Then the present Prime Minister went into a province where there is, if I may say so without offence to the people of any other province, a more acute understanding of federal-provincial tax problems. This matter has been discussed for longer in that province than any other province. I refer to the province in which I spent 30 years of my life, Manitoba, because it was in that province under Mr. Bracken, Mr. Garson and latterly Mr. Campbell, that this problem of tax-sharing was preached to the people. When the Prime Minister went to Winnipeg, therefore, there were some doubts in a good many people's minds, including apparently the Prime Minister's, about how some of this doctrine he was preaching was being received. There were some questions in many people's minds about whether the equalization system was going to be continued. The Prime Minister gave a press conference in Winnipeg which was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press. This is on May 14, 1957, and it reads:

Conservative Leader John Diefenbaker in Winnipeg today denied any claim that he was "buying" the support of Ontario Premier Leslie Frost with promises of a better federal-provincial tax agreement deal for Ontario which could work against the prairie provinces.

Such a suggestion, said Mr. Diefenbaker in an interview here, had "absolutely no foundation". There never had been any "direct or indirect suggestion" by Premier Frost that he would expect better tax terms from a Conservative government.

And he added that any person saying otherwise was talking "from fear and not reason".

I do not think I should trespass upon the time of the committee to read the whole of it. However, there are one or two other points.

He charged that continued centralization of taxation by the federal government was leaving the municipalities as "the forgotten people".

Dominion-Provincial Relations

Present tax relations, Mr. Diefenbaker maintained, are a "haphazard outgrowth" of wartime agreements which don't meet the problems of Canada today. The federal government offered "cut and dried" plans—

The difference there is that in the case of this government they were cut and not even dried before the provinces were forced to take them. They were "all wet", and they were "all wet" in more senses than one.

Under a Conservative government, he said, the provinces would have a voice in deciding fiscal terms—

Listen to this!

—the provinces would have a voice in deciding fiscal terms and the tax agreements would contribute to national unity.

Then, at Carman, Manitoba, on May 15, 1957, as reported in the Toronto Star of May 16, we find something very important, Mr. Speaker, and I am going to say something about this one.

No province in Canada will get less tax money from Ottawa if a Conservative government is elected June 10, John Diefenbaker pledged here last night.

The national Conservative leader promised a fair share of tax revenues for all provinces, with more for the poorer provinces but not at the expense of the richer provinces.

This is more of that mirage about which we used to hear, that you could give more services, have lower taxes and still balance the budget. This is one of those myths of the balmy days of 1957 that have gone with the wind.

The larger provincial shares, he indicated, would come from tax money now retained in the federal treasury.

At that time, of course, the Tories were going around saying that Mr. Harris had left the treasury bulging with money. I believe the Minister of Finance has a different line now.

Mr. Diefenbaker made this pledge to almost 700 persons who overflowed—

And so on. Then, at Victoria, on May 21 —I think this, sir, is really a honey, and I hope the Minister of Finance is listening— this statement was made:

"The plight of the municipalities is becoming tragic because there is a constant increase in federal taxes. Now the federal government takes the attitude that there is no responsibility on them to assure that the municipalities shall have the right to discharge their responsibilities—

"The municipalities find themselves unable to carry on because they are being restricted of the sources of revenue."

The premiers of many provinces, he said, had complained there was no recognition of their fiscal needs.

"Even the city of Victoria has to pay outrageous rates of interest today."

This is in 1957, and I should like to know what they pay in 1959.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

The time has come for a meeting of the provinces and the federal government, with the municipalities present, to discuss these problems.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I wonder what the idea of the hon. member who has the floor is as to the scope of this debate? He seems to cover the whole realm of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I am not sure if he is right in doing that. It seems to me that the section continues for one year an increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent of one particular arrangement—that is the allowance, I think it is—with respect to personal income tax as a factor in calculating the tax equalization payments. Is that not it?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: What the bill does in itself is a relatively limited thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite so.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether it is necessary or appropriate to debate the whole concept of the division of revenues between the federal government and the provinces and the municipalities on a bill that is as narrow as that. I should like to have a little bit of guidance on that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might say to Your Honour that I completely agree with you. We are told that this bill is a temporary measure for one year only pending the permanent measure which the present government promised before it was in office, and which it has continued to hold out some hope of extending to the people since. I am seeking to argue that instead of bringing this temporary measure before us for a period of one year only—and the duration of one year is extremely important to my argument—the government and the minister should explain to us why the government did not do what it undertook to do when it obtained a mandate from the people. I suggest that this measure which is brought before us is an entirely different one from the measure for which the government obtained a mandate. In order to make that argument it seems to me I must show what the nature of the mandate was. I have been trying to confine myself strictly within those limits, with this one exception that in making that argument—

Mr. Speaker: Even following the hon. member's argument in that respect, may I ask whether he should not relate his proposition that the government is not doing something that it promised to do to this narrow field rather than to the broader field. In this bill the government is not saying that this is the only provision with respect to federal-provincial arrangements that it is putting forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am seeking to show that that is precisely what it is and indeed that the government has forgotten these other things which it promised to do. It seems to me that it is the proper scope of debate. When the government seeks, as we as an opposition think it does, to mislead the people and to fool the people, it seems to me that it is the proper function of an opposition to bring to light the facts relevant to this measure. The excuse that the minister gave—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that the hon. member is leaving the point of order that was raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; I am not leaving the point of order. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could possess his soul in patience until I am finished. When the minister introduced the first bill in 1958 he indicated to us that this was an interim measure pending the resumption of the conference which had been promised and that, in succession to that bill early in 1958 in the previous parliament, something else would come. He told us the same thing with less conviction last year. He told us that with still less conviction this year. In other words, what we are being asked to do is to accept this bill.

What seems to me to be the governing point is that this is a one-year measure. I am suggesting that the principle of the bill, in its being a one-year measure, is entirely unacceptable. So that Your Honour may perhaps more readily see what is the trend of my argument, may I say that I intend to show that either the government should come clean and admit it has nothing else to offer and then propose a bill that would extend this until 1962 when the parent act also expires, or, alternatively, they should tell us now what it really has in mind as the successor of this legislation. It seems to me that matter is entirely relevant to the principle of the bill, and I have no intention of departing at all from that line of argument. If the Minister of Finance wishes to say something, he now has the opportunity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should say thank you to the hon. member who permits me now to have a word on the point of order. Apart from other considerations, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that this has now become the third debate in this session on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. It has become that because hon. members in the opposition will not recognize the rules of the house. The first debate on dominion-provincial relations in the present session was held on February 9 and 10 on an amendment introduced by the hon. member for Essex East. It is to be found at page 826 of Hansard and is as follows:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations."

That amendment, Mr. Speaker, was negatived by the house by a vote on February 10 as recorded at page 885 of Hansard. In that debate we heard the same speech that we are hearing today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not speak in that debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not the same speaker. We were denied the inexpressible privilege of listening to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in that debate. But his near neighbour the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) then made the same speech that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is making now. Then we have had speeches on the same subject smuggled at every opportunity into other debates during the session by hon. members opposite. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate smuggled one in within recent days—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —on a matter that was not related to the matter in issue. But there was indulgence shown to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who is always ready to test, try and take advantage of any indulgences. We had this same ground covered again at the resolution stage. Members were not restricted as I urged them that they should be in the light of the fact that the debate had been held on this wide-ranging subject on February 9 and 10. They covered the whole area again. Now the hon. member is back trying to repeat the same thing again.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, that I chided the Leader of the Opposition about introducing that amendment on this subject on a supply motion back on February 9, when he knew very well that we would be bringing in this resolution and bill not long after that and that there would be full opportunity to talk about the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, his answer then was, "This will shorten up the debate when we come to that bill". It has not shortened the debate, Mr. Speaker, because hon. members opposite have blithely disregarded the fact that there was discussion on this matter and they have gone over the whole area again.

With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this bill is confined to one thing and one thing only. It proposes to amend one section of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act and to do so for one purpose and one purpose only, namely to raise from 10 per cent to 13 per cent the provincial share of the yield from personal income tax in this present fiscal year. That is what it does and it does no more than that. In my respectful submission this wide-ranging debate, this odyssey into the realm of federal-provincial fiscal relations is quite out of order.

Mr. Speaker: If this bill is not passed, the effect would be to leave the exemption at 10 per cent, would it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not the exemption, Mr. Speaker. The provincial share would then remain at 10 per cent. The one thing the bill does is to raise to 13 per cent for this present fiscal year the provincial share of the yield from personal income tax.

Mr. Speaker: The point on which I wanted assistance was what the minister and the hon. gentleman who had the floor felt was the proper scope of debate. I take it that the minister feels that the debate should be limited to a discussion of the desirability of increasing from 10 per cent to 13 per cent for another year the exemption of tax. Can he say whether that necessarily involves other aspects of the agreement and arrangement between the provinces and the federal government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all. The other provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act continue without change. There is no change made in the agreements which have been entered into between the federal government and the provincial governments in pursuance of the act. All this does is to enable the federal government to pay to the provinces this additional 3 per cent yield from the personal income taxes for the present fiscal year. That is its complete effect, no more, no less.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I have a word on this very point of order. I noticed with great interest the point you raised with reference to what had been said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), and I had decided to let well enough alone and that nothing needed to be said. However, the minister, who is considered an authority in this house by a goodly number of people, has raised the point which I noted very carefully you had not raised, which was that when the house has made a decision in the same session, the minister's contention seems to be, that subject matter may not again be debated within the same session regardless of the legislation which may be introduced after the decision has been made in the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, that is a position which I would maintain would be completely unacceptable. If we accepted that proposition, all the government would have to do in order to prevent any debate on any of its contentious legislation would be to sit and wait until the opposition had obtained a verdict on an issue and then bring in some very controversial legislation on that very subject. Then the house would, according to the minister's interpretation, be blocked from having a proper debate on the bill in question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's apprehension on that score is not warranted, because the debate on this general field was a debate on the holding of a conference, and that has been disposed of. I would think it quite improper to reopen or redebate that decision today. The debate, of course, on the resolution stage is an inevitable duplication in our system of debating a bill three times, or four times if you count the committee stage, if the house wished to do so. I suppose that is just a precaution against inadvertent or ill-considered legislation. But I think it has been well established that where a section of an act is amended it does not open up the discussion of the whole act. That has been well established and well laid down. The trouble with this subject is that it is so intangible. At least, it has so many ramifications that it is hard to draw the line, but I think the debate ought to be restricted to the proposition which is before the house and criticism of the government for having taken that particular stand.

I admit that that necessarily opens the door to a reference to what else might have been done and what else the government promised, but I think that discussion too ought to be with relation to this particular amendment, which is an allowance of the equivalent of a percentage of income tax. It will take a little time, but this might be a long debate if it were not clear what we were trying to do. I would therefore ask the house to keep as closely to this specific item as it can, because the rules are clear that that is what we are supposed to do when debating an amendment to a specific section.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping to avoid this by pointing out at the outset that I was not going to open up the debate of February 9, and I have not, at any stage, urged or said that I thought there ought to be a federal-provincial conference now or at any other time. I have been keeping completely off that subject. It may prolong my argument a little to have to point out at each stage that increasing Mr. Harris' 10 per cent to the present minister's 13 per cent is not carrying out what the people of this country were led to believe would be done in this field, and in this specific field, when they elected this present government. It does seem to me that perhaps the Minister of Finance, having used this rubber stamp method of dealing with the provinces, now thinks that this house should also be treated as a rubber stamp, and that all we can debate is whether it should be 14 per cent or 11 per cent, or else we must keep quiet.

What I am saying is that this bill is not what the people were led to expect. In the first place, they were led to expect that this problem was going to be solved, and not that the government were going to be given an annual reprieve, as my hon. friend from Humber-St. George's described it. It seems to me that, we should consider what the Prime Minister said at Victoria on May 21 as to what he intended to do about this problem of federal-provincial fiscal relations. What he said was that the government intended to convene such a meeting in the spirit of confederation. He said that if action was not taken we would find ourselves in a position in five years where the municipalities would be bankrupt or unable to carry out their responsibilities.

I say that this is a very poor substitute for that promise. That was apparently something which was to be done urgently. Two years have already passed almost to the day since the Prime Minister made that statement in Victoria, and we are ask to approve another interim arrangement for another year. It is obvious that nothing more will be done about this urgent problem for one more year, although the Prime Minister had said that in five the direst things would happen, and we have already disposed of three of those five years.

Then the Prime Minister said at Saskatoon on May 27—and I will make these remarks as brief and direct as possible—that no province would receive less than it is receiving under existing fiscal relations. Well, that is true. Then the Prime Minister added that no new fiscal agreement would be made "except by agreement of all". This bill is introduced by agreement with no one except with the majority of this house. It is an enactment of this house and the provinces can take it or leave it. No province agreed to it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But they all take the money.

Mr. Pickersgill: They take the money, just as they took the money which Mr. Harris' bill provided in exactly the same way. That was the "take it or leave it" which the minister used to complain about, but all he is doing today is exactly the same thing except that Mr. Harris discussed the question with the provinces, and Mr. St. Laurent discussed it at five different meetings with the provinces over a long period, and had a great deal of correspondence, before reaching a decision. Mr. Harris did not send a telegram on Saturday saying, "We will be doing this on Monday, and if you do not like it, it's too bad, but that promise made last November to have a conference is no good any longer." That is the difference between what we are asked to do here and what the people were led to believe would be done.

Then at Prince Albert—and this is surely very different from what the minister is doing in his bill—the Prime Minister told his audience that if elected the Conservatives would call a federal-provincial conference at once, with the municipalities invited to sit in, to "distribute the Canadian tax dollar to suit all provinces". This certainly is not doing that. This bill is certainly not doing what we were told would be done right after the election. Another thing which was said at Prince Albert was that one result of the conference would be to ease present tax burdens on Canadian municipalities. I do not think the minister would contend for a minute that he has done that by this bill. At least, if he did, he certainly would not find his friend Mr. Gardiner, the super-mayor of Toronto, agreeing with him, because we know his views. He would not find the premier of Ontario agreeing with him either, and he certainly would not find the premier of Manitoba agreeing with him.

There is other evidence of the same kind, but I do not intend to be repetitive, sir. This is what we were told would be done as compared with what is now being done. The Prime Minister said at Three Rivers on June 4, 1957, according to the Montreal Gazette:

> The Conservative party will restore the true meaning of the British North America Act which guarantees the provinces freedom to carry out various spheres of activity allotted them under the constitution.
> We will not only make sure that the constitution is respected—we will make sure that the provinces and municipalities have sufficient money to do the job they are supposed to do.

And this is how this is being done!

> Having the power to do a certain job does not mean very much if you have not the financial means to implement these powers.

I believe, Mr. Frost is still saying that. So, I believe, is Mr. Duplessis and so, certainly is Mr. Roblin, the premier of Manitoba. And here is the last of these quotations. At Woodstock on June 6, the leader of the Conservative party said:

> A Conservative administration would summon a dominion-provincial fiscal conference in the fall to revise the tax structure—

And this is the revision. It was not done at the conference; it was just brought in unilaterally and the provinces could take it or leave it.

That is the record. There were no doubts, no problems, before June 21, 1957. You just called a conference; you all loved one another and the problem was quite easy—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are talking about a conference again, and that is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not talking about any conference that is going to be held. I am talking about the conference that was held here in Ottawa, the conference out of which the minister claims this bill came. I am talking about the very origin of this bill, and surely not even the minister will claim that that is out of order. He surely will not contend that it is not competent in a debate on the second reading of a bill, to discuss the origin of that bill. The minister told us in January 1958, when he introduced a bill which was exactly the same as the present bill except for the dates, that it was in substitution for the resumption of the conference, which held a two-day meeting in November, 1957. It was to tide them over the period when parliament was meeting. He did not say "until the election was over", because that was a dark secret then. He said "while the session was on", and explained that there was not enough room in this building to accommodate the conference while parliament was sitting, though Mr. St. Laurent did not find any difficulty on that account. When there was a will, there was a way, but when there is no will, no way can be found. The reason we have this bill before us, for a third time, is precisely because of what happened at that conference, precisely because it was the most disillusioning experience that this new government has had, among the many disillusioning experiences it has suffered. Let us see what this conference was supposed to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is just doing the very thing which, if I correctly understood the view which you expressed earlier, Mr. Speaker, is quite out of order. He is going back now and advancing the most spurious connection between the argument with which he wants to delay the house and the bill itself. There is no such connection as he is trying to maintain, and all these arguments with which he is now seeking to delay the house and the payments to the provinces, are entirely without relevance to the matter before us as I understand it.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Our purpose at this stage, as I conceive it, is to debate the principle of this bill, and the principle of this bill is concerned with raising the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax under this statute. The statute is not opened up to discuss other matter. This bill proposes to amend one single provision of that act. It is quite obvious that the hon. member is just going ahead to make these endless, repetitious remarks in an effort to cover matters which are not relevant to the bill within the rules of this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may say a word on the point raised by the minister. I think it comes with singularly ill grace from a minister who read endless documents for three hours in a very recent debate—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All relevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and who also took part in a very celebrated debate in 1956 when he refused to accept the ruling of the Chair and had to leave the chamber—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is this relevant?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am discussing whether this is relevant.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This demonstrates the irrelevancy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened to the minister patiently and without interruption. Perhaps he could reciprocate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. gentleman could stick to the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will have an opportunity to speak later, and if he should stray from the point I will not raise points of order.

The principle of this bill, says the minister, is to raise the provinces' share of the personal income tax from 10 per cent to 13 per cent under the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreement. Mr. Speaker, the principle of the bill is surely nothing of the kind. That is the modus operandi of the bill. Surely, the principle of the bill is to provide the provinces with a share of the direct taxes. That is the principle of the bill. It is the principle as enunciated by Mr. Walter Harris when the statute which we are now asked to amend was introduced, and it was the principle to which the minister pointed with great satisfaction when he claimed that he was following it in a more generous way only a little over a year ago. The principle of the bill is not merely the arithmetic of the bill but the purpose of the bill, its object, why we are doing it at all. Why do we have this federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangement at all? We have it for many reasons and I am not going to enter into a discussion of these reasons now, because that would be debating the main measure. We have it primarily in order to divide as equitably as possible the direct taxes in which the federal government and the provinces are entitled to share under the constitution. And I am maintaining that this bill does not do what the government said it was going to do before the Minister of Finance introduced the original bill of which this present measure is the successor.

The minister now says that this measure did not arise out of the conference. If I had Hansard here for January 25, 1958, I think it was—that Saturday morning when the minister said the conference could not be resumed for certain reasons and that, in substitution, he was taking this course—I could prove otherwise. Now he says there is no connection between the two. It seems to me that the minister has answered himself.

Mr. Speaker: I have the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act of 1956 here. It contains a great many sections and it deals with a great many different things. I would think that while this bill does, in effect, change the amount of the payment which will be made—the amount of the share which will accrue to the provinces—it does not change any of the principles which were settled by this act passed in 1956. The house then took its decision on the general scheme for a division of revenues between federal and provincial authorities.

All this bill seeks to do is to alter one of the component parts. That does not open the door to debating the question of how corporation taxes or estates taxes are dealt with, or anything of that kind, nor does it open the door to the debating of the negotiation of agreements which have been concluded, except in so far as this legislation may change those agreements. I admit it is not easy to define a narrow pathway, and I certainly do not wish to restrict debate, but I feel that if the whole subject is discussed we would not be following the course that this house should follow.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was about to read from the opening speech made by the Prime Minister at the conference. I should like to read a sentence or two, and I think Your Honour will see how directly it is related to this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to indicate in what way it is related he should do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is related because it states what the government intends to do in this precise field. I wish to refer to what the Prime Minister said at page 8 and I shall try to leave out every irrelevant sentence. I hope the minister, in consequence will not accuse me of taking statements out of context. Here are the Prime Minister's words:

> We have given our undertaking that when new fiscal arrangements are determined on—

That is to say, new fiscal arrangements with the provinces. I continue:

> —no province will receive less than it is now entitled to. But I want to make this clear at the beginning. We are not placing before you any "take it or leave it" attitudes;—

Those words were spoken on November 25, 1957, two months precisely to the day before the take it or leave it attitude was placed before the provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue.

> —we are not taking any hard or fast positions. We are not placing before you any rigid formulae. This conference was convened to seek your ideas and your proposals.

In other words when this conference was held the Prime Minister said that the course this government would follow in federal-provincial fiscal relations was to seek the ideas of the provinces and to get their agreement. But instead of doing that, the government has used its overwhelming majority to impose a particular piece of legislation upon the provinces. That was the point I was seeking to read from this part of the proceedings.

I am sure the Minister of Finance will be able to contain himself while I read something that he himself said on one of the Press Conference programs on which the minister always distinguishes himself to such a marked degree. This conference was held on November 26, 1957. The minister was asked the following question by Mr. Blakely, an old friend of his:

> We have just had a new federal-provincial conference, and yet the only one thing which did not emerge from that was a new tax arrangement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about conferences again he is just going back over the same ground and in effect defying the view you have expressed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not understand that Your Honour's ruling precluded me from referring to conferences.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member in referring to a conference is coming to the matter of this bill, well and good; but if he is only referring to a conference it seems to me it would be out of order to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: This refers to the subject matter out of which this bill emerged. The minister two months before—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it is not sufficient to make it in order to have it referable to something in the history of dominion-provincial relations over the past several years. Surely to be relevant and to be in order in this debate it must have relevance to the principle of this bill and the principle is a very narrow issue, whether the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax should be increased from 10 to 13 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to agree that this is the limit of the reference the hon. member should make to speeches and conferences. Such references should relate to this method of determining a part of the remuneration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well, Your Honour, I shall confine myself to the last sentence of the minister's reply to Mr. Blakely at this press conference, because, in his words, the minister told the public of Canada on November 26, 1957 what the government was going to do about this matter. That is what the minister was purporting to tell the people what the government was going to do about the matter. This is what he said then:

> But we are going to continue meeting. There will be a meeting, as you are aware, early in the new year, after these extensive proposals that the provinces have submitted have been reviewed by the federal government. We have promised to give them very serious consideration.

That is what he said, but what did he do? The minister sent those telegrams that resulted in this temporary-permanent arrangement. I now ask myself why it is that we are being presented year after year with a bill of this kind and I shall seek to give my interpretation of why that is.

If it is beyond the rules of debate to argue about why this course is being followed instead of another course it seems to me that debate is virtually impossible. As I apprehended what happened at the conference which made the minister take this new course which Your Honour so aptly described as nothing more or less than carrying on the old course of the previous Liberal government with a slight change in the rates it was that the minister was unable to devise anything better. I must say I am flattered by that suggestion. I am flattered that Your Honour recognizes that this is all the bill amounts to, and, as I said the other day, we in this party are flattered that, after two years, this superman working 18 hours a day has not been able to think of anything better than Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris were able to devise. This is very flattering to us.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stinson: Be careful of that kind of language.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman wants to get up and say that all these promises in 1957 and all this past record should be forgotten by everybody, that hon. gentlemen opposite have now seen the light and know that Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris were right, that this is the best thing that any government could do and that is all they could do, and that that is all parliament is being asked to do, and we therefore, must not debate anything else, all well and good. If that is the attitude of the government and if the minister wishes to get up and say that is his position, and that all those things he and his leader and other hon. gentlemen opposite said about those matters when they were on this side of the house, including some of the things which the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) put on the record the other day, perhaps there is nothing more to debate. But we were told, over and over again, that this scheme of things for which Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Harris and the Liberal government were responsible was inadequate.

We were told by the Solicitor General that the government would change this basis, that it was going to bring in something new and different. The Solicitor General, standing in his place in the house as a member of the government, made that statement. Of course, he spoke for only a little while. I think the Minister of Finance now feels that nobody should be allowed to say a word about finance in this house, except himself, and that if anyone initiates the debate the minister should take three hours or more in order to prevent other people from talking.

This measure is not what was promised. It is not what the people were led to expect they were going to get from this government. It was not done in the way they were led to expect this government would behave even as late as November 26, 1957, as I have said, after that ill-fated conference was over.

I wonder what it is that made the government see the light. I suggest there were two things. I suggest the first was that hon. gentlemen opposite found, perhaps to their surprise—though this is rather a confession of ignorance on their part, if that is the case—that this subject is a very complicated one and that it is not very simple or easy to find a solution. The hon. member for Quebec South very wisely said that the other day. I agreed with him when he said that this is a very complex matter and perhaps, if the hon. member for Quebec South would apply his obvious talents to this problem he might come up with the solution which the Minister of Finance is sorely in need of, because, after telling us what a terrible mess the Liberals made of it, he continues the Liberal system unchanged except for three percentage points. It may be that the distaste for a conference itself—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance seems to think that the word "conference" is now unparliamentary.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister appears to labour under the delusion that if there is one debate on the subject of a conference in the course of a year the word cannot be mentioned again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest that the hon. member not debate points of order unless they are raised by the minister when on his feet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member in talking about conferences that he suggests should be held is completely out of order in the light of the decision made by the house on February 10.

Mr. Hellyer: Are you asking a question or trying to direct the Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand the hon. member to say that he is calling for a conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not at all.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member understands that it is not within the scope of the debate to talk about the need for a conference or the desirability of holding one.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. As a matter of fact, what I was going to suggest was that I thought that the Minister of Finance had perhaps accepted the view of his colleague and next door neighbour, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), who on May 10, 1955 made this remarkable statement in the house as found at pages 3647 and 3648 of Hansard. This is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, then the private member for Winnipeg South Centre, speaking about his conception of having federal-provincial conferences, and I am not asking that one be called or anything of that kind. I am suggesting one reason why this bill, this arbitrary method, this take it or leave it method is being substituted for what was promised as late as November 26, 1957. I suggest that we may have the explanation here in this statement made by the self-confessed architect of victory, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who, at least, has the name of an architect of victory, if none of the other attributes. The hon. gentleman said:

> If you carry this idea of dominion-provincial conferences to a logical conclusion what happens? You have a government set up over and above the ones we now have, and the result would be a sort of small united nations assembly of Canada. What disturbs me is the effect of all this on the House of Commons.
> I will conclude with this statement. Dominion-provincial conferences may continue to be a necessity for Canada. If so, they should be restricted to the core of the problem, the division of administrative responsibility between the dominion and the provinces, and the division of fields of taxation.

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt, I do think that the hon. member is going beyond the scope of the debate in arguing the pros and cons of conferences and the usefulness of conferences.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me, sir, that this particular argument was used in a precisely similar debate on a precisely similar motion in another parliament, but I think that hon. members will have seen the trend of the views of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and they may throw some light on the attitude of the government. In the past it was from Manitoba that most of the light on this federal-provincial problem came and perhaps a new light has come from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Perhaps the Prime Minister, having had that new light recalled to his mind may see in the Minister of Trade and Commerce a fitting successor to the Minister of Finance when he is transferred to another sphere where his human qualities will perhaps be even more appreciated. I want now to say a word about—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Say a word about the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will say a word or two about the bill. The hon. gentleman does not need to worry about that. I want to say a word or two about the way in which this legislation has been received in one or two of the provinces. You will recall that earlier I indicated very clearly that the government had promised before the election that they were going to solve this problem in a spirit of amity and agreement with all the provinces. Let us see what kind of spirit of amity they have in one or two of our provinces, because I think it might be very helpful. I am going to speak first about a province in which I have lived for a good deal of my life and which I know something about. It perhaps will not surprise the house if I refer to the province of Manitoba where I went to school and lived a good part of my life. A year ago the present premier of Manitoba, then not premier, had nothing but admiration for this government in every respect.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): And still has.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is very well illustrated by this clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of May 31, 1958, headed, "You Followed John, Now Follow Me." One sentence of the article reads:

> —Mr. Roblin pledged his party would keep its promises provincially just as John Diefenbaker did federally.

I hope that Mr. Roblin is still saying that but in fact he is not. Why is he not? Precisely because of this bill. I refer now to the Winnipeg Tribune of March 3, 1959, a paper that is not unfriendly to hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in Manitoba. I have here an article headed, "Duff Says Policy Not Always Dief's." The headline is the Tribune's, not mine. Apparently in the campaign another slogan was, "What Dief Did, Duff Will Do Better."

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have finished that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —on a point of order, do we have to listen to this running debate on a provincial election? Can we come back some time to the provisions of the bill?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is being very repetitive in his argument that the government has not kept its promise. After all, he has advanced it in five or six different ways and I thought he was turning now to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just laying the foundation for what I am now going to read. Perhaps what I am now going to read would not be as well appreciated by hon. gentlemen opposite without the foundation because it is really necessary to see how great these illusions were before you see how great the disillusionment is. This is the Winnipeg Free Press of March 17, 1959.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: This has nothing to do with the election. It is before the election was called. As Your Honour will see, it has to do with the bill before the house now. The article reads in part as follows:

> Conservative Premier Duff Roblin told the provincial legislature Monday night that the Conservative government at Ottawa is not giving the provinces a fair share of federal funds.

If anything can be more directly related to the bill I do not know what it is. That statement was made in the legislature on that date, so far as I can judge, or on the previous day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the date?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 17. The Free Press commented editorially but I will not attempt to read their editorial. It was headed: "Mr. Roblin Says Boo." Then I wish to indicate that nearer home—

Some hon. Members: Boo.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I mean the minister's home, not mine, in Ontario there is not 100 per cent satisfaction with this bill that the minister offers, what the minister would have described when he was over here as "these crumbs". They are not crumbs. This is a substantial sum of money and I am one of those who believes that any million dollars or any half million dollars or any quarter million dollars is a substantial sum of money. A substantial sum of money is involved here but it is very much less substantial than the people of the province of Ontario were led to expect they would get from this government. I have here an article in the Windsor Star of March 12, 1959, headed, "Better Tax Deal Still Frost's Aim." This was after the bill had been announced, and the opening sentence reads:

> Premier Leslie M. Frost has no intention of dropping his campaign against Ottawa for a better tax deal for Ontario.

Then, of course, in the Globe and Mail of yesterday morning we have Mr. Frost's manifesto in which he said, indicating once more that he was not satisfied with this bill which is all he is being offered:

> His government would continue to strive for the 15-15-50 formula of tax sharing with the federal government and would press for a rational and equitable tax structure in Canada at all future fiscal discussions.

In other words, the provinces were promised something that they would all find satisfactory. In so far as this legislation is concerned, it is found completely unsatisfactory by the two Tory premiers who are now seeking suffrages of the people of their provinces.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is not going to interrupt too frequently on points of order, I can assure him I will not be saying again what I have said in the house on other occasions on the matter now before us. I will not be as long as other speakers have been. I have not any doubt in the world but that all hon. members in the house are going to support the amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act as it is offered by the government. However, that is not going to prevent us from underlining, with as heavy a marking pencil as we can, our contention as to the inadequacies of the amendment that is offered at this time.

The present Minister of Finance has by way of the budget seen fit to impose additional tax burdens on the people of Canada to the extent of $352 million for the period of a full calendar year, and yet in the amendment he is offering he is making it very plain that he is not pretending to let the other levels of government receive any of the increased taxes that he is hoping to garner for the federal treasury. We deplore especially the arrangement whereby once again we are being asked to accede to the ten provincial ministers of finance having an assurance as to what their receipts from the federal government may be for only a 12-month period.

We have long contended that the original approach taken on federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements ought to prevail, that is that the minimum time for which an arrangement should be made should be at least five years. As conditions have now existed over a number of years, all we are doing is to assure the provinces of their receipts from Ottawa for the ensuing 12 months. This is hardly good enough in that it completely handicaps the provinces in so far as any long term planning is concerned. We feel that this house has had enough of these annual amendments such as the one now being discussed.

We feel also that the government is certainly less than honest when it presents an amendment of this nature to our Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, while at the same time carrying on negotiations for financial arrangements with certain of the provinces that are not being revealed to the House of Commons. I have particular reference to the announcement of the premier of Ontario indicating very clearly that, in his opinion at least, negotiations are under way for another kind of financial arrangement not yet disclosed to the house. I should like to refer also to the indication on orders of the day yesterday that negotiations are taking place with the province of Manitoba. These negotiations, too, are not covered by the proposed amendment or by any explanation of the need for the proposed amendment. I have reference in particular to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) as recorded at page 3327 of Hansard for May 5, 1959, when he said, referring to Manitoba:

—I may say that no decision has yet been reached.

I feel that if the minister wants to be honest with this house in offering an amendment of this nature he ought, in all fairness, to reveal to this house at this time, and to the people of Ontario and Manitoba, whether or not there are some arrangements being made in the back rooms of the Conservative party about which this house should know. We feel it is an insult to the integrity of parliament to be asking parliament to approve this measure, inadequate as it is, when there may well be other measures of even greater significance in the offing. We feel that if there are other measures in the offing the time to reveal them to the House of Commons is now when we are asked to renew this amendment to the act. I realize very well that Premier Roblin and his supporters are running around the province apologizing for the actions of the Diefenbaker government. I feel that now, not next Wednesday, is the time to reveal the intention of this government.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): As I rise to discuss the principle underlying the bill before us, Bill No. C-41, I feel that possibly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) might not have the same patience with me as we have had with him on certain occasions when he was endeavouring to explain his problems to us. I feel that if he has such problems, and possibly duties to perform, he will be more patient in listening to me present the problems which I feel I must present on behalf of my constituents in the riding of Nickel Belt.

The principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is one which is most important in Canada because it represents an effort to solve a problem which has grown greatly and which represents a burden to every citizen. I refer to the problem of how they can manage the high rate of expansion brought about by our way of life, in addition to the burdens imposed by having three forms of government, federal, provincial and municipal. The workers in my area do not have three salaries, one to assign to the expenses created by the federal government and the other two to provide for the necessary expenditures of the provincial and municipal governments. It is, therefore, in an attempt to solve this problem that the government has introduced the amendment to augment by 3 per cent the provincial share of the revenue for a period of one year.

Apparently this government is interested in this problem only by way of anniversaries. Last year we had this extremely short amendment which we were told was to be for one year. Definitely the people of Canada, if they have followed the discussions in the house, expected that this government was studying the solution which they had promised of this problem of sharing taxation which necessarily would alleviate the burden caused by the works which are undertaken by our municipalities and works and services undertaken by the provinces. I say that the bill before us today in no way solves this problem.

Moreover, this bill which is before us today indicates that this government has absolutely defaulted in connection with the study which was required of the problem, something which, of course, we all know was discussed at great length by the members of the government prior to the last election and the one preceding it.

In connection with the principle and problem involved in this 3 per cent increase, I should like to quote some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) prior to the last election concerning the solution of this problem of tax sharing with the three levels of government. I have a quotation dated June 3, 1957, from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. Here are the remarks attributed to the Prime Minister on that occasion. It states:

A Conservative government will call a federal-provincial fiscal conference at which there "must be municipal representation"—

We see by this bill—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Surely we have had your views clearly made known to the house by this time this afternoon with regard to proposals for calling a conference. The hon. member is now reading what purports to be statements made advocating the calling of a dominion-provincial conference. Surely that matter was decided on February 10.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see how the hon. member who has the floor can justify the line he is following. I base that statement on two grounds. The first is that it is irrelevant; and in the second place, as to the argument that the government has not carried out its promises in this bill, that point has been amply made already. The hon. member is being repetitive.

Mr. Godin: With all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker, and with much respect, may I say this. I realize, as do you, that the shortness of this bill and the grave problem which it is endeavouring to solve, cannot be discussed simply in a discussion of the 13 per cent or 10 per cent. In discussing this bill—and I think this is the best opportunity—I think I should be entitled to express the opinion that the solution for the Canadian problem has not been found. We have no other legislation. It has not been suggested since the discussion has been opened on this bill that a solution has been found for the Canadian problem faced by the three forms of government under our constitution. Where the provinces and the federal government are entitled to share, they must come to some agreement which will solve the problem of the burden which is obvious in Canada, especially in my province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot agree with the hon. member. This bill does not open up the whole question of federal-provincial fiscal relations or federal-provincial-municipal fiscal relations. This is a bill to amend one section of an act which dealt with that problem some years ago. That was the time when it would have been relevant to follow the line of argument which the hon. member is now attempting to follow. However, he cannot do it on this narrow, limited bill which amends one section of the act. I refer him to the ruling made by the Speaker of the house on November 14, 1949, and which appears in the Journals for 1949 at page 237. It reads in part as follows:

On the second reading of an amending bill—

And that is what this is.

—(honourable members will notice that this is an amending bill)—it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration". The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill. If, for example, a bill were introduced to amend a certain section of the Criminal Code of Canada, the discussion would have to relate to the principle of the particular amendment. It would be irregular to enter upon a general discussion of the Criminal Code as a whole.

Then he goes on to deal with the principle of the bill which was before the house at that time. There is no doubt about it that what is relevant relates to this particular provision with respect to income tax, and that exclusively.

Mr. Godin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realize that there should be some limitation and I will try to govern myself accordingly. But what I should like to suggest at this moment is this. My intention is to discuss what this government has offered to the provinces under this bill, which is the only piece of legislation before the house, in order to solve the Canadian problem of tax sharing. In order to do that I should like to indicate that because of the knowledge which we have outside the house and the knowledge which we have inside it, this government has not performed those things which should have been performed in order to obtain a better arrangement than the increase to 13 per cent.

With all due respect, may I say this. If we were now discussing an amendment of the Criminal Code, as was mentioned in the reference made by you, Mr. Speaker, concerning for instance abolition of the death penalty, I feel that the members of this house representing the Canadian people should be able to make reference to a conference which was held or not yet held concerning the study of the problem of the abolition of capital punishment. I realize that you could not go into the Criminal Code and discuss any other conference or any other meeting which had nothing to do with the particular amendment but that, as the quotation indicated, you should be limited to discussing those problems pertaining to the section of the code in question, just as in this case we are limited to the particular amendment we are now discussing. But I think it would be outside of the meaning of the reference—and I say this with all due respect—to state that if we were discussing an amendment of one section of the code we could not discuss meetings or conventions concerning studies of that amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. member to proceed with his remarks. If he errs, I shall try to keep him in line.

Mr. Godin: I am stating now that this amendment concerning the 3 per cent increase for one year only, as I stated before, does not give the provinces the tax sharing possibilities which they were led to believe would be made available. My people in northern Ontario today are more burdened than ever. The costs of services of local governments and provincial governments have risen greatly. My people feel that they have been unjustly treated by this minimal increase which is, after all, a repetition of last year. I am of that opinion, and my people hold it much more strongly. I am sure the Minister of Finance will not disagree with me, having regard to the indication made by him along with his leader that they had absolute solutions to this problem which would bring about the desired result. This government has stated that with respect to this tax sharing problem they would do things which are not even included in this bill. I should like to see them included. I think I am entitled to mention that matter. We have spoken of fiscal relations with the provinces—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has indicated that he is going into a discourse which I think is not in order. I think it is quite proper to indicate in general terms that the bill does not go far enough, as the hon. member has already done, or that something else should be done. I have no objection to his doing that, but I would not permit a debate on all the other things that should be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: But surely, Mr. Speaker, no hon. member should be restricted or prevented from saying that he thinks a bill is totally inadequate having regard to the purposes it is supposed to have or was proclaimed to have. As I apprehended what the hon. gentleman was proposing to do, that was all he had in mind, namely to indicate that these crumbs from the rich man's table—that is what the minister would call it; I will not call it that; I think that was one of the phrases he used when he was over here on this side of the house—would not be adequate.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, it seems obvious that when this government discussed before the Canadian people the solutions which they had, they led them to believe, as far as my province is concerned, that it would receive in the neighbourhood of $100 million last year, and that was stated by the premier of the province from which I come, and stated on many occasions. Undoubtedly this bill does no such thing. That is what I am trying to place before the Minister of Finance and this government the manner in which they led the people to believe they would find a solution to their great problem. I certainly cannot see it in this 3 per cent increase. For instance, it was stated that the municipalities should have some benefit from new fields which would be opened to them, but we did not receive them.

The Prime Minister has stated that Canadian unity would be solved. He stated that a concerted "study"—if you do not wish me to use the word "conference"—of this problem would bring about a complete redress of injustices which they thought existed. This bill will make the people realize that they will only get this very small gift—and I use that word—for another period of one year. They will only get this small increase.

Possibly the Minister of Finance will permit me to indicate to him how different this amendment is compared with a similar amendment which was brought before this house under the previous administration, the Liberal administration under Mr. Harris as minister of finance. We heard a lot last year about the amendment which we are now renewing by way of changing the date of its expiration. We are renewing the same amendment which was before us last year, and it was said then that the province of Ontario would receive by this amendment $22 million. Well, we knew within a year after that that there was no such thing. This government had failed to realize that this percentage increase of income tax was certainly dependent on the prosperity of this country, and therefore because we suffered under this regime a recession last year in the incomes of our Canadian people, the $22 million which was thought of in the first place turned out to be a mere $18.9 million.

Now what was the increase granted under the Liberal party in 1956? I would like to refer the house to some figures. We have the figures under the previous arrangement before this act which we are now amending came into effect. If we look at the figures under the previous arrangement, the provinces, including Ontario, in all received $156.8 million. That reference will be found by the minister at page 114 of the 1957-58 budget. If you care to find the figure for the first year under which the Liberal amendment was made, Mr. Speaker, you will find on the estimates that the figure is $196.8 million, which gave a total increase for the province of Ontario of $40 million. This government contends that because the province received less than the $19 million increase by this amendment it has found a complete solution to the problem in which my province, as well as all the other provinces in Canada, found themselves.

We have ways and means of making promises about this bill which we are now studying. We have the outside promises, which I am not going to quote. I would like to, because it would be very good for the memory of the Minister of Finance and members on the government side, when they were about the country electioneering before the last election. But the people in Ontario construed the promises which were made to mean an increase of $100 million to the province of Ontario. Of course, I must realize that we have now classified these promises, and that was one made outside of the house. Then we have the one which I have just discussed a moment ago, as did the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), the one made by way of telegram. Of course, I was not a member of the house at the time, but I understand that there was a slight mistake in the telegram and finally it turned out to be $22 million. But that was a promise which was made in the house, and even that promise made last year on the passing of the bill was found to mean only $18.9 million. That is the type of attitude this government has taken toward its promises, the ones made outside the house as well as the one made inside.

We have been told, Mr. Speaker, that in wanting to solve this great problem of the provinces and our municipalities we would try to satisfy them better by opening the field of possible taxation for them. I realize that this bill does no such thing, but what the government has done is this. While it has promised new possibilities of money for the provinces and municipalities, instead of giving them more occasions on which to levy possibly their taxation, the government has now raised the personal income tax 3 per cent and the corporation tax three points. In other words, this government is acting in this piece of legislation in the very opposite manner to that promised. It would seem to me that someone should find a way to invent power steering for those people in public office on occasions, because this government is showing by its conduct, and the Minister of Finance who is proposing this bill has shown in his budget speech, that he was prepared to increase taxation and told the provinces and the municipalities—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely it is not proper for the hon. gentleman to refer to the budget debate during the course of a debate on the present bill. It is perfectly obvious that hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to talk this bill out today. I think that has been evident all afternoon. They are trying to keep the debate going until their leader is able to return to the house to take part in it some other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to remind Your Honour that the other day, when we were debating a supply motion immediately after the budget, the Minister of Finance made allusions to his budget speech. He did not quote from it, but he did make allusions to it. It would seem to me that surely a backbencher would have the same right as the minister.

Mr. Speaker: It is undoubtedly improper to quote from the budget debate because it is obviously just repetition. I did not understand the hon. member to be actually quoting. I think he made a passing reference to something, but he must not quote from the budget debate.

Mr. Godin: I was making a reference, Mr. Speaker, and I also realize that on one occasion I have had reason to believe that the Minister of Finance was reading at great length from what he called his notes or his files. I have a few important notes which I would like to refer to as well. I would like to indicate that this government has acted in an opposite direction absolutely from that promised in that it has increased its taxes and has sent the provinces and municipalities out to borrow. I notice that the Minister of Finance more or less indicated that that was not the case, and I have here a very good phrase of his in his own speech to which I would like to draw his attention. However, if it is against the rules to quote from his speech, I would simply refer him to page 2415 of Hansard, where he may find reference to remarks of his where he was begging the municipalities to try to borrow to solve their problems. Borrowing has today become very difficult for the provinces—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, surely we are not to have another debate now on interest rates? That subject was fully debated some days ago. The hon. member is just killing time in order to talk this measure out until six o'clock for the purpose which I mentioned earlier and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, with great respect to ask the hon. member to conform with the rules of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the Minister of Finance has made an uncalled for and totally improper reflection on the motives of another hon. member. I did not say that the three-hour marathon of the minister the other day was a means of killing time, and the hon. gentleman has no right to say that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) is doing so.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the hon. member's view that it is not proper to accuse members of ulterior and improper motives. Members are supposed to keep within the rules, and they are entitled to speak as much as they like within that limit.

I must say that this debate has been a hard one to limit because the subject matter is not a definite one and because members have not, I think, been too co-operative in keeping within the narrow limits of this measure. Certainly it is not in order to enter upon a discussion of matters such as interest rates with which we have dealt on a previous occasion.

Mr. Godin: It seems that the minister and the government do not appreciate at all times that when members of the opposition have occasion to rise—

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member proceed with the debate on the bill. It seems there is too much lecturing back and forth across the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Godin: What I was trying to indicate is that this bill, since it provides the provinces with so little, obliges them, as was suggested by the minister himself, to go out and borrow money, because there is no other way by which they can obtain the extra money which they require. My province is one of those which feel that this 13 per cent is not sufficient, and it will be required to borrow in order to continue the expansion which is necessary. I feel that this government has defaulted greatly in the light of its promises.

I trust that even now the administration may find the solution which all Canadians have been led to hope would be brought about, and that before too long, as a result of a proper study, our provinces may obtain the money which is definitely needed. It is clear from the complaints which were voiced in this chamber at the time this agreement was announced and on subsequent occasions that it has failed to satisfy the provinces of Canada.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): When I spoke on the resolution stage of this bill I was prevented by the rules from presenting the plea of the municipalities and, particularly, of my own municipality of Gloucester, where education costs have increased 800 per cent in the last 12 years.

This debate has to do with an amendment to the tax-sharing agreement or rather an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. It deals with one point of the formula, and this point was amended in a mild respect last year following a shadow meeting or a cover-up meeting which was held with the provinces. I am trying not to mention the word "conference" because I am sure the Minister of Finance will rise and try to have me ruled out of order.

Today we are again asked to approve an amendment to an interim measure. In other words, this is an amendment to an interim measure pending the convening of a meeting at which special studies may be made of this particular point.

I shall try to show where this amendment does not meet the needs of the provinces and of the municipalities. The 3 per cent increase which was agreed to last year is not sufficient, and it is far from being in accordance with the promises which were made prior to this government taking office. After all, Mr. Speaker, how can principles which were wrong before 1957 be right today just because a different government administers the affairs of the country? When the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act was introduced in this house in July, 1956 here is what the present Minister of Finance had to say as reported at page 6287 of Hansard for July 23:

> I point out at the outset, sir, that this is enabling legislation. If it is adopted, it will vest very wide powers in the Minister of Finance, and the power vested in him includes the power to legislate in the form of regulations.

And then, this has to do with the formula which we are asked to adopt today:

> As to the details of the formula, suffice it to say at this point that it is an actuarial maze to most people. The formula itself would undoubtedly confuse most citizens.

And yet today, the Minister of Finance, the same hon. member who was sitting in this house on July 23, 1956 is asking us to approve this same formula with minor amendments. And then the minister continued:

> Talk of tax equalization payments, provincial revenue stabilization payments, tax rental agreements, gross national product, average personal income, and other expressions in which this formula bounds make it very difficult for the average citizen to appreciate the niceties of the formula. Indeed, it would be interesting, particularly in the light of the fact that no Liberal member spoke on the resolution—

In this he was wrong, because a few days before two Liberal members had spoken on the very same resolution.

How could the minister blame the government of the day for introducing a formula which he is asking this house to support today? Later on in the course of his speech the minister referred to the municipalities. It has been said in this house time after time that part of this grant to the provinces is intended to relieve the municipalities of the heavy responsibilities, the heavy tax burdens, which they are called upon to bear. Here is what the Minister of Finance had to say about the position of the municipalities as reported at page 6294 of Hansard of April 23, 1956:

> The Minister of Finance and the government have been often urged in this house to recognize the fact that the sources of revenue open to the municipalities and to the provinces are inadequate to provide for the expanding cost of education as things stand today. In approaching this present renewal of fiscal arrangements between the dominion and the provinces, the Minister of Finance has a golden opportunity to recognize that inescapable fact and to do something to meet it.

Well, what is he doing today to meet this need of municipalities? He is asking this house to approve a minor amendment to the same act about which he was speaking on July 23, 1956. The explanatory notes of the bill to which we are asked to give second reading today states:

> The effect of the proposed amendment will be to extend for a further year the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

The explanation does not refer to one part of the formula but mentions the tax rentals agreements. I feel that the adjustment we are being asked to approve for a period of another year pending the holding of a few provincial elections throughout the country is a far cry from the promises made to the electors of Canada during the last federal election campaign. I have in my hand a press clipping dated March 19, 1958, in which the premier of Ontario is reported as having said:

> —the $22 million additional tax revenue Ontario has received from the Diefenbaker government, must be regarded as a down payment. Ontario had found it much easier to work with the federal Conservatives than with their predecessors, the Liberals.

The Ottawa Citizen of March 20, 1958, also contains an interesting statement attributed to Mr. Frost:

> The premier said the Diefenbaker government was producing "a new deal for the people of Canada" and referred to the October provincial-federal tax meeting as proof.
> "After years of getting nothing from Ottawa we came back from that conference with a down payment of $22 million in federal money, which we returned to the municipal taxpayers of this province."

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, down $3 million.

Mr. Robichaud: It is obvious that the premier of Ontario is much easier on the present government and especially on the eve of a provincial election than he was on the former government. Let me quote a statement made by the Prime Minister in Moncton on March 25, 1958, as reported in the Toronto Star on March 26:

> The Prime Minister pointed out New Brunswick was getting an extra $2,236,000 annually for the next four years in federal tax-rental grants.

The Minister of Finance introduced early in this session his estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, which contain a section entitled, "Special payments to provinces" under which we find:

> Payments to provinces as provided under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act (Chap. 29, Statutes of 1956, as amended).

This may be found at page 23 of the blue book. The people of certain maritime provinces were disappointed to learn that the amounts they will receive for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960 will be much lower than the amounts they received in the previous year. The province of Newfoundland will receive $24,893,000 which is $321,000 less than what was received in the previous fiscal year. The province of Nova Scotia will receive $35,250,000 which is $1,441,000 less than it received in the previous year. The province of New Brunswick will receive $30,266,000 which is $724,000 less than it received in the previous year.

The Atlantic provinces have no guarantee whatever that the amounts they were receiving under federal-provincial grants will be maintained at least at the level they were last year. People in the maritime provinces who are interested in the affairs of the provinces are today expressing the fear that the special Atlantic grants which are supposed to terminate in 1962 may under this government be terminated simply by an announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) similar to the announcement he made in respect of Newfoundland.

The bill before us today does not meet the requirements of the different provinces and municipalities across Canada. It is no wonder that the Fredericton Gleaner, a newspaper which we know is rather friendly to the present government, in an editorial under date of May 4, 1959 stated:

> We have made no secret of our disappointment and regret that the federal government is not giving evidence of its avowed intention of remedying the conditions which plague us in this area of Canada and make us worse off by far than other Canadians.
> Pledges were given and the people of the maritimes intend to see that they are carried out. We mean to keep this issue clearly before us.

This is an expression of the popular opinion that exists in the maritime and Atlantic provinces today. It is not surprising that the people of New Brunswick and other maritime provinces are disillusioned by the actions and attitude of the present government after only two years in office.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock and move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Robichaud the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the acting house leader what the business is for tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, as stated last night we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Labour tomorrow and if we finish them we will proceed with the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Chevrier: So we will have estimates both on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. Brooks: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL MUSEUM—REPAIR STAFF

Question No. 202—Mr. Argue:

1. How many people have been employed on the staff of each branch of the national museum of Canada for each year since 1956, to look after the repair, condition and maintenance of the collections of each branch?

2. How many people were so employed by the national museum of Canada for each year from 1950 to 1955?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

As the number of people employed in the national museum over the periods in question does not accurately reflect the volume of work actually carried out, the answers to the questions are given in man-year equivalents.

1. Year	Natural history branch (Man-years)	Human history branch (Man-years)	Services common to both branches (Man-years)
1957	2.6	1.6	1.4
1958	3.3	1.6	1.4

2.	(Man-years)

NATIONAL MUSEUM—PLANNING OF EXHIBITS

Question No. 205—Mr. Argue:

1. How many people have been employed by each branch of the national museum of Canada for each year since 1956 whose primary duties involved the planning and placing of exhibits, and the care and maintenance of specimens?

2. How many people were so employed by the national museum of Canada for each year from 1950 to 1955?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

As the number of people employed in the national museum over the periods in question does not accurately reflect the volume of work actually carried out, the answers to the questions are given in man-year equivalents.

	Planning and placing (Man-years)			Care and maintenance (Man-years)

EGGS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR COMING YEAR

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural Stabilization Act provides for the announcement of support prices on an annual basis, and I am now announcing that the existing price basis of 44 cents a dozen for grade A large eggs delivered to Montreal will continue in effect for another 12-month period ending May 5, 1960.

The volume of eggs marketed through registered grading stations to date this year is 7 per cent more than for the same period last year. However, this does not correctly represent the actual increase because of the steadily growing movement of eggs from large-scale producers direct to retail outlets. Because of this, a greater percentage of the eggs marketed through registered grading stations is offered to the agricultural stabilization board.

From January to June, 1958 the board purchased 354,412 cases. Up to April 27 of 1959 the board had purchased 503,073 cases, and shell eggs are still being offered in unprecedented volume. With many countries of the world developing larger surpluses of shell eggs, the disposal of the surplus accumulated by the stabilization board is creating an extremely serious problem.

The continued expansion in egg production can be largely attributed to the growth in numbers and size of large commercial producers. Because of integration in this industry and technological developments, the present support program is providing an incentive to commercial operators to increase production. I have therefore directed the stabilization board to develop as soon as possible a method of providing price support for shell eggs by means of a payment to producers—commonly described as a deficiency payment—rather than to continue the present method of offer to purchase.

The payment to producers would be calculated on the difference between the actual market price for shell eggs for the period concerned and the prescribed support price. This method, as in the case of the arrangement proposed with respect to hogs, would make it possible to withhold payments from commercial organizations operating under the so-called vertical integration plan, or to restrict payments to a specific volume of eggs delivered by any one producer in a given period.

I wish to assure the house that every effort will be made to have an alternative plan ready to put into operation at the earliest possible date.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I have very little to say at the moment about this announcement of the minister, except to suggest that it indicates that the government is now adopting the principle of deficiency payments in respect of one agricultural commodity, yet refuses even to consider it in respect of wheat and other grains.

Mr. Harkness: You do not understand what deficiency payments are.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the success of the policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture today can only be gauged when the government brings forward a specific program, as referred to in the last couple of sentences of the announcement. The main point of the announcement is first of all, that the basic price will not be changed but that under a deficiency payment plan certain producers or commercial organizations may be barred entirely from receiving the floor price by way of a deficiency payment.

We in the C.C.F. are not opposed to this being done. In fact we are very much in favour of large commercial organizations being barred from getting their hands into the public till. But we would like to warn the minister that in deciding the specific volume of eggs which may be delivered by any one person, we suggest it should not be so low as to prevent a producer from making his living by way of egg production. The pattern of the government's announcements as far as agricultural floor prices are concerned has always been either to hold the line or drop the price. In this instance, with the modifications as outlined in the latter part of the minister's announcement, we are glad there has been no price reduction.

Food for Peace Conference

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOOD FOR PEACE CONFERENCE—REPORT ON MEETING

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give to the house a brief report on the outcome of the food for peace conference held in Washington on May 5 and 6.

The conference was convened by the United States secretary of agriculture, Mr. Benson, and the representatives were from the five major wheat exporting countries, namely Argentina, Australia, Canada, France and the United States. The director general of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, Dr. B. R. Sen, was also present as a delegate.

On April 15 in the House of Commons the Prime Minister announced the calling of this conference and indicated its objectives. On several occasions in the past the Prime Minister had made suggestions for the establishment of a food bank for the assistance of countries whose populations are short of necessary food, and for long term reasons, such as the need for economic development.

The President of the United States, in his farm message to congress on January 29 of this year, made similar suggestions and subsequently instructed Mr. Benson to take the necessary steps to summon a conference to deal with the utilization of surplus food products.

The conference in the course of its two day meetings, which had been preceded by excellent preparatory work by officials of all the participating countries, suggested that the objectives in mind could best be achieved by considering projects to raise consumption of food among especially deficient groups in the population of the recipient countries; by projects to aid economic development, and by projects to establish national food reserves. There was general agreement that effective consultation was necessary for the success of any program for the utilization of surplus food products. In this way misunderstandings could be lessened and interference with commercial markets could be avoided.

Accordingly the conference agreed that a consultative committee should be set up to be composed of senior officials of the governments there represented. It was further agreed that Mr. Benson should be asked to convene the first meeting of the committee at an early date. It is expected that the meeting will be called in June.

The conference decided that the committee should, among other things, give consideration to the following:

[Mr. Argue.]

1. Possibilities of expanding the world's commercial trade in wheat, including the development of new markets.

2. Ways of increasing and making more effective the utilization of wheat surpluses for the promotion of economic development and the improvement of nutritional standards.

3. Co-ordination of disposal programs for economic development with other development activities in the recipient countries so as to ensure that such programs will contribute fully toward increasing consumption and commercial markets, and

4. The establishment of guide lines for providing wheat to individual countries on concessional terms and the safeguarding of commercial marketings.

The conference invited Secretary Benson to convene the first meeting of the committee at an early date.

The conference resulted in a better mutual understanding among the participants of their countries' policies, problems, and proposed actions. There was discussion of the advantages of holding similar consultations on other food commodities and with other nations.

With the approval of the house I should like the communique issued in Washington yesterday to be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have the communique referred to printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): This five nation food conference dealing with the utilization of surplus food products was called some weeks ago, and the matter with which it dealt has been under consideration by the governments concerned for a good many months. Indeed, the President of the United States made his proposal for using food for peace some months ago. Presumably, therefore, a good deal of preparation had already been made with regard to the subject before the conference held in the United States last week.

The results of the conference seem to be very inadequate, though if they do lead to any progress in dealing with this problem that progress would, of course, be welcomed. From the minister's statement it appears that the main result has been the setting up of a committee—a committee, I take it, not of ministers of the governments concerned but of officials—to keep this question under review and to exchange information with regard to it. But this subject has been kept under review by officials of the United States and Canada for a good many years. There have also been committees set up under the auspices of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, and these committees have already reviewed the problems which were dealt with at this conference. If a new committee can be of any assistance it will, of course, be welcome; but this, I repeat, does not seem to be a notable result from a conference dealing with such a very important matter.

I remember the Prime Minister putting forward about a year and a half ago—and this has been echoed by other ministers—his proposal for a food bank. There is no indication from the statement the minister has just made, or from his comments, that any progress has been achieved toward the realization of that idea in practice.

The minister mentioned that Canada's position had been protected at this conference. I have in my hand a report of the conference which appeared in the New York Times of today's date by its Washington correspondent, and this correspondent points out that at the same time that the report of the conference was being issued, the United States government disclosed that it would soon expand donations and sales of wheat abroad for foreign currency in a wider effort to provide economic assistance through surplus farm products and, indeed, in a wider effort to get rid of its own surpluses. That report goes on to say—and this raises an uneasiness in our minds which is not completely dispelled by the statement of the minister—

> —there was confusion about the agreement reached by the conferees. On the major point of concessional, or bargain-rate sales of wheat for foreign currencies, Mr. Benson said the other countries had "expressed willingness to make" sales. However, members of the Canadian and other delegations foresaw little possibility of such a move.

If there is that difference of interpretation and opinion already in regard to the results of this conference, I suggest to the minister it is very important to get this difference of interpretation resolved now so that this conference, inadequate though its results may have been, will at least make some progress in regard to this important matter.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, anything that would provide food for peace is deserving of support. There is no argument about the fact that tremendous surpluses of food are building up on the North American continent, nor is there any argument about the fact that many people in the world are hungry, but there seems to be little of a concrete nature that has come out of this conference. There has been more consultation and discussion but little action and little by way of firm agreement.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that Canada's position is protected, and he spoke about our position with regard to wheat. Wheat is not the only commodity that is causing some difficulty now. As a matter of fact we are probably in a better position with regard to the disposal of wheat than we are with regard to many commodities. The Minister of Agriculture could have added other commodities including pork, eggs—after today's announcement—dairy products, large inventories of butter, large quantities of poultry meat and a possible impending surplus of turkeys. This points up the great seriousness to our economy of this ever-growing inventory in the production of agricultural commodities.

I believe in co-operation with the United States in disposing of these surpluses. I can remember when the Prime Minister was castigating the former government for undertaking special programs to dispose of their commodities. I said that a better alternative would be co-operation in the disposal of these commodities on an agreed basis.

There has been discussion but little by way of action. We suggest that there are many possibilities that should be explored and acted upon, including the acceptance of currency of other countries, the making of barter agreements, the selling of surpluses on the basis of long term contracts and the buying of goods from countries that wish to purchase our surplus produce. There are countries—Russia and Poland, to mention but two—that are anxious to buy our surpluses but because of lack of action and the inadequacy of government policy this is not being accomplished at the present time. We hope the consultations the minister has talked about will lead to action.

APPROVAL OF STATE TREATY FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT AUSTRIA

On the order: Government notices of motion:

> May 5—The Prime Minister—The following proposed Resolution:—
> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the state treaty for the re-establishment of an independent and democratic Austria signed at Vienna May 15, 1955, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO U.S. ASSISTANCE RESPECTING NUCLEAR-POWERED VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there appears in today's press the news of an agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom under which, according to the report, the United States has agreed to furnish information to the United Kingdom regarding the design and construction of a nuclear-powered submarine. The United States has already agreed to provide a reactor for a British nuclear-powered submarine. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there is any arrangement for that kind of co-operation and assistance if required between the United States and Canada in connection with not only a nuclear-powered submarine but a nuclear-powered icebreaker if one were required?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman very well knows questions such as this cannot be answered without some notice. I shall simply accept his question as notice and answer in due course.

Mr. Pearson: The reason I was not able to give the Prime Minister notice—I agree it is a very important subject—is that I got the report just before I came to the house.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTESTS RESPECTING PROGRAM ON FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) who reports to parliament for the C.B.C. Could he tell us:

1. Whether he has read press reports or received protests following the nauseating production broadcast over the French TV network originating in Montreal on Sunday night, May 3rd last entitled La plus belle de céans?

2. Will an inquiry be made into the reasons which prompted the author, and especially the producer, to present such a play which constitutes an insult to Catholics and French Canadians?

3. Does the C.B.C. intend to apologize to the Order of the Grey Nuns which was founded by the Blessed Mother Marguerite d'Youville?

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already read newspaper comments on this program which appeared on the French network of the C.B.C. last Sunday night. I have also discussed it with Mr. Ouimet, the president of the C.B.C. It is one which undoubtedly offended, and properly offended, not only French Canadians in this country but Catholics generally, and it is one which I have suggested to the president—and he agrees—is a matter of most serious concern. I can assure the hon. member and the house that the president is conducting an inquiry as to how this program could have originated on the C.B.C., and that appropriate disciplinary action will be taken against those who were responsible for the production of such a program.

PRICE SPREADS

STATEMENT AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I at this time give an answer to the question asked on May 5 by the hon. member for Trinity. The question was:

> Could the Prime Minister tell the house when the government expects to receive the report of the royal commission on price spreads.

The chairman of the commission has indicated it is expected that the report will be concluded some time about mid-September.

FINANCE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR REPORTING BANK LOANS OF OVER $1 MILLION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question arising out of one I asked yesterday in connection with the tabling of certain documents recording the arrangements covering individual loans made between the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada and other creditors. Perhaps my question was not clear. I admit that I was referring to the question which had been asked by the Leader of the Opposition as reported at page 1171 of Hansard, which was similar in nature, and to which the Minister of Finance replied by stating:

> There are certain modifications which are under consideration at the present time, as I am informed by the inspector general of banks.

Later on, following a further question by the Leader of the Opposition, the Minister of Finance said:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to acquaint the house with those.

Really that is the information I was seeking to obtain, and I wonder now whether it would not be possible for the minister—perhaps not today but at a later date—to table those modifications, if there are any.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): They have not been concluded, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister table them when they are concluded.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If there is anything to table, if hon. members wish it, it will be tabled.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but the minister said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not determined yet that there will be any new arrangement. There have been discussions going on from time to time between the inspector general of banks and certain chartered banks.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue the matter unduly, but if there are, will the minister be good enough to table them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to acquaint the house, but at the moment, in the light of the form of my hon. friend's question, it is rather conjectural.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—STATEMENT ON REDUCED FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): In my absence yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia directed a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture, arising out of reports with regard to the floor price for turkeys. In reply I may say there has been an exceptionally heavy increase in the marketing of turkeys. The volume marketed through registered processing plants in 1958 was 27 per cent greater than in the year earlier, and the volume marketed in the first four months of this year was 106 per cent greater than for the same period a year ago. By reason of this increase in the volume marketed there has been a progressive decline in turkey prices until they recently reached support level.

As a result the agricultural stabilization board met with representatives of the Canadian turkey federation. At this meeting numerous proposals were considered. The representatives of the Canadian turkey federation, and not the stabilization board, suggested lowering the floor price with retention of import controls. The Canadian turkey federation is now giving further consideration to this problem, and will be meeting with the board next Thursday, May 14.

The final action to be taken on this matter will in some measure depend on what the turkey producers themselves feel should be done, in view of the tremendous expansion that has taken place and the implications of this situation.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO QUANTITY OF OBSCENE MATERIAL PASSING THROUGH MAILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the Canadian post office noted any recent increase in obscene material passing through the mails, such as was commented upon recently by the postmaster general of the United States?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, we have encountered no problem in that type of material being produced in this country, and the reference of the United States postmaster general was to its increased circulation in his country which, again, we have not noticed in Canada recently.

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF STAMP BEARING QUEEN'S PORTRAIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in order to bring speculation to a halt, may I ask the Postmaster General whether or not there is any intention of withdrawing the postage stamp which is now bothering so many people. I refer to the one with what is apparently the devil's picture in the hair of the Queen. Is it going to stay or is it going to be withdrawn?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not know the difference between a dollar bill and a postage stamp.

Mr. Winch: I understood the minister had control of both.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I most definitely accept the rebuke of the Postmaster General, but may I ask whether both jobs are not done by the same bureau?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is scarcely a matter of urgency. I think it goes back at least 20 years.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—ALLEGED REFUSAL TO ALLOW CONTRACTORS TO BID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. The question arises from a letter I received from the lakehead builders' exchange, an organization representing nearly 200 contractors, who were not given an opportunity to bid on the construction of three compressor stations at Geraldton, Ignace and Parthia.

Can the minister inform the house why Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation refused to let local contractors have the plans after the secretary requested these plans by wire to enable them to bid?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I will have to get this information; I have no information on this subject. There was one question asked by one company at Port Arthur. They had put in a tender and did not get the bid. That is the only information I have, but I will get the information.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce also look into this matter, because I believe the crown corporation is still under his control?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but it would be helpful if a question of this nature were placed on the order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: Why should it be put on the order paper?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LA BAIE DU FEBVRE—PRESENTATION OF CHEQUE IN PAYMENT OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, concerning a cheque in the amount of $400,000 which he recently handed over to the payee for the purchase of lots in the community of La Baie du Febvre and in connection with which his picture was published in the papers. I would therefore ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys whether he intends to establish in the government of Canada, with regard to his department, the same system as is used by the Union National in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Pigeon: This is perfectly ridiculous.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I must say that in fact I did attend the handing over of a cheque in payment for the expropriation of lots in the community of La Baie du Febvre. The cheque had been sent to the attesting notary appointed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) in settlement of this expropriation. I was merely a witness. I had the cheque in my hand, but it had not been handed over to me by the government. I merely attended the delivery of the cheque to the president of the corporation. As for the picture, I feel no shame about it. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I felt a distinct pleasure in seeing that a matter which the previous government had been unable to settle over a period of five years has now been attended to at last.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member is rising to continue the argument or ask a further question.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a further question. I asked the hon. minister if the way in which the cheque had been sent was somewhat the same as the way it is done by the Union National in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Johnson: It is like the way it used to be done by the one time secretary of state.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put another question to the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has the hon. minister also considered what a good thing it would be for himself and the country if he personally handed out his employees' pay cheques, with a press photographer tagging along?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnson: Put this question to the hon. Roch Pinard, who used to go around his constituency of Chambly-Rouville carrying cheques in his pockets; and ask Jean-Paul St. Laurent, too.

HIGHWAYS

REPORTED PLAN TO PAVE ALASKA HIGHWAY ON COST SHARING BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. This question arises from a press report in today's Globe and Mail concerning Senator Neuberger's proposal for jointly sharing the cost of paving the Canadian section of the Alaska highway. Has the United States government sought the views of the Canadian government with respect to legislation pending in the United States congress concerning paving of the Alaska highway? If so, what comment has been made?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McIlraith: Should that one go on the order paper, too?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. McIlraith: I asked if that one should go on the order paper too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The self-appointed guardian of the rules has interrupted.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as this question is concerned, the categorical answer would be yes. The government has indicated that the complex nature of the subject suggests the need for careful study and extensive consultation between the two countries before reaching any decision on the terms of an international agreement along the line suggested by the legislation introduced by Senator Neuberger in the United States Senate.

The problem of this highway is one that merits attention when it is considered that from 1945 to March 31, 1959 the cost of maintaining that highway has been $132 million. The whole question will receive consideration and, in so far as the legislation now before the United States Senate is concerned, it is unilateral in that it lays a foundation for a subsequent proposal for an international agreement. In any event it is subject also to the objection that the direction of the work would, in effect, be controlled by an agency of the United States government, which is something we could not accept.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Would the Prime Minister allow me to ask a supplementary question? Since this highway, or a part of it, is exclusively under Canadian jurisdiction, would it not be a matter for the Canadian government to determine whether or not the paving should be paid for by Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes. In so far as the highway is concerned, that portion of the highway system that lies in Canada is about 1,500 miles in length, of which 1,221 is the Alaska highway proper. There are about 800 miles in British Columbia and about 700 miles within the Yukon Territory. Obviously the answer would be yes.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENT IN FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of a number of communications I have received from Prince Edward Island. Can the minister say what consideration has been given to the proposal that in order to improve the present inadequate ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland the United States vessel Vacationland should be purchased for this service?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The government has under consideration several alternatives for further improvement of the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The suggested purchase of the Vacationland is one of these, but as yet no decision has been made.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. Would not the best and most practicable method of improving the service be to construct the causeway between the mainland and Prince Edward Island, which has been promised now for some time?

Mr. Hees: That consideration is also going on, Mr. Speaker, and the Department of Public Works advise me that they hope soon to have reached a conclusion on that important subject.

Mr. Chevrier: Why is an item not included in the estimates for that purpose?

Mr. Hees: Because, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, it is impossible to put an item in the estimates until a decision is made on an important matter of that kind.

Mr. Chevrier: We have been after it for two years.

Mr. Hees: Twenty-five years now.

MANITOBA—FEDERAL AID IN PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister in the light of his answer to an orders of the day matter raised on May 5 last, and in the light of the desperate efforts of Premier Roblin of Manitoba. Is the minister now in a position to announce any extraordinary arrangement that may assist the people of Manitoba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, the reason for the question is the desperate fears of the hon. gentleman and those associated with him.

Supply—Labour

POSTAL SERVICE

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF GLENDALE AND MOUNT PEARL PARK IN METROPOLITAN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to complaints from the patrons of the post offices of Glendale and Mount Pearl Park, suburbs of the city of St. John's, and the exasperation they experience in having letters and particularly bills sent to them with only 4 cent stamps on them. May I ask if the Postmaster General would consider including this area within the St. John's post office, as has been done in the case of many other metropolitan areas?

An hon. Member: Write him a letter.

Mr. Speaker: The question having been asked I suppose I should allow the minister to answer it, but I suggest that it is the sort of question that might well go on the order paper.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the extreme and obviously urgent nature of the question to which you have drawn attention, I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I want to ask the Postmaster General. If the Postmaster General were obliged to pay postage due on all his bills, would he not consider that an urgent matter?

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

163. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,105,745.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, today is my second opportunity to bring the estimates of the Department of Labour and of the unemployment insurance commission before this committee. I feel that it is a privilege to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if hon. members would please lower their voices when they are talking to each other. It is hard to hear the member who has the floor.

Mr. Starr: As I was saying, I feel that it is a privilege to bring these estimates before the committee. At this time I should like to say how appreciative I am of the understanding and co-operation I have received from hon. members on all sides of this house in connection with the administration of this department. The remarks I am about to make on the estimates will be fairly general. I will try to cover every aspect of the functions of the Department of Labour and also the responsibilities that come under the unemployment insurance commission.

The estimates of the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission taken together total $90,734,240. The operations of both these departments enter into the economic and industrial streams of this country in such a way as to affect the lives of a great number of Canadians.

The unemployment insurance commission with its more than 8,000 employees, its approximately 200 offices across Canada and, of course, its great responsibility in the administration of unemployment insurance and in placement operations, is asking for $74,754,000.

The Department of Labour, with somewhat fewer than 650 employees, has responsibility for co-ordination of vocational and skilled training programs, civilian rehabilitation, women in industry, and for administration of the various federal acts governing wages, working conditions and collective bargaining and conciliation procedures. The Department of Labour is asking for a somewhat lesser amount, in the neighbourhood of $16 million.

I might just, with the permission of the committee, stress briefly the background against which these requirements are being presented. The fiscal year just past was, as hon. members know, an active one both in the fields of bargaining and of general employment. In the industrial field a number of two-year agreements came due and in the majority of cases these were satisfactorily concluded. Some proved more vexatious than others, but a final settlement was eventually reached in a great majority of these cases.

In the field of employment and placement, which applies particularly to the unemployment insurance operation, a number of positive steps were taken during the past year. It will be no news, I am sure, to hon. members when I say that we experienced a period of industrial softening in this country which I might well describe by the term "recession". Nor will it be news to them that this impinged strongly upon myself as minister in charge of the administration of unemployment insurance. Well do I recall, Mr. Chairman, the dire forebodings of certain hon. members opposite at this time last year. However, as everyone knows, the government acted and acted quickly. The results of those actions are equally well known.

I may say that certain actions had to be undertaken at the same time in the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission. Both these departments had to be geared in line with the developing situation. Through the unanimous and wholehearted co-operation of the staffs in both departments this was done successfully.

Partly as a result of the winter work conference last year and partly as a result of suggestions from the federal-municipal conference, the municipal incentive program was developed and put into action this winter, with the result that jobs were provided for nearly 40,000 Canadians on sites where no jobs had existed before. As a result of these and other measures taken by my colleagues, employment this spring was 150,000 above last year and unemployment, according to the latest dominion bureau of statistics figures, was 72,000 lower. The administration of the municipal incentive program was largely in the hands of the Department of Labour, and this was accomplished with a minimum of complaints, so far as I know, and with no increase in staff. In short, not one single person was added to handle programs in excess of $90 million. At the same time our winter work program went ahead in much higher gear, and I would say it was far more successful than ever before.

In unemployment insurance the placement program was steadily accelerated. This effort will continue, and extra staff will be required this year on a permanent basis. This will at the same time permit the release of a number of casual employees with a consequent appreciable saving in administration costs. In unemployment insurance, which is in direct contact with a great many Canadians both for benefit and for employment purposes, the endeavour has been and will continue to be the elimination of delays and a positive emphasis on the principle of public service. All staff members are co-operating in this policy.

To come down now to the details of the estimates, the net increase this year over last, taking in supplementary estimates in both years, is of the order of some $1,113,107. This is largely accounted for by an increase of $1,300,000 in vocational training commitments to the provinces. At the same time, as I earlier pointed out, there is a decrease of $322,000 for administration in the unemployment insurance commission due to a lessening requirement for casual employees.

Perhaps I might at this point touch on some of the activities of the labour department. I think it is most important that members should grasp, at least in a general way, the functions of this department. I sometimes fear that the impression is all too current that the minister and the department exist only to be summoned in the case of labour disputes. This is an impression which should be dispelled, since the day to day activity of the department, though it does certainly enter the field of labour conciliation, has very wide ramifications in many other aspects of industrial activity. The keeping of records, the setting of wage scales, the administration of fair wage and anti-discrimination legislation, as well as federal legislation in the collective bargaining field, the constant surveillance of the employment picture in order to anticipate future needs, the assessment of manpower requirements, the raising of the level of training skills in this country; all these are part of the very important functions of the department. They are functions which, in my estimation, are being carried out in response to a definite public need.

The role of women in industry is the responsibility of the women's bureau in my department. Recently the director acted as adviser to the Canadian government representative at the United Nations commission on the status of women. Government annuities, a form of social security for a great number of Canadians, are administered under the Department of Labour. Contracts in force number 180,000 for individuals and 247,000 group contracts. The annuity fund at March 31, 1959, stood at $1,106 million.

Conciliation of industrial disputes comes under the industrial relations branch, which in the past year has been most active indeed. Disputes numbering 108 were referred; in only six was strike action involved. Under fair wages legislation 9,000 cases were dealt with, and in October a new act, the vacations with pay act, came under the administration of this branch.

In the rehabilitation of civilians who have suffered disablement for one reason or another, new agreements with the provinces have been authorized this year, to extend a further five years. To give an example of the effect of civilian rehabilitation I might cite the case of some 2,000 persons who, before rehabilitation, were dependent upon relatives to the extent of $1,700,000 annually. After rehabilitation their earnings in the first year will total $4,660,000.

The problem of older workers is one which is receiving attention. It is receiving even more attention at this time, since it is becoming evident that a number of firms in this country have now approached the ridiculous in their attitude on this question. Recently it has been brought to my attention that certain firms are even going as low as 35 years as the upper age limit of employment. As I have mentioned earlier, in years past this has been a problem which has touched me very deeply, and I have felt very concerned about it. Studies were recently undertaken by the economics and research branch of my department which show not only the downright fallacy but the poor economics of this position, and I hope to the able to bring these results home to employers across Canada very shortly.

I have mentioned employment and unemployment, and I think I can say that at least one thing has emerged from the events of the past year. This is that unemployment is susceptible to a certain amount of control by direct government intervention. Let me also say, Mr. Chairman, that I am proud to be a member of a government which had the fortitude, the vigour and the vision to come to direct and positive grips with unemployment. This next winter we shall continue to wage the winter employment program with vigour.

I would pay tribute here, Mr. Chairman, to winter employment committees across Canada to the various organizations such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Canadian Construction Association, Canadian Labour Congress, National Council of Women and others whose support has made this effort possible. At the same time I point to the excellent co-operation we have received in connection with the municipal incentive program from provincial and municipal authorities. It has been a delight to me to have had the opportunity of being associated with this program, because of this co-operation and because of the smoothness with which it has operated.

Let me say also that studies are continuing in my department in connection with this matter of seasonal unemployment. One of the studies currently under way is being undertaken by the unemployment insurance commission in co-operation with the dominion bureau of statistics on the characteristics of the seasonally unemployed. The study was suggested in the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress to the national conference on winter unemployment, and the results cannot help but be beneficial to an understanding of this problem.

In British Columbia, where the seasonal unemployment program has assumed special and distinct characteristics, a special study is being undertaken co-operatively by the British Columbia research council, the provincial and federal governments.

One of the more important aspects of industrial development in our society is the maintenance of a high level of industrial skill.

[Mr. Starr.]

This may in fact be the most important problem before us now. Another aspect, tying in closely with this, is the equation of the human factor with rapidly changing technological demands. I dare say that upon the manner in which we solve these two problems will depend our industrial progress in the coming 15 to 20 years. There is no need for me to emphasize to the committee at this time the vital need for maintaining a high level of industrial skill in this country, and indeed in the whole free world.

One of the measures we are taking is the technical and vocational training program now under way in co-operation with the provinces. Under agreements signed in 1957 some $40 million is being made available to the provinces over a five-year period for the establishment of suitable training facilities. Through the national vocational training advisory council such activities are co-ordinated across Canada. Another important aspect of this program is the development of uniform standards in apprenticeship training across Canada. Other aspects include training of unemployed, disabled persons and so on. Vocational guidance material is also provided to high school students across Canada.

My department is also carrying out research into skilled manpower training which will throw considerable light upon this particular problem in the years ahead. There is also a study going ahead dealing with automation and its effects upon people employed in industry which should provide results useful in the solution of a number of pressing problems. I would also mention in this connection the assistance provided by the advisory committee on professional manpower, which has been of benefit to my officials in their assessments of these problems.

All these activities are designed to assist in keeping up a high level of training skills in Canada through co-operation on the federal, provincial and industrial levels. It is essential that this co-operation be maintained, and I am hoping that as time goes on an even more intensive approach may be made to the problems in this field.

As I have said, the unemployment insurance commission is asking for $74 million. I have already pointed out the increased burden of responsibility which the commission staff faced during the past winter. Personally I do not anticipate that the effects of recession will be felt as severely in this country in the immediate future. Nevertheless I am convinced that in order to provide the type of service to which the public is entitled, the permanent staffs of the unemployment insurance offices across Canada must be supplemented. Particularly is this necessary in the placement field.

I have been stressing for some time the importance of the placement function of the unemployment insurance commission. I cannot myself, subscribe to the theory that the main function of this organization is to hand out benefits. No less important, and perhaps more so from the point of view of providing service to the taxpayer, is the necessity of an effective and positive placement program. This program will seek out jobs wherever they may be found. It will place the right person in touch with the right job. In the long run, by putting people to work rather than handing them benefits it will add greatly to the productive capacity of this country, and it will save the taxpayer money. That is why we are asking for these extra positions. At the same time the elimination of certain casual positions will result in an administrative saving in the first year of $322,000.

Hon. members will note an increase in the amount provided for office stationery. Compared to last year, and including the final supplementaries of last year, the increase is $209,000. This results partly from the extension of the mechanization program which will entail the use of special forms. Other items in the administration vote are much the same as last year.

I would point out in closing, Mr. Chairman, that during the two years of the modified recession which was felt in this country perhaps less than in any other, unemployment insurance, as administered by this government, pumped $805 million into the lifeblood of our economy. In this respect unemployment insurance became a weapon against recession, and a weapon against suffering. The balance in the fund at March 31 of this year was $496,251,386.48. At the same time last year it was $744,200,124.87.

In closing I wish to assure the members of this committee that I shall be available along with the staff of my department to answer any questions which hon. members may care to ask, and to provide any information which may be required.

Mr. Pearson: Consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour gives members of this committee the opportunity to discuss labour and industrial problems in a general way. The committee will have listened with interest—though I think this interest was mingled with some disappointment—to the statement the minister has just made, I believe the disappointment felt by hon. members will arise not so much because of what he said as because of what he omitted to say about some of the labour problems which face us today.

If I criticize, as I propose to do, the policies of the minister and the government, the hon. gentleman will know that I have a high regard for the sincerity, the industry and the good will with which he approaches this subject. That is quite apart from the criticisms I may feel called upon to make.

I hope to deal with these matters in a general way and later some of my colleagues will discuss in more detail some of the topics the minister has just mentioned. The hon. gentleman began by making a reference to the unemployment insurance commission and the importance of its work. We all agree about its importance, especially in the months ahead. We have already had a difference of opinion in this chamber between this side and the government side concerning one matter connected with the unemployment insurance commission. Whatever side one may take in regard to the procedure followed by the government in this matter it must surely be admitted that the ultimate result of this particular appointment is unhappy and unfortunate in that the trade union representative, the workers representative on the unemployment insurance commission, one of three, has not the confidence of the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour.

To say the least, that is surely an unfortunate result. As far as I am concerned I do not believe it is genuine and effective consultation within the meaning of this particular act when a minister tells workers' organizations that a vacancy has occurred and invites them, as he did, to submit names, but also tells them that he himself is going to recommend to his colleagues in the government a particular person.

The point at issue, of course, is not the qualification of any particular person. Certainly in this case it is not that the recommendation of the government covers a man who I believe is qualified in every way to fill the post, nor is the point at issue the political views of a particular nominee, if he has any. The political views and loyalties of a government nominee or a nominee of the Canadian Labour Congress do not matter, it seems to me, if the qualifications of the nominee are satisfactory for the position and if the procedures for consultation as laid down in the act are genuinely followed.

The point at issue here, as we see it, is what constitutes this honest and effective consultation as required by the act for the purpose of ensuring—there can be no doubt but that this is the purpose of the consultation—that the workers' representative on this commission will have the confidence of the workers' organizations as it faces—and I use the words of the minister in describing it—an increased burden of responsibility.

The minister in my view did not adequately deal with other extremely important matters, in the sense that he did not get down to principles and fundamentals in respect of at least two of the major problems that face him and that face Canada today in the field of labour, in the department over which he presides. One of those problems is that of labour-management and employee-employer relationships and the other, of course, is the problem of a continuing high level of unemployment in this country.

As far as the first problem is concerned, the minister mentioned with some satisfaction the working of the conciliation procedures of his department. No doubt he will be winding up the discussion on this item, and when that time comes I would like him to tell the committee if he will whether he feels that the present procedures of conciliation and mediation for the avoidance of wasteful and indeed anachronistic though often necessary strikes as a method of settling labour disputes are in his opinion satisfactory and adequate procedures in view of his experience in the last two years in this country. I should like him to tell us if he is satisfied as to whether these procedures are working satisfactorily in Canada at this time. If he is not satisfied, what is he doing about it and what does the government propose doing about it?

Last year when the minister opened the debate on his estimates on August 15, 1958, as reported at page 3593 of Hansard, the minister had this to say:

> Coming to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, may I say that I have given notice of my readiness to consider amendments to this act and that a number of suggestions have been received and are being considered at the moment.

Perhaps the minister ten months later will bring us up to date as to the views and intentions of the government in dealing with the act and the nature of the changes that have been suggested to date. I should also like to ask the minister if he will tell the committee in due course on what principle of intervention, whether mediation or conciliation, the government acts in labour disputes, intervention by non-intervention as was the case with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation producers' strike, or intervention of the kind followed in relation to the railway diesel firemen's dispute. Also does the minister think that in the light of the problems of labour and management and the general industrial problems we are facing today the method of protecting the public interest, which we all know is paramount, is adequate and satisfactory?

I should also like to hear the minister's views and those of the government on what can be done to reaffirm and strengthen the means of maintaining in this country the right of collective bargaining, subject always, of course, to the overriding consideration of the public interest. I believe hon. members of this committee will agree that any effort on the part of employers or of government or of anybody else to weaken that essential principle in the development of our labour relations legislation is inadmissible, just as violence and law-breaking in labour disputes is inadmissible.

Many trade unions, like corporations now have great power and efficient organization. Most of them are not the struggling groups of 50 years ago, when the right of collective bargaining was not established in this country in the way it is established now; indeed, when it was not recognized as essential by all sections of opinion as I believe it is recognized now. But along with this power, for both corporations and trade unions, must go responsibility. When that power is used irresponsibly, when there is corruption or law-breaking, the unions themselves are the first and the greatest sufferers. I believe, and indeed it was pointed out in the debate last year by the hon. member for Skeena, that unions are the first to realize that they themselves should be the strongest guardians against that kind of thing, otherwise they would be giving ammunition to those in this country who would still like to see them weakened.

There is another problem with which perhaps the minister will be able to deal in this debate. Demands by workers for wage increases are bound to be limited and affected by economic considerations. Hence the relationship of those demands to increased productivity and to the danger of increasing costs creates a problem, thereby pushing up prices in a way which at times makes the resulting wage increase an illusory benefit.

What does the minister think of this relationship? I would like to hear his views on the most interesting proposal of one trade union—I think it was the steel workers' union—that its own demands for wage increases could be related to increased productivity in its own industry.

Of course labour, through wage demands of this kind, has its responsibility for holding back inflation which can nullify the benefits of wage increases; but perhaps there is a tendency at times to blame labour and the demands of labour too much for the effect of increases on inflationary tendencies. There are other factors. At times we are perhaps tempted to overlook the importance of those other factors, but they are factors over which labour itself and trade unions have no control. I am thinking of the question of administered prices by corporations and groups of corporations. On this point the president of the Toronto-Dominion bank, Mr. Ashforth, had this to say on February 23 of this year, in an address before the Canadian club in Toronto. I quote one paragraph from his address:

> Business, like labour, will have to make some sacrifices. It is interesting to note that corporation profits have turned buoyant again and this, of course, is a symptom of economic recovery. However, it may also be taken as evidence that management is proving fairly successful in passing on increases in costs by boosting its selling prices. It also means that business may be vulnerable to a new round of wage demands.

That, I think, Mr. Chairman, is a very wise and very significant statement, especially as coming from the president of a bank.

There is only one other particular aspect of these problems that I am going to discuss this afternoon, and that is the employment situation in this country. Last year when we debated this subject, a debate to which I have already referred, on August 15, after describing the employment and unemployment outlook for 1958 I said to the minister, and I am quoting from page 3598 of Hansard:

> Perhaps he—

That is, the minister.

> —will give us as clear and frank a statement as he can on this very important matter and on the policies the government intends to initiate in order to cope with what I believe to be a continuing and serious situation.

The minister replied, and I quote from page 3681 of Hansard of the same day:

> In answer to that—

He was referring to my question:

> —I have been advised by the officials of my department in comparing last year's conditions with the conditions this year—

That is, 1957 with 1958.

> —that last year the economy was declining to a marked degree. In comparison, this year—

That is, 1958.

> —the economy is on the upswing at this time.

That was in August, 1958. And he went on to say a little later on in the debate, at page 3683:

> One of the best indicators is the fact that registrations at our national employment service offices were on the increase as of August last year—

That is, the increase over August, 1957.

> —but we have shown that there is a steady decline week by week in the registrations at our national employment services offices in recent weeks and although the dominion bureau of statistics figure for mid-July is not available yet—it has not been issued—I venture to predict that on the basis of the national employment service figure of 365,440 on August 7, there will be a very appreciable decrease in the D.B.S. figure for mid-July and even more so in the figure which will come out for mid-August.

The ministers optimism about the mid-July figure may have been justified by the figures as they then come out, but certainly not for the two succeeding months, I claim, Mr. Chairman, that the minister at that time took a too optimistic view of the unemployment situation in this country and that he did not at that time—though we pressed him very hard for it and we were criticized for introducing considerations of doom and gloom, as we always are when we talk about unemployment—introduce adequate policies to deal with what we thought was a continuing serious situation, and which indeed proved to be so.

When he referred to the recommendations of the conference on winter unemployment—I will have something more to say about that in a moment—which was held in mid-July, 1958 he said at page 3669 of Hansard, about a month later:

> The recommendations have been made, and those recommendations are being compiled by the department for study.

That was in the middle of August. The minister went on:

> I have not yet had an opportunity of presenting them to cabinet. I am going to do this because I consider this problem is very important. These matters will certainly be brought to the attention of the government for consideration.

That, Mr. Chairman, was the statement made by the minister on August 16, 1958. But not, as the minister knows—indeed, as he has already been reminded more than once until the end of October, 1958, did the government announce this offer to participate in the cost of certain municipal works designed to reduce unemployment during the winter of 1958-59. We have criticized this program, Mr. Chairman, as being too little and too late. I have already indicated in the date I have given why we considered it to have been too late.

Surely subsequent events have justified the criticism we made at that time and have repeated since. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that this program—though the minister takes a great deal of satisfaction from it—did not represent a well thought out and well planned attack on the basic problem of winter unemployment in that it was announced in October, so late that municipal authorities, without whose co-operation of course it could not have been successful at all, did not have enough notice in order to take account of federal sharing in labour costs in preparing their own construction programs.

The program from the outset was too narrow in its conception to be of substantial aid in combating unemployment. At that time—and indeed the situation remains—certain areas had large concentrations of unemployment, and the figures show that these concentrations still exist. The successful application of this program in any such area of severe unemployment depended upon the financial resources which could be made available to the municipalities in such areas, and where such financial resources did not exist or where they were limited then the program could not operate at all, or at least could not operate to maximum effectiveness. Tying the success and the operation of the program to the financial capacity of municipalities was surely not a strong and appropriate basis for a plan that should have had as its sole basis the extent of unemployment.

When the Prime Minister announced the terms of this winter works program in his telegram of October 29, he said, and I quote from the telegram:

> We believe that by co-operation these programs will create many thousands additional jobs this winter in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: And they did.

Mr. Pearson: I will have some comment to make on that in a moment. Of course the program did create jobs, and in so far as it did create a single job we welcome that result.

Mr. Fulton: Grudgingly.

Mr. Pearson: But naturally you have to take the effort made, the amount expended and the plans that were drawn and relate all that to the results achieved in order to try to show whether, through some other plan done in some other way, you could not have had better results.

On April 22 the minister gave the committee the figures. I am not sure whether he repeated the figures this afternoon, but they are on page 2928 of Hansard for that date. These figures show that this program had created 37,055 additional jobs. We are glad of that, and I am sure the 37,000 who got the jobs welcomed them. On April 23, the day after the minister spoke, and this will show how inadequate the contribution of this winter works program was to the total problem, the figures showed that there were 698,351 unplaced applicants registered at the national employment offices. I am using that figure of unplaced applicants because the figures calculated on that basis more nearly coincide with the date on which the minister gave the figures for the jobs created under the program.

The inadequacy, as we claim it to be, of this program of winter works is also well demonstrated by comparing the extent of unemployment in the various regions and the number of jobs created. The following table underlines this inadequacy.

	Unplaced applicants, April 23	Additional jobs, April 22
B.C.	64,441	3,059
Prairies	91,998	7,929
Ontario	197,506	10,486
Quebec	240,702	5,561
Atlantic	103,704	9,924

These figures show that in many areas, notably in Ontario and the prairie provinces which had less than the national average of unemployment, there was a greater proportion of additional jobs created by this program. Well, what is the situation now in regard to this problem of unemployment. Although in our view the minister underestimated the seriousness of this problem in the last session, in the present session, some months later, with the facts before him, he has recognized that unemployment last year was unusually high. He has followed the example of the Minister of Finance in adopting this course. Last year in his budget speech, and later in August, the Minister of Finance said unemployment was declining, and he took a great deal of satisfaction out of that. Of course, we all did. Then, he drew the conclusion, and the minister supported him in this conclusion, that we were over the hump, through the woods, and everything was going to be much better this year. Some months later in his budget speech, and dealing with the same period, the minister said as reported at page 2409 of Hansard for April 9, 1959:

> Throughout 1958 there was serious unemployment despite very substantial positive action by the government.

This year the Minister of Finance is again very optimistic about employment opportunities for 1959, just as he was last year in regard to employment opportunities in 1958. Nevertheless without exaggerating or without trying to take an unduly alarming view of the situation, because I am not doing that, we have evidence to support the view that unemployment in the year in which we are will still be unusually high. Perhaps if he is still Minister of Finance, in his next budget speech the minister will recognize that unemployment was a serious problem in 1959. Then, of course, it will be too late to do anything about it. We say that the unemployed in 1959 want jobs now. They do not want to be told next year that, unfortunately, there were too many unemployed in 1959.

Let us look for a moment at the basis of the ministers' optimism, that is the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour, in regard to employment prospects in 1959. Let us look for a moment at the latest figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics in the daily bulletin for April 21. This bulletin includes this paragraph:

> The substantial employment gains from a year ago were maintained but not increased during March . . . Unemployment, which usually rises slowly from February to March, declined this year. An estimated 525,000 were without jobs and seeking work—(8.6 per cent of the labour force)—12,000 less than in February and 72,000 fewer than in March last year.

We rejoice in that improvement, but that improvement itself does not remove our worries about the continuing seriousness of the situation. Surely we cannot, as a nation, be satisfied that in March, 1959, by the dominion bureau of statistics method of calculation, which is the most conservative one, 525,000 workers or 8.6 per cent of our labour force were still seeking work. In case we are inclined to take too much satisfaction from the progress that has been made in regard to employment, we should also take a proper account of a factor which is responsible, I think, for a decline in the number of unemployed. This dominion bureau of statistics release goes on to say:

> The drop in unemployment was associated with a slight decline in the labour force. Although this decline amounted to only 7,000, it was in contrast to the expansion that usually occurs at this time of year. In the past five years, the labour force has increased between February and March by an average of 22,000.

This quotation is from a D.B.S. report and it means that if the labour force had increased at its normal rate between February and March instead of declining there would have been 29,000 more unemployed or more than 9 per cent of the labour force which would have meant an increase in unemployment of 17,000 in March compared with February. As a matter of fact, the labour force increased by only 1,000 in March in comparison with January 1959.

While it is true, and we rejoice in this, that general economic conditions have improved recently, the fact remains that the recent decline in unemployment is not due so much to that improvement as to the unusual decline in the labour force, while our population continues to increase rapidly. I think last year we added to our labour force some 75,000 people. The minister will correct me if my figures are wrong. The fact that fewer people offered their services on the labour market, as they did in the last few months, could be explained by their expectation that they would not get jobs if they tried to join the force.

The minister could point out, and perhaps he will in reply, that claimants, both regular and seasonal, had unemployment insurance benefits on March 31 of this year, and they were 4 per cent less than on February 27, and 11 per cent below March 31, 1958. These figures are from the bureau's weekly bulletin. I should like to say here again that that figure, without analysis, could be quite misleading. It is true that regular claimants were, at that time, 8 per cent fewer than in February and 19 per cent fewer than in March, 1958. But this could be explained mainly by the fact that after many months of heavy unemployment, more unemployed are not entitled any more to receive regular benefits.

Mr. Starr: They would still be registered.

Mr. Pearson: That explanation is substantiated by the other fact that seasonal benefit claimants who do not, as the minister knows, necessarily need any stamps, were in March 6 per cent higher than in February and 10 per cent higher than in March, 1958.

As to the unemployment situation for 1959 as a whole, as we see it, I had this to say in my speech in the budget debate, as reported at page 2914 of Hansard. Perhaps I can read one paragraph from it because it is our considered view as to what may happen during the forthcoming year. I said then and this is the main reason why we are not as optimistic as are the members of the government with respect to this matter: I quote:

> If only a 4 to 5 per cent increase in the volume of the gross national product is achieved—

And the government is planning on the assumption of an increase of 7 per cent.

> —and that is the estimate of the tax foundation—that would mean that during the current year we would have, on the average, more than 300,000 people unemployed in this country which would be the second highest level in the post war period.

Then I went on to say this:

> Thus, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's facile optimism on this score, the problem of unemployment remains and is likely to remain throughout the year.

On the basis of current economic conditions I do not think this estimate of 300,000, on the average, is unrealistic. If that is true, that would mean about 5 per cent of our labour force, on the average, would be unemployed in 1959. Compared to the 3.1 per cent in 1956, surely that represents an extremely serious situation throughout 1959 but especially, as we enter the winter of 1959-60. It is not easy to comtemplate the possibility—and I hope the possibility will not arise—that we may, if we are not careful and if policies are not put forward to prevent it, and if our economic conditions do not improve sufficiently, be entering into a period when we will have something like a hard core of unemployment of about that figure. I am sure that is not a prospect that any hon. member of this house contemplates with any satisfaction at all.

We feel that the government approached this problem last year by inadequate measures put into effect too late. So we ask now what are the government's intentions and policies for this year. We do not know but I think we have the right to know. Surely the provinces and the municipalities should know without delay what the government is prepared to do, what the government is planning to do for next year. It is time now to plan, to discuss, to arrive at concrete decisions. It will be too late next fall to do very much about it.

Is it the intention of the government to participate in the cost of certain municipal works next winter? If so, should not the minister announce that decision immediately? Is the minister—and to be fair to him I think he gave some indication that he was doing this in his statement this afternoon—examining last winter's program with a view to seeing how it can be improved, how its shortcomings can be removed so that it will be more effective next winter if the government participates in a similar type of program.

Would it not be highly desirable to call another meeting with the provinces and representatives of the municipalities—call it without delay, not next October, not next September but now—in order to review the winter works program in the light of last year's experience. I feel perfectly certain that the municipalities, in the light of that experience, would have some extremely helpful suggestions to make to the government as to the timing and the scope of that program as well as to their view of the degree of participation of the federal government in it. Hence I repeat that this meeting should be called immediately. I hope the minister will have something to say on this particular matter in the course of the present debate. I am content that with adequate advance planning and the effective co-operation between the provinces and the municipalities a great deal could and should be done to reduce seasonal unemployment which has been such an extremely serious problem, especially during the last two years. We have always had it in this country and I suppose we shall always have a measure of seasonal unemployment because we cannot, at least as yet, alter our climate. But the magnitude of that problem has been greater in the last two years than it was previously.

As we move on the road of economic recovery—and we all hope we are moving on that road—we can, I suppose, expect what the economists call cyclical unemployment to decline. But we will realize, surely, that a hard core of unemployment still exists, not only because of the climate but because of the action of certain structural factors, as the economists call them. Even if we enjoy intense prosperity in the next two years—and I hope we do so—we will still have this structural unemployment, if steps are not taken to prevent it, due to technological progress and automation and to an unfavourable economic climate in certain depressed areas in this country, as we may perhaps almost refer to them. The minister touched on some of these matters this afternoon. Perhaps he will give us a slightly more detailed analysis when he comes to reply.

There is one other aspect of the unemployment problem which should receive the careful attention of the government, and I hope the minister will have something to say about this matter as well. In our own party program which we put forward with inadequate results a couple of years ago there is included this paragraph and I am glad of every possible opportunity to put on the record of Hansard what we said then during the election campaign.

Mr. Fulton: Why? Because it was so wrong?

Mr. Pearson: Because it was so right, as the country is now beginning to find out.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all.

Mr. Pearson: Here is what we had to say about the development of automation and technological progress.

Mr. Fulton: Persistent self-delusion.

Mr. Pearson: The minister is whistling to keep up his courage in the face of declining popularity. We were right then and we are right now. Here is what we said:

> To help in dealing with the long-term problems of production and employment, the Liberal party will establish an advisory board with representatives from labour, industry, agriculture and the universities. (It would be called the national advisory board on economic development and automation). One principal duty of the board will be to study the long-term measures required to assure a high level of employment and to minimize for workers the consequences of automation by providing for retraining programs, for better mobility and other progressive measures. A second duty of the board will be to plan programs for long-term investment and development which will ensure the steady progress of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Chairman, it would have been expected, of course, that in the planning of such long-term development program any board of this kind would have to give special attention to depressed areas, as I have called them, across Canada but especially those areas in the Atlantic provinces which are suffering so greatly from unemployment, as the regional figures prove.

This problem of automation should certainly receive special attention on a continuing basis. I thought that the minister dealt with it in a casual and rather desultory way this afternoon. A very interesting study was made by the Canadian Labour Congress for the Borden commission, I think in 1956. It is entitled "Probate Effects of Increasing Mechanization in Industry". The Department of Labour, as the minister knows of course, initiated a few years ago special studies of this problem in specific industries. The automotive industry was one. I wonder if the minister could make these studies available to us and tell the house if his department is going to continue with them. I am sure that they would prove most useful. I am also sure that like many others they will not be adequate to cope with the growing problem of unemployment resulting from automation and other technological developments which cannot be held back without harming the economy of the nation as a whole, but the impact of which must be cushioned by the government to ensure that these changes when they are made will be made with a minimum of dislocation and disturbance to the working man.

The minister talked this afternoon about some of the work which is going on in the Department of Labour. He also talked about that a year ago, and I have quoted from his speech delivered on August 15 last where he said that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was being considered with a view to making amendments thereto. He also said on that date, as reported on page 3593 of Hansard:

> It is my intention to set up a consultative committee representing interested groups to advise upon the administration of the fair employment practices act as it relates to discriminatory practices in industry.

Well, what has been done in that regard? The minister went on and touched on this problem, and I agree it is one of the most important problems which faces the field of labour relations. He said:

> In the civilian rehabilitation branch, in order to carry on the services rendered we are making provision for two additional employees to assist in the placement of older workers.

I would like to say that I could not agree more with what the minister said this afternoon with regard to that problem. One way perhaps in which it could be alleviated, and this is also something that we have put forward, is to bring into existence legislation or regulations by which the working man's pension belongs to him when moving from one job to another. The hon. minister went on to say:

> This has been an aspect of labour problems in which I have been very interested for quite a number of years.

He repeated that interest this afternoon. He went on:

> Because of the practice of certain industries of specifying certain ages, they have thereby eliminated many useful persons from employment. We are concentrating on this aspect of the matter by endeavouring to institute an educational program for employers, and by pointing out to them that the ability of a person is in no way diminished as the result of age but that in some respects the workmanship of an older person offers a great deal to a prospective employer.

The hon. minister repeated his interest in that matter this afternoon and gave us an assurance that the matter was under study. When the minister gets up to reply to some of the points raised this afternoon perhaps he will give us some indication of the results achieved in respect of this matter.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to cover some of the aspects of the problem on item No. 1. There will be other hon. members on this side who will have something to say and we hope that when the minister rises he will put all our worries at rest.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the Minister of Labour with great interest. The Leader of the Opposition said that the minister is a most genial person, a most disarming person, and I think some of his colleagues will agree with those remarks. We all hope that we will expedite this matter and bring the session to an early conclusion.

I was disappointed that the Minister of Labour, in his statement this afternoon was not able to assure the Canadian workers that the central problem of unemployment was being tackled and would be solved. No matter the amount of soft soap, there is little comfort in the fact that 525,000 persons are without jobs and seeking work, according to the joint release of April 21, 1959 of the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. We face a serious unemployment crisis in Canada at the present time. There may have been some small improvement in recent weeks, but it is still a very serious crisis. The Canadian people did not expect to have this problem with them at this time. They were led to believe by the Conservative party that they had a program which would solve the question of unemployment. The Canadian people were assured that this government had a policy, and in the pamphlet entitled "Labour" which they issued during the recent election campaign, the first words on the opening page are:

> Labour: Progressive Conservative Policy. We will:
> 1. Maintain full employment and the highest possible standard of living.

That commitment has been broken. We are a long distance from full employment. We are a long distance from the highest possible standard of living. The Minister of Labour in introducing his estimates this afternoon has outlined no program to deal with the half million unemployed in the country at the present time. In the recent election campaign much was said about unemployment. The Prime Minister spoke on this subject at almost every meeting. He spoke about it on television, and on March 4, 1958 in a Toronto telecast he had this to say, as reported in the Montreal Star of March 5:

> As long as I am Prime Minister, this government will not rest while one Canadian remains out of work. No one will be allowed to suffer.

Does the Minister of Labour say that no one is suffering today because of unemployment? Is that the position he takes? The Prime Minister spoke about this subject many times. In Halifax on March 24, with the election campaign drawing to a close, the Prime Minister had this to say: He said that his government—> —was launching "one of the greatest public works programs this country has ever seen" in order to stimulate employment. "I am able to tell you that we're over the peak as the result of our policies. I can see the light ahead—"

He was just getting the vision.

> "—and employment reasonable and complete, over the next few months."

On March 24, 1958 the Prime Minister was seeing the light. He was being shown the vision of employment "reasonable and complete" within the next few months. Over one year later we are facing a great unemployment crisis in this country that the government has not solved and is not dealing with in an effective manner. The Prime Minister went on:

> "I know what unemployment is. They don't have to tell me secondhand," he added. "But as long as I am Prime Minister, deficit or no deficit, no man or woman is going to be allowed to suffer because of unemployment."

With more than half a million unemployed the government reduces the deficit, but still no program to deal with this crisis. The Minister of Labour spoke in glowing terms of the government's winter works program, and it has been of some benefit. As the hon. minister pointed out, it is a demonstration that the provincial governments of this country and the federal government are able to co-operate on specific projects of value to the nation to put people to work. But how many people have been put to work? The minister says over 40,000. That is a commendable effort. But surely that is not the thing that should be concerning the minister in the main, the accomplishment of putting 40,000 to work when half a million are out of work. This is just a flea bite compared to the major effort which is needed.

The government last year held a conference. The conference was itself delayed and the report of the conference was delayed. We asked for its report many times; we expected that when published it would be a substantial report including specific proposals. What we were given at that time was merely a record of the words spoken at the conference. We shall have, next winter, I am certain, a difficult unemployment situation. We are facing a difficult unemployment situation even now, with summer at hand. And still the government has no program for dealing with this crisis.

The Leader of the Opposition said his party has a program, and he quoted his program. The Conservative party, does not lack a program either. What could be a better program than full employment? What could be a better program than employment at a reasonable level, no one being allowed to suffer? The fact is that the financial interests which dominate the thinking and actions of this Conservative party, just as they dominate the thinking and action of the official opposition, are not prepared for government action and government intervention to the degree necessary to provide full employment in this country.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask a question?

Mr. Argue: When I have concluded my speech I will be very glad to answer a question from the hon. member.

That is the reason why there has been a failure to deal with this problem. This is a situation which requires government action. It requires a government program, and it requires government intervention into the so-called free enterprise system which hon. gentlemen opposite love so much. These gentlemen are not prepared to accept the necessary intervention by government which alone will assure the welfare of the people of this country.

The provinces have co-operated with the government in its plans. They have done all they could. Some provinces have agreed to pay, not only 50 per cent of the cost of the wage component of the winter works program but 75 per cent. I think this points to an improvement which the minister could make in the winter works program for another year. The federal government should step up its contributions to these projects because, after all, it is not paying the total cost but merely paying a part of certain specific items in that cost. Since unemployment continues to present such serious difficulties, I suggest to the minister that now is the time to act. I suggest that now is the time to call the provinces together. They have been waiting for many months for a call to discuss financial matters. The government should call the provinces into session to discuss this central problem of unemployment as well as the financial problems which they face. These two issues are very closely related. I do not think they can be separated. They should form the agenda of a special federal-provincial conference called to deal with these important questions.

The federal government should not be satisfied with a winter works program dealing only with a specific area of employment. The government should be prepared to embark on a great federal program of its own. There are many areas in this country which need assistance. There are many industries which are languishing—the coal industry, the fishing industry, the agriculture industry. These are all industries which are sick and which need treatment, and if the government could, through its program, provide a better economic situation for these industries, that in turn would help create the kind of economic climate where full employment might be a possibility.

The government was very much interested in labour before the election. The government at one time was much interested in co-operating with labour and settling disputes whenever possible. But an entirely different attitude seems to have come over the administration since the election. Now that they have this tremendous majority—this crushing majority—now that they can use their steamroller tactics, they are not interested in settling labour disputes wherever possible. The dispute in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a case in point. The Minister of Labour was not prepared to act. It was necessary for a backbencher to come to the rescue and do what the minister himself should have been doing, namely try to settle this dispute. It would have been settled many weeks earlier, I am certain, if the government had not maintained what in effect was an anti-labour attitude.

Labour today in this country is being maligned. Labour today is being attacked on every front, and one of the worst attacks, one of the worst interferences with the freedom of trade unionists in this country has, of course, occurred in the province of Newfoundland. This, I suggest to the minister, is direct interference with free collective bargaining.

An hon. Member: On whose part?

Mr. Argue: On the part of the government of Newfoundland. This is a direct interference with human rights and fundamental freedoms in the province of Newfoundland. Mr. Chairman, I realize that under the rules I am not allowed at this time to ask the government to disallow this act, and therefore I am not going to do so. But it is possible to raise the question on the estimates of the Department of Labour and to call attention to this unnecessary interference, this unwarranted interference with free collective bargaining in this country. I think the Minister of Labour would be doing a service to the trade union movement if, on his responsibility as minister, he pointed out that the international woodworkers of America in the province of Newfoundland was a union properly certified under the law, a union which had not broken the law but which has, nevertheless, been decertified because a provincial legislature had interfered and changed the law. This is something with which the Minister of Labour must be concerned. It is something with which the Prime Minister should be concerned, and that is why we in this group say it is time we had a bill of rights embodied in the constitution of this country which would protect individual freedoms in this country—the freedom of association, the freedom to organize and the freedom of collective bargaining.

I know the government takes the attitude that its jurisdiction is very limited, but there are important constitutional authorities which disagree very strongly as to the basis for that position. There have been other instances this session when the position of the workers of this country was not taken into consideration. There was the case of Avro where 13,000 workers were unceremoniously dumped on to the streets following an announcement in this house. Since that time the Minister of Labour has said that his department is doing everything possible to have those workers placed in new jobs. He says the department is working on it, but the situation is difficult and they have not been having very much success so far.

On April 16 the Minister of Labour in reply to a question of mine said this, as reported at page 2738 of Hansard:

> At the time of the lay-off there were registrations totalling 11,582. The number who have been placed by the national employment office is 622. Those who have found work on their own total 1,179.

More than 13,000 workers lost their jobs and in the words of the minister himself, the number who have been placed by the national employment office is 622.

Let me continue my discussion of what seems to be the cavalier attitude of the government, an attitude that has brushed aside organized labour and is in fact failing to obey the spirit if not the letter of Canadian law. We have the case of the appointment of the commissioner to the unemployment insurance commission. As I said earlier in asking a question about this, it is not my intention to discuss any political considerations at all either one way or the other.

Mr. Grafftey: I do not blame you.

Mr. Argue: I believe the principle is very clear. The Unemployment Insurance Act laid down a method of procedure under the law and the minister failed to follow that procedure because before any consultation took place with organized labour the president of the Canadian Labour Congress was told that the Minister of Labour and the government had in mind Mr. A. F. MacArthur and we all know he is now in the job in spite of representations that have been made since then.

Mr. Small: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Argue: I said I was not discussing the person but the principle. I think the government made a great mistake in failing to carry out the letter of the law. I have no reason to think that the three labour nominees were well qualified but if the minister decided they were not well qualified for some reason, since they were endorsed by the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, I believe it was incumbent on the minister to open the door for the appointment of some person who would have been mutually satisfactory. Instead, however, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress wired the minister on March 24 asking for an appointment to discuss the matter and as far as we know there has not yet been a reply to the telegram. What an absence of good public relations.

This government had the best public relations before the last election but since it got its tremendous steamroller majority the public relations people apparently have been dropped and public relations is no longer a part of the operations of this government. It does not care whether it obeys the law set out in the statutes and it apparently cares less whether it has the confidence of organized labour in the people that are appointed to this important board.

It is very easy for members of parliament to be taken in by the hysterical campaign that is being directed against organized labour at this time. It really amounts to a smear campaign. According to reports one reads in the newspapers it would seem that organized labour—your friends and mine, your neighbours and mine—are a greater menace today than communism. I see in the newspapers today far more complimentary statements about Premier Khrushchev than about organized labour in Canada. I think that is a damnable and disgraceful attitude. I believe that organized labour is an extremely important part of democracy. I believe that the right of people to associate themselves together in an industry to bargain with their employer is something all of us should protect and cherish. I do not think it results in great conflict in the industry or in a breakdown of our economy. I believe it has the opposite effect of maintaining and increasing productivity.

If we read the newspaper, listen to the radio or observe television we would be led to conclude that half of the workers in the country are striking all the time. Let ten people go out on strike somewhere and that is national news which is hysterically shouted across the country. The Labour Gazette of February 27, 1959 sets out the facts at page 190, as follows:

> There were 260 work stoppages arising from industrial disputes in 1958 compared with 245 in 1957; time loss was somewhat higher and more workers were involved in 1958 than in 1957, according to a preliminary summary of strikes and lockouts released last month.

Let us see what that amounts to? I continue:

> The 260 work stoppages in 1958 involved 107,497 workers and a time loss of 2,879,120 man-working days. —the time lost in 1958 amounted to 0.24 per cent of the estimated working time—

That is all; less than ¼ of 1 per cent. On the assumption that a person who was on strike worked a 40-hour week this would mean that on the average, day in and day out, in all the strikes that were on in 1958, there were just 1,440 persons on strike. That is the great news, the source of complaint. The fact that one-half million people in Canada are unemployed apparently is a much smaller problem and considerably less newsworthy than the fact that a few hundred people were out on strike.

I presume that from time to time irresponsible people find their way into the trade unions but this is bound to happen. It happens in political parties too. For instance, there is one well-known member of the Conservative party who this year is taking quite an opposite line from the government. There are bound to be people who take an opposite view in any large organization. We see labour maligned today by the phony accusations that labour organizations are controlled outside of this country and that the strikes here are manipulated and managed in the United States. I wish to quote one sentence from page 213 of the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, that portion relating to Canada-United States economic relations. It reads:

> Not a single case has been found where a Canadian local has gone on strike under orders from international headquarters.

I would suggest that hon. members of this committee who doubt the integrity and the independence of the Canadian labour movement could do no better than read this very important finding. Labour has a good name which has been maliciously and wrongly maligned. Labour is not interested only in improved working conditions in industry; labour organizations have a great interest in the welfare of their members. Those involved in labour organizations are as good Canadians as the rest of us. They are interested in what is good for the nation. They have brought certain proposals to the government which I hope the government has under consideration.

For instance, the automobile industry through its Canadian director has asked the government to interview the automobile companies—the big three—to see if they will make a small car in Canada. Would that not be a good thing for our nation? I ask the minister if the interview has taken place and if the government has made any contact with the automobile industry to see if these companies are prepared to embark in the field of small car production.

The steel union through its Canadian director has also made a highly important submission to the government. Here is a union which is offering the government a method by which prices in this country could be held down. It is asking the government to have a public inquiry into the steel industry and I am certain the steel industry needs a public inquiry. It is very largely a monopoly. It shows a very rapid increase in profits; and although wages in the industry have gone up substantially, productivity has increased at a much more rapid rate. I would suggest that in the name of fair play this proposal by the steel workers should be accepted, and there should be a thorough inquiry into the steel industry of this country to find out why steel prices are so high and whether or not, in the view of the steel workers, they are unduly high.

As free citizens in this country, Mr. Chairman, many people in the trade union movement at this time are looking to the field of political action. This has not come about by a decision that was taken overnight; this has come about because of frustration, because of inaction by both Liberal and Conservative governments. I would suggest that the trade union movement of this country, believing it necessary, will do everything in its power to replace the old parties, to see that the kind of economic program, in the interests not only of labour but of all Canadians, is in fact placed on the statute books of this country.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask a question? The hon. member referred to the economic program, and he referred to it before. Is he including in that the nationalization of industry in order to bring about his program?

Mr. Howard: The hon. member asked me that question three months ago.

Mr. Argue: I made a 40-minute speech on that single subject in the budget debate. It is in Hansard. I do not want to try to avoid answering the hon. member's question. I believe in a mixed economy. I believe there is a field for public ownership and a growing area where public ownership is required. I believe—and I am certain that he believes and also his party—in private ownership where it is really competitive and not the great corporate ownership of which he is such a strong supporter.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask one other question? The hon. member says that he would nationalize certain industries. Would that include the steel industry and the rubber industry, for example?

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend will also find a specific answer to that question in the speech I made this session which is reported in Hansard.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, much has been made during the past few days about the appointment of Mr. MacArthur as labour's representative on the unemployment insurance commission, and much has been made of the protests of the Canadian Labour Congress about the appointment on the ground that Mr. MacArthur was not one of the names which had been submitted by the congress. I should like to take a few moments to deal with the attitude of the C.L.C. in this regard; but before doing so I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the answer I received from the hon. member for Essex

East to the question I put to him. When I put a question to him about the appointment of Hal Banks to represent the Canadian workers at a convention in Geneva, the hon. member for Essex East replied, as reported at page 3368 of Hansard:

I should be glad to answer that question. I understand that Mr. Banks was appointed by the workers as their delegate; and the government of the day respected the wishes of the workers of the country.

I further understand that he got his understanding from his deskmate. At that time the Leader of the Opposition was satisfied with what he thought was a proper answer to my question because he said:

Are there any more questions?

I would like to deal with his remarks and the answer to the question that I received the night before last. It is a shame and it is a disgrace to the former administration that they would submit to any representation on behalf of any group or any individual that Hal Banks, a known American gangster, could represent Canadian workers outside of this country. It is also a disgrace to the former administration that he should have been given the status of a landed immigrant in this country and should represent Canadian workers at a convention.

Mr. Pearson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacInnis: I will adopt the same attitude as was adopted by the hon. member for Essex East and not permit any questions at this time, because my questions were avoided the other night.

Mr. Pearson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacInnis: I was not permitted that privilege the other night. I will continue with my remarks, as other hon. members have done, and at the end of my remarks I will answer questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: When hon. gentlemen get tired I shall continue with my point of order. If the hon. gentleman thinks he can be so discourteous as to refuse questions I would remind you, sir, that we are discussing—

Mr. Harkness: This is not a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour for 1959-60, not the appointment of Mr. Banks by a trade union organization to the international labour office delegation some years ago. I would not have taken the slightest exception to what the hon. gentleman was saying if he had had the courtesy to permit the question that the Leader of the Opposition wished to pose to him. But I submit to you, sir, that the hon. gentleman is completely out of order in discussing something that happened several years ago and had nothing to do with the hon. gentleman who now administers this department.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): There is no point of order here. It is a well known fact that on the first item any hon. member can speak on general items with regard to the department which is under discussion. This is what the hon. member is doing. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is always on his feet speaking about points of order and questions of privilege. There is no point of order here at all.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman is out of order because he was discussing not only the appointment some years ago but an appointment which was an appointment made by a trade union to the I.L.O., and not a government appointment in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Harkness: That is not a point of order; it is a statement.

Mr. Pearson: A true statement.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition is taking advantage of the Chair.

The Chairman: Order. I ask hon. members to please permit the hon. member who has the floor to carry on with his remarks, and not to speak all at once. It is extremely difficult to try to understand what the point of order is when many members are speaking at the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be very happy to repeat it.

The Chairman: I suggest the hon. member be permitted to continue.

Mr. MacInnis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to make just one observation on the point of order. I have not learned, and I do not think I ever will learn in this house the meaning of courtesy from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. My objection to answering any questions at this time is just the same as the reason I received a couple of nights ago from the hon. member for Essex East. I feel that the appointment of an American gangster to represent Canadians was a discredit to anybody who had anything to do with appointing him.

The Leader of the Opposition has also made the statement that appointment to the I.L.O. conference is not a government appointment.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, I did not say that at all. The hon. member is misquoting me. I am sure he wants to be right. I said that it was a workers' appointment to the I.L.O.; it was not a government appointment. That is what I said.

Mr. MacInnis: It is a strange thing, but we have had this particular question up in the last couple of weeks. I will quote from the constitution of the I.L.O. to prove that the Leader of the Opposition is wrong and that this is a government appointment in agreement with organized labour.

My own union is not affiliated with the Canadian congress, although there are many workers in my constituency who are. Recently there have been delegates appointed to the I.L.O. coal committee meeting at Geneva. The procedure followed in the appointment of these delegates is that the Minister of Labour is required, according to I.L.O. regulations, to consult with the Canadian Labour Congress, which is the largest representative group of labour in the country, who in turn appoint these delegates to go to the meeting.

The practice followed in the United States by the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. is that they turn over these appointments to the united mine workers. The point I should like to bring out here is the attitude of the C.L.C. on appointments. Rather than turn over the appointment of delegates to the largest group of coal miners in the country, the C.L.C. saw fit to appoint a couple of their own men to attend this conference in Geneva. I should like to read the paragraph of the I.L.O. regulations under which these appointments are made. It reads:

> The members undertake to nominate non-government delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organizations, if such organizations exist, which are most representative of employers or work-people, as the case may be, in their respective countries.

The minister consults with the head of the C.L.C., who then appoints these delegates to go to the conference. In this case the C.L.C. completely ignored representations made by the largest organized group of coal miners in this country, namely the united mine workers, district 26, Nova Scotia, and instead they appointed delegates who had no more coal mining experience than working in what would be termed a bootleg mine. However, the delegates just happened to be affiliated with Mr. Jodoin's union. This gives you an idea of how they handle appointments.

Mr. Pearson: Why did the government not stop that appointment?

Mr. MacInnis: The government fulfilled its obligation when it went to the C.L.C. and asked for nominations. The same situation applied with respect to the matter of the unemployment insurance commission, although the members in the opposition would like to deny that. The C.L.C. executive should be very careful, in view of these two different situations, to see that the attitude they are exhibiting is one which will stand up to honest scrutiny. I have made reference today to the attitude toward the appointment of these delegates to the I.L.O. coal committee meeting in Geneva and the attitude they have adopted toward the Minister of Labour. The mine workers of Nova Scotia were not properly recognized for the simple reason they are not affiliated with Mr. Jodoin's congress.

If I may return to the subject of the congress' recommendations, it would be interesting now to find out their attitude toward Mr. Banks since they have been joined recently by Mr. Stanley Knowles. Representatives of the united mine workers of America have been corresponding with the Minister of Labour on this matter and, because of his own political affiliation, the president of the union at home would like to leave the impression that this situation is all the fault of the Minister of Labour. I was in communication, personally, with Mr. Jodoin on this matter. He has indicated no intention of doing anything about it this year, but he would be happy to consider the representations made next year by the united mine workers. This would depend, of course, on the attitude of the united mine workers toward his congress and whether he could ever hope to have them affiliated.

The C.L.C. speaks about political patronage and the fact that their advice was not followed. I might say that so far as I am concerned C.L.C. headquarters is just a nest of their own personal patronage. This has been made evident by the recent appointments made to the coal miners' meeting. There are more politicians down at C.L.C. headquarters than there are in this House of Commons.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that a man with Mr. MacArthur's background in the labour movement ought to do a good job. He was sufficiently respected in the movement to be a candidate against this same Mr. Jodoin a few years ago. I cannot understand why the other labour representatives would think this appointment was so detrimental to the interests of labour that they should resign. I should think that if there were likely to be some detriment to labour, and I were in a position to offset it or fight it, the last thing I would think of would be to resign. I would think it would be very much better to stay there and fight any detrimental effect they might think Mr. MacArthur would have. The fact that Mr. MacArthur was at one time in a position to run against Mr. Jodoin for the presidency of the trades and labour congress is an indication that he must have been well qualified in the labour field. Otherwise, he would never even have been considered for the leadership. I do not believe that Mr. MacArthur is any Johnny-come-lately to the labour field as others have been.

The other evening the hon. member for Timmins made reference to the back door of labour. This back door of labour never got such a going over as it did during the recent appointment of Mr. Stanley Knowles who was taken into the Canadian congress by way of the back door. I say this because of my knowledge of labour unions. I know that certainly in my own labour union I could not qualify for committee work if I did not have a certain attendance record at my own local union. If I were to qualify to go to a district convention I would have to have at least 50 per cent attendance record over the period of the last six months. How could Stanley Knowles, therefore, walk into the Canadian Labour Congress convention and be appointed by any fair means? How could he receive an appointment in the Canadian Labour Congress when he had spent the last number of years far removed from any affiliation with labour? He claims an affiliation through the typographical union and his union card. Perhaps he has one, but I understand he did not get it from the Winnipeg area. He had to go down to Ontario to pick that up.

I know that a great number of professional men in my province were some time or other, affiliated with either the steelworkers union or the miners union. They earned the money at these occupations to continue their education and go into the other fields. However, these men do not go around talking about their affiliation of 15 or 20 years ago with these unions, nor do they take this sanctimonious attitude toward labour. How interested in labour was Mr. Knowles during the 1957 session when the hon. member for Kootenay West chaired a four-party meeting on the matter of Mr. Banks? We had Mr. Knowles' attitude towards labour then.

I could ask some questions of the hon. ember for Essex East. He was the champion of labour here a couple of nights ago and he might be the champion of labour here this time next year. But it is not a consistent attitude on his part and it is not very well taken when he gets to his feet and likes to champion such a cause.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just arrived. Don't be too hard on me.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Timmins had great criticism to offer with respect to the appointment of Mr. MacArthur. He must have been quite badly taken aback when the Minister of Labour had cause to rise and read telegrams that he had received from his own president and his own secretary-treasurer. It has been said that the confidence of labour has been lost in this appointment of Mr. MacArthur and that his appointment is a great defeat to the labour men in this country. That is ridiculous. Because Claude Jodoin or Stanley Knowles or a few other people are elected heads of the union in this country does not necessarily mean that they are representing the views of labour on every issue that might be before labour. The situation is the same in my own union back home. We will always have our Bankses, our Hoffas and our Dolhantegs. In case you do not know who Dolhanteg is, Mr. Chairman, I may say that he is an officer in my own local back home. I could expound on his attitude on unions here for hours and tell you a few things about what this man's attitude is on unions. But because they are elected representatives of unions, it does not necessarily mean that they are at all times voicing the opinions of the union or of labour. I am quite well aware of how these labour conventions operate. It will be extremely interesting to observe how many fellows within the next number of years will be put up to run against Mr. Jodoin and to see how democratically he handles his labour congress in that regard. It will be interesting to see how many men can rise up in the ranks of labour.

Speaking of rising in the ranks of labour, may I say it is a shame what happened. Just about a year ago the automobile workers were up from Windsor; there was a delegation. They had a committee there which spoke for Canada. The hon. member for Essex East was present that day but he did not expound too much on his theories of labour that day, as I recall it. These men were here. It was clearly evident that among them there were delegates who could very well speak for the ranks of labour and do so more effectively than any Stanley Knowles, any Donald MacInnis, or any other member of parliament, especially when dealing with their own particular problems. Why should Stanley Knowles be taken in the back door of the Canadian Labour Congress over and above such people who have spent their lifetime working in the interests of labour? Why should he be shoved in there? They need men like Stanley Knowles to talk for them. But at the same time, among their own men there are any number who can do a better job of talking than can the same Mr. Knowles. At least, when they talk, they talk with sincerity, something which I doubt very much he has when it comes to labour.

This idea of criticizing the appointment of Mr. MacArthur was carried just a little bit too far, in my opinion, in view of the fact that his qualifications for such a job were outstanding. As for members associated or affiliated with the labour congress resigning, that is just another way of lying down. I feel that these fellows should stand behind the fact that they have already been appointed, should look after the interests of labour and should not resign because the game is not going to be played according to their rules. The fact that the Minister of Labour does consult with the congress does not necessarily mean, as has been pointed out in this chamber several times, that he is going to take without question recommendations put forward by them. It must be understood that the Canadian Labour Congress which I understand has a strength of over a million men, still does not represent the entire working force in this country.

Before resuming my seat I should like once again to say, now that the hon. member for Essex East is in his seat, that the answer I received with regard to the appointment of Hal Banks as a representative of Canadian workers to the conference in Geneva was anything but proper. Again I repeat that it was a most shameful thing to have any government appoint a man who represented American gangsters to represent Canadian workers.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, during the debate on the budget, I referred to certain newspaper headlines which might be used in writing the story of the present Conservative administration. In some of those headlines there was reference to a deficit unequalled in this country's history; in others, to unprecedented taxation.

In yesterday's edition of La Presse, I found still another headline which might also help write the story of this Conservative government. Indeed, in its issue, of yesterday, May 6, La Presse had a heading which ran:

Worker's unemployment insurance contributions are going up.

The item then went on to say, among other things:

Amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act just introduced by the cabinet in the House of Commons, will result in increasing the worker's contribution without increasing the weekly benefits of the insured.

Thus in the case of a man earning $51 a week the insurance premium will be 72 cents instead of the present 56 cents. The weekly benefit, however, will remain at $21 for the single man, and $30 for the man with dependents. The increased contribution applies to all workers.

During the budget debate, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) did no end of juggling with words. He toyed with them so much that the people of Canada had the impression that the government was not raising taxes very much on small salaries.

Well, Mr. Chairman, in the light of the report I just quoted, and of what happened yesterday in this house, we can see that, beyond the shadow of a doubt, this government has indirectly increased the taxes that will be paid by the small wage earner.

During the last two elections, we were told that the Conservative government would cut down taxes and government expenditures too. What happened since the Conservative party came into power is exactly the opposite. Present conditions further subtantiate my argument: The small wage earner is being, as I said, indirectly taxed, and workers who will be paying increased contributions to the unemployment insurance fund will not be getting increased benefits. It is even stated, in the schedule of contributions which will have to be paid by small wage earners that a person who gets a wage as little as $9 a week will have to pay in an extra dime a week into the unemployment insurance fund.

That, sir, is this government's achievement. I mention this just by the way and my purpose in rising today is to put before the house a plan which has been dear to me for many years.

For the last three years, Mr. Chairman, I have had put on the order paper a resolution designed to help people of 45 years or more, who want to find a job. I should like to quote this resolution which I put on the order paper on January 15 last, and which, I am afraid, will not be discussed during this session:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing, during the current session of Parliament, legislation that would facilitate the employment, in federal works, undertakings or businesses, as defined in section 2 of chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada, 1956, or in any corporation set up to perform some function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada, of male or female persons over 45 years of age who, on account of their age, find it difficult to secure proper employment at the present time.

It is most imperative, Mr. Chairman, that the federal government urgently introduce some bill to stop a discrimination which is sowing discontent and raising a problem which is already extremely serious and is growing increasingly so in Canada.

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, if such legislation were passed by parliament, it would fall short of its full effect until a similar one was passed by the various provincial legislatures.

As I suggested during the budget debate, a federal-provincial conference should be called as soon as possible in order to settle many issues concerning the central government and the various legislatures. And those issues should include the matter I am again submitting this afternoon. It is a matter of the utmost significance, Mr. Chairman, and should be settled at the very earliest opportunity.

In a question that went on the order paper some time ago, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), how many people 45 years old and over were at that time looking for work. The answer I got was that, for the week ending January 19, 1959, there were 143,000 such people, i.e. about 35 per cent of all people then unemployed. As I mentioned, the problem of those people 45 or over who are being refused jobs because of their age must be settled without delay.

You can imagine, sir, the anxiety, the distress of a man with dependents, a man in the prime of life who, though only 45, 50 or 55 years old, has all kinds of trouble finding a job because of his age. Imagine fathers who need employment to support their family and provide for their children's education and who, at a time when they need it most, cannot find any work, and are being discriminated against because of their age. Imagine those jobless men with dependents, wandering from plant to plant, from office to office, trying to find a job and earn an honest living for their families. A man 45, 50 or 55 is still well able to support his family, and wants nothing so much as a chance to do so. But there is discrimination I just referred to which constitutes a crying injustice toward a large sector of the population of this country.

I have had occasion in recent years, to discuss the matter in this house; and as a result of my representations, I have received many letters from people in that category, describing their plight. I should like to quote from some of those letters.

On August 19, 1958, I received a letter from a citizen in Longueuil who says in part:

[Mr. Rouleau.]

Dear Sir:

I had a job with the Canadian Pratt & Whitney Engines, in Longueuil. I was told that, when over 45 we were laid off, and I went a long way in order to find another job; I was always turned away, too old even at 40. Mr. Rouleau, we will have to wait for the old-age pension or operate a blind-pig in order to make a living.

I am sure the person who wrote me that letter will not operate a blind-pig in the constituency of Longueuil, because that riding is well represented. But, when a person writes a letter of that kind to say he will have to resort to dishonest means to make a living because he cannot find a job any more, I think it is an indication that the problem is really serious and must be considered and solved as soon as possible.

On February 26, 1959, Mrs. Bensmiller wrote to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), to say, among other things:

(Text):

My husband passed away in November 1958. Since that time I have found that it is impossible to find work because I am 49.

(Translation):

The Leader of the Opposition replied to that letter on March 3, as follows:

(Text):

Dear Mrs. Bensmiller:

I agree with you that this is a matter which deserves the attention of governments, both at the provincial and federal level, and I have been giving a great deal of thought to it myself.

(Translation):

Another letter was sent to the Leader of the Opposition on February 23, 1959, by Miss Grace M. Parker, one paragraph of which reads as follows:

(Text):

I believe the government will first have to pass a new law regarding company benefits. It appears that firms will not hire females over the age of 45 years and males—the age limit is 35 years. I have been told by businessmen that benefits are not transferable in case one wishes to make a change and that the insurance companies have set the age limit for hiring. The new law should change this to permit a firm to hire older people and either grant benefits on a lower rate or else without benefits. Also that benefits should be transferable. There are many thousands of people out of work through no fault of their own.

(Translation):

Those are, Mr. Chairman, some of the numerous letters which the hon. members sitting on this side of the house or myself have received.

Among the letters sent to me, there were really pathetic cases, and it is with tears in my eyes that I read them. That is why, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the government to do its utmost to check this social unrest.

The premier of Ontario pointed out that situation, not very long ago, and stated the problem had to be solved. Well, as premier, he should have introduced some legislation to solve it at least in so far as Ontario is concerned. On the national plane, it is up to the federal parliament, in the first place, to introduce the type of legislation I have just referred to.

A short time ago, the member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) himself asked in this house that such people be helped through the granting of a tax reduction to firms employing a certain percentage of workers over 45 years old.

Mr. Chairman, if we keep on with this discrimination, there will be more and more social unrest. What would happen if we set an age limit to people seeking public office, to those who strive to get themselves elected in the various fields of public endeavour, either here in the Canadian parliament, or in the provincial legislatures, or in municipal councils? We would be deprived of people of ability, of men who can render services to the country, if an age limit of 45 were set for those who seek public office. First of all, we would be deprived of the services of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and thus the Canadian people would not know what is a Conservative administration such as the one we now have. Thus the Canadian people would be deprived of the services of great statesmen who are anxious to serve the Canadian nation. Half the membership of the house, and more, and half the membership of provincial legislatures, would be ruled out, and thus we would lose the precious contribution of able men.

It has never occurred to anyone, Mr. Chairman, to set an age limit on those seeking public office. So why set an age limit in the field of business? Such a discriminatory practice is contrary to human dignity, and we have a duty, as members of the federal parliament, just as members of the provincial legislatures have a duty, to find some solution to this serious source of social unrest. To achieve this, as I was suggesting, the matter should be discussed at a federal-provincial conference.

I have been very carefully going through legislation of this type that has been enacted by a number of American states. I have studied with particularly close attention legislation aimed at ending discrimination against people of 45 and over, which has been adopted by the states of New York, Massachussetts, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. Generally, such legislation makes it illegal for an employer to require applicants for employment to state their age. Under such legislation, an employer is forbidden to mention, in classified ads published in daily and weekly newspapers, and in radio or television broadcasts, such a requirement as "aged from 21 to 35". It is also illegal to require that an applicant be under 45.

This legislation even prohibits the use of the phrase "young men or young women". Every application, under such legislation, has to be considered on its merit, without regard to age.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that is a measure which shows concern for humanity and which should be adopted without delay by the Canadian parliament and even by our provincial legislature in order that those benefits be made available to all. It is our duty, as members of parliament whatever our political allegiance, to find a solution to the problems which confront the Canadian nation and especially the people I have just mentioned.

During the past years, when this country was being administered by a Liberal government, I have had occasion to support a bill introduced by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—she was not of cabinet rank at the time—providing equal pay to women for equal work. Feeling that the bill was premature, the liberal government defeated it. However, although I was a member of the Liberal party, I supported the bill then introduced by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Some years later, under the St. Laurent Liberal government, the hon. lady who is now Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had the satisfaction of seeing the legislation she was advocating endorsed by the parliament of Canada. I therefore urge the minister today to do likewise about a legislation which would remove all discrimination against people of 45 or over. I wish with all my heart, in the best interest of the population and of all Canadian families, that the government, during this session or a later one, will introduce a bill which will forever eliminate this discrimination so that all these family heads, all those deserving workers, may have a chance to make a living unhampered by such discrimination.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to begin what I have to say by referring to the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I regret he is not in his place at the moment to hear what I have to say about them. First of all, he made the comment that at the present time there were more active politicians in the Canadian Labour Congress than there were in this house. That is possibly the conclusion which the hon. member may have drawn after participating with his colleagues in the work of this parliament, but it is certainly not the impression I have gathered working with the C.C.F. group in this corner. The hon. member also made a great to-do about the fact that at one time Mr. MacArthur ran against Claude Jodoin. I do not know the organization and the constitution of the local union to which he belongs, but for the hon. member's information I may say that is the privilege which is held by each and every delegate who attends the convention of the Canadian Labour Congress. Any delegate attending that convention has the privilege of running against the president or against any other officer if he so wishes.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South also made a specific reference to remarks I was supposed to have made about backdoor entry into the union. If he will look at the record in Hansard I think he will find I made no mention of any backdoor into the union. I did mention backdoor politics and I intend to say something more along that line today. The hon. member also made the statement that Mr. Stanley Knowles was appointed as executive officer of the congress. That is not correct. An executive officer of the congress is not appointed; the post is filled by election at a democratically-held convention. As a matter of fact, the remarks made by the hon. member were an insult to each and everyone of the 1,700 delegates who attended the last C.C.L. convention in the city of Winnipeg. The hon. member also made reference to Hal Banks and of his great concern in this matter. I ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South: what has he or the members of the government which he supports done about it over the last two years since they were elected?

