal and outstanding changes that are proposed. In the great majority of cases, of course, the changes correspond with the recommendations of the tariff board but they do not tally in all cases with the recommendations of the tariff board.

Mr. Benidickson: You had to negotiate afterwards.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes. Such changes as there are were in some cases arrived at in the course of negotiations with the United States. Some were the result of giving compensation and for other reasons.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the recommendation of the board? I should be familiar with the matter but I am not. What about the reference in the tariff board report to the recommendations from the industry about some further change being necessary on the pre-packaged vegetables? Is that a 5 per cent protection? Did you follow out the recommendation of the tariff board with a 5 per cent protection, having regard to the practice of bringing in such a high percentage of vegetables in a pre-packaged state?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. That is carried into the resolution. The hon. member will find it at page 11 at the very top of the page. It is in resolution 2 (b).

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph 2 (b)?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if you intend to call the individual items? As I indicated earlier, I have one amendment on page 13, item 95.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The Chairman: If it is the wish of the committee I will call each item.

Mr. Argue: I have a few remarks which I think would probably be appropriate on subclause (b). In the minister's budget statement he had this to say as reported at page 2422 of Hansard:

> The house will recall that on November 17, 1957 I tabled an extensive report by the tariff board on fruits and vegetables.

Then of course the minister goes on to say that as a result of the extensive report and the recommendations contained in that report and the subsequent negotiations and so on, he has these particular changes to recommend to the house. My question has to do with whether or not the minister feels that the inquiry that was undertaken and completed by the tariff board and to which he refers was an adequate one or a proper one and whether it is the intention of the minister to have these particular items referred to the tariff board again for a full report? The reason I ask these questions is as a result of the comment of the tariff board itself in the report it makes, and to which the minister has referred. On page 26 and under the heading entitled "Results of Inquiry" I find this statement:

> In the brief time at its disposal, the tariff board could not conduct the full-scale inquiry that a reference such as this warrants and should receive. There has been no opportunity under the time-table envisaged in the letter from the minister of finance, to explore thoroughly many aspects of the problem, much less all of them.

The board in its report goes on to say that under these circumstances it had done all that was physically possible on very short notice to ask the producers for their submissions. But the question I have is this. As a result of the admission of the board itself that its report was not an adequate one, that it brought in the report under the pressure of the letter by the Minister of Finance to complete this report in a hurry, does the minister feel that the report itself is adequate? Is any further inquiry going to be made? Apparently the board itself felt that its report was not adequate, that it did not have the opportunity to conduct a full scale inquiry that a reference such as this warrants and should receive. It seems to me that the tariff items which the house is being asked to pass are extremely important ones. I know that the minister has been in consultation with producers' organizations, and I am not complaining at this time about the changes that are being made. However, I am concerned as to whether or not these recommendations are the best that can be made since, in the words of the tariff board itself, they were made in a great hurry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I remind the hon. member that the reference to the tariff board of the items of the tariff respecting fruits and vegetables was directed not by myself but by my predecessor, Mr. Harris. The letter to which reference has been made in the passage he has quoted is the letter evidently written by Mr. Harris to the tariff board. The note of urgency which appears in that letter is, of course, to be ascribed to him.

As to the adequacy of the inquiry, I think it may best be judged by the results. I tabled this report in the house a year and one-half ago. The representations that we received were all in the interests of the earliest possible implementation of the recommendations of the tariff board report. We have followed the procedures prescribed by the general agreement on tariffs and trade and have submitted these recommendations to the house as the result of the tariff board's inquiry and its report, the public knowledge of the recommendations contained in its report and the subsequent negotiations which were carried on with the United States. It is significant—and I think is the very best answer to the question raised by my hon. friend—that we have not had one adverse recommendation or representation from either producer or consumer with regard to these recommendations. Indeed, we have had very generous and widespread commendation of the recommendations which are now submitted to the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question which I asked earlier, and which he did not answer, although perhaps the answer is implicit in his statement. I take it that there is no intention to have any further inquiry in this general field in the near future, in spite of the statement by the board itself that in its opinion its report was not comprehensive?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. We see no occasion for any further inquiry by the board into this subject. In any event, the board has some other and pressing burdens awaiting it, some heavy references which will have to be given priority under any circumstances.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would be kind enough just to bring me up to date on whether or not all the positions on the board have now been filled and whether the board is up to full strength?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. This is the fifth day of May. For the past four days the board has not been at full strength. It was at full strength until April 30.

Mr. Argue: Is it short of just one member at the moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Two vacancies arose on April 30.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell us whether it is the intention of the government to fill these vacancies? I hope the government will not follow the many precedents it has established in delaying appointments to other bodies and unduly delay appointments to this board. It seems this government is certainly not in a hurry to fill any of these positions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are about 100 vacancies which this government is not filling.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East is also interested in this question. I wonder if the minister can tell the committee when the government will fill those important vacancies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is quite out of order. We are discussing recommendations and changes in tariff rates. I will be glad to deal with this subject on a proper occasion, but I think if we go into this question further we will be clearly out of order.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

Items Nos. 85, 87, 89 90, 92 and 93 agreed to.

Customs tariff—95a. Cantaloupes, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 1¼ cents or free; general tariff, 1¼ cents or free.

In any 12 month period ending March 13, the specific duty shall not be maintained in force in excess of eight weeks, and the free rate shall apply whenever the specific duty is not in effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On item 95a, Mr. Chairman, this is the second of the group of three amendments I mentioned at the outset, and I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Labour, to move the amendment. I have furnished copies to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Starr: I move the following amendment:

That resolution No. 2 (b) of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom tariff item 95 and by substituting therefor the following:

95. Cantaloupes and muskmelons, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, per pound.

British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 1¼ cents or free; general tariff, 1¼ cents or free.

In any 12-month period ending March 31, the specific duty shall not be maintained in force in excess of 8 weeks, and the free rate shall apply whenever the specific duty is not in effect.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister what is the mechanism for applying these specific duties? Supposing fruits are on the way to the Canadian market from the United States. Do these specific duties go on overnight or is there notice given?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will look back to his copy of the pamphlet containing the resolutions, he will see in subsection 2 of section 13 the provision which is made for goods in transit.

Amendment agreed to.

Items Nos. 99d, 106 and 107 agreed to.

Customs tariff—187d. Sensitized photographic rolls consisting of a photo-sensitive layer and a positive receiving layer, for use in cameras for making positives: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this point how does this item happen to get into the fruits and vegetables section?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, these two items, 187d and 505c, are the two items not pertaining to fruits and vegetables which are part of the package deal made with the United States. The hon. member will see these are reductions being made in our tariff as part of the negotiated price we pay for obtaining from the United States agreement to the increases which are being made in the tariff rates on vegetables imported into Canada.

Item agreed to.

Items Nos. 187d and 505c agreed to.

(c) that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 95a, 95b and 107, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Customs tariff—84. Onion sets and shallots, in their natural state: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this item I would like to bring in a little bit of local viewpoint. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said something about the regional difficulties in not having an appropriate designation for his territory other than the Atlantic maritime group. I would like the minister to convey to his colleague a report which I received to the effect that regardless of the changes which will be made in the tariffs here, it is not likely to change very much our likelihood of purchasing, shall we say, from eastern Ontario fruits and vegetables at the same season as I imagine one would purchase in northwestern Ontario. I think our natural marketing is through Winnipeg, and there is a great deal of importing from the United States in that area. Therefore I think northwestern Ontario should not properly be included in the entire Ontario grouping, because the minister will recognize that we are a thousand miles away from the eastern Ontario producer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The point of division between those two regions is at Port Arthur.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not the way it is worded, though. The minister's references have been to Ontario as such.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, that is the way it stands at the moment.

Mr. Benidickson: I am glad to hear that.

Item agreed to.

Items Nos. 84, 85a, 85b, 87, 89, 90 and 92 agreed to.

Customs tariff—95a. Muskmelons, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 1¼ cents or 10 per cent; general tariff, 1¼ cents or 10 per cent.

In any 12 month period ending March 31, the specific duty shall not be maintained in force in excess of 8 weeks, and the 10 per cent duty shall apply whenever the specific duty is not in effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, item 95a gives rise to the third of this group of amendments, and I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Labour, to move the amendment.

Mr. Starr: I move

That resolution No. 2(c) of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom tariff item 95a.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This pertains, of course, to the changes made with respect to muskmelons.

Mr. Benidickson: On that point, Mr. Chairman, the rates are the same? You are simply deciding to put these two products together, but there is no change in the rates? The muskmelon is be to lumped together with cantaloupes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I pointed out earlier, there is a change as far as the muskmelons are concerned. In the form of the original resolution, the cantaloupes were to be free of duty during the off season, and muskmelons were to continue to be dutiable at 10 per cent during the off season. The effect of the change is to make the muskmelons duty free in the off season.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Items Nos. 95b, 95c, 105i, 106 and 107 agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Resolution 3.

Mr. Benidickson: I see it is getting very close to five o'clock. I have a request from my deskmate, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who had to leave the house for a short period. He did wish to speak on resolution 3 and he wondered if it would be possible to deal with resolution 4, and then revert to the one in which he is interested.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would be quite agreeable to that.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreeable to the committee that we should deal now with resolution 4?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

4. Resolved,—that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 28, 72a, 82f, 134, 135, 143, 156, 180a, 296g, 351c, 399a, 409f, 414a, 427, 438b, 438c, 438d, 438e, 438m, 440c, 440k, 442b, 442c, 446e, 462d, 462i, 502, 502c, 504a, 505a, 682, 691(1) and 696a and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Tariff items 27, 27a, 72a, 79h, 79i, 82i, agreed to.

Customs tariff—134.

Mr. Benidickson: On this substantial item with respect to sugar, what is the reason for the presentation in the budget of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to items 134 and 135 which apply to sugar, both raw and refined, the only change in these two items is the elimination of the provision specifically limiting the application of special duty.

Item agreed to.

Items 134a, 135, 143, 152j, 156, 180a, 296g, 351c agreed to.

Customs tariff—399a. Pipes or tubes of iron or steel, commonly known as "oil-country goods", being casing or tubing and fittings or couplings therefor; sucker rods, pony rods, polished rods and couplings therefor; all of the foregoing for use in connection with natural gas or oil wells; British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: This item seems to have some reference to some of the changes that were made last year in regard to some of the iron and steel pipes items, particularly those used in the natural gas and oil industry. What has occasioned a change this year after the very extensive revision which took place last year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The changes proposed under 399a affect rods known as sucker rods, pony rods and polished rods which are used in oil wells and which are now being made in Canada. In future, the same rates of duty will apply to sucker rods, pony rods and polished rods as apply to casing or tubing in oil wells.

The hon. member is correct in saying that this change stems from the revision last year of the tariff with respect to pipes and tubes. The rods used in oil wells are now being given the same rates as the tubes in connection with which they are used. The rods were not, of course, included in the reference to the board; that reference was confined to pipes and tubes.

Mr. Benidickson: But it would appear this is an increase with respect to some of the items mentioned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the addition of these particular rods to the tubes which were dealt with last year, and the reason is that at the time of the tariff board inquiry these rods were not being manufactured in Canada. The proposed change does not require negotiation, because it is not an item which is bound in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Items 409f, 414a, 423a agreed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On item 427, Mr. Chairman, there are amendments which I will ask my colleague the Minister of Labour to introduce. Perhaps if you will call the sub-clauses one at a time it might simplify our dealing with them. There are two amendments, one affecting sub-item 4 and the other, sub-item 5.

Items 427(1), 427(2), 427(3) agreed to.

Customs tariff—427(4). Power shovels and cranes, convertible, with nominal dipper capacities, as shovels, from three-eighth to two and one-half cubic yards, inclusive, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Starr: I move that resolution No. 4 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended by deleting therefrom item 427(4) and by substituting therefor the following:

427(4) machines, commonly known as convertible power cranes or shovels, crawler mounted, with nominal dipper capacities as shovels from three-eighth to two and one-half cubic yards inclusive, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—427(5). Power cranes, truck or wagon type, with rated lifting capacities of 10 to 40 tons inclusive, computed on the basis of 12-foot radius with 50 foot boom, n.o.p. parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I move that resolution No. 4 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended by deleting therefrom item 427(5) and by substituting therefor the following:

427(5) machines, commonly known as convertible power cranes or shovels, truck or wagon mounted, with nominal dipper capacities as shovels from three-eighth to two and one-half cubic yards inclusive, n.o.p.; machines, commonly known as revolving power cranes, truck or wagon mounted, with maximum rated lifting capacities of ten to 40 tons inclusive, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent. Most favoured nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I did raise this question earlier, but I do not think the minister replied to it specifically. Perhaps I could refer to it again, now. I think it deals with these machines which are the subject of the amendment and also with soft drink vending machines. I am reading from the Financial Post of April 18 in which an analysis of some of the tariff changes proposed in the budget appeared, and the staff writer makes this assertion:

The tariff board has rejected "made in Canada" appeals involving soft drink and hoisting machines.

I do not think the minister replied to the question which I raised on that point earlier.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is definitely not a true interpretation of the effect of this resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if I am right in assuming that all the articles mentioned in item 427 are deemed to be of a class or kind made in Canada whether in fact they are, or are not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are all ruled to be made in Canada.

Mr. Batten: Then by what criteria does the minister classify these items? Are they classified by size or by performance? What method is used?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Minister of National Revenue has so ruled. Under the act the criterion is to be determined by the minister and, naturally, the minister satisfies himself that these particular machines are of a class or kind which are in fact made in Canada. Inquiries are being made all the time of manufacturers and producers. This sort of inquiry is a constant routine.

Mr. Batten: I recognize all that, but my problem is this: I want to know how the Minister of National Revenue is going to decide that an item which is not made in Canada is to be considered of a class or kind which is made in Canada. How is he going to decide that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I presume the hon. member is aware that the decision of the minister is subject to appeal to the tariff board, and that a decision of the tariff board is subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. Batten: Does this section, as it stands now, mean that importers who disagree with the ruling that a particular item is of a class or kind made in Canada still have the right to appeal to the tariff board or to the courts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member has, perhaps, failed to appreciate the effect of item 427 as proposed. These machines have all been ruled, hitherto, to be of a class or kind made in Canada. That is a ruling which was made before the budget was brought in. Here we are simply dealing legislatively with a fact and with a ruling already made by the minister under the statutory powers given to him and, in some cases, by the tariff board itself.

Mr. Batten: I understand the amendment to 427 (4) and to 427 (5). There is some indication in the wording here as to how these items would be described as being of a class or kind made in Canada or not. For example, 427 (6) refers to paper machines, slitting, winding, and so on. There is no indication here at all as to what criteria will be used to decide whether these items are deemed to be made in Canada or not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, all paper machines have been ruled hitherto, without exception, to be of a class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: By whom and how recently?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Ruled by the minister and in some instances by the tariff board on appeals.

Mr. Batten: Was there not an appeal before the tariff board in February of this year regarding paper machines and winders, and no decision was made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, that is correct, and the tariff board in its decision upheld the ruling of the minister.

Mr. Batten: My information in this particular case, Mr. Chairman, leads me to believe that the appeal began on February 17 of this year and my understanding is that no decision was given on this appeal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The decision by the tariff board was given on April 30.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall 427 (6) carry?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend may wish to pursue his point.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to pursue his question further.

Mr. Batten: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Since it is five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 to leave the chair and allow the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RIGHT OF APPEAL OF DEPORTATION ORDER

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-20, to amend the Immigration Act (jurisdiction of courts).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a measure which I feel should have the unanimous approval of every member in the house who is concerned with the right of people to have appropriate recourse when they feel themselves aggrieved. I think this is a principle which has long been approved and supported in our system of government and in our system of justice. I find that section 39 of the Immigration Act denies that full right, that full freedom, for people who feel themselves aggrieved and wish to seek redress. In order to follow the argument logically I should like to invite hon. members to look at section 39. Let me read it:

> No court and no judge or officer thereof has jurisdiction to review, quash, reverse, restrain or otherwise interfere with any proceeding, decision or order of the minister, deputy minister, director, immigration appeal board, special inquiry officer or immigration officer had, made or given under the authority and in accordance with the provisions of this act relating to the detention or deportation of any person, upon any ground whatsoever, unless such person is a Canadian citizen or has Canadian domicile.

The wording of the section is certainly all-inclusive and aims, as the wording clearly indicates, to prevent any court, any judge or officer thereof from dealing with any decision made in connection with a deportation, as set forth in this section; not only does this concern a decision of the minister but also a decision of the deputy minister, a director or immigration officer, meaning almost any immigration official, whether he is in the upper echelons of the department or not, who deals with a matter of this kind.

[Mr. Speaker.]

He makes the decision and the person aggrieved has absolutely no recourse. He must accept it as though it were the decision of the highest court in the land. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that a section in an act which is so restrictive as to prevent a person from seeking redress is not a section which should form part of the law of this country.

Hon. members may be surprised to know that I was a member of the committee in 1953 which adopted this section of the act. Of course, one could properly say, "did you speak up at that time in protest against the inclusion of this section"? I want to draw to hon. member's attention the fact that I did, and I now quote from the minutes of the committee meetings when they considered Bill No. 305 respecting immigration in 1952 and 1953. I shall now quote from page 75:

> Section 39: Jurisdiction of courts.
> Mr. Crestohl: I suggest that section 39 merits a little attention. I think that the minister, like human beings, or departmental officials, or boards of inquiry, is human and is prone to misjudge a situation. I do not think they should assume the responsibility, and it is a difficult responsibility of rendering a final judgment which is almost equivalent to the highest court in the land. I think we should allow the man who feels aggrieved by the decision which the minister or the department or the board of inquiry might make, to be permitted to have his day in court; and I think we should work out some machinery to allow a person ordered deported to address himself to the courts.
> Mr. Gauthier: Judges are human!
> Mr. Crestohl: That is true, but they are not interested persons; they are not accusers, prosecutors, and judges at the same time. While the department in the very best of faith unfortunately can be in that position, the courts are not.