The hon. member also made reference to a couple of telegrams which were read by the Minister of Labour the other night, and I should like to quote them briefly, now. The first was a telegram from Mr. Walter Childs, president of the provincial federation of Ontario professional firefighters, saying: "Your appointment MacArthur shows exceedingly good judgment." I think that in order to assess correctly the value of this telegram one should know a little of the background of this particular officer. I have known him for many years, at least since 1949. I know he was president of the Brantford local. I also know he ran three times in his own district for vice-president of the district, and that he could never make it. I also know that even though he had never served on the provincial executive he was the only man on whom the various factions concerned could compromise in the city of Fort William in 1955 in order to keep a C.C.F.'er out of the president's chair. I also know something else, and I think this is very important, if we are properly to assess the value of this particular telegram. I will recall one day at an executive meeting, recommending a former attorney general of the province of Ontario as an arbitrator for the firefighters throughout the province. I may say that this man was also a former Conservative cabinet minister. And then this president of the provincial federation said he could not recommend him. I wanted to know why, and he said: "He is in the black books of the government". I was puzzled, and asked: "How could a former cabinet minister be in the black books of the government?" "Well," he said "He is too pro-labour". I think we should remember that when we assess the value of those two telegrams.

Mr. Pallett: Why not give us the name?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The name is already there—Mr. Walter Childs, president of the provincial federation of Ontario firefighters.

The second telegram was from Mr. Bob Gilbert and it reads as follows: "Congratulations on your appointment of MacArthur."

Mr. Pallett: Who was the former cabinet minister? Put it on record.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have no objections. Mr. Leslie Blackwell, who contested the leadership of the Conservative party in Ontario against Mr. Frost.

I also have on my file a letter from this same Bob Gilbert which is very interesting and very enlightening. It followed that same convention in 1955. At that time, the executive dispensed with the services of its provincial solicitor. It was said he was not competent to remain in office. In his place we engaged another solicitor on the recommendation of one of the biggest locals in the province. When I returned after a short vacation following that convention I received a letter from this same individual the contents of which indicated that they wanted the decision reconsidered. The new appointee was a Liberal and they wanted reconsideration of the appointment of the other man because he was a Conservative and a friend of the government even though he was not competent. It is small wonder that there should have been congratulatory telegrams on this latest Conservative appointment.

Over the years I have attended a number of annual provincial conventions of this organization and it is interesting to note the speakers who were selected to address those meetings. In 1949 in St. Catharines the speaker was a Conservative cabinet minister. In 1951 in Hamilton the speaker was a Conservative cabinet minister. In 1952 in Oshawa the speaker was a Conservative member of parliament who sat in the opposition and who is now Minister of Labour. In 1953 in Brantford the speaker was a Conservative premier. In 1955 in Fort William the speaker was a Conservative cabinet minister. In 1956 in Brockville the speaker was a Conservative cabinet minister. In 1958 in Niagara Falls the speaker was a Conservative cabinet minister. Never to my knowledge have we had a speaker address this organization who was other than a Conservative member of parliament, a Conservative member of a provincial legislature or a Conservative cabinet minister or appointee.

There is an interesting and significant point to be made in regard to these two telegrams. Possibly hon. members are not aware that the Ontario firefighters as a unit have no particular interest whatever in the unemployment insurance fund. When a man joins the staff of a fire department of a municipality in the province of Ontario unemployment insurance contributions are deducted for the first two years of his employment. After two years of service with the department he is qualified as a permanent employee and his contributions cease. He cannot draw unemployment insurance in the event he is laid off. The organization as such, therefore, has no real interest in the fund. Why then should such an organization through its president and secretary send congratulatory telegrams to the Minister of Labour? I am not going to accuse the minister of soliciting these telegrams. I will merely suggest that he received congratulatory telegrams from two very close political friends of long standing. I wish to make it clear that I did not raise this issue. It was first raised by the Minister of Labour and then by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Then there is another point of even greater importance. There has been no specific reference made to the fact that working people across the country have a big stake in the unemployment insurance fund. Approximately 50 per cent of that fund is money they have paid in; it is their money. Certainly they are entitled to have their representative on the commission that administers this fund and unemployment insurance as a whole. I suggest that is the basic reason for the section in the act that provides that the labour representative is to be appointed to the commission following consultation with labour. I do not see that it is proper to go through the motions of consulting labour and then proceed to appoint the individual you had selected in the first place.

It is true that Mr. MacArthur has the confidence of some people in the labour movement. Proof of that is perhaps to be found in the telegrams to which I made reference. I do not deny that. The fact remains, however, that apparently Mr. MacArthur does not have the confidence of the majority of the people in the labour movement and I do not think the labour representative on the commission should represent a minority of the labour movement.

I do not know what the purpose of this appointment was but unfortunately I believe I can foresee what the results will be. It is going to cause disunity and confusion within the ranks of labour across Canada. I hope that was not the purpose of this appointment.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks let me assure hon. members of the committee that I do not intend to review the past today. I wish, however, to place before the committee a few thoughts with regard to labour in my constituency.

For many years labour in Canada was suppressed by big business. During the twenties and thirties people were pushed out of their jobs. After the war labour completely organized and became a very powerful group in the country. Today we have what might be called two sectors of the labour movement, the group of business people in management and the group of union leaders, jockeying for position, I believe they are using the rank and file members of the unions for gain.

I should like to discuss today the demerits of the new political party the wedding of which has been announced and is to take place shortly. I do not feel that the rank and file people in the unions want this merger to occur. Mr. Knowles in talking about the new political party indicated that it would represent the workers, farmers and similar groups of people across the country. May I point out that the Conservative party already does that. Our membership comprises a miner from the east coast, a fisherman from the east coast, people in various occupations and trades from the west coast and people from all walks of life and a variety of ethnic, cultural and social backgrounds. Some members of this party came from homes that knew poverty during the depression and had to rely on charity to see them through. We are by no means the people of the big business interests, the people who are scheming to control the economy of Canada. The people who are scheming in this way are the Stanley Knowleses of today. People who think in that way have lost the farm support and so they cannot become a truly national party. My understanding is that even within the little group of eight in this house there is a great deal of dissension about the methods whereby the new political party may come into being. Surely a man like Stanley Knowles who could not even plan his own election could not plan the economy of the country as a whole.

I suspect that at the convention of the Canadian Labour Congress in Winnipeg last year a group of barefaced politicians tried to sneak in the back door and take over. I also suspect, however, that they have taken over the Canadian Labour Congress only on the surface; perhaps only in the newspapers. I conclude from letters written to me by people in my constituency that the average worker wants an honest living, the right of free collective bargaining. The average worker does not want to be suppressed by big business. He does not want any politician to come in and tell him how he is going to vote and where he is going to vote.

Mr. Knowles in elaborating on the theme of the new political party has said that there is going to be a planned economy. What he really means is a controlled economy or the nationalization of industry. I asked the hon. member for Assiniboia today a question about nationalization and he told me to read the speech he made on the budget. I have now had an opportunity to examine his speech and I found that in it he was again walking down the middle of the nice red line and would not commit himself.

Much reference has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to broken Conservative promises. During the last election campaign I heard some statements made by C.C.F. candidates in my constituency, including statements made by a C.C.F. member of the legislature of Ontario, on public platforms. In effect they said that if the party came into power they would take over the steel companies, the rubber companies, Proctor and Gamble which is a soap company, and various other organizations. They proposed taking them over completely. I was rather amazed by this statement and asked how they would do it.

Mr. Winch: I am amazed too.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Well, you had better go down to Hamilton and talk to your socialist friends there who are scheming just as you are with the Canadian Labour Congress in an effort to hurt the little man in this country, to push him around and tell him how and when and where to vote. You boys have a rude awakening in store for you, you can be sure of that.

What is happening with respect to the taking over of industry? I asked the question: "How do you intend to take it over?" He said: "We are going to buy the industry." I replied: "You are going to buy all the large industries in Canada?" He said: "Oh, yes." This is what the C.C.F. representative of the district said. He said: "We are going to buy all the stock of all these big capitalists; we are not going to steal them". I said: "If the stock of Dominion Foundries and Steel is worth $30 today, are you going to pay $30 for it?" He said: "No, we are going to pay the price of the stock when it first started off." Today the great percentage of the holders of stock in industry are the little people of the communities, the people who are buying the stock. They are going to steal the stock of these people when they come into power.

Mr. Winch: That is damned eyewash, and you know it.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I remember the hon. member for Vancouver East back in 1943. I remember reading some speeches that he made. He said that when they came into power they would scrap the British North America Act; they would make this country a police state.

Mr. Winch: That is a dirty lie; I never said that in my life. I said it would be reviewed and revamped.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will have to ask the hon. member for Vancouver East to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Winch: Sir, when a persons utters a dirty lie what do you say? I withdraw the word "lie". I said it would be reviewed and revamped and in my six years in the House of Commons I have made my position on the British North America Act very clear.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I thank the hon. member for his interruption. I am not the long-winded politician type. I probably will not go until six o'clock.

With respect to the labour-C.C.F. amalgamation, I feel it is a great mistake for the average trade union movement in Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia spoke a few minutes ago and in two or three paragraphs of his speech he talked about what trade unionism was in Canada. He said it was a banding together of a group of people to put forth their views and to get the best deal possible over the collective bargaining table. It was not to have political hatchetmen like Stanley Knowles come in the back door and having a check-off of money to sponsor a political party for people who wanted to vote the other way. In a labour magazine that came out just recently Mr. Knowles said that there were people in the labour movement who were Conservative and Liberals. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, if there were not I would not be here today. I make these little references to gentlemen who are trying to get in by the back door. They have talked to Mr. Jodoin and a few of their associates in the back rooms. They have schemed as to how they are going to analyse the situation, how they are going to play the labour classes of the country against the big businessmen, trying to squeeze the small businessman in the middle and give a variety of things to everyone.

Since this government has taken office it has instituted a national health scheme with the provinces who want to participate. The policy of the C.C.F. in the past has been—the hon. member for Essex East frowns. I remember also that according to the Liberal platform of 1919 they were going to bring in a health scheme in 1920, as soon as they got elected. But in all the years that he was in power, and he was in power for 22 years, the hon. member for Essex East did not do it. I know in the last part—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member will come back to the Department of Labour.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I was just trying to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the policies of the C.C.F. party, which they are putting forth with labour, they are mixing the two.

This government has taken decisive steps to help the working man. They are not all the steps that I would like to see taken; I would like to see more, but I do not want to see under any circumstances the possibility that my children will be living in a socialistic, nationalistic state such as has been schemed for by the socialist people around my area. I do not like it. I do not think it is the proper thing. I think it would be the ruination of the economy. Mr. Reuther, president of the automotive workers in the United States, was asked by a group of people if he thought that the trade unionists in the United States should get into the political business and he stated in a magazine, the U.S. News and World Report, of December 9, 1958, that the American labour movement is committed to work within the framework of the two-party system, the republican and democratic parties in the United States. Hon. members can see the way in which our economy—as we saw in the 22 years that the Liberals were in power—is tied in with that of the United States. If this country were to become a socialist state under C.C.F. domination, just think of the political implications there would be with the steelworkers of America on the one hand bargaining and Canadians on the other with the steel industry because, if you took over the steel industry, as the hon. member for Assiniboia said they would do during the budget debate, if you took over this industry, what would happen to the voice of the trade union boys? They would be working for the government and not for a group of collective people sponsored to bargain for their rights?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question? How do the employees of the Ontario hydro bargain with their employers now?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I am glad the hon. member asked that question.

Mr. Winch: Answer it.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I will answer it the way the hon. members for Essex East and for Assiniboia answer questions. Do you agree that the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East do not answer questions in the house properly? I have a certain conception about energy and about hydroelectric systems. I am trying to make a point with respect to United States control and the steelworkers of America control over the steel companies. If the steel companies were told that possibly the C.C.F. party would take over this country they would be bargaining with a steelworkers union in the United States which did not believe in the taking over of industry. Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member this question? Does he also have any interest in the United States companies in his own riding which control companies to such an extent that they cannot sell outside of Canada because of this United States control?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Yes, I have a lot of them in my riding.

Mr. Winch: I will give the hon. member the names of the companies if he wants them.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I know them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was trying to discuss in a very humble way the delusion that the C.C.F. party has about forming a new political party in Canada. Before I continue with my remarks I want to say that I made a statement about the hon. member for Vancouver East, and I am sorry he is not here right now. I do not want to misrepresent what he has said so I have the press clippings here. There is a statement reported in the Calgary Herald of November 10, 1943:

> Asked about the position of the police and military forces in the event of a move for a change, Mr. Winch replied, "When we become the government, we will institute socialism immediately, and would use the power of the police and military forces to force those who oppose to obey the law."

Well, that would happen anyway, I suppose. That is just what he said.

> Those who defy the government will be treated as criminals. If the capitalists say no, then we will know the answer and so did Russia.

He was asked another question, and he replied:

> We are going to scrap the British North America Act.

These statements were reported in the Calgary Herald of November 10, 1943. Then, as reported in the Vancouver Province of February 14, 1944, he said this:

> I did not say one thing in Calgary that other C.C.F. people have not been saying for the last 11 years.

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member who is speaking can show me how remarks of this kind which he is now making are relevant to the labour estimates?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I thank you for correcting me, Mr. Chairman. I just wanted to point out that the remarks I made before recess were not made just to embarrass the hon. member for Vancouver East. I have the facts and I just wanted to bring them to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the hon. member would indicate the source of his quotations?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I have all kinds of quotations here. I have been quoting from the Calgary Herald for November 10, 1943. These statements were made by the hon. member for Vancouver East, and I can send the newspaper clipping over to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: I just wanted to identify it for the record. I am sure that the record will show the hon. member objected to that and said he never said it.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I should like to sum up my speech with a few observations concerning the trade union movement in Canada today. The trade union movement today actually has four things to fear. They are, first of all, communistic activities in the trade union movement; racketeers; political interference by the C.C.F. party; and a lack of interest on the part of rank and file trade unionists. If the people in the trade union movement band together to fight for those things for which the trade union movement stands, then I am sure that these people will be able to put their views strongly before any government in the country. I think it is suicide for them to affiliate with a political party because they would be getting away from the things for which the trade union movement was designed. I would humbly submit that the C.C.F. party, in affiliating with the Canadian Labour Congress, will have a very difficult job.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have just one question which I should like the hon. member to answer before he sits down. He has painted a very gloomy picture of what the trade union movement would become under a C.C.F. government. Does the hon. member know that the only civil servants in Canada today with bargaining rights are those employed by a C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I am glad the hon. member enlightened me about these facts. I am putting my views forward, and that is the purpose for which I was sent here by my constituency. If those views do not suit the hon. member, I am sorry about it.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I believe that taking part in the discussion on the first item is bound to shorten to a very considerable extent consideration of the estimates, because whatever the subject dealt with, we have only half an hour at our disposal to express our views on various subjects, and so, when the different items, come up later on, we can pass them after a fairly brief discussion because they have already been gone into.

Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a riding made up largely of workers, I think that all labour legislation passed by parliament is of concern to the voters in my constituency. That is why I am taking part in this debate, to acquaint the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and the government, with the thinking of the workers of my riding.

There is one thing I asked the minister to do last year, at this stage of the study of his estimates, as I had also asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr.

Churchill), and that was to separate, in the preparation of their statistics, the Hull side—that is the Quebec side—from the Ottawa side. However, today the statistics still include both Ottawa and Hull. Now, the situation there is quite different, since the population of the city of Ottawa is nearly entirely made up of civil servants, while that of the city of Hull is made up of workers.

A study of the latest statistics issued by the department for the Ottawa-Hull area shows an increase in unemployment. I am convinced that unemployment has not increased on the Ottawa side, but that it did mostly on the industrial side, which is the Quebec side. So, if the department would kindly comply with my request and separate statistics between Ottawa and Hull, in order that we may have a better idea of what goes on both on our side and on the Ottawa side, I would be very grateful indeed. Besides, we are—

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt him at this point to say that I am inclined to agree there should be a distinction. I want to point out that the system was set up by the government of which he was a member, and we have only carried on what we inherited. We have been hoping to be able to separate these so that there will be a distinction between what the situation is in Hull and what it is in Ottawa.

Mr. Caron: I want to thank the minister for telling me that it was the system which was organized under the former administration. It has been the same story all the time, Mr. Chairman; when it is good or they think it is good, they accept it, and when there is something going wrong they blame the former government. Why not accept your own responsibility at the present time? I am not speaking of the present time, I am speaking of the future; you are responsible for the future and you should decide for the future.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the future, and not to dwell on the past. However, before going into my main subject, may I be allowed to deal with certain assertions made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), parliamentary leader of the socialists in this house, who stated that the Conservatives, as well as the Liberals, cared little for Canada's workers because of their connections with or subservience to big business, and thus were prevented from giving to labour what it has a right to expect from a government.

Mr. Chairman, such charges are unfair both to the Conservatives and to the Liberals, because in my view, the political parties represented in this house each have a different philosophy. The Conservatives think they can lead Canada to prosperity by making industry prosperous, on the grounds that once industry flourishes, it will lavish benefits on the masses and, in this way, workers and farmers will profit.

On the other hand, we Liberals, believe that to achieve enduring prosperity, we must first bring prosperity to the people—workers and farmers—and as a result this prosperity will redound to industry and make for happy conditions all around.

As for the socialists I am sure they look forward to the downfall of capitalism, to be replaced by some sort of welfare state, based on irresponsible state management which, in their view, would promote prosperity in all classes of society.

Sir, this seems to be a clear indication of a great difference too in the philosophy of the Conservative party, and that of the Liberals and of the C.C.F. I claim that the hon. member for Assiniboia was not being quite honest, intellectually, in trying to make us believe that Liberals have done nothing for the working people.

In fact, if we have a minister of Labour at all in Canada, it is because the labour portfolio was established by the Laurier government, and long before the socialist party ever came into being in Canada. If we have good social legislation, we owe it to the Liberal party, which planned and enacted it long before the socialist party came here to preach its doctrine. Indeed, at a general convention held as far back as 1919 the Liberal party set up its whole program and carried it out gradually as and when Canada's resources allowed.

That policy is being carried on, and I admit that, in certain departments, the new government has possibly made certain improvement. Credit for this achievement cannot be claimed by the socialists but by the Liberals. As for the Conservatives, by continuing this Liberal policy, they have made a few improvements.

It was also a Liberal government which established the first provincial department of labour, in the province of Quebec, under the Hon. Mr. Taschereau. The Liberals sought in this way to give workers the protection they required to grow and to prosper in Canada. As you know, around 1907 and 1908, when the Department of Labour was established, an attempt was made to set up trade unions in Canada, and in the United States. Today those people set themselves up as the champions of workers' rights, whereas, instead of serving the cause of labour they are bent on enslaving them into membership of a political party.

However, sir, I am convinced that Canadian workers know where their best interests lie and are aware of the danger of identifying themselves with a political party. Besides, a very significant development took place recently in Montreal. Construction workers came out emphatically against the creation of a political party within the ranks of organized labour. This happened in Canada within the building trades union, as it happened in 1920 in the United States, and it was the building trades union which objected to the creation of a political party within organized labour, and this under the leadership of Mr. Hutchisson, with the help of Gompers and Lewis. These men stymied the politicians who left no stone unturned in the United States to take over labour movements and develop them into political parties.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the socialist party will be no more successful than the labour party was in launching a political movement in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, a while ago the hon. minister said that, under the Liberal administration, they kept bungling certain things. I agree, without any false shame, that everything was not perfect under the Liberal administration. I know as well as anyone that governments are made up of men. By their very nature, men are imperfect and, of course, the laws they make can be imperfect too. And yet, Mr. Chairman, those are the very people who, while in the opposition, used to blame the Liberal party then in power for all the problems existing at the time. I see in the record of a debate on the budget that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said:

(Text):

This budget—

I am quoting from page 3396 of Hansard for 1955:

(Text):

This budget does not meet, in fact it cannot even make the pretence of meeting or even assisting to meet, the problem of unemployment. The government is still running away from that problem; they hope to ignore it.

(Translation):

Such is the situation now prevailing, Mr. Chairman, is it not? Is the government doing anything in the way of planning so as not to find itself next winter, in the same predicament as we were last winter?

[Mr. Caron.]

The budget carries the same items, the same amount of $395,500,000, in addition to $75,000. That is all, nothing more, nothing less, unless the intention is to introduce a supplementary budget in an effort to cure the evil which is rampant in Canada.

The situation has eased up a bit and we are glad of it; 37,000 people are reported to have worked on projects undertaken by municipalities during the winter. So much the better, and we feel happy about it. But is the minister contemplating anything for next winter? Does he think that the problem will be met when, in March, there were more than 500,000 unemployed in this country? Did not the situation grow worse? Is it going to get better by itself? Of course it will not! Still the minister and his colleagues seem unwilling to tell us right now what their policy will be by next winter when there will be three, four or five hundred thousand unemployed, or even more, since it cannot be expected that a situation such as this will right itself in so little time. Why does not the government introduce legislation right now so that we might examine it and provide such information as would enable the government to improve upon its legislation? Does the government intend to let municipalities continue to carry the heavy burden of unemployment, as apparently they still have to? All the municipalities have had to spend much greater amounts on relief and welfare for the needy. And why did they have to? Because a lot of people do not get unemployment insurance, or not enough to support their family. Therefore municipalities have to support those people, have to provide them with food, shelter, clothing, fuel, lighting and what not, although their powers of taxation are nothing like those of either the provinces or the central government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that if the Minister of Labour was really in earnest, really interested in improving conditions, he would immediately introduce a bill which would give us some insight into government intent as to projects planned for the coming winter. But no, he keeps on shutting his eyes on all those problems as if they would settle themselves without anyone doing anything about them. Let me say that they will not settle themselves without outside help. The government has to step in and do something to improve the present position.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said in 1955—and I am quoting from page 1602 of the official record:

(Text):

In the midst of wealth we have human misery. With all the faith in the world these people cannot wait ten years of fifteen years for a steady job and a weekly pay cheque.

(Translation):

Such is the position at this moment. In view of all this hardship, can those people wait another year, or two, three, five, six, or even ten years, before getting a pay cheque that would enable them to provide a decent living for their families?

And at page 1606:

(Text):

A nation is prosperous only as its people are prosperous. I think that is an accepted fact.

(Translation):

Well, conditions are no better today. I am quoting those texts to point out the great similarity with the present position. People want so many things. But what is the government doing today? Nothing, absolutely nothing. And people are unhappy. We find that the government has a hard time meeting its expenses. The government has deficits growing deficits, because it lacked vision, it lacked foresight. Yet, it is foresight that makes for good government.

And the same hon. member said—and this is taken from the same page of Hansard:

(Text):

We cannot afford to wait. This is a time for action.

(Translation):

Well, we say that it is enough. We cannot wait any longer. It is high time to act. The government must wake up, it must face the facts and the situation. But the ministers are sitting there, not heeding the people's plight! They may not want to do anything wrong, but they do not want to do anything.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that, if they go on in this way, the people will decide before long to make the change that is called for in Canada.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration also said, as can be seen on page 1601 of Hansard for the 1955 session:

(Text):

Regardless of the number of people who are out of work, regardless of whether the number is 362,000 or 569,000, the question we have to ask ourselves is whether or not hon. members and the people of Canada are going to consider that a person is merely a statistic.

(Translation):

It is still the same thing. The government seems to consider that the people and the unemployed are but statistics. What do they say? They say that there are more people working in Canada than a few years ago, according to official statistics. Unemployment has decreased from March, according to official statistics. Well, Mr. Speaker, people cannot live on statistics. They are for politicians, those who wish to discuss failings or lack of action, but the people cannot live on that.

And I find at page 3940 of Hansard for 1955, that the Prime Minister had this to say:

(Text):

Certainly the degree to which chaos is present in labour matters in this country indicates that the Department of Labour lacks direction, lacks system and lacks, not authority but direction.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Speaker, could we find words that would apply better to the present Minister of Labour? And the present Prime Minister says:

(Text):

Lacks direction, lacks system and lacks not authority but direction.

(Translation):

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the present minister will consider the danger that threatens the people of Canada and that he will really introduce measures that not only will act as a poultice to relieve pain, but that will constitute a permanent cure. Many permanent remedies have been suggested to him in the last two years at least, but the minister ignores them.

And the present Prime Minister, said, according to page 2036 of Hansard of the same year:

(Text):

The municipalities are loaded down with unemployment relief. The residents of our urban communities cannot bear it any longer. What is to be done about the unemployed employables? What is the attitude of the government?

(Translation):

And today I ask the same question of the minister: What does the minister intend to do with those who do not work but who are physically fit to work? That is the question that the present head of the government asked in 1955 and I put the question back to him. I hope that the minister will be able, when he speaks, to explain how he is to help the people of Canada who are suffering at the present time.

It is also the same minister who, according to page 3937 of Hansard for the 1955 session, said:

(Text):

I feel that the Department of Labour and this government should make strenuous efforts to alleviate the present condition of those who find themselves unemployed.

(Translation):

That question has been asked for the last two years or so. We want to know from the minister the same thing he asked us. And we receive no answer.

Mr. Martel: What did your government do?

Mr. Caron: What did it do? Plenty! When the government saw in 1955 that unemployment was rising, we hastened to find new markets, and industry began to hum again. As a matter of fact, in 1957, things were going really well, until the day when the Conservative government came into power.

Mr. Martel: How is it that the number of unemployed has risen since that time?

Mr. Caron: Because of Conservative party inertia.

And the present minister said—this is from page 826 of the 1955 record:

(Text):

It is this utterly unrealistic added burden of taxation on one of the most important and, I might add, most expensive necessities of normal life under modern conditions in this country, which should be removed.

He was referring to federal taxation. Well, at the present time, not only is the Minister of Finance taxing the country, but the Minister of Labour himself is taxing the whole labour class, that class of people which occupy a commanding position in this country, a tax which increases by 30 per cent the unemployment insurance contributions. That is a new tax which will affect most Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, the minister was complaining about taxes in 1955, and yet, today, the Minister of Finance, and even the Minister of Labour would like to impose a new tax. Why? Because of a lack of foresight on the part of the administration. Things were so bad, that the unemployment insurance fund ran dry, and the minister had the choice of either getting $400 million out of the consolidated revenue fund, or imposing an additional tax on Canadian workers.

The Department has decided to levy a tax. One more tax, what's the difference? It has decided to tax? Well, we are being taxed, and overtaxed.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest the people has had enough of that system of new taxes piling up one on top of the other. What we want now, is for the government to plan ahead so that we may know what to expect, and whether it intends to help municipalities in the future.

I suggest the government should tell the municipalities what it intends to do next winter, so that they may, with their engineers, plan their works programs. The government should organize in such a way as to help municipalities and their unemployed. But no, it refuses to do anything of the sort. It is sheer lack of foresight, from start to finish. Lack of foresight everywhere and always. Then, when they come face to face with rather serious difficulties, they turn around and say: it was your fault, Liberals, when you were in office.

However, you Conservatives have been in power for two years. In those two years, what positive, constructive measures have you brought forth to help Canada's working class? We have seen nothing but makeshift measures.

Meanwhile, the cost of living has been going up: the gap between wages and the cost of living has been widening steadily. Within a few months, things will be even worse, because of the new taxes. A month from now, because of the lack of foresight...

Some hon. Members: You have lacked foresight.

Mr. Caron: Certain new members lack foresight because they are totally lacking in administrative experience.

They raise taxes in all fields, they burden Canada's working class with taxes. Workers have to pay a tax for the right to live at home. With the cost of living on the increase, such a situation will necessarily give rise to demands for higher salaries and higher salaries will necessarily mean higher production costs. And if productions costs go up, we will not be able to sell our goods abroad, and our inability to sell abroad will mean a halt or at least a slow down in production, with consequent increased unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, it is high time that the government paused and gave serious thought to its policies, so that we will not have to suffer for many years to come. The government should wake up, while there is still time to improve the situation. That is all we ask. Our sole concern is the welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, it has sometimes been said that the definition of effervescence is an extreme overflow of bubbles, and I should like to say at the outset that I do not intend to follow along the lines of what was said by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. I am sure that the ridicule which he has thrust upon the Minister of Labour would, if all the people of Canada could be present here tonight, make us all to go over to Hull.

I should like to say that this afternoon and this evening and, indeed, on another occasion not many evenings ago, our Minister of Labour was subjected to the most unkind ridicule that any hon. member has ever had to endure in this house. Hon. members laugh at that suggestion, but I remind them of the words used by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he said: "the government made a great mistake in failing to carry out the letter of the law". The hon. member was speaking with regard to the appointment of Mr. MacArthur to the unemployment insurance commission. Those are the words he used. In that connotation he could only have meant the Minister of Labour.

Again, a couple of evenings ago, the hon. member for Essex East, although he did not use the same words because he is a lawyer and a little more careful, made a similar observation and said: "It would seem he did not carry out the letter of the law". The hon. member for Assiniboia has accused the Minister of Labour of ignoring the law of his country, and the hon. member for Essex East has implied that the Minister of Labour has ignored the law of this country. In other words, those two hon. gentlemen who occupy places in this house have accused the Minister of Labour of being a criminal as far as the law of this country is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I, being a supporter of the government, will stand here and refute any such suggestions or claims made by any hon. gentleman in this committee. The Minister of Labour has followed the law. He has consulted. To quote an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail, if anything he has consulted too much. The minister was under no obligation to inform the head of the Canadian Labour Congress that he had a name he would like to propose. Nothing in the statutes compelled him to do that. But he informed the head of the Canadian Labour Congress as a matter of courtesy, a courtesy which is shown to people and to organizations across this country at any time this government has occasion to do something.

Some hon. members may have wondered why I have risen to speak on the estimates of the Department of Labour. For their edification, and particularly for the edification of hon. members to my extreme right, I should like to put a little statistical data on the record. I was elected to represent the constituency of Winnipeg North and that is where the labour movement began. Mr. A. A. Heaps, in 1925 was a labour member of the House of Commons and before him in 1921 in Winnipeg North Centre, came Mr. Woodsworth, the founder of the C.C.F. And then in 1933, I believe, the Regina manifesto was brought into being and in 1935 Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps ran as C.C.F. candidates.

What do we see today? We see the successor of Mr. Woodsworth, Mr. Stanley Knowles, who has tried the C.C.F. and who is now busy forming another party which in all probability will be called the labour party. There is no question about his forming it, or his attempting to form it. An article appeared in the Canadian Commentary for March 1959 under the heading "The New Political Party". It was written by Mr. Stanley Knowles the executive vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress. And who in Winnipeg does not recall the day when Mr. Knowles decided to accept his present appointment? Hon. members on my extreme right in the C.C.F. group may well say that the C.C.F. has always been pro-labour and that it was natural that Mr. Knowles should end up where he is. But I have never seen any other executive vice-president announce his intention to run for this office accompanied by the fanfare which accompanied the nomination of Mr. Knowles. Every radio station in the city of Winnipeg was represented; every television camera was there the day he made that announcement.

I ran against a C.C.F. sitting member and I followed the philosophy and the platform of the Conservative party in both elections, in 1957 and 1958. And I, on behalf of the government which I have the honour to support in this house, promised the people of Winnipeg North that this government, on my representations, whatever value they may have, would give each and everyone every break no matter what decision came to light.

The C.C.F. candidates in both election campaigns made no bones about their position. They stood up and said, "We represent the farmer and the labourer". I in turn rose and said, "If you want to put the farmer and the labourer ahead of everyone else in our society then the C.C.F. is your party, but if you want a fair break along with every other Canadian including the fisherman, the corner grocer the shoemaker and everyone else in this great country of ours then I believe the Conservative party is what you want".

Mr. Pickersgill: More taxes for everyone.

Mr. Keays: He said "fisherman", so be a good boy.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): The Conservative party has in the person of the Minister of Labour a man who has given to labour in this country what it has never had before. The hon. member for Assiniboia has placed his opinion on Hansard. He stated in effect that the government made a great mistake in failing to follow the letter of the law. He was referring to consultation under the Unemployment Insurance Act in respect of the appointment of the new commissioner. He has accused this government in general and the Minister of Labour in particular of being criminal and the hon. member for Essex East has implied the same. That hon. gentleman, however, prefaced his remarks with the words, "Indeed, it would appear". Those are the words he used; but then he is a lawyer and the hon. member for Assiniboia is not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, under the rules of this committee, of course, no hon. member has the right to say that an hon. member has referred to another hon. member as a criminal. I am not aware that any hon. member in this debate has suggested that the Minister of Labour was a criminal.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): You were not here long enough.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia, the Leader of the Opposition and myself was that the Minister of Labour had violated the statute. There was no suggestion that he violated the Criminal Code. I think the hon. member does the Minister of Labour a great injustice when he keeps referring to him in the language which he has used when he characterizes him as one who has been accused of a criminal act.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, being a relatively young member in relation to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and being relatively unlearned in the law contrasted to his fine grasp of it, far be it from me to argue the point he has just made. I shall merely refer hon. members of the committee to page 3362 of Hansard and invite them to draw their own conclusions from the words the hon. member for Essex East spoke.

The hon. member for Essex East in his speech the other evening put a great many words on the record but did not—

Mr. Nesbitt: Say anything.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): —impress too many people, in my opinion, because he beat around the bush and refrained from answering questions directly. With respect to the unemployment insurance legislation the hon. gentleman, as reported at page 3362 of Hansard of May 5, said:

> The issue which is immediately before us is that the replacement which the government has announced is not, it would seem, fully in accordance with the requirements of the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): In that sentence, Mr. Chairman, I contend that the hon. member for Essex East has tried to leave the impression that the Minister of Labour violated the act and thereby did not comply with the laws of Canada. In other words, he is stating in that sentence that the Minister of Labour does not comply with the laws of this land. Despite the opinion of the hon. member for Essex East I am still prepared to stand in this chamber and say that the present minister is the best Minister of Labour this country has ever had.

I would suggest that the hon. member for Essex East read over his own words because I am sure that a man of his integrity and outstanding scholastic reputation in this country would want to correct the false impressions he has placed on the records of this house. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is another gentleman who—

Mr. Baskin: He is reading the paper now.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Yes, he is, but that is nothing unusual. However, he is one when he is not reading the paper who is—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Knocking labour.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): —prone to getting on his feet and issue challenges. I in turn in my humble position as a backbencher in this parliament will issue a challenge. I will challenge the hon. member for Essex East to resign his seat along with me and stand for re-election in the constituency of Winnipeg North on the platform of the ethics of the Minister of Labour of this government.

Mr. Winch: And you will both lose.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is always good to relieve tension with a hearty laugh.

Mr. Drysdale: I agree. We are glad you are up.

Mr. Howard: Of course, I cannot help laughing every time I look across at hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house but I am not looking at you, Mr. Chairman, when I say that.

Inasmuch as the Minister of Labour has been in office for only a couple of years I suppose one might say he is the highest paid apprentice in Canada because he is just starting to learn, as he says, and so far as the administration of his department, his ability to present his policies and ideas to the committee and his geniality are concerned, he is progressing very well in this direction.

I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he had better stay in the committee this evening because as sure as heaven if he steps outside the hon. member for Winnipeg

North who just took his seat will have him arrested for all the dastardly things he has been accused of doing. If the minister had done what the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested he would have broken the law and completely violated the statute and would not simply be deemed to have done so nor would it just have appeared that he had done so.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested was that the minister did not have to consult anybody but in an outburst of spontaneous graciousness and from some deep well of kindness in his heart he advised the Canadian Labour Congress with respect to this appointment. However, we have perhaps heard enough on this subject because it has been kicked around a great deal today.

My personal views are that I do not care one way or the other whether Mr. MacArthur is a member of the unemployment insurance commission. I do not think it matters one iota in so far as the discussing of personalities of the individual is concerned. This is a question of principle.

This afternoon and this evening, Mr. Chairman, we have had a tremendous display of fear—unconscious, maybe—on the part of the hon. members who have spoken of something new developing in the political movement in Canada. I suggest it could be nothing else but fear that prompted them to make all those comments that they did; and many of them, using their protected position in the house, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): As you have.

Mr. Howard: —to slander and malign individuals outside the house who have not the opportunity here of protesting or of protecting themselves. This is not in keeping with any sense of fair play, of justice or of decency.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Do you know what it means?

Mr. Howard: I hope the Tories have relieved themselves of their ulcerous pains so that we can carry on with something constructive on these particular estimates. So far, we have had nothing but a great deal of trash and tripe discussed or debated in the house.

An hon. Member: You should talk.

Mr. Howard: Apparently my hon. friend was not listening because I said so far, thereby including everybody who has spoken. I hope my hon. friend who has his tongue wagging so profusely down there will realize that I have never yet attempted to say that I know anything about a great many things. I am the first one to admit that on occasion things that I have to say may be incorrect.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Which is entirely different from the attitude of my friends down in the other corner of the house, as you know yourself, Mr. Chairman, because on occasion you have had to correct them for some of the things they have said.

We have had a great deal of discussion here, and certainly there has been a great deal of discussion in the country in the past two or three years, with respect to unions and the activities of unions, and there have been special references to international unions or unions that have their international or head offices in various parts of the United States. There has been a feeling that this should not be so; that it is not a pleasant thing to have international unions. We should have unions completely run in Canada; we should have Canadian unions. All sorts of people participate in this type of program, of advocating what they classify as Canadian unions, without having the faintest idea, many of them, just precisely what they are talking about or what they are trying to advocate—

Mr. Grafftey: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Howard: —except that the idea sounds good.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I do not know where that blurb came from.

Mr. Grafftey: I made the comment "speak for yourself".

Mr. Howard: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, this attitude that exists and the propaganda that has been spread for the last couple of years in so far as not having international unions is concerned is probably the natural follow-up to the attitude that has been developing in Canada for the last number of years respecting anything connected with the United States. We have had election campaigns conducted by all parties on the basis of anti-Americanism. It has been said that we should not have United States control of our industry; we should not have Wall street control of our finanical structure. Our defence program is developed in Washington and when it comes to external affairs we have to consult with the secretary of state of the United States. All sorts of ideas along these lines have been developed. We do not like control of Canadian affairs resting in the hands of people in another country. I agree with that suggestion.

In so far as the development of so-called Canadian unions is concerned, the phrase that is used by others, I do not know what it means. I have my conceptions of Canadian controlled unions and there are many in Canada which are completely run, democratically operated and every penny of the dues paid by members in Canada is spent in Canada. I am partial to that approach to things.

I should like to illustrate to the committee if I may one particular union with which I am familiar. I think this union can set a criterion or a pattern to be followed by quite a number of unions. It is an international union with offices and locals in the United States. I refer to the international woodworkers of America. This particular union —and it is not an isolated case; there are many like it—is completely autonomous in Canada. The international officers have no authority to come into any local union, to come into any district council or any subdivision in Canada unless they are invited there by the Canadian officers elected by the membership in Canada. That state of affairs has been in existence for quite a number of years. Every penny in dues that is paid by members to the I.W.A. in Canada is banked and spent in Canada for international purposes or district purposes or for what have you, but every penny is spent in Canada.

The officers of that particular union are elected by secret ballot of all of the membership. The constitution is amended in the same way. Every six months the local union that I was attached to, and others in British Columbia, had an audit of their accounts, of their books by a firm of chartered accountants. Griffiths and Griffiths was the firm. Every six months that chartered accountants' audit was submitted to the membership, to every sublocal. Every member of the organization had access to it. It is completely democratically run, completely membership controlled, and there is a close liaison between the question of authority and responsibility. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, this is a pattern for some other unions to follow in so far as autonomy is concerned and in so far as democratic membership control of trade unions is concerned. I mention this—

Mr. Chown: Why do you not preach it, then?

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the hon. member would like to explain his question.

Mr. Chown: Why do you not advocate that kind of union across the line?

Mr. Howard: I do not know what my hon. friend is doing over there but I have just been suggesting that. It is unfortunate if he was contemplating other things and not listening to what I said. That is what I said. And anybody who knows me and knows of the things I save said within the union—

[Mr. Howard.]

An hon. Member: We know you.

Mr. Howard: —and at any political meeting that I have attended where this question has been discussed knows I have used this approach exactly.

Mr. Chown: And out on the hustings, too?

Mr. Howard: On the hustings, too, yes sir. So that, I assume, answers the questions that the hon. member asked and I also imagine it answers the remark, whatever it was, of my hon. friend over there, a while ago.

Like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I am proud to belong to my particular trade union. I worked in that industry and I suppose any union member would feel precisely the same way as I do. This is the union, Mr. Chairman, that—I will not use the word "gentleman", it sticks in my throat —the premier of Newfoundland outlawed by political domination or by by-passing the labour relations board of that province. This gentleman and the hon. member for Hamilton South suggested a while ago that unions had a number of things to look out for. He mentioned the infiltration within their ranks by communists as one. He mentioned the apathy of the membership of the unions as another. He mentioned political interference or domination by the C.C.F.

Mr. Denis: That is the worst.

Mr. Howard: He mentioned one other thing. Exactly what it was does not come to my mind. But my friend who just said that was worse is a person who belongs to the same political party as the one which did the most dastardly and unkind thing to a union in Newfoundland that has ever been done in Canada. He is sitting there and saying, that is the worst thing that could happen. These people from the Liberal party who are talking about the things that unions have to fear will find that the Liberal party in Newfoundland is doing the things that will create the need and the desire on the part of working people of that province for political action. Heaven knows what might result from it. It will be a good thing if the people will take more thought about political action.

I, for one, do not care too much about which particular party an individual in the trade union movement supports; that is his business. In so far as the thoughts we have had in regard to this new political party are concerned, it would still remain his business. There is no intention of changing that and forcing people to vote this way or that way. Anyone who suggests otherwise is talking through his hat or exhibiting his own fear of something new in a political party developing in Canada.

It is not a question of international unions; that is incorrect. It is not the international unions toward which people should be directing their thoughts today. In practically all unions today there is responsibility through the executive, through councils, through annual meetings and conventions to the membership. It does not matter whether unions have their head offices in Cincinnati or Portland or Montreal or Ottawa; it does not matter whether it is an international union or not an international union, but there may be incorrect things that creep into the organization. I am speaking about a minority element in the trade union movement—I mentioned this during the last session when these estimates were under discussion—but conditions exist in some unions under which members are denied their democratic rights within an organization.

One of the places in which we find this condition, where there is a juggling of the affairs, where there is a hiding of financial records and books, is where there is a great preponderance of supporters of the communist party in a particular union. These unions are in the minority, but this is the thing which is causing a great deal of difficulty and concern, not only outside of the trade union movement but inside as well. It is this question of not allowing the members of the union to have complete control, for one reason or another, which is causing concern. If the principles which I outline at the outset and which are followed by the union to which I belong, the international woodworkers of America, were adopted by some of these unions in which free speech does not now exist, we would have a much better attitude toward unions in Canada, whether they be international or not international. I know my friend the hon. member for Vancouver South has some knowledge of the operations of this union on the west coast, as has the hon. member for Comox-Alberni who is also in the lumber industry. I am sure that they would generally agree with the things I have just mentioned.

Mr. Broome: You are quite right; we agree with you 100 per cent on this.

Mr. Howard: Here is where the effort must be developed, in so far as the unions themselves are concerned, if they are to make any progress toward ensuring that every possible degree of democracy exists within the unions, and that every possible allowance is given for freedom of speech; that chartered accountants audit the books and that financial returns are made to the union members.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Wait a minute, and then I will. This minority section of the trade union movement in which these conditions do exist has to clear up these problems itself. One of the difficulties is the apathy of the membership. Certainly, this condition must be cleared up or, just as sure as I am standing here, public feeling will gather steam; legislators will hear more and more things, and there will be a demand for legislation in order to curb all these practices. The only way to prevent what might be classified as governmental or political interference in the internal operations of unions is for the unions themselves to set this goal, and to generally adopt the internal organization, the democratic procedure, that exists within the international woodworkers of America.

Mr. Broome: I quite agree with everything the hon. member has said about the I.W.A., about it being a very democratically run union. Would the hon. member agree that no trade union should be allowed to affiliate with the Canadian Labour Congress or be given recognition by the government unless that trade union meets a minimum standard in its constitution by way of democratic organization, and that there is control of the leadership by the union body? In other words, a union ought to have a minimum democratic set-up before recognition is given by the federation?

Mr. Howard: There are two parts to that question, and it may be rather a lengthy one to answer.

Mr. Broome: It just means, should all unions be as democratic as the I.W.A. before they are allowed to become members of the Canadian Labour Congress?

Mr. Howard: I do not think I can speak for the Canadian Labour Congress, but I will say this: I know the attitude of that body toward its affiliated unions. They have taken measures—and this thing is continually under review—

Mr. Broome: Like the S.I.U.

Mr. Howard: —just as the C.I.O. and A.F. of L. in the United States have done.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Howard: Wait until I answer the first one. In so far as whether or not a union should be, as I put it and as the hon. member puts it, as democratically operated by the members themselves as is the I.W.A., I would say that would be an excellent condition to have in existence.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member agree that the trusteeship of a union local should be outlawed?

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howard: Just a minute. There may be a sound reason for trusteeship in some instances. I do not think it should be used in a way in which it has been used in some instances where the local was placed under trusteeship, where the bylaws were absolutely waived, where membership meetings were cancelled for months ahead, and that sort of thing. However, for one reason or another, a local union may not be able to stand on its own feet. There may be a financial reason. Then, there is quite likely a good case for trusteeship. It is the application of trusteeship, when it goes too far, that creates difficulties.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I have one question I should like to ask and I ask it in all seriousness. The hon. member comes from British Columbia. I should like to know whether or not he agrees with all the implications or part of the implications of the recent bill passed by the British Columbia legislature with regard to labour. I think it is Bill No. 43. I should like to know how the hon. member stands on the various implications.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this a quiz program?

Mr. Howard: I do not mind going into that matter. I think it probably verges on the question of the jurisdiction of the provincial government. I might get part way into it and find that I am out of order and then would not get the thing cleaned up. I should be quite willing at some other time—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): The only reason that I raised the matter was the fact—

The Chairman: Order. I must ask hon. members please to limit their comments and questions to matters under the jurisdiction of this house.

Mr. Howard: Through you, Mr. Chairman, I would say to my hon. friend that at some other time outside of this chamber where the rules are not so strict we could sit down, for instance in an office, and discuss the matter and I should be more than pleased to do so. But from some of the remarks I will set out here later on in my discussion of the federal labour code and its relationship to union-management negotiations, you might get some idea of what my feelings are toward that particular statute.

[Mr. Howard.]

We have the question that we hear so much about, namely the question of strikes. The minister today, in some of the statistical information that he gave to us, said that during the year ending March 31, 1959 his department had handled 108 industrial disputes. I assume that figure relates to disputes which were not settled in direct negotiations, but got to the conciliation officer stage. So there may have been in addition to the 108, some other disputes which were settled by direct negotiations and which would not necessarily come to the attention of the department. Of these, 63 were settled at the conciliation officer stage and another 24 at the conciliation board stage. Six of them ended up in strikes.

I am going to submit that, generally speaking, the development of labour laws in Canada and the provinces where there is a similarity in the process of negotiations, has not kept pace with the changing moods and attitudes of unions and management in their negotiations and in their feelings toward negotiations and that the law is out of date in many respects. Here, for instance, in some cases, the question of illegality arises.

If I may, I should like to make a brief reference to the labour relations act of the province of British Columbia, previously the industrial conciliation and arbitration act. Under that law in British Columbia and because of the manner in which the international woodworkers of America—and the international brotherhood of carpenters and joiners is another union—have received their certificates of bargaining authority, because of the structure of industry and the manner in which they negotiate with the group of employers rather than with each separate employer; because of that system and the law, if and when the international woodworkers of America in the province of British Columbia finds it necessary to go on strike, it is not possible for that union to conduct a legal strike.

The minute they go on strike, it can be classified as an illegal strike if the courts want so to determine or if the minister wants to refer it to a judge of the supreme court out there. The law is written in such a fashion that it is absolutely impossible for the I.W.A. to conduct a legal strike in the province of British Columbia. What happens is this. The minute a strike takes place there is a big hue and cry about illegality and the general public says, "If you cannot conform to the law, then there is no sense of your even being in existence." Yet the lawmakers said in the first place, "We are not going to let you comply with the law." That is one instance of what happens if you end up in a strike. You get into a difficult legal position because of the manner of the negotiations, the manner in which the Department of Labour has issued its certificate and the wording of the act itself. Here we have, as given by the minister under the federal code, a number of cases that have been settled at the conciliation stage, and a number that have been settled at the conciliation board stage, and since March, 1959, I think one that was settled by the minister would not be included in this set of statistics. But if it was included, I do not know whether he would say it was one dispute settled by the minister or just how he would classify it. In any event, from time to time strikes take place because of the law itself.

I submit the law is far out of date in this instance. This happens in some sense in negotiations. It has happened in the past and probably will happen in the future. It happens probably under the federal act because of the manner in which it is worded. It sets out that the first steps in the negotiations between union and management will be direct negotiations. Each side sits down on the opposite side of a table or in a room or wherever they want to meet. They sit down and try to bargain. Neither side, neither the union nor management will give too much. They want to feel each other out at this stage and see how much they might get on this point and give on that. That is the process of collective bargaining, giving and taking. So at the end of the time set for direct negotiations they have not reached a settlement.

So they go before a conciliation officer. If the conciliation officer is not astute and able, and an acceptable mediator and is not tactful and diplomatic—and many of them that I have come up against are not—they will not reach any settlement there. They will put off the negotiations or the collective bargaining until they get to the conciliation board stage. In many cases both management and union will then say, "We will submit our briefs to the board". The board will weigh them and will issue a report. They will say, "Well, we will not make a settlement". If the report of the board is not acceptable, one side or the other will reject it because the union has to take a strike vote. Management will say, "We will wait and see whether they will get a good strike vote, it will indicate how solid their members are behind them, and we will know how far we can go". The union might say, "We will not accept the award but we will wait for the results of the strike vote and then we will know what position we are in so far as our membership are concerned and we may be able to get a little bit extra or another word in the contract or something of this nature".

The legislation that exists now tends to promote and foster the idea of delay and protraction and putting off collective bargaining until it is just too late and then the matter ends up in a strike. I submit that it is necessary to eliminate or drastically revise these sections of your labour code where it has reference to conciliation procedure. A prime example of a good conciliation officer is the Minister of Labour's actions just a few days ago in so far as the C.N.R. and the railway employees were concerned.

I do not know what went on in the room. I do not know the words that were used or anything else. But I know the attitude of the minister. We have seen him in this house a number of times. We have spoken with him personally. We know his attitude. A diplomatic and tactful approach, is the one that should be used by a conciliation officer and that conciliation officer or mediator, or whatever you want to call him, should have the authority to make union and management sit down and bargain instead of saying, "Well, I will not do too much because we have another step, namely the conciliation board". A certain amount of authority and power should be given to the conciliation officer. Revise your act. Select good conciliation officers. Give them the authority to mediate, to conciliate, to get people to sit down together. Make sure you pick the right people, people like the minister with diplomacy and tact, people with honesty and openness just oozing out all over them so that no one can accuse the mediator of having an axe to grind. Then you will get more settlements in that way than you will get under our present system.

I would like to make reference, if I may for a short while, to the strike vote which is nowadays conducted. Many union constitutions including that of the I.W.A. say that no strike can be called unless a majority of the members by secret ballot vote to call such a strike. I submit that that is the manner in which all strike votes should be conducted, namely by secret ballot. The way a strike vote has been conducted in some cases is that you have a number of people standing in a hall and a motion is put to them: "We are going on strike; all in favour say aye". But during the course of that procedure a number of people may still desire to vote no. Union officers thereby have no clear idea of the actual feeling of the members. I also think that the secrecy of marking the ballot should not be violated. I submit that this, the secret ballot, is the method by which all strike votes should be conducted.

Mr. Chairman, I have concluded that phase of my remarks and I have only a few points to add.

The Chairman: The hon. member's time is up. Has he unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think there are some hon. members who would like to take part in the debate.

The Chairman: I am sorry; the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I will leave time for other hon. members to speak this evening. I would like to speak at this stage because the riding which I represent, St. Lawrence-St. George, is to a great extent composed of working people, including many members of unions recently actively engaged in union activity. I must say I was somewhat surprised at one suggestion made by the hon. member for Skeena, namely that a mediator should be given more power of negotiation. It seems to me that he was getting very close to the anathema of the labour movement, compulsory arbitration.

There has also been some criticism in the last few days, particularly from the hon. member for Essex East as well as from members of the C.C.F. party, on the question of appointments to the unemployment insurance commission. The shorter Oxford dictionary defines "to consult" as "to confer about, deliberate about, to consider". There are a few other definitions not too applicable to this case, but nowhere is the definition given as "to dictate". Yet it did seem to me from the remarks of some hon. members that what was wanted was that the C.L.C. should have dictated this very appointment. I repeat "to consult" means "to confer about, deliberate about, to consider". This was done. But as has also been mentioned, the C.L.C. is at the moment working on the formation of a political party in consultation and co-operation with the C.C.F. with the object of forming, presumably, a government in this country. If we accepted this idea that the C.L.C. had to appoint, in effect, the labour member of the unemployment insurance commission, what we would be saying is that you could not get this appointment without being a supporter of the C.C.F., or that party which presumably is to be its heir.

I think, Mr. Chairman we should consider which party in this house represents labour. In my view the Conservative party at this very moment represents the majority of the labour people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chambers: In constituency after constituency where labour was the dominant vote the Conservative candidate was elected. We intend, or at least I intend, to go on doing my best to represent the views of the people in my riding who are in the labour movement. They support the Conservative party because the labour program put before them by the Conservative party is what they want. The Conservative party has a record throughout the history of this country of being the leader in legislation beneficial to labour. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said today, we have provided this country with the best Minister of Labour in Canada's history.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Hull was accusing this government and the Minister of Labour of having done nothing about unemployment. With his usual heat he overlooked the fact that one chronic problem in this country with regard to unemployment, which has been a chronic problem for many years, is the problem of winter unemployment. I could mention just briefly four separate things which this government and our Minister of Labour have done to alleviate that problem. There was a conference held with representatives attending from all parts of the country from all interested bodies. Then there was the winter works program. There was the aid to municipalities for their winter works; and there was the general government program of accentuating those government undertakings which could be done during the winter months. Yet to my knowledge this problem was not even considered by the previous government. So it is difficult to see what justification there could be for the statement of the hon. member for Hull that nothing has been done. Mr. Chairman, I have only mentioned a very small part of the undertakings of the government, and in particular the Minister of Labour, in this field.

Mr. Chairman, I said that I would be brief, and I would like to end my remarks again on the question of the proper representation of labour on government bodies, and to put before you, sir, and the other hon. members present in the house that with the present situation in this country, different as it is from the United Kingdom, where there is not and never has been any likelihood of a party formed by the labour movement being successful, it would not be in the interests of the rank and file of labour to support this new group or to support recommendations or nominations by them, because if they did they would not be properly represented in government and government bodies.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Skeena while he had the floor said some very harsh things about the premier and the government of the province of Newfoundland. I am not going to take the time of the committee to reply to his charges one by one, but I do want to make a point, and it is this. The leader of the party to which the hon. member for Skeena belongs, as well as the party to which I belong, asked the Prime Minister to set up an impartial inquiry to find out and make public all the facts in connection with the labour dispute in Newfoundland. That inquiry was not set up and these facts have not been ascertained or made public. On what basis can the hon. member for Skeena get up in this house and make such charges? I ask him on what basis can he make charges and pass judgments of that sort when nobody knows the facts, because the facts have not been ascertained by an impartial body? The facts have not been made public as a result of a public inquiry. Besides, the hon. member for Skeena has not been to Newfoundland, and so he does not know what he is talking about. He cannot judge by hearsay, yet on that basis he has set himself up as a judge. In doing that he has given the lie to the very democracy for which he claims to stand.

Mr. Howard: You are very incorrect, you know.

Mr. Carter: That is all I have to say on that subject. I will let hon. members judge for themselves.

The unemployment situation in my own province has been very serious for the past two years. The level of employment in 1957 was far below the average for previous years. The 1957 fishery was far below average and during that year there was also a falling off in construction work so that there was far less opportunity for people to supplement their earnings from the fisheries. Last September, when the house was in committee of supply, those of us who have the honour to represent the province of Newfoundland in this chamber drew attention to the conditions which existed at that time, and in order to refresh the minds of hon. members I should like to quote what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said on that occasion as reported in Hansard for September 4, 1958, at page 4616:

> In view of conditions in Newfoundland, which have been particularly adverse this year because of the failure of the fishery and because of the difficulty of disposing of the pulp and paper products of the only other large Newfoundland industry, there is no question that the economic situation is very serious. Maintenance of existing services is going to be more difficult this year than it has been any year since confederation, particularly during the coming winter. Capital works are very urgently needed indeed.

Mr. Howard: How then could you have granted this large wage increase at all?

Mr. Carter: You get up and make your speech in your own time.

In supporting the plea which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made at that time, I had this to say, and I should like to quote a few lines from page 4618 of Hansard of the same date:

> Every province wants to improve its services. But if this money is not forthcoming, Newfoundland will be obliged to divert funds from the special grant from its original purpose intended by this parliament in order to maintain existing services, and the result of that procedure is going to be to retard progress in Newfoundland for at least two or three years. Not only will it retard progress but it will also nullify the plans of the government which were intended to cope with the unemployment situation in Newfoundland which today is double what it has been in the worst year since confederation.

The money we referred to was, of course, the grant recommended by the McNair commission which, however, was not made available as requested and which has not been made available to the province even today. As a result, the situation in Newfoundland is still serious in the light of an analysis of the unemployment figures for March which are the latest I have been able to study. The Minister of Labour very proudly announced in this house that the March figures showed an upward trend and a general improvement in the employment situation in Canada. For Canada as a whole, that is true. The percentage of unemployed declined from 8.8 in February to 8.6 in March, but if we analyse those figures we find that this improvement took place in Ontario and in the western provinces. In Quebec and in the maritime provinces the situation was worse in March than it was in February. In Quebec the percentage for February was 12.1 and for March it was 12.5. For Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the figure for February was 12.2 per cent, and for March 13.2 per cent.

What were the figures for Newfoundland? In February the level of unemployment stood at 30.8 per cent and in March it was 31.5 per cent. The government and the Minister of Labour did not see fit to act on the suggestions which we made on this side of the house for coping with the unemployment problem. Instead they set great store by their winter works program and their funds for housing and public works. I commend them for what they tried to do in housing, and on their winter works program, but it may be recalled that on April 22 I asked the Minister of Labour the following question as recorded on page 2928 of Hansard. I propose to read this question into the record again because I think it will be useful for readers of Hansard and for hon. members to have it before them when they analyse these figures. My question was:

1. How many municipal winter works projects under the Department of Labour have actually been in operation up to date in each province?
2. What is the estimated cost to the federal treasury in each province?
3. What is the estimated number of additional jobs provided in each province.

The minister replies as follows:

Province	No. of projects	Expenditure	No. of jobs
British Columbia	292	$1,191,000	3,059
Alberta	238	1,494,000	4,557
Saskatchewan	123	481,000	2,050
Manitoba	76	661,000	1,322
Ontario	641	3,565,000	10,486
Quebec	254	1,818,000	5,561
New Brunswick	208	242,000	2,324
Nova Scotia	205	445,000	7,184
Prince Edward Island
Newfoundland	26	49,000	416
Northwest Territories	8	12,000	96

If you total the expenditures which I have just read out you will discover that they amount to $9,958,000, or just a little under $10 million. When you analyse those figures you find that the people who benefit from these projects are those who live in the wealthier provinces and not those who live in the poorer provinces where unemployment is highest. For example the province of Ontario alone gets almost exactly one-third of the total expenditure. The three wealthy provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta receive over $7¼ million or roughly 71 per cent. The maritime provinces including Newfoundland receive only $736,000 or roughly 7 per cent.

Although the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George took exception to a statement made by the hon. member for Hull that the government did nothing, I think in view of these figures that as far as Newfoundland is concerned if the government did nothing it certainly did next to nothing. The amount of $49,000 was the total expenditure for Newfoundland and it provided 416 extra jobs.

Mr. Broome: That is because you did not apply for projects.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is because the money was not paid under term 29.

Mr. Broome: You did not apply for projects so it is your own fault.

Mr. Carter: I have quoted these percentages—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Without understanding them.

Mr. Carter: —in connection with the winter works program but the same proportion and percentages apply with respect to all these matching grants regardless of whether they relate to housing, public works or some other projects. Any 50-50 grant set out by the government is always divided in that proportion and the wealthier provinces get the lion's share while the poorest provinces that are in the greatest need get the crumbs.

Mr. MacInnis: What about the proportion of the population?

Mr. Carter: The other project which the government undertook as a winter works project in Newfoundland was the community stage program. I believe that this program is a splendid one but it should never be put forward as a works program. Although it is an excellent idea that should be encouraged and enlarged it should not be a make-work program but rather should be developed as an integral part of the fisheries development program.

What were the effects of the community stage program? In Newfoundland we have approximately 10,000 or 12,000 fishermen living in 1,300 communities spread all across the province. The government provided 20 community stages. It may be said that there is an equal need in each community. In each community probably 20 people got work; let us say a total of 400. In my own riding there were two projects providing work to approximately 40 people.

Mr. Small: You were lucky.

Mr. Carter: Before leaving the subject I wish to suggest to the minister that now is the time to make plans for next winter. The making of plans should not be left until next September, October, November or December. Unless well-developed plans are made now we will have the same thing happen next year. I urge the minister and the government not to make any more 50-50 grants. Such grants may be all right for Ontario but they could ruin Newfoundland and the other maritime provinces.

Mr. Paul: What do you want, 90-10?

Mr. Carter: Yes. I want the grants distributed on the basis of need and not on the basis of wealth.

I wish now to turn to the subject of prevailing rates. The Department of Labour has a division which takes samples of wages paid in various parts of each province. I do not know what formula is used or whether the average is taken. In any event they set up what is known as a prevailing rate which is used as a standard of wages paid to government employees—

Mr. Starr: Prevailing rate employees.

Mr. Carter: Yes. This is what happens. The hydrographic survey in my riding a year ago operated two small boats of exactly the same size that were doing exactly the same work. The crew of one was recruited in Halifax and the crew of the other was recruited in Newfoundland. The Halifax crew doing exactly the same job and living side by side with the Newfoundland crew was receiving about 20 per cent more wages for the same job. The same thing is true of our public works programs. This year in St. Lawrence on the community stage, about which the Minister of Public Works knows something, the wages that were paid for the jobs were lower than the union rates that obtain in the community.

I suggest to the minister that as a matter of government policy provision should be made for equal pay for equal work, certainly for people employed by the government of Canada in the same region. If we divide Canada into three regions, the central, maritime and Pacific regions there may be differences in rates between the regions but certainly people doing similar work for the government should get the same pay within a region. The least that could be done would be to take the average for the province as a whole when the department is taking samples. The department should not take a sample from half a dozen small communities.

An hon. Member: How many years has that been going on?

Mr. Carter: I do not know how many years it has been going on. I discovered it only two years ago. That does not alter the value of the suggestion. If a practice is wrong it does not matter whether it has gone on for two years or twenty years. Hon. gentlemen opposite were elected on a platform based on a high level of righteousness that promised to eliminate every injustice in Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: How long have you been a member?

Mr. Carter: Before I sit down I wish to say a word about the unemployment insurance program. Two years ago we set up seasonal benefits for fishermen. That has been the subject of a great deal of criticism in mainland newspapers. I read something about it in the latest issue of the Financial Post. It has been referred to as a welfare program for loggers and fishermen. I do not know why mainland papers always have to pick on loggers and fishermen because they are not the only ones. Long before the loggers and the fishermen ever got into the scheme it was a welfare plan for all the lake seamen, for all the lake stevedores and for everybody who handled freight up and down the great lakes, and there are many other categories as well. But nobody remembers that. All they are concerned with is that the fishermen are getting something out of this.

There is a need to review this scheme for fishermen because it is not working out on an equitable basis. In the western part of my riding the fishermen fish all the year around and the winter season is the best time for fishing. Because they have to fish in the wintertime the stamps they earn then cannot be counted for unemployment insurance in the slack season when they need it. Therefore, that section of the fishermen is deprived of it altogether and I should like to make that known to the editors of the Financial Post and to the editors of all the other mainland papers who are interested in this subject.

There is a need to review this. It was my understanding that the present government gave an assurance that it would be reviewed and revised. Certainly, we have had it in effect long enough to know what the difficulties are and how to iron the bugs out of it.

The latest suggestion of the Financial Post is worthy of consideration. It was that perhaps the time has come when we should have two unemployment insurance funds, one for seasonal workers and one for regular workers, which perhaps could be put on an actuarial basis. I have not had time to give too much study to it but it looks reasonable to me and I do hope the minister will give some consideration to it.

Mr. Starr: It is being studied now.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have an idea that I shall speak for the full five minutes that are left. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I think I intend to speak for more than the full five minutes, although I want to make it clear that it had actually not been my intention to speak on this item at all. But, after listening this afternoon to the remarks made by the hon. member for Hamilton South, the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Winnipeg North I most certainly have a few remarks to make.

I admit I was a little bit surprised to find the first vote of the Minister of Labour being used by two members on the government side and one on the official opposition side to pillory the trade union movement of this country and to make some rather amazing, fantastic and startling statements relative to some outstanding trade union leaders of this country, but notably to pillory the C.C.F. and, of course, at last to bring out in the open just how much both old line parties are scared stiff of the political future because of a democratic and almost unanimous move by the useful people of our country, the working people, to have their own political expression. Yes, all three members made it very clear how the Liberals and the Conservatives are shaking in their political shoes because of what they can see coming up in the future.

It was, of course, very interesting to listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North—

Mr. Henderson: An hon. member says you are still wearing your overalls.

Mr. Winch: If I am still wearing my overalls it is a damned expensive suit I have on now. I am told that it suits me.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, it was interesting to listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, when he was trying to tilt a little bit with the hon. member for Essex East, and to hear him say he was a complete novice when it came to tilting with an hon. member of the legal profession. But yet, at the same time, as a complete novice as, he admitted not only in legal matters but in this House of Commons, he attempted to give us a trade union historical review when he told us, as he did, about how in Winnipeg North we had started the trade union movement under A. A. Heaps and J. S. Woodsworth, two very renowned names in the trade union and political history of this country.

May I tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North that the trade union movement did not start in Winnipeg in 1921, which was the date he gave. There was a great trade union movement long before 1921. Not only that, but may I say this—because of his interest in that he named J. S. Woodsworth—J. S. Woodwsworth did not learn his trade unionism in Winnipeg in 1921. He learned it in Vancouver in 1917 and 1918. I can not only pinpoint J. S. Woodsworth's trade unionism and socialism in Vancouver, I can point out 1218 Howe street in the city of Vancouver, because that is where he lived, at the home of my father, who was the business agent of the international longshoremen's association. I am proud of the fact that it was at 1218 Howe street, in the west end of Vancouver, in the home of my father, that the man who later was the chief and the founder of the C.C.F. learned his trade unionism and learned that socialism and Christianity are one and the same thing.

I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I understand we are going on with these estimates tomorrow. I wonder whether the leader of the house could throw any light on the business for next week?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct about the business for tomorrow. On Monday we shall commence with the budget bills with the exception of the amendment to the Income Tax Act; then take the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister be continuing with that on Tuesday as well?

Mr. Green: Probably, but I cannot be sure. I would hope that we would get all of this finished on Monday.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is optimistic.

At 10.02 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

FOOD FOR PEACE CONFERENCE—JOINT COMMUNIQUE OF MAY 6, 1959

The conference of major wheat exporting nations convened by U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, implementing President Dwight D. Eisenhower's instructions to explore means of utilizing food "in the interest of reinforcing peace" took place in Washington May 4-6, 1959. The governments were represented by the following cabinet members or heads of delegations:

For Argentina: Rafael Garcia-Mata, under secretary of agriculture, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

For Australia: Sir John Crawford, secretary, Department of Trade, Canberra, Australia.

For Canada: Hon. Gordon Churchill, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, Canada; Hon. Douglas S. Harkness, Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa, Canada.

For France: His Excellency Herve Alphand, Ambassador of France, Washington, D.C.

For the United States: Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.; C. Douglas Dillon, under secretary of state, Department of State, Washington, D.C.; Clarence L. Miller, assistant secretary of agriculture, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.; Laurence B. Robbins, assistant secretary of the treasury, Department of the Treasury, Washington, D.C.

The director general of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, Dr. B. R. Sen, participated in the discussion. In addition to the delegates, senior officials of the five governments and F.A.O. were present.

In opening the conference, Secretary Benson emphasized the need for the food surplus nations to increase their already considerable efforts to assist those peoples in need of additional food. He invited the participants, in the broad definition of President Eisenhower's statement, to join with the United States in studying possibilities for improving existing programs and engaging in new understakings to increase the utilization of food.

Secretary Benson outlined plans of the United States to achieve more effective utilization of wheat to alleviate hunger, promote economic development, increase world consumption and expand commercial markets, which will be the subject of a separate U.S. release. He pointed out that there would be close consultation with the other wheat exporting countries to ensure adequate protection of their commercial marketings. At the same time, he emphasized that this did not in any way imply a change in the administration's policy to seek ways to reduce incentives which result in overproduction and the accumulation of surpluses.

The conference examined, in the light of principles established under FAO auspices, a wide range of subjects related to world trade and the use of food, particularly wheat, for humanitarian and development purposes in the less developed countries.

The conference recognized the importance of adequate food supplies to all nations. These exporting countries share a feeling of responsibility to assist, within their capabilities, the efforts of other nations to achieve this goal.

In a review of food availability and world food needs it was recognized that the commercial export marketings of wheat by the countries represented, even though expanded somewhat, probably would be considerably below their combined capacity to supply for the next few years. In fact, unless there are striking changes in wheat production patterns and trends in the major exporting and importing countries, it will take larger movements of wheat than in recent years to prevent further accumulations of surplus supplies in exporting countries. The conference also recognized that the real food needs of many underdeveloped countries exceed their ability to buy, and could only be satisfied commercially after a period of economic development. The wheat exporting countries do, therefore, have a very real interest in market development, in sound economic development, and in the possible use of surplus wheat in ways which will contribute to healthy economic growth and assist in emergencies.

All these wheat exporting nations, according to their individual capacities, have contributed wheat to assist other countries in past emergencies, or are doing so now.

The importance of commercial trade in wheat as a desirable force in world development was stressed. The conference discussed means of promoting the growth of such trade to mutual advantage of exporting and importing countries. There was agreement on the necessity of safeguarding the interests of all wheat exporters in their existing commercial markets and of assuring the natural growth of the commercial world market.

In the review of existing and possible means of utilizing wheat supplies in excess of commercial marketings, it was recognized that many of the surplus disposal measures developed to date have had, as important objectives, the promotion of specific economic development projects in the recipient countries and the improvement of nutritional levels—objectives to which all major wheat exporting countries subscribe. It was agreed that these objectives are not always easily attained; that there is a need for considerably greater study of the manner in which efforts in this direction can be made most effective; and that studies and actions in this field should be directed toward:

1. Projects to raise consumption directly among specially deficient groups in the population, as, for example, through direct feeding programs, such as school lunch projects, refugee feeding and resettlement, and related economic and community development projects.

2. Projects to aid economic development, on a basis which will permit most effective use of national currency funds accruing from sales of surplus foods.

3. Projects to establish national food reserves utilizing existing idle storage facilities or newly constructed ones.

The conference took a realistic view of the situation. It recognized that the world wheat supply situation and levels of prices are disturbed by the stimulation of production, in most importing countries as well as in some exporting countries, by high price supports and other measures. In this connection, it was noted that some exporting countries have made, and are making, efforts to reduce incentives to overproduction.

It was realized, also, that moderate increases in total distribution and utilization of wheat can be attained within the next few years with increased efforts by exporting and importing nations. There are physical and administrative limitations to the importation and distribution of wheat in many importing countries. Inadequate distribution facilities and lack of trained personnel can create bottlenecks which can prevent adequate food from reaching people who need it. Balance of payments problems may require consideration also. It will take time and effort, in addition to food and investment, to offset these limitations.

The conference attached great importance to arrangements for ensuring the consultation required for attainment of the agreed objectives. It was decided therefore to establish immediately a wheat utilization committee which will be a consultative body of governments represented at the conference and which will be composed of officials having policy responsibilities.

The committee will consult, as appropriate with representatives of recipient and other countries. It will maintain a close working relationship with the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations.

The committee activities will include consideration of the following:

1. Possibilities of expanding the world's commercial trade in wheat, including the development of new markets.

2. Ways of increasing and making more effective the utilization of wheat surpluses for the promotion of economic development and the improvement of nutritional standards.

3. Co-ordination of disposal programs for economic development with other development activities in the recipient countries so as to ensure that such programs will contribute fully toward increasing consumption and commercial markets.

4. The establishment of guide lines for providing wheat to individual countries on concessional terms and the safeguarding of commercial marketings.

The conference invited Secretary Benson to convene the first meeting of the committee at an early date.

The conference resulted in a better mutual understanding among the participants of their countries' policies, problems, and proposed actions. There was discussion of the advantages of holding similar consultations on other food commodities and with other nations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 8, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

ESTIMATES

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) presented the third and fourth reports of the standing committee on estimates, and moved that the third report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-46, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-45, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-44 to amend the Customs Tariff and the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—TABLING OF REPORT ON EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I intimated to the house that my department's next regular report on strontium 90 levels in milk powder samples was expected shortly. This has now been completed, and is being distributed through the usual channels. In view of the widespread interest in the subject I should also like to table it for the information of hon. members. The report contains new data on milk covering the period April to December, 1958. It is the second in a series of reports which will deal with the measurements of radioactive fall-out in air, rainfall, soil, various foods and in human beings.

While the report speaks for itself, I think certain points warrant special mention. Of first importance is the fact that our findings indicate no basis for alarm about this matter. Although it is evident that the strontium 90 levels have continued to increase, it is made clear that they are well below the stringent standards suggested by international authorities.

I am also aware that there continues to be concern about the stress given to milk in this regard, and I would emphasize again that milk was chosen for sampling because of its convenience and because it is an important item in our daily diet. In addition, dairy products provide most of our food calcium, the absorption of which by the body is closely associated with the absorption of strontium 90. At the present time our findings, taken together with other available information on the biological effects of radiation, provide no basis for curtailment of the use of dairy products.

At this point I would remind the house that radioactive fall-out constitutes only one of several sources of radiation exposure for Canadians. Other man-made radiation sources have been in use for at least half a century and, moreover, the human race has always been exposed to radiation from natural sources. Estimates have been made of the relative contributions to the average radiation exposure from each of these sources, and it is apparent that radioactive fall-out contributes only a small part of the total.

In order to evaluate more completely the over-all situation we plan to expand our radiation protection activities in several ways. Currently we are extending our fall-out sampling program to include analyses of air, rainfall and soil. We are also engaged in a study of the genetically significant dose resulting from the medical use of X-rays. At a later stage we propose to investigate the variations in natural radiation levels. The results of these studies, as they become available, will be the basis of further reports.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): This is a matter which is, of course, of the greatest importance. The minister has said in effect that the strontium level does not appreciably increase any danger to human health. However, he has pointed out that strontium levels themselves continue to increase. That is a matter, of course, of great concern to the minister and I am sure to his officials, as it is to scientists generally. The house and the country would expect the government and the minister to give this matter their closest attention.

The minister has mentioned that there has been an expansion in the radioactive detection facilities and activities of his department. I presume that includes the purchase of new equipment, reference to which was made by Dr. Watkinson about two months ago. Perhaps the minister might supplement his statement by advising whether or not the facilities of the government have been reinforced by the employment of at least one additional geneticist.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this group are interested and pleased that the minister has tabled this very important report in view of the increasing concern of the Canadian people about dangers from this source. We are glad to know that studies will continue, and we hope no avenue will remain unexplored in an effort to get the facts and present the truth to the Canadian people for their protection.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF LOAN FOR U.S. PURCHASE OF CANADIAN PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can confirm the report which appeared this morning that the government had agreed to guarantee 80 per cent of a loan by two United States corporations to buy transport planes from the Canadian subsidiary of a United States corporation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in general the answer is no. I cannot give the hon. member full particulars because the minister is away today, but the course of securing an opportunity for Canadian industry to share in contracts such as were mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition is a course we have followed. The full particulars will be given on the return of the minister to the house.

Mr. Pearson: If I may ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, it would be whether or not it is true that this particular transaction has nothing to do with defence contracts but rather with ordinary commercial contracts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true. As yet we have simply given notice of intent with a view to providing an opportunity for full consideration as between the vendor and the would-be purchasers.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO TREASURY BILL AND BANK INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister comment on the new record rate established for three month treasury bills at 4.91 per cent and the bank rate at 5.16 per cent?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the figures have been published and are well known, and I do not think they require any comment. We had an extended debate on this subject in this house last week.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, would the minister comment on the recent use of the six month treasury bills, and tell us when these were last issued by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this issue yesterday was in the amount of $20 million. It was subscribed, and the average rate on it is 5.27 per cent. It has been the custom for some time past to issue treasury bills with a 91-day maturity only. In this issue there was $115 million of a 91-day issue and $20 million of a new six month issue. I should say this is not the first time a six month issue has been offered. That has not been done recently, but it was done some time earlier by the former government.

ALLEGED PURCHASE BY BANK OF CANADA OF PART OF C.N.R. BOND ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister comment on the report that owing to depressed conditions of the market for government bonds the Bank of Canada was obliged to purchase one-third of the current Canadian National Railways issue of $150 million?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it has not and I believe never has been the practice to disclose the subscriptions for any issue of government bonds, let alone bonds of the Canadian National Railways. This is a Canadian National Railways issue bearing the guarantee of the government. The issue is for $150 million. It was subscribed, and I think the public interest would not be served by disclosing details as to particular subscriptions. It never has been the practice to do so.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT ON U.S. ASSISTANCE RESPECTING NUCLEAR-POWERED VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me the following question:

There appears in today's press the news of an agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom under which, according to the report, the United States has agreed to furnish information to the United Kingdom regarding the design and construction of a nuclear-powered submarine. The United States has already agreed to provide a reactor for a British nuclear-powered submarine. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there is any arrangement for that kind of co-operation and assistance if required between the United States and Canada in connection with not only a nuclear-powered submarine but a nuclear-powered icebreaker if one were required?

As I stated on April 21, negotiations have been proceeding with the government of the United States with a view to modification of the 1955 agreement on the exchange of atomic information for mutual defence purposes, to take account of the amendments to the relevant United States legislation which was passed in July of 1958.

I am very glad to say that the government is confident that as a consequence of the bilateral agreement which is now being negotiated, the way would be open to make arrangements for the kind of co-operation and assistance which would be required if the government of Canada were to decide to build a nuclear-powered submarine. However, the cost would have to be taken into consideration. I understand the cost runs to something like $60 million.

So far as a nuclear-powered icebreaker is concerned, information regarding a project for the non-military use of a reactor such as, for instance, to supply power for such a vessel could be exchanged by mutual agreement between Canada and the United States within the scope of the agreement on co-operation in the civil uses of atomic energy.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Labour if he can give any report on the dispute between workers and management at the Polymer Corporation, which has been in existence, as he knows, for some considerable length of time.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Another meeting was held this week, convened by the conciliation officer of the Department of Labour. At the moment we are looking over the situation to see what further steps can be taken in order to bring about a meeting between both parties with a view to a settlement being brought about.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—REQUEST FOR SPEEDING UP OF REVIEW OF BUILDING COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Since we are in the midst of the house-building season, will the minister ask Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to speed up their current semiannual review of building costs and release their new basic rates as soon as possible—as he knows, this was formerly done on July 1—with a view to making more realistic appraisals in those areas throughout Canada where reductions in basic rates of appraisals were made on January 1, 1959, which has resulted only in a reduction in the level of National Housing Act loans.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take up this question with the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I would point out to the hon. member and to the house that the loans under the insurance provisions of the National Housing Act are even higher this year than they were last year at this date. The figure for requests for undertakings to insure up to May 1—that would be for the first 17 weeks of the current year—is 12,092. Last year there were only 11,741.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT TO WINDSOR AND WHEATLEY BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries based on a report in the Windsor newspaper to the effect that 24 members of the House of Commons visited Windsor and Wheatley on Thursday. Was the transportation provided through the Department of Fisheries? Can the minister advise the house as to how air transport was provided, and at whose expense?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe the standing committee on marine and fisheries visited some fisheries plants in the Wheatley area yesterday. The transportation was not provided by the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. McIlraith: Was it provided by the government at government expense? How was it done?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I think that is the case, but I am not in a position to say.

Mr. McIlraith: Will you get the information?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member put the question on the order paper. It is asking for statistical information.

HEALTH INSURANCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—OUT OF PROVINCE BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I feel rather uncomfortable about my position in connection with the national hospital scheme. Can something be done to see that the regulations are amended so that I and others can be in Ottawa, away from our home province of British Columbia, for more than three months at a time?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Fraser Valley for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I might point out that within the last few days we have been informed by British Columbia authorities of their intention to amend their regulations regarding out of province benefits. As a result of these changes, which are expected to be made in the near future, I understand that an insured person temporarily absent from British Columbia will be eligible for a total of three months' hospitalization benefits during the year following his departure from the province. In other words, if he has to go to hospital during the year of his temporary absence because of acute illness or injury, he will be covered up to a maximum of three months' stay in hospital. I imagine this will take care of the situation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TARIFF BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Finance if he is having difficulty finding suitable candidates for appointment to the chairmanship of the tariff board.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is interested perhaps he would submit his application in writing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman I am interested, but not in the appointment for myself. I am interested in seeing that an appointment is made, and I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. If he has had no difficulty finding candidates, why does he not fill this important post?

Mr. McIlraith: He cannot make up his mind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will be filled in due course, and in the meantime the work of the tariff board is proceeding. They have been hearing a number of appeals.

Mr. Pearson: Without a chairman?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The tariff board can function with a panel of three, and it has been functioning quite satisfactorily.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF SUPERVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to advise the house as to what attitude the government has taken with regard to the reported request by India and Poland for a reconvening of the international supervisory committee on truce arrangements in Laos.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been differences of opinion over the possibility of attempting to reconvene the international commission for Laos which was adjourned sine die on July 19, 1958. Early this year a request for the reconvening of this commission came from the Poles, who urged resumption of the commission's activities in Laos on the ground that the commission should continue to carry out its supervisory functions there. North Viet Nam and communist China also requested a resumption of the Laos commission's activities. In December, 1958 north Viet Namese incursions into Laotian territory occurred. The Indian government, following upon this frontier dispute, urged a meeting of the Laos commission to deal with this specific problem.

Hon. members may also have seen press reports to the effect that the Soviet embassy in London handed a note to the foreign office on April 29 requesting the return of the international commission to Laos. The Canadian government received a similar request from the Soviet ambassador on April 28. It will be recalled that the United Kingdom and Soviet foreign ministers are the joint co-chairmen of the Geneva conference, and in that capacity act as a channel of communication with the international commissions in Indochina.

During the negotiations leading up to the adjournment sine die of the Laos commission in July, 1958 the Canadian position was that with the achievement of the political settlement in Laos and the integration of the dissident Pathet Lao into the national community, the commission had completed its supervisory task and should be dissolved. Because the Indian representatives did not accept that view, Canada agreed to the compromise formula of an adjournment sine die against the opposition of the Poles. However, the Canadian commissioner was instructed to make it quite clear, at the final meeting of the commission, that Canada could not agree to any further commission action which would infringe upon Laotian sovereignty.

I understand that the government of Laos is opposed to the reconvening of the commission. The Polish request, in the view of the Canadian government, did not bring forward adequate reasons for reconvening the commission, and since it called for a reconstitution of the commission secretariat in Vientiane, it would have been an obvious infringement on Laotian sovereignty.

I think that in general represents the situation at this time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

163. Departmental administration including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,105,745.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found at page 35 of the blue book, the details at page 231. Shall vote 163 carry?

Mr. Herridge: I wish to make a few remarks on this item—and I shall try to be brief—with respect to the problem of unemployment which exists at the present time and may be worse next winter. We in this group consider that unemployment in a country like Canada is a serious injustice to those who suffer by it. In the second place, it is an unnecessary waste of human resources. In the third place, it is a challenge to governments in general at all levels, to industry, to labour and to the people as a whole. Personally I believe it is unthinkable to accept the dictum that we must accept a hard core of unemployment in Canada throughout the year, and that that core should be larger during the winter because of seasonal unemployment.

During the last session of the British Columbia legislature the labour committee gave considerable consideration to this problem as it affects British Columbia. That committee was composed of representatives from all parties, and I am informed that it made a unanimous report to the legislature. I want to bring to the attention of the committee at this time a portion of that report with respect to its recommendations concerning the national government.

The committee invited representations from labour, industry and other sections of the community. It received briefs and representations from the British Columbia federation of labour; the mine, mill and smelter workers representing the miners of British Columbia, and other unions. It heard from various sections of industry through employers' representatives. It heard from the alma mater society of the University of British Columbia, which organization in my opinion made a thoughtful presentation. It heard from the research council of British Columbia, and finally it heard from some of the minister's officials in the regional offices at the coast.

In dealing with this question, Mr. Chairman, the committee considered all aspects of the problem—and I thought they did so in a constructive way—and dealt with the extent of unemployment in British Columbia from January, 1957 to January, 1959. They then sought to find the major causes of unemployment in British Columbia during 1958, and then made certain proposals as to the responsibility of the national government, the provincial government, the local governments, the trade union movement and industry.

I want just to place on record the recommendations of the committee with respect to responsibilities, from the committee's point of view, of the national government to meet this situation. In the report of the committee on labour of the legislative assembly of British Columbia, dated March 18, 1959 this is what I read with respect to the responsibilities of the national government. The committee had this to recommend:

I. The national government

By virtue of its control over the collections and disbursements of unemployment insurance funds, as well as constitutionally within the framework of the British North America Act as accepted by the national government when taking over certain taxation privileges from provincial administration, the primary responsibility for employment in Canada rests with the national government. With that authority lies the power to sustain a climate conducive to industrial expansion and the creation of new industries with a consequent high level of employment of the working force. Specifically, your committee considers that the national government of Canada should:—

1. Materially assist in a large-scale works program at appropriate times of the year on such projects as:

(a) Forest access, transprovincial, and interprovincial roads;
(b) Park and campsite improvement;
(c) Diking and drainage projects;
(d) Stream clearance projects and the creation of artificial spawning areas;
(In this latter connection it is contended that, since the improvement of fishways on the Fraser river eight years ago at a cost of $2 million, the salmon yield has increased by $127 million at cannery prices, and it is therefore evident that such projects would in time be self-liquidating because of the tremendous dollar market value increase in a comparatively short period of time.)
(e) Fraser river flood control consistent with a policy of fish conservation.

Then No. 2; the committee recommends that the federal government:

2. Institute an enlarged program of apprenticeship and trades training during adverse seasons of employment by extending the scope of the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Chairman, I have had a good number of representations along those lines which I intend to deal with when we are discussing the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It goes on:

3. Adopt a carefully screened immigration policy on the basis of the stated needs of industry and agriculture thus ensuring the planned assimilation of immigrants into the national working force.
4. Encourage and promote the construction of coastal shipping and national defence requirements in Canada.
5. Foster the expansion of a research program designed to encourage the use of coal and coal by-products in our industrial economy.

No doubt that recommendation, Mr. Chairman, springs from the fact that the coal industry in British Columbia, particularly in the Fernie area, is suffering a decline at this time.

6. Initiate the formation of a joint federal-provincial trade investigation team to the republic of China for the purpose of inquiring into trade possibilities with that country.

I would like to bring to the minister's attention that this recommendation was made both by industry and labour, because the working people of British Columbia as well as the industrial interests realize the great possibility of expansion of our markets for primary products if we can obtain greater trade in that direction.

7. To provide the ways and means to extend low cost credit in order to:—
(a) Promote and expand economic development and stimulate revenue, income, or self-liquidating projects or works by the province and its municipalities; and to

(b) Assist and encourage the establishment and growth of local industries.

Then, Mr. Chairman, the last recommendation is:

8. Give leadership and co-operation in the calling of a federal-provincial conference to seek a Canada-wide solution to the unemployment problem, requesting representation from all levels of government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I heartily support the proposal of the committee for a federal-provincial conference including all levels of government, I think for such a conference to be effective in providing a clear picture of the situation, and at the same time adequately representing the view of the Canadian people generally, that conference should also include representatives from labour, from industry, and from agriculture across this country.

When I say representation, I mean decentralized representation. I am a great believer, Mr. Chairman, that in the development of our domestic society we should decentralize authority and administration. I would like to see all sections of labour have the opportunity to be represented at such a conference. For instance, I think all sections of labour from the Atlantic to the Pacific, such as the forestry industry, the mining industry, the steel industry and the oil industry, should be represented. Then you would have a conference where the government would get the rank and file point of view in dealing with these day to day and very important problems.

The same thing, I think, Mr. Chairman, applies to industry. It is not sufficient just to call in the Canadian Manufacturers Association and have two or three big shots express their views. We have a diversified industrial structure in Canada, and I would like to see at such a conference representatives of various sections of industry, including the small industries, from every province in Canada, and in that way you would get all the information these people would be able to give.

Then with regard to farming, I would like to see a diversified representation in the same way, so that the grain farmers, the general farmers, the dairy farmers, the fruit farmers and the poultry farmers would be all represented at such a conference on a diversified basis, instead of having two or three people speaking for the whole industry. That would give the conference and the government a clear picture not only on a national or a provincial basis but also on a local basis.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring another matter to the minister's attention. I see he is busy chatting at the present time but I hope he will read my remarks later on. I am not blaming him entirely for this, because I think the blame can rest in other quarters too. But I would like to bring to his attention the success which has been achieved in this direction in the little country of Norway. I have recently been reading some books about the Norwegian government, for which I have a great respect. I have a great respect for all Norwegians. They are a simple and resourceful people who have had to meet some great problems both in peace and in war, and they have met them successfully, and I think countries of our size can learn from such lesser countries, countries with more experience and possibly more maturity when it comes to handling the organizations which represent the various groups of society.

I have been very interested to note how they have formed just such an advisory council representing industry, labour and agriculture in order to deal with the problems of inflation, monetary fiscal policy, unemployment, industry and economy generally. Their conferences have been called somewhat on the basis I have suggested this morning, so they get the local rank and file touch in meeting these problems.

I think that is a principle which can be explored to advantage in Canada. In this way not only does the government get the opinion of various sections of labour, industry and agriculture, but the persons who have the opportunity to represent these people also learn the problems of government and the difficulties which have to be faced. Out of this blending of ideas, this association of different interests, which has such a constructive approach to the problems facing us at this time can be evolved, as was done in Norway, a program which will receive the support of all classes of the people. I do urge the minister to give consideration to a conference of that type.

In addition I think other advantages flow from that type of conference. All programs have to be financed, and when it comes to bond issues for capital investment in self-liquidating projects, I think flowing from such a conference would come an understanding of the problems which face the government and a greater understanding of the program the government may desire to carry out. But it is desirable to have this local interest.

For instance, if I may refer to a local industry in my own district, say the government intended to do certain things with respect to access roads or provincial roads as the result of a program designed to meet the challenge of unemployment. In that case, if you floated a bond issue I think even in the smallest communities of Canada there would be people who would, under those circumstances, willingly purchase government bonds to assist in such a program because of their greater knowledge of the circumstances and the need, and also because of their interest which would spring from local participation in the development of that program. I think it would be most beneficial in designing a program to get an understanding of it, and from that I think would flow quite an interest in assisting to provide some of the funds which are necessary to give effect to such a program. Many more people would then feel that they were a part of this program and that they should accept some personal responsibility by making what financial contribution they could toward any bond issues which were offered to meet any of the challenges of national development at this time.

That is all I have to say at this time, and I put the suggestion forward as a constructive approach toward meeting the problem of unemployment as it faces us today.

Mr. Hellyer: Like other members of this committee I am very much concerned about those Canadians who are unemployed. I am afraid we refer to them some times rather blandly as mere statistics, forgetting that they are human beings with human problems and human needs. I think the time for taking practical steps in an effort to alleviate their position is overdue. It is not my intention to give a lecture on economics or to talk about the situation in a general sense. I wish, rather, to put forward a specific proposal.

I am becoming more and more distressed about the situation of the unemployed. When I go home at week ends I talk to many people, some are young, some middle aged, some of them older, some of them skilled, some of them without any skill or training at all. Each has a common problem. Each is unemployed. Many of these people have mortgage payments which are overdue. Many of them have doctor bills and other bills to meet. Many have family responsibilities and must keep a roof over the heads of their children. Almost every week end I talk to some person who has just lost, or is just about to lose, his home because of inability to meet the financial obligations connected with it.

Chronic unemployment makes cynics, petty crooks and communists out of decent people, and in a rich, young and dynamic economy such as we have in Canada it should be a fundamental right of any able bodied man to be able to work at a wage which will keep body and soul together and provide not only for himself but for his family. Our task as elected representatives who come here to take cognizance of the needs of the people we represent is to try to determine what solutions are best able to meet this grievous situation. Our task is to maintain employment and, through employment, the values of human dignity and decency.

The problem is very difficult to solve completely. As is well known, a significant proportion of our unemployment is seasonal. Many improvements have been made in this respect in the last few years. There have been great strides in technology, and dislocation due to seasonal unemployment is, I think, diminishing. Great strides will be made in the future, and we should press forward in research and study in an effort to find every means possible of mitigating still further the effects of seasonal unemployment.

I think, however, it would be too much to expect that we could ever completely overcome this problem which is indigenous to our climatic conditions. We experience, in addition, the type of unemployment which is called frictional, by which is meant people changing their jobs in the normal course of events. This is something we will always have with us, and something which need not cause us too much concern.

In our search for a solution to this whole problem we require the fullest possible information. The statistics available at present do not give us the whole story. I think we need more detailed information and a more careful study. In approaching this question seriously I feel that the first step required would be a national manpower survey. How extensive this survey ought to be should be left to the experts to determine, but the survey would have to accomplish certain things. It would have to give us a complete analysis of the unemployed labour force, it should determine into which age categories the unemployed workers fall, and give us a more complete breakdown of a variety of information including marital status, training, educational background, vocational training background and, perhaps, job history; sufficient information to enable us to tackle the problem in an all-out manner. It should not be difficult for the national employment service and the unemployment insurance commission to obtain all this information. It would, of course, be an additional job for them at a time when they are already overtaxed, but it is one which is within their capacity and one for which they have the machinery in being.

If such a survey were made, we should then know accurately how many of those people registered as seeking employment were actually unemployed. We should know whether they were plumbers, carpenters, nurses, stenographers, unskilled labourers. We should know just what their background happened to be. We should know the extent of their educational background, whether they had completed grade school, high school, college; whether they had received apprenticeship training or vocational training; whether they had been self-taught, or whether they had received no training at all. I am sure it would be possible for the commission to obtain sufficient information along these lines to provide material for a very careful and detailed analysis.

At the same time it would be necessary to make a study of the extent and nature of job openings in this country. We should seek to determine what skills will be required not only at the present time but in the months and years which lie ahead. Employers can give a great deal of assistance in this respect. Most of them can forecast their requirements at least for a year or two ahead, and know the type of jobs they are likely to have available. Such information as this is, of course, essential. Whether or not it would be necessary to cover the entire working force in connection with this survey is something I am not prepared to say. That is a decision which can be taken by the people who make these matters their day to day business. The survey should be just as broad as is required to enable us to obtain all the information necessary to meet the situation fully and do the job properly.

The question may be asked, if this is a good suggestion why was it not done some years ago? I think if it were a good suggestion then, it is a good suggestion now. Moreover, the problem is of greater urgency today than it was previously, due to the increase in unemployment since the summer of 1957. Besides, this is a matter which is far too important for quibbling. Completion of such a study as I have suggested would provide facts and eliminate reliance on hearsay.

We are told, for instance, that a great number of those who are at present unemployed are of a mature age and that as a consequence they find a great deal of difficulty in obtaining employment. We are told day after day that people over 40 find difficulty in obtaining employment due to company pension plans. I have no doubt that this is true, but we should know specifically to what extent it is true. If necessary we should examine individual pension plans and find out which provisions make it difficult for employers to engage people over 40. It may be we shall need to do some rethinking and take the initiative in making changes in the pension plans which now exist.

I am sure, and I know the minister agrees with me, that it was not the intention of either management or labour to set up these pension plans in such a way as to constitute a deterrent to the employment of mature and experienced workers and keep them from rejoining the labour force. This is something which might have been done inadvertently; it would not have been done deliberately. If this should be the case it is our responsibility to find out about it and take the initiative in changing whatever has to be changed.

Another common complaint we hear is that many of the people seeking employment are incompletely or inadequately trained. It is difficult to know to what extent this is true. One suspects from interviewing people that there is considerable validity to this statement. Our survey would show whether or not there is correlation between training and employment, and to what extent lack of training is responsible for unemployment.

Many people in the unemployed labour force went into the labour market in the early post-war years. This was a natural thing to do. Many went in without finishing their schooling. The attraction at the time was very great; high wages prevailed, and it was easy for almost anyone to get a job. This tended to seduce people from their academic or professional studies and persuaded them to enter the labour force perhaps earlier than they would have done in other times. These people now lack the training which they would have had in the ordinary course of events, and for them there is a special problem.

We hear from day to day that for the employment opportunities that do exist there are not skilled applicants. I have personal knowledge of some of these cases. I mentioned earlier this session a period last summer when there were not sufficient trained plasterers to meet the demand. Just two weeks ago in Toronto I was talking to a coat manufacturer who had openings for three machine operators. He was unable to hire adequately trained machine operators. I also know that in the construction industry there could be openings for highly skilled estimators, inspectors, material handlers, material expediters and for other classes of people if they had sufficient technological training to fill openings of this kind. There must be many other trades and vocations where there are employment opportunities if the people were available who had the training and skills required.

In the unemployed labour force at the present time there undoubtedly are a number of skilled workers whose skills may be in overabundant supply or for whose skills there may be continually contracting requirement. This is a situation that is likely to continue in the wake of automation. Inevitably there will be change, and our responsibility is to face it and use it to our national advantage.

We should not attempt to impede the progress of automation, from which a great deal of dislocation can be expected and much adjustment will be necessary. Automation will be a great boon and a blessing if we are prepared to plan for it and use our displaced personnel to the best advantage of the total economy and channel their productivity and creative talents into new, productive enterprises and outlets. This is a program that will require some imagination. It is a problem that has not existed for very long and one to which we perhaps have not given sufficient attention. It will require imaginative and well-planned study. This is a problem which I know we can and will face and solve if we really set our minds to it.

Once the facts had been determined by our survey the next step would be to launch a massive rehabilitation program. It seems ironic that during wartime big men present big plans and achieve big success with almost universal public support, whereas in peacetime we seem reluctant to face big problems and procrastinate sometimes almost interminably in seeking solutions. If we could just maintain some of that sense of urgency which we feel during wartime we could achieve miracles.

This program of massive rehabilitation could be patterned on the experience gained by the Department of Veterans Affairs in the early post-war years. At that time, as you will recall, the government made it possible for veterans to undertake academic or vocational training at government expense. More than 60,000 veterans took some university training under that plan, and almost 100,000 were approved for vocational training. Many, of course, did not complete their studies, but there is no doubt but that they have been able to contribute much more to the growth and potential of the Canadian economy as a result of the opportunity made available to them.

The massive rehabilitation program would, in effect, be a massive program of adult education. It could be set up in various centres right across Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia. The number of trades and subjects taught would, of course, be related both to the demand for these particular courses and to the result of the survey and future surveys held from time to time, indicating the extent to which any trade or skill would be required in the economy. Participants would be given complete freedom of choice in their selection, but it would probably be advisable to provide counselling service. In addition, though I personally am somewhat leery of them, aptitude tests could be given if requested.

I do not know why persons drawing unemployment insurance and for whom there is no immediate prospect of job openings should not take advantage of the opportunity to increase their knowledge or improve their skills. I am confident that many would welcome the opportunity. In many cases, no doubt, it would be a first introduction to vocational or technical training; in other cases an extension or supplement to previous courses. For others it would be the commencement of acquiring a new skill as an alternative to one already possessed which is in oversupply. Such a plan, of course, would not necessarily be limited to those persons drawing unemployment insurance but should be available to those on municipal relief, etc.

It may be said that there is a constitutional problem involved, and someone may wish to argue that such a program may be outside the federal jurisdiction. I doubt if this objection would be seriously raised. The veterans rehabilitation program was designed to give Canadian veterans an opportunity to better fit themselves for return to, or absorption by, the Canadian labour force. This proposed plan would be for exactly the same reason, to take people from the rolls of the unemployed and prepare them for return to and absorption by the Canadian economy. When a person trained in Newfoundland, for example, is able to obtain employment it will relieve, indirectly, the tax burden on every other Canadian from coast to coast. For each person able to obtain employment as a result of such training it would reduce the burden on all the Canadian taxpayers.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that whether this plan is administered by the federal government or by the provinces is not too important. However, I feel the federal government must take the complete financial responsibility and not load any part of the responsibility on the provinces, and not make the implementation of the plan dependent on additional provincial financial responsibility. I know some of the background as to why it is suggested that the provinces should participate, but I feel the provincial governments already have such a heavy burden that we could not reasonably expect them to participate financially. Particularly would this be true of some of the smaller provinces such as the maritimes, and some of the other provinces which are not as wealthy as the central provinces. I would hope that it could be done completely on federal initiative. Whether or not it is administered by the federal government is a matter of detail that I would have to leave to the administration.

Notwithstanding the constitution, unemployment is by its very nature and because of its relationship to federal policies particularly federal fiscal and monetary policies, a federal problem, and no federal government can escape its over-all responsibility in this regard. Unemployed people can pass freely from one province to another and they are the concern of all Canadians, and as such should be the concern of this parliament and of this House of Commons. Our labour force must not only be trained but mobile. A pocket of unemployment anywhere in Canada is the concern and responsibility of people in every other part of Canada. I expect the provincial governments would welcome any proposal which would tend to reduce the ranks of the unemployed and to mitigate, whether directly or indirectly, those many economic and social problems connected with unemployment.

I wish to compliment the minister on the increased emphasis he is putting on vocational training. I note the increase in expenditures for vocational training under item 170; but most of this money is being used to train new people who are coming into the labour force, young people who are just making their way into the labour force. A very small proportion of it is being used for the rehabilitation and training of unemployed workers. The increase in this year's estimate specifically on behalf of unemployed workers is very small.

I think modern society accepts the responsibility, though not adequately, for people without jobs. People who are unemployed must not be denied food, clothing and shelter. We have reached a state in our evolution where we believe we are our brothers' keepers at least to the extent that we have to provide them with the basic necessities of life. It would be incredible if we in a great, rich, growing country such as ours could not supply our unemployed people with at least sufficient of the basic requisites of food, clothing and shelter.

Whether these are paid for through unemployment insurance, municipal relief, or through some other means, they are a charge on the community at large and are paid for by the taxpaying and consuming public. We find ourselves, I think, believing that this money comes out of some pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. If we trace it back we find that it all comes from the same source, namely from all of us as workers, from all of us as consumers, and we all have to pay the shot.

The unemployment insurance fund and relief are just two more of those fixed costs which we talk about, costs which raise the prices of our products and make it more difficult for us to compete in world markets. Expenditure for a rehabilitation program—and it would be a considerable expenditure; I do not deny that—would be in the nature of an investment. It would result ultimately in very handsome dividends, not only in the self-respect and dignity of the individuals themselves but to the community at large. This is a program which, though not self-liquidating in the normal terminology of self-liquidating, would be far more than self-liquidating in the ultimate and total effect on the Canadian economy. More important, Mr. Chairman, would be the tens of thousands of individuals who would regain their dignity, self-respect and independent place in the community.

This plan, Mr. Chairman, is complementary to the one put forward yesterday by my leader. These are both partial solutions to a very serious problem. They could be studied. At the same time they could both be discussed with the provinces at a conference such as that suggested yesterday by my leader, the leader of the official opposition.

In conclusion, I would suggest that the government give serious consideration to this proposal. I can assure them that they would receive wholehearted support and backing from members on this side of the house. This is the type of progressive peacetime policy which we as members of parliament and as representatives of the people have an obligation and a responsibility to put forward, and not only just to put forward but to implement.

I suggest with deference to the government that, just as with the proposal for next year's winter works program, they do not leave consideration of this until next fall but that they consider it urgently and immediately, because the days and weeks have a habit of slipping by so quickly that before we know it next winter will be upon us, and only plans which are commenced now can possibly be achieved and implemented by the fall of the year. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, provision could be made in the supplementary estimates which would enable a start to be made and the machinery to be set up. It is obvious that it would not be possible to achieve maximum enrolment at once because of the difficulty of obtaining and perhaps training the teachers, the supervisors, the instructors and other personnel necessary to organize such a large scale enterprise. But once it was started it would grow and would be a permanent and dynamic fixture of our economy in a growing technological age.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the committee for listening so carefully to this proposition. Again on behalf of those on this side of the house I recommend it to the sympathetic consideration of the government, and I can promise that if they would implement this, or some scheme based upon similar lines, they would receive enthusiastic and considerable support from all of us over here.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, as I represent a riding where workers account for about 50 per cent of the population, I feel I must take part in this debate so as to acquaint the house and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) with the views of the people in my riding as regards unemployment insurance.

But before doing so, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in rebuttal of some arguments advanced in this house, more particularly last night by hon. members for Hull (Mr. Caron), and for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau).

I should like to ask the house to look back on conditions as they were at the time when hon. members of the Liberal party were managing the affairs of this country. They would have us believe that Liberal times were invariably prosperous times, whereas under Conservative administration, Canada lapsed into unrelieved hard times.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should hark back to the late twenties, when a Liberal government was sitting on the government benches. Farmers remember, for instance, that butter, at the time, was selling for 18 to 20 cents a pound; eggs, 12 to 15 cents a dozen; hogs $10 to $12; and milk about 80 cents a hundredweight.

On leaving college, I spent a few months looking for work, because it was a period of unemployment, although, it will be noted, this was under a Liberal government. Finally, I found a job that was paying me $6 a week. The facts, therefore, are somewhat different from what hon. members in the opposition would have people believe. But these gentlemen have so taken advantage of the good faith of the public that, sooner or later, they are bound to regret their irresponsible statements.

I also like other citizens of St. Hyacinthe, witnessed practices bordering on inhumanity resorted by the town's mayor, a Liberal. During the depression of the 30's, people were being hired at 10 cents an hour to break up stone with a sledge-hammer. Please note, sir, that this was under a Liberal administration, for it was the Hon. T. D. Bouchard, mayor of St. Hyacinthe, who was responsible for those conditions.

In 1933, the business picture brightened up somewhat. However, at that time, when I was working for the Goodyear Company, men were being paid $6 and $7 a week. This went on until 1939. Now the conditions I have referred to were those that existed during the years 1936, 1937 and 1938, therefore under a Liberal regime. Yet, according to our good friends, whenever they were in power these were years only of prosperity and even of opulence.

I am pointing this out Mr. Chairman, so as to give a complete picture of the conditions then prevailing in Canada. It is easy to brag about prosperity while looking at only one side of the picture, but in these matters, as in any others, it is necessary to look at both sides.

Since the beginning of this session, and especially since the house took up the estimates of the Department of Labour, our Liberal opponents have been painting a very dark picture of the present situation and of unemployment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And they have been right.

Mr. Ricard: If you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, we shall look in retrospect at conditions which prevailed under the Liberal regime.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were not as bad.

Mr. Ricard: In so far as my constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is concerned, figures which I got directly from the local unemployment insurance office show that, in January 1953, 1,696 unemployed were registered there. The figures also show that 2,835 were registered in January 1954, 2,438 in January 1955, 2,553 in January 1956 and 2,809 in January 1957. That was the situation under a Liberal regime. On the other hand, according to the latest statistics supplied by the same local office, 1,298 unemployed registered in the city of St. Hyacinthe in December 1958.

As reported on page 2 of the English Appendix to yesterday's Hansard, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) stated:

> In yesterday's edition of La Presse, I found still another headline which might also help write the story of this Conservative government. Indeed, in its issue of yesterday, May 6, La Presse had a heading which read:
> Workers' unemployment insurance contributions are going up.

To that, I would oppose a heading from another newspaper. In its editorial of today May 8, Le Devoir has an item headed:

> A commendable extension of the social security idea.

And the item goes on to say:

> It is feared that news agencies have not understood a thing about the new amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.
> In their dispatches they emphasized only what was bound to make the greatest impression on people's minds, i.e. the higher contributions, but left in the dark the increased protection guaranteed to each contributor.

Mr. Chairman, any unbiased person will agree that the present Conservative government has done much to help those who are unfortunately out of work. At this stage of the discussion, I should like to remind the house of some of the measures taken by this government at the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), who, is everywhere recognized as the best minister of labour the Canadian parliament ever had.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is a good man, no doubt, but I think you are exaggerating a bit.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, let me first of all draw the attention of the house to the restrictions which applied to married women and which were removed during the very first session. The elimination of such restrictions has had the happy effect of putting $5 million more into the hands of married women who, under the old act, did not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

I would also point out to the house that this government twice extended the benefit period, by six weeks and two months respectively. In each case, it was at the suggestion of the present hon. Minister of Labour.

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Two months and six weeks.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: The first amendment provided for a six week extension, and the second an extension of two months in the duration of seasonal benefits. About 100,000 workers were helped by this wise measure, and received additional payments amounting to approximately $48 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a result of their own contributions.

Mr. Ricard: Yes certainly. The hon. member for Essex-East, just as hon. members to his right, apparently expects to get everything for nothing. However, I do not think we have yet reached that stage, and we hope with God's help that present conditions will go on improving as they have done until now.

Meanwhile, our Liberal friends keep on saying that this government has done nothing to alleviate hardships. They are not the only ones who feel sorry for the unemployed. We on this side of the house are concerned with human suffering and are just as anxious as are our opponents—perhaps even more concerned, because we are proving it—to alleviate the regrettable effects that are being felt by these people.

Just to go on with my enumeration, let me also remind the house that it was through the actions of this government that unemployment insurance benefits were granted to fishermen. Following an amendment introduced by the Conservative government, 13,000 fishermen received an amount of about $15 million.

And finally, at the suggestion of the present Minister of Labour, the duration of unemployment insurance benefit payments will soon be extended from 36 to 52 weeks per year.

If you add up all the money spent by this government to help the unemployed, you reach a figure of $68 million. I think our Liberal opponents should at least be realistic and admit that the payment of such an amount certainly deserves the gratitude of the people concerned.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what about the winter works promoted by this government? Such works, amounting to $97,903,000—or almost $98 million—provided employment to close to 40,000 people—39,961, to be exact.

In the province of Quebec, this winter works program reached an amount of $33,450,000 and provided employment for 6,229 persons. I therefore suggest to our Liberal friends to take a good look at the present situation and to represent it in its true light, instead of raising the cry of depression and trying to have everyone, including people in employment, believe that there is a shortage of jobs.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the house that, as a consequence of the tireless efforts of the Minister of Labour, Canadian workers can certainly look forward to happier days.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Last evening I had occasion to make a few comments on this particular item, but because of the time limitation I was unable to complete and give expression to the thoughts I desired to express.

In the latter part of my remarks I was making reference to the effectiveness, or lack of it, of the conciliation arrangements in effect under the jurisdiction of both the federal government and the provinces, which are in most cases somewhat similar. The suggestion was that following an initial period of negotiation between the representatives of the workers themselves and the representatives of management, if no settlement is reached in this direct stage of negotiation every effort should be made at the conciliation officer stage to effect a settlement and to insist upon collective bargaining taking place to the fullest possible extent.

At the moment we have the system of a conciliation officer and then a conciliation board. In many cases the conciliation board does nothing but duplicate the activities of the conciliation officer. It may be that because the conciliation officer failed to effect a settlement for one reason or another, the conciliation board finds itself in this position of having to perform the duties and the functions which are properly those of the conciliation officer.

I look upon this situation as we look upon most matters of duplication, namely as being nothing more than a waste of the money of the federal treasury in the payment of the costs of the chairman of the conciliation board. I am sure we could scrap the conciliation board procedure without too much difficulty, thus realizing a great saving in costs to the Department of Labour for those particular services, and probably channeling that money in the direction of conciliation officers, if more of them are needed, or in terms of additional money to them in order to get the right type of person for a conciliation officer.

I believe the minister mentioned that last year 24—I have not the figures right before me at the moment but I believe that is the figure he used—negotiations were settled before conciliation boards last year. Here then are 24 cases of duplication, 24 industrial disputes or negotiations that could quite well have been settled at the conciliation officer stage.

Another failure which I believe exists in our conciliation procedure is that—as has happened in a number of cases, especially major industrial disputes affecting large corporations and a large number of workmen—when these industrial disputes get beyond the conciliation and strike vote stage, either preceding the time the strike is to take place or after a strike has taken place, the minister invariably is obliged to go outside of his own departmental officials and call upon private citizens to assist in the conciliation or mediation process in order to effect a settlement.

I do not think this is giving due credit to the officials within the department. It may be that they are not capable of performing their duties in that sense and at that stage of negotiations; that I could not say. But when we have a conciliation structure; when we employ conciliation officers whose duty and responsibility it is to effect a settlement, to mediate, to get both sides together, to ensure that collective bargaining, give and take takes place and a contract is signed, it seems rather senseless that we should be obliged to go outside and call upon the services of private citizens to do the things that Department of Labour officials should be doing in the first place.

Another unfortunate matter that arises from the operation of conciliation boards is in the selection of people as chairmen of conciliation boards who are not departmental officials. This is so in practically all cases. Some private citizen is asked to be chairman of the conciliation board. He may be a judge of some court, as happens in a number of cases. He may be a retired individual. He may be someone who has done a considerable amount of work in conciliation and arbitration procedures, such as university professors, lawyers and so on. But in some cases it has happened that the appointment of persons as chairmen of conciliation boards has been nothing more than a recognition of the contribution a person has made to a political party in one way or another over the years, and political hacks are appointed as conciliation board chairmen.

I have participated in conciliation boards where this has happened, and that procedure is extremely detrimental to labour-management negotiations and to peace and harmony in those negotiations, and in regard to effecting a settlement at that stage. In many cases the individuals appointed in this way are not too interested in the process of negotiation. They do not have too much of a conception of the industry itself or the play of human psychological forces in labour-management negotiations; therefore the process of conciliation falls down at that stage where these things happen.

I would certainly suggest to the minister that when he does take steps to amend the present Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, if he would do so along the lines I have suggested I do not think he would find there would be too much argument or rejection of those proposals by the people affected by them. Certainly as far as I am concerned, as well as others on this side, the minister would not find much objection.

One of the other difficulties which arise in the enactment of legislation governing the relationships between the working people, through their unions, and management is that those laws are often enacted in the dark. Legislators in many cases do not have too much of an understanding about the forces involved in the process, as well as the psychological factors at work. In this instance we have legislation along these lines which has been in effect for too long without any revision being made to it, and without it being kept up to date.

Legislation oftimes is restrictive. I point again to the case in British Columbia under our labour relations act where in some cases it is absolutely impossible to comply with the provisions of the act, and if a strike does take place the union is automatically on an illegal strike because the law says so. The law is restrictive in that event, and consequently causes difficulties and much trouble. Then the lawmakers come along after they have caused these difficulties and trouble and say, "We will have to put even greater restrictions in the legislation. You people are not complying with the law; we will impose such drastic penalties that you will be required to." But they do not deal with the problem at its roots by designing the proper legislation in the first instance which would, in the first place, be acceptable to both sides, and second, take into account the human factors involved.

I hope when the minister does get around to it, though I do not imagine it will be until next session, he will introduce amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act somewhat along the lines I have suggested, and that he will not fall into the trap into which other people have fallen of making the legislation so restrictive and damaging that it will defeat the very purpose which it is supposedly designed to accomplish, namely promoting labour-management harmony, promoting collective bargaining in the true spirit of give and take, and promoting peaceful relations between the two groups who are directly involved in the negotiations. As I say, I hope he will not fall into this trap but will have the foresight, which I know he is capable of exercising, to introduce legislation which will not only not be too drastic in this light but will also, in effect, have the result of promoting labour-management harmony.

Mr. Chairman, if I may I would like to comment on some of the remarks made last evening following my remarks. First of all, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George spoke directly after I did, and he made the suggestion that the proposals I had put forward with respect to the power and authority of conciliation officers was bordering on compulsory arbitration. Surely the hon. member, especially in view of the experience he himself had when he bailed the government out of its difficult position with respect to the C.B.C. in Montreal, cannot reasonably expect anyone to think that this is bordering on compulsory arbitration. Far, far from it.

Then my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo, who also spoke following my remarks—I regret that he is not in the house at this moment so he would have the opportunity, if he so desired, to reply to what I am about to say—made some comments in connection with certain remarks of mine to which I would particularly like to make reference. I say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that I have a great deal of respect for the honesty, ability and integrity of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, and I am sure if many other hon. members in the house had the same openness and sincerity, not only internally but also outwardly, we would have much less difficulty with the problems which face us at the present time.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo started off in a very impassioned and emotional way which was apparently occasioned by the remarks I had made originally, and I cannot for the life of me see why he started off on that tack because I do not think I said anything untoward in my comments so far as the recently enacted labour legislation in Newfoundland is concerned. My remarks were confined specifically to that legislation and were not bordering on the question of article 29, and so on, about which I have other views. But I did make two comments which I think were quite factual and had nothing to do with whether I was in Newfoundland or whether the facts had all been brought out or not. One of my comments was that the premier of Newfoundland had instituted legislation, which incidentally the legislature subsequently passed though I did not say so in my remarks last night, which in effect decertified and outlawed two locals of the I.W.A. Mr. Chairman, that is a fact; there are no two ways about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: I would prefer the hon. member to wait until afterward, but if he insists—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is on the definition of a word. I would like to hear the hon. member's definition of the word "outlawed"?

Mr. Howard: I do not want to make any unkind remarks about you, sir. I did not use the word "outlawed"; I used the word "decertified".

Mr. Pickersgill: No. The hon. member will find on checking Hansard that he said both decertified and outlawed just now.

Mr. Howard: Just now I said decertified and outlawed, but last night I just used the word decertified, and I used it in this context and in the same way because that is precisely what happened. In this instance the two words are synonymous. It is factual. The act which I have before me, of which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was kind enough to let me have a copy for my own information, makes no reference to "outlaw", it is true. It refers to decertification.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly; and that is all.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. members carry on their private conversation outside the house?

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend wants us to carry on our private conversation outside the house. I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I did not make the interjection; the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did. I am only trying to accommodate other hon. members by giving as full as possible a discussion of this particular question.

The other comment I had to make last night was in my opinion another factual matter, except that it related to something which might happen in the future. However, I do not think even that remark should have provoked the comments made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. The suggestion I made was that this type of action by a group of political people outlawing a union—or decertifying it, if the hon. member likes a euphemistic term better—could have the result of provoking working class people into taking political action. It could, and that is a factual statement.

I could go further into this question if the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo—and again I am sorry he is not here—wished me to do so. I could discuss this question of the invasion of the rights of individuals, of the by-passing of the labour relations board, of the removal of jurisdiction from the administration's own quasi-judicial board which deals with certification, and with political interference in the conduct of union affairs. I would be quite prepared to do this, for the act is right here before us. Any hon. member can get a copy, and it represents nothing more than a group of politicians denying to the people of Newfoundland their just and moral rights under the law.

What would be thought in this parliament if, for instance, the Minister of Labour, who has under his jurisdiction a board which issues certificates to unions, were to introduce a specific piece of legislation stating that the brotherhood of locomotive engineers no longer had the right to represent the firemen on the C.N.R.? Yet that is precisely, in effect, what was done in Newfoundland. Suppose the Minister of Agriculture were to introduce a specific piece of legislation to the effect that a particular farmer no longer had the right to sell his wheat to his own elevator. Yet precisely the same principle is involved. If we accept this legislation saying that certain people no longer have the right to belong to a particular union, it is no different from accepting the principle that a law may be passed saying that an individual no longer has the right to belong to a particular religious organization because it is not one which the government likes.

I imagine that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo had reference to the economic position of the Anglo-Newfoundland company and its ability to pay certain wages and taxes, if in fact the company pays any taxes to anyone other than the federal government. I do not wish to become involved in discussing the economic affairs of the company. Information on that subject is readily available from the company's own annual reports. Whatever conclusions may be drawn from this information, the fact remains that as soon as Premier Smallwood got rid of one union and established his own politically dominated union, the company was able to pay to its employees the wage increase which earlier it had said it was unable to afford.

I should like also to make reference, if I may, to the relationship which exists between wages and prices, because that is certainly part of our economic system. The general cry in the last couple of years has been that every time there is a wage increase prices to consumers must immediately rise. It has been accepted that the company affected by the wage increases was obliged to increase its prices. Consequently the working people who received the increases were labelled as irresponsible by the rest of society.

I think the facts themselves in no way bear out this attitude. In some cases, it is true, increases in wages could have an effect upon prices, especially if a company is in a marginal position or if the company concerned cannot afford to pay wage increases without raising prices to the consumers of its product. However, I submit that in the great bulk of cases this is not the situation. Then again we constantly hear the cry that we are pricing ourselves out of world markets because of high wages, because the working man desires a sufficient income to provide for himself and for his family. It is said that the only way we can get these markets back is by cutting wages so we can produce more cheaply and compete with other suppliers of world markets.

This is the gist of the arguments we hear. But let us take the case of the aluminum industry. In Canada the notable company is the Aluminum Company of Canada, which for a long while has been virtually in a monopoly position. It was not too long ago that the Aluminum Company of Canada, or Alcan as it is briefly referred to, found itself in difficulty in so far as the United Kingdom market was concerned because aluminum from Russia was being sold in the United Kingdom at a price lower than that at which Alcan was selling to the United Kingdom. The cry went up that because of high wages the Canadian aluminum industry had priced itself out of the market, and that consequently we should be obliged to curtail production, lay people off and so on.

One of the first things we have to determine, if we can, is how the cost factor in Russia is calculated. I myself believe this to be impossible. How do the Russians determine their cost of production? What is it based on? We have no idea. I am sure the manner in which the economy of that country operates would make it impossible for us to compete with them even if we were in a position to find out how they compute their labour costs. So that argument has not too much validity.

Again, one of the facts about this industry which few people seem to realize—or if they do realize it they do not say too much about it—is that for more than 50 years the aluminum industry has operated in the world market in a monopoly position, protected by cartels and price fixing arrangements. The price of aluminum has never had anything to do with the wages received by the employees in that industry or in a particular company. Alcan or Aluminium Limited, the holding company which owns Alcan in Canada, was for many years the agency through which Alcoa in the United States entered into these international arrangements in so far as price fixing agreements were concerned.

I wonder if I might call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I gather that I have about five minutes or more at my disposal in which to conclude my observations. At one o'clock I was dealing with the question of the effect that wages may have on price increases and said that this is an insignificant part of the pressure on price increases. In fact, I made mention of the aluminum industry in general and the Aluminum Company of Canada in particular. The question of price fixing arrangements, of combines, of participation in international cartels and the question of price increases without any relationship between the amount of the increase and the wages paid and other costs of the industry form one of the major factors affecting an increase in price or the devaluation of the dollar or inflation.

For some twenty years Canadian farmers were at the mercy of a price fixing combine in the steel industry. The Steel Company of Canada, Dosco, New Brunswick Fence, Lundy Fence and Canadian Fence are a few of the names that come to mind as being companies that were engaged in a price fixing combine and that were subsequently charged and found guilty under the Criminal Code just a short while ago. This served to point up the fact that over a twenty-year period farmers were at the mercy of these corporations that charged whatever they wanted to charge. It was found that the wages paid to the employees in the steel industry had absolutely no connection with price levels and price increases with respect to farm fencing and other fencing.

There have been a number of prosecutions in the Canadian courts with respect to other combines. Some of the industries and names that come to mind are the rubber industry, the electrical industry, the E. B. Eddy Company's match factory, the pulp and paper and fine papers industry, and so on. Case after case arises across Canada involving corporations that engage in price-fixing arrangements with other corporations in the same type of industry the design of which is to charge the highest possible prices they can, there being no connection whatever between the wages paid in the industry, the other costs which industry had to meet and the prices which they charged.

There are many other cases which have not yet been considered by the courts but which have been reported by the restrictive trade practices commission and which as far as we can gather from information gleaned from the press and from questions raised in this house the Department of Justice is considering prosecuting under the Criminal Code. We cannot deal with this question at any length because some of these cases are presently before the courts or under consideration.

Time after time in industry after industry and in corporation after corporation attempts were made to enter into price-fixing arrangements. The larger the corporation the easier it is to do so. There have been price-fixing arrangements, instances of uniform bidding on government contracts, uniform price setting and uniform increases introduced which constitute one of the major factors in the increasing cost of living and one of the major factors in prices having reached the level they have now attained. I mention these illustrations only to show the other side of the coin to those people who spread propaganda from one end of the country to the other saying that the working-class people are responsible for the increased cost of living because of demands for wage increases or other adjustments in their remuneration.

The working force is not entirely to blame although they may be to a slight degree or in some individual instances. Certainly, however, they are not entirely to blame. By far the greater part of the blame rests with those corporations that engage in price-fixing schemes, combines, monopolies and international cartels with companies in other countries. If we would attack this problem with the same energy that is devoted to spreading propaganda about the working class being to blame more significant strides would be made toward meeting the problem than have been made up to the present time.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few moments of the time of the committee. It may seem strange that a member from what is almost entirely a farming community should rise in his place to speak on a labour vote but there are plenty of precedents established in this committee of people—as it were—talking out of their natural habitat.

The first thing I want to do is tell the Minister of Labour that the people of my constituency as well as the members of this party are 100 per cent behind him. We approve very much of his actions and are happy to have as the minister in charge of this portfolio a man who is so naturally unruffled, even-tempered and keen-minded. We know that he has the interests of labour at heart because he has been a member of a union for many years. We also commend him for the appointment of Mr. MacArthur to the board of commissioners of the unemployment insurance commission. The minister's decision indicates that he does what he knows to be right and that political considerations do not influence his actions.

I wish to make particular reference to the addresses made yesterday by two hon. members, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Hamilton South. I thought they were very able addresses.

The thing that I want to talk about particularly this afternoon is the situation in so far as farm labour is concerned, at least in western Canada. It is very difficult to get sufficient help on the farms and I do not know what possibly can be done about it. People do not seem to want to work on the farms any more. I know why perfectly well. You cannot run a farm on a 40-hour week or less. While there are alleged to be half a million more or less unemployed people in this country, yet at the same time there are probably 250,000 or 300,000 jobs available on farms. I will admit that everybody who is unemployed is not suitable for work on the farm but a great many of them could work there if they wanted to.

The people who work in industry have contributed to the unemployment insurance fund, and rather than work on farms they are satisfied—I do not say contented—to draw what unemployment insurance they can and not work on the farm. This is something that farmers find difficult to understand. They cannot understand why, when there are so many jobs of one kind or another that perfectly physically fit people could take, they do not take them. This lack of help on the farms is one thing that is causing the situation that has been called vertical integration to take place on the farms. The farmer cannot get sufficient help to carry on the way he should and the way he wants to; therefore, he is forced into this situation.

Another thing that farmers fail to understand is why so many of the unions in this country are controlled by people from a foreign country. It does not seem right that the national economy of Canada should be controlled by perhaps a gangster or gangsters from a foreign country.

Mr. Peters: Does the hon. member know of one instance where there has been a foreigner in a union in Canada?

An hon. Member: Hal Banks.

Mr. Peters: Give us the name of any union which has an executive officer who is a citizen of any country other than Canada.

Mr. Fane: How about Banks? How about the teamsters union?

Mr. Peters: Hal Banks is still a United States citizen.

Mr. Ricard: That is what he says.

Mr. Fane: Or, he was. A great many people do not seem to know that of the unemployment insurance which the unemployed workers collect, five-twelfths of what is in the fund is paid into the fund by the workers. Another five-twelfths is paid in by the employers, leaving only two-twelfths, or one-sixth of the amount contributed to the fund by the government. Therefore, that is one reason why some organizations, or people in some walks of life, are averse to unemployment insurance. I have heard it many times. They do not seem to realize the proportion that is contributed by the workers.

A short time ago I was very happy to hear the minister say that unemployment insurance for farm workers is being considered. It might make a great difference to the farm labour situation if farm labourers were eligible for unemployment insurance, although it is very difficult to think of anybody who is a farm worker being unemployed.

Last winter we had a winter works program initiated by this government under the Minister of Labour. For the few who were unemployed and who were not on a farm basis that was a very good thing in my constituency. For example, in Elk island park alone jobs were made for 100 men all winter, and that really did help the situation out there.

I have now had my little say about the farming angle of the unemployment situation and again I want to tell the minister how happy the people in my constituency are to have him in charge of this department.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take too much of the committee's time in order to deal with labour conditions on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Labour. I mentioned the matter briefly during the budget debate, but I want to recall certain points and, more particularly, to make a few suggestions to the government.

I have pointed out before in this house, that labour conditions in the riding of Lapointe and throughout the Saguenay-Lake St. John area, are on the whole pitiful. Just about one family head out of four is without a job and, considering that next week, that is in mid-May, supplementary benefits paid out to the jobless will come to an end, I think this is a very deplorable situation, urgently in need of attention. It is all right to help the unemployed so that their wives and children may eat, but I am of the opinion that this is a short-sighted solution from those who are responsible for administrating this country's business.

As I said, there are in my constituency of Lapointe, and in the neighbouring area about 17,000 people—fathers or heads of families—who will be out of work and most of whom will no longer receive supplementary unemployment insurance benefits. Among the many people affected by unemployment in my area, there are a good many young men, and to me, this is one of the most tragic situations that can exist.

Unemployment can foster all the seamiest aspects of society. Young people of 17, 18, 20, 25 or even 30 years, who have no work can engage in any adventure, even in crime, because of the despondency they feel when they find that, as they have no work, they cannot help their family to subsist and to eat when they are hungry.

I am aware of such cases as are, I am sure, many of my colleagues.

During the Easter holidays—I am not setting myself as an example, I am merely stating a fact, and I am sure many of my colleagues have had the same experience—I had to send out several hampers of food—paid out of my allowance, since I have no other source of income—to families whose fathers and older children were out of work, even after they had desperately tried to find jobs. I called on those families; I did not content myself with receiving the heads of families at home to give them money directly; on the contrary, I rented cars and paid them a visit, thus seeing with my own eyes that there was hardship in many families of my constituency. I am of the opinion that this is the problem that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) should try to solve for next fall and next winter.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from the words of His Eminence Cardinal Leger, but before I do so, I should like to make a statement. There are many politicians who like to quote church authorities or hobnob with the clergy, in order to gain more prestige with their constituents. I should like to state here, and very categorically, that I am not quoting His Eminence Cardinal Leger, merely because he is the highest Catholic church authority in the province of Quebec. I do so, because he wrote a letter about unemployment which, in my opinion, is a genuine charter from which the federal government could derive inspiration in its search for a solution to the evils from which we are suffering today, and to those which threaten us in the future.

> It has been stated by an economist that, if a man suffers from unemployment for an extended period of time, morbid reactions will almost certainly affect his quality as a man and as a worker. Not only will his technical ability be impaired through disuse but he will lose the habit of working, with consequent loss of self respect and self confidence. So when an opportunity later arises, this man, who previously was merely "unemployed", will have become "unemployable". Meanwhile, his private life may have been shattered, and the atmosphere in which his children grow may have been poisoned.
> Though full employment theories remain a subject of discussion among economists, unemployment is no longer considered a natural necessity.
> Unemployment places the social order in serious jeopardy, because it can foster, among the unemployed, feelings of discontent and bitterness towards a society which has proved incapable of making use of vital forces crying for an outlet.
> The experience of foreign countries tends to prove—

And I want to draw the attention of the government and of the Minister of Labour to that last sentence—

> The experience of foreign countries tends to prove that agitators and demagogues always find there a choice field to promote class struggle. Because of the lack of stability from which it rises, unemployment becomes one of the great scourges of mankind.
> While impoverishing its victims, unemployment decreases consumption, leads to economic stagnation in other branches of the economy, and paralyses progress. Not only does society not benefit from the development of resources, which are thus truly sterilized, but it has moreover to meet the needs of the unemployed.

The situation has become so serious, as I was saying a few days ago in this house, that throughout the province—and I thought it was only happening in my riding—young people are forming groups in order to rouse public opinion and appeal to the leaders of this country.

I have here an excerpt from La Presse of March 24, 1959, which is preceded by the following headline:

> In a pool room, young men are forming an association of jobless.

We also have in my riding such groups of young unemployed men, as well as in the three other ridings of my area.

Mr. Chairman, there is no need to quote statistics, because I know that the Minister of Labour and all hon. members can see, through those statistics, the plight of those who are unable to earn their living and provide for their families. That is why I ask the Minister of Labour to think not only of unemployment insurance benefits, but to try and find some formula to alleviate the terrible scourge which affects not only my own riding, my area and my province, but the country as a whole. There has been some progress I admit, but the situation is still intolerable and the government must do more.

In a letter about unemployment—and I shall come back on this later—His Eminence Cardinal Leger spoke of the responsibility of our leaders with regard to unemployment. I want to quote a passage on page 2897 of that pastoral letter entitled:

Those chiefly responsible

Social justice asks all those who are responsible for our economy to create general economic conditions in which it will be possible and easy to exercise the natural right to work. Leadership and economic responsibility are divided among individuals, professional groups and the state. Each must intervene in his own way according to the function he assumes within the economic system.

In our economic system, the responsibility for maintaining existing jobs and for creating new ones rests chiefly with employers and their professional associations.

But the public weal requires much more urgently than in the past that the state intervene in "the division and the distribution of work". Thus, the state in this regard must take new and daring steps, while respecting what Pope Pius XI called "the suppletory function of the state". It must encourage intermediate organizations to take the necessary steps; it must facilitate their action and, if necessary, remedy their deficiencies.

I believe that, in this regard, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) said something that came close to the statement of Cardinal Leger about the economic field; but the Prime Minister of Canada has the means at his disposal and can take the necessary steps to carry out what he has advocated.

I have here a clipping from La Presse of July 9, 1958—that is during the visit of the President of the United States to the parliament of Canada—where I find these words from the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada:

"I believe that the nations of the free world, now united for defence, must, on a world basis, initiate in the field of economy, a new and bold policy designed to ensure prosperity everywhere. It is urgently needed. The communist forces will not wait. Time is against us".

The Prime Minister of Canada understands the problem quite well—I know that, on account of that quotation—and he, more than anyone else in this country, can put in concrete form the ideas he put forward at the time of the United States President's visit. He has colleagues with whom he can discuss the matter. I know it cannot be settled overnight, by why, for instance, a commission could not be set up which would be composed of employers, labour representatives and representatives of certain well-known public organizations, whose devotion to the national common interests is well known? Why could not the government set up such a commission? I am not suggesting anything new to the government, since my leader, the hon. member for Algoma-East (Mr. Pearson) proposed the setting up of such a commission during the 1958 election campaign. That commission could, with the help of both employers and especially workers study the effects, in several fields of automation in our industry. It could, after such a study, make recommendations to the government which could bring about, over a period of time, concrete results which, each fall and each spring, would save us from the evil of unemployment which affects so many Canadians and so many Canadian families.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take more of the time of the house, but I do want to ask the Minister of Labour to consider that matter. I agree he has no time to consider it himself, but why—and I emphasize this point—does not the government think of setting up a commission to consider that problem? It has set up similar commissions in several other fields. It is setting up, for instance, commissions to avoid certain subjects being discussed here in the house. Why not set up a commission to consider the means that could rid us of that spectre of unemployment which afflicts us each fall? That suggestion is not my own, but it seems that next fall and next winter, the unemployment situation will be very serious in Canada, because by next fall many people out of work at present will not be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to close my remarks by quoting again a suggestion made by His Eminence Cardinal Leger, in his letter on unemployment:

We hope that the unemployment problem, as well as so many other urgent matters today, will bring the opportunity of proving by concrete action that overriding community of interests. Would it not be advisable that such a solidarity, which must unite all factors of economic life, take shape through the setting up of joint commissions, grouping labour and employer leaders, in an undertaking of common study and concerted action? Such organizations could also seek efficient means of alleviating the present crisis, of offering concrete plans and obtaining from the state the support and the services deemed necessary. Only such an initiative of employer-labour co-operation, taken in a spirit of co-responsibility with the state, could protect our economic life from the abuses created by either unlimited liberalism leading to anarchy, or by oppressive state control.

Mr. Chairman, may I point out in closing that I have not quoted the words of His Eminence Cardinal Leger in an attempt to cover myself with the cloak of religion, or to try to give more weight, as it were, to the words and suggestions I have offered to the government. I have read this letter from Cardinal Leger at least five or six times, and I think it contains some advice which the government should follow. Here are suggested solutions which would benefit not only the people of my constituency, or of my area and province, but the whole country, and indeed all the free world.

And let me add this. The other day, the hon. Minister of Labour suggested that Mr. Jean Marchand, who has resigned as labour representative on the unemployment insurance advisory committee, was perhaps a C.C.F. supporter or a Liberal, but was certainly not a member of the Conservative party. I think that has absolutely nothing to do with Jean Marchand's resignation from the unemployment insurance advisory committee. Mr. Chairman, Jean Marchand should be considered only as a representative of labour.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I know Jean Marchand. He is one of the people most devoted to the cause of labour in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Jean Marchand is a very able man, and has devoted the major part of his life to the cause of labour, though he is still young. Ever since he left university, he has devoted his full time and his moments of leisure to the workers. He is now employed full time by the labour unions, and he looks after the labouring people. No one can say that Jean Marchand is attempting to mislead the people. Jean Marchand has a very keen mind, he is quite unselfish, and I believe he is a sensible man. I was somewhat taken aback the other day when I heard the Minister of Labour accusing Jean Marchand of being perhaps a C.C.F. supporter or a Liberal, but not a Conservative. I think a man can disagree with the views of the Conservative party and still be an able and intelligent man, and Jean Marchand is one who has always worked for the good of his province and his country. I hope the Minister of Labour will take back what he said about Jean Marchand, and will withdraw his statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour on the job he has done over the years, particularly when a number of his colleagues rise in this chamber and show their ignorance in labour matters, his job must be that much harder and the work that he is doing that much more difficult. It has been said today that a number of unions have officials from other countries. I would defy any member of the house to cite more than two instances where any Canadian union or any union operating in Canada has foreign organizers or official representatives.

I think something must be said about this matter of gangsterism. It is all very well for Joey Smallwood from the province of Newfoundland to make these charges, irresponsible as he is; but it certainly is not in keeping with the facts for these statements to be made in the rest of Canada. I know of no individual trade union official in this country who could be classified as a gangster, with the exception of the one that has already been mentioned. I think the Minister of Labour is not completely unaware of what happened in this specific case. Certainly the Liberal party can take no credit for the fact that Hal Banks is in this country. I think that this is one of the things that the Canadian people should know.

One of the problems arises when the government will co-operate with unions that are not doing the job that a union is organized to do. One of them was this particular case where Hal Banks was brought in from the United States with the assistance of the government through a crown company, namely the Canadian National Railways. He was brought in, set up, a backdoor agreement was negotiated and there were all types of manoeuvring and manipulation by the employer and by the government in allowing this to take place. I therefore do not think that labour unions in general can be criticized for something for which they themselves are not responsible. Judging from the remarks that have been made by several of the members, one or two of them representing large labour ridings, I think they should take a close look at what unions are supposed to do and what they do.

I think a great deal has been said over the past few years, particularly since the investigations in the United States concerning one particular union, which would have been better said in its proper context or with the emphasis which it deserved. I think it would be very difficult for any Canadian, yes probably any American, to name half a dozen Americans who are in key positions in the unions and could be called by the name gangster or rowdy, or any of the other names which have been applied or could be applied to trade union officials. In the main, where the investigations took place in the United States—

Mr. Henderson: On a point of order. The hon. member is absolutely wrong when he says there are no gangsters in the United States in these unions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Has the hon. member a question to ask the member who has the floor?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps you did not hear. The hon. gentleman raised a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: What is the point of order.

Mr. Henderson: The point of order is that there are gangsters in the United States.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I fail to see the hon. member's point of order. Will the hon. member who has the floor proceed?

Mr. Peters: I am sure the hon. gentleman is right. In that particular investigation there were quite a number of people whom I would class as gangsters. However, what I said was that I thought it would be very difficult for a Canadian citizen or even a United States citizen to pick out by name more than half a dozen in the United States. I repeat that I would defy anyone in Canada to name two in Canada, although one of them has been already discussed.

Mr. Henderson: What government brought him in here?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is not listening very well. I leave that question on the doorstep of the Liberal government. If we go into the history of this particular case, although it is not a matter I wish to speak about, this subject was investigated and consideration given to this particular immigrant, and the Conservative government has taken no action against him and has said that probably no action is intended against him.

Mr. Henderson: I do not want to get into an argument with the hon. gentleman, but the Conservative government has tried to get him out. He is a murderer and a gangster.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think it is generally agreed that this particular gentleman comes under the category of a gangster, but I repeat that the Conservative government has taken no action whatsoever to eliminate this unwanted immigrant in Canada. The trade union movement did not ask for him. He was invited to come here by a crown-controlled company.

Mr. Henderson: Pardon me. Does the gangster belong to the C.L.C.?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a good question!

[Mr. Henderson.]

Mr. Peters: I understand his union is affiliated with the C.L.C.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Peters: Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, my union belong to the C.L.C., but I do not know that I am a member of the C.L.C. I said his union is affiliated. These charges have been made continually over the years, yet the people who have the opportunity to do something about it have no intention of doing anything but are glad to make use of him. The Minister of Labour is also aware of another situation, although there have been very few cases in Canada where there has been bad unionism.

This matter also rests pretty well on the doorstep of the government. Last year, or two or three years ago, when the trans-Canada pipe line started crossing northern Ontario we found that the workers who were being hired were already in a union which had a contract already signed. This contract was negotiated between the crown corporation on the one hand and another union on the other, obviously with the government's knowledge and without any objection from them. This is the type of thing which gives unionism a bad name, because it is a sort of backdoor agreement where you sign the contract without having any employees. It means, of course, that the workers themselves have no say in this situation.

But this is always good for news. If there is anything happening which is not happening just the way it is supposed to, then the newspapers play it up. When investigations take place in the United States, although they have no similarity to those in Canada, then we see great big headlines in all the papers. We are not always very helpful to management but I would like to suggest to them that if they continue to do this type of hatchet job on organized labour and do not realize that trade unions are here to stay—they are probably the most democratic organization we have in the country—and if they fail to see the function which a trade union has in industry and in our national affairs as a whole, then they will force those organizations and the various unions into taking other steps to protect the things which they were set up to provide. A union is fundamentally set up to provide its membership with a higher standard of living and to maintain it, to obtain wage increases if they are necessary, to continue to fight for better working conditions, better conditions in the plant and in the community. No union functions only in the plant; all trade unions are publicly minded. More than that, the membership have obtained an education in practical democracy which makes them in many cases much better fitted for taking their position in the community than many others.

Mr. Chairman, I belonged to the united steelworkers of America in Timmins, and when I was president of the local there we engaged in many things about which I think the country should know but does not normally pay much attention to. We assisted in setting up such things in the community as blood banks. We set them up because there was a need for them, not only for our own members but for all citizens in the community. We supplied the blood to the hospital free on request. We did some of the administration which was necessary to see that this blood was supplied to the needy at a very nominal cost.

We also participated in such things as community betterment, beautifying the town and trying to change the course of a particular creek through the town which had drowned a number of children. In that particular case we did try very hard to get the creek diverted. We were always very interested in civic elections, not only as trade unionists but as individuals. We also took an active interest in the affairs of the community. We helped in addition many welfare organizations, and a lot of trade unionists throughout Canada have headed some of the largest welfare agencies in the country. I think it is safe to say that in Toronto, Windsor and Hamilton they are very proud of the trade unionists who take their places and carry their share of the load in the welfare agencies and in the raising of money for these agencies.

I think these things are too often forgotten. Some fear has been expressed in the last day or two about a third party, the new party, whatever its name might be. I suggest this party will come into being if the trade unions are forced to take action because the need is there. It will not be imposed from the top as has been suggested; it will come from a desire on the part of the worker, because when a worker listens to the budget and legislation he is immediately in politics. Fears have been expressed by people, who in my opinion should be more familiar with the operations of the trade unions than they are. They have been expressed by a number of people who, I suggest, should take a closer look at the operations of their local unions.

I am sure that the hon. member for Cape Breton South would be quite welcome to attend a trade union meeting in his own riding—it would presumably be a meeting of the united mineworkers—and I believe the same would apply to the hon. member for Hamilton South, both of whom discussed trade union operations in a very cursory manner. If the hon. member for Hamilton South would drop in at a meeting of the steelworkers union in Hamilton, I am sure he would learn a great deal about parliamentary procedure and about the democratic working of an organization. I am certain, too, he would find that none of the officials was behaving as a United States citizen or as a citizen of any country outside Canada.

Some concern has quite properly been expressed about the manner of the election of a commissioner to the unemployment insurance commission. The unemployment insurance fund is not as simple in its workings as some people believe it to be. It is not a fund which can be pulled out of a hat to end the recession. It is a fund set up to help cushion the effects of seasonal unemployment, to tide over workers employed in industries which do not operate all the year around. All the workers in Canada contribute toward this fund. In fact, they contribute almost half the money, and a portion of the other half is contributed by management.

Management does not hesitate to tell the workers: this is the amount of money we have to spend as our contribution toward your unemployment insurance fund. This contribution is taken into account in the total wage picture which the companies put forward at negotiations. The companies also include other things such as contributions to medical plans, pensions, where they exist, and benefits of that nature, but unemployment insurance enters directly into the wage picture of all employees. So it adds up to this, that the workers are, in effect, paying nine-tenths of the money which goes into the fund. I suggest that if there was not this contribution coming from the employers, the workers could get its equivalent in the form of wages. Labour has asked, through its democratically elected organizations, for some voice in the appointment of these commissioners, and this was granted in the act. I maintain that more consideration should have been given to the representations which were made on this occasion than was in fact shown. This fund, which is operating for the benefit of Canada as well as of the workers who contribute toward it, should always be managed with the utmost consideration for the representations made by labour with regard to it.

The fact is that in the last two or three years, this fund has had two main objectives. One has been the relief of unemployment—the job it was set up to do—and the other has been its usefulness as a means of stemming the tide of the recession. In my view the fund was never set up for that purpose. The fund should be divided into two parts so that it may be clear in which areas it is functioning, and to the extent that it is being used to carry out part of the government's financial policy, contributions should be made to it from the consolidated revenue.

I think the minister might well take some of the advice which has been offered to him. Fortunately, the Minister of Labour is one who has always sought advice and given it some consideration. I think he could follow his well known pattern of behaviour in the past and give some further consideration to this question of the unemployment insurance commission and the representations which have been made to him with regard to it. Knowing, as I do, the attitudes taken by some of his colleagues, I am surprised that the minister has been able to accomplish what he has with regard to unemployment insurance. The workers will certainly appreciate what he has done, though they will not appreciate having to raise the increased amount of money necessary in order to continue the benefits which they are to receive.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are referring to the proposed rates of contribution?

Mr. Peters: These are the changes which will be made in the unemployment insurance regulations.

We had hoped that the minister would by now have indicated his intention to introduce changes in the federal labour code. We had hoped he would have announced his intention to revise this code. Changes in the code are even more necessary now, in the light of events involving labour in the province of British Columbia, and in Newfoundland than they were some time ago. They are also necessary in view of the situation in Ontario. The other day I was discussing with officials of a union in Toronto some of the problems with which they were faced under the industrial relations act of that province. It was pointed out to me that the labour board by stalling and delaying its decisions was making it almost impossible for a union to function. They told me of a situation which had arisen at a plant where some 33 workers were engaged. A request was made for certification. Six months later the board got around to asking for a vote because one employee had, apparently, objected. When the vote was finally taken, only four people were there, the man who had intervened and three of the union people. This is one of the problems they are facing.

As another example, I recall a strike which took place in a small lumber mill at Field, Ontario. Decertification was applied for and the union, as I think the membership would confirm, was ready to agree that any decision taken would be binding on both parties; if the decision went against the union, they were willing to leave that particular plant. The period for entering into negotiations was drawing close, and some decision needed to be taken. Mr. Chairman, that strike was over a few months ago, and only the other day the union concerned received a letter saying that it was hoped in the near future to be able to render a decision on the decertification hearing which had been held six or seven months earlier. These delays cause problems in many of the industries enjoying labour contracts.

I wish to thank the Minister of Labour for the assistance he gave to some of the people in my part of the country. In his diplomatic way he intervened in a serious situation in the gold mining industry. I believe he suggested that it would be a good thing if they sat down and negotiated but I am not sure if he sat in on the negotiations. Shortly after that a settlement was reached in the dispute. A few years ago an identical situation developed involving an eight-month strike resulting in the loss of all concerned of thousands of dollars and the settlement reached at that time was not much better received than was the recent one which the minister assisted in obtaining by intervention.

The minister on a number of occasions has said he is investigating all the aspects of the labour code. This is necessary in Canada. If we are going to have a bill of rights I think we should also have a bill of rights for trade unions.

The situation in Newfoundland was probably more dramatic than that which develops in most cases. The results in British Columbia, as the hon. member for Skeena pointed out, will not be much better and it will be longer before we find out what those results are.

The minister must ensure that Canadian labour is guaranteed certain fundamental freedoms under the labour code. The Newfoundland situation illustrates the need of this. It must be remembered that the international woodworkers of America did not go into the province uninvited. The president of district 2 of the I.W.A. was invited to speak at a convention of a company union in 1956 which he accepted. During the course of the convention a motion was put on the floor recommending that this particular union join forces with the I.W.A. As was the case in some of the constitution mentioned by other hon. members who have spoken, the membership did not have the right to affiliate with I.W.A. at that time.

The loggers themselves invited the president to bring the organization into the province which he did. In 1957 organizational work was started in the bush. Eighty-seven per cent of the loggers in the A.N.D. company signed up in the I.W.A. They applied for certification under the labour relations board and the government turned them down on a technicality. They re-applied to the board in June 1957. I think hon. members should know that in most provinces a bare majority or a majority of 55 per cent will grant certification automatically. In this instance a vote was ordered and held with 86.4 per cent of the loggers voting. It had to be conducted by referendum, I am told. Committees were set up and there are many union committees in the outports and small communities where the loggers live. The I.W.A. in Newfoundland is democratically constituted, has set up committees and holds conventions of its membership.

The union opened negotiations with the Company after certification but these broke down. They applied for conciliation services but these too, broke down. They then applied for a board. The surprising thing is that this board comprising a representative of management, of labour and an impartial chairman voted unanimously in favour of their being granted a 5 per cent increase over a period of two years. The hours were to be reduced from 60 to 54. The company then refused to negotiate and the strike resulted.

My time is nearly up although I should like to continue.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the Minister of Labour present his estimates to the committee yesterday I realized he was not dealing with the basic causes of unemployment at all but with the results and with his work in trying to overcome those results. I want to compliment him because I think he is doing the best he can in the circumstances. If the minister wanted to help eliminate unemployment I should think, however, he would speak to the Prime Minister and ask him to forget about the diversion of trade.

The last time the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke in Port Colborne he said there had been a great deal of trade switched from United States to England and that more would be switched but he has not made a pronouncement to this effect in this house.

I want to relate a few remarks to unemployment in my area. Hon. members will recall that in December 1957, the government sent a trade mission to England comprising 40 or 50 men. They went over to buy but not to sell. That was at a time when England had almost full employment and Canada had considerable unemployment. It will also be recalled that the mission was headed by Mr. Duncan, chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and that the Prime Minister went to Montreal to wish them bon voyage. He said at that time this mission would reap rich rewards. One of the rich rewards obtained for my district was an increase in unemployment.

Hon. members will recall that before departing with the trade mission Mr. Duncan announced a $10 million order for large turbines, generators or something of that nature. Whatever it was, we were told in this chamber that they had never been made in Canada before. I was informed by an engineer that this was true but also that they had not been made in that size in England before, either. Canadian industry expected to have an opportunity to bid on that order. Canadian subcontractors were working on components for that order but Mr. Duncan's announcement killed it altogether. I am not saying that if it had bid Canadian industry would have got the order but I believe Canadian industry should have had an opportunity to bid. If Canadian industry did nothing else, or if Canadian industry was incapable of building that particular turbine or generator, why did it take 40 or 50 men to go to England to buy it, because we have never heard of anything else that they have bought?

It is true that the mission cost Canadians well over $500,000, and when they came back they gave work to some printers down near Toronto to print the report of that particular mission. If you read the report you will find that it reads something like the social pages in the press, the social register. It deals mostly with the social functions they attended, who entertained them, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce joined them, when he left them and when he joined them again and when he left them again, and so forth.

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder whether the hon. member would stay away from trade and commerce and come back to the Department of Labour.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, we have listened almost all day to discourses on the minister's estimates about matters that are within the concern of provincial legislatures and not of this parliament at all. It does seem to me strange that when an hon. gentleman seeks to show that the policies of this government have produced an unemployment situation that the minister is having difficulty in coping with he should be called to order. It may not be completely and strictly relevant in the narrowest sense but at least it is within the purview of this parliament and under the jurisdiction of this government and not a shocking intrusion into the affairs of other jurisdictions which are none of our business in this house. I feel that members should be treated alike in this house and there should not be discrimination against an hon. member.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate realizes that the hon. member is going a little far in discussing trade as long as he has been discussing it.

Mr. McMillan: I shall try to stay within your ruling. It is true, though, that our unemployment is related to our trade and certainly in Britain they have complained about the trade they are getting from Canada. I have already put on Hansard the complaints of Conservative members of parliament, particularly in England, that Canada was not carrying out her obligations undertaken at the Montreal conference.

I think trade has a great deal to do with unemployment, and I also think that if the municipalities and the provinces could get money cheaper they would go ahead with different projects. I know that every time the Minister of Finance comes out with a new loan, and particularly if we think the interest rate is too high, he invariably says that the municipalities will be able to borrow money at a more favourable rate.

Mr. Harkness: Order.

Mr. McMillan: Certainly, I do not think this helps unemployment or helps to pick up the slack of unemployment. We would get more help in Canada toward solving the unemployment problem if Canadians felt they had a government with a sane trade and fiscal policy, something they could depend on, and something that the businessmen could count on. I feel that business would go ahead with greater confidence and we would have more employment in our country.

Much of the unemployment is due to our fiscal policy. I do not think anybody in Canada will deny that our fiscal policy flows from the greatest of all transactions, namely the conversion loan, with which I do not intend to deal.

I regret to see the unemployment insurance fund depleted by some $250 million last year, and I should like to have the minister comment on the loss of $10 million from that account through the sale of bonds. I think my leader and the hon. member for Trinity made excellent contributions in their suggestions to the minister for dealing with unemployment, but I cannot help but think that the trouble is more basic. Today I read an article in the Montreal Gazette which was a report of a speech by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, the former minister of trade and commerce, who spoke last night to the dominion mortgage and investment association.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who is that?

Mr. McMillan: The Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

Mr. Harkness: If you would listen you would hear.

Mr. Starr: Very important.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One of the great men of our country.

Mr. Pickersgill: More and more people remember him every day, too.

Mr. Anderson: They will never forget him.

Mr. McMillan: In his speech he dealt with inflation and unemployment. After saying that during the time he was in the government there were two periods of inflation he went on to tell how the government of that time tried to overcome inflation. I shall quote something he said concerning inflation:

> I am not going to claim that we were 100 per cent successful in our efforts to curb inflation.

Mr. Harkness: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Inflation is one of the most important problems in relation to unemployment.

Mr. Harkness: That has nothing to do with labour estimates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister ought to confine himself to soybeans and do something about them.

Mr. Harkness: I have a wider horizon than the hon. member.

Mr. McMillan: I continue:

> But I do think it is fair to say two things: first, that the federal government itself did not contribute to increased inflationary pressures; it consistently acted to restrain inflation; and, second, the public never seemed to lose confidence in the value of money.

Mr. Harkness: Order.

Mr. McMillan: Concerning confidence, he had this to say:

> But confidence is a tender plant and it is not sufficient for a government merely to express confidence in the future, or to say that there is nothing to worry about. A government must inspire confidence by deeds, as well as by words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMillan: Then he went on to say that he realized advice is the cheapest of commodities, but he does give this government advice and it is the same advice that has been given by many managers of banks, by managers of trust companies, and so on, over the last two years. These are the two courses he says the government should take:

> The first is that the government must give the clearest possible indication that its budgetary deficits are temporary and will be turned into balance or into surplus when the slack in the economy is taken up, and competing demands threaten to push up prices.

The second is that the government must give evidence that it has an effective plan for dealing with unemployment.

In my view, we need to take a new look at unemployment. The problem is changing in character, and needs re-examination to determine more precisely its composition, its causes and how it can be cured.

Unless the problem is thoroughly understood, serious mistakes in policy could be made . . . there is great danger in the crude idea that it is possible for governments to spend their way out of recession and unemployment.

I might say that when the Minister of Finance presented his baby budget in December, 1957 I expressed this in a somewhat different way. I said at that time that the government had the mental complex of a man who came to my office. He saw the Globe and Mail lying on the table with big headlines across the top giving the net earnings of the Ontario liquor control board for the previous year, which were very considerable, and he said: "I think we will drink ourselves out of debt yet." Quoting further from Mr. Howe:

The threat of inflation cannot be checked by government alone. The government must, however, inspire confidence and give leadership, first by setting its own house in order, and then by establishing rules that it expects every citizen to follow.

He concludes with these words:

I am confident that the battle against inflation can be won if government leadership is forthcoming.

I think government leadership needs to be forthcoming in order to overcome inflation and unemployment. The government has received advice from financial men over the last two years and has not taken that advice. Mr. Howe is a man who had much experience in parliament. He has said that he never intends to enter politics again and I think it would be well if the government would take his advice at this time because it is certainly parallel to the advice given by many other men in the financial field.

It seems to me that the government could do more to get our unemployed re-established. The minister is doing the best he can but I think he might do more. So many of our unemployed have been out of work so long that they have lost heart. The unemployed make periodic trips to the unemployment insurance offices to get their cheques when they can qualify. They look over the list of vacant jobs and when they cannot find one they go home. They come back again the next week or in two weeks' time. They draw unemployment insurance as long as they can and then they drift to the municipal relief rolls. At least, that is true in my area.

It certainly was not difficult for men to qualify for unemployment insurance in the winter of 1957-58. In fact, the government was so solicitous about the unemployed in my area that they wrote letters to people who were retired and on pension telling them to be sure to go their unemployment insurance offices and get their cheques. Of course, these people had votes and the government was attempting to buy votes with money being contributed by people who were working.

Mr. Starr: What a story that is.

Mr. McMillan: The government is not so generous today. It has mismanaged the fund so that at the present time they are calling on industry and the workers to contribute to make up the $10 million loss in bonds and the cost of some of these votes.

Mr. Henderson: Do you really believe that?

Mr. McMillan: I believe it. It certainly happened in my area.

Mr. Starr: You must have instigated it.

Mr. McMillan: There is nothing that injures a person's morale more than idleness. After a time people give up and lead rather aimless lives, making no contribution to our society. There are a good many skilled or semi-skilled jobs for which these people could be trained. It seems to me that since we have so many shortages in certain skilled and semi-skilled occupations and have been going to Europe to get such workers we might have a look among the unemployed and see if we cannot train some of these people.

The government certainly could co-operate with the provinces. In my opinion many of these unemployed people are bright and would be industrious. I think they could be trained. In many hospitals at the present time there are shortages of nurses aids and male attendants, and I think we could easily train such people. There is a marked shortage of nurses. I know one hospital that up to two months ago could not open its new addition because nurses and proper personnel to staff the hospital were not available. I think the government might take the lead in co-operation with the provinces so that many girls might train as nurses. Many of them cannot do so on their own resources and I think that the federal and provincial governments should co-operate to this end.

I happen to know of a very young person who was unemployed last year and got into trouble by stealing. This person was sent to the house of correction for one year and while there learned a skill which she has put to very good use since. As a result, she now has a thriving business. It does not seem to me to be a very good thing that this person should have to go to the house of correction to learn something that she wanted to learn before going there.

There are also many young men idle who might be taught different skills such as carpentry, plumbing and a multitude of others. To my mind it is more expensive not to teach them than it is to teach them. Many of these people are bright and industrious and they should be given a chance. I think it would be a very easy matter for the Department of Labour to classify these people. I do not suggest that a costly commission with expensive economists should be set up but I think that the government could come forward with some type of committee that would make recommendations respecting the unemployed.

I do not think that the government is doing anything about older workers. I know that the other day the minister referred to the fact that this is quite a problem. By "older worker" I mean people between 35 and 40 whom industry will not hire because of the various pension plans. During the last campaign I believe the Prime Minister promised —I remember seeing this in the press although I have not the article here—that working men would be able to take their pensions with them. I do know that it has been said by some that this would not be constitutional but I think it would be constitutional if the government would refuse, in whole or in part, to allow industry their right to deduct their contributions toward pension plans for income tax purposes unless industry is willing to grant workers an earlier vesting of pension rights or give them the right to take their pension with them to another job. I imagine that would probably be constitutional because, after all, we would only be dealing with the Income Tax Act.

There are many reasons why I think workers should have earlier vesting of their pension rights. The plant where a man is working might close down. A mine might run out of ore. Woods operations might close down. Then there are many medical reasons. For instance, a man working in an industry might develop a chest allergy or skin allergy and while he would not be sick he could not continue working in that particular plant. I think that the government should devise some means by which there would be earlier vesting of pension rights. I think that this would in itself clear up much of the trouble of the older worker in changing jobs.

I think my time is about up. I would say this. I think unemployment is a great social problem in our country. We are a young country. We have many resources but we do not seem to know how to handle them. I think this government should take the advice that people have been trying to give them in the last two years. I think it is extremely important that we solve our unemployment problem because it would be to our economic advantage.

[Mr. McMillan.]

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this debate but since the opposition apparently propose to keep it going all afternoon I think I should take a few minutes in which to put forward a few of the ideas I have and to call attention to a few of the sins of omission and commission of the opposition, as I see it. I can understand how, when this debate first started, the opposition thought they had a tremendous issue in the manner of the appointment of Mr. MacArthur to the unemployment insurance commission. Led by that seasoned member with usually a keen nose for a political issue, namely the hon. member for Essex East, they went tearing off on that trail until the force of public opinion showed them that they were completely off base.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are still pursuing the same policy.

Mr. Broome: Prior to that, in a press release to the Globe and Mail of last Saturday, May 2, the Leader of the Opposition led off with a statement to the effect that labour organizations had been shockingly ignored and he went on to say there had been government bungling in this matter and that the government would have to take full responsibility. The very fact that the talk on this particular issue has sort of died out is the clearest indication that the government did not bungle on this matter and that the government acted in the proper and right manner. I should like to talk about it for a moment or two since the opposition seem to have dropped this subject. I should like to refer to what the hon. member for Essex East said as reported at page 3364 of Hansard when he was detailing what the duties of the unemployment insurance commission are. He said this:

> This is a body that is called upon not only to administer, by way of formulation of policy, matters having to do with unemployment insurance, but this commission actually is a trustee of many millions of dollars contributed not only by the employers but by the workers of this country. At one time there was almost a billion dollars in the fund.

To that he could also add that the fund is built by general contributions of the taxpayers of the country and through government contributions as well. The very fact that it is a semi-policy making commission, that it is an advisory committee to the minister, that it is called upon to advise, in an impartial and unbiased way, the minister as to what action he should take with regard to the operation of the commission and to future legislation with regard to unemployment insurance surely is, as newspapers all across the country have pointed out, a reason why that commission must be non-political and unbiased.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Broome: I would suggest that the hon. member for Essex East might have taken a look at Hansard at page 2228 or might have consulted with his colleague to his left, namely the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, with regard to the supplementary question to the Prime Minister in the matter of the R.C.M.P. in Newfoundland, when he said as follows:

> I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Is the government reluctant to act because they are afraid of incurring the displeasure of Mr. Knowles . . . and other politicians now in the labour movement?

Mr. Pickersgill: Was that not true?

Mr. Broome: It proves that the opposition speaks with many tongues and that consistency is not one of their virtues. The fact is that Mr. MacArthur's record speaks for itself. The records of the nominees who were not chosen also speak for themselves. It is clear that if the recommendation of Mr. Jodoin had been accepted there would have been political bias. In this way there is no political bias. So no wonder this has become a dead issue as far as the opposition is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman may be assured that this is not a dead issue.

Mr. Pearkes: The opposition is dead, anyway.

Mr. Broome: It speaks well for the persistence of the hon. member but it does not leave him in quite the high plane in the judgment I formally had of him on political matters.

An hon. Member: Why did you revise it?

Mr. Broome: With regard to general labour policy, I believe a great deal has been said in the press and by organizations which tends to damn all labour for the sins of a relatively few unions. Out of some 200 unions in the United States only some seven are involved in the present senate investigation. I think it is at only those seven unions that any public censure has been directed. We always play up in the press the strikes and the walkouts but we do not play up the literally hundreds of settlements which are made every year where management and labour get together and through collective bargaining iron out their differences and come to a decision between the two parties which is fair to both. The whole essence of labour peace is through honest collective bargaining, with recognition by labour of the problems of management and with management recognizing that labour is entitled to a just share in the wealth of this country.

However, there are conditions which arise—and this matter has been laboured in the house previously—where some of these unions, the odd one of them do certain things. In this respect may I say that I am not talking about the I.W.A. The hon. member for Skeena who spoke about the I.W.A. last night and pointed out what a democratically run union it is, has my full agreement. I know the I.W.A. and I know what a good union it is. It is a good tough union but it is a good union. But I have also heard the hon. member for Kootenay West lambaste Mr. Banks of the seafarers international union. I have also committed that error myself because it is an error to go after Mr. Banks. It is not Mr. Banks who is important but it is the conditions which allow a man like Mr. Banks to have the power and control that he has. If Mr. Banks left the country tomorrow, there would be another man with another name, but the policy would still be the same, namely the policy set out by Mr. Banks. Therefore you must get at the root of the problem before any improvement can be made.

In this regard, just in order to give an instance to the house, I should like to refer to a letter which I received. I may say that I have checked on the facts in this case myself. I received a letter from a Vancouver man, namely Mr. A. Gourley, Sr. who told me—and I think all hon. members received copies of this letter—about the record of his son in the S.I.U. I will quote two paragraphs only. They are as follows:

> I instance the case of my son, and I invite the fullest investigation by the Department of Labour. My son was a union seaman for 12 years before the S.I.U. acquired jurisdiction. My son then joined S.I.U. and paid $75 entrance or initiation fee, $4 monthly dues and an assessment of $15 a year. That represents a serious reduction in take-home pay of an ordinary seaman.
> Then like a bolt from the blue, my son was charged verbally with non-payment of union dues although he was working for the Union Steamship Company under the check-off system by which union dues are deducted from pay cheques and are sent direct to the union by the employing company. The fact the charge was a manifest lie did not prevent my son's expulsion and deprivation of the benefits for which he had so dearly paid.

The letter goes on to point out that an actual statement had been received from union headquarters indicating that these dues had been paid and I received the check-off book, and the man's ticket showed that the dues had been paid. It is instances like this where a labour leader is given the power to say a man shall work at his profession, his job, his avocation, or whether he shall not. Those conditions can only be changed by labour itself; they cannot be changed by government action. The government cannot police the wrongs of labour; labour must clean its own house.

In this regard I would suggest to the labour movement that they set up what I call a minimum constitution for their unions. That minimum constitution might be a bill of rights for labour unions, and that would set the standard. The minimum standard which I would suggest would be that leadership of the union must be elected democratically and by secret vote; that there must be a secret vote in all cases of strike action, not only for the sake of the men but also for the sake of the leaders so that they would know they really had the men behind them. Even if these two simple changes were made, then the odd rotten union which is rotten only because of the way its constitution is written which gives its leadership overwhelming dictatorial power, would fall by the wayside. I suggest that if that were a condition of recognition by the Canadian Labour Congress, so then should it be a condition of recognition by any government.

Perhaps it would change a few of the methods of working of some of our unions, for example the railroad unions. They are the oldest unions in the country. In many ways they are the sanest of all unions; they have a tradition and integrity behind them. But even when they call a strike they have open ballots which are sent in to their central regional headquarters for counting. Hon. members remember the recent disagreement which was so ably settled by the Minister of Labour between the firemen and the C.N.R. When the decision was made to strike, that decision was made by the chairmen; perhaps a score or so of men across the country. Now that is not right. Secret ballot is the way that this parliament is elected, and it should also be the way in which unions are operated.

With regard to the question of union publication of their financial statements, I have pointed out before that there are large companies operating in Canada which do not publish their statements, and until we can say that all the affairs of business are open to the public, then we cannot in justice ask that the unions do the same. The labour policy of this government is a progressive one.

[Mr. Broome.]

It is a policy which has been praised, particularly in the session of 1957, by hon. members in the Liberal party and hon. members in the C.C.F. party, and it has also been praised this session. The Minister of Labour has received much praise, and no members on the opposite side dare attack the minister. They are playing fair on that point; they do give the minister credit for having done a job which I think ranks him with the best ministers of labour this country has ever had. The criticism we have heard, as I have said before, is backfiring, and I do not think the opposition have a very good case on any matter concerning the Department of Labour.

There are two other points I would like to touch on, Mr. Chairman. With regard to the winter works program which has been so successful, I agree that it would be a good thing for the planning to start as soon as possible so that it can get off to a good start next fall. Even in the very short time which was allowed for the plan to get into operation last year it was an outstanding success. I am concerned too about the problem of older workers. A young engineer came to see me. At least, I thought he was a young engineer. He was 35 years of age and he came to me and wanted to know about a particular company, because he felt he could only make one more job change and then that was the end until he retired, because companies just were not hiring men over 35 years of age. Part of the trouble is because of pension plans. Pension plans are needed and are necessary, but they place a disability on workers, professional people and day labourers who wish to change their jobs after a certain stage in life, because it then becomes too expensive for the company which would have hired them to take them in because of the cost to their own pension scheme. If the pension could be vested in the worker so that he might carry it with him and make his own contribution to the pension scheme of the company he would be moving to, I think it would be very worthwhile. We must also accept the fact that a man of 55 or 60 years of age still has a worth-while contribution to make.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I rose to speak in this debate for just a few minutes, and I will close my remarks with the same topic I commenced with. The hon. member for Essex East said that this was still an issue. I would like to quote to him part of an editorial from the Toronto Star, which is certainly not a supporter of this party but I think is a fairly vocal supporter of the party to which the hon. member belongs. This is what the main organ of the Liberal party has to say in its issue of May 4 last. It is headed, "No Injustice to Labour".

We find it hard to summon up a sense of outrage at the government's appointment of A. F. MacArthur of Toronto to the unemployment insurance advisory committee over the objections of the Canadian Labour Congress. And why are the Liberals and C.C.F. making noises as if labour civil rights are being trampled, and talking darkly of raising the issue in parliament? What issue?

It makes sense that the Unemployment Insurance Act should require consultation with organized labour about appointees to represent labour on the committee. But no government can abrogate its right of final decision, after the advice is assessed. Advice is one thing, dictation another. Not the Canadan Labour Congress, nor the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, nor anybody else, should be able to dictate appointments to the Canadian government.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago I was stating how a properly organized union would function, and I mentioned some of the considerations which must be given to it. I did that to give the lie to some of the statements made in the newspapers about the dictatorial methods which are sometimes said to be used by unions. I used the example of the international woodworkers of America and the situation they found themselves in in the province of Newfoundland. This is only an example; there are many others. They conducted such things as organizational drives and they obtained a large number of cards. They received support from a large percentage of the workers, which involved both the paying of money and the signing of cards. Then they applied for certification which was granted by the government. They applied for services from the conciliation branch which were supplied. Then they went through a conciliation board, and that is where they justify to the public at large the conditions they are asking for and the requests they are making in their negotiations. In this particular case it resulted in a unanimous decision of the board.

This decision was agreed to by the conciliation board, but it did not have to be accepted by either the union or the company, and in this case it was not accepted by the company. I think everybody is familiar with the road blocks which were set up by the government intervening in this case. They finally passed a law which said that this union was no longer to be allowed to operate in this particular situation.

How different this is from the justification which must be made by the companies when they wish to obtain an increase in the price of their products. They do not go to anybody and ask permission. They just raise the price, and because of the monopoly control which is evident in a large number of industries, and high prices result. In this particular case as in many other cases some of the road blocks which were put in the way of the union involved a hostile government, a hostile board when certification was applied for, and a vote taken under adverse conditions. And then there was what took place after the strike began, when heavy fines were imposed for obstruction and jail sentences were imposed on people for taking part in picket lines and using moral persuasion to prevent other people from stealing their jobs.

I think the complicated operations which the union was willing to go through was a good example of how unionism works in Canada. We hear talk about the right to work, what is meant is the right to "scab" and take somebody else's job, also, in this case, the right of a government to set up an alternative union which is under government control. These are the things that the newspapers should be talking about.

This has been no credit to government, and it should be pointed out that the federal government itself cannot guarantee to all the workers in Canada the right to organize, negotiate and bargain in good faith in any of the provinces in Canada. In this particular instance the board of public opinion was given the facts. For instance, in the mill, the wage rate is not $1.05 an hour; it has been increased to something like $1.78 an hour. At the same time, a wage increase was paid to those millworkers of between five cents and seven cents an hour, when the basic rate was $1.75. It was also established that this company was not paying the taxes which other companies were paying. The union had to establish in its public relations work before the country in general, that conditions were as they had stated them to be in their negotiations. They not only had to justify themselves to the government, but justify themselves before an impartial board and then, through the board of public opinion, to the country also.

All these things have been done, and yet the rights which a union can normally expect —the rights which a bill of rights would guarantee to all citizens—have been denied in this particular case. There has certainly been an oversight in our federal labour legislation when we cannot, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has just said, have at least a minimum federal labour code to guarantee certain basic rights.

Unions continue to be willing to express their democratic point of view. For years one particular union in which I have been interested, one that is not in the Canadian Labour Congress, has been accused on many occasions of not fighting for the workers whom it represents. Nevertheless, those workers have continually over the years supported that union. Only recently, within the last year, a strike took place in that union. It fought a bitter strike with defection inside its own ranks, even between worker and fellow worker, but it came out with a settlement. Those unionists were unsatisfied with the leadership they had received, and they did throw out the majority of that leadership and establish a completely new executive. But what help are they getting now from the people who always said: "Let us get rid of the commies who are in this particular union."? What assistance do they get? The other day, one of the staff representatives who has been accused of supporting the old guard in Sudbury was fired because the new executive had put in an auditor and the books were being audited to find out exactly what had happened during past years. This particular staff representative was burning and destroying certain documents, and he was fired. Well, the newspapers, this democratic organization which stands for fine sentiments, did nothing to help the workers who had already made a decision, democratically reached, and who had decided to do something about the position which had been rumoured for a long time. No, the newspapers came out with an article condemning the union for having fired this staff representative, instead of saying: "Let us get to the bottom of this and find out what the situation is."

I remember, also the work done by the newspapers over the years in other areas. In the mining area in Timmins, when I was a miner, we decided we would change unions and bring in the Canadian Congress of Labour so that they should be our bargaining agents. We set up an organizing committee and democratically did the work necessary to bring in these unions, applying for certification and so on. Then we transferred to the steelworkers and we negotiated with the gold mining industry. But we got no help from newspapers which had previously said the unions to which we belonged had been communist dominated. Did we get assistance in setting up better working conditions? I should say not. They immediately changed their tactics and said: the poor industry is in such bad shape that it does not matter who has got control of the unions or what the unions are; there is going to be no assistance. Did the newspapers give any consideration to the other work the unions do in the community? These newspapers have always been on the other side of the fence, and no matter whether a union was under a democratic or any other kind of administration they were more favourable to the industry than they were to the union.

I think the unions over the years have done a great deal of good, and one of the things the minister could do on behalf of organized labour is to draw attention to the story of how the unions work and are supposed to function. I would not be opposed to the minister developing a minimum constitution for these unions, and I think that if he examines the constitutions of the major unions he will find they are much further advanced than the constitution he would consider to be the minimum.

If the workers wish to change their union, they have that right. When they do not have that right it is being run by people we do not want in this country. Usually the worker has not too much control over that. The only time a union has been at fault or has been guilty of being undemocratic has been when some of the union and company officials co-operate among themselves to sign backdoor agreements or agreements under which money is exchanged under the table and where the union membership has no say in the matter or is not taking an active part. I know of only one or two cases where this has taken place. These cases have been the subject of extended investigation, reams of reports and page after page of newspaper comment. These instances are given much publicity but nothing is said about the thousands of unions that function properly and fairly.

We sometimes hear reference made to the right to work clause. This sounds very good. Most of us would agree that there should be a right to work clause but the right we mean is the right to obtain a job and have full employment. Thousands of people have been unable to enjoy that right this year. This is not the right that would be given under the proposed law in the United States. It would mean that an employer could engage cheap labour working long hours with low pay and few benefits. The dog-eat-dog attitude would prevail and there would be bickering back and forth. There can be no harmony in industry or in labour affairs if a situation of that kind exists.

We have a working force of five million people in Canada and approximately half a million people are now looking for work. If there were no unions today and no contracts and labour legislation as we know them people would be underbidding each other for jobs and a man who lost his employment would offer to go back to work for five cents less. This would lead to a chaotic situation. I do not think anyone in Canada wants that. I do not believe this is what is wanted even by those in industry who are opposed to labour unions. I have heard it said on many occasions in the past by people engaged in management that they are quite satisfied with the unions they have and they have expressed a willingness to continue to increase the union security. They have expressed appreciation of the co-operation and assistance that only a union can give.

I should like to mention only one illustration. A few years ago I had the honour of organizing a plant in Kirkland Lake in one of the few industries in that area that is not connected with the gold mining industry. The latter industry has been one of the last strongholds of anti-labour and as far as I know there is no union security in the whole industry. This little plant was organized in a town that is engaged in the gold mining industry. The management of that plant promised that the union security would be increased if the union functioned satisfactorily and lived up to the agreement. It has been increased and there is now a union shop. This happens to be an I.W.A. local. The management was so happy that it negotiated a profit-sharing program. We are very surprised to find that the program is paying more money to the employees now than we would have got under our original negotiations which amount the company said would bankrupt the firm. Management and labour enjoy a good relationship there and management is happy to tell any segment of the industry about their happy experience with the trade union.

This experience has been repeated across the country. The only place where differences of opinion arise is around the bargaining table but this is to be expected because the union is pledged and has the responsibility of getting as much for its employees as it possibly can get. Management on the other hand has the responsibility of getting for the shareholders as much as it can get. One way they can get extra money is through low-priced labour. Both management and labour have an obligation and as the hon. member for Skeena pointed out so clearly this morning they share the obligation to sit down and negotiate in good faith. When contracts are allowed to drag along for a year or two inharmonious labour relations result. Many things build up over the period of time that should never enter into the negotiations. We should endeavour to cut down the length of time that is necessary following an application for conciliation services and the length of time in which a board may sit and bring in its report. Limits must also be imposed when a union goes on strike or when a company locks out the workers from the plant. These limits should be definitely expressed and rigidly adhered to in order to eliminate much of the strife that has been experienced.

I have been interested in the comments of those hon. members representing western constituencies who have participated in this debate. They have been educated through weekly and monthly farm newspapers to think that all farm problems are caused by labour. They should demand that the minister conduct an investigation into this allegation. It is true that a part of the price of an automobile is represented by labour costs and we should know this. I am informed, however, that labour costs represent a total of $300 of the price of a $3,000 car. As the Financial Post pointed out last year the production cost in assembling an automobile is $57. We should know these things. If these facts were brought out by the Department of Labour I do not think the farmers would object. I know they would not be opposed to an automobile worker receiving $300, figuratively speaking, of the cost of a $3,000 car when the manufacturer, dealer and distributor each receive $600.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. Speakman: Are you suggesting that the worker who has no investment except the labour he has to offer should share equally with the manufacturer, dealer and distributor and others who invest large sums of money?

Mr. Peters: I certainly suggest that the worker should not receive just one-half of what is received by the distributor, dealer and manufacturer. This raises another point. The worker has a big investment in the industry in which he is engaged. A worker may invest his lifetime in a plant. The value of the investment of his working life cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. In many plants the worker does not enjoy pension plan benefits which are, as it were, depreciation. The manufacturer and dealer are allowed depreciation for their equipment. The only one not allowed depreciation by law is the poor worker. The minister should give urgent attention to the question of the establishment of a national portable pension program. This is something that consideration must be given to, because the matter has been raised so often. Everybody else who has an investment is permitted to state what the investment is and to depreciate it but the poor workers who work in those plants are not given the same right.

A good example is that of the international woodworkers in Newfoundland. Those loggers are working in the bush and they are investing in an industry which is returning to them only $1.05, $1.06 or $1.07, or whatever the company has decided to pay since they formed Joey's new union. They are investing their lives in that particular industry and there is no pension plan for them. They are not allowed any depreciation on their income tax for the lifetime that they are spending there nor for the years of seniority they have established. By law we shall have to establish a national portable labour pension plan which will take into consideration the work that a worker does during his lifetime. He invests in the same way as a man who is setting up a factory. He invests in that plant a certain amount of his life and he should be compensated to some extent by having a pension plan which he can carry with him from job to job and from plant to plant. In other words, the Newfoundland workman could carry his pension into the logging industry, into the fishing industry, or into any other plant or allied industry he may be in so that when he spent 20 years of his life working he would have established a pension plan that would give him some consideration for the work he has done.

I do not think the farmers—I am sure this is true—in western Canada or in any place else will disagree that the worker has some rights in a particular plant and that he should be given some consideration. I am quite sure they will not be too concerned because they know it is the workers who buy their agricultural products; it is the workers who keep them on the farm; it is the workers who supply them with the market for their products. They know that the manufacturer eats only the same amount of food as a worker; he eats the same number of eggs as a worker will eat. Because the workers are more numerous, the farmers are much more concerned and should be much more concerned with the workers than with other various aspects of industry. I would strongly urge that when the minister is considering a national labour code he consider putting in something that will give protection in a bill of right for labour, as the hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned, and that he will also give consideration to and be much more willing to recommend the disallowance of legislation in the provincial field that eliminates the rights to which labour is entitled. The minister could give consideration to other matters also.

I should like to refer to one case which comes under the field of the Department of Labour. I refer to the uranium industry. In this instance the workers have not the right to join a second union if they wish. They have not the alternative they wish. Staff representatives of one union are not allowed to go on company property, are not allowed to visit the bunkhouses of this particular company because the company says this will create some difficulty. It should be pointed out that this union has been in the forefront of organized labour for some time. Consideration should be given to seeing what can be done to allow those workers who may wish to make a change the opportunity of talking to the representatives in their own domicile, which happens to be the company bunkhouses. They should be given this consideration so that they can make a democratic choice for themselves and decide whether they wish to belong to the union of which they are now members or if they wish to change. This would apply also to the other plants and to the other bunkhouses in the area.

I think that workers should also be given the right, when they wish, to join the steelworkers union. They should be given the right to do what they wish. If they wish to join the mine, mill and smelter workers union they should have that right. They should have the free choice to join that union if they wish, and this right should be insisted upon by the Department of Labour.

We have been very concerned also with the fact that the federal Department of Labour has farmed out some of its responsibilities to provincial governments. The instance in Blind River is a good example. The workers have continually complained over the last two years about the safety conditions that exist in that area. They have complained to the provincial government and they have received no redress. Because this falls under the jurisdiction of the federal government they should have the right to ask the minister at least to intervene on their behalf in matters which are not covered by the provincial government but the responsibility for which may have been assumed by the provincial government. We believe that conditions, and particularly the safety factors, should be higher under the federal government than under the provincial government which has accepted the jurisdiction over the particular industry. When the federal government safety factors are higher, then they should apply, and I suggest this would be the case in the uranium mines of Blind River.

Mr. Batten: Before the hon. member for Fort William begins his remarks may I have permission to ask a question of the hon. member who has just sat down? He made some reference to the scale of wages paid to Newfoundland loggers. May I ask him whether he has the scale of wages paid to Newfoundland loggers?

Mr. Peters: I referred to only two particular figures. One was the figure used in the conciliation board report, which was $1.05. The second figure is the figure that is paid as a base rate in the mill by the same company and that figure is $1.78 an hour, base rate.

Mr. Batten: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I must confess we have been regaled with much oratory here this afternoon. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming refer to the matter of profits made by distributors of automobiles and dealers. I want to assure the hon. member who has just sat down that I do not know of any automobile distributor or dealer who made a profit of $600 on any automobile. The average profit for all Canadian dealers across Canada in 1958, for which I have the figures, was approximately 1½ per cent on the total turnover of their business. I do not think that is an excessive amount and in many cases I might say for his information and edification the dealers lost money. I know of some companies which lost thousands and thousands of dollars in the operation of the automobile business, notwithstanding the volume of business. Therefore, I wish to say to him that it is not the dealer who is making the money or indeed the manufacturer. The returns are evenly distributed. As he knows, the workers do receive a fair wage in the automobile plants, and adequate fringe benefits to boot.

I just wanted to say that in passing to correct the impression that the dealers are making so much money on the work of the workers.

Mr. Peters: Before the hon. member leaves that, may I ask him a question?

Mr. Badanai: You have made two speeches this afternoon, sir, and I think you can wait until I am finished. Notwithstanding statements made by members of the government on many occasions, to say nothing of solemn promises made in the course of the election of last year, the unemployment situation is still grave enough to cause anxiety in many places, and anything that anyone can say to the contrary does not alter the fact that the situation is serious. I realize that the Minister of Labour has the matter of unemployment very much in mind and that he has tried to relieve it with the winter work program in co-operation with the municipalities and the provinces.

In the city of Fort William there are now approximately 100 persons working under the scheme but this is only a drop in the bucket in the face of some 2,760 still seeking employment at the present moment. Had it not been for the active co-operation which the citizens of the community of Fort William have given to the winter do-it-now campaign, which is separate from the winter work program of the government, several hundred more would have been out of work all winter. Individual citizens, industry, business and labour are to be congratulated for their united support in assisting the effort put forth by the lakehead employment advisory committee. The members of this committee worked like beavers to create work.

I must also pay a compliment to the manager and staff of the national unemployment insurance office at Fort William for their untiring efforts in publicizing the need for co-operation. It is my belief that these campaigns fulfil a vital role during the winter months in assisting to create and spread employment to those who are unfortunately without the means of livelihood through no fault of their own. The success of these campaigns leaves no doubt that they are a part of our responsibility and a challenge that our economy must face and effectively solve. The suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition that a federal-provincial-municipal conference be held as soon as possible for the purpose of planning a winter work program for the next winter season is one that should be carried into effect without delay.

It is rather regrettable, and I am sure no one regrets it more than my good friend the Minister of Labour, who I must confess is sincere and hard working, but I must say that the government has not given evidence to date that it has an effective plan to deal with unemployment. I have no doubt that the government receives advice from many quarters because, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Welland this afternoon, advice is one of those commodities that are offered free of charge to anyone who wishes to listen. Nonetheless, sometimes there are some suggestions made which bear consideration. One of these appeared in the issue of the Globe and Mail of January 22, 1959 and I wish to read part of it for the record:

> If one is to judge by recent discussions of economic problems, the nation has to take a choice between unemployment or inflation. Since inflation inevitably leads in the end to massive unemployment, it may seem there is no choice at all.
> Fortunately, defeatism is not a Canadian characteristic and some of our better minds are not prepared to admit the impossibility of providing work for those who want to work constructively, and yet increasing real prosperity.
> As something to think about, a proposal has been put forward by Eugen Berkovits, an international businessman and economist whose name has appeared in this column before. In his opinion, unemployment as a recurrent and urgent problem might be overcome by establishment of new manufacturing plants in this country on a large scale.

Evidence in support of his idea can be found in the way secondary industry has grown as a large employer here in recent years, far outstripping primary industry. If we would speed up that growth, says Mr. Berkovits, government might consider offering incentives and inducements, instead of having to make work itself and also make handouts to people who sooner would earn.

To this end, Mr. Berkovits suggests government should grant assistance to those who would establish new plants in Canada, in the way assistance is provided for housing, using the industrial development bank as the agency.

So the industrial development bank would be authorized to issue insurance policies in respect of industrial development loans granted by approved financial institutions, up to an aggregate of perhaps $1 billion. Industrial development bank would have the right of approval and each loan would be no greater than 80 per cent of the outlay necessary to get such new plants going. Repayment would be spread over 30 years, with a fee of possibly two per cent of the loan to cover the cost of insurance. Behind the industrial development bank would be the government—if required.

Mr. Berkovits does not believe government would get "caught" by such a guarantee system. New enterprises, as is well known, have a multiplying influence on production and between thus creating additional activity adding to the nation's wealth, the investment would start bringing back to goverment substantial taxes, so that the whole outlay might be balanced by income within four or five years. In contrast, housing loans, which also help employment, are not constant and expanding inducers of revenue.

While there might be a need for government to put up some money, as it has done for housing, Mr. Berkovits sees most of the capital under his plan coming from regular sources of funds, in greater volume when insurance reduces the risk.

This suggestion merits the consideration of the government and should be explored in every way. Our economic recovery depends to a very large degree on employment of human resources. The dangerous curves on the road to recovery are unemployment and inflation and these are the twins of misery which we must cope with, and so long as they are present so long will distress and unhappiness prevail.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 5, to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to consider public bills pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING STATUS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. C-2, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act and the proposed amendment of Mr. Roberge.

[Mr. Badanai.]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that when this bill was introduced on February 5, my friend the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) late in the day moved an amendment which I want very warmly to support, namely that the bill should not be read a second time but that the subject matter thereof should be referred to the standing committee on external affairs. That motion was made after a previous motion that the bill should be referred to a special committee to be set up was found by the chair to be out of order. Of the standing committees, the external affairs committee therefore seemed the most closely related—although I admit it is not too closely related—to the subject matter of the bill. However, as we all know, it is a highly competent committee; and I am perfectly sure that if the subject matter of the bill were referred to it, the experience and the quality of the members on that committee would make them eminently well qualified to deal with the subject matter of this bill.

In introducing this bill originally I attempted to be as non-controversial as it is in my nature to be. It is not for me, of course, to be the judge of how well I succeeded. I found that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite were perhaps a little bit more controversial than I was or at least so it seemed to me. But I do not seek to say anything whatever about any of the personal references that were made to me or any of the objections that were taken to my administration of the department when I was the minister or to any of the other things of perhaps a not entirely complimentary nature that were said in that debate.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, it was my hope—and it is still my hope—that this matter could be considered and decided in a completely non-partisan manner in the best interests of all the people of Canada, for what we are talking about here is something that I trust all members in the House of Commons, to whatever party they may happen to belong, value equally. I refer to our common citizenship which I think binds all of us together more than anything divides us in this House of Commons, or at least that is my hope. I must say that I hope the hon. gentleman who is a learned member of his profession will not think it presumptuous of me, a student in the same profession, to say so but I thought the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) was rather devastating in his legal criticisms of the bill.

In defence of the bill itself, I may say that it was drafted rather hastily in the house at the last session and was not revised. It was based upon an assertion that was made at that time by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) to the effect that the particular matter to which it had reference was the only disability still existing in the act; that is to say, the only disability under which naturalized citizens suffered and natural born citizens did not. I thought that the hon. member for Marquette completely demonstrated that that foundation was wrong. The moment I heard him cite the section of the act that he cited, I realized that this bill was imperfect and that it would not be a proper bill to pass in the form in which it was introduced.

Of course, as hon. members will recall, I said at the outset that I was not in the least wedded to the terms of the bill, that I felt the purpose of the bill was clearly stated, that the principle of the bill was clear and that there would be no difficulty in revising the terms of the bill itself in a committee in order to fit the essential purpose that was in mind. However, in all the circumstances, I think it would be better to have the subject matter of the bill go to a committee where a new bill could be drafted based upon the principle of this bill.

I also thought that the hon. member for Marquette—I keep wanting to say "Portage" for some reason or other but I know it is "Marquette"—was quite right in thinking that the disability in section 18 should also be removed from the act. I think so too.

I want to go back to the real purpose of this bill. I want to say again—and try again to say this in a way that will not be controversial—that I do not think there was really any injustice in the old act as it was before it was amended at the last session of parliament. But there was a psychological situation that had developed. It seemed to me that on balance, the correcting of that psychological situation was more important than were the advantages of the old act. I think one can make a strong argument for the retention of section 18 in the citizenship act. But if you retain it or if you retain any other disability or any other difference between the legal status of a naturalized citizen and a natural born citizen, our citizenship is open to the charge that we have two kinds of citizens. In other words, it seemed to me that you must either do the whole job or there was really not much point in tampering with the act at all.

I come to the other argument of the hon. member for Marquette which I must say did not impress me nearly as much. I refer to the argument that these persons who were still excepted by the one section of the act which I was seeking to have amended do not deserve to carry the honourable name of "Canadian" and, of course, I quite agree. I quite agree that if, in fact, they are the kind of people it would be charged that they were, that is quite true. But I am afraid there are many other citizens who do not deserve to carry the honourable name of "Canadian". You either have discrimination or you do not have discrimination. You cannot have almost no discrimination and have equality. That is one of those mathematical propositions on which I am sure the hon. member and I would not disagree. It therefore seems to me that either one has to do what hon. gentlemen opposite or some of their leaders before the election in 1957 said they would do, or not do it. If you do not do it, we would probably be just as well off—in fact, I am not sure that we would not have been better off with the old act—and I am going to explain briefly why.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. MacLean), who also made, I thought, a very interesting, illuminating, thoughtful and scholarly contribution to the debate, on which I would like, if he will not take offence, to congratulate him, pointed out something which had never occurred to me when I was minister as being a discrimination, but obviously is once it is pointed out. That is that there were certain kinds of so-called natural born citizens, although they were not born in this country, who did not have an equality with the natural born citizens who were born in this country. It is quite clear that if this task of establishing a status of complete legal equality is going to be performed, it does require a careful examination of the whole act. It seems to me that that would be very well worth doing and there would be no harm in going ahead with it in anticipation of the wider study of the act which we hope there will be at the next session of parliament.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, however, did make another argument which did not impress me nearly as much as the legal argument he made, and that was his argument about the desirability of retaining the disability which is now in the act to which the bill has reference. The hon. gentleman was arguing that it was very important to be able to strip of their citizenship those Canadians who, on being accused of treason, left the country or were not in the country and would not come back to stand trial. I think a lot can be said in favour of that, but surely there is just as much to be said in favour of stripping of their citizenship those people who have been convicted of treason or of disloyalty to the country and who, after serving their sentence, leave the country and sever their connection with it for a considerable period of time. As hon. members know, that was the law up till it was changed by the present government a year ago.

At the time I was minister a very celebrated case arose. It was the case of a man who had been a member of this house at one time and who had subsequently been convicted in the courts, who after serving his sentence, had left the country and gone to live in the country where he was born, who had lived there for the statutory period and on whom I caused to be served the necessary legal instrument, who appealed against my announced intention of recommending that his citizenship be stripped from him, and whose appeal was listened to and dismissed. I am not using these terms in a legal sense, of course, but rather in an administrative sense. I then recommended that his citizenship be taken from him, and the governor in council saw fit to accept that recommendation and that person lost his citizenship. That is not possible any longer. Since the law was amended by the present government, that person would retain his citizenship although he had been convicted, had served a sentence, and then had gone out of the country with the apparent intention of severing his connection with it. In that case we could not now take his citizenship away from him.

It seems to me that since the present government saw fit to remove from the act the possibility of taking citizenship away from a person of that sort, it is very illogical indeed to retain in the act this other disability of removing citizenship from a person who has never been convicted of anything, against whom a charge has been laid but who does not see fit to come back and have the charge heard. It might be conceivable, in spite of the very best efforts which might be made to find him and acquaint him with the charge, that he might not be aware of the charge or the circumstances. I must say that it does seem a little odd that it should be argued by hon. gentlemen, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seemed to argue—and when I asked him a question he told me I was trying to wriggle out of it, but it struck me that the wriggling was all being done not by me but by the hon. gentleman—in view of the fact that later this session hon. members will presumably be supporting a bill of rights which we are told in the speech from the throne is to be introduced by the leader of the government, that it would be wise to maintain disabilities against a person who has never been tried but remove disabilities against someone who has been tried and convicted. It is rather an odd conception of equality of rights. I do think myself that there is a very strong argument for taking citizenship away from people like that. There is also a strong argument for equality. It is an argument that induced me to introduce this bill, and notwithstanding the strong arguments on the other side, left in my mind a balance in favour of making all Canadians legally equal. I must say I am unrepentant in the views that that is what we should do.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), with approval from some other hon. members, did suggest that there was another way of doing it, and that was to impose disabilities upon natural born citizens and to strip them of their citizenship in certain circumstances. I do not think that we would ever get this parliament to do that, and I do not think we would ever get parliament to do it for this reason. When we strip those people of their citizenship we would be making stateless persons out of them deliberately. In the case of some naturalized persons, what we are doing is simply restoring to them the citizenship which they had before, though in some cases we are not. Again I think that is another important consideration. The idea of making outlaws of individuals is to my mind very reprehensible and completely out of accord with the notions of jurisprudence which exist today in most of the civilized countries of the free world. It seems to me that this is another very strong argument for our bringing the law completely up to date in this regard. I must say that in all the circumstances I do feel that by one means or another we should try very hard in this parliament to reach agreement in regard to equality of citizenship.

Another point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was this. I do not want to take up a lot of time in reading over the previous debate, although if the hon. gentleman thinks I misrepresent anything he said, I would be only too glad to be corrected at once because, as I say, I am seeking to be completely fair and uncontroversial. The hon. member raised the question of fraud. It seems to me that a person who gets a citizenship certificate by fraud has not in fact become a citizen. I think we should deal with such cases judicially. The determination of the facts as to whether he got his certificate by fraud would be a matter, I think, not for any government but for the courts. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seemed to think that that would make the law more rigid than if some administrative discretion were allowed. I think this is a judicial matter.

No minister should have it in his power to decide whether someone else is guilty of fraud. That is what we have law courts for, and if that is going to be done at all I am sure that is the way it should be done. Of course, it may be that the language of the drafting was not all it should be, but I think the hon. gentleman would find that using the word "court" meant whatever was the court of competent jurisdiction with whatever rights of appeal there would be. I would think that there should be all the rights of appeal that there would be in many other similar kinds of cases. I can see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was, I think, properly concerned about one problem, because there is a problem here. It is conceivable that someone might 20 years ago have obtained a certificate of citizenship or, as it used to be called 20 years ago, naturalization, not having complied with the law. That person, during all this long period would have been regarded as a Canadian citizen, and it would seem to me—and I thank the hon. gentleman for putting this idea in my head—that we would not want to frame the law in such a way that notwithstanding the fact that that man never really became a citizen he would have to start all over again and be landed as an immigrant, if that was necessary, and have to wait for another five years before he could become a citizen.

I do think the hon. member has found another gap which ought to be filled. It is a gap which, I imagine, exists as much in the existing law as in the one suggested. Some provision should be made in cases where either there was good faith in the beginning or good conduct in the country since that time—some process by which citizenship could be conferred with a very slight delay indeed.

Perhaps the court could be given the power to make that kind of favourable decision on application immediately after an adverse decision had been reached in the other case if it seemed desirable.

It seems to me those were the only points of substance which were raised. I looked over the debate the other day when I thought this matter was coming up but it did not come up because of our higher interest in divorce which I am sure is a matter of great interest in some parts of this country at the present time. I am not going to detain the house any longer but I am going to appeal to hon. members to bring this matter to a vote, because all it will do is to send this subject matter to a committee where we can perhaps have a preliminary canter over the subject. In view of the complexities which have been revealed during the debate I do not think we would probably reach a decision this session, but I think it might be useful to have one or two meetings to see what ground can be covered so that between now and next session the law officers can be working on this problem with a view to dealing with it at another session.

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I must say at the outset that unlike the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) I cannot see my way clear to supporting or accepting the amendment which is before the house at the present time. The hon. member has all but admitted, in the first instance, that his bill is bad in many respects, and there are other defects which, if I have time, I hope to point out in the course of my comments today.

Aside altogether from the initial unsoundness of the bill, I do not think that any amendment such as is now proposed shoud be considered by any committee other than a select committee. I agree that the time has come for a careful examination of this whole act, but I cannot support an amendment which would have the effect of sending this bill to the standing committee on external affairs.

The hon. gentleman, when he spoke a few days ago, was very prone to make confessions about things he had done while in office. I had hoped he would confess an error today and withdraw the bill and perhaps remedy some of the defects inherent in it before, if necessary, presenting another bill. This, to my mind, would have been the most workmanlike approach to the whole affair.

Apart from the bill itself, I should like to draw attention to a matter which did not receive too much consideration during the debate which took place in this house, namely the fact that at the present time we have two orders in council in effect under the War Measures Act which would nullify any work the committee might do with regard to the principle of the bill. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) brought this out during the discussion which took place on Thursday, February 5. I think this is very important because these orders in council are noteworthy and deserve to be brought to the attention, not only of the house but of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who, I imagine, has not even read them. One of them was brought into effect in November of 1942—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to make an observation? I did not join the government until 1953, and I had nothing to do with what was done by the government before that date. I had no responsibility whatever. I should also like to take this opportunity to ask the hon. member a question. I understand that the War Measures Act can only come into effect upon proclamation by the governor in council, and that a second proclamation was made after the end of the war, saying that it had ceased to be in effect. For the life of me I cannot believe that there are any orders in council which have the effect of law today and which were passed under the War Measures Act, unless they have been continued by some other statutory authority.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I made no personal reference to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): This order in council was passed by the Liberal government in 1942. I do not know whether it is in effect or not. I have not looked into it in detail. But it merits consideration. If we are going to go ahead with the committee work, I think we should look at this. There are two orders in council, one of which, dated November 26, 1942, stated:

> Any person who is a British subject by reason of marriage, or by reason of birth or naturalization in Canada, or by reason of the birth or naturalization of his father in Canada, and who makes application for repatriation to any country which at the time of application is at war with Canada, shall, as from the date of his departure from Canada for repatriation, cease to be a British subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not in effect. It has not been in effect for more than 10 years.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know whether it is or not. There was another order in council dated December 15, 1945, which states:

> Any person who being a British subject by naturalization under the Naturalization Act, Chapter 138, R.S.C., 1927 is deported from Canada under the provisions of order in council P.C. 7355 of 15th December, 1945, shall, as and from the date upon which he leaves Canada in the course of such deportation, cease to be either a British subject or a Canadian national.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not in effect either.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Whether it is or not, this was brought to my attention when I learned that this matter would be debated, and I should like to have some more information with regard to it, if possible, before I can go ahead and discuss intelligently the principle of this bill in committee.

There are other defects in the bill which were not pointed out by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate during the day-long debate we had back in February. I think one more should be pointed out to him, and that concerns section 19(1). The purpose of the bill is ostensibly to restrict revocation of citizenship to cases of fraud, misrepresentation or concealment of material circumstances and to provide that in such cases where citizenship is revoked it shall be deemed never to have been granted.

In so far as loss by revocation is concerned, this would effectively place naturalized citizens upon the same footing as natural-born citizens, since a person whose citizenship had been revoked could not be considered ever to have been a citizen. However, the amendment is worded in such a way that no procedure for the institution of revocation proceedings is left, because the proposed amendment deletes the present preamble to section 19(1), which reads:

> 19(1) The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied that such person—

And so on. I point this out in case the hon. member wishes to bring up this matter again or present another bill. This would be another ground for consideration with regard to the drafting.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question? Has the hon. member not noticed that the new section—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question is this. Does the hon. member not think that since the courts would determine whether the certificate would be revoked the governor in council would not need appear in the matter and that it would be a matter for the courts?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I still think you would need a process whereby the proceedings would be instituted in the first place. You cannot have a simple declaration. You would have to have something to put it in effect whether it be done by the court or the governor in council. In all earnestness I suggest that this is a serious omission in the bill as drafted.

Another point which I believe is of importance is that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) took directly opposite stands with regard to what they want done and with regard to what they think this bill does. In the first instance I shall refer to the statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in this house last year as reported at page 4759 of Hansard of September 6, 1958, when he said:

> No. What I am saying here is that he never was a citizen because he did not comply properly with the law that he is required to comply with to become a citizen. The only difference between what I am suggesting and what the hon. lady—

That is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I continue:

—is putting forward in her bill, now that she has taken out that highly objectionable section (c) which really would have instituted thought police in so far as these naturalized citizens were concerned, is that it will no longer be competent to revoke the citizenship of the person who has been charged with the offence of treason, is outside the country and does not come back to be tried. That is the sort of thing that happens once in a great while. It is perhaps desirable to be able to do this. However, if we are going to take away all the other reasons, why leave this one? The main purpose of this whole exercise, as I take it—and I think the house is not divided on this point any longer—is to give complete equality, the psychological feeling of equality.

We turn now to the remarks made on the same issues by the hon. member for Cartier as reported at page 4760 where he said:

I should like to ask the minister a question. The minister speaks in terms of a naturalized citizen who has committed an offence, leaves the country and does not come back for trial and therefore should lose his citizenship. I agree with that. But assuming that a natural born citizen also commits the offence, also leaves the country and also does not come back to trial, why treat him differently from the way in which you treat a naturalized citizen? He has committed the same offence. He has left the country the same as has the naturalized citizen, and he does not come back for trial. They are both on an equal footing. They have done the same thing. Why differentiate as between the one and the other?

Throughout the debate on the 1958 amendments as presented by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the view appeared to be taken that the citizenship status possessed by a natural born citizen was inalienable and that a naturalized citizen should be placed as nearly as possible on the same footing as the natural born citizen. It is clear that the fact that the natural born citizen may lose his citizenship by the effect of the law under certain circumstances was not appreciated at that time.

During the course of debate on this question last February I attempted to detail the sections under which a person may lose his natural citizenship and I think the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have made reference appreciate that point now. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Cartier answered him fully in these words reported at page 4698 of Hansard:

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) I know felt very strongly about this bill, but even he seemed to feel that instead of making concessions it was imposing additional discriminations. I am sure on reflection he will see that is not true, but the main part of his remarks seemed to me to be directed towards an argument in favour of imposing restrictions on natural born Canadians rather than removing them from those who are naturalized. I doubt very much that that would go down too well with either natural born or naturalized Canadians.

During the debate last February I asked the hon. member for Cartier if he thought that the bill presented to the house accomplished what he wanted it to, and he replied that he thought so. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate gave his interpretation of what the bill does and it was an entirely opposite conclusion. I suggest to these hon. gentlemen that they should agree in their interpretation of what the bill accomplishes. This must be done before there can be agreement with regard to whether or not to send it to a committee.

I know that there are other hon. members who wish to speak on the bill. I have no reason to not want it to come to a vote because in the first instance I cannot see how a committee could treat this subject in the light of the bill we have before us. The bill is poorly drafted and is bad through and through.

We have the suggestion that the bill be sent to the committee on external affairs. I know it had to be done in that way at the time because notice would have had to be given with regard to a special or select committee. In all seriousness I say this procedure is not conducive to any serious study of the bill. It is obvious that if we are going to study this subject at all the whole question would have to be examined by a special or select committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question? Would he like to amend the motion of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) to send it to the special joint committee on Indian affairs?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I could never live with myself if I were to agree to sending this bill to a committee in the form in which it is presently drafted. The amendment is an absurdity and I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is only too well aware of that.

The minister stated in introducing her estimates that there would have to be a careful examination of the citizenship act. I do not think there will be time to do that this session but it should be done at the earliest possible opportunity and I hope it will be done next year. Each section of the act should be examined by a special or select committee which could make recommendations to the house with regard to changes in the act.

For the reasons I have outlined I am compelled to say I cannot support the proposed amendment with regard to sending this legislation to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Murray Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I thought this amendment would give the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate an opportunity to unravel some of the statements he placed on the record when he presented this bill to the house but he has not taken the opportunity to do so. He has not satisfied my mind as to the need for this amendment, or the reasons why it is being introduced by him at this time after his term of office as minister of citizenship and immigration. While he occupied that position I do not think there were any major amendments made to the Canadian Citizenship Act, and I am sure that citizenship in those years was as important to Canadians as it is today.

I have been connected with the newly formed citizenship council in the province of Manitoba, and the discussions that they are having and the problems that they are encountering in getting their organization on its feet and in trying to promote better citizenship in this country. They certainly are not having any problems with people outside of Canada who have been charged with treason. This is a very small and insignificant matter when you consider the whole matter of citizenship in its entirety. There is no discrimination in Canada between natural born Canadians and naturalized Canadians. If there is any discrimination in our act at all it does not affect citizens who are in Canada; it affects Canadian citizens who are outside of Canada. In my estimation, that is a more important point. When we consider that a great many countries of this world allow dual citizenship—by that I mean citizens of those countries can come to Canada and obtain their Canadian citizenship and still retain citizenship in the country from which they came—this puts us into a difficult position, or it could put us into a difficult position in certain circumstances and in certain instances. For example, a person who has such dual citizenship could come to Canada and commit an offence which would prompt our law officials to lay a charge of treason, and then leave the country and refuse to return to stand trial. In such a situation we would have a citizen who could go all over his native land or into countries which are ideologically opposed to us and brag about being a Canadian citizen. I for one do not like to think of that happening. I do not know whether it would ever happen but I suggest that just because the incidence of occurrence may be very small that is no argument for removing something from the statute books.

[Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I think we should have certain protections on our statute books to provide a deterrent or a punishment for situations that could arise in the future which might be embarrassing to us as far as our neighbours in the world community are concerned. I might even go so far as to agree with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) when he says that a natural-born Canadian citizen should also lose his citizenship under the same circumstances. I would be inclined to agree with him except for the fact that we should be creating a person with a stateless category. That is something that is repugnant to our way of thinking and it is something that I would certainly have to do a lot more thinking about before I would permit myself to advocate it.

In this country we have a certain amount of pro-communism and a great deal of anti-communism. I think the anti-communist element is more pronounced in those communities which are made up of new Canadians or naturalized Canadians. I do not hesitate to say that if any naturalized Canadian found himself within the confines of the section of the Canadian Citizenship Act that we are discussing today his fellow naturalized Canadians would not have too much sympathy for him; for these people have seen what happens in countries where persons sell their souls and their morals to a political philosophy that in effect means slavery and means imprisonment and lack of freedom. They have seen this happen first-hand. One of the main reasons why many of them came to this country was to get away from places where that could happen. I would think that possibly, instead of worrying ourselves today with how we are going to treat people who are charged with treason we should be worrying ourselves as to how we are going to, or whether or not it would be a good idea to get rid of certain people in our society who are trouble-makers and who are openly opposed to the democratic system as we know it.

I am not by any means advocating expulsion because one holds a communistic belief or a socialistic belief, but I would think we would be much better off discussing that point, or discussing how we can help new Canadians rather than discussing how or whether we should deal with people charged with treason in the manner in which this act stipulates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question? Do I understand from his argument that he is opposed to legal equality for all Canadian citizens?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate gathered that from my remarks, then I suggest he must have been reading his paper again.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member explain what his remarks do mean?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): There is no inequality in Canada. The inequality exists for those who have been charged with treason and who are outside of Canada. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is very quick to get on his feet now and to charge this government with discrimination when in fact his own government practised discrimination to an extent that had never before been experienced in this country, not only as far as immigrants were concerned but as far as natural born Canadian citizens were concerned and, to my mind, this bill which he has proposed to this house is nothing more than an attempt to get back into the good graces of some of the people of this country.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) knows full well that I do not engage in personalities. I value his sincerity, his honesty—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): His good looks.

Mr. Mandziuk: —his debating ability and his ability to make the headlines.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): That comes first.

Mr. Mandziuk: I can visualize what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would like to see in the Liberal press all across the country—"Pickersgill Fights Against Dual Citizenship". If that is not the purpose of the bill then I do not know what is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thanks for the headline.

Mr. Mandziuk: On February 5 last I think we threshed out the bill. Everybody expressed their opinion. It was generally agreed that the only people the bill purports to protect are those who have been charged with treason or with a breach of the Official Secrets Act and who fail to come back to our courts and justify themselves. By their very failure to answer the summons they convict themselves of being guilty.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the aim of the hon. gentleman is to make headlines that he is the only one who is fighting for equal citizenship for all, I believe I am expressing the opinion of every member of the house, including members of the opposition, that Canada is proud of her naturalized Canadians.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, it is a known fact that one-third of Canada's population is either naturalized or descended from naturalized Canadians. These people came from all parts of the world and they have helped to pioneer and develop this land. They have contributed to every part of the economy of the country. They have fought on the battlefields of France, Holland and Belgium and their names, some of which are hard to pronounce, are on the crosses of Flander's fields.

I do not know whether hon. members realize that a Victoria Cross holder of Ukrainian origin works downstairs in this building. He holds the highest honour in the British Empire. I do not know how many of us are aware that today is the 14th anniversary of V.E. day. The west fought in that war for freedom and we won the war but how many people lost their freedom after V.E. day if for no other reason than because of Quislings and such people.

An honest, naturalized Canadian is not worried about this section being in the act. I cannot express myself any better than by quoting part of an article by Mr. Harold Weir which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of October 19, 1957. It reads as follows:

> Naturalized persons who feel "insecure" because their citizenship is subject to review by the government must derive their feeling of insecurity from a bad conscience. It doesn't make any more sense than the complaint of light-fingered gentry that their freedom is in jeopardy because, if they commit a robbery, they'll be thrown into jail.
> The only naturalized citizens who run the slightest risk of losing their citizenship are those who obviously don't deserve citizenship in the first place.

They are very very few. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate expects to make the headlines because he has fought for equality of citizenship I can only say that he is fighting for probably one in a million. I do not know whether we have had one case since the last war and I do not think we will have one in the next 14 years. I continue:

> Men and women who change their minds about Canada, men and women who get sour on Canada, men and women who have come into this country with bad intentions, these are the only ones likely to run afoul of cancellation clauses.

These are the only people who are liable to have their citizenship taken away from them. This country has accepted a large influx of immigrants. We are a country with wide-open spaces. We have room for many, many more people. I believe that this government or any other should have that one clause giving the right to revoke the citizenship of anyone who refuses to answer a charge of treason. Treason is a serious crime. It is punishable by death in some countries and in the past it was punishable by death in all countries. All these people have to do is to come forward and answer the charge and their citizenship will not be revoked. If they answer the charge, if they face the music, as the saying goes, and undergo the penalty their citizenship is absolutely safe. When only an odd case may arise once in 50 years, is it worth wasting a day or an hour of the time of the house, all this under the smokescreen that there is at least one member of the house who is fighting for equality of citizenship for all? I can see him make the headlines, but all over one case in probably 50 years or maybe never.

I object to the bill. I do not want to be repetitious. I do not want to go into my objections to the bill. The same opinion I expressed before still stands. I would not be afraid to vote against the bill no matter what the Liberal press of Canada said. I am quite satisfied that is the opinion of most hon. members and I think we have wasted a lot of time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the leader of the house could confirm the business for Monday and perhaps indicate a little more for the rest of the week.

Mr. Green: The business for Monday will be, first of all, second reading of the act to amend the Excise Act, then the act to amend the Old Age Security Act, then the one to amend the Customs Tariff and the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, all of which follow from the budget. Then we shall take second reading of the Unemployment Insurance Act amendments and then second reading of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will that be the business for the next two days after that?

Mr. Green: I would not like to say as to the next few days. I hope the hon. member will not take that long on these bills.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would just venture to suggest to the leader of the house that if we were given a little ampler menu it might be possible we would consume less in each course.

Mr. Green: I doubt that very much.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CABINET COMMITTEE AUTHORIZATIONS

Question No. 307—Mr. Fisher:

1. Are orders in council in effect at the present time authorizing cabinet committees, ad hoc cabinet committees, committees of council, and interdepartmental committees?
2. If so, what are the numbers and dates and contents of the particular orders in council?
3. Who are the members of these committees?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1. Cabinet committees have no legal powers and are set up from time to time by the cabinet without any orders in council.

There are two committees of the privy council, both authorized and given certain powers by statute. These are the treasury board, established by the Financial Administration Act, and the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research, established by the Research Council Act. In addition, there is a statutory committee of which certain ministers of the crown are members, together with the Speaker of the House of Commons. This is the committee of internal economy, provided for in the House of Commons Act.

In the past, interdepartmental committees were set up from time to time by order in council but the present practice is for them to be established by the cabinet, by the treasury board or by the minister or ministers most directly concerned. There is still one active interdepartmental committee, the establishment and terms of reference of which were authorized by order in council. This is the standing committee on public records, of which a minister is chairman.

2. Present members and alternates of the treasury board were appointed by orders in council P.C. 1957-889, of June 21, P.C. 1957-1188 of August 29, and P.C. 1958-1326 of September 22. Present members of the scientific and industrial research committee were appointed by order in council P.C. 1958-1482 of October 23. Present members of the internal economy committee were appointed by order in council P.C. 1958-1715 of December 17. The committee on public records was set up by order in council P.C. 6175 of September 20, 1945, and its composition is set out therein, subject to the changes that have taken place in ministerial responsibility. Copies of the above orders are attached.

3. Answered by (2) above.

The Governor General in Council:

His excellency the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker, the Prime Minister, pursuant to section 16 of the House of Commons Act, is pleased hereby to appoint:

The Honourable Donald Methuen Fleming, Minister of Finance,
The Honourable Leon Balcer, Solicitor General,
The Honourable George Clyde Nowlan, Minister of National Revenue, and
The Honourable Ellen Louks Fairclough, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to act, with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes of sections 16, 17 and 18 of the said act.

Certified to be a true copy.

Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council

Order in council establishing the committee on public records

P.C. 6175

AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA

Thursday, the 20th day of SEPTEMBER, 1945.

PRESENT:

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL:

WHEREAS the secretary of state reports that, at the request of the Prime Minister he has convened an informal advisory committee on public records to give consideration to methods for providing adequate conservation of the public records, with particular reference to those records relating to the wartime activities of the government; and

That, following investigation of the state of the public records, a report has been prepared and considered by the committee and certain recommendations resulting therefrom approved;

Now, therefore, his excellency the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, is pleased to order and doth hereby order as follows:—

1. There shall be a committee on public records under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State and consisting of the following officials:—

A representative to be named by the Secretary of State (public archives).

Two representatives to be named by the Minister of National Defence (army and naval services).

A representative to be named by the Minister of National Defence—Air.

A representative to be named by the Minister of Public Works.

A representative to be named by the Minister of Finance.

A representative to be named by the minister of munitions and supply and the minister of reconstruction.

A representative to be named by the Minister of Labour.

A representative to be named by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A secretary shall be provided from the privy council office.

2. The Canadian Historical Association shall be asked to recommend two professional historians to act in an advisory capacity to the committee to serve at no salary but with expenses to be provided by the government.

3. The duties of the committee shall be to keep under constant review the state of the public records and to consider, advise and concert with departments and agencies of government on the organization, care, housing, and destruction of public records.

4. The committee shall, as part of their duties, examine and report on the following:

(a) The preparation by departments and agencies of government of suitable accounts of their wartime activities and,

(b) The implementing of the approved recommendations of the royal commission on public records of 1914 regarding establishment of a public records office, with particular reference to the integration of the public archives therein, and the type of organization which would facilitate the best use of the public records.

5. When questions specifically affecting the records of a department are being dealt with, a representative from that department shall be present at the meeting.

6. The primary responsibility for the care and maintenance of records and for seeing that the policies of government in respect to disposition of public records be carried out so as to ensure that material of permanent value be not unwittingly destroyed will rest with departments and agencies of government concerned.

7. Each department shall assign responsibility for superintendence of its records to one or more senior officers, preferably the departmental secretary if such a position exists, or an official of similar rank. The duties of these officers will be to review periodically the state of the departmental records and to reclassify them with a view to disposal or transfer of those of permanent value but not currently required to the public archives (or public records office, if established) or to other dominion or provincial departments, or by some form of destruction under existing regulations. These officers will also maintain liaison with agencies responsible to the minister. Recommendations respecting contemplated disposal along the above lines shall be submitted, in all cases, for formal approval of the committee on public records.

A. D. P. Heeney,
Clerk of the Privy Council

WHARF REPAIRS, BONAVENTURE COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 328—Mr. Bourget:

1. During the 1957-58 fiscal year, has the Department of Public Works done any work in connection with the wharves at Riviere Caplan, Riviere Caplan (Bourdages), Riviere Caplan (McLelland's Beach) and St. Charles de Caplan, county of Bonaventure, Quebec?

2. If so, what are the names of the persons employed for such work and what amount was paid to each one, in each case?

3. What are the names of the persons who supplied the materials and what amount was paid to each one, in each case?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. See attached statement.

3. See attached statement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 11, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Ninth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

WEST INDIES FEDERATION—STATEMENT ON PRESENTATION OF CLERKS' TABLES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that at the time of the inauguration ceremonies of the federal legislature of the West Indies in 1958, the ministers representing the government and people of Canada stated that a presentation of two clerks' tables would be made by Canada to the federation, one for the house of representatives and the other for the senate, to commemorate the occasion. These presentations will be made this afternoon by the commissioner for Canada, Mr. R. G. C. Smith.

This house, too, bears evidence on every hand of similar presentations. No doubt most hon. members are aware that your chair, sir, was presented to the parliament of Canada in 1921 by the United Kingdom branch of the empire parliamentary association. Incorporated into it were portions of the old oak roof of Westminster hall which was constructed in 1397. The mace was, of course, a gift from the United Kingdom, presented by the lord mayor and sheriffs of London in 1916. So, in taking the course we do, we but follow an example which has been set on previous occasions.

The gifts which are being presented to the West Indies legislature, like the gifts which repose in this house, serve as tangible reminders of the continuity and the growth in strength of parliamentary government and of the close and cordial relations which exist between the various parts of the commonwealth. I am sure hon. members in all parts of the house will wish to join with me on this occasion in extending our very best wishes to the federation of the West Indies.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): We on this side of the house have heard with great pleasure and approval the statement the Prime Minister has just made, and we agree that the presentation of clerks' tables to the parliament of the new federation will be a reminder that both federations have inherited the same parliamentary traditions. It will also be an indication of the good will of the parliament and people of this country to the new federation as it enters on the first stage of its constitutional existence, and the desire of the people of Canada to maintain the closest and friendliest relations with this other western hemisphere nation of the commonwealth.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we consider this a most appropriate gift to this new member of the commonwealth. It stands as a symbol of our common parliamentary heritage, traditions and procedures, and is a visible indication of our good will and best wishes for their every success in the future.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING AMOUNTS PAYABLE TO INTERNATIONAL FUND AND BANK

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to provide for the payment, out of the consolidated revenue fund, to the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development of sums not exceeding in the whole an amount equivalent to the subscriptions thereto required from Canada, that is to say, thirteen hundred million United States dollars, and to authorize the necessary borrowing therefor in the manner provided by the said act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1959 not exceeding $348,900,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1960; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $289,900,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $289,900,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the house to have this motion put today. I do so because the committee is anxious to commence sitting tomorrow in order to deal with the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Chevrier: It is agreed in so far as we are concerned.

Mr. Winch: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to give unanimous consent to the motion being put today instead of being transferred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent the motion will be put today. Mr. Green, seconded by Mr. Brooks, moves:

That items numbered 372 to 379, inclusive, relating to the Department of the Secretary of State, and item number 67, relating to the civil service commission, as listed in the main estimates of 1959-1960, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on estimates, saving always the power of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. JOHN'S HOUSING AUTHORITY

Motion No. 97—Mr. Batten:

For a copy of all communications addressed to the Minister of Public Works or the president or other senior officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation since April 1, 1959, regarding the St. John's housing authority, together with any replies to such communications.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

ST. JOHN'S HOUSING AUTHORITY—FEDERAL NOMINEES

Motion No. 100—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of any letter or letters exchanged since January 1, 1958 between the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland on behalf of the government, and the minister of municipal affairs of Newfoundland, regarding the appointment of federal nominees to the St. John's housing authority.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion be agreed to subject to obtaining the consent of the government of Newfoundland with respect to the tabling of the documents and also that it be understood that the government is not admitting that this is any precedent for the future.

Mr. Winch: Is it also understood that this motion is changed in accordance with the advice given by Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The motion as presented carries the correction which I directed be made the last time this matter was before the house. Subject to the reservation requested by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TREASURY BOARD MINUTE T.B. 537517

Motion No. 101—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of treasury board minute T.B. 537517, September 11, 1958.

Motion agreed to.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—UNSATISFACTORY CONSTRUCTION WORK

Motion No. 103—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports, by St. Lawrence seaway authority inspectors and Warnoch Hersey Company, and other documents exchanged between the minister, the St. Lawrence seaway authority or any government department, and any person or persons since January 1, 1955, regarding construction work considered unsatisfactory and not up to specifications demanded by the authority in connection with the Cornwall high level bridge, locks, and the erection and painting of mitre gates and sector gates at that site.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this motion passing subject to the usual reservation regarding privileged papers.

Motion agreed to.

RED RIVER FLOOD CONTROL, MAN.—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Motion No. 104—Mr. Pearson:

For a copy of all communications received since February 1, 1959, by the Prime Minister or any other member of the federal government from the premier or any member of the government of Manitoba, and any replies thereto on the subject of federal assistance for flood control on the Red river.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this motion passing subject to the consent of the province being obtained.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the Prime Minister is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED RELIANCE ON ALLIES FOR NEW ARMAMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he would care to comment on a report attributed to what are called defence authorities that from now on Canada will rely completely on its allies, and particularly on the United States of America, for new armaments?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no truth whatever in that statement. I have no idea who the alleged defence authority is.

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED FAILURE TO HIT SUPERSONIC TARGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I sent him notice two and a half hours ago, and I hope he received it in time. Has the minister noted the report from Washington carried in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that committee members of the United States congress contend that the Bomarc on all tests was capable of shooting down a subsonic aircraft, such as were used in the second world war, but has failed to hit a target travelling at supersonic speed? Will the Minister of National Defence inform the house whether any change is contemplated in government policy in establishing two Bomarc stations in Canada as a defence against intercontinental ballistic missiles, in view of this information? Will he also inform the house why Canadian taxpayers should be committed to buy obsolete United States equipment which is useless against intercontinental ballistic missiles?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister wishes to deal with this question, as he has had notice of it, but it does not seem to me to be the type of question that should be asked at this time. In the first place, it calls for an opinion and opens up a subject which can scarcely be dealt with at this time.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I will give the Minister of National Defence an opportunity to answer if he wishes.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have said on several occasions recently that it is not the practice to make comments on statements which are alleged to have been made before another body in another country by officials of that other country.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Fulton: If the first one was out of order, how can a supplementary be in order?

Mr. Winch: It is because the minister makes such statements that I do not know whether to love him or hate him. However, in view of what has been said may I ask the house leader when the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be called for discussion?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): They will be called at as early a date as possible. I am not just sure when it will be.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour can bring the house up to date on the strike situation at Sarnia involving the Polymer Corporation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I received a report from Mr. Ainsborough on his discussions with the parties to the Polymer dispute. In effect Mr. Ainsborough reports that neither party is prepared to move from its present position, and he does not believe that either party will change its position in the very near future. In view of his report, no good purpose will be served by continuing Mr. Ainsborough's appointment as commissioner at this time, and this appointment has been terminated accordingly.

I am sending copies of the report to the parties and have pointed out to them that there is a serious responsibility on both parties to depart from the uncompromising positions which Mr. Ainsborough reports they have maintained, and to be prepared to make reasonable compromises and to resume negotiations in good faith in order to reach a settlement of the dispute.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if Mr. Ainsborough had previously been assigned the responsibility of mediation with respect to these two disputing parties?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Ainsborough has been connected with this dispute for some time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister agree with the allegation made by the union in Oshawa on Friday last, that the participation of Mr. Ainsborough was not really helpful in the context of the situation?

Mr. Starr: I do not agree with that at all.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED IMPORTATION AND SALE OF CARS BY DIPLOMATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister inform the house whether any foreign diplomats have been guilty of breaking the Customs Act or the Excise Act by importing luxury cars free of duty and then selling them in Canada at a profit? If so, does the government intend to investigate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would put that question on the order paper. It obviously requires some research to obtain statistical information, and I think it would be more appropriate to have it on the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he can tell the house whether any report has been provided to the government by the unemployment insurance advisory committee since that tabled on August 18, 1958?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Even though the hon. member for Essex East gave me notice of his intention to ask this question, I am sorry to report to him that I have not had an opportunity of checking thoroughly in order to give him a reply, but I would hope to do so tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that we are going to deal later today with his proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, will the minister not endeavour before that discussion begins to ascertain whether or not a second report was made by the unemployment insurance advisory committee since that tabled on August 18, 1958? I think the minister will agree that this might be very important information for purposes of the debate today.

Mr. Starr: Even though I think the hon. member already has that report, I will look into it.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—REFERENCE TO REPORT ON EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare based on a statement made in the proper place. In view of the contents of the report on strontium 90 in Canadian milk powder, tabled by the minister on Friday last, and particularly the graphs contained therein, would the minister inform the house who provided the information on which he bases his statement, and I quote:

> Of first importance is the fact that our findings indicate no basis for alarm about this matter.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. As I mentioned in my statement to the house, the stringent standards referred to were suggested by competent international authorities. The levels illustrated in the graphs to which the hon. member refers are the results of analyses carried out in the radiation protection division of my department. Departmental officers work closely with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and with recognized experts in our universities. In addition, we keep closely in touch with national and international bodies, and have access to the latest data in this field of science. Information from all these sources was taken into account in the preparation of my statement to the house.

HOUSING

DOWN PAYMENTS ON LOW COST HOUSING IN REMOTE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister inform the house whether down payments on low cost housing in remote areas, such as the town of Atikokan, are on a par with down payments asked in larger centres?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take this question as notice.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

UNITED STATES—REPORTED FAILURE OF CANADIAN FIRM TO SECURE TURBINE CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. My question is based on newspaper reports from Washington over the week end dealing with the inability of a Canadian company to get an order from United States army engineers for eight hydraulic turbines for the Big Ben dam in South Dakota, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian bid was considerably lower than United States bids after allowing for taxes and the 12 per cent differential because it was a foreign bidder.

My question is this. Would the minister look into this matter and make a statement to the house giving the full information and telling us whether or not this is at variance with the arrangements for production sharing, and if it is what can be done about it?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): This is a lengthy question, the reply to which needs a lot of preparation. I think it should go on the order paper, and then we would give an appropriate answer.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the minister is taking it as notice?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIlraith: My question implied that the minister make a statement on the subject to the house, and I took it that he would require notice. It is something that should be dealt with by the minister in a statement to the house.

Mr. O'Hurley: There are other contracts in this field, and negotiations are going on between my department and the United States. There are a number of contracts that have to be discussed and are being discussed. It is for this reason that I still believe I will take the question as notice.

Mr. McIlraith: That will be satisfactory.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—REPORTED CHANGE IN ROUTE OF PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Acting Minister of Transport, one of which I sent him notice. In view of the minister's absence possibly these questions will be taken as notice. Would the minister comment on an article appearing in the Financial Post of May 9, 1959 entitled, "Pine Point Plan Postponed. 80,000 Get Time to Think", which states that the government has decided in favour of the Waterways route for the proposed railroad to Great Slave lake, having reached this decision a year ago; and in particular would he say if it is correct that the government has concluded that the railroad should be built by the eastern or Waterways route?

My second question is, would the minister assure the house that all relevant facts will be considered before a decision is reached, and that this railroad will be built for the benefit of the people of Canada and not just as a convenience for the C.P.R.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would allow the minister to answer the first question.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Minister of Transport): I will take both questions as notice, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

STATEMENT ON SALE OF TRANSPORT PLANES TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Leader of the Opposition asked a question about a report which had appeared in the press relating to a proposed sale of transport planes by a Canadian company to two United States companies. Negotiations for the sale of such planes are in fact in progress, but to give full details at this stage might preclude the successful conclusion of these negotiations. If they reach a successful conclusion I will give full details to the house at a later date.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED LOSS OF TRAWL GEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries arising out of a telegram I have received from the Victoria co-operative fisheries of New Haven, Nova Scotia, in which they advise that ten fishing boats lost their trawl gear last night as the result of dragger operations. Can the minister assure the house that he will have his officials immediately investigate this report with a view to preventing a recurrence of this unfortunate, and I might say costly, incident?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Unfortunately as yet I have no report on the matter to which he refers, but I can assure him that my officials will give it their immediate attention, if they have not already done so. I might add that I would welcome any additional information which the hon. member might be able to give my department.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LOANS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that we will soon be discussing—perhaps today—amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, if he can say as Minister of Finance whether or not during the months of April and May, but particularly April, he made any loans to the unemployment insurance commission?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there were some loans made in pursuance of the provisions of the statute, but I will make inquiry to determine the precise amount.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it a fact that very substantial loans were made in the amount of many millions of dollars, and in that event can the Minister of Finance explain to the house and to the country why no disclosure of this was made in the budget speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is not the type of matter which is disclosed in the budget statement at any time. As to the amount, I shall make inquiries and determine the amount and give the house the information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was it less than $80 million?

OIL

ARCTIC EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT—PROTECTION OF PUBLIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, notice of which he had this morning. In view of recent press comments, particularly in the last issue of Maclean's magazine, in respect to the protection of the public from unscrupulous stock promoters in connection with the exploration and development of our Arctic oil and gas lands, can the minister give the house any assurance that the public interest is being protected?

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe any hon. members or any others in Canada who think the oil exploration in the northern Arctic islands will be the type of thing which will lend itself to speculation underestimates the judgment of the people of Canada. First of all I would like to make it clear that we have not issued any exploratory permits, as this article states, with regard to the Arctic islands and the continental shelf. What we are issuing at the present time are exploratory licences valid for one year which give the applicant the right only to carry out general geological reconnaissance. The exploratory permits, if and when issued to permittees, will give them the right to carry out all types of exploratory work, such as seismic, of geophysical and geochemical, which includes drilling, and also the right to obtain up to 50 per cent of the grid area as an oil and gas lease. It is in my opinion likely that speculation taken in anticipation of any rights which may be acquired upon obtaining exploratory permits will be minimized because section 10 of the territorial oil and gas regulations provides that the crown must be satisfied that the applicant is able to undertake exploratory work of value. The government intends that each applicant shall furnish the following information:

(a) Proof of financial ability to carry out the necessary exploratory work on the area applied for;

(b) The latest audited financial statement of the company or the individual;

(c) The exploration program the applicant intends to carry out during the first half of the term of the exploration permit.

Mr. Speaker, I might conclude by saying that the author of the Maclean's magazine article referred to is not only out of touch with our oil and gas regulations but is also out of touch with government policy. I can assure the house that the public interest is being safeguarded to the maximum within our powers.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Has the minister assurance from all those who have received licences that geological and other surveys will be carried out before the end of the one year period?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, under the licences they acquire all they require to give us is a plan of general reconnaissance during the first 18 months, and that they have done.

Mr. Hardie: Every licensee has done so?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED ADVERTISING AWARD TO MINISTER—FUTURE STAMP DESIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. I would ask him whether his attention has been drawn to a certain report in today's paper. I would ask him whether or not he is the man named in today's press as having been chosen for an award in advertising techniques and experience throughout Canada and if so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he has received an all-Canada award and whether that technique, experience and vision will be applied to future designs of stamps so there will not be in future—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question which I take it is perhaps a personal one rather than relating to the administrative duties of the minister, and the hon. member then proceeds to give advice about the design of postal stamps.

Mr. Winch: And if so—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: —will he deny a member of the opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: Could I have an answer?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member's question really calls for an answer.

Mr. Winch: On a question of privilege, I should like to make clear that I was trying to pay a compliment to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker: I think the house will have appreciated that the hon. member was trying to do that.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-45, to amend the Excise Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I find that in the bill there is no departure from the language used or from the announcements made at previous stages of the debate, on budget night and when the resolution was being discussed.

I simply wish to remind the house that we are being asked here to provide an all-time high rate of taxation on distilled spirits.

I believe that prior to the introduction of this bill the excise tax amounted to $1.31 on a 25-ounce bottle of distilled spirits. The increase will bring this figure to $1.42, with sales tax to be paid in addition. As in so many other cases connected with this budget, we find there has been a desire on the part of those who merchandise a product to do some profiteering beyond what the increase resulting from taxation would have justified. Even my own province of Ontario was not slow in this respect. The authorities immediately imposed an increase in price well beyond the amount which the Minister of Finance had announced would be the net tax cost increase per 25-ounce bottle of spirits.

We know that as a result of criticism the government of Ontario did decide to lower those prices. It may have had something to do with the subsequent decision to hold an election. I do not know. Perhaps it was the result of a comment by the Prime Minister, who said that merchandisers were improperly and unjustifiably raising prices to consumers beyond the additional amount of taxation. In any event, we have seen that the liquor control board in Ontario, and perhaps in other provinces too where there is a government monopoly, has since reduced the price to the consumer to a figure which more nearly takes account only of the extra amount of the tax.

I have heard the Minister of Finance speak in the past about taxation in fields of this kind, and he always used to warn his predecessors that there was a point of diminishing return. I hope the minister, who never wants to appear wrong in front of the public, may never have to do what his colleague the Minister of National Revenue suggested he might have to do, and play some personal part in trying to make up the deficiency in tax revenue if there are diminishing returns.

In any event, we have in connection with this product an all-time high rate of government taxation either in peacetime or wartime.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Looking at the proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act, Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that the Minister of Finance is against evil. We have often had ministers of finance who where against evil, and when they needed more revenue they simply levied taxes on the people of Canada who consume liquor or who have the habit of smoking.

I feel that a growing number of people in Canada are becoming increasingly irritated about this attitude which various ministers of finance have taken over the years. They feel that there is a limit beyond which their particular weakness or vice if you want to call it that should not be exploited. I am saying this merely for the sake of the readers of Hansard, that a bottle of ordinary liquor, rye for example, could be purchased for roughly $1.10 if it were not subject to taxation. Yet, after the various levels of government have taken their toll, the Canadian consumer finds he has to pay around $3.00 extra. A package of 20 Canadian cigarettes can be purchased, in those places where it is tax exempt, for 9 cents. Yet, in Ontario today people are asked to pay 35 cents a package.

I do not like this continued punishment of what some puritanically-minded people may consider to be a vice. I believe it is high time that the majority of the people of Canada began to voice their opinions about these continued impositions year after year upon practices which they regard as unharmful but which a minority regard as harmful. However, it seems that the days are few and far between when public representatives are willing to make their voices heard on behalf of those people who occasionally buy a bottle of whisky or a package of smokes. I feel that if there is a need for added taxation in Canada we should not take it out on these people simply because there are no members of parliament ready to take up the case on their behalf.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—R.S. c. 319 s. 12.

Mr. Pearson: I only wish to say one word in order to fortify the spirits of the minister as we deal with this important provision of the bill. The hon. gentleman knows through observation, though not of course from experience, that the law of diminishing return does apply to the consumption of this commodity, and I wonder whether he thinks the level of taxation has now been reached where the law of diminishing return is likely to apply also.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously I would not be recommending this modest increase to the committee if I thought it would give rise to the application of the law of diminishing return. We are not raising the amount of the tax just for fun; we are raising it because we think greater revenue will accrue. The increase is a modest one, $1 a gallon.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

[Mr. Regier.]

On clause 3—R.S. c. 319 s. 12

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I ask if this in effect is a 100 per cent increase in crown revenue in this category?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the cigars?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, Mr. Chairman, in that sense it is 100 per cent in the particular tax that is proposed here, but of course this is only one of the taxes on cigars and the net result is a very slight increase in the total tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister assure us that this is not a punitive tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can assure my hon. friend that it is not a punitive tax on him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I do not smoke.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, does the minister realize that this is going to make it much more difficult for us on this side of the house to keep the hon. member for Essex East supplied with cigars?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my heart bleeds when I think about my friend the hon. member for Essex East in this respect, but I console myself with the thought that as he lights those big cigars of which he is so fond and blows large billows of smoke all over the place, his satisfaction will be the greater for realizing that he is contributing to the excise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, we have had an argument non ad rem sed in persona. May I say to the Minister of Finance that this is in many respects a regrettable tax, not from my point of view as a cigar smoker but from the point of view of the tobacco growers of our country.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now, by leave.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Fleming moves third reading of the bill. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-46, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I made some remarks with respect to these three tax increases at the resolution stage on May 4, appearing at page 3306 of Hansard, and I believe some amplification of those remarks is justified.

The Minister of Finance and I had the privilege of serving together, I believe in 1950, on the joint parliamentary committee which looked at the question of ways and means of improving social security for the aged, and I think he will agree with me that that committee was a most useful one. It also was quite devoid of partisanship in the preparation of its report.

It is true that the committee did not lay down in a dogmatic way recommendations to the government as to how the improved social legislation should be financed. I am not going to read the committee's recommendations, but they are contained at page 703 of the committee report of June 28, 1950.

The committee agreed that it was desirable to have basically a pay as you go system for supporting old age security. It did not specifically instruct the government as to how this might be financed. It did point out the fact that certain important tax sources might on a percentage basis provide the necessary revenues. On the whole I believe the committee was recommending a compromise between what would be called contributory old age pension system, on the insurance pattern such as we examined in respect of other countries, and the matter of having the fund in balance at all times.

The committee at no time said the fund should be completely in balance. It recognized that in the past the federal treasury had been responsible for making contributions out of general revenues to certain social security measures existing up to that time and, as I said, did not dogmatically state that the fund should be completely in balance. In other words there was the thought that if there was an occasional deficit in connection with the fund it might be reconciled with the amount of revenue that had been utilized previously from general taxation in the past.

However, the following year the government did decide that it would apply to three of the important tax fields for contributions to the very widely expanded old age security plan that was introduced in 1951. It introduced what was known as the 2-2-2 formula. The minister is proposing in this legislation a 50 per cent increase in that form of tax receipt.

In 1952 the revenues that were received were not actually to be new taxes in the main. That is the difference between what the minister is proposing now and what the government of that day proposed when this legislation was introduced in 1951. It may be said that with a very slight exception instead of increasing existing taxes the new fund was provided with allocated revenues, but it did not involve extra taxes for that purpose affecting the actual individual taxpayer of the country. The existing tax rate was adjusted in such a way that there was assigned without increase in rates 2 per cent of the sales tax, 2 per cent of the corporation tax and 2 per cent of the personal income tax for the purposes of this fund.

To establish that this was essentially so and that this vastly improved benefit scheme was provided without extra specific taxes on the public as a whole I want to quote from the Canadian Tax Foundation which in its review entitled "National Finances, 1958-59" at page 84, confirms what I have said in these words:

> For old age security.
> —represented the earmarking of a part of existing taxes rather than the establishment of new imposts.

That, I point out, is the contrast between what was done then and what is proposed in this legislation. The additional burden of taxation at that time was negligible. The major source of financing therefore came to the fund from a transfer of taxes rather than from an increase in taxes that were already being imposed in the country. In subsequent years there were deficits, I admit, but in the year 1956-57 the fund was almost in balance.

I think the deficit that year was only $7,500,000, which hon. members will recognize is negligible in relation to the portion that it was always expected would come from general government revenues.

In the budget of March, 1957 there was proposed an increase of $6 per month in the basic pension. Of course later in 1957 there was an additional increase and that increase, together with the $6 increase, made it obvious that the deficit would be considerably increased. But the point I want to emphasize today is that between March, 1957 and the next assembly of this parliament the people of this country, in an election campaign, were told that it would be possible by miracle or otherwise to provide extra pensions out of this fund without any increase in taxation. We have heard even in this debate, and I am not going to document the quotations—and we heard the Prime Minister not only in 1957 but subsequently thereto, and he was just repeating what he said in 1953—say that it was possible to reduce taxes by $500 million—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: —and balance the budget and provide extra social welfare benefits.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He did not say that.

Mr. Benidickson: In the fall of 1957, although this parliament was sitting, we were not the ones to get the announcement. The Prime Minister went to the television audience and told it of his intentions with respect to the additional increase of $9 in the basic pension rate. In June, shortly after assuming office, the Minister of Finance told this country that it was his intention to have a new look at the finances of the country and as a result to have a budget in the session that was called in the fall of 1957. We know that did not develop. We know now why it did not develop. It was obvious to the administration that the miracles they talked about were not likely to prove possible of performance, and as a result we had no budget at the time that legislation was provided for the increase in benefits from this fund.

The position of the Liberal party was made very clear by the then leader of the official opposition, the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, who on October 16, 1957 at page 44 of Hansard said this:

As for the measures forecast to increase old age security and other social benefits, naturally every true Liberal will welcome them in principle. Our sole concern will be to see how they fit into the whole financial picture and how far the government will take effective measures to control the rise in the cost of living which, if unchecked, could easily take away all the advantages of the proposed increases.

Well, the increase, of course, did involve the solvency of the fund, as we now see it clearly, in a very substantial deficit. The Minister of Finance was one of those who, as I say, was a member of the original committee. He was well acquainted with the views of the committee, and there was not too much disagreement among the members of the committee despite their party allegiance. When this legislation came up these were his views with respect to this particular fund; I refer to what he had to say in 1951.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the page?

Mr. Benidickson: It was in 1951, on the old age security debate.

Mr. Pearson: Pages 609 and 610.

Mr. Benidickson: It was in October, and this is what the minister had to say at that time:

In the second place, I think that the house will desire to preserve—as the committee recommended in paragraph 64 which I have just read—the consciousness on the part of the individual of the association between the contribution he is making to the cost and the benefit he is to receive. It is on that basis that rest our ideas, our beliefs in the house, that we are departing as far as we can from the idea of any handout, any payment as of grace, and are seeking to supplant that type of payment with a payment which will be received by the pensioner as of right.

I think the house will be glad to see that the minister—

That is the present hon. member for Essex East. I continue:

—in his proposals, has recommended that the entire cost . . . is to come out of the special old age security fund.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the minister referred to was the minister of finance at that time. It was he who brought in the financial proposals for providing the revenues for the fund.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Abbott spoke, of course, right after the minister of national revenue—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I spoke right after him.

Mr. Benidickson: —who introduced the proposals, the financial portion of which was referred to by the minister of finance. I continue:

We are subscribing as a house, I take it, to the principle of a pay as you go measure, a pay as you go universal scheme.

Well, if those were the minister's views so strongly and clearly expressed, as he always did express his opinions in those days, I ask what happened to him in December of 1957, when he had full information as Minister of Finance, and had all the calculations, all the forecasts that would be available and decided that it was not desirable or appropriate at that time to tell the public what the cost would be. I am not saying that at that time, if there were some storm warnings, it would have been desirable to do what the minister is doing now, namely have a real over-all increase in the actual rates paid by the individual taxpayers. But if the minister was consistent and still held the views that he so strongly expressed in 1951, I say it was his duty to inform the house of the likely effect upon the fund and to do what was done in 1952, namely allocate from existing taxes the additional amount that would be required to keep this fund in balance.

That, I think, is the important thing that was not done. We know why it was not done. It was not done because there was no desire to let the public know that this could not be done as a result of surpluses available, which they talked about, $500 million, and other things which we heard so much about not only in the 1957 election campaign but later.

The ministry had very much in their minds the fact that they probably would soon be in another election campaign, and in consequence the bill is coming up only now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. member a question. Can he tell me why Mr. Harris, when faced with the same question in the spring of 1957, did not propose to deal with the measures required to meet the cost of the additional $6 per month which he was then proposing?

Mr. Benidickson: I am familiar with that because I remember the discussions that took place. First of all, we were in boom times and revenues were flourishing. I gave the minister the figure for the best result in any of the previous five years—a small deficit in the fund only $7.5 million. For the year ended March 1957, which had just concluded, the fund was almost in balance, and I do not think an increase of an additional 1 per cent in each particular tax category would have been practicable. Had an increase been made at that time from 2 per cent to 3 per cent in each category the fund actually would have been put into a surplus position based on the expectations of revenue at that time, and that was never the intention of the fund.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit another question. How then did the Liberal government propose to meet the additional cost of the $6 increase, which amounted to over $60 million for a full year?

Mr. Benidickson: Having come to the point where the deficit in the fund was only $7 million, and the requirements out of general tax revenues for the old age security program were so much less than had existed even before this legislation, it did not seem unreasonable that by the end of 1958 the anticipated revenues would have kept to normal levels the proportion of contributions from general revenues.

Another matter that I think is very interesting in this connection is the question of the reduction in the actual purchasing power of the pension since it was introduced on January 1, 1952. I have looked at the cost of living figures and at January 1, 1952, the figure was 118.2. In June, 1957 after a period of five and one half years, it had reached 121.6. I calculate that to mean a reduction in the purchasing power of the pension of $1.12 per month. I give this figure after a period of five and one half years, and I now give the figure covering something less than two years of the new administration. During that time the cost of living index went up to the extent that the equivalent real value of the old age pension has declined by $1.70. That was part of the thinking in March, 1957. So I emphasize that the real net value of the $9 increase, after taking into account the rise in the cost of living in this period of less than two years, works out to about 17 per cent—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Benidickson: May I conclude first—but for this 17 per cent increase the purchasing power of the cheque of the old age pensioner there is proposed in this legislation an increase of 50 per cent in the actual taxes that are to be levied for it. This is not a matter of merely making a transfer from the general tax rate to the fund without an over-all increase with respect to the individual taxpayer, as was done in 1952, but it is a completely new and additional 50 per cent rise in the amount of taxes that it is recommended be provided for this fund.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could I ask the hon. gentleman on what amount of pension he has worked out the $1.12 and on what amount of pension he worked out the $1.70?

Mr. Benidickson: I refer to the $9 increase, and if my hon. friend will apply that to the $46 rate he will find it is roughly 20 per cent. My point is that in less than two years the actual purchasing power through inflation has been reduced by the percentage I gave—and down to 17 per cent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): From the $55?

Mr. Benidickson: It is $9 on the $46.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But the $1.70 comes off the $55, not off the $9.

Mr. Benidickson: The $1.70 certainly is related to the $9 because it is the $9 that was so blatantly advertised as the increase. The result is that, having regard to the reduced purchasing power, the amount of the pension went up net only 17 per cent, and we are now being asked to provide 50 per cent more in contributions to the fund by the taxpayers.

I think that sets out in essence, Mr. Speaker, the difference between what this government is asking and what was done in 1952. In 1952 practically no additional taxation was imposed on the Canadian people as a result of this very big step, as was thought at the time, in improving and enlarging our social security program for the aged. It was done by transfer. This time it is being done wholly by an increase of 50 per cent in the actual new rates that will be paid by those who benefit.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone can quarrel too much with the minister for levying new taxation if such new taxation is necessary for the welfare of the people of Canada. However, in this particular case, as was mentioned on another occasion, the old age pensioners of Canada seem to be getting the blame for the new taxes that are to be levied at the present time. They are being advised that the old age security fund is losing money and that the books have to be brought into balance, even though I do not believe it was ever the intention of parliament that the books of the old age security fund should be brought into balance. It was always recognized that there would be many people in receipt of old age pensions who, for various reasons, had not paid very much into the fund in their lifetimes, and therefore it would only be reasonable to expect that for a goodly number of years at least lump sum payments would have to be made from the consolidated revenue fund to the old age security fund in order to balance the books.

I have in mind one particular category of those who receive $55 a month. Under the amendments introduced approximately a year ago any person 70 years of age or over who has been in Canada for as little as ten years is entitled to receive $55 a month. It is obvious that a person who has only lived here for ten years will not have paid nearly as much into the fund as the average Canadian who has paid into the fund over a working lifetime of 30 or 35 years.

So the plea that this additional taxation is necessary in order to balance the books is not valid. Rather, we contend that it is a new plea which has been introduced in order to justify a new imposition and, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has pointed out, it is a heavy increase in taxation. It amounts to an increase of 50 per cent, and if such an increase were applied in other places there certainly would be very serious repercussions. I can well imagine what would happen if the minister were to raise income taxes by 50 per cent or if he were to raise corporation taxes by 50 per cent. However, when it comes to putting the responsibility on the old age pensioners of Canada, we find that we have a government in office which is willing to blame them for a tax rise as great as 50 per cent.

We are just wondering on this Monday, Mr. Speaker, whether these tax increases are at all necessary. After all, we have been reading our week-end newspapers and listening to the radio, and we know that a certain prime minister made a speech in Montreal over the week end in which he forecast a fantastic improvement in the Canadian economic situation over the balance of this year, at least. He did not have too much to say about the year after.

However, if improvement on the economic scene is going to take place, as was predicted by the Prime Minister, then one would imagine that the old rates would have supplied the Minister of Finance with sufficient revenue so the additional tax imposts would have been looked upon as unnecessary. I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance has also read the Prime Minister's speech delivered last week end in Montreal. I was expecting him, at this sitting of parliament, to say that in the light of the prediction by the Prime Minister over the week end the government was now asking the consent of the house to withdraw the bill now before us. The whole attitude surrounding the new bill is certainly a far cry from the new kind of deal the pensioners of Canada were led to believe they would get. They were informed clearly that the $9 per month added pension was only the beginning.

We now have the Clark report filed, and so far as we can gather from the replies to questions on the orders of the day the Clark report has been truly filed. In fact the house may never even get a chance to consider the Clark report. The new deal seems to be to put the blame for the 50 per cent increase on certain already onerously taxed people of Canada. In the case of the sales tax there is an increase of 10 per cent. We find this position very difficult to reconcile. On the one hand we have the Prime Minister saying the economy is going to move forward at such a rapid pace that we would expect the minister to be in receipt of a great deal of added revenue, and on the other hand the minister says he regrets that because of the deficit in the pension fund, he must levy this unusually heavy, 50 per cent increase in taxation.

If the minister's argument that this is necessary in order to bring the fund into balance is true, then Mr. Speaker, the minister is also introducing a new principle. This will confirm the fact that henceforth old age pensions are a matter of right. This also confirms the claim that has long been made by many old age pensioners, that they are entitled to this money inasmuch as they are the ones who have paid for it. If that is the case, then the minister is very remiss in that he does not allow these pensioners to decide when and where in the world they are going to spend their money. If the minister is going to put this fund in balance, if the minister is claiming that it shall be self-liquidating, then the people who are in receipt of their own savings ought to be at liberty to determine where they are going to spend the money. They should have the right to spend it anywhere in the world.

I regret very much this increase in taxation, and especially do I regret the blame being put where it is. We feel that if the economy had not been in a period of recession this added impost would not have been found necessary. We find that once again the minister, by his acts, is admitting that conditions in the country are not as they were claimed to be last week end by the Prime Minister. We would suppose that rather than adopt these added imposts, the government should seriously consider how they could increase revenues by expanding the economy of the country as a whole.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The bill before us is a bill to meet the bills. In so far as the attitude of the official opposition toward the principle involved in the bill is concerned, that has been clearly stated by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I desire to add only a word or two to what he has said. In so far as the principle of the legislation is concerned, and the benefits involved in old age pensions, as my hon. friend has said our former leader, Mr. St. Laurent, explained our position on October 16, 1957. Our position now is as it was then. He said then that every true Liberal will welcome in principle this increase in old age security and other social benefits, but our concern, as he said then and it is our concern now, is to see how they fit into our financial picture.

We know now how they fit into that picture because, as has been pointed out, the increase in benefits which necessitated this bill, the real increase having regard to the increased cost of living, is 17 per cent and the taxation increase is 50 per cent. Economic considerations have now made it necessary, therefore, for the government to take the kind of action which party political considerations prevented them from taking only a year ago, when it should have been taken. As a result the sales tax is now at the highest level in our history.

This must be of interest to the minister, in view of what he said in the past about sales tax, and I refer to the debate in 1951 from which my hon. friend has already quoted. The present Minister of Finance stated, as reported on page 610 of Hansard for November 1, 1951:

> We must recognize as well that it is a costly tax to the consumer because it pyramids as the result of mark-ups as the goods pass from hand to hand, from the manufacturer or producer, who pays the tax in the first instance, to the wholesaler, from the wholesaler to the retailer, from the retailer to the consumer, and that a 2 per cent sales tax—

That is what we were talking about then.

> —in this way levied on the manufacturer or producer will probably cost the consumer not 2 per cent but closer to 4 per cent on the cost of the goods that he has to buy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are proposing to increase this tax from 2 per cent to 3 per cent. The position of our party on this matter is clear. We think the government is to be condemned for its refusal to apply the pay as you go principle in the fall of 1957, when it increased the pension without increasing the contributions and at a time—this is in contrast to the situation which prevailed in the spring—when a deficit was as certain as anything could be. The increase could have been made and should have been made at that time, having regard to the economic picture, by transferring receipts from existing taxes to the fund. This was the best method at the time of keeping it in reasonable balance.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, party considerations took precedence over economic considerations. So far as we are concerned we do not want to share the blame now, because we would have approached the whole problem in a different way then. The government took full responsibility before the election for the political decisions which have led to the present financial difficulties. It must now, therefore, accept full financial responsibility for the measures that have to be taken to get the country out of these difficulties, and this bill is the reflection of one difficulty. I think we can leave it at that.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Tax payable by individuals.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say I disagree with the clause where in (b) we put a limit or a ceiling on the amount of money which can be collected of $90. This means that anyone earning more than $3,000 will still continue to pay only a maximum of $90. I think the limit of $90 is not fair and reasonable. There are many people in this country who are making a large enough sum of money now to be in a much better position to pay more than $90. To make it fair and equitable I think the $90 should be removed. Obviously there will be more tax available, and this would be a much more reasonable method of increasing the amount of revenue for the fund than would the imposition of a higher tax which affects mainly those in a lower wage category. I would suggest to the minister that some consideration should be given to the removal of this ceiling of $90.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-44, to amend the Customs Tariff and the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, again I find nothing in the bill, beyond the amendments which were given announcement at the resolution stage to the schedule, that is contrary to what we have had in our hands since the budget debate. While I am on my feet, however, before we leave the particular stage of the debate perhaps the minister would indicate whether or not those several amendments which were announced on May 4 or 5 have been the subject of any complaints since we last discussed them? It is rather short notice and the minister knows that the first reading of the bill was only Friday, and therefore any report on this bill missed the financial and trade papers of last week. Has he received any communications since the debate on Monday and Tuesday of last week which indicate any objections to the amendments which he proposed a week ago? I ask that question and I will continue very briefly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will facilitate matters if I answer now?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to reply now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated to my hon. friend earlier this afternoon, I will have an amendment when we come into committee of the whole on items 438b, 438c, 438d and 438e pertaining to automotive parts arising out of the reference to tariff item 411a.

[Mr. Peters.]

That is the only matter upon which any representations have been received, to my knowledge. The changes which were made in the committee stage on the resolution, Mr. Speaker, were very slight, as you remember. I explained the reason for them at that time and indicated the steps we had taken in advance of their introduction in the committee to ascertain information on them on the part of those who were interested.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the house, because, as I say, I find that except for the amendments of last week the bill appears in the form of which notice was given, and the public would have every expectation of the things in the bill as a result of the minister's budget address of April 9. But I did feel the other evening that I had overlooked a comment which I would very much have liked to have made when we were discussing the Customs Tariff, and I refer to the fact that we have recently lost, I guess, our very distinguished former chairman of the board. I would like to pay my compliments to him. He is a man who has served under five prime ministers, and I think even the present minister asked him to continue a little beyond the time when he might have otherwise wanted to have had some leisure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Twice.

Mr. Benidickson: Twice. We have in Canada some very sterling servants of the public, and I do not think any of them have more general admiration than is held for him by people not only in Canada but in places abroad.

I have found tariff a most intricate and difficult subject to study. I think it is even more difficult than certain presentations to the courts. Usually in courts we have only two conflicting opinions; but anyone who peruses the very exceptionally exhaustive reports of the tariff board in recent years will understand that in an economy such as ours the board is not considering the conflicting desires and economic interests of merely two litigants appealing to the board, but in many cases perhaps half a dozen or more in more or less conflict. In other words, the judicial and sensible decisions which have to be resolved are extremely onerous indeed. I think that both governments have followed the recommendations of this board fairly closely. Certainly the minister did last year, and I realize that he went a long way this time to accept the recommendations of the tariff board in that very intricate study of fruits and vegetables. This was not quite so simple as in other reports. Sometimes the Minister of Finance if he chooses can actually take the suggested amendments to the tariff schedules as recommended by the board without much personal contribution to policy. But in this case the minister and his officials in the department had treaty obligations to a number of countries, and they had to relate the recommendations of the board with those involved treaty obligations. I should also like to pay my respects to other members of the tariff board some of whom are retiring at this time. Perhaps during the committee stage we shall be able to refer to others, in front of the minister, right now. I think of Mr. Glass who has been made a member of the board—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And vice chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: And vice chairman. I had reason over the years to consult him quite frequently in seeking his counsel and advice on these matters which are so detailed and complicated. I did not consult him or anybody else in the minister's department this year, because I thought the changes taking place were uprooting and I was not quite sure what the result will be. I know the minister will be equally well served in the department in having Dr. Annis as Mr. Glass' successor. We have exceptionally devoted civil servants engaged in a most exacting task, and quite irrespective of party politics I think the minister will agree that they are most deserving of recognition by this house and by the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I quite agree.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister will have noticed that the committee on estimates has concluded a very interesting course of meetings with the officials of the Department of National Revenue. It was hard to draw the line, sometimes, between those who administer our customs laws and the Minister of Finance who actually has to recommend the customs rates which shall prevail. However, I did note that in paragraph 1 of the committee's report there was a suggestion that it be made mandatory that all goods from outside Canada should be labelled. Perhaps the minister could make some comment on that when he replies, if he has an opportunity.

I take it that we shall in committee be able to be our own judges on the matter of procedure, and while there is no desire to be repetitive and to go over individual items, there are items in the schedule which, after a few days' lapse, do require, perhaps, some further clarification. I am sure the minister will make that possible at the committee stage. I do not wish to alarm the minister, and I hasten to say that there are not many items which this group is proposing to follow up, having regard to less formal discussion we had in committee last week. But I should like to direct a few questions to the minister about the new category of machines which are deemed to be made in Canada. Am I right in thinking that this could properly be done on the committee stage, on the schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Although the items which have been subject to increases in this budget are, for the most part, or in large part, not items with which many people in the public are familiar, I think it has been understood that the over-all emphasis was on increasing protection again. Certainly, with respect to machines, we are simply returning to precedents that were followed when we last had a Conservative government, and once again we have something which is in the nature of a legalistic and arbitrary determination of what is made in Canada, without the usual adjudication by officials of the department and the courts. It is true that if any taxpayer is aggrieved he has the right to appeal to the tariff board and, in succession, to the exchequer court and to the Supreme Court of Canada. I think this is another matter which we can discuss further on the committee stage.

The section having to do with woollen goods, as we predicted last year, is likely to have repercussions among some of our better customers—people to whom we export goods in excess of the imports which are to be subject to the new duties. Again, I think this is a matter which can appropriately be discussed in committee.

In conclusion, I might mention, as I did the other day, that the minister and his officials have helped the house considerably by the actual new grouping of the schedules and by the explanatory remarks which were made on April 9 which led the average member of parliament to a better understanding of the appropriate occasion on which to debate these items, which is usually on the schedules. I will leave it to the minister to decide later whether or not we should call each item individually or whether we shall deal with them in a broad group.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If no one else wishes to speak, I want to say about three sentences in order to express once again the very strong objection which I feel to this regrettable increase in the wool tariff. This objection is shared, I believe by everyone engaged in the fishing industry. I think it is also probably shared by primary producers in the wheat growing areas of this country.

The minister referred to it as a modest increase. That is his favourite word, and one which he uses in connection with almost every impost. He says they are modest increases, implying that they are of no use as protection measures. But it is quite obvious that the government would not have made these changes at all if they had not been expected to keep out goods. Certainly, the minister has never argued that this particular change is a revenue-producing one, and it seems to me this is a retrograde step for a trading country such as Canada to take when we depend so much on maintaining our exports to countries abroad.

The minister may be right in saying that its effect on the cost of living may be very small, but practically everything which this government has done since taking office two years ago has tended to increase the cost of living as well as the cost of production of primary producers. This is another stage in that direction and it seems to me to be regrettable on that account, also.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Before we deal directly with this clause I should like to have something in the nature of a positive answer from the minister as to the circulation to business people across Canada of the amendments which were proposed last week. The minister will agree that they were presented to us and carried on May 5 last. There has not been time for some of these things to appear in trade and financial journals. I do not think most businessmen subscribe to Hansard. If they are interested in the customs field they probably subscribe to the bulletins with which my hon. friend will be familiar that go out from the Department of National Revenue. I am wondering if there would have been time for the amendments decided upon last Tuesday to have gone out to the subscribers for these bulletins from people who are interested in customs schedules.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, these amendments were before the committee of ways and means six days ago. It is obvious that those who are interested in the tariff proposals arising out of the budget have followed them. With respect to the amendments which were introduced at the committee stage we have received no criticism but we have received a number of commendations.

Mr. Benidickson: Have the actual bulletins gone out? I know that I myself subscribe to them. I received, for instance, the budget resolutions in the form in which they are given to subscribers to the day to day customs bulletins but there was not time to have the information appear in the Thursday financial papers in Toronto and Montreal which usually comment on some of these tariff changes. Is my hon. friend confident that there is nothing in these that would cause much complaint if they were to be dealt with in haste?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not regard six days as haste in the light of experience in some other years. In that light this is quite a long time to have elapsed between the resolution stage and the stage of second reading of the bill with respect to tariff changes where the bill simply follows the language of the resolution precisely.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity we have had to ask the minister a question or two on this subject. I notice that this is not a significant item with respect to a change in the receipts of the Minister of Finance; however, he does expect to collect $3 million more in customs tariff as the result of these amendments he is now proposing.

As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned earlier, it is obvious that ever since this government took office every time it has introduced amendments to the Customs Tariff the net effect has been the raising of the tariff against products from other countries entering Canada. I should like the minister to give the committee an indication of what steps he has taken since he became Minister of Finance toward obtaining a reversal of this tendency.

The minister has made numerous references to commonwealth meetings on economic matters. I believe a meeting was held in Montreal a year ago. Has the minister or the government ever made any proposals to other commonwealth countries, NATO countries or other countries adhering to GATT that would tend to liberalize world trade and especially that would liberalize trade as between members of the commonwealth, members within NATO or the member nations of GATT? If so, what has been the reaction of these countries to such a proposal? If a proposal of this nature has been made why has it not been carried out? Why has the minister followed this process of asking parliament to amend the act each year the net result of which is to curtail the free flow of trade between nations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the increase in revenue from the customs tariff is expected from the customs duty on liquor and that alone. As I indicated in the budget speech, we do not expect any appreciable difference in receipts of revenues from customs duties in respect of the other changes.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is completely wrong in talking about the trend and the result of this year's tariff proposals. I will give it for the third time. I gave it in my budget speech, full details of which appear at page 2422 of Hansard of April 9 in the second column. I repeated this in the discussion in the committee of ways and means on May 5 but I shall be quite happy to give it again. I said that with respect to the changes proposed in the tariffs this year that 142 tariff items and sub-items are affected by the resolutions. In the case of 32 items the rates of duty are being increased. In the case of 40 items rates are being reduced. In the case of 9 items, all involving fruits and vegetables, rates are being both increased and decreased depending on the season. I concluded by saying that there are 61 items for which rates of duty are left unchanged and for which the changes proposed are, for the most part, purely formal.

So far as GATT is concerned, there will be a GATT meeting shortly and negotiations will proceed there. There will be GATT negotiations again in the autumn and also in 1960. These occur from time to time. Within the course of these negotiations, whenever we ask for an increase in a bound rate we are asked to give compensation in some other form, sometimes in the form of decreases. This process of negotiation with consequent increases and decreases has become almost a continuous process due to the frequency of the meetings of GATT.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, the minister says I am completely wrong. He claims he has increased the customs tariff on 32 items and decreased it on 40 items and that we are therefore, ipso facto, bound to assume he has lowered the rates when he has in fact done nothing of the kind. It all depends on which items are raised or lowered. May I refer the minister to his own remarks in the budget address on April 9 last at page 2414 of Hansard. In table 3 on that page he indicates that his receipts from customs tariffs in the year 1958-59 are forecast as being $486 million. In the following fiscal year ending March 31, 1960—and this was before the currently proposed tax changes—he anticipates revenue from this source in the amount of $525 million. Therefore in one year the minister expects a rise in income under the customs tariff of $39 million.

I am aware of the fact that his anticipated increase because of the bill now before us is not very large. He records that on page 2425 of Hansard, and he indicates that he expects that in a full year his income in regard to these changes will grow by only $3 million. However, we had this a year ago, Mr. Chairman, when the house was informed that there really is not much of a change here. Many items are being reduced and the tariff on a lesser number of items is being raised. However, it all depends on the volume of imports of those items as to whether or not the cost of living of the Canadian people is really being raised. I cannot let the minister get away with saying that I am completely wrong. His income under the customs tariff has been rising since he became minister and since these amendments have been introduced. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was perfectly right when he said that the over-all effect of customs tariff changes since this government has taken office has been a rise in the amount of tariff that the Canadian people have to pay.

I was pleased to note that the minister said there would be many more meetings of GATT. However, the minister gave us no indication that his government is planning any proposals to the member nations under GATT that would lead to a lowering of tariffs. The minister indicated that each time they meet there is a demand made for the raising of some tariffs but no proposal on the part of his government to reduce them. The minister also completely ignored my request for a report of the meeting of the commonwealth economic conference which was held last fall, the object of which was supposed to be to enhance trade within the commonwealth. Presumably one of the methods that would be employed to enhance the exchange of commodities between commonwealth countries would be by rather severe amendments to the existing customs tariffs acts of the various commonwealth members. I hope that at this time the minister will indicate some of the results in this regard that have emanated from the Montreal economic conference, which was an important conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thought that hon. members were aware not that receipts from customs revenue have increased steadily since the government came into office but that they dropped in the year 1958-59 as compared with the fiscal year 1957-58, and the reason is that imports were down. Similarly, when in the budget I estimated that we would have an increase in 1959-60 over 1958-59 in the receipts from the customs duties, I assumed that imports into Canada would be greater in 1959-60 than they were in 1958-59. I thought that was quite clear.

Now, as to the course of negotiations, all hon. members are aware of the report that came from the commonwealth trade and economic conference held at Montreal last autumn.

The GATT conference of 1960 has been called to discuss proposals, including one from the United States, for tariff reductions. In those negotiations the desires of various countries which are members of GATT, whether to increase or reduce their tariffs, are to be discussed. This is a general sort of discussion, and it would hardly be appropriate on my part, if we had any reductions in mind which we might be intending to use in the course of negotiations on a quid pro quo basis, to be disclosing them publicly at this point.

Mr. Benidickson: On this clause I continue to think that while this is rather an innocent looking change, this matter of the utilization of the interchange of the words machinery and machines is questionable. I do not think we have had an adequate explanation about it from the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member whether he is on clause 2?

Mr. Benidickson: I am on clause one, subclause 3.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member is on clause 2.

Mr. Benidickson: I am thinking of the customs tariff schedule, which reads:

Resolved,—
(a) That it is expedient to amend—

And so on. Are you dealing with (a)? I am still using my working notes.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is on clause 2. Shall clause one carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—"Machinery" construed as "machines".

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps this is the clause the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Benidickson: I must say, I was using my basic notes on the resolutions of the budget as dealt with in Hansard. This change looks innocent enough, but I do not think the minister has fully explained to the committee the reason for the change. The change says:

The word "machinery" wherever it appears in this act shall be read and construed as "machines".

If we want something interchangeable and not something arbitrary this would seem to be a radical departure from past practice. What would the minister's view be about a substitution for that language say something like this: "The word 'machinery' wherever it appears in this act shall be interpreted as including 'machines' "?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would not be acceptable because it has the effect of reversing the situation, Mr. Chairman. With respect, I did my best to make this as clear as I could when I dealt with it and answered questions on it in the committee of ways and means on May 5. I can only invite my hon. friend to consider the explanation I gave at page 3331 and elsewhere of Hansard in that respect. It it a matter of definition, and the need for a proper definition, I think, was made clear in the illustrations that I gave of what might happen if the change is not made.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in connection with clause 4, I presume you will be calling the schedule separately, because I have an amendment. I may say that the change that I wish to make will affect the reference in line 23 to clause (d) of section 4 of the bill. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move the following amendment, that Bill No. C-44 be amended as follows:

(1) By deleting the numbers "438d, 438e" where they appear in clause 4 on line 23 of page 2;
(2) By striking out the reference to tariff item "411a" where it appears on page 16 in tariff item 438b in part IV of the schedule;
(3) By striking out the reference to tariff item "411a" where it appears on pages 17 and 18 in tariff item 438c in part 4 of the schedule;
(4) By deleting from part IV of the schedule tariff items 438d and 438e on pages 18, 19 and 20.

Mr. Nowlan: I so move.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the committee would like an explanation of this item, Mr. Chairman. This is a matter that was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni since it was before the committee of ways and means and reported back to the house on Tuesday last, May 5. He brought forward representations also received from the British Columbia loggers association in this respect.

The effect of the amendment which is now proposed is to withdraw a proposed change which had been introduced in the budget at the request of the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce. The objective was to simplify the administrative procedure in importing certain parts of logging trucks. It was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, however, that the change might have some adverse and, I may say, completely unintended effects upon the Canadian logging industry. Tariff item 411a covers certain equipment used in logging operations. This item carries a most-favoured-nation rate of 12½ per cent and imports under it are exempt from sales tax. The purpose in proposing that tariff item 411a be enumerated in the automobile parts items was to provide entry for such parts as were ruled not to be made in Canada either free of duty or at a most-favoured-nation rate of 7½ per cent.

It now appears, however, that while the original amendment would have had this effect it would also raise questions as to the continued exemption of such parts from the sales tax, and it was certainly not our intention to deprive these parts of the exemption they now enjoy in respect of sales tax. Therefore the amendment now proposed will have the effect of restoring the position which existed prior to the budget both as to the rates of duty and the application of sales tax, and further consideration will be given during the course of the next year to this whole situation.

I may say that since the hon. member for Comox-Alberni brought this matter to my attention we have communicated with the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce and they are not offering any objections to the amendment now proposed. I should like to express my very warm thanks to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for bringing this matter to my attention as he has done. It was, I think, a very useful service that he rendered to me as well as a very useful service to the British Columbia logging industry.

Mr. McQuillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word of thanks to the minister for the prompt action he took when I brought this problem to him. He did not have much time. It was only a matter of hours. I appreciate and I am certain that the industry in British Columbia appreciates the action he took so promptly.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4 as amended agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On the schedule. Part I.

The Deputy Chairman: On the schedule, shall part I carry?

Mr. Benidickson: On the matter of the schedule I wonder what your views are. Will we serve ourselves well and be more expeditious if you call the individual items?

The Deputy Chairman: If it is the pleasure of the committee I will be very happy to call the individual items.

Items 85, 87, 89, 90, 92, 93, 95, 99d, 106, 107, 187d and 505c agreed to.

Part I agreed to.

On part II.

Items 84, 85a, 85b, 87, 89, 90, 92 and 95b agreed to.

Customs tariff—95c. Passion fruit (passiflora edulis): British preferential tariff, free; most favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell us how much passion fruit is imported into this country?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry to disappoint the hon. gentleman but it is not separately classified in the revenues.

Item agreed to.

Items 105i, 106 and 107 agreed to.

Part II agreed to.

Item 160 agreed to.

Customs tariff—162. Vermouth, aperitif and cordial wines, containing more than 32 per cent of proof spirit and not more than 40 per cent of proof spirit: British preferential tariff, 50 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 50 per cent; general tariff, 80 per cent; and in addition thereto, under all tariffs 42½ cents per gallon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here I am really inquiring more seriously for information than I was in the last case. There are two or three questions I should like to ask the minister. Will he tell us how much in quantity or in monetary terms, whichever is more convenient and I do not insist on both, vermouth, aperitif and cordial wines were imported from France and how much from Italy in the last year for which we have complete records? I should also like to ask the minister if there has been any reduction in prices by any of the vendors anywhere as a result of these concessions, or what I understand are supposed to be concessions, and which will be, of course, of no use to the countries to which they are made unless the retail price is decreased.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In reply to the first question I may say that again the figures are not segregated as to these particular wines. In the second place, I am not informed as to any changes that have been made in prices since April 9.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister could then tell us what kind of arguments were used to convince the Italian negotiators that there would in fact be some value in this concession. It is perfectly apparent that the purpose of the increases in the woollen items, which we will come to in a moment, is to increase the price here, and presumably therefore, since this was supposed to be a matter of negotiation, in order to give some advantage to the other country in exchange for the woollen increases the government had some kind of argument to offer as to what advantage would go to the Italians.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item is of principal interest to Italian exporters and they have not required any instruction on the part of Canada as to what the value of a reduction in the tariff on these items may mean to them. There have been negotiations and in the course of those negotiations they have put whatever value they think is proper on this particular concession.

Mr. Pickersgill: Were these things asked for by the Italians or were they offered by us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is very difficult to separate any particular time in the course of negotiations and say when something was initiated. The negotiations with the Italian government representatives in regard to these changes in the tariffs so far as they were of interest to Italy have been going on for some time. This particular change has taken place in the course of the negotiations. It was regarded by the representatives of the Italian government as something of interest to them and, as the committee is aware, the tariff proposal will have the effect of reducing the British preferential and most-favoured-nation duties by 30 per cent, that is, from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. I do not need to tell hon. members that most of the types of wines imported under this item are not produced in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is pretty obvious that none of them is except I believe there is a kind of vermouth produced in the Niagara peninsula. I do not know whether that is the kind the minister uses. But the minister must realize that as far as I am aware—it may be that I am wrongly informed but I believe it is true—in every province I know anything about there is a monopoly in the sale of these products by an agency of the provincial government, and even if the duty were reduced to nothing the advantage would be nil to the exporting country unless there was some assurance that the reduction in duty was not simply going to be put into the provincial treasury but was going to be passed on to the consumer. With the exception of our marble imports from Italy which I cannot imagine are very extensive, although I intend to ask about them later, it would appear that the only concessions that were offered to the Italians for the injury we were proposing to do to their exports of woollens involved the commodities in items 162 and 163, items which to the best of my knowledge are controlled by monopolies in every province. There may be one province in which that is not true. I am very surprised that the minister is not informed as to how it was that the Italians were satisfied, which I doubt, with concessions of this character. I would urge the minister to be a little more frank with us and tell us what arguments were used in this context.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Italians are quite capable of defending their own interests in any negotiations. I do not think it is the duty of any Canadian to suggest that they should ask more in the way of concessions than they thought, in the course of these negotiations, they should ask.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not suggesting that they should ask more, but I happen to represent a constituency which has a very valuable market in Italy for one of the two products produced in that constituency, namely salt codfish. This market, in my opinion, is likely to be jeopardized by these changes in part III. Although the minister has never shown much interest in that section of the country or in that community, it does seem to those of us who represent this area that we should have the right to have our questions answered.

We have an interest in seeing that a good customer, Italy—in fact, we have not in recent years been able to satisfy the demand of the Italians for this product—should not be lost by tariff action taken by this government. I have no apology whatever, for this reason, for pressing for assurance about this matter. Moreover, as the minister well knows, the establishment of a common market has brought Italy and France, into a very close relationship. France has become a very serious competitor of Canada in the world market for salt codfish. There is every reason to be apprehensive about this Italian market.

It does not seem to me that it is incumbent upon the government in making tariff changes to see that they do not injure a community like the fishing community which has to sell its products in an export market or not at all and which, from a consumer's point of view, is a captive market for other industries in Canada which do benefit from the protective tariffs. I do not think it is unreasonable at all to expect the Minister of Finance, when asking us to change the tariff structure of this country to the apparent detriment of one industry and one section of the country, to give us assurances that he satisfied this valuable customer of ours that these changes were not going to injure his capacity to buy these primary products of Canada such as fish and wheat.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were over all this in the committee of ways and means. I dealt with this subject and gave the hon. member a full explanation. He is just asking me to repeat it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not asking the minister to repeat. The minister keeps saying that we have been over all these things, but he gives no explanation and no answer. He does not deal with any of the questions that we ask. The minister seems to forget that it is not so many years since he sat over here and I predict it will not be so many years before he will be back here, especially if he treats parliament in the way in which he has been treating it lately.