Lower down the minister made this observation:

> As I understand Mr. Crestohl he believes that the evidence taken by an inquiry should form the basis of a court proceeding which would pass through the hands of the minister and go to a judge of some kind in a provincial court. I am free to confess that such a proceeding would probably relieve the department of some work and would relieve the minister of exercising his discretion; but if adopted it would introduce entirely new procedures into the immigration proceedings.

Hon. members will see that in 1952, when the government of which I was a follower and supporter dealt with this legislation, I opposed it then. I merely point this out to prove that I am consistent in my opposition. At that time the minister stated that what this would do would be to alter the proceedings in the department of immigration and introduce new procedures. On the question of modifying existing regulations or changing the act, I say respectfully that if the reasons advanced then are the only ones why justice should not be preserved for an aggrieved person, they are not sufficient. One is entitled to have a grievance heard by a tribunal so that he may obtain justice.

In the debate a few minutes ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) pointed out that so far as tariff matters are concerned a person who feels himself aggrieved because of a tariff decision has a right of appeal first to the minister; if he is still unhappy about the decision he also has a right of appeal to the tariff board; he then has a right of appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada, and finally he has a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. This was clearly explained by the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago. One is really shocked and appalled to find that when dealing with matters of dollars and cents, with tariff questions, there are four stages of appeal in order to seek redress and justice but under the Immigration Act, which deals with human liberty and human rights, there is no right of appeal. It is really incongruous.

An immigration official in the very best of faith talks to an immigant and makes a decision. "I, immigration official, decide that you are to be deported." That decision is as formidable as a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. I respectfully submit that such a situation is inconsistent with the reasoning of every member of the house and inconsistent with our basis of justice.

On very many occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has condemned the arbitrary decisions that the immigration department has been able to make and he promised that if he were given the opportunity he would alter the situation. I should like to quote a statement he made as found in the Toronto Star of April 26, 1957. Among other things he said that he would—> —end the "bureaucratic" interpretations of the Immigration Act and ensure that humanitarianism would be considered more often in handling immigration applications.

What could be more humane, what could fall more within the scope of the Prime Minister's statement than to say to a person who has been told by an immigration official that he is to be deported that he has a right of appeal. The official may have made a mistake in the very best of faith but unfortunately once he has made his decision the door is closed and the person is deported. In all justice and to be consistent with the Prime Minister's statement that humanitarianism will be applied in dealing with immigration regulations, I respectfully submit that the proposed amendment to modify section 39 in order to grant the right of appeal under certain conditions should be adopted. We do not want frivolous appeals, we do not want appeals for the purpose of delay, but if a person is serious enough to make a deposit as security for costs, as I have suggested in the amendment, and if he complies with the other conditions he certainly should be entitled to have his day in court. I should also like to quote another statement of the Prime Minister found in the Globe and Mail of April 27, 1957, which report reads as follows:

> The Conservatives, he continued, will end the arbitrary and unjust interpretation of immigration regulations which . . . have constituted a denial and veto of immigration legislation.

These two statements of the Prime Minister were both very lofty in principle and in their sense of justice, and I know that he was serious when he made them. I am prepared to accept them and certainly the country will accept them. One way of giving some meaning to the statements of the Prime Minister is to remedy what I and many others consider to be an evil in the present regulations. To deny a human being justice if a minor immigration official should make a mistake by not permitting a right of appeal certainly is beyond every concept of justice as we understand it in Canada.

I have therefore introduced the bill now before us. I had hoped that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) would have taken up the bill. I am prepared to withdraw my bill if she will make a statement to the house that section 39 will be remedied. I am not particularly concerned whether it becomes law through a measure presented by me or one presented by the minister as long as it becomes law and human beings are permitted to have their day in court when they are aggrieved so that they may be able to receive justice. I do not want to delay the house in discussing this matter. One could certainly enter into a long debate on the principles of justice but I think that would be elementary and unnecessary. I have presented the situation as I see it and I respectfully submit to the house that the bill should be favourably considered.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-20 purports to make drastic changes in the Immigration Act. I have heard the hon. member who has just taken his seat trot out the horrors. He referred to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his pending bill of rights and suggested that we are neglecting the rights of those who intend to become citizens.

Apparently the criticism of the present section of the act is that these persons are not allowed their day in court. However, if one reads the whole act one comes to section 31, and I would direct the attention of all hon. members to that section which sets out in some detail in four subsections the rights of appeal. It is true that if you read section 39 as it now stands carelessly you might be led to believe that there is no appeal.

But section 31 of the act, and similar provisions, have been used in hundreds of cases before the courts of Canada. I might say that at present there are six rather important cases before the courts. I am, naturally, not able to name them because they are still before the courts. But if you go to the Canadian abridgement you will see dozens and dozens of cases listed in which appeals have been made from decisions of minor officials and of the minister himself.

The suggested amendment in Bill No. C-20, far from enlarging the rights of applicants for citizenship, brings in one or two restrictions. If you go to appeal under this Immigration Act now there is no necessity for putting up a bond, certainly in the first stage of the appeal. If a man got off a ship and an order was made for his deportation, the machinery for appeal is plainly here for all to see. If hon. members are trotting out the horrors, as I said, and trying to pretend that these persons are not getting their rights before the courts of Canada, then I say that is just not true.

There is another amendment which I noticed in this bill which suggests that 30 days of grace be allowed in which to launch this appeal. There is no time limit, Mr. Speaker, under the present administration of this act so I feel if you insert a 30-day period of grace you are not going to assist these people who are allegedly being neglected by our Canadian laws.

I return again to the monetary angle. It would seem to me that if we asked a penniless stowaway to put up $300 before he can have his case heard we would be imposing a serious restriction on his rights.

The amendment also suggests that there would be some difficulty concerning domicile, and I think again this is the result of a careless reading of section 39. A great many of the hundreds of cases reported refer to persons who are neither Canadian citizens nor do they pretend to be. The rights which we extend to these persons are the same rights which we give to Canadian citizens. Although section 39 as it now stands reads awkwardly, if any criticism should be directed toward this section I think it should be directed toward the administration of it. Let us suppose that the minister, having reviewed a case brought to her under section 31, makes what the aggrieved person feels to be an injudicious decision. This person still has recourse to all the historical writs.

I refer again to the reported cases. They are so numerous that I will not bore the house by listing them, but if you look at these cases you will see that they have been instituted, in the final analysis, by writs. These are writs of certiorari, prohibition and habeas corpus. They all have the same effect, and that is bringing in the back door something which cannot be brought in the front door. Even when a man is under detention awaiting deportation, a writ of habeas corpus might still be issued and he would be brought before the court. I fail to see, Mr. Speaker, how the rights of these persons are in any way withheld under the present act. I can only say that the amendments suggested by Bill No. C-20 would restrict those rights to an even greater degree.

In the last sentence of section 39 of the act we find the phrase, "unless such person is a Canadian citizen or has Canadian domicile". I agree that that is a suggestion that the act does not cover these cases but I say again that the act, as it is administered, gives these applicants the full protection of British law.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Bigg: Yes.

Mr. Crestohl: Is the hon. member aware that within the past three months applications were made by way of writs of certiorari before the courts in Montreal and judgments were rendered not allowing the writs to be issued because the applicant was denied the right by section 39 of the act? This was mentioned.

Mr. Bigg: I am not aware of these decisions, but I refer again to the Canadian abridgement in which the law is plain. I have no doubt that the higher courts in Canada have had other reasons for quashing these writs, but there is no doubt that the machinery is there or that the section of the act as it now reads does not restrain any applicant. If you read the section carefully, as I suggested, you will find it says:

> No court and no judge or officer thereof has jurisdiction to review, quash, reverse, restrain or otherwise interfere with any poceeding, decision or order of the minister, deputy minister, director, immigration appeal board, special inquiry officer or immigration officer had, made or given under the authority and in accordance with the provisions of this act—

We must presume, therefore, that ministers of the crown act within their jurisdiction justly, fairly, with patience and with discrimination.

Mr. Crestohl: And infallibly?

Mr. Bigg: No, that is why we have the writs. There is no person infallible. We have these writs of the crown which have been used on numerous occasions. I presume they will continue to be used. If there is any point in passing Bill No. C-20 and amending the act, I have not seen it. All the rights for which the hon. member is asking in this bill are already in the act. As I pointed out, I think conclusively, quite contrary to helping any applicant, these restrictions imposed by the $300 deposit and the 30-day time limit, would cut down his right of appeal.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): As a fellow practitioner in the law of the hon. member who proposed this bill, I was almost ready at first sight to stand beside him and say "three cheers". However, my own experience points out the wisdom of having not only one look at these amendments but possibly a second and third look. At first glance the proposition seems to be very clear. In other words, the proposition is that in all cases where a deportation or detention order is made under the Immigration Act the subject of that order shall have the right to go to the court and have his case put before a superior court of the jurisdiction defined in the proposed section.

However, let us look first of all at just what is the ambit, who are the people that are to be protected. I cannot fully subscribe to being an admirer of the present act. Certainly I do not feel that the question of Canadian domicile as such is consistent with other principles of law when we are considering domicile. But the person who has been a landed immigrant over five years by section 4, in material cases has assumed Canadian domicile. However, this leaves the person who has been a well-behaved citizen for four years and six months or four years and nine months and then runs afoul of the law subject to deportation procedures. He has not yet acquired his Canadian domicile unless he lodges his appeal. There is a period there, but it actually covers those people who have not yet acquired Canadian domicile. Whether a person being a Canadian citizen could be deported is a matter of question; I do not think so. I think you would have to strip him of his citizenship first and therefore he would not be called a Canadian citizen. I do not think you can deport a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I am very much interested in these words "Canadian domicile". Can the hon. member give an explanation of what that expression really means?

Mr. Lambert: The only thing I can do is refer the hon. member to section 4 of the Immigration Act. If we go to the definition clause, which is subsection 2, we find that subsection (c) states:

> "Canadian domicile" means Canadian domicile acquired and held in accordance with section 4;

Then we go to section 4 and we see this:

> 4(1) Canadian domicile is acquired for the purposes of this act by a person having his place of domicile—

Repetition again.

> —for at least five years in Canada after having been landed in Canada.

Then there are restrictions on that, such as if he has been confined to a penitentiary or an asylum and resides in Canada under a permit or has gone out of the country under certain circumstances. But I personally feel that there are certain difficulties in the wording of the act. However, that is not the principle behind the hon. member's proposal here this afternoon.

Let us consider what he is doing. He is singling out a particular group of people, namely potential deportees and he says, "They must have a right of appeal to the court". But what of the person who has applied for citizenship and is not subject to deportation? Under section 14 of the Citizenship Act the minister may deny that applicant's request for citizenship and there is no appeal.

Mr. Crestohl: There should be.

Mr. Lambert: I will deal with that matter in a moment. But there is still no appeal. What about all these proposed immigrants who cannot meet medical requirements? They have not the right of appeal.

Mr. Crestohl: They have not yet been ordered deported.

Mr. Lambert: It is the question of equality that I think the hon. member is trying to get at: these people are human beings; they are residents of this country and therefore they should be equal before the courts.

Mr. Crestohl: If they have been ordered deported.

Mr. Lambert: That may be so. But, as I say, he feels that they have no right of appeal, that they are being denied an appeal beyond that of section 31. After all, there is an appeal procedure under section 31. It is taken up with the minister or a special inquiry board. But the hon. member wants to go beyond that. He wants to have an open court. I say then that there are a number of other instances where a person is aggrieved under the act—and a potential deportee is a person aggrieved under the act—and such people surely must have a right of appeal. Let us consider these particular points. If we refer to section 5, the medical section, in subsections (a), (b) and (s), there is no right of appeal on a refusal of admittance under a medical certificate. Nor is there under section 19 subclause (1), paragraph (d), which deals with convictions under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. There is absolutely no right of appeal. I might cite again section 7, subsection (5), of the present act. You would have to amend the act. As a matter of fact, if we amended section 39 as requested by the hon. member, we would have to go and amend section 7, subsection (5), because you would have a clear inconsistency. May I cite section 7, subsection (5):

(5) The minister may make a deportation order against a person referred to in subsection (4) and such person has no right of appeal from the deportation order and shall be deported as soon as practicable.

If you amend it in one place, I submit you must amend it in another. With all due respect, I would rather think that the point which the hon. member is getting at is this subsection here and not section 39 because I would submit that section 39 allows a certain class of people to have recourse to the courts.

A few moments ago I mentioned section 14 of the Citizenship Act. We have gone a stage further. As to a person who is otherwise qualified as a landed immigrant in this country and applies for citizenship, the court in its examination of the applicant may agree but the minister has the full right to refuse and the applicant has no appeal. Let us say, for the sake or argument, that there should be a right of appeal. I would place these people in the same category as the ones about which the hon. member speaks. We may speak of an absolute right to be heard. But I would ask the hon. gentleman whether there are any such things today as absolute rights. I do not believe there are such things for the individual. In today's international relations and in our relationships one with another there comes a time when perhaps the common good may override the right of the individual. We certainly see it in wartime.

Let us consider but one aspect. I do not say that this is the sole aspect that determines the matter or serves as the basis for this section and section 14 in the Citizenship Act. And, my hon. friend would fully recognize the impossible position in which we would be put. I am speaking here of where there are certain fields where the common good must override any suggestion of an absolute right of the individual. For purposes of security I do not have to dot the "i's" and cross the "t's" for the hon. member to indicate precisely what would happen if a potential deportee had an order against him because of his background and connections, which posed in the eyes of the laws of this country a threat to the security of the country. He can come forward in court and say, "Prove your case against me." It is a most difficult question and I do not think that the hon. member or I can come down with a 100 per cent answer.

As I indicated initially, I too was bothered as a lawyer about this denial of the right of appeal, and I will say that perhaps I can go a long way towards the point of view expressed by the hon. member. But I am just wondering how far we can go. After all, as the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) indicated, there are a number of cases presently before the courts where the applicant, the deportee, does not allege that he is a Canadian citizen or that he has acquired domicile. But he is being heard in court. I do not think we can go quite as far as the hon. member would like. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I think I have indicated that he is perhaps applying a patch in a very doubtful area. I think he would find himself in almost as difficult a spot under section 7, subsection 5. At best you would have a blatant inconsistency in the act. At the moment it is not there. Bearing in mind that the hon. minister has indicated that immigration policy would be subject to review, I do not honestly think that now would be the time to apply what I consider a somewhat dubious patch to this act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I wish there had been some members of the Conservative party before the election of 1957 who had taken the same judicial view of the administration of the act and the act itself as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) have taken this afternoon. Because the kind of things which used to be said on this side of the house when I was administering the Immigration Act are very much out of accord with the very moderate and judicial statements they have made.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a question of privilege. If the hon. member looks through my remarks, I doubt if he could find the type of white brush he is trying to ascribe to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has just argued his case, so perhaps he will let me now argue mine. I was accused of denying people the right of access to the courts, which I never did at any time. I was accused by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of all sorts of arbitrary activity, of which the hon. member for Cartier has given a couple of examples. I will not repeat them by putting them on the record, but I must say that after administering the Immigration Act from July 1, 1954 until June 21, 1957, a period of almost three years, I came to a conclusion which leads me to support the bill moved by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) today.

I would like to tell hon. members why I reached that conclusion. I think the hon. member for Athabasca is largely right in what he said, that any person with an ingenious enough lawyer and a sympathetic judge can get his case before the court, and in some provinces this is much easier than in others. There are other provinces where because there is a stricter interpretation of the act it is not so easy. I will not reflect in any way on the bar in any province, but I know there were gross discrepancies. My experience was that all the most dubious cases and all the cases which I thought deserved the least consideration always got into the courts, and a great many cases where the persons were not so persistent or ingenious, or perhaps not so anxious to beat the laws of Canada, never did get to the courts.

As hon. members who interested themselves in this subject know, I did take the responsibility of recommending to my colleagues the setting up of an appeal board against deportation orders made against landed immigrants. That appeal board went as far as the Immigration Act itself allowed, because the Immigration Act says the appeal in the ultimate resort is to the minister. I gave every applicant a choice between appealing to the minister or appealing to the board, and I said that if they chose to appeal to the board and indicated that in their appeal I would not interfere with the judgment of the board. If on the other hand they preferred to appeal to the minister, I would then seek the advice of the board but would have to take my responsibility under the act and make the final decision. From the day that board was set up until I ceased to be minister, and as far as I know I have never heard of any difficulties since although perhaps the hon. lady may know of some, I do not think there has been any trouble about appeals from landed immigrants. I have never heard of any case where it was alleged there was any injustice.

These difficulties all arise in the case of persons who are visitors to Canada, either voluntary visitors or, in some cases as far as the country is concerned, involuntary visitors. No doubt the hon. lady remembers one celebrated case, as would the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) if he were here. These people are not citizens or landed immigrants and have, strictly speaking, no rights except human rights. I came to the conclusion—and this is the reason I am standing here and saying I have completely changed my mind about this—that it would be preferable, and certainly preferable for the minister involved as well as for the reputation of the country, that instead of having to use a backdoor method which has to be used now in many of these cases we could provide in the law for a regular procedure whereby these cases could be taken directly into the courts under appropriate circumstances.

I think the hon. member for Edmonton West has pointed to a difficulty in respect of section 7. Section 7 is very rarely used and there is some question about whether it really serves very much purpose in the act at all. But I think the hon. member is probably right in saying that if section 7 were left as it is and the bill proposed by the hon. member for Cartier were adopted there would be an inconsistency in the act. That is the kind of inconsistency which could easily be fixed up in committee and I do not think it would constitute an insuperable difficulty, or indeed any real difficulty at all to the enactment of this legislation if parliament were so minded.

There is something, too, in what the hon. member for Edmonton West has said about the fact that the hon. lady has promised us in the near future a revision, I took it not merely of the regulations, but also of the act itself.

My hon. friend from Cartier has indicated that if the hon. lady were to say she was considering favourably this proposal of his for inclusion in her general amendments, he would be glad to drop his bill, since he would feel it had served its purpose. I do think the principle of this bill is, on the whole, a sound one. That does not mean that every appeal is going to be successful. I would, in fact, expect that so long as the general ideas prevail which seemed to have prevailed in this country over the years, and which have been reflected in the Immigration Act over the years, most of these appeals would not be successful.

However, there is no doubt that this procedure would remove from the minds of many people the feeling that the administrative officers or the minister were acting both as judge and as an interested party in these cases. While this was not a proper statement of the facts, if it is widely believed to be a proper statement of the facts and if it creates in people's minds a sense of injustice, I can see a very great advantage in the course suggested, a course which would enable these misgivings to be removed by legislation which would enable people to go to the courts and have their cases considered by a tribunal which is independent and which obviously has no axe to grind.

I am not at all impressed by the observations of the hon. member for Edmonton West about the Citizenship Act. It is a separate act of parliament. It stands on its own feet, and whether or not it should be amended is an entirely separate question. There is no reason whatever why we should not fill in a pothole on Wellington street just because there is one on Sparks street, and there is no reason why we should not amend the Immigration Act just because the Citizenship Act may require amendment. The hon. member guessed, if he did not know, why that provision was in the Citizenship Act. It was put in there on security grounds. Having administered that act for some time, I am not sure that it is not a rather blunt instrument. I hope that next session when the hon. lady sets up this committee on the Citizenship Act which she promised, this matter will be looked into.

An hon. Member: When did she promise that?

Mr. Pickersgill: During the estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: The Immigration Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the Citizenship Act. If the hon. lady will look back to the time her estimates were being discussed she will see that that is so. As a matter of fact, I think that in many ways the Citizenship Act is in even more urgent need of revision than the Immigration Act, if I may express out of order a personal opinion.

But I do not wish to detain the house any longer. I merely wish to make this confession, that if I had been asked in 1955, or up until quite late in 1956, to support the bill which the hon. member has introduced, I would not have done so. But sometime during the period in which I was minister, I turned increasingly to the view that for the good administration of the act, and for the good name of the country this was a requirement that should be met, and I confess, since I am making a lot of confessions, that I had rather hoped that I might preside over this change. However, the electors decided otherwise, and I hope the hon. lady will do so.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I fear I shall not have time to complete the remarks I had intended to make, but I will begin, and attempt to make my position clear.

At the outset, I should like to say that as a matter of principle I am in favour of the right to appeal from the decision of an administrative board or tribunal wherever that course is humanly possible. In my opinion a bureaucratic decision or a decision made by a department has elements in it which are unfavourable. I think that in principle we should not tend to move toward making decisions by a government department final, and to that extent I agree with the principle of this bill.

Having said that, however, I should like to look at the measure more closely and point out what I believe to be its shortcomings. I had some other remarks to make, but having regard to the time available I will come immediately to my main point. There are always a number of cases where the security of the country is involved. I feel that to the very point where this is so, the right of appeal should be given. However, the hon. member's bill does seem to have this shortcoming—that no exception is made to cover such circumstances. I believe that had the bill stated that a right of appeal would be granted in any case except where the minister declared that the national interest must override the right of appeal, one of the major objections to his measure would have been removed. But there is no exception made in terms of this bill.

It is very difficult to decide at exactly what point the basic right of an individual to appeal to the courts and have his case heard in public ends, and where the national interest begins. However, it has been the practice for many years in this country that a statement by a minister who has the facts before him that the national interest would not be served by a certain case coming into open court has been accepted. We know many cases where the courts in Canada have gone a long way in this respect. We know of cases where mounted policemen who have been engaged in investigation work—men who have, perhaps, completed many years of investigation into certain cases—have been obliged to come before the courts in order to give their evidence, and immediately, at that point, having been identified, their usefulness as investigators and agents has ceased. That, to my mind, is an indication of the length to which we should go in protecting the rights of the people to appeal to the courts and to have their cases heard.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that it is six o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at five o'clock we were dealing with the Customs Tariff, item 427(6). The hon. member for Humber-St. George's.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at five o'clock I was asking some questions relative to tariff item 427(6). If this item is passed as it now is amended, what effect will this have on appeals that are now before the tariff board or before the courts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These changes will come into effect as provided in the budget resolution on April 10 of this year. That is provided in resolution No. 5.

Mr. Batten: Would it have any effect on the appeals that are now before the tariff board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would not affect the terms of importation of particular goods at the time of their import, which were the subject of appeals prior to the budget.

Mr. Batten: Under this new legislation would it be possible to appeal a ruling respecting an item as to whether or not it is of a class or kind made in Canada, if the item comes under 427?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; if the item comes under 427(6) it, from this point on, is dealt with and fully governed by item 427(6). You see, item 427(6) does not use the words, "of a class or kind made in Canada", and it then becomes a matter of ordinary interpretation of item 427(6). But the question whether it is of a class or kind made in Canada does not arise on the interpretation of 427(6) in this form.

Mr. Batten: Are the items under 427 items which are covered by GATT? If so, was any negotiation entered into with other countries in making these changes? What were the concessions and what were the countries?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are bound by GATT, but no negotiation was required because there is no change in the rates.

Mr. Benidickson: On item 427(6), Mr. Chairman, if the paper machine was not one that previously would have been deemed to have been made in Canada what would the most-favoured-nation tariff import rate be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would have been 7½ per cent; but I remind the hon. member that all of these items were ruled to be of a class or kind made in Canada before this item was introduced—

Mr. Batten: The point I am trying to get at—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and were never regarded in any other way.

Mr. Batten: I quite agree with the minister, Mr. Chairman, that before this they were ruled as a class or kind made in Canada. If this legislation is passed will they be ruled as a class or kind made in Canada because of this legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That question cannot arise. The formula as to class or kind made in Canada does not apply to 427 (6).

Mr. Batten: It does appear to me that some of the items of the legislation, if they were considered as a class or kind not made in Canada and were brought in under the British preferential tariff, would be free. If they were brought in under the most-favoured-nation tariff, the tariff rate would be 7½ per cent. It now appears to me that the rate will be 10 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 22½ per cent for most of those items except those under 427 (2), which is at 15 per cent. All the others will be 22½ per cent. I will agree that trying to decide whether an item brought into this country is or is not of a class or kind made in Canada does set up a very difficult administrative problem. It does appear to me that what this legislation is trying to do is to avoid this administrative difficulty. In my view it is an attempt to do exactly that. For example, under 427 (3) they talk about "fork-lift" trucks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have passed that.

Mr. Batten: We have here a class of truck ranging from 4,000 pounds to 16,000 pounds. What would happen in the case of a truck of 4,000 pounds or 5,000 pounds, I am not sure. I am not sure that a truck of that capacity, 4,000 or 5,000 pounds, is made in Canada. If such a truck is not made in Canada and it was imported into Canada I do not see by what reasoning such a truck could be considered as a class or kind made in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: I will have to ask the hon. member to come back to 427 (6).

Mr. Batten: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will come back to 427 (6). In this item we have this tariff increase on paper machines, even though the type of paper machine that could be bought in Canada may not be the type that is required by any paper-making company, and may not be of the speed that is required by any paper-making company.

Item 427 (6) refers to parts thereof. What would happen in the case of a paper-making company that had imported a paper-making machine four, five or ten years ago, and now has to import parts for that machine which are not made in Canada? I do not understand the reasoning behind saying that these parts should be deemed as a class or kind made in Canada. This seems to me to be an increase in the rate of tariff on equipment used in the paper-making industry at a time when even though the paper-making industry forms a very important segment of the economy of this country, yet I think we are entering into a period when we can see that in the years that lie ahead—I do not think it is going to happen tomorrow—the Canadian paper-making industry is going to face keener competition than it has ever known before.

For example, in 1957 the Canadian production of newsprint was something over 6 million tons, 43 per cent of the total world production. Canada used only 3.3 per cent of the world production. Over 5 million tons were shipped to the United States. On the other hand, the United States produced something over 2 million tons, only 14 per cent of the total world production, and yet they used 48.8 per cent of the total world production. Now, it seems to me it would be economically sound if the United States were to begin to produce to fill some of this great demand for paper which they have. Of course, if they had the raw materials to produce that paper it would be a sound business venture. Not too long ago we can remember that in order to make newsprint the best of black spruce was required, and in every batch of pulp a large percentage was black spruce. Then, only a few years ago we got to the point where a fairly large percentage of balsam fir could be used. We now have the situation that in the southern states newsprint is being made from southern pine. We have the same sort of situation in France, and having in mind the progress that is being made in the chemistry of paper-making I think we can feel sure that within a few years paper will be made not only from southern pine in the southern states but also from hardwoods.

Russia is not included in the ten great newsprint producing countries of the world but I believe that within the next few years we will find that Russia will not only invade the papermaking industry but will also invade the paper markets. Therefore it is my opinion that within the not too distant future Canada is going to face very keen competition in the paper industry, and it is for that reason that I believe that any tendency to increase the tariff on machines being brought in by the paper industry is most inopportune at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with the previous resolutions, particularly those affecting vegetables and fruits, the minister indicated that since his intentions with respect to tariff changes were announced on April 9 he had received no complaints. Has he received any complaints with respect to this particular item and the changes proposed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There have been representations but none has taken objection to this action. Most of the representations called for some kind of interpretation as to the effect of the proposed change but I am informed that none expressed opposition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On 438b there is an amendment which will result a little farther down, if it is approved, in the insertion of item 438f. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to move the following amendment:

That resolution No. 4 of the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff be amended by deleting from tariff item 438b the words "bearings, ball or roller".

Mr. Brooks: I so move.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That will delete the first line in this particular item.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, several times I have asked the Minister of Labour if he could tell us what progress the government had made with regard to the representations made several weeks ago by a delegation of the united automobile workers in which they had suggested, among other things, that the government might use its good offices to ascertain, by way of a conference with automobile manufacturers, the latter's intentions as to the making of small cars in Canada. On April 20 last a brief was presented to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet entitled "Small Car Problem as it Affects Canadian Auto Workers." In the third paragraph on page four of the brief it is represented that what is needed is for the government to find out what the intentions of the automobile manufacturers are regarding small car production in Canada, whether they intend to make small cars first in the United States and then, when market conditions warrant, or some other such excuse, get into Canadian production.

On page five the last paragraph states:

The first step, we believe, is for management to take the government and the union into its confidence on this small car issue. To that end we are asking you . . . to call a conference of government, management and the union at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this item relating to the manufacture of small cars. This is an item relating to the tariff on automobile parts and the only changes in it, as will be seen on page 26, concern metal frames for convertible soft tops and permanent mould pistons for brake master cylinders. There is nothing here that concerns the manufacture of small cars in Canada. There may be an opportunity at some other time for the hon. gentleman to ask his question but it obviously does not relate to the matter before us now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can well understand that that kind of observation would be made by the Minister of Finance who obviously does not drive an automobile and is not aware that the ignition, for instance, is a very important instrument in an automobile; that magnetic plugs, lenses and articles of that sort are important constituents not only in small but in large cars. It would seem to me that my hon. friend is asking me to restrict myself when it is quite obvious that these items alone warrant reference to the small car problem.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am only asking the hon. gentleman to adhere to the rule of relevancy. There is nothing here about the manufacture of small cars. That is an entirely different issue not related to the importation of these parts. I am not prepared to discuss the issue as to the manufacture of small cars in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend will tell me how you can have a small car or a large car for that matter that does not include a control kit designed for attachment to motor vehicles to facilitate their operation, etc. I should like to have that explanation. The Minister of Finance is resourceful in finding ways and means of restricting discussion but surely he has resorted to a most unusual argument tonight. The fact is that these are important constituents in a vehicle of this kind and, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate obviously understands, these are important constituents as well. What I rose to point out to the Minister of Finance is that possibly he would give the Minister of Labour an opportunity to indicate to the house what progress he and his colleagues have made.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must call the hon. member for Essex East to order. I am sure that somewhere in the tariff there is something pertaining to cars that are completed ready to bring in but, as the hon.

member knows, this item only refers to various parts and accessories of cars. I cannot see how we can go into a full discussion on the importation of cars.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not easily subdued, Mr. Chairman. I am inclined to pursue my position very strongly but if you can indicate to me where I would be in order in discussing this problem I would be glad to give careful consideration to the view Your Honour presents. Surely to discuss the parts that go into an automobile does not preclude one from discussing the problem arising out of the completed article of which these are parts. It has always been within the rules of debate in this house that on an item like this one can discuss this kind of question provided there is some application of the articles under consideration, and these are all articles that have to do with automobiles.

The Deputy Chairman: I realize what the hon. member is getting at. I see that apparently there is no item covering completed cars but if his argument were allowed to prevail hon. members could pick out any item that might go into a completed article and enter into a discussion on that basis. We would not have any control of the discussion at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is my very point. If you can point to one article then you can carry on the kind of argument in which I am now engaged.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member cannot convince the Chair that he can take an ignition contact point and make an automobile out of it.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister is splitting hairs here. After all, this resolution is being considered in its entirety and the minister is protesting with respect to 438b. If the Chairman will look at 438c, and the following paragraphs, he will see we are discussing, in essence, the automobile manufacturing industry in respect to the tariff. Certainly, the point that is brought up by the hon. member for Essex East that some new phase in popularity with respect to public demand which involves the import of this article could be discussed on these items because they relate very definitely—438c relates very definitely—to all those items that go into a passenger automobile.

The Deputy Chairman: I realize what the hon. member is saying, but what we are discussing is 438b. Shall 438b carry?

The governor in council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity of putting forward the point of view of so many people who are out of work. One of the reasons that they are out of work is that they feel this particular situation contributes greatly to the problem with which I am sure the Minister of Labour is familiar. Now, the government did see this delegation on two occasions. I asked the Minister of Labour what progress he had been able to make in trying to comply with at least some of the requests made in this brief. If the Minister of Finance is not in a position to reply, and I would understand that he is not, perhaps he would allow the Minister of Labour to give the committee some indication of the progress the government has made toward implementing the assurance it gave to the united automobile workers several weeks ago on this very matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The progress we are interested in making is with respect to the business before the committee which is tariff item 438c. This item does not give rise to any issue or any question of the manufacture of small cars. There will be a place and a time in the course of this session when, I presume, it will be relevant for the hon. gentleman to raise that issue. This is not one of them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance must not arrogate to himself the authority which belongs to the Chair. The Chair said this was the item under which I might pursue this topic. The Minister of Finance says, no. I would remind him he is the Minister of Finance and not the chairman of the committee. Until the Chair tells me I am out of order, I intend to pursue this matter.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair said that the item 438c contained parts that went into the manufacture of an automobile and the subject could be discussed that way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for confirming what I had told the Minister of Finance. The minister says that he is interested in making progress on this item. I can understand that. I should like to tell him what we in this committee are interested in is what progress the government has made toward implementing the assurance it gave the delegation when the government stated it was going to ascertain what the possibilities were of making these small cars in Canada, thereby creating an opportunity for many people to acquire gainful employment.

That is the question I ask the Minister of Finance. If he cannot answer the question, he might give the Minister of Labour an opportunity of making a reply of some sort to indicate some progress, which I believe he is now prepared to do.

Item agreed to.

Items 438d, 438e agreed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, following item 438e, may I submit now the other amendment which involves the insertion of 438f which provides a further amendment to schedule A by striking out tariff item 438f (1), the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty of customs set opposite the said item and by inserting the following item, enumeration and rates of duty in the said schedule A:

438f (1) Parts, n.o.p., electroplated or not, whether finished or not, for automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances and hearses, or chassis enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, including engines, but not to include ball or roller bearings, wireless receiving sets, die castings of zinc, electric storage batteries, parts of wood, tires and tubes or parts of which the component material of chief value is rubber; British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

I would ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move the amendment.

Mr. Brooks: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Items 440c, 440k, 446e, 462d, 462i, 479, 502, 502c 505a 611a 682 691 696a agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the next resolution will be No. 3?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We might as well take No. 5.

The Deputy Chairman: Resolution No. 5?

5. Resolved,—That any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the 10th day of April, 1959, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the said resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Resolution No. 3, item No. 160.

3. Resolved,—That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 160, 162(b), 163(3), 307a and 554b, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

160 Alcoholic perfumes:

(a) When in bottles or flasks containing not more than four ounces each: British preferential tariff, 22½ p.c.; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 90 p.c.

(b) When in bottles, flasks or other packages, containing more than four ounces each, per gallon: British preferential tariff, $4.00; most-favoured-nation tariff, $4.00; general tariff, $5.00; and most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 40 p.c.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I might be permitted to make an observation or two about the whole resolution because it is my understanding that this resolution does, in fact, contain those concessions that were made by the government in some of the commodities that were to be admitted to Canada at the lower rate of duty in exchange for a release under GATT in order to enable the government to increase the protective tariff on wool and woollen fabrics. I am informed that the principal country with which we had to negotiate was not, as I would have thought, Italy, but France. I do not profess to have any great knowledge about that. Perhaps in reply the minister could indicate whether or not that is so.

The minister will no doubt recall that when we were discussing the Customs Tariff on August 13 last year, at the time the tariff on British woollens was to be increased, I was able to make some observations, with some difficulty, about this prospective increase that the minister mentioned last year. I said that, strong though my objections were to the increase in the tariff on British woollens, as a member for a fishing constituency I took even stronger objection to what the government was planning to do this year in trying to discourage imports into Canada from one of the few good customers for the higher quality salt codfish that we have for sale, and incidentally also a country that is one of the good customers for Canadian wheat. It did seem to me an extraordinarily unwise policy to be discouraging imports from a country to which we sold more than we bought, and to thereby take the risk of discouraging the sale of Canadian primary products for which the market was none too good anyway.