When we are raising the tariff structure of this country we are entitled to know why these things are being done, and to know that some Canadian interests and industries are not being injured by these changes. In my opinion this change is a most retrograde step and is very detrimental to this country in every respect. It is most unfortunate it was made at all. It does seem to me we are entitled, at least, to be told some serious effort was made to get some assurances that Canadian producers who do have to stand all the cold hard winds of international trade are not to be injured any more than can possibly be avoided. If the government intends, as I know they do, to persist in this unfortunate course they have undertaken, then we are entitled to this information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member likes to keep himself busy, Mr. Chairman, trying to raise storms and dust. We were over this whole subject and I shall direct the hon. gentleman's attention again to what was said just six days ago in this house as recorded on pages 3358 and 3359 of Hansard. We were over this same matter, and he is asking me to repeat what I said then. No doubt he is entitled to do that if that is his conception of the proper use of the time and facilities of the house. I was hoping to acquaint the committee with the fact that this point had been covered and that it was a matter of record. I traced there, Mr. Chairman, the course of our negotiations with the Italians.

The hon. gentleman now says, in effect, that the Italians were too easily satisfied in the negotiations; that is about what he says. The changes to which they were asked to agree were covered under the terms of GATT, and were tentatively agreed to on the basis of certain concessions we made to them, one of which is now before the committee as item 162b. The committee is well aware, I think, of that fact. Now the hon. gentleman says, in effect, that the Italians should have asked for more; they should not have been so easily satisfied in the course of the negotiations. His argument amounts to about that. I may say we worked out the arrangement with the Italians, and it was tentatively agreed to by them following our negotiations. I cannot say more than that. I said that a week ago, Mr. Chairman; that is the fact and it is on record.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said that it is on record, and he keeps on saying that. What he has not told us is whether there is any conceivable way in which an advantage can be secured from this reduction in the tariff in items 162 and 163. I do not believe the minister would get up and argue that any advantage could be derived unless retail prices are reduced by the liquor commissions or whatever those authorities are called in the various provinces. This concession means absolutely nothing whatever unless that is done. This leads me to the conclusion that perhaps the Italians were told we were going to do this anyway, and it did not make any difference, and they may have said, we can easily retaliate and the Canadian primary producers will suffer, as I predict they will.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not expect the minister to have a crystal ball to enable him to predict the value and volume of the new trade which will result from the changes in the tariff schedule. Surely, however, he is able to tell us what was the value of the woollen goods that were imported from Italy in 1958 and which were the basis of these new negotiations. I am told, too, that the minister, for political purposes, was in great haste to announce, as he did in December, 1957, some increase in the tariff against British woollen goods. Having done that, of course, France and Italy realized they were tied into it, and in consequence our bargainers did not have the elasticity they might otherwise have had.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is talking about the other side of the ledger in the negotiations, namely the value of our imports from Italy of these woollen goods and fabrics which will be affected by the proposed increase. The total value in 1957, I am informed, was between $3 million and $4 million. The figure for 1958 is not available as yet.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister the figures of vermouth importations from France and Italy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. These particular wines are not separately recorded as statistical items.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister seriously tell us that we send people to the GATT negotiations and they trade away these things without knowing what they are worth, and that they have so little information about what they are talking about when they go to Geneva that they do not know what the imports are of these commodities? I find that very hard indeed to believe, and I would be very surprised if the hon. minister is not ill-informed on this subject.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told the best estimate we have on the imports from Italy of these three types of wines is about $400,000 a year. But these are not precise figures and cannot be.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister give us an approximate figure for item 163 as far as Italy is concerned, and also for item 162?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No sir, we have no figures on that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Once again the minister is telling us that serious negotiations were carried on with Italy about their loss of a good part, at any rate, of the woollen market, but he and his negotiators have no idea what they were offering in exchange. This really strains our credulity, I think, beyond the breaking point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can only regret that the hon. member, when he was a minister of the crown, did not learn a little more about the facts of the situation than he apparently did. The fact is that there are many items of imports and exports for which we have no precise figures broken down. There is nothing new about that. It is as it always has been, and negotiations under GATT have been carried on for years on that basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: I very much doubt whether in the days when a different kind of government was in office which was interested in expanding trade instead of restricting trade that negotiations were carried on about items on which the government was not informed. That is probably one of the things which came in with the new look in 1957. If the minister has not the information, of course I do not expect him to manufacture it. I know that the fabrication plant of his party is outside the house rather than inside.

Items agreed to.

Item 163 agreed to.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Customs tariff—307a. Manufactures of marble, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister is not going to tell us he does not know how much marble was imported from Italy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will send for the blue book. The officials do not happen to have those figures here. They are in the blue book, if the hon. gentleman wishes them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I certainly do wish them, because up to now we have been told that they were willing to sacrifice a market worth $3 million or $4 million for some $400,000 of vermouth and $X worth of other wines, as well as some quantity of marble which is detailed in the blue book. It does seem to me that the minister might have come to the committee prepared to answer these obvious, simple and elementary questions and that we should certainly have that figure. However, if the minister would like to go on with the other items and let this point stand so that we will not hold up the work of the committee, I would be quite agreeable.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—554b. (1) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 27½ p.c.; general tariff, 40 p.c.; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 cts.; most favoured nation tariff, 36 cts.; general tariff, 40 cts.

The total duty leviable shall not be in excess of per pound: British preferential tariff, 60 cts.

(2) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair and weighing not less than twelve ounces to the square yard: British preferential tariff, 20 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 27½ p.c.; general tariff, 40 p.c.; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 15 cts; most favoured nation tariff, 33 cts.; general tariff, 40 cts.

The total duty leviable shall not be in excess of per pound: British preferential tariff, 55 cts.

(3) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in chief part by weight of yarns of wool or hair and weighing not more than nine ounces to the square yard, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 27½ p.c.; general tariff, 40 p.c.; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 cts; most favoured nation tariff, 38 cts.; general tariff, 40 cts.

The total duty leviable shall not be in excess of, per pound: British preferential tariff, 60 cts.; most favoured nation tariff, $1.10.

554g. Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool, imported in the web in lengths of not less than five yards each, for use exclusively in the manufacture of neckties, scarves or mufflers: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 15 p.c.; general tariff, 40 p.c.; and, per pound; general tariff, 40 cts.

In the case of such fabrics weighing not more than nine ounces to the square yard, the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of per pound: most favoured nation tariff, $1.10.

Mr. Benidickson: With regard to 554g, is that another item that Italy is more interested in than France?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Italy is more interested than France.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was the figure which the minister gave on item 554b and 554g a global figure for them both? I mean the figure he gave a few minutes ago to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The French figure would be about a quarter of that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the $3 million or $4 million for both France and Italy, or just Italy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure I gave of $3 million to $4 million was for Italy. We were talking about trade with Italy as against which certain concessions had been made in respect of wines and marble. The figure for imports of woollens from France is about one-quarter of the Italian figure.

Mr. Pickersgill: The question I was raising was, does the figure of between $3 million and $4 million embrace both items 554b and 554g? I take it it does?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Our fish exports are almost exclusively to Italy.

Items agreed to.

On part IV.

Items 27, 27a and 72a agreed to.

Customs tariff—79h. Multiflora rose bushes: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this a new item, and what is the actual effect between the change of 3 cents specific and 12½ per cent ad valorem?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 79h which concerns multiflora rose bushes is a new item which reduces the duty on multiflora rose bushes to the same rate as applies to other shrubs and plants. Multiflora rose bushes had been classified as rose bushes and as such were dutiable at 3 cents each, although the value of them is about 1 cent or 2 cents each, whereas decorative rose bushes are worth 40 cents to 50 cents each. The association of Canadian nurserymen has indicated that there is no objection to this change.

Item agreed to.

Items 79i, 82i, 134, 134a, 135 and 143 agreed to.

Customs tariff—152j. Dehydrated citrus fruit juices with or without stabilizers or sugar: British preferential tariff 2½ per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a matter of concessions on the fruit and vegetables trading with the United States; is that correct? This is a reduction in duty?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was done on a unilateral basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this a reduction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member speaking of item 156?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, 152j.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the hon. member was speaking about 156. Item 152j, Mr. Chairman, concerning dehydrated citrus fruit juices, with or without stabilizers, is a new item which makes provision for dehydrated citrus fruit juices at a most favoured nation rate of 7½ per cent, which is the same rate applying to orange juice. Formerly the rate was 20 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I am still using my work notes from the budget papers, but there is no "j" in the printing of that item. Was that a typographical error? Perhaps in the bill it is "152j", but according to my copy it was just "152" in the resolutions tabled on budget night.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend is mistaken. I have my copy of the budget resolution as reprinted in pamphlet form, page 21, and the first item is "152j, dehydrated citrus fruit juices with or without stabilizers or sugar". It shows the proposed new rates to be 2½ per cent, 7½ per cent and 25 per cent, and the former corresponding rates were 15 per cent, 20 per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I assure the minister that I am using the official appendix to the budget debate on April 9. I suppose it was a typographical error.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I notice in the reprint in Hansard of April 9 the "j" was omitted.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did these citrus fruit juices come mainly from the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Entirely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was this one of the concessions in return for the changes on fruit and vegetables?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the United States was not prepared to regard this as significant enough to be a concession.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may not be significant enough, but what prompted the government to do it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was thought only fair that these crystals should be put on the same basis as orange juice coming in in other forms.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will be interested to know that is one of the changes of which I approve.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am glad there is something the hon. member approves of.

Mr. Benidickson: We had a discussion the other night, and we did learn that this was a peculiar crystal formed by dehydration. But why not use the word "crystal"? It is explanatory, and it is not referred to here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the way it was worked out with the administrative authorities, and it was thought to be an adequate and clear description. There is no question about what this refers to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we leave this item, which is a very interesting one, I wonder if the minister could tell us what stabilizers are?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An ingredient which prevents the crystals from becoming damp again. These crystals, as I recall, are packed in hermetically sealed tins.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—156. (a) Whiskey, per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $4.50; most favoured nation, $5.00; general tariff, $10.00.

(b) Gin, n.o.p., per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $4.50; most favoured nation, $5.00; general tariff, $10.00.

(c) Rum, n.o.p., per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $4.50; most favoured nation, $6.00; general tariff, $10.00.

(d) Brandy, per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $4.00; most favoured nation, $4.00; general tariff, $10.00.

(e) Liqueurs, per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $4.50; most favoured nation, $4.50; general tariff, $10.00.

(f) Ethyl alcohol, or the substance commonly known as alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl or spirits of wine, n.o.p.; spirituous or alcoholic liquors, n.o.p.; absinthe, arrack or palm spirit, artificial brandy and imitations of brandy, n.o.p.; cordials of all kinds, n.o.p. mescal, pulque, rum shrub, schiedam and other schnapps; tafia, and alcoholic bitters or beverages, n.o.p.; and wines, n.o.p., containing more than forty per cent of proof spirit, per gallon of the strength of proof and in addition thereto, under all tariffs, $9.00 per gallon of the strength of proof: British preferential tariff, $5.00; most favoured nation, $10.00; general tariff, $10.00.

When the goods specified in item 156 are of greater or less strength than the strength of proof, the measurement thereof and the amount of duty payable thereon shall be increased or decreased in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof.

Bottles and flasks and packages of gin, rum, whiskey and brandy of all kinds, and imitations thereof, shall be held to contain the following quantities (subject to the provisions for addition or deduction in respect of the degree of strength), namely:

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing not more than one-eight of a gallon per dozen as one-eighth of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-eighth of a gallon but not more than one-sixth of a gallon per dozen, as one-sixth of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-sixth of a gallon but not more than one-fourth of a gallon per dozen, as one-fourth of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-fourth of a gallon but not more than one-half of a gallon per dozen, as one-half of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-half of a gallon but not more than three-fourths of a gallon per dozen, as three-fourths of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than three-fourths of a gallon but not more than one gallon per dozen, as one gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one gallon but not more than one and one-half gallons per dozen, as one and one-half gallons per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one and one-half gallons but not more than two gallons per dozen, as two gallons per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than two gallons but not more than two and four-fifths gallons per dozen, as two and four-fifths gallons per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than two and four-fifths gallons but not more than three gallons per dozen, as three gallons per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than three gallons but not more than three and one-fifth gallons per dozen, as three and one-fifth gallons per dozen.

Bottles or phials of liquors for special purposes, such as samples not for sale to the trade, may be entered for duty according to actual measurement, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister can assure us, on item 156, that these changes in the tariff are precisely the same as the changes on the domestic products, or if there has been any additional protective element.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Exactly the same.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—180a. Photographs, negatives and exposed film, for use only as news illustrations, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Benidickson: As the minister was always much exercised about the enlargement in legislation of ministerial discretion when he was on this side of the house, I should, perhaps, point out that the new words seem to describe what the minister can do. Could the hon. gentleman say what the practice has been hitherto?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Item 180a reads, at present, as follows:

180a. Photographs, negatives and exposed film, for use only as news illustrations, under regulations by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation, free; general tariff, free.

In the proposed change, there is no change brought about so far as the minister's authority is concerned. The change is made simply to bring the language into conformity with what has now become the standard wording.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister is quite right in saying that there is no change intended in the minister's authority, but is this not an extraordinary power to confer upon a minister? This would appear as if it were another form of censorship. These are photographs for news illustrations, and the minister might prescribe, say, the length of dress that might be worn by women in those photographs. There is no end to the number of things the minister might prescribe. Does the government not think it might be wise to indicate that the powers here would have to do not with what is contained on the photographs but with the photographs themselves in a purely technical sense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The item does not relate to news illustrations but to photographs, negatives and exposed films for use only as news illustrations. It has been found necessary in the administration of this item in the past, including the period during which the hon. gentleman was a minister, to have some power reserved to the minister to deal by regulation with the use of photographs for the purpose of news illustrations, and the only change being made in this item is the inclusion of negatives and exposed film within the scope of the item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can accept that, but I must say that though, perhaps, I was being facetious when I began to discuss this point, I am now beginning to wonder seriously why there is the slightest need for the minister to make any regulation in this connection. Why should it not be sufficient to say "photographs, negatives and exposed film, for use only as news illustrations" and stop there. A photograph is a photograph, a negative is a negative and exposed film is exposed film. It does not appear to me that there is any need at all for regulations. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue knows why he wants to regulate these products, but I must say, as an ordinary layman who has never had anything to do with the administration of this department, that it is hard to see why regulations need to be made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The words conferring this authority on the minister were inserted in 1936 and have been there ever since. I did not wish to take the responsibility at this time for taking them out. I am told that no great use has been made of the power in recent times. We shall examine this in the course of the experience during this coming year, now that the item is being revised, and take into account the observation made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Everyone knows that I have the greatest possible respect for that particular King, but I have never held that that King could do no wrong, and the fact that the minister says this happened in 1936, though it would lead me to think that there was some reason for it, would not satisfy me that it was infallible and that there was no reason to inquire into it. I therefore think it would be advisable to inquire into this and find out whether there was any need for regulations, because it does seem to me, at first glance, that there cannot be the slightest reason for any regulations and that these wide powers being conferred on ministers are objectionable, particularly when they are to be conferred on a government which intends to treat us to a bill of rights.

Mr. Winch: Are they not all free, anyway?

Mr. Pickersgill: If they allow them in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of the item is to enlarge the scope of duty free entry so as to include negatives and exposed film. Certainly it is for the purpose of extending free entry.

Item agreed to.

Items 296g, 351c, 399a, 409f, and 414a agreed to.

Customs tariff—423a. Chiropody chairs and parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Winch: Is this not the item under which the minister said an announcement would be forthcoming on vibrators?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman concerns an amendment to the Excise Tax Act, not to the tariff.

Item agreed to.

Customs Tariff

Customs tariff—427. (1) All machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(2) Seed and grain cleaning machines of screen and air blast type with a capacity not exceeding 100 bushels per hour; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 15 p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(3) Industrial trucks, gas or gasoline powered, commonly known as "fork-lift" or "lift" trucks, for the movement of goods, having maximum lifting capacities, when equipped with forks, from four thousand pounds to sixteen thousand pounds, inclusive, at a load centre of twenty-four inches from the face of the forks, n.o.p.; accessories and attachments therefor; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(4) Power shovels and cranes, convertible, with nominal dipper capacities, as shovels, from three-eighth to two and one-half cubic yards, inclusive, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(5) Power cranes, truck or wagon type, with rated lifting capacities of ten to forty tons, inclusive, computed on the basis of twelve foot radius with fifty foot boom, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(6) Paper machines; machines for calendering (not including super-calenders), slitting, reeling, winding and re-winding paper, n.o.p.; driving mechanisms therefor; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(7) Electricity generating sets, consisting essentially of an internal combustion engine and one or more generators mounted on a common base, n.o.p.; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

(8) Vending machines for dispensing soft drinks, coin-operated, incorporating mechanical refrigeration; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, 10 p.c.; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ p.c.; general tariff, 35 p.c.

Mr. Benidickson: On this item, which I consider one of the most interesting in its implications of any on the list, we had a discussion the other night. In the meantime I have made some inquiries. We were somewhat startled to think that the minister had made up his mind about one of the items—I am thinking about sub-paragraph 6 relative to paper machines—on April 9 before he had heard the result of a pending reference to the tariff board concerning the paper machines, but it is now my understanding that the tariff board in this particular case under appeal had ruled that the articles concerned were in fact made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think that ruling has been published yet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, it has been published.

Mr. Benidickson: In the Gazette?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not in the Gazette. But the declaration has been published.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, a mimeographed sheet was issued, but I do not think it has been published in the Canada Gazette yet.

Now in all these items except this one there is some qualification, some definition as to size and so on which would enable these machines to qualify for the high rate without any dispute at the administrative level, so that it could be said immediately whether the low or the high tariff rate on import would apply. I believe that there has been a good deal of litigation on this subject in connection with power cranes.

This went to the tariff board, to the exchequer court and up to the supreme court. In my opinion the words of the supreme court judgment indicate the need for not having these particular items without fairly rigid definitions as to their specifications. The supreme court judgment in connection with cranes and shovels had this to say:

It is undisputed that power shovels with a nominal dipper capacity of 2½ cubic yards or more were not made in Canada at the date of import.

That was the subject of the appeal. I continue:

On the other hand, power shovels with a nominal dipper capacity ranging from one-half cubic yard to 2 cubic yards were being made in Canada at that time.

The judgment goes on to state, referring to the tariff board:

The board held that where the capacities of machines are established in clearly defined sizes, "the least arbitrary and perhaps therefore the best line of demarcation is in accordance with those sizes which are, in fact, made in Canada as opposed to those sizes which are not."

The concern is that if the area of definition is not carefully defined we might be imposing the high duty on something that is not in fact made in Canada. The supreme court quoted the finding of the exchequer court as follows:

The Exchequer Court held that there was no error on the part of the tariff board in its acceptance of the trade classification of power shovels into different classes or kinds; that the board's finding was a finding of fact; that the 2½ cubic yard shovel was different in fact from the 2 cubic yard shovel and that there was material before the tariff board upon which it could reasonably declare that the imported shovel was of a class or kind not made in Canada.

The supreme court judge then stated:

My opinion is the same as that of the Exchequer Court that the tariff board came to the correct conclusion.

In other words, the tariff board decision that went against the departmental ruling was confirmed first by the exchequer court and then by the supreme court. My point is that in respect of these items we might run into danger if the language is not properly specific so as to apply to known manufacturers in Canada.

My friend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's referred to the question of paper machines. In this one in particular I see no limitation and the reference is just to paper machines. Any paper machines will be subject to the higher rate. The minister made the statement in his budget speech that what he was doing here was not altering the practice of the department in so far as rate application for tariff was concerned but on a matter of this kind we should ask the minister for a little more detailed information.

First of all, the paper machine appeal had not been decided upon when it was decided to bring in this amendment. The question that arises is this. Are the criteria in each case adequate to make sure that these articles to a responsible percentage are actually being made in Canada or is it sufficiently arbitrary that even if the article is not made in Canada at all the manufacturer or other person is to find his costs going up because he cannot get the article in Canada but arbitrarily has the higher rate of duty as prescribed by this subsection? I wonder if the minister would consider that point.

In the matter of paper machines have we in recent times and over how long a period ruled that paper machines of all kinds would be subject to the 22½ per cent instead of the 7½ per cent duty? In other words, is it conceivable that someone in primary industry who wants to sell his product in the export market is going to be penalized because he has to pay a high rate for a machine of a certain size, shall we say, that is not in fact made in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Dealing with the last point, Mr. Chairman, I am told that paper machines have been ruled to have been made in Canada since 1907.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Two years after the minister was born.

Mr. Benidickson: All paper machines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There has been no question raised on that point at any time. The tariff item here proposed simply is in line with the decision to which the hon. member refers.

As to the power shovel, the hon. gentleman raises a question as to the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and as to the cubic contents of the shovel which in this item is fixed at 2½ cubic yards. The Supreme Court of Canada handed down its decision some few month ago but it was dealing with a state of facts that existed several years ago.

Mr. Benidickson: There was prolonged litigation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there was prolonged litigation. In the meantime there had been rulings that power shovels with a cubic content of 2½ cubic yards were made in Canada and therefore the change now proposed in the item is simply in harmony with the decisions and rulings already made.

As to the enlargement of the sizes, I presume the hon. member was referring to representations concerning the possible increase in the cubic content of the shovel to three cubic yards. I had representations from one source on that same point. I should like to point out to the committee that this provision takes nothing away from item 427. In other words, if the time comes when power shovels with cubic contents of three cubic yards are made in Canada they will be entitled to the benefit of the higher rate that goes with goods of a class or kind made in Canada and nothing in the proposed amendment will preclude them from doing so.

Mr. Benidickson: When we discussed this on May 5 at page 3344 of Hansard I quoted from the Financial Post of April 18 in which it was stated that the tariff board had rejected made in Canada appeals involving soft drink and hoisting machines. I now am just speaking from memory. I have no complaint against the minister or his staff. I know his staff is asked to revise Hansard afterwards. I think he gave me a categorical denial that evening that the statement was incorrect. The minister's reply as reported at page 3344 was as follows:

> That statement is definitely not a true interpretation of the effect of this resolution.

Rightly or wrongly I think the minister said at that time the statement itself was incorrect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board dismissed the appeal as to the vending machines.

Item agreed to.

Items Nos. 437b, 438b as amended and 438c as amended, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: 438d?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is deleted by the amendment. Item No. 438e is also deleted by the amendment.

Items 438f, 440c, 440k, 446e, 462d, 462i, 479, 502, 502c, 505a, 611a, agreed to.

Customs tariff—682:

Fish hooks, for deep-sea or lake fishing, not smaller in size than number 2.0;
Fishing nets and nettings of all kinds;
Lures, jiggers and artificial baits;
Metal panel devices for use in keeping nets open;
Metal swivels, of a class or kind not made in Canada;
Net and line floats of any material except wood;
Specially designed needles of a class or kind not made in Canada for use in repairing fish nets;
Threads, twines, marlines, fishing lines, rope and cordage, not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference;
All the foregoing for use in commercial fishing, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe;
Carapace measures of any material: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word about this item. The minister will recall that a year ago the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo raised this question in the house. Since he does not happen to be in the committee at the moment, I think it would be only right that I should express appreciation to the government for having listened to our representations.

Items 691 and 696a agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand we are now to revert to item 307a.

Customs tariff—307a.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the D.B.S. publication "Trade of Canada Imports" for the 12 months ended December, 1958 shows on page 155 that imports of marble manufactures from Italy in the 12 months period ended December, 1958, aggregated $78,049.

Mr. Pickersgill: This means that the concessions we have made to Italy relate to a traffic on which they had $78,000-plus in business last year as opposed to $3 million or $4 million. I just wanted to underline the fact that this does not seem to have been a very good way of safeguarding our market there.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is not right. He has overlooked the fact that with respect to item 554b we gave a binding to Italy on that item which had not existed before, and with respect to item 554g, this is a new item and gives a reduction in rate to Italy. This is a woven fabric.

Mr. Pickersgill: How much does the minister estimate that trade is worth?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a new item and it is not possible to give an estimate that would have significance.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not suggesting that the minister could estimate how much more trade there would be. I presume this is an item that the Italians were exporting to us. What I meant was, what were the exports for the last year for which the figures are available?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the goods described in this particular item have never been segregated.

Item 307a agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill as amended?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, before you report the bill I may be permitted to say one word. I know that in the house and in the committee we do not recognize strangers on the floor as such, but I am sure the committee would permit me to say that we have on the floor this afternoon Mr. Lloyd Younger, who has been assistant deputy minister of customs for some years and on many occasions and under difficult circumstances he has sat here and assisted both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. So far as one can tell at the moment, owing to his own will and determination, he will retire while he can still enjoy life and the pursuit of happiness. This is probably the last time he will be seen on the floor of this house.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I just add to the words of the Minister of National Revenue the enthusiastic endorsation of those of us on this side who know the competent deputy minister. I had considerable association with him in the various stages of debate such as we have been engaged in here today and were engaged in last week. In addition, of course, he has been one of those who has been called in on pre-budget discussions. He, of course, has been a servant of distinction of the department of customs and excise. He has been most loyal to the country and to the minister and I think particularly to the statute law which we parliamentarians pass.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to wish the deputy minister in question good health and a long, happy, enjoyable retirement.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on second reading of Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, I wish to make a few observations. The present amendments in this bill will provide coverage for a greater number of wage earners. They will increase benefits and allowable earnings. They will also increase contributions. They will extend the benefit period to 52 weeks.

Today, in asking the house to give consideration to these amendments I would refer first to section 3 of the bill. This section raises the wage ceiling on insurability, bringing in under the umbrella of unemployment insurance protection persons making up to $5,460 as compared with only $4,800 under the present act.

I should also like to explain that we have adopted a new principle in regard to allowable earnings as shown in the table on page 6 of the bill. Hon. members will note that the benefit rate for a person with a dependant is higher than that for a person without a dependant, even though their wages may have been the same. This is the way in which the act recognizes the greater responsibilities of those with dependants. At the present time, however, this principle is not recognized in the allowable earnings schedule. We propose, therefore, a new schedule that provides for somewhat higher allowable earnings for the person with a dependant.

Furthermore, since the allowable earnings idea was first incorporated in the act in 1955 experience has shown that the amount of earnings allowed should be higher if the claimant is to have adequate incentive to take on casual work. We propose, therefore, to make the allowable earnings one-half of the claimant's weekly benefit rate, rounded to the nearest dollar. By doing this, we will be producing two desirable results with one amendment; that is, we will be recognizing the greater responsibilities of those with dependants and we will also be putting a realistic price tag on incentive to work.

I should like to deal now with the new schedule of benefit rates. This schedule appears on page four of the bill. It will be noted that two new classes of benefits are added, one a new maximum of $36 for a person with one dependent, earning $69 a week and over; another of $33 for a person with one dependent earning between $63 and $70 per week. Previously persons earning over $57 weekly could not draw more than $30. That was the maximum. The two new clauses display a more realistic regard for present economic conditions. Also, in increasing the schedule of allowable earnings all the way along the line, the maximum total income now permitted to an unemployed person with one dependent is $54 per week compared with the previous $43 per week. Thus, in order to provide a higher benefit range we have had to provide for increased contributions.

In connection with this I should point out to hon. members that during the last two winters of moderate recession, which Canada suffered along with a great number of other countries, the drain on the fund has been heavy. In 1957-58 outgo from the fund was in the neighbourhood of $385 million. For 1958-59 the figure will be higher. In the two past years the fund has been reduced by almost $400 million. No one will deny that this has been a heavy drain. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone would quarrel with this use of the fund for the purpose for which the fund was originally set up.

The expenditures that were made from the fund in the past two years were made for the purpose of easing the lot of those whose misfortune it was to fall into unemployment. The amendments which are now before you will make possible further easement of that difficult and unpleasant situation, while at the same time keeping the fund on a sound basis. I would point out at the same time that we do not anticipate a need for drains on the fund in the immediate future of the magnitude of those of the past two years. All signs now point to a steady strengthening of the economy. However, there is a responsibility on the government to maintain the fund in a condition of equilibrium and this the new schedule of contributions will help materially in effecting.

I now come to an amendment which deserves notice at this time. I refer to section 10 of the bill which sets out the grounds on which the period of qualification may be extended and adds to these grounds time served in penitentiary up to two years. Ordinarily a person who had spent up to two years in penitentiary, would lose the benefit of unemployment insurance contributions, which would impose a further punishment in addition to those levied by the court. This disability is now removed and it will help a great deal in the rehabilitation of those who have been unfortunate enough to have punishment imposed upon them by the courts.

The final major amendment increases the maximum duration of benefit from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. This is being introduced in answer to many representations and reverts to the situation that existed back in 1955 prior to the time when there was a general revision and amendments were made to the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister ends his statement may I ask him if he is now in a position to table the report of the advisory committee to which I made reference on the orders of the day?

Mr. Starr: Upon investigation as soon as orders of the day were over I found that the statutory report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission was tabled in the house as provided by the act. However, I asked the unemployment insurance advisory committee to give some study to some of my suggestions for amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which they did. They forwarded their report to me, and under the circumstances I consider it to be confidential and for the information of the minister. It is not a statutory report. However, there is nothing in it that I feel is detrimental in any way. As a matter of fact, some of the most important things they discuss are not incorporated in the present bill. Therefore I have no hesitation in tabling that report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister tabled it already?

Mr. Starr: No, I have not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to look at it during the dinner hour because, in spite of what the minister said, I have not had the opportunity of reading it although I have heard a good bit about it.

Mr. Starr: I can table the report now. It is a report dated August 26.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising on second reading to comment on this particular and important measure I should like to say to the minister that I hope he will not misunderstand me if I say that I had expected, particularly in the light of previous discussion as well as because of the implications of the bill, that he would have had more to say on second reading. But perhaps the minister intends to make a more comprehensive statement at the conclusion of the debate rather than at the beginning.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, if I may interrupt the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) it is my intention, as I indicated earlier on the resolution stage, to refer the bill to the industrial relations committee where ample opportunity will be given to every member of that committee to discuss each amendment as thoroughly as possible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I welcome that suggestion which I think is a good one because of the character of the bill. However, that does not remove, of course, the fact that there are a number of very important considerations of principle and related circumstances that can more appropriately be discussed on second reading as I now propose to do. I thank the minister for tabling that report about which I propose to have something to say during the course of my remarks. I regret that I cannot treat it as he treats it, as a document confidential to the members of the advisory committee and the minister.

I think it is very important at the outset of the discussion that we should not forget that the unemployment insurance commission and its auxiliary and related bodies were enacted by statute to occupy a rather unique position, certainly different from the functions assigned to the various divisions of a particular department. The unemployment insurance commission is a body that reports, through the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), to the governor in council. There is nothing in the act that authorizes the advisory committee to report directly to the minister. However, as I said at the outset I will have more to say on that subject as I proceed.

The minister dealt cursorily with certain features of the bill. He referred to the fact that increased rates were going to be imposed on the main contributing bodies, employers and employees, and also a consequential increase in the grant provided by Canada out of the consolidated revenue fund. Then he said that there would also be increased benefits. I must say that I have carefully perused the legislation and I think it is a very strong overstatement to say that the bill provides for any real increase in benefits. It does make certain provision for extension of the present period to 52 weeks, restoring the old situation, but generally speaking the bill does not provide for any increases in the rates of benefit.

What this bill does is to impose on the workers and the employers a heavy increased obligation, an obligation which in its totality represents further taxation of these two segments of the community in an amount of money equal to almost one-third of the additional burden of taxation imposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget. What we are now dealing with is a measure that is going to impose an additional tax burden on the workers and the employers, a burden that was not referred to by the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget to us on April 9.

It is true that in his budget speech he made reference to the unemployment insurance fund. He referred to the fact that as a result of unemployment in the country there had been an impairment of the integrity of that fund. No reference was made by him, however, and no detailed reference was made today by the Minister of Labour to indicate what this particular measure will mean in terms of additional contributions by two groups in our national community. This should be viewed in the light of the fact that the measure, as I say, does not provide for any real increase in benefits to those who are called upon to make the contributions provided for by this act.

The minister, and I think understandably from his point of view, did not deal with a matter to which I referred on the resolution stage. I do not want to revive that matter, but I do want to indicate to the minister that in my judgment, as well as in the judgment of those who sit on Mr. Speaker's left, we are not satisfied that the Unemployment Insurance Act has been complied with in so far as the appointment of Mr. MacArthur is concerned in succession to Mr. Tallon. I repeat that there is nothing against Mr. MacArthur whatever in terms of confidence. I believe that what the minister has said, and the evidence before us, clearly indicates that there has not been a proper consultation with labour as required by the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The minister indicated when he spoke the other day on the resolution, and I refer to his words at page 3361 of Hansard for May 5, 1959, that the reason for this bill is to maintain the fund in a situation of stability over the next few years. He said that during the past two years of recession which we have experienced there has been a pretty heavy drain on this fund. Those words by the minister, I think, represent the true situation. I would point out that the fund dropped by $134.2 million in 1957-58 and by $247.9 million in 1958-59, a total reduction of $382.1 million in two years. At no time previously had the fund dropped by such a large amount in any one or two years period.

This is, of course, an indication of the level of unemployment we have in this country. One would have thought from the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) outside of this house on Friday last that the situation was otherwise when he said that we were emerging from the recession more rapidly than any other country in the western world. Of course, the facts are precisely the opposite, particularly in so far as unemployment is concerned. It is no wonder, then, that there has been a drop in the level of the unemployment insurance fund, the replenishment of which the minister said is the primary objective of this legislation.

Now, the aggregate of the replenishment which the minister has in mind is going to be made up of two elements. First, there will be the contribution that will be made by insured persons whose earnings are in the bracket between the present maximum of $4,800 per annum and the new maximum of $5,460. The second element will be the increased contribution payable by employees and employers as a result of the increase in rates of contribution of those now earning $4,800 or less. The minister told us the other day that as a result of this legislation 80,000 contributors will be brought back into the scheme. I have calculated that each of these, if fully employed, will pay 52 times 94 cents or $44.88 per annum. The total 80,000 additional workers to which my hon. friend referred in this group will contribute annually $4 million more and the employers will contribute a like amount.

Now with regard to the present class that is up to the $4,800 range, the rates of increase vary upward from 25 per cent to 56.7 per cent. It is, of course, difficult to know the present weighting of the different classes. If we assume, however, that the average rate of increase will be 30 per cent, then the employees in this class, that is the $4,800 or less, would pay roughly 30 per cent of the 1957-58 contribution, that is to say $94 million or an aggregate of $28.3 million. If these estimates are correct, or even approximately correct, this new bill will lay additional burdens on the employers of Canada of approximately $32.3 million, and a similar burden on the employees of $32.3 million.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I had concluded my remarks before dinner, by observing that this bill would impose an additional burden on the two main contributors, the employers and the employees respectively, in the amount of $32.3 million. I should now like to emphasize that for those who fall into the new class who are not now making any contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, the new measure will subject them to a contribution of $48.88 per annum, which is a substantial amount particularly when one thinks of the increases in sales taxes, corporation tax, income tax and other impositions which were provided for in the recent budget. It certainly imposes a substantial burden on industry which has already been called upon to pay substantial taxes; and of course this represents an important burden now imposed on the workers of our country.

The minister said when he was explaining these proposed increased contributions that the reason was to maintain the fund in stability over the next few years. One might reasonably ask whether the increased contributions do not represent a heavy burden both on industry and the labour force for conditions which have prevailed in the last two years and for which they cannot be held, of course, accountable.

I said when speaking the other night that one of the reasons for the position in which we find the fund is because of invasions made on this fund since the period following June 1957. I indicated that of course hon. gentlemen opposite were not the first to provide for supplementary benefits, but that whenever supplementary benefits had been provided for, as they were on three occasions by the previous administration, steps were taken to replenish the fund. With regard to the two occasions that have presented themselves during the term of the present administration in respect of which there has been an invasion of the fund for the purpose of providing seasonal or supplementary benefits there was no consequential action taken by the government to replenish the fund.

No one quarrels, of course, with the desirability for these supplementary payments, particularly in the last two years when there has been serious unemployment, more serious that at any time since the period between 1930 and 1935. But we have argued in this session and in other sessions that the burden was one that should have been shared by the people of Canada generally and not a burden that should have been imposed only on two segments of the population, namely the employers and the employees. That is obviously a responsibility which should be shared by all Canadians, and to have imposed this obligation on the workers and on the employers without replenishing the fund is in part one of the reasons why the government and the unemployment insurance commission and the advisory committee have been disturbed about the present state of the fund.

I said that when we invaded the fund for the purpose of providing supplementary benefits we took steps to replenish the fund. That was done in the years 1949-50, 1950-51, and in 1951-52. In 1949-50 vote 585 provided for reimbursement to the fund under section 87 (f) (1) of the act in the amount of $1,500,000. The actual expenditure amounted, however, to only $13,425.56. The following year, vote 597 provided for similar purposes the amount of $1,780,000, which was fully expended. In 1951-52 vote 717 provided for $40,000, of which $35,438.35 was spent.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member a question. Were these votes to provide for the payment of seasonal benefits which were being granted at the time?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were consequential upon the fact that the government had recommended to this house legislation providing for supplementary payments, and the government took steps to replenish the fund in accordance with its belief that this was a responsibility which should be shared not just by the workers and the employers but by the people of Canada, generally, through the consolidated fund.

So if the government is faced with a situation where the fund in 1959 has been reduced to $496.3 million as compared with what it was, let us say, in 1954, $881.3 million, one of the contributing reasons is the failure of the government to replenish the fund in accordance with a responsibility that belongs to all Canadians. The government may have had budgetary reasons for that; it may not have wanted to add to the deficit of 1957-58 or the larger deficit of 1958-59. But that certainly does not justify the invasion of a fund contributed to by two groups for the purpose of giving them maintenance grants which they require, as this winter and last fall indicated they did require, in the event of a high level of unemployment. I am sure that in considering the increased contributions which the employers and the employees must make under this measure one cannot help but wonder whether the increased contribution is designed to improve the financial condition of the fund or whether it is designed to pay the true actuarial cost of the additional coverage. I am sure that the minister would have satisfied the house if in his brief statement he had included some explanation for the government's course in this particular.

Mr. Speaker, we all recall some of the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in connection with unemployment insurance. At Port Alberni on March 12, 1958 the leader of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister, told the audience in that community that when his government came to power in June 1957 there was the greatest unemployment in Canada's history. He was giving them the facts, he said. He told the audience that now we had passed the peak of unemployment in this country. Of course, he did not give the figures, but, Mr. Speaker, you and I know, as do hon. members of this house, that the situation that eventuated after that speech was made is not supported by the facts. The real situation in the measure before the house is clear, that the government did not foresee the situation which now confronts us, and in failing to foresee it did not take the necessary preparatory steps and action to maintain the integrity of the fund.

The Prime Minister said at Pembroke on March 28 that the Liberals were saying unemployment was still on the increase but he said figures from the national employment service showed that registrations for unemployment insurance which had been mounting steadily all winter were finally going down. Registrations, the Prime Minister said, had gone up by 10,000 in the first half of March, but in the week beginning March 20 there had been a drop of 3,120, an indication that Canada's unemployment crisis had passed its peak. That confirms what I have just said, because the figures for March, published late in April, reveal that for the week ending March 22 there were 590,000 persons out of work and seeking jobs—or 10 per cent of the labour force—and 883,660 applicants for employment.

If the fund is in the dangerous state in which those who have to do with this matter obviously regard it to be, a contributing factor is the heavy invasion of it because of the fact that we have had this high level of unemployment in Canada. I suggest to the Minister of Labour that the government should have been warned last year by what was said on this side of the house, and should have taken steps not only to mitigate the occasion of unemployment but also, as was done by its predecessors, to see that the integrity of the fund was maintained in a manner which represented the common contribution of the people of Canada generally.

In the short presentation which he made today, the minister took credit for the value of this legislation in that it is extending the period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks and restoring the situation which prevailed prior to the amendment introduced by Mr. Gregg. The Minister of Labour has not, of course, overlooked the fact that the unemployment insurance commission noted, in the last report but one which it made to parliament, on page 50, that in view of the high percentage of claimants who did not use the long period of entitlement which was often set up for them it was considered justifiable to reduce the period of entitlement. And the commission went on to explain that in certain circumstances a claimant might continue to receive benefit, with or without partial earnings, throughout 51 instead of 36 weeks.

The fact remains that it was indicated from experience that between 1949 and 1953, 9.9 per cent of the claimants drew benefits for 20 weeks or more and consequently it would be a pity if the great mass of contributors were called upon to pay for much longer periods of benefit than they were likely to need. This, of course, was not mentioned by the Minister of Labour. It means that for the very large number of individuals who are outside this 9.9 per cent, a heavy added burden results from the amendments proposed. I do not quarrel with this in principle, except that I think that in regarding this as one of the great advantages of the legislation now before us, the minister should have pointed out the limited number of people who, in the light of experience, are likely to profit from this particular modification of the act.

We were told by the Prime Minister repeatedly, during the election of 1957 in particular, that if his government came to office the waiting period would be eliminated entirely. I think the government should be reminded of that promise as my reading of the bill does not indicate that this particular promise is being fulfilled by the administration.

It is noteworthy that the Canadian Labour Congress has called for compensation on the basis of two-thirds of the earnings of the beneficiaries under this scheme. I took issue with the Minister of Labour at the outset of my remarks by saying that while this measure imposes additional contributions from both employers and employees it does not provide any real increase in benefits. The minister said it does, and I hope that at some point he will indicate what these increased benefits are.

In the light of the present value of our dollar one wonders whether the present level of benefit is satisfactory. One would have thought that if there was to be this additional burden by way of increased rates, to the extent of 30 per cent covering some categories, there would have been some increase in the amount of benefit provided for workers covered by this legislation. There is no doubt that the Unemployment Insurance Act was intended to cover every earning worker, and to provide its benefits for all. That, I am sure, is the intention of the present administration, as it was the intention of its predecessor. It seems to me that the benefits provided by the act should enable a worker to look after himself and his family on a satisfactory basis. The failure of the government to increase the benefits at a time when it has taken such a significant step in increasing so sharply the rate of contributions, represents one of the substantial deficiencies of this series of amendments which is now before us. The amendments do not basically affect the rate of benefits. I say they should be increased in the light of the value of Canadian currency at this time, the cost of living and all the ensuing obligations which are incurred by our people as a result of policies put forward by this government.

The minister made reference at one point to the report issued by the unemployment insurance advisory committee on August 18, 1958, which was tabled in accordance with the requirements of the Unemployment Insurance Act. In this connection it is worth observing the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act itself. Section 89, subsection (1) reads:

> (1) Within four months after the end of each fiscal year the advisory committee shall make a report to the governor in council on the financial condition of the fund as of the end of that fiscal year and shall also make a report to the governor in council on the financial condition of the fund whenever the advisory committee considers that the fund is or is likely to become, and is likely to continue to be, insufficient to discharge its liabilities, and may make a report on the financial condition of the fund at such other times as the advisory committee may think fit.

This advisory committee is an important body. On it sit four representatives of the employers. Their names are Mr. James Hunter, Norman Hesler, H. Shoobridge, and Mr. T. C. Urquhart. In addition there are four representatives of employees, Mr. George Burt, Mr. Stanley Knowles, who substitutes for someone else; Mr. Jean Marchand, and Mr. J. G. McLean. And the chairman of this advisory committee is the former deputy minister of labour, Mr. Arthur MacNamara. This report was tabled in accordance with the requirements of the statute, the pertinent section of which I have just referred to. The report itself is of great relevancy to the subject we have before us at this time. By the way, this report is addressed to the governor in council. Under the act I would submit that every report of the advisory committee must be addressed to the governor in council.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

The unemployment insurance commission is a unique body. The commission was established so as to remove it from the ordinary routine of departmental administration and the reports it makes are made to the cabinet as a whole—to the governor in council—rather than to the minister in particular. The first section of the report reads:

> Section 89(1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act requires the unemployment insurance advisory committee to report not later than July 31 each year on the financial condition of the unemployment insurance fund as at the preceding March 31.

That is clearly in accordance with the act. The reason for my emphasizing this section will be clear, I think, in the light of what I shall have to say about the supplementary report which the Minister of Labour in answer to requests by the opposition today tabled just prior to our adjournment at six o'clock.

In the third paragraph of this report the advisory committee points out:

> The balance at the credit of the unemployment insurance fund at March 31, 1958, was $744,200,124.87, a decrease of $134,241,341.68 in the twelve-month period.

And then with some significance the committee goes on to point out:

> This compares with an increase of $18,970,908.62 in the fiscal year 1956-57, an increase of $13,186,624.99 in the fiscal year 1955-56, and a decrease in the fiscal year 1954-55 of $41,245,135.50.

In paragraph 8 on page 2 of the report we find these words:

> It should be mentioned that there was a revenue from investment of the fund of nearly $24 million. This item will be approximately $7 million less next year.

Of course, the reason for that was the unemployment insurance fund experienced the same difficulty that attended all the holders of government securities at that particular time. In paragraph 9 of the report the committee states:

> The staggering increase in benefit payments is mainly due to the large number of unemployed workers during the period, and to the extension of the period during which seasonal benefits were available.

In paragraph 12 it is stated:

> In the seventeen years, over $1¾ billion have been paid out in benefit payments.

On page 3 the report contains a table showing the balance at the credit of the unemployment insurance fund for the years 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958. The balance in 1955 was $846,284,000 and in 1958 it was $744,200. I have already indicated that in 1959 it was $496.3 million. Paragraph 17 on page 4 states:

> The committee calls attention to the serious drain on the fund created by the heavy load of payments during the year.

We come then to paragraph 19 which states:

> There was, unquestionably, a need for the special provisions to meet the emergent situation last winter. The committee is gratified to find that the benefit payments could be made so satisfactorily through the commission offices.

Paragraph 20 is extremely significant:

> It is a fact, however, that the burden of this expense, in the opinion of the committee, should not be imposed on the unemployment insurance fund unless the loss to the fund is made good.

That is the recommendation, the statement and the view of this advisory committee of employers and employees. In paragraph 21 they say:

> We trust the government will take action to replace the drain on the fund, by reason of the extension of the seasonal benefit period by a grant.

This government has not accepted that recommendation made by this advisory committee which recommends that what was done on three previous occasions should be done by this administration so as not to place on the two main contributors a burden which in all fairness does not exclusively belong to them.

One could go on and look at various other sections of the report to find that the advisory committee by statistical analysis supports the contentions that it has made, that the fund should be supported by grants from the government and that the burden should not be shared only by the employers and employees. In paragraph 30 we find this statement:

> You will observe Mr. Humphrys' estimate that an increase of 20 per cent in the contribution rates would probably maintain the fund at the present level. The estimate is based on the assumption that a pattern of employment during the next five years, may be expected, similar to that of the last five.

That is the view of this committee, repeating the observations of Mr. Humphrys that an increase of 20 per cent in the contribution rates would probably maintain the fund at the present level but that is not what is in this bill. This bill provides for increased rates of contributions to be imposed on the workers and on the employers in some categories of 30 per cent and in some other categories of slightly over 30 per cent. Can there be any doubt that the government for reasons that it has not explained has not pursued the practice of its predecessors in this particular and has failed to carry out the recommendations of the advisory committee set up for the purpose of advising the government and the commission in these matters?

I do not say it is the obligation of the government to accept the recommendations of bodies such as this one but surely it is an obligation of the government in the presentation of legislation such as this to explain why it has not carried out the recommendations of the advisory committee, recommendations that are made only after the most careful consideration.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Pretty weak.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Health and Welfare says, "Pretty weak". I may say to him that the policy of the government in the face of this report is obviously very weak.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I was referring to the applause.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Paragraph 33 reads as follows:

> In amplification of the reasons for the recommendation that the government contribution be increased,—

Not as provided for in this bill as I hope to show, but through another formula altogether. I continue:

> —attention is called to the following, as some of the expenditures, with which the fund has been burdened and for which provision for sufficient balancing revenue has not been made—

Again they are calling upon the government to replenish the fund out of the consolidated revenue fund in such a way as to distribute the burden equally on the Canadian people.

In paragraph 35 the advisory committee makes certain other recommendations as to what might be provided for in amendments brought to parliament. These include, among others, payment of benefit for unemployment caused by illness, payment of benefit for short term claimants, the revision of the benefit formula involved in the elimination of seasonal benefits, which the committee believed would develop serious difficulties, and so on. These recommendations of the advisory committee were not even referred to this afternoon by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). Unless these bodies are to be taken seriously, as this one certainly should be, the government should, when it is not prepared to carry out recommendations of one of its own agencies, explain the reasons for the course that it takes.

I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that this particular report was made in accordance with the requirements of section 89 of the statute. This afternoon I asked the Minister of Labour the following question: "Will the Minister of Labour tell us whether any report was presented to the government by the unemployment insurance advisory committee since that tabled on August 18, 1958?" The minister said that he had received notice of my intention to ask this question during the course of the morning but that he had not yet had time to ascertain the kind of reply that he should make. Before dinner he did refer to the fact that there was such a report, a report which he said was made on his own instigation when he asked the advisory committee for some supplementary information in addition to that provided for in the report of August 18, 1958. However, he said that this second report was addressed to him and he regarded it as a privileged and confidential document. I want to be fair with the minister. I do not know whether he said "confidential".

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think before the hon. member proceeds to discuss the circumstances of the production of the report in question he should indicate how it relates to the bill. The hon. member knows that this is second reading, and the bill contains specific principles. It seems to me he is now going into something that is extraneous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a supplementary report made by the advisory committee with regard to what that committee believes should be in the bill, and it is a supplement to the report already tabled, to which I have been making references for the last half hour.

Mr. Speaker: I am not objecting to the hon. member using the report, but what I am objecting to, or what I am asking him to desist from, is a discussion of the production and manner of production.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to quarrel or take issue with you on that point. The document to which I refer has been tabled, and it is in that context that there is an issue between the Minister of Labour and myself.

Mr. Regier: When was it tabled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just before six o'clock. The hon. member will recall that on the orders of the day I asked the Minister of Labour whether there was such a report. He said he would make inquiries. He told me that it was addressed to him personally. Because he said it did not contain consequential information he would have no hesitation in tabling it, and I took advantage during the recess to make a careful perusal of the report. Now the Minister of Labour says that this was a report made to him in his capacity as Minister of Labour. There is no doubt that the report does indicate that it is addressed to the Hon. Michael Starr, Minister of Labour; but, as I said at the outset—

Mr. Speaker: That is the line of debate which I was questioning. The hon. member seeks to make a point about the character of the report. He has the report. I do not object to his using it. It seems to me that how it got to be tabled, or what its character is does not matter; at least, is not relevant to the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, I think it has everything to do with the bill, because I am going to indicate that this report was not tabled in accordance with the Unemployment Insurance Act, as it should have been, and some of the amendments of which are now under consideration in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, if my hon. friend will permit me, I am not sure whether Your Honour was in parliament at the time but a situation arose in the year 1949 when a certain document was in question that was not even directly related to a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act which was before parliament and the precise question arose before the Speaker of that day. It was argued by Mr. Knowles and by the present Prime Minister and was established by them, with the support of the Speaker, that since the document was germane and related to the subject matter of the amendment under consideration it could be referred to and discussed in the course of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I quite agree that the hon. member can refer to and discuss the report but I do not think we ought to have a debate on it, whether or not it is a confidential document. He has it in his hands. It is not relevant to second reading of this bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I am simply trying to do is to establish that the minister did not comply with the requirements of the statute. This report should have been tabled a long time ago, in accordance with subsection 2 of section 90 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I suggest to Your Honour that it is clearly a matter that is of greatest relevance, having in mind the particular amendments now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I wish the hon. member would tell me how it is relevant to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: May I, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I would be very glad if any member could show me how it is relevant, then I will admit it. As it stands, I do not see that the character of this report, the question of what kind of report it is and whether it should have been tabled at a certain time is relevant to the debate we are now engaged in.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to indicate to Your Honour why it is relevant. As the hon. member for Essex East has said, this report has now been tabled by the minister, and during the recess we have had an opportunity of reading it. Anyone reading this report can clearly see that parts of it refer very clearly to recommendations contained in the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act now before the house, and parts of it condemn some of the things that should have been done and are not contained in this bill. Surely, if it does deal with the measure now before the house the hon. member for Essex East has a right to deal with the report in all its aspects.

Mr. Speaker: I agree that he has the right to use the report—it is tabled—in so far as it is relevant; but the nature of the report and whether the report should have been tabled at some other time, that seems to me to be not relevant at this stage. It may be relevant at another time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In joining with my colleague, the hon. member for Laurier, I would want to say that this ruling of yours would have, I think, the greatest restrictive consequence in the elucidation of this very important matter. If this report had been tabled, if the minister had not violated the statute, we would have had—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —this report months ago.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member is still speaking on the point of order. I wish he would make it brief.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would ask Your Honour also to bear in mind the interruptions. I am saying that if this report had been tabled in accordance with the act we would have had the opportunity months ago, and so would the public, of ascertaining what kind of recommendations should be made and what kind of implementation of those recommendations should be carried forward by the government in respect of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This particular report was tabled tonight for the first time. This is the first opportunity we have had to see the report, and surely I have the right to complain about the minister's failure to comply with the statute; I have the right to complain that he has violated the law in not tabling this document.

Mr. Speaker: I differ with the hon. member there. The hon. member has the report. It is clear that it was tabled tonight. As he has indicated, he feels it should have been tabled earlier, but that is another debate. What we are dealing with is second reading of a bill to amend an act. The hon. member has the report and he is free to refer to it. In my view what he should discuss is the amendments that are being made and those which perhaps should have been made in accordance with the report but not the other question of whether there has been some anterior breach.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Essex East has charged that I have violated the act I think I should be allowed to say a few words with respect to the report I tabled tonight.

Mr. Speaker: I will be glad to hear the minister. The sole point I have raised is that while the hon. member is free to use the report this is not a debate on how this report got into the House of Commons, and that is my view notwithstanding what has been said. Unless the minister wants to dispute that view he might leave the matter there.

Mr. Starr: I was going to say that I dispute that there is a provision in the act requiring that a report of that nature should be tabled. The act provides that the statutory report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee be tabled when it is addressed to the governor in council. The report under discussion was made to me on my own request when I asked the unemployment insurance commission to advise me on certain amendments I had in mind. Only one of those proposed amendments is included in this report. None of the other proposed amendments is incorporated in the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We shall see that when we come to examine the second report, but on the point of order I would ask Your Honour, in accordance with the observations made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to recall what happened in this house in 1949. The present Prime Minister, then the private member for Prince Albert, charged the then minister of justice with having failed to comply with the statute in question in that he had not tabled a report he was required to table within the prescribed period under the statute. One can read the discussion through many pages of Hansard. For instance, I have page 2091 here containing the speech—

Mr. Speaker: Was that on the second reading of a bill?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, it was on the second reading of a bill. The Prime Minister spoke twice making the complaint which I had hoped Your Honour would allow me to make tonight.

Mr. Speaker: I am not objecting to the hon. member making the complaint in the proper place. He seems to misunderstand me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am submitting that this is the proper place and that the justification for it is seen in the incident of 1949.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I say to the Minister of Labour is that inadvertently or for some other reason—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —he has not complied with the statute.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I have not accepted the hon. member's argument and if he persists in contravening the ruling I have made I will have to ask him to desist.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order which the hon. member has raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: He has not raised any point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order has been disposed of and I would ask the hon. member to continue the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In accordance with the rights of a member who feels that he has a legitimate grievance, Mr. Speaker, I ask—

Mr. Small: Are you challenging the ruling?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My respect for the Speaker is equivalent to that of the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Why don't you show it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking Mr. Speaker not to take this position in the light of the debate to which I have made reference. What happened in that case was that there was a discussion of the Combines Investigation Act generally—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and a question was put as to whether or not the minister of justice of that day had tabled a report which he was required to table within a prescribed period in accordance with the act.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It developed that he had not and the Prime Minister of today and other hon. members, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —belaboured the then minister of justice for his failure to comply with the act, for his failure to table the report and the absence of a satisfactory explanation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Harkness: You suppressed the report for two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nonsense. It was a much shorter period than in this case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the same kind of situation. The Minister of Labour did not comply with the act. He did not table a report which under the statute he was supposed to table and which, if it had been tabled, would have provided us with information which would have given us an even better opportunity of understanding the validity or invalidity of the recommendations now made by the Minister of Labour. The words of the Prime Minister of this country are there in support of my submission.

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the situation is as the hon. member has explained it and as did the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I suppose that the point of order has no significance now because I dare say everything has been said that can be said with respect to the tabling of this report. But my point was that we should not depart from the debate on second reading of this bill into the discussion of an extraneous matter which is in effect a charge against the minister of not complying with the statute. That is not the matter now before the house. I would ask the hon. member to proceed on that basis and use the report as he sees fit. That is my view of the situation.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): On a question of privilege, I was a member of the House of Commons between 1949 and 1953 and I remember very well the suppression of the report to which the hon. member refers. It was a report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act charging several flour milling manufacturers with violating the Combines Investigation Act, and the report was held back for two years so they could not be prosecuted.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the privilege?

Mr. Speaker: The minister is really debating the point of order again and not raising a question of privilege. I remember the circumstances too and I do not think they are a precedent for not following what I have suggested is the proper course tonight.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have before me Hansard in which the Prime Minister of this country—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —took four pages and later at the end of the debate another two pages discussing his complaint against the then minister of justice for failing to comply with the statute. I am now inquiring whether, in the face of this, Your Honour has understood the situation to the point where he is denying me the opportunity of complaining against the failure of the Minister of Labour to comply with the statute.

Mr. McPhillips: Challenge or shut up.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member feels he has a point he will have an opportunity but not in the debate on second reading of this bill.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a word on the point of order. I have only now received a copy of the report tabled tonight and I am sure that even you, Mr. Speaker, have not seen it. I would point out that it refers to the addition of two new classes at the top of the earnings range, and that is contained in the bill. I maintain that if anything in the report of the advisory committee is now contained in the bill it is in order for the house to discuss the belated tabling of the report by the minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do I understand clearly now that I am not to be allowed to go on to discuss the minister's failure—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to comply with the act, using the same precedent and the same practice that the Prime Minister used when he sought to preserve the rights of parliament against a minister whom he thought had violated the rights of parliament and, as well, the law of the land.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that is the view I take of it. The hon. member is free to use the report. He has already commented on the time of its filing and on the fact that he feels that under the statute it should have been filed earlier. What I am seeking to avoid, and this is all I am trying to do, is a debate on this subsidiary issue because I do not consider such a debate to be relevant to the principle of the bill now before the house.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker; you have said that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is now free to use this report in connection with the bill in question. What we are trying to point out is that this matter, in the form of a resolution and a bill, has been before parliament now for some time, yet this very pertinent document bearing directly on this bill is one which we have had an opportunity of considering in relation to the bill only since six o'clock. It was only after repeated requests that the minister produced it. Surely, we have a legitimate grievance in connection with our consideration of this bill and the report. We have had such a short time to consider the report because of the action of the minister in keeping it hidden.

Mr. Starr: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is talking about a hidden report. I want to say this to keep the record clear, that this second advisory committee report was not one made under section 89 (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act to which the hon. member refers. It did not, therefore, have to be tabled. It was only upon the request of the hon. member for Essex East that I felt I would honour his request.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is debating the very point which I do not think should be debated. I have not sought to prevent the hon. member from commenting upon the disadvantages from which he suffers by reason of having received this report only tonight. What I have endeavoured to avoid, and what I insist upon avoiding as being irrelevant, is a debate upon whether or not this report should have been tabled under the statute.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say a word on that point, whether the hon. member should be allowed to discuss a report which was not tabled in accordance with section 89. The minister has just stated it is not necessary to table this report because it is not a report to the governor in council and therefore does not require to be tabled under section 89 (1) of the act. The contention of the hon. member for Essex East, and the contention which I am making now, is that it is such a report under section 89.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that quite well, and I stopped the minister because he was entering into a debate which I said was irrelevant. I would hope hon. members would respect that decision and proceed with the debate on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall try not to be irrelevant, and just deal with the point with which you asked the hon. member to deal. It is this. May I, sir, submit this to you, that if this report which the hon. member for Essex East wants to use and wants to discuss as being a contravention of the section had been tabled at the same time as the other report, then surely Your Honour would have allowed it and would have allowed any comment to have been made on it at that time. Simply because the report is tabled by the minister today, it seems to be inequitable that the hon. member for Essex East is not now allowed to challenge the fact that it is not made in accordance with section 89 of the act. This is the point I wanted to bring to Your Honour's attention.

Mr. Speaker: This is the point we have been discussing for the last half-hour. The hon. member is free to use the report, but what I do consider to be out of order is going into a collateral debate as to whether or not this report should have been tabled because that is not a subject before the house.

Mr. Harkness: He wanted to make the allegation for the seventh time that it had not been tabled at the right time.

Mr. Starr: It does not have to be tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are procedures in a situation like this to which resort has been had in other parliaments. We do not want to resort to that procedure because of our great respect for Your Honour. I hope Your Honour will have an opportunity of reading the Hansard to which I have made reference to see if the situation now is not on all fours with the situation referred to. What I had intended to do was to deal with the point made by the Minister of Labour and to use the words of the Prime Minister in condemnation of the act which I have cited.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member says. I may be wrong in my ruling, and I shall look at the report to which the hon. member refers. In the meantime, I insist that the hon. member who has the floor, if he has the regard for my ruling which he professes, proceed in accordance with it.

An hon. Member: Go back to your reading; you were doing well.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to read what the Prime Minister said, and then the hon. member would see that I am doing very well. The minister obviously is greatly concerned about this report because, at first, he said he did not recall that it was in existence; he had no knowledge of it, and could not give a reply to my question, notice of which I had sent him earlier in the day. Then when it was presented here he said it was the kind of a document that did not require the observance of the provisions of sections 89 and 92 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Now that the document has been produced and, for the time being, the argument that I was going to make on the failure to comply with the act stands in abeyance, let us look at the report itself. In connection with the observations I will make on the terms of this report, let us assess the value of some of the recommendations made by the minister in the amendments now before the house. This report is dated August 26, 1958.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Small: You have told us that four times already.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend is confused.

Mr. Small: I understand you well.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the second report, for my hon. friend's information.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member has been asleep.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the hidden report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my hon. friend says, this is another hidden report. This report covers several meetings of the unemployment insurance committee convened on August 19, 1958. "Status of the fund"; attached to this report is a statement of revenues and expenditures for the period July 1, 1941 to July 31, 1958.

In the first paragraph, the report goes on to point out the situation is that during the past 16 months the balance in the fund has been reduced by $234,283,645.05. Here is an observation which undoubtedly the Minister of Labour, and understandably, was anxious that we should not carefully observe in connection with the matter now before the house. The report goes on to say:

> The excess of payments, over revenue, persuades the committee it would be improper to recommend major changes at this time. That is changes which would very materially increase the deficit; or in the alternative would necessitate a tax on industry and workers.
> The committee wishes to reserve its opinion on the "benefit formula proposal" of July 24, 1958 until the commission, and actuary, have had more opportunity to give it careful consideration in the light of further experience with the existing act.
> In the meantime, we respectfully draw your attention to our report of July 18, 1958.

Incidentally, I would ask the minister if we could be provided with the benefit formula proposal which is referred to by the advisory committee to enable us to formulate a judgment as to whether or not the proposed rates, in the absence of increased benefits, are justified; so that we can compare our information with that before the advisory committee before we make up our minds on this important measure.

Then, the committee goes on to point out:

> The committee recommends for your favourable consideration the following proposals of the unemployment insurance commission:
> (1) revise existing schedules of contribution and benefit rates by the addition of two new classes at the top of the earnings range.

The committee accepts that particular recommendation. Then, the second one is:

> (2) readjust and consolidate some of the lower classes;

That is not concurred in by this committee and is information which I believe is important in considering what we should do at the present time.

Then thirdly:

Revised rates of allowable earnings.

The committee accepts that. Then the committee goes on to point out on page 2:

The committee respectfully recommends that the division of responsibility for revenue to the fund as between employers, employees and government be adjusted so that the contribution from each be made equal. In other words, that the contribution from the government be made equal to one-half that of the combined contribution from employers and employees.

That recommendation is refused by the government and is in consequence not embodied in the legislation now before us. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) points out, the committee persist in this recommendation, having already made it in the earlier report which was tabled in accordance with section 89 of the act.

Then other recommendations were made which are not accepted by the government. For instance, it has not accepted the committee's endorsation of the proposal of the commission that the rule for determining dependancy rate be revised to avoid frequent changes in classification in respect to dependency. Then here is the significant thing. The Minister of Labour said that this report was made as a result of a request which he made to the advisory committee. Here is one of the concluding paragraphs:

A draft of the foregoing was read at the concluding session. Certain changes were suggested and made.

It was agreed that a proposed report, based on the draft, would be prepared and sent to members, to wire approval, or to suggest changes.

Messrs. Hunter, Hesler, Shoobridge and Urquhart approve.

Messrs. Burt and Andras—

These were two of the labour representatives.

—sent an identical telegram which is quoted: "Reur proposed report dated August 20 of unemployment insurance advisory committee regret do not find it possible to attach signature. Feel committee should be reconvened to review benefit formula proposal of July 24 possibly in October with view to modification or in light of further study by actuary. Feel also committee should withhold comments until minister has notified it of intentions regarding recommendations contained in our report dated July 18."

Mr. Marchand of the Catholic syndicates sent a wire to the same effect. Mr. McLean, the other labour representative, was absent and unable to attend the meeting.

Mr. Speaker, in the face of this report which the minister says he was not obliged to table in accordance with the requirements of the act we have here further evidence of the disagreement of the advisory committee with some of the policies embodied in this legislation which is now before the house. Either this advisory committee is a useful body and its recommendations are to be taken seriously, or we are to be told by the minister that such is not the case. At least we have the right to be told why these recommendations, originally in the report of August 18 unanimously concurred in, are not accepted by the government of the day.

We are called upon to impose a further contribution on employers and employees to the extent of 30 per cent. That is no ordinary imposition to impose upon the two segments of our population, and we in this house have the right to know why the government has failed to carry out the recommendation of the advisory committee. We have that right in the face of the circumstances that attend the presentation of the report for the first time in public as the result of a question put to the Minister of Labour this afternoon as to whether or not such a report was in existence. We do not even know whether the Minister of Labour has complied with the recommendation and the request of the advisory committee for further meetings. Was any meeting held in October? Was the advisory committee advised of this particular legislation? Were all of these proposed amendments placed before the advisory committee? Does this legislation, apart from the differences in the recommendations which it made, not now meet with the desire or point of view of this committee which was established to represent employers and labour and to advise the commission and the government? Surely we have the right to know what is the situation in that regard.

A difficulty may be because three members of that advisory committee representing labour have resigned from the commission. In this connection I call the minister's attention to section 19 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which says:

(1) There shall be a committee, called the "unemployment insurance advisory committee", consisting of a chairman and not less than six nor more than eight other members, appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure.

(2) At least one of the members of the advisory committee, other than the chairman, shall be appointed after consultation with organizations representative of workers and an equal number after consultation with organizations representative of employers.

That is a requirement of the act. At the present time three members of that body are not functioning and may have resigned. Does the minister think that he is now complying with the act in carrying on the advisory committee when three labour members are not functioning? Subsection 1 of section 19 says:

> There shall be a committee, . . . consisting of a chairman and not less than six nor more than eight other members, appointed by the governor in council—

At the present time there are only five functioning members of that committee other than the chairman. Does the minister think the act is being complied with at the present time? Is it permissible for him to bring in legislation of this kind and not have consulted a body set up, not by the government but by act of parliament for the purpose of advising the government on the very kind of measure now before us? It is a measure which adds rates of contribution to the extent of 30 per cent on the employers and workers. Does the minister think that he is complying with the statute in providing for that kind of a recommendation without having consulted the members of the advisory committee?

I say that this act passed by this parliament has been violated by the minister not only with regard to sections 89 and 90 but also with regard to the violation I have just referred to in section 19. This particular legislation, in order to carry with it the support it must have from the employers and the employees, should have been discussed at least in principle with this committee, a committee which has not sat since last August. We are told by this government which claims that it specially cherishes the rights of parliament, in effect and by implication, that we do not need this advisory committee. True, it has been set up by parliament, but the government knows what to do. It disregards this agency created by parliament because it has its own ideas of what should be embodied in this legislation. This from a government whose Prime Minister is about to bring in a bill of rights; this from a Prime Minister who has established himself in the minds of some people as the foremost champion of the rights of free people and the rights of a free parliament.

Let us examine the situation further and see whether there have been any other violations of this act. I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) this afternoon if in the month of April the government had made any loans to the unemployment insurance commission. The Minister of Finance did not know. He was not certain whether or not in the month of April or in the month of May loans were made by the government of the day. I have before me, Mr. Speaker, a copy of order in council P.C. 1959/383, certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the privy council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on April 2, 1959. This order in council is, of course, available to all hon. members as it was to me. The order states:

> The committee of the Privy Council advise that Your Excellency may be pleased, pursuant to section 86 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans from time to time to the unemployment insurance fund in an aggregate principal amount of $50 million.

Such a large amount, one would have thought, would have been in the mind of the Minister of Finance when a question was put to him a few weeks ago as to whether or not the government had made a loan to the unemployment insurance commission. But the minister did not remember, and I call the attention of the house to the significant date, April 2, 1959. That date is significant for reasons I will ultimately show. I pass over the first recommendation as not being immediately relevant, but here is recommendation No. 2:

> That the said notes be signed by a commissioner and the secretary of the commission and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

This is an order in council dated April 2, 1959. And the rate specified is to be 5 per cent per annum. That percentage, Mr. Speaker, was imposed by a government which is opposed, so it says, to tight money. It was imposed by a government which promised to reduce interest rates after the very document which was tabled in the report of August 18 revealed that the unemployment insurance commission held fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth victory loan bonds which bore a rate of interest of 3 per cent. And this government, dedicated to the principle of easy money, nevertheless imposed upon the unemployment insurance commission a rate of 5 per cent. And then there is this most unusual arrangement set out in paragraph 3, namely:

> That the loan be additionally secured by pledge of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds with a market value of at least 105 per cent of the loan.

In other words, the government's own body is saddled with a fixed rate. There is no market play here. What is open on the security market to the people of Canada generally holding bonds is denied for some reason by the Minister of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission with respect to the kind of yield that it might expect from the sale of its own securities. The Minister of Finance would lend this money, but the security must have a market value; not the market value which is current, but a market value of at least 105 per cent of the loan.

Again, here is a most unusual arrangement. Paragraph 4 states that the loan is to be repaid from the proceeds of the sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance, or from the cash resources of the fund. What authority is there for this kind of imposition "at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance"? I say that the Minister of Finance must tell us what authority he has for exercising this kind of authority. There certainly is no statutory justification for his making that kind of condition with respect to such a loan.

But the most interesting part of this document, as I said at the outset, is the date. Under sections 84, 85 and 86 of the Unemployment Insurance Act the minister is given authority under certain conditions, which I do not propose to analyse now, to extend credit to the unemployment insurance commission. I hope that hon. members will peruse these sections carefully in order to ascertain whether in fact the minister acted in accordance with the act. But I call the attention of the house particularly to section 87:

> The Minister of Finance shall report annually to parliament the state of the fund as of the 31st day of March last preceding and the transactions under section 86 during the fiscal year ending on that day; and the operations of the fund shall be set out in the public accounts in such detail as the Minister of Finance may decide.

Now the Minister of Finance did comply with this section of the act. He did report annually to parliament on the state of the fund as of the 31st day of March. But is it conceivable that on the thirtieth day of March, let us say, the Minister of Finance did not know of the intention on the part of the government to make a loan to the unemployment insurance commission in the amount of $50 million? Is it conceivable that the Minister of Finance or his advisers were not aware of the fact that there was about to be a transaction moving from the government through the Department of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission covering a loan of no less than $50 million? I suggest that the reason why this particular order in council is dated April 2, 1959 is because this government, with its large deficit this year and last year, and saddled by its promises to reduce these deficits while at the same time supplying additional benefits, would have been embarrassed by having to make once again in the report which it had to table on March 31 some reference to a further expenditure to the unemployment insurance commission in the amount of $50 million.

And what is amazing is that the actual transfer of funds took place on April 7. The order in council is dated April 2. There is an actual transfer of funds from the Minister of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission on April 7, and on April 9 the Minister of Finance delivered his annual budget to the nation. In that budget he referred to the unemployment insurance fund. In a single paragraph he mentioned that the fund had suffered some diminution as a result of the invasions made on it. He made no reference whatsoever to the fact that only two days earlier he had transferred some $50 million to the commission. And, as he said today, that was not the kind of thing to which he had to refer in his annual financial statement to the nation. That is perhaps a clear indication that the Minister of Finance has not fully understood the obligations of a minister of finance. But if he did not mention it on April 9, can he find any excuse whatsoever in the light of the debate which ensued, for his not advising the house before the budget debate concluded that there had been a transfer of this large amount. The budget debate concluded on April 22, and from April 9 to April 22 it is inexplicable, in view of the repeated references which were made to the unemployment insurance fund, that the Minister of Finance should not have advised the house of this heavy borrowing by the fund.

As I said, the budget debate ended on April 22. And then the most amazing thing happened. On the next day we had another order in council providing for a further loan to the unemployment insurance commission. The budget debate had concluded on the 22nd and the minister was, then, safe from any likely interrogation as to whether or not moneys had been transferred from the Department of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission. It will not be forgotten that during the budget debate I asked the Minister of Finance whether or not the unemployment insurance commission had lost any money as a result of its forced participation in the bond conversion scheme of the government of Canada. The Minister of Finance said that that was not the kind of question obviously that could be replied to; that it was not in the public interest. One did not disclose the contents of the portfolios of those holding government securities, was his answer. I tried the question another way. I sent a written question to the Minister of Labour. Whether or not there was collaboration between the two, the information which was denied me by the Minister of Finance was supplied by the Minister of Labour when he told us that the unemployment insurance commission as a result of its forced participation in the bond conversion scheme of this government had lost over $10 million. That was the kind of information that could not be disclosed by the Minister of Finance so we had been told. I suppose the reason is now clear because, as I say, the next day, the 23rd, we had an order in council providing for an additional loan to the unemployment insurance commission of $30 million.

In the month of April we had two loans made by the government to the unemployment insurance commission in the amount of $80 million and the Minister of Finance today when asked whether or not such transfers had been made or whether any authority for loans of this character had been extended said he did not know. Is it conceivable that the Minister of Finance could not have known of these two transactions? He owes to the house an explanation as to why he did not include this information concerning the loans of $50 million and $30 million in the budget and why he did not reveal it to the house after the budget debate particularly when the Minister of Labour had revealed the extent of the loss as a result of bond conversion participation.

The terms of this order in council are interesting. The notes were to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, the same condition as in the other order in council. The loans were to be additionally secured by pledge of the government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds with a market value of at least 105 per cent of the loans. A further condition was that the loans be repaid from the proceeds of sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance or from the cash resources of the fund. This is a most unusual condition.

Why the Minister of Finance? What authority has he for giving himself this sole discretion? What statutory right exists for such an imposition? We have the right to ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour for an explanation of these particular loans. Why was not the unemployment insurance commission allowed to cash its own securities? If it had done that it would possibly have been able to make some money or, depending on the state of the market, it might have lost some money. In any event it had securities in its own possession. Its portfolio is a matter for the public to see. Why did the Minister of Finance find it necessary to make loans when the commission could easily have made its position liquid? I say it was only because the investment committee about which I am going to have a word to say was composed in such a manner as to make available to the commission only one course and that was a course that would not in any way have embarrassed the administration, by selling bonds below their face value.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

What other explanation can there be unless, depending on the state of the market on that particular day, the commission could have sold the bonds at a profit? In any event I have no doubt that the reason for these transactions was that the government did not want to be embarrassed in any way and therefore the government was not going to allow the unemployment insurance commission to make transactions as normally it would in disposing of its securities in a manner that was conducive to its own interests.

It is interesting to note that section 20 of the Unemployment Insurance Act provides that investment transactions under sections 85, 86 and 87 shall be made only on the authorization of an investment committee of three members, one nominated by the Minister of Labour, one nominated by the Minister of Finance, and the governor of the Bank of Canada. It happens that those nominated include the deputy minister of finance and the deputy minister of labour. Does anyone think that this investment committee as presently constituted in the face of the present government's financial policy was free to allow the unemployment insurance commission to take the kind of action that would provide some liquidity from its securities?

I think the Minister of Finance owes the house an explanation of these various transactions. I ask him now some questions to which I think replies should be given before this debate concludes. What amounts were loaned by the Minister of Finance to the unemployment insurance fund during the months of April and May to the present date? Are these the only orders in council? Are these the only transactions made by the government to the commission? What issues of government bonds were pledged by the commission to secure these loans? At the time these loans were made was there outstanding to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund not sufficient for the payment of benefits under the act as required by paragraph 1 of section 86 of the act? Will the Minister of Finance report to the house on the amounts of various securities including treasury bills held by the unemployment insurance fund as of March 31, 1959? What were the purchases and sales of various obligations of or guaranteed by the government of Canada including treasury bills for each month of the last fiscal year and at what prices were these transactions made? What were the amounts of each victory loan issue held by the unemployment insurance fund sold during the conversion operation or converted into each conversion bond issue? Those are questions which in this matter we feel have great relevancy to the present situation.

Mr. Regier: Would the hon. member permit a question? I think most of us understood that there was money in the unemployment insurance commission fund. The hon. member is now referring to the unemployment insurance commission borrowing money from the Minister of Finance. Why would the commission borrow if it had lots of money?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, that is the very question with which I have been dealing. I said that the unemployment insurance commission has securities in the amount of many millions of dollars. If it required cash to meet benefit obligations all it had to do was liquidate those securities. Why was that liquidation not permitted? Was it because the government felt that the consequences would be embarrassing to it with regard to its particular financial policy? I do not know. I am simply asking the government to explain why it made these transactions. I am also asking the government to clearly establish that in the face of this situation it had the authority to extend this credit at a time when the unemployment insurance commission was in a position to meet its own obligations.

No one in this house questions the value of unemployment insurance. We sitting in the opposition under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) belong to a group that was responsible for presenting this legislation to the house in the dark days of the war. We were the first to introduce the principle of supplementary payments and we replenished the fund whenever we did provide for these supplementary payments. We support the principle of supplementary payments in the face of the serious unemployment problem that now confronts Canada; but we say that those payments given to people out of work to help to keep them alive should be borne by all of the taxpayers of the country and not imposed on the workers and on the employers of Canada exclusively.

We do not quarrel with the necessity of meeting the exigencies of this fund in the face of the perilous position in which we find it. We say that this perilous position could have been mitigated if the government had taken the right kind of steps to replenish the fund at the time they invaded it for the legitimate objective of providing supplementary benefits. We say that this bill is deficient because it imposes an abnormally high rate of contribution on the workers and on the employers of our country at a time when they are heavily taxed, without providing compensatory benefits certainly in proportion to the increased rates of contribution.

We say that this measure is only half right; we say that this measure does not give us the confidence which otherwise we would possess if we were satisfied that there had been the fullest consultation between the government and the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission. We say we would have greater confidence in this measure if we had been satisfied that some of the recommendations made by the advisory committee had been recognized by this government, if there had been an increase in the benefits to those who were called upon to pay the additional contributions. For these reasons I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house declines to proceed with a bill, the terms of which do not provide that the contribution from the government to the fund be made equal to one-half that of the existing combined contributions from employers and employees."

The terms of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, are in harmony with the recommendations unanimously made by the unemployment insurance advisory committee in the summer of 1958.

Mr. Speaker: I expect the debate will continue. I will take this amendment under advisement.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, like yourself, our group would like to take this amendment under advisement and therefore I am not in a position to say at this time what our reaction will be. We received the amendment only a moment ago. However, I have an approach along these lines to the bill as proposed to the house at this time. Only recently the minister advised us of the report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

It was very unlucky for me, Mr. Speaker, that I was invited to a reception at Government House over the dinner hour and therefore the recent release of the minister was not available to me until after eight o'clock. However, I do not want to be unduly harsh with the minister. If I were minister of labour, Mr. Speaker, I would never consider a debate in the house of a bill that I was proposing, or of my estimates, unless the ministers most responsible for levels of employment were with me in the house and were willing to share the burden with me. We know, and I think all of us realize, the humane qualities of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). However, I feel that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) ought to be here and ought to absorb the brunt of the attack in matters of employment and unemployment.

As the Minister of Labour knows, he is not in the front row of the government; he is in the second row, and his responsibility is to administer the acts having to do with labour. He has very little to do with levels of employment or unemployment in the nation. I therefore hope the minister will not take the attacks from opposition ranks as a personal affront, as he will realize that these are attacks on the government as such.

If I had any adverse things to say about the minister they would be that I have completely failed to understand how the minister, knowing him as well as I do, would have the nerve to file a report today that ought to have been filed early last autumn.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member heard the discussion which took place earlier on the relevancy of the debate on whether this report should have been tabled under the statute or not and how it came to be tabled. I hope he will keep that in mind. It applies equally to him.

Mr. Regier: I shall abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but at the same time I shall appeal to the minister's sense of fair play. I hope he realizes the handicap that the opposition is under when we are asked to discuss amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act when the very essence of any possible amendments were contained in the report of his own advisory committee as it is established under the law, and which he had and saw fit to table many, many months after the time to table the report had passed. I am not saying that this was done intentionally. However, it places the opposition in this house under a very severe handicap indeed, and if we are to have any respect for the functions of the house—

Mr. Bigg: That would be new.

Mr. Regier: —the opposition ought to be placed at least in a position where they are able to consider the recommendations that the minister has received as to amendments to this act at the time at which we were supposed to receive them. In the amendments the minister is advocating added burdens upon the workers and employers of Canada. It is merely another case, as I indicated on another matter this afternoon, of again adding to the tax burden of the people of the country. I hope the minister and the government will realize that the way out of our difficulty is not by adding to the burdens of the working people of the country. The solution is an expansion of our economy and greater employment. When we have greater employment, more people paying into the unemployment insurance fund and fewer people enjoying the benefits of the fund we will work our way out of the problem we are now seized with much more readily than if the only solution is to add to the burdens of those who are still usefully employed.

The minister is asking us to agree to a 30 per cent additional imposition on the workers and yet only 1 per cent of that additional burden is necessary to meet the extension of the benefits from 36 to 52 weeks. The average worker in Canada is being asked to pay 30 per cent more into the fund than he has been paying. However, if and when he becomes unemployed he will receive nothing by way of additional benefits with the exception that if he is unemployed for more than 36 weeks he will have the assurance that he can obtain benefits for 52 weeks.

Actually what the minister is asking the workers of Canada to do is to pay more money into the pool so that the government of Canada will not be faced with a completely denuded and depleted unemployment insurance fund within a very short time. Only 1 per cent of the 30 per cent is needed to pay for the extension from 36 weeks to 52 weeks of seasonal benefits. All the rest of the added impost on the workers of Canada is intended to replenish the fund. The minister should realize, and I gather he does, that the inadequacies of his own government are the cause of the economic recession. They are the cause of the unusually high level of unemployment and are responsible for the heavy burden being imposed on the unemployment insurance fund. Yet the minister is asking the workers of Canada to make up for the lack of adequate government policy.

Our group agrees that the seasonal benefits should be extended from 36 to 52 weeks. I should like to make the plea at this time that the act be amended in such a way that a gradually rising scale of benefits will be available. It is all right to ask an unemployed person to get by on $24 or $30 a week for a limited number of weeks. However, when his period of unemployment extends to months then the need for a higher weekly benefit is obvious. I believe that the act should be amended to provide for a graduated scale so that if a person is unemployed for three, four, five or six months he will receive a higher weekly income than if he is unemployed only for a limited number of weeks.

I also believe that the act should be amended along the lines of the resolution placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) in which he advocates that enterprises which are vulnerable and may only continue in operation for a limited period of time should pay an extraordinary amount into the fund so that if what is commonly called a ghost town develops, if a mine or other enterprise completely closes down, there will be some help available to the insured workers over and above their normal weekly unemployment insurance benefits.

I should also like to have seen in the amendments that the minister is now proposing the adoption of the philosophy that in the Unemployment Insurance Act we have the best machinery yet devised for looking after the welfare of our unemployed. I regret that under the act as it now stands the employable unemployed, after the expiry of a certain number of weeks, are advised that there is no more assistance available and that if they need help in order to maintain their homes and their families they must now apply to the social welfare office of their local municipal government. I believe that the Unemployment Insurance Act provides us with machinery that might adequately look after the welfare of all employable Canadians. I have advocated on a number of occasions that the act should be so amended so that when a man's regular benefits have expired he will continue to receive benefits from the unemployment insurance commission. I also advocate that the unemployment insurance commission should be recompensed for these benefits out of the consolidated revenue fund. The economy as a whole should absorb the expense.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) is not here and has been absent on many other such occasions. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is absent. They always leave the Minister of Labour to absorb the brunt of the attack. The Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to be here. He ought to show this house how, if we will now agree to the amendments proposed, his plan for the expansion of trade will relieve the problem a few months hence. The Minister of Finance ought to be here and ought to explain that, while this added taxation may be necessary at this moment, he has plans whereby there will be an economic expansion in the nation so that a year hence we might have hopes of reducing the impost on the working people of the country.

Our contention is that we should have in Canada an ever rising standard of living. It has never been our philosophy to pull anyone down. We do not believe that we build a better society that way, rather all our efforts ought to be directed toward bringing everyone up. We believe that an expanding economy and a policy of full employment would eliminate many of the difficulties with which the Minister of Labour is faced. We regret very much that the Minister of Labour has to be held responsible for the proposed amendments to the act. We do contend, however, that the Minister of Labour is offering nothing to the working people of Canada except an added imposition, an imposition that may be necessary because of the inadequacies of the government in supplying us with an expanding economy and full employment.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I doubt very much whether this amendment is a proper amendment. Your Honour will notice that it reads that this house decline to proceed with a bill, the terms of which do not provide—and so on. Now, surely that is covered by a ruling to be found on page 170 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, where he says:

> An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

This amendment is a straight negative that the house decline to proceed with a bill. How can you get an amendment that is more truly a direct negative than that? I refer Your Honour also to paragraph 14 on that same page of Beauchesne:

> An amendment which would produce the same result as if the original motion were simply negatived is out of order.

Hon. members in the two opposition parties are free to vote against this bill, and they may produce quite a few reasons why they propose to vote against it, but surely they are not entitled to move amendments on the basis of those arguments that they use against the bill. However, this is exactly what this amendment seeks to do. Then, I refer Your Honour also to page 279 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 389, the opening sentence of which reads as follows:

> A motion opposing the second reading of a bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee. Alterations which may be affected by amending the clauses of the bill cannot be moved on the second reading.

We have only had a short time to check up the rules in regard to this amendment, but I do suggest that even on the citations which I have read the amendment is clearly out of order.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I be allowed to say that it is quite clear from what the house leader has said that he has only had a short time to consider this amendment. It is evident from what he has said because he has not even cited one paragraph that deals with the amendment. He has referred to three paragraphs which are so general in nature that they do not meet the point which the hon. member is trying to make, namely that this amendment is out of order. My submission to you, Mr. Speaker, is that all this amendment does is to say that the government should have acceded to the request contained in a report tabled in this house by the Minister of Labour, and one at least of the recommendations in that report suggested that the contributions of the government to the fund should be made equal to one-half—

Mr. Pallett: This is not on the point of order at all.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend wants to raise a point of order, he can do so after I have resumed my seat.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier has the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going on to say, before I was interrupted, that the amendment seeks to carry out the terms or at least one of the terms of the report tabled in this house, to the effect that the contributions of the government to the unemployment insurance fund be made equal to one-half that of the existing combined contributions from employers and employees.

I thought the leader of the house was going to indicate that this amendment meant an added expenditure—

Mr. Green: Perhaps that is an added reason.

Mr. Chevrier: —and that because of that it was out of order. It does not mean any such thing. It means a reduction in contribution, on the contrary, and because of that it seems to me that this amendment is in order.

Mr. Speaker: If anybody wants to use the remaining minutes to discuss the matter, I shall be glad to hear him. I shall defer my decision on this point until tomorrow, taking into account all that has been said. I would refer hon. members on both sides to citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It seems to me that this amendment, as it stands, is one of those so-called declaratory amendments which declines the reading of the bill the second time and for reasons which could not be moved at the committee stage. However, I shall defer that matter.

Mr. Herridge: We, in this group—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Fort William wish to speak?

Mr. Chevrier: It is not on the point of order.

Mr. Herridge: We in this group, Mr. Speaker, were pleased to hear you say previously that you wished further time to consider this amendment. We were pleased also to hear you repeat that statement just now. We are quite in agreement with that. We trust that you will not be stampeded by any of the remarks made previous to this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and, if the leader can tell us, what the government intends to do for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with this debate; then take item No. 6 on today's order paper, the second reading of an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; then the resolution which appears on government notices of motion today having to do with the Bretton Woods agreement; then item No. 15, a resolution concerning the convention covering the abolition of forced labour; then, item No. 13, a resolution preceding a measure on the Defence Services Pension Act; item No. 2, second reading of an act to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of New Brunswick respecting Indian reservations; item No. 11, a resolution approving the convention on the nationality of married women.

After that, we will take the estimates of the Department of Labour, and then the estimates of the Department of Public Works. There may have to be some change for Wednesday, but in any event we start with that tomorrow, at least.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it the intention to proceed with this work in that order during the course of the whole week?

Mr. Green: I cannot say about the order on Wednesday, but tomorrow we will proceed in this order. There is a chance that if the report of the special committee considering the Canadian National Railways and the Trans-Canada Air Lines is tabled we may go on with the resolution which appears today under government notices of motion concerning the expenditures of the C.N.R.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I say on that point that that is a very involved item of legislation, and if the printed records of the committee are not available until tomorrow I do not think the house leader would want us to go into the capital expenditures of the C.N.R. as rapidly as was suggested.

Mr. Green: We would meet the wishes of the members opposite with regard to that.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SEAWAY AUTHORITY—SCOW DELIVERIES FROM KINGSTON SHIPYARDS

Question No. 333—Mr. Argue:

Questions

1. Has the St. Lawrence seaway authority taken delivery of any scows from Kingston shipyards since January 1, 1956?

2. If so, on what dates were they delivered, what official of the seaway authority accepted their delivery in each case, and what was the date of the contract under which they were delivered?

3. Have any reports been made by inspectors of the seaway authority or other inspectors, to the effect that these scows did not meet the specifications agreed upon in the contract?

4. If so, (a) What was the date of each report, and the name, position and personnel rating of the person who signed each report? (b) To whom was each report submitted? (c) In what respect did the scows, fail to meet specifications of the contract as outlined in each report?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes, conditional upon subsequent completion of work (as indicated in answer 4 (c)), there being an urgent need for the scows.

2. Delivered September 9, 1958. Accepted by R. W. Willis, structural engineer, and R. M. Houldsworth, inspector. Contract was dated June 27, 1957.

3. Answered by 4.

4. (a) Certificate to the effect that with the exception of the items mentioned in (c), the whole of the work had been completed to his satisfaction in accordance with the terms of the contract and the governing plans and specifications, was given on October 22, 1958, by J. B. Stirling, chief inspector, the St. Lawrence seaway authority; (b) Submitted to R. W. Willis, structural engineer, who resubmitted it to the chief engineer on the same date; (c) Only in respect to the painting of the interior of the two scows, and the sandblasting and painting of the deck of one of the scows, which work was not completed.

SEAWAY AUTHORITY—SCOW CONTRACTS WITH KINGSTON SHIPYARDS

Question No. 334—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the St. Lawrence seaway authority entered into any contract with Kingston shipyards for scows at any time since January 1, 1956?

Questions

2. If so, (a) What was the date of each contract, the date of delivery specified, the contract price, and the terms of each contract? (b) What payments have been made to date under terms of each such contract?

3. Was payment of extras over and above the contract price asked for?

4. If so, what were the terms of the agreement in this respect, and the amount of money agreed on?

5. Has any payment for extras been made to date?

6. If so, on what date were these extra payments made, for what contract, for what purpose, what was the amount of each payment and who authorized it?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) June 27, 1957; date of delivery specified, September 1, 1958; contract price $179,602; contract contained applicable provisions of standard form, progress payments authorized; (b) payments to date, $172,102.

3. Yes.

4. No extra payment yet authorized by authority.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 5.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS FOR BENEFIT OF PROVINCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Question No. 385—Mr. Racine:

1. What have been the federal contributions to each province for payments for the benefit of provincial institutions (a) university grants; (b) grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal government property, during the fiscal years 1956-57 1957-58, 1958-59, and estimated amounts for the fiscal year 1959-60?

2. In what fiscal year was each of these payments inaugurated?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. The federal government does not make contributions to provinces for the benefit of universities or municipalities. In the case of the university grants program a lump sum payment is made to the national conference of Canadian universities which is responsible for the distribution among qualifying institutions.

(a) The conference advises that the amounts paid out to institutions within each province are as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 12, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO FORMER SPEAKER, HON. ALBERT SEVIGNY

Mr. Speaker: I would not ordinarily take the liberty of interrupting the house to welcome a former speaker; but since the gentleman in question was the speaker of this house in 1916, 43 years ago, and is now chief justice of the province of Quebec and apparently in good health and not a frequent visitor, I think the house might give me the liberty of expressing on its behalf our welcome and good wishes.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

Second report of sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping—Mr. Tassé (for Mr. Rowe).

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—SUGGESTED PRIORITIES FOR CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the delays which have taken place on the Welland canal, I should like to know whether it is the intention of the government to establish a system of priorities which would give the right of way to ships of Canadian registry over those of foreign registry.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The answer is that there is no such intention at the present time, but this matter is under study. I might also add for the information of the house that at this moment there are only six Canadian ships waiting at Port Weller for entry into the Welland canal.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has the minister given any consideration to the installation of sector type gates in the lock at Thorold, where I am informed there has been quite a bit of delay? These sector type gates are similar to those used on the new locks of the seaway. If they were installed I believe they would speed up the movement of ships very considerably.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I inspected that lock yesterday and I was not advised of any slow-down in the operation of the lock gates. There was a slow-down of 16 hours during which the whole canal was stopped because a Canadian ship went out of control and ran into a safety gate, but that had nothing to do with the type of lock or the type of gate. That was the fault of the ship in question, but I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister comment on, or tell us whether any consideration is being given to, the protests of some Canadian interests over the fact that foreign ships are not required to carry pilots throughout the whole of the lakes, and whether any consideration is being given to putting that rule into effect?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have heard no such protests.

TRADE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY UNITED KINGDOM TRADE COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of his absence I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. My question arises out of a statement made yesterday in Vancouver by the United Kingdom trade commissioner. The trade commissioner is reported to have said that the United Kingdom would definitely put pounds before loyalty to the commonwealth if Russia undercuts world prices. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if this policy came about as a result of the 15 per cent diversion policy of the new Conservative government.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that before the hon. member phrases his question in that way he should first satisfy himself as to the accuracy of the statement attributed to Mr. McGregor, the senior United Kingdom trade commissioner in Canada. I have information that the statement attributed to him was not made in that form at all. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. McGregor was giving a press conference in Vancouver and the reporter from the Vancouver Sun put to him this question:

> Do British businessmen put pounds before loyalty to the commonwealth?

Mr. McGregor never used this expression, as I am informed by the United Kingdom high commissioner, and his answer was merely to the effect that British businessmen did trade with Russia and had been so trading for a hundred years in the course of ordinary commercial practice. When the newspaper in question publishes the article under the caption "U. K. Buys Red Goods" I think it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the actual statement does not correspond with the headline or with the question of the hon. gentleman.

I may add as well, Mr. Speaker, so far as this matter relates to commonwealth trade, that the United Kingdom high commissioner, since this matter appeared in the press this morning, has issued a statement referring to the conclusions reached at the commonwealth trade and economic conference at Montreal last autumn. He concludes his statement with this sentence:

> Within a multilateral trading system over the widest possible area, Britain remains determined to increase its trade with other commonwealth countries to the maximum possible extent.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister what he is reading?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said this is a statement given to me by the United Kingdom high commissioner.

LEAD AND ZINC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS IN NEW YORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce may I ask the Minister of Finance if he or perhaps some other member of the government is in a position to make a statement regarding the discussions on lead and zinc held under United Nations auspices at New York last week.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think the house will agree that the question ought to be answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself on his return. I shall be glad to bring it to his attention.

BRIDGES

WELLAND CANAL—REQUEST FOR NEW HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the automobile traffic tie-ups caused by the additional traffic through the Welland ship canal, will the minister recommend to his colleagues federal financial participation in the construction of a new high level bridge over the Welland canal at the Queen Elizabeth highway?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of any automobile tie-ups due to traffic going through the Welland canal at the present time.

Mr. McIlraith: You had better get around.

Mr. Hees: The delays are due to ships waiting to enter the canal at Port Weller, not in the canal itself. Once the ships are in the canal they go through in perfectly normal fashion.

Mr. Hellyer: I was not referring to the ships. I was talking about automobiles. Perhaps they put the bridge down for the minister. I think he knows the bridge I refer to.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I think it would do the hon. member a lot of good if instead of talking off the top of his head, he would go there and have a look at what he is talking about.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he is aware of the fact that I was there about a week ago. I did not get the red carpet treatment, and there was a considerable traffic tie-up.

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member was there, had his eyes open and watched what was going on he would have seen that the canal was working in perfectly normal fashion. The crews and the locks are working at top speed and full capacity. The fact remains that the canal has become very popular as more ships than were expected are using it. The canal is in the position of a popular girl at a party, with the boys simply having to line up for dances.

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly what I said.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SEATTLE, WASH.—REQUEST FOR CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION FACILITIES AT AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): With air travel increasing rapidly between Canada and the United States, and with the summer tourist season approaching, will the Minister of National Revenue give early consideration to the establishment at the air terminal in Seattle, Washington, of facilities for handling customs and immigration, thus eliminating much inconvenience and delay at the port of Vancouver?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will take this matter under consideration, consult with the officials of the department, and give a reply later to the hon. member.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING LAY-OFFS NORTH OF GUELPH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that many C.N.R. employees in the Palmerston area are losing their jobs due to dieselization, automation and transfer of work to other points, and that another lay-off will affect men with 30 to 40 years' seniority who have given their lives to the service, will the government indicate what the policy is with regard to the C.N.R. north of Guelph?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): This seems to be my day, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that as a result of dieselization there was a certain rearrangement of staff in the area north of Guelph. A total of 15 employees were involved, 13 of whom were able to exercise their seniority rights in accordance with the appropriate wage agreement. The institution of improved passenger train service in the Bruce peninsula through the use of rail diesel cars effective June 21 will also mean certain adjustments, but all the men involved will be able to exercise seniority rights. It is the general practice of the management to cushion the impact of technological changes so far as is possible and to assist the placing of employees in other forms of work.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—STATEMENT ON REPORTED CHANGE IN ROUTE OF PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in my absence the hon. member for Peace River asked two questions concerning the proposed Great Slave lake railway line. I can only say at the present time that no decision has yet been reached as to the route of the proposed line, and assure the hon. member that in the consideration being given the matter by the government all relevant factors are being taken into account.

Mr. McIlraith: No decision until after the Alberta election.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.—REPORTED INTENTION TO USE U.S. SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that the crown-owned Northern Transportation Company intends to use ships of United States registry in Arctic work this year? If so, would he assure the house that other Canadian companies will be given the opportunity to do at least some of this work before these United States ships are brought in?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of that fact; neither was I given any notice of this question. I will be glad to look into this and give the hon. member an answer as soon as I have done so.

HIGHWAYS

TRAFFIC DELAYS OCCASIONED BY CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE AT MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the government doing anything to reduce the delays of some 10 weeks to highway traffic at Montreal caused by the construction of a diversionary railway span by the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The government and the Canadian National Railways have looked into all possible means of reducing or minimizing delay. The only plan of which I know that has been put forward for so doing would cost over a million dollars, and neither the government nor the Canadian National has decided to go ahead with such a plan.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the government or the minister give consideration to the construction of a Bailey bridge, which would substantially reduce those delays of 10 weeks this year and perhaps much longer next year?

Mr. Hees: As I said, the construction of an auxiliary bridge has been considered, but the cost of such a bridge is believed to be very high.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

UNITED STATES—STATEMENT ON REPORTED FAILURE OF CANADIAN FIRM TO SECURE TURBINE CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment briefly on a question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

This concerned the supply of hydraulic turbines for a dam being constructed by the United States army engineers, for which a bid was submitted by a Canadian company. Specifically, the hon. member asked whether the procedure for evaluating bids which was being followed by the United States army engineers, as reported in the press, was at variance with the arrangements for production sharing.

The answer is no. The production sharing arrangements apply only to the production and procurement of defence supplies. The turbines required do not fall into this category, being part of a civilian project. The United States army corps of engineers are involved, not because of any defence implications but only because it is the practice of the United States government to make them responsible for the execution of works of this nature.

I would add that although there is no direct defence production interest in this matter, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce should be the one to make any further comments if further comments are necessary.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister not aware of the fact that national security is one consideration governing the award of these contracts in the United States? Could it not therefore be assumed that this had defence implications and be brought under the terms of the agreement?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the Leader of the Opposition I may say that the information I have received is that the United States army engineers always work on these projects, these dams, and the project is not of a defensive nature at all.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Is the minister aware that the United States electrical manufacturers have applied to Washington for a declaration that this is in fact a project related to defence in the United States?

Mr. O'Hurley: Is the hon. member for Trinity referring to this dam?

Mr. Hellyer: No; the installation of the turbines, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'Hurley: Well, Mr. Speaker, according to the information we received it is not a defence project at all; it is a civilian project.

Mr. McIlraith: Will you find out?

Mr. O'Hurley: We certainly did.

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

FINANCE

REPORTED INTENTION TO CURTAIL PERSONAL AND COMMERCIAL LENDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware of an intention on the part of the Bank of Canada and others to curtail personal and commercial lending at this time?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. I saw a newspaper article to that effect this morning. I can only conclude that it was completely speculative, because I have no knowledge of any such intention on the part of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): If the minister should, in the next day or two, receive from the governor of the Bank of Canada a copy of a letter directed to the banks along these lines, would he inform the house about its contents?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would expect to, unless the letter should be of a confidential nature.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROVIDE LOW COST HOUSING IN NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I wonder if the minister has any knowledge of the repeated accusations that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has failed to provide low cost housing in the hinterland areas, specifically in the northwestern Ontario region?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) asked me a similar question having to do with the town of Atikokan. I think all the complaints have come from that town. The question asked yesterday was as follows:

> Can the minister inform the house whether down payments on low cost housing in remote areas, such as the town of Atikokan, are on a par with down payments asked in larger centres?

Perhaps I could deal with the two questions in the one answer. There are three factors involved in the determination of down payments. The first factor is the loan terms available under the National Housing Act; 90 per cent of the first $12,000 of the appraised value of a dwelling and 70 per cent of the remainder. These terms are the same in all areas, large or small.

The second factor is the appraised value. The National Housing Act provides that the corporation will determine appraised values for lending purposes. Appraisal levels are adjusted on the 1st of January and the 1st of June each year, as a result of surveys of material costs and wage rates conducted in the corporation's branch office areas. Because residential construction costs in small towns are usually not less than in neighbouring urban areas, the amount of loan in such towns is usually as great as or greater than in urban areas. For example, the loan level in Atikokan is 8 per cent higher than in Fort William and 10 per cent higher than in Winnipeg. Appraisal levels in Atikokan were adjusted upward by 5 per cent on the 1st of January as a result of the survey of residential costs carried out in the area late in 1958.

The third factor affecting the amount of the down payment is the actual selling price of the dwelling. This is something over which the government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no control. It depends on market conditions, the kind of house and so on. It is the difference between this selling price and the loan which determines the down payment.

In view of the rather bitter attack made by a real estate agent and builder in Atikokan on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I should like to add the following. The housing standards prescribed by the division of building research of the national research council do not mitigate against minimum standard or low cost housing in Atikokan or in any other community. Houses similar to the C.M.H.C. minimum house, which the corporation is prepared to approve, may be built in Atikokan without basements, and indeed without foundation walls. The house may be built on concrete posts. It need not be equipped with electrical services or plumbing, if such facilities are not available in the community. It is known that this house can be built to sell for $8,000 including land, and equipped with both electrical and full plumbing services.

Mr. Benidickson: How much?

Mr. Green: For $8,000. It is also known that this house, similarly equipped, can be built to sell for $9,500 including land in Prince George and Dawson Creek, two of the highest cost areas in Canada. As yet there has not been an application for a minimum house of this type in Atikokan. A loan for the construction of a house similar to the corporation's minimum house would be approved to any creditworthy borrower in Atikokan, Kenora—although I do not suppose they would want minimum houses there—

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Green: —Dryden, Geraldton, Marathon or any other community in northern Ontario.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I know the procedure here. The minister is naturally dependent upon advice given to him by his officials. May I just say that I think, in referring to a builder, he was rather unfair in that the person who is best known—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: My question is this. Has the minister noted that one of the chief supporters of this government in northwestern Ontario declined to accept a directorship in the Ontario chamber of commerce because he felt that that body, contrary to what they did last year, were not prepared to advance the same recommendations along those lines?

Mr. Green: I think this is the builder and real estate agent to whom I was referring. I really was not a bit interested in his politics. I repeat that he made a very strong statement, and a statement which I considered to be unfair.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, I think the minister's statement was unfair, because—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think this matter should not be continued. I see that it is not.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works, in view of the answer he has already given, whether he is in a position to confirm or deny definitely that officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been instructed to discourage the construction of these so-called minimum houses in any area of northern Ontario?

Mr. Green: All the instructions I have given to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been just exactly the opposite. I have encouraged the constuction of minimum houses, not only in northern Ontario but in every part of Canada where they can be built.

Mr. Garland: Is the minister in a position to know if his officials are carrying out his orders?

Mr. Green: If the hon. member will give me the name of any official who is not carrying out this instruction I will be very glad to make inquiries.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Does the minister know of any opposition from real estate people other than those mentioned already in connection with this minimum house?

Mr. Speaker: I should scarcely have thought that was a matter within the administrative responsibility of the minister unless the question means, have there been any communications.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Has this been drawn to the minister's attention?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC MINISTER JOHNSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)?

La Presse reported yesterday that, at a meeting of the Catholic Hospitals Association of Canada, the Minister of National Health and Welfare met the representative from the province of Quebec, Hon. Daniel Johnson, Minister of Hydraulic Resources, and on this occasion, the provincial minister told him, regarding Quebec's acceptance—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Question! Question! Order!

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: —of the federal plan for hospital insurance—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is indulging in somewhat extended preliminaries. Perhaps he could ask his question.

Mr. Denis: I was just preparing the minister to answer my question.

(Translation):

He is reported as having said this:

If and when we accept to participate in your plan, it will be with the determination to obtain much more than is being offered at the present time. It will be a hard bargain.

My question is this: Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare obtain further particulars on this matter from the provincial minister? If so, what are they?

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is completely out of order—

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —because whatever conversations I may have had with the minister of resources for the province of Quebec took place at a dinner, and they were of a very private nature. It was a purely personal discussion.

Mr. Denis: I think it is very important—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already taken considerable liberties with his question. He knows he is not entitled to insist upon an answer, as I have said from time to time. He is entitled, perhaps, to a reply, but he has had his reply.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might ask the Acting Minister of Justice if the rumour is correct that a chief justice of Newfoundland has been appointed.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Minister of Justice): I am very sorry, but I cannot confirm this rumour.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF U.S. SCOOTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the minister any progress report to make about his American scooters?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): If the hon. member would preserve his impatience until my estimates are under consideration, I will be glad to give him all the details.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Starr for the second reading of Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-43, perhaps I should present to the house the problem which arose over the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), in the following terms:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "this house declines to proceed with a bill, the terms of which do not provide that the contribution from the government to the fund be made equal to one-half that of the existing combined contributions from employers and employees.

Mr. Green: If Your Honour is proposing to give a ruling, may I suggest that you allow hon. members the opportunity to make submissions to you first in respect to this point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I was just about to say that I had given careful consideration to this, but that before dealing with the matter I should be glad to hear any hon. member who feels that the amendment is not in order. I did suggest last evening, it will be recalled, that hon. members might take the opportunity to give the matter some consideration overnight. I say quite frankly that my considerations up to this point lead me to think that the amendment could be sustained. I should be glad to hear any hon. member who would like to contest the regularity of the amendment.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Before you make your ruling, and bearing in mind that there were extensive arguments advanced here last night, I should like to say a few words on this particular point. It seems to me that the opposition in this case had some four alternatives before them with regard to this piece of legislation. First, they could vote against this bill, and they may still do so. Second, they could move a six months' hoist which would, in effect, kill the bill—

Mr. Chevrier: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Third, they could propose that it be sent to a committee for further consideration if they felt there was something substantial which they wanted to change. As a matter of fact, I think in this connection the minister said yesterday that he was quite prepared that this bill should go to a committee.

There is, then, a fourth alternative which is the one the opposition has chosen. They could move a declaratory amendment adverse to the principle of the bill itself. A great deal of the evidence in this case indicates that the amendment as phrased is not adverse to the principle of the bill, and on that ground I believe it should be ruled out of order. In my opinion the opposition by this amendment is trying to have things both ways. Hon. members of the opposition obviously do not want to vote against this bill, but at the same time they want to use this method to hold it up and substantiate the position they are taking.

I wish to refer Your Honour to two references in Beauchesne's fourth edition. The first is a page 279, citation No. 388. I shall not deal at length with the facts referred to in this citation, but reference is made to a bill dealing with co-operation between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway. I refer Your Honour to the last words of the paragraph, in which it is stated:

> The Speaker ruled this out for the reason that, instead of being a declaration of principle, it proposed a postponement of the second reading pending a definite declaration of the house; moreover, it did not purport to disagree with the principle of the bill but it dealt with its provisions and anticipated amendments whch may be moved in committee.

I would also refer you to citation 393, subparagraph 1, at page 280. It reads:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading.

We also have the words of the mover himself as reported at page 3553 of Hansard of May 11:

> We support the principle of supplementary payments in the face of the serious unemployment problem that now confronts Canada; but we say that those payments given to people out of work to help to keep them alive should be borne by all of the taxpayers of the country and not imposed on the workers and on the employers of Canada exclusively.

In effect the mover of the amendment said that he approved of this principle. In all likelihood the hon. member for Laurier will say that if this were reserved and sent to a committee it would be impossible to move an amendment of the type that is involved here. This is not a case where the opposition contend that there is going to be an increase in government expenditure and therefore the amendment could not be moved in committee. At page 3556 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as having said:

> It means a reduced expenditure, on the contrary, and because of that it seems to me that this amendment is in order.

If it is in order in connection with the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East now before the house, then obviously it would be in order in connection with an amendment placed before a committee. We have a situation where the opposition are attempting to do something at this stage, but at the same time if the argument hon. gentlemen opposite advanced last night is correct they would be perfectly in order in attempting to do it at the committee stage. In the face of this fact I would say that the amendment should be ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could elaborate the way in which he considers the principle declared in the amendment is not contrary to the principle of the bill. I had some difficulty in following what he said in that respect.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I would answer Your Honour's question in this way. At the present time this legislation provides for contributions by the government to the unemployment insurance fund. There is no change in principle in connection with the amendment which has been proposed; there is only a change in the amount. Under those circumstances I would submit that an amendment of this kind is clearly not contrary to the principle of the present legislation.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that if I could accept the view which has been so well expressed by the hon. member for York West, that the amendment amounts to nothing more than an attempt to change the amount of the government contribution by reducing it, then I would have to agree that the amendment is not in order because such an amendment could be moved in committee at the committee stage, and it is clear that no amendment to the principle of the bill on second reading can be accepted if it is an amendment that could be put forward when the bill progresses to the committee stage.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, before making your ruling could I redirect your examination to the views expressed last night by the hon. member for Laurier in that respect.

Mr. Speaker: I followed with interest the quotation from the address that was given, but what I have to interpret is the amendment itself and I think I should give my views on it, perhaps not at great length but at sufficient length to indicate the reasoning I am following.

As the hon. member for York West said, there are a number of ways one can approach an amendment to second reading of a bill, and he has enumerated them. If this one is to stand it clearly must fall within the scope of an amendment declaratory of a principle opposed to the bill. Beauchesne in citation 382 makes it clear that such an amendment is possible. In fact it has been recognized both here and in other parliaments as a proper amendment to second reading. Citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

I have examined this proposed amendment from that point of view, first as to its form. The form of the proposed amendment to my mind is acceptable. There are precedents both in this parliament and in the United Kingdom for this particular formula for moving a declaratory principle. For example, in the journals of 1877 of the British House of Commons an amendment is noted which declined to proceed further with the bill under discussion for reasons of the principle. Also, in 1933, at page 17 of the journals of the British house, there was another reasoned amendment moved in the following words:

> An amendment was proposed to be made to the question, by leaving out from the word "That" to the end of the question, and adding the words "this house declines to assent to the second reading of an unemployment bill which fails to recognize that all the victims of the unemployment which is inherent in the modern system of industrial capitalism are entitled to equal and honourable treatment and maintenance——and so on. Therefore I am satisfied that the form is correct. The real question to my mind is whether it is relevant to this bill. I asked myself what the principle of the bill was, and I have taken in answer the words of the Minister of Labour in explaining the principle of the bill yesterday, as he indicated it in moving second reading of this bill, which is one to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. He said, as reported at page 3537 of Hansard:

> The present amendments in this bill will provide coverage for a greater number of wage earners. They will increase benefits and allowable earnings. They will also increase contributions.

With respect to contributions the minister said:

> However, there is a responsibility on the government to maintain the fund in a condition of equilibrium and this the new schedule of contributions will help materially in effecting.

Therefore one of the principles of the bill is that of maintaining the fund by increasing the contributions. As hon. members know, there are three sources of contributions, namely the employer, the employee and the government. The bill provides that specific increases in contributions be made by both employers and employees. It does not propose to amend section 83(c) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which provides for the contribution by the government to the fund of one fifth of the amount contributed by employers and employees. However, the effect of increasing contributions which employers and employees are to make under this bill is automatically to increase the amount the government will have to pay to make up its one fifth contribution under the existing act. What the hon. member is saying in his proposed amendment is that the increased contributions to the fund should be made by the government, by increasing its contribution from one fifth to one half of the employers' and employees' contribution as they now exist, and leaving the employers' and employees' contributions as they now stand.

This, I think, is where I really part company with the hon. member for York West, because if the amendment were found to provide for a one half contribution of the revised schedule it might then be said not to be different in principle but in amount only. In other words, the opposition asks the house to consider a different principle of maintaining the equilibrium of the fund by increasing the contribution of only one of the three contributing parties, namely the government.

It is a resolution declaratory of a principle adverse to the main principle of the bill. It is not an amendment which could be moved in committee except by an amendment which would call specifically for increased expenditures of public funds, which no opposition or private member is entitled to do.

Now, I find some difficulty, as I am sure all members do, with these declaratory amendments. One cannot go too far with them because they would open the way to an endless succession of debates on the second reading of a bill; but in this case it seems to me there is a principle which is different and relevant, because it is a principle of contributions to the fund. Where there is a reasonable doubt or difference of opinion as to whether such an amendment is regular or not, I suggest to hon. members that it should be resolved in favour of the right of private members to bring a matter of this kind before the house, particularly as their function in money matters is so restricted. When this bill comes in and is debated—and its principles are only discovered when it is introduced—I think the door is then closed to a debate at a future time on this particular principle. If a member is to bring the idea of this amendment before the house and divide the house on it, it seems to me this is the only opportunity to do so.

As I say, it appears to me to meet the precedents and the rules of the house; therefore I am prepared to allow the amendment.

Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, at the termination of the debate on the amending bill last night the leader of the house made the suggestion that members of the opposition were free to vote against the bill if they so wished. Sentiment along the same lines was expressed a moment ago by the hon. member for York West. We are not against the clause in the bill which provides for an extension of payments from the present 36 weeks to 52 weeks, but we are opposed to the increase in the contributions without corresponding benefits being paid out. Even the extension from 36 weeks to 52 weeks will benefit only a very small percentage, approximately 3.5 per cent, of the workers from whom excessive amounts in contributions are being extracted, and also from the employers. In other words, we are not being fooled by the contents of this bill.

For the record I should like to go a bit into the history of the bill which was introduced in this house by Hon. N. A. McLarty, the then minister of labour, on July 16, 1940. This is the resoluton which I shall read, as recorded on page 1647 of Hansard:

> That it is expedient to introduce a bill to enact a scheme of national employment insurance to be administered by a commission appointed by the governor in council, and to create an unemployment insurance fund from contributions from specified persons and from moneys provided by parliament, for the payment of insurance benefits, to be administered by the commission assisted by an advisory committee; with provision also for the organization and maintenance of an employment service administered by the commission with the advice and assistance of a national employment committee; also with power to the governor in council to establish committees and boards subsidiary to the commission and to enter into agreements with the governments of other countries for reciprocal arrangements relating to unemployment insurance; with provision for the remuneration of the commissioners and the appointment and remuneration of such officers, clerks and employees as may be required for the due carrying out of the provisions of the act and for the costs of administration.

During the debate Mr. McLarty said this, as reported at page 1647 of Hansard:

> The surest foundation on which to base democratic government is a happy and contented people. Nothing militates more against happiness and contentment than fear. By this measure, fear will be removed to some extent from 4,660,000 of the Canadian people.

These figures included the dependants of the workers affected by the act. When the Unemployment Insurance Act was first introduced the entire labour force in Canada under the act was estimated at 2,100,000. During the course of the debate the then leader of the opposition, Mr. R. B. Hanson, gave approval to the principle of the bill, as indeed it met with the approval of all parties. However, he did question the amount which industry would be asked to pay as its contribution to the plan.

He said this, and I quote from page 1653 of Hansard for July 16, 1940:

> I have been told it is estimated that industry will be asked to pay $50 million into the fund in a good running year, after the act has come into operation. I do not know whether or not that is a correct estimate.

The then Liberal minister of labour replied as follows:

> No. I know that the leader of the opposition does not want to give anything but a correct impression. That would be a very exaggerated figure of what industry would pay under the rates fixed by the proposed bill.

I have no means of knowing, of course, but that is the figure which has been indicated to me, and I am glad the minister has indicated that it is an exaggerated figure. He will be prepared, when the opportune moment comes, to state the maximum amount which will be taken from industry to finance these proposals. I think the country would like to have the most solemn assurance that the scheme will be actuarially sound, because if it is not, and there is a deficit, the treasury of Canada will be asked to meet the deficit.

These quotations from the debate which took place when the original bill was introduced 19 years ago reveal that the members of the party in opposition at the time, now the government party, were very much concerned with the cost of the operation of the act at a time when unemployment was almost non-existent with the exception of the unemployable. The number in our labour force has probably trebled since then, and the number of unemployed now appears to be in the neighbourhood of half a million.

I am not opposed to the provision to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, which is depleted and overdrawn; but surely when we are asking labour and industry to increase their contributions by approximately 30 per cent with no increase in the benefits to the workers there is something wrong with the bill. The contribution of the worker earning from $51 to $57 per week is being increased from 56 cents to 72 cents a week. A single man in that salary range now receives $21 per week by way of benefit and a person with dependants receives $28. The present bill does not provide for any increases. That is indicated in schedule A on page 4 of the bill, where we see that the rate of benefit for a single person is $21 per week and for a worker with dependants $28 per week.

By no stretch of the imagination can it be assumed that the bill will benefit labour to the extent that we are led to believe. Does the bill include hospital employees? Does it include nurses? Does it include domestic help? It does not include any of these categories. All there is in the bill is a higher contribution by labour and industry without corresponding increases in the benefits, except that the eligibility for unemployment insurance has been extended to 52 weeks.

I sincerely trust this does not mean that the government has given up hope of being able to introduce a program which will eliminate the necessity of accepting continuous large scale unemployment. Our objection to the bill stems from the fact that the government has ignored the recommendations of the advisory committee to the effect that any increase in contributions by labour and industry should be accompanied by corresponding increases in the benefits.

I like to go back into the history of this legislation, because it shows the difference between the attitude of the government in power when the act was originally introduced and that of the present government. For the benefit of the house I should like to quote from Hansard of July 18, 1940, at page 1719, where I find the following:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I understand my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition does not wish to proceed with the second reading of the unemployment insurance measure today.

Hon. R. B. Hanson (Leader of the Opposition): That is correct. I have striven vainly to understand the principles and details of this bill. Under ordinary circumstances counsel would take at least three days to brief this bill: I have had about four hours. I protest against any attempt to rush this bill through the house without adequate time for study, even before it comes to second reading. The bill, apart from any war measures that we have put through parliament, is the most important measure that I can recall for years, since the act of 1930 at any rate. It involves the annual expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars. There should be no rush to push it through the House of Commons, even if it is to be sent to a special committee.

Mr. Mackenzie King: As I said yesterday, the government have no desire to rush the bill at all. Our desire is simply to expedite the business of the session as far as we can.

Mr. Hanson: I am prepared to stay.

So are we prepared to stay until we see this legislation put through in a proper manner. The prime minister of that time, Mr. Mackenzie King, went on to say:

In agreeing to have the bill sent to a special committee after the second reading I was seeking to oblige the Leader of the Opposition, who made the suggestion, and I propose to hold to the arrangement made. I have sought to expedite the step, since it has already been made abundantly clear that all parties in the house are agreed upon the principle of the bill. If my hon. friend feels that to take second reading tomorrow would not give him sufficient time to examine the bill, I am prepared to hold it until Monday. But I very much hope he may be ready tomorrow.

Prime Minister Mackenzie King appreciated the difficulties under which the opposition was labouring at the time, and did not hesitate to give the opposition the consideration asked for. Would it be too much to ask the present government to give the opposition the same consideration?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I believe that in discussing this proposal to replenish the unemployment insurance fund we have an obligation to go into some of the aspects of the question that lie behind the need for this particular action in Canada. We have never decided, as they have in some other countries, just when the unemployment insurance fund should cease to be employed to pay benefits to those out of employment and when the national treasury should be used to supplement this type of payment. In Great Britain, where in the past year they have had 620,000 unemployed or 2.8 per cent of the labour force, it is considered that anything over 2 per cent is a national responsibility. In the United States they have had 4,700,000 unemployed, or 6 per cent of their labour force. In Canada, according to the figures for January, 1959, we have had 538,000 unemployed or 8.9 per cent of our labour force. If one compares the conditions in these two other countries with conditions in Canada, one finds we have had three times as much unemployment, percentagewise, as Great Britian has had, and half as much again as in the United States.

When the unemployment insurance fund was set up it was to handle the problem of seasonal unemployment, or persons who were displaced from industry on a temporary basis. During 1955 we experienced a serious unemployment situation. Again in 1957 and 1958 we had very serious unemployment conditions. These percentages of unemployed have been much higher than we considered the seasonal or temporary unemployment situation would bring about when we established the unemployment insurance fund. These periods of unemployment were covered actuarially by the amount of money Canadians were required to pay into the unemployment insurance fund.

This serious unemployment situation does not appear to be getting any better. It has been pointed out that in the March report of the national employment service the figures show close to 800,000 workers unemployed. This is less than the 885,000 reported in March, 1958, but it represents a staggering problem which is still far from solution. Taken as a proportion of the total paid workers in the non-agricultural labour force, excluding employers and those working on their own account, the March 1959 unemployment figures represent more than 15 per cent of those who normally work for others. The March 1958 figure was 17 per cent. There is a decline, but the improvement is hardly sufficient to warrant the belief that mass unemployment is now only a bad dream.

Merely restoring the Canadian economy to its pre-recession level will not be enough to ensure that those now out of work and those now entering the labour force will secure jobs. A considerable expansion of the economy is required to provide full employment. The government's forecast of capital expenditures by private business this year does not offer much hope for any substantial stimulus to expansion in 1959 from this sector. Consequently it is up to the government to help stimulate expansion by a large scale spending program. However, the budget is more concerned with the bond market than with unemployment.

A number of businessmen and economists have expressed doubt about the Minister of Finance's estimated increase of 7 per cent in the gross national product. Mr. Ashforth, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, for example, expects the gross national product to rise by only 4 per cent over the 1958 level. The point is that even a 7 per cent rise, which the Minister of Finance expects, will be quite inadequate to support full employment in Canada. Our own estimate is that it will require a rise in the gross national product of about 14 per cent or 15 per cent, excluding the effect of price increases, over the 1958 level to support full employment.

This situation does indicate there is a chance that we will again experience unemployment conditions similar to those of the last two years in which there has been an exceptional level of unemployment, not necessarily of a seasonal or a temporary nature. This amendment we are now proposing to the Unemployment Insurance Act is an indication that we are going to try to build up the unemployment insurance fund by means of contributions in an amount that would be sufficient to take care of any unemployment conditions in Canada. Mr. Devon Smith, financial editor of the Toronto Telegram, writing in the Toronto Telegram of Monday, April 27, 1959, had this to say:

> The threat that hangs over our unemployment insurance has its roots in a dangerous mood.
> The threat is that our protection against unexpected unemployment is being melted away because we are using the money collected from our industrial workers for other purposes.

Then he goes on to say:

> Sound accounting quite obviously calls for a separation of the assistance given to seasonal workers and misplaced or unemployable persons, from the self-help provided by regularly employed industrial workers for their own unexpectedly unemployed.
> We must keep unemployed insurance free of any share the wealth political enterprise.

I think this suggestion is one to which we must give some thought, namely the matter of separating the unemployment insurance fund from what might be termed a national unemployment disaster fund, which obviously must be supported from the current revenues of the government. It is not fair, it is not reasonable, to ask people to carry insurance against the type of disaster that is contemplated by seasonal and temporary unemployment, and at the same time ask those people to increase their contributions to the extent that the fund will carry a national situation which is not within the control of the contributors. We are suggesting, therefore, that two funds be set up, the one we now have in force and a new one to which we could bring money from the treasury.

The unemployment insurance fund has dropped from a maximum of $927 million in 1956 to $427 million. The average amount paid out of the fund yearly to take care of seasonal and temporary unemployment could be worked out actuarially; then when the fund dropped below a certain amount additional moneys to bring the fund back to that level could be obtained from the treasury. This would mean that conditions over which the insured workers have no control would be taken care of by contributions through taxes paid by the Canadian people. This is an idea that has been endorsed in the agricultural field, and we are only suggesting that the same type of program be introduced to take care of the labour force by establishing a new, auxiliary fund.

We have some qualms about supporting this particular measure. At the same time we sympathize with the minister in the problem with which he is confronted. We realize that the need for increased benefits is quite evident. We agree that a certain amount of money will have to be paid if we are going to extend the benefits for unemployed workmen. Certainly we are very much in favour of extending the benefits from the period of 36 weeks to 52 weeks. But it is my information that the increase we are granting to the unemployed in extending the period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks will require an increase of 1 per cent in the premiums paid by the workers at the present time. This information would indicate that a great deal less money is necessary in premiums than the 30 per cent the minister has asked for. I should like to know whether the minister has these actual figures, whether he knows how much more actuarially it will cost in premiums to allow for the extension of the benefit period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks.

Second, we would have to take into consideration and be willing to increase the premium to take care of the extension that is being made to those that are now in penitentiaries, increasing the period during which they may revert into their working period from 44 weeks to two years, on a basis similar to that of those who are sick or unemployed through medical reasons. I would think the minister probably has these actuarial figures. At one time we had the benefits extended to this period. They were subsequently reduced. It is quite probable that it would not be too difficult to work out how much this extension is going to cost.

I would suggest this with respect to this other category we have added, namely the category on the top, and may I say that I am not opposed to adding this category. But as to this category on the top, where we have raised the amount of money that an insured worker can earn to $5,460 and where we pay him an increased benefit of $36, I would feel that this would be an inexpensive category to add. I would think that the higher in the wage scale we go, the less chance there will be for those people to be unemployed because there has always been a tendency for the higher paid groups, those in the highly skilled trades, when they are unable to find work, to keep coming down into a lower paid category where work over a wider scale was available to them. I would therefore think the number who will be unemployed in this particular category will be much less than in any of the categories of employees earning much less money.

I think the amendment moved by the official opposition is worthy of support. I believe that the facts and figures presented in moving that amendment are worthy of some consideration. They have taken into account the observances of the former government in the years in which they had administrative responsibility for this department. It may well be that some of the facts presented last night have not been available to the present Minister of Labour. If so, when we are asking for this bill to be referred for further study I would think that consideration could be given to this matter by the minister and that he could join in hoping that this bill would be sent back to a committee so we would have a better chance of examining this situation.

Over the last few weeks newspapers have mentioned their opinion of the increase in the unemployment insurance fund. I think they have generally agreed that we are going to be obliged to give some consideration to splitting this fund into these two parts, one for which the money will come out of the treasury because of the fact that the economic situation in Canada is such that unemployment results.

In this regard it should be borne in mind that many economists in Canada are saying that we are going to have 400,000 people unemployed continually or we are not going to have a rising and expanding economy. I disagree violently with this sentiment. Certainly we must have holes in our heads if we think we have to plan for 400,000 people to be unemployed so we can have a rising economy. I disagree that this is going to happen. I certainly hope that the government does not sympathize with this thought.

The great unemployment that we have had has not been the result of seasonal lay-offs or lay-offs in particular industries because of automation. They were not seasonal lay-offs that took place in the automobile industry. They were not seasonal unemployment situations that developed in the lumbering industry. Rather they are lay-offs that took place because of the economic situation in Canada. Therefore I think justification can readily be found for the inclusion of treasury money for the support of this unemployment fund, because the fund was never set up to handle national disasters. These things should bear some consideration.

I think the minister should be able to tell us how much it costs to extend seasonal benefits for these workers—I think actuarially the information is available—and how many people will be unemployed in the new category that we have added to those now covered by unemployment insurance. With this information we may reconsider the position that I think we must take if we are not so say that the best information we have would indicate that only a 1 per cent increase in the premium is necessary to extend the benefits to 52 weeks. If this is true, then I do not believe we can support a 30 per cent increase, 29 per cent of it to cover what we would consider to be a national problem in an economic sense. I think the minister in his summary should give some indication as to the actual cost involved in the various increases.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the main purpose of Bill C-43 is to increase contributions to the unemployment insurance fund so as to stabilize that fund and increase the amount of money available for purposes of paying benefits to those who may be unemployed in the future.

However, I feel that we are discussing the bill without having available to us the necessary information. Certainly the last fiscal year was one in which there was a great depletion of the unemployment insurance fund. A great deal of money was taken from that fund in order to pay unemployment insurance benefits to those who were out of work and were able to qualify. Because I think the greatest depletion in that fund has been during the last fiscal year, I believe the figures for the last fiscal year should be given to the house so we may be in a better position to understand what the situation is.

I realize, of course, that the advisory committee under the act is not compelled to present its report until some time before July 31. At the same time I do think it might have been very helpful to the house if the appropriate information had been given us so that we would have been in a position to discuss this bill in a way which would be more relative to the facts of this year rather than to the facts of last year.

Certainly, many people across Canada are very concerned about this fund. Over the last two years they have been able to experience its good effects in time of recession, and they have been able to appreciate the benefits which have come from this fund. In many cases across this land distress has been alleviated because this fund was in existence and because demands could be made upon it. I think no greater tribute could be paid to the former administration than to say that at a time of depression, such as we have had in the last two years, a fund was in being to alleviate the distress which would have been experienced if no such fund had been in existence. I believe that this fund, set up almost 20 years ago by a Liberal government, has proved in the last two years to be a bulwark against the country-wide effects of recession.

I say again that people all across this country, and particularly those who work for wages, are very much concerned about the state of this fund. They want to know how much money is there, and what possibility there is of the fund being able to carry on next year, the year after, and the year after that. And yet, although the people who receive these benefits have contributed 80 per cent of the money to this fund, we are discussing this bill without the necessary information which should be given not only to the house but to all those who have contributed so largely to the fund over the years. As I say, there is keen interest in this fund throughout the country, and why should there not be?

During the last two years, this fund has been reduced by an amount of approximately $400 million. We can look at page 3 of the report of the advisory committee of August 18, 1958 and note the status of the fund in 1955 as compared with 1958. In 1955 the fund was in credit to the extent of approximately $846 million. The deficit in that year was $41 million. In the following year, 1956, the balance to the credit of the fund was approximately $859 million, and in that particular year the credit balance rose by an amount of $13 million. In the year 1957 the balance to the credit of the fund was $878 million, and even in that year the total year's operations resulted in an excess of revenue over expenditure of nearly $19 million. We come, then, to the year ending March 31, 1958, and we find that the fund has been depleted to the amount of $744 million, with a deficit for the year of $134 million. We do not have a report for the year just ended, but it seems that the amount to the credit of the fund as on March 31, 1959 was about $496 million and that the deficit on the whole year was about $248 million, which means that in the last two years this fund has been depleted by almost 50 per cent.

A further comparison can be found in the table which is printed on page 5 of this report. This table shows the balance in the unemployment insurance fund per insured person, and for the year 1950, at the beginning of March, the lowest amount for that year was $216 per person, and the highest, $223. In 1951 the lowest was $221, in the months of January and March, and the highest amount was $249. And so we go right on to the year 1958, and we find that as of March 31, 1958 the amount in the fund per person of the insured population was $177. Or let us look at the amount for March of each year from the year 1950. In March, 1950, it was $223; in 1951, $221; in 1952, $252; in 1953, $270; in 1954, $273; in 1955, $242; in 1956, $232; in 1957, $221, which was the same, approximately, as in the years 1950 and 1951. As of March 31, 1958 the amount was $177 per person, and I suspect that the amount as of March 31, 1959 will be considerably lower still.

I agree with the minister that some effort must be made to stabilize this fund. Some real effort will have to be made if we are to prepare ourselves against the type of unemployment such as we experienced during the past winter. Are the methods outlined in this bill sufficient to enable us to do what needs to be done? Yesterday, when the minister spoke on second reading, he said, as reported on page 3537 of Hansard:

> The present amendments in this bill will provide coverage for a greater number of wage earners. They will increase benefits and allowable earnings. They will also increase contributions.

All of us would agree that there are some benefits which will be increased by this bill, but I hope nobody will take the minister's statement as meaning that there is to be a general increase in benefits. Possibly one of the things which the government should do is to look more closely at the administration of this fund. I have here a cutting from the Ottawa Citizen of April 24. The headline states: "Big Loss Taken in Government Bonds by U.I.C.'s Fund". The first paragraph states that the unemployment insurance fund took a loss of $10,155,171.51 on the government bonds it sold last year. The article goes on to say that this was due to the fact that these bonds held by the commission had been converted during the conversion period. Bonds to the value of $300 million had been cashed, and in cashing that amount $10 million had been lost. I am sure that the people of Canada when they listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) as they gave that tremendous broadcast and reduced financial leadership in this country to television showmanship, did not expect that to happen. I am sure the people of Canada did not expect anything like that to happen when they were encouraged to convert their victory bonds, and surely if such a thing could happen to a government agency it could, in proportion, happen to other people who have money invested.

Further, as was stated last night by the hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You had better get a better authority than that.

Mr. Batten: —the minister made a loan to the unemployment insurance fund of $80 million. The Minister of Finance does not want to talk about this $80 million, but it has come to our attention that a loan of this magnitude was made to the fund.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it was not.

Mr. Batten: Yesterday the hon. gentleman did not accept any responsibility for that at all, but if this loan had not been made to the fund surely the Minister of Finance would be in a position to tell the committee that it is not so. Again, if we were to look at the investment portfolio of the fund we would find many holdings of a long term nature. It is my view that because of the nature of the unemployment insurance fund when it may be necessary from to time to time to pay unemployment insurance benefits to those who are unemployed, the holdings of the unemployment insurance commission should be more liquid. They should be able to be used more readily if they were of a shorter term nature.

The minister says that there are increased benefits and that, of course, is a true statement, but let us have a look at those increased benefits. In the first place the benefits will be increased from 36 to 52 weeks. That will include a small percentage, perhaps not more than 3.5, of those who now receive benefits from the fund. Also the levels are raised and there are added classes. The wage level is raised from $4,800 to $5,460. This will include not more than 80,000 workers. I agree with these benefits but I suggest they are not nearly as important in quantity and amount as they would appear to be from the minister's statement. Surely the 80,000 people who are going to receive benefit from this represent but a small percentage of the thousands of workers who receive benefits from the total unemployment insurance fund.

The actual fact is that there is no real increase in benefits under these amendments. On page 2 of the bill there is a table setting out the rates of contributions. The first class earning less than $9 a week enjoy an increase of less than 25 per cent. The various ranges of earnings are set out in the table and the increase for the last class is 30 per cent. While these rates are increased by 30 per cent there is no real increase in the benefits derived by those people who are in those classes.

Here we have a bill under which it will be expected that the people who are in the two added classes at the top of the list will provide approximately $8 million of revenue to this fund. Here we have a bill that will ask the employees and employers across this country to provide $32 million for each group in the form of additional revenue to this fund. This is a total of $72 million. In actual fact this bill is nothing more than an increase of $72 million in taxes which is 20 per cent of the total impost for a full year announced by the minister in his last budget.

The people of Canada who pay into the fund are largely opposed to having their contributions to it increased. I believe they feel that if the rates of contribution are to be increased then surely the rates of benefits should also be increased. Thus far in this debate we have heard very little from those hon. gentlemen who sit on the government benches. I hope that before this debate concludes those who sit on the government benches will stand up and give us the reasons why this bill is as it is. I trust they will be able to support the various amendments introduced and the statements made in the bill. I am sure the whole house would benefit from their opinion and I am sure the country would welcome the statements they have to make about this bill.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few remarks to make because I believe the general criticisms have been well summed up. We can look at the bill and say it is nothing more than a tremendous increase in payments and represents no increase in benefits beyond the two new classes. The entire purpose of the increased benefits apparently is designed, as the minister expressed it, to build up the fund to a point where it will not be in such great danger and at such a low level as it is at the present time. The added hope or the added carrot is that come next election the minister will be able to reduce the payments and then stalk about on election platforms telling the people what a fine chap he is and that he should be re-elected.

This is nothing more than an attempt to force working class people to pay for the short-sightedness of the government in respect of its economic policy and with respect to its inability to see past its collective nose when it comes to the question of unemployment. It is an attempt to bail the government out of a difficulty which it got itself into. As my friend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) said, it is a backdoor method of increasing taxes. However, as I said previously these points have been covered and may be covered again by other hon. members when they speak.

I wish to make only one point concerning one group of workers affected by the act and by unemployment both seasonal and the type of unemployment that accompanies Conservatism. I speak particularly of loggers who through no fault of their own but rather because of the nature of the industry in which they work and because of weather and the export conditions of that industry experience difficulty.

The act was amended a few years ago, I believe in 1955. Provision was made that where a person had a previous benefit period he then had to have thirty contribution weeks within the last year. There is a provision in this bill to amend this section but not the appropriate part I am going to mention here. It was found in the application of that section that there were countless hundreds of loggers who could not possibly meet the qualifications because of the seasonal nature of the industry, the shortness of the work year, the recurrent lay-offs because of factors other than weather, and so on. Quite a bit of correspondence was entered into between the then minister of labour, the loggers affected and their union.

The then minister of labour, the Hon. Mr. Gregg, sponsored a bill in this house at a subsequent session which reduced the qualifying period from 30 to 24 weeks which made it somewhat easier for the loggers. Although I mention loggers it is because I am familiar with them but I am certain there are other categories of working people who are also adversely affected by this provision in the act. If the minister wanted to do something constructive he could have altered subsection 2 of section 45 of the act to establish a closer relationship between the period of qualification set out in the legislation and the inability of some people to comply with it due to the nature of their empoyment.

Surely, if the minister feels it necessary to allow inmates of penal institutions to have special considerations under the act in order to qualify, then he could extend that self-same generous attitude to working people who for one reason or another do not get into penal institutions. I agree that inmates of penal institutions should be covered. In fact, the minister will recall that he was one of the first persons I called on personally when I got to Ottawa in 1957, before the fall session was held, and had a personal discussion with him about these two particular things: one, inmates of penitentiaries being allowed to extend the qualifying period up to two years, the same as people who are self-employed or unemployed because of illness or something of that nature; two, the question of the application of section 45, subsection 2, as it applied to loggers and to other employees. The minister went half way, but his attitude would be much more acceptable to the working class people if he had gone in the other direction, or in both directions, and dealt with the adverse manner in which the act applies to loggers.

I do not intend to say any more, but I should like to reiterate that we in the C.C.F.—and some of our members have spoken on this—have posed a number of questions to the minister. I have asked for some actuarial figures, if he has them, of the relationship between the tremendously increased payments and the so-called increased benefits to which he referred. The unfortunate part is that the minister did not see fit to advise the house of these matters, which I am sure he must have felt were material to the bill, and on which he should have advised us when he made his introductory remarks on second reading. Perhaps if he had done that we would not be going around and around in this particular discussion at this time.