There is one thing I should like to know from the minister, and that is whether the concessions that we gave to Italy were considered by the Italians to be completely satisfactory or whether I am correctly informed and France was the country with which we mainly negotiated and Italy just got the residue of these concessions. I must say that I do not know enough about the technique of these matters to speak with any confidence about them, but I know this. Unless the Italian commercial interests and the Italian government were completely satisfied by the bargain that was made, we are further imperilling our exports by this increase in duties on a growing import from Italy of a kind of commodity which is used to a great extent by the very primary producers in Canada who are apt to be injured in the export market. It seems to me that it is unfair anyway to be increasing the cost of living to these primary producers in this way by this increase in the tariff on the woollens.

Speaking for myself, I am opposed to it on that ground. But I am equally opposed to it on the ground that there is the peril, by discouraging Italian imports, of discouraging an export market. I should be much interested to hear what the minister has to say. Of course, he is obviously determined to increase the tariff in order to increase the protection but I would at least hope that he could give us some reassurance that we were not imperilling the market in Italy for these vital exports.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no reason at all to think that we are imperilling our market in Italy for fish, wheat, or anything under GATT; it was bound to France. But Italy was the chief supplier of the particular goods that are affected here by the most-favoured-nation rate. Under the provisions of GATT it is necessary in such cases for this country to negotiate with that country which is the principal supplier as well as the country, namely France, in whose favour the item was bound. This change has been the subject of negotiations which have proceeded since the item was amended last summer so far as the British preferential rate was concerned. We have completed the negotiations with France to the satisfaction of France. We have completed the negotiations with Italy. They have been tentatively approved. It is simply a matter now of awaiting confirmation which we expect at any time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the minister that whatever his friends in his constituency may think of reducing the tariff on vermouth and wines, this reduction will not be much comfort to the fishermen and other primary producers who would rather get their woollen goods, which are necessities, more cheaply. But I should like to be assured that the Italians were completely satisfied that they would be able to sell us enough more vermouth and other wines and manufactures of marble—I do not suppose the Italians supply us with much in the way of alcoholic perfumes; I assume they come from France—to make up completely for what they are going to lose in the woollen market. I would be rather surprised if this would turn out to be the case. I must say that it is hard not to be very apprehensive about the market for salt fish in Europe in any case.

As the minister is doubtless aware, France has become an increasingly important competitor of Canada in world markets for salt cod, even in the West Indies; and with the establishment of the common market by the six countries in Europe, there is a real danger that we may be imperilling our market from that angle by itself. I am not at all satisfied by the explanation the minister has so far given that any real effort has been made to safeguard our market in Italy. If the minister can give us an estimate of the expectations of increased imports of these commodities on which we are reducing the tariff and his expectations as to the decline in the imports of woollens in dollars, I think it might be reassuring.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no estimate as to what this is going to mean in terms of importations. The committee will recall that the changes made in the tariff items affecting woollens and worsteds were of the most modest nature. The effect of the increase would amount to 15 cents on a suit of clothes and 25 cents on a winter overcoat. I can only repeat that we have negotiated with France and with Italy and the negotiations have been concluded. France has indicated her satisfaction with this package arrangement embodied in resolution No. 3. The negotiations with Italy have been completed on this basis and all that is awaited is confirmation.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, the minister talks about the increase being modest. But the extent to which the increases will accomplish the purpose the minister presumably has in mind in disturbing the tariff is the extent to which they will keep goods out. If they do not keep goods out, the amount of revenue is so small that there is no point in them whatsoever. The minister never asserted that they had any other purpose except the protective purpose. He indicated last year that although the first instalment was against British woollens, he was mainly anxious to keep out Italian woollens. That is what he told us last year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; I did not tell you that.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister can look up the record. He will find that is the impression he left.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; that is not what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like the minister to tell us then whether he expects that the main protective effect of this tariff will be against British woollens or against Italian woollens. Does he expect it is going to discourage imports from Britain more or imports from Italy more? How much effect does he think it is going to have in discouraging imports from Italy? Before we are asked to approve this increase, surely we are entitled to that information. Information of that kind must be in the possession of the government. Some kind of estimate must have been made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think all hon. members, with the exception of my hon. friend, are aware that in this resolution there is nothing that affects the British preferential rate. We made that change last year. But as I stated last year, we propose to move in due course to restore the margin of the British preference. What this present resolution does is to move the most-favoured-nation rate up simply to the extent—and a very slight extent it is—by which the rate under the British preferential tariff was moved up last year. The effect therefore is to restore the margin of preference to what it was prior to the 1958 changes in the tariff.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister seems to think that by iterating and reiterating things we already know he is answering questions about things which we do not know. Every member of the committee knows perfectly well that first they raised the tariff against the British in order to keep British goods out. Now they are increasing the margin of preference in order to keep Italian and other imports out. The minister can surely tell us what effect the increase last year has had in keeping out British goods. Perhaps from there we can form some impression ourselves as to how much damage this is going to do to Italian exporters to Canada who are earning money to buy Canadian wheat and codfish. I think the committee is entitled to that information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I said, Mr. Chairman, there is no estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister no estimate whatsoever of the effect on imports of the change we made last year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: It is an extraordinary policy, Mr. Chairman. At least in the days when the government raised tariffs openly and boasted about it, the last time we had a Tory government the prime minister of that day came into the house and told people what he expected to achieve by these things. This government which brings in these tariff changes by stealth, after a year does not have the faintest idea what effect they have had. Maybe the effect is so small that the minister is ashamed to mention it; or maybe it has discouraged so much British trade that, remembering the famous 15 per cent diversion, the minister is ashamed to tell us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hear some of the hon. gentlemen from western Canada in the background, but they are not making much effort to preserve our markets.

An hon. Member: You mean Gaspe.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, if he came from Gaspe he is not doing much to preserve the market for fish. It seems to me, sir, that this change in the tariff, which is a threat to one of our important markets for some of our greatest prime exports, is something which deserves more consideration than it seems to be getting from the ministry.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to raise the rate of remuneration of insurable employment; to increase the rates of contributions to be paid on behalf of insured persons and employers; to add new grounds for extension of the qualifying periods; to provide a new schedule of rates of benefits consequential on the new table of contributions; to provide that the maximum benefits, under the heading "duration of benefit", will be increased from thirty-six times to fifty-two times the weekly benefit rate; to establish a new schedule of allowable earnings; and to provide for other related matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend at this time to go into detail on the contents of the bill which will follow this resolution. I shall do that on second reading and when the bill is before the house. At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I shall confine myself to outlining in a general way the provisions which will be forthcoming in the bill.

In brief, the resolution proposes to increase contributions to the unemployment insurance fund by government, by management and by those who will be benefiting under the act. The reason for this is to maintain the fund in a situation of stability over the next few years. During the past two years of recession which we have experienced there has been a pretty heavy drain on this fund. In my opinion it is not anticipated that such a drain will occur again next year. Nevertheless I feel it is good business to place the fund on a sound actuarial basis. It is also my opinion that the government's responsibility is such that it should see that the fund will be able to meet whatever eventualities may arise. At the same time I would like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the government's intention to adopt an inflexible attitude in this regard. I hope the situation will be reviewed from time to time in the light of the requirements of the fund, and should it be possible, as an example, a year from now to look at the situation and find it is possible to reduce the rates, then most certainly that action would be taken.

In these amendments we are establishing two new classes; that is, one class of $33 per week and one of $36. We are also raising the ceiling from $4,800 to $5,460. The purpose of that is to bring back under the act those who were included originally. They were a foreman or his equivalent, but because of the rise in wages over the period of time some 80,000 have been excluded from the act. It is our intention, by raising the ceiling to $5,460, to bring back those 80,000 as contributors to the fund who would enjoy the coverage of the act. Allowable earnings are being increased to the extent of 50 per cent of the benefits. We are also taking care of prison inmates. That is something the hon. member for Vancouver East has propagated, as also have other societies in Canada who are interested in the rehabilitation of prisoners after they have served their term.

In general the purpose of the amendment is to give stability to the fund, to extend coverage to a number of persons who do not now have it, and also to increase the benefit period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks, which brings it back to the status which was in existence prior to the amendments of 1955. This last provision, I might say, has been one which has been requested by a great many organizations, and is one of the promises made by this government during the last two campaigns. There are other amendments to correct existing anomalies of minor nature under the act at the present time.

After the second reading it is my wish to refer these amendments to the standing committee on industrial relations so that the members of that committee may go into detail on all of these amendments now proposed to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure we have all listened with interest to what the Minister of Labour has had to say in his brief statement on this important resolution, a resolution which my hon. friend will remember we urged early in the session should be brought forward at the earliest possible moment. We did so because, in the face of the serious unemployment problem, it was wondered whether or not this measure would provide any kind of relief, by way of maintenance, to many out of work. But it is clear from the account given by the minister a few moments ago that, meritorious as these amendments may be, generally they are not calculated to contribute in any way to the problem of unemployment that now prevails.

As I listened to the minister and as I read the resolution, I assume that the main purpose of the bill which will be founded on this resolution is to raise the rate of remuneration of insurable employment, to increase the rates of contributions to be paid on behalf of insured persons and employers, to add new grounds for extensions of the qualifying periods, to provide a new schedule of rates of benefits consequential on the new table of contributions, and to provide the maximum benefits under the heading "Duration of Benefit", which I imagine will be increased. All we can assume is that the stories which have appeared in the newspapers give correct indications of what is to occur. Then it is proposed to establish a new schedule of allowable earnings and to provide for other related matters.

The minister was frank in saying that one of the reasons for the introduction of this measure was to maintain the integrity of the fund, a fund which has been very seriously invaded during the past 18 months; so seriously, in fact, that if we have a level of unemployment next fall and next winter comparable to the level last winter and last fall there might not be enough money in the fund to take care of the needs contracted for by employers and employees, together with the more modest contribution made by the government of Canada.

As I said, the minister mentioned that one of the purposes of this bill was to guarantee the integrity of the fund, and in this connection it is interesting to recall his own words which will be found in Hansard for 1955 at page 4760 when he said, among other things:

> If we look at the fund from 1942 to 1955 we find that at no time was it seriously impaired. We see that it has increased gradually at the rate of about $70 million a year, with one exception when in one year it increased only to the extent of $30 million. To my mind, therefore, there is no danger of serious impairment of the fund, even if the maximum period of 51 weeks were placed in the act.

So in 1955 when the hon. gentleman was on this side of the house he was not concerned about the integrity of the fund. Indeed, he had no reason to be. That is not the situation today, as he himself has acknowledged. The minister was confirmed in the confidence he showed in the past, by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who, also in 1955, as reported in Hansard at pages 4626 and 4627 said:

> I am not worried about the condition of the fund. Not a bit. It is my opinion that after these new provisions have been in effect for a year the fund will be even healthier than it is today. I base that opinion on the fact that from the actuary's own calculations there is every expectation of a net profit.

Later on in my remarks I propose to deal with the figures which indicate what the situation was then, and what the situation is now. I simply wanted to deal with this aspect of the question in a general way at the outset, because the minister himself said that one of the reasons for bringing forward this resolution was to see that the integrity of the fund was maintained. I think we ought to begin by putting first things first.

This particular amendment, like other amendments brought in by the administration in the course of the last year and a half, is an amendment which is being proposed with respect to an act brought in by a Liberal administration, an act which in this period of heavy unemployment has served the people of Canada, and particularly the unemployed, in a most gratifying manner. When we think of the serious problems and vicissitudes which have affected the unemployed population of Canada, for the last year and a half in particular, we can all be grateful that we had an Unemployment Insurance Act in being and that there was available for its operation a large fund to which contributions had been made by three bodies and, particularly, by two—the workers and management—thereby bringing to the unemployed, as a matter of right, assistance which in this period of unemployment was so essential to them.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

But before dealing with the merits of the resolution I think there is one piece of unfinished business to be done, and that concerns a matter which was referred to yesterday in answer to questions put by the hon. member for Assiniboia and by the Leader of the Opposition. One of the posts on the unemployment insurance commission had become vacant. Mr. R. J. Tallon, the former secretary treasurer of the trades and labour congress, has resigned, or his term of office has come to an end. I think I am expressing the views of every member of this house and, certainly, the views of all of those who have had anything to do with this matter, when I say that Mr. Tallon has earned our warmest gratitude for his services as the labour representative on the unemployment insurance commission for a long period. He should know in his period of retirement that he has done a useful job and that the workers, the employers and all of us in this country are grateful to him for his services. He was appointed by the former government, as I am sure the Minister of Labour would agree, in accordance with the requirements of the act, after consultation with the labour organizations of Canada. The issue which is immediately before us is that the replacement which the government has announced is not, it would seem, fully in accordance with the requirements of the act. Certainly it would seem that the new appointment has been made in such a way as not to encourage a measure of cooperation between the government and the representatives of labour.

The points of difference between labour and government are, inevitably, great. Oftentimes the relationship is complicated and no opportunity should be lost to encourage wherever possible the greatest measure of co-operation between the government on the one hand and labour on the other. I am afraid that the government in this instance, whatever may be its defence, has created a situation which in spite of the statement made by the Minister of Labour yesterday will not be regarded as fully satisfactory.

Mr. Starr: By whom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman asks: by whom? He will find out as I go along. I may say that I was not in the house yesterday, but I read his statement and it certainly has not satisfied me. For instance, the Leader of the Opposition addressed to the Minister of Labour this question as reported in Hansard on page 3276:

> Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question arising out of the minister's statement. Would the minister comment on the following words which appear in the letter from Mr. Jodoin to the minister:

And then the Leader of the Opposition goes on to quote the words:

> Even before you wrote me on February 5, even before you asked the congress to submit its nominees, you had advised me of your intention to recommend the appointment of Mr. A. F. MacArthur.

In that sentence is to be found the validity or the invalidity of the argument made by the president of the congress of labour.

What was the reply given to that question put by the Leader of the Opposition? The Minister of Labour did not answer the question at all. He simply spoke of the high qualifications of Mr. MacArthur. No one questions the qualifications of Mr. MacArthur. His politics have nothing to do with the matter. Mr. MacArthur is quoted as saying that he is politically neutral. I am not particularly concerned with that aspect of the problem. The question is: did the government comply with the act. The act is clear as to what the obligations of the government are by statute. One commissioner other than the chief commissioner is to be appointed after consultation with the representatives of organized workers, and the other after consultation with organizations representative of employers. That does not mean that the Minister of Labour has complied with this requirement of a statute passed by this parliament if he has simply told the president of the congress that the government regards a particular individual as being qualified for this particular post and that it intends to appoint him. It does not merely consist in telling the representatives of labour that this is the man the government intends to appoint. This section, if it means anything, means that the government must actually consult the labour organizations, ascertain their opinions but not give the impression that the government has made up its mind and is saying, this is the man we want; we are telling you about it and because we are telling you about it we feel that we are complying with the act. That is all that the minister said in reply to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether he would explain his definition of "really consult".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It certainly is not to do what the Minister of Labour seemingly has done, merely to inform. I say the evidence before us, the statements of the president of the congress, the reply of the Minister of Labour yesterday, do not indicate any more than that all he did was to inform the labour organizations and, by the way, we do not know what labour organizations were informed. We understand that the "syndicats Catholiques" were informed. Were the railroad brotherhoods informed? Were other national labour organizations informed? After all, the act does not specify that it must be only the organization headed by Mr. Jodoin. Were they called in and asked to recommend someone?

I am not suggesting that the minister was wrong yesterday in saying that the decision must be made by the government.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, the decision must be made by the government. I will be very glad to permit a question when I finish. I agree with my hon. friend that government in this country, or in any other country where government seeks to be effective, must be carried on by government. The cabinet must make the decisions; but that is not the point at issue. The point at issue is whether or not the labour organizations of this country, in accordance with the statute, have been consulted by the Minister of Labour and my argument is that that does not seem to be the case.

Mr. Starr: May I at this point—I think it would be in order since the hon. member posed a question whether other organizations had been consulted or not—answer the question asked by the hon. member. I have a telegram here. It is addressed to me and it reads as follows:

> The national legislative committee of the railway transportation brotherhoods the recognized central body of railway labour was consulted—

I am answering the question.

Mr. Regier: It is not the Canadian Labour Congress?

Mr. Starr: I continue:

> —and did submit a nominee to the Minister of Labour for the vacancy on the unemployment insurance commission. While the Canadian Labour Congress states the congress consulted with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour which endorsed the congress' nominees the congress did not consult with the railway transportation brotherhoods. These brotherhoods have no quarrel with the government in respect of its appointment of A. F. MacArthur as commissioner of the unemployment insurance commission and accordingly our representative on the unemployment insurance advisory committee will not be resigning.
>
> A. H. Balch chairman
> H. E. Campbell secretary > national legislative committee > international railway brotherhoods

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for giving that information.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question now? In the last few minutes the hon. member has been belabouring the differences and implying that this government made this appointment somewhat differently, I take it, from the way appointments were made by the previous administration.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he asked permission to ask a question. He should ask his question.

Mr. MacInnis: I ask the hon. member whether the former administration followed the recommendations of the Canadian labour congress in respect of those appointments?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can say to my hon. friend that I do not know of one instance where the government of which I was a member failed to comply with the requirements of the statute in this context.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know of very few instances where there was not the fullest co-operation between the government and labour. I want to come back—

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to come back to the statement made by the Minister of Labour. What the Minister of Labour has said now is valuable information but it does not address itself to this question at all. The point in the act is clear. The government has no right, under this act, to make up its mind whom it wants for the job until it has fully consulted labour. What my hon. friend did, according to the evidence, according to the letter of Mr. Jodoin, was to call him in and say, "We intend to appoint Mr. MacArthur; what do you think of him? Do you think he is a good man?" What my hon. friend should have done was to say, "We have an appointment to make. Have you any recommendations to make?" Then, as those recommendations were given, the government, exercising its executive responsibility and after carefully assessing the situation, would make the decision; but to appoint a particular individual in the circumstances in which this individual was appointed is not to comply with the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I ask my hon. friend to look up the correspondence having to do with the appointment of Mr. Tallon and see what the various labour organizations in Canada said to the government of that day about the way in which they had carried out the obligations of consultation under this act.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Tallon was one of those names recommended by the former labour congress. He was one of the three nominees put forward and that, incidentally, answers the question put forward to me by the hon. member. The former government accepted the recommendation of labour, but it was the government of the day that made the appointment and not the labour organization.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend regards this as a special situation. This is not an ordinary body serving government and made up of a representative of labour and of management. This is a body that is called upon not only to administer, by way of formulation of policy, matters having to do with unemployment insurance, but this commission actually is a trustee of many millions of dollars contributed not only by the employers but by the workers of this country. At one time there was almost a billion dollars in the fund.