Perhaps part of the reason is, as happens so often, when a minister wants to refer a bill to a committee he sloughs most of the responsibility that he should have off on the members of the committee, hoping that the bill will get past second reading and that he will not be in too embarrassing a position. If that is the case, I am sure the minister has good reasons for not wanting to extend this type of debate because certainly he would be in an embarrassing position if he started to relate what actuarial figures there are, if there are any, to the relationship between the 30 per cent increase in contributions and payments, and whether that terrific increase was necessary merely to cover persons when they are released from jail in order to go back an additional two years, or whether it was justified to cover the extension from 36 weeks to 52 weeks, or whether it was justified to cover the two new classes, or whether it was justified to cover the whole three at once.

I submit the minister will have to admit that what he is doing is taking over part of the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and attempting to become a second minister of finance by taxation methods. Perhaps all the Minister of Labour is doing is trying his hand out. He may move into the seat of the Minister of Finance when that hon. gentleman moves somewhere else. It may be that this is just a sort of apprenticeship course that he is going through to see what it feels like to impose taxation on people.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the legislation which we now have before us appears to have two desirable features and two very undesirable ones. I think the increase in allowable earnings is something that deserves favourable consideration because it will remove one of the problems of the worker who is unemployed and enjoying unemployment insurance. We all know of many cases—certainly there are many instances in my own riding—where the worker receiving unemployment benefits has been offered work but he is afraid to take that extra job for fear his earnings might disqualify him for further benefits and then several weeks would have to elapse before he could be reinstated in his benefits. The increase in the allowable earnings will to some extent alleviate that problem and for that reason I welcome it.

The other feature, the two new classes of benefits, I think perhaps deserves support because it relates benefits to people in the higher brackets whose contributions are so much greater that perhaps in the past they have not received a fair benefit in proportion to the contributions they have made. Therefore, in the interest of justice I would say that this, too, is a desirable change.

The undesirable features of this legislation are, of course, the size of the increase itself and the fact that the burden falls entirely upon the workers and the employers. Our chief criticism of this legislation is that the government makes no contribution to the increased payments into the fund. Since there is no comparable increase in the rate of benefit, therefore the benefits which the workers will obtain from this are not comparable to the increased rate of contribution. The 52 weeks extension, to my mind, is of doubtful value. It merely restores the original benefit period which was written into the act when it was first set up by the former Liberal regime. When it was reduced to 36 weeks I do not think that any very serious disadvantage resulted and I doubt whether there is any very great advantage in restoring it.

To appraise this legislation we must carefully weigh the benefits against the impact upon the taxpayers and upon the national economy. We must ask ourselves how many workers will benefit from this extension from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. In this connection I should like to put on record a paragraph from the fifteenth annual report of the unemployment insurance commission and I quote from the bottom of page 49:

> The great majority of insured persons have a good contribution history and experience had shown that in many cases the credit thus set up for an unemployed person when he files the claim was not being used. For example, during the five-year period 1949-1953, although about one-third of all those establishing benefit rights were entitled to 180 days (30 weeks) or more, only about one-twentieth actually drew benefit for 180 days or more. This is illustrated by the following: The average duration authorized for all claimants was 26 weeks; the average benefit taken by all claimants was nine weeks; 90.1 per cent drew only one to 19 weeks, 6.4 per cent drew 20 to 29 weeks, while only 3.5 per cent drew 30 or more weeks.

Since that paragraph contains statistics for the five year period from 1949 to 1953 it does include a period of recession which in some respects is very comparable to our present situation. If we had the figures for today I doubt that there would be any great change in these percentages. In fact, as we progress toward the 52 weeks the percentage will certainly drop considerably and should be below the 3.5 per cent mark. It seems then that we are paying a price that proportionately is too high for the benefits that are going to be received by such a small number of applicants.

We must ask ourselves also what will be the impact of this heavy increase in the rates of contribution. We know there will be no increase in the rates of benefit so that those workers who fall in the category of less than 36 weeks, and they are the majority, will receive no benefit at all. The impact on the contributor, however, will be considerable. Ostensibly the increase is going to be shared 50-50 by the worker and the employer. The worker will pay 30 per cent more and the employer will pay 30 per cent more for the same benefits.

We know that there is no escape for the employee. He must pay the 30 per cent increase because there is no way of passing it on to anyone else. But with respect to the contribution paid by the employer, perhaps in the majority of cases the contribution does not come from the employer at all. He simply passes on the cost to the consumer. Since the worker is also a consumer he will therefore pay not only his own contribution but a considerable part of the employer's contribution. Consequently, the increase in the case of the employee will be considerably more than 30 per cent. Just how much more, of course, is difficult to say but it could very well raise his share of the increase from 30 per cent up to 40 per cent or perhaps even higher.

We must also look at the impact on the economy. Since a large part of the employer's share is going to be passed on to the consumer, this amounts to another tax, and we all know the effect of an increase in taxes upon prices. The recent increase in the cigarette tax is a good example. In order for the government to get two cents extra the person who buys a package of cigarettes now pays four cents more. The same will be true with respect to the consumers who will have to pay through higher prices for a part of the employer's share.

We understand that the total amount to be raised by this increase will be approximately $72 million, and for $72 million to be collected by the government and placed in the unemployment insurance fund the taxpayers certainly will have to pay considerably more. Possibly they may have to pay $80 million, $90 million or even $100 million in order to make $72 million available to the unemployment insurance fund. This in turn is going to have an effect upon the competitive position of industry and upon our position as a trader in world markets.

There is another aspect of this matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention. There are many contributors who will keep on paying as long as they work and will never receive one cent in benefits because of the nature of their employment. It does not seem quite right to me that these people should pay continually when there is no chance whatever of receiving any benefit. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister for his consideration. When a person has paid five years' contributions without receiving any benefit at all I suggest that when he pays his sixth year he should get his first year's contributions refunded. Perhaps a five year period may not be feasible but I use it to illustrate the proposal I have in mind. Possibly the period could be ten years, but I think some consideration should be given to the worker who has to pay in during all his working life and by the nature of his employment can never get anything back.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this unemployment insurance legislation was meant to take care of temporary unemployment only. But we are faced now with conditions that did not obtain when the legislation came into being. There is now a distinct possibility that we may be faced with a large measure of permanent unemployment. We know that our population is growing and that our work force is expanding at the rate of about 200,000 or more new jobs every year. The theory behind this legislation is that a man's labour is a marketable commodity. To take care of our increasing labour force we must depend upon the expansion of capital investment but at the present time a considerable portion of our capital investment is devoted not to creating jobs but to destroying jobs. I think the time has come when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) must try to secure some sort of breakdown of public and private investment to determine what proportion will be devoted to creating jobs and what proportion will be devoted to automation which will have the effect of destroying jobs. Certainly all indications now point to the fact that our labour force is going to expand at a rather more rapid rate than new jobs are going to be created, and this will tend to increase unemployment and to make a larger proportion of our labour force permanently unemployed.

I believe this will necessitate rethinking on the concept of labour because a man's life and the life of his family depend upon employment, upon his ability to market his labour commodity. I think we must ask ourselves what is going to happen when there is no market for a man's labour. This situation may not be as far in the future as many of us believe. Certainly, it is something to which we should be giving some thought at the present time, because if we are going to meet that situation it is going to involve a great deal of change in our monetary policy—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is going rather far afield from anything that is contained in this bill.

Mr. Carter: I was just pointing out that provisions we are considering are for temporary unemployment only, and we have a bigger problem to face as a result of the conditions to which I referred, and the time to think about it is now.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Chevrier: May I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to standing order 51.

PRIVATE BILLS

LUTHERAN CHURCH—CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. S-18 to incorporate the Lutheran Church—Canada. —Mr. Weichel—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE CANADIAN LEGION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE SERVICE LEAGUE

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Carleton) (for Mr. Macdonald, Kings) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-19 respecting the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of divorce bills standing for second readings, is it agreed that the house shall take all these in one motion? They are bills SD-206 to SD-233 inclusive, items 50 to 77 on today's order paper.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill SD-206, for the relief of Theodora Cornell Moore Martin.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-207, for the relief of Rose Ange Lorange Gadoury.—Mr. McCleave.

Fraser River Fisheries

FRASER RIVER

LEGISLATION TO SAFEGUARD NAVIGATION AND FISHERIES

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-23 respecting navigation and salmon fishery on the Fraser river.

He said: This bill is a very short one and, as is apparent from the title, it has to do with the protection of navigation and of the salmon fishery on the Fraser river in the province of British Columbia.

Perhaps at the outset I should say that the control of these matters on the Fraser river belongs to Canada. The Fraser river was a navigable river at the time of confederation; in fact it was a navigable river a good many years before this country entered upon confederation. In addition, it is part of the sea coast and inland fisheries of Canada. One of the purposes of this bill and certainly an important one, is to prohibit the building of hydroelectric projects on the Fraser river, or of any dam for such purposes, and also to prohibit the placing of any obstruction in the Fraser river except those which may be necessary to be built by the government of Canada in connection with erosion, or flood control or current control. And, of course, the government of Canada does this now on the Fraser river, and has been doing this for many years as the authority which has control over the navigable waters of the river.

Hydroelectric power dams are always high dams and they store a great deal of water. No matter how carefully they are constructed or operated they always affect the flow in the river involved. The Fraser river presents difficulties from the point of view of navigation. My view is that the river should not in any way be rendered more difficult in the matter of navigation than it is right now. At this time the great port of New Westminster is concerned about silting up and that sort of thing.

I can say with exactitude and with no fear of contradiction that the Fraser river is the greatest salmon river in the world. The fishery of which that river is the foundation of an important item in the Canadian economy. The salmon fishery on the Pacific coast makes an annual contribution of $80 million to the Canadian economy. Of course, the fishery on the Fraser river itself is only part of this industry and the great feature of the Fraser river is the run of the Pacific salmon. We must also consider the wages earned by the fishermen and all the collateral matters of commerce such as fishing boats which are expensive, their engines and equipment, nets and so forth.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Pacific salmon industry gives Canada an important position in the export market of canned salmon, particularly in the United Kingdom. This is a prestige export for Canada because Pacific salmon is the finest canned product of the sea to be found anywhere in the world. One might say I have dealt with the economic side of things and all of these factors are highly important today. In addition we must recognize that this industry provides a great source of protein food. My suggestion is that we cannot take any chances of doing possible damage to that industry because of the vast amount of food it produces each year.

I know there are those who say that power and salmon can exist together on the Fraser. That has been said on previous occasions by learned engineers, professors, biologists and others in connection with the Columbia river just south on the Pacific coast which flows into the sea between the states of Washington and Oregon. Expert opinion was that the Bonneville dam could be built without damage to the fishery but that dam ruined the entire fishery on the Columbia river which was second in importance only to that on the Fraser.

There is a canal in connection with the Bonneville dam and one learned gentleman said that the salmon would follow a ship into the lock and go out the other side when the ship passed through, but the Pacific salmon does not operate in that fashion. While I have every respect for the expert opinion of these engineers, professors and others, when it comes to an innate knowledge of the spawning habits of the Pacific salmon I have more respect for the knowledge of the fish.

At the present time there exist no safe or accepted method of passing fish up and down the river to the sea. Getting them up is not as difficult as getting them down. The little fingerlings, as they are called, are not strong when they go down to the salt water. They suffer injury dropping over the dam or passing through the turbines and are killed by the millions.

Furthermore it should be noted that there is no need for the development of electric power on the Fraser river. We have the Columbia river in British Columbia about which most hon. members in this house know because it has been in the news a great deal. Another important river is the Peace river. In my opinion these two great rivers are capable of generating all the power needed in the foreseeable future. We also have the potential of atomic power.

I should like to read the views of the president of the Fisheries Association of British Columbia as set out in a letter to me dated February 11, 1959. I am sure that most hon. members opposite will remember very well the Hon. James Sinclair, president of this association. He stated:

> The stand of the Fisheries Association has been that we can have both fish and power in British Columbia. Fish from the Fraser and power from non-salmon streams, such as the Peace and the Columbia. In addition, there are ever increasing thermal sources of power now available in British Columbia with the completion of the oil and gas lines to the coast. The British Columbia Electric has already built a 75,000 KW gas turbine at Port Mann and is now building a very large thermal plant at Ioco which can use either oil or gas. The first unit of this plant will be 300,000 kilowatts and its final capacity 1 million kilowatts. This latter figure equals the total production of the British Columbia Electric system today from all sources. These plants certainly would not be built if the cost of thermal power was not pretty close to the cost of hydro power.
> There has been remarkable increase in the efficiency of thermal plants in recent years.
> The third alternative source of power comes from nuclear energy. In this field, the British are the leaders with six plants either in production or under construction. Two plants have been producing power for the commercial grid for over a year. Sir John Cockcroft, head of the British Atomic Energy Commission has announced that by 1962 power from nuclear plants will be competitive with conventional power plants and by 1982 will be half the cost of conventional power. In view of the enormous resources of uranium which Canada is fortunate enough to possess, it would be the height of folly to dam the Fraser when other such sources of power are available for if the Fraser is dammed, the salmon resource will be lost forever.

That is the considered view of a fisheries expert. The parliament of Canada can settle this question once and for all. We have in Canada the greatest salmon river in the world that provides a vast source of food. There is no need for generating power on this river when other alternatives exist.

In closing let me urge hon. members to give this matter sympathetic consideration. Let us take no risk in using the Fraser river for the purpose of providing power. I ask all hon. members to assist in the protection of our vital salmon fishery through giving their support to this bill.

Mr. W. H. Payne (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips) for so ably presenting a case with which I am quite frankly in disagreement although familiar with. It is not many months since the day when discussions on this subject were held at considerable length with the gentleman whom the hon. member has quoted so widely in defence of Bill No. C-23, the Hon. James Sinclair, as an outstanding fisheries authority.

I wish to make myself quite clear, as I have on many occasions on the platform, with this authority in matters having to do with Canada's fisheries. I, like thousands of British Columbians, have not at any time encouraged a program which would deny to anyone a benefit. I wish to make that most profoundly clear; but I do, Mr. Speaker, take violent issue with a bill of this kind which in effect does not only close the door but slams the door in the face of all practical and logical study and investigation which could, if properly carried out, be the means of seeing that the people of British Columbia were favoured with both the benefits of salmon fisheries as well as of low-cost power. This would aid them, not only in their industrial and commercial uses, but would lessen a burden on the thousands of homes and families in the greater metropolitan complex area from which I come.

In saying this I wish to emphasize most definitely that the domestic bills for power today, essential to the life of the modern communities, in the greater Vancouver area run almost twice, and in certain specific instances three times, the cost borne by householders elsewhere in any other communities in this dominion of ours. I think before we slam a door in the face of a proper, logical and reasoned approach, which may bring a solution to this complex problem, we should give a little thought to the interests of the thousands of people who today are paying through the nose because insufficient research and insufficient study has been carried on. Too many authorities have grown up, authorities, which I wish to emphasize most forcefully, when it comes to power matters in British Columbia today, believe you should go to see the fisheries experts on power matters. You should go and talk to the president of the B. C. fish association; you should go and talk to the fisheries biologists; if you want the answers to power problems. That is the place to get your answers. I am likewise equally critical when, if you want solutions today to biological fish problems in our province, you go to the power authorities.

I have read evidence which has been presented to committees from time to time during this session. I refer to the committee on mines, forests and waters and also the committee on marine and fisheries. It is pointed out, as I say, if you wish an expert on fisheries you go to the opposite side of the pole. If you want to consult an expert on hydro matters you go to the fish people. It is high time that this whole problem was made free of all closed, bigoted views. Intelligent men, qualified people, must be brought in to solve this problem and must be adequately financed. It is high time, Mr. Speaker, that this dominion of ours started to call on the United States under the international North Pacific fisheries treaty to pay its share because it takes half of the harvest of the salmon that spawn on the upper stretches of the Fraser river. I contend that our United States neighbour, taking that advantage, has not produced according to the treaty nor in any way co-operated toward a logical solution to this matter.

I hold in my hand what I consider to be a very well thought out editorial from the Vancouver Sun of February 17, 1958. It reads in part as follows:

> Research can find a way to have both salmon and hydroelectric development of the Fraser river.
> But the research isn't being done.
> Again this sensible warning comes. When will it sink in with politicians who posture so eagerly as saviours of the salmon from the wicked hydro barons? When will it sink in with fishing interests who applaud the politicians and try to sell the idea that hydro soon won't be important? And with hydro interests who face having to inflict higher costs on the public unless the Fraser is used.

I also hold in my hand a mail-out that every householder of the lower mainland received last year. This indicates another expense of modern day costs in raising a family. It indicates that household electric rates must be increased, and the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia know the results.

In discussing this matter there is also a great tendency to overlook a few of the facts. Flood danger is an ever present one on the Fraser river. I admit that the proposer of this bill will say that the bill in no way precludes solution of flood problems. I would like to read from the interim report of the Fraser river board, dated June, 1956. In part, it says:

> Since then, in 1950, 1954 and again in 1955 the river rose above the 20-foot level at the Mission bridge, the danger mark prior to dike reconstruction in 1949. However, the system of dikes as reconstructed since the 1948 flood, contained the freshets and only very minor local damage or inconvenience has resulted.

Then it goes on to refer to other very disastrous floods which the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia have learned through the years to live with. The important fact is that this same report in its findings recommends—and I would point out that on that board as one of the five members was a representative from the department of water resources branch, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Mr. T. M. Patterson; from the Department of Fisheries there was the chief supervisor of fisheries, Pacific area, Mr. A. J. Whitmore—that a multi-purpose project should be undertaken to control floods. The reason they recommend multi-purpose projects is that damming for the sole purpose of controlling flood waters in the Fraser river is not economically feasible unless benefits can be gained by virtue of the production of power, by virtue of the reclamation of land through moving siltage up on to the flat lands and moving water on to the surface. I point this out, Mr. Speaker, but not to suggest that this parliament can go forward on such a project today. I do not think any person in the province of British Columbia contends that this matter of salmon and power can be solved today; but we do contend that it will never be solved if we are going to face a lack of co-operative effort and approach the problem on a level of bigotry.

I should like now to refer to a statement by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). I will say to him that I have heard this statement made on many platforms by other past ministers of fisheries. At page 100 of the proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on marine and fisheries of April 23, 1959, the minister said in answer to a question, and the proposer of this motion concurred in these remarks in his earlier statement:

> That power development from hydro sources, or even from the common types of thermal development, may be a passing thing. It is quite likely that in the very near future it will be economically feasible to produce power from atomic energy.

It is statements of this nature by fisheries people speaking on technical matters regarding energy and generation of power that wash out a solution of the problems that we are now concerned with. I am deeply concerned with the power cost that results, from this approach. The burden is placed on our homeowner. I should like to refer to the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 11, of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, April 7, 1959, wherein perhaps the most outstanding Canadian authority on atomic matters, Dr. John Convey, director of the mines branch, Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, gives his testimony as found on page 261 and on following page. He had this to say:

> Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: I am somewhat on the spot, but since I reported to you almost 12 months ago, I am in a position to give evidence that there has been a lot of experimental work done in the field of the development of nuclear power. However, it is still in the experimental stage and there do not exist any economical kilowatts produced by atomic reactors today. At Geneva last fall it was reported there were some 13 power reactors producing power, but none of them economically. Eight of these exist in the United States, one in the U.S.S.R. and three in Great Britain. The situation is still one in which you have a combination of three main factors: the nuclear fuel, the moderator and the coolant.

He goes on to say:

> Quite a number of experiments are under way at the present time, but the cost of producing power for these reactors is certainly nowhere in the neighbourhood of six mills. There are educated guesses as to when it will break through, but as far as I know at the present time it is merely a guess to say that by 1970 we will be producing economic power.

He goes on at great length and makes this final statement:

So I would say right now that experimental work in reactors has not reached a stage wherein one could give an honest guess as to just when it will break through; and I cannot see it breaking through at least for another two decades.

I and the thousands, I say advisedly, who feel as I do and for whom I speak in the house do not say that atomic power may not be the only economic means of generating power requirements in the future. We do not say that dams are essential on the Fraser river. We do say that, at the moment, the only economic means of generating power is through hydro development, and as long as that situation exists let us not, by passing Bill No. C-23, close the door to a logical, reasoned and intelligent approach to this problem which faces all in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Rather, let us get on with an intelligent, reasoned research program so that we will not deny the people of our province those benefits which may be derived through a logical, proper approach to the problem.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to have a few words to say on this, shall I say, most novel and interesting bill. I fully appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips) with regard to preserving the salmon fishing resources of the Pacific coast but I think he has taken a rather unusual way to do that. In my opinion there are several sound reasons why the bill should not be passed by the house. I respect fully the sincere intention of the hon. member to protect this fisheries resource about which he is so concerned.

First of all, the bill is very final. It slams the door. It reminds me of an occasion about 60 years ago when my father wanted to stop me skating on Sundays and in order to do so he chopped up my boots and skates.

Mr. McIlraith: Did you say 60?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: I thought it was 40.

Mr. Herridge: It was a very final act but within a week or so my father ended up by having to buy me new boots and skates. This bill is final. Section one provides:

No hydroelectric power shall be generated in the Fraser river in the province of British Columbia, nor shall any dam, weir or other obstruction to navigation or to the spawning run of the Pacific salmon, be constructed in or over the said river.

If the bill should pass it would finalize the situation so far as the Fraser is concerned. I think the bill overlooks possible developments of the future. We are not in a position to say today that it will not be possible to have fish and power on the Columbia as a result of research. Today I was reading of the tremendous advance made in that direction in the Soviet union, according to a report in the newspapers, where they claim that they have been able to develop power and preserve fishery resources at the same time. It is only a newspaper report but I suspect there is some foundation of fact in it.

In adopting the bill we would be closing the door to possible developments of the future through research and so on. I am sure that all thinking people in British Columbia are concerned about the preservation of the fishery resources but the people who think and take a long point of view do not want parliament to take any action that would prevent any future development as a result of advances in science and in our knowledge of these matters.

There is a second reason for my opposition to the bill. The member realizes there are other, shall I say, surrounding aspects to this question that I do not want to go into in detail at this time, but if the bill were to pass it would preclude the more efficient development and use by Canadians of the surplus waters of the Columbia in the future. In that connection we are not certain what the possibilities are and what the circumstances will be, but the bill would preclude Canadians from using the surplus waters of the Columbia in the years to come in the most efficient way and in the best interests of the people of British Columbia.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I take strong exception to the bill and trust it will not be passed by the house. I think we would be much wiser to leave ourselves the opportunity to take whatever course we see fit to take in the future with respect to the development of the Fraser and the utilization of the surplus waters of the Columbia in the light of the fact that at the present time, as St. Paul says, and I use his words in connection with this problem: "We see as in a glass darkly."

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak I must say at the outset that I disagree violently with the preceding two speakers, especially the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Payne) who, incidentally, is my roommate. He took exception to the fact that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips) in his bill was slamming the door but I feel that the door was not slammed tightly enough or perhaps was slammed too violently so that it sprung open. Contrary to the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, I believe that the legislation does not go far enough. The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) has provided in his bill that no hydroelectric power dam shall be constructed on the Fraser river. In the second paragraph of the hon. member's bill he allows the federal government a certain amount of leeway with respect to flood control, navigation and so on, and I think that perhaps this is one of the difficulties in the bill.

In recent testimony before the marine and fisheries committee, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) pointed out very clearly the sensitivity of spawning fish to any interference with their natural habitat. I, myself, am rather leery as to any interference by power dams or flood control dams. If I may, I should like to quote what the minister says on page 11 of the proceedings of the marine and fisheries committee:

> In British Columbia and the Yukon we have been concerned with the continuing problem of overcoming the effects of industrial developments on the major salmon runs. I might say in this connection, in a general way, that one of the problems of conservation is of course the impact of civilization and industrialization on the environment in which fish live. There are very severe changes which follow industrialization and settlement in a natural habitat which may not be apparent to the casual observer, but which the fish are very much aware of. I am referring to such things as changes in the fluctuation of run-off, water temperatures and many other things along this line of which the casual observer is not aware. These things include siltation of spawning beds and the reduction of the sunlight in water by siltation, and contamination and suspension of fine material in the streams, which cuts off the sunlight and reduces the growth of micro-organisms in the streams, on which the fish feed, especially in the early stages of their growth.

Perhaps the fisheries committee, in its recommendations, Mr. Speaker, expresses more truly the principle which the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) is trying to enunciate. In their conclusions on page 85 of the committee's report we find this:

> Your committee expresses the opinion that no dams should be built on the Fraser river, or any of its tributaries, where such dams will, in the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries, interfere with, or be detrimental to anadromous fish runs.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) expressed concern about the fact that this legislation was final. He seems to forget that parliament can, in the next day or even next year, should changes be required, introduce other legislation to replace this legislation. I would say, therefore, that the difficulties in connection with shutting the door are perhaps theoretical and only for the time being. I believe the door should very definitely be slammed.

What is the reason for this interest on the part of power companies in British Columbia? British Columbia has a power potential of some 25 million horsepower. In this connection, the Fraser river has a power potential of approximately 7 million horsepower. I contend, that we have two other rivers, the Columbia river with a potential horsepower of 3 million and the Peace river which has another 4 million potential horsepower. In addition, we have thermal power, for example, such as that which exists at Port Moody. I believe there are some six nuclear power stations which have been established in the United Kingdom. It is purely the monetary and economic considerations which urge these interests to establish a power dam on the Fraser river because of its closeness to the settled mainland area.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that of more importance than dams and electricity is the fact that we have a tremendous resource which, in the past year, had a landed value to the fishermen of some $37 million. The market value would probably be considerably more than that. This represents almost 15 million fish going up the Fraser river. I feel that when we have this natural resource that comes back year after year it is extremely important that we do nothing to jeopardize the continuity of this particular run. One of the suggestions that is frequently made in connection with this fish and power problem is the idea of having fish hatcheries. The experience of those in the hatchery business has been that the fish leaving the hatchery are extremely vulnerable. The fish can be produced in the hatchery, but once they get clear of the hatchery they tend to die off in large numbers. Experiments have shown there is no advantage in artificial over natural propagation in this respect.

The sockeye salmon, which is the one with which we are most concerned in the Fraser river, apparently has proven the least suitable for hatchery culture. For example, I should like to cite from the B. C. Professional Engineer of March, 1959 an article entitled "Artificial Propagation is Not the Answer". This particular article, dealing with the problem of raising young fish in a hatchery, states:

> A modern salmon hatchery capable of rearing 2 million sockeye to seagoing size costs approximately $1 million and at least $60,000 annually for operation. The Adams river run alone would require 100 such hatcheries to equal the natural production of seaward migrants. The super-hatchery installation required would have 16,000 standard-size rearing ponds, an inflow of several thousand c.f.s. and a labour force of over 2,000. Other lesser runs which are concurrent with the Adams run would require additional space. Even with all this effort to duplicate the numbers that would be produced naturally, the low survival rate of the hatchery-raised fish would fail to duplicate the natural return of adults.

To summarize, the Fraser fish-power problem centres around the sockeye salmon, the species of salmon which is least adaptable to hatchery culture on any scale, and which occurs in such abundance in the Fraser river that hatchery and rearing facilities are inconceivable.

Two of the greatest difficulties with regard to the problem of the fish migrating upstream is, first of all, the delay and second the problem of transporting them over the spillways. Again I should like to refer to the same article because it very succinctly and concisely sets forth the problems:

Basically there are two problems on the Fraser for which no satisfactory solution has been found. First, sockeye salmon will not tolerate delay in upstream migration and there is no known system for transportation of large numbers of adult salmon over a dam without delay. The problem is not primarily one of engineering. Fishways or lifts, locks or pumps, tank trucks or trains can all be engineered to accommodate large numbers of fish, although the cost would be high. The difficulty lies in convincing the fish that the facilities are designed for their benefit, i.e., getting the fish to go into them without delay and to proceed through them without stress or panic. The answer to these problems lies with the research biologist studying behaviour and physiology. Recent findings in this sphere have been significant and there is some basis for optimism that they will lead eventually to much more successful design of apparatus for directing salmon from the broad expanse of turbulent spill into the fish facilities. None of these developments have reached the stage where a solution based on them could be considered a calculated risk in a mammoth application to the Fraser.

I interject at this time, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. member for Coast-Capilano made some brief reference to the research facilities. While I was a member of the fisheries committee I took the opportunity to ask Dr. Pritchard whether there was sufficient money and men available to do the necessary research to try to solve the problem. He explained to me the problem was not one of the number of men. He said that at the present time they have approximately 75 scientists and engineers working on this fish-power problem. There is a joint outlay between Canada and the United States of approximately $3 million every year on this problem.

Returning to the article, I find it states:

The second problem is centred on the safe transport of hundreds of millions of young fish down over spillways and through turbines. A large and well co-ordinated research effort has gone into both the design of spillways and turbines to minimize losses, and engineering and biological studies to probe the possibilities of directing or guiding the young fish into safe downstream bypasses. Where river flow is extremely small, guiding by electricity or light has been used with success. In small forebay installations mechanical screening may be a feasible though costly protection. None of these techniques has measured up to the problem posed by large mainstem developments in which the freshet discharge accompanies the downstream navigation of the fish. For instance, effective mechanical screening on the Fraser would necessitate maintenance of approach velocities of less than ½ foot per second in the forebay of dams which with existing design would have velocities of 13 feet per second during freshet periods. It is obvious that in addition to the tremendous costs of screening, physical conditions in the Fraser canyon make it impossible to meet such standards.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, both the fisheries association and the united fishermen and allied workers union have opposed power development on the Fraser river. Although both organizations recognize the need for flood control they have steadfastly been in agreement that power dams should not be erected on the Fraser river. This is one of the few occasions on which they have been in agreement. I must commend the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. for bringing forward this legislation although I must reiterate that, as for myself, I do not feel that it goes sufficiently far.

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house on this bill. It has been fairly well explained pro and con by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Payne) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale). I should like to thank the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. McPhillips) for his interest in the Fraser river and to congratulate him on bringing forward his bill.

As all hon. members of this house know, the Fraser river is the greatest salmon river in the world, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. From experience we all know what the power dams on the lower Columbia river did to the salmon runs of that great river. We also know that the United States government has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to bring back the salmon runs of the Columbia river but has met with little success.

I understand that the value of the fish pack from the Fraser river run last year was between $80 million and $100 million. That resource has added a terrific amount to the economy of the province of British Columbia. It is not altogether the monetary value which we are considering when we think of the fish; it is the great food value that will eventually be lost if that salmon run of which we are so proud is ever decimated. With the development of the upper Columbia river and with the power potentials of the Peace and other non-fish bearing rivers of British Columbia, I believe we shall have for many years all the power that we need in our province. With the great development of atomic energy and nuclear power I think the time may be near when the need for development of the Fraser river for power will be past and that we shall have plenty of power and also the fish produced in that great river. I am convinced the time lies a long way in the future when we can have both fish and power. From all the experiments that have gone on in the past, there is no sign that we can have both on this great river.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Fraser river is about three miles from my constituency but in my riding I have a great number of fishermen. On behalf of myself and the fishermen of my riding I can say that we appreciate the interest of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. McPhillips) on Vancouver island some 75 miles away, in the maintenance of the fishing industry in general and the salmon industry in particular on the Fraser river. However, I want to say this most emphatically, and I think I understand the problems of the fishermen and the importance of the Fraser river. I want to say that I cannot agree with the terms set forth in Bill No. C-23. Clause 1, without any question of doubt whatsoever —and here I completely agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Payne)—completely slams the door on any development whatsoever of the Fraser river because it contains this provision:

> 1. No hydroelectric power shall be generated in the Fraser river in the province of British Columbia, nor shall any dam, weir or other obstruction to navigation or to the spawning run of the Pacific salmon, be constructed in or over the said river.

I am afraid that the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) does not understand the development and the resources of the Fraser river. It was not too many years ago that nature itself, by means of land slides, almost completely obstructed the Fraser river in what is known as Hells canyon or Hells Gate. What happened? The federal government of that day spent a great deal of money in the construction of a fish ladder at Hells canyon. I think it cost in the neighbourhood of $1½ million, although I may be wrong in the figure. From the hon. member who just sat down, Mr. Speaker, you heard about the Adams river run which is of only a certain type of salmon. There are four species that go up the Fraser river. This year the greatest run that British Columbia has ever known on the Fraser river, on the Adams river run, got over what? It did not get through Hells Gate directly but it got through the fish ladder constructed at Hells canyon or what is known as Hells Gate.

According to reports millions of fish died because there were so many. There was there, as there is now, complete proof that when nature caused an obstruction and when a government took action of a scientific nature, the run was not only maintained but was of such a nature that millions of fish, when they reached their spawning ground, died in large numbers. I saw pictures of them only the other week. You could almost walk over their bodies on the Adams river.

In addition to that, as I say, with the principle and purpose of this bill I completely agree. However, it closes the door to scientific knowledge and proof by the federal government, even up to now, that at Hells Gate you can take care of the fish.

Mr. McPhillips: That was just a few feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Starr for the second reading of Bill No. C-43 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to increase the contributions made to the unemployment insurance fund by the government, the employers, the employees and by those who will benefit under this measure. In other words, it is sought by means of this legislation to increase the rates of contribution by the employer and the employee by about 30 per cent without at the same time increasing the benefits to the employee.

For every dollar put into the fund before this measure was brought before the house, 40 cents thereof was paid each week by the employer, 40 cents by the employee and 20 cents by the government. This contribution will hereafter amount to 52 cents from the employer, 52 cents from the employee and 26 cents from the government. Why has it been found necessary to do this? The minister, in introducing this measure, stated in effect that it was because the fund is depleting. The hon. minister said this was required in order to maintain the fund in a stable position during the next two years.

During the last two years of recession the minister has indicated that there has been a heavy payment out of the fund. He has stated, further, that it is the responsibility of the government to see to it that this fund is able to meet whatever eventualities may arise. But I say to him that it is also the responsibility of the government to protect the fund. The government did not discharge that responsibility, and because it did not discharge that responsibility it is now asking the employer and the employee to pay the shot by means of this measure.

This, sir, is just another tax; it is just another method of imposing taxes on the people of this country which should have been announced during the budget debate. This, I say, is another way—a backdoor method, if you will—of collecting taxes. By means of this additional tax to which no reference was made in the budget speech it is expected to raise between $80 million and $100 million over a period of one year. That is a substantial sum of money having regard to the increased taxation which has already been placed upon the people of Canada.

I say that the unemployment insurance fund has not been properly administered. Last year the fund suffered a loss of $10 million in the sale of securities. According to sessional paper 82A which was tabled in the house it appears that the fund held about $400 million in victory bonds and we have good reason to believe that a substantial portion of those bonds were converted. Later when cash was required to meet the calls made upon the insurance fund by the unemployed, the government was forced to sell government securities, and as a result of these operations it made a loss exceeding $10 million. The administration of this fund is an example of how the conversion loan worked out. The government lost this money and it is now calling upon the workers to pay a portion of the bill.

What are the facts? The facts are contained in a document known as sessional paper 82A. I will not repeat what was said last night by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), but there are a number of things which I believe should be drawn to the attention of the house and which are to be found in this document. As of March 31, 1958 the balance to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund was $744 million, approximately, which was a decrease of $134 million over the 12 months period. The revenue for the fiscal year 1957-58 totalled $250 million, roughly, and benefits paid in the year 1957-1958 totalled $385 million. This represents an increase over the previous year of $153 million in total benefits. The operations of the year resulted in an excess of expenditure over revenue of $134 million. I think it is important that this should be brought to the attention of the house, because repeatedly, not only in this report which I hold in my hand but also in the other report of August 26 which was tabled yesterday by the minister, there is reference to this drain upon the unemployment insurance fund. Here it is stated that the staggering increase in benefit payments is mainly due to the large number of unemployed workers during the period and to the extension of the period during which seasonal benefits were available.

There are at this time 525,000 unemployed persons seeking jobs in this country, and more than one-third of those are in the province of Quebec. In the province of Quebec alone that represents 12.5 per cent of the working force, and I remind the minister that it is because of this unemployment that the drain on the fund which is referred to in this and in the other report is mentioned by the advisory committee.

The advisory committee also calls attention to the serious situation in which the fund finds itself. "It is a fact, however," states the committee, "that the burden of this expense, in the opinion of the committee, should not be imposed on the unemployment insurance fund unless the loss to the fund is made good." The committee goes on to state:

> We trust the government will take action to replace the drain on the fund, by reason of the extension of the seasonal benefit period by a grant.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member goes further, I think it well to remind him that the house has decided the question which was raised by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) which called upon the government to make contributions to the fund and to that extent the debate is limited from this point on because of the disposition of that matter.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I wanted to do was to incorporate the report which was tabled yesterday by the minister and which I think forms part of this sessional paper with reference to section 89 (1) with which I should like to deal if I may be allowed to do so. What I was going to bring to the attention of the house was the last recommendation of the committee and then I am through with sessional paper 82A—which states that:

> The committee respectfully recommends that the division of responsibility for revenue to the fund as between employers, employees and government be adjusted so that the contribution from each be made equal. In other words, that the contribution from the government be made equal to one-half that of the combined contribution from employers and employees.

Mr. Speaker: That is just the point where the hon. member reverts to the motion which was made by way of amendment and was disposed of. He is free to deal with the report but not in so far as it relates to the matter we have disposed of.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not labour the matter. If I may be allowed to make one other reference to it I will pass on to another matter.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have seen this type of debate steadily increasing in the last few weeks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the point of order?

Mr. Green: Under this bad practice a point of order will be raised, Your Honour will make a ruling, and then the hon. member of the opposition who has the floor will go on to make his point as though Your Honour had never said a word. This is a practice which is being followed, I suggest, deliberately by the opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Are you lecturing us?

Mr. Green: Your Honour has ruled that the hon. member could not deal with this question. He said, "Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, but I have just one more point I want to make". I submit he should be forced to follow your ruling and should not be allowed to evade it in that way. He has already done so twice since I have been here in the last five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure what the final point is which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) wishes to extract from the report or the sessional paper from which he is reading but I expect him to observe the limitation which is a clear one.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member wants to be out of order just once more.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): He is trying to beat the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who holds the record.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment that was disposed of dealt specifically with the question of government contributions to the fund and to my mind that point is closed as far as this debate is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. What I was going to do—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And we see that you are now going right on to do it.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: —was not to continue but simply to ask a question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh!

Mr. Chevrier: The question was this. Why was not the recommendation of this committee, a copy of which I hold in my hand, accepted by the minister or by the government? Having said that may I now proceed to another matter which I think is equally—

An hon. Member: Out of order?

Mr. Chevrier: I hope Mr. Speaker will not find it so, but if the Speaker does think I am out of order I shall quickly abide by his decision. My hon. friends may not like what I intend saying and they may not be so anxious later to make the interruptions which they made a moment ago.

If they will only bear with me and be patient I shall come now to another part of my remarks. I turn to the most amazing thing, in my opinion, about the subject matter of this measure, and that was the report dated August 26, 1958, which was tabled in the house yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). This is a report which should have been tabled earlier and which in my mind is in clear violation of section 89 (1).

Mr. Speaker: I had considerable difference with the hon. member for Essex East, on that point last night and I hope I will not have the same difficulty with the hon. member for Laurier.

An hon. Member: You will.

Mr. Speaker: I agreed quite readily that it was open to any hon. member to use the report which had been tabled and to use it in the debate but it is not open to hon. members to go into a collateral debate on whether or not this report is of a certain character which requires its tabling by law. That is something that can be brought up at another time but it is not relevant to the bill which is now before the house for second reading. Therefore I hope the hon. member for Laurier will keep within the limits which I tried to define last night.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Your Honour hear me on the relevancy of the point which I seek to make?

Mr. MacInnis: That point was determined last night.

Mr. Chevrier: No, this point was not determined. I wish to refer to what is contained in the report of August 26 and establish its relevancy before I am told not to go any further.

Mr. Speaker: I of course will hear the hon. member briefly if he wants to indicate that that particular line is relevant but I hope he will not debate it in the course of making his statement concerning its relevancy.

Mr. Chevrier: I will do it as briefly as I can, Mr. Speaker. The point I want to make is this. In the report of August 26 there are three paragraphs which deal with the fund and I shall not bother Your Honour with them but the last paragraph consists of one sentence which reads as follows:

> In the meantime we respectfully draw your attention to our report of July 18, 1958.

My contention is that the report which the minister tabled, sessional paper 82A, together with this report of August 26 forms the recommendations to the governor in council and therefore is debatable. I maintain that I can refer to it within the terms of section 89 (1) which says that the minister shall lay before parliament every report made by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. I say that by incorporation and by reference those two reports are debatable now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member appreciates that the minister has laid them before parliament. What he is asking to do is get into a collateral debate on quite a different matter than is before the house under this bill. As I understand it the question of whether or not the handling, disposition, and tabling of these reports and so on is in compliance with the act is not an issue on the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: May I point out to Your Honour that this matter was not before us at the resolution stage because when the minister introduced the resolution he had not tabled the report and it was only afterward that we were able to consider the report. I feel that on that basis since—

Mr. Speaker: I still have not made myself clear. I do not suggest that the hon. member is not free to complain that he has not had the report in fact but what I do think he should avoid is a debate on the legal responsibilities of the minister with respect to these reports because to my mind such observations are not pertinent at this time. They would be pertinent if the question were raised as a supply motion condemning the government for not tabling the reports in accordance with the act but they are not relevant in this debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, we are now, of course, dealing with the second reading of a bill which deals with the unemployment insurance commission and the operation of a fund and measures taken by the government to strengthen the fund. In respect of that we now have before us a report, which was tabled last night at six o'clock, of the unemployment insurance advisory committee giving certain views of that committee on how all this might be done. Surely, Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of this bill we can refer not only to this report but to the circumstances surrounding the tabling of it and, as we see it, the fault of the government in this matter which is borne out by the report. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this has a bearing on the principle of the bill which is before us.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, last evening Your Honour dealt with this point at some length and under some difficulty when the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was speaking. I submit that the hon. member for Laurier and the Leader of the Opposition have absolutely no right to go back tonight and argue that same point of order and ask to be allowed to go on with the same type of debate which was not allowed from the hon. member for Essex East last night. I urge upon Your Honor that the rules of the house be enforced in respect of these three hon. members and that they be restricted from dealing with this point on which Your Honour ruled last night.

Mr. Caron: Closure.

Mr. Green: When these people across the way talk about closure I say there is no doubt about who are the experts on closure in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Let's not make a joke out of this.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: What the minister says is quite true. The point of order which I raised last night was debated at considerable length and I thought I made it quite clear what were the limits of the debate which could take place on the background of this report. I have no objection and there is no rule that I know of which would prevent the hon. member for Laurier from complaining that he had this information only last night, and that that does not give him time to use it appropriately. What I do reiterate—and I feel I must, of course—is the point which I made last night, namely that the regularity of the government's action with respect to this report is a matter entirely outside this debate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there is a slightly different point actually, it seems to me, that the hon. member for Laurier was trying to make. Your Honour will recall that, according to May's sixteenth edition, it is competent to members to move amendments which may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of a bill. I apprehend that if it is competent to move an amendment about it, it is certainly competent to debate it and it seems to me that what the hon. member was seeking to do was not to debate a specific point, as perhaps the hon. member for Essex East may have been doing last night, but to debate the circumstances connected with the introduction of this bill, and particularly the circumstances that we did not have this information at an earlier stage.

Mr. Speaker: The simple answer to what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says is that the amendment must be relevant. The debate is not relevant and an amendment which would open up the debate which the hon. member is seeking to introduce is not relevant.

Mr. Pearson: On the second reading of this bill are we not competent to debate the relations of the government to the unemployment insurance advisory committee? Its relations have been explained in part at least in this particular report. Those relations surely, have a bearing on our attitude toward this particular bill and those relations, surely, cannot be discussed unless we discuss this particular report and the circumstances surrounding its introduction in this house.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member must be under a misapprehension that the whole Unemployment Insurance Act is before the house.

Mr. Pearson: It is.

Mr. Speaker: This is the second reading of a bill to amend an act. It has been very well established, and the practice has been very closely followed in the house, that a bill to amend a particular act opens up only the sections that it seeks to amend. Now, there are three or four principles or purposes in those amendments: one has to do with the numbers who may benefit; one has to do with the amount of benefits; one has to do with the amount of contributions. That is a fairly broad range of the unemployment insurance scheme, but it does not open up the whole act by any means, and it does not open up debate on the contents of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the advisory committee and its relations with the government.

[The Speaker.]

It only opens up the principles which I think were reasonably correctly stated, as I understand the bill, by the minister when he introduced the bill yesterday and referred to the four principal changes which are the purposes and principles of the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I suppose then that I would not be prevented from discussing what the minister said in his opening remarks yesterday. I presume, then, if I may be allowed to go on, I can at this stage deal with some of the statements that he made and to challenge those statements.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): And take an hour and a half to do it.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I did not take an hour and a half to get at this.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You have another hour and a half.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I have 40 minutes in which to speak and I would like to take the 40 minutes unless I am interrupted.

At page 3538 of Hansard of Monday, May 11, 1959, the minister said:

> I asked the unemployment insurance advisory committee to give some study to some of my suggestions for amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which they did.

The minister said in this statement which I have just read that the report was given to him at his request; that he asked the unemployment insurance advisory committee to give some study to some of his suggestions, which they did. He considered the report as confidential but the report which was tabled yesterday is not so marked. The point that I make now, is that it should have been tabled long before yesterday, along with the sessional papers.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: On a point of order,—

Mr. Chevrier: It should have been tabled—

Mr. Green: On a point of order,—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor is questioning the regularity of the acts of the minister and of the government with respect to this report. That is what I indicated last night was outside the ambit of this debate. This does not mean he is not able to refer to the report or to the time it was tabled. To make a debate on the subject of whether or not the government should have tabled it when it did, or whether it was required to table it under the act, is the limit that is being set and that is what I have been trying to tell the hon. member. I hope he will keep that in mind.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister permitted to make a statement regarding the circumstances of the production of this report? He said last night that this report was produced at his request, but the report itself shows that that is not so. Are we not allowed to comment on that statement of the minister, he having been permitted to make it last night?

Mr. Chevrier: That is really the point, sir. If I am not allowed to make any comment on what the minister said, then I might as well resume my seat and not go on with my remarks. The minister did this. Surely, if the minister is able to make certain statements, then I ought to be able to reply to those statements and that is what I intend to do, unless I am interrupted by Your Honour, because there are statements here which I think demand explanation and which I think the minister should explain before second reading of the bill is proceeded with.

One of the things I believe he should explain is this. Did the minister actually ask the advisory committee for these suggestions?

An hon. Member: He said so.

Mr. Chevrier: He said he did but if you read the sessional paper dated August 26—I doubt if I am able to refer to it—there is not the slightest indication in that paper that the minister asked the advisory committee for suggestions as he said he did. What are the suggestions that the minister made? I think the house is entitled to know what those suggestions were. We know what the answer is. We know what the report of August 26 is but we do not know what the suggestions are which the minister made. Why are we being denied this information?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He did not say that.

Mr. Chevrier: Why is it that we have not got the information? Where are the suggestions? The House of Commons is entitled to know what these suggestions were. We should not have just half of the picture. We should not have the report of August 26 without, on the other hand, having the suggestions which the minister made and which brought about the report. The house is entitled to this information and I say that we are being denied it. We have a right to have that information, and I challenge the minister here and now to produce the minutes of the meeting which will indicate what the suggestions were.

Why is it, that in the last part of this report there is not only no indication that the minister asked for suggestions but on the contrary there seems to be clear-cut evidence, and it appears from the last paragraph, that although at least three members of the advisory committee were not in accord with the minister, the minister had not notified the committee of his intentions. The minister says that he asked the advisory committee to study some of his suggestions for amendments to the act. I say, that the minister has no right to do that. I say that there is no provision in the act for such action. I say that the minister acted in contravention of the Unemployment Insurance Act when he asked for this report.

An hon. Member: Whoo, whoo!

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says, "whoo, whoo". Let us see what the act says.

Mr. Pearson: Trained owls.

Mr. Chevrier: Section 91 (1) of the act reads as follows:

> Whenever the governor in council, after consultation with the commission, considers it expedient to do so, he may direct the advisory committee to investigate and to report upon,
> (a) the provision of unemployment insurance—
> (b) the rates of contribution and benefit—

Parliament has not given the minister the power to ask for the report which he said he asked for. The minister took that power and he had no right to take that power. The minister acted in contravention of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I say that the minister should explain to the house why and under what authority he did ask for this report because I have been unable to find anywhere in the act any statutory authority that gives the minister jurisdiction to ask for a report of this kind. The governor in council and the governor in council alone has the right to demand an additional report, and that is why I say with all respect that I was in order a while ago when I asked to be able to consider these two reports alongside the act because it is the governor in council alone who has the right to demand this and it should be tabled in accordance with the request of the governor in council.

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. member to follow an inquiry as to the circumstances of asking for this report but I will not allow him to continue on the specific point to which he is now reverting.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will go on to another point. I say, that not only has the minister contravened section 91 (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act but he has also violated section 19 (1) which states:

> There shall be a committee, called the "unemployment insurance advisory committee", consisting of a chairman and not less than six nor more than eight other members, appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure.

That unemployment insurance advisory committee does not exist at the present time and it does not exist because of the conduct of the minister. I say that there has been a violation by the minister of section 19. The Minister of Labour has violated four sections of the act and he is in contempt of parliament under four heads. He has violated section 89 (1) by not producing the report of August 26 until yesterday. He has violated section 91 (1) by asking for a report of the advisory committee which he has no right to do. He has violated section 19 because there exists no legal unemployment insurance advisory committee today as provided for by the act. Lastly, he has violated the spirit and the intention of the act because he failed to consult the advisory committee and failed to carry out the major recommendations made by that committee in connection with the matter now before the house.

What the minister has done, is not only unjustifiable but inexcusable and it is in contravention of the statute. It is in contravention of principles going back to the bill of rights which declares, among other things, that no government or executive can suspend the law in any particular without parliament. At this point, I desire to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this house declines to proceed with this bill because its provisions were formulated and introduced without any consultation by the government with the advisory committee and before receiving the annual report of that advisory committee on the financial condition of the unemployment insurance fund for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, and its recommendations thereon."

Mr. Speaker: I have very grave doubts as to the regularity of this amendment but I take it there are others who wish to participate in the debate and I will give consideration to it while the debate proceeds.

Mr. Chevrier: I had not finished my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to continue, if I may. I want to say that it is unfortunate that this bill is submitted to parliament at a time when relations between the Minister of Labour and the labour movement have been broken for all practical purposes. The minister, of course, must assume full responsibility for the unfortunate position which has brought about a contravention of section 19 (1) of the act in that we find ourselves at this moment without an advisory committee having a legal status. As a result of the failure of the minister to comply with that section, as I stated earlier, a clear and important provision of that legislation, the two most important Canadian labour unions have stated that they do not recognize an appointment made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr).

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure how the hon. member relates the appointment of officials to the committee to this bill which is now before us. Before he proceeds to deal with that matter, I feel he should satisfy me it is relevant to the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I have been discussing section 19 (1) for the last five minutes, and Your Honour has not stopped me. Section 19 (1) says:

There shall be a committee, called the "unemployment insurance advisory committee", consisting of a chairman and not less than six nor more than eight other members, appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure.

I say that that committee does not exist at the moment. I was going on to deal with subsection (2), which says:

At least one of the members of the advisory committee, other than the chairman, shall be appointed after consultation with organizations representative of workers—

Surely I have the right to discuss and deal with those two sections of the act at this time.

Mr. Green: May I point out to Your Honour that once again we have an evasion of Your Honour's ruling. You have ruled—

Mr. Chevrier: The Speaker has made no ruling.

Mr. Green: A few moments ago you pointed out the principles of this bill which is under debate. Now you have said that the raising of this question of the appointment to the advisory committee is not relevant to the discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Laurier is going right on to make that point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Close parliament; let us go home. Let us have a dictatorship, that is what you want.

Mr. Green: You know all about dictatorships. If the hon. member for Laurier is not prepared to follow the rulings made by Your Honour, then he should stop speaking.

Mr. Speaker: I did not rule, of course; I asked the hon. member for Laurier how he could relate the appointment of the members of the board to the bill. I see no connection myself, and unless he has some means of bringing the question of the appointments to the advisory board or the conduct of the government in that respect into the scope and purpose of this rather limited amendment to the act, which does nothing to the provisions for the advisory board, I cannot allow him to proceed. I was asking him how he could justify the relevancy of the course upon which he was obviously embarking.

Mr. Pearson: On the point you have just made, may I be permitted, with great respect, to say this: We are dealing with a bill which amends, in some very important respects, the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Unemployment Insurance Act is administered by the unemployment insurance commission, and another important agency in the administration is the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

How can we discuss intelligently the second reading of a bill which amends the act in these important respects without discussing the commission which deals with the administration of the act, as it will be amended. We are giving new responsibilities and new duties to this commission. Yesterday when the minister, in a very short speech indeed, explained these amendments he found time in that very short speech, as recorded on page 3538 of Hansard, to refer to the unemployment insurance advisory committee, and I think quite properly. He referred to that committee in respect of suggestions which he said he had made to that committee. If we are going to deal intelligently with these important changes in the bill, surely we are entitled to deal with the machinery which has been set up by parliament to administer this act.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot accept that argument. There would be no limit to the debate, the whole field of unemployment insurance would be under review, if the hon. member's contention were correct. There is no attempt made in this bill to deal with the machinery for the administration of the act. There are four or five relatively clear changes, but there is no change in the machinery. It is open to hon. members to debate the subject on a supply motion, if they wish, but they cannot debate it during the debate on second reading because this subject goes beyond the scope of the bill that is before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask Your Honour for some guidance, then? In that case, is Your Honour ruling that I cannot deal with the contents of section 19 (1), which indicates that there should be an advisory committee?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I am ruling that the appointment to the advisory committee, and all that machinery of administration, is irrelevant.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, the minister has referred to that matter by tabling sessional paper No. 82A, and by tabling yesterday the additional document of August 26, both of which referred to the advisory committee. If I cannot deal with nor discuss the advisory committee which is referred to in the report now before the house, then of what use is this debate?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will not see the limit I am trying to draw, I am afraid I have only one course open and that is to ask him to resume his seat if he wishes to go on with that line of argument. The fact that the minister referred to there being an advisory board and he sought its advice and filed its report does not open up the constitution of the machinery of administration.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall not continue the matter—

Mr. Pearson: Talk about closure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I respect your ruling, sir, but I now want to say, without any hesitation and without any doubt, that in my opinion there has been a clear violation of the statute under four heads by the Minister of Labour. I want to add that the Minister of Labour has withheld from this house information which this house was entitled to receive. I want to quote, from an hon. gentleman who sat on this side of the house at one time and who afterwards became the Prime Minister of this country, when he dealt with a situation similar to this.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member referring to the quotation which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) sought to quote last night?

Mr. Chevrier: No, sir. I am now dealing with the words spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the debate of January 20, 1958, which has nothing to do with the matter which was discussed last night by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Speaker: At what page?

Mr. Chevrier: At page 3526 of volume 4 of the session of 1957-58, the Prime Minister then said this, and I quote:

> He said we must not conceal facts, but I put it to the hon. members opposite—every one of them in the official opposition—that they hid the facts; they concealed the record; they did not let the Canadian people know what was taking place.

I say to the Minister of Labour that he withheld information from this house when he did not tell this house what the request was that he made of the advisory committee. Then, a little farther on, the Prime Minister said:

> Did they give us such information? They had it in the report but they did not give it to parliament.

The information I submit the Minister of Labour had or has, and he must be able to tell the house what these suggestions were which he made to the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission. Then at page 3530 the Prime Minister, still continuing the debate, stated:

> You concealed the facts. That is what you did.

And a little later on:

> What did they do? They concealed the facts.

And again at page 3533:

> I think of the fact that the hidden book reveals that they did nothing.

And at page 3534:

> However, the point I made was that they did have that document and they did not act upon it but, instead of acting upon it, they actually placed before the House of Commons at the time of the budget a picture of a buoyant economy, hopeful for the future—

I say, that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) brought down his budget he should have given some indication that this additional taxation, ranging anywhere from $80 million to $100 million, was to be brought in by his colleague the Minister of Labour. But not one word was said by the Minister of Finance. Neither did the Minister of Finance say anything about the loans which are alleged to have been made and which the hon. member for Essex East asked him about on the orders of the day. His memory did not seem to be too clear in so far as they were concerned. His memory seemed to be confused in so far as they were concerned. Nonetheless, the hon. member for Essex East put on Hansard details of the two loans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He put on the record a great many misstatements.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance says he put on the record a great many misstatements. I ask him this question: Why did you not get up and challenge the misstatements? Why did you not get up and reply? No; you did not do that. You sit there and you interrupt; and you interrupt because you have a bad conscience.

Mr. Walker: I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker is in the chair. The hon. member for Laurier should address the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; I must remind the house—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: I did not catch that gem from the hon. member for Rosedale. I would ask him to repeat it.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member should know better than to do what he has been doing; he should address the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosedale was properly reminding the house that I am still in the chair. I would remind the hon. member for Laurier that he was directing his remarks to a new chairman down there.

Mr. Chevrier: I extend my apologies to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier will also appreciate the fact that I have given him the benefit of a substantial amount of time which was consumed in the debate between himself and myself. However, I find that his time has now expired.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I submit to you that the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Laurier is out of order. You will observe that the operative part of the amendment reads as follows:

> This house declines to proceed with this bill because its provisions were formulated and introduced without any consultation by the government with the advisory committee and before receiving the annual report of that advisory committee—

And so on. Mr. Speaker, I know that I do not need to submit to you that the mere insertion of a reason for any particular course set forth in an amendment is out of order. The only amendment that could be in order at this point is one which would set up a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. In my submission to you, Mr. Speaker, this amendment does not set up a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. What it says in effect is that the house should not proceed to give the bill second reading because certain things were done in relation to the bill without consultation with the advisory committee and before receipt of the annual report of the advisory committee. These are obviously procedural questions, something outside of the scope of the bill. The amendment says that something should have been done or that the introduction and formulation of the bill should have been delayed until certain things were done. This is not the assertion of a principle contrary to the principle of the bill.

After the discussion that was had in this house last evening and today, I do not need to say anything further about the principle of this bill. The principle of the bill you have yourself discussed in the course of the rulings that you have already made. But, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in these two points of a procedural nature which relate to the principle of this bill. There is nothing here that is set up that is contrary to the principle of the bill at all. All this amendment says is that something should have been done entirely outside the bill before the bill was formulated and submitted to the house. That certainly is not the assertion in the amendment of a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. Therefore, in my respectful submission, this amendment is clearly out of order.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this point of order. I would quite agree with the Minister of Finance that this amendment was out of order if it fell within the ambit of the first citation in May's 16th edition which Your Honour will recall, and I am reading as little as possible:

> A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 530, at the bottom of the page and at the top of page 531. The citation continues:

> (1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.
> (2) It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

It seems to me that this amendment falls absolutely, completely and categorically within the ambit of that citation.

The other question, of course, that has to be decided, as I understand it, is that of relevancy; it must be relevant to the bill. I think the question of relevancy was decided last night by Your Honour in a decision you made in reference to the point on which you decided adversely to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) when you agreed that he could discuss the report of the advisory committee but could not discuss the narrow point of whether or not that report was made at the right time. If it is competent to debate the report of the committee and the advice of the committee, then I submit they are relevant to the bill and therefore are a relevant subject for an amendment. As this amendment is an amendment expressing opinions as to the circumstances, it seems to me that it falls completely within the ambit of this citation of May. It is, of course, in that respect, as Your Honour will recall, similar to an amendment that was moved and found to be in order at the last session of parliament on the Customs Act.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, as the acting leader of this group—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: A change for the better.

Mr. Herridge: While I greatly appreciate the applause, I want to remind hon. members that my star will be in the ascendent only temporarily. However, I want to make a few general remarks. I am not going to be repetitious, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member speaking on the point of order?

Mr. Herridge: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was hoping that the hon. member was going to give me some words of wisdom which would help me to deal with this proposed amendment. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has asserted that there is a relevancy to this assertion of principle. However, I am afraid that I cannot follow him in that assertion. It seems to me that this is not an assertion of principle contrary to the principle of the bill. It is a statement of fact relating to the conduct of the government. It is a condemnation of the government for something it is alleged not to have done, namely to consult the advisory committee and receive the annual report of the advisory committee. I do not think it is in the same category as the amendment which was submitted by the hon. member for Essex East last night. It does not assert a principle contrary to the bill, but seeks to introduce extraneous and irrelevant matter in the form of a condemnation of the government for its alleged conduct in not having done this or that, preliminary to the bill, and therefore I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In an effort to regain my temporary ascendancy as the acting leader of this law abiding parliamentary group, I wish to make a few general remarks. I am not going to be repetitious, and I am not going to be verbose. Our views and criticisms with respect to this bill were ably placed before the house by the very good-looking member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the equally good-looking member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

I discussed this unemployment insurance legislation with a number of my constituents. They were very interested in the operation of the act, and very interested in amendments which were even then, as it were, in the air. I must say before I proceed that I find it somewhat difficult to work up a suitable political head of steam when I look at the genial and very much respected Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). I may say that we in this group do not blame him entirely for the deficiencies of this bill. The hon. gentleman is one of a cabinet. We are of the opinion that if he had had his own way all the amendments which the official opposition and we in this group are proposing would have been already incorporated in this measure.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is a very sound piece of legislation, and one which has been of great benefit to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I think we are sometimes inclined to overlook the days when there was no Unemployment Insurance Act and when people who, for one reason or another, lost their employment were obliged to rush around for a few extra dollars or go on relief. This legislation represented a big step forward. I do want to remind the house that this legislation was placed on the statute books of this country after men like Mr. J. S. Woodsworth and Mr. William Irvine had urged the government of that day year after year to make provision of this kind. I think when we are discussing this legislation we should not fail to remind ourselves of the pioneer work done in this respect by former members of the C.C.F. party in this house—

An hon. Member: And Liberals, too.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, and by some other hon. members of that day. There were a few of the more progressive Liberals who supported us in those efforts.

An hon. Member: New leader.

Mr. Herridge: I see that hon. members are trying to interrupt me.

While these good people of the past—members of this house, representatives of the labour movement, and people in other sections of our society—were urging the adoption of this type of legislation, there were other people who strongly objected to it. I am sure there are members of this house who remember the heated criticism made by some Tory-minded people of that day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have them right in this house, too.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is correct. I am not suggesting that they were all members of the Progressive Conservative party, but there were some Tory-minded members of this house, and some members of the other place, too, who regarded this legislation as a dole rather than as legislation based on the principle of insurance in order to provide against days of adversity.

Experience in changing circumstances has clearly demonstrated the necessity for periodical amendments to this act. This is one of the times when amendments are indicated and justified. While there are some improvements in the measure, some things which this group welcomes, there are also reasons for disappointment because of the omission of certain things which this group thinks should have been in the bill before us at the present time.

The extension of the benefit to 52 weeks is excellent, and we support that wholeheartedly. The protection of people earning up to $5,460 is also an excellent amendment. There is also some improvement in the rates of benefit; not as much as we should like to see, but some improvement. Higher earnings are also permitted for certain persons before they are considered ineligible for benefits and this, too, we consider to be an improvement because it provides an opportunity for exercising initiative and helping oneself while receiving unemployment insurance benefit. And then there is the question of extending the benefits to persons who are in a penitentiary for up to two years. That is an excellent improvement.

We support the protest made by many hon. members at the use of the greater portion of the increased contribution for the rebuilding of the capital of the fund. We think that is most unsound in principle. We think it is a decided departure from the insurance principle upon which the act is based. We have been informed that only 1 per cent of the 80 per cent increase expected is required to pay for the extension of benefits up to 52 weeks, and that the balance will largely be used to rebuild the capital of the fund. When the minister replies before the conclusion of this debate on second reading I hope he will give the house some figures in this connection. I repeat, that we have been informed that it only requires 1 per cent of the 30 per cent increase expected to meet the cost of the increased benefits and that the balance will be used largely to rebuild the capital of the fund. I hope the minister will give us some figures in this connection in order that we may know whether we are dealing with facts. We want to be accurate in this respect, because to criticize on unfair or incorrect facts is only to render invalid the argument one is trying to make.

I want to deal with three omissions from the bill from our point of view, three things which we regret have not been included in this measure. I intend to be quite brief. First, we regret that while the minister was amending this act provision was not made for the inclusion of farm labourers. This question has been discussed repeatedly in the house, and I know that there are a goodly number of members who support the government at the present time and who, when they were in opposition, felt that the government of the day should include farm labourers under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We are very sorry they have not been included, because it is most unfair to the farmers of the country. I am repeatedly having farmers come to me and say how difficult it is for them to get labour on the farms because, naturally, men prefer to seek employment in fields where they have the protection of the Unemployment Insurance Act; they are not anxious to work for a farmer for two or three weeks if they are not to have the benefit of this protection. I shall have more to say on this subject when the estimates of the Department of Labour come before us for consideration. I think there will have to be a much more accurate definition as to what exactly a farm labourer is. I was talking to the local manager of the unemployment service—

Surely I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. member considerable latitude in going into the background of this bill. It is in order to say that the bill does not go far enough, and that it could do something else, but I would ask the hon. member to make his contribution on what is omitted a recital rather than a debate of the matters omitted.

Mr. Herridge: At your request, Mr. Speaker, I shall carry on in the form of a recitation, not a debate. I want to bring to the attention of the minister the unfairness suffered at the present time by farmers because of a failure to include farm labour in this act. This problem is constantly being brought to my attention. My detailed remarks with respect to farm labour I shall reserve until we are discussing the estimate concerning the unemployment insurance commission.

Another matter a number of people have discussed with me is this. We in this group regret there is no provision in this act for students who would be eligible for unemployment insurance if they were to remain at home but who cannot draw it if they attend university or technical training school. We in this group say that these young people are better off learning than lounging. We urge the minister to give consideration to introducing an amendment of this nature to the act. It would enable a number of young men and women to carry on with their education and it would be of assistance to others if they were allowed to draw to the fullest extent possible the unemployment insurance to which they would be entitled if they were not attending a university, technical or other school of learning.

As the final paragraph of my recitation I would say I think some consideration should be given to bringing under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act members of the armed forces who are on short term service. It has been brought to my attention and to the attention of other hon. members in this group that men who are in the armed forces for short periods up to five years and are then discharged, as men were within the last year or eighteen months owing to the recession and lack of employment, have found themselves unemployed and without any unemployment insurance protection. We think that men who have joined the armed forces and served their country should receive on their discharge the protection of unemployment insurance.

We would urge consideration of an amendment to protect those persons discharged from the armed forces of Canada. I know there is some objection to that from the Department of National Defence. In an issue like this I do not think the decision should be left to the senior officers of the Department of National Defence. Senior officers have a prejudice about things like unemployment insurance. Some may even think it somewhat degrading. This decision should be made by the Department of Labour and this protection given to those young Canadians.

We in this group think the time is ripe for a thorough review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We urge the minister to give consideration to our criticisms of the present bill and to our suggestion for the inclusion of other groups so we can build up in this country on the foundations already laid a complete, just and sound unemployment insurance system to protect those who suffer adversity through temporary unemployment. We cannot evade the fact that owing to our climate and other circumstances in the country with all the best arrangements there is bound to be a measure of seasonal unemployment in Canada. We must provide for that. We in this group believe in building up this act so it is based on sound insurance principles to cover those who pay for their own protection and in so doing provide for their own security.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, of this we may be sure, that the unfortunate Canadian man or woman who today, tomorrow, next week or next month may be a beneficiary under this act will be totally unimpressed with the debate in this house this evening if indeed they ever hear of it. We are dealing tonight with human relations. We are dealing with an act introduced into this parliament many years ago, amended from time to time, requiring further amendments, an act that brings great benefits not only to large numbers of men and women but also to many children.

I am totally unimpressed with the argument that there need not be increases in the levies on the part of employers or employees for this reason. If they are honest I believe that my hon. friends opposite will admit that the fund originally was created in the buoyancy of a wartime economy and of a postwar economy. Today we live in a different age—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is true.

Mr. Brunsden: We live in a different age by reason of our inheritance from the previous administration.

Mr. Pearson: An inheritance of buoyancy.

Mr. Brunsden: As time marches on and conditions change this act, like many other acts, will require survey and amendment from time to time.

A moment ago I mentioned that we are dealing with human values this evening. Let us rest this debate with respect to this bill not on legalities relating to papers, reports or precedents, but on the basic human factors of Canadian manhood and womanhood.

(Translation):

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with close attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden). He says he has not been in the least bit impressed by what the opposition members had to say on the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act introduced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) because, as he says, within a week, a month, or two months, there will be women, men and young people benefiting from this legislation. And I believe this. In fact, I not only believe it, but I am sure of it, because never more than under a Conservative government have so many Canadians been on unemployment insurance. Things have reached such a pass that, according to the famous report of August 19, 1958, which has been referred to here—

Mr. Johnson: It was not our fault if we were not in office in 1953.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): If the hon. member wants to repeat what he just said, I shall give him an answer.

Mr. Johnson: We cannot be blamed for not being in power in 1953.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are always served the same argument: we inherited those conditions. Yet, when anything good happens in this country since they came into that legacy, they give the whole credit to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the cabinet's vision. On the other hand, when anything goes wrong, the inheritance and legacy left by the former Liberal administration takes the blame.

Mr. Speaker, I shall go back to what I was going to say when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Bagot—

An hon. Member: It was not the hon. member for Bagot.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The name does not matter, for the hon. member's quality is the same.

Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I was going to say that, in the report dated August 19, 1958, the unemployment insurance fund is indicated as having been reduced by $234,283,645 and a few pennies—which I shall spare the hon. member who just interrupted me. Mr. Speaker, we have here the proof that, under a Conservative administration, Canadians really need unemployment insurance.

In answer to my hon. friend from Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who was saying that the legislation was passed in 1944, I shall remind him that the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed by parliament in 1940 at the instigation of a Liberal administration. Even if it was introduced by Liberal and C.C.F. members, I think that the credit for it is to be attributed to the then prime minister and his Liberal cabinet, i.e. the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who had truly enough vision to see that the Conservatives would be in power in 1958, and the unemployed Canadians might benefit from such good legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Johnson: Let's talk about the crystal ball.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, if you want to let those people rise who spend their time interrupting me, so as to catch the cabinet ministers' attention, I am ready to sit down, and pursue my remarks when they have finished with theirs.

In that same report of August 19—when I say August 19 I am not referring at all to the Conservatives—in that same report of August 19, 1958—

Mr. Johnson: Leave such play on words to the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis).

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The following may be noted:

> The excess of payments over revenue, persuades the committee it would be improper to recommend major changes at this time. That is changes which would very materially increase the deficit; or in the alternative would necessitate a tax on industry and workers.

The committee wishes to reserve its opinion on the "benefit formula proposal" of July 24, 1958, until the commission and actuary, have had more opportunity to give it careful consideration in the light of further experience with the existing act.

There you have, Mr. Speaker, a recommendation which should have been taken into account by the hon. Minister of Labour. After all, the unemployment insurance commission advisory committee is composed of businessmen having real vision, men of common sense and experience, representing both labour and industry. I believe their recommendations should be seriously considered, and be taken into account by the Minister of Labour when he contemplates amending the Unemployment Insurance Act.

In that same report, Mr. Speaker, on page 2, the committee recommends the following:

The committee respectfully recommends that the division of responsibility for revenue to the fund as between employers, employees and government be adjusted so that the contribution from each be made equal. In other words, that the contribution from the government be made equal to one-half that of the combined contribution from employers and employees.

I would have liked to discuss the matter Mr. Speaker, but I know it was made the basis of an amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who, incidentally, discussed it most ably and intelligently. I hope I shall have the opportunity of dealing with this point later, but I wish to point out that the Minister of Labour failed to take into account—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Young members, elected in 1957 and 1958, who think parliament came into existence when they were elected, do not even bother to follow what goes on here in the house, at a time when we are discussing problems which are of direct concern to the people suffering from unemployment at the present time.

Mr. Denis: Tell us about the frogs of Roberval!

Mr. Johnson: He didn't say anything about the toads of St. Denis.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Some hon. members seem to be starting a private debate. I would ask them to leave the floor to the hon. member for Lapointe.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I hope the official stenographer of the house has had the time to make a note of those remarks, which stigmatize the intelligence of some members of the house.

Mr. Tremblay: You mean the member for Hull (Mr. Caron).

Mr. Johnson: Such modesty!

(Text):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Is the hon. member through with his remarks?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Get on with your speech.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who has the floor persists in engaging in these private debates I am afraid I cannot protect him.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard: (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, a man who is nettled cannot help jumping up.

Mr. Johnson: It takes time.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to refer to a question that the hon. member for Essex East asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), about certain loans purported to have been made to the unemployment insurance commission.

Not later than yesterday, the hon. member for Essex East asked the Minister of Finance whether the government had made loans to the unemployment insurance commission. The Minister of Finance, who usually has a good memory when it suits him, replied that he did not recall it. The member for Essex East then read a copy of Order in Council 1959/383, approved on April 2, 1959, by His Excellency the Governor General. Among other things, the hon. member has quoted the following:

The committee of the Privy Council advise that your Excellency may be pleased, pursuant to section 86 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans from time to time to the Unemployment Insurance Fund in an aggregate principal amount of $50 million.

A little later on, the hon. member pointed out that those loans had been made at a rate of interest of 5 per cent.

That is, Mr. Speaker, another of the many about-faces—they are too numerous to be counted—of the Minister of Finance in another field, that of loans made by the government to an agency of the Crown—the unemployment insurance commission.

This government has loaned money at a rate of interest of 5 per cent. And what has the Minister of Finance not said—when he used to sit on this side of the house—about the rate of interest.

What criticism did he not make, not only in the house, but on all election platforms of the country, when he used to speak of the high cost of money or what he used to call in his language, the "tight money policy" which was supposedly so detrimental to the industry and to the workers of this country.

Now that he administers—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will not find anything in the bill relating to advances to the unemployment insurance commission nor to the subject of high interest rates which he is discussing. We heard last night exactly the same speech which the hon. member is now making only it was made by another hon. member.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, behalf of the Minister of Finance, I thank you for having come to his rescue.

I realize you have heard a debate on that matter yesterday evening, but I feel the matter is so glaring, compared to what has been said and done until now, that it needs to be stressed and emphasized as often as can be done.

Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Kootenay West, I deplore—

(Text):

An hon. Member: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has something to say, I am ready to let him take over for a few seconds, because I trust he will not be able to speak longer than a few seconds.

I want to join the hon. member for Kootenay West in deploring the fact that the new amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act do not take students into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I know of several cases where young girls in my riding, or in my area had been working for corporations or in local offices for 5, 6 or 7 years, and later decided to leave their work in order to take a nursing course. Those girls then tried to collect their unemployment insurance benefits, but, obviously it is provided in this act that if a person making an application for benefits is not unemployed, the request cannot be granted. I am sorry the minister failed to consider that aspect of the matter, before introducing his amendment. I would also urge him to consider it seriously the next time he brings other amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, as I feel that from now on, until the next general election, several other amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be submitted to us, for unemployment will keep on growing—not that we wish it to grow—but because it is the business policy and national policy of the government, in other words, bad administration by the whole cabinet, which has led us to the chaotic condition in which we now find ourselves.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is the the house ready for the question?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I should prefer to take part in it non-competitively if that is possible. As I say, I had not intended to take part in the debate until we heard some of the fables of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). It so happens that almost from the first moment when I came to Ottawa I had a good deal of association with the act which the minister is now asking us to amend, and I hope I will not be any more out of order than the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) was, who made no reference to the bill at all in his intervention, if I recall to the minds of hon. members that this measure would not be on the statute books but for the fortunate circumstance that Mr. Mackenzie King was undiscouraged by the refusal of the present premier of Quebec to agree to an amendment to the constitution to make it possible. As soon as the Liberals won the election in Quebec in 1939 and agreed to a constitutional amendment this legislation was possible and was put on the statute books by a Liberal government.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Herridge: He made some reference to my talking fables. Is it not correct that Mr. J. S. Woodsworth and all the members of the C.C.F. group in the house at that time had urged this legislation for years prior to the Liberal government taking action?

Mr. Pickersgill: It so happens, Mr. Speaker, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) will bear me out in this because he was first elected to that parliament, that that parliament was elected in March of 1940 and the constitutional amendment was put before the house some time before the middle of the summer so that there could not have been very many years consumed in this advocacy of which the hon. member speaks. It is quite true that Mr. Woodsworth long before there was any C.C.F. advocated unemployment insurance and so did Mr. King long before Mr. Woodsworth did.

Mr. Small: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Small: Did not R. B. Bennett put it on the statute books first and was it not declared ultra vires?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is almost right. Perhaps he is quite right. Perhaps that government was like this government. If the Prime Minister did it you did not bother about parliament, but in 1935 it was parliament, not R. B. Bennett, that did it. It was the whole parliament that did it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see I have been in error in allowing the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) the latitude I did in discussing the general origins of unemployment insurance. It is permissible as an introduction to a discussion of the bill but I would not like to see the debate develop into a debate on the origins of unemployment insurance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I hate to discourage the rather unexpected thirst for knowledge of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small), which I was seeking to satisfy, but if Your Honour would prefer me to discuss something else, say, for example, the bill, I am equally prepared to do that. I am prepared to discuss the bill in terms of the totally inadequate and really rather pitiful introduction to this measure that we listened to in a very few minutes yesterday from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). Here is a measure that, according to the Minister of Labour, is necessary to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, but more than half of his speech dealt largely with the illusory additional benefits which were dealt with very capably by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) this afternoon as well as by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) last night and which will be of some benefit to a very few people compared with the totality of the people covered by the act. They are mostly camouflage in order to bring in a large group of contributors who will, of course, contribute many times as much as they can ever expect to derive from the fund.

But what I do intend to do is to give some reasons why I intend to vote against the bill. I apprehend that on second reading of a bill, it is permissible for a member to give any reasons he wishes, as long as they are not blasphemous, as to why he intends to vote against the bill, and if those reasons appear in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite to be foolish, nonsensical or even repetitive it is not for hon. gentlemen opposite to object to them on the alleged ground they are out of order. Unless I am ruled out of order I intend to give my reasons for voting against the bill. One reason I have for voting against the bill is that we have not been told the facts. They have been hidden from us by the government. They concealed the facts. As the hon. member for Essex East showed, they concealed the report of the advisory committee. That is one reason I have for voting against the bill, because they hid the report. They kept it from us and they intended to go on keeping it from us to use in the words that were read so eloquently by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) a little earlier, words that had a ring that some of us will not forget for quite a long while.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I would think you would not forget.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not the only thing that was hidden from us. It was only the beginning of what was hidden from us. We also had hidden from us the order in council of the second of April. I understand that the Prime Minister tabled the orders in council for the month of April but that order in council was not, I am told, among those tabled. I am not accusing the Prime Minister of having broken the law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman to what he is referring? Does he say that any order in council that was supposed to be tabled along with all orders in council during the month was not tabled? Is that the statement he makes?

Mr. Chevrier: You should have been in the house and you would not have been interjecting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are here irregularly.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister should have been in the house and he would not ask that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should never talk about absence from the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I am free to talk; I have a perfect right to say what I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am telling you that you are the last person who should talk about absence from the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister has asked me a question and I have said what I understood. I have not checked to see—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the Prime Minister and hon. members are not anxious to hear the answer to the question, all right. I say I was told. I did not look it up myself to see if the Prime Minister had—

An hon. Member: Look it up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps hon. gentlemen would like to let me finish my sentence.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a fact that every month under the Regulations Act certain orders in council, not all of them, are tabled. I was told they had been tabled for the month of April. Maybe they have not been tabled. I have not checked through Votes and Proceedings to see.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Why talk then?

Mr. Pickersgill: But, strictly speaking, I do not suppose that these two orders that were produced by the hon. member for Essex East yesterday fall in that category because from the look of them I do not think they have statutory effect. In fact, the hon. member for Essex East went a little farther. He suggested that, not only did they not have any statutory effect but he was unable to find any statutory foundation for them. I would have thought that in the face of a statement like that from so eminent a member of the bar—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —so experienced a parliamentarian as the hon. member for Essex East, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would have been anxious to assure parliament at the opening of the house today as to what the legislative foundation of these orders was. I do not pretend to know whether there is any statute, but I take it that the hon. member for Essex East, having looked for the statutory foundation, was unable to find any statutory foundation for these orders in the unemployment insurance commission legislation itself.

The hon. member asserted he could find none, and I think parliament is entitled to be told on the basis of what statute, what vote, what appropriation or what other authority of parliament, the Minister of Finance disposed of $80 million, if in fact he has disposed of $80 million. In any event, we should be told on what legal basis these two orders in council were passed. We used to hear a lot from the hon. gentleman who is now the Prime Minister of this country about government by order in council, but we are told nothing about these orders in council; about what statute they are based upon; about what the legislative foundation of them is; about where it came from; about when parliament authorized it. Surely, if the Minister of Finance, who said he could not even remember them yesterday morning, did not know about them—only $80 million, and he did not even know about it yesterday morning—

Mr. Pearson: What is $80 million?

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say inflation seems to have proceeded quite rapidly in the past few years since hon. gentlemen went to the other side of the house. It seems to me it is an outrage for the minister to have disposed of $50 million out of the treasury in this fashion, and for the governor in council to have disposed of it seven days before the budget, and yet according to the information of the hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The misinformation, you mean.

Mr. Pickersgill: —according to the uncontradicted information; of course, if the minister wants—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It certainly is contradicted.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister wants to reply, instead of interrupting, and put the facts on the record, then I do not want to debate something that is not debatable. The minister has had all day. I waited until Your Honour rose before getting up myself, because I thought the Minister of Finance, even at this late hour, would show enough respect for parliament to get up and tell us what the facts were. However, there was not a word. Not only did he hide the orders in council, not only did he say the orders in council had no foundation, but he said they were misleading. He said it was misrepresentation, and he said that in one of his interruptions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What are you talking about?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am talking about one of the interruptions made by the minister. He will find it is in Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are having hallucinations.

Mr. Pickersgill: He will find that the hon. member for Laurier referred to these orders in council and the minister said they were misleading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said the statements from the other side of the house were misleading.

Mr. Pickersgill: These orders were read into the record last night by the hon. member for Essex East. Does the minister say these orders in council do not exist?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, but I say the hon. member for Essex East uttered untrue statements.

Mr. Pickersgill: I only asked the minister one question. He said no. He does not deny that these orders existed, and therefore we can assume that these orders do exist. Six or seven days before the budget we find $50 million paid out of the treasury.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: We find not a word about it in the budget speech. We find a rate of usury of 5 per cent, and such confidence in the bonds—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, is doing what he set out to do, is exercising his alleged right to be repetitive, because the hon. member for Essex East dealt very fully with this matter. Furthermore, I fail to see any connection between loans made under this order in council and the bill which is now before the house. Perhaps the hon. member could indicate how he relates this discussion to the second reading of the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and then I would not feel so badly about it.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, Mr. Speaker, may I say we are now dealing with a bill which purports to replenish the unemployment insurance fund. The minister took steps to replenish it by $80 million in his own queer way, by order in council. Surely, we can talk about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More misstatements.

Mr. Pearson: I submit on that basis—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is untrue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, get up and defend yourself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is untrue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, get up and prove it as untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no difficulty in relating these orders in council to the bill. The bill before us, according to the minister, is for the purpose of replenishing this fund and for the purpose of putting this fund, which is in a dangerous financial position—

Mr. Small: Watch out you don't choke.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in a dangerous financial position, in a better position. Step one in the replenishment, the hidden step which we only came upon by accident because it was not revealed in the budget and was not revealed at the resolution stage of the bill—it was only revealed because of the research of my hon. friend—was to replenish it by this amount. Now, this bill is asking—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member talks about replenishing the fund and he has mentioned loans that have been made which neither increase nor decrease it. If the Leader of the Opposition suggests that this is relevant, then it would be relevant to discuss all the transactions in and out of the fund from the time of its inception.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would apprehend that it would be.

Mr. Speaker: I have been trying, without a great deal of success, although I must admit hon. members have accepted my efforts, to keep the debate on this second reading of the bill within the confines of the bill and not allow it to range over the whole administration of the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Pearson: I wish to point out what the minister said last night or at some stage, perhaps it was the resolution stage. He said, I feel it is good business to place the fund on a sound actuarial basis. It is also my opinion that the government's responsibility is such as to see that the fund will be able to meet whatever eventualities arise. When the minister can talk about the fund in that way, surely we can talk about the fund, how it got into that position, and the steps taken by the government, as well as the steps we propose to take to get it out of that position.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the Leader of the Opposition has said, this loan has to be repaid. I assume that it is going to be repaid by these people on whom the extra impost of 30 per cent is being imposed by this legislation. Now, that is how it is relevant. This hidden loan, this secret loan, hidden from parliament at the time of this $80 million transaction, which took place at the time of the budget and was concealed from parliament, it seems to me is a very good reason why we should have no confidence in a minister who brings in this kind of legislation. The minister never told us about this loan. He never told us about the report that he had received last August during discussion at the resolution stage when we were debating whether or not it was expedient that a bill should be introduced.

All this information was concealed from us, and we were not told the facts. We have to drag them out in this way, and when we seek to debate them we are harassed by hon. gentlemen opposite raising phony points of order, and attempting to prevent parliament from carrying on a debate in the true British fashion, attempting to prevent us from stating our side of the case, or in other words attempting to gag us with their huge majority.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Unmitigated rot.

Mr. Pearson: Bring in the bill of rights.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that because of these transactions alone, that is one of the reasons —and I come back to that matter—that I am going to vote against this bill. I am giving the reasons why I am going to vote against this bill and this is one of them.

Another reason is that we have not before us the statutory report for the year ending March 31, 1959 on the fund itself. Surely on May 12 or at the date on which this measure was brought before us in the form of a resolution the least the government could have done was to give us the up to date information which the government is obliged by statute to do on the state of this fund. Here we are being asked—and this is certainly relevant to the bill—to put another tax on the producers of Canada, the workers and the manufacturers and other employers, to raise the cost of living in Canada; to raise the cost of production; to weaken our competitive position in world markets, because all these things flow from the increased imposts.

We are being asked to do this blindly and without the information to which we are entitled under the law, because the government chose to hide it from us when they found it embarrassing. It would have given a different appearance to the whole financial transactions, to the whole budget. One can understand why the minister did not want anyone to see these orders in council, did not want anyone to see how much confidence there was in their bonds, with the insistence on 105 per cent security and a 5 per cent rate. It is relevant because this charge is being imposed under the guise of insurance upon certain specific contributors, not upon the generality of taxpayers. The poor general taxpayer is obliged to pay and pay and pay for the pleasure of having the present Minister of Finance. But at least when it is straight taxation it is supposed to be imposed equitably on the whole body politic, and when we have good government it is so imposed. But here under the guise of insurance the contributors to the unemployment insurance fund—of whom I am not one but many of whom I represent are—are being asked to pay an additional tax to pay this interest rate to the minister. That is what is happening.

Surely it is a most elementary thing that the minister should rise in his place and tell us why, when there is some $400 million still in the fund in the form of bonds, it was necessary to make this loan at all at this high rate of interest. Why was not the fund managed in such a fashion that it was in a liquid state so that these loans would not be necessary? As to 5 per cent on $80 million, I am not very good at mental arithmetic but I know it is a great deal of money. When the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) talks about human relations and gives us this heart-bleeding stuff that we listened to from him, he should not forget that this is really a fraud being perpetrated on these people under the guide of insurance. That is what it is and the minister knows it perfectly well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The other reason why I intend to vote against the bill is this. I must say I voted with more satisfaction for the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). If that proposition had not been decided in the negative, there would have been even greater force to my argument than there is now. But it is unfair, unreasonable and unjust to ask the insured contributors to pay for these welfare benefits that the Prime Minister described in his last television show as these payments that came from the government for human betterment. They did not come from the government at all. They came from the insurance fund which belongs to the people who are insured. It does not belong to the government.

It is true that this parliament passed these various statutes that were brought down one after another last year extending the period of seasonal benefits until the winter was extended into June. We all know that. On every occasion the hon. member for Essex East rose in his place in the house and appealed to the minister and to the Minister of Finance to do the honest thing. He said that we were in favour of these seasonal benefits but that they should be paid for out of the treasury, that they should not be charged against the fund because they were not actuarially sound, and everybody knows they are not. It is this extension of benefits that are not actuarially sound, paid for out of the payments that were made by those people who were under categories that were actuarially sound, that has created the difficulty which the minister is now proposing to ask parliament to cure by this method of increasing the contributions of the workers and the producers, with all the deleterious economic effects that will flow from it. It is imposing a special tax on a select group of people. That is all it is. In my opinion, that is an adequate reason for voting against this bill. But it is not the only reason for voting against this bill. There is another reason and it is this.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the hon. member for Essex East pointed out last night and as my friend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) pointed out again today and as I think the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) also pointed out—and I have no doubt that I shall be accused of repetition; but I do not think there can be too much repetition about this matter—the fund lost $10 million last year. That is a great deal of money; $10 million is a great deal of money. That amount was not paid out in benefits; that amount was lost in the sale of securities.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow and for the rest of the week, if it is not concluded. Otherwise, if it is concluded tomorrow, we shall go on with the program which I announced last night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS BY PROVINCES

Question No 380—Mr. Meunier:

1. What is the total amount paid by the federal government under the Unemployment Assistance Act to each of the provinces, including Quebec, for each year from the inception of the act to March 31, 1959?

2. What was the total number of recipients in each year, by provinces, including Quebec?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. The total amounts paid by the federal government to each province under the Unemployment Assistance Act are as follows:

	Fiscal year ended March 31/57	March 31/58	March 31/59	Total
	$	$	$	$
Nfld.	2,373,125	1,787,894	3,040,767	7,201,786

	$7,875,568	$8,233,125	$23,933,534	$40,042,227

Questions

Note 1. The amount of the federal share of assistance paid out in a fiscal year does not correspond to the amount expended for assistance by the province and/or municipalities in the same fiscal year because there is a time lag between the date on which assistance was given and the submission of a claim for federal reimbursement.

Note 2. The figures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1959 are subject to such minor adjustments as may be required prior to closing the accounts for the year.

2. The average number of recipients of unemployment assistance, including dependents, is as follows:

	Fiscal year ended
	March 31/56	March 31/57	March 31/58	March 31/59
Newfoundland	27,281	33,646	39,848	50,939
Nova Scotia	—	—	5,055	4,523
Prince Edward Island ...	1,382	1,130	1,456	1,183
New Brunswick	4,035	3,152	3,899	4,829
Quebec	—	—	—	—
Ontario	—	36,904	42,872	61,405
Manitoba	8,868	8,856	10,196	11,973
Saskatchewan	8,399	8,791	10,365	9,721
Alberta	—	—	11,547	9,882
British Columbia	19,659	19,176	21,046	31,371

Note 1. Statistics for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1956 relate to the period July 1, 1955 to March 31, 1956 (except for New Brunswick where the period is from January 1, 1956 to March 31, 1956).

Note 2. For the year ended March 31, 1957 the average for Ontario is based on the period December 1, 1956 to March 31, 1957.

Note 3. The 1957-58 averages for Nova Scotia and Alberta are for the period January 1, 1958 to March 31, 1958.

Note 4. The 1958-59 averages are based on incomplete returns because information about caseloads for the last few months in the fiscal year is not yet available.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—INMATES AWAITING TRANSFER

Question No. 381—Mr. Howard:

As of March 31, 1958, how many inmates in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary were awaiting entry to the federal training centre?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

On March 31, 1958, there were eight inmates in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary who had been approved for transfer by the selection board and were awaiting entry to the federal training centre. They were transferred on April 8, 1958.

POST OFFICE CONSTRUCTION, COUNTY OF DORCHESTER

Question No. 382—Mr. Racine:

1. Have plans been made by the Department of Public Works for the construction of post offices in the county of Dorchester?
2. If so, in what localities?
3. What is the population of these localities and the estimated annual revenue of such postal stations or post offices?

Answer by: Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.
2. St. Anselme, P.Q.
3. St. Anselme, population, 1086; revenue 1958-59, $8010.88.

TRANSPORTATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO REVIEW RAILWAY PROBLEMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into problems relating to railway transportation and the alleviating of inequities in the freight rate structure. A little later I shall ask leave to table two copies of the order in council which establishes this commission.

Hon. members will recall that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), as Acting Prime Minister, on November 26 announced the intention of the government to set up a suitable body to review the general field of railway problems and policy. He said this study would include not only a comprehensive consideration of the freight rate problem, including the situation of the long haul provinces in the west and in the Atlantic region, but also other specific problems which required solution if Canada's railways were to be able to serve the national interest without prejudicing particular areas or industries.

At the same time it was announced that pending the results of this long term study, measures would be worked out to relieve inequities in the freight rate structure, and this, of course, has been done in Bill C-38, now before the house, which is designed to carry out that intention. I think an examination of the terms of the commission will make clear that they are wide enough to cover all that is necessary and specific enough to direct the attention of the commission to the most urgent problems.

I should like to refer to the powers in general, which are as follows: The commission is empowered to inquire into and report upon the problems relating to railway transportation in Canada and the causes thereof and to recommend solutions thereto; and in particular, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the commission shall consider and report upon:

(a) inequities in the freight rate structure, their incidence upon the various regions of Canada, and the legislative and other changes that can and should be made in furtherance of national economic policy to remove or alleviate such inequities;

(b) the obligations and limitations imposed upon the railways by law for reasons of public policy, and what can and should be done to ensure a more equitable distribution of any burden which may be found to result therefrom;

(c) the possibilities of achieving more economical and efficient railway transportation;

(d) whether and to what extent the Railway Act should specify what assets and earnings of railway companies in businesses and investments other than railways should be taken into account in establishing freight rates; and

(e) such other related matters as the commissioners consider pertinent or relevant to the specific or general scope of the inquiry.

The commission will consist of the following: Hon. Charles P. McTague, Q.C., Ll.D., chairman; Herbert Anscombe of Victoria; Archibald H. Balch, Ottawa; Rene Gobeil, Quebec city; M. A. MacPherson, Sr., Q.C., of Regina; Howard Mann of Moncton and Arnold Platt of Lethbridge. We think those recommended have the necessary qualifications. Mr. McTague, Mr. MacPherson and Mr. Anscombe are, of course, widely known. Mr. Balch is chairman of the national legislative committee of the national railway brotherhoods. Mr. Gobeil is a consulting engineer. Mr. Howard Mann of Moncton is secretary of the maritime transportation commission, and Mr. Arnold Platt is a farmer and immediate past president of the Alberta farmers union.

The commissioners are aware that it is the desire of the government, and I am sure of parliament, that they should proceed with this inquiry with all reasonable dispatch in order that a report may be made on these important problems as soon as it is possible to assemble and consider all the information and analyses that it is necessary to have.

When the Minister of Public Works as acting prime minister announced the government's intention to arrange for this review he assured the western farmers that such review would not mean that they would have to pay more freight on the shipment of grain for export. I wish to take this occasion to confirm this, in regard particularly to the action that may be taken as a result of the work of the royal commission. To make it clear beyond question, the Crowsnest pass rates are part of a bargain that was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers who went west on the other hand. We intend, in so far as this government is concerned, to see to it that that contract shall not be broken. I wish to table, sir, copies of P.C. 1959-577.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house welcome the announcement by the Prime Minister of the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into transportation matters. While it is difficult at this time to analyse what the powers of the commission are, this will be possible after we have been able to consult Hansard.

However, as I listened to the Prime Minister I was impressed with the powers which the government intends to give to this commission, namely powers which will authorize the commission to investigate not only the inequities in the freight rate structure but also the transportation problem in general.

The house will remember that the Prime Minister invited some of us on this side to make suggestions to him as to the subjects to which consideration should be given by the commission. Whether or not these recommendations have been taken into consideration it is not possible for me to say from the statement the Prime Minister has made. I think there is no doubt, sir, that an investigation into the whole transportation problem of this country, that is the railway transportation problem, and into the freight rate structure is imperative at this time.

I would, however, like to remind the government that similar investigations were made by the former administration in years past. I should like to bring to the attention of the government the fact that under P.C. 1487 there was conducted a complete and thorough investigation of the freight rate structure. The board of transport commissioners has handed down three reports in that connection. Then there was the Turgeon royal commission which followed and which made a number of important recommendations all of which, in so far as the freight rate structure of this country is concerned, were implemented by the former administration by way of legislation.

There may be, however, a series of circumstances that have developed since that time which make it important and imperative that further investigation be carried out. The government has seen fit to do that, and we on this side of the house welcome it. May I, however, say to the Prime Minister, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Transport and I believe by the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister, that time is of the essence in connection with any investigation of this nature. I say that having regard to the fact that there is now pending, although it is adjourned, before the board of transport commissioners an application for a further increase of some 12 per cent in freight rates.

Whether or not it will be possible for this commission to report within the period of a year I am not in a position to say. But I do know this, that having regard to what the Turgeon commission did—and they made a very thorough investigation of the transportation problem—it took them two and one half years. It would seem to me that if this commission is to do the kind of job that parliament expects it to do, it should take all the time that is necessary.

I thought I should put these suggestions or this reaction to the announcement on Hansard because there can be no doubt that all of us agree that this is all to the good. In connection with the last statement made by the Prime Minister concerning the Crowsnest rates, I may add that I believe he will remember that on more than one occasion when I occupied the post of minister of transport I stated that there was no intention on the part of the then government to alter in any way the status of these rates which had been established in 1897.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The present injustices and inequities and the many problems that face the various regions in Canada, particularly certain sections of industry and agriculture, have required investigation for some time. On that account we in this group are glad to know that the government has appointed this royal commission to investigate this section of the transportation problem.

We are sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the royal commission has not the power to investigate all aspects of transportation including air, sea and road, because we believe that the evolution of a satisfactory transportation policy means an investigation into all aspects of transportation and the tying of them together by one investigation, one report and one set of recommendations.

To that extent, Mr. Speaker, in our opinion the royal commission has been shackled. However, we trust that the commission will speedily undertake its duties and that a report will come forward at the earliest possible time in order that legislation may be presented to this house at the soonest possible moment.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA-U. K.—REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS ON AGREEMENT

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that discussions took place in Ottawa last week between the aeronautical authorities of the United Kingdom and Canada, with a view to bringing up to date the air agreement signed in August, 1949 between the two countries. The problems confronting the two governments on the next phase of international transport were examined, and it was decided that the traffic rights under the present bilateral should be broadened to meet the new situation.

The United Kingdom granted Canada the right to originate flights in Toronto destined for Hong Kong; to originate flights in western Canada destined for the United Kingdom; and rights in Europe between London, Brussels, Dusseldorf, Zurich and Vienna. Canada granted the United Kingdom rights in Toronto on the north Atlantic service. The air lines of both countries will be able to exercise the new rights on March 1, 1960.

I am very pleased with the outcome of the discussions with the United Kingdom, and expect that the new services will greatly contribute to the convenience of the travelling public.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I was not able to follow too carefully the statement he just made. I should like to ask him whether the agreement includes fifth freedom rights for B.O.A.C. at Montreal?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the resolutions which were adopted in the house on May 4, I ask leave now to introduce two of the budget bills, namely an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-47, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

PUBLIC WORKS DREDGES—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Question No. 66—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Have any changes of personnel taken place on Department of Public Works dredges number 23 and 24 for the 1959 operating season?

2. If so, (a) Are any of last year employees not being rehired for the coming season? (b) What were their names and how many years of service had each of these employees to his credit? (c) What were the reasons in each case for dismissal? (d) Were representations made against such employees, and what is the source of complaint in each case?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Yes.

(b)

Name	Service
Zoel Allain	3½ seasons
George Clancy	3½ seasons
Pius Robichaud	3½ seasons
George Savoie	2 seasons

(c) and (d) There were no dismissals. These are seasonal positions and employment terminates at the end of a season.

EXPLORATORY OIL AND GAS PERMITS, NORTHERN CANADA—PUBLIC SALES

Question No. 75—Mr. Hardie:

1. How many exploratory oil and gas permits were issued between July 1, 1957 and March 31, 1959, on the mainland of northern Canada i.e. the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon?

2. How many public sales were held in that period, on what dates were they held, what are the names of the successful bidders in each sale, and how many acres are under permit to each successful bidder as a result of each sale?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to the first part of the question is: Northwest Territories (Mackenzie district), 1,033 permits; Yukon Territory, 75 permits; total, 1,108 permits.

With regard to the second part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I have a list of these public sales with the acreages, and I would ask permission to have them printed in Hansard at this point as part of my answer.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have the answer to this part of the question printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ATOMIC ENERGY—BILATERAL AGREEMENTS ON PEACEFUL USES

Question No. 76—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Are negotiations underway at present between Canada and any other government or governments, with a view to a bilateral agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy?
2. If so, with which countries?
3. What form are any such negotiations taking?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to the first question is yes.

The answer to the second question is: Japan, Pakistan, Australia and the European atomic energy community, known as EURATOM. The members of EURATOM are Belgium, Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

The answer to the third question is: In the case of Japan, a Japanese delegation has been meeting in Ottawa with Canadian government officials. The negotiations with EURATOM were conducted initially by a Canadian delegation sent to Brussels for this purpose and are being concluded by the Canadian embassy in that city with the EURATOM commission. The other negotiations have been taking place through normal diplomatic channels.

ATOMIC ENERGY—BILATERAL AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

Question No. 77—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has a Japanese delegation been in Ottawa conducting negotiations for a bilateral agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy?
2. If so, has an agreement been signed?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to the first question is yes.

The answer to the second question is: No, an agreement has not yet been signed. However, good progress has been made in the work of the two delegations and a draft text has been referred to the Canadian and Japanese authorities for consideration.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—DEGREE GRANTING STATUS

Question No. 78—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Is Royal Military College a degree-granting institution?
2. If so, does its charter authorize the granting of honorary degrees?
3. Who recommends candidates for honorary degrees?
4. Have any candidates been recommended for such degrees?
5. If so, who are they?
6. What qualifications must any candidate for an honorary degree possess?
7. Is Royal Military College under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first two questions, the Royal Military College of Canada is a degree granting institution by virtue of The Royal Military College of Canada Degree Act. Section 2 of that act reads:

The senate of the college shall have the power to grant degrees and honorary degrees.

In answer to question 3, I suppose normally the recommendations would originate with the senate, but I know of no restrictions to prevent anybody making a recommendation to the senate.

In reply to questions 4 and 5, I am sure hon. members of the house will be very pleased to learn that, on the recommendation of the senate, on Friday of this week Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker will have an honorary degree conferred upon him. He is, as all hon. member know, Prime Minister of Canada, a member of Her Majesty's privy council, a distinguished member of the Canadian bar, and a gentleman who served overseas with the Canadian expeditionary force during the years 1916 and 1917.

In reply to the sixth question, I think the general answer is that the Royal Military College follows the normal practice of other universities in considering candidates for honorary degrees.

In reply to the seventh question, the answer is yes.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION—LAND DISPOSAL, QUEENSWAY AREA, OTTAWA

Question No. 79—Mr. McMillan:

1. Has the national capital commission recently disposed of a parcel of land (approximately 40 acres) in the Tremblay road, St. Laurent boulevard, Queensway area, Ottawa?
2. If so, to whom and at what price?
3. Was this property publicly advertised for sale?
4. Were bids invited from the public for this land?
5. If such bids were not invited from the public, why not?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. The second is not applicable. The answer to the third and fourth questions is no, and the fifth is not applicable.

I think I should add, however, that I am informed that negotiations have been going on with regard to the disposal of property in the St. Laurent boulevard-Queensway area but as yet no recommendation has been received by the governor in council from the national capital commission.

AIR TRANSPORT FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, WINDSOR-WHEATLEY, ONT.

Question No. 80—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Did the Department of Transport provide air transportation for a group of members of the House of Commons to Windsor and Wheatley, and return, on Thursday, May 7, 1959?
2. If so, to what vote was the cost of such flight charged?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is that the Department of Transport assigned an aircraft to transport from Ottawa to Windsor and return, on May 7, the members of the standing committee of the House of Commons on marine and fisheries on official business of the committee.

The answer to part 2 is vote No. 435—civil aviation branch—airports and other ground services—operation and maintenance, etc.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. I apologize for not having sent him notice, but it arises out of his answer to this starred question. Can the minister indicate what was the seating capacity of the aircraft which the Department of Transport made available for the marine and fisheries committee to travel to Windsor on May 7?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that this question should be put on the order paper. It is purely a statistical inquiry and is of no great importance to the house.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I may raise a point of order with regard to your suggestion that the question be placed on the order paper, it flows from a verbal answer in the house by the minister to a starred question, and because of information given by the minister I am seeking additional information.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question which is supplementary to a starred question, he did not say so and I misunderstood him. If the hon. member has a supplementary question to an answer given to a starred question he may proceed.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and let the hon. member know the exact number of seats; but I can assure him that there were enough seats to allow both him and the Liberal members who did not go to do so, rather than trying in some manner to put the government on the spot.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES—CONDITIONAL PAYMENTS

Question No. 386—Mr. Denis:

1. What have been the federal contributions to each province for conditional payments (a) agriculture: (b) health; (c) hospital insurance; (d) welfare; (e) vocational training; (f) highways and transportation; (g) resources development; (h) subsidized rentals and slum clearance; (i) other, during the fiscal years 1956-57, 1957-58, 1958-59, and estimated amounts for the fiscal year 1959-60?
2. In what fiscal year was each of these conditional payments inaugurated?

SASKATCHEWAN—FEDERAL PAYMENTS AND RECEIPTS

Question No. 389—Mr. Carter:

1. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, what were the total payments by the federal government to individuals, institutions, corporations, municipalities, and government, of the province of Saskatchewan?

2. In the same year, what were the total payments made by the federal government elsewhere than in Saskatchewan on behalf of this province?

3. What is the estimated amount of revenue received in the fiscal year mentioned, by the government of Canada, out of the province of Saskatchewan?

4. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, what were the payments paid to the residents of Saskatchewan by way of (a) family allowances; (b) the Old Age Security Act; (c) the Old Age Assistance Act; (d) Disabled Persons Act; (e) Blind Persons Act?

5. At the end of that year how many people in Saskatchewan were reported as being in receipt of (a) unemployment insurance; (b) social welfare or relief?

6. What was the estimated population of Saskatchewan on March 31, 1958?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

URANIUM—SPECIAL PRICE CONTRACTS WITH MINING COMPANIES

Motion No. 96—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all special price contracts entered into between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and (1) Bicroft Uranium Mines Limited; (2) Canadian Dyno Mines Limited; (3) Faraday Uranium Mines Limited; (4) Gunnar Mines Limited; (5) Lorado Uranium Mines Limited; (6) Rayrock Mines Limited; (7) Algom Uranium Mines Limited; (8) Can-met Explorations Limited; (9) Consolidated Denison Mines Limited; (10) Milliken Lake Uranium Mines Limited; (11) Northspan Uranium Mines Limited; (12) Pronto Uranium Mines Limited; (13) Stanleigh Uranium Mining Corporation Limited; (14) Stanrock Uranium Mines Limited.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this motion, which calls for copies of all special price contracts between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and the 14 private uranium producers in Canada, is not acceptable to the government.

In these transactions Eldorado is acting merely as an intermediary between the Canadian producers and the atomic energy authorities of the United Kingdom and the United States. No Canadian government funds are involved. It would be improper and indeed a breach of business relationships to make available the details of these private transactions.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED STATEMENTS BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister say whether the Minister of National Defence was speaking for the government and has he any other comment to make on the statements attributed to the minister yesterday to the effect that "the west could knock the stuffing out of the Russians if they started a war today", "I am certain the western alliance has the nuclear power to totally obliterate their principal cities", while, and this is another quotation "a Soviet attack on North America today could very well prove abortive"?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I was asked to comment on a statement made by Mr. Khrushchev a few days ago, and I did make those remarks. I think all those remarks are true.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister did not answer the first part of the question. Was the minister speaking for the government in making this statement?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The minister has given his answer, and the responsibility of a minister to a government is always recognized.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY GENERAL PARTRIDGE TO U.S. SUBCOMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of National Defence comment on a statement made by General Partridge to the House of Representatives subcommittee on appropriations on February 12, at which he said he was speaking as a servant of the Canadian as well as the United States government, when he said:

> We think the threat which we have now and the one which we shall have in the future is of the same general character as the offensive force which we ourselves are building.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have said many times that it is not the practice to comment on statements made by an officer of the United States before any congressional or other committee of that country. I feel that it would be most inappropriate to make comments on such statements as are alleged to have been made.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this is not an alleged statement. It is from an official publication, and the man who made it—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition is not entitled to make statements himself. He is entitled to ask questions at this point, and at other times there are opportunities to argue.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not realize that General Partridge, in his own words, made this statement "as a servant of the Canadian as well as the United States government"?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, as a servant of Canada an officer cannot be called before any United States congressional committee. He was called as an officer of the United States air force.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. For the purposes of the Royal Canadian Air Force, did the minister ask General Partridge whether or not he made that statement?

Mr. Pearkes: You are asking me whether I will ask General Partridge if he made that statement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did you ask him?

Mr. Pearkes: I am told by the Leader of the Opposition that he did make the statement and that it is in an official record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, will the latter call General Partridge before a committee here so we can inquire what the situation is in this particular?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Speaker, since it is not the custom to call even Canadian officers before any such committee.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I ask a further supplementary question. Will the minister tell us what Canada's contribution would be to North American defence which would make any Russian attack abortive?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this matter has gone too far. The hon. member is now asking a question which obviously is not one to be answered on the orders of the day.

Mr. Pearkes: I would be very pleased to answer that question if I may. For example, there is the extensive warning system which Canada helps to maintain in the northern part of this country.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister aware that in the evidence presented before a United States congressional committee there was a statement that the warning system could be jammed by attacking bombers?

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is pursuing a matter for which he knows the answer. The minister answered the first question and gave his views about the propriety of the matter.

Mr. Hellyer: I know the answer. I just wonder whether the minister does.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE ON MANUFACTURE OF SMALL CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Following the presentation made to the cabinet by the united automobile workers last month on the matter of small cars, is the Prime Minister in a position at this time to make a statement on the subject?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for some months there have been newspaper reports to the effect that the so-called big three in the United States motor car industry were planning to produce small cars in the United States. Following these reports a delegation of the united automobile workers had a conference with the government urging that, if such reports were correct, small cars should also be produced in Canada. Prior to the visit of the delegation the government had been giving consideration to this matter and discussions have been going on between the government and its officials with representatives of the automobile industry.

I can say this, that if and when Ford, General Motors or Chrysler announce that they intend to enter upon the production of the so-called small cars in the United States the government is determined, in so far as lies within its power, to have smaller cars produced in Canada.

To that end I have asked the presidents of General Motors of Canada, Ford and Chrysler to meet with me in Ottawa on Saturday morning when discussions will take place. Following these discussions I hope I will be in a position to determine, with my colleagues, the future course to be taken. But let me emphasize that if small cars are manufactured in the United States by these companies we want the same situation in Canada.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a question of privilege, when the hon. member for Essex West rose to ask this question you referred to him as the member for Essex East, Mr. Speaker. Undoubtedly you recalled that I had put this question three times before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I was in error in my description of the hon. member, there was certainly no doubt about his identity in my mind.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—APPLICATION FOR EXPORT OF GAS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government received a new application from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the export of gas to the United States? If so, at what point or points in Canada does Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited propose to export gas to the United States?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take that question as notice.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—SUGGESTED SPECIAL SCHEDULING FOR BULK CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): May I ask the Minister of Transport if, in order to ensure adequate supplies of raw materials for some of our basic industries, any consideration is being given to special scheduling of bulk carriers through the Welland canal at this time of congestion there?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. It has been decided that, so long as a considerable degree of congestion occurs at the Welland canal, and in order to assist Canadian and United States industries dependent upon the expeditious movement of bulk materials, such as iron ore, coal, grain and pulpwood, and to ensure the effective operation of the canal, special dispatching will be resorted to under which bulk carriers —whether in ballast or loaded—fully engaged in the transportation of the commodities referred to will be taken alternatively with general cargo vessels. There will, of course, be adherence to the requirements of the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act of 1911 which provides for equal treatment of vessels of both Canada and the United States.

REPORTED BAN ON CERTAIN FOREIGN VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Did any representative of the Canadian government consult with representatives of the United States government or the St. Lawrence seaway authority before banning certain foreign vessels from the seaway?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to make it very clear that no ships have been banned from the use of the seaway. Before the seaway opened shipping companies were advised that certain gear would be required in order to allow ships to move through our locks as efficiently and speedily as possible. What we have required these ships to do now is to instal this gear so that they can move through our locks as expeditiously and as efficiently as possible.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister received representations from certain Canadian ship owners urging that priority be granted to lake ships over foreign ships in going through the seaway?

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member was in the house and paying attention he would have heard my answer given earlier today which dealt with the matter quite fully.

Mr. Herridge: I was paying attention, but the noise created by party members opposite prevented my hearing it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBLE WALK-OUT OF EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister aware of a possible walk-out of C.B.C. employees following the rejection by the union negotiating committee of the federal conciliation board's report? What is the minister or his officials doing to conciliate this dispute?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, I am aware of the circumstances involved in this dispute, and our department is doing everything it possibly can to provide facilties for a settlement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

REPORTED INTENTION TO CURTAIL PERSONAL AND COMMERCIAL LENDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the government or the Bank of Canada recently issued any instructions to the chartered banks to limit credit or new loans?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): None whatever, Mr. Speaker There have been rumours, and there have been speculative articles in the press, suggesting that a letter had gone out from the Bank of Canada to the chartered banks proposing some form of credit restriction. I have made inquiries of the Bank of Canada and I am informed that they have sent out no such letter, and so far as any indication on the part of the chartered banks to their clients on the subject of their credit is concerned, it has not been sent at the suggestion of the Bank of Canada or with the prior knowledge of the Bank of Canada. The same applies, so far as the government is concerned. Whatever has been done by the chartered banks in this respect has been done entirely on their own initiative.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask a supplementary question. I am thinking of the last sentence in the minister's reply. He referred particularly to a letter. Will he assure the house that the governor or his senior officials have not, in consultation with the commercial banks at a conference urged them to do the thing to which reference has been made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that there were some conferences or meetings of the chartered banks in this respect, but the meetings were held without any prior knowledge whatever on the part of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the minister if he is now aware of the decision of the banks to seriously curtail lending activities and if so, is the government contemplating any action to ensure that enough money will be available for the immediate expansion of the Canadian economy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, so far as action on the part of the chartered banks is concerned, I presume the banks will have to be guided by what they consider to be good banking practice in this respect. I can tell the hon. gentleman, if he is suggesting that the government should debauch the currency of this country, we have no intention of doing any such thing.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Will the minister inform the house as to what effect this may have on the co-operation the banks may give to the minister's efforts to market federal securities in the future?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is getting rather ahead of the possibilities. Unless he relates the question to a specific loan I think it is too hypothetical and indefinite.

[Later:]

Mr. Regier: I have a question I should like to ask the minister in view of his claim only a few minutes ago that neither he nor the Bank of Canada had any prior knowledge of this meeting of the chartered banks as a result of which action is now being taken. Was the government or the Bank of Canada a participant in any of these discussions prior to the decision arrived at by the banks?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROTECT BONDHOLDERS FROM LOSS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance in view of his reference to the debauchery of currency. Is the minister aware that the price offered yesterday on his 4½ per cent conversion bond was down to $91.25 and is the government planning any action to protect the small investor who may have to sell his bonds from suffering exceptional losses?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is an extraordinary question that concerns itself with the price of securities in the market fluctuating day by day. The government never said that it would support these bonds in the market. On the contrary, when the question was asked in this house last September by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) I made it quite clear that there was no such undertaking on the part of the government or the Bank of Canada. As the hon. member may be aware or should be aware by now, the situation in the market is the result of the fact that the banks for some time now have been selling in substantial amounts their holdings of Canada bonds in order to place themselves in a liquid position to provide the credit sought of them to an extraordinary degree at the present time in the course of the great recovery that is going on in the Canadian economy today.

Mr. Benidickson: I have a supplementary question. The minister referred to the normal market freedom of buyers and sellers in this particular realm. Does he want to say to the house that, without consultation with him, the Bank of Canada supported until late October the market price of these bonds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that subject in this house two weeks ago in a speech of such length that I blush even to think of it. I am not a little surprised and I may say highly flattered that my hon. friend should ask me now to repeat something that I said then and tried to say very plainly. I spoke at that time of what the Bank of Canada had done both in the after-market and at the time around the first of November when they ceased to buy bonds of those particular issues.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why don't you answer the question?

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS AND SOYBEANS—INQUIRY AS TO FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask my friend the Minister of Agriculture, who is in a generous mood today, if he is in a position to announce the government's policy with regard to representations that have been made for the continuation of floor prices on sugar beets and soybeans, products that mean so much to the farmers of southwestern Ontario?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I am always in a generous mood, but I am not in a position to make any announcement in regard to these two commodities today.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADA CAR PLANT, FORT WILLIAM—CONTRACT FOR AIRCRAFT INTERCEPTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. Could the minister comment on the statement made in Fort William on May 11 and reported in the Times-Journal of May 12 to the effect that an announcement would be forthcoming within two months on the possibility of aircraft interceptor contracts for the Canada Car plant at Fort William?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not in a position to control all the representations that appear in newspapers, and this is news to me.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Minister of Defence Production any information on the possibility of a Bobcat contract for Canada Car at Fort William or the possibility of aircraft component contracts, and have his officials given any information to Premier Frost on this subject which he has not given to the house?

Mr. O'Hurley: Phase 2 of the Bobcat program is progressing in Montreal in Canada Car, and we have briefed Canada Car on the possibility of getting contracts for aircraft components, but at the moment I have no definite report to make on this subject.

Mr. Fisher: I think the minister missed my question. Has he given any information on this particular point to Premier Frost of Ontario that he has not given to anyone else?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure how the hon. member would justify a question of that kind.

Mr. Fisher: Premier Frost made an announcement in Fort William two days ago that the Bobcat contract had been speeded up, and that aircraft interceptor contracts were going to come within two months to this plant. If he is making these announcements, I should like to know what his contact is from the point of view of the Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. O'Hurley: Premier Frost is absolutely right so far as speeding up the Bobcat program is concerned. I think I gave the answer to the other part of the question. We have given every facility and encouragement to Canada Car at Fort William to get some contracts from the air defence program in the United States.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ISSUE OF STAMP COMMEMORATING ASSOCIATED COUNTRY WOMEN OF THE WORLD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I ask a question of the Postmaster General. Will the minister give the house the reason for another recent stamp issue, and will the minister explain the meaning of the design which seems to represent a rather fully dressed woman sitting on her heels picking a banana from its stem?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I might say that this stamp design commemorates the significant contribution of Canadian women to the formation and development of the international organization of rural women's groups known as the associated country women of the world, and is the first Canadian stamp ever designed by a woman. We are rather proud of that fact. I am sorry that the hon. member seems to have completely missed its significance and has tried to cast aspersions on the work of this artist. The stamp, of course, represents a symbolic woman attending a plant on which is superimposed a globe of the world, indicating the international aspects of this movement which originated in Canada. I may say that it has proved to be abundantly clear to almost everyone who has seen the design.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista Twillingate): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Postmaster General what is a symbolic woman?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Two hon. members have supplementary questions. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has already finished his question. I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): My supplementary question is addressed to the Postmaster General. Is it not correct to say that the federated women's institutes of Canada expressed their great appreciation of this stamp?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am extremely grateful to the hon. member whose observation is quite correct. Several members of the national executive of the women's institute saw the design a substantial time before it came and were quite delighted with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house what a symbolic woman is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I should allow the minister to run that risk.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO USE BY SEAPLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether negotiations have been completed between the national harbours board and the civil aviation officers with respect to the use of Vancouver harbour for seaplanes?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The civil aviation officers of the department have recently concluded negotiations with the national harbours board, and it has been decided both to increase the size of the area designated for use by seaplanes, and to relocate the area in order to reduce taxiing to and from bases of operation to a minimum.

Incidentally, it was deemed necessary to continue to restrict seaplane traffic in the harbour to commercial air carriers and aircraft belonging to industrial concerns having business in the harbour, owing to the normal heavy traffic of ships.

TRANSPORT

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED INTENTION TO USE U.S. SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was asked me yesterday by the hon. member for MacKenzie River (Mr. Hardie). I was asked if I was aware that the Northern Transportation Company intends to use ships of United States registry in Arctic work this year.

The Northern Transportation Company reports to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), but I can inform the hon. member that I am not aware of any United States commercial vessels which are being used in supply work in the Arctic this year. Certain United States naval vessels, which were the only suitable type available, were transferred to my department when the United States government agreed that Canada should take over the supply of the D.E.W. line, and these are in the custody of Northern Transportation Company which, of course, operates them with Canadian personnel.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wonder whether the Minister of Transport can tell me whether those ships have passed Canadian steamship inspection for Arctic work?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

DISPOSITION OF ORDER RESPECTING DEMURRAGE ON GRAIN CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I was wondering if he could inform the house whether or not, by order in council, the decision of the board of transport commissioners with respect to demurrage for railway cars with respect to grain has been altered and, if so, what is the duration of the time specified in the order in council?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, this order has been held up in order to allow the matter to receive further consideration and study.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister of Transport answered me directly. Has there been an order in council suspending this particular ruling of the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

RETAINING WALLS, QUEBEC PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State.

(Translation):

Mr. Y. Dupuis: Has the minister made inquiries, as he promised to do on April 22 last, concerning question No. 108 which I had asked in early February and which had been passed as an order for return? The question dealt with certain retaining walls.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as several departments are concerned, some of the inquiries remain to be done, but I shall reply to that question very soon now.

Mr. Dupuis: Could the minister tell me what other departments can be concerned with the matter of retaining walls?

Mr. Courtemanche: The Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Dupuis: That is not several others, just one other department.

Mr. Tremblay: It takes two to handle that job.

(Text):

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

TRANSPORTATION TO LONDON FOR AIR COMMODORE FAUQUIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister tell the house whether any consideration was given by the R.C.A.F. or by his department to providing transportation for Air Commodore Fauquier of the famous Dambusters squadron to attend the ceremony before the Queen Mother in London?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker; but unfortunately no transportation was available nor is it possible for the R.C.A.F. to meet the many requests made by individuals who wish to attend similar events in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Could the minister tell us whether space was available in the Lancaster bomber which flew other members of the R.C.A.F. to London?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that this line of inquiry is of sufficient urgency to take the time of the house that is by asking whether there was space in an aircraft flying across the Atlantic. The hon. member can ascertain by private inquiry what the answer is or put the question on the order paper.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This matter has already received a great deal of attention in the press. It deals with a man who was a great hero in the R.C.A.F. during the war, and the ceremony in London is of great symbolic importance. Surely it is proper to ask whether or not it would have been possible to make an exception in this case so that he could have attended the ceremony in London.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the minister to have given an answer. I did not intervene on the first question, but it seems to me that the second one went too far.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can give the house any information as to the progress, if any, being made in the discussions concerning the renegotiation of the Soviet-Canadian trade agreement, and whether reports to the effect that difficulties are being encountered in this matter are correct?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Starr for the second reading of Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rather thought from the challenges that had been made in the debate so far that perhaps the first speaker this afternoon would have been the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) explaining to us the reasons for the extraordinary financing that the cabinet has seen fit to provide for the unemployment insurance fund, which everybody knows is a fund which has about $400 million worth of securities in its portfolio. I am not going to comment further about that. I hope that before the debate concludes the minister will explain, not only the authority but the reason for this unusual and unprecedented form of governmental intervention in the affairs of a fund that is basically contributed to by non-government sources. Eighty per cent comes from employees and employers.

My chief point at this time, Mr. Speaker, is to direct the attention of the house to the fact that in the last couple of years, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) himself said, we have had an unusual experience in that the amount of money paid out has greatly exceeded the amount of receipts. Of course, that is typical of any insurance scheme, at unusual times but the question which I want to raise before the house at this time is the question of whether or not the act, as it now stands, is really satisfactory to members of this house having regard to investment policy. I will be the first to say that this particular legislation was provided by the previous administration; but under the previous administration we had not the same experience of take-outs from the fund as we have had recently. I confess, that section 85 of the statute stipulates that the funds of the unemployment insurance commission should be invested exclusively in government of Canada securities.

Then under section 20 there is set up what is called an investment committee. Having regard to the experience of the last couple of years and the startling information that there have been capital losses of over $10 million—perhaps more, but the latest return was $10 million—I wonder if the house in considering this act would not want to make sure that a review should take place with respect to the set-up of the investment committee as determined by section 20 of the act. I do not think that anybody who examined parliamentary return 82A, I think it is, of last session in 1958 would have failed to note that a high proportion of the investments of the fund were in victory bonds on March 31, 1958. But the interesting factor is that the people who are in charge of this very large capital fund happen to be the same people who have other responsibilities in connection with government debt policy and general fiscal policy. In recent times I am suggesting to the house that there could be on their part difficulty in deciding where their judgment should lie. According to parliamentary return 82A, which I mentioned, $402 million was invested in victory bonds. I cannot think that any committee member at that time could fail to foresee that there was a likelihood of greater need for liquidity in the assets of the fund; but on the other hand the same people who under this section are asked to be the investment committee are the very people who were associated with the Minister of Finance and others in the promotion of the sale of longer term government financing through the conversion loan.

In other words I see that these people are at times in the regrettable position of being asked to wear two hats. I believe that it would be highly advisable for the Minister of Labour and the government to reconsider this matter of the investment committee. In my opinion the investment committee in charge of a fund of these enormous proportions should be completely detached from the possibility of any conflict of interests with respect to the relationship of the policy of the Minister of Finance or the government in the matter of fund raising.

We have a precedent in the Canada Council. We have an investment committee there headed now by a private citizen, the much-esteemed former governor of the Bank of Canada. This bill is asking us to make sure that further amounts go into the unemployment insurance investment portfolio. While we are doing that I suggest we should make sure that the most impartial determination of best advantage to the contributors will result without question.

This is an unusual fund to the extent that it is not substantially government money. Eighty per cent of it is contributed by employees and employers. Under the act one member of the investment committee is nominated by the Minister of Labour but two are designated as being either the nominee of the Minister of Finance, or the governor of the Bank of Canada, or the nominee of the governor. Those who are paying 80 per cent of the shot, having regard to the disclosure of these capital losses, would I think feel better assured if we had an independent investment committee. I raise that matter for the consideration of the house.

We have been rather restricted in debate in discussing some sections of this bill. I am hoping that the committee on industrial relations will not feel itself so restrained. I am hopeful that the committee will call for evidence about the possibility of widening the group of those who are insured under this scheme. This is a major factor but at this time the government has not seen fit to increase the number of those who could in all likelihood suffering this particular catastrophe expect insurance coverage. I feel the time is ripe for the industrial relations committee to examine the act carefully.

I am thinking of the possible inclusion of hospital workers and many other employees. Hospital workers alone number approximately 100,000. In view of the proportion of hospital revenues that will come from either provincial or federal government sources through insurance schemes I believe that hospital employees should be brought into this scheme. There are hospital maids and non-professional workers of various kinds who have not been included and I feel that the committee should give this question very serious consideration.

My main point, however, is simply to say that the experience of the last year or two indicates that the individuals who are responsible for policy with respect to the investment of funds in the unemployment insurance fund are the same people who in another capacity are engaged in debt management and other fiscal government matters. In view of the fact that 80 per cent of the contributions to the fund come from outside government sources—they are in essence taxes—I think a more independent investment committee is highly justified.

I would therefore at this stage move, seconded by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this house declines to give second reading to this bill which makes no provision for ensuring the stability of the unemployment insurance fund through the establishment of an investment committee independent of the persons responsible for carrying out the government's policies with respect to the public debt".

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I submit to you that this amendment is out of order. You will observe that it proposes that the house should not give second reading to the bill on the ground that the bill—and this is the language of the amendment:

—makes no provision for ensuring the stability of the unemployment insurance fund through the establishment of an investment committee independent of the persons responsible for carrying out the government's policies with respect to the public debt.

In shortened form, Mr. Speaker, this amendment proposes that the house should not give second reading to the bill because we have not included in the scope of the bill a provision which is not there now. When the Speaker was in the chair last evening he was called upon to deal with another amendment introduced on behalf of the official opposition which he ruled out of order. That amendment, if I may recall it to you, sir, was in these words:

> This house declines to proceed with this bill because its provisions were formulated and introduced without any consultation by the government with the advisory committee and before receiving the annual report of that advisory committee on the financial condition of the unemployment insurance fund for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, and its recommendations thereon.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that you were not in the chair at the time, that the ground upon which the Speaker ruled that amendment to be out of order was that on second reading an amendment that can be submitted and be in order is an amendment that sets up a contrary principle, a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. It was quite evident to the Speaker, in dealing with the amendment introduced last evening, that it did not introduce a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. It dealt with something that the opposition argued was antecedent to the introduction of the bill, something that should have been done before the bill was brought before the house, that there should have been prior consultation, that the bill should not have been submitted until a certain report had been received. In view of the nature of the amendment he ruled that it did not set up a principle contrary to the principle of the bill, and therefore he ruled it out of order.

Now, that rule, Mr. Speaker, is obviously one aspect of the rule of relevance. My submission to you with respect to this new amendment, is that it fails for the same reason and is not relevant to the bill before you. The bill before you contains a number of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, in designated clauses of that act. None of these clauses relates to the subject matter of this amendment.

In his remarks in leading up to the introduction of his amendment, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) referred to the provisions of section 20 of the main act which determines the composition of the investment committee. Then he made reference also to the later sections of the act, sections 85 and 86. None of these sections, Mr. Speaker, falls within the scope of the amending bill now under debate, Bill No. C-43.

Last night the Speaker had occasion to refer not once but several times to the well-established rule that the introduction of a bill to amend a statute in this house does not in fact open up the entire statute for discussion in this house, and discussion on the amending bill must be relevant to the bill and cannot stray outside the scope of the bill into the wider provisions of the statute which it proposes to amend. This is precisely what has been done here this afternoon.

There is nothing in the present bill at all that concerns or affects the composition or the powers of the investments committee. There is nothing in the amending bill, which relates to investments, and yet the amendment before you proposes that the house should withhold second reading of this bill because it makes no provision for changing the provision of the main act in reference to the investment committee.

If this amendment were in order it would be possible for any member to discuss any provision of the main act, regardless of whether it receives mention or no mention in the amending bill. It would be equally competent to any member to introduce any amendment proposing that second reading of the bill be withheld because some provision of the main act, not mentioned in the amending bill, is not included within the scope of some particular amending provision. This would reduce the procedure of the house obviously to chaos, and it is because of considerations of this kind that the rule is so well established: first, that the introduction of an amending bill does not open up the main statute for discussion and debate; second, that any amendment must be strictly relevant to the bill. The fact that it concerns some provision of the main act does not make it at all relevant to the bill. In the third place, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this amendment does not set up a principle contrary to the principle of the bill. It says only that the bill should not be read now because it does not make provision for something that lies outside of it. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this amendment is out of order on several grounds and I respectfully ask you so to rule it.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): On the point of order, may I just refer to the matter of relevancy? Your Honour will have looked at the remarks of the Speaker the other night when he referred to principles of an amending bill. I think that is of the essence here. We are being asked to vote additional moneys to this fund. This amendment relates entirely to those moneys and I say that that therefore is one of the basic principles of the bill. I refer to the principle of stability of the fund or the integrity of the fund, as I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) called it the other night. It is of the essence to make sure that the investment policy will maintain stability and integrity in the fund.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): If you would allow me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to supplement what the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said in this connection. This matter has interested me and I thought I would engage myself this morning in looking up the appropriate authorities which I think clearly establish the false position in which the Minister of Finance seeks to place us when he calls Your Honour's attention to an amendment which had been ruled out of order last night. But, as he himself indicated in the remarks which he made this afternoon, there is no similarity between the amendment now before Your Honour and the amendment submitted last night.

I call Your Honour's attention to May's sixteenth edition at pages 530 and 531. At the bottom of page 530 I find the following:

> It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment". This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words: and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question. A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.
> (1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differeing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.
> (2) It may express opinion as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill,—

And I underline the words "circumstances connected with the introduction".

That is a statement of principle which has been recognized by all commentators, including Beauchesne, who makes reference to a comment similar to May, in citation 382, which of course is well known to this house and which deserves mention at this time. Citation 382 reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from,—

And I underline the words "or differing from". I continue:

> —the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill.

And so forth. I shall not quote the remaining portion of this particular citation. Then if we look at the work, "A Parliamentary Dictionary", we find on page 162 what is meant by a reasoned amendment. In the first paragraph on page 162 beginning with the second sentence I find the following:

> This form of amendment—

Your Honour will remember that my hon. friend sought to base part of his argument upon his interpretation of what was a reasoned amendment.

> —seeks, by substituting other words for those of the question "that the bill be now read a second (third) time", either to give reasons why the house declines to give a second or third reading to the bill, or to express an opinion with regard to its subject matter or to the policy which the bill is intended to fulfil.

My hon. friend who has just spoken has emphasized the argument of relevancy, and in that connection I would refer Your Honour to Votes and Proceedings for 1958 where there is a ruling by His Honour the Speaker on a problem involving this particular principle. The reference will be found on page 539 at the middle of the page where Mr. Speaker makes this observation with regard to the argument of relevancy:

> This is the third time I have had to deal with this matter today.

I would call Your Honour's attention specifically to this observation. He says:

> I will not repeat what was said previously. The first question which must be considered is relevancy. I think the Minister of Justice, in acknowledging that it would be relevant to debate whether the clauses of this bill are in conflict with our obligations under GATT, thereby acknowledges that an amendment directed to that same purpose is relevant, because if it is relevant to debate it—

That is the important point—"because if it is relevant to debate it."

> —if the amendment is otherwise good—it is relevant to move an amendment declaratory of a principle to the same effect.

All through this debate, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has emphasized, emphasis has been placed in argument on the importance of preserving the integrity of the unemployment insurance fund. That has been the gist of most of the speeches. The particular committee referred to in section 20 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, modification of which is proposed in this amendment, has to do with that very argument, and if it is proper to make reference to such an argument and make it part of the main argument in debate, as Mr. Speaker has said, it is possible and justifiable to base an amendment on such an argument even though, as the Minister of Finance said, directly there was no specific reference in the bill. However, I would argue that by implication and indirection there certainly is.

The Minister of Labour himself has given us the justification for this amendment. He said that the purpose of the bill was to maintain the integrity of the fund. The integrity of the fund can best be maintained by a proper investment policy. A proper investment policy is one pursued by the investment committee under section 20 of the act, and this amendment calls for a rearrangement and a new composition of that investment committee in order to do what the Minister of Labour said, namely maintain the integrity of the fund.

In this connection, if Your Honour will address himself again to May, page 421, 16th edition, he will find the author's comments on the question of relevancy, the matter I am now pursuing. There the author says:

> The fundamental rule that debate must be relevant to a question necessarily involves the rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Stated generally, no matter ought to be raised in debate on a question which would be irrelevant, if moved as an amendment, and an amendment cannot be used for importing arguments which would be irrelevant to the main question.

Surely that is clear. The Minister of Labour indicated that the purpose of this bill was to maintain the integrity of the fund, and if we were justified in commenting on that particular purpose and now seek to strengthen the instruments by which the fund is to be made stronger, then surely this amendment must perforce be regarded as in order. Lest there be any doubt whatsoever, I refer Your Honour again to the words of Mr. Speaker at page 539 of last year's Votes and Proceedings where he goes on to point out:

> The first question which must be considered is relevancy. I think the Minister of Justice, in acknowledging that it would be relevant to debate whether the clauses of this bill are in conflict with our obligations under GATT—

The amendment there had nothing to do, in the sense in which the Minister of Finance speaks with the argument in debate but since argument in debate was permitted by Mr. Speaker it must follow that the reasoning which he pursued in connection with that particular matter applies on all fours with regard to the matter now before us. The facts before us are that the unemployment insurance fund was diminished to the extent of $10 million as a result of the loss of value of certain securities held by the commission. That was a permitted situation as a result of the operations of the investment committee. We say that happened because the investment committee was improperly constituted and that because of these facts and in order to preserve the integrity of the fund the committee ought to have a different composition such as this amendment contemplates.

There is no precedent whatsoever against an amendment like this. All the positive evidence clearly indicates that we satisfy the argument of relevancy. When my hon. friend says that there is nothing in the particular amendments before the house having to do with the investment committee he is right, but the point is, as the Minister of Labour said, that the purpose of the bill is to maintain the integrity of the fund and the only way that can properly be done is by an investment committee that is so constituted as to further that particular end.

For these and among other reasons I ask Your Honour to take the view on the basis of this argument that there can be no doubt whatsoever that this is a proper amendment, a proper amendment likewise for the reasons which caused Mr. Speaker the night before last to accept in principle the argument made in the amendment which I had the honour to propose. That amendment had nothing to do whatsoever with the sections of the bill. We were calling in that amendment for an increase in the contributions paid by the federal government for the purpose of giving benefits to the unemployed people of our country. There is nothing in the amendments which have to do with the federal contribution and to argue that this particular amendment is out of order is to argue that the Speaker was wrong on Monday when he acknowledged the amendment put forward at that time. So, Mr. Speaker, with confidence in this argument I submit it to you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: First of all, I must remind the house that we cannot compare the ruling which was made the other night by Mr. Speaker concerning the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) with the position of the present amendment. There is a marked distinction between this amendment and the other amendment, and the ruling which was made the other night does not serve as a precedent for the ruling which I now propose to make.

I have listened with great interest to the comments made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I have also listened carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), and the hon. member for Essex East. There are two points which I should like to emphasize. The first one is the question of relevancy. In the present instance, I consider that this amendment is not relevant to the bill being discussed. It is rather relevant to the act itself, but at the moment we are not discussing the act, we are discussing the bill. The second point I wish to emphasize is that the house should listen carefully to the way in which the amendment reads. I shall now read it:

> This house declines to give second reading to this bill which makes no provision for ensuring the stability of the unemployment insurance fund through the establishment of an investment committee independent of the persons responsible for carying out the government's policies with respect to the public debt.

The way in which this amendment reads actually makes it more in the form of a separate resolution or bill than an amendment to what is contained in the bill under discussion. Then again, the rule of relevancy is completely disregarded. If every bill that was discussed by this house were subject to amendments of this type which could stipulate that the bill did not contain enough and should contain something else, then there would be no relevancy at all. I consider this amendment which is now before the house contains no reference to anything contained in the bill and I must therefore rule it out of order.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I must admit that I find myself in some difficulty at this stage of second reading of Bill No. C-43 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I rather think I am in the position known as being over the proverbial barrel because I am damned if I do and I am damned of I do not, when it comes to a question of how to vote. Undoubtedly many cogent arguments have been set forth, not once but repeatedly, that there are sections of this bill which are of such a nature that they should be opposed.

There is a provision in the bill for approximately a 30 per cent increase in the charges on employers and employees so as to re-establish the fund or, as has been so aptly put by previous speakers, to maintain the integrity of the fund. I think it is obvious also that in so far as the beneficiaries of the fund are concerned, there is not a commensurate return from the 30 per cent increase in the charges which is to be levied in the future. There is also a section of the bill which introduces new and discriminatory taxation and to that, of course, I am certainly opposed.

In addition, I agree with the objections that have been raised that the increased charge is, in part, made necessary as a charge on the insured because of circumstances over which he had no control. I refer, of course, to the amount of money that was required to be taken out of what was actually an insurance fund to take care of the situation that arose because of serious unemployment, call it a recession or depression if you like, and changes introduced by the government without any financial responsibility being accepted by the government which made the changes in the act. I think that is a negation of the principle of insurance and should not be supported.

There is also another matter, of course, which I think is very serious, and that is the fact there is no increase contemplated in the weekly allowances to those beneficiaries who fall in the low income categories. The amounts which they are receiving now are certainly low enough, and if the employees in the future have to pay increased charges and yet the majority of those workers will receive no increase whatever, then I think there is something wrong with the basic principles. As I say, Mr. Speaker, there are excellent and cogent reasons which have been put forward in great detail by a great many speakers in this house as to why there should be opposition to second reading.

At the same time there is another side of the picture. I find I am in agreement with the fact that some improvements are being made in the bill which is now before us. We have the bringing of new salary groups into the plan, and I think that is all to the good. There are small, very small provisions for an increase in the earning rates at the same time one is drawing unemployment insurance. Small as this improvement is, it is to the good. Then, of course, there is the extension of coverage. If one is eligible the period of eligibility is raised from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. Although I am rather inclined to believe that this will not cover a great many in the plan, it is an improvement without a doubt. For these latter reasons, therefore, I feel that the bill should be supported on second reading. You see, Mr. Speaker, what I meant on opening when I said I was over the proverbial barrel and damned if I did and damned if I did not.