Does the Minister of Labour deny that the labour organizations of this country have the right, in view of the contributions made by their constituents, the trade unionists of this country, to make a suggestion, based upon consultation as conceived by this act, as to who shall be their spokesman? The unemployment insurance commission is an important body. What we have now is the initiation of the new term by a worthy individual, namely Mr. MacArthur, I am sure, but under a cloud, a cloud described by the head of the largest labour organization in this country, representing more trade unionists than any other national body.

My hon. friend may find, as I did myself, that some of the officers of that organization may belong to another political party, but what has that to do with the problem? In the statement my hon. friend made yesterday, as reported at page 3277 of Hansard, he said:

> Over the week end I received and accepted, as a consequence of this appointment, the resignations of Mr. George Burt, Mr. A. Andras and Mr. Jean Marchand from the unemployment insurance advisory committee. Mr. Burt is head of the united automobile workers; Mr. Andras is chief of the legislation department of the congress; and Mr. Marchand is secretary general of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour.

Then the minister went on to say, and I am sure he will regret these words:

> Like Mr. Jodoin's three nominees for this appointment, all have a record of close affiliation with a political group—not the Progressive Conservative party.

Does that mean that one of the qualifications in the minds of the government of the day for replacement and holding office on the unemployment insurance advisory committee is that the nominee must belong to the Progressive Conservative party?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert: Read on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What interpretation can one place on the words of my hon. friend? He said:

> Like Mr. Jodoin's three nominees for this appointment, all have a record of close affiliation with a political group—not the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Lambert: Read on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Somebody says "read on". I will be very glad to do that.

> I say that political considerations were not absent in these resignations.

That may be the case but that has nothing to do with the point in issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members laugh. This is a serious matter. The Minister of Labour of this country has said—

Mr. Pallett: Stop smiling then.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and I repeat:

> Like Mr. Jodoin's three nominees for this appointment, all have a record of close affiliation with a political group—not the Progressive Conservative party.

I know, as the Minister of Labour knows, that some members of the congress do not support his party. Some of them do not support the party to which I belong but what have their political qualifications got to do—

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —with their right and fitness and qualifications to hold this particular appointment? I say that under the act the Minister of Labour has the responsibility of ascertaining, first whether the person suggested is a suitable person, whether he is capable of carrying out administrative responsibilities as a member of the commission and, second, whether he is one who is acceptable to the widest group of labour people in this country. Having satisfied himself about those particular qualifications, the Minister of Labour should have left out of his considerations the fact that the recommended persons did not belong to the political group which he so staunchly supports. That I think was a regrettable position for the Minister of Labour to take.

Then my hon. friend says: we are co-operating with labour. No one can contest that we have endeavoured at every point to co-operate with labour in this matter; I called Mr. Jodoin in; I told him to put in a certain number of names in addition to the name that finally emerged as my appointment and the appointment of the government; we have always co-operated with labour. Let us see from the minister's own statement if that is really the situation. After all, whether we like the politics of a particular individual who happens to be a high officer, indeed, the president of the largest labour organization in Canada, he does represent an important segment of the population of this country. He wanted to see the Prime Minister. He was not satisfied with the action taken by the Minister of Labour. The Leader of the Opposition put a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour which was in these words:

> Mr. Speaker, might I ask a further supplementary question. Did the president of the Canadian Labour Congress ask, by telegrams dated March 24 and April 29, for an interview with the Prime Minister and the ministry to discuss this appointment? Was any reply sent to the telegrams and, if so, what was its nature?

Here is the reply of the Minister of Labour to the president of the congress, not to the head of a small union but to the head of all the unions that belong to this largest labour organization:

> I did receive such a telegram from Mr. Jodoin. I am quoting from memory now, but he did ask at the end of the telegram for an appointment with the Prime Minister, which I did not consider to be necessary.

The hon. gentleman is by nature not an arrogant man but by that statement he certainly is guilty of an arrogant act. What right did he have to decide whether in this particular situation the Prime Minister should or should not carry on further consultations with the president of the Canadian Labour Congress? I say to the minister that he acted regrettably.

Mr. Walker: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone laughs. My friend, Mr. Walker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the hon. member for Rosedale, who is recognized as a great champion of labour, laughs, but let me tell him that the labouring people of this country are not laughing tonight. They regret very much—

Mr. Walker: They are laughing at my hon. friend.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend may be assured that his party, which has talked so fervently in the last two years about its relations with labour, the farmers and so on, has made a false step in this particular situation, has revealed its true colours and has indicated the extent to which in the pinch it really is prepared to co-operate with a properly established democratic organization representing an important segment of the people of our country. Look at Mr. Jodoin's letter. The hon. member for Peel is enjoying the laughter. I would tell him that he comes from a constituency where very many trade unionists will not support the stand of the Minister of Labour who has failed to carry out proper consultations with them prior to the appointment of their representative on the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Pallett: Make your speech on the 12th of June with a different tone.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour will likely have something to say by way of comment on what I have said tonight.

Mr. Starr: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I take it then that my case has been substantiated.

Mr. Starr: In your own mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, I know, does not propose to say anything because there is no reply. I want to say to the minister that all the events of Friday last had a doubtful character. It was generally known on Friday that the Minister of Labour was going to introduce his estimates after those of the Minister of Agriculture had been considered. However, the Minister of Agriculture did not finish in time to enable the Minister of Labour to initiate discussion of his estimates but he was ready, as he well knows. With respect to an important appointment of this kind and having regard to the fact that the house was sitting and the labour estimates were about to be discussed, I should have thought that the Minister of Labour would have announced the appointment in the house instead of issuing a press release.

I do not know whether the reason for that particular procedure was to avoid interrogation that day with regard to this appointment or whether it was to ease the embarrassment in which my hon. friend unwittingly has been plunged. In any event, I should have thought that if he was going to make an announcement concerning the appointment of a representative of labour on the unemployment insurance commission he would have taken the house into his confidence in accordance with our practices and traditions and told the house of the government's intention. But, of course, this government that has such a high regard for the rights of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members say "hear, hear". This government that has such a high regard for the rights of parliament prefers, while parliament is sitting, to make such an announcement by way of a release outside of parliament. Sometimes they are not even issued by the minister concerned, but by the Prime Minister. I can only say to the minister that it may be doubtful as to whether this appointment can stand the test of legality if there has not been proper consultation.

Mr. McGee: What is proper consultation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is my hon. friend, the solon from Scarborough, asking me what is proper consultation. I can tell him that proper consultation under this act is not the kind of consultation pursued by the Minister of Labour in this particular situation. Let me read the section again.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The section reads:

> One commissioner, other than the chief commissioner, shall be appointed after consultation with organizations representative of workers and the other after consultation with organizations representative of employers.

I say that under this particular clause there was not pursued the kind of consultation required and which labour as one of the important contributing sources to the unemployment insurance fund, has the right to ask of this government.

Now, the minister dealt at the outset with the question of the integrity of the fund.

Mr. McCleave: Now we know what Martin B.S. really means.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone made a very useful observation?

Mr. McCleave: I said now we are aware of what Martin B.S. really means.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend is obviously well trained in parliamentary language. I compliment him upon the succinctness and adaptability of his language to this very important situation.

My hon. friend mentioned the integrity of the fund. The fund has now reached the figure of $496 million. At one time the fund, of course, was just a little under a billion dollars. Is it to be assumed that one of the reasons for the introduction of this resolution is so that the government will be able to take steps to replenish the fund and not be confronted with a situation such as I indicated a few minutes ago might eventuate in the fall of 1959 and the winter of 1960 if we have a comparable level of unemployment over again? If we are faced with such a situation, the fund will be close to complete depletion, and that is a serious matter. Undoubtedly, it is a matter that concerns the minister.

The government is somewhat responsible for the depletion of this fund to its present level. On several occasions the government brought in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for additional supplementary payments. These particular amendments were supported, and widely received throughout this house, but those in the opposition associated their acceptance of these amendments with the suggestion that the government should at once replenish the fund; that the moneys paid out by way of supplementary benefits should not be replenished entirely, as they have been, by the employer and employee groups. This is the responsibility, as we said, of the people of Canada, and consequently the fund should have been replenished on two occasions by over a hundred million dollars out of the consolidated revenue fund, thereby very materially reducing the obligation which my hon. friend is going to impose upon the workers and employers by way of increased contributions for further benefits.

During the time we were in office we did introduce some supplementary benefits. As a matter of fact, the first supplementary benefit was introduced when Mr. Mitchell was minister of labour. Every time the fund was invaded for that purpose or any other, on three different occasions, it was replenished out of the consolidated fund. The full obligation for the abnormal situation, covered by the supplementary payments, was thereby borne by the people of Canada as a whole, as it should be, and not imposed on two particular groups in the national community, the employers and employees.

I say that if the minister is worried about the integrity of the fund the government, by failing to replenish the fund out of the consolidated revenues of the government of Canada, is materially responsible for this situation. Of course, it is responsible in another way. It is responsible because it has not taken the vigorous measures which it said it would take to try to alleviate the problem of unemployment in tihs country. I know hon. gentlemen do not like to be reminded of this, but lest any member think this is an idle boast I have something here in which the hon. member for Cape Breton South may be interested. I have here a hand bill which was used on behalf of the Conservative candidate, the hon. member for Pictou, in the last federal election. The bill reads:

> I promise you this: As long as I am Prime Minister, no man or woman will ever be allowed to suffer, deficit or no deficit, and as long as I am Prime Minister the welfare of the average Canadian will never be forgotten.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope hon. members will applaud what I am now going to read from the bill:

> There you have it! Those are the words of John Diefenbaker, speaking at Sydney, February 28. He is in effect telling you that as long as there is a dollar left in the Canadian treasury you will not want...
> Russell MacEwan agrees with him 100 per cent.

I now ask hon. members to applaud that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen are now applauding the statement that as long as there is anything left in the treasury, the unemployed shall not want. Now, what are we doing tonight? We are putting more money into the unemployent insurance fund, and we are calling upon the workers of Canada and the employers of Canada to pay another 30 per cent contribution so that they can get the benefits proposed. Hon. gentlemen are now confronted with their promise. They are confronted with a fait accompli. They are confronted with a fund that has been depleted very seriously, and they are now bringing in legislation to add new categories, impose new contributions, so that the fund will not be completely empty.

Let us look at the picture. In 1954—I am using round figures—the fund contained $881 million; in 1955, $840 million; in 1956, $854 million; in 1957, $874 million; in 1958, $744 million; and this year, 1959, $496 million. If the Minister of Labour did not come forward with this legislation he would be confronted with a situation next fall and winter, assuming a serious unemployment condition, in which there might perhaps not be sufficient money to pay to the workers the benefits which, by their own contributions, they have a right to receive from this fund for assistance for themselves and their families. I ask hon. gentlemen to applaud that statement.

An hon. Member: That is your own statement.

Mr. McGregor: There is no applause over there.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen opposite will be confronted shortly with the details of this bill. We will be told specifically what the income ceilings will be. We will be told what the rates of benefit will be.

The Chairman: Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: It is very entertaining. Let him carry on.

Mr. Ricard: Carry on. He has not said anything yet.

The Chairman: It is the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member be permitted to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the committee is in a generous mood. The committee has been co-operative. The committee tonight has agreed with everything I have said.

An hon. Member: You have not said anything.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On that account I would be taking unfair advantage if I kept driving home something that I know is of greatest consequence and which disturbs the Minister of Labour and the government.

Mr. Starr: It does not disturb me at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said that I do not disturb him. I know the Minister of Labour too well. I know he does not mean that, because there is nothing that disturbs him more.

Mr. Starr: You have not said anything tonight that rang with sincerity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What did he say?

Mr. Starr: I said that you have not said anything tonight that rang with sincerity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I could, through you, Mr. Chairman, ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark but I am not going to ask him to withdraw it because he knows perfectly well that no one is more sincere in this matter than I am. No one has fought harder in this house for these measures than the man who is now speaking. Long before the Minister of Labour was around in this house I was doing my utmost as a private member in this house and later as a member of the government, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury knows, for the improvement of the social and welfare conditions of the people of Canada. I will take second place to none in that regard.

The Minister of Labour should not be offended when I point out to him, as is our duty in the opposition, the seriousness of the state of the fund. The failure of the government to take steps 18 months ago to replenish it, the regrettable decision of the government to use moneys out of the fund that should have been taken from the consolidated revenue fund. The Minister of Labour should not object if I also point out, as I take my seat, that as a result of the financial policy of the government of Canada the unemployment insurance fund lost further by way of a diminution of its securities over $10 million as a result of the ill-conceived bond conversion plan of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Timmins has the floor.

Mr. McGee: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind you that the hon. member who has just taken his seat after professing himself to be the greatest hero in a long time in this country, indicated that at the conclusion of his remarks he would be willing to answer certain simple questions put to him by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and myself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is all right. I should be glad to do so.

Mr. McGee: He has not done so. Will he take advantage of the generous mood of the committee and answer those questions?

Mr. Robichaud: Is it a recommendation for membership on the coal board?

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member for Timmins willing to permit these questions to be asked of the hon. member who has taken his seat?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have no objection to being further entertained, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Then I will give the floor to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to ask the hon. member for Essex East to explain, since he is so verbal in his explanation of the ways these appointments are made, to the committee what procedure was followed when Hal Banks, a non-Canadian citizen, was appointed by his administration while he was a member of the government to attend the conference in Geneva.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should be glad to answer that question. I understand that Mr. Banks was appointed by the workers as their delegate; and the government of the day respected the wishes of the workers of the country.

Mr. Pearson: Are there any more questions?

Mr. Robichaud: What about a recommendation to the coal board?

Mr. McGee: I am grateful to the hon. member for permitting this great privilege. During the course of his remarks he used the words "real consultation" on several occasions. Upon four separate occasions I asked him to define that term and then he proceeded to tell me what it was not. I wonder if he would tell me what it is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that if my hon. friend had had the responsibilities of the Minister of Labour, he would have consulted labour before he made up his mind.

Mr. Pearson: Are there any more questions?

The Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members that the procedure being followed at the present time is not in accordance with the rules and must be stopped by the Chair. I therefore give the floor to the hon. member for Timmins.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, if this particular item that is being discussed at the present time was not of such a serious nature I can assure you that both I and my colleagues would be very much amused with the display we have witnessed for the last while. As the hon. member for Essex East promoted himself or proposed himself as the undying champion of labour, I could not help recalling that at the convention of the Canadian Labour Congress held out in Winnipeg last year I do not recall that the party he represents received any more favourable consideration than did the party that he was castigating at this time. In my opinion, the labour movement of this country, as represented by their Winnipeg convention last year, has written off both parties.

Mr. Chairman, the very point that was expounded so well by the hon. member for Essex East has to do with the fact that the government is now faced with the necessity of increasing the contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. I think he skipped lightly over the basic reasons for this action. If we look back to the time when this unemployment insurance fund was first created I think we will find that it was created for a specific purpose, namely to deal with seasonal unemployment that occurs in this country as a result of climatic conditions. In other words, even if you have full employment in the summer time, owing to climatic conditions during certain seasons of the year certain workers are unemployed. As a result of this situation, this unemployment insurance fund was set up.

This condition has gone on for the past two years and we are no longer faced with this problem which the fund was set up to meet. Instead of having seasonal unemployment during the winter months owing to severe weather conditions, we are faced with almost chronic unemployment of roughly half a million workers in this country. The fund which was set up just cannot cope with this. By increasing the contributions of people who are still working we will not cure the cancer in our society which we have today. I think this government must realize that if we are going to condone the fact that we must have chronic unemployment in this country, we had better find a new cure for it, because increasing the unemployment fund to meet seasonal unemployment will not cure the problem with which we are faced today. Certainly you will have to increase contributions if you are going to make the unemployment insurance fund do the job it was intended to do some time ago, because either through the actions of this government or through its lack of action the cost of living is going up in a straight climb, and the contributions which would suffice some time ago just will not suffice today. In addition to that, if we are going to be faced with 500,000 unemployed workers in this country, then you will have to find a new cure for the problem.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another point I would like to deal with. This matter has attracted much attention in the newspapers of this country, and I think I am fairly well qualified to speak on this subject. For eight years I was president of a T.L.C. local and for seven years vice-president of the provincial federation of the T.L.C., so I have lived for many years in the domain of the Trades and Labour Congress. We all know that there has been a new appointment to the unemployment insurance commission. I have met this gentleman many times at conventions in the past and I know him very well. I have a lot of respect for him and know the kind of job he has done. He has served for a long period in his capacity as executive officer of the Trades and Labour Congress in Ontario.

I think hon. members must realize, however, that there has been a steady change in the thinking of the labour movement in this country. I also recall other prominent leaders in the old T.L.C. for whom I have great respect. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted I would like to name two: Gordon Cushings and Bill Jenoveese. Both these gentlemen were devoted for many years to the trade union movement. Both these gentlemen belonged to the same line of thinking and the same old traditions as Mr. MacArthur. They subscribed to the same line of thought. But here is one difference, Mr. Chairman. Brother Cushing and Brother Jenoveese were trade unionists first and Conservatives second. They fought their battles at conventions and meetings wherever they were held, and in accordance with the democratic traditions of the trade union movement. If they lost their fight then they accepted the majority vote. Brother MacArthur did not follow these traditions, possibly not by his own choice. He was more or less pushed aside by the new thought in the trade union movement.