However, an hon. member should, if he can act with conscience, vote, and so far as I am concerned a decision has to be reached. I have reached a decision, Mr. Speaker, based on this fact. If one turns down a bill on second reading which contains improvements which one favors, then turning down second reading in order to kill those things you do not like automatically deprives the people of this country of the opportunity of reaping the benefits of the improvements. The important fact is, and it is an important fact, if a bill does pass second reading, then every member of this house gets an opportunity to support those sections which he feels are improvements in the act, and at the same time he is able to speak against and vote against those measures of which he disapproves. There is such an occasion where one can express an opinion on each proposal and each section, and that is when the bill gets into committee. Although I strongly disapprove some of the provisions and I think I also disapprove some of the motives behind the government's introduction of some of the provisions of this bill, nevertheless I also agree with some of the proposals and we will have an opportunity of expressing ourselves by speech and by vote in committee, and be able to try to vote down the things we do not like and try to get through the things we like. After being careful to explain that that is my position, as far as I am personally concerned it is my intention to vote in favour of the second reading of this bill.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on this matter. The bill before us, which is one to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, seems to substantiate in my mind, two points. The first is that the government is prepared to accept the proposition of mass unemployment in Canada and the second is that it seems prepared to accept as a fact that unemployment will continue. In other words, it is apparent that this government, which claimed to have all the answers when they sat on this side of the house, are bankrupt of ideas for the solution of Canadian problems today. They are pursuing policies which, if continued, could bankrupt our national treasury. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that the Minister of Labour and his colleagues have no policy to deal with unemployment. Instead, they seem to accept it by this legislation they seek to extract from Canadian workers and Canadian employers enough cash to pay for the government's folly. In other words, they are seeking to have workers and employers pick up the cheque for the failure of this government. The necessity for replenishing the unemployment insurance fund simply reflects the failure of this government to restore confidence in our economy, and failure to recognize and to attempt to cure the basic causes for the heavy drain on the unemployment insurance fund.

It is not my intention to deal at any length with these causes. They are well known, I think, to most Canadians: lack of planning; diversion of trade rather than expansion of trade; higher interest rates which are a drag on expansion and a drag on our economy; higher taxes, which retard and restrict expansion, expansion which can only come from increased savings and those savings from earnings. I think the people are wondering what has happened to this billion dollar program of public works. All of these things are, of course, the reasons, to a great degree, for the necessity for the legislation that is before the house at the present time.

But I rose today primarily to bring one matter to the attention of the government. I refer to the difficulty that is being experienced by many of our young people in Canada today in getting established in the labour force. I am talking particularly about those people under the age of twenty. They have been having considerable difficulty especially in this past couple of years. This is one of the most disturbing factors in our whole economy. It is one which is giving concern to many of the welfare organizations throughout our country and I think should now concern the government and business generally. I am not suggesting that this matter is solely the responsibility of the government but it is a very real problem.

I am going to use November figures which show a great difference between the impact of the recession on working people over 20 and its impact on those to whom I refer, namely those under 20. At November 15, 4.5 per cent of the labour force between the ages of 25 and 44 were out of a job and looking for work; but of the labour force between 14 and 19, 12.5 per cent were jobless. Unemployment among this group, I recognize, is always higher because they have difficulty in getting established in the working force. The rise of unemployment among teen-agers from 5 per cent in November, 1956, to 9.8 per cent in November, 1957, and now to 12.5 per cent in November of last year, is indeed an alarming situation. If, as seems likely, a large number of young people will be leaving school—

Mr. Speaker: I am listening to the hon. member's exposition of the problem with respect to the employment of people first coming to an age where they will begin working. I would ask him to relate what he is saying to the problem that is before the house. I have not yet seen that there is in this bill or in the amendment anything which involves the matter which the hon. member is discussing.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order and, at the same time, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) would allow the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) to indicate how he intends to relate what he is saying to the bill. I have simply asked him to do so. If he does not want to answer, I will hear the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Before he does so, Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege affecting all of the members of this house. It has to do with the amendment which was made a moment ago by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and about which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke at some length. While he did so, the Speaker in the chair had a ruling which he gave and I am sure it must have been a prepared ruling. He did this in the absence of Your Honour who was in the habit of ruling and who did rule on two of the amendments that were proposed by this side of the house, I believe the day previous. It seems to me that the fact that the amendment was made just a few minutes before the ruling was handed down, although the Speaker at that time had in his hands the text, is a matter of privilege affecting all of the members of this house, having regard to the fact that this should have taken place when Your Honour was out of the chair.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows very well that it is not open to any member of the house to impugn the conduct of the Chair, whoever may be in the chair. It cannot be raised as a matter of privilege. The only way in which such a matter can be put forward is by making a positive motion calling the conduct of the Chair into question. I therefore cannot allow the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) to proceed to criticize the occupant of the chair for his conduct, even though he is not satisfied with it.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the last thing that I would want to do is to impute motives to either the Speaker or the person who holds the Speaker's place in his absence. But the point I was trying to make is this—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was doing exactly what he has said he would not want to do and I hope he will not continue to do it again. What is before the house now is a question which I have asked the hon. member for Nipissing who has the floor. I have asked him whether he can relate the problem he has been discussing with the bill that is before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Your Honour allow me to rise on the point that I indicated to Your Honour—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: —because I think there has been an invasion of the rights of the members of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the hon. member says but I cannot see how he could possibly, within the rules of this house, continue the discussion which he opened as a matter of privilege. I therefore cannot hear him in that way at this time. If the hon. member wishes to bring that matter before the house, he has open to him a way of doing it but it is not by a direct attack on the conduct of the Chair.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask Your Honour how an hon. member can raise this question? This question is not one of censure but a question relating to the clarification of a decision of the greatest importance with regard to freedom of debate in this house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Essex East is making the same error.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With respect to Your Honour, it is not an error.

Mr. Speaker: A decision was made by the Chair in my absence a few minutes ago by the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And not appealed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should not draw inferences and make imputations against the Chair, no matter what he feels about its conduct, unless he does it in the proper way which is by a substantive motion in which the allegations can be made and the facts debated. There is no other way under the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have asked Your Honour a question. Are you now suggesting that we can have this particular ruling clarified by way of a positive motion? There is no suggestion on the part of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) or anyone else of imputing motives either to Your Honour or to the Deputy Speaker. That has not been our custom in this parliament. But we do feel that there has been a grave error committed today, and we are asking Your Honour how that can be rectified? We feel it is an error. Certainly it is inconsistent with the ruling—

Mr. Speaker: There is only one course open to an hon. member who disagrees with the ruling of the Chair, and that is to appeal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame.

Mr. Chevrier: You are a fine one to say shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not supposed to give interpretations of the rules of the house. Hon. members know that there is that right of appeal, and that is the only way in which a decision of the Chair can be reviewed.

Mr. Starr: Shame on you.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the Minister of Finance who should be slapped. No one is more shameful than he is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in the British house during the last century Lord Morley, I think it was, on an occasion like this made an observation of this order regarding a ruling that was not regarded as valid. Your Honour said we should have appealed. We have endeavoured throughout this parliament not to resort to that course for the reasons I have stated. An appeal would not solve this question. Hon. gentlemen opposite would vote against us as they always do.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made my ruling. I am sorry, but I cannot hear the hon. member further. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) had the floor, and he was dealing with the question of unemployment of young people coming to the age of employment. Before he proceeds to discuss that problem I assume he is relating it to the bill, and I would ask him how he attempts to do so?

Mr. Garland: Thank you very much for bringing me back to the point where I was when Your Honour stopped the debate. It seems to me that in discussing the legislation which we are considering today, which is necessary to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, we may discuss some of the reasons which have brought about this particular necessity. The point I was trying to make was that a substantial drain on this fund is due to one segment. It does—

Mr. Speaker: Let me put it to the hon. member in this way so that he understands me. I have no intention of restricting the debate on this bill beyond what appears to me to be its proper scope, and I have given a good deal of latitude, in my own view, to what is the proper scope. If the hon. member who has posed a particular problem relating to young people wishes to suggest that this bill deals with that problem inadequately or has some suggestion how this bill can deal with it, then he is in order and can proceed. If he is discussing unemployment at large, that would not be in order.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, I assure you I have no intention of discussing unemployment at large. However, statistics prove, as do the government's own figures, that a substantial drain on the fund is due to that segment to which I referred earlier, namely those people in the labour force under the age of 20. It seems to me that this legislation fails to recognize that fact. Here is the percentages of the labour force between 14 and 19 years of age that are unemployed: in November 1956, 5 per cent; in November 1957, 9.8 per cent; in November of last year the figure had risen to 12.5 per cent. I was simply going to say that the number of people coming out of school this year who probably will not go back in the fall, together with the larger group coming up next year, makes this a very real problem which I think the government should recognize and in some way endeavour, with the co-operation of business generally, to solve.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say something about this bill on its second reading, which normally deals with the principle of the bill and which normally gives the opposition the opportunity to discuss, in a very general way, those principles and other matters relevant to the bill and all that it covers.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, with the government that something has to be done about the unemployment insurance fund, and I propose in the course of my remarks, with your permission, to deal with the situation which brought about this necessity and to deal also with the various methods by which this difficulty could be overcome, one of which has been put forward by the government in this bill. But that is not the only way of dealing with the problem, and indeed in our amendments, two of which were ruled out of order, we put forward alternative proposals dealing, as we thought, with the principles of the bills and its problems.

Mr. Speaker, as to the reasons which require legislation of this sort—I will come back to that again later in my speech—the statistical report on the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act for March 1959, which has just come to my hand, gives us some very good evidence as to why the fund has to be strengthened, why it has to be replenished, and why the steps which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) referred to in his brief address the other night have to be taken to strengthen the stability and the security of this fund which is so important to the workers of this country. This fiscal report includes, perhaps as its most significant fact, that unemployment for the 12 months ending March 31, 1959, according to benefits paid to claimants on the fund, was nearly 25 per cent greater than in the 12 months ending March 31, 1958. The total benefits paid out amounted to $479 million as against $385 million, the monthly average of beneficiaries being $452,000 for 1958-59 as opposed to $366,000 for 1957-58.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) that in approaching this bill and in approaching this problem we in the opposition, as the hon. member pointed out, are in a dilemma. There are some things in this bill which should and do meet with our approval. There are other things in the bill with which we strongly disagree; and there are some omissions from the bill which we think should be put in the bill.

There are also circumstances surrounding the introduction of this bill with which we most strongly disagree. Of course, that constitutes a dilemma. On second reading, as an hon. member said, you are confronted with a dilemma whichever way you vote. You are damned if you do and you are damned if you don't.

There are various ways of dealing with the problem which this bill attempts to deal with in one particular manner. There was an interesting editorial in the Financial Post of May 9 entitled, "Split Insurance Fund?" which puts forward one method of alleviating this problem. Perhaps I could place on the record one or two paragraphs from that editorial. Dealing with the draft bill before us the editorial said:

> The proposal now is to raise contribution rates 30 per cent and to make a start at adding another huge group of seasonal workers to the fund—those in agriculture. This will simply mean that the industrial worker and employer will be making welfare payments to farm workers as well as to loggers and fishermen.
> This is manifestly unfair.

I do not say that I agree with those words in the editorial. I continue:

> An entirely new approach to unemployment insurance in Canada is needed. Perhaps we should not have one unemployment insurance scheme, but two. One could cover year-round workers and could pay its own way. The other could cover seasonally employed loggers, fishermen and farm workers and its resources could be beefed-up by drawing on the general funds of the state.

The government has not attempted to follow that course in the amendments to the act nor did the opposition in the amendments we put forward follow that course exactly. But we did put forward the view that the government contribution to this fund in the present circumstances—the proportion of the fund met by the general taxpayers through contributions—should be higher than it is at present. That was the principle that was embodied in the amendment we put forward yesterday. However, I agree, as I have said, that something has to be done. We do not think this bill is going at it in the right way although there are some parts of which we approve.

As I said, we strongly condemn the circumstances surrounding the introduction of this bill and this debate in the House of Commons. We believe that the procedures followed and those not followed by the government exhibit a contempt of parliamentary rights. That is all the more surprising in view of the language that used to be used by some hon. gentlemen opposite when anything happened in this house that appeared to reflect on parliamentary rights and privileges. We think also—and this is one reason which would certainly justify any hon. member of this house voting against second reading of this bill—that there has been evasion or violation of certain of the provisions of the unemployment insurance act with which this bill deals. We think there has been on the part of the government a refusal which is to be condemned to provide the information on which to form an intelligent and reasoned judgment on the merits and principles of this bill on second reading. We are surprised, to put it mildly, that in this debate on second reading there has been no contribution made to this vitally important matter by hon. members on the government side of the house at a time when the level of unemployment is greater than it has ever been since the act was introduced.

The present debate has not been easy for the opposition. Hon. members opposite have certainly raised points of order which we believe has unduly restricted the debate. They have restricted debate by their interruptions and by the raising of these points of order. Yet no member of the government as yet has commented on any proposal made by those on this side of the house. We are always being charged by hon. members on the government benches with having no proposals to make. They say we are merely objecting. Yet we have not heard from any member of the government in regard to the proposals which were emphatically made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and which have been repeated by others.

The government has not yet answered the questions we have asked or given the information we had the right to get. Indeed, it would have been quite impossible for us to have conducted this debate with any sense of realism or of having covered the whole subject if we had not been able to secure after the debate began a report from the unemployment insurance advisory committee which has a definite bearing on the matters covered by this bill. I have said that I thought in this matter the government has evaded or violated certain provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Having made that statement which has already been made in this debate by my friend the hon. member for Essex East I should attempt to document it.

In our opinion paragraph 2 of section 3 of the act has been violated because the minister failed to carry out that genuine and effective consultation with organizations representing labour in connection with the appointment of a member of the unemployment insurance commission

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now getting into an area which I very clearly decided in the course of this debate was beyond the scope of this debate; that is, the constitution of the advisory commiteee, the appointment of the membership and matters relating to the advisory committee which are not called into question in any way in the bill which is before the house. I must ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) not to deal with the question of the appointment of the advisory committee. I shall leave it at that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I had not mentioned the advisory committee. I mentioned the unemployment insurance commission. Certainly, however, I feel that I had every right to mention the unemployment insurance advisory committee because that is the committee which is the agency charged in this bill—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member perhaps misunderstood me. I did not say he had no right to mention the unemployment insurance advisory committee. I said I would not permit a debate on the question which was attempted yesterday; that is, the appointments to the advisory committee. I may have misapprehended that the Leader of the Opposition was going in that direction.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I misunderstood you. What I was hoping to be able to point out was that the unemployment insurance advisory committee is the agency referred to in the amendments and charged in this bill with the responsibility for giving financial advice to the commission and the government in the operation of the fund and surely it is possible to mention the committee and its activities in connection with this bill because whether the bill is a success or not will largely depend, not only on its provisions, but on how they are carried out. It is our contention that at the present time the government has violated the act to the point where this committee now has no legal existence of any kind.

I am not arguing for the moment how that was brought about. Perhaps that would be out of order. But the result of the action taken or not taken is that this committee, which is so important in its connection with this bill, has now only a chairman and five members when the act itself in paragraph 1 of section 19 says that there shall be a committee consisting of a chairman and not less than six members. It has not got six members. How, therefore, can this committee function? How, therefore, can the purposes of this amendment be carried out in so far as they affect this committee, when no such committee is in legal existence?

Mr. Speaker: That may be a proper subject of debate at another time. The hon. member can bring that forward as a charge against the government for its failure to comply with the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That in effect is what he is doing. But the committee is involved in this debate in so far as we have heard the recommendations which the government has tabled and which have been submitted to the government in connection with the amendments to the act. I have not sought to interfere with the fullest and freest debate on the contents of that report but I do repeat, in my view, the members who seek to deal with the actions of the government with respect to the constitution of the committee are contravening the rules of the house. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will appreciate that I am not trying to curtail the debate on the bill which is before the house, but I am trying to enforce the rules of the house by ensuring that debate proceeds in an orderly manner toward a decision on the matters which are before the house. The questions the hon. member raises are not before the house and will not be before it, and they are out of order.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, what we have before the house is a bill which seeks to replenish the unemployment insurance fund and to provide stability for that fund, to ensure that that fund will be administered in the best interests of those who benefit from it as unemployed. We are giving some more money to the fund; we are giving more responsibility to the agency which administers the fund. I am merely saying, Mr. Speaker, that one of those agencies, which was referred to by the minister in his opening statement, though he spoke only a few minutes, cannot discharge its responsibilities under this amendment or under the act.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand what the hon. member is saying but he persists after I have made my ruling in going on with the discussion. I hope he will not make it necessary for me to ask him to desist.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will drop that although I had something more to say about it. You have ruled it out of order and naturally I accept your ruling.

There is another section of the Unemployment Insurance Act which in our view, Mr. Speaker, has been evaded and it has a bearing on this bill and I think on this debate, and that is paragraph 2, section 90. We contend, Mr. Speaker, that under that section—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What section is that?

Mr. Pearson: Paragraph 2 of section 90. Under this section the report made in August, 1958 to the advisory committee on the status of the fund, a report which has a bearing on this bill, should have been tabled weeks ago, according to the specific and clear requirements of this section of the act. I know perfectly well, Mr. Speaker, that under the act there is an obligation on the part of the government to table all reports made to the governor in council by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. I also know that there is no obligation or requirement under the act for this committee to make reports to the minister as such but only to the governor in council as such.

The minister said the other day—and this surely has a bearing on our discussion—that he had invited the committee to make this report to him. We have pointed out—and perhaps I am repeating—that the report itself, which we have now been permitted to see, certainly does not support the contention that any request was made on the committee for its production. But surely, Mr. Speaker, it is an evasion not, I admit, a violation—and I did not use the word "violation"; I said it was an "evasion"—of this section of the act that a report can be made of that importance, dealing with the operation of the act and the fund, not to the governor in council but to the minister, thereby perhaps preventing its appearance in parliament so that it may be of help to us in debating this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question? Was he a member of the government at the time the former minister of labour asked the same thing and received a report which was never brought before parliament or tabled? That was in 1955.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Mr. Pearson: I have no knowledge of that at all, and if it were true—and I do not know whether it is true or not—it has nothing whatever to do with what I am saying. Whenever we make this kind of statement, Mr. Speaker, and whenever the government gets into this kind of position it takes advantage of its research assistants—and of course it has more of them than the opposition has—and goes back 10, 15 or 20 years and digs up something that happened in earlier times and then puts that forward as justifying its position in 1959. Even if that had happened in 1955, is the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggesting that that justifies everything being done now in connection with this matter?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pearson: If I may continue—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand you. I am asking—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said "sit down".

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member has yielded the floor; I think not.

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister has a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman does not want to have a question asked I am only too willing not to ask it.

Mr. Pearson: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he willing? All right. I suggest to him that during the period he was a minister of the crown—

Some hon. Members: That is not a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest to him that on several occasions a minister asked the advisory board to produce those reports and to make summaries in respect of amendments to the act and those were not tabled because they were not required to be under the statute.

Mr. Pearson: That is a new kind of question.

Mr. McIlraith: Typical tactics of the present Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Arguments we are not permitted to make.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite all right. The Prime Minister has made a suggestion which will appear on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it a fact and did it take place?

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister has now made it a question by saying "is it a fact"? I shall be glad to look into that. Merely because the Prime Minister states it as a fact does not necessarily make it a fact.

There is another section of this act, paragraph (1) (b) of section 86, which also has a bearing, a direct and definite bearing, on the bill before us. I suggest it has been violated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). This paragraph reads:

Where the amounts standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund are not sufficient for the payment of benefits under this act, the Minister of Finance, . . may,

(b) on the security of such obligations, credit further amounts to the unemployment insurance fund—

Mr. Speaker, we have put into the record a couple of orders in council dated April 2 and April 23, and I make no reference now to the circumstances of the production of those orders; but the orders in council in question, approved on April 2 and April 23, makes no reference whatsoever to the conditions stipulated in the act that the amounts standing to the credit of the fund are not sufficient for the payment of benefits.

In the second place, those orders in council authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans from time to time to the fund, but section 86 of the act makes no provision for loans. The section which I have just read authorizes the minister to credit further amounts; it does not authorize the minister to make loans from time to time, as the order says, but only when a very specific situation arises, as I pointed out a moment ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The minister laughs. The amount of $80 million tossed off by the minister to the unemployment insurance fund by order in council without, so far as we know, any statutory authorization. This is nothing to laugh at.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You had better read the statute then.

Mr. McIlraith: Why don't you explain it?

Mr. Benidickson: You tell us about it.

Mr. Pearson: It was two days ago that questions were asked of the minister in this regard and since that time he has maintained a diplomatic silence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That seems to annoy you.

Mr. Pearson: We also say that section 20 of the act has been violated by the minister. The orders in council to which I have referred provide for the loans to be repaid "from the proceeds of sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance or from the cash resources of the fund". Section 20 of the act states:

Investment transactions . . . shall be made only on the authorization of an investment committee—

It is our contention, therefore, that the governor in council may not determine terms and conditions which permit the Minister of Finance to say when and if securities held by the fund are to be sold. Under the act that is a function which belongs only to the investment committee, the personnel of which we think might be altered in view of existing conditions. I am not talking about personalities because the members of the investment committee as personalities are highly qualified men of great integrity but the composition of the committee, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), might be improved in the way he indicated in an amendment. So much for the violation and, as we see it, evasion of the act.

Let me deal for a few moments, if I may, with our contention that this particular bill with its amendments was introduced by the government without proper consultation, without the consultation which should have taken place with the advisory committee, and that we in this house have been denied information we had a right to have in order to appraise the principle involved in the bill. We all know, Mr. Speaker—I mentioned it a few moments ago and I repeat it—that the unemployment insurance advisory committee has the responsibility under the act to report on the financial condition of the fund. We all know that in July, 1958, they made a very important, indeed a unanimous recommendation dealing with ways and means of replenishing the fund, the very matter we are discussing in the bill. The committee repeated that unanimous recommendation of July in the hidden report of August, 1958. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in the drafting of the bill, in the discussions leading up to the bill, in the discussion of the resolution preceding the bill, in the discussion on second reading of the bill, in everything pertaining to the bill, and in the preparation of this legislation there was no effort made to consult or discuss with the unemployment insurance advisory committee at any stage so far as we know.

So far as we know—we have asked this question and it has not been answered—there has been no meeting of any member of the government concerned with the preparation of this important bill with the unemployment insurance advisory committee, which is also concerned with these matters, since the report made by the committee to the minister last August. In other words, the committee has been by-passed. The government did not even wait to receive the annual report of the committee on the financial condition of the fund before introducing this measure.

As a result of what we consider to be the arrogant attitude of the government toward the committee and of the silence of the minister concerned during this debate, we are asked, without sufficient information, to approve second reading of a bill to ensure the stability of this fund without knowing what is the exact financial condition of the fund. The only detailed information we have goes back to March 31, 1958, and this is May 1959.

Let me ask the government a few questions. What really happened to the fund during the fiscal year 1958-59? We do not know from the government. To what extent are the increased seasonal benefits responsible for the heavy drain on the fund? We do not know that. What were the amounts standing to the credit of the fund at March 31, 1959? We do not know that. What was the investment portfolio of the fund at March 31, 1959? We do not know that. When are we going to receive the answers to the questions asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)? We do not know that. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to approve the second reading of this bill whose main effect will be to increase the contributions of workers and employers to the unemployment insurance fund by, so far as we know, an average of approximately 30 per cent.

We have also raised another very important point in relation to the bill. It was done this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I refer to the serious mismanagement of the fund during the last year which resulted in a loss of more than $10 million consequent upon the sale of government bonds at depressed prices. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour that this loss could certainly have been avoided if the fund had carried a larger share of its assets in more liquid treasury bills rather than in long term government bonds. That loss was not avoided because of the fact that debt management policy, that is, considerations concerning the lengthening of the public debt and the conversion loan, had a priority over liquidity for those who had the responsibility of deciding the investment transactions of the fund. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the probability of heavy drains during last winter was evident before midsummer when the conversion operation was launched by the government. Such a mismanagement by the government of the contributions made by the workers and employers to the fund surely cannot be tolerated by the house even if it is designed to help the government temporarily to get out of serious financial difficulties.

I should like to say a few words now about certain specific provisions of the bill. As I said at the beginning, some of these provisions are desirable and we on this side of the house are happy to support them. We support them generally; we would support them in isolation. We accept the idea of adding two new classes of benefits and of extending the maximum duration of the benefit period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. We also approve the proposal to increase the amount of allowable earnings and to provide a higher schedule of allowable earnings for the insured unemployed with dependants. We are also ready to support the more generous treatment given in the bill to convicts which we would hope would help in their rehabilitation.

All these improvements may be—indeed, I think are—important in the case of certain individuals but on the whole and in relation to some of the weaknesses and dangers inherent in some parts of the bill we think that these improvements are marginal. These improvements are not going to impose a heavy additional burden on the fund because the benefits they provide are not likely to exceed $20 million annually. The Minister of Labour will correct me if I am wrong in these facts, because we have to make these calculations from the information which we have. We certainly would have liked to know from the minister his estimate for the new benefits provided by this bill, how much they would come to in dollars and cents, but up to the moment we have not been given any indication in this respect.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we on this side accept the creation of two new classes of benefits. Since we do that, we must also, to preserve the insurance principle which is basic to this legislation, favour the addition of two new classes of contributors at the top. The raising of the income ceiling from $4,800 to $5,460 can in itself, I think, be approved by us. It will bring in, and again the minister can correct me if I am wrong in my figures, about 80,000 more workers. These two changes, we estimate, will result in increasing revenues to the fund, but again the minister did not give us any estimate of the increased revenues to the fund as a result of these two new provisions. I would be very surprised, Mr. Speaker, if the additional revenue would be materially lower than the marginal benefits provided under the bill.

We, on this side then, would be prepared to support these particular, and some of them are minor, modifications to the act. On the whole, the increased benefits they provide would be offset by substantially similar increases in contributions resulting from the additional two new classes and the raising of the income ceiling.

But there remains, Mr. Speaker, what we consider to be the main provision of this bill, which is the general increase of all contributions, as we have estimated, by 30 per cent on the average. Here again, the minister has not given us any detailed information on this, but we estimate it at a 30 per cent increase on the average, without any corresponding increase in benefits to the insured. We cannot, Mr. Speaker, accept that main provision of the bill. It is surely analogous to a further increase in taxes. If these provisions were accepted by the house it would mean $70 million to $80 million extra in contributions, and this is the important point, and 80 per cent of that would come from the workers and employers. We must not forget—we should not forget it because it has been mentioned in this debate more than once—the nature of this fund. Only 20 per cent of this fund is contributed by the general taxpayers through the government, and 40 per cent comes from the workers and 40 per cent from the employers; that is the nature of the fund. Yet the Prime Minister, speaking on the program "The Nation's Business" on April 20, had this to say, and I quote from the text of the broadcast:

> —we will be paying out this year $550 million more to Canadians in national health insurance, welfare and social security payments, than in 1956-7, the last year before we came into office—that is to say, twice as much as the tax increases.

I should like to analyse that particular calculation, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure you would rule me out of order. When I quoted it, that does not mean I accept it. Then, the Prime Minister went on to say this, and it does have a bearing on the unemployment insurance fund and the nature of it:

> The $550 million does not include additional expenditures which will be made for unemployment insurance as a result of the extension of these benefits to more people and for longer periods.

Then, he added this:

> Here alone, the additional cost will be $200 million more than in 1956-57.

In other words, the impression was given that the government out of its beneficent generosity was adding a $200 million payment to the workers of this country. If that is the right figure, then 80 per cent of that is being contributed by the workers and by the employers, and the government dares to take credit for 100 per cent of the $200 million increase in unemployment insurance contributions, on the basis of a fund to which they contributed only 20 per cent. The Prime Minister found it necessary to repeat that statement in a speech which he made in Montreal last week.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude where I began. We accept the necessity for the replenishment and strengthening of the fund. We know why that necessity has arisen. It has arisen because of the high level of unemployment. As of March 31, 525,000 men were out of work, that is on the lowest basis of calculation, and 700,000 had applications for unemployment insurance. The Prime Minister, in dealing with unemployment in his speech the other night in Montreal, said that Canada had made a quicker recovery from the recession than other countries. One of the important indices of recovery from a recession is surely the figures for unemployment. What do they prove? They prove that in Canada, as of March 31, 8.6 per cent of our labour force was unemployed, whereas in the United States it was 5.3 per cent and in the United Kingdom, 2.5 per cent. So far as unemployment is concerned, and we are dealing with unemployment in this bill, who dares to say we have made a quicker recovery from the recession than any other country?

As I said at the beginning, some of the provisions of this bill we can approve, and some of the principles in this bill we cannot approve. We most strongly disapprove of the circumstances surrounding the introduction of this bill, the contempt of parliament which has been shown by those circumstances, the withholding of vital information necessary—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —to an intelligent consideration of this bill, and we deplore the fact that members of the government, in the discussion of a matter of this importance, have not even seen fit to answer the questions that have been addressed to them from this side.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is in full retreat. Those of us who sat in this house last night and heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) engage in that fiery denunciation of everything connected with the bill and everything connected with the government, will find it very hard to reconcile the tone of the speech just now delivered by the Leader of the Opposition with anything that has preceded him from his fellow frontbenchers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Overnight repentance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there has been a measure of repentance here, and undoubtedly it is long overdue. How careful the Leader of the Opposition was to point out the good features of this bill. He went over them one by one, and sitting here one could not fail to be impressed by the fact there were a great many of them.

Mr. Pearson: And a great many bad features.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The evident enthusiasm displayed by the Leader of the Opposition for many of the features of this bill was such a touching demonstration after the anger and the spleen of last night and the night before. I can only say that this demonstration on the part of the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon must be very disturbing to his colleagues on either side of him.

This was a different approach from that of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) in his wild paroxysm of Monday evening, and was such a contrast from the extraordinary outburst, even for him, of the hon. member for Laurier last evening and, finally, such a contrast from that master performer, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), in his closing appearance before the curtain descended at 10 o'clock last night.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not my closing appearance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting volte-face on the part of the opposition and I think we can begin to see the reason for it. The fact is that preceding speakers in the opposition, particularly those three eminent and wordy gentlemen whom I have mentioned, have gone so far away from the bill, have taken such flight from fact into the realm of fancy, that it behooved the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon to try somehow, if he could, to associate the party that he leads with the bill and some sense of rationality in approaching the provisions of the bill. He did not completely succeed in doing that but he has made an heroic effort even in the face of all the handicaps created for him by his associates on the front bench opposite.

Mr. Speaker, my participation in this debate will be on a quite limited aspect of the debate. My entry into the debate in that sense I intend shall be restricted to those matters which have been raised and which directly concern the relationship of the Minister of Finance to the administration of unemployment insurance as that has been discussed in this debate.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that many members in this house, particularly the younger ones, are likely to be here for a very long time. It may be that some who are sitting in this house today will be here for many years to come. But whether they are here for 20 years, 30 years, 40 years or many more, no one will ever again hear in this house, I am sure, a speech the like of that delivered in this house by the hon. member for Essex East on Monday evening. My comment on that is necessarily restrained because, where it concerns him, I must, of course, speak more in sorrow than in anger. That speech of his was, in my opinion, unique. It has established an all-time record in this parliament for the extent to which the pages of Hansard which it occupies are strewn with untrue statements, statistics that could come only from the Martin bureau of statistics—no other source would own them—and the extent to which, in paragraph after paragraph, the hon. member has jumped to conclusions that have no basis or justification and has followed the slippery course of leaping all over the place in making false charges based upon unwarranted conclusions based in turn on untrue statements.

Let me now, Mr. Speaker, set in their proper proportions the statute law and the steps that have been taken in this connection. Here let me invite the house to have regard to the laws enacted by parliament. I venture to say that we shall not again hear in this house interpretations of the statute law of parliament the like of which we have heard in this debate. I hesitate to think that the reputation of some hon. members in the opposition in relation to the interpretation of statutes is to be governed and judged by what they have said in this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This side of the house has been kept to what we regard as the very narrow limits indeed of relevancy to the bill. The hon. gentleman has not yet mentioned the bill after having the floor for almost ten minutes.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member suggest that comment on what has been said earlier in the debate is out of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that character sketches of other hon. members are quite out of order.

An hon. Member: Hogwash.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Labour was the one who started the argument which Your Honour, under his ruling, precluded us from continuing. What the Minister of Finance is now doing is what we endeavoured to do but which Your Honour decided we could not do.

Mr. Speaker: I want to be consistent, by all means. The minister, I trust, is coming to the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall continue on the bill and on the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Denis: Are you going to beat your own record?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am going to beat, I hope, into their proper position the nonsensical, misleading and distorted arguments that have been put forward by hon. members opposite. I say that the recklessness demonstrated by hon. members opposite must surely be without precedent in this house. They have charged us with violations of an act. The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon backed away from that statement. Today he talked about evasions. He was careful to change his ground there this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order. The minister has quoted me and he has quoted me incorrectly. I charged the government this afternoon with both violations and evasions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is that not lovely, Mr. Speaker? We now have the Leader of the Opposition partly on the same track with his voluble colleagues on either side. He is just as wrong when he talks about evasions as he is when he talks about violations.

What is the statute law? There is no mystery about this matter. The terms of this act are plain. This act was enacted and has been on the statute books for some years. It amazes me that hon. members opposite or some of them could have been associated with the government that introduced this bill and that all of those of whom I am speaking could have been members of the government that was responsible for the administration for a couple of decades, and yet today know so little about the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Let me take up a couple of provisions that were dwelt upon this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition. He tried to make them sound so mysterious. I mention only three sections in so far as they bear upon the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon and the charges he has made. Section 20 is the section which provides that investment transactions shall be made only on the authorization of an investment committee consisting of three persons, one nominated by the Minister of Labour, and that has been the assistant deputy minister of labour; second, one nominated by the Minister of Finance and this is, as it was under the former government, the deputy minister of finance; and, third, the governor of the Bank of Canada or an alternate whom he may appoint from among the deputy governors.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last night I attempted to discuss at some length section 19 (1) and (2) and also pertinent parts of what the hon. member is now dealing with but Your Honour called me to order. I submit that the hon. member is in the same position that I was in.

Mr. Speaker: I find it rather difficult to know how far my attempts to limit the discussion were successful. It is true that I restricted the hon. member. Yet I think the Leader of the Opposition today has dealt with this same matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what we were prevented from doing on our amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the minister will not attempt to deal with provisions of the act which the opposition was not permitted to discuss. But as I understand it, he is replying to the charges which have been made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am replying to the—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: May I hear just one at a time. I will hear the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was the very point of the argument made to Mr. Speaker when he ruled that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was out of order. That amendment having been ruled out of order, the Minister of Finance, who observes the rules of the house so carefully, is himself now doing what we were prevented from doing. In this debate we have been held strictly to order and we are asking Your Honour to hold the hon. gentleman, under the same rules, strictly to order.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure I quite understand what is objected to. The hon. minister is naming the personnel of the investment committee. Is objection taken to that?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, when I dealt with that particular committee I dealt only with its activities in administering investments of that fund. I refrained from talking about any change in the composition of the committee which we thought should have been brought about because you ruled it out of order. Therefore I did not talk about the personnel of the committee at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not talking about a change in the personnel of the committee or about the subject matter of the amendment which was ruled out of order this afternoon. It was the Leader of the Opposition who referred to the clause and said that the Minister of Finance had violated it in what had been done, and I am answering what the hon. member said this afternoon. The hon. member for Essex East was not impeded in what he said on this matter the night before last. I am dealing with what the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I hope this is not going to be taken out of my 40 minutes—

Mr. Pickersgill: —the ruling on my hon. friend's amendment was that the investment committee was not relevant to the bill and could not be debated, nor be the subject of an amendment. I submit that if we were not allowed to debate it or make it the subject of an amendment, it is also incompetent for the minister to do what we were not allowed to do.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. minister is replying to the Leader of the Opposition, as I understood he was, and limiting his statement to what the Leader of the Opposition said, then I would consider that he would be going beyond the scope of the matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have nothing more to say about section 20. I merely referred to its terms because the Leader of the Opposition said I proceeded illegally because the investment committee had not dealt with the matter of a loan to the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That clause refers to investments, not loans.

Then I would point out the effect of the sections referred to by the Leader of the Opposition and also by the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), who was not prevented from dealing with it fully in his speech. Section 85 is the provision under which the fund is created. The unemployment insurance fund is included within the consolidated revenue fund in view of the terms of sections 85 and 86 of this act, and the receipts, whether from contributions of employers, contributions of employees or the government contributions, go into that fund. The provisions of section 85 are the ones which deal with the crediting of those contributions and the payments out. May I point out that section 85 provides by clause 1 that:

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

To the extent that there are amounts standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund not currently required for the purposes of this act the Minister of Finance shall, on the requisition of the commission, purchase obligations of, or guaranteed by, the government of Canada and pay therefor out of the consolidated revenue fund.

That is the provision under which all of the investments made by the unemployment insurance commission are made. The provision contemplates that those investments shall be made by the Minister of Finance on the requisition of the unemployment insurance commission, and the investments are confined to obligations of, or guaranteed by, the government of Canada. Then clause 2 provides that the payments made out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 shall be charged to the fund.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then we have provision also for the crediting of interest to the fund, and then this important provision—

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members are calling order. If there is any point of order I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order, and I make the same point I made earlier, namely that the hon. minister should not refer to the section he is reading now because he is out of order to the same extent and in the same manner that I was last evening when I referred to a similar section.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how the wheat can be sorted from the chaff at this point, but it seems to me there was a charge made without restriction in the course of the debate as to the loans being made to the fund, and I assume the hon. minister is dealing with that point. If so, I will not restrict him in replying to the debate which took place on the two orders in council and on the financial transactions between the government and the fund, about which all members have spoken in this debate. Am I correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Entirely correct, Mr. Speaker.

In answering the Leader of the Opposition and what he had to say this afternoon to the effect—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that there was no statutory warrant in section 86 of this act for what the Minister of Finance did in relation to this loan, which is the basis for what I am about to say, I—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in answer to your question said it is perfectly in order, and the hon. Minister of Finance has demonstrated all day that he is a very unprejudiced witness in this matter. The fact is that when you were out of the house, Mr. Speaker, although you came in at one point, I was addressing myself to Mr. Speaker in respect to an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) which asked this house to change the composition of the investment committee to guarantee the integrity of the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I am aware of that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour says he is aware of that, and I sincerely hope that is the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the result of the debate. I did not intervene because it was in process, but I have the amendment before me and I have read it, and the hon. member can proceed knowing that I do know of it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a result of the non-acceptance by the Speaker of that amendment we were precluded from carrying on the argument which that amendment suggested, and arguments based on the proposal made in that amendment. What the Minister of Finance is now doing is proceeding to debate and seeking to justify a priori something we were denied doing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We were held strictly to account in this debate, and we therefore have no other course but to ask the Minister of Finance to also observe the rules of this house and the decisions of the Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can rest assured that I will not permit the minister to proceed upon lines along which the opposition were ruled out of order. However, I see it is now six o'clock and I think this might be an opportune time to adjourn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the acting house leader what the business of the house is for tomorrow?

Mr. Brooks: Tomorrow we will continue with the unemployment insurance debate, and when it ends go on with the labour estimates. Then we shall continue with the public works estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I get some indication from the acting leader of the house what the business is for Monday?

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry but I cannot give you that now.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FORT WILLIAM ARMOURY

Question No. 351—Mr. Badanai:

1. Is the armoury building in Fort William which has been closed since the middle of March, still being heated?

2. Is the building going to be demolished in the near future?

3. If not, what is the government going to do with it?

Answer by: Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State):

1. No.

2. Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has advertised for offers for the demolition and removal of the building from the site with a closing date of May 20 for the receipt of bids.

3. Answered by 2.

R.C.A.F. ALLOWANCES, ENGLAND

Question No. 379—Mr. Carter:

1. For a wing commander at maximum pay with a wife and five children (ages 1, 3, 5, 8, and 10 years) and a wing commander at maximum pay with a wife and three children (ages 2, 6, and 8 years) living in public married quarters in England during a four years overseas tour of duty, what is the amount for the four year period of: (a) the gross loss in family allowances; (b) the offsetting saving in income tax; (c) the total of additional allowances payable in England which are not received by a serviceman of similar rank in married quarters in Canada, and which are peculiar to married personnel as distinct from single personnel?

2. What are the comparable figures for (a), (b), and (c) above for sergeants at maximum pay with similar families?

3. What are the comparable figures for (a), (b) and (c) above for leading aircraftsmen at maximum pay with similar families?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1, 2 and 3—See attached table.

Question Part	Rank	Number of children	(a) The gross loss in family allowances	(b) The offsetting saving in income tax	(c) The total of additional allowances payable in England which are not received by a serviceman of similar rank in married quarters in Canada, and which are peculiar to married personnel as distinct from single personnel
1	Wing commander	5	1,584.00	998.40	Nil
1	Wing commander	3	912.00	595.20	Nil
2	Sergeant	5	1,584.00	310.08	Nil
2	Sergeant	3	912.00	398.88	Nil
3	Leading aircraftsman	5	1,584.00	16.80	Nil
3	Leading aircraftsman	3	912.00	278.88	Nil

NOTE—The above figures do not take account of foreign allowance payable to both single and married servicemen in England which amounts in a four year overseas tour of duty to the following:

Wing commander	$ 1,296.00
Sergeant	576.00
Leading aircraftsman	432.00

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 14, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO PREMIER OF STATE OF VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the house will permit me I should like to refer to the fact that present in the Speaker's gallery today is Premier Henry E. Bolte of the state of Victoria in Australia. We welcome him to this assembly. We welcome him for himself as well as for the fact that he is a representative in the best parliamentary sense of our sister dominion, the commonwealth of Australia. We hope his stay with us will be one of joy and as much pleasure to him as it is a matter of appreciation to us to be able to welcome him.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I associate myself and those of us on this side of the house with the words of welcome which the Prime Minister has just addressed to our distinguished guest, the premier of Victoria. We welcome him not merely because of his own distinguished contribution of service to his state, his country and the commonwealth, but because he reminds us of the close and friendly relations that so happily exist between his country and Canada as two nations within the commonwealth.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I wish to endorse the words of welcome, best wishes and good will expressed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition to this distinguished gentleman.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park) presented the fifth report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

FURTHER STATEMENT ON SALE OF TRANSPORT PLANES TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last, in reply to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I confirmed that negotiations were in progress for the sale of transport planes by a Canadian company to two United States companies. Canadair Limited have today announced the successful conclusion of negotiations and have made sales of 5 CL-44 turboprop cargo aircraft to Seaboard and Western Airlines Inc., and 10 of the same planes to the Flying Tiger Line, Inc. These two lines are reported to be the largest air cargo carriers in the world.

A few weeks ago Canadair Limited approached the Export Credits Insurance Corporation asking for insurance in connection with the proposed sale of these 15 aircraft. The amount involved is approximately $70 million. The terms of payment are 10 per cent cash with order, a further 10 per cent on delivery, and the balance of 80 per cent spread in instalments over five years after delivery. The policies will protect Canadair Limited against non-payment by the buyers for up to 85 per cent of the amount owing.

It should be noted that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation does not finance. It insures against non-payment. In the normal course of events the exporter arranges for any necessary financing with his own bankers, and I understand that such arrangements have been made by Canadair through Canadian banking channels. These two orders for 15 aircraft will provide employment over a period of two and one half years for 4,500 men, many of whom are professionals or in the skilled category.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—SPECIAL SCHEDULING FOR BULK CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the report over C.B.C. news last night that a system of priorities is being established for ships moving through the seaway, which appears to me to be in contradiction of a statement made the day before yesterday by the minister, will the minister tell the house how the system operates and what ships and cargoes will be affected?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it clear yesterday in the statement I made. However, I shall try to clarify it. In order to make sure that North American industries using such bulk materials as iron ore, coal, pulpwood, grain and so on are adequately supplied, we have decided to alternate ships carrying these bulk cargoes, irrespective of country of registry, with package freighters, irrespective of country of origin, so the industries of this continent may not be short of the materials they urgently need for the successful continuation of their operations.

WELLAND CANAL—ACCIDENT INVOLVING PANAMANIAN VESSEL

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give the house any information on a serious accident which took place today in the Welland canal involving a Panamanian vessel? If so, could he confirm or deny whether the pilot of the vessel was licensed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question just before coming into the house. The ship under Panamanian registration was the Gannet and was upbound, but there was no delay as a result of the accident. I do not know whether a pilot was aboard, but I will make inquiries and let the hon. member know as soon as possible.

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, based on the suggestions in the press that some of the hold-up in the Welland ship canal is due to the shortage of authorized pilots. I should like the minister to comment on that statement and ask him whether, if it is true, he will employ more authorized pilots?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): There are a great many more pilots required this year because of the greatly increased volume of shipping which has been in evidence in the last few weeks, causing a delay at Port Weller. We have considerably increased our establishment of pilots, both temporary and permanent, and we are doing our very best to get more pilots on the job. We have the situation very much in mind at all times.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Can the minister tell us the status and position of Captain Crawford, and explain just what his relationship is to the department and to the pilots who are being engaged?

Mr. Hees: I think that is a question for the order paper. I cannot give the hon. member that information offhand.

Mr. Winch: You ought to know that.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister comment on the view that one of the reasons pilots are difficult to obtain at the present time is that Captain Crawford was the leader of the strike-breaking organization in the dispute last year?

Mr. Hees: I would say that had no validity whatsoever.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has as yet had any reaction to the suggestion he made to management and the union with regard to the dispute at the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia. At the same time is he in a position to tell the house what his own reaction is to the suggestion made by the workers that he ought to call management and the workers together here in his office in Ottawa for the purpose of seeking to settle this dispute, which has been outstanding for such a long time?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. They acknowledged my communication, in which I requested that both sides get together and resume negotiations. I do not think it is necessary for me to call them here to Ottawa. I expect that these negotiations will go on, and I will extend the facilities of my department. I hope to have someone to help them in these negotiations within the matter of a day or two.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any progress has been made in the appointment of a secretary of state for external affairs?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy the interest of the hon. gentleman in this matter.

Mr. Pearson: It is a professional interest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can tell him that progress is being made.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—CLAIMS BY CONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise us as to when an order for return passed many weeks ago and inquired about some three weeks ago and not yet made will be filed so it will be available?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to look into the matter. I am sure there is an excellent reason for any delay that has taken place, but I will find out what that reason is.

Mr. Winch: May I say that is the same answer that I was given three weeks ago.

Mr. Hees: Then I am sure the situation is exactly the same.

(Translation):

RETAINING WALLS, QUEBEC PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State if he has made inquiries regarding question No. 108 placed on the order paper since February and to which no reply has yet been given? May I ask him also if he could supply me with this information before the house takes up the estimates of the Department of Public Works?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the fullest possible attention is being given to this question and as soon as the reply is ready, it will be made known to the hon. member.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a further question. The question of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was placed on the order paper last February, that is more than three months ago—

An hon. Member: Ask your own question!

Mr. Bourget: It seems to me that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), who has claimed that his department is efficient, could see to it that a reply is given to this question as soon as possible.

(Text):

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I ask the hon. member to which question he is referring?

Mr. Bourget: I was referring to the question just asked by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis). He asked a question about protection works about three months ago, and I am surprised—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is supposed to be asking a question, not giving information.

Mr. Chevrier: He is answering the minister.

Mr. Green: I notice in yesterday's Hansard a reference to this question. I am hoping it is the Department of Transport that is delaying the answer and not the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Bourget: That was a question that had to do with protection works. Unless there is a new policy in the Department of Transport to the effect that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of that department, I would think it came under the Department of Public Works. I should therefore like to see the efficiency of the Department of Public Works.

FEDERAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND AND OTHER PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he expects, before the debate is resumed on the tax-sharing bill, to be able to comply with the order of the house asking for certain information about payments to the provinces which those of us who wish to debate that bill would like to have.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The return has been in course of compilation ever since the house ordered it. It is quite a comprehensive task, as I think the hon. member will appreciate, but whenever it is ready it will be tabled. I may say that it is of itself not immediately relevant to the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements amending bill, because it includes a great many things which are not relevant to that particular bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman aware that there are many hon. members who feel that this information is relevant and that parliament is entitled to it?

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA-U.K.—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REPORT ON AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport following the announcement the minister made yesterday concerning the United Kingdom bilateral air agreement amendment in which he announced United Kingdom rights in Toronto on the north Atlantic service. The question I would direct to him is this. Does that amended agreement mean that all or some of the services of B.O.A.C. which now terminate in Montreal will henceforth terminate in Toronto?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no way of knowing whether B.O.A.C. will move any of its present services from Montreal to Toronto. The agreement permits them to fly to Toronto as well as to Montreal. How they operate is up to them.

RESEARCH

REPORTED REJECTION OF APPLICATION FOR GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette to the effect that the statement was made in Montreal that the Prime Minister, in answer to a request for a grant for research in neurology, and so forth, had turned down the request on the ground that the members of the House of Commons would not agree to it?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the hon. member is referring. I have not read the item in question, but there certainly never was an explanation given such as the hon. member implies in the latter part of his question.

TRADE

RUSSIA—STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked a question about the renegotiation of the trade agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. Discussions are proceeding with Soviet representatives to establish a mutually satisfactory basis for renewal of the trade agreement. It would be inappropriate to comment at this stage on the progress of the discussions or on the reports to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—STATEMENT ON APPLICATION FOR EXPORT OF GAS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question concerning an application by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the export of gas to the United States, and at what point or points Trans-Canada Pipe Lines proposed to export to the United States.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The answer is that an export application dated April 29, 1959 has been received from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This application is for licences to export natural gas at two points on the international boundary. The company proposes to export a firm supply, not exceeding 200 million cubic feet daily, to Midwestern Gas Transmission Company at a point near Emerson, Manitoba. In addition, permission is requested to make interruptible sales to the Tennessee Gas transmission system near Niagara Falls, Ontario, at the option of Trans-Canada and only to the extent to which Trans-Canada may from time to time have gas available in excess of its Canadian requirements.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister give the house any information as to the new price or prices at which these companies intend to sell this gas in the United States?

Mr. Churchill: That question can be answered at the time these applications are considered. The application I have mentioned here has only just been received.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED SUGGESTION BY PREMIER FROST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question which stems from a report in the Fort William Times Journal of May 12, in which Premier Frost comments on the Bomarc guided missile and its position, and goes on to say:

> The obvious thing for Canada is to make arrangements with the United Kingdom and the United States to build interceptors under licence in Canada.

Has the minister received advice on this aspect of defence policy from Premier Frost and, if so, what consideration is being given to it?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have received no such advice from Premier Frost.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED INCREASE IN REDISCOUNT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I might direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him whether he can confirm that the Bank of Canada rediscount rate today reached its highest level at 5.30 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: I think the time of the house is being taken unnecessarily if every time there is a change in the rediscount rate it is made the occasion for a question. That information is available to all hon. members. If there is some question arising based on the altered rate, that is another matter.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): What could be more important or urgent than an increase of this type, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The reason I considered the question to be out of order is that it is information which is available to all members of the house. Simply to ask what the rediscount rate is, in my view is not a proper question to ask on the orders of the day.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the government planning any action to halt the ever-rising interest rates in Canada, including the rediscount rate?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The government is following wise and sensible fiscal policies within the realm of government action. The Bank of Canada, as I pointed out in a debate not long ago, is by statute law enacted by this parliament, in charge of monetary policy.

Mr. Regier: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance another question. Is the minister aware that he is, on behalf of the people of Canada, the only owner of the Bank of Canada and that according to the act the Bank of Canada is the agent of the government of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has been making a statement rather than asking a question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not a statement, but a gross misstatement.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister aware of the fact?

Mr. Caron: He is not aware of anything.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF REMUNERATION AND CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Starr for the second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I was replying to the reckless misstatements and false charges that the members of the official opposition have been making during the course of this debate. They have said that there were on the part of the government violations and evasions of the law. We say, Mr. Speaker, there have been neither violations nor evasions of the law. Everything that has been done has been done within the law. Nothing has been done in excess of the powers conferred by law enacted by this parliament. There is nothing mysterious—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —nor unlawful in what has been done, and I will proceed now to indicate precisely what has been done.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I was asking whether the minister would permit a question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will have to ask the hon. member and others to reserve their questions until completion of my remarks because I am faced with the time limit today, Mr. Speaker.

Just before the adjournment yesterday I was referring to the provisions of section 85 of the act, which is one of the provisions of the act of which we are charged with violation. I pointed out that this section provides that contributions to the unemployment insurance fund go into the consolidated revenue fund, and payments made out of that fund are charged against the unemployment insurance fund. The section also provides that obligations of the Dominion of Canada may be purchased; that is to say, obligations either direct or guaranteed by the government of Canada, and when those obligations are purchased on behalf of the fund the cost is charged against the unemployment insurance fund within the consolidated revenue fund.

Then subsection 5 contains this provision:

> Obligations purchased under this section shall be held by the Bank of Canada and are subject to the inspection of the Auditor General.

Section 86 then proceeds to provide, Mr. Speaker:

> Where the amounts standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund—

That is to say, the credit balances in the consolidated revenue fund. I continue:

> —are not sufficient for the payment of benefits under this act, the Minister of Finance, on the requisition of the commission, may,
> (a) obtain advances from the Bank of Canada on the security of the obligations acquired under section 85 not exceeding the par value of the obligations secured, and credit to the unemployment insurance fund an amount equal to those advances, or

(b) on the security of such obligations, credit further amounts to the unemployment insurance fund not exceeding the par value of the obligations secured, on such terms and conditions as the governor in council determines.

Those are the important words for this purpose, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are two forms in which the assets of the unemployment insurance fund are held.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; I just said to the hon. member—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On this very section?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —for Bonavista-Twillingate that I will take the questions at the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the same question? You do not want to—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are two forms in which the assets of the unemployment insurance fund are held. First, there are the obligations. Those are government obligations which are held by the Bank of Canada; and there is as well the amount standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund. You have the two types of assets of the fund, the obligations and the amount in the consolidated revenue fund.

Now, here is where the Leader of the Opposition has completely confused himself. He seems to regard it as necessary that the obligations should have been exhausted before any application is made for a loan under section 86. He has completely overlooked the fact that—

Mr. Pearson: I never said that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —section 86 contemplates loans on the security of the obligations. The obligations that are held by the Bank of Canada for the fund are used as security for those loans. The lending power written into this act was put there for a purpose. There have been two orders in council passed in pursuance of the provisions of section 86. At the beginning of this new fiscal year, on April 1, the fund still had approximately half a billion dollars of obligations to its credit—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that in cash?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in the hands of the Bank of Canada, as provided by section 85, but it did not have enough cash to pay the benefits that were to be made week by week.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

There was not enough to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund to meet those recurring obligations. This situation brought section 86 of the act immediately into play. Naturally the commission did not wish to sell any more of its obligations, in the light of the weakness of the bond market at that time. They therefore applied to the Minister of Finance for a loan in pursuance of the provisions of section 86. To accommodate the unemployment insurance commission in this situation I recommended the loan, which was approved by the order in council No. P.C. 1959/383 of April 2. This was done to accommodate the unemployment insurance commission and the fund—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. My point of order is this. The minister has said that this loan was made pursuant to a requisition from the unemployment insurance commission. Will the minister table that requisition to substantiate this point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order at all. I hope I will have time to say the things that hon. members opposite have been challeging me in the last three days to say and which, ever since I started yesterday afternoon, they have been doing their best to prevent me from saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just as you did.

Mr. Pearson: Table the document.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And so, Mr. Speaker, in response to this request from the unemployment insurance commission, I made this recommendation and the order in council was passed. This order in council did not constitute a loan; it constituted an authorization for a loan of $50 million. There were drawings, Mr. Speaker, under that order in the month of April, and before the end of April a similar request was made for another loan, the situation remaining unchanged; in other words, the sum to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund not being adequate to meet the maturing obligations, another order in council was passed on April 23, order in council 1959/495, authorizing another loan of $30 million.

Mr. Benidickson: Which could have been foreseen by the investment committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This again is an authorization. The unemployment insurance commission is not prevented from selling any obligations which it chooses to sell. This is another mistake made by hon. members opposite. There is nothing at all to prevent the unemployment insurance commission from proceeding to sell any of its obligations and repaying this loan. That is contemplated by the provisions of section 86 subsection 2, of the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read section 4 of the order in council.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here again the hon. member for Essex East was completely mistaken in what he had to say in his remarks on May 11. As recorded at page 3552 of Hansard he said:

> In the month of April we had two loans made by the government to the unemployment insurance commission in the amount of $80 million—

That statement is untrue. The fact is that to date, in pursuance of these two authorizations, the loans aggregated just $55 million. Here are the dates and the amounts: April 7, $10 million; April 9, $10 million; April 16, $10 million; April 22, $10 million; April 30, $5 million; May 7, $10 million. There has not been any loan of $80 million. There is an authorization, which is a very different matter. The hon. member for Essex East in his stormy remarks on Monday evening also said, as found on page 3552:

> Why was not the unemployment insurance commission allowed to cash its own securities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The unemployment insurance commission could have cashed its own securities had it wished to do so. There is no obstacle in its way if it chooses to do so. But if it did that hon. members opposite would be the first to complain that it would be selling bonds on the market and taking something less than the par value of the bonds. They would be critical of the commission for doing so. They would be the first to criticize.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: What happened to the bond market?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You see, Mr. Speaker, I was asked to give information and I am trying to give it but hon. members opposite do not want it. All they wish to do is stretch their own lungs. The balance of that authorization, another $25 million, is there if it is needed. These are the only orders in council providing authorizations for loans.

When the hon. member for Essex East referred to the question that he asked me on Monday on orders of the day may I point out that he asked me if there were loans made in April and May. He did not give me any notice of the question in advance. If he had I could have given him the amounts, but in his question he asked about April and May. I am not going to make offhand statements, Mr. Speaker, as to particular periods or particular amounts in matters of this kind. If the hon. member had wanted information, if that was his real purpose, he could have had it very simply by giving me notice a short time in advance. I could have had the information and would have been very glad to give it in full at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I say it is incompetent to the minister to impute motives to other hon. members.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is incompetent to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to act in this house in any other way than as one who regards himself as above the rules of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My honour as a member of the house has been impugned by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has said in his usual irresponsible way that I do not abide by the rules of the house.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure Your Honour will ask him to withdraw so unfair an imputation.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I heard the minister reflecting on the hon. member's observation of the rules. I do not know what the exact words complained of are, but it did not seem to me that the hon. member should take it seriously because it is in line with the observations made back and forth across the floor from time to time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope these deliberate interruptions on the part of hon. members will not be deducted from my quite limited time today.

Mr. Pickersgill: The rules will be applied, I hope.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidently every effort is being made to prevent me from giving information that I was challenged to give and which I am endeavouring to give the house now. The hon. member for Essex East, not having gone about obtaining the information seriously, then went ahead and splattered the record with his reckless statements.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Other hon. members of the opposition then followed his example, a very doubtful thing to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not mind the hon. member going on with his superlatives, but when he suggests that I did not pursue this matter seriously he is impugning my motives and conduct in the house and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw that statement. If he cannot make an argument addressed to the subject under discussion I hope he will not indulge in insulting personalities in this house.

Mr. Speaker: It is a well established rule and observance of the house in most instances that reflections are not made on the motives of hon. members. I do not know exactly what the words complained of are, but I am sure the minister does not wish to reflect on the motives of the member and will say so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have made it obvious time and again in the house that out of my affection for the hon. member for Essex East I have let him down lightly time after time even when he makes statements in the house that have no foundation in fact, as he did on Monday evening.

The next complaint was that certain terms had been attached to the loan. The section I have read, Mr. Speaker, contemplates that very thing. It speaks about that very subject in section 86 (1) (b)—"on such terms and conditions as the governor in council determines." Surely there cannot be any question about the regularity of what we did there.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a question I should like to put right now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): According to the provisions of the act the security that has now been placed with the Minister of Finance consists of $61,386,000 of obligations of Canada, 4¼ per cent bonds of 1972.

The other complaint concerned the interest rate, which they said was 5 per cent. Every hon. member of the house, except hon. members opposite, knows that the interest rate is established every six months. It was established on April 1 in connection with all loans made by the Minister of Finance to crown companies and others concerned for the six month period following and the rate for this period is 5 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: An all-time high.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The terms that were established by this order in council are proper and in accordance with the act. The next suggestion was that information had not been given to the house that ought to have been given. Orders in council, Mr. Speaker, are communicated to the house in the ordinary way. The orders in council for one month are tabled in the house by the Prime Minister around the middle of the following month as a matter of course. There has not been any departure from that rule, as was alleged by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate without any foundation at all, in his empty speech the night before last.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This rule is being followed and will be followed.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I am rising—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Another interruption.

Mr. Pickersgill: —on a question of privilege. The minister has stated that I made a false statement to the house. He knows perfectly well that is not correct. I said I had been informed. I was very careful to say that I had not verified it myself, and the minister, by saying that I misinformed the house, is himself misinforming the house.

Mr. Speaker: I understood that the words used were that the statement was made without any foundation at all. Unless the minister wants to modify that I do not think it is something I should ask him to do, because it is a very common expression.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not ask the minister to modify anything.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house will pass its own judgment on the statements of the hon. member who undertakes to base charges upon statements made on information which he is not prepared to back up and that he cannot back up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, do you know how the hon. member for Essex East got hold of these two orders in council? A request was made for them by Mr. Lamontagne and that request was complied with. Mr. Lamontagne, a well-known official in the office of the Leader of the Opposition, made a request for them and the request was complied with. That is how the orders came into the hands of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Pearson: Surely the minister knows that it is at least inappropriate to mention the names of people in other members' offices who act on the authority and at the request of that member. It is not customary to mention civil servants, and I suggest the minister might show the same courtesy to the members of my office.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition raises a point of order. I know of no rule or authority that prevents an hon. member—

Mr. Pearson: Just courtesy.

Mr. Speaker: —mentioning any person by name except a member of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: The ordinary decencies of parliament are now disregarded.

Some hon. Members: Cheap, cheap.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it was said that Mr. Lamontagne is a civil servant—

Some hon. Members: Cheap, cheap.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has the floor should have the opportunity to reply to the debate which has been going on for some days in fairly animated and active form. Those who have spoken on one side of the bill have been heard, and it seems to me that the minister should be allowed to continue the debate. He has only 40 minutes, and he should be allowed to continue without interruption by members who do not take the floor and do not rise on appropriate points of order or privilege.

Mr. Regier: I should like to rise to a question of privilege. This is a matter that affects the rights of every member in this house. We have various means of obtaining our information, and if those means are going to be exposed by members of the government then I feel that affects the effective work of opposition members.

Mr. Pickersgill: Another form of closure.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, I take it, raises this matter of privilege seriously?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I have never heard of such a matter of privilege. As I understand what took place, the minister who was speaking mentioned the name of an official who asked him for certain information. I see nothing derogatory in that to the official, to the house or to anyone. Unless some member can indicate where the privileges of the house are affected, the minister should continue.

Mr. Regier: It shows how cheap he can be.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must say that in my opinion there is no matter of privilege involved.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this: no rule forbids a member to spit on the floor, yet nobody here does spit on the floor.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I mentioned the name of this estimable gentleman to indicate why it was regarded as a request made on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition and why it was complied with. Copies of the orders in council were promptly made available to this emissary from the Leader of the Opposition. They talk about hiding information, yet a request was made through an emissary from the Leader of the Opposition and the request was complied with and copies of the orders in council were immediately supplied.

Mr. Pearson: Why shouldn't it be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And why should hon. members opposite seek to distort the facts by pretending that there was any attempt to hide something?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was a definite attempt.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Next, there was a reference to the budget. It has become quite evident now that no debate can be conducted in this house without a reference to the budget. We were told by the hon. member for Laurier that I should have announced in the budget a new tax, as he calls it. Had I undertaken to discuss a resolution that was on or about to be put on the order paper, you know I would have been out of order.

He is talking of this as though the bill proposes a tax increase. In practice what the increase in the contribution amounts to for a person with a salary or wage of $60 per week is 3 cents per day. But that has nothing to do with the budget.

Mr. Chevrier: You should listen to what the people say about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Minister of Finance does not control the operations under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Minister of Labour proceeded in the proper way, by resolution, and this point was not raised at the resolution stage of the present measure.

Now, let me test the nonsensical arguments put forward by the opposition by citing what they did in relation to this unemployment insurance measure. They introduced the measure in 1940. Did they bring it in as part of the budget? Did they mention it in the course of the budget speech? No, sir; this measure was preceded by a resolution which was introduced into this house on July 15 and debated and passed on July 16—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and the bill was given second reading on July 19.

Mr. Speaker: I will not be able to hear the point of order unless hon. members remain quiet.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is that we on this side were precluded from discussing what we considered to have been a breach of the Unemployment Insurance Act on the ground that it was not relevant to this bill now before the house. Surely a debate upon the circumstances attendant upon the enactment of the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1940 is in no way relevant to the bill now before the house, and the Minister of Finance should not be entitled to privileges in this house that are denied to hon. members on this side.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to be very careful, as I was earlier in the debate, to see that the minister does not go beyond the scope of this bill or the charges that have been made. I have very definite recollections that in the course of the debate it was alleged that the increase in rates was a form of taxation and should have been disclosed in the budget. I understand the minister is trying to deal with that allegation, which is quite proper and relevant to the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I pointed out that on July 19, 1940, the bill was given second reading. The budget that year was introduced on June 24 by the late Mr. Ralston, and it was completely silent on any reference to the intention of the government to introduce the unemployment insurance measure. This statute was consolidated and re-enacted by the former government in 1955. What happened then? The resolution was introduced in this house on March 30 and debated on April 5 in the afternoon—

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a further point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —the budget was introduced in this house on April 5 in the evening—

Mr. Speaker: Did the hon. member wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: Even if the minister can make an allusion to something to establish a point, to enter into a debate on the whole history of the unemployment insurance legislation when we were restricted to very narrow limits does seem to me to be improper. It does seem to me the same rules should apply to the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Another interruption, of course.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the hon. member does not assert, I take it, that this matter has not been the subject of debate so far?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do, sir.

Mr. Speaker: He is complaining of the extent of the reference being made?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I do, sir. I say there was no reference made to the increased contributions being announced in the budget. What was referred to was the fact that the loans should have been disclosed in the budget, and that is an entirely different matter to which the minister is not referring.

Mr. Speaker: I could refer the hon. member to the pages of Hansard where this bill was connected with taxation, the budget and similar matters. I have a summary of the debate to this point, and there appear to have been a great number of speakers who took that line. I would think that, within limits, hon. members cannot reasonably object to the minister meeting the arguments which were advanced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was done in this debate was that members referred to loans made by the Minister of Finance to the unemployment insurance commission, the minister says in the amount of $55 million. The allegation made by hon. members on this side was that in the presentation of the budget this kind of transaction, the first of its kind in the history of our country, should have been disclosed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a different point, and I will come to that if hon. members will ever stop their interruptions and allow me to come to it. The hon. member for Laurier was the one who said this should have been announced in the budget because it was a new tax. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, as I said, that in 1955 a resolution contemplating the consolidation and revision of this act was introduced on March 30. The resolution was adopted on April 5, in the afternoon, and the budget was brought in that night, after the resolution was adopted. Now, Mr. Speaker, surely hon. members opposite should make some pretence to consistency in connection with their baseless charges in this house.

I now come to the other allegation that was made concerning the budget. It was said that we should have reported the loan to the house, and that I should have done this in the budget speech. Mr. Speaker, whoever made that allegation evidently was not familiar with the act or with the facts. I have pointed out already that the order in council was passed on April 2. One loan of $10 million was made on April 7 and one of $10 million on April 9, the date of the budget. The budget presentation laid before the house all the information available for the fiscal year that was covered in the white paper, namely the year ended March 31, 1959. Had there any loans made in that period they certainly would have been reported to the house. There was no loan to be reported in accordance with the provisions of the budget or the terms of the white paper. Mr. Speaker, the act deals in section 87 with the reports that are required. That section provides as follows:

87. The Minister of Finance shall report annually to parliament the state of the fund as of the 31st day of March last preceding and the transactions under section 86 during the fiscal year ending on that day; and the operations of the fund shall be set out in the public accounts in such detail as the Minister of Finance may decide.

Mr. Speaker, that section has been adhered to and obeyed literally.

Mr. Pickersgill: "Literally" is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When the reports are submitted to the house for this present fiscal year they will show not only the state of the unemployment insurance fund but all transactions of the kind that have been discussed. That will appear in accordance with the provisions of the act, just as was done by my predecessors in this office, who submitted information to the house in the public accounts. That is what the act prescribes. That is what has been done in the past and that is what will be done on this occasion. The budget, Mr. Speaker, is certainly not the report prescribed by the terms of section 87 of this act.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we are accused of maladministration in connection with the fund itself. We are told first of all that there has been compulsion on the part of the government, applied to the unemployment insurance commissioners in relation to their conversion of victory loan bonds into the conversion bonds of 1958.

Mr. Speaker, that statement is untrue. There is not a tittle of truth in it. Those upon whom the responsibility in this matter is laid by the act reached this decision of their own free will and accord and they made a wise decision, Mr. Speaker, to convert their holdings of victory loan bonds into conversion loan bonds because thereby they obtained a higher rate of interest for the benefit of the fund and contributors to it. They obtained in return a bond that has consistently sold in the market at a higher price than the victory loan bonds have sold at any time since then. In addition, they made a profit for the benefit of the fund and for its contributors in so doing. We are charged with making a mistake in that respect. I think those who were responsible for the decision to convert ought to be congratulated.

Then finally, Mr. Speaker, we are told that there have been capital losses. I wish there were time to document the denials and the contradictions that should be made to the hon. member for Essex East for the misstatements he put on the record in this house on May 11—and there are a number of them—when he said there was compulsion and that there were capital losses due to the conversion. That is not true. I am coming now to the final point, and talking about capital losses. He said this, as reported at page 3551 of Hansard:

—as a result of its forced participation in the bond conversion scheme of this government had lost over $10 million.

Mr. Speaker, that is not true. It did not result from the conversion at all. It resulted from sales, Mr. Speaker. This is another sample of the Martin twisting of the facts.

Mr. Speaker, this loss, an aggregate loss of $10 million, is not the first loss the unemployment insurance fund has sustained. If hon. members opposite did not have such weak spots where their memories and consciences are tender, they would recall that the last loss before they went out of office occurred in May, 1957. In that month, which was the last complete month during which they were in office, the unemployment insurance fund sustained a loss of more than $2 million in the course of their administration. Did they say then that fact ought to be made public? Did they go out through the country in that election campaign, at that crucial stage of the campaign, and announce that there had been a loss of over $2 million to the unemployment insurance fund as a result of the transactions in obligations? No, Mr. Speaker; they did not do that.

I am obliged to hurry over these facts, with all the interruptions. Let me say this in conclusion. This house has had to sit and listen, during the course of a three-day debate here on the part of hon. members opposite, to the most shallow, hollow, unjustified, trumped up charges this house is ever likely to listen to. Hon. members of this house will know in future about how much attention to pay to charges by hon. members opposite based upon the variety of statements, misstatements and distortions in which they have indulged here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Finance a series of questions which will be found at page 3552 of Hansard. I ask him now to address himself to all those questions but the first two.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All but the first two?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You dealt in part —not satisfactorily, I may say—with the first two questions, but you have made no reply whatsoever to my question as to what issues of government bonds were pledged by the commission to secure these loans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I answered that question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, you did not. With great respect I say that my hon. friend did not answer that question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I beg my hon. friend's pardon, Mr. Speaker, but I did give that information. I said that the commissioners had pledged with me $61,386,000 of the 4¼ per cent 1972 bonds.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My second question was this:

At the time these loans were made was there outstanding to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund not sufficient for the payment of benefits under the act as required by paragraph 1 of section 86 of the act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I also dealt with that question. I said both with respect to the first order in council of April 2 and also with respect to the date of the second order in council of April 23, that there was not in hand a sufficient amount in the consolidated revenue fund to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund to meet the obligations that had to be met in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I regret that my hon. friend apparently really does not want to answer that question. Will he answer the next one, which was this:

Will the Minister of Finance report to the house on the amounts of various securities including treasury bills held by the unemployment insurance fund as of March 31, 1959?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will gladly do so. At March 31, 1959 the investment position of the unemployment insurance fund indicated that the obligations it held aggregated in par value $490,067,500. I can give the detailed holdings if it is of interest to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was information I asked for and which I was denied about four weeks ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that is an untrue statement which the hon. gentleman has made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, no hon. member—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He did not ask for that information four weeks ago or at any other time until he spoke in this house on May 11. He knows the rules of the house very well. He is one of the most senior members of the house. If he wants information he knows he can put his questions on the order paper at any time.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that the hon. member for Essex East is referring to a question he asked in the house and which is reported in Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On a question of privilege, may I say this. My hon. friend said I was guilty of an untruthful statement. Under the rules of this house no hon. member has the right to make such an allegation, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. gentleman is suffering from difficulty in hearing. I did not say "an untruthful statement". I said "an untrue statement". That is quite in accordance with the rules of the house and also in accordance with the facts of this situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend will recall that about a month ago I asked him what losses the unemployment insurance commission had incurred as a result of the bond conversion policy of this government. My hon. friend told me in this house that it was not in the public interest to disclose the details of portfolios of this kind. When I could not get that information I addressed a written question to the Minister of Labour, and I got the information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has not stated the facts correctly at all. This is getting to be a habit of his, and I would recommend now, before he makes any more unfounded charges, that he should read the text of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister's time has expired, and I do not know whether I should, except by leave of the house, permit questions to be asked at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did agree to answer one question of mine.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would be glad to complete the answers to the questions put by hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Essex East asked a question at page 3552 of Hansard, and I will be glad to answer him if that is the wish of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to answer the questions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The next question I was asked, Mr. Speaker, was:

What were the purchases and sales of various obligations of or guaranteed by the government of Canada including treasury bills for each month of the last fiscal year and at what prices were these transactions made?

Mr. Speaker, that will involve a very lengthy table. I have the information and it can be made available, but I can tell the house that it is a very lengthy statement indeed.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that the information be made available by tabling it, because we have gone past our time and we are out of order at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister be prepared to answer a very brief question which I would like to put to him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will table that information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say by what statutory authority the fourth paragraph of the order in council of April 2 was passed, which gave the minister the sole discretion to direct the sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds, when it would appear from section 20 of the act that that authority was vested by parliament in the investment committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the language of section 86 is very clear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am talking about section 20.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Section 86, subsection 1(b) provides, in the opening words:

> Where the amounts standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund in the consolidated revenue fund are not sufficient for the payment of benefits under this act, the Minister of Finance . . . may
> (b) on the security of such obligations, credit further amounts to the unemployment insurance fund not exceeding the par value of the obligations secured, on such terms and conditions as the governor in council determines.

Those concluding words are the governing words for this purpose. The power is vested by this act in the governor in council to determine the terms and conditions upon which the Minister of Finance may make loans to the unemployment insurance fund, and that is the power which was exercised, and properly and responsibly exercised, in the terms of these two orders in council.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he does not feel that section 20 of this act has been violated, which section says that investment transactions shall be made only on the authorization of the investment committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have that question from the Leader of the Opposition, because it gives me an opportunity to say that he was quite confused in his interpretation of this point in his speech yesterday. Section 20 relates to investments.

Mr. Pickersgill: Investment transactions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, investment transactions are the investments constituting the use of moneys standing to the credit of the fund for the purpose of acquiring obligations. If you look at the marginal note opposite section 85 (1), there you will see the word "investments". When you come to section 86 it is "advances" which are talked about. You are in a different realm there. Section 20 and section 85 relate to investment in these government obligations. When you come to section 86 you are dealing with amounts. You are not dealing with investment there at all, but with amounts in the fund. Then when the amounts are not adequate, provision is made for a loan.

Now, a loan is not an investment transaction within the contemplation of section 20 at all. It is not an investment. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, so far as any suggestion of investment is concerned, under section 86 it is an investment on the part of the Minister of Finance, and the statute deals very precisely with the terms upon which the Minister of Finance may make a loan for the benefit of the fund to enable it to meet its obligations.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, is the minister trying to argue that the authority of the investment committee under this act is limited to the purchase of government securities and does not extend to the sale or to the conversion of such securities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, so far as the purchase and sale of securities not related under section 86 to loans are concerned, that of course is done by the investment committee appointed in accordance with the terms of section 20, and that has been done with strict adherence to the terms of the act. But when you come to section 86, this is not a matter of investment by the fund or the commissioners. This is a matter of borrowing by the fund and by the commissioners. The investment here is on the part of the Minister of Finance in the form of a loan, and the statute has dealt with this in the plainest terms. The statute says that the Minister of Finance may in the given circumstances make this loan on the terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, and that was done.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A good deal of latitude has been given to most of the questioners and the minister. If the house is not yet ready for the question I must recognize the next speaker.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have just a remark or two. After listening to the discussion which has been going on between the Minister of Finance on the one hand and three or four of the hon. gentlemen along this side on the other, I think if Cervantes were still alive and preparing his book "Don Quixote" he could very well have had all four of them in his book as characters.

The Minister of Finance, if nothing else, I think, has certainly given some truth to the old saying that figures do not lie but liars ofttimes figure.

It is unfortunate, I think, that in considering this particular bill which is before us, which relates to unemployment insurance, unemployment insurance payments, benefits and so on, the whole discussion should be cluttered up, as I think it has been, with references to hidden or secret reports and references to charges of lawbreaking on the part of the Minister of Labour. Whether the minister did or not, I do not know; but the fact that such references are made does nothing but confuse the entire issue and the whole principle contained within the bill, if there is a principle there in the first instance.

All these points about the budget, secret documents, hiding reports, breaking the law and so on have absolutely nothing to do with the bill itself. I think that is what we should be addressing ourselves to; we should be looking at the bill in the light of exactly what it is and why such a bill needs to be introduced at this time. I certainly think the reckless use of the unemployment insurance fund by the minister without any consideration for safeguards and proper methods of replenishing the fund is the reason we are in this position today. I would like to put a few short statements on record to indicate the position of the C.C.F. party with regard to this particular bill.

The bill, in effect, asks the working class people of this country to subsidize the unemployment policy of the government; it imposes an additional tax burden on workers without any comparable benefits accruing to them. It is certainly an indication of the government's lack of intestinal fortitude—or to use plain terms, guts—to replenish the fund in a sensible way from general revenue, and to declare this heavy drain on the fund as part of a national disaster rather than asking the working classes themselves to bail the government out of its difficult position.

I am sure the minister does not seriously expect members of this group, particularly, to support this bill. We have no intention of supporting it, because we regard it as a back door, sneaky method of imposing taxation on second reading of this bill. If the minister wishes to withdraw the bill and introduce something which is more in keeping with ethics and more in keeping with a sound moral attitude toward the working class we would be prepared to look at it again, but we are certainly not prepared to accept the measure as it stands in the light of the principles which it contains.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): I should like to make one or two comments on this bill at this time, and I should prefer to stick closely to the principles of the bill rather than raise a verbal smoke screen of the type we have had from the Minister of Finance this afternoon.

There are some things in this bill with which I agree. That clause which refers to the increase in the wage ceiling is one which I think has a great deal of merit. Over the years the workers of this country have enjoyed the benefit of increased wages, and it is understandable that some of them should have exceeded the limits which were imposed in the original act. I think raising this ceiling from $4,800 to $5,460 is a good thing to do, because it will bring into the insurance scheme, according to the statement made by the minister, another 80,000 wage earners who will become eligible for the benefits of the unemployment insurance plan.

I think, too, that the proposed increase in the benefit period from 36 to 52 weeks has some merit. If a worker can qualify under the terms of the regulations for benefits throughout a period of 52 weeks, I see nothing wrong with that. I can understand that a situation may arise in which a worker may be unemployed for this length of time. I hope that such would not be the case, and I certainly hope there will never be a large number of people in Canada who will require unemployment insurance for 52 weeks; but for the small number who do need it, and who are able to qualify, I think this will be of great assistance, and I certainly have no objection to this proposed amendment.

Again, I have no objection to the revision of the allowable earnings. I agree with the minister in his division of allowable earnings into two classes—those paid to workers with dependents, and those paid to workers without dependents. I should think, however, some thought might be given to consolidating the two or three lower classes. After all, it is understandable that a man who receives $6 in unemployment insurance for a week will need $4, $5 or $6 just as badly as a person who receives $12 or $15; and if during the winter time a worker gets $6 or $8 a week and is able to obtain a day or two shovelling snow, I see no reason why the amount of benefit he is able to obtain should be limited by the fact that he receives a lower rate than another man who lives nearby. However, I have no objection to this amendment.

The main purpose of the bill, however, is to stabilize the unemployment insurance fund. Over the last two years this fund has been considerably depleted. It has been depleted by an amount estimated to be $400 million. I agree that this money has been paid out to those who were suffering from the effects of unemployment, and that it has helped to relieve a large measure of the distress felt by those who have had the misfortune to be unemployed. These benefits went out not only to those who were seasonally unemployed but also to a large number who were qualified for regular unemployment insurance benefits.

But if the main purpose of this bill is to stabilize the fund, let us look at the manner in which this is being done. First of all, the contributions made by wage earners are being increased by anywhere between 25 per cent and 30 per cent. In return for this larger contribution they are receiving no extra benefits, nothing more than they have received in the past. Again, employers will be obliged to increase their contributions by between 25 and 30 per cent.

We are living in a country where prices are high, and any charge which is going to increase the cost of living, or any charge which will have the effect of increasing the cost of production and particularly the cost of articles which we sell in foreign markets, will only result in our being placed in a less competitive position. This amendment will certainly increase our cost of production at a time when corporation taxes in this country are at the highest level in our history. I feel sure that this bill will give little encouragement to those who wish to improve or extend their industrial interests.

For example, I have here a clipping taken from this morning's Montreal Gazette. The headline says "Industry Asks Tax Be Eased" and the first paragraph reads as follows:

> The federal government was urged today to grant substantial tax concessions to Canada's forest industries to enable them to remain competitive in world markets, particularly in the field of pulp and paper.

And the last paragraph reads as follows:

> Canada has become less and less attractive for major investment in this field. Investment is flowing elsewhere. There is obviously something seriously wrong with the economic climate for the pulp and paper industry in Canada.

Yet despite this, in addition to the high level of taxes which industry already has to pay, the minister is imposing this extra charge by way of the employer's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. Speaking the other day on the resolution I said this was nothing more than an extra tax of something over $70 million which will be imposed on the workers and employers in this country. I still think that is so, because no extra benefit is being received from it.

As far as the administration of the fund is concerned, there can be no doubt that a great deal of information is needed regarding the handling of the fund in the last two years. The Minister of Finance may quibble all he likes about the $10 million that was lost due to the cashing of some of the bonds held by the unemployment insurance commission, but the money is lost, nevertheless. One might ask, are the workers of this country now being required to make up this $10 million? Is that what the government is doing?

We could ask a number of other questions about the investments of the commission. The minister says the commission is quite within its rights in cashing any of its investments at any time it wishes to do so. If that be so, why was it necessary to borrow the sum of $55 million from the government? I do not know the reason; but one might ask the government, if the question does not embarrass them, to what extent it was due to the bond conversion operation and its effects upon the bond market.

After all, as unemployment increases there comes a critical point beyond which benefits paid to our people begin to move from the realm of insurance into the realm of welfare. Because of the large amount of unemployment we have had in the last two years it is my belief that the government should have made up this deficit in the unemployment insurance fund by a direct grant. What we are now doing is asking a certain proportion of the workers of this country to pay for that which more properly should have been considered as a welfare payment. I might say, to quote Kipling, that we are "robbing a selected Peter to pay a collective Paul".

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make a few brief remarks on the second reading of Bill No. C-43, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. To my way of thinking, this bill is nothing else but another measure introduced by the present government which takes away so much from the taxpayers but offers so little in return.

We listened for a while before the adjournment yesterday afternoon and again for over half an hour this afternoon to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). We learned at last in the course of his remarks that the minister himself is admitting the present weakness of the bond market. We also received from the minister certain information which up to now had been kept away from the members of this house. For obvious reasons, reasons known to any hon.

member who was in the house in the spring of 1956, the present Minister of Finance should be the last member to accuse members of this house of not abiding by the rules of the house. We certainly have not forgotten his attitude on that occasion.

In introducing the resolution preceding this bill, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) clearly stated that the purpose of the amendment was to give stability to the unemployment insurance fund. The unemployment insurance fund was built up of contributions from employees and employers, together with certain contributions from the federal treasury, and during the regime of the former administration had exceeded the sum of $900 million. The fact remains that after fewer than two years of administration by the present government the workers' fund has been reduced to a sum under $500 million.

We have been asked to approve the second reading of a measure which has been introduced by the present administration to cover up its failure to provide sound and consistent policies in the administration of the affairs of this country. This is a clear illustration of the greater concern of the present government in trying to keep some of its election promises than in giving the country sound management. In moving the second reading of this bill the minister stated, as reported at page 3537 of Hansard:

> The present amendments in this bill will provide coverage for a greater number of wage earners.

No one on this side of the house has any objection to the fact that a greater number of wage earners will be included under unemployment insurance benefits; but the main class of wage earners who are now being included are the class of wage earners who are earning salaries ranging from $5,000 to $6,000 a year, and they are the ones who are in less need of unemployment insurance benefits.

Further on, the minister stated that these amendments will increase benefits and allowable earnings. They certainly will not increase the rate of benefits which are being given now under the present regulations. In order to get increased benefits the wage earners will have to earn larger salaries and they will have to make larger contributions.

The minister also stated that these amendments will also increase contributions. There is no doubt in anyone's mind that one of the main amendments of this bill is designed to increase contributions. This is why I say the measure introduced by the present administration is another one which will take away so much but it will offer so little in return. In fact, it will ask the wage earners of this country and the employers of this country to pay 30 per cent more in their contributions to the unemployment insurance fund.

The amendments also propose to increase the benefit period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. At the resolution stage preceding the bill the Minister of Labour stated that this is one of the promises made by this government during the last two campaigns. The minister appeared to be proud to be able to advise the house and the country that they were increasing the unemployment insurance benefit period of 36 weeks to 52 weeks; but the minister did not state that when they promised the electors of this country to extend the benefit period from 36 weeks to 52 weeks that at the same time they would ask them to contribute 30 per cent more to the unemployment insurance fund by way of premiums.

These additional premiums, Mr. Speaker, are an additional tax added to the taxpayers of this country. As was stated the other day by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), it is an additional tax of $72 million over and above the increased taxation of $352 million which was included in this year's budget. Its direct effect will be to increase by that specific amount the price of consumer goods. By adding another $72 million a year to the cost of manufactured goods to be exported, in competition with other countries in the international market, we shall again be adding to the problem of inflation.

We of the opposition cannot accept this increase of 30 per cent in premiums without additional benefits to the employees. It is true that 80,000 more contributors will be added to the fund. By adding 80,000 more contributors and by choosing those contributors, as I said earlier, from a class which earns from $5,000 to $6,000 a year, the government is doing nothing else but setting up a pretext to get out of the dilemma in which it finds itself.

What about adding to those who should receive benefits from the unemployment insurance fund those that the government promised during the last campaign would be added? What about adding the workers employed on Canadian farms? What about those eastern Canadian farmers who have to employ lumbermen to cut pulpwood on their privately owned wood lots. In my constituency of Gloucester and in other sections of the maritime provinces farmers have substantially large wood lot holdings and they depend on the sale of pulpwood and lumber for their cash revenue. They cannot get any help to cut this wood because they cannot guarantee unemployment insurance benefits?

We have heard at different times that one of the reasons why the unemployment insurance fund was being depleted is that fishermen have been made eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. The total amount paid to the fishermen during the winter of 1958 or 1959 is much less than the $10 million which was lost by the sale of bonds in 1958. This, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance tried to explain a few minutes ago, is nothing else but pure robbery of the workers' savings in the unemployment insurance fund. Any insurance company which operated on such a basis would certainly not be in business very long.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) addressed a question to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). He suggested that on several occasions a minister of labour had asked the advisory committee to produce reports and make summaries in respect of amendments to the act and that these were not tabled because they were not required to be under the statute. But the Prime Minister did not draw any difference between the reports made in 1955 and the one referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the Leader of the Opposition.

It is true that the previous minister of labour asked the advisory board on certain occasions to produce certain reports and make summaries in respect of amendments to the act and that these were not tabled because they were not required to be under the statute. But the previous minister of labour did not hide from members of the house the fact that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were submitted to the unemployment insurance advisory committee for its approval as provided under the act. On January 11, 1955, when speaking on amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Mr. Gregg, the then minister of labour, said, as found on page 80 of Hansard:

> There is just one other point I wish to mention. It is something which I forgot to include in my first remarks. This bill has been submitted to the unemployment insurance advisory committee which is provided for under the act, and has been approved by them. Very shortly, of course, the larger bill will also be submitted to them.

The then minister of labour advised the house that the advisory committee had been consulted with respect to the amendments. Again, on April 4, 1955, Mr. Gregg, speaking on amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, said, as found on page 2663 of Hansard:

> When the unemployment insurance advisory committee met on December 14 last to review the amendments regarding seasonal benefits, it was of course necessary for the committee to have before it the views regarding this general revision as they were then held. Later when plans had further crystallized to the point where they were nearly the same as the amendments now proposed, a further meeting of the advisory committee was held on February 15. In order to review these final recommendations, as reflected in the actual bill, the committee has called a further meeting for tomorrow, April 5.

This is further evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission was consulted and the house was advised accordingly without the minister having to be requested to do so by the members of the opposition. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance should be reminded that under the previous Liberal administration the unemployment insurance fund was never in the precarious position it is today because, I repeat, of the mismanagement of the present government. This is why parliament is called upon to approve amendments which will place an extra burden on employers and employees without giving them any worth-while benefit in return. I might also add that when amendments were made to the Unemployment Insurance Act by the previous administration provision was made to obtain from the consolidated revenue fund the additional amount required to meet the needs of such amendments. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for the opposition to vote in favour of second reading of the bill.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the impression in the country is that in order to replenish a fast depleting government account we must pass these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. When I think that this actually amounts to an increase in taxes, when I think of the increases in taxes in the budget, I cannot help but think of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in Brantford on February 17, 1958, that "the humblest of our people will not be forgotten." I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is helping him to keep that promise.

The other day the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) said that the purpose of the increase in rates was to bring the unemployment insurance account into better balance, but these particular facts strike me. First, there is no actuarial accounting to indicate to us whether the minister is raising rates too much or is not raising them enough to bring the account into much better balance. Second, there is a further great obligation or tax on employers and workers equal to one-third of the total tax increase imposed in the budget. This all occurs at a time when the Prime Minister himself said not long ago in Montreal that Canada was emerging from the recession more rapidly than any other country of the western free world. It also occurs at a time when the Minister of Finance has predicted a 7 per cent rise in the gross national product.

I should like to know why such conditions in the country would not bring about a building up rather than a depleting of the account. Under the former government the funds in the account certainly rose very rapidly under similar conditions.

I think the minister should be able to give us an estimate of the percentage increase in payments to take care of the extension of benefits from 36 to 52 weeks. We could then see how much of what will be raised will be needed to pay for the other increases in benefits which, after all, are very little. I think most of the increase is meant to look after seasonal unemployment. I met an executive of the pulp and paper industry the other day and he told me it was his opinion that it would cost that industry an extra $1½ million to $2 million in order to make the additional payments into the unemployment insurance fund. The workers in the industry will also have to pay a similar amount and will have it lifted from their pay envelopes.

The former government put money into the unemployment insurance fund from consolidated revenue to take care of seasonal unemployment and I think this government should do likewise. The workers who will have to contribute this money also have to pay more taxes because of the tax increases in the budget. They have to pay more sales tax. They have to pay increased cigarette and old pension taxes.

Now they are asked to assume all the taxes under these amendments in order to pay for seasonal unemployment. In spite of the promises made by the Prime Minister there has been no elimination of the waiting period. Today, I think for the first time, I heard a minister of the crown say that the government should be congratulated because of a $10 million loss in connection with a government account.

When the Prime Minister was in Welland he said that the government did not want relief and that is why they launched the winter works program. Certainly, I think there has been more relief paid, in my district at least, than there has been for a good many years. Unemployment insurance benefits certainly were not received by all the people. I think, myself, that there has been a great depletion in that account, and yet the municipalities have had to assume a great deal of the responsibility for people who were out of work.

While listening to the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago, two or three questions occurred to me. I heard him refer to the fact that there were $490 million in government securities in the fund—I may be mistaken, but I thought he said at face value or at current face value. I should like to ask him what par value is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said par value.

Mr. McMillan: You said market price, and I should like to know what the par value of these securities is. I should like to know also, at the time of the—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, but I gave the investment position, as of March 31, 1959, in terms of par value. That was the expression I used.

Mr. McMillan: I understood the minister to say face value. I should like to know who made the decision to sell $400 million worth of victory bonds held by the fund, and convert those into conversion bonds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The investment committee took the decision, of course, but that was not the amount.

Mr. McMillan: Who made the decision to sell securities held by the fund throughout the last fiscal year, and under what provision of the act? Were loans or credits extended before by the government under this act and, if so, when and under what conditions? If in paragraph 1 of section 86 credit means cash and therefore does not include securities that could be sold, and if at any time the commission has not sufficient credit for the payment of benefits, then surely it means that the investment committee has authorized too much purchasing of securities.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I should like to add a few words to the remarks already made on this bill. The principle of unemployment insurance is, of course, sound and humane. It has made a substantial contribution to the freedom from want which was one of the principal clauses in the Atlantic Charter, the code on which the post-war policy of the free world was in fact based. During the past two years of recession the unemployment insurance fund was one of the main fenders between many people and penury. The establishment of this fund reflects the farsighted wisdom of the Liberal government which introduced it, and the forward looking statesmanlike approach which that government had.

However, it seems to me that the present bill will create an imbalance. While it is obviously desirable to stabilize the fund, it seems to me that the cost more than offsets the benefits. The increased benefits include a longer receiving period, increased from 36 weeks to 52 weeks. The wage level is raised, but the cost in premiums is also raised, yet the unit amount of the benefits remains the same.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, there are two kinds of unemployment. There is the unemployment which in normal times results when workers are temporarily out of work, but who normally would after a while be re-employed. Then there is the wholesale unemployment caused by the complete disappearance of jobs during an economic recession, such as that which has been historically associated with Tory times, and which has vexed the country for nearly two years. The former can be insured against, but the latter should be dealt with by an outright government grant. It is because of the fact the bill does not provide for outright government assistance, so that the cost can be borne by all, that I shall oppose this bill.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be words of appreciation to hon. members who have participated in this debate, and particularly to those who, in their participation, contributed to the debate by constructive and reasonable suggestions in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have noted these suggestions, and I can assure them that consideration will be given to them. It is doubtful whether that consideration can be given in these amendments, but it will be given eventually.

Now the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was one of the first—there were others who followed him—to ask for a breakdown of how the 30 per cent increase was arrived at, what percentage these amendments will represent of the cost of this increase. In the annual report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee which was a statutory one requiring to be tabled in this house and which was so tabled, the actuary estimated that the annual revenue through contributions would amount to $240 million, and that annual benefit payments would amount to $313 million. These estimates were based on the experience of the previous five years, and took no account of interest earnings and made no provision for changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act as then existing.

When the actuary was requested to report on the effects of the proposed changes he estimated the increase in revenues would result as follows: Taking in two new classes would be about 7 per cent or about $16,800,000; the raising of the ceiling, ¾ per cent, or $2 million; a total increase in revenues of $19 million. By the same token, the estimated increases in benefit payments were as follows: The addition of two new classes represented 3 per cent, an amount of $9,400,000; increase in duration from 36 weeks to 52 weeks, represented 3½ per cent, an amount of $11 million; increase in allowable earning rate, 1 per cent, amounting to $3,100,000; or a total increase in benefit payments in round figures of approximately $24 million.

After providing for the amendments the adjusted figures are therefore as follows: Estimated annual contribution revenue, $259 million. I may say that these are round figures. Estimated annual benefit payments, $337 million, or a short fall of $78 million. A 30 per cent increase on $259 million will produce $78 million which is designed to take care of the short fall.

The Leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked certain questions in the course of this debate. I should like to take the opportunity of giving the information now. They had to do recent expenditures from the fund. The fishermen's benefit, April 1, 1957, to March 31, 1959 amounted to $13,878,011. Seasonal benefit extensions—and these are estimates—two months extension, December, 1957, to April 15 and from April 15 to May 15, 1958, $24 million; special six weeks extension to June 28 last year—as hon. members will recall, a temporary extension was made—cost $18 million; up to December, 1958, which is the latest for which figures could be compiled, amounted to $6 million or a total of $48 million. These again are round figures. The losses under the married women's regulations annually amount to $2,500,000. The high point in the fund as of December 31, 1956 was $927 million. The previous low point, October 31, 1958 was $500 million. The status of the unemployment insurance fund as of March 31, 1959, stands at $496,251,386.48. I think that covers the questions that were asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

In this debate, Mr. Speaker, a great many things have been said, most of them unfortunately having little to do with the amendments before the house. It is not my intention to follow the official opposition down all the winding by-paths through which they have been straying. I feel that I have a duty to the unemployed in this country to deal with these amendments in order that they may come into effect as quickly as possible. In that connection I am glad to say that the unemployment situation is now improving even more rapidly than I had hoped for or expected and that the picture for April will be a much happier one than those prophets of doom have led us to expect. I say that because as a Canadian I have great faith in this country. I believe in the the future of this country. I believe in the industry of Canadians. Through that industry and through that endeavour to bring about a stronger economy I know that this will be accomplished. It has been accomplished time and time again in the past and it will be accomplished in the future as it will be accomplished now.

I am happy that the supreme high prophet of doom who sits opposite in the person of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has taken such a great interest in this debate. He has certainly shown a greater interest in labour than he ever took when he sat on this side of the house. I also commend the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) made a contribution to this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. As Your Honour will recall, we were restricted very severely to the terms of the bill now before the house. It seems to me that the minister has strayed even beyond the Unemployment Insurance Act itself into realms of fancy that are of no relevance to this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my hon. friends are becoming extremely touchy about a little bit of criticism.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Green: They are very good at handing it out but they are beginning to show that they can't take it. I think the Minister of Labour has been extremely temperate. I am sure that if we cannot say even these mild things about the official opposition, there is not much life left in this parliament.

Mr. Pearson: That is a good remark.

Mr. Speaker: Strictly speaking, personalities are always irrelevant but they seem to be a more or less inevitable part of our parliamentary system. If the hon. member does not confine himself to that kind of debate, I would not want to condemn him.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, it is not my reputation to do so continuously. But may I say that in days gone by I have heard remarks to the effect that a little bit of indulgence in personalities in the House of Commons adds a great deal to the debate. I must say that during the course of this debate many charges have been levelled against me by way of personal attack.

Mr. McIlraith: Why do you not deal with the charges?

Mr. Starr: As these charges have been published in the newspapers I think I should be permitted, with the indulgence of the house, to answer them. I assure you that, with the great respect I have for the position you hold, Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to confine myself to the matter at hand. When I was interrupted I was, as a matter of fact, making complimentary remarks about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: Which would suggest that I was not annoyed.

Mr. Starr: —and also the hon. member for Laurier. I want to say that they were equally distinguished in the way in which they carefully avoided any reference to the amendments before the house. To me, Mr. Speaker, that was a demonstration of real devotion to the cause of unemployment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not called to order.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to adopt the tactics which my hon. friends have adopted, as I said a few seconds ago. But when a minister is attacked on the grounds of violating a statute, when he is described as acting in a manner contrary to parliamentary privilege, there is a question of personal privilege involved in such accusations. While I do not intend to reply in detail to the picayune and meaningless accusations piled up by the official opposition, in their anxiety to avoid discussing these measures, I wish to leave no doubt in the minds of the hon. members of this house or of the people of Canada with regard to the low level they have reached in making personal attacks on myself.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising now to a point of order which is much more serious than the one I raised before. The hon. gentleman has raised a question of privilege. It is a well known rule of the house that if there is any question of privilege it must be taken up immediately at the first opportunity. The hon. gentleman did not do that. If he is going to discuss the question of whether or not he violated the statute, may I say this. Your Honour will recall that we were not permitted to discuss that question. It was ruled out as being irrelevant. I hope the same ruling will be applied to the minister as was applied to those on this side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is that the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: That the minister is out of order in discussing this matter.

Mr. Speaker: —is discussing something that is irrelevant—

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: —in dealing with the charge that he violated the statute. I certainly restricted the hon. member for Essex East in his allegations that the statute had not been observed with respect to the filing of reports.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Speaker: I hope it will not be necessary to discuss that matter, but there were other allegations of non-compliance, a great many of them, made in the course of the debate, and I expect that no hon. member would question the right of the hon. minister to deal with these allegations which were made.

Mr. Starr: The allegations I referred to appear in Hansard and were publicized. I am very grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for restricting the hon. members from going further, because I did not know how far they would be prepared to depart from these amendments. However, you have restricted them to the allegations they made.

Coming back to the hon. member for Essex East, I do not want to say that his remarks were any more significant than any of the others, but he sort of set the pattern, I think, in leading this debate. The hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) contented themselves with just parroting the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East. I clocked the hon. members opposite speaking for a combined total of over three hours but devoting approximately only 45 minutes to the amendments before the house. Again I say that this is an indication of their devotion to the unemployed of this country. This time was occupied by a series of devices which I might describe as the hidden report trick, the violation of the statute trick, and the mystery of the hidden loan. None of these devices, as you, Mr. Speaker, attempted to point out several times during the course of the debate, had anything to do with the present bill or had any reference to reality except in the frenzied minds of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Surely there must be a strong sense of guilt in the front benches opposite, especially in the minds of the four shattered remnants of the former Liberal government.

Ever since a celebrated day about 18 months ago they have been busily looking for a hidden report. This time they thought they had found one. What they really did find was a special report dealing with a matter which had been referred to the advisory committee by the unemployment insurance commission and myself for an opinion. That was what this report contained. As required under the statute, the annual report of the advisory committee was duly tabled in this house. The matter which was referred to in this special report to the Minister of Labour was a new benefit formula. That formula was dropped at the suggestion of the advisory committee. On this occasion may I say that we took their advice, and I maintain that because of that, this report is irrelevant and obsolete.

The hon. member for Laurier says that the report never should have been made, and he also says that I should never have asked for it. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, then it should never have been tabled and hon. members opposite certainly should not refer to it in this house. But to clarify the whole issue I should like to refer to other similar reports which have been made in the past. I refer to these reports now in order to relate the opinions and views of the advisory committee as to revisions and amendments to the act which have been made at other times, and also to the present amendments.

Mr. Pearson: They did not deal with the fund though.

Mr. Starr: No; they dealt with unemployment insurance revisions.

Mr. Pearson: That is a different matter. Look at the act.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I have repeated at least four times that the statutory report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee relating to the status of the fund as prescribed under the act was duly tabled in this house last year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the second report?

Mr. Starr: The second report was of the same nature as other reports made to the Minister of Labour under revisions to the act.

What emerges from a study of the reports of the advisory committee in the past few years is that recommendations of the committee were sometimes accepted and sometimes rejected. In the case of the present amendments, some of them relate directly to recommendations made by the committee. Others were not specifically recommended.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the minister—I think it is irrelevant, but I will let that pass—mentioned certain reports in the past dealing with the matter. I suggest that under the rules he is now required to table those reports which he has referred to as having passed through the previous administration.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I am coming to that and I have every intention of so doing. As an example of what the practice has been, Mr. Speaker, on November 22, 1955 a special report was made by the advisory committee addressed to the then minister, the Hon. Milton F. Gregg, in these terms:

> The unemployment insurance advisory committee at your request met on November 21, 1955, to consider the recommendations made by the unemployment insurance commission relative to regulations applying to seasonal benefits—

I stress the words "at your request". This report was never tabled, Mr. Speaker. I will table it today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It did not have to be under the act.

Mr. Starr: It was exactly the same kind of report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, it was not. It was nothing to do with the fund.

Mr. Starr: I do not know how many times I must repeat myself to the hon. member for Essex East who does not want to listen to reason. A report was tabled duly as required by the act, which report had to do with the status of the fund.

Mr. Pearson: That is right. They all have to be tabled.

Mr. Starr: In accordance with the act it was tabled last year and was for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958. The other reports to which the hon. member refers are here and were never tabled by the former government, and I am prepared to table them now after a period of four years.

Mr. Pearson: But that was not required under the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has nothing to do with the fund.

Mr. Starr: I would also like to note that a report was made by the committee on February 17, 1955, which relates directly to the matters we are now discussing since it deals with the revision of the act which took place then.

Mr. Pearson: Not the fund.

Mr. Starr: I want to point out that it dealt not only with specific amendments to the act but also with the complete revision of the whole act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But does it deal with the fund?

Mr. Starr: The report which was tabled at the request of the hon. member for Essex East does not deal with the fund.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes it does.

Mr. Starr: It deals with the new formula which is an amendment to the act. This report of February 17, 1955 which I have just mentioned, was made directly to the minister of labour, but it was never tabled. It gives the views of the committee on the proposed amendments. For the information of the house, the committee was by-passed by the then government and a special interdepartmental committee was set up to consider these amendments in February, 1955. I do not recall any complaint from the hon. member for Essex East at that time, not one single, solitary complaint, although he was at that time a member of the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because it had nothing to do with the fund.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. The hon. minister says that when I was a member of the government I failed to observe a particular duty. He alleges in proof thereof that I did not insist on the tabling in this house of a report which was required to be tabled under the statute. I say that the report now characterized by the hon. gentleman was not the kind of report envisaged by section 90 subsection (2), of the Unemployment Insurance Act dealing with the fund, and therefore did not have to be tabled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not yet indicated how privilege is involved. It appears to me that he is disagreeing with the hon. minister who has the floor, and that is not a matter of privilege. If there is some correction necessary it should be made when the hon. minister who has the floor has finished his address.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect to you, Mr. Speaker, I insist that I am within my rights in this house. The hon. gentleman has said that when I was a member of the government I failed to do my duty, and I am now answering that charge, as I have the right to do under the rules of this house with regard to a question of privilege. I say to the minister that the reports to which he is now dealing had nothing to do with section 90, subsection 2. They did not refer to the act, and did not, as the second report which was brought up on August 28—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is saying as a matter of privilege that he has been charged with a breach of his duties as a minister of the crown. If the hon. member would state the words he complains of, I will ask the minister—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It must be obvious from the context. What the hon. gentleman said was: here were certain reports which should have been tabled which were not tabled by the government of the day; the member for Essex East was a member of that government, and he should have seen to it that those reports were tabled.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is being unduly susceptible. He has been making the same charges, in the course of this debate, against the minister, and it seems to me a case of the retort courteous.

Mr. Starr: The hon. gentleman has a habit of twisting and turning the facts. I did not say they should have been tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, but we say your reports should have been tabled.

Mr. Starr: That is exactly the same kind of report as those I make reference to, and when these reports are tabled they can be compared to see if there is any difference. Cetrain suggestions were brought forward. They were referred by me to the unemployment insurance advisory committee. One or two officials suggested that the present formula of contributions and benefits could be looked at to see if it could be changed. That is what the formula refers to. The unemployment insurance advisory committee rejected the suggestions and we dropped them. Hon. members opposite say this has something to do with the fund. Certainly not. It has nothing to do with the fund.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister not realize that the title of the report he is talking about is: "The status of the fund"? That is at the head of the report.

Mr. Starr: This report was made to me personally, and the report on the status of the fund was filed and tabled in this House of Commons—the official statement. I want to draw the attention of the house to the report made to the Minister of Labour on April 7, 1955 dealing with proposed amendments to the act. The last paragraph is significant, and I intend to quote it. This is a report made to the former government of which most of the four remnants were then members.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order. Your Honour will recall that we were severely restricted to the contents of this bill. I cannot see how this talk about what happened in 1955 is related in any way to the present bill, and I do not think any hon. member who looks at the matter objectively can hold any other opinion. I maintain that the minister should be restricted as we were restricted.

Mr. Ricard: It hurts too much.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recall that I have already dealt with that very point. It seems to me that the minister is proceeding in a perfectly legitimate way to answer charges and accusations which were made against him. The point he is dealing with is a report in connection with which a great many allegations were made, and he is attempting to meet them by referring to the handling of similar reports in the past. It seems to me he is quite in order.

Mr. Pearson: May I say a word on that point?

Mr. Starr: I am making a speech and I have no recollection of having interrupted the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition or any of the other members—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the Leader of the Opposition, though I have no doubt about the situation.

Mr. Pearson: I want to recall to Your Honour that yesterday when I brought up the question of this report you told me, and I did not argue your ruling, that it was out of order because it was irrelevant. I, and the hon. member for Essex East and others on this side of the house, would, had it not been for your decision, have tried to relate this particular report in August to earlier reports which we knew about, but we were not able to do so because they did not deal with the unemployment insurance fund. We were not permitted to go into the history of this, and I suggest that although the minister has the right to reply to statements we made about that particular report last August entitled "Report to the minister on the status of the fund," that surely does not give him the right to go back to deal with other publications which were not concerned with the fund, as he himself admits.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have had for the last two days continual evidence of the nature of the attitude of the opposition. It has been shown over and over again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is this, a lecture or a point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: Dictator.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would be the last to speak of dictators after the attitude of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I take it the Prime Minister is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is lecturing the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is trying to restore some sense and reason to an opposition which has got out of control. I have sat here and maintained silence, but I have a responsibility in the house, and the attitude shown has been as unreasoning as—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is not; he is lecturing us.

Mr. Speaker: May I just say a word before the Prime Minister proceeds? I did give the Leader of the Opposition the floor to speak on the point of order. Now the Prime Minister, as everyone knows, has a responsibility in this house, and I am prepared to hear him speak to the point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will be the last to try to lecture those to whom a lecture would prove entirely ineffective. They spend their time arguing over facts—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: Hear the man speak, at least.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They say that certain reports should have been tabled—that they were hidden reports—and I can understand their feelings with regard to hidden reports. They say the reports should have been tabled, and the minister is now showing that the report in question is identical with similar ones which were not tabled in 1955 and 1956 by the last government, either because there was no legal requirement to table them or for some other reason. Surely we have not reached the point where any group of members in the house can make a series of assertions that are not justified by the facts and then when those statements are answered, and the truth is about to be brought before the house endeavour to seize an opportunity to prevent that information being given.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister has expressed effectively the view which I had formed. I have heard the Leader of the Opposition, and just to conclude this matter may I recall that this supplementary report, which is the subject of the debate which the minister is now proceeding to carry on, is referred to at pages 3542 and 3549, 3586-3592, 3596-3599, and 3628-3631 of Hansard. There was very considerable discussion, and I do not see how any member of the house in fairness could object to the fullest opportunity being given to the minister to meet as he sees fit the case which was made by several members of the opposition. I hope hon. members will hear him in reasonable silence so that the matter can be proceeded with.

Mr. Pearson: As a matter of principle and finally to clarify it, Mr. Speaker, do I understand that you stand by the ruling you made at page 3544 of Hansard, when you said:

> I am not objecting to the hon. member using the report, but what I am objecting to, or what I am asking him to desist from, is a discussion of the production and manner of production.

That was the ruling you gave on May 11, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I did restrict the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) in that way, but the debate went far beyond that as it progressed. There was a good deal of reference to the tabling and the production not only of the report of August but of a supplementary report. I was trying to confine this debate so that there would be no reference to the legality of the action of the government with respect to the tabling and the obtaining of these reports, but in fairness I could not—

Mr. Winch: How about stopping all this and getting down to the bill?

Mr. Speaker: —stop the minister in the line he is now taking, in view of the course the debate took.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted I was about to quote from a report which was made to the minister of labour on April 7, 1955. In my view the last paragraph of this report is quite significant. I quote the following:

> Under paragraph 89 of the present act, the committee is expected to review recommendations for changes, bringing excepted employment under coverage. Under the new proposals the committee is not mentioned. Members expressed the view that the committee, if it is to function properly, should be consulted before changes are made, especially those which involve additional payments out of the fund.

I have two comments to make. This report was made on April 7, 1955 when the former government was in power. These are the two comments I have to make. First, when I was asked to refer the present amendments to an interdepartmental committee which would have had the effect of bypassing the advisory committee I declined to do so.

Second, when these amendments were being discussed in the preparatory stage we made our submissions to the advisory committee in order to get their views. I have before me also the minutes of the advisory committee for July 24 and 25, 1950, in which the chairman explains why the government declined to consult the advisory committee on the question of seasonal benefits before introducing draft legislation. I refer also to the report of the advisory committee for the year 1957, in which the following statement appears on page 4:

Incidentally, your committee was not consulted before the provisions for fishermen's coverage were introduced and passed.

By this time, Mr. Speaker, they were so used to this sort of tactic that it was merely incidental. This report, I might say, Mr. Speaker, was tabled in this house but the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) seems to have missed seeing it. If he read it I would only conclude that he did not make it available to his colleagues. By July, 1957 the situation had reached a point where it was considered necessary to have the president of the Canadian Labour Congress appear before the committee and make the following statement:

Finally, we believe, in view of the importance of this committee and of its representative nature, that the status it enjoyed before the amendments of 1955 should be restored.

This is the statement of the president of the Canadian Labour Congress. This is the way in which the former government treated the advisory committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: That is what we over here were not allowed to debate.

Mr. Speaker: I have not considered the functions of the advisory committee relevant. There has been debate, but it has been on the report and the minister's action with respect to the report.

Mr. Starr: With the permission of the house, I would like to table the reports to which I have made reference up to now.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these reports?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It will be very interesting to look at them.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member saw them many times but he did not want to refer to them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be very glad to look at them.

Mr. Pickersgill: It will be interesting to have them on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Starr: Now we shall be able to have the benefit of the advice of the committee which castigated the former government for its bypassing of its function.

With respect to the present amendments, the minutes of a meeting of the advisory committee—

Mr. Pickersgill: We are now coming to the bill?

Mr. Starr: Yes. I have spent approximately 10 minutes of my time on this and I did that in order to reply to the hours that have been spent in this house by the members of the official opposition in discussing everything else but these amendments.

Now with respect to the present amendments, the minutes of a meeting of the advisory committee for August 19, 1958, urge the elimination of the ceiling of $4,800. The same minutes show strong opposition to the principle of extending benefits to fishermen. I mention this for the information of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Again, with respect to the recommendations, the special report which was presented to me, dated August 26 of last year, suggested two new classes at the top of the range and provided for adjustments of the wage ceiling being made from time to time by the governor in council. These recommendations are also shown in the annual report which was tabled last August in accordance with the statute.

I think what I have put forward fairly well establishes the position of the advisory committee and I hope deals once and for all, with the matter of tabling reports. But before leaving the subject, Mr. Speaker, I would refer hon. gentlemen opposite to section 19 of the act. I think this is the information they asked for. Section 91 provides for certain other reports to be made from time to time by the advisory committee. There is no requirement as to tabling. Section 91, subsection (2), reads:

> The commission may from time to time refer to the advisory committee for consideration and advice such matters relating to this act as the commission thinks fit.

This is done in consultation with the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour is the minister responsible to the members of this house for the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Pearson: Read that section again.

Mr. Starr: One of the curious objections which was made by them the other night was the criticism that my remarks on this bill have been very short. I wish I could say the same for hon. members opposite. They were neither short nor clear; they were windy and wordy—and that is spelled w-o-r-d-y.

Mr. Benidickson: W - o - r - t - h - y.

Mr. Starr: The hon. gentleman from Essex East—I almost said "the big wind" from Essex East—had me violating quite a number of statutes. His colleague, the hon. member for Laurier, had me violating every statute in the book. I am afraid this only showed their complete unfamiliarity with the act. Like my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming),—

Mr. Robichaud: Big wind finance.

Mr. Benidickson: What about "wordy" there?

Mr. Starr: —I was struck by the ignorance shown by three former cabinet ministers of the ordinary administrative procedures of the unemployment insurance commission. I do not intend to labour this point, Mr. Speaker. I would simply refer them, for their information, to section 19, paragraph 5, which permits the advisory committee to function despite absences or resignations of members.

Mr. Pearson: No, that is not right.

Mr. Starr: Section 19, paragraph 5, reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: I did not allow a debate on the constitution of the committee, the lack of membership of the committee or appointment of the committee, and in all propriety I think the minister should omit that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the minister, I did say that I thought that this committee had no legal existence, and I take it the minister is trying to reply to that by reading the section which he thinks does give it a legal existence.

Mr. Starr: I refer to section 19, subsection 5, which reads as follows:

> A majority of the members of the advisory committee constitutes a quorum, and a vacancy on the membership of the advisory committee does not impair the right of the remaining members to act.

Mr. Pearson: Will you read subsection 1 now?

Mr. Starr: The advisory committee is constituted as follows: There are four representatives of labour, four representatives of industry and a chairman, making a total of nine. At the moment there are four vacancies which leaves a majority to function.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister read section 19(1)?

Mr. Benidickson: The "not less than" provision.

Mr. Starr: My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has dealt with section 86 which authorizes the making of these mysterious loans which have been deplored so dramatically in the past few days. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has declared himself against these amendments. But what really hurt was when he gave as his reason the fact that he had lost confidence in the Minister of Labour. This kept me awake all night. A great smokescreen has been thrown up around these amendments, a smokescreen behind which have skulked the hon. member for Essex East and his somewhat less portly colleagues from Bonavista-Twillingate and Laurier.

Mr. Pearson: That is nice personal observation.

Mr. Starr: In reality these amendments are quite simple.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I weigh more than the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only in a physical sense.

Mr. Pickersgill: Donald's first good joke.

Mr. Starr: In reality these amendments are quite simple. We are extending the benefit period to 52 weeks, and this has been done in answer to repeated requests from labour organizations. We are increasing allowable earnings in answer also to repeated requests from labour organizations. We are adding two new additional classes at the top level and these are in answer to repeated requests from labour organizations. We are making certain easements in favour of persons who have had the misfortune to serve a prison sentence.

To support these extensions we are increasing contributions, as recommended by the actuary of the fund. I gave the substance of the actuarial report at the beginning of my remarks. Against this the official opposition have suggested that we support these changes by a grant from the consolidated revenue fund. That is also the position of the C.C.F. group. This would place upon the taxpayers of Canada a burden of $112 million. It would perhaps tend to remove some of the burden of these changes from the large corporations—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order—

Mr. Starr: —and distribute it among the taxpaying public. Presumably this is what the hon. member for Essex East had in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is that the minister is now embarking on a debate on the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East which has been decided by the house.

Mr. Speaker: As to the amount of the government's contribution?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment called for a larger government contribution and the maintenance of other existing contributions. That point has been decided.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister could have spoken at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: And should have.

Mr. Starr: If I had spoken at that time I would have closed the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not on the amendment. The minister does not know the rules.

Mr. Starr: Let us look at the record of the former government. The annual report of the advisory committee for 1957 shows that a recommendation was made to the government to support the cost of fishermen's benefits from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister to be allowed to proceed to debate a question that has already been decided by the house in this session?

Mr. Speaker: I have not heard enough since I decided the last point of order to know what his line is.

Mr. Starr: I think if I say a few more sentences you may get the drift of what I am trying to say. I had just mentioned that the annual report of the advisory committee for 1957 shows that a recommendation was made to the government to support the cost of fishermen's benefits from the consolidated revenue fund. This was turned down flatly by the cabinet of which the hon. member for Essex East was a member. No doubt he and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate were the leaders in the turning down of this recommendation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was certainly a leader in getting unemployment insurance for the fishermen.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, when the members of the official opposition were the government, when they were in that position in 1950, when they had to finance seasonal benefits they did exactly what we are proposing to do here. They raised the contributions by 15 per cent and more.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the fund was not imperilled as it is now.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Essex East was a member of the government at that time. Surely he knew what was going on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I did.

Mr. Starr: Why does he make all these speeches, why does he talk so much now—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will answer.

Mr. Starr: —that it should be paid from the consolidated revenue fund? I am not asking a question—

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You are afraid of the answer.

Mr. Starr: —because he has already answered that question by saying repeatedly that it should be paid from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but after making due allowance for points of order and interruptions his time has expired and I must now put the question.

Mr. Pearson: I think the minister ought to be given all the time he needs to finish his speech.

Mr. Denis: Not three hours like the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: I wish to thank you and hon. members opposite for giving me a little more time. I want to assure you that I will not take any more than is necessary. Not one of these members opposite, and I refer particularly to the four former cabinet ministers, was aware of how the former government regularly ignored and disregarded the recommendations of the advisory committee. This government has not done so.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister permit a question? He has just mentioned the advisory committee. Would he tell the house how many times the advisory committee has met since the report of last August 25?

Unemployment Insurance Act

Mr. Starr: The advisory committee only meets once a year. It only meets to deal with the statutory report on the condition of the fund. It may meet at other times when it is requested by the commission or the minister to consider certain amendments. This is an indication of what was known by these former cabinet ministers as to what went on in the government. Not one of them was aware of reports which were made and never tabled. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this must have been an absentee government indeed. In this as in other matters in this house the hon. member for Essex East has shown himself to be a master of misinformation. He has laboured mightily trying to make Martin mountains out of Martin molehills. But mother Martin has laboured in vain. Instead of a mountain he has brought forth a mouse.

The opposition has resorted to every possible device to avoid discussing these amendments. They have even objected to expenditures made from the fund last winter in pursuance of the object for which the fund was set up. The object for which this fund was first proposed by the late R. B. Bennett was the alleviation of human hardship. This fund is more than a series of actuarial tables. Certainly we have an obligation to keep the fund stable. Certainly we will keep it stable. We also have an obligation to those people of Canada who are unfortunate enough to suffer unemployment. This is our first obligation on behalf of these people and their families. I reject entirely the cold and callous position of the hon. member for Essex East, followed by his two colleagues.

Last winter the fund was put to the purpose for which it was set up. It was devoted to the alleviation of human hardship. I have no apologies to make.

Today there are 150,000 more people at work. Unemployment is more than 80,000 below last year. We are going into next winter with confidence. If our hopes should prove wrong, let me tell the hon. member for Essex East that this fund will be used next winter for the same purpose it was used last winter. This government will not see Canadians suffer in order to preserve the actuarial tables intact. They say in this debate, we are for this; we like these amendments, but we are going to vote against them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Against the tax.

Mr. Starr: They are going to vote against amendments of benefit to the working people of Canada.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

163. Departmental administration including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,105,745.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, at the time of adjournment of this debate last Friday night I was pointing out that our economic recovery depends to a very large degree on the employment of human resources, and that inflation and unemployment were the twins of misery besetting our communities today. The government is no doubt aware of the consequences of the evils of unemployment, but what are they doing about it? They certainly are not doing what they did when in opposition; that is plain when one reads their speeches in Hansard of 1955, 1956 and 1957. I do not wish to belabour the point by reading excerpts from these speeches at this time because I realize that my friend the minister, who has had a rough time during the past couple of days, is anxious to have the estimates approved without delay to enable him to proceed to the Geneva labour conference. May I extend to him sincere best wishes for an enjoyable time and safe journey.

However, I have here an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of January 24, 1959 which has a bearing on the situation and which I wish to read. It is as follows:

Mr. L. B. Pearson's colleagues in the House of Commons have been at some pains to reply to the personal attack made on their leader by Prime Minister Diefenbaker. The Prime Minister had lectured Mr. Pearson on his statistical references to unemployment and to the economic situation generally, saying that such remarks were "not in keeping with his responsibilities as Leader of the Opposition at a time when world conditions are difficult and trying, when the communist world attacks the free world economically as never before." Mr. Pearson, in a word, was rocking the boat.

On that occasion Mr. Diefenbaker had scoffed at Liberal warnings about the state of the economy. Last year, he said, Canadians "worked more, earned more, spent more and saved more" than ever before. A few days later Mr. Paul Martin had an opportunity to comment on this statement, finding on the basis of official figures that Canadians had actually worked less, earned less and spent less, in terms of real dollars, than in the last year the Liberals were in office.

As for the charges that the opposition leader was talking in such a way as to instil fear into the Canadian people, Mr. Lionel Chevrier pointed out that some highly responsible men had expressed quite similar views. One of these was Cardinal Leger, who in a recent pastoral letter said that the unemployment situation "requires the intervention of government to take new and audacious steps." And Mr. Martin listed half a dozen heads of Canadian banks who had all spoken in the gravest terms of the problem of inflation.

In his own days in opposition, as Mr. Chevrier reminded the house, Mr. Diefenbaker had been less cheery about preaching "doom and gloom". In March, 1955, when there had been a fairly sharp, though temporary, upsurge of unemployment, he had accused former Prime Minister St. Laurent of remaining silent "in the face of a problem that wrings the hearts of the people". But if the Prime Minister feels that the people ought to be spoken to soothingly so as not to get them all upset, he does not always set a good example in that respect. When meeting a delegation from the Canadian Labour Congress, for example, he told it that the Russians are staging a "terrifying" trade offensive aimed at undermining the economies of western countries.

This is more apt to give a listener the chills than anything uttered by the leader of the opposition.

Just a few moments ago the Minister of Labour made reference to the present employment situation and claimed that it was much better than it was. I am very pleased and happy to hear about that, but unfortunately his statement does not apply to the city of Fort William. Here I have the figures with respect to unemployment in Fort William. I am quoting from the weekly statistics compiled by the unemployment insurance office of the city of Fort William. On December 5, 1957, there were 2,075 people seeking employment; on December 4, 1958, there were 2,522; on January 2, 1958 there were 2,975 people seeking employment, and on January 21, 1959 there were 3,343; on February 6, 1958 there were 3,297 people seeking employment, and on February 5, 1959 there were 3,836; on March 6, 1958, there were 3,639 people seeking employment, and on March 5, 1959, 3,822; on April 3, 1958 there were 3,727 people seeking employment and on April 2, 1959 there were 3,882; on May 7, 1959 there were 2,619 people seeking employment.

All these figures indicate that so far as the city of Fort William is concerned the employment situation is no better than it was. In fact it keeps getting worse, unfortunately. It is obvious the statistics are not likely to inspire any degree of confidence in the present state of our economy. Therefore, it is imperative that something should be done immediately to lay the foundation for the cure of unemployment.

One of the puzzling paradoxes of our time lies in the fact that while the personal incomes of Canadian workers in 1958 reached the highest figure in their history, averaging an annual income of $3,534, and while farmers, too, enjoyed their biggest earnings on record, with $2.8 billion, an average of 405,000 Canadians were out of work in 1958, while all those billions of dollars were being made and spent. The average still holds at that rate today. Some 24,000 fewer Canadians were employed last year than were employed the year before—5,722,000 against 5,746,000.

The appointment of an advisory board with representatives from labour, industry, agriculture and the universities to help in dealing with the long term problems of production and employment, as advocated by the Liberal party under the leadership of the hon. member for Algoma East, should be considered by this government without delay. A much needed service to the nation would be rendered if action were taken to implement this proposal. I submit that the problem of unemployment transcends any other with which the government is faced. We of the opposition would be delighted to co-operate with the government in any measure designed to bring about a solution to the cancer-like curse of unemployment.

One cannot speak of labour without giving some consideration to that army of workers known as the civil service. These men and women, working silently and efficiently, dedicated for the most part to the service of their country, very much like an army disciplined by an archaic code which deprives them in many instances of a voice to vent their feelings or opinions because of fear that their jobs may be placed in jeopardy, should be granted a new charter. I suggest the Minister of Labour should recommend to his cabinet colleagues that the time has come to place all workers of the civil service below the executive rank on the same footing as workers who are employed in industry, and that they be given the same bargaining rights as any other group.

There should also be a study made to determine whether or not there are infringements on labour rights to organize in Canada. I believe that a clear-cut policy by the government on the rights of labour and management should be made plain for all to understand, in order to avoid unnecessary labour disputes.

I have received letters from my own constituency reflecting dissatisfaction within the staff of the Post Office Department. The information I have is that their shift work is placed on a seven-day week. One letter disclosed that grievances which were taken up with the district director of postal services were not taken care of and that in consequence, the morale of the employees has suffered considerably.

Perhaps the minister would use his good offices in order to have an investigation made of the situation in the post office in Fort William.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, at the hour of adjournment I was indicating that the labour relations in the Fort William post office are not what they should be. I, therefore, would ask the minister to have an investigation made and if there is something wrong at that point I am sure there must be other places with similar complaints. It must be borne in mind here that the average civil servant will not complain for fear of discrimination.

I appeal to the minister to consider giving all our civil service employees a new charter in which there should be an outline of the rights of an individual to join any organization or political party of his choice. While this government claims that it does not favour patronage, it has been guilty of causing honest working men to be fired from their jobs because of political leanings or affiliations.

The charge has been made on more than one occasion that the Liberal government when in power were far more patronage-conscious than the present government. Be that as it may, I for one would not make a single excuse for any government using their power to fire a person because of political affiliations. I look upon such an act as one of the most despicable outrages that anyone could commit, regardless of political stripe.

There is one particular question which I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour and that is the premises occupied at the present time by the unemployment insurance commission at 123 north May street in Fort William. It is the former post office building, erected in 1904. The unemployment insurance commission has been occupying the premises since August, 1946. Since that time the steady growth and development of Fort William and the surrounding area find the premises occupied at the present time totally inadequate as to space, and unsuited structurally for handling the heavy volume of traffic peculiar to the unemployment insurance commission. The foreseeable space required for the next 10 years by the unemployment insurance commission office is 14 to 16 thousand square feet. The present 5,800 square feet reveal the lack of adequate working facilities, the congested conditions, which clearly indicate the present need for new premises as soon as possible.

The site occupied at the present time by the armouries, a federal government building, at 323 north Archibald street, would provide ample space for a new building to house the unemployment insurance commission office staff. The armouries building has been condemned and is to be torn down. Crown Assets Corporation has advertised for offers for the demolition and removal of the building from the site. The property belongs to the federal government and all that remains to be done is for the Department of Public Works to inspect the site and the unemployment insurance commission to approve the plans. This project should not present any difficulty to the government, financially or otherwise. I express the sincere hope that the minister will look upon the project with favour, as the present accommodation and facilities are totally inadequate. All one has to do to be convinced of the necessity of a new building is to go by on north May street, next to the premises of the Fort William Times Journal, to see long double queues of unemployed people lined up on the sidewalk waiting for something to come. Perhaps the minister may indicate that a new building is under consideration.

Finally, I submit that the greatest problem facing this government is the problem of checking rising costs and prices by creating more jobs and by producing more.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is true that we live in a country where winter unemployment has been traditional. I come from a province where there is probably on the average more winter unemployment than is experienced in any of the other nine provinces of Canada. I suppose generally we give the excuse that winter unemployment is a matter of winter weather; but perhaps over the last four or five years we have come to realize that winter unemployment is not altogether a matter of winter weather in Canada. It may now be a matter of our thinking and it also may be a matter of habit.

In my own province of Newfoundland winter unemployment is a situation that we have had for many, many years. It is true it is largely due to winter weather but it is also largely due to the type of economy which we have, a type of economy which has been partly accepted by us and partly imposed on us. I suppose another reason why we do have more winter unemployment across Canada is the fact that many of our primary industries are outdoor industries.

But I believe that the time is at hand when winter unemployment will be reduced a good deal. Our secondary industries will catch up with the outdoor primary industries and there will also be a change in our thinking due to the fact that more people are becoming concerned as to the ill effects of unemployment during the winter months. I believe that the winter unemployment we have in this country can be reduced a great deal by concerted attack on the problem not only by the federal government but by provincial governments, municipal governments, employers, all those who are directly and indirectly concerned and all those who feel that for every man day that is lost in Canada some part of the country must suffer.

We have examples of how winter unemployment can be reduced. Take the construction industry which normally composes between 7 and 10 per cent of all industry in Canada. Yet its contribution to winter unemployment in years gone by has been much greater than those figures. Nonetheless over the last two or three years we have begun to see that by the use of different methods winter unemployment even in this segment of our economy can be reduced. Today jobs are being carried on in the winter time. Concrete is poured in zero weather and construction is carried on under cover with the result that the construction industry today is not hampered by winter weather as it used to be years ago. A very good example is the paint industry. In years gone by the paint and painting industry did most of its work in the spring and summer with very little during the winter months. But lately we have seen a larger percentage of employment in this industry during the winter months. Various methods have been introduced by which winter unemployment can be reduced.

But I say again that it is not altogether a matter for the federal government. It is a matter for the provincial governments also and everybody else interested in seeing that every man in this country is employed for as long as it is possible for him to be employed. All phases of the economy must co-operate if we are to reduce winter unemployment to the level to which I believe it can be reduced.

During the past winter and in other years gone by the unemployment insurance commission endeavoured to set up committees all across the country to devise methods to decrease winter unemployment. In my own area a committee was set up under the manager of the unemployment insurance commission and I know that a great deal of effective work has been done. At this time I should like to extend to him, the members of his committee and the staff hearty congratulations for the work they have done under most difficult circumstances. I believe that with the encouragement of the federal Department of Labour they can continue their work and produce better results in the years that lie ahead.

In the field of labour the past year has been a most difficult one for my brother Newfoundlanders. The fishery has brought in far less returns to the fishermen than is the case in an average year. There is far less employment in the pulp and paper industry with the result that many men living along the coast of Newfoundland have not had the employment possibilities that have been open to them in years gone by. We have not been able to take advantage of the winter works program in the same way that many other provinces have for the simple reason that we do not have the same municipal set-up that is found in the other nine provinces of Canada. The 50-50 deal, for example, imposes some hardship on municipalities that even in the summer months have not sufficient money to be able to do the work that needs to be done. Under the regulations of the present winter employment program our municipalities are far less able to take advantage of the offer of the federal government.

The Department of Labour, of course, has agreements not only with municipalities but also with unorganized areas through the provincial governments. There are many places in Newfoundland where I think it would be very difficult to organize any winter works program and I suggest to the Minister of Labour that possibly it would be much more effective to endeavour to get what works can be started under way as early in the spring as possible. That is not only true in the case of federal works but all other types of works that are carried on.

Last year when we were considering suggestions for a winter works program I thought that one winter works program which could have been undertaken on the west coast of Newfoundland was the improvement of Canadian National telegraphs service in that section of the province. If improvements had been decided upon a good deal of winter employment could have been given to loggers who would have been able to cut the necessary poles and at this time of the year considerable employment could have been given by Canadian National telegraphs in constructing a line down the west coast of Newfoundland in an area where communications are worse now than they have been at any time in the last 30 years. There was a time when communications existed all down that coast but over the years of the depression and the years of commission government the service was allowed to drop. It is necessary now to restore it and I believe that a winter works program could well be provided in this area by agreement between the Minister of Labour and Canadian National telegraphs to cut the necessary poles during the winter months and then later in the year have the line rebuilt along that section of the coast.

I say again that in those places where it is not possible to carry on a regular program of winter works it might be a very good thing indeed if those works that are to be started could be commenced very early in the year. I am going to give two examples. I cannot say that I am giving them merely as examples and am not complaining because in actual fact I am complaining to a certain extent. Last year public works began to build a harbour at Codroy on the west coast of Newfoundland and during the latter months of the year a good deal of work was done. When winter came the work was stopped. Even though we have had pretty fair weather in that section of Newfoundland for the last four weeks there has been no sign to date that the work will be resumed on this project. I believe this is a fairly good example of what could be done if work that is to be carried on during the year could be started as early as possible.

I give another example and while I am using it as an illustration I am also complaining. The Minister of Fisheries, who has been very kind in his efforts to attack our problems in Newfoundland and has always given a sympathetic hearing to our suggestions was able to have a portable bait depot sent to Norris Point in Bonne bay last year. The bait depot has been there since last fall. The fishermen are now ready to take up the lobster fishery after a long hard winter when they had very little income. Yet, they are not able to take advantage of the lobster fishery at this particular time because they are still hampered by a lack of bait. While this particular bait depot has been there for nearly six months now, it is still not in operation. I hope that it will be very shortly.

I say again that this has been a very difficult winter in Newfoundland. Although the latest figures on unemployment are beginning to go down, and I am grateful to be able to say that, in my area at the moment there are 6,132 unemployed, and that is a reduction of about 600 from a week earlier. Nevertheless, we do have a large percentage of the population of Newfoundland on relief. During the whole of the month of March the number of heads of families unemployed amounted to 7,018, representing a total of 37,321 persons. When one realizes that the population of Newfoundland is 420,000, one recognizes that 37,000 is a large percentage of that population to be on relief. Of this number who are on relief, 6,078 are employable, that is the number of employable heads of families, representing 34,359 people.

During the debates on unemployment and employment that we have had in the last months one or two references have been made to election promises made by members of this government as they went across the country during the campaigns of 1957 and 1958. When the Prime Minister was at Brantford on February 7, 1958, he said this:

> The humblest of our people will not be forgotten. The people who are unemployed will not be in the false position of being put on relief.

Yet here, even in the middle of the fifth month of the year, we still have almost 10 per cent of the people of Newfoundland on relief.

May I pass on now, Mr. Chairman, to one or two other points which I should like to make. I should like to mention very briefly vocational training and training for the unemployed. I believe that these two services provided by the federal government, by agreement with the provincial governments, are at this time particularly important. We have seen in the newspapers during the last few weeks numerous references to the relationship which exists between the level of education and the rate of unemployment. This is a task not only for the federal government, but for the provincial governments, for education officials and for all employees.

I suggest we do live in an age of automation, an age when greater demands are being made for trained personnel. I suppose it is true, too, that automation does produce temporarily a certain percentage of unemployment. But I think in the long run it does produce more jobs for those who are qualified to take them. I would suggest, therefore, not only to this government but also to the officials in my own province, that more attention be paid to the program of vocational training and to training of the unemployed.

We live here in Canada in a country which has many natural resources, and the greatest will be its people, particularly the young people. The population in Canada has one-third of its total composed of people less than 20 years of age. All these young people can make a great contribution to the future of Canada if they are properly trained to take part in those things which they are equipped to do.

I was glad to hear the minister refer to the older worker. I believe that here we have a very serious problem facing this country, when a man or woman at the age of 40 can be debarred from certain classes of work and referred to as an older worker. I was pleased to hear the minister say he was going to give some attention to this problem. I would suggest to him he not only give attention to the older worker of 40 years of age, but also to the older worker in his sixties. We are living in a land where the span of life has been lengthened. I am sure that many people who are considered older workers at 40 years of age or who are discharged from their jobs at 65 years of age still have contributions to make in some fields.

May I refer to unemployment insurance again? I bring up a pet problem of mine. It is not one that involves a large number of people, but I think it is grossly unjust. During the past winter of 1958-59 and also the winter of 1957-58 I did have a number of young men in my constituency who were not able to find work in the fishing industry or the lumbering industry. They were living in small settlements where there was absolutely nothing to do, so they decided that for two or three of the winter months they would go back to school and attempt to improve their standing in English, arithmetic and perhaps history and geography. They were not taking the whole course that was given at the local school, but just taking those subjects that would be of help to them. I thought it was a very commendable thing for young men past school age to do. There was nothing else left for them to do, except sit at home and draw their unemployment insurance. If they went back to school to improve their educational standing, I thought it would be a sound thing to do. However, the moment they entered the school door their unemployment insurance benefits were cut off. I believe that this is eminently unfair, and I would present this problem to the Minister of Labour, not as a problem which involves a large number of people but as one that is very serious from the standpoint of justice. I hope that on some future occasion he will be able to give some attention to a problem which, after all, is serious for those people concerned.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that during the coming months, and before too long, the Minister of Labour will be making plans for his unemployment program for the coming winter. I hope that the plans will be made far ahead of time and they will be as effective as possible in reducing the number of men who are unemployed in the wintertime, many of whom have been unemployed for a large part of the year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, as it was not possible under the rules of this house as interpreted by the Speaker yesterday and today to deal with one of the matters relating to the debate which preceded this one, at this particular moment when we are dealing with the estimates of the Department of Labour we are forced, indeed we have a duty to refer to a matter which we on this side of the house regard as a one of importance. I refer to the failure of the government and the Minister of Labour to table in this house a report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission relating to the unemployment insurance fund.