I recall that at the last convention of the Ontario T.L.C. the subject of political education came up. It was split right down the middle 50-50, and the chairman had to cast the deciding vote. But each year there had been a marked difference in the trend of thought of the members of the trade union movement belonging to the T.L.C. in the province of Ontario. Next year who knows what would have happened. The next year there was a merger and the T.L.C. and the C.L.C. joined together. However, I would still like to pay my respects to Brother MacArthur for the outstanding work he has done in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): But the fact still remains, whether he agreed or not, the trade union movement did not see fit to carry him along in the new movement which is going on in future. This is really what we come down to. If the government sees fit to appoint Brother MacArthur to this new job, then that is their right. I personally do not think that the trade union movement in this country will be too badly off with his appointment. But the fact still remains that he was not the choice of or acceptable to labour today for this position.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You mean he was not Stanley Knowles' choice.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The government has appointed Mr. MacArthur to the unemployment insurance commission. If they had appointed him as a government representative, that would be fine as they are entitled to do so, but they have appointed him as the labour representative of this province when in fact he no longer represents labour in this province. So the result is, assessing all the aspects of this question, that this government is trying to ram down a political appointment as a labour representative of this province by appointing him to the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to say to the hon. member for Timmins, I understand he is still a member of the federation of Ontario professional firefighters. I want to read to him two telegrams. Here is the context of one:

> Your appointment of MacArthur shows exceptionally good judgment.
> Walter Childs, President, Provincial Federation of Ontario Professional Firefighters.

Another telegram reads:

> Congratulations on your appointment of MacArthur.
> R. A. Gilbert, Secretary Treasurer, Provincial Federation of Ontario Professional Firefighters.

Mr. Chairman, I just thought he might be interested in knowing that his union supports this appointment.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to answer the hon. minister if I may. For eight years I belonged to the old T.L.C., the union which would not allow politics to enter the door. The fact is they would not let it in the front door but they had no objections to letting it slither under the back door. I recall the convention in 1955 of the Ontario firefighters in Fort William. I ran for president of the Ontario firefighters and a group headed by the Toronto local caucused against me on this sole question: How can we keep Martin out of the chair, because he is a C.C.F'er? when we have a Conservative government in Queens Park. Now if that is not politics what is? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that politics were every bit as active in the old T.L.C. as they are today in the C.L.C., but instead of bringing them in the front door, they were always slithered under the back door.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Starr thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

AMENDMENTS REPEALING AND REPLACING ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-31 to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Brooks: The resolution introducing this bill was before the house on March 4. At that time I gave a review of the substance of the bill. It was sent to the committee on veterans affairs where it was given careful study, and it is again before the house at this time.

It is not my intention to make any lengthy remarks on this occasion but I am prepared to answer any questions on individual clauses.

On clause 1—Paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act repealed.

Mr. Herridge: I do wish to say briefly that this bill was of interest to veterans generally and particularly to the representatives of the Canadian Legion who appeared before the committee on veterans affairs. In dealing with this measure, some doubts were expressed and in this connection I wish to quote from page 198 of the minutes of the committee. These were the comments of Mr. Burgess, dominion president of the Canadian Legion:

> Having carefully considered the terms of Bill C-31, we believe that none of the proposals contained therein tend in any way to reduce or abolish any benefits which are now or are likely to become available to veterans. The bill appears only to delete those sections of the veterans rehabilitation act which are either no longer applicable or which are provided for in other legislation or regulations.

The Chairman: Since the messenger from the other place has arrived, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF NEW COMMANDER IN CHIEF

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): With the leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the President of the United States, with the concurrence of the Canadian government, has appointed General Laurence S. Kuter to replace General Earle E. Partridge as commander in chief, North American air defence command, effective upon the retirement of General Partridge on July 31, General Partridge having reached by that date the statutory age limit for his rank. Air Marshal C. R. Slemon, of the Royal Canadian Air Force, will continue in the appointment of deputy commander, North American air defence command. An announcement of this change of command is being made at this time in Washington.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us in this house are sorry to learn of General Partridge's retirement. He has been indeed a very great strength to NORAD. He is an outstanding airman and an outstanding public servant. We all wish him well in his retirement. I think at the same time, Mr. Speaker, we would like to pay tribute to Air Marshal Slemon, the deputy commander, for the long and excellent service he has given to this country and for the continued contribution he is making in this position. He is an airman's airman, and an officer of whom this country can be proud.

The airmen under NORAD are carrying on an important task under very difficult circumstances, and to them we owe our support and our appreciation. We congratulate the new commander upon his appointment. We wish him every success in this new, very difficult and demanding role. We hope the government of Canada will give him every possible support in the carrying out of his responsibilities and we would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that they pay greater attention to his advice than they have paid to that of the retiring chief.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we have all noted with interest the statement by the Minister of National Defence relative to the retirement of the United States commander of NORAD, and the information that a Canadian still holds the position of second in command. We also wish the retiring commander a very long, happy and pleasurable retirement.

In view of the fact that the change in command, as illustrated by the statement of the Minister of National Defence, is strictly because General Partridge has now reached the retirement age in the rank he holds, we certainly hope that a full discussion in this House of Commons will be allowed, perhaps led by the Minister of National Defence, of the entire issue of NORAD because of the fact that both the retiring commander of NORAD and the Canadian who is second in command have both publicly questioned the position or the status, the responsibility and the methods of air defence of North America.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was Air Marshal Slemon considered as a possible appointee to the chief job in NORAD?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: Would it be possible at any time for a Canadian officer to be appointed to that position?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is asking for an interpretation of arrangements which can scarcely be given off the cuff.

Mr. Hellyer: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, with deference I suggest that I am really exploring the arrangements, not the interpretation of the arrangements.

Mr. Pearkes: As I stated the day before yesterday, the appointments of commander and deputy commander of NORAD are by arrangement between the government of the United States and the government of Canada.

STARRED QUESTIONS

TELEVISION NEWS BROADCAST, SPEECH BY PREMIER SMALLWOOD

Question No. 64—Mr. Aiken:

1. Who were the cameraman and the film editor involved in a television news broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation showing the Leader of the Opposition applauding Premier Smallwood at the Canadian club, Ottawa, on April 8, 1959?

Starred Questions

2. On what date was formal complaint concerning this broadcast first made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and by whom?
3. Is the film still available?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to question No. 1 is "C.B.C. employees".

The answer to question No. 2 is "A letter containing the complaint was received on April 15, 1959, from H. E. Kidd, secretary, national Liberal federation of Canada".

The answer to the third question is "yes".

BROADCASTING AND TELECASTING REGULATIONS

Question No. 70—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the board of broadcast governors issued any regulations for broadcasting and telecasting?
2. If so, what changes, if any, were made from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation regulations which these regulations replaced insofar as political broadcasting and telecasting are concerned?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is as follows. The board of broadcast governors has issued regulations for sound radio broadcasting. These are to be the subject of representations at public hearings on May 14, and may be amended by the board following the hearings. In connection with these regulations, the board has indicated that they will apply to telecasting until such time as the board announces regulations specifically for television.

The answer to the second question is as follows. The regulations as announced by the board of broadcast governors make the following changes in the section referring to political broadcasting and telecasting. There follows a page and a half of technical definitions and changes which are of a minor nature. With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, rather than read it here I could give it to the reporter and have him insert it in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to insert at this point the answer which he has indicated?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The portion of the answer referred to above follows.]

6. (1) delete "Each station shall allocate time for political broadcasts as fairly as possible among all parties or candidates desiring to purchase or obtain time for such broadcasts."

replace by

"Each station shall assign time for the broadcasting of programs, advertisements, or announcements of a partisan political character on an equitable basis to all parties and rival candidates."

(2) delete "The identity of the speaker or speakers on any political broadcast and the names of the sponsor or sponsors or the political party, if any, upon whose behalf the broadcast is made shall be anounced at the beginning and end thereof, but such announcement may, with the previous consent of a representative of the corporation, be dispensed with in the case of a political spot or flash announcement."

substitute new subsection (2) by

"For the purposes of this regulation, 'any day that an election is held' shall be deemed to mean an ordinary polling day, not the day or days of an advance poll."

(3) delete "For the purposes of this regulation, a broadcast in respect of any by-law which is the subject of municipal balloting or any plebiscite or referendum which is the subject of national, provincial or municipal balloting is deemed to be a political broadcast."

Note. Substitute the wording of section 17 of The Broadcasting Act, 1958, for the wording of section 21 of The Canadian Broadcasting Act, R.S.C. 1952.

TENDERS FOR MOTEL AND CABINS, FUNDY NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 71—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Were tenders called for a concession to operate a motel and cabins on Hastings hill, Fundy national park?
2. If so, what were the names of the persons or firms submitting tenders and what was the amount of each tender?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. In answer to the second question there is quite a long list of tenders, and information about the tenders, and I would ask permission of the house to have this part of the answer printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have the rest of the answer printed at this point in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The portion of the answer referred to above follows.]

Bungalow cabins concession: G. A. Sommerville, E. A. Ryder, Ghislaine and J. A. Tanguay, W. S. McQuaid, F. W. & E. J. Pettis, R. J. M. Hickey, R. R. Friars, I. D. Smith, H. Stevenson The Riviera Restaurant Ltd., George E. Marks and Evelyn J. Marks, Wm. V. Spencer and Hallie I. Spencer, R. E. Davis, C. H. Snow, R. S. Humphrey and son Manager Green Gables Bungalow Court, P. E. Lister, C. H. Llewellyn, President Wandlyn Motels Limited.

Motel concession: G. A. Somerville, Wm. V. Spencer and Hallie I. Spencer, R. E. Davis, W. S. McQuaid, R. R. Friars, R. J. M. Hickey, W. H. Randall and Mrs. Anne Randall, H. Stevenson The Riviera Restaurant Ltd., George E. Marks and Evelyne J. Marks, E. A. Ryder, C. H. Snow, Ghislaine and J. A. Tanguay, R. S. Humphrey and Son Manager Green Gables Bungalow Court, J. D. Inches, P. E. Lister, C. H. Llewellyn President Wandlyn Motels Ltd.

It would be misleading to quote a simple amount on tenders of this kind without mentioning the other important factors that must be considered in the awarding of a concession. One factor that must be taken into account is the percentage of gross receipts from the rental of accommodation returned to the crown. Equally important is the rates charged to members of the public making use of the accommodation. Other factors that must be taken into account include the previous experience of the tenderer in operating this type of accommodation, his financial capacity and evidence of his ability to operate the concession efficiently and in a manner in which the public will be well served. In addition, due consideration is given to selecting concessionaires whose permanent place of residence is close to the park and who, by reason of close proximity and more immediate interest, could be expected to give greater attention to the entire operation. The decision as to which tender is the most favourable must be taken in the light of these many important factors and not only on the basis of the percentage of gross receipts that will be paid to the department.

SHOPPING CENTRE, SHANNON PARK

Question No. 72—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Has the Department of National Defence approved the sale of land for the construction of a shopping centre at the naval housing project known as Shannon park?
2. If so, were tenders called for the sale of this land?
3. How many acres of land were involved?
4. What was the total price received?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part is yes. The answer to the second part is that in May, 1954 and in February, 1955 business interests in the Halifax-Dartmouth area were invited to bid on a shopping centre scheme whereby this land—that is, the portion of land in Shannon park—would be made available at a small rental and the buildings and operation of the business would be provided and conducted by the successful bidder. No bids were received.

In September 1958 a company came forward with a proposal to erect a shopping centre on this land. After consideration of the merits of leasing as opposed to selling this property, it was decided to recommend the sale of the land on the understanding that it would be used solely for the development of a shopping centre and that construction be commenced within one year. This sale was authorized in December, 1958.

The answer to part 3 is, 4.8 acres.

The answer to part 4 is, $8,500.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence based on his answer to my question No. 72 on today's order paper. I do not think the minister understood the second part of the question as it was intended, so may I put the question again. When the land for the construction of a shopping centre at the naval housing project known as Shannon park was sold, were tenders called for the sale of that land?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

OIL AND MINERAL DEVELOPMENT APPLICATIONS, NORTHERN CANADA

Question No. 73—Mr. Hardie:

1. How many of the applications for oil and mineral development in northern Canada listed on page 3149 of Hansard are from companies or individuals now engaged in the production of oil or minerals?
2. How many of the applicants are actively engaged in exploration for oil and minerals elsewhere?
3. Are any of the applicants not at present engaged in the business of exploration or production? If so, which ones?
4. Are any of the applicants acting as agents for other persons or corporations?
5. If so, who are these applicants and for whom are they acting?
6. How many exploratory licences have actually been issued to date; to whom, on what date and for what acreage in each case?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the first five of these questions deal with applications for oil and mineral development in northern Canada, listed on page 3149 of Hansard, and I intend to answer the first five questions together. The answer to the first five questions is as follows. These companies simply requested priority to obtain oil and gas permits when the revised oil and gas regulations are promulgated. They are not required to provide the information requested in these questions. Therefore the information is not known to us in all cases.

The answer to the sixth question is that oil and gas exploratory licences were issued to:

Dominion Explorers Limited (J. D. Bateman)
Texaco Exploration Company
David Rosen
The California Standard Company.

The licences issued do not cover a specific acreage but are designed for general geological exploration anywhere in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory, including the Arctic islands.

1. Have any postmasters and/or postmistresses, non-civil service, been dismissed from service during the period June 1, 1957, to date?
2. If so, what are the names of those dismissed and what post offices, respectively, were affected?
3. What were the reasons, in each case, for dismissal?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ST. JOHN'S HOUSING AUTHORITY—FEDERAL NOMINEES

Motion No. 100—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of any letter or letters exchanged since January 1, 1958 between the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland and the minister of municipal affairs of Newfoundland, regarding the appointment of federal nominees to the St. John's housing authority.

Mr. Speaker: If the house will permit me, I would like to say something about this notice of motion. In view of the discussion which has taken place earlier about questions to and returns by ministers without portfolio, may I say that normally a motion for production of papers is directed to a minister who has responsibility for a department, and in this case, as the subject matter appears to be a housing authority, I assume it would be the Minister of Public Works. And so I asked myself whether in the circumstances any part of this motion could be within the competence of the house and in accord with the practice in respect to the production of papers.

[Mr. Howard.]

I considered the matter in consultation with the Clerk of the house. I could not say definitely that the notice of motion was necessarily beyond the competence of the house in all respects, and in the circumstances I felt that I should not deprive the house of the opportunity of deciding for itself whether or not it could call for the production of these papers after I had indicated to the house the considerations which had prompted me to raise the question.

Briefly they are as follows. There are two cases where the house calls for the production of documents. One is for public papers from a department of government, and the other is for communications made by the government as a whole. In this particular case the minister named in the motion has no department of government and is therefore excluded from the responsibility of producing documents from a department. On the other hand he is a privy councillor, a minister of the crown and a member of the government, and therefore in respect of acts in his official capacity as a member of the government he is presumably amenable to the jurisdiction of the house with regard to the production of documents, subject to the limitations of public policy and so on, which pass through him in that capacity.

I therefore came to the conclusion that the order, if it were issued, would have to be read as though it limited itself to communications made on behalf of the government. In other words it would have to be considered as reading this way:

—for a copy of any letter or letters exchanged since January 1, 1958, between the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland on behalf of the government and the minister of municipal affairs of Newfoundland regarding the appointment of federal nominees to the St. John's housing authority.

It would be possible to put the question as it stands with that necessary qualification being understood, but I think it would be better if I directed that the motion be amended by inserting those words before it is put to the house, as I have authority to do in accordance with the precedents as cited in Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 199.

Before making any move, however, since this is a matter of some interest, I would be happy to hear, within reason, what any hon. members wish to say. May I first give you the authorities for the views I have expressed. May, in his sixteenth edition, at page 273, indicates:

(a) that returns may be moved relating to any public matter in which the house or the crown has jurisdiction;

(b) that these documents may be obtained from all public offices and from corporations, bodies, or offices constituted for public purposes, by acts of parliament or otherwise; and

(c) that the papers and correspondence sought from government departments should be of a public and official character and not private or confidential.

Campion, to the same effect, in his Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons, third edition, says:

Returns are of two kinds, either to an order of the house, or to an address to the crown. This distinction, which corresponds to the constitutional origin of the departments, is still rigorously observed. It amounts to this—that information which is wanted from a department which originally grew out of the royal prerogative, such as a department of a secretary of state, is prayed for by an humble address to the crown, whereas information required from a financial department or from a department constituted under statute is demanded by an order of the house.

There is one further reference. In his book Parliament, Its History, Constitution and Practice, Sir Courtenay Ilbert, former clerk of the British house of commons, explains at page 114 that the asking of questions is not the only mode by which the house can obtain information from or through the government, and he then adds:

It can, on the motion of any member, obtain returns supplying such information on matters of public importance as is obtainable through departments of the government.

I might also point out that Beauchesne in his fourth edition under citation 209 has something to say on the subject. What I proposed to suggest to the house was to insert those words and allow the house to decide whether these documents should be produced.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as far as the insertion of the words "on behalf of the government" is concerned I would suggest that in essence this really should not restrict the motion, because the letters in question that have been referred to publicly were written to a minister of the crown of the province of Newfoundland. Since they were written by a federal cabinet minister to a provincial cabinet minister about federal appointees to a housing authority, the housing authority itself having been the subject of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland, I would say this is definitely a public matter and this is an official communication and therefore should be produced.

You have said that motions such as this are ordinarily directed to the minister who has authority over the department concerned. I would point out to Your Honour that there have been a number of motions passed in this house on previous occasions when we have had ministers without portfolio. The motions have been passed in general terms and I would suggest in such terms as to make it necessary to divulge the kind of correspondence to which this motion is directed.

I would refer Your Honour to a motion moved on May 11, 1931, when in fact there were ministers without portfolio. It reads:

A copy of all petitions, resolutions, recommendations, letters, telegrams, documents, reports, as well as an epitome of all verbal representations addressed or communicated to the prime minister, the minister of agriculture, or any other minister, recommending the pegging of wheat or grain prices from any farmers' organizations, pool selling agency or unit thereof, municipality, board of trade, service club, community association and individual or collection of individuals, from the North Battleford federal constituency since July 28 last, and the respective replies thereto.

A second motion of a similar character was moved and passed on July 20, 1931, and reads as follows:

A copy of all letters, telegrams and representations made by any person, party or organization in Canada to any minister of the crown in connection with the duty on potatoes coming into Canada and their valuation for duty purposes; also a copy of all orders in council passed in connection with same, since August, 1930.

In the return that was produced each minister, including ministers without portfolio, had been canvassed as to whether or not they had any correspondence in this field.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. member permit a question? Who were the ministers without portfolio?

Mr. Argue: I am sorry, but I do not have that information. However, there were ministers without portfolio at that time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Were there any at that time?

Mr. Argue: Another motion falling in the same category was moved and passed on March 13, 1939. It reads:

A copy of all correspondence, papers, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any member of the government and any member of the Winnipeg grain exchange with respect to the wheat board's operating and selling policy and the distribution of the board's business among members of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

A fourth motion, more up to date, was moved on July 28, 1958. It reads:

A copy of all correspondence exchanged since June 21, 1957, between any member of the provincial governments and any member of the federal government concerning the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements.

I would submit that since these motions have been moved and passed, and since a cabinet minister is a member of the government—I do not think there is any question about that—this motion is proper. Even if the words are added to the motion as suggested, the papers to which this motion refers, if they are in the category outlined in the press report, should be produced.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think it unnecessary to hear two representations from the same group.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there is just one very brief observation I wish to make about the ruling, with which I completely agree, I may say. There are communications which are addressed to ministers from time to time about general matters of public policy and general matters affecting the government as a whole rather than a particular department. It would seem to me that the ruling Your Honour has made would apply equally to such communications if they were asked for, even though the prime responsibility for that particular aspect of policy, on its administrative side, might fall within the purview of a particular minister.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, do I understand that you will not hear two speakers from the same party?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to muzzle anyone, but the leader of the group with which the hon. member is connected has expressed his views and I take it that he does not dissent from what I have said, except possibly that he feels the motion is correct as it stands without inserting the additional words. Does the hon. member have another point of view to express?

Mr. Winch: No, sir.

Mr. Speaker: With respect to what has been said by the hon. member for Assiniboia, my thought is that with these words limiting the order of the house for the production of documents passing through the hands of the Minister without Portfolio to those which passed through his hands on behalf of the government, it is quite clear that private papers should not be called for by the house. The Minister without Portfolio, or any minister for that matter, can and does have private communications which would not fall within the purview of the motion. Perhaps in the past these things have been understood, but in view of the interest that has been taken in this matter in connection with oral questions I thought it should be clear that the house is not asking the minister to produce private papers, and that is the answer to what the hon. member says. Therefore I will put the motion.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the interpretation you place on your own interpretation the motion is accepted.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Herridge, moves:

> That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that he will cause to be laid before the house a copy of any letter or letters exchanged since January 1, 1958 between the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland on behalf of the government and the minister of municipal affairs of Newfoundland, regarding the appointment of federal nominees to the St. John's housing authority.

I do not know whether the leader of the house would like to suggest a limitation.

Mr. Brooks: I should like this motion to stand until the Minister of Public Works is here. He is not directly interested but he is interested indirectly.

Mr. Speaker: Is the mover of the motion prepared to let it stand until the Minister of Public Works is here?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to waiting for the minister to return. I do not see what it has to do with the question, because after some discussion the house is now in agreement, but I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk reminds me that I have put the question with the amendment which I have directed to be made, and it will appear in that form on the order paper when it comes up again.

Motion stands.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. ON PILOTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now able to report to the house on the result of the negotiations which took place between his officers and those of the United States concerning the subject of pilotage on the great lakes?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I cannot give any further report than I did when I returned from Washington. Very satisfactory consultations took place between the officers mentioned, but I have nothing further of a definite nature to report at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that Vice Admiral Richmond, the commandant of the coastguard, stated before the committee on marine and fisheries of the House of Representatives that consultations had taken place on Monday and Tuesday, April 20 and 21 —that is after the minister was there—attended by representatives of the Canadian government, and that the discussions had proved abortive?

Mr. Hees: I am not aware of that statement. I am advised by my officials who were at the meeting that although Vice Admiral Richmond still maintained somewhat the position he had formerly, in our belief satisfactory progress was made.

Mr. Chevrier: The discussion appears in public document K-107 of April 22.

COAL

DOMINION COAL COMPANY—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF LOAN APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of the numerous and recent representations originating from all parts of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia asking the government to revise its unfavourable decision on the Dosco application for a loan for a coal wash plant, can the minister advise the house if this request is at present being reconsidered with a view to giving a more favourable decision in the very near future?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The Dominion Coal Company has not yet presented its revised submission for a coal wash plant that would be of a more realistic size and cost.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SUGAR—PROSECUTION OF B.C. SUGAR REFINING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I regret not having been able to give him notice until a few minutes before the house opened. Is the minister in a position to report to the house on whether he has received an opinion from Mr. F. O. Meighen, Q.C., regarding possible prosecution of the B.C. Sugar Refining Company? If so, what was that opinion and what legal action is contemplated?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I received the hon. gentleman's notice just before coming into the house, and in reply I should like to advise him that, as he is aware, it is not the custom to inform the house in detail of legal opinions received from counsel. In this case, however, I had already informed the house, in answer to earlier questions, that the matter had been referred to counsel with instructions for prosecution, and I think I can go so far as to say that Mr. Meighen is preparing the case accordingly.

FINANCE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR REPORTING BANK LOANS OF OVER $1 MILLION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister table the documents recording the arrangements covering individual loans of over $1 million, as requested by the Leader of the Opposition some time ago?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have no recollection of the particular request to which the hon. gentleman refers. Will he indicate what it is?

Mr. Chevrier: These are loans reported to the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, this goes back some time. This matter has been under consideration. I do not believe the Leader of the Opposition requested a report to the house on the individual loans. He put this question some weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, and asked whether a newspaper report indicating that the inspector general of banks was calling upon the chartered banks for certain returns indicated a departure from past practice in this respect. My answer was that it was not a departure from past practice, and that the matter was under discussion.

The matter has been discussed between the inspector general of banks and some of the banks in the meantime. There was no change made at that time in the existing practice. I pointed out that the newspaper article was erroneous.

Mr. Chevrier: I have not Hansard before me, but was there not some indication by the minister that he would give to the house the arrangement made between the banks and the Bank of Canada covering these loans?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a matter of arrangement between the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada. This matter arose in the course of the discharge of his duties by the inspector general of banks. Under the act he has a right to call upon the chartered banks for certain returns, and the returns that were referred to in this connection were the returns that he was asking the chartered banks to make.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Did the minister not indicate to the Leader of the Opposition—like the hon. member for Laurier I have not looked up Hansard—that he would table the record of the arrangement, perhaps "procedure" would be a better description, that the inspector general of banks has laid down for the banks?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. gentleman refers to some suggestion that was made about a change in the existing arrangement. If there was, I was asked if that would be reported to the house. In this regard the inspector general of banks is simply discharging the duties and exercising the powers conferred upon him by the Bank Act. Returns are made to his office from time to time by the chartered banks. There has been a discussion as to the form of these returns, but there are no new arrangements that could be reported to the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—ALLEGED DIVERSION OF CERTAIN VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which was sent to his office early this morning. Has there been a diversion of Canadian National Railways vessels from the port of North Sydney within the past 10 days? This question concerns vessels which normally carry freight from North Sydney to Newfoundland. If there has been, why?

Has the Canadian National any plans to use any other port in preference to the port of North Sydney, now or at any time in the foreseeable future?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The management of Canadian National Railways advise that throughout the past winter, and also in previous years, due to ice conditions there has been certain use made of the port of Mulgrave. Currently there are two small charter ships operating between this port and Argentia in order to clean up an accumulation of cars which built up during the period when there were ice difficulties. The management states that North Sydney is the regular port of handling for Newfoundland traffic.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of Premier Frost's announcement that within the next two months a dominion-provincial conference will be held to initiate a study of Canada's entire tax structure, can the minister advise the house if a definite date has been set for this conference?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I was not aware that Premier Frost had made any announcement on this subject. The matter of arranging a date for a conference between provincial treasurers and ministers of finance and the federal Minister of Finance has been under discussion for some time. As a matter of fact we have been endeavouring to arrange a date. Now, the date has not been finally arranged, but I wrote a letter yesterday to the provincial treasurers and provincial ministers of finance proposing that the meeting should be held in Ottawa commencing on July 6. I have a copy of the letters here and I could read from one or table them, as the house may wish.

Mr. Winch: Why does the announcement come from Premier Frost instead of from you?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as I am aware there has been no announcement made by anyone, because the date has not been settled yet. I wrote the letters yesterday to propose a date. I presume the letters have arrived in the hands of some if not all of the provincial treasurers by now.

Mr. Speaker: Would it be satisfactory if the minister tabled the letter?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robichaud: Does the Minister of Finance expect to preside at this meeting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the ordinary course, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance of Canada would probably be expected to preside at this meeting of ministers from the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance regarding the federal-provincial conference. Has it been brought to the minister's attention that the announcement of a forthcoming federal-provincial conference was contained in Premier Frost's election manifesto issued yesterday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, whatever statement was issued by Mr. Frost yesterday did not and could not contain any reference to this particular date for the conference. The date has been a matter of discussion. We have been trying to arrange this matter with the provinces in order to find a date that was mutually convenient. It has been known to this house and to every member of this house and known throughout the country for some time that there was to be such a conference.

There is nothing new about the intention to hold a conference. That intention was announced in this house early in the present session. We have been directing our efforts to the arrangement of a suitable date, and such discussions as we have been able to hold have culminated in the letter I wrote yesterday proposing July 6 as the date for the commencement of the conference. It is expected that the ministers will be meeting for probably the first two days of that week and that then the officials, the continuing committee, will meet for the balance of the week. That is the proposal. We are now awaiting the response from the various provincial treasurers and ministers of finance to this proposed date.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED TRAFFIC JAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Knowles (Norfolk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I wonder if his department is considering any changes to the Welland ship canal section of the seaway which, according to today's Globe and Mail, is causing a major traffic jam?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the heavy concentration of upbound shipping off Port Weller, where some 37 vessels are waiting to enter the Welland ship canal, is largely the result of the unusual number of ships on hand for the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway.

There have been a series of unrelated and diverse delays on the Welland canal, involving both inland and ocean shipping, due partly to high winds and partly to the fact that the mariners are beginning a new season and are more prone to accidents. The ocean-going masters particularly are proceeding cautiously through the locks during this initial period. In spite of these delays an average of 32 ships a day, 20 upbound and 12 downbound, have passed during the last week and with normal operating conditions the backlog of shipping at Port Weller should be cleared in a few days.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that the reason for this delay is simply this. We have built a good seaway, we have a fair toll structure and we are attracting a great deal of shipping. We are simply suffering from overpopularity at the moment.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the Minister of Transport say what proportion of these ships going through the St. Lawrence seaway or the Welland canal are foreign ships or other than Canadian and American owned ships?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker; I do not have that information available.

IMMIGRATION

SANDOR SZILAGYI—REQUEST FOR SYMPATHETIC CONSIDERATION BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister received representations on behalf of Sandor Szilagyi?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister give her most sympathetic consideration to the plight of this young refugee, who has suffered so much for so long?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure I do not need to assure the hon. member of that. I always give sympathetic consideration.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to direct a question to the acting minister arising out of reports that the agricultural stabilization board have contacted the Canadian turkey federation suggesting that the present floor price for turkeys of 25 cents per pound be reduced to 20 cents. Can the minister comment on this report and can he assure the house that the government is not considering this further reduction in still another agricultural product?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture so he can deal with it on his return.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST FOR BENCHES ON SUN DECK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Public Works. I should like to know why the sun deck in front of the parliament buildings has not as yet this year been furnished with the usual benches.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since three weeks or a little more have elapsed since he told us we could expect the announcement of the filling of the vacancy in the supreme court of Newfoundland very shortly, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he now hopes it will be made in the next day or two.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I think I said on the last occasion when the question was asked by the hon. gentleman, one of my major regrets was the fact that he was as yet a law student and could not be included among those who might be appointed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister if he is waiting to make this appointment until I become a member of the bar?

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFER OF COLD STORAGE SUBSIDY ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Now that the Minister of Fisheries is also Acting Minister of Agriculture, I wonder whether any consultation has taken place between the two ministers with respect to transferring the cold storage arrangements from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Fisheries?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, some preliminary consideration has been given to this proposal, but no decision has been made.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether, while he is in the enviable position in which he now is, he would make a submission to council transferring this function to himself in his capacity as Minister of Fisheries?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that question requires an answer. In any event, I think any such plan would not materialize because I expect the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) to be back very shortly.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a further supplementary question. Does the Minister of Fisheries expect to be the next secretary of state for external affairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The ministers are not allowed to talk to themselves in this house.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

AMENDMENTS REPEALING AND REPLACING ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-31, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act—Mr. Brooks—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act repealed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, my advance in my discussion of this bill was halted last night by a cross-fire of other events. As I had done so little talking I will start at the parapet again. This bill was not only considered by the house on second reading before being sent to the committee and later sent to the committee, but was well considered by the Canadian Legion, as usual, with other veterans legislation. I should like to quote briefly from the Legion brief in this respect, but apparently I have lost the page.

In any event, some concern was felt by the Legion with respect to the effect of this bill on certain veterans. After Mr. Burgess, the dominion chairman of the Legion, had mentioned this concern in a brief presented to the committee, at page 366 of the minutes of proceedings of the standing committee I find the following:

> Clauses 6 to 10 inclusive agreed to.
> The Chairman: Gentlemen, before we consider the preamble, there was one query from the Legion. It was a recommendation presented more in the form of a query than a recommendation. The Legion is wondering about the position of the veterans who have spent a long period in hospital, and whether they will be covered by the terms of this act upon their discharge from hospital.

To that statement by the chairman Colonel Lalonde, the deputy minister, replied. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the first colonel I ever met tried to put me in the jug. In fairness to the deputy minister, Colonel Lalonde, I must say that ever since I have known him he has tried to bail me out of my problems as presented to me by my constituents. Anyway, Colonel Lalonde stated as follows:

Mr. Lalonde: Under present policy, Mr. Chairman, I can give the Legion the assurance that these cases are covered. I cannot speak for future governments or ministers, but I know that at the moment these cases are all covered.

On account of the assurance from the deputy minister the committee felt satisfied that the concern of the Legion was covered. That is all I have to say on this bill at this time. That was the one point that had concerned the Legion before the committee.

Mr. Brooks: I might explain to the hon. member that he will find in section 4 of Bill C-31, at page 3, that it is covered. When we come to clause 4, perhaps we can go into it a little more thoroughly. That point is covered.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Additional time where veteran receiving treatment.

Mr. Brooks: This is the clause to which I was referring. If the hon. member wants to look into it he can see that the point he raised is covered.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, RE-ESTABLISHMENT CREDITS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-32, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, the resolution introducing this bill and the bill itself were before the house on March 4, when the principle of the bill was quite thoroughly explained. It was also before the committee on veterans affairs and has been given very thorough study by that committee. If there are any questions on the different clauses I shall be happy to answer them.

Clauses 1 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; there is an amendment to this bill. I would move that the house again go into committee on this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Will hon. members give unanimous consent to revert back to committee of the whole to consider this amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 5—Member eligible for re-establishment credit mentally infirm.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I move:

That clause 5 of Bill C-32, an act to amend the War Service Grants Act, be amended by adding thereto, after line 5 on page 3, the following provision:

"9B. Notwithstanding anything in this act, where a member of the forces who is unmarried has, because of a mental infirmity that confined him to hospital, been unable to use all the re-establishment credit for which he is eligible under this act before the expiration of the period within which that credit may be made available to him, the minister may, on application by that member within one year of the date of his discharge from hospital, make available to him any unused portion of his re-establishment credit."

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am very pleased to see this amendment, as I was checking through the bill just prior to the minister making the announcement that he intended to introduce it. This was one question which was pretty thoroughly discussed in the committee, as the result of representations made by Mr. Thompson, in particular, of the Canadian Legion. I judge from reading the amendment now that it does meet the fears expressed by Mr. Thompson on behalf of the Legion and expressed by members of all parties in the committee when they were discussing the representations made by Mr. Thompson. I would like to say we are very happy to support this amendment.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, on this clause may I just make this remark. As the hon. member has just stated, this point was brought up in the committee by a representative of the Legion, and more particularly by some of our own members on the committee especially the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Speakman). It is a point that was very well taken and it shows the great value of having a veterans committee studying veterans legislation. The purpose of the clause as it reads is to extend the availability of re-establishment credit to the dependants of those veterans who are mentally infirm. It enables the credit to be used for the benefit of the veteran's household on application to the minister within one year of the date of his discharge from hospital, and he would be entitled to any unused portion of his credit. The act at present makes no provision for such contingencies.

The recommendation made by the committee was to the effect that a single veteran mentally infirm should not be deprived of his re-establishment credit, and then suggested that when his condition had improved to the extent that he could manage his affairs and such improvement had not taken place until the expiration of the normal time limit during which he was able to use that credit, such veteran should have a period of one year within which to use his credit. There would admittedly not be very many cases to which this clause would apply. I am very pleased indeed to get this recommendation from the committee, and we are very pleased to make this amendment.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, at the meeting of the committee this matter was decided by the committee. As a matter of fact the resolution was drawn up by one of the members, and I think some credit should be given to him. This matter has been reviewed on many occasions and discussed for the last five or six years, and finally we have resolved it into a piece of legislation today which is entirely satisfactory, I would suggest, to every veteran in the country.