In his speech today the minister sought to indicate that what he had done was no different from what had been done on four other occasions by his immediate predecessor. He referred us to a number of reports of the advisory committee which were tabled by him during the course of his speech. I had an opportunity of looking over these four reports of the unemployment insurance advisory committee during the dinner recess. From examining these four reports I think it is clear that these were reports of the committee that do not cover matters that come under sections 89 and 90 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. These were reports that had nothing whatsoever to do with the fund, certainly with the fund in the context of sections 89 and 90. Any hon. member who wishes to take the trouble to peruse these reports will find confirmation of what I have said.

The situation is briefly this. A report was made by the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission on August 18, 1958. That report was tabled in this house. That report dealt with matters having to do with the fund and the perilous position in which that fund seemed to be, in the judgment of the advisory committee. In so far as this particular report is concerned, the act was fully complied with. Section 89 is explicit on this point and it bears repetition in this particular in this new debate. Section 89, subsection (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act reads as follows:

> 89. (1) Within four months after the end of each fiscal year the advisory committee shall make a report to the governor in council on the financial condition of the fund as of the end of that fiscal year and shall also make a report to the governor in council on the financial condition of the fund whenever the advisory committee considers that the fund is or is likely to become, and is likely to continue to be, insufficient to discharge its liabilities, and may make a report on the financial condition of the fund at such other times as the advisory committee may think fit.

As I say, this report was tabled in accordance with the act. The other day I asked the Minister of Labour if there was another report of the advisory committee. I gave notice of my intention to ask that question and on the orders of the day the minister indicated that he had not had time to prepare the reply to my question of which, as I say, notice had been given. I readily understand that the minister who is a busy man could justifiably and readily offer that reason for not having a reply ready at the time. After all, the minister is a man with great preoccupations and responsibilities. But later in the day, after I pressed him again or interrogated him again during the course of his speech during that afternoon, when he was explaining the principles of the amendments which he proposed to the Unemployment Insurance Act, he indicated that there had been a second report. He explained, however, that it was a report of a different category from the one to which I have just made reference; that it was a report that he himself had initiated; that he had asked the advisory committee to look into certain matters previously covered in their report of August 18. That report, however, he insisted was not a report of the same kind as the report which required tabling. During the course of the debate we endeavoured to pursue this matter but, as I said, under the interpretation of the rules by the Speaker we were precluded from so doing. It is now our duty to proceed further in connection with this matter.

There can be no doubt about the statutory obligation. I call the attention of the committee to section 90, subsection (2) which reads as follows:

> (2) The minister shall lay every report made under section 89 before parliament within thirty days after it was submitted to the governor in council, or if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first thirty days thereafter that parliament is sitting.

Mr. Starr: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Starr: May I ask whether the report to which he refers was addressed to the governor in council?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. I am going to deal with that point. My hon. friend asked me whether the report about which I am now registering a complaint was addressed to the governor in council. My answer is no. It was addressed to the minister. I will comment on that point in a moment. The significance, Mr. Chairman, of this subsection (2) of section 90 is that if the report of the advisory committee has to do with a matter that comes within the purview of section 89 (1), then there is an obligation on the minister to table that report within 30 days after it was submitted or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder whether I may ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will he read subsection (1) of section 90?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. I shall be glad to do so. Subsection (1) of section 90 reads as follows:

(1) The advisory committee shall give such public notice as it considers sufficient of its intention to make a report under section 89 and shall receive any representations that may be made to it with respect thereto.

That section, of course, would apply to certain situations but no situation that is now before us, as my learned and hon. friend, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne), with his great knowledge of the interpretation of statutes, must fully understand.

The question that I think confronts us at this time is whether or not this particular report of the advisory committee is the kind of report that comes within section 89, subsection (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Does it refer to the fund? From the earlier comments in this report it is clear that it does refer to the fund because after referring to the balance in the fund which it puts at $234 million roughly or, to be specific, $234,283,645.05, it then goes on to say this:

The excess of payments, over revenue, pursuades the committee it would be improper to recommend major changes at this time. That is changes which would very materially increase the deficit;—

The deficit of the fund. These last words are mine.

—or in the alternative would necessitate a tax on industry and workers.

This clearly is a report that had to do with matters covered under section 89 (1).

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Starr: Was not the status of the fund reported in the statutory report that was referred to the governor in council in August, the official report tabled in the House of Commons? Did it not deal briefly with the state of the fund, and in this case does it not say that because of that situation—these matters that had been referred to it—amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would not be advisable?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not quarrel with my hon. friend's statement because he has correctly stated the situation. The report of August 18 does cover the matters to which he has just referred. What I am now saying is that this report deals with the fund and at the end of the report, as we were reminded the other day, three of the labour members of the advisory committee, namely Messrs. Burt, Andras and Marchand wired to the chairman as follows:

Reur proposed report dated August 20 of unemployment insurance advisory committee regret do not find it possible to attach signature. Feel committee should be reconvened to review benefit formula proposal of July 24 possibly in October with view to modification or in light of further study by actuary.

Feel also committee should withhold comments until minister has notified it of intentions regarding recommendations contained in our report dated July 18.

Mr. Marchand wired to the same effect; Mr. McLean, the other labour member, was absent. Now it is clear that this report does deal with the fund. The committee did not feel they could make proposals or accept proposals because of the deficit position of the fund.

Mr. Starr: May I ask another question if the hon. member would permit? Is there not a reference directed particularly to the new formula?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Starr: And that the formula is not an amendment to the act at all? Therefore there is no need to go further.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There may not be any need to go further. All I am saying is that the report deals with the state of the fund, and under the act, where a report of the advisory committee deals with the state of the fund there is an obligation to table such a report in parliament. Now, the minister seeks to answer this argument by observing that this report is different in form from its predecessor of August 18 in that it is addressed to the "Hon. Michael Starr, Minister of Labour, Ottawa". That is true; it is clearly addressed to the Minister of Labour, as this other report is clearly addressed and properly addressed to his excellency the governor in council. But my contention is that this report, for reasons which I do not know, should have been addressed to the governor in council, because under the Unemployment Insurance Act the advisory committee must report through the minister to the governor in council. That is clear from section 91 of the act.

But lest there be any doubt about the character of the report about which I make complaint, all one has to do, as the Leader of the Opposition indicated this afternoon, is to refer to the title at the head of this report, "Status of the Fund". Can there be any doubt that this particular document which instead of being addressed to the governor in council is improperly addressed to the minister, does come within the provisions of sections 89 and 90?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member another question, if he would be kind enough to express his opinion on the matter. Is there not only the reference to the status of the fund on which the report has been made because of the new formula which I have asked him to study, but also an indication whether the committee thinks the formula should or should not be accepted?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. The very words of the minister indicate that what I have said is valid. The minister himself refers to the governing phrase, "the state of the fund". My argument is that once the advisory committee reports on the state of the fund in any way, that report under the statute must be tabled in parliament just as any other report which requires tabling by authority of the statute.

The minister made something of the fact that the report is addressed to him and not to the governor in council. I would refer the minister and the house to section 91 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, in particular subsection (1), where it says:

(1) Whenever the governor in council, after consultation with the commission, considers it expedient to do so, he may direct the advisory committee to investigate and to report upon,

(a) the provision of unemployment insurance for any excepted employments, either by extending thereto the provisions of part III, with such modifications, if any, as may be found necessary, or by special or supplementary schemes, and

(b) the rates of contribution and benefit of insured persons having regard to the earnings of such persons.

Then subsection (2) reads:

(2) The commission—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Not the minister, but the commission—

—may from time to time refer to the advisory committee for consideration and advice such matters relating to this act as the commission thinks fit.

I say that under this act the minister as such has no authority to refer matters to the advisory committee. Matters of such kind can only be referred by the governor in council. This is for a very good reason. Parliament intended that the administration of unemployment insurance should come under the governor in council and that the minister should report on the operations of the commission to parliament and to his colleagues, just as the Secretary of State does with regard to the civil service.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit another question at this point? Is the hon. member conveying to me the fact that my predecessor did not correctly conduct himself in this respect on similar matters?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not aware that my hon. friend's predecessor carried on his administration improperly. My hon. friend may know of instances. I would not be surprised if—

Mr. Starr: I tabled reports this afternoon addressed to him from the advisory committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What my hon. friend did not do when he tabled those reports, and what he has not done tonight, is to listen correctly to what I have said. I said that those reports which he tabled today were of a different category from the report of August 26. That report had to do with the fund. Those reports had no comment to make on the fund and consequently did not require to be tabled. That is the difference.

Mr. Starr: The report addressed to me was a new formula which meant an amendment should be made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would suggest to my hon. friend who has before him his deputy minister of labour, a lawyer, that when this night session is over both ought to get together.

Mr. Starr: He agrees with me now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But obviously he is not giving you at the moment the kind of advice which I think his great legal training should warrant. Now section 92 provides:

The governor in council may direct the commission to investigate and report upon all questions that the governor in council deems advisable or necessary.

Throughout this section there is no reference whatsoever to the minister. Throughout this act the reference is to the governor in council.

If the minister assigned a particular responsibility to the advisory committee, I am not going to quarrel with that except to say that the report is not the kind of report envisaged by these sections, and if it reports on the fund it must be addressed to the governor in council. Consequently under the statute that I have just referred to it must be tabled in this house.

Hon. members who are new to this house may wonder why we in the opposition place such emphasis on this matter. We do so for two reasons. First, because it is our duty to point out if, in our judgment, an act has not been fully complied with by the government. Not that we charge the minister with any criminal act, as was suggested the other night; that is not the intention. Everyone knows that the Minister of Labour did not for any sinister purpose fail to comply with the act. That is not the point. But if under our system of government we are to adhere to its principles, we must as the opposition take every opportunity to see that the law is fully observed.

That was done in this house in 1949, and those of us in this group and other members who were here at that time will well remember when we had a protracted debate in this house centered on an allegation made by the present Prime Minister, as well as by the present Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, that the minister of justice of that time had not tabled a report pursuant to the obligations imposed on him under the Combines Investigation Act. They pointed out that the then minister of justice had failed to comply with the statute. We had endless days of debate and we had placed on Hansard words that undoubtedly have much to do with the inspiration which has persuaded the present Prime Minister to introduce in this house a bill of rights, which ultimately I understand is to come, a bill which has been so widely criticized because of its inadequacies and its failure to take into account the obligations of the provinces, and to recognize the constitutional difficulties involved in the bill of rights as a result. What does it mean? I will paraphrase the words of the Prime Minister. This means something that is fundamental to the preservation of this free parliament. These are the words of the Prime Minister.

Let us see what the Prime Minister had to say about this. Oh, it is all right for the Prime Minister to rise today and give us a lecture and tell us it was his duty to point out to us that we had no right to persist in debate. He acted as the custodian of the rights and privileges of this house, but he forgot to remind us that when he was sitting on this side there was no one more persistent, day in and day out, in reminding us of our obligations as members of parliament to live up to the letter of the law. On the occasion I refer to he was criticizing the minister of justice because he had not tabled a report; because, seemingly, he had violated the act. No one was saying, as the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, was fair enough to point out, that there was any dishonest intention on the part of the minister of justice any more than anyone is suggesting to the Minister of Labour that he had acted dishonestly. Anyone who knows the Minister of Labour knows that all we are doing is simply to point out that in our judgment the act has not been observed by him.

I think it would be useful to note, for the benefit of posterity and of those hon. members who have come to this parliament for the first time, these words of the Prime Minister, these memorable words, as the right hon. gentleman said referring to some words of mine in another context the other day.

Mr. Montgomery: I think it will be well for the hon. member to read the law which required a report to be made by the minister of justice before he gives us the quotation, because I am satisfied that the reports are different, and therefore the two cases are not on the same footing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman is quite right. The law is different, because different matters are involved. But after I have finished my statement, the hon. member can get up and express his opinion. What I am doing is putting on record the words of the Prime Minister and some other hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman, who is a good lawyer, can assign himself that particular function which time will not permit me to discharge at this moment. Here are the words of the Prime Minister as reported at page 1504 of Hansard of November 7, 1949:

> Parliament has the right to expect that ministers of the crown shall live up to the provisions of statutes passed by parliament; for if these be not lived up to, parliamentary responsibility ends, and a contempt of parliament occurs which should not be permitted to pass uncensured.
> The minister stated that the facts and conclusions in this report were, in his opinion, unjustified. That statement does not answer or justify the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) failing to discharge his obligatory responsibilities under the provisions of an act passed by parliament. Only three years ago in this house I was one of those who stated that in my opinion—and I know there were some who criticized me for this view—we should alter the provision with regard to publishing these reports in order that no one should be found guilty before the bar of public opinion without having the opportunity of answering in the courts.

Then Mr. Coldwell, then leader of the Co-Operative Commonwealth Federation, said at page 1508:

I do not propose to cover the same ground as that which has been so ably covered by the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is now the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister, who proposes, shortly, to introduce a bill of rights. Mr. Coldwell continued:

I merely want to say that I agree with him wholeheartedly when he says that no government, no minister, has any right at any time to disregard a statute adopted by parliament, and the provision in that statute for the publication of a report within 15 days for the information of the people of Canada.

Then, many days later—almost two months later—the hon. member for Greenwood, now Minister without Portfolio, and a very respected member of this house, reminded us of the words of that great authority on the constitution, Mr. Dicey. And, as reported at page 2065 of Hansard of November 22, 1949 the hon. member for Greenwood, quoting from that authority, pointed out:

With us every official, from the prime minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen.

And then the hon. member spoke some words which, I think, really touch this situation. I am not going to complain about the personal attacks made by the minister today. I am sure that upon reflection he will find that that has not helped his case. Any physical disability which belongs to me or to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate surely has nothing to do with the merits or demerits of this argument.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some members say "oh" but they will remember that the minister so strongly attacked me—

Mr. Starr: You made attacks on me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I made no attacks on you. I simply stated that it was our duty in the opposition to point out things of this sort, and the minister does not do himself any good by considering this as a personal attack upon himself. Our complaint is not of that category.

Here is what the hon. member for Greenwood said:

Let me remind hon. members that in respect of the ordinary citizen the law moves automatically, and it calls for him to account for what he has done. But, so far as I understand the constitution, the only bodies that can move against ministers when they break the law is, first of all, public opinion—and I shall come to that later—and, second, this House of Commons, which rejoices in the title of the High Court of Parliament.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Yet I suggest that in spite of all, in spite of the wise things that have been said here, the public of this country has not yet registered what has happened.

And the hon. member for Greenwood continued:

I said a moment ago it is hard to believe that men whom we like—

And that applies to the Minister of Labour

—and meet happily—

And that applies to the Minister of Labour

—and who have much good to their credit—

And that certainly applies to the Minister of Labour

—could do this wrong thing. And it may be that in some curious way they did not quite intend to do what was wrong.

I certainly believe that of the Minister of Labour. But what I am pointing out is that the failure to place this report on the table has deprived the public and parliament of the opportunity to be fully seized of the considered opinion of the advisory committee whose business it has been for some years to advise on these matters.

But the hon. member for Prince Albert, now Prime Minister, did not stop at one single speech. He came back to this matter, and I find that on November 22, 1949 he went on to complain once more about the failure of the minister of justice. He said, as reported at page 2091:

It was fairly obvious—and as I listened to him I sympathized with him—

He was referring to the minister of justice

—that he realized what he had done was unjustifiable, inexcusable and a contravention of principles going back to the Bill of Rights, which declared among other things that no government or executive can suspend the law of the realm in any particular without parliament.

What the Prime Minister said that day certainly applies today.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Starr: Could the hon. member be allowed to continue?

Some hon. Members: By consent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman has intervened. I do not want to ask that right—I think I have that right now.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should to say that I completely agree with what the hon. member for Essex East has said up to now—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The minister has asked whether the committee would give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Essex East continuing. First, I should like to ask whether the committee is willing to do that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the committee. I will not take very long. I just want to complete those memorable words of the Prime Minister. He said at page 2092 of Hansard of November 22, 1949, in concluding his argument after a speech that lasted I suppose the usual time permitted under our rules:

> That is no justification. Indeed, if anyone in this country had known during the 10 months' period that the minister had broken the law, as he did, His Majesty's courts could have been applied to in order to protect His Majesty's subjects, under a writ of mandamus, which would direct the minister to live up to the law. He concealed the report, and one explanation is this: we did not agree with the terms of the report. Is there anything in section 27 of the act that gives the government discretion to say they may break the law because they do not agree with the terms of a report; that they may break the law because after consideration, even honest consideration, they feel it should be broken? If that be an excuse for breaking the law, how many people in this country would feel like breaking the income tax law, or any other laws passed by parliament? Expediency, or the desire to prevent argument between high civil servants, afford no excuse in extenuation or otherwise for what has taken place in connection with this report.

I say to the minister, even assuming for purposes of argument that he was correct in saying that the four reports tabled today by him and addressed to his predecessor came under section 89 of the act, that would not justify or provide him with a satisfactory reply to the allegation and to the arguments that we have made in this context regarding this matter. However, I have indicated that these four reports do not refer to the state of the fund, and consequently do not come under section 89, or under section 90 (2). Therefore, I say to the Minister of Labour that if the advisory committee, when it is properly constituted once again, when the labour representatives are returned to their function, if they are going to be or if new ones are going to be appointed—the committee is not now legally in existence under section 19 (1) of the act—do make a report with regard to the state of the fund in any way the minister, I know, will not hesitate to table that report so that parliament will have the benefit of the judgment of the members of the committee and so that we can make an assessment as to whether or not the recommendations of the committee are satisfactory.

How valuable it would be to have had the report tabled on August 18 last and to have known that the committee felt that because of the perilous condition in which the fund was it was thought that the contribution of the federal government should be increased. That is in conformity with the stand that we have taken with regard to this measure, a measure which will go to a committee where we hope it will be possible to improve the bill and to remove some of the burden on the employers and on the employees which we feel has been imposed upon them unjustly.

The minister has tabled not only the four reports but the minutes of some of the meetings. He certainly tabled the minutes of the meetings of July 24 and 25, 1950. It would be of the greatest value certainly to us in this house and to the committee if we had the minutes of the meeting of August 18, so we could find out whether or not the advisory committee detailed the reasons for the statements it made when it observed that there should be an increase in the federal contribution so that there could be an adjustment and so that the contributions from each of the contributing parties would be made equal; in other words, that the contribution from the government would be made equal to one-half that of the combined contributions from employers and employees.

I simply have this further observation to make, Mr. Chairman. The way to preserve the rights of parliament is not by a bill that does not take into account the constitutional responsibilities of other levels of government in Canada. It does not consist in general statements declaratory of one's belief in the freedom of the subject. The way to guarantee civil liberties and the rights of parliament—and these words I address particularly to the Prime Minister—is by seeing to it that the law of the land is observed by everyone.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the main reason why I want to make remarks on this particular estimate has to do with something that has been debated very much in the last while, namely the unemployment insurance commission. The aspect that I wanted to touch on is one which I do not think anyone has been after as yet. In effect, it is a request to the minister or to the department to consider the possibility of getting some outside agency—perhaps one of the groups that is making efficiency studies—to come in and look at the unemployment insurance commission operation, to see how the operation would stand up to the general accusation that I think every member of parliament hears, namely that there is a great deal of abuse of this particular welfare arrangement.

I should like to make it very clear that I do not believe there are very many abuses, but these are the stories that are tending to be exaggerated at all times. I do believe that when you get a situation where there is largely false propaganda being made about the operation of a fund such as this, the thing to do is to scotch it wherever possible. I notice that from representatives of management I get representations that the unemployment insurance idea is fine but there are very many abuses in relation to it; there are all sorts of people taking advantage of the fund who should not take advantage of it and we must wipe out those abuses. I think every once in a while it is important that the commission and those people who guide and administer it should tackle this particular problem which to a degree is one of public relations. I think the time has come to do that.

I notice that in my constituency during the past winter up to 25 per cent of the labour force was registered for unemployment insurance benefits. In the neighbouring constituency of Fort William, which is linked to it, the rate was not quite as high but almost as high. At the same time in my constituency I heard so often from people who are unemployed that there were a great many abuses. All my contacts with the unemployment insurance commission officials and with labour representatives in the area indicate that there would be a denial of this; but there is in existence this popular conception, or misconception, and I think it is one of the responsibilities of the minister, if he feels the fund and the whole concept are as worth while as he expressed in ringing tones this afternoon, to do the job. It is largely his responsibility to see that this type of false propaganda is scotched, if it is false propaganda, as I believe it is.

One of the other brief remarks I wanted to make about this particular department has to do with the Canada labour relations board. I am probably one of the few members of parliament who has ever been at a hearing of that board in any capacity, and I was not impressed with what went on there. It seemed to me that the proceedings were perhaps rather more informal than I think should be the case with such a body. I happened to appear before the board with a group making a representation which was turned down. The reasons for it being turned down were probably quite valid. I have no quarrel with them. But the mood or atmosphere of the hearing was something that I think would be considered by many people to be regrettable. When you have the kind of hearing where first names are being tossed back and forth between the members of the board who are judging the matter and people who are there with an interest in the case one cannot help but have the feeling that the person who is not on a first-name basis is on the outside and in a difficult position.

This is a minor complaint. I only saw one example of the workings of the board but as the minister has a direct relationship with the board I feel it is something that he might take into consideration. I would not want to suggest that the proceedings should be made a great deal more formal so that they would be like a court of law with all its formalities but if my experience is typical I suggest that there could be room for some of the people who appear before the board to feel that they are pretty well on the outside if they do not happen to know the members of the board on a first-name basis.

One other point I wish to make in connection with the department has to do with the question of annuities. As I think all members know, I brought up in the house not too long ago the subject of increased recompense for members of parliament. Since then I have had a number of communications and this particular one brings up a point in connection with annuities that I think is fairly valid. The letter is from Mr. J. F. Brister of 2323 Inglewood avenue, West Vancouver, B.C. The first part of the letter is nothing more than a condemnation of members of parliament who would go after more pay when old age pensioners and people like that are having a difficult time. This is not the place to answer that but he does go on to deal with the falsity of the whole government annuities approach as a result of inflation. He says in his letter:

> I am bringing this matter to your notice because this matter of Canadian government annuities is one which simply screams for some sort of justice to be done on behalf of those who have been so hard hit due to having placed their faith in these government annuities and tried to provide for their own welfare in their old age.—
> Regarding government annuities, the attached outlines some of the incentives and assurances which were embodied in an official brochure entitled "Canadian Government Annuities—Backed by the Whole Resources of the Dominion." From cover to cover this brochure extolled the great advantages and the security which would accrue to those who placed their trust in these annuities.
> I suggest to you that it is the solemn duty of any government to honour the obligations which are clearly outlined in this official brochure and that justice in the most elementary sense demands that at least some of the enormous increase in government income should long ago have been channelled back to those unfortunates who placed their good dollars and their trust in these annuities.

The next paragraph may interest the minister.

> I wish to make it clear that the responsibility for the plight of government annuitants today lies squarely on the shoulders of the late Liberal government who permitted inflation to creep upon them while as a government no action was taken to arrest or offset the dangers which were gaining momentum with the passing of time but I repeat no action was taken. The onus to correct a grave injustice does fall upon all succeeding governments.

In conclusion and with regard to the present plight of government annuitants it will be noted as per attached that it is stated:

"In offering you now the benefits which Canadian government annuities provide, the government does so with one purpose in mind, that of making it possible for all within the borders of Canada to spend their old age in comfort and ease, a fitting and well-earned reward for an industrious life. This assures you a safe and profitable investment . . . with the certainty of a definite livable income when your working days are over."

The maximum permitted under the Annuities Act is $1,200 per annum.

Obviously there are difficulties in this particular regard. This gentleman is suggesting that people who put good dollars into annuities that have depreciated very much in value have in a sense been "suckered" by the overoptimistic advertising of the annuities scheme. It seems to me that the other point he is making is that the maximum of $1,200 for an annuity is nonsensical in the light of inflation and what has happened to the dollar. All I can suggest is that we should have a statement from the minister when we get to the annuities branch as to the views of the government on what has happened to these long time holders or builders-up of government annuities and, on the other hand, what is the government doing about acceding to the request of many people that the level of government annuities be raised above $1,200.

I know that the charge I have heard repeatedly is that the insurance company lobby is so powerful that the government is frightened to go ahead and raise the ceiling. I should like a yes or no or an explanation of that particular charge. I do not make it from my own knowledge. I am just repeating something I have seen in labour publications.

The final point I want to touch on is a personal one. It has to do with criticisms that have been made in the debate about one of the executive vice-presidents of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Stanley Knowles. He has been referred to by the young member for Hamilton South as a political hatchetman and the hon. member for Winnipeg North had some very derogatory things to say about Mr. Knowles. It is not my position to state that Mr. Knowles is not open to attack. It is not my position to defend whatever he may be doing in his particular post, but I should like to remind the members who accuse him in such derogatory terms that for many years he was a member of this house, a member whose conduct and integrity were of such a standard that he was offered, we gather, the most senior and honourable post in this house. I should like to say to those who have made these vicious criticisms of this particular gentleman that his conduct throughout the time he was in the house, in terms of probity, integrity and fair dealing, should have been good enough to protect him from this worst kind of invective that he seems to gather in another post.

Mr. Martel: Why don't you resign and give him your seat?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. gentleman suggests that I resign and give him my seat. Quite frankly, Mr. Knowles could not take my seat simply because he could not get enough votes there. Several times in debate the remark has been made, "Come and run in my constituency." I believe some of the members on the far side made this challenge. That is one of the most nonsensical challenges that can be made. I think most members in the house should be aware that in a particular constituency where you have local situations outsiders have a very difficult time. That is a most ridiculous suggestion by the hon. member.

In summing up this particular point, I repeat that hon. members should examine the record of Mr. Knowles for probity and integrity, a record that was recognized by the Prime Minister, and I think it is unfortunate that he should now become sort of a whipping boy for some of the members of the government party who seem to feel that his actions are really remiss or poor or bad.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat? Is the hon. member suggesting in his remarks that a gentleman who has been a member of this house, and who then moves into another area of political activity, is immune from criticism?

Mr. Fisher: No, nonsense; I did not say that. I do not care what remarks are made about Mr. Knowles. I am just suggesting that the members who make them should consider this point about his activities before they paint him too black. He had a very fine record in the House of Commons to put against this, and I am not saying that he should not be criticized. There is just this one point to keep in mind.

The Chairman: I must remind hon. members that we are talking about labour legislation, and not one particular member. Shall item 463 carry?

Mr. Granger: I should like to comment briefly on this item. First of all, I should like to again express my regret that special arrangements were not made last fall to make unemployment insurance benefits available to all fishermen who suffered from the disastrous failure of the cod fishery in Newfoundland last year. I would ask the minister to keep in mind the possibility of making provision to look after such a contingency, if we are unfortunate enough to be faced with it again. The winter works program did not work out so well in Newfoundland. This was simply because the program was not applicable to Newfoundland.

However, there was one aspect of the winter works program which deserves commendation, and I refer to the construction of community stages. From an employment standpoint, this program was limited in its benefits, but from a utility standpoint the idea was sound and worth while. These community stages are needed, and with the loss of fishing property in southern Labrador and northern Newfoundland, the need is greater than it ever was before. A continuation of the program is very desirable. I would suggest to the minister that it is not too early to start to plan for another program to build community stages, the work to be done next fall and the following spring because work in the fall and spring is more important in the part of Newfoundland which I represent than work in the middle of the winter.

There is one type of industry which lends itself to winter work. I refer to the cutting of timber. I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's. The cutting of telephone and telegraph poles for the C.N.T., the cutting of railway ties for the C.N.R. and the cutting of timber for wharves and breakwaters to be constructed by the Department of Public Works could be organized in a way that would give planned employment during the winter. The cutting of this timber could be organized in the vicinity in which the various projects are to be constructed.

There is another matter I should like to mention and that is the question of servicing the more remote areas in Newfoundland by unemployment insurance officials. This has been discussed before, and I was happy to hear a while ago that a program was being organized to supply fieldmen who would travel from outport to outport to assist people with their unemployment insurance problems. These officials could give advice and straighten out these problems at the source. I should like to say this is a fine, forward step, and I presume the program is being implemented as quickly as possible.

[Mr. Granger.]

I should like to make a suggestion whereby I believe the service of existing unemployment insurance offices might be extended. The officials from the centres could, from time to time at set periods visit the nearby places. I have one place in mind which will serve as an illustration, and that is the seaport of Botwood, which is about 20 or 30 miles from Grand Falls. Grand Falls has a permanent unemployment insurance office. Last year the management of a union at Botwood requested that officials from the Grand Falls office spend a day or two in Botwood from time to time, timing their visits to coincide with payday, and thus assist people with their unemployment insurance problems. The union suggested that they would provide an office rent-free, light-free, and so on. Some plan of that nature, I think, would extend the services—

Mr. Starr: I would say to the hon. member that if he would come at his leisure to see me privately, and give me all the details, I would be glad to look into that for him.

Mr. Granger: Thank you very much, sir; I shall be glad to do it.

There is one other point which has to do with employment rather than unemployment. There is a tendency in Newfoundland for those who are living near the large centres of population in which employment offices exist to get preference over those living in the remote areas when there are jobs available. This is only natural because they are on the spot. One way to offset this, I think, would be to keep the names of those who apply for jobs on file longer. I believe, as it stands now, after the names are on file for a while they are declared dormant and the newer applicants get consideration while the older ones are dropped. In view of the distances involved, and the fact that some people looking for work are living in the remote areas where communications are slow, I would suggest that a little special attention be given to these applicants from the distant places so they would get an equal chance.

Not long ago I was talking with an employment official, not connected with the government I hasten to add, who told me that the applicants from nearby were generally considered first because they were more readily available. They could be questioned as to their status, when they could commence work, their qualifications and so on. I imagine the same conditions would apply to employment officials of the Department of Labour. In conclusion, I would ask the minister to consider these few remarks and see that proper consideration is given to those who are handicapped as a result of living some distance away from the employment offices.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions for the minister, about which I should like him to give the committee some information. The first question I should like to ask him is whether he can give the committee an up to date report with reference to the reemployment in other industries of the Avro and Orenda Engine workers who were laid off. I know the minister has received a letter from Mr. D. McAllister, business representative of the aeronautical industrial union, district 717.

Mr. McAllister starts out by drawing to the attention of the minister the fact that many former employees of these two companies are finding considerable difficulty in obtaining alternative employment. He goes on to say it is nearly three months since the hon. member for Peel and the minister predicted most of the skilled employees would be hired by other industries. He observes that such has not been the case because there are still about 8,000 workers who have been unable to find suitable employment. In his opinion, one of the reasons for this is the fact that a number of them are aged 40 or 45. There are a number of reasons given as to why these people are not hired by other industries. Mr. McAllister then suggests the consideration of legislation which would prevent this discrimination or alleviate it and asks the minister's consideration.

I must be fair. At the close of his letter he compliments the minister for assigning an employment officer to the Avro plant and he hopes that the employment officer will be left there until most or all of the 8,000 workers are successfully employed. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to give us an up-to-date report.

Mr. Starr: I received such a letter today. Unfortunately I have left it in my office. Immediately upon receipt of this letter I asked for a report on this situation. I cannot quote accurately from memory but in round figures—and I can assure the hon. member this is fairly close—there were 11,600 registrations when the lay-offs took place. The latest report that I have—and I do not know the exact date of that report—is that there are still 5,900 on the register or rolls in our office. In other words, the others have found employment elsewhere. A little less than 50 per cent are still on the rolls. The number of aplicants for employment taken in the local office on the Avro lay-offs—that was on February 20—was 12,019. A number of placements have been made. Some have found jobs on their own and others have been placed by the national employment service office. As of May 7 there are still registered 5,937 or between 40 per cent and 50 per cent are still left on the rolls. We are not going to relax our efforts on their behalf, I can assure the hon. member.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister have any idea as to how many left Canada for the United States or the United Kingdom?

Mr. Starr: No, there is no record of that number.

Mr. Hellyer: There is another question I should like to raise. I wonder whether the minister can give us a report on the computers which have been installed in the Winnipeg office and as to the effect there as a result of the installation?

Mr. Starr: We had some difficulties. They take care of about one-ninth of the total applicants in Canada, that is, those in the prairie region. We put in this mechanization —I think that is what you are referring to —for processing claims. They look after all the prairie region. That is, all claims must be sent in to the Winnipeg office. Unfortunately, we had a breakdown. There was a period of time when delays occurred in the processing of these claims and of course we had many complaints. However, I am glad to say that this situation has been rectified and we hope that we shall not run into the same problem again.

Mr. Hellyer: Is this system or some variation of it going to be installed in other offices?

Mr. Starr: Yes. We hope in time that we may be able to instal this mechanization in all our regional offices.

Mr. Hellyer: During this period of breakdown to which the minister referred I assume one of the things that went wrong was overpayments, or that type of error.

Mr. Starr: No. It would be delays in paying claims. That was the only complaint we had.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it a fact that the records of the payments are kept in a different office and that the vouchers are prepared by the machine in advance and for this reason, as the vouchers are prepared before the actual report is turned in by the claimant, there were a large number of errors and overpayments?

Mr. Starr: No complaint on the matter of errors has been lodged with me. The only complaints that I have received with respect to this mechanization or the breakdown of the mechanized process was the delay in the processing of claims.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister could tell us how many employees there were in the Winnipeg office before the installation was made and how many there are now?

Mr. Starr: I have not that information now but when we get to the item on unemployment insurance, if the hon. member would be good enough to refer to that question again, I should be glad to get that information for him.

Mr. Hellyer: I should be pleased if the minister would do that. Would he also get supplementary information as to the cost of the computers, stationery and other things involved in the change-over?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief remarks that I should like to make at this time. They are about a subject that has been touched on tonight but I think possibly a little bit more attention could be given to it. This matter was drawn clearly to my attention by an article I noticed in the paper today. It has to do with a situation that occurred in my own riding where three men had been convicted—in one case I believe there were 16 charges—of fraud in collecting unemployment insurance improperly. In fact, I believe they took time off from their work in order to collect their unemployment insurance cheques.

I think this is an extremely important matter. I do not know just how widespread this offence is across the country; but certainly if there were only these three cases, they are far too many. All this offence amounts to is nothing more or less than chiselling. Certainly even the people who a few years ago were extremely opposed to the idea of unemployment insurance and indeed to some other social benefits have come around now to the understanding that they are good and beneficial things for the working people of this country. But situations such as this one certainly give the opponents of unemployment insurance and other social benefits good ammunition with which to carry on their attacks on these social benefits.

There are two ways of dealing with this matter. One is a continuation and possibly an improvement, if possible, of the present method which is, of course, policing these things to the best of our ability. The other one, of course, is the one that is proposed by the opponents to this plan who say that, because this plan is being abused by a few people it should be abolished. We have seen that attitude in respect of this item and many other items of social welfare. It is said that people are going to abuse it, and that it should be abolished because people are just taking advantage of it.

I think we must look a little deeper into the matter in order to find the reasons for these abuses. I think a great deal of the difficulty is because of this theory that is so prevalent in our society, this something for nothing idea. Certainly political parties are not free of guilt of proposing this idea. We are always going to give something for nothing and people are inclined to go along with this idea. Certainly our advertising across the country is to a great extent based on this false statement. We are always giving prizes for this and something else for that, and everybody is led to believe that he is getting something for nothing. There is no such thing in society, and I think the sooner we tell the people this, the better off we are all going to be. In fact, I sometimes think that this is the reason why the party I represent has not been more successful than it has been in this country. One of my colleagues in Timmins told me one time that the reason the C.C.F. has not been more successful is that we appeal to the unselfish side of people whereas the other parties appeal to the selfish side, and that is why they are so successful.

Mr. Hellyer: You are thinking of the self-righteous side of people.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): However, I think that this is something that the minister should take into consideration. I think something could be done through the public relations branch of the department. I think a greater effort should be made to appeal to the basic honesty in people and to make them realize that in chiselling on the unemployment insurance fund and other benefits of that nature they are not only cheating the other people but are in fact jeopardizing the whole plan and defeating the very things that have taken many years to build up to the advantage of the Canadian working people.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I have two questions on two different topics which I would like to put to the minister before this item carries. My first question deals with the community stage program or fishermen's stage program in Newfoundland. This program was put forward as part of a winter works program, and to that extent it involves the Department of Labour. But it is complicated in that it involves not only the Department of Labour and the Department of Fisheries, which makes some recommendation in this matter in connection with these projects, but also the Department of Public Works, which builds these stages.

Due to the fact that three departments are involved here, I do not want to miss an opportunity of getting some information about one aspect of this program which I should like to bring before the house, and it is this. There seem to be two kinds of programs in connection with the community stages, both going on at the same time. I know of two communities about ten miles apart. In one community the stage is being built and the people are being paid by the department for their labour in connection with the building of it. In the other community only a short distance away the same thing is happening but the fishermen have to donate their labour; they are not getting paid for their labour at all.

I do not know to what extent this involves the minister's department, but I think it is something which should be brought to his attention, because if we are going to have a program of community stages, even if it is a winter works program and credit is taken for it as a winter works program, we should have the same treatment for all fishermen. We should not have the position where some donate their labour and some get paid for their labour. I see that the Minister of Public Works is in his seat and he can be sure that when his estimates come before the house I will have some important questions to ask him too; but I would like the Minister of Labour to clarify now to what extent his department is involved in this program, and whether he is at all responsible for this position.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, my department is not involved in this program at all. This program is being worked out in conjunction with the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Public Works. As regards the position the hon. member mentions, where some people are asked to donate their labour free of charge while others are paid for it, if the hon. member knows of an instance of that kind I would appreciate it very much if he would bring it to my attention and I, in turn, will speak to my colleagues about it.

Mr. Carter: I thank the hon. minister for giving that reply, and I can assure him I will give him the details tomorrow.

My other question has to do with prevailing rates. I know this matter does involve his department, because it is his department which makes the survey upon which the prevailing rates are based. But what I do not know is who in the various departments determines what employees shall be employed on a prevailing rate basis? Does the Minister of Labour or his department make any recommendations in that respect?

Mr. Starr: The hiring department has the right of designating positions.

Mr. Carter: Do I understand the minister to say that for all the other departments of government it is his department which recommends which employees shall be employed under prevailing rates?

Mr. Starr: No, the hiring department. For instance, if an employee is an employee in the Department of National Defence, then it is that department.

Mr. Carter: Each department determines for itself?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Carter: Thank you.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I realize, of course, that the minister has had a long and hard day, but I hope he will not take it amiss if I occupy his attention for a few moments as we discuss the first item of the estimates of the labour department, which gives us an opportunity to deal with general problems relating to labour. I do not think we in the opposition need apologize for our preoccupation with these problems. We certainly have been concerned, and very deeply concerned, with one aspect of these problems in the operations and the economic health of the unemployment insurance fund. We have condemned the investment policies governing that fund. We have complained about the inadequacies of measures taken to strengthen that fund; and while we have supported some of the changes made, we have tried to point out that as a result of increased contributions from the workers and employers who have to make up 80 per cent of the contributions, even as a result of those increases, which average I think about 30 per cent, no single unemployed worker will himself get higher weekly benefits.

However, the unemployment insurance fund, important as it is, is only a reflection of a far more important aspect of the problem, and that is employment itself, and more particularly, Mr. Chairman, unemployment. When we talk as we do in the opposition, and as we will continue to do on every possible opportunity about the employment and the unemployment situation in this country we always, of course, leave ourselves open to the charge which the minister made this afternoon of being prophets of doom and gloom. The minister said this afternoon, although he did not give the figures, that the figures for April will be much better than those for March.

Mr. Starr: It was my hope they would be.

Mr. Pearson: It was the minister's hope and we share that hope, and if they are better we will rejoice with him in that improvement. But, Mr. Chairman, that does not exempt us from the duty and the right to point out some dangers and difficulties ahead in regard to employment in this country, because if they are not pointed out by the opposition perhaps the government may underestimate some of these difficulties which we think are going to face us in the months ahead.

It is just as unwise, of course, to exaggerate the difficulties and the dangers as it is to exaggerate the more pleasant aspects of the picture. I suggest in this regard that there was a great deal of this kind of unrealistic and optimistic exaggeration in a statement which covered, among many other things, employment and unemployment; a statement made by the Prime Minister on May 8 in Montreal, and which in some respects repeated a broadcast he had made a few weeks before. This statement of the Prime Minister had a direct bearing upon what we are discussing tonight and it is a good example, or if you like a bad example, of extravagant exaggeration in the direction of optimism. The Prime Minister stated that this country has recovered much faster from the recession than other countries.

Mr. Chairman, one of the most important indices of recovery, all the more important because it is a human index of recovery, is employment and unemployment. As I will try to show in a moment or two, the Prime Minister can find nothing in the employment statistics of this country to support such an extravagant statement as that. As a major basis for employment in this country, the thing which really in the long run determines whether we are to work or not to work at full capacity, or at as full capacity as possible, is the gross national product.

If the Prime Minister of this country could find no better foundation for his statement that we have recovered more rapidly from the recession than any other country than his estimate, or his statistic of gross national product in this country, then the rest of his evidence has no validity at all, because the Prime Minister in his statement, which must have been carefully prepared by a number of people, because it was given to a large audience and received a great deal of attention, had this to say, and I quote from the text of his statement:

> Our gross national product, the basic barometer of our economy, was up three per cent last year to the highest point in history.

I agree that it is the basic barometer of our economy. But on the basis of the figures given to us a few weeks earlier by his Minister of Finance—figures which appeared in Hansard in the budget statement—the Prime Minister is just $160 million out in that particular statistic. Even without making any allowance for the increases in prices which are responsible for most of the increase in the gross national product which occurred and which, indeed, are responsible for all the increase except 20 per cent, the Prime Minister made that assertion. That is what I mean by the use of misleading statistics in an unrealistic optimistic direction. The right hon. gentleman was $160 million out in connection with what he himself called the basic barometer of our economy. The fact is, as the Minister of Finance pointed out in his budget speech, that the increase in the gross national product last year was 2½ per cent, 80 per cent of which was made up by higher prices.

Then the Prime Minister in supporting this theory pointed to the fact that our exports were approximately the same in 1958 as in 1957 but that our imports were down by 8 per cent. He was quite right in emphasizing the importance of foreign trade as another basic indication of the health of our economy and of our employment situation. But while our foreign trade, as we all know, stood up well in 1958 also, as we all know, our imports were down by 8 per cent in 1958, the Prime Minister put this forward as an encouraging factor because, as he said later in his speech, it corrected the imbalance in our trade with the United States. But then he admitted that for the first three months of 1959 our exports were "off 3 per cent". Let us hope that during the rest of the year we will recover that decrease, because if we do not it will be a bad sign for employment. Let us not forget, also, as the export figures begin to show some weakening, that the only reason they stood up in 1958 was because of uranium and cattle exports.

Yet when export figures began to go down in the first three months of 1959, as they are doing, and when our imports began to rise, as they are doing by 5 per cent, the Prime Minister derives a good deal of comfort even from that situation because, he said, it was an indication of the growing recovery of the country from the recession. The committee will see that he tries to have it both ways; he has one argument for 1958 and another for 1959.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say, and this has a direct bearing on unemployment, that the monthly average of persons with jobs was practically the same in the two years and that both were higher than in any previous year. Employment figures, in other words, were practically static through those two years, though in those two years unemployment was higher than in any previous year. Mr. Chairman, if our employment figures do not substantially increase month by month, our unemployment figures will certainly increase, because the growth of the labour force has to take care of the increase in the population together with immigration, and we will never make any substantial progress in dealing with what is becoming a hard core of unemployment unless we can get our employment figures increasing from month to month. It is not good enough to say they were practically the same in two years. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> It is true that there was an increase in the category of persons without jobs and job applicants in 1958.

Let us see what that increase was because, after all, if our economy is recovering from the recession faster than that of any other country, our employment should reflect that recovery. But we know what the figures are. We do not know them for April, though we hope they will show a great improvement, as the minister suggested they might. But we do know that on March 21, on the lowest basis of calculation, the number of those without work stood at 525,000, and that is 8.6 per cent of the labour force. Percentages are often used in these debates, and this is a percentage which shows how wholly misleading was the Prime Minister's statement that our recovery has taken place faster than that of other countries, because this is a far higher percentage than that which occurs in the United Kingdom, the United States or practically any other western European or Atlantic country. And, surely, without being called prophets of doom and gloom, we in the opposition are under an obligation to point out that on a regional basis, on March 21, 31.5 per cent of the working force in Newfoundland was unemployed, and 13.2 per cent in the maritime provinces; in Quebec, the figure was 12.5 per cent. Therefore, while, of course, there are forces at work in this country which are countering recession and there is no doubt that our economy has shown a resilience of which we are all proud, nevertheless there are many difficulties and dangers ahead.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house could give us any indication of the business for next week? I take it there is no change in the business arranged for tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will continue with the estimates of the Department of Labour, and then take those of the Department of Public Works. On Monday we will commence with the first item of today's order paper, which is the house in committee on the freight rates measure. Then we will go on to consider item 11, the resolution preceding an act to set up a national energy board; then item 8, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. After that we will take item 9, amending the Income Tax Act; item 14, the resolution concerning the abolition of forced labour; and item 18, the resolution concerning the Bretton Woods agreements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the same order be followed on Tuesday, or is the minister able to say?

Mr. Green: This will be the order for Monday. On one of the later days in the week, Tuesday or Wednesday, to suit the convenience of the members of the official opposition, we would want to include in the list the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. There has been some delay in getting money to the provinces because this act has not been passed.

At 10.03 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SEAWAY AUTHORITY—PAYMENTS IN EXCESS OF CONTRACT PRICES

Question No. 335—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the St. Lawrence seaway authority made payments on any contracts, since the start of construction work, in which an increase over and above the original contract price has subsequently been authorized?

2. If so, to whom were they made, on what date, on what contract, and what was the amount of each payment?

3. What was the total amount of difference on each such contract between the accepted tender price, and the settlement after the increase?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:—

1. Yes.

2. Name of contractor: (1) Pentagon Construction Co. Ltd. and Iroquois Constructors Ltd. in joint venture; (2) McNamara Construction Co. Ltd.; (3) Miron et Frères Ltée; (4) Atlas-Winston Ltd.; (5) Miron et Frères Ltée; (6) John Entwistle; (7) Rianco Corporation Ltd., formerly Roy Robertson Excavation and Foundation Co. Ltd.

Date: (1) Various as work progressed; (2) Various as work progressed; (3) Various as work progressed; (4) August 13, 1958 and September 9, 1958; (5) May 27, 1958; (6) January 13, 1959; (7) December 8, 1958.

Description of contract: (1) Contract No. 6, construction of canal and lock at Iroquois; (2) Contract No. 9, dredging lake St. Francis, approach to Beauharnois canal; (3) Contract No. 14, excavation of channel and construction of dyke, station 75+00 to 124+00; (4) Contract No. 34, excavation of channel station 900+00 to 930+00; (5) Contract No. 41-1, supply of coarse aggregates, Cote Ste. Catherine lock; (6) Contract No. 88, construction of temporary water supply installation, Courtaulds, Cornwall; (7) Contract No. 130, extension to sewer outfall, municipality of Laprairie.

Amount of payment: (1) $2,149,564.20; (2) $646,222.08; (3) $17,018.10; (4) $5,737; $38,-344.87; $2,297; (5) $33,884.70; (6) $1,913.58; (7) $5,575.54.

3. Construction contracts make provision for the authorization of additional work to that covered by the contract. Unit price contracts are made on the basis of estimated quantities exhibited at the time of tendering, with provision for increases or decreases in accordance with the actual quantities of work performed. Payments for additional work, or in respect of additional quantities, although increasing the amounts or estimated amounts shown in the contracts, cannot be construed as additions to the original or accepted price. Exclusive of such payments, the difference on each contract is as shown in answer 2.

SEAWAY AUTHORITY—INCREASES IN TENDER PRICES

Question No. 336—Mr. Argue:

1. Has any increase been authorized by the St. Lawrence seaway authority on any contract work over and above the original contract price accepted by the authority since construction started on the seaway?

2. If so, (a) what was the name of the contractor or contractors awarded such an increase? (b) what was the date, amount of tender price accepted, and the nature of each original contract?

3. What was the amount of increase authorized on each contract, the date of authorization, and what official of the seaway authorized each?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Name of contractor: (1) Pentagon Construction Co. Ltd. and Iroquois Constructors Ltd. in joint venture; (2) McNamara Construction Co. Ltd.; (3) Miron et Freres Ltee; (4) Atlas-Winston Ltd.; (5) Miron et Freres Ltee.; (6) John Entwistle; (7) Rianco Corporation Ltd., formerly Roy Robertson Excavation and Foundation Co. Ltd.

(b) Date of contracts: (1) February 11, 1955; (2) March 23, 1955; (3) June 15, 1955; (4) September 14, 1955; (5) March 8, 1956; (6) January 25, 1957; (7) June 5, 1958.

Amount of tender price: (1) $6,470,000.00 (estimated); (2) 682,000.00 (estimated); (3) 1,768,900.00 (estimated); (4) 3,259,525.00 (estimated); (5) 1,113,000.00 (estimated); (6) At cost, estimated not over $176,000. plus fixed fee $25,000.00; (7) 125,185.40 (estimated).

Description of contract: (1) Contract No. 6, construction of canal and lock at Iroquois; (2) Contract No. 9, dredging lake St. Francis, approach to Beauharnois canal; (3) Contract No. 14, excavation of channel and construction of dyke, station 75+00 to 124+00; (4) Contract No. 34, excavation of channel, station 900+00 to 930+00. (5) Contract No. 41-1, supply of coarse aggregates, Cote St. Catherine lock; (6) Contract No. 88, construction of temporary water supply installation, Courtaulds, Cornwall; (7) Contract No. 130, extension to sewer outfall, municipality of Laprairie.

Questions

3. Amount of increase authorized:		Date of authorization by treasury board
(1)	$1,991,000.00	September 27, 1956 T.B. 506968
	88,000.00	October 18, 1956 T.B. 507694
	120,000.00	September 26, 1957 T.B. 522572
(2)	750,000.00	December 18, 1958 T.B. 542035
(3)	17,050.00	January 22, 1958 T.B. 526619
(4)	5,737.00	April 18, 1958 T.B. 530407
	38,344.87	June 20, 1958 T.B. 533783
	2,297.00	November 21, 1958 T.B. 540517
(5)	40,000.00	June 5, 1958 T.B. 532865
(6)	1,913.58	December 6, 1958 T.B. 541137
(7)	5,575.54	November 21, 1958 T.B. 540691

This answer excludes payments for additional work or those arising from variations in quantities under unit price contracts.

AIR NAVIGATION ORDER SERIES V, NO. 17

Question No. 357—Mr. Broome:

1. What period does air navigation order series V, No. 17 cover?
2. On what date did the Department of Transport send this order to the queen's printer?
3. On what date did the Department of Transport receive the printed orders from the queen's printer?
4. On what date were they mailed out from the Department of Transport?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. March 15 to March 31, 1959.

2. March 3, 1959.

3. March 10, 1959.

4. March 26, 1959, but on March 6 the Moncton region office of the department was instructed to issue domestic and international NOTAMS regarding temporary prohibition of air space to become effective at some time between March 15 and 31, 1959, and on the same date, Goose centre was requested to issue NOTAMS 18 hours in advance of the 40 hour period of time when the prohibition would be in effect.

URANIUM PURCHASES

Question No. 364—Mr. Howard:

1. Has any money been paid to (a) Bicroft Uranium Mines Limited; (b) Canadian Dyno Mines Limited; (c) Faraday Uranium Mines Limited; (d) Gunnar Mines Limited; (e) Lorado Uranium Mines Limited; (f) Rayrock Mines Limited; (g) Algom Uranium Mines Limited; (h) Can-met Explorations Limited; (i) Consolidated Denison Mines Limited; (j) Milliken Lake Uranium Mines Limited; (k) Northspan Uranium Mines Limited; (l) Pronto Uranium Mines Limited; (m) Stanleigh Uranium Mining Corporation Limited; (n) Stanrock Uranium Mines Limited, for the purchase of Uranium?
2. If so, how much was paid to each such company for each year (a) during which any special price contract for the purchase of uranium was in effect between the particular company and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and pursuant to such special price contract; (b) for purchases of uranium other than pursuant to a special price contract?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. Yes—payment has been made for the purchase of uranium by Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited pursuant to contracts between that company and the various companies listed.

2. (a) It is not the policy of the government to reveal figures concerning the private business of individual firms.

(b) Nothing.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 15, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. SPEAKER—CORRECTION OF IMPRESSION CONVEYED BY RULING

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the house will allow me to make a correction in Hansard, not to the context but to the impression which I may have given inadvertently in dealing with a point of order at page 3662. The particular point of order was taken by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when the Minister of Labour was seeking to refer to reports given by the unemployment insurance commission in 1955, and when defending himself with respect to allegations about his use of what was known as a supplementary report in the debate that was then proceeding.

After hearing some argument I find that altogether there were 24 separate interventions before I finally came to the point of giving my view, which I expressed in these terms:

The Prime Minister has expressed effectively the view which I had formed.

I was of course referring to the Prime Minister's immediately preceding intervention that it was in order for the minister to proceed to refer to the report, and not to matters in the other interventions which occurred earlier, four of which I find upon reading the report were also interventions by the Prime Minister. My endorsement was of his argument on the point of order in the intervention immediately preceding my own in the second column of page 3662.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTED STATEMENT BY SUPREME COMMANDER RESPECTING NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment on the report which has been brought to my attention of a statement made in Toronto yesterday by General Norstad, supreme commander of NATO, to the effect the Canadian brigade in the NATO forces was operating in a context where other units of the NATO forces in Europe have short range tactical nuclear weapons while the Canadian brigade has not; and also that the role of the Canadian air division in Europe, according to General Norstad, should be modified to encompass a strike-attack capability.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to study the remarks of General Norstad and then make a reply after they have been fully studied.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you.

NATO—REQUEST FOR BRIEFING OF MEMBERS BY SUPREME COMMANDER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the great public interest in national defence at the present time, and in view of the considerable difficulty entailed in obtaining the facts with reference to both NATO and north American defence, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would arrange for General Norstad to give the members of this house an off the record briefing on Monday when he is here. I am sure the Prime Minister will recall that this was done on a previous occasion by General Gruenther when he was here, and it was extremely informative.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the correctness of any statement that was in the preamble of the question to the effect that the fullest information is not made available. However, in so far as the question consists of a request to have General Norstad follow the course that was taken by General Gruenther some years ago, that is a matter for consideration. After General Norstad has seen members of the cabinet, the question can then be determined.

COPYRIGHT ACT

CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST BY CANADIAN LEGION FOR AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the government given consideration to the recommendation of the Canadian Legion included in the brief presented to the Prime Minister of Canada and the cabinet last October as follows:

In view of the ever-increasing burden on the Canadian Legion by the levies of the Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada and Broadcast Music Incorporated (Canada), the Canadian Legion recommends that the government take steps to amend section 17(3) of the Copyright Act.

If so, is it the government's intention to introduce a bill to amend the Copyright Act in response to the representation of the Canadian Legion?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. We are giving consideration to this request. No amendment will be proposed at this session.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the light of previous questions asked in the house and in view of the extraordinary developments in the province of Manitoba yesterday, has the minister any further information to give the house with regard to the flood protection plan for the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think dike protection for the Liberal party would be in order out there.

TRADE

GATT—REPORTED U.S. PROPOSAL FOR REDUCTION IN TEXTILE TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister comment on a United States news report that United States negotiators at GATT are ready to propose a general and reciprocal 10 per cent reduction in textile tariffs? Would the minister indicate whether he favours such a proposal?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the last session of congress legislation was enacted which empowered the United States administration to negotiate reductions in the United States tariffs of up to 20 per cent of existing rates over a four-year period in return for similar concessions on the part of other countries. The United States administration notified Canada and other GATT countries that they would be prepared to enter on a first round of negotiations in the exercise of that power.

These negotiations cannot take place until the 1960 session of GATT, although it is contemplated at the 1959 session that there will be some preliminary discussions of a procedural nature looking forward to discussions in 1960 on United States proposals. These are not related to any particular commodity, whether textiles or any other. So far as these negotiations are concerned, and so far as the attitude of the Canadian government is concerned, naturally we would have to know what are the United States proposals prior to making any comment upon them. However, I can say that so far as we are aware there have been no proposals relating particularly to textiles.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED "DECLARATION OF WAR" BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I must apologize for my superficial obtuseness. Has the alleged declaration of war put forth by the Minister of Justice yesterday in Newfoundland been of any assistance to the Prime Minister in the choosing of a minister of external affairs?

NEWFOUNDLAND—AMOUNT PAID BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has any comment to make on a report from Newfoundland that he informed the board of trade there that $100 million was paid into the provincial treasury last year by the government of Canada, and whether he got this figure from the Department of Finance.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, inadvertently I used that figure in the text of my remarks, but at 11.15 last night, at the first possible opportunity after having completed my speech, I issued a correction showing that the increase in direct federal contributions to the Newfoundland treasury, instead of being from $55 million to $100 million, in round figures, should have been shown as from $24 million to $55 million, again in round figures. The error in the figures was caused by the fact that I inadvertently took the totals of all contributions from the dominion government to Newfoundland, whereas the reference should have been to the total of conditional and unconditional grants, exclusive of payments to individuals and institutions.

I pointed out, however that the correction in the figures does not alter the statement I had made as to the proportionate increase in direct contributions to provincial revenues made by the federal government in recognition of Newfoundland's need for capital assistance, except that in fact these contributions have more than doubled instead of nearly doubled as stated in the text.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister aware, in the first place, that he included in the figure the increase made by the previous government under the tax-sharing arrangements, and second that the figure is not correct?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware, of course, that the figure is not correct. The figure, according to the calculations made by the Minister of Finance, is correct.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I should have said, by the Department of Finance. It was correctly calculated, and the statement I made reflects the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not aware that that figure includes many millions of dollars which have not been paid or provided by parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think hon. members had better await the proper opportunity to debate this matter.

Mr. Chevrier: May I point out that in addition to the Martin statistics we now have the Fulton statistics.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO RECEPTION GIVEN MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and ask him whether he has been able to assess the temperature in Newfoundland to determine whether the cooling off period suggested by the Prime Minister has taken place?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I had a very cordial reception from the people of Newfoundland, and I had a cordial reception from the premier of Newfoundland at a meeting I had with him at noon at his invitation. Any change in the atmosphere took place in the evening.

Mr. Pearson: After your speech.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that is perfectly correct; and since that matter has been mentioned I would point out that there was no justification for any such comment as that which was made to the effect that my remarks constitute a declaration of war. What really happened was that I presented to the people of Newfoundland—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Objections are being raised. Has the minister leave to continue his statement? I consider this to be a continuation of the earlier debate about the events in Newfoundland, which I had asked should not be continued.

Mr. Hellyer: The second question I asked was ruled to be the continuation of a debate, and I do not think there should be two sets of rules in the house.

Mr. Fulton: I was asked an earlier question regarding this matter by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and now another by the hon. member for Skeena, and I think I should be allowed to tell the house what actually happened.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I consider that the question which was asked was not a proper one for the orders of the day. It opens up a debate and invites the minister to make a reply which should not be made. I should prefer the house to defer this subject.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO DESTRUCTION OF IROQUOIS ENGINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister ordered the destruction of the Iroquois engines and components under construction at Orenda Engines Limited at Malton?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Trinity is well aware, after this program was cancelled the work of destruction and scrapping of the Iroquois engine is continuing.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a supplementary question. Does not the minister think it would have been advisable to leave the production line in existence until after General Norstad had been here, and until the government had a chance to consider its future policy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked one of those argumentative questions which are not in accordance with the rules and do not call for an answer.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

RETAINING WALLS, QUEBEC PROVINCE

(Translation):

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Has the Secretary of State had time to compile the replies that came in from other departments with regard to my question No. 108, a reply to which I have been looking forward since early February?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, patience is one of the great virtues that the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville possesses in high degree.

Mr. Dupuis: Is the minister aware that procrastination is bad for a parliament that ought to be active?

Mr. Tremblay: Does the hon. member realize what has happened to the Liberal party?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HIT AND RUN DRIVERS—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the increasing number of hit and run driving cases brought before our courts, I wonder if the minister will give consideration to the suggestion made recently by Mr. Justice Lamarre of Montreal.

(Translation):

Justice Lamarre has suggested that section 225 (1) of the Criminal Code be amended to provide for suspension of the driving permit of any driver found guilty of an offence against section 221 (2) dealing with hit-and-run cases.

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): In reply to the hon. gentleman I am glad to be able to inform him that the fullest consideration is being given to this suggestion, which has been made in a number of other quarters as well, in connection with the preparation of the bill to amend the Criminal Code as forecast in the speech from the throne.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS IN NEW YORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in a position to answer the question I addressed in his absence to the Prime Minister about a week ago on the results of the discussions on lead and zinc in New York?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A reply is being prepared, and I hope to have it ready for the Leader of the Opposition on Monday.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

163. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,105,745.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Labour I have only a few more words to add to what I said last night when the committee adjourned. I was dealing at that time with unemployment fund questions and more general matters concerning employment. So far as the former are concerned, we on this side of the chamber will have an opportunity of asking questions in committee on this matter. We propose to take full advantage of that opportunity, particularly in regard to the management of investment funds, the evasion of the law in regard to reports and the status of the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

Not long ago I asked the Minister of Labour about the status of this committee, because I had previously made the statement that in my view it had no legal existence. The best I could get from the minister—and perhaps he will elaborate on the matter when he replies—was a reference to section 19, subsection 5 of the act, which states that a majority of members of the advisory committee constitute a quorum and a vacancy in the membership does not impair the right of the remaining members to act. With all due respect may I say that has nothing to do with the point I was making about the legal existence of the committee which is determined specifically in section 19, subsection 1, which say that the committee shall consist of a chairman and not less than six members, and there are not now six members of the committee.

I was also dealing last night with some questions arising out of a speech made by the Prime Minister on May 8 at Montreal which dealt with employment and labour matters among other things. It was a speech which was full of commercials and would have done credit to an advertising campaign.

Indeed, there is a very close connection between this speech and advertising, which makes it all the more unusual to hear the Prime Minister say in this speech that one of the faults of his party since it has been in office has been to take its good works too much for granted. If that is true, then the vice president in charge of advertising has not been doing his job.

On page 9 of this unusual speech the Prime Minister made a labour reference which perhaps should be put on the record. He said:

I can tell you that no group of men and women anywhere in Canada worked as hard or as many hours a day as the members of the cabinet.

The results of that work, according to the Prime Minister, were expressed in these words:

I have no hesitation in asserting at this time that I believe that the government has accomplished more in those two years than any other government at any time in our history.

He added:

The facts are on the record.

Indeed, that is true; the facts are on the record and the government can be judged by those facts put on the record in the last two years, facts which deal with unprecedented levels of unemployment since the thirties, unprecedented lack of confidence in government bonds and unprecedented tight money.

On page 15 of this speech the Prime Minister made mention of the unemployment insurance benefit question, to which I made a cursory reference previously. The Prime Minister referred to the dubious figure of $550 million in additional welfare funds that had been given to the Canadian people since this government came to office and said:

The $550 million does not include additional expenditures which will be made for unemployment insurance as a result of the extension of these benefits to more people and for longer periods. Here alone the additional cost will be $200 million more than in 1956-57.

I should like the Minister of Labour to explain where this $200 million in extra unemployment benefits came from. I should like the Minister of Labour to explain when he speaks, if he will do me the honour of giving me some attention while I am referring to him, what the Prime Minister could have meant when he said that $200 million more in unemployment insurance benefits were paid in the last two years than in the year 1956-57. If that figure is correct—perhaps it is correct; the minister will be able to check us on that—and if that additional amount of money was paid out for which the Prime Minister takes credit to his government, it was paid out because there were unprecedented levels of unemployment which required these payments. However, to make a virtue of that is a very strange thing indeed.

Perhaps the minister will also confirm my statement that if this figure of $200 million is accurate as representing benefits received from the government, according to the Prime Minister, 80 per cent of these benefits came from the pockets of the employers and employees. It is a very strange kind of political advertising that takes credit to a government for contributions made by the employers and the employees to the insurance benefits of the unemployed employees.

Last night I also mentioned the strange statement of the Prime Minister in this strange speech—perhaps the minister will also deal with this when he replies—that our gross national product had increased 3 per cent last year. I pointed out last night, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister was only $160 million out in that figure on the basis of his own method of calculation. If he had adopted the method of calculation put forward by the Minister of Finance when he estimated the gross national product, that is a calculation which is based on stable prices and takes into consideration price increases, the Prime Minister would have been over $700 million out in his statement.

These are some of the matters which perhaps can be dealt with by the minister in the discussion of this item of the estimates, but there is one other reference I should like to make before I sit down. He will know, of course, that when I spoke on this item some days ago I addressed to the government through him some general questions on labour policy and unemployment policy. The hon. member for Trinity also put forward some suggestions which I thought were very interesting and constructive. We on this side are often charged by the government with not putting forward constructive proposals but when the minister replies at the close of the discussion of this item of the estimates, or whenever he feels like replying, we expect him to deal with the particular suggestions which have been put on the record.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the minister that I will not be very long. However, I should like to bring a number of matters to his attention. The first is that as our urban areas grow in population it is only natural that the staff of the unemployment insurance commission should also grow. It does not take long in terms of years for an office that had 15 or 20 employees to increase to 60 or more employees, not only because the increase in unemployment is a problem but also because of the growth in population. At this time I should like to make the plea again that as much as possible, and in line with efficiency and the maximum output in these offices, the minister make every effort to keep the offices on as small a unit basis as he can.

I know that the officers of his department naturally like promotions, and as the offices grow so does their rank and their income as civil servants. Therefore each and every time the minister looks into the possibility of opening another office the advice he receives from his officers is usually against opening such additional offices because it affects their own position and income. There is a tendency for the officials to continue to advise the minister not to grant requests for the opening of additional offices.

This is of particular concern to those of us who live in rapidly growing urban areas. As population grows and as the need arises we hope the minister will understand the position and will agree a little more readily than he has in the past to the establishment of additional offices of the unemployment insurance commission. I do not like to see men become mere cogs in a machine, and when you have very large offices handling thousands of men a week I believe we make mere cogs in a machine out of men. So far as obtaining employment for people is concerned, I think this cause would be better served if there were offices in the local communities which would be aware of employment openings that might exist. They would be more aware of possible employment openings than a major office with a large hierarchy of civil servants. I also believe there would be more humane treatment of those who are unemployed and must use the facilities of these offices.

I have in mind particularly such expanding municipalities as are found around the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster. There are municipalities around New Westminster with a population three or four times that of the little city of New Westminster. Yet the unemployed in these surrounding municipalities must have their unemployment insurance needs attended to in the New Westminster unemployment insurance office, which is already larger than it needs to be in order to render efficient advice and help to the unemployed. Naturally the same criticism applies to the unemployment insurance offices in the city of Vancouver. I do not believe the government should sponsor the establishment of ever larger institutions when the matter of dealing with the needs of our unemployed is involved.

Another plea I should like to make at this time is that the minister use his influence in the government to obtain much more money for the retraining of workers. We will never be relieved of the problem of unemployment as long as automation is with us, and I do not see the end of automation and its effects. I believe the minister will agree that as the years go by more and more money will have to be spent on retraining our workers.

In so far as a large number of them are concerned, we will have to make arrangements whereby we pay them a maintenance allowance while they are being re-educated in order to enable them to take other employment. It is very difficult for a man with a family to agree to attend a training course for six months or more if he has no regular income. The day may well have arrived when the government, through the medium of the unemployment insurance commission, ought to give serious consideration to the payment of a living allowance to those of our unemployed who want to obtain the education necessary to take other employment.

I should like at this time to appeal to the minister to take measures very early in the year directed toward launching the next winter works program. I believe the minister now wishes that he had begun these projects a little earlier last year. I think the time is now when initial moves should be made whereby we could have a vastly expanded and enlarged winter works program next year. I hope when the minister begins planning next year's winter works program he will devise ways and means whereby the municipalities do not have to assume such very heavy obligations in order to supply a limited number of men with work. The minister indicated some months or more ago how pleased he was with the fact that some 38 per cent of the money that was being expended was being used to pay wages.

I have statistics here to show what happened in Burnaby. I note that the headline on the article from the British Columbian of April 16, 1959 says, "Winter Works Bring $72,000 From Ottawa". It says:

> Burnaby has spent $300,000 of the $557,720 allotted to eight public works projects that qualify for federal winter works financial aid.

Of this $557,720, the federal government is paying $71,926. This means that the municipality of Burnaby, in order to supply employment to roughly 100 men, had to go into debt to the tune of almost half a million dollars for these undertakings. If we are going to try to solve our unemployment problems in this manner it is my contention that we are going to break every municipal government in Canada. The municipalities simply cannot afford to go out and borrow money, especially with interest rates as they are now, to the extent of $500,000 for every 100 men who must be supplied with employment. Our municipalities simply are not able to assume that kind of burden.

I should like, therefore, to propose that the minister attempt to persuade his colleagues in the government that when next year's winter works program is launched the municipalities be assured that the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act will be reactivated. This act is on the statute books, and under it the government has authority to give aid to the municipalities.

This act, which was introduced in the thirties, was specifically designed to provide employment through municipal organizations. I know the capital which is available under it is limited. However, the government might easily ask parliament to expand the capitalization allowed. I believe the present capitalization is $30 million, but in the light of Canadian problems and costs of today I think the minister would agree that our municipalities might easily use something in the nature of $300 million.

This act was a means whereby loans for self-liquidating projects were made available to municipalities at a very nominal rate of interest. I believe that if next year's winter works program is to be a success this act will have to be reactivated so these low cost loans are available to the municipalities, or the government will have to find other ways and means whereby the municipalities will not have to go into debt to the extent of half a million dollars in order to supply employment to 100 men for the five winter months.

The other proposal I have concerns the annuities branch. I know the minister is very much interested in the cause of labour. I know that he has heard much about industrial pension plans. I know the minister knows quite a number of the disadvantages of the present industrial pension plan arrangements, especially when a worker leaves one place of employment, either through no fault of his own or otherwise, and moves to another place of employment. The worker usually loses his pension rights in such instances. Once he reaches a certain age he has a difficult time in obtaining employment because he is told that for pension purposes he is too old.

I should like the minister to have the annuities branch look into the possibilities of establishing, under the annuities branch, a portable pension plan for Canadian workers. I feel that the annuities branch could be augmented and expanded in a manner which would give employers and unions some encouragement to transfer their present pension arrangements into the government annuities branch. If they did that they would then be making a move toward the establishment of a portable pension plan for Canadian workers.

Many members in the house have made remarks about industrial unrest. We have often heard the blame placed on organized labour. Well, all of us regret industrial unrest. However, it is sometimes part of the system. Unless we want to establish a dictatorship I do not see how, under our present concept of liberty, industrial unrest can be avoided. However, I feel that there has been a lot of exaggeration in this regard. I should like to place on the record a limited number of remarks made in the legislature of British Columbia by Rae Eddie, M.L.A. for New Westminster. I read these as they were reproduced in the B. C. Lumber Worker, the first issue in March, 1959. Mr. Eddie was pointing out very effectively that strike losses are being magnified and are not as harmful as many people would have us believe.

He says the facts are these. He used March, 1958 as a sample because he says that was the month in which labour disputes were particularly heavy in British Columbia. He says the figures show that out of total man days lost, 86 per cent of that time was lost through unemployment and 13 per cent was lost through illness, leaving less than 1 per cent of man days lost because of labour disputes. In short, unemployment cost more than 95 times as much as did strikes in time loss, and illness cost 15 times as much. To me that does not sound like irresponsible use of a free man's right to use his ultimate bargaining weapon.

We in this house are greatly concerned about the growing needs of government in the way of revenue. The other day we had a proposition that would cost several hundred million dollars. However, may I say in conclusion that our present level of unemployment, with half a million unemployed in Canada, over a period of one year means a loss in wealth that has not been produced of $1,500 million. That is, $1½ billion of wealth is lost in one year because of unemployment. That wealth is more than the cost of all family allowances, old age pensions and many other welfare enterprises added together. The cost of unemployment to the Canadian economy is today by far the greatest cost that the people of Canada are paying for having voted as they did in March of last year.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, I shall limit my remarks—and they will be brief—to my own riding. I discussed the matter I am about to mention with the Minister of Labour on an occasion about a year ago. I refer to the question of employment at Petawawa military camp. As the minister knows, there is an employment office in Pembroke. I am now making a suggestion that will bring business to the employment office. The matter concerns government contracts. My criticism or observation will apply equally to other ridings in Canada where there are government contracts. I suggest to the minister that he consult with the Minister of Public Works and see to it that there is inserted in the contracts awarded by the government a clause to the effect that the labourers shall be drawn from that section of the country in which the contract has been awarded.

At the present time the situation in Pembroke or in the district is that the number of unemployed is about 2,500. This situation is extremely serious. If the contractors and the subcontractors as well—particularly the subcontractors—would draw their labour from the section of the community in which they have the contract, there would be considerable alleviation of the distress in my section of the country. I would ask the minister if he would discuss this matter with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and with the Minister of Public Works and ascertain whether there cannot be inserted in these tenders and in the contracts when they are finally signed a clause to the effect that the labour shall be drawn, as far as possible, from the section of the country in which the contract is to be carried out.

Mr. Chevrier: The other evening, Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing other matters concerning the Department of Labour it was not found possible, because of the rules of the house, to discuss certain matters which the opposition desired to discuss at that time. While I have no intention of repeating what I said in the debate then, there are however some things that I believe should be put on the record.

I have, of course, no complaint to make with regard to the ruling of the Chair by which all members of the house must abide. It is because of that desire on my part and on the part of all of us who sit here that we follow the decisions of His Honour the Speaker. The ruling was that anything having to do with the reasons for non-compliance with the statute should not then have been discussed. The statute, of course, is the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is why at this time I feel that I should put certain matters on Hansard which I was prevented from doing on the earlier occasion.

[Mr. Forgie.]

At the time I indicated that there were, on the part of the minister, certain violations. Perhaps that word was too strong; perhaps I should have used another term. Perhaps I should have said that the minister had not abided by the terms of the statute. But whether it is one term or the other that is used, I do not think it makes any difference in the effect.

There are two or three points in which I am interested. One of them is the report of August 26, 1958, which the minister tabled at the request of the hon. member for Essex East. My purpose at this time is to say that this report forms part of sessional paper 82A and should be incorporated therein by reference. My purpose in saying that is found in section 89 (1) of the statute which can be divided under two heads, and which reads in part as follows:

(1) Within four months after the end of each fiscal year the advisory committee shall make a report to the governor in council on the financial condition of the fund—

Furthermore, over and above that obligation, the advisory committee may report at any time it sees fit, as I take it was its intention in the report of August 26, 1958. I have particular reference at this time to the paragraph in the beginning of this report which reads as follows:

In the meantime we respectfully draw your attention to our report of July 18, 1958.

My contention, Mr. Chairman, is that legally the moment the advisory committee, in any report to the minister, puts in a clause of this nature, then by reference any additional report is incorporated into the report required to be made under this statute. It then falls to the minister under section 90 (2) to lay that report on the table of the house. Section 90 (2) reads as follows:

(2) The minister shall lay every report made under section 89 before parliament within thirty days after it was submitted to the governor in council, or if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first thirty days thereafter that parliament is sitting.

I say that the words "submitted to the governor in council" should be read with reference to the whole statute. My contention, with great deference, is that both these documents should have been tabled in accordance with section 90, subsection 2.

I think too, sir, that there has been an infraction, an evasion, of the statute in that section 19 (1) has not been complied with, because there is not now legally in existence an unemployment insurance advisory committee. I think that has been made quite clear in an earlier debate and I need not repeat it on this occasion. But because of the circumstances in which the committee finds itself three members have found it necessary to hand in their resignations. Therefore that committee, because it does not consist of the required number of members, which shall be not less than six nor more than eight, does not legally exist.

Then, of course, there is the fact that there has been an infraction of this statute in its intention. I did mention this matter the other evening and I will not repeat it now except in passing. I would ask the minister if he will not tell the committee under what power he requested certain information and a report from the advisory committee. As I look at this act, and look at it as fairly as I can, there is a clear cut section, 91 (1), which gives the governor in council that power and that authority, but I see nowhere in the act any authority to the minister to act in the way he did.

In addition there is the unfortunate situation which exists between the minister and the labour movement at the present time. I say to the minister, with all the regard I have for him, that I am afraid he must assume full responsibility for this unfortunate situation, because in my modest estimation I believe he failed to carry out the required consultation with labour. I listened very carefully to the statement the minister made in defence of his position, but as I read section 19 (2) it is clearly set out therein that at least one of the members of the advisory committee other than the chairman shall be appointed after consultation with organizations representative of workers and an equal number, after consultation with organizations, representative of employers.

As a result of the failure of the minister to comply with that very clear and important provision in our legislation, the two most important labour unions have stated that they do not recognize the representative of the minister or of the government as their representative on the commission. The commission will therefore be composed of two government appointees and one representing employers. Although the minister may claim that the recent appointment does not constitute a technical violation of the act, I am sure he cannot deny that he did not comply with the spirit and the intention of this legislative provision in that respect.

As a result of that clear violation by the minister and the government of the spirit of the legislation, the three representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress and of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour on the unemployment insurance advisory committee have announced their resignations. There was no other course, I believe, for these men to adopt under the circumstances. Indeed, in addition to those specific and important responsibilities which are contained in the act, the advisory committee must work in close collaboration with the commission. Since the labour movement cannot feel that it is properly represented on the commission, as it has the right to be so represented, its representatives could not continue to act as members of the advisory committee and to work with the commission. The minister, I am afraid, must assume the ultimate responsibility for those resignations and for the situation which, as I indicated, is in contravention of section 19 subsection 2 of the act, which clearly states that at least one member of the advisory committee must represent labour.

As a consequence of these three recent resignations, the advisory committee has at present only five members other than the chairman. Moreover, it is doubtful whether there is at present on the committee a member who has been "appointed after consultation with organizations representative of workers" in accordance with the section to which I have referred. The minister—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, if I may just advise the hon. member, the labour representative after consultation, as the hon. member puts it, is still on the advisory committee, and that representative is Mr. McLean.

Mr. Chevrier: That is true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the three others are not.

Mr. Starr: The three others tendered their resignations and new appointments will be made within the next two weeks.

Mr. Chevrier: What the minister has said is quite true, Mr. Chairman, but that does not derogate from the point that there are still three members of the labour movement who have handed in their resignations—

Mr. Starr: That is a fact.

Mr. Chevrier: —and because of that, the point I am making is that the unemployment insurance advisory committee has no legal status. The minister may disagree with that, but that is my interpretation of the act, and because of that I think an injustice is being done to the labour movement.

The point which I think is uppermost, or should be uppermost, in our minds at the moment is this. The minister may not agree with this, but none the less I think it is accurate. The minister's responsibility as Minister of Labour is to conciliate. I am sure that no one would agree with that statement more quickly than the minister; but under the circumstances, willingly or not, voluntarily or involuntarily, he did not conciliate in this case. True, he gave the house an explanation of what happened, but that explanation is contradicted by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, and clearly contradicted. It is contradicted, too, by the three representatives who handed in their resignations. Therefore I think I am safe and accurate in saying, first of all, that the advisory committee has no legal status as it stands today; and second, with all respect to the minister, I do not think he used his conciliatory powers or facilities in the manner in which they should have been used on the occasion.

I do not want to go into this unduly and pursue the matter ad nauseam, but I think there is one point which I must make and that has to do with the Quebec representative on that body, Mr. Jean Marchand, who is the representative or the secretary of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. The minister, and again I say this to him with deference, stated that Mr. Jean Marchand was official affiliated to a political party which was not the Progressive Conservative party. That I submit is not an accurate statement. That is not a fact, and I challenge the minister to substantiate that accusation. Why should the minister have made that statement, if it is not in accordance with the fact? I have no doubt that Mr. Marchand is not in that position. If he were I am sure he could not hold the position which he holds at the present time. I am prompted to say that it might be because of the position Mr. Marchand held during the strike of the employees of the C.B.C. that the minister was prompted to make that statement. Be that as it may, I do not think the statement was accurate; I do not think it should have been made, and I do not think there is any foundation for it.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Would the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) allow me a very brief question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fortin: Is the hon. member for Laurier aware that Jean Marchand is not only an active member of the Social Democratic party, but also one of the leaders of a political movement in the province of Quebec, which is called "Rassemblement"?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet may know of these facts, whereas I have no such information. I am, however, convinced that the minister's statement in this house was not in accordance with the facts and that, under the circumstances, he should not have made it because to my mind it is a responsibility of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to reconcile the various attitudes instead of confusing them, as he attempted to do.

Furthermore, if I may say so, Mr. Chairman, without in the least wishing to cast reflections on the Minister of Labour, I think the attitude shown by Mr. Jean Marchand in the C.B.C. producers' strike had a great deal to do with the attitude taken by the government towards him.

That is the reason why I made my statement a moment ago. I have not the slightest doubt that the charges directed at Mr. Jean Marchand are not in accord with the facts—I am trying to use a phrase that will not be ruled out of order—and I am therefore inclined to believe that the minister should not have made such charges. In fact, I am certain that if the minister were to repeat that statement today, he would leave out the part dealing with the political connections, not only of Mr. Jean Marchand, but also of the two other labour representatives in this matter.

(Text):

Now, if I may return to the point I was trying to make—and I was trying to make it as calmly as possible in the circumstances, and I am sure the minister accepts it in that light—I was trying to point out that the minister failed to consult, in accordance with section 19 (2) of the act, the various labour organizations when the appointment of Mr. MacArthur was made, and that because of this failure an unfortunate situation has arisen as between the minister and the labour movement, a situation which I believe has led to the worsening of the relationship between the two.

I am sure the minister himself would be the first to recognize the need and importance of close and continued collaboration between himself and the labour movement for the proper and effective operation and administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The point now arises, how does the minister propose to secure this essential collaboration? When and how does he intend to extricate himself from the difficult, delicate and awkward position in which he finds himself? How does he intend to get out of the illegal position which exists today?

A moment ago the minister said he expected to appoint persons in lieu of the three who had resigned. No one can anticipate, of course, what the appointments will be, but will they be truly representatives of labour? Will they be appointed after consultation with labour? These are questions which I am sure cannot be answered at this time. So I conclude this part of my remarks by stating that in my opinion a serious mistake has been made because of the fact that there was a failure to consult and because there was a failure to conciliate. This has set a bad standard for both employers and employees. I trust and hope that this situation will be rectified.

Before I resume my seat I would like to make a suggestion. I can speak only for myself, but the suggestion is this; that item 1 of the minister's estimates be allowed to stand, after the discussion thereof has been terminated, and that meantime we continue with the other items of the department in order that we may get from the minister a report on the winter works program. I make this suggestion with deference. I think it will hasten the consideration of the estimates, because I have a feeling that if this were done we could certainly dispose of these additional items very quickly.

Mr. Starr: In response to the suggestion that the first item should be deferred until the program is brought in, may I say that the winter works program has been carried on for five years—unless, of course, the hon. gentleman is referring to the municipal program. I do not know exactly what he has in mind. Perhaps he could tell me.

Mr. Chevrier: I was under the impression that we could have a statement from the minister as to what has happened with the winter works program involving assistance to the municipalities. This has been mentioned in the house from time to time, but no complete report has been made bringing us up to date. It seemed fitting, therefore, that between now and the end of the session we should have an opportunity to discuss that program.

Mr. Starr: Is the hon. member referring to a complete report on this incentive program which has gone on during the past winter?

An hon. Member: And next winter.

Mr. Starr: I can readily give the committee a report of what has gone on in the past winter. However, future government policy with respect to the program will have to be planned.

I am very happy about the attitude taken toward this municipal incentive program. It was initiated by the government following conferences we held last July with the municipalities. I remember the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite who characterized it as being too little and too late. They said it would not work out, and they criticized it month by month. In all modesty I feel I may claim that it is a fine program, and I cannot resist reminding hon. gentlemen opposite that it is a program that was instituted by this government. The government takes the responsibility for the situation. The government will give consideration to the question as to whether or not it will be necessary to continue this program.

If hon. gentlemen opposite have any constructive suggestions to make that they feel would help the situation I would be happy to receive them and bring them to the attention of the government for consideration. Under those circumstances, however, I did not feel I could let that suggestion stand.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, in opening my brief remarks may I congratulate the minister for his opening remarks on the presentation of his estimates and say that I welcomed the announcement of consideration for older workers. I believe the minister well knows this is a subject of great interest to me as well as to many hon. members on both sides of this chamber. I am sure many were gratified to hear that steps were being taken to find a solution to the problem confronting older workers in Canada. I have spoken on this subject on previous occasions and do not wish to elaborate further on the point at the present time.

I wish to bring to the minister's attention the need for a change in the regulations at some future time. It may be, of course, that the objections I raise to the present regulations could be met by valid arguments, but I would hope the minister and his officials might give the matter some reconsideration. I refer to the regulations under section 172, subsection 3, paragraph (b) of the act. The regulations came into effect last autumn, I believe, and as a result the following notice was distributed through national employment offices to a number of people applying for unemployment insurance. The notice is specifically directed to farmers, and the pertinent part reads:

> All earning must be declared (see paragraph 15 of "Information for Claimants" form 501D). This includes earnings from farm operations.
> If you dispose of any farm produce (milk, grain, livestock, etc.) during a week for which you are claiming benefit you must include as earnings for that week one-half of the amount of money that you received or will receive as a result of the transaction.

The notice then goes on to make some reference to penalties. This has no reference to the point I should like to make. Just after the end of the last war we all know that the Department of Veterans Affairs under the Veterans' Land Act encouraged veterans to purchase small holdings of land, up to four, five or six acres or whatever it was, for the purpose of assisting the veteran and his family to become more or less self-sufficient. This was one of the purposes in any event. This policy was to assist those who became unemployed. They were encouraged to get a few chickens, pigs or cows, and generally one might say veterans were encouraged to put their money into projects of this kind.

Nowadays many people among the farm population work in the cities and there are many persons who because of high tax rates in certain urban areas have bought small holdings out in the country. Their wives may keep a few chickens or they may keep some pigs or possibly even one or two beef cattle or a cow or something of that nature. This trend is becoming increasingly common.

If an individual is able to save some money which he invests in real estate and draws rent from his investment he is in no way affected by the regulations to which I referred. Neither is he penalized if he invests his money in stocks, bonds or securities. However, if an individual invests his money in any kind of farming operation from which he draws income he is penalized under this section of the act. I cannot help but feel this is a form of discrimination against those workers who live in rural areas and have invested their money in small holdings of land from which they draw a little income.

I know that one of the arguments in favour of the present regulations is that investment in real estate or stocks and bonds represents a consolidation of the past labours of the individual, and if they draw income from this source it is not considered as earnings. I realize that it is sometimes difficult to draw a fine line in matters of this kind, but I have difficulty in comprehending the difference between a person who has invested money in real estate which he has to repair and maintain and from which he draws income in the form of rent, and a person who on the other hand has invested in a small holding of land from which he draws some income through keeping a few chickens, pigs or something of that nature which he must feed whether or not he is working elsewhere. In the former case the individual is not affected by this section of the act but in the latter case the individual is penalized.

I believe these regulations would even go so far as to make necessary the declaration of money received by an individual from the sale of a cow, for instance, which he sold in order to purchase another cow. This is clearly capital, but he would have to declare the money he received from the sale and would be penalized as a result. I appreciate that it is difficult to administer some of the provisions in the act but I would hope that the minister and his officials would give some reconsideration to this matter.

My next remarks relate to what I have just said. Because of interrelated activities in our economy today often there is a very fine distinction between city workers, those who are half working in the city and half in rural areas, and farmers. In other words there are no clearly defined black and whites but we have an increasing number of grays somewhere in the middle today. I refer to the distinction between industrial workers and farmers which used to be more clearly defined. Because of this I suggest to the minister that he might give consideration to appointing someone to the unemployment insurance advisory committee who has at least some knowledge of farm problems and can represent the views of people who may have small holdings in rural areas but who may work in a factory in the city. I feel that this is important, and I urge the minister to give consideration to this suggestion.

In conclusion may I say that in my opinion and in the opinion of many people throughout the country with whom I have discussed these matters the present Minister of Labour is probably the best minister of labour this country has ever had. I believe this view must be recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite. In fact the only conclusion to which I can come is that hon. members of the official opposition and the C.C.F. are becoming alarmed at the popularity of the Minister of Labour in the country. I am quite certain of this in view of recent speeches that have been made in this house, which cannot be interpreted in any way other than as attempts to tear down the excellent reputation the minister has acquired for himself, and very justifiably so.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been asked to bring certain complaints to the attention of the house and the minister by a good number of trade unionists in my constituency, a number of members of the Canadian Legion and some business people. I have also received considerable correspondence along the same line. In the national employment service we have a very excellent organization that provides an opportunity for employers to register their employment needs and for employees to register for employment. From my contact with the service I would say that generally speaking they are doing a very good job, sometimes under quite difficult circumstances.

As opposed to that we have the immigration department also undertaking the responsibility of seeking employment for immigrants. I am not criticizing the officials of the immigration department. They are undertaking their duties as they are supposed to according to the act and the regulations and their instructions. However, people to whom I have spoken think this creates an unnecessary duplication of expenditure and a certain unfairness to Canadian citizens, and that the procedures create quite unnecessary ill feeling at certain times.

I have personal knowledge of an immigration officer who in some cases travels two or three hundred miles to find employment for immigrants. I am not blaming the immigrant who naturally wants to get employment. In fact this officer travels even greater distances on occasion. Funds are provided which give him the opportunity of travelling all over the district, visiting small places, quizzing employers and in some cases obtaining employment where the employer did not consider that he really needed an employee for the work in question. They are pretty thorough in that respect in going into every nook and corner of the Kootenays and trying to find employment for immigrants.

One or two managers of small lumber companies have mentioned to me how efficient the immigration officials are in that respect, in that they have suggested that the employer put the man on for a week or two even if he cannot provide work for very long. The immigration official says he has to get jobs for the immigrants somehow and that it will be a great help to him if the employer can give the man a job, and so on and so on.

The officials of the national employment service do not have the same opportunity. I know the local managers do what they can, within close range of the towns in which employment offices are situated, to come in contact with employers quite frequently, but the funds available and their duties are such as to make it impossible for them to travel the district in the same way as the officers of the immigration department. During recent years I have had it repeatedly brought to my attention by the people I have mentioned that there has been a certain unfairness.

I want to cite one case, which could be repeated many times. This man came to see me personally, having been sent to me by the secretary of the Legion branch and the secretary of his trade union. This man was born in a town in my constituency. He served overseas for six years in the second world war and had a very commendable record. He now has four children and had been unemployed for five months when he came to see me. He is an electrician and there was no employment in sight. An immigrant came into the district who was an electrician, was in the town one day and got a job because the immigration official just happened to arrive at a certain place at the right time, when the employer was about to notify the national employment service that they needed an electrician.

The criticisms of these people are quite sound that there is unnecessary duplication, and at times this brings about criticism of the national employment service which is not justified. I have heard people complain about the national employment service officials not getting out and rustling up jobs, and I have had to explain over and over again that they do not have the same opportunity because there is no financial provision and their duties will not permit it.

I could illustrate this complaint with a number of similar cases, but I will only refer to the one case. With respect to my own experience, may I say that after receiving complaints I am in the habit of investigating because I like to get the facts, and as a result of the complaints I have received and my personal experience I suggest that the registration of jobs and the seeking of employment should be the sole responsibility of the national employment service. All this work should come under one branch. In addition, there should be provision for appropriate officials of the offices to travel around the districts in order to visit employers in the same way that immigration officers now do. In that way it would be fairer to Canadian citizens and fairer to immigrants. They would not encounter these unnecessary hostilities which are very easily built up, particularly in small communities.

I have gone to considerable pains on two or three occasions to dampen the fires of resentment which were directed at the time at the national employment service and also at the poor immigrant in question because of the method of doing things at the present time. I have brought these views of my constituents to the attention of the minister, and I hope serious consideration will be given to some consolidation of the services that I have dealt with so briefly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Laurier is extremely important. He has asked the Minister of Labour to allow the first item to stand so we will have some opportunity at a later date to ascertain what is likely to be the government's policy for attacking unemployment next fall and winter. The minister has indicated that he cannot accept the suggestion; consequently we are going to observe the traditional routine of dealing with these estimates. That is the responsibility of the minister, and apart from disagreeing with him for the reasons stated by the hon. member for Laurier I do not quarrel with his decision. But we therefore have an obligation to ask the government at this time what its policy with regard to unemployment is going to be for the ensuing period.

The minister understandably has taken some pride in the achievements under his winter work program. The program I am talking about is not the advertising campaign urging people to provide employment. Without belittling the value of that, though recognizing that it really has not cut very deeply, what I am referring to is the winter work program which involves contributions by the federal government together with the provinces to municipally conceived projects. The minister has said that obviously the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier are to be construed as an approbation of that program, and in understandable modesty the Minister of Labour says he is very glad to know that hon. gentlemen on this side approve the program and share his pride in its achievements.

I think the Minister of Labour is under a great misapprehension. We on this side of the house welcome the program in so far as it goes. Any program designed to assist men and women who are out of work to find gainful employment will receive our support, but the minister does not do justice to the record of debate this session when he suggests that we are satisfied with the program. We are not. This program was announced in the fall of last year but it was ill timed, and as a result was not capable of the productive results which it otherwise would have had. What we are now saying is that while we all hope there will be a real improvement in the unemployment picture, there are indices that suggest it is going to be a serious problem, though we hope however not on the same level as last year. Every indication would appear to support the view that unemployment nevertheless will be present with us next fall and winter.

What we are asking the government to do is not wait until Christmas or late fall to declare its policy, but to tell the country and the house now what its policy is going to be. Is this program going to continue? If it is going to continue, the municipalities ought to be told far enough ahead of time so they can make the necessary preparations through budgetary arrangements, through use of necessary facilities, personnel and the like to cope with the problem. The minister takes credit for this program. I think he is overstating the case when we recognize that as of the last reported period there were some 525,000 people without jobs, and that the number of unplaced applicants had increased by almost 4,000.

This is a picture that does not warrant the suggestion that we can coast along as the government has coasted along, during the past 18 months. Now we would like to know from the minister, has all the money that was voted for this particular project been expended by the government? How many people have been put to work? When we are told how many people have been put to work under this program, we realize its limitations. The fact that 33,000 or 40,000 people have been put to work as a result of this program is in itself commendable, but it is nothing compared to the problem of unemployment that faces the country at the present time. I do not believe the minister is on sound ground when he takes great satisfaction from these figures, in the light of the total unemployment problem and in the light of the very limited achievements of this program of works.

Now, what we want to know is, what is the government now doing—

Mr. Starr: Do you want us to drop this program?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend does not do himself justice. Of course we do not want him to drop this program. What I want him to do is announce this program at a time when the municipalities can prepare for it. Tell us now, are you going to embark on this program next year?

Mr. Starr: The hon. member talks about the preparation of budgets by municipalities. I think I should advise him that the municipalities have already set their budgets for this year, and a new budget will not be set until after the new year, in 1960. Budgets, therefore, have nothing to do with it.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Ontario is not the whole country.

Mr. Starr: I have had some experience in this connection. Preparation for any plan of this nature at this time would be a little premature. We will have to look at the situation later on to see what the position may be this winter. I realize the plan could have been announced a little earlier last winter, but there was no harm done by the announcement being made when it was. In the first week of this plan we received over 500 applications.

Now, most certainly, if it is found necessary later on this year that this program should be continued for another year, the experience we have gained during this winter will help us in deciding earlier, and the plan will be announced earlier—there is no question about that—if it is decided to go ahead with it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for incorporating my remarks in his. I believe he has only confirmed now what I have said. He has said that municipal budgets are already prepared. Of course he knows that is not the case nationally. As a matter of fact on December 23 last the minister made a statement which confirms what I have just been saying. The minister said that the interest shown to date in this program and the favourable reception to it from municipalities all across the country are very encouraging, and this was particularly true since budgetary restrictions have prevented many municipalities from submitting projects until their 1959 works programs are approved by the newly elected councils.

This is surely an indication of the truth of my statements. My own city of Windsor is a pretty good illustration of the weakness of this program. Shortly after the program was announced last year we met under the capable direction of that devoted public servant Mr. John Sharrer, the director of the unemployment insurance offices in Windsor. The members of parliament, members of the legislature, representatives of the unions and of management met to discuss this particular program and ascertain whether it would be adaptable to the situation in Windsor. The mayor and the council of Windsor indicated that they could not participate in this program because their budgetary plans were already drawn up, and also, to use the language of the former controller, Mrs. Montrose, because the plan was inadequate in that it did not provide financial assistance from the two senior levels of government in connection with supplies.

I am sure my hon. friend knows as well as I do that if he wants to bring in a works program that is really going to put thousands of people to work, the federal share should be extended beyond merely assisting in direct employment. It has to encourage projects, and one way of encouraging projects will be for the federal and provincial governments to do more than merely share the cost of labour involved in those projects. In my own city of Windsor, where there has been heavy unemployment, we have not been able to take advantage of this program. I think the fact that in the province of Ontario this program has not put more than—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—9,000 or 10,000 to work—

Mr. Starr: Over 11,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —over 11,000 people to work, in a province of 6 million people—

Mr. Starr: But this program was not designed to put everybody to work.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —is a pretty good indication of the failure of this program. We admit that this type of program is valuable. What we are asking the minister to do is to announce, at the earliest possible date, whether or not the program is to be continued; that is what we asked last year.

Mr. Starr: I promised the hon. member that the date would be announced at the earliest possible time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister say that this program to cope with unemployment will be announced before we rise at the end of June or the middle of July? Will the minister promise us that?

Mr. Starr: A decision will have to be made in the light of the situation in the month of August.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says the month of August, but parliament will not be sitting. We were caught that way last year. The Leader of the Opposition, in the month of June—

Mr. Pickersgill: We asked for it in August last year.

Mr. Starr: You did not know about it in August.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Leader of the Opposition, in the months of June and August, asked the Minister of Labour if he did not think that in view of the outlook for the fall and winter the government should take steps to do something about combatting unemployment. That request was supported by members of the opposition. Nothing was done between August and the time when, a week or so before the Prime Minister left the country, he announced the program in Saskatoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: At a provincial convention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, at a provincial convention. We do not want to be caught in the same situation, because we have had a very serious level of unemployment this year. Many thousands of people have suffered as a result. Having promised to do something about unemployment, this government owes to the unemployed and to this parliament the obligation to tell us, before we leave, what are its plans to meet unemployment next fall and winter.

Mr. Starr: I just want to repeat to the hon. member what I said earlier, namely that the responsibility for action in this matter rests with the government and we are assuming that responsibility.

Mr. Pickersgill: Parliament does not matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure I understand my hon. friend's difficulty. I know that if he were left alone and were the only minister in the government he would announce today that this program was going to be continued, and that its features would be refined and liberalized so it could be more effective. But I am not addressing myself only to the minister; I am addressing myself to all the members of the government who have the obligation of sharing with him the responsibility for action. Surely we are entitled to know, before this session closes, whether the municipalities can now start preparing programs that will at least put this same number to work, if not more. But if the hon. gentleman waits, as I am afraid it is his intention, not until August, September or October but until November, we shall have a recurrence of this same situation; and a year from now we shall be arguing in this house, just as we are arguing at this moment, and criticising the government for not having taken in the middle of 1959 preparatory steps to meet a situation in late 1959 and the winter of 1960. That is the reason for the proposal made by the hon. member for Laurier. It was made for the purpose of assisting the minister in the passage of his estimates and at the same time preserving—as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out a moment ago—the rights of parliament, in its right to ascertain government policy with regard to the most serious problem that confronts us in Canada at this time, namely that of unemployment. This government owes to this parliament and to this country, more than any other government in the history of Canada, action along these lines because this government made a solemn commitment to the unemployed of our nation as no other government has ever done. For that reason the government should not hesitate to give us now a clear indication of its policy.

The hon. member for Trinity the other day outlined a program which, if adopted, would put many thousands of people to work. What is the government's attitude with regard to that program? Does it accept what the hon. member for Trinity suggested? Does it think his suggestion had any merit? This is the opportunity for the Minister of Labour to tell us. If he does not, we can only conclude that this government is going to run a calculated risk and trust that there will be no unemployment of a serious nature next year. In running it, it runs the risk of adding, unwittingly or wittlingly, to the continued discomfort and distress of thousands of people.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, every time I rise to speak I always seem to be doing so against the clock. However, that may be a good thing. I did not intend to speak at this stage, but this morning I received from one of my constituents a letter which has prompted me to do so. I should like to read a portion of this letter. It reads in part as follows:

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Dear Doug.:

This morning's headlines are "steady workers to pay more employment insurance". Surely you can help to curb this. For 11 years I have worked for my boss and paid employment insurance. If I stop, I will get one year of insurance benefits that will not keep me happy. Why can't we have as the U.S.A. have, the security plan, forced saving that all comes back to the worker? After all, it is my money. I have already paid taxes. Why should the "steady" worker keep the numbers happy who never stay on a job longer than possible?

To me, Mr. Chairman, that letter indicates that there is some feeling of dissatisfaction among these workers who are steadily employed. They understandably feel that the money they have paid into the fund is theirs and that they are being penalized by virtue of being steady employees.

In order to remove this feeling of dissatisfaction may I make the following proposal to the Minister of Labour. Can some consideration be given to protecting the unemployment insurance fund by making the contributions of the employee payable to his estate if the contributor never draws on the fund? The estate created by his contributions might be a very modest one, but I think such a procedure might give some people the incentive to build up their contributions instead of thinking of ways and means of depleting the fund at every opportunity.

If such a plan were adopted the contributor would feel that his contributions would be a sort of savings fund. Even if the estate were a modest one I think it might be of some assistance to those in the lower income brackets who, after all, make up the larger number of people who pay into this fund. It might be of some comfort to the older workers who would know that some extra money is coming to their family if anything happens to them. By limiting the amount payable to the estate of the contributor to the actual contributions paid by him we could emphasize to him that it was his fund and that he is not being—if I may use the word—cheated out of his own money.

The minister may see disadvantages in my proposal. I have not spoken about it at great length because I can appreciate the tremendous administrative problems that would arise from such a scheme. However, I make this proposal because I think some consideration should be given to removing this understandable feeling which some of the people have that they are being unjustly penalized.

The Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that prior to the adjournment of this morning's session I had submitted a proposal to the Minister of Labour. This proposal was that in order to remove the feeling prevalent among many that those who are steadily employed subsidize those who are out of work, the contributions paid into the unemployment insurance fund by the steadily employed worker should be made payable to his estate.

I do not intend to repeat the remarks which I made this morning, and I shall conclude by saying that, in my opinion, such a scheme would not only make the contributor feel that he was really protecting his contributions to the extent that he will get all his money back if he has never drawn on the fund, but also I think that such a plan would slow the drain on the unemployment insurance fund because it would encourage people not to use their unemployment insurance benefits unless they really had to. This may be a very difficult plan to implement, and if I may be permitted to say so this is a very ambitious project. However, if the minister does not feel that this project can be implemented at this time, then I would urge that the government consider this plan on a broader basis so it will ultimately tie in with a national program of social security.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of delaying the passing of the estimates of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), but at the request of the Catholic and Canadian trade unions of Joliette, I should like to ask the minister to consider the possibility of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act in view of the fact that certain large categories of workers are not yet receiving the benefits and protection provided by the legislation. The Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended so that the benefits it provides might extend to workers in hospital and religious institutions. All that would be required would be to delete section 27 d and e of the said legislation.

Again at the request of farmers in the federal riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and more especially cigar and cigarette tobacco growers, I must say it would be of paramount importance that the minister consider the possibility of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act, as soon as possible in order to make its benefits available to farm workers. So far, I have received many delegations of farmers from my riding who are having a hard time finding the farm help they need to operate successfully. I know that the government is looking into the possibility of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act and of making it easier for farmers to hire farm hands by allowing such workers to qualify for the benefits provided by the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I admit that the administration of the legislation would be very difficult and complicated. It might be important, perhaps, to consider as soon as possible the possibility of extending the provisions of the act to farmers who grow special crops, such as producers of cigar or cigarette tobacco.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the Minister of Labour, as usual, will look into the possibility of introducing the necessary amendments so that farm workers may enjoy the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have several different topics I wish to say something about with regard to the first item of the labour estimates. First of all, I would like to say something about the winter works program following along the line taken the other day by my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo. In that context I would like to draw some attention again, as has been done once or twice before, to the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo about these municipal winter works projects, which answer is to be found in Hansard of April 22 at page 2928.

I am not going over the details of all these figures, but if they are compared, as the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo compared them, with the latest available figures for unemployment in the different provinces and regions of this country, it will be found that this winter works program is effective in almost precisely inverse proportion to unemployment. This 50-50 arrangement has this effect in this field, as it unhappily has in so many others, that it follows the text: To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.

That is particularly true in the case of the province, one constituency of which has done me the honour of electing me to this parliament. It will be seen that unemployment in that province, according to the latest figures which the minister gave us, was very substantially higher than in any other part of Canada. The reasons for that have been given before and I am not going to go into them in greater detail now, except to say one thing. As the minister knows, there was a disastrous situation in the fisheries of Newfoundland last year, the kind of disaster which I am sure, if it had happened in any other province, would have been relieved by this parliament.

For some reason or other, however, despite the fact that it was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Fisheries in October before the date on which this winter works program was first announced at a political convention in Saskatchewan, nothing was done about it. That announcement was made, as I said, at a political convention of the provincial Tory party; the program which we were denied in parliament was announced at a Tory political convention with this fine disregard for the rights of parliament which unfortunately has been increasingly conspicuous in recent times. The government had promised to consider the suggestion which we put forward at that time and which was supported by all the members from Newfoundland. They promised to consider it when this question arose in the month of January; the Prime Minister told us on the second day of the session, I believe it was, that it was still under consideration. Two days later, or it may have been slightly longer, the Minister of Labour told us that the matter was not being considered.

At one stage of an earlier debate the minister said it was not considered because the proposal was made too late. That was the excuse he made. I point out that the suggestion was made earlier than the winter works program proposed to the municipalities, and that it would not have involved anybody except the federal government. There would have been no problem whatever about carrying it out had there been the will.

The alternative which the government followed—the alternative of making a start upon the building of community stages for fishing settlements—was a very good one, and I commend the government for undertaking it. It was very good for those settlements in which it was done. However, as my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo pointed out, of some 1,300 settlements around the coast of Newfoundland, 20 were affected by this plan to build community stages, and many of the individual projects could not be proceeded with last winter because the program was announced so late. Nevertheless, I may say that the people in those communities are grateful for what is being done.

I hope that next winter the scheme will be extended, and I hope the extension will be announced while we are still here. There is no reason why it should not be announced tomorrow. I can give the Minister of Fisheries a list of the settlements where these community stages would be of permanent benefit to the communities. I can provide him with that list any day he asks for it. The timber could be cut in the fall, and though construction cannot go on while there is ice in the sea, the work could be done early in the spring before the fishing season opens. That would be a real help. I know the Minister of Labour, who is genuinely interested in helping to alleviate unemployment, will at least give serious consideration to this suggestion.

With regard to the winter program itself, as the minister knows there are practically no municipalities in Newfoundland, apart from St. John's and Corner Brook, in the sense in which municipalities exist in other parts of the country, and this program in its original form, was not geared to conditions in Newfoundland at all, though this was the province with the greatest proportion of unemployment. It is true that a provision was subsequently made, as the minister pointed out one day in the house, and I want to be completely fair about this matter, enabling the province to act in lieu of a municipality.

Again, I do not intend to weary the committee by going back to the record, but if hon. members care to look at the speeches which were made by the Liberal members for Newfoundland on the last day of the session, or the day before the last day, and one day before that, they will see that we appealed to the government to implement term 29 of the terms of union without delay. I can tell the minister that if this had been done, and if that money had been paid at the time it should have been paid, and at the time the people of Newfoundland had a right to it, the treasury of Newfoundland would have been in a position to have done things under this winter works program which it has not been able to do. The denial by this government of money which rightfully belonged to the province under the constitution has already, I suspect, cost the province at least half a million dollars in unnecessary interest charges. That $500,000, if it had been spent on a winter work program, would have meant that instead of there being only 26 projects on which $49,000 was spent a very considerably greater sum might have been undertaken.

I myself know of many projects which were suggested but which the provincial government felt could not be proceeded with because there was just not enough leeway in the treasury. Why was this? It was because this government was not sufficiently interested to do something which would have caused very little debate in this house at that time. It was because the government failed to act upon a unanimous request of the house of assembly in Newfoundland asking that they should receive money to which they were entitled under the confederation agreement.

As the text said, to him that hath shall be given. And now we have insult added to injury, and a member of the present government goes to Newfoundland and claims, first of all, that the treasury has received money which has certainly not been paid. Even worse, he claims that the treasury has received funds whose payment has not yet even been authorized by parliament. The Minister of Justice told us this morning that $55 million had been paid into the treasury of Newfoundland last year. He told the board of trade last night that it was $100 million; then he found his arithmetic was all wrong, and changed it to $55 million. His arithmetic is still wrong, because as nearly as one can judge from the budget papers which I have in front of me the figures in respect of payments to Newfoundland including transitional and additional grants amount to $14.7 million. Of that $14.7 million, $13.5 million is called a special grant under the terms of union. Not only has that grant not been paid, but it has not even been voted.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): What has that got to do with the winter works program?

Mr. Pickersgill: One of the reasons why the winter works program was almost a complete failure in Newfoundland was the neglect by this government of its duty to treat Newfoundland as the province has the right to be treated under the constitution, and if that is not related a great deal more to the minister's estimates than the debates about provincial matters we heard at earlier stages in this committee, I cannot think what would be.

Having made that point, I do not intend to continue on the subject because there will be another occasion on which to do so. I hope that occasion will not be long delayed, because this money has still not been voted. Until it is, and until it is made available, necessary services which would provide employment cannot be proceeded with.

I return to this 50-50 formula. The 50-50 formula makes it very easy for relatively prosperous municipalities where the tax base is high and where unemployment is relatively low to embark on schemes for providing employment. But these projects do cause an additional strain upon areas which need help most, the areas where unemployment is highest. I say that this 50-50 method of dealing with this matter is utterly inadequate. It is not only inadequate in relation to the total number of unemployed in the country, but it is inadequate by reason of its method of application. I agree with the minister that we cannot expect this winter works program to provide for all the unemployed in this country. Nobody would be so foolish, I hope, as to suggest that. But to the extent that some employment can be provided in the winter time under this plan, the idea is a good one.

I believe that if an equitable provision is to be made for all Canadians, and if all are to be treated alike, a formula different from the 50-50 formula has to be provided. Indeed, it seems to me that particularly in the Atlantic provinces where unemployment has been regrettably at a much higher level than it has in any other part of the country and where there are in addition a good many very urgently needed federal works that, in some cases, could be timed a bit better—and I shall have something more to say about that when we are discussing the estimates of the Minister of Public Works, statements that have been made before in these debates—a greater effort should be made by the government to accelerate these works. The government should go on to provide a larger share of winter works directly in the form of federal works than has been done up to now.

I believe it was the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam who said he felt sorry for the minister because his colleagues in the cabinet who are responsible for economic policy were not here during the consideration of the minister's estimates. These hon. gentlemen have a much larger share of the responsibility for the level of employment and the consequent level of unemployment than has the minister. I quite agree with what was said in this respect. I agree that it is the policies above of all of the Minister of Finance and to some degree of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and certain other ministers that have a much larger effect on determining the level of employment. The Minister of Labour because he happens to have the responsibility of the unemployment insurance commission must bear the brunt of criticisms that most of us direct not against the Minister of Labour but against the government as a whole with respect to the question of unemployment.

In spite of the recovery that is very marked and, which we on this side hope is going to be very much more marked as the year goes on, we are going to have from this recent recession, as we have had from every recession since the war, an increasing number of people who are left stranded by the recession and the technological changes that follow a recession. In my opinion, one of the most useful suggestions made in this parliament for some time was the suggestion made a week ago by the hon. member for Trinity that a massive retraining program should be undertaken and this problem should not just be tossed off on the provincial governments or local authorities.

This is something for which a good foundation has been laid over the years by vocational grants, the progressive improvement of vocational schools and the progressive training of competent instructors in these schools. While everything cannot be done at once it is perfectly obvious that a very great deal more could be done. If we are going to meet the problems of change, instead of trying to bolster up uneconomic industries in the places where they are, a great deal along this line is going to have to be done and in a big way.

There is another problem that is relatively new. I am not criticizing the minister for this because it is not his responsibility at the present time. I am suggesting in some way or other it ought to be a responsibility of the unemployment insurance commission to see that the names of those who are unemployed for lengthy periods are kept in mind for employment opportunities as they arise.

We have the regrettable situation now that once a man or a woman has exhausted his stamps and ceases to get unemployment insurance there is a progressive tendency for that person to be forgotten and I am not blaming the commission for this because it is just in the nature of things. Such persons then have to go on provincial or local relief and while, if they are insistent enough, their names are kept on the rolls of the employment service, after a time they may be forgotten. I know there are many instances where this has happened and I know of experiences of this kind in the case of my own constituents whose names are dropped as dormant because these people having no income to live on except relief do not like to spend what little they have on 5 cent stamps to keep writing in to tell the offices to keep their names on the rolls. The result is that the people who have been out of work longest and need employment most and who should get first consideration receive last consideration. This was pointed out by several other hon. members and it is a particularly serious problem in Newfoundland with the difficulties of communication we have there. In some way or other a radical new departure has to be made in this field.

I think the minister's department should give serious consideration to establishing some machinery for making sure that they keep track of those people and that an effort is made to see that they get a fair share of the employment that turns up. When a job comes along I do not blame the officials for saying, "Here is someone in St. John's who can do it," and forgetting that there are people in Bonavista who are equally competent to handle it. I do not blame them at all. However, we in parliament and especially those in the government should see that there is established machinery to prevent that happening. That is the point I am seeking to make and it is a highly important one.

Just as the St. Laurent government during the little recession of 1954-55 provided unemployment assistance on a 50-50 basis with the provinces, so a new step forward is going to have to be taken if we are going to have any considerable amount of continuing unemployment. I do not think a 50-50 contribution to relief is going to be adequate if the numbers are going to continue on unemployment relief that in some provinces were on unemployment relief in the past winter. I think we will have to go back and take another look at these proposals made by the government of which the hon. member for Essex East was a member in 1945. Those proposals were not put into effect, as everyone knows, because in the first place some of the provinces would not agree on them and in the second place because over a long period we had enjoyed virtually full employment or even more than full employment and the unemployment assistance problem was of a minor character, even in the winter time, until about 1954-55.

If this problem is going to drag on, even with a considerable measure of recovery, steps will have to be taken to solve it. In part because of the nature of the thing and in part because of the fact that an increasing number of people who are now unemployed are older people who experience difficulty in obtaining employment, a number are unskilled people and a number are people whose mobility is very limited; in view of all these circumstances the whole problem has to be looked at anew and in a different way.

A serious problem exists in Newfoundland despite what the Prime Minister said just a little over a year ago at Brantford. I just happen to have that reference before me and I have lots more like it. This appears in quotation marks and was reported in the Toronto Star of February 18, 1958, and is an extract from a speech made the day before by the Prime Minister:

"The humblest of our people will not be forgotten," he promised. "The people who are unemployed will not be put in the false position of being put on relief."

There were no if's, and's or but's attached to that statement. It was unequivocal:

The people who are unemployed will not be put in the false position of being put on relief.

That was the promise upon which a good many of the 207 followers of the Prime Minister were elected to this house. That was the promissory note given on their behalf.

What do we find in the province of Newfoundland? In the month of March this year 7,018 families involving 37,321 persons received assistance in kind. Of these, 6,078 heads of families are employable. They and their dependants total 34,359 persons. I admit at once that, because of unemployment insurance for fishermen, that does include a considerable number of fishermen who were not able to qualify last year for unemployment insurance because of the failure of the fishery and that it was abnormally inflated on that account. But regardless of whether or not that is taken into account, it is a very different picture from this promise. It so happens that that is the state of affairs in a province with, unhappily, the lowest per capita income in the country, a province which by this government was denied its just due, denied the means that it was entitled to to help cope with this problem, a province which was left with this problem despite that promise of the Prime Minister.

I do think the people of Canada are going to hold the Prime Minister to account for that promise on every occasion on which they have the opportunity to hold him to account, and I think he should be held to account because the people should not be encouraged with that kind of promise if there is no intention whatever to implement it. It is simply playing ducks and drakes with human lives.

In view of the financial position of the country after two years of Tory government I do not expect that we are going to have the government assuming the whole responsibility for unemployment assistance but I do think that in some fashion or other the government has got to find a way to implement that pledge at least in spirit if they cannot do it in letter, and I do not believe, of course, that they ever will do it in letter. I am not going to say that I do not believe they ever intended to but I say I do not believe they will in fact do it in letter.

Mr. Henderson: Oh, they likely will.

Mr. Pickersgill: You mean after the unemployed are all dead. Perhaps the hon. member might listen to this quotation from the Prime Minister. I had not intended to read it again. It has been read into the record a good many times but it bears repetition. It is from his Charlottetown speech and the report appeared in the Toronto Star of February 28, 1958, a promise in quotation marks which has never been denied.

An hon. Member: It would be the authority.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it has been read over and over again and it has never been denied by the Prime Minister although he has had plenty of opportunities to deny it. The Prime Minister is pretty good at denying things. He denied the 15 per cent diversion of trade but he has never denied this. The report reads:

"I will make one more promise," the Prime Minister asserted.

"I have had experience, I know the lot of the average Canadian, I've gone through it," he said, dropping his voice and speaking in solemn tones.

An hon. Member: Is that in there?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, that is right, "dropping his voice and speaking in solemn tones."

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, but this is a report by a very competent and reliable newspaperman.

Mr. MacInnis: There are reliable newspapers in Fredericton, too, Jack.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know there are a lot of members, especially from Cape Breton island, who do not like to be reminded about this pledge of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does not want to be reminded of the affair in Fredericton either.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will deal with the hon. gentleman and his affair in Fredericton any time it is relevant to the rules and I will just tell the hon. gentleman right now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, this is relevant. I am not going to deal with anything that is irrelevant. What did his leader and the maritime candidates promise at that great Atlantic assembly in Moncton in 1957? What did they promise? They promised that coal production would be increased in the maritime provinces and more employment would be given.

Mr. MacInnis: No, they did not; that is not so.

Mr. Pickersgill: What has happened? They are now paying the fares of miners to go to northern Ontario. That is what is happening.

An hon. Member: Talk about Manitoba.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I do not mind talking about Manitoba either. I will say this about Manitoba. Manitoba has suffered less from the recession than any other part of Canada because for years and years it had a good Liberal government running its affairs, a prudent government, and the lowest provincial taxation level in the country.

Mr. Nesbitt: Why did they vote Tory then?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am going to come back—

The Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members that one speaker has the floor at the present time and I would ask them to kindly refrain from interrupting too frequently. May I also remind the hon. member that we are discussing labour estimates and will he please relate his comments to the same.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be delighted to come back to this "let no one suffer" pledge. If hon. members have forgotten the beginning of it I can read it again but perhaps that would be trespassing unduly on the patience of the Minister of Labour. I continue with the quotation:

"I am not here for the purpose of telling of my experience in my early days until well into my late teens"—

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with labour?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would like to listen he would learn that this is in 1958 when the Prime Minister was really concerned about the plight of the unemployed. I continue:

"I know, I know . . . a man who is unemployed is a human being, not a statistic.

That knowledge is not peculiar or special to the Prime Minister. The rest of us know it too.

"I make this promise. We acted."

I do not know in what sense he used the word "acted" but I leave it to hon. members to imagine. Certainly it was not in the sense of doing anything about the matter. The way they acted was to send parliament packing before we could see what a financial mess there was in the country brought about by their policies. They acted to have an election in order to make promises like this that have not been kept. That is the way they acted.

"We acted. My pledge is to every man and woman in this nation who is unemployed"—

[Mr. MacInnis.]

To every man and woman in this nation who is unemployed.

—"so long as I am Prime Minister no one will be allowed to suffer in this nation."

There is lots more like this.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, after all those long speeches by hon. members in the opposition, there is, of course, not much more to say. I thought that, somehow, there would be an end to the spate of words we have been hearing the last few days, first on the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and now on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr).

Mr. Chairman, I have little to add. I just want to make a few remarks of general interest, and more particularly with regard to the people in my riding.

Before tackling the main neglect, I would like to point out that, after listening to several hon. members who spoke about these matters, and especially hon. members for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who took part in this morning's debate, I fully endorse their remarks as to the special attention that should be given to the rural areas. It is a recognized fact that farming areas are faced with a very special problem, and I am convinced that the hon. Minister of Labour will seriously consider any suggestion that has been made to solve that problem.

Mr. Chairman, I know that there has been some improvement in the Unemployment Insurance Act, but I trust that future amendments will further improve it.

Mr. Chairman, I would also refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) last week, i.e. on May 8, which is to be found on pages 3476 to 3479 of the official record. I do not fully approve what he has said, but he nevertheless made certain statements with which I agree. They mainly concern seasonal unemployment which, as the hon. member said, is due to the climate of this country.

I also agree with the hon. member's remarks about the letter of His Eminence Cardinal Leger on the unemployment insurance problem. I believe that this distinguished figure of the Catholic church has set an example in that field, by asking the authorities to intervene and by personally organizing a works program, last winter, to help relieve the unemployment problem in the city of Montreal.

Many members of the opposition, including the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) and the one who just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), have stated that the winter works program of the federal government had not yielded favourable results; I believe those hon. members are ill-informed and do not want to admit the good results achieved by the Conservative government's initiative. In my area, at any rate, the winter works program has been fairly substantial and has given very interesting results. In many cities, the program helped reduce the number of unemployed and, in this connection, and for the record, I should like, Mr. Chairman, to refer to certain articles published in the newspapers of my area, particularly in the Val d'Or Star of April 15 last, page 4, or again to a more recent issue of that same paper, that is the one of May 7, as well as to the May 7, issue of the Écho Abitibien. In their summary of the work done by the employment office last winter, those newspapers report that in each of the winter months, the number of unemployed in my area has been less than it was the previous year.

Of course, there are still difficulties because of seasonal unemployment, when workers are without jobs in the wintertime. Of course, things would be the same every winter. However, in March and April, just to take those two as illustrations, the Val d'Or employment office reported a drop of close to 1,000 in the number of unemployed as compared with a year before, and things are much the same at the Rouyn office, whose territory covers a large section of my constituency, both for purposes of unemployment insurance and as an employment bureau. The Rouyn office is also responsible for the area north of the Pontiac-Temiscamingue constituency, and the western section of the Chapleau constituency.

In the light of statistics issued by the local office of the national employment service, it is found that unemployment has markedly decreased during the winter. There are still problems, of course, but I am sure the Conservative government will not evade them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the number of unemployed in your constituency at this time?

Mr. Martel: At the present time, according to the local N.E.S. office, figures for the month of April show that there were 3,446 applications for employment, as compared to 4,390 a year ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is serious.

Mr. Martel: It is serious enough, but at this time of the year, you have to realize that as in past years, construction work has not yet started, though things should be picking up any day now. It must also be realized that road, housing and public building construction jobs should be starting soon. According to a report which appeared in the Thursday, May 7 issue of l'Echo Abitibien, the local N.E.S. office has made the following statement in this regard, and I quote:

> Resumption of logging operations, together with the various construction projects scheduled to start soon in the district, will certainly provide employment for many jobless workers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Labour —I have already submitted the matter to him in a letter I sent him—to a brief which was submitted in January 1955 to the former government, about a relief program for employable unemployed. May I put on record the following findings of the brief.

> The Canadian Council of Social Welfare urges all governments in Canada, that is the federal, provincial and municipal governments, to take all necessary steps to bring about a conference on the matter of relief for employable unemployed, in order to best determine the sharing of government responsibilities in meeting the needs of the unemployed who are not covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act, and to guarantee the establishment of a program for the above mentioned group, as soon as possible.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that the Unemployment Insurance Act covers the cases mentioned in the findings of the Canadian Council of Social Welfare, but I would like to call the attention of the minister to the conditions which exist in areas like mine, where many communities are not incorporated and where family heads must, occasionally, turn to this form of assistance because they are unemployed. Under this act, provincial and municipal authorities must co-operate, but in the case of unorganized communities, or communities without a municipal council, I believe that the federal government should consider the matter with a view to bringing about a solution and to help alleviate in these most difficult times the hardship suffered by the unemployed in those communities.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to the statement made a few days ago by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, a statement that rather surprised me. When the discussion was concluded after many interruptions, I did not want to mention it, but I did make note of it and I merely wish to set the record straight. To avoid any misunderstanding, I shall quote from the official record—not, of course, the whole statement—because a lot has been said on this subject these last few days—and I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house, but the hon. member said, as reported on page 3598 of Hansard of May 12:

(Text):

. . . I recall to the minds of hon. members that this measure would not be on the statute books but for the fortunate circumstance that Mr. Mackenzie King was undiscouraged by the refusal of the present premier of Quebec to agree to an amendment to the constitution to make it possible. As soon as the Liberals won the election in Quebec in 1939 and agreed to a constitutional amendment this legislation was possible and was put on the statute books by a Liberal government.

(Translation):

Well, sir, what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate forgot to add is the manner in which Mr. Mackenzie King and the Liberal government had amended the constitution. That amendment was made by means of a telegram. He did not choose to mention that. And I am sure that if he checks on it, he will find that this amendment was made by the federal government by means of a telegram and that the provincial government's reply came the same way.

I believe it is unconstitutional to make an amendment in such a way.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a comment or two upon some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Oxford, who felt that the Minister of Labour was losing some of his popularity and who attempted to suggest that the reason for this was the critical comments of opposition members about governmental policy. If the minister's popularity is slipping, I submit it is only because of the people with whom he is associated in the cabinet. It is the entire Conservative cabinet attitude which is getting more unsavoury all the time. If the minister agrees with what was said by the hon. member for Oxford, he merely has to look around him and try to perk up the ideas and policies of his deskmates. Maybe then he too will be getting back on the pedestal to which he was climbing up a while ago.

I was interested in one thing that was said by my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in an off-handed remark in reference to something which happened in Manitoba yesterday. He said that the reason that they did not suffer in Manitoba to the degree that they had suffered in other provinces was that they had had a Liberal government out there for so many years, which government had some rather progressive policies and thereby had protected Manitobans against the policies of this particular government. Then in the next breath he turns around and complains about the poor economic conditions and the suffering that takes place in Newfoundland. I wonder whether he would associate his remarks with the Liberal government in Newfoundland as he did with the Liberal government in Manitoba? I am quite sure he would not say some things and say that Premier Smallwood is to blame for the suffering that takes place in Newfoundland. But nevertheless that rather paradoxical situation in which he finds himself is indicative of the general Liberal quandary that they have been in for quite some time.

I should like to give one indication of support to a suggestion made initially, I believe, by the hon. member for Laurier, and the request was supported by other Liberal members. I refer to the possibility of holding over the administration item until other matters in the department had been dealt with. I support that suggestion and I have done so for a long period of time. My support is not restricted to the request in so far as it applies to the Department of Labour but I think it could be also applied to other departments. Often times we find—and it may even be so in the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour now —that once you get past the administration item and get into some of the other items that follow and some of the details, questions arise either by answers of the minister in which he includes matters not specifically connected with that particular item that might be under discussion at that time and we find the desire arising in many members to speak about something that should have been dealt with on the administration item but they were not familiar with it because the information was not available or had not been given by the particular minister at that time. I believe this process was followed, if I am not mistaken, when we considered the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I believe we left the first item over and took it as the last item for consideration in that department's estimates and it worked out very well.

Mr. Starr: The suggestion was that the first item be left over until the end of the session.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Howard: I misunderstood. I thought it was until the estimates of the Department of Labour had been concluded. Then I must qualify the support I gave to the suggestion and say that I support that suggestion only in so far as putting it at the end of the estimates of that particular department in order to pick up the tag ends of questions that could be dealt with under general administration.

In so far as the winter works program is concerned, I have a comment or two to make about that matter. However, I should like to mention a series of things on the general matter. Some of them apply specifically to the constituency of Skeena. Others are of more general application. The suggestion has been made to the minister that when contracts are let for federal government public works projects a provision should be contained in those contracts to the effect that people from the locality where the work is being done be used to the greatest possible extent.

At the present time and during the last winter they were working in Prince Rupert on an airport. Because of conditions which were not specifically provided for in the contract or may not even have been under the jurisdiction of the minister we found employees being hired to work on that particular airport project coming out of Vancouver and coming up to Prince Rupert, while people who had lived in Prince Rupert a great deal of their lives were unemployed and were unable to get work on the airport job because of this situation that existed so far as the relationships were concerned between the contractor doing the work and the unions with whom he had collective agreements.

I realize that this matter could invade the jurisdiction of provincial governments in so far as their certification and bargaining processes are concerned. I certainly think the minister, wherever he possibly can arrange it, should ensure that local people are given the first consideration in jobs on projects that come under the federal government. If to another one of the promises which the Tories made when they were elected the minister had applied himself as assiduously as he applies himself to some other things, maybe we would have been moving in the direction where this situation could have been overcome with more ease than is possible at the present time.

We have a problem also with respect to the operation of the national employment service in keeping a record of jobs available and so on, in that this service does not seem to operate too effectively when it comes to attempting to provide employment for native Indian people. The attitude of some of the officials—I would not say a great number of them—in the N.E.S. offices that I have spoken of appear to look upon the Indian as being outside of their jurisdiction and they do not give the Indian the consideration that should be given to that person in seeking employment. I do not suggest that this is a matter of conscious discrimination on the part of N.E.S. officials against Indians. It may be part of our whole attitude toward Indians in that they may not even come to the N.E.S. offices as much as would non-Indian persons. But this attitude exists and I do not think the fullest possible consideration is being given by the N.E.S. offices in attempting to find employment for native Indian people. This means a great deal, of course, in the northern part of the country. It means a great deal in the constituencies of Skeena and Cariboo where there are a great number of native Indian people. When you get farther away from areas that are populated to any degree by native Indians the problem becomes less difficult. But I certainly think that some consideration should be given to that particular aspect of it.

I certainly endorse the suggestion that the too little, too late approach to the winter works program of last winter could easily exist again this coming winter. I am not sure whether the minister dealt fully with the argument from the Liberal members as to the preparation by municipalities, and the planning that is necessary in order to enter into certain types of projects. The minister mentioned the budgetary and fiscal arrangements which the municipalities must make and suggested that he had had some experience in this field, as I understand he has. I do not think it is a question of preparation of the municipal budgets and the levying of taxes and so on necessary to carry out certain types of work as much as it is a question of attempting—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I did not mention that.

Mr. Howard: The minister mentioned the question of budgets and that these budgets had already been prepared this year.

Mr. Starr: Because it was brought to my attention that budgets had to be taken into consideration.

Mr. Howard: That is precisely what I am saying. This argument, I think, should not be given so much weight. You should not give as much consideration to budgets being an important factor in the preparation of winter works as you should to the planning of the work itself, the drawing of the plans, the survey work which has to be done, the contracts which have to be let, the bidding, searching around for materials, and so on. That type of planning is what I am talking about.

The municipalities should have as much notice as they can possibly get in advance, and today is not too soon for the government to indicate to them that next winter they will be participating in certain types of winter works cost-sharing programs so that the municipalities can start to prepare the necessary plans and draw up the sketches and see how much they can do and how much money they can allocate, and that sort of thing, rather than waking up in the middle of a November morning and saying, "We will go over the whole rat race again", merely because the government did not make this announcement sooner.

The minister mentioned something about August or September, and he said that at that time the government may be in a position to announce what things the winter works program might include for the coming year. That to me is not sufficient. Surely the government should have some opinion now, based on this experience which it has gone through in the last few months, as to whether or not it is possible to go into the question in the next winter. It does not appear to be too complicated unless—and this is the reason for the refusal of the minister to make any comment or any announcement so far as next year's work is concerned—the government is planning to greatly expand the field of types of works which the municipalities can go into within which the federal government will participate. If that is the reason and the government is going to expand it to include such things as municipal buildings and so on, then I wish the minister would say that so that the municipalities may have an idea where they might be able to expand the type of projects they are going to go into.

I would now like to comment about the attitude of the government and of the minister toward this question of the numbers of unemployed. Invariably during this session we find references are made to the comparison between the numbers of unemployed this year and those last year at a similar time. I understand that in some cases it has been lower; the number of unemployed has been lower than what it was, say, a year ago. This is in effect saying that the government has accepted the principle that there should be twice as many unemployed as there were before they took office, and they are trying to create the impression, even by their own statistics—the ones they use which are most beneficial to the government—that half a million people unemployed across Canada is normal and that we should not worry too much about it, when they should know full well that it is something they should concern themselves with.

For two years we have been running at double, and more than double in some cases, the number of unemployed people which we had before the government took office. In all fairness to the people and to this parliament, the government and the minister should make references to or comparisons between the time before they took office and the start of the high level of unemployment after they took office, instead of trying to cover up and leave the impression with the general public that things are not quite so bad as last year and leave the impression that this government accepts the fact that half a million people unemployed is something which is normal and we should not worry too much about it. As long as we keep below the figure or not too much above it they think our economy is running along pretty smoothly. That is a pretty callous attitude to take toward these people who are unemployed and have been unemployed for many months, and who have not much to look forward to except unemployment again this coming winter.

I had a note to make a comment about automation and the necessity of a retraining program and a channelling of the services, abilities and skills of people lost to a given industry and moving into some other type of service or program. My friend from Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned this and made reference to the hon. member for Trinity having been the first to espouse or propound the idea—this is absolute nonsense and my friends from Bonavista-Twillingate and Trinity know it—that the Liberal party came up with this suggestion first in the land, and so on. That is not so and they know it. All they have been doing in the opposition is carrying on the practice of thievery of other people's ideas, taking them as their own and saying, "We thought of this first." I do not mind. I have said many times when the Liberals were in office, and I say it now when the Tories are in office, that if you want to steal part of our program that is all right with us. But why do you not take the whole thing? We do not mind. All we are concerned with is putting these ideas into effect, and I do not care whether a Liberal government puts them into effect or whether a Conservative government puts them into effect, or even a C.C.F. government. The only slight difference is that if a C.C.F. government put them into effect they would be done properly and not in a half-hearted fashion.

I want to make a comment about uniformity of legislation in so far as the labour field is concerned, and in particular as far as employing local people. At the present time, as the minister knows, and as I am sure every hon. member knows, we have eleven sets of varying types of labour legislation in Canada. We have those under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. Then we have each of the ten provinces with the authority by constitution to develop and pass their own particular legislation. This allows a very unwise, and I think unfortunate, situation to develop where we have eleven different sets of laws applying to people all across Canada, and applying to employers and to the working class people who deal through unions with their employers. We have industries which cross provincial boundaries. The meat packing industry is a prime example. The steel industry is another, the lumber industry and the pulp and paper industry in Newfoundland, for example the Bowater company; and the employees in those other provinces are treated more fairly than they are in Newfoundland when it comes to legislation. The point I am getting at is that the great necessity exists for the minister to concern himself less with going to Geneva and more with concentrating upon uniformity of legislation in the provinces in an attempt to—

Mr. Starr: I am not concerned with going to Geneva. I think that is uncalled for.

Mr. Howard: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Starr: I say, I am not so concerned about going to Geneva. I think that is most uncalled for.

Mr. Howard: The minister says, "I think that is most uncalled for."

Mr. Starr: If my work requires me to be here I will be here, and I do not think it is up to the hon. member to determine whether I should or should not be here anyway.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: It might not be up to me to determine whether the minister should be here or not; that is entirely his business. I made no reference to whether he should be here or not, or whether he has decided, rightly or wrongly, to be here at the moment. He is here at the moment and we are considering his estimates. If he likes to go some place else, that is his business. I do not know why he is getting so excited or uppity about it, unless I touched on a sore point.

I will put it in a more delicate fashion as the minister seems so sensitive about it. If the minister would apply himself to some of these problems under his jurisdiction, such as the question of uniformity of legislation, more so than he has in the past, we might have some sensible type of legislation throughout Canada. We might see more desire on the part of the people who have to work under the act to operate in a more sensible fashion.

The minister was very concerned about this when he sat on the opposition side of the house and when he was campaigning around the country. It is well known that one of the subjects on which he and his friends campaigned was the uniformity of legislation. They said they would bend every effort in the direction of establishing uniform legislation in Canada. So far, nothing has been accomplished and we would appreciate an answer from the minister telling the committee exactly what he proposes should happen in the future with regard to uniformity of legislation. We hope he can do this before the present debate concludes, and before he leaves to attend whatever function he has in mind.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, like many other members, I was very much surprised and disappointed that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) refused to let the first item of his budget stand so that we could come back to it later; while in the meantime we could examine any necessary legislation.

The minister told us that the 50 per cent share of the salaries paid to employees working on municipal winter projects has been of very great help. We readily agree. According to the figures supplied by the minister, winter work projects provided employment for 37,000 unemployed but that is out of a total of more than 550,000 people, which indicates that it is entirely inadequate and that we are right in asking the government to introduce a legislation capable of solving the biggest part of the problem. Whether there be 550,000 or 600,000 or 700,000 or 450,000 unemployed in Canada in the wintertime, that is too many. It is a situation which is abnormal for Canada, a young, productive and growing country. Therefore, we have the right to ask the government and the hon. minister to introduce some adequate legislation before the end of this session.

The minister tells us that he will wait until August or September to see how much unemployment there will be at that time.

I remember, that ever since they came to power, the Conservatives have never wanted to face facts. I also recall that, in the beginning, when we were speaking of the extent of unemployment, when we were saying that our position was serious, we were told that we were crepe hangers and that all we wanted was to create an impression of hardship in Canada. Yet, though they wanted to ignore it, unemployment has shown its real face and, at this time, even if we accept the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr Fleming) to the effect that there is a general recovery of business in this country, we cannot say that unemployment is going to vanish overnight. We are certain that, next winter, unemployment will be on a much larger scale than in the winters which preceded the coming into power of the Conservative party. The latter may not be entirely responsible for those conditions. But those conditions are here. We are facing a problem. There are more unemployed in Canada than there should be. At this time, official statistics give us a figure of about 500,000 unemployed, which does not illustrate the actual situation, because those figures do not take into account the many thousands of people without jobs, who, for the past year, have not been working enough to be entitled to benefits, and who, at this time, are falling back on the municipalities.

What is the government doing? What legislation has it enacted to help municipalities in that field? It is not sufficient to have some winter works done in order to help municipalities to get out of the situation that forces them, in the matter of relief, to spend the huge amounts that they did not use to spend.

To quote but one case, in the city of Hull, in 1955, the amount provided by the provincial government and by the municipality for public relief was $188,000. In 1959 the amount, including the provincial government contribution that the municipality will spend, will reach $588,000. The difference is extraordinary. We cannot ask the municipalities to assume responsibility for the present unfavourable conditions which are not their doing. Yet, the burden falls heaviest on them.

Can we blame the municipalities if Canada's foreign trade has substantially decreased? Can we blame municipalities for our production surpluses? Can we blame them if the cost of certain commodities is too high to compete with foreign products? Can we blame municipalities if the Prime Minister, when he came to power, announced that famous 15 per cent decrease of Canada's trade with the United States, a step which vexed our neighbours and made them take steps that are detrimental to Canadian trade? The municipalities cannot be held responsible for all those things. It is the federal government which is responsible for all the steps it has taken. Why does not the federal government admit today that there is a problem, one for the government to solve? Besides, the provincial governments admit there is a problem, but a problem which goes beyond normal winter unemployment.

A law has been enacted to increase certain taxes, or to impose new ones; but that will not solve the problem. The Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced to help those who are suffering from unemployment, on a temporary or seasonal basis. It was not drafted in such a way as to provide for an extraordinary situation like the one which we are now facing. A new law should be enacted, which would protect the unemployed who have not enough stamps to get their benefits, protect those who have not worked long enough to be entitled to those benefits, and protect the municipalities which are now in a deplorable situation, lacking the sources of revenue available to the federal government or its powers of taxation. And we have seen, this year, that the federal government indeed has powers of taxation.

The federal government should introduce adequate legislation which could alleviate the hardships suffered by the municipalities, and cure the prevailing disorder.