Mr. McMillan: I did not see the amendment. Does it refer to a veteran after he is discharged from hospital? A veteran might be mentally deranged and still not be in the hospital. In fact, I know of one such case now, and I do not think he would be capable of applying for it.

Mr. Brooks: There is a cut-off date, 1962. That is the time limit, but if a man is in a mental institution and is discharged from that institution later than that date, this arranges that he may apply for the rehabilitation grant, and he has a year in which to do so after he is discharged.

Mr. McMillan: Does it not state that it is one year after he is in hospital?

Mr. Brooks: It is one year after his discharge.

Mr. Carter: I think the point which the hon. member for Welland was trying to clarify was this: if the man is not in hospital, but is still in such a mental condition that he cannot take advantage of these benefits, is there any provision by means of which he may take advantage of them later when his condition improves?

Mr. Brooks: My understanding is that if a man is not in a mental condition to look after the matter himself he would have a year in which to do after improvement.

Mr. Forgie: If a man is mentally ill, in Ontario at least, a trustee could be provided. This rehabilitation grant could be transferred to the public trustee and held in trust until such time as the man was capable of managing his own affairs. I do not think the point which the hon. member for Welland has raised has yet been brought to the attention of the committee, and I do not think the criticism levelled at the minister has been met by this amendment introduced at the present time.

Mr. Brooks: We have investigated this matter in the department. There would be very few cases at the present time of the kind the hon. member has in mind. We do not know of any. However, I am satisfied, that this amendment, in the light of the attitude the department takes, will prove sufficient.

Mr. Forgie: I quite agree. I think the matter could be held in abeyance until the meetings of the committee on veterans affairs are held next year. But I would point out that the criticism made by the hon. member for Welland has not been met by this amendment.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Brooks moved third reading of the bill.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Before third reading is agreed to, I just want to take one minute to call the minister's attention to the fact that when this bill was before the committee, the committee did receive a delegation on behalf of the Canadian overseas firefighters association which felt that the services of its members had not been sufficiently recognized, and that because of this they had not been able to take advantage of benefits which other veterans have obtained under the act.

Although many of these benefits have now gone out of existence, I think, as a member of the committee, that the firefighters had a fairly good case and that there had been some injustice with respect to their organization. I would therefore ask the minister and his colleagues if he would give some consideration to the appeal made by the delegation from that organization to review their services and see what can be done in the future with respect to what may have been an oversight.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should just like to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. We all know where the minister's heart lies; I think it is largely a matter of persuading his colleagues in some of these matters. I urge that every consideration be given to the representations of this organization. We have felt for many years that these men suffered some injustice. They are few in numbers, and I do not think it would cost this country a great deal to remedy the injustices which affect them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

FURTHER EXTENSION OF INCOME TAX RATE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-41 to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to say anything on second reading?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think anything I might say now would be quite superfluous. This is a very short bill. It contains only one clause, and we had a somewhat extended debate, I may say, on the resolution. The resolution gave full information as to the contents of the bill, and I think, therefore, the discussion on the resolution stage covered all the ground that would be relevant in a debate on the second reading of the bill.

I might just point out to hon. members that until this bill is passed we have no authority to make the payments to the provinces with respect to the additional 3 per cent of the yield from the personal income tax, and that the provinces are waiting for this; some of them have indicated that they are counting on it and hoping to receive it very soon.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the heart-rending appeal which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made in concluding his observations, it seems to me that there is not only a great deal to say but that there is need for much to be said about this bill.

It may be recalled that a bill similar in all respects was introduced into this parliament a year ago, and also into the previous parliament a little more than a year ago. This is the third round of the same old thing. It seems to me that this business of bringing in this measure for one year at a time and holding out a kind of carrot to the provinces indicating that something is going to be done on some future occasion is a most inefficient way of using the time of parliament and of carrying on the affairs of this country.

When my friend, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) spoke during our discussion of this matter on the resolution stage, he described this as the annual reprieve of the government from its pre-election promises, and I suggested, speaking after him, that the government would continue to proceed in this way from year to year until at least 1962 which seems, if I may make a brief allusion to the bill which we were discussing just before this one, to be the final cut-off date favoured by this government.

Now the minister indicates that the government has no authority to pay this money. It seems to me that there is no need whatever for this situation to have arisen. The minister well knew, when he brought a similar bill before the house in the previous session that this government had no intention whatsoever of making any different provision this year, and there is no reason on earth why the bill of last year should not have applied for two years, or three years, or four years.

This government has not the faintest intention of doing anything more for the provinces at all. Hon. members of this government simply are not willing to get up and say so, however. That is what I said last August in the debate on the previous bill. I said that at most the provinces might receive telegrams but probably this year they would not even receive telegrams; the matter would be just presented to this house and that would be all there would be to it. I also said it would be done at the last possible moment in an endeavour to make a squeeze play—I did not use that phrase, but that is what it amounts to—on the House of Commons.

This is no way to treat parliament. This government that was going to be so respectful of parliament is simply using up the time of parliament in making these annual appropriations in exactly the same form when it knows perfectly well it does not intend to do anything different although, as I suggested the other day, there will probably be a deathbed repentance just before the next election which I have no doubt is already being planned. I hope hon. members opposite will mark those words because like previous predictions that have been made in this field, I think my words will be borne out by the facts as they will unfold.

There is another thing that needs to be said about this particular bill. This bill is an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. It is an enactment of a new scheme for federal-provincial tax-sharing that was devised very largely by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, and the former minister of finance, Mr. Harris, with the very competent assistance of the able officers of the Department of Finance and other relevant branches of the public service. It was a vast improvement in two respects on any previous arrangements there had been in this field. It was an improvement financially in that, in the good times which we had three years ago, the federal government of that day showed a disposition to share the tax advantages to a much larger extent with the provinces than the present government has been willing to do.

In the second place, it was a much better arrangement because it did remove the last vestige of anything that could conceivably be described as a disability upon provinces which did not want to impose their taxes in exactly the same way as the federal taxes were imposed. In other words, if there was any suggestion—and I never thought there was much to it—that the old tax rental system in any way limited provincial autonomy, the new tax-sharing arrangement removed that suggestion. That is no doubt the reason why the premier of Quebec is now taking the money, which, of course, he did not do under the old tax rental arrangement. It should not be forgotten that it is a very handsome sum, indeed, that he is taking nor should it be forgotten that the people of Quebec would be very much worse off as far as provincial services are concerned or as far as provincial taxation is concerned, or more likely both, if it had not been for the constructive and statesmanlike efforts of Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris and the present leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —than whom no hon. member of this house understood these problems better, in my experience in these matters, with one possible exception and that one possible exception was Mr. St. Laurent himself.

Mr. Ricard: That is a tough one to swallow.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: It happens to be the truth and I am sure the truth is very unusual in the experience of some hon. gentlemen who have been fed a mixture of myth and camouflage for so long that it has become difficult for them even to recognize the truth when they hear it.

Mr. Cardiff: Why not stick to it?

Mr. Ricard: The people of Quebec do not share your view.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister, of course, is bringing in a bill one year at a time just for the sake of attempting to kid the troops, and I shall not proceed very long in my remarks before I shall be able to show that that is exactly why it is being done. This method is already wearing pretty thin.

Why do we not have a bill that will run for the same period of time as the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, until 1962? I will tell you why, sir, and I will tell the minister too although he knows it perfectly well. The reason we are not doing it is because there are provincial elections this year in Manitoba and Ontario. My hon. friends opposite, ably assisted by the party's chief of staff, are trying to win those elections by, among other things, giving the impression that something is going to be done about this in the very near future. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) attempted to elicit some information from the Minister of Finance on the orders of the day, with the usual success we have in these matters.

I have here a quotation from one of the leading newspapers in this province, a newspaper very dear to the heart of the Minister of Finance. I refer to the Toronto Star of the day before yesterday, May 4. That issue carried an article in which the newspaper quotes the manifesto of the premier of Ontario in these words:

> In the manifesto, Premier Frost disclosed there would be a federal-provincial conference "within the next month or two"—

That was before he got the minister's letter. He was jumping the gun a little, apparently. I continue:

> —to initiate a study of Canada's entire structure of taxation and the expenditure and debt trends of each level of government.

A direct quotation then follows in these words:

> "There is no doubt," he went on, "that this intensive and dispassionate study—

I like that word "dispassionate" study. There was nothing very dispassionate about those tear-jerking speeches the premier of Ontario was making a couple of years ago when he was appearing on the same platform with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and was saying, "That is the man who is going to give us $100 million." There was no dispassionate study at that time and apparently the $100 million is now being devoted to a dispassionate study. Certainly it is not in the provincial treasury.

Returning to the article, the premier then went on to say:

"There is no doubt—that this intensive and dispassionate study will produce far-reaching fiscal reforms best calculated to render effective the great principles of our Canadian constitution."

It is obvious from that kind of language that there is an election impending.

The Minister of Finance and the premier of Ontario are engaged in this joint enterprise of trying to fool the people of Ontario once more into thinking that something is really going to be done about this matter, but we know perfectly well that this study group the minister has organized is little more than a pale reflection of the kind of conferences which were promised before the last federal election. Oh, I know that the minister is going to get up and say that this promise was made in the election campaign prior to the last election campaign, and so it does not count any more. The minister might be interested in knowing, however, that there are many people in this country who take public men—or at least some public men—at their word.

As I am going to be saying a great deal about federal-provincial conferences and as I know how sensitive the Minister of Finance is on this subject, I think I might anticipate the objection I expect he will raise whenever he thinks that anything I am saying is somewhat effective, by recalling to Your Honour's mind the fact that we did have a debate on a very small aspect of this subject which began with a motion moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) on February 9. That motion read:

This house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations.

The words of the motion may be found at page 826 of Hansard of February 9. I can assure Your Honour that I am not going to argue that the federal government should call a federal-provincial conference at once. I understand the rules of the house and I know that the Tory majority in this house decided there should not be a federal-provincial conference at once even if Mr. Frost wants one and in spite of the fact that Mr. Roblin wants one, or pretends he does. The Tory majority in the house put a steam roller over that motion. They would not allow it to pass. Therefore it is a decision of the house and I am not going to transgress the rules of the house.

But I do think that when the minister replies he should tell us when this conference is going to be held, and I do not mean this pale imitation conference of bureaucrats who cannot decide anything and who, of course, should not be allowed to decide anything; but when a real, proper conference of heads of government is going to be held, or whether the government has any kind of intention of holding one at all, which I do not think they have. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I think there has been a complete change in the attitude of the government since they came into office.

In the last parliament we were told very authoritatively by the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) what the situation was. On October 18, 1957 he was asked a question by Mr. Breton, the then very distinguished member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, whom all of us in this house miss, at least all of us in this party, and who, I predict, will be back. I read from the English translation as found on page 129 of Hansard:

Mr. Breton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Solicitor General a question? When sitting in the opposition the hon. Solicitor General has, on various occasions, given expression to the well-known thought that federal subsidies are unconstitutional. The opinion which he voiced then was shared in every way by the government of the province of Quebec. In view of the proposed federal-provincial meeting on fiscal matters—

That was the one in November, the shadow meeting.

—could he tell us now if he would oppose the subsidies which his government seems to be preparing at this time?

Here is the answer by the Solicitor General:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend that I am still opposed to subsidies such as were proposed by the former government.

"I am still opposed." These subsidies so-called are still being paid. A slight increase has been made by the present government, but surely if a thing is wrong, to do a little more of it is even more wrong. Yet the Solicitor General, despite his capacity as a law officer, is now compounding this wrong. At that time, it was suggested by an hon. member that the question was a political one, and the Solicitor General went on:

And a political one, yes.

Since when has it become improper to ask political questions in a political assembly?

I want to tell him that the proposals of the federal government are not yet known—

How right he was! They are not yet known, and heaven knows when they will be known!

—but I am convinced—

Though nobody knew what they were.

—that they will be made on a very different basis from those of the former government.

Then we got, of course, a small instalment precisely on the scheme of the former government. The questioning was pursued but I will not take up the time of the committee to read all that intervened. It is very interesting and can be found on pages 129 and 130 if hon. members want to read it. But I intervened—perhaps it will not surprise some of the newer members to hear this—and addressed a question to the acting prime minister, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). The question I asked him was this:

I ask the leader of the government, is there any intention whatsoever on the part of the federal government to substitute something else for the equalization grants?

This was the reply of the Minister of Public Works:

Well, now, Mr. Speaker—

We all know the way the Minister of Public Works speaks.

—I suggest that the hon. member for Twillingate-Bonavista—

Mr. Pickersgill: Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Green: Oh, Bonavista-Twillingate—he is all twisted up anyway.

That, I thought, was a remarkable contribution to the debate.

I suggest that he has already had his answer from the Solicitor General and he should know better than anybody else in this house that announcements of policy will be made in due course by the government.

We know that all announcements by this government are going to be made in due course, and "in due course" is coming to be more and more and more like eternity. The Solicitor General, having told us that on no account would this government continue payments to the provinces on the same basis as the Liberal government we had, of course, the events we all remember in January of 1958 when the Minister of Finance got his arithmetic all wrong and allowed all of the provinces to expect more than they got and some of them to expect more than, after a bad week end, even the Minister of Finance thought they were likely to get.

From that day until this, we have never had the faintest hint of what was in the mind of the government until the speech made by one hon. member from the province of Quebec who last Thursday was preaching for a call. The hon. gentleman, who made a very bright and intelligent speech, is already rumoured as likely to be, if not the next minister of finance, at least the parliamentary secretary to the next minister of finance. I am sure that considering the limitations on the choice of the government that choice would be welcomed in some quarters at any rate. The hon. gentleman had this to say, as found on page 3197 of Hansard of April 30:

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

(Translation):

When the central government convened the provincial representatives in 1957, it listened to their proposals, but soon realized that there were such differences of opinion between them that it became necessary to go very deeply into that problem.

(Text):

A very profound study would have to be made of this matter, a very profound study going on at least until 1962 and maybe beyond that. That is not what we were told before the election before the last. Before the election before the last, when the hon. gentlemen now occupying the treasury benches were going about the country preaching for a call, they had no doubt that they had the solution right up their sleeves.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: You said that last week.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see that the Tremblay is trembling.

(Text):

They had the solution. The solution was all there. There was no problem at all. There was no profound study needed. All the people needed to do was to elect the Conservative party and this problem would be solved forthwith.

We all remember that touching scene in Toronto on April 25, 1957, when Mr. Frost and the Prime Minister appeared together on the same platform to open the campaign and Mr. Frost appealed to the people and said—it must have been very touching indeed—"Don't let them work you to death, John. We need you." They may have needed him, but they have not got much out of him. I could go on reading this sob story. I do not think the meeting was quite what was expected, because Mr. Frost spoke so long that the Prime Minister, according to the Canadian Press, had to cut three-quarters of his own speech and even then it went on until nearly midnight. But there were some things said on that occasion that I think are perhaps worth recalling today. For example, the Globe and Mail reported as follows:

Mr. Frost, whose appearance on the platform with Mr. Diefenbaker gave the rally a significant air of party solidarity, hit hard at the tax-sharing deal which the Liberal government offered the provinces . . . "I say that the solution lies in a realistic division of tax sources in the direct tax field which belongs equally to the provinces and the federal government. It is not a matter of the federal government giving Ontario or the provinces anything. That is the patronizing attitude of Ottawa.

Now they do not even give!

All we ask is a reasonable part of our own, a part which is commensurate with the size of the job we have to do, and upon the accomplishment of which much of Canada's future depends."

Then, the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, had this to say at that same meeting and I think the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Flynn) should listen to what his leader said on this occasion because it is very different from what has happened.

We believe there can be no national unity in this nation—

Imagine, sir, saying that after Mr. St. Laurent had been prime minister of this country for nine years and when there was a greater degree of unity than there had ever been before or than there has been at any time since.

We believe there can be no national unity in this nation until there is a realization that the federal-provincial matters have handcuffed the provinces of this nation; have denied the municipalities adequate sources of revenue;—

What amount extra have they got since?

—have placed the provinces and the municipalities in a position where they cannot discharge their constitutional responsibilities or permitting the necessary development in their own territorial confines of the natural resources that there are. We believe the provinces and municipalities must have the financial resources to carry out those responsibilities. We believe in the federal system of government.

That, of course, is a remarkable assertion!

We believe in the federal system of government.

These are the people who send telegrams out to tell the provincial governments concerned what they are going to get.

We believe that its preservation is essential to Canadian unity. We believe the federal system is today being challenged by the centralization complex of the St. Laurent government and that a healthy division and balance of revenues as between the federal and provincial governments must be assured.

We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination as displayed by the present government, but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

That was the first speech in Toronto, and there were variations on this theme right across the country. Because there were some variations I intend, in order to be completely fair to hon. gentlemen opposite, which I always try to be, to give some of these variations. For example, I quote from the first television broadcast the Prime Minister delivered on April 30, 1957:

Since they came into power—

That is the Liberals.

—they have more than doubled the percentage of the federal portion of the taxation dollar. They have left the provinces and the municipalities fewer and fewer sources of revenues for their expanding requirements.

Since the minister's latest budget a higher proportion of the taxes of this country is being taken by the federal government than ever before in our history.

Then, at Hull, on May 7, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of May 8, we find the then leader of the opposition saying:

"One of the first steps to be taken by any government which I am called upon to lead", he said, "is to call a dominion-provincial conference to discuss a fair apportionment of sources of revenue as between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities."

Well, the municipalities were forgotten along the way somewhere as we all know. Then, at Guelph, on May 13, as reported in the London Free Press of May 4, we find this:

Mr. Diefenbaker asserted that a Conservative government would convene this autumn a dominion-provincial conference to ensure that the provinces and the municipalities had a reasonable share of the tax dollar.