A moment ago, I heard the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) ask the minister to extend the Unemployment Insurance Act to hospital employees, to those who work in religious institutions, and to farm hands. If it is the minister's intention to suggest such changes, assuming they are needed—I am not as familiar as the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm with the problem of farm labour—the Minister of Labour should be in a position, before the end of this session, to put forward new legislation to try to remedy the problem. However, we ask him to let the first item stand until the end of the session, on the understanding that we will pass the other items as quickly as possible, though giving them fairly close attention. Then we might hope that the government would come forward with legislation which would help settle present conditions. But how does the minister react to our suggestion? He tells us to wait and see, and that there is no need to let the first item stand. Yet there is nothing extraordinary in such a request. It was granted in several cases when the Liberals were in office, particularly where Mr. Abbott, agreed to postpone consideration of a budget item to allow for its consideration at a later date.

I also recall that when I was a member of the Quebec legislature—again, it is true, this was under a Liberal administration—it was customary, though I am told this is no longer the case, to postpone consideration of the first item of every department until the last day of the session. So if anything came up before the end of a session, we were thus able to come back and explain to the minister why we were calling upon him to settle this or that problem. Today, however, the government is apparently afraid that the Liberal party, or the socialist party, may rise and bring up points which might cause embarrassment to the government.

But all we are asking for, all that we want, is an improvement of the situation for those who are in need. That is all we ask. We ask the government to introduce legislation, and if we find it sound and capable of curing the existing ills, we will help put it through.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that if the minister would let the first item of his department stand, we could certainly adopt it quickly at the end of the session.

If only the government would care to solve the existing problems. But far from it. The government wants to ignore the problem. They believe that the situation will solve itself, that those problems have cropped up by themselves and will disappear in the same way. Well, Mr. Chairman, we do not see it that way. We believe the government has a very great responsibility in regard to the situation prevailing at the present time, and that it must introduce legislation which would, first of all, help the department of public welfare and the municipalities to solve that problem. In fact, municipalities are now spending thousands of dollars which they would not have to spend were the government to adopt some legislative measure allowing the seasonal unemployed, and those who do not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits because they have not enough hours of work to their credit for the year, to get help from the present government.

Direct assistance to the unemployed is the federal government's business. The present situation looks very much like the one which prevailed from 1930 to 1935. We are of the opinion that we cannot afford to wait until this plague kills the population. The government must act at once. That is what we are asking. And yet, the minister is there lulling himself into the belief that everything will turn out all right. He seems to believe, indeed naively, that the statements made by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance outside the house are gospel truth and that everything will turn out all right, as by magic.

Well, Mr. Chairman, "to govern is to foresee": a government that does not foresee is remiss in its duty, and if the government is not remiss in its duty, then it is simply lacking in the necessary intelligence to govern the country at the present time, according to its needs. I believe it is rather that latter quality which is lacking in the government, since it does not seem to grasp the importance of the situation.

Mr. Chairman, once again, I urge the minister to kindly agree to let that first item of his department stand; the other items could then be adopted rapidly. If he agrees to postpone the consideration of that first item, I can assure you that we will not take advantage of that to press on our demands constantly, but merely to ask him to introduce the proper and necessary legislation.

If the government refuses to recognize the evil when it exists, they must expect us to ask them to assume their responsibilities, something they should have done, in any case, in the two years during which they have been running the country.

It is my contention that the government has neglected the situation. It has made some efforts towards solving the unemployment problem, finding jobs for 37,000 workers when there were over 550,000 unemployed across the country. That is just a drop of water in an ocean. Surely, the government must do more than that, because the figure of 550,000 unemployed does not represent the true situation; the number of unemployed was greater, because statistics provided by unemployment insurance offices included only people who qualified for unemployment insurance. However, the thousands of workers who do not qualify require special attention from the government, yet they are being overlooked.

Municipalities are being driven almost to bankruptcy as a result of such conditions. Can you imagine a city such as Hull, with a population of about 50,000, spending $588,000 on winter works? It would be doing more, proportionately, than the federal government has done across the country last winter. The result is that municipalities are forced to help the unemployed, because as human beings, we cannot allow people to starve in a country enjoying prosperity. Besides, those people would not be suffering hardship, and municipalities would not be driven to bankruptcy or very near it, if the federal government would just assume its responsibility and work out a solution to such problems.

We urge the government to introduce and adopt the legislation needed to solve this problem. We, in the opposition, have only one method open to us to protect our ability to carry out our duties, and that is to ask the Minister of Labour to allow the first item of his estimates to stand, so that we may renew our demands at some future date. However, if he refuses to grant this, if he is satisfied just to sit there and what for problems to settle themselves, let him take that responsibility before the people and the municipal governments.

(Text):

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words in support of the minister's program of winter work. We have listened to three speakers who have participated in this debate, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the hon. member for Skeena and to some extent the hon. member for Hull who said just about everything that could be said by one who had little or no appreciation of this program. But in the same breath they said, "We want more".

Mr. Caron: Yes, we do.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member misinterprets what I said.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I take the position that this is one of the finest programs that has been put into effect by this government and I rise at this time to express my commendation of it.

Mr. Caron: It is good but it should be expanded.

Mr. Kindt: This program was introduced at the request of the common people and of the municipalities throughout this great dominion. They asked to be given the opportunity to suggest projects which would give employment to people in their communities. The municipalities of Canada asked for this winter works program and they were given it. They suggested various winter works projects, 50 per cent of the labour cost being borne by the federal government. In the province of Alberta the provincial government bore 25 per cent of the cost of the program and the local communities bore the other 25 per cent.

This is a good working arrangement which ensures that only those projects chosen are those in the best interests of the community, the taxpayer and above all the worker. In other words, by permitting these municipalities to choose these works projects they are able to get certain work done which otherwise would be left undone and at the same time give employment to those two or three or half a dozen people you so often find in small communities who, through no fault of their own, are unemployed. In my constituency of Macleod this program has been very well received. Wherever there have been unemployed people the local communities have requested approval of such projects as stockpiling gravel, clearing roadways of brush and trees so that road work could be carried on in the following summer, and many other projects.

I should like to suggest to the minister that in so far as it is possible to increase the number and types of projects which will qualify under the program it would be greatly appreciated by the towns and municipalities of my constituency. In other words, in a cold climate where you cannot dig sewers in the winter and where it is not possible to do many of those things which would be done in the constituency of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or those of others who live in areas where the climate is modified by the influence of the sea, we must have recognition for certain projects which we can do in order to provide winter work.

I may say that the preparation of historic sites and the building of roadways in connection with such sites are among some of the projects which I believe will be undertaken in my constituency in the coming winter. I hope that if and when the local people and historical associations enter upon this work that these projects will be given every consideration from the point of view of support under the winter works program.

In closing I want to compliment the Minister of Labour again for the work he has done and the excellent program he has brought forward. On behalf of those I have been working with in my constituency may I say that I have yet to find one municipal organization that has said that the program is not one of the finest that has been brought forward by this or any other government.

Mr. Caron: Would the hon. member for Macleod permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: Yes.

Mr. Caron: Does he believe that the winter works program is sufficient in the face of the unemployment situation? We admit it is good but does he believe it is sufficient?

Mr. Kindt: The winter program is meant to take up the slack in certain areas where there are one, two, three or half a dozen people unemployed. The hon. member for Hull is talking about industrial development. I will grant that there are communities where there has been a slackening of activity. In my area we have been faced with serious unemployment because of the closing down of the coal mines in the Crowsnest pass and we have been doing everything possible to create employment. It is a complicated problem which you cannot solve by any one particular measure. You have got to approach it from a number of angles. One way of approaching it, although it is not a complete solution, is the winter works program. It has helped to take up the slack. It has not met the whole problem by any means nor is it a long term solution. We have got to look to industrial development to correct the unemployment situation and give continuity to the employment of labour. But we must have these stopgap programs to take care of unemployment until such time as long term industrial development comes into being.

Mr. Caron: When there are so many unemployed who are not benefiting from the winter works program does the hon. member suggest that the government should try to settle the question in some other way or does he claim that the government should sit down and be satisfied with that legislation alone?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order. I think that this exchange between the two hon. members has perhaps gone about as far as it should go.

Mr. Caron: May I be permitted to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that we are in committee and once there is another speech I can rise and take another 30 minutes if I wish to. Even if the remarks are in the form of a question I am entitled to speak again.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I recognize that. I am not questioning the right of the hon. member to question another hon. member. I am wondering whether the discussion between the two hon. members concerned has not reached the point that we might pass on to the next hon. member.

Mr. Caron: I think we are satisfied.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I really rise to ask one or two questions following up the questions I asked the minister last night about prevailing rates, but before I come to those questions I should like to make one observation about the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod. The hon. member for Macleod has said that the winter works program is a very fine one. We all agree that the idea behind the program is good but I think the hon. member has missed the point that we on this side are trying to make, that it is a better program for some provinces than it is for others.

It is a particularly good program for Alberta and I can understand the hon. member for Macleod being enthusiastic about all the work that was done, the projects that were started and the jobs that were created. But that happened in Alberta because Alberta is a rich province, and that is the burden of our complaint. On April 22 the minister gave me the information that for all Canada the cost of work under the program amounted to a little under $10 million, but out of that $10 million Alberta got $1,494,000. The hon. member, who is good at arithmetic, will realize that nearly 15 per cent of all the money was spent in Alberta. Compare that with what the maritime provinces got. All four maritime provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, together only got $736,000 or 7 per cent. All the maritime provinces together got less than half what the province of Alberta got.

I think that points up more than anything else the injustice of awarding grants on a 50-50 basis because it makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. In addition, some provinces are rich because of the industrial development taking place to which the hon. member has referred. That is the source of their richness and because of that unemployment in those provinces is likely to be much less than in the maritime provinces where development is not taking place at such a rapid rate. That being the case, the least money is being spent where unemployment is the highest with more people out of jobs.

Mr. Kindt: Would the hon. member say that the provinces he has mentioned were unable to obtain the 25 per cent, or the usual portion the provinces were required to put up, in order to co-operate in the plan, and that that was what made them unable to qualify?

Mr. Carter: Exactly, because their treasuries would not permit them to match the grants. Do not forget that every province put up every dollar it could spare to match the dollar from the federal treasury. Together they could put up only $736,000. The province of Alberta alone, out of its riches, could put up nearly a million and a half dollars. There is the difficulty, and there is the point we are trying to drive home. This type of proportion, this 50-50 proportion, is impossible for the maritimes. This formula reminds one of what the bible says in that it gives to him who hath and takes from him who hath not even the little which he has. Provinces like Newfoundland can be ruined by this 50-50 formula, and we think another formula must be developed if all Canadians are going to be treated alike.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I intend to say. These few remarks were inspired by the words of the hon. member for Macleod. I should like now to get back to the two questions which I want to ask of the minister. I quite understand that the minister may not have the information in front of him at the moment to enable him to give me an immediate answer. If that is the case, I will be happy if he will give the answer before the last item of his estimates is carried.

Last night the minister made a statement that his department recommends to other departments the prevailing rates for casual employees. The question I want to ask the minister is this: Has his department recently recommended a set of prevailing rates to the Department of Transport for the crew of the new icebreaker, I think she is going to be called the Sir Humphrey Gilbert, which is to be assigned to Newfoundland waters? If this is the case, would he also inform the house what those rates are for the different categories of men employed on the ship, and also if those rates were based on Newfoundland rates or if they were based on maritime rates generally?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two observations I did not get an opportunity to make before my time expired. I can assure the minister that, unlike some members of the committee, I do not intend to take three half-hour periods on the first item. No doubt this information will be a relief to some hon. members.

I cannot forbear, however, to take a little notice of one or two observations that were made by the hon. member for Skeena. He purported to contrast the situation in the province where I was brought up with that of the province from which I was elected. He suggested that if I attributed the comparatively mild effects of the recession in Manitoba to a Liberal government, then I should impute blame for the greater effects of the recession in Newfoundland. In the first place, I would not give full credit to the Liberal government. We know that there were very great developments which came about in northern Manitoba which were partly responsible for this situation. What I said was that the extraordinarily good administration, the low tax rates and general prudence with which affairs of that province had been administered, were in part responsible for the good economic climate.

In so far as the suffering in Newfoundland is concerned, of which there has been a great deal, unhappily, in this past year, I would say that I would hate to think what it would have been if it had not been for what the present premier of Newfoundland and some others were able to accomplish 10 years ago. In Newfoundland, right up until 10 years ago, there was a situation which did not exist, so far as I know, anywhere on the mainland of Canada. Up until the time of confederation the people who were unfortunate enough to be in need went on relief at six cents a day. This situation was all changed by confederation. The hon. member does not need to think that there is not a vast majority of the people in Newfoundland who know quite well who it was who took the Newfoundlanders, who unhappily were on the dole at six cents, off the dole.

I may say that the welfare system in Newfoundland, because there are no municipalities in the sense in which they exist in the rest of the country—except St. John's and Corner Brook—is entirely provincial. I believe it is operated, so far as I have been able to discover, quite efficiently. I am glad to say I have never had to get relief myself, but I have had a lot to do with people who have had misfortune and have had to get help. I think this welfare is administered with less red tape and just as humanely as anywhere in Canada because it is uniform all over the province. There are none of these residence requirements that are sometimes so vexing in the other provinces.

I can see the chairman getting restive and wondering what all this has to do with unemployment. Of course, you do not go on welfare unless you are unemployed, and you do not go on welfare if you are covered by unemployment insurance, or generally you do not unless there are some very special circumstances. It was precisely because the situation in Newfoundland, from a financial standpoint, was so much more unfavourable than even that of the maritime provinces—where it certainly has not been very good—that I ventured to say something about it before, and I intend to say a little more about it. I am sorry the hon. member for Macleod is not here at the moment. I do not want to cast reflections on him, because I know he attends the session assiduously. However, I do want to comment on one or two things he said.

As my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo has pointed out, the province of Alberta, where unemployment in March was at least the average for the prairies—I do not suppose it was higher in Alberta than it was in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, probably about the same—was 4.4 per cent.

Mr. Speakman: It is less now.

Mr. Pickersgill: No doubt, it is considerably less now, and yet they got the lion's share of help under the winter works program.

Mr. Speakman: It was because the municipalities took advantage of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was because they had a wealthier government that they were able to take advantage of it. The hon. gentleman can make his own speech on his own time, and I shall be glad to shorten mine to give him the opportunity. I am not criticizing the government of Alberta or the municipalities of Alberta for taking advantage of this program, nor am I criticizing anybody else for taking advantage of it. What I am seeking to point out is that it does, in fact, as the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo pointed out so well the other day and again today, provide most help where it is least needed and the least help where it is most needed. These figures bear that out. I should like to compare the two sets of figures because I say this is an entirely unsatisfactory way of dealing with this problem.

During the month of March in the province of Newfoundland, relief costs were $324,884, over twice as much as they were in March, 1958. This situation exists in this year of recovery as compared with the year in the deepest depression, when they were half as much. Now, that is the actual situation. I venture to say that if the level of unemployment west of the Ottawa river, and particularly west of the city of Three Rivers, were on the level it is east of that area, there would be a very different attitude to this problem in this house from what there is at the moment. That is why perhaps some of us who represent that area are taking more of the time of the committee on the minister's estimates than are some other members from some provinces that are somewhat better endowed with resources, perhaps somewhat more favoured by nature, and perhaps somewhat more influential in the councils of the nation.

I must say that I was rather disappointed that the hon. member for Skeena did not see fit to support fully the appeal of the hon. member for Laurier which was so ably seconded by the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Hull, and to which I am going to come back in a moment. Last year I am glad to say that his leader supported that appeal. But before I come to that matter—and I am coming to it fairly quickly—I want to say something about another aspect of this problem. We were told this a couple of years ago. They did not say quite so much about it last March, I admit, a year ago, but a couple of years ago, in that great election of 1957, when the Tories discovered the maritimes, we were told that they were going to do great things. They were going to bring defence contracts there. They were going to bring new industries there. They were going to create two jobs where there was one before. More coal was going to be mined. The situation was going to be altogether different from what it was in the sad days when the Liberal government was in office.

What has been the consequence? I have here an editorial which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 2, 1959. It is entitled "Mr. Gordon Vindicated". I think perhaps hon. members should be reminded, particularly those on the other side of the house who have been fairly silent in this debate, of what really has happened.

Mr. Cardiff: They do not get a chance to talk.

Mr. Pickersgill: They get recognized every second time if they get up on their feet as the hon. gentleman does. But if they do not do that, of course they are not recognized. The editorial to which I have made reference reads as follows:

> In the reports on its studies into Canada's economic prospects the Gordon royal commission suggested, as a sort of last resort for the adversity-stricken of the Atlantic provinces, the provision of federal aid for transplanting the affected families to other parts of Canada. The recommendation got such a bitter denunciation in political and other circles—

And especially by the Tory candidates in 1957. That is not in the editorial. That is an addition by me.

> —that Mr. Gordon, himself, had to come back for a public appearance to try to explain his reasoning and cool the anger.
> Three years later, however, the proposal seems to be in full implementation.

Under a Tory government. That is also an interpolation of mine.

> Ottawa has just offered to unemployed iron ore miners and their families at Bell island, Newfoundland, the necessary funds for relocating elsewhere in the country. And this is not the first time such financial help has been extended. In fact, it now is a general policy that applies to any community or region officially declared by the government to be a "surplus labour area." It was brought into effect for Springhill after the closing down of the last colliery following the disaster of last fall.

And so on. It gives further examples but I will not weary the committee with the rest of the editorial because I have illustrated the point.

I am criticizing the government for doing this. If there is no other place for these people to earn their living, it is better that they should go somewhere else. But it is a much different realization from the glowing picture that hon. gentlemen and their leader painted in the Atlantic provinces two short years ago.

Mr. Hicks: Short?

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that it may seem long to hon. gentlemen who sit here and who are gagged and not allowed to speak because the session may last a little bit longer if they do so. I am sure they may seem very long years to them but to me it seems but yesterday. Lest the Chairman think that I was getting away—

An hon. Member: And getting nowhere.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —from the point, I should like to say that there is one other point I wish to make before I come to my main point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is this. The hon. member for Skeena, in one of those essays into fiction for which he and his colleagues have a certain penchant, told us that the Liberals, when they were in office, were fond of stealing the ideas of his party.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Harris told us that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Harris had told them that. I had never realized that the so-called ideas of the hon. gentleman's party were copyrighted or patented or that they were not in the public domain.

Mr. Howard: We never said they were.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, there have been very few of them, in my experience, except one or two socialist notions that nobody has stolen, that were not common coin of all progressive people and that were not in Liberal programs long before they were in C.C.F. programs. But there is this difference with regard to where these ideas come from. When the Liberals were in office ideas were translated into action. Now they are just words. That is the essential difference.

I now come to the point that I mainly rose to make. It will be recalled that last year in the month of August the minister's estimates were before the committee. They are earlier this year. Last year in the month of August we on this side of the house, both in the Liberal party and in the C.C.F. group, appealed to the minister to let item No. 1 of his estimates stand until he was in a position to tell us what the government's winter works program was for the winter coming forward. The minister refused. We appealed to the leader of the house. He refused. The Prime Minister came into the house and an appeal was made to him. This was done on every occasion in my recollection when it was ever asked of the Liberal government when they were in office. It was done automatically as parts of the rights of parliament. But it was categorically refused by the government that is now in power, these champions of the greater rights of parliament. We are asking it again this year and we are asking it for this reason.

The winter works program did not appear until October—that is, the first announcement of it—until parliament had been away for nearly two months, when there was no opportunity to criticize it; no opportunity to point out how lopsided it was; how relatively good it was for Alberta as compared with the Atlantic provinces, not because of anything except the inherent better fortune of Alberta; and the other deficiencies. We think that parliament should have the right to discuss these things. We think that this problem is important enough to be brought before parliament, and we do not see that it is interfering with the proper carrying on of the business of parliament. In our opinion, the situation is quite the contrary. If the minister were to allow this item to stand until towards the end of the session the minister could come in and tell us what the government proposes to do about this problem in the forthcoming year as far as he knows it up to that time.

I suggest that anyone can predict, no matter how great the recovery is, that we are going to have a substantial seasonal unemployment problem next winter. There is no doubt about that matter now. There is no need to wait until August, September or October to find that out. Even if we get full employment during the summer time, as I hope we shall, there is still predictably going to be a problem next winter, and parliament ought to be told —parliament has the right to be told—what the government's plans are for dealing with that problem. I say that the minister should accede to this very reasonable request if parliament is to mean anything.

There is another reason. We not only have the precedent of last year. We have the precedent of this year. We have the adoption of the estimates of one department. What happened? The very day after those estimates were adopted an order in council was passed doing the exact opposite to what everybody on both sides of the house who had spoken suggested ought to be done about a particular matter, and parliament was deprived of the normal opportunity to debate that action in the knowledge of the facts. I say to the minister that this government, which is supposed to have a great regard for parliament, whose leader professes to have a great love for parliament, should accede to this request.

I am going to resume my seat now and ask the minister to agree to this, and I think so far as our party is concerned I can assure him there will not be a great deal of time taken with the rest of his estimates if he is willing to do that.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the Department of Labour estimates are estimates pertaining to the function of the Department of Labour. They have nothing to do with government policy with regard to unemployment. When the government is prepared to announce what it intends to do with respect to what I term actions of responsibility, then that information will be conveyed to the house, as it has been in the past. Most certainly the policy of the government with respect to unemployment has nothing to do with the estimates or the function or administration of the Deparment of Labour. I cannot see why the first item should be held under this pressure, and I would ask that we proceed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, my friend from Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned in two or three ways some of the remarks I made, and I hope he is not trying to misconstrue my position or misinterpret my position in so far as the winter works program applies in this case to the province of Newfoundland, or to the maritime provinces or any other province, and attempt to leave the impression that I might be partial to policies which are opposed to those which he has just enunciated, namely the question of taking into account the financial and economic conditions of the province if the federal government participates in any cost-sharing scheme. That is not so, and I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and other members will recall—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me? If I seemed to imply any such thing, I never intended to. I would not suggest for a moment that the hon. gentleman had said that or thought that, and I did not think he did.

Mr. Howard: I am just saying how this misinterpretation of my attitude could result, and I do not want that to happen because I am sure hon. members will recall that one of the first things I dealt with in this house in so far as federal participation in the cost of municipal projects was concerned had to do with the trans-Canada highway. One of the first things I think was a proposal that the geographic and economic conditions of provinces should be taken into account, and any program of the federal government based on a 50-50 basis is inequitable to some and beneficial to others at the expense of somebody else.

In so far as the application of the winter works program to the maritimes is concerned, I have no ideas about the division of cost, whether it should be 25-75 or whatever the proportion may be. But there is certainly a good case, not only in the winter works program but in other types of programs as well, for treating provinces differently so far as economic ability today is concerned. I do want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howard: If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will permit me, we have raised quite a number of questions for the minister to comment upon, and I am sure he would not want to let this general administration vote go without answering the questions raised from both sides of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was only going to raise the point that the Leader of the Opposition began the discussion by raising a number of specific questions, as did the hon. member for Assiniboia, and I am sure the minister will recall that it has always been the custom on the first item to reply.

Mr. Starr: I will go ahead now if you will permit me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well, I will stop.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I want to express my appreciation for what I consider to be some worth-while discussion on the first item. There have been some very good constructive suggestions put forward, and my officials and I have made note of them and some of them are reasonable enough to be given very serious consideration.

Before I go on with that I would like to give the information requested by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo regarding the rates on the new Sir Humphrey Gilbert icebreaker. This icebreaker has been operated, or will be operated, by the Department of Transport, and we recommended the rates to the treasury board. When they are approved by the treasury board then they are applied by the Department of Transport. It is not our policy to reveal the rates which we have recommended to the treasury board, but they will be announced by the department under which that operation is carried out; in this case, the Department of Transport. I hope that is the information the hon. member desired.

I was struck by the approach taken by the Leader of the Opposition in this debate in dealing with conciliation procedures, and he wanted to know whether I was satisfied with them. Whether I am satisfied or not, Mr. Chairman, is hardly the issue, but I would like to tell him right away that in this world there is nothing perfect, and certainly we would want to evolve more effective procedures. The accent is on the word "evolve", and in dealing with conciliation procedures you are dealing with economic situations and economic factors. But above all you are dealing with people, and I do not think you can solve all these problems by statute. I am just wondering whether those who have been discussing this particular aspect feel that the present procedures leave something to be desired. Some of them no doubt do, and I can assure them that any suggestions that anyone would wish to make will be treated with great respect.

I would also add that the Leader of the Opposition asked a great number of questions dealing mostly with the theoretical and academic aspects of labour. I would like to tell him that in the time I have been in office I have not had much opportunity to bother with theory; I have been more interested in facts. The important thing is that I have not had time to bother with the intricate little things.

With regard to the amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, it was pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition that some ten months have now elapsed since this matter has been before us. It is hardly that long because when I asked all the various organizations and labour bodies to submit their recommendations, in most cases it took up to about 14 months to submit them. This presents quite a great deal of work in sifting out the various amendments and putting them into some form. Unfortunately it would be impossible for me to bring in amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act this session, but most certainly it will be up for discussion during the next session of parliament.

As I say, I did note the remarks of the hon. Leader of the Opposition regarding conciliation procedures. I am certainly amenable to any suggestions which could be put forward to streamline these procedures, but I feel that the conciliation procedures we have now are procedures which have been worked out over the years and are working pretty well. They certainly are not perfect, but the fact is that out of hundreds of cases the great majority of those cases have been settled at the conciliation board stage, and in the last fiscal year out of 106 disputes only six resulted in strike action. I think this in itself is an indication of the way in which these procedures are working out. I want to point out, however, that they are not perfect. There are anomalies, and the department is trying at all times to work out better procedures.

Mr. Howard: After amendments have been prepared to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act by the minister and his departmental officials, I wonder if the hon. gentleman could indicate whether he is willing to consult with representatives of both labour and management in order to obtain their views so that any differences may be resolved, and so that the act may be drafted to comply so far as possible with the ideas of the two groups who will be most affected by its operation.

Mr. Starr: As the hon. member may know, we have already received all the suggestions, but I will consider what he has just said. We have not thought about that aspect of the question. I should like to add that with regard to these suggestions concerning the amendment of the act, very few proposals have been received as to the conciliation procedure—only two, in fact. I should have thought there would have been more.

I might say at this point that in common with the Leader of the Opposition, and in common with every responsible labour leader in Canada, I abhor violence and regret that the necessity arises from time to time for strike action, because we all know that a strike is very often a bitter and regrettable business. I feel that any action taken by any individual or group to bring about strike action until all other means have been exhausted is reprehensible, but as to changing the procedure in any radical way, let me tell this committee that labour in Canada guards jealously the collective bargaining privilege which it has fought so hard to obtain. However, I can assure hon. members and the Leader of the Opposition that in my brief tenure of office I have found that there is a great reservoir of goodwill and honest responsibility among our labour leaders in Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia, for example, that there is a growing tendency to be critical of labour. I have been dealing with men in the labour movement who are honest, decent and sincere. They are doing their best to get a square deal for their members. I have also met with the same kind of people in management. With men such as this at the helm in this country I do not feel we need have too many misgivings.

As I mentioned, settlements were effectively reached in a number of the disputes which arose during the year. I cite as an example the recent dispute between the firemen and the Canadian National Railways, and also the Pacific coast seamen's dispute. I think the record stands up well. Although the Leader of the Opposition is not here for the moment, I know that as an old baseball player and fan he would subscribe to the statement that you can't win them all.

Mr. Howard: How much did you pay the mediator in the C.P.R. firemen's dispute?

Mr. Starr: He has not yet sent in his bill. But we have won quite a few, by which I mean that the people of Canada were winners inasmuch as settlements were reached in so many cases.

On the subject of the winter works program, may I say that I think the program was a good one. It succeeded in providing jobs for over 40,000 people. Unfortunately, as has been pointed out, some of the provinces were not able to take advantage of it, it may be for financial reasons. The same comment applies to the municipalities. We did try to help in these circumstances by designating the Department of Public Works as a contractor, and this worked out well in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

We are endeavouring to make our program for the training of manpower more effective, and are keeping in close contact with the provinces who must, under our plan, take the initiative in retraining unemployed persons. There has been a noteworthy increase in activity in this direction during the past year, and we must keep this up so that more and more people may be trained, rehabilitated and equipped to take other employment.

Automation is, perhaps, the factor which dominates our industrial development at the present time. I do not intend at this moment to attempt an exposition of this whole problem, but let me assure the committee that my department is well aware of this process. There are ten or eleven studies on automation proceeding in this country at the present time, and six of those studies are being undertaken by the Department of Labour. Some of them are now available and I will be glad to send copies to hon. members who request them. An advisory committee on automation has been established. I think it will be appreciated that the primary need at the moment is information on how automation will affect industry. This we are endeavouring to obtain. I think this is a very important subject and one which needs every consideration.

A number of hon. members have expressed concern about the position of older workers, and concern has also been expressed with regard to other forms of discrimination. We are working on this problem to the end that it may eventually cease to exist. We are watching some of the legislation which has been introduced recently into the United States in order to see how legislation affects this question; whether it is likely to bring about the desired result or not. In any event, I am having a survey made throughout Canada through the medium of our employment offices to ascertain which employers are discriminating against, or requesting labour on the basis of a certain age or height or weight. Thus we should gather enough information to enable an accurate picture to be formed of what is taking place. We hope, then, to be able to bring to the attention of employers the value of older workers. I think something in the nature of an educational campaign is needed to prove to these employers the worth, the ability and the dependability of the older worker. By this means I feel sure a great deal can be accomplished.

I was, of course, interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia who has once again shown himself to be a fiery defender of the labour movement. With much of what he said, everyone can agree. In this connection I would say that most of the gains which have accrued to the working men and women on this continent and indeed in the whole free world, have come from the activities of organized labour. Anyone in the twentieth century who does not feel that we need unions has got an eighteenth century mind. In trade unionism there has been shown western man's genius for organizing, and his genius for using the collective principle for obtaining his objectives; while at the same time preserving freedom of individual action. It is this freedom and independence which must be preserved.

The hon. member for Trinity has commented on our program. Without going into great detail I have outlined some of the work carried on in our department and through our advisory committees more will be carried on. This matter is of great importance to us and I wish to assure hon. members of this committee that no stone will be left unturned in the course of bringing about the most desirable results.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the minister was good enough to answer the first part of my question but he did not answer the second part. Can the minister say if the rates he recommended to the treasury were based on the rates in Newfoundland or in the Maritime provinces?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether they were based on the maritimes or Newfoundland rates. I do not have that information but I shall be glad to obtain it and give it to the hon. member at another time.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, under the proper item I should like to make some comments and ask some questions about the statistical press releases that are issued from time to time concerning the unemployed. The one in my hand is headed, "Unemployment Situation" and apparently was issued jointly by the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour.

Mr. Starr: That release is a joint release but the field work is done by the bureau of statistics and comes properly under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Howard: I am interested in the section concerning registrations at the national employment services. Is that a concern of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman, that comes under the national unemployment insurance commission and I shall be glad to deal with it under the appropriate item.

Mr. Howard: I will leave it until then. In the latter part of my remarks I made mention of uniformity of legislation as between the various acts under the minister's jurisdiction and similar types of legislation under provincial authorities. I wonder if any consultations have been held and if any steps have been taken toward meeting the question of uniformity of labour codes and labour legislation especially as they apply to corporations that have plants that are organized and consequently the same union is involved in more than one province. What have you been doing in that direction?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I have given this matter quite a bit of thought. I am informed that in the past consultations did take place between the departments of labour of the federal and provincial governments. It is difficult to evolve a plan although I have been thinking about it and that is the stage at which it is now. I hope to be able to evolve a plan whereby it may be possible to achieve some uniformity with respect to vacations with pay and other labour legislation which is, I assume, what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Howard: When the minister says he is getting around to thinking about these matters I feel he should be reminded of the election promises made in this regard in the last two election campaigns.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact I keep a list on my desk and I am continually crossing out these promises as they are fulfilled.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Howard: Apparently the party did not keep you informed, Mr. Minister, of what they were letting you in for when they conducted the election campaigns because this was one of the promises made by the national Tory party and you as a candidate should have been advised as to what was happening. Perhaps they did not have you in mind as Minister of Labour at the time they developed this program. I wish to mention two points and while the opportunity presents itself I might as well mention some others. One promise made was that there would be co-operation with the provinces in an effort to achieve uniformity of labour legislation. That cannot be done just by thinking about it and there must be action.

Mr. Starr: It takes time, too.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I realize that, but this was two years ago in 1957. Two years have elapsed since then. I appreciate that the minister has been extremely busy.

Another thing the national Tory party failed to tell the minister about was the question of industries that cut across provincial boundaries. They were to pay special attention to the meat packing and steel industries to promote uniformity of labour legislation. I wonder if the party advised the minister prior to his appointment that they also promised to extend the provisions of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act to cover all federal government contracts and projects? I wonder if this has been done and if they have been able to accomplish their promise of eliminating delays in conciliation procedures? I also wonder what steps have been taken toward introducing new amendments to the Minimum Wages Act? The question of vacations with pay has been dealt with. While we are at it, I wonder if in fulfillment of the promises the Tories made they have been able to move toward eliminating the waiting period under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and extending coverage to the greatest possible number of wage earners or whether they are still just thinking about that one?

I bring these points to the attention of the minister because it is obvious he was not kept up to date concerning what the national Tory party was getting him into when conducting the election campaign of 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the item is carried I want to renew my appeal to the government—I see that the leader of the house is here now—to do what was invariably done by all other governments, to accede to the reasonable request of the opposition to let this item stand until the end of the session or until the government is in a position to announce its winter works program for next year. This is a request that anyone, having any regard at all for the rights of parliament, would not hesitate one second to accede to and I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that we heard a great deal about regard for the rights of parliament when we were in office. On no occasion in my recollection when such a request was made of the former government was it refused and on many occasions such requests were granted.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty pursuant—

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I think this is a most outlandish action the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is now taking. He has made these charges just at five o'clock when there is no opportunity for me to reply. They are absolutely without foundation. I was house leader for the Conservatives when in opposition for several years and at no time did we ever ask to have the first item stand as he has done this afternoon. He has already delayed this first item for four days, I believe. I do not mind what he does and he could keep it going until the first of December if he wishes to, but to get up and intimate that we are interfering with the rights of parliament and all that sort of thing is to speak completely without foundation. It is absolutely unfair to speak in this way and I am most amazed that my hon. friend should have seen fit to do so.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I am not amazed; he did it yesterday in our committee, following the same principle.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Starr: All right, sit down. You have made your point. It will not carry now.

Mr. Green: Five o'clock.

The Chairman: With respect to the question of privilege that has been raised I must remind hon. members that although they can carry on a debate at length and at will on particular items there is also such a thing as undue repetition. When I have been in the chair in the last few days I have listened quite attentively to many of these debates and they have been repetitious. Whether there is a purpose in the constant repetition of things is not for me to judge but it would be appreciated by the Chair if hon. members did not delay the proceedings of the house unduly by constantly coming back to the same themes and repeating the same sentences.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Public Works has suggested that I have kept these estimates going. I took no part whatever in the debate on these estimates until this afternoon and I took a very limited part. I addressed myself strictly to the estimates and I think that the remark of the Minister of Public Works is entirely and utterly uncalled for.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: These lectures about the rights of parliament are getting very repetitious.

The Chairman: I must remind the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that my remarks were not addressed to him so his remarks were quite out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: But the Minister of Public Works referred to me.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, section 3, to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of divorce bills standing for second reading, is it the pleasure of the house to have these bills taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill SD-234, for the relief of Marcelle Flore Terreault Wright.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-235, for the relief of Daisy Naydia Pretula Link.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-236, for the relief of Alexander Hill Forbes.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-237, for the relief of Barbara Ann Mary Curran Albrechtson.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-238, for the relief of Dorothy Vera Doyle Trudel.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-239, for the relief of Mary May Helen McCormick Moran.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-240, for the relief of Ethel Marguerite Nimick Hemmings.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-241, for the relief of James Donald McAllister.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-242, for the relief of Heather Joan Maxwell Firth.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-243, for the relief of Suzanne Mary Florence Peyton Young.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-244, for the relief of Elizabeth Ann Nelson Bissett.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-245, for the relief of Moira Elizabeth Latham Bruce.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-246, for the relief of Audrey Edwardeen Scanlan Grayburn.—Mr. McCleave.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps for a moment or two I might give a different complexion to the debate in the house from that earlier today. A while ago I brought to the attention of the house the appearance of lady detectives in some of these cases and perhaps I might be permitted for the next moment or two to give the house and the country information on the latest doings of these charming creatures, as I called them. They have appeared in several cases before us and are getting along rather well except in one instance where the front lady, that is, the lady who puts her foot in the door and then enters the apartment first, was given a drubbing by the boy friend of the erring wife. Apparently she was badly beaten for in every case in which she has appeared since then she has made it a point to go to the police station first and make her whereabouts known on the particular evening. I presume that is on the theory that if she does not come out alive the police will at least have some clue as to who did it and why it was done. I mention this merely to illustrate that women who demand equal rights as these lady detectives are now doing should remember the good old days when they occupied a privileged position in society.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-14, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year when this bill was introduced I was fortunate enough that it was discussed for several hours and a relatively worthwhile debate took place in connection with its merits. I am not one of those who feel that a politician is suspect whenever he gets up and begins to talk about the beauties of non-partisanship just as I do not suspect, when people begin to talk about the public interest, that there is possibly a scoundrel or a nigger in the woodpile somewhere. I should like to suggest that if one cannot be wholly non-partisan about this bill he should at least try to approach it with as little partisanship as possible.

The reason I have introduced it stems partly from my own experience and partly from following the activities of the house in this particular field over recent years and also in a historical sense. I made the point last year, and I do not need to repeat it, that the idea behind redistribution being put in the hands of an independent commission is one that has found favour with such people as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the prime minister who was the leader of Canada for the longest period of time, an hon. gentleman in the other place who is a Liberal stalwart and with quite a number of other people, and that the idea of putting redistribution under an independent commission is one that has found favour in a number of other commonwealth countries that have the same parliamentary system as we have, although not necessarily with parallel problems, where it has been found to work well.

The basic idea of redistribution is, of course, simply one of representation by population or an attempt to assure that each individual vote in the country is worth relatively the same as any other individual vote. I would not say that the material I put on the record last session was so valuable that I want to hold it up as being something wonderful but I think the bibliography and other information connected with it opened up many of the problems concerning the matter and some of the discussion that followed was rather valuable in expressing critical points of view.

One factor in connection with redistribution about which I have thought more and more since last year is not the fact that we are getting closer to the issue all the time of a hurried redistribution in 1952 or that we will probably find an election held in 1962 upon the population basis of 1951 but the fact that it seems to me after a bit more experience in the house, and everyone is aware that my experience has not been too long, that a member more and more, if I judge the situation correctly, is becoming a constituency information and welfare officer to quite an extent for the population of his riding. I mean that the pressure upon him is in direct relationship to the size of his constituency. This is an argument which, in my opinion, calls for as fair a balance as possible within provincial limitations, and for equality in terms of the number of people that a member of parliament represents.

During the debate on this measure last year, the lead-off speaker following my presentation was the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), who opposed the bill largely on the ground, as I take it from scanning his remarks, that the bill was a further derogation of parliamentary rights. He believed that in setting up an independent commission you were taking away from parliament and this house certain rights, and that was something he could not support. In so far as my argument was concerned that by so doing you would remove any chance for gerrymandering, both he and the hon. member who spoke later, the hon. member for St. Lawrence - St. George (Mr. Chambers), had the feeling that we had reached a new time in Canadian politics. Perhaps their views are coloured by the fact that they are members of the party in power. They felt we no longer have any worries about anyone trying to hurt anyone else. We have a population that is more alert, more informed, and this sort of thing would not be accepted any longer.

I cannot really comment on that particular point of view. It is going to be fun, during the next redistribution, to see what the members from Nova Scotia are going to do, since they are all Conservatives, in reducing the seats in that province. There will be a reduction of at least one, and it is going to be fun to see how much they hurt one another. In Saskatchewan, where there will be a loss of three or four seats, the Conservatives have only the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) upon whom to work in terms of gerrymandering. Then, too, I should like to see them work on each other in Manitoba, where they can only work on themselves. We could almost turn the problem inside out from the point of view of gerrymandering being an issue, and say that at least an independent commission would save government members from cutting each other's throats when redistribution time does come around.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) spoke on the bill, but I felt it was one of his poorer performances. He was thrown off by some of the comments made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), and by our wonder interventionist from Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). The hon. member proceeded to read the members of this group a little homily about our too great preoccupation with planning and our too great trust in experts. He did, however, state he thought there should be some kind of independent body of experts or knowledgeable people to determine principles which should apply in so far as redistribution was concerned, then those principles should be left with members of parliament who would deal with redistribution. He seemed to feel that members of parliament, being more familiar with constituency problems, were the ones to be consulted. I should like to remind the hon. member for York-Scarborough or any other member, including myself, that much as we may look upon our constituencies as our personal possessions, our rights are very impermanent ones. There are other parties within our constituencies who have views that are just as valid and as pertinent as any we, as members of parliament, can offer. We are only one source of information or opinion, and there are other sources of information and opinion which are just as important in so far as determining the boundaries of a constituency and that sort of thing is concerned.

Mr. McGee: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. McGee: Is he suggesting—he seemed to me to be suggesting and perhaps he can tell me if I am right—that perhaps the defeated candidate should be consulted in determining the riding boundaries?

Mr. Fisher: No, I am not trying to suggest that at all. I do not believe the defeated candidate or someone who ran third, fourth or fifth or who is the head of a local organization, is in any better position than an M.P. to be consulted. My whole point is that they have as valid an interest as the member of parliament. I would say that any independent commission gathering information would want to hear representations from these people on this question of boundaries.

I seem to have forgotten the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who, along with the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul), concentrated on an argument which is very familiar to anyone who has watched the Quebec scene. In my opinion, the source of their argument can be found in the Tremblay report, in which the line of argument is strongly adopted that redistribution concerns one part of the British North America Act that requires provincial consultation. As a matter of fact, I think the hon. member for Joliette - L'Assomption - Montcalm adopted exactly the idea that is in the Tremblay report, that once the bases have been determined for general provincial representation, the whole problem should be handled by the province itself rather than the House of Commons. In my view this is an indefensible position, in that the House of Commons must continue to hold the right to set up, for example, this independent commission, and if the independent commission does not work, to make any other amendment or change that is necessary.

The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere was generally in favour of the idea of putting redistribution under a commission, but he did want this exception, that the commission should be determined on a provincial basis and the provincial authorities should enter into it. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George brought up a legal point as to whether or not the words "independent commission" were really valid because of the fact that parliament would always have the right to change a decision made some years ago about this section, and to change it or alter it at any time. In other words, you may set up an independent commission but it would not be there in perpetuity, so therefore it would not be an independent commission.

This is rather a difficulty in semantics. I agree with his point that if we do set up an independent commission as a consequence of the passage of this particular act, then we will have to remain ready to change the independent commission idea if it does not work out. I might point out in passing that the independent commission idea, for example, in Great Britain has worked extremely well. The same fears were expressed in Great Britain as were expressed by hon. members on the government benches here when this change was sought.

There were no speeches made by hon. members of the opposition when this bill was before us last year. This has become one of the hallmarks of their operations in this particular parliament, that is they do not express any opinion on public bills introduced by private members. I just want to touch on this particular aspect of the matter. The opposition members may not see the point or feel the need of this particular hour of the house activities, they may not feel that this idea of private members being able to introduce public bills is worth while. However, it seems to me that at some time we should have a statement from this particular party, not so much about this bill, but on this issue of whether or not they believe this sort of thing is even worth while. In my opinion, it is very worth while because it leaves to hon. members at least one avenue by which private members from any party can put a bill on the order paper expounding an idea or conception, and ultimately the idea may become popular. If the members of the opposition feel that this is a bad thing, and that all legislation should come up through some sort of party channel in the government, then they are accepting the fact we have already had a transition in the status of a member of parliament and that the rest of us may be clinging to some ideal that has disappeared.

The final point I want to make is not a major one. It is just this, that the Canadian Labour Congress has advocated this idea of redistribution by an independent commission for some time. I could go further than that. I could also say that another body has identified itself with this idea of an independent commission. I refer to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I would suggest—and perhaps not push the suggestion too far—that when you get two bodies such as these that in the main contend with each other or are antithetical both going along with the same idea, the idea must have a little bit more than ordinary value.

I hope in the time there is left some of the members will be able to express further criticisms and offer further suggestions on the bill. I would hope that some of them might even move that this bill be sent to the committee on privileges and elections which I am sure is going to do an extremely worth-while job this session. I might say this about the chairman of that committee at the present time. Nothing has pleased me more than to know that in this particular field we have as chairman of that committee someone who has an academic background and with the broad values and detachment that I think that background brings to one of the most controversial fields that politicians can ever get into.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all grateful to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) for his summary of the arguments we dared to advance in the face of his final utterances on the subject. It seems to me to be rather typical of the hon. member sponsoring this measure and other members in his group. I have stated this previously in this house and shall state it again. There seems to be a theory that, once these omnipotent people have examined a subject and written down their conclusions, that is the end of it; that everything that needs to be thought about this subject has been thought and that everything that needs to be said about the subject has been said. The leader of the lonely eight earlier in this session went farther than that and suggested that owing to the fact that he had introduced a certain measure into this house on three or four occasions there was no need for any further debate whatsoever.

However, to come back to the bill in question, may I say this. I would be derelict indeed in my duty as a member of this house if I did not rise on each and every appropriate occasion in order to draw attention to the plight of the people of York-Scarborough. As I have said before in this house, the pattern of growth in this particular constituencey is astonishing, to say the least. The population at the present time would be something of the order of 225,000 people. As far as I can gather, the annual increase in that population—apart from the birth rate which is substantial—is something of the order of 25,000 a year. I have given serious consideration to introducing a private bill which might be entitled "An act for the relief of McGee" or perhaps might be better described as "An act for the relief of the long-suffering and patient constituents of York-Scarborough".

I should like to read into the record a statement by one of my opponents in the last election and the one prior to it, namely a charming and delightful woman indeed by the name of Elva Reta Sigen. Mrs. Sigen took advantage of the opportunity, she having been a candidate in federal elections, to write in August of 1957 to the chief electoral officer offering some suggestions. I will not deal with the specific suggestions and criticisms of the operation of the elections act because they are not pertinent to this debate—they might form part of the evidence of the committee in privileges and elections—but I should like to read into the record her first paragraph:

> As a candidate in the federal election in June, I would like to take this opportunity accorded me in section 58(2) of the Canada Elections Act to bring to your attention a few changes in the law which I consider desirable in so far as it affects the riding of York-Scarborough.

The first paragraph I refer to reads as follows:

> (1) For an urban riding York-Scarborough is unwieldy, being the largest riding in Canada with a population at present of 167,500 people and with more families moving into the riding every day. If this growth continues, it will be an impossible task for any candidate to campaign and for any member to represent the riding and know the problems of such a large number of people.

As I say, these are the words of my opponent in the two previous elections. She is a woman of some ability and much charm. They were no doubt prompted by the fact that her father was a prominent Tory in the good old riding of Carleton.

As the hon. member pointed out, I agreed in principle with his bill but I expressed some doubts, after I survived the interruptions and banter that assailed me on that occasion. I thought at a certain stage the independent commission or group of so-called experts should come back to the house and to the members, having defined the broad areas and designated the principles upon which such distribution would occur. I am one of those optimists, like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) and others in this house, who happens to believe that as far as political morality in this country is concerned, tremendous strides have been made in recent years. Everything that I see in the political life of my province and in my area in particular leads me to the belief that this trend and pattern will continue.

I was going to read into the record some of the delightful experiences and activities which took place in the early years in elections in this country but I am sure that most of the hon. members who have interested themselves in this bill and in this matter are already familiar with this subject. As Norman Ward says in his book, honesty is becoming compulsory in many parts of this country.

Mr. Fisher: Would you like to define the parts?

Mr. McGee: The problem, and the reasons advanced in another debate earlier in this session by the hon. member for Port Arthur as to why we might not have redistribution before the next election, I challenge. As far as its being possible is concerned, surely the methods and means are now available today, particularly as far as tabulation and computation are concerned, if some way can be found between the spring of 1961 and the beginning of the session in 1962, assuming that an election is called at the end of that particular session. Surely the basic material can be made available to this house and to the members of whatever body we ultimately decide will wrestle with this problem, and surely we can have redistribution before the next election. I see the hon. member is shaking his head.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the hon. member a question. Is the hon. member aware that it is technically impossible before March, 1962 for the bureau of statistics to complete its compilations of the detailed statistics which will be necessary to carry out complete redistribution, even though the total population statistics by provinces will be available much earlier in order to give a provincial breakdown? But you will not have the detailed figures which will enable you to actually carry out adjustments.

Mr. McGee: May I, in turn, ask the hon. member a question. What is the source of the information or opinion which he has expressed?

Mr. Fisher: The information I have is from the dominion bureau of statistics officials.

Mr. McGee: Well, as one hon. member has just pointed out to me, a lot of things which perhaps were not thought possible under other administrations might very well be possible under the present.

Mr. Fisher: Possible but improbable.

Mr. McGee: That is just about all I wanted to add, Mr. Speaker, to what I said last year, except I have to apologize to the hon. member for Port Arthur that I did not come up to snuff last year and I hope he will think I did a little better this year.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is largely the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat which cause me to rise to say a few words in support of this bill introduced by the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). This is not a new subject. Anyone who has read the records of the house will realize that there have been quite a few voices in all parties over a long period of years who have suggested some procedure for redistribution after the fashion of that mentioned in this bill. The member for Port Arthur referred to the attitude of the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who I think on a number of occasions—if I remember correctly I heard him on one such occasion —said that while he personally was in favour of the principle of having redistribution undertaken by a commission, he would accept the opinion of the majority. There have occasionally been other voices raised in the Liberal party throughout the years, and I think on one or two occasions members of the former Progressive party suggested that this principle be applied with respect to redistribution in Canada.

It has been the policy of the C.C.F. party ever since it was formed to express its support for this method of redistribution, and that is indicated by the numbers of private bills which have been introduced on this question by members of the C.C.F. group throughout the years. However, I do want to bring to the attention of the house, in view of the comments made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that at one time there were quite prominent members of the Progressive Conservative party who supported this principle. On February 21, 1947 the then secretary of state introduced a bill for the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons. That provided for the appointment of a committee. During that debate Mr. Knowles, who was then a member of this house, introduced an amendment to the bill which read as follows, as reported on page 697 of Hansard for February 21, 1947:

—this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons should be referred to an independent commission to be appointed for that purpose.

Then later on certain members of the Progressive Conservative party spoke and indicated their support of that amendment. The interesting thing to me is that at the time when the vote was taken on this amendment, who do we find supporting the amendment moved by Mr. Knowles which would provide for the appointment of a commission to undertake redistribution? Well, here are the names of some of them. We find Mr. Black, who was then a Conservative member for the Yukon; Mr. Blair, then a Conservative member of this house but who unfortunately passed away two or three years ago; Mr. Boucher, a Conservative member; Mr. Casselman; Mr. Cockeram; Mr. Fraser, who is still in this house; and Mr. Harkness, who is now the present Minister of Agriculture. Then, most interesting to me of all, is the name of Mr. Green, who is now the present Minister of Public Works and the house leader.

Mr. Green: How do you know I will not support this bill?

Mr. Herridge: Then we find Mr. Harris, a Conservative member of this house; Mr. Hatfield; Mr. Henderson; Mr. Homuth. Then we come again to another interesting supporter, Mr. Macdonnell, the present Minister without Portfolio. Then we find Mr. Merritt, a well-known Conservative, still residing at the coast. Mr. Senn, a very prominent member of the Conservative party at that time; Mr. Stirling, who used to represent the riding of Yale. That is all I see in the list, but I think it is very interesting in view of the support that that proposal received from those very prominent members of the Progressive Conservative party, some of whom are now members of the government.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that leads us in this group to the hope that possibly before the next redistribution we will see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) rising to introduce a bill for the appointment of a commission to undertake redistribution, seconded by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. Green: It does not come under public works.

Mr. Herridge: I quite understand that. It comes under the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche); but I assume the Minister of Public Works might be so enthusiastic as to undertake that task, or at least speak of it.

Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in reading Hansard to note that the idea was also born within the womb of the Liberal party, because on February 21, 1947, Mr. Powers, who was then a member of this house and who is now an hon. member of the other place, informed the house that in looking over his files he had found a copy of a bill which had been drafted, and it was the intention of the government at one time to introduce this bill which made provision for the appointment of a commission to undertake redistribution. However, owing to the fact that in 1940 the phony stage of the war, as he put it, was over and the nation was fully occupied with the realities of war, the bill was not introduced. So, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that there has been considerable sentiment throughout the years in favour of a commission undertaking the task of redistribution.

That principle has been supported by prominent members of the Liberal party and it has been supported by prominent members of the Conservative party. It is a principle which has been consistently supported by all members of the C.C.F. group in this house throughout the years. As one of our members said previously this afternoon, we would not be at all offended if the present government, shall we say, stole this plank from our platform and gave effect to it before the next redistribution.

I do want to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it is about time we gave some consideration to this principle. It has been adopted by several other countries in the commonwealth and found to be most satisfactory, and in handing the task over to a commission it would remove the injustices and the doubts with regard to redistribution which exist at the present time.

We do hope that hon. members on the front benches will be consistent and give expression to their attitude first expressed in February 1947 by introducing legislation from the government side giving effect to the principles contained in this private bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill, I wish only to add a few remarks to those made by members who spoke before me.

The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) is most interesting. However, before allowing it to pass, I think we should at least have a closer look at it.

I have been going over the statistics quoted to us last year by the hon. member for Port Arthur, which gave specific information on the number of voters, the area and total population of every constituency in Canada. Such information is most interesting, and I often wonder how opposition members, and particularly C.C.F. members, manage to find time to make such elaborate research into various fields, and also to make lengthy speeches on practically every subject discussed in this house. In any case, this is not the question we are considering at present.

I would like to point out to this house that, in his remarks, the hon. member for Port Arthur admitted that the amendment he was moving under Bill C-14 would not reach its aim, which was to make redistribution independent by adding to the British North America Act the words "independent of the Canadian parliament". His suggestion to refer the redistribution of parliament seats to a body independent of the Canadian parliament is only theoretical, as parliament can, in fact, always amend the act. And in order to further clarify the reasons for which we should be very careful before passing such legislation, I would simply like to point out to hon. members what happens, for instance, when redistribution is made in vast territories in which population is perhaps not as dense as in our large Canadian cities like Montreal and Toronto, but which nevertheless are entitled to representation in this house, so as to make the Canadian government aware of the needs of people in those areas.

Let us take for instance the riding I represent here. The constituency of Chapleau was created in 1933 on the occasion of a redistribution and it covers 83,640 square miles. In 1937, it had 30,094 voters, out of a population of 65,456. The neighbouring riding, that of Villeneuve, covers 5,250 square miles. It had in 1957, 34,494 voters and a total population of 74,366. That riding was created in 1947. Further to the south, there is the constituency of Pontiac-Temiscamingue which has an area of 16,625 square miles with 20,480 voters and a total population of 42,432. Those three constituencies therefore cover 105,515 square miles, and include 85,068 electors out of a total population of 182,244, according to the latest available statistics. I should like to point out that before 1933, that area contained only one constituency, before the constituency of Chapleau was itself carved out and that, in 1947, part of the constituency of Pontiac-Temiscamingue was cut out, in order to give the mining area of Rouyn, Noranda, Malartic and Val d'Or, a representation in the house.

In establishing the constituency of Villeneuve and in adopting the amendments which were proposed to readjust those territories, account was taken not only of the population but also of that northern territory which is developing rapidly, since, even if sometimes the population is not as large as in cities those territories are, just the same, entitled to representation in the Canadian parliament.

That leads me to say, in closing, that since confederation, and generally speaking, changes were made to several constituencies. Making a brief survey of the situation, I noted that in the maritimes, for instance, there were changes made in 22 constituencies. In the province of Ontario, there were changes made in 76 constituencies; in the province of Quebec, 60; in the western provinces, 46 constituencies and in British Columbia, 22 constituencies. Between 1892 and 1952 changes were made in 226 constituencies. Therefore, since confederation, i.e. since 1867, only 37 constituencies have remained unchanged. In other words, readjustment of several constituencies is taking place regularly according to changes in population, from one end of our huge country to the other.

So, instead of agreeing to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and as was suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), it would be preferable, in my opinion, to set up a commission which would be responsible for the readjustment of electoral seats in the federal parliament.

(Text):

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I am happy to have the opportunity to participate briefly, as needs must at this hour, in this debate. I should like to say how much I appreciate the kind remarks of the hon. gentleman from Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who is, I suppose, spatially as far removed from me as anyone could be in this chamber, and to congratulate him for his efforts in this direction.

I remember quite well his contributions, both written and oral, during the last session. The hon. member also brought us up to date with an appraisal of the speeches which were delivered. He did not appraise his own, and I noted his modesty in that connection, but he did comment on the others. He is quite right in saying there is today an overwhelming tendency to approach this important subject with a high degree of impartiality. It is, indeed, a subject which is of tremendous importance. And as the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) pointed out, it is, of course, not a new subject.

For members of parliament to direct their attention to means and methods whereby they may improve their ability to express fully and honestly the opinions of the general public is certainly a very high form of endeavour, for we are here to express public opinion—in an indirect democracy this makes us the most important expressive institution in the land.

I have long been interested in the subject of independent commissions for distribution of electoral constituencies. I have had many reasons to see in them very favourable aspects. I believe that the province of Manitoba recently moved into the field with an independent commission and in recent hours I have come to the conclusion that this sort of device is not too bad and does allow for a very good expression of popular opinion on election day.

Some hon. members on this side of the house have expressed themselves quite well when they pointed out that the mores of the country have changed. I believe that the evil old days of the past cannot return. Certainly there are many historical instances which should bring to us a blush of shame. It is known that many an infamous old gerrymander occurred in the days of Conservative administration and instances of this have unhappily occurred in much more recent days. I am sure that if the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) were here he would tell us of some personal experiences. We might remember what happened in Parry Sound-Muskoka at one time. We could recall the marriage of the Brandon and Souris ridings and the death of the Lake Centre riding all taking place at one time. These were very unhappy examples of parliamentary activity in this connection.

Through the years I think it has been shown that gerrymanders are not a sure-fire recipe for success. Perhaps the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) was not altogether humorous when he said that honesty in this instance is proving to be the better policy. In the voting pattern of citizens I believe there are reasons for this.

Once upon a time we looked upon certain areas or constituencies in a province as being hidebound and devotedly attached to a given party regardless of candidate, issue or any other consideration. It was felt there were certain blocs of safe seats and if one could only attach and detach them in some logical mathematical proportion one could win political success. But we have moved far away from the days of hereditary voting. If you could squelch a party by manoeuvring political boundaries of constituencies the party which is now in power in Canada would have been kept in the shadows for years and years if not forever. The party, however, revealed its ability to fight in any constituency in Canada and it won nearly all of them. I say this in no sense of gloating or boasting but as an indication of the fact that the pattern of voting has changed. I believe this is a very good development and I am sure the promoter of this bill would agree that the hereditary pattern of voting is not an uplifting aspect of a political democracy.

There are some underlying issues in this matter that might be worth exploring. I quite agree with what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) said on a previous occasion to the effect that any move to shift power and responsibility from the elective and responsible institution of government to one which is not elective and is irresponsible in a constitutional sense is not a step which should be taken lightly. Down through the years in the British tradition a great effort was made to bring under popular control the agencies of government, to bring the executive under parliamentary control and to move away from the earlier day when the rule of law did not prevail over these agencies and aspects of state sovereignty. In this instance I am not prepared to move to this too readily or gladly. I believe that the intervention of parliamentary responsibility is a very good thing.

In this connection I remember last year that the hon. member was good enough to put forward a very extensive and interesting bibliography and I was happy to see included in it the works of many of my former colleagues in the field of political science. I would not presume to tell anyone what he should read but had I more time at my disposal I had intended to make reference to a very important work which I am sure is familiar to many hon. members of the house, "The New Despotism" by the Right Hon. Lord Hewart of Bury, in which he deals with this growing tendency in these days of big government and of demands for government to move into more and more avenues of daily life, with the dangers inherent in setting up regulatory bodies which are not directly responsible to the organ which in turn is responsible to the sovereign people.

Another aspect we must consider is that the mere counting of heads is not of itself a sufficient consideration. We in Canada are a pragmatic and practical people and we do not follow neat formulae. If we were to follow a certain precise formula under which a certain number of people had one member of parliament and this prevailed all across the country, it would be unworkable. I know that the hon. member does not have this in mind because I remember the thesis he put forward. There are also historic and geographic considerations which must be involved and I do not think that because one citizen lives in a constituency which has 50,000 voters and another lives in a constituency which has 25,000 voters the quality of the representation of the former in this sovereign parliament is any less and certainly no one would say it is only half as good.

This is not to say, however, that such complaints as the hon. member for York-Scarborough put forward with deep feeling are not to be considered seriously and do not cry for early remedy. At the same time I do not think there is any mystical efficacy in the mathematical computation of voters and the election thereby—

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does the hon. member think there is any mystical efficacy in the practice that protects Prince Edward Island and keeps it with four members?

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I wish I had more time to talk about Prince Edward Island's membership. I think that is just one instance of what we have been talking about. Indeed, had our negotiators in 1873 insisted on a minimum of six seats I think they would have served not only Prince Edward Island but Canada better than they did. Six seats were accepted but this number was eventually and over many protests reduced to four.

Mr. Speaker: Six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the house if there is any change in the announcement he made last night?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to add to the items I listed last night the following: resolution No. 9 on today's order paper concerning the convention on the nationality of married women; No. 11, the resolution concerning the Defence Services Pension Act; No. 12, the resolution referring to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and there will be a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Veterans' Land Act which will appear in Votes and Proceedings on Monday. We may ask to go on with that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that these measures would follow on Tuesday as well as the others the hon. member mentioned for Tuesday?

Mr. Green: These represent a little addition to what I mentioned last night, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ESCAPES OF INMATES, JOYCEVILLE PENAL INSTITUTION, ONT.

Question No. 372—Mr. Howard:

1. How many, if any, inmates have escaped from the penal institution at Joyceville, Ontario?
2. At the time of escape what percentage of the inmate population did the escapees represent?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. Four inmates (two in July, 1957 and two in December, 1958).

2. 4.16 per cent on each occasion.

ROADS TO RESOURCES PROGRAM

Question No. 398—Mr. Roberge:

1. In what fiscal year was the development of roads leading to resources program initiated?
2. What provinces have entered into an agreement with the federal government in each fiscal year since the inception of the program up to March 31, 1959, and what is the amount paid to each of them in each year?
3. What provinces have not entered into such an agreement?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. The original offer of federal assistance in the construction of roads to resources was conveyed to the premiers of the various provinces in a letter dated February 12, 1958. The actual program was initiated in the fiscal year 1958-59.

2. As at March 31, 1959, agreement had been reached with all provinces except Quebec on the roads to be included in the program, their standards and specifications and the general terms of cost sharing between the two levels of government. Formal agreements are now in process of execution with these nine provinces. At March 31, 1959, the only provincial program for which the formal agreement had been signed by both governments was that of British Columbia. The amount paid to date under the terms of this agreement is $1,000,732.79.

3. Answered by No. 2.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 18, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

DECLARATION OF LOYALTY ON CELEBRATION OF BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this being the day that has been designated to be celebrated as the birthday of Her Majesty Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, I hope the Acting Leader of the Opposition will join with me in conveying congratulations from the House of Commons to Her Majesty. At the same time I know I speak for all Canadians when I say that she enjoys the loyalty and affection of all of us. After we have heard from opposition members, shall we then rise and join in summarizing our feelings by the singing of, "God Save the Queen"?

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to say a few words in French, a language which has always been not only understood but very correctly spoken by our sovereigns.

I wish to associate myself with the words of congratulations which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just addressed to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II.

I should also like to express, if I may, the feelings of devotion, affection, attachment and loyalty of Canadians of French origin for Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. History shows, Mr. Speaker, that in times of emergency the people of French Canada have always supported the British crown. Indeed, on one occasion, if not two, they took up arms against invaders of our Canadian territory.

It seems to me fitting that, on this day, a French voice be heard so as to echo from this side of the house the feelings that the Prime Minister has just expressed towards the gracious lady who, by virtue of the Statute of Westminster, is now Queen of Canada. Therefore, on behalf of the members of the opposition, I wish to make known to this house our feelings of affection and devotion to the Canadian crown.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we of the C.C.F. should like to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister and the Acting Leader of the Opposition in offering our congratulations to Her Majesty. On this occasion when Canada commemorates her birthday we wish to assure Her Majesty of our continuing loyalty and affection, and of the continuing loyalty and affection of all Canadians. We have, of course, a monarchical form of government. We recognize that it is based on the sound democratic principles of a responsible government. Although some of us might wish the house were not sitting today, nevertheless it is appropriate that the parliament of Canada, in commemorating her Majesty's birthday, should carry on Her Majesty's business.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the Queen

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Tenth and eleventh reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—TABLING OF REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS IN NEW YORK

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to table the report of the United Nations conference on lead and zinc.

In my statement to the house in advance of the conference on April 24 I explained that the Canadian government's views regarding the U.S. import quotas remained unchanged, and also that it would be made clear that Canada would be willing to explore the necessity for and possibility of an intergovernmental agreement for lead and zinc but that to be acceptable to Canada any such agreement must find wide support with all major importing and exporting countries playing their full part. I also referred to the representations which had been received from Canadian industry which has sought to avoid the necessity for an intergovernmental agreement and the regulation of exports, and the effects on mine production that such an agreement might entail.

As will be seen from the report which is being tabled, there was every indication prior to the conference that again in 1959 there would be a substantial addition to world surplus stocks of lead and zinc as a result of the high level of production which was being maintained in the face of weakened and restricted markets. This situation could not, of course, continue indefinitely.

Shortly before the conference reports were received of decisions taken by private producers in one or two countries to reduce their production. These indications of a change of direction in production policies were noted by the conference and encouraged a broad reassessment of expectations on the part of the different delegations including their industry advisers. In a good number of cases this led to announcements during the course of the conference of the intentions of other producers to curtail their production. In other cases governments, including that of the U.S.S.R., announced reductions in their expected or intended exports.

Hon. members will recall that the effect of the U. S. import quotas has been to restrict shipments by Canadian producers to the large United States market, and it became necessary for some of them to adjust production. The net effect of reduction by a number of our producers and revisions of previous forecasts is that Canadian exports will likely fall below 1958 levels by 9,000 tons of lead and 30,000 tons of zinc, as is indicated in the report.

If the revised forecasts are realized the annual rate of world production of zinc will be brought nearly into balance with expected consumption. Reduction from a forecast 120,000 ton surplus to a mere 16,000 tons for the world industry as a whole would be a major advance toward the restoration of more normal market conditions for zinc. The effect of forecast reductions in the case of lead is not quite so satisfactory, though there too the progress anticipated is significant.

I would not like to convey too optimistic an impression. The United States quota restrictions still remain in effect. Moreover, it should be noted that the report of the conference does not deal with the difficult problem of existing surplus stocks. However, it appears possible that as a result of voluntary decisions taken by private producers to adjust production to demand, the lead and zinc industries may have taken the first step on the way out of their recent difficulties.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I wonder if I may ask the minister if copies of the report will be available to any hon. members who may wish to obtain them; and second, do I understand his statement to indicate that no further restrictions on the part of the United States against Canadian exports to that country are to be expected?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: I doubt that there will be further restrictions, Mr. Speaker. An attempt to solve the problem in this way was suggested a year ago, and the committee has now arrived at its findings. The report I have just tabled can be reproduced for those who require it. Three or four copies have been made available through the proper office, but other copies I think can be made available if it is so desired.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the report just made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is an interesting one, and indicates the difficulties in the situation as he has explained them. This matter is of grave concern, as we all know, to the mining industry of British Columbia and to the working people who depend for their livelihood on the prosperity of that industry. We do hope the government will continue to work in closest co-operation with the industry in Canada, and will continue its efforts in the spirit in which they have been commenced in co-operating with United States interests and the interests of other countries with a view to finding a final and satisfactory solution to this most complicated and difficult question.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FURTHER ASSISTANCE FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION, TO FARMERS AND FISHERMEN, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Veterans' Land Act to provide further financial assistance to veterans for home construction and to veterans presently settled under the act as full-time farmers or who may be so settled in the future and to veterans who may be settled as part-time farmers or commercial fishermen; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

R.C.M.P. DETACHMENT, QUEEN CHARLOTTE CITY, B.C.

Motion No. 102—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and any person, organization or government, since January 1, 1958, relative to the purchase of land or any other matter relating to the proposed Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment at Queen Charlotte city.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): There is no objection to accepting this motion subject to the usual reservation regarding privileged communications, if any, and also to the obtaining of consent from the provincial authority if any correspondence with the provincial government is on file.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to those limitations is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCES ON MANUFACTURE OF SMALL CARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder if the Prime Minister could give a report to the house of the conferences he held on Saturday last with the presidents of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, the Chrysler Corporation of Canada and General Motors Corporation with regard to the manufacture in Canada of small cars. This is a matter which I am sure the Prime Minister will realize is of the greatest consequence as it affects the employment of thousands in Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The importance of the problem has, of course, been directed to my attention on a number of occasions by the hon. member for Essex West as well as by the representatives of labour who met the cabinet some weeks ago.

All I can say at this time is that I had meetings with the various executive officers of the several companies referred to by the hon. member for Essex East at which we discussed the problem in all its facets. I pointed out that it was the view of the government that the manufacture of small cars in Canada is an economic necessity. The interviews I had were conducted in a fine spirit on the part of the executives of the automobile manufacturers concerned. There was complete good feeling, and there was frankness shown by each and every one of them throughout the discussions. I can only say that any announcements that may be made from time to time respecting this matter will, of course, have to be made by the companies in question. Other than that I do not think I can make any comment at the moment that would be appropriate or of assistance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is it still a fact that the Prime Minister will see the president of the Studebaker corporation tomorrow?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as the hon. gentleman knows the Studebaker corporation has already proceeded with the manufacture of small cars; but I felt it would be only fair, having regard to the circumstances, that the executive head of the Studebaker corporation should be given the opportunity of presenting the views of that company.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I wonder if the Prime Minister could say whether any follow-up meetings or consultations are under consideration, and whether in his discussions there was any intimation that the policy of the companies' head offices in the United States would make it difficult for the companies in Canada to manufacture small cars, or whether the companies in Canada, as I would hope is the case, are free to make the decisions themselves based on the economic needs of this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add anything more to what I have already said. If by "follow-up" is meant further meetings with the executive heads of the automobile companies, I have no present intention of undertaking any such follow-up. However, if "follow-up" means that there will be further correspondence as between the government and the companies, I feel sure that would be the case.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would answer the second question I asked. Since Canadian sovereignty in all these matters is of great importance to all of us, I wonder if the Prime Minister would say if the Canadian companies are free, apart from any outside influence, to decide on this project themselves based on Canadian interests.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman could secure that information by communicating with the companies. I was dealing with the companies on the basis that the representative heads in Canada would be in a position to determine the policies for the companies.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I also direct a question to the Prime Minister on this subject. Have he and his colleagues given any consideration to the thought that in regard to this problem there might be an advantage in giving a special concession with respect to the excise tax relating to small cars of lower weight?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not expect a budgetary matter to be answered on orders of the day.

Mr. Benidickson: The budget debate is over.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—REQUEST FOR EARLY AGREEMENT ON PILOTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement made by Vice Admiral Alfred Richmond, commandant of the United States coast guard, to the effect that there is little chance that congress will pass his legislation this session because of opposition from Canada and from three departments of the United States government, does the minister not think that now would be an opportune time for either himself or his officials to enter into discussions with the officials of the United States government in order to reach an agreement upon pilotage on the great lakes?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the officials of my department are in close contact with the officials of the United States government at all times regarding this matter, and they know our desire, expressed many times over, to reach an agreement between the two countries on this question.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RUSSIAN MESSAGE RESPECTING HIGH ALTITUDE NUCLEAR TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister comment on Mr. Khrushchev's latest message to President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillan which appears to indicate the Soviet government's willingness to take part in a technical conference to study scientific information related to the detection of high altitude nuclear tests?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reports in the press indicate that the Soviet appear to have taken a cautious step toward the solution of the problem of discontinuing nuclear tests. However, it would be a mistake to regard the expression of Mr. Khrushchev's views in an optimistic light, or to come to the conclusion that what has been said by him represents a concession of major significance. The house will recall that the question of detecting high altitude tests was discussed at length last summer at Geneva between western and Soviet experts, but those discussions were not pursued to agreed conclusions. Mr. Khrushchev's latest message, therefore, rather than initiating a fresh subject for negotiation represents merely an expression of renewed willingness to discuss an aspect of the problem on which a considerable amount of preparatory work has already been done.

It will be noted that his message is silent on the related question of how to detect subterranean tests. The aim with regard to subterranean tests is to reach agreement on a satisfactory number of annual inspections. On this aspect of the problem there was no encouragement whatsoever in Mr. Khrushchev's message as reported in the press.

All I can say is that while what has been suggested by him does represent at least a step forward, there is nothing in that statement which would lead the free world to believe that a major change of policy has been effected.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister comment on the departure this morning of Sir Michael Wright from the discussions in Geneva for the purpose of considering a further proposal to be put forward by Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO RELIEVE BAIT SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, but owing to his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister. In view of the serious bait shortage being experienced right now by the lobster fishermen in Newfoundland, will the minister please inform the house what steps his department has taken to cope with this urgent situation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall brink this question to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO ACCEPTANCE OF PAYMENT IN SOFT CURRENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. As the result of the recent meeting of representatives of Canada, the United States, Australia, France and Argentina in Washington to discuss the distribution of the world's No. 1 surplus food, namely wheat, to hungry people, is the Canadian government now giving consideration to accepting payment from the recipient countries in so-called soft currencies?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have equal pleasure in replying to the hon. gentleman. He gave me notice of his question, which I think is based on a newspaper report that emanated from Washington. But in answer to the question, the policy of the government and of the wheat board is the same as it was last year, that is not to accept soft currency. During the last crop year 90 per cent of our export wheat was sold for cash. The remainder was disposed of either by way of loans on a three-year basis to, for example, Poland and Israel, or on long term loans to countries under the Colombo plan, or by way of outright gift to the Colombo plan countries. In the latter instance counterpart funds are set up for those outright gifts, that is, local currency; and those counterpart funds are used by the recipient country of the wheat to promote development projects within their own countries. We have no intention of changing that policy at the present time.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the minister's reply, would he admit that the government is now following to some extent the policy advocated by this group for many years?

Mr. Churchill: The government will continue to set an example to the group in that corner for many years to come.

HARBOURS

LAKEHEAD—FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of Premier Frost's recent statement that his government is in partnership with the federal government to make the ports of Fort William and Port Arthur the finest on lake Superior, can the minister indicate what contributions have been made so far by the provincial government, and what are the arrangements on sharing with this government in the future?

Mr. Speaker: I am rather in doubt that the hon. member should expect an off the cuff answer to a question which covers as much as that. Perhaps it might be put on the order paper and dealt with more efficiently in that way.

LAKEHEAD—REPORTED CONVERSATION WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In a telephone conversation with Hon. George Wardrope, the provincial member for Port Arthur, last Thursday, did the minister express, as reported in the Port Arthur News-Chronicle, surprise that the lakehead harbour commission had not met and appointed a chairman and secretary?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have had no conversation with Hon. George Wardrope.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL PLANT, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can he inform the house when we may expect the tabling of correspondence and documents agreed to on April 15 under motion No. 25, and having to do with the East Saint John thermal plant?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): As I recall the motion accepted on April 15, it was on the understanding that if an agreement was signed with the province. The province has turned over the decision on the matter of costs and policy to a royal commission for a report. I have forgotten the exact date when the matter was turned over to that royal commission, but until that agreement is signed I am not able to table the documents.

Mr. Robichaud: May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house if it is still the intention of the federal government to participate financially in this project, and has the government been officially notified whether oil or coal will be used to generate power in the plant in question?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The government position has been made known on several occasions. There has been no official declaration by the province of New Brunswick as to whether they intend to use oil or coal at that plant, and there will not be until they get a report from the royal commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

GASOLINE—ALLEGED PRICE DISCRIMINATION IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice; I hope my notice reached him in sufficient time. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a newspaper advertisement in this morning's Globe and Mail, placed there by the Ontario retail gasoline and automotive service association, which charges that two oil companies, in an attempt to escape prosecution for price discrimination practices, used the subterfuge of buying back the gasoline originally sold to certain dealers at predatory rates and then claiming that the gasoline was being sold on a commission basis? If so, can the minister indicate what action is planned to determine whether the charges set out in the advertisement are correct; and if they are correct, what remedial action is to be undertaken by the combines investigation branch?

Mr. Speaker: There are several questions involved. I do not know whether the minister would want to reply to the last one about combines investigation. However, it seems to me the first one is directed to prosecution for a criminal offence, which lies with the officers of the crown in the province.

Mr. Howard: May I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the jurisdiction in this question of price discrimination falls under the Minister of Justice, and would initially rest there, I think, rather than with the provincial authorities.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister can throw any light on the matter with respect to the aspect of combination in restraint of trade, he may wish to answer. I did not understand the hon. member to be asking a question of that kind. I thought it was a question directed to prosecutions.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I think all such questions have usually been directed to the Minister of Justice, and perhaps I can answer on this occasion. I did not have the opportunity, since receiving notice of the hon. gentleman's question, to check the advertisement specifically, but I can tell the hon. member that the combines branch of my department has been keeping under close surveillance all gasoline price wars, so-called, over the past few months, and a number of informal steps have been taken from time to time to follow up complaints which have been received.

I could not, of course, be expected at this time to say whether or not the statements made in the advertisement referred to are correct or disclose material warranting formal inquiry. However, I should emphasize once again that it would be most helpful if those concerned would, in addition to any other steps of this nature they may be inclined to take, communicate all specific information in their possession directly to the director of investigation and research in the combines branch.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REQUEST FOR BRIEFING OF MEMBERS BY SUPREME COMMANDER—STATEMENT ON MEETING WITH CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister been able to arrange for General Norstad to give a private briefing for members of this house?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): General Norstad spent two hours with the cabinet this morning, and thereafter attended a luncheon. He had to leave immediately for Oslo, Norway, so it became impossible for him to arrange his itinerary to permit the carrying into effect of the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if either the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence has any comment to make as a result of the meeting this morning?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what comment could be usefully made. The commander of NATO dealt at length with the situation in Europe, with the concept of NATO, and something of its future plans. He discussed with my colleagues and myself in particular Canadian participation in NATO and the future course to be taken by Canada.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he can bring the house up to date on the Polymer strike.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Perhaps the hon. member has noticed a report in the Toronto newspapers that we have appointed Mr. Taylor of the city of Toronto as mediator. He will be convening a meeting between the two parties concerned either today or tomorrow.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT ON 1957-58 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the urgent need to supplement the cash position of western grain producers, particularly in the light of the very adverse crop conditions at this time. Is the minister in a position to say when an announcement can be made as to the final payment on the 1957-58 wheat crop? It has been over nine months since the end of the crop year.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am waiting to hear from the Canadian wheat board. They advised me some time ago that preparations for the final payment should be completed about the middle of this month. I expect to hear at any time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN NORTHERN ALLOWANCES FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the discriminatory rate of northern allowances paid government employees at Hay River, in the Northwest Territories, compared to allowances paid at comparable high cost points in the north? If so, will the minister make appropriate representations to the treasury board in the near future on behalf of these employees?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I am not aware of this fact, but I will check and let the hon. member know.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

WELLAND CANAL—REPORTED TRAFFIC JAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Did the minister note the article in this morning's Globe and Mail concerning the rather unusual traffic tie-up at the Queen Elizabeth highway crossing of the Welland canal?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I noticed some allusion to that matter. I should like to remind the hon. member that the traffic tie-ups that are now taking place on the Queen Elizabeth highway crossing of the Welland canal are exactly the same as those which occurred for 22 years under the former Liberal government, without that government doing anything whatever to alleviate those traffic problems.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister would not wish to leave the impression—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Is it true that there is increased traffic through the Welland canal now, and that as a result the bridge is up for a greater length of time than it was previously?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, everything is moving faster, more quickly and more efficiently under a Conservative government than it did under the former government.

Mr. Hellyer: Everything except the minister.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of Premier Frost's announcement that the government of Ontario is going to build bridges to relieve this congestion, can the minister indicate whether or not any conversations have been held with his department for the purpose of determining the federal government's position with regard to this particular project?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, Hon. Leslie Frost is quite capable of making his own decisions on behalf of the government of Ontario and has done so, to the voters' satisfaction, for the past 15 years.

An hon. Member: All good things must come to an end.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister mean to leave the suggestion that the federal government is making any contribution toward a bridge across the Welland canal at the Queen Elizabeth highway?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker. Neither did I intend to say nor, I feel sure, did I say anything to the effect.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION RESPECTING REPORTED TIGHT MONEY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the Minister of Transport about all things getting better I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, if I may. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether or not he has read the leading editorial in the Montreal Gazette of this morning with respect to tight money, and whether he and his colleagues are contemplating action that would avoid the results there indicated.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet read the editorial in question. I thank my hon. friend for directing my attention to it. I should be glad to have a look at it. There is no tight money policy as far as this government is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not what the Gazette says.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That policy belonged to the government that went out of office two years ago. According to a statement issued by the president of the Canadian Bankers Association last Friday, the chartered banks have instituted a policy of curtailing credit in the case of larger loans. I am told that this policy is not going to affect loans in amounts of under $100,000. I took particular note of the concluding paragraph of the statement issued by Mr. Ulric Roberge, president of the Canadian Bankers Association, when he said this:

> Within these limitations, a special attempt will be made to look after the essential credit needs of small borrowers.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Knowing the bankers' problems, is the minister, from the point of view of government policy, doing anything to encourage the banks to act along those lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the chartered banks are well aware of the government's wish that credit be provided within the means of the banks for creditworthy projects. If the banks find they have not an ample amount of money to meet the extraordinary demands for credit that are made upon them today as a result of the upsurge in the Canadian economy, then certainly it is not the intention of the Canadian government to inflict on the people of Canada a repetition of the tight money policy of our Liberal predecessors.

Mr. Pickersgill: What are you going to do to stop it?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister deny that he has suggested to the Bank of Canada that in this restrictive policy some liberalization with regard to small borrowers should take place?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is well aware, or should be by now, that monetary policy is a matter that parliament has confided to the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never mind the lecture.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly the Bank of Canada assure me they have not made any suggestions to the chartered banks of this country that they should in any way restrict credit.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance on several occasions in the past has indicated—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: —that when interest rates go down, it has something to do with the government. What is he doing now to try—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this discussion on monetary policy on the orders of the day is rather fruitless, and I suggest that it be dropped at this point.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENT IN FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport; I regret that I was unable to give him notice. It has to do with a telegram I have received from Prince Edward Island saying that west coast interests are reported to be considering the purchase of the Vacationland. Can the minister say what further consideration, since his statement on May 7, has been given by the government to the purchase of the Vacationland to augment the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland? If the decision has not been made yet, can the minister say when it is likely to be made?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of using the Vacationland, along with several other alternative means of improving transportation facilities between the mainland and Prince Edward Island, is at present under active consideration by the government.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister might be able to say when a decision in this regard will be made, since there is a great deal of interest in this matter in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, there is also a great deal of interest in the department. We are just as anxious as are the people of Prince Edward Island. Certainly the four members from Prince Edward Island have been bringing this matter to my attention daily. A decision will be reached just as soon as possible.

AIR TRANSPORT

SEATING CAPACITY OF PLANE CARRYING MEMBERS TO WINDSOR AND WHEATLEY, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On Wednesday, May 13, I directed a question to him with respect to the seating capacity of a particular aircraft that went from Ottawa to Windsor and Wheatley, Ontario. The minister indicated that he would inquire and would let me know the exact number of seats. I wonder whether he is in a position at the moment to give me this information?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker; 24.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLIOMYELITIS IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM FOR MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): Mr. Speaker, because some members of the house have not as yet received notice of this matter I should like to make a brief announcement on behalf of the parliamentary voluntary health committee which should be of interest to all members of the house.

The parliamentary voluntary health committee is commencing a polio immunization program on Tuesday, May 19 next. A doctor will be in attendance in the nurse's office between one o'clock and two o'clock on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays to administer Salk poliomyelitis vaccine. All members desirous of obtaining this protection against poliomyelitis are welcome to avail themselves of this opportunity. We hope the first part of this program may be completed by May 29 next.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the recommended routine with respect to the prime element between inoculations of this type? I understand that perhaps two or three months are required.

Mr. Kucherepa: Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the hon. member's question. Briefly, we hope to complete this part of the program by May 29 in order that we may be able to give the second dose in about three to four weeks time, before the house should adjourn.

FREIGHT RATES

MEASURE RESPECTING REDUCTION OF CLASS AND COMMODITY RATES

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill C-38, to make provision for the reduction of certain class and commodity rates on freight traffic.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement on this bill at this time?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman. I have already made a statement. As the hon. member knows, this matter received considerable discussion both at the resolution stage and on second reading. It was examined thoroughly by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for a period of three days. I do not think there is really anything further I have to say at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this bill, which is known as Bill C-38, to reduce class and commodity rates on freight traffic, comes to the house as the minister has just said after examination by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In that committee representations were heard from various groups indicating to the committee and to the government what their views were on the bill. I would have thought that in the light of those representations, sir, the Minister of Transport would have seen fit to indicate to the house what his views, those of his department and those of the government were in regard to those representations. It seems to me too, sir, that the minister should have given the house some indication, particularly in the light of the announcement made by the Prime Minister the other evening, on the royal commission on transportation. Unfortunately he has not seen fit to do this, and this prompts me to make a few observations on the bill as it comes from committee.

In the first place, out of the evidence that was given before the committee there comes some pertinent information having to do with this subsidy of $20 million which is being granted by parliament to various regions of Canada. One of those pertinent facts is the evidence given by one of the members of the board of transport commissioners to the effect that this subsidy will be divided among the various regions as follows: to the western region, 57.6 per cent, or $11,340,000; to the central region, 26.5 per cent or $5,300,000; and to the maritime region, 16.8 per cent or $3,360,000. Having regard to the fact that it was announced in this house that this was a measure to bring relief to the long haul provinces, it seems to me that here is positive proof and positive evidence that this measure will not provide relief to the long haul provinces as was anticipated.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to make a correction. I do not think it was ever said by me or by anybody on this side of the house that this was intended to relieve the long haul provinces; it was intended to relieve the long haul shippers.

Mr. Chevrier: Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I have not before me the statement made by the minister and that made by the Prime Minister, but there is no doubt in my mind what the implication of this measure is, that it is to come to the assistance of those who live in the far away parts of Canada, so the effect of the 17 per cent increase will be minimized to the extent of $20 million. That was clearly made the subject of statements made in this house.

However, the point I want to pursue is this; that had the committee been given the information which was asked, namely what was understood by a long and short haul and to what extent was the relief granted in the ten blocks established by the board of transport commissioners, then I am sure we would be able to ascertain and establish that the benefit of this subsidy is not nearly as great as was indicated and anticipated in favour of the long haul provinces. Unfortunately this information was not given. It is true that I did receive from the commissioner ten sheets, which were an analysis of the way bill sample, outlining the movements originating in one province and remaining in that province, but this information does not throw a great deal of light on the bill now before the house.

There is, however, another matter which I would like to discuss, sir, in relation to this measure, and that is the terms and the scope of the royal commission which was announced by the Prime Minister on Wednesday last. I would like to take this opportunity of saying, notwithstanding the statement which was made on that occasion, that the terms and the scope of the royal commission in my opinion are inadequate to deal with the problem that is now before us.

In the first place, before we consider that matter I think we must give some consideration to the reason the royal commission was established. The royal commission was established because of the decision of the board of transport commissioners in November, 1958 authorizing a 17 per cent increase in freight rates to meet the wage increase which had been agreed upon between the railways and their employees. As the house knows, the provinces appealed this decision and the cabinet, in disallowing the appeal, stated that it would bring in a measure to relieve the inadequacies or inequities of the freight rate structure, and at the same time indicated that there would be a further study of the whole transportation problem in Canada.

The contention of the opposition at that time was that the government should have disposed of this problem earlier. The contention of the opposition was that in November, 1957 there was clear indication of this dispute between the railways and their employees, and if the government had then given the consideration which it should have given to this important matter then perhaps it would not have been necessary to take the action which was taken by the government, not of establishing the royal commission but of disallowing the appeal.

The wage increases for the employees, arose in November, 1957. It arose one year earlier than the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister, and it arose when the board of transport commissioners, faced with an application for an increase in freight rates because of an anticipated wage increase which at that time had not been agreed upon between the railways and the employees, had to make a determination of the issue, and the matter then came before the cabinet following the appeal from that decision. During the whole period of the wage negotations the government was aware that ultimately they would be called upon to give some consideration to the question and to take some positive action in order to settle the matter; but nothing was done and the matter was allowed to drift until the government was face to face with the appeal from the provinces.

I say, sir, that in my opinion the terms of this royal commission are inadequate. Before I give positive reasons for that assertion I should like to consider briefly the background. Why did the provinces appeal the decision? Though I was not present when the appeal was argued, I presume that one of the many reasons the provinces appealed the decision was that the long haul provinces suffered economic disadvantages on account of the long haul to markets and from the sources of supply which placed the Atlantic provinces and the western provinces in particular at a relative disadvantage in reaching central Canadian markets in competition with producers in other parts of Canada, and particularly with producers who had shorter hauls to make.

The maritime provinces take the view that the Maritime Freight Rates Act should be retained and extended, and they want, to a large degree, the equalization of freight rates. The prairie provinces want the retention of the Crowsnest rates, and they too demand equalization of freight rates. They also would like closer supervision over the establishment of competitive rates. British Columbia wants the preservation of its transcontinental rates together with a greater equalization of freight rates.

In effect this means that the provinces want lower freight rates, although different methods are suggested; some provinces favour one method, whereas other provinces favour another. Whatever method is suggested as the solution to this important problem, the object will be the same, namely to give to the shipper and to the consignee greater relief from the disadvantages attributed to the increases in rates by the horizontal percentage method, and at the same time to retain any existing advantages in rates which are enjoyed by the shipper and the consumer.

On the other hand, the railways want the preservation of the horizontal rate increases; they say that is their method of obtaining relief from the increasing costs of transportation in this country.

Therein lies the clash between the provinces, on the one hand, and the railways on the other. It seems that between these two points of view a solution must be found. The royal commission has been established with the object in view, I presume, of finding some relief from that problem. What do the terms of the royal commission do in order to meet this point? Nothing specific is stated in the terms of reference to this question I have just raised. I say that the terms are inadequate, first because there is no specific reference in the order in council to horizontal rate increases and to the effect these increases will have upon the long haul provinces.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to consider the attitude of the government when they sat on this side of the house, and how hon. gentlemen opposite rose in their places and inveighed against the impact of horizontal rate increases from one end of the country to another and, by implication, indicated that when they got into office they would do something to relieve that burden. I say there is no specific reference to this problem, which to me is one of the most serious problems—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about subsection (a)?

Mr. Chevrier: —as indicated by the Prime Minister and others when they sat on this side of the house. In a moment, if I may, I shall deal with subsection (a) in connection with horizontal rate increases. Then I will ask the committee to consider the attitude adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite during the election campaign. Will the Prime Minister allow me to read to him what he said on May 18, 1957 at Drumheller. He stated on that occasion:

> —there should be equalization of rail rates in Canada "within reasonable limits" to give a shot in the arm to agriculture and industry on the prairies.

He is reported a little further on as having said:

> —that a rate pattern discriminatory to the west has been made worse by recent increases. This had struck "an almost paralyzing blow" to industrial development in the west.

And still later, according to a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 20, 1957, he is reported as having said:

> —a Conservative government would equalize freight rates as far as possible to help both agriculture and industry on the prairies compete with the rest of Canada.

When these statements were made there had been three reports submitted by the board of transport commissioners equalizing freight rates to the extent that they could be equalized at the time. One of these reports is dated May 25, 1955.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the hon. gentleman mean by the words "to the extent that they could be equalized at the time"?

Mr. Chevrier: I mean this, that freight rates were equalized in western Canada. I mean, further, that freight rates were equalized on a long list of commodities as set out in Mr. Justice Kearney's report dated March 25, 1955 of which, I am sure, the Prime Minister could not have taken cognizance when he made the statement he did. I mean, also, the report on equalization dated September 22, 1957. This is the one handed down by chief commissioner Clarence Shepard in which is detailed a long list of class and commodity rates which had been equalized.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that these lists covered all the commodities which affect western Canada and the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Chevrier: I suggest this, that if the Prime Minister had read those three reports —and I know it is impossible for him to read everything which has to do with this subject—he would have amended the statement he made during the campaign, because these are three reports dealing clearly and without equivocation with what has been done by the board of transport commissioners to equalize freight rates in Canada. I think they are well worth reading, because they indicate to what extent the board has gone in dealing with this question of equalization.

I return now to the terms of reference. It was suggested that term (a) of order in council P.C. 1957/577 covered the question I discussed earlier about the impact of horizontal freight rates. The point I was making was that this subsection does not deal particularly with the impact of horizontal freight rates, and having regard to the fact that members of the government when sitting on this side of the house complained so bitterly about this matter, it would seem to me that this was one of the first things they would have mentioned in the scope of the reference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this not comprehensive enough to cover it?

Mr. Chevrier: I doubt very much whether it is, because the words are so broad that they could probably mean anything. But having regard to the fact that certain charges were made it would have seemed to me that a particular reference could have been included to cover the matter.

May I now draw another point to the attention of the government. It is stated that the commissioners are appointed to inquire into and report upon certain problems, one of which is stated to be inequities in the freight rate structure, their incidence upon the various regions of Canada, etc. My suggestion is this. I doubt very much whether there are inequities in the freight rate structure in the sense mentioned here. What I am saying is that there are inequalities. I know the Prime Minister is ready to rise and blast at me because of that statement, but I shall repeat it. I doubt very much if there are inequities in the legal sense of the word. There may be inequalities in the freight rate structure and I think there probably are serious ones, but how could there be inequities in the sense in which this is meant when the Railway Act clearly says that the moment an application is made to the board of transport commissioners the board shall deal with the matter as it comes before them? I refer to section 328, subsection 5 of the Railway Act which states:

—the powers given to the board under this act to fix, determine and enforce just and reasonable rates, and to change and alter rates as changing conditions or cost of transportation may from time to time require, are not limited or in any manner affected by the provisions of any act of the parliament of Canada—

I submit that the freight rates which have been determined by the board of transport commissioners, while they may be unequal because of the vast distances in Canada, are not inequitable because they are authorized under statute passed by parliament. To that extent I say that the wording of this section is not sufficient in order to cover adequately the impact of the horizontal rate increases.

Furthermore, the scope of this inquiry is not adequate because it contains no specific reference to the problems of the Canadian National Railways. Is there any railway in Canada or on the North American continent which at this time is suffering greater difficulties because of lack of traffic and competition from other sources than the Canadian National Railways? It seems to me that with a deficit of $51 million for the year 1959 as announced by the president and an estimated deficit of $34 million for the year 1960, some specific reference should have been made in the scope of this inquiry to deal with the problems of the Canadian National Railways which are most urgent at this time.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman. Is the hon. member suggesting that the commission should have been given power to examine all the ramifications of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not suggesting that, Mr. Chairman. What I am suggesting is that the commission might well have been given power to deal with what assistance could be given to help the C.N.R. in getting around its fixed charges. That is a matter that has come up in parliament from time to time and one about which the Canadian National Railways is greatly apprehensive. Without going into the whole scope of railway transportation I believe the government might well have given consideration to asking the commission to give specific attention to some of the problems of the Canadian National Railways that are most imminent at this time.

There is complete exclusion from this reference to the functions of the board of transport commissioners. I am not complaining about that, but I draw the attention of the government to the following fact. The Prime Minister will remember that when he and his associates sat on this side of the house they criticized the board of transport commissioners by saying that they were useless and were not doing their job properly. If that was the case, why did they not ask the commission to inquire into the functions of the board? Now that they sit on the other side of the chamber and see it in a different light they find that the board is operating satisfactorily, or at least they do not intend to consider an inquiry into the board's functions.

Again, there is no specific reference to the problem referred to in the statement made by the acting prime minister in November of last year, namely the problem that in future the board of transport commissioners should not take it upon themselves to increase freight rates until a definite agreement had been made between the railway company and its employees on the subject of wages. There is no mention of that. This seemed to be a highly important matter when it came up for discussion and was contained in the statement made by the acting prime minister.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member for Laurier to explain in more detail what he means by this suggestion? What does he think should have been written into the terms of the commission in this respect?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, at the request of the Prime Minister the other evening I indicated what I thought should be considered by the royal commission. The Prime Minister rose and said in effect that if anybody in the chamber wanted to tell the government what it should give consideration to with reference to the terms of the royal commission they should make suggestions. I rose and made four suggestions. The Minister of Public Works now asks me what I have to suggest. I am saying that the minister was complaining about this position in which the board of transport commissioners found themselves in having to raise rates because wages had been increased. The minister then made the statement that he did not think the board should be put in that position. Why should not the scope of the inquiry extend to that matter? Why should not that matter be studied so that if in future a similar situation arises the board will know what to do? Under section 328, subsection 5, the board has no other alternative but to deal with applications which come before it as those applications are launched by the railway association of Canada.

Then there is the other matter to which the Prime Minister himself referred when he made the announcement of the royal commission. I should like to quote his words. If I interpret them wrongly I am sure he will correct me. At page 3607 of Hansard of May 13 the Prime Minister said:

> When the Minister of Public Works as acting prime minister announced the government's intention to arrange for this review he assured the western farmers that such review would not mean that they would have to pay more freight on the shipment of grain for export. I wish to take this occasion to confirm this, in regard particularly to the action that may be taken as a result of the work of the royal commission. To make it clear beyond question, the Crowsnest pass rates are part of a bargain that was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers who went west on the other hand. We intend, in so far as this government is concerned, to see to it that that contract shall not be broken.

In that statement the Prime Minister for obvious reasons has started the royal commission off with—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I had reached the last point I intended to make, and I am grateful to the Prime Minister and hon. members of the committee for allowing me to continue. When I was interrupted I was saying that I thought this commission was being started off with one foot carrying a ball and chain, because unless I interpret this statement wrongly it indicates that they cannot consider the Crowsnest pass rates because these rates are part of a bargain that was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers in the west on the other. I doubt if that is correct from an historical standpoint, but I have not risen for that purpose. So far as the government is concerned, the declaration that this contract would not be broken seems to be tantamount to excluding the Crowsnest pass rates from the scope of the inquiry of the royal commission. If I am wrong I stand to be corrected.

The point I wish to make is this. When the Prime Minister made the announcement of the royal commission I said that when some years ago I occupied the position which my hon. friend the Minister of Transport now occupies, the situation in so far as the Crowsnest rates were concerned was quite clearly established by parliament and we had no intention of changing those rates in any way whatsoever. But the point I wish to make now is this. Why should it not be within the scope and purpose of the royal commission to inquire into whether those rates are compensatory? Surely there is nothing which would affect in any way the rights of people in western Canada if that were done. And if perchance it were found that the rates are not compensatory to the railways, then the royal commission might want to make a recommendation to parliament for the payment of a subsidy on behalf of the western farmer, who benefits from the movement of grain because of the Crowsnest rates, in the same manner and to the same extent that there has been a Maritime Freight Rates Act, as there has been a bridge subsidy, and as there has been assistance given from time to time to certain areas for the movement of commodities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question. He has quoted what I said and I stand on those words, but I would ask him what are his suggestions. How would the western farmer be compensated? He has studied this very carefully. The Turgeon commission dealt with this matter rather subjectively. The hon. member, having been a minister, and having given a great deal of study to this, possibly would suggest what he has in mind.

Mr. Chevrier: Before I answer the Prime Minister's question will be allow me to ask him one question. Am I correct in the assumption I have made that the royal commission on transportation is not to give consideration to the Crowsnest rates?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not challenged the hon. member's interpretation.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I take it I was correct in my assumption. That being so, it seems to me that I made it quite clear that if the commission were given the power to study this matter they might well make a recommendation that a subsidy should be paid which would give assistance to the railways in the amount required to compensate for the right which the western farmer enjoys in so far as those rates are concerned. If that were a recommendation of the royal commission and the government decided to implement it, I am sure that parliament would give it the consideration which is required in these matters and which it would deserve under all conditions.

Here it seems to me that a study of the railway transportation problem in Canada, an inquiry so important to railway transportation in Canada, is not complete unless there is a study of this problem because it is one of the most serious problems that exist today, as the Prime Minister knows. It comes up in the committee from time to time; it comes up in the house and it seems, in my opinion at least, that some consideration should have been given to it.

There is no question of eliminating an agreement or changing the agreement that was enacted by parliament away back in 1897. There is no intention on the part of those who sit on this side of the house to affect or change that agreement in any way whatsoever. That has been made quite clear on many occasions. But it is the railways who find themselves in a difficult position. It seems to me it would be just giving the members of this commission an additional term of reference, an additional scope of the reference, in order to consider what is of tremendous importance to the economy of western Canada.

Then, sir, there is no specific reference to the one and one-third rule which affects the province of Alberta so much, the one and one-third rule which has been lost as regards agreed charges. Then it seems to me the inquiry ought not to have been limited in its scope as it has been. It seems to me the government has narrowed the scope of the inquiry by the terms which have been set out.

Then there was the very important statement made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport, that there is to be no increase in freight rates until the commission reports its findings. How long is the commission going to take? It seems to me that a most important task has been given to the members of the royal commission. If they are to do their jobs in the way parliament wants them to do them it may take more than a year. It took the Turgeon commission two and a half years. It is true this commission may do its work much faster. I am not saying that is not possible; but I am saying that future applications to the board of transport commissioners, future increases in freight rates, are tied down because of the statements which have been made. This is not an equitable way to deal with the commission which, it seems to me, should have all the time required to consider and report upon what is a most important problem.

Without trespassing unduly on the time of the committee I could go on with other matters, but I shall not do so. I will simply conclude by saying that the royal commission on transportation have a difficult and important task. Their duties are set out in the preamble to the order in council, which indicates that they are to inquire with reasonable dispatch into problems relating to railway transportation in Canada and the possibility of removing or alleviating inequities in the freight rate structure. With that statement no one can disagree. With the general and broad statement contained in the preamble to the order in council no one, I think, can find fault with it; but then, when it is broken down, it seems to me that there are specific problems having to do with transportation in Canada that should have been mentioned.

I mentioned four of them. On an earlier occasion I mentioned some of the matters which it seemed to me the railways were charged with, and consideration should be given to those matters. Whether the scope of this inquiry is broad enough to consider those I am not in a position to say, but I know that I would have felt a great deal happier, as many hon. members in this house would have felt, if the terms had been spelled out in such a way that many other problems affecting railway transportation could have been considered in this inquiry.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I ask the hon. member a question. With reference to the first part of his question, when he said he did not think this legislation would greatly benefit the long haul provinces, I would ask him how he reconciles this statement with the fact that counsel for the provinces in every case, I believe, in committee ultimately spoke in favour of the legislation? Then, the Canadian truckers' association opposed this legislation because they felt it would mean so much for the long haul provinces it would perpetuate the no-competition situation. Third, my question is, how does the hon. member reconcile this with his own initial statement that he felt it would not assist the central provinces?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend has not listened to what I said because if he had he would not have prefaced his question by saying I had made that statement. I did not make that statement. What I said was this: This was a measure brought into this house to assist the long haul provinces in a general way, and after the evidence we heard, it tends to assist the central provinces, because if one looks at the evidence which was given before the committee, there are certain regions in Canada which are neither in the east nor the west which are going to benefit far more than the region from which my hon. friend comes, namely the maritime provinces.

Mr. Fisher: This group will support the legislation. We followed it with interest when it was before the committee. I, followed the remarks of the speaker from the official opposition. It seemed to me he beat the legislation a little harder than it deserved to be beaten on some points. I must say you can never tell how people interpret things when they read them. I must say I came to the same conclusion about the Crowsnest rates when I listened to the Prime Minister, but after looking at the terms of reference, and after appraising the members of the commission, it looks as though this commission will have the Crowsnest rates very much in mind. It is a commission oriented to the west. If one looks at the terms of reference, one finds paragraph (b) reads:

> (b) the obligations and limitations imposed upon the railways by law for reasons of public policy, and what can and should be done to ensure a more equitable distribution of any burden which may be found to result therefrom;

I could not think of anything to which this would refer except the Crowsnest rates and the maritime rates, unless the commission is going to get into the minor things such as commuter problems, passenger service, and that sort of thing.

Furthermore, it seems to me that the rider the Prime Minister put in with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates merely states that, as a principle, the Crowsnest rates from the west will be safe from any increase. It does not say, and I cannot get an indication from this, that the commission will not ascertain whether or not the Crowsnest rates are compensatory, and work out some sort of arrangement whereby the railways might get paid for the service rendered.

I speak with a certain amount of feeling on this because I have before me an editorial from the Regina Leader-Post of May 13 entitled "C.C.F. tips its hand", and it goes on to indicate that I, as spokesman for the C.C.F. on this particular matter, indicated a position supporting labour and diametrically opposed to the grain producers' interest in the prairies. It reads:

> The farmers at least have one reason to be thankful to Mr. Fisher. The information his persistent questioning elicited from Mr. Gordon is a warning to them that they and their organizations should get busy to prepare their case for retention of the statutory grain rates before the proposed transportation inquiry. It is evident that if such an investigation is launched the most determined effort yet will be aimed at the destruction of the Crowsnest pass rates.

In this regard, I should like to put on the record something from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, page 186, which indicates my particular point of view. The hon. member for Jasper-Edson had just said, in connection with the Crowsnest pass rates:

> Here is the ideal situation where the railway could find out whether the rate was compensatory or not, and I want to bring out again, perhaps as a matter of privilege, that a newspaper last night referred to the Crowsnest rates. I do not think the Canadian National should say the Crowsnest rates are compensatory until they are able to bring that forward.
> Mr. Chevrier: Was that not done before the Turgeon commission?
> Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): No, the Turgeon commission stated they have not been able to say.

Then this is the point which I think answers the editorial and expresses our policy:

> Mr. Fisher: I agree with Mr. Horner on this that, until we have something definite laid on the line, all Mr. Crump's statements and all the other statements made by railroaders should not be made until we know something more definitive on the point. We have not, so far.

The point that bothers me, as someone interested in seeing grain go through the lakehead and also in seeing railway labour happy and the railways kept as going concerns, is this: There has been a two-sided argument in so far as the Crowsnest pass rates and other freight subsidies are concerned, and they pit farmers in the west against railway labour. What has happened has been that the two groups have been set against each other. Management and other people argue that subsidization is outrageous, and subsidies such as we are putting through here are nothing but a sop to labour and on the other hand subsidies like the Crowsnest pass rates are nothing but a handout to the western farmers. I do not believe that is so; it is a completely wrong attitude.

I do not believe the prairie farmer can afford any increase in the charges on his wheat. I feel that if anything we should be thinking, not of an increase in the prairie rates but a decrease. The point in so far as railway labour is concerned is this: Every time they want an increase the western farmers get excited, with newspaper encouragement, and say that these are the people who are putting pressure upon the Crowsnest pass rates. I suggest that if the Canadian Pacific railway is the key to western grain rates, not the Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian Pacific must earn 4 per cent on their stock, then let us establish that through this commission. Then we could say that we will see this free enterprise organization is subsidized to the extent of the non-compensatory margin, but we are going to keep these grain rates as they are or, if necessary, reduce them. We are going to try to get away from the situation where every time the railway unions ask for more money hands are thrown up and people say it is coming directly out of the federal taxpayer's pocket. This is one of the reasons I hope this commission will go into the facts relating to the Crowsnest pass agreement. If one looks at the terms of reference, I believe the commission will be in a position to do so.

In other words, let us find out how much the Canadian Pacific has made out of Consolidated Mining and Smelting over the years, and out of those properties given to them decades ago, from which they get gas and oil revenues. One of the things that is really serious in this matter is that, according to Mr. Gordon when he was questioned before the committee, it may be that we will be unable to have any way of determining historically whether or not the rates have been compensatory. A decision may have to be made by this commission on the situation this year or next year if we cannot get at the value of the things the Canadian Pacific did get from the Crowsnest pass agreement. I suggest that what they did get was very substantial.

It seems to me that the real criticisms that can be made about this legislation are ones that have to do with the present mood and purposes of this government. It is in a very dull mood and the performance is not one that gives any feeling of energetic leadership. The issue came up last November when the Minister of Public Works made his statement. Here it is May before we get the royal commission announced, and we certainly seem to have been dawdling through this freight rate problem. I do not mean dawdling in the house, but I mean in working out a system by means of which the $20 million is to be circulated throughout the whole freight rate structure.

The very figure of $20 million intrigues me. Why was it struck? It only reflects 7 per cent of the 17 per cent increase, but it seems to me that $20 million was the best bargain the Minister of Trade and Commerce could get out of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that $20 million is probably the best bargain the Minister of Trade and Commerce could get out of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me a pity that he could not have obtained a little better bargain in terms for the freight shippers. The figure of $20 million was really never justified to us in terms that were satisfactory in any way. It was just a figure supposedly pulled out of a cabinet meeting hat. I only wish we could have had more elaboration as to the justice or the merit of the $20 million figure.

As to the royal commission and where it is going to go, it is certainly apparent that its report is not going to be ready in time and that we are going to have to do something about putting something more through this complicated process. The year end will reach us soon. We are not going to get any kind of royal commission report by then. We were going to get a rush report on social security pension payments but look what happened. We were going to get a rush report by the Borden energy commission but look what happened.

Mr. Green: You received one.

Mr. Fisher: Yes; we received one finally but it was not within the period stated by the government. Royal commissions are notoriously much longer in making their reports than is indicated by the most optimistic or most pessimistic forecasts of the gentlemen who set them up. We have no real indication that this commission is going to enable us to solve this problem in time. Of course, the other irony is that if and when a royal commission does bring down a report, how long does it take this government to act upon it? It seems to me that we are not getting the dynamic, speedy leadership some people hoped for.

One of the other complaints that was made by the hon. member for Laurier was that the terms of reference were not being broad enough. After the evidence that was put before the freight rates committee by the Canadian truckers' association and the fact that every one of the provincial groups that came there felt that it was necessary to rebut that testimony or say something about it, we should surely have in the terms of reference something that would bring the trucking interests into this whole picture. This is one time when, in the interpretation of the terms of reference, I have perhaps missed something, but I cannot possibly see how under these terms of reference, this royal commission can study the trucking industry except as very much a side issue. To me that was extremely disappointing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We ought to know exactly about that matter.

Mr. Fisher: There is no use asking the Minister of Transport because we tried in committee to ask the Minister of Transport questions about spelling things out and he was always ready to take refuge in the urbanity of that extremely pleasant face of his and the smile.

Mr. Pickersgill: But he cannot spell.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How can you speak of a face being urbane?

Mr. Fisher: There are many things we can say about that face, but I think we will agree that the face is much more attractive than are the announcements that we get from him.

The initial views that I expressed on this whole idea of the $20 million subsidy brought before the house were that there was really no need for a royal commission and that there was no need for this complicated apparatus at all. In substance what the hon. member for Laurier was saying about equalization was the fact that the board of transport commissioners has done a fair job of carrying it out. Their last statement last December on the equalization of freight rates pointed out that there was only one province left that was really clamoring for more equalization, namely the province of Alberta. To me that fact suggests that with the research done and the information that the board of transport commissioners has gathered, with the great number of hearings that the transport commission has held lately, there was enough information available for an energetic, go-getting government to have done something right off the bat on their own initiative and not by this means of a royal commission.

The fundamental question in transportation in this country still boils down to this. It has been said before and it needs to be said again. We must make up our minds, in so far as the railroad side of it is concerned, whether we are going to continue to hobble along between the principle of socialism or free enterprise or, if we want to put it another way, whether we are going to recognize outright that transportation is, in the public domain, a public utility and that therefore the ordinary business costs and business efficiency that would apply to an enterprise in the private sector do not apply here. I can certainly agree with the feelings of Mr. Crump as expressed in his annual reports over the last few years with regard to the frustration of a private corporation trying to do business under the limitations under which the C.P.R. operate. To me and to the people in this group the solution is for us to move logically to the position that this is a field of public enterprise, not of private enterprise, and that until we move in that way we are going to have to continue to have this bastard arrangement of private enterprise and public enterprise, with the advocates of each condemning the other, and no real knowledge about where we are going.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Green: Does he mean that there should be an amalgamation of the railways?

Mr. Fisher: No, sir. I was asked, Mr. Chairman, whether I believed there should be amalgamation of the railways. No; I certainly do not believe that. But I believe that some sort of arrangement should be worked out by means of which the C.P.R. either gets out from the burden of working under these regulations or else the fact that the railway has to make so much in terms of profits or dividends, as the case may be, is no longer an issue in any way, and that this government and the provincial governments must recognize their responsibility there. No matter what steps were taken from the point of view of making the C.P.R. a public enterprise, I think it would be most inopportune to merge the lines together because I think that, even between public corporations, the competitive idea is not an unsound one.

The final point that I think we should consider in so far as this $20 million increase is concerned is what the next subsidy is going to be, how big is it going to be. I hope that the Minister of Public Works, who just got into this matter in a public way last November, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was supposed to have led the fight in the cabinet, and the Minister of Transport will be considering whether it is to be $20 million or whether it is going to be, as we suggest, a larger figure to take care of these freight rate problems and the inordinate burden they are placing upon so many parts of Canada.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks with regard to this bill. First of all, may I say that we in Alberta are extremely grateful to the government for introducing this bill and bringing it before parliament. Our transportation problem in Alberta, of course, is multiple. We are in a particular geographical area in which freight rates are extremely important to our economy.

In his remarks with regard to the bill the hon. member for Laurier tried to put on the record some of the pertinent facts that came to light out of the committee meeting on this bill. I think the pertinent fact that came out of that committee meeting was that all of the provincial government representatives there who had appealed the 17 per cent increase were wholeheartedly in support of this bill and that the only complaint they had—and the same complaint was just heard from the hon. member for Port Arthur—was the fact that there was not enough money. That, of course, is a chronic complaint for everyone, namely that there is not enough money to go around. However again we commend the government for this bill. It is an excellent one. It is one which will go a long way to relieve some of the inequities in the present freight rate structure.

If I may I should also like to make a few remarks with regard to the royal commission on transportation. We again commend the government for setting up this commission. We are particularly happy with the western representatives on this commission. I disagree entirely with the hon. member for Laurier when he says that in the terms of reference there is nothing by means of which they can look into the inequities of the horizontal rate increases. Does he think that men like Howard Mann, M. A. MacPherson and Arnold Platt will not look into the inequities of the horizontal rate increase?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, my hon. friend apparently did not listen to what I was saying. I did not say that there was nothing in the terms of reference which authorized the commission to deal with the impact of horizontal freight rates. What I said was there was no specific reference, and that is not the same thing.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I agree the hon. member said no specific reference, but I say we did not need a specific mention. We want the whole situation with regard to all the inequities investigated, and I commend the government for the terms of reference and for the members appointed to the royal commission.

Now, perhaps I may as a sort of question of privilege on behalf of western Canada make some comment about the newspaper editorials and articles which have been printed in some of the eastern papers and some of the national magazines. I take strong objection to them, particularly the article which was printed in Saturday Night with regard to the case against fixed freight rates and the Crowsnest pass rates. This article is based on similar facts to those on which the trucking association presented their brief to the committee on this bill in which they made a comparison of the freight rates in Canada on a ton mile basis. I strongly object to the use of these figures, because if one looks at the geography of Canada one sees immediately that one cannot compare freight rates in Canada on a ton mile basis. It is not equitable, it is not fair, and it is not even scientifically possible. Yet these people have done that. We have had a lot of editorial comment. The latest I have seen was in a recent issue of the Montreal Gazette. There has been comment in some national magazines with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates and the necessity for them to be investigated.

There was one matter which I suggested—I think the hon. member for Port Arthur also mentioned it—in the recent sessional committee with regard to the C.N.R., and I would like to repeat it. No railway official or executive, either Mr. Crump or Mr. Gordon, should make any statement with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates being unrealistic, because that has not proved to be the case. They have had 25 years, or even more than that, 30 years, to show that these rates were not compensatory. As an example, I asked in the railway committee the other day about the Hudson Bay railway, and I was told, "We cannot break it down; we do not have the figures". We had just had them from the Department of Transport last year, so I looked up the past annual report for the Department of Transport for 1957 and I found that the Hudson Bay railway produced a surplus of $34,000 before depreciation and interest on investments. A total of 660,000 tons of freight was handled, an increase of some 99,000 tons over the previous year, 78 per cent of which consisted of wheat for export, 46,000 passengers making up the balance. The important point is that here we have a railway operating from the prairies to the port of Churchill. Seventy-eight per cent of its traffic was in wheat carried at the Crowsnest pass rates, and this railway has an operating surplus before depreciation and investment.

Now we come to the definition of compensatory rates. Mr. Gordon says that compensatory rates are out of pocket expenses. If that is so, I ask you how the Department of Transport can run the Hudson Bay railway with compensatory rates on the basis of the Crowsnest pass rates? There must be something wrong with the statements made by Mr. Crump and Mr. Gordon.

Another example is the Northern Alberta railway. For years, while not making money this railroad certainly has not lost any. It is serving an agricultural area in northwestern Alberta and hauling traffic by way of grain and agricultural products. But it does not lose any money.

These gentlemen say that the Crowsnest pass rates are unrealistic, but I would suggest to them that before they make any more statements like that they find out whether or not we should have a cheaper rate for our grain. We are not being subsidized in western Canada because of the Crowsnest pass rates at the present time. If the Hudson Bay railway, with obsolete track and poor equipment, can make out of pocket expenses, then surely to God the Canadian Pacific railway is making out of pocket expenses hauling our grain where they have a massive tonnage and where its equipment and lines are in much better condition.

Before I close I would like to say something with regard to the supposition of the hon. member for Laurier that the Canadian National Railways would not be taken up on this commission. I suggest that the Canadian National will be sending a brief to the commission and will be able to present their case as fully as they want to. Again I want to commend the government, for this is the first time we in western Canada are getting a breather with regard to freight rates. This is the first government which has had the courage to stand up and do something for us and to say that these freight rates will not go into effect. No other government has been able to do this for us.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I have little controversy with the last speaker except with the political exaggeration that he presented. I recall very vividly having been associated with the hon. member for Laurier when certain recommendations of the Turgeon report were submitted to this house; and certainly in so far as a possible government subsidy was concerned there was there, as a pertinent helpful factor, a subsidy through the sometimes non-productive area of northwestern Ontario which involved $7½ million. The then minister of transport, my colleague from Laurier, of course proposed that to the house a few years ago.

We had extended debates about that. I am western born, but present western concerns west of the lakehead make me a bit partial even though I am an Ontario member of parliament. I would like to assure the last speaker that these matters are of grave concern to any member of parliament.

The thing which impressed me, however, in the last few days was my reading of the extensive committee reports of our parliamentary committee on railways when they were examining the officials of the C.N.R. I see the Minister of Transport is looking at me, and I am only going to endorse what he has in mind. We had there in very concise terms statements which I do not recall we had in the days when I was on the committee, namely a statement that rate increases in a strictly percentage way are a far cry from the percentage increase in actual revenue accruals that might go to the railway companies as a result of a general freight charge increase. I think the word used by Mr. Donald Gordon was "attrition". I think the president of the C.N.R. said that on a 17 per cent judgment through the board it had been figured out carefully that this worked out to only between 8 per cent and 9 per cent in actual increases in revenues to the roads concerned.

I know this presents a very serious problem to the Minister of Transport and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as it did for those who sat in their seats in previous times. I am very concerned about it, because all must take into account competition from other methods of transportation. You simply do not add a percentage gain to over-all railway revenue by reason of a judgment of the board of transport commissioners allowing an increase in over-all rates. We have a competitive society. There is no one in this committee who does not number among his constituents railroad workers, truckers, or men engaged in marine transportation. Some hon. members have all three. This is why it is so important that we in this House of Commons should regard this subject not in a political light but judiciously in order to foresee what is likely to be the ultimate future of the kind of process we are discussing today.

With respect to the Crowsnest pass rates to which the last speaker referred, I may say that I cut my teeth on the belief that these were inviolable and I still have that opinion. That decision, when it was taken, was a parliamentary decision and if it is changed that change must be brought about by a parliamentary decision. Although I was not a member of the committee, I was impressed on reading the extensive minutes of the House of Commons committee which examined the president of the Canadian National Railways on these matters. I do not think we have ever had an admission before from a senior railway executive in such plain words that a mere increase in freight rates, in percentage terms, would fall so far short of a comparable increase translated into terms of ultimate revenue. I think the president said that the last increase—was it 17 per cent?—had resulted, according to the calculations of his cost analysis department, in an actual over-all revenue increase of perhaps 8 or 9 per cent. I think this is very important.

With respect to this subsidy of $20 million, I may say that I support it. I think it is a right thing in the circumstances. But I find some uncertainty in deciding who is really going to benefit from this subsidy. Is it to be the railway companies, the shipper or others. Even the committee, according to its minutes, was somewhat vague about this.

Mr. Hees: May I answer that question right now? I have stated before that it is the consumer who will benefit from this subsidy, the consumer who pays the shipping charges.

Mr. Benidickson: The whole economy benefits if the tax base is reasonably low. I know the Minister of Transport would agree with me in that respect because of the spending turn-over factor. I was pleased that the president of the C.N. railroad indicated in a general way—and there was some doubt about how much detail should be entered upon in the course of a parliamentary examination—that a staff training program has for some time been operating to enable persons displaced by automation or by changes in the system to enjoy first preference for new employment elsewhere. I shall have more to say about this when we deal with the C.N.R. guarantee and finance bill.

I think all Canadians must be impressed by the fact that changes do take place in the way these industries are organized and develop. On the other hand, I read recently in a United States publication that the overall contribution to cost on the part of so-called management in the United States has increased not very impressively while the wage bill of employees on the railroads has gone down; at least, the number employed has gone down.

I think we are discussing a very important question, here. I know the committee gave it the most careful examination, but I am still not clear as to the allocation of the benefits which are to flow from this admittedly temporary measure, particularly with regard to the advantages which are to flow to the various elements in the railroad economy. I hope that when the minister replies he will give us some further information on this point, because this solution—subsidies and so forth—can go on indefinitely.

I am like the hon. member for Port Arthur, in so far as the C.N.R. is concerned. It is perhaps the biggest employer in the riding which I have the honour to represent. I never pulled my punches when I was a member of the administration with respect to any criticism of C.N.R. management, nor have I done so since in personal correspondence on behalf of those who are affected by changes in the railroad organization. I must say, however, that I thought the president gave a very good outline of the retraining program that is necessary in a thing of this kind to achieve economy and I shall do my best to explain that to those who might be affected.

I am not satisfied that the railway has given adequate notice of technological changes to its employees. I hope the minister will urge the railway to do so in the future. Even though, as the president said, some things were in the experimental stage and therefore could not be widely advertised better notice should have been given to the employees affected. I believe that a frank discussion such as we are having here today is a very helpful thing for the railway and for the economy. I hope the minister will explain whether the dollar sign looms as a larger consideration than the employees with respect to the railroad in these difficult days.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, coming from the most easterly province in Canada and an island province I am naturally keenly interested in anything that has to do with freight rates. The cost of freight is vital to the economy of my constituency as indeed it is to the entire province of Newfoundland. Practically all of our consumer goods have to be imported including clothing, food, much of our building material and indeed most of the necessities of life. These are brought in by rail and ship. The products of our mines and our fisheries as well as our pulp and paper products have to be exported. The cost of moving goods in and out can mean the difference between solvency and bankruptcy for people in this area. While this bill will give some help it will not give sufficient assistance considering the extent of the disability of the Atlantic provinces and particularly of Newfoundland.

The position of Newfoundland was very well stated by Mr. Edgar Miller, a prominent Newfoundland businessman, writing in the Daily News when he said:

> Once more Newfoundland will bear far more than its fair share of this new freight increase. The 17 per cent has been applied as a percentage to existing tolls. We are at the end of the line and we pay the highest rates, so it is inevitable that we must contribute the greatest part to this increased freight cost.
> —we are the people in Canada who are least able to afford to carry the burden of the railway's additional cost of operations. Here in Newfoundland we literally have no competitive rates or agreed charges.
> —each year our contribution to the railway's increased cost for operation has been larger than each preceding year. A recent study disclosed that between 70 per cent and 80 per cent of the traffic in the Atlantic provinces—possibly higher in Newfoundland—moves on non-competitive rates and so all of this will be increased by 17 per cent.
> While the Maritime Freight Rates Act does provide some benefits it is of the least importance to us. Practically all of our exports move by water and these are not eligible for the subventions. Except for a few competitive rates on traffic originating east of Montreal during the summer months, we have no competitive rates. Being at the end of the line our rates are the highest. Consequently all of our in-bound traffic, representing the necessities of life, will be subjected to the full impact of this latest freight rate increase. I suggest this province, its industries and its people are less able to support the railway than the rest of Canada.

May I suggest that transportation is a national family concern, yet under the present system those provinces that are not as well able to bear increased costs are required to shoulder them. May I point out that what I shall refer to as the centre of Canada sells to Newfoundland about $250 million worth of goods a year. As a matter of fact, the province of Newfoundland is the third greatest overseas market of Canada and I refer to it in those terms because Newfoundland is an island. Newfoundland buys more from the rest of Canada than does any market other than the United States and the United Kingdom.

With all due deference I should also like to point out that Canada sends millions of dollars worth of goods to Ghana and other countries which she justifiably hopes will develop and become customers. Is it not just as important or possibly more important to look after the interests of one who is already a good customer? All we are asking for is equality of opportunity. I should like to pass on a suggestion which has been made that in considering the position of the maritimes and Newfoundland consideration might be given to a roll back of rates to 1948 plus an increase based on a constant dollar.

In closing I should like to make a purely personal observation. From my limited knowledge of freight rates it seems they are getting more complicated every year. As a matter of fact there is some excuse for thinking that the best minds in Canada are spending their time making them more intricate as time goes on. This leads one to suspect that, given time, no doubt there will be one freight rate applicable to rice krispies and another applicable to sugarpops. I should like to suggest that some consideration be given to the possibility, remote though it may be, of applying the principle of the postage stamp to freight rates; that is, simplify the structure so that it would cost the same amount to move a pound of freight anywhere in Canada regardless of the distance involved.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this bill which is designed to roll back the 17 per cent increase in freight rates will undo at least part of the damage that was done by allowing the full increase. This measure does not, however, restore the freight rate structure in this country to the point at which it was when this government took office. Instead of fulfilling its well-known election commitment under which it promised to prevent further horizontal increases in freight rates this government has allowed them to be increased. Even after this measure has become law the freight users of Canada will be paying higher freight rates than when the Conservative administration took office.

We in the C.C.F. have said that all the information as far as freight rates are concerned which the government needs for action is already available. We have had many royal commissions in the past and many studies have been made by the board of transport commissioners. This government that has prided itself on being a government of action should not require the stalling procedure of bringing forward still another royal commission before it takes action.

This royal commission will take a good deal of time and will cost the country a substantial amount of money. Even though the recommendations that are made we would hope will result in an improved freight rate structure in Canada, nevertheless we believe that the required information leading to satisfactory recommendations is already at hand.

The announcement of the terms of the royal commission was made in this house on May 13. The scope of the inquiry is confined in general to freight rates and in particular to the operation of the railways and various financial aspects of their operations related to freight rates. We think that when a further royal commission was being contemplated its terms of reference should have included a study of overall transportation policy, a consideration of truck and air lines competition and the whole transportation field in Canada.

Mr. Morris: Will the hon. member permit a question before he advances along this line of reasoning? When he speaks of the rollback having undone some of the damage caused by the increase, will he tell us what is his position on the increase?

Mr. Argue: I believe my hon. friend asked me this question when I made my speech on this some time ago. At that time I said—and if necessary I will repeat it now—that I would take the position that was taken so ably and so consistently by the present Minister of Public Works when he was in the opposition, namely that there should be a halt to the horizontal increases in freight rates. That is the position I take, a consistent position that I have taken over the years, and I suggest that if the government itself has wished to be consistent it should have prevented further horizontal increases in freight rates. That is my answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Morris: I thank you for that. These are not antagonistic questions. The 17 per cent increase was based upon labour wage demands.

Mr. Argue: This is an assertion from my hon. friend which is an incorrect one. If it is a correct one, it condemns the board of transport commissioners. It means that the board does not in fact judge applications based on their merits. Are they in a position that they grant an automatic increase in freight rates every time there is an increase in wages?

Mr. Benidickson: On the C.P.R. yardstick.

Mr. Argue: On the C.P.R. yardstick, a very wealthy yardstick, a very inappropriate yardstick, in my opinion. But they would be following the same policy consistently if, when there is an increase in interest charges as a result of the policy of this government, when there is an increase of financial charges, they automatically gave the railways an increase in freight rates; or, if the costs of dieselization are increased would my hon. friend say that this should mean an automatic increase in freight rates by the board of transport commissioners? Of course, that is an absolutely untenable position to take; and we believe that the board of transport commissioners place themselves in a completely untenable, a very awkward and embarrassing position when they say that a given wage increase automatically results in their giving a similar increase in freight rates.

There has been a good deal of talk this afternoon about the Crowsnest rates. I take it that all of the political parties in this house are opposed to any tampering with the Crowsnest rates, although I think this is a rather generous interpretation of some of the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier who seemed most interested and desirous that this royal commission should have power to see whether rates under the Crowsnest pass agreement are compensatory. Then, he went on to use the phrase that these are rates from which the western farmer benefits. I know the western farmer benefits. I think it is very unfair to leave that remark, without any qualification, that this aspect of national policy was one that was directed to benefit solely the people of the prairie provinces who are engaged in the production of grain.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege, I think the hon. member would be the last to misquote anything I said. He did start off by saying that all the parties in this house favoured the rates adopted in 1897, with perhaps the exception of the member for Laurier.

Mr. Argue: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Chevrier: That was my understanding of what he said. I want to make it quite clear here that anything I said does not derogate from the fact that in 1897 there was an agreement to which parliament was committed and which this party stands to support.

Mr. Argue: No. I did not suggest—and I think the record will show this—that the hon. member was opposed to the Crowsnest rates, but by the remarks he used there was a very definite inference to be drawn that those rates are for the benefit of the western farmers. He left it at that. I do not think that is a fair interpretation of the Crowsnest rates at all. I think they were part and parcel of a national policy, and the people who brought forward and completed that national policy at that time decided that those rates would be of advantage in maintaining an important grain industry on the prairies, which in turn would support the economy of three provinces in that area, and that this in turn would do much toward the prosperity of the Canadian nation as a whole. I think it is impossible to say that the Crowsnest rates are in fact directed solely to the benefit of the prairie producers, and that is not exactly the way the hon. member for Laurier put it.

It has been part of a national policy that is necessary to the national welfare of this country. I will go even farther and say it is essential if there is to be national unity in Canada. If the Crowsnest rates are interfered with it would be the greatest blow to national unity administered by a government in this generation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member not recall that those rates were suspended by a Tory government and restored by a Liberal government in the 1920's?

Mr. Argue: Which underlines my statement about national unity, and if my hon. friend will check the date he will find that it was immediately after the first war. My statement still stands. The people of Canada and the governments of the day learned that this was an agreement that could not be tampered with.

Why should people say that this is an agreement which has resulted in benefit to the prairies only and leave it at that? It would be just as fair to say that because of the huge land grants, some 22 million acres, because of the cash subsidies, some $35 million, because of other concessions the Crowsnest rates that the Crowsnest agreement was the biggest handout ever given by any government to a private corporation and only benefited the C.P.R. This was an agreement entered into long ago, and the people of the prairie provinces who produce grain, and I believe all of the people of Canada have benefited from that agreement, but certainly the C.P.R. has benefited. Even in their most recent annual report they show that their net income from petroleum rents, royalties, reservation fees and land rents constitute the sum of $6,828,123. This is a very substantial continuing benefit from the agreements which were entered into when the railway was extended to western Canada and these grain rates established.

I have looked over the personnel that have been appointed to this royal commission. Of course, I am not acquainted with all of them, but there are at least two members of the commission with whom I am acquainted. I was pleased to see that these men will be on the royal commission. I have reference to Mr. Arnold Platt from Alberta, a former president of the Alberta farmers union, and a man who has contributed greatly to Canadian agriculture not only through farm organizations but also in the field of plant breeding. I think his name is a good one to have on the royal commission. The second person with whom I am quite well acquainted is Mr. M. A. MacPherson, senior, Q. C., of Regina, a very prominent and nationally known supporter of the Conservative party. I do not say that in any critical way because M. A. MacPherson of Regina, although a very prominent Conservative in Saskatchewan, has acted as counsel for the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government on freight rate inquiries for many years. I think he has brought to these freight rate inquiries a mind which is exceeded by no one's who took part in any of these discussions. I think Mr. M. A. MacPherson is particularly well qualified, and I say this without having any reference to political beliefs, to take part in this royal commission. I think the people of Saskatchewan and the people of western Canada generally will be pleased that he has been appointed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of Mr. MacPhersons' appointment to the commission, who will the province of Saskatchewan get to represent them before the royal commission?

Mr. Argue: That is a very interesting question from the hon. member for Essex East. I think if we can accept the statement made by the Minister of Transport, there will not be any further freight increases—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I was thinking of counsel to go before the commission.

Mr. Argue: I do not consider myself as well qualified to make a statement—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are some good Liberal lawyers in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: We have a few, but they are a vanishing race, both in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You ought to look at the Gallup poll on Saturday.

Mr. Argue: I checked that, too, and I noticed that the Liberal party is still shrinking. I am sure there are any number of good people in Saskatchewan to represent Saskatchewan in any submission that is made before the royal commission. I do not know whether or not this would be an appropriate person, but Mr. M. A. MacPherson, Jr., has substituted for his father on some occasions on freight rate inquiries before the board of transport commissioners. Since they are members of the same legal firm, and I know very little about the ethics of the legal profession, I cannot be certain whether or not it would be proper to have two members from the same firm operating in two different capacities with relation to the commission.

We have this royal commission which has been set up. It has, I think, very substantial powers to inquire into the effect of freight rates. I believe its terms of reference, so far as freight rates themselves are concerned, are very comprehensive. For example, paragraph (d) says that the commission shall consider and report upon whether, and to what extent, the Railway Act should specify what assets and earnings or railway companies in businesses and investments other than railways should be taken into account in establishing freight rates. I think that is one of the most important terms of reference because, in the past, we have had the Canadian Pacific used as the yardstick. The board of transport commissioners, in determining the level of freight rates, has allowed the Canadian Pacific, in its accounting statements, to set aside those enterprises from which it has made very substantial profits and to consider its railway operations only. I do not believe such a division is fair or just. I believe that the Canadian Pacific's total position as a company should be considered whenever it asks for a freight rate increase.

I make that statement precisely because of these tremendous land grants and cash grants over the years which have been used by the Canadian Pacific to extend its operations into the field of air lines, hotel services, into the smelting business, into the petroleum business, and many other activities which have produced revenue for the Canadian Pacific.

I have been asked a question earlier, Mr. Chairman, as to my attitude about the 17 per cent increase in freight rates. I have said that it was my opinion the government should not have allowed this increase to take place. The inference is left that every time the railway workers get an increase in wages this automatically must result in an increase in freight rates. This is a premise I do not accept. I think the railway companies have shown over recent years a very great ability to reduce the number of workers necessary to operate the railways. One has only to refer to the size of freight trains to illustrate the very substantial reduction in labour as compared with freight trains in the early years. Freight trains used to have 30 or 40 box cars, but today's freight trains are often in excess of 100 railway cars and are operated by the same number of persons.

The program of dieselization has brought about very large savings to the railway companies. Earlier I mentioned Mr. MacPherson. I might say that in his statement to the board of transport commissioners on October 31, 1957 he pointed out that the evidence given by the Canadian Pacific vice-president, Mr. Emerson, shows that, comparing 1947 with 1957, there was a saving from dieselization alone of $45 million on an expenditure of $138 million. Mr. MacPherson points out that at that time the railways had been dieselized only to the extent of 48 per cent, 72 per cent passenger and 68 per cent yard. The railways in Canada must have made further, substantial savings in the intervening time as a result of dieselization.

The modernization of railways would dispense with much of the labour that has been used in the past. I understand that when the president of the Canadian National, Donald Gordon, was before a committee of this house he said in reply to a question that he could foresee the time when freight trains in this country would be operating without any people on the trains, completely automatic freight trains. If we had completely automatic freight trains in this country, do hon. members think that, without persons operating on freight trains, the railways would decide they needed no further increases in freight rates because they would not then be able to put the blame on increases in wages?

Of course, so long as cost increases continue, and so long as the railways are desirous of earning a substantial profit, we will be faced with further demands for increases in freight rates. We do not feel that this royal commission has been necessary, but we do admit that the personnel of the commission gives us some hope that the recommendations may be improved, and that if they are, and if the government acts, then the continued horizontal increases in freight rates may be halted. We may then have a more equitable freight rate system in this country, and our railways may provide again the national service that is expected from them. Then, too, the workers of this industry would not be discriminated against but would have an opportunity to improve their standard of living as Canadians in other occupations are able to do from time to time.

Mr. Carter: This bill which is entitled "an act to make provision for the reduction of certain class and commodity rates on freight traffic" is of vital importance to my province; and to the extent that it will achieve this purpose, we welcome it and support it.

We in Newfoundland have the highest cost of living in all of Canada, and the most important factor in that high cost of living is freight rates. We know that this legislation is consequent upon an increase of 17 per cent in freight rates. It has been estimated that this subsidy will, in its effect, reduce that increase to 10 per cent. I think we must realize that these figures are only theoretical. They would be true if the same factors applied all across Canada, but that is not the case. The figure of 17 per cent is artificially high because in the central provinces other factors such as truck competition and water competition make it impossible to benefit from that increase to any extent. The burden of the extra revenue must therefore come from the Atlantic provinces and from the western provinces. It is, of course, for that reason that the two central provinces do not even bother to appear before the board of transport commissioners and oppose these freight rate increases because they know an increase is not going to affect them materially in any way at all.

We had hoped that the distribution of this subsidy of $20 million would be carried out in such a way as to offset, as much as possible, these inequalities in the freight rates and in the freight structure owing to the factors which obtain in the central provinces and which are not operative in the eastern and western provinces.

If my understanding of clause 3 is correct, this subsidy will apply only to commodities where the full 17 per cent goes into effect. If that is not the case, I hope the minister will correct me when he replies. I think perhaps that is an advantage to the western provinces and to the Atlantic provinces because certainly they are going to have the greatest percentage of traffic upon which the full 17 per cent increase will be applied. But the figures which my friend the hon. member for Laurier put on the record just now, if they are even approximately correct, would suggest that the inequality is still going to exist to a remarkable degree. The central region is going to get 26.5 per cent of the $20 million or $5,300,000 while the maritime region will get 16.8 per cent or a total of $3,316,000.

The point I want to make is this. For traffic in the central provinces where the full 17 per cent increase is applied, that full subsidy goes into effect and will reduce it down to 10 per cent, which figure perhaps would be much lower than would otherwise be the case if just the normal competitive factors were allowed to operate. I am not going to complain about that fact. I think it should put the railway in a much better competitive position vis-à-vis the trucking industry and water transportation and should perhaps result in increased traffic and increased revenue for the railways so that a greater part of that $5 million which the central region is going to get may be recovered from them. If that is the case, the total subsidy would be reduced only to about, say, $15 million.

The maritimes, of course, are going to get an extremely small share of this subsidy and Newfoundland will get the least of all. As the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador pointed out just now, the products of our industries are shipped direct from Newfoundland to foreign markets. We are in a much different position from that of the other maritime provinces. Mainland Canada buys very little from us. As to the paper that is shipped direct from Corner Brook or from Botwood to the British or the United States markets, I cannot see how it is going to get benefit as a result of this subsidy. The fish products that are shipped direct from the various cold storage plants are not going to benefit by it. This subsidy will not benefit our industries at all. Hence the benefit we get out of this subsidy is going to be derived mainly from the things that we buy from the mainland. Our total traffic in that respect is going to be in smaller proportion than that of the other maritime provinces.

I was greatly interested in what the minister said about this subsidy being passed on to the consumer. I know that the trouble with subsidies is that they seldom benefit the people we really want to help. I must confess that I find it extremely difficult to believe that the consumer in Newfoundland will benefit very much or even at all from this subsidy. If the government increases a tax, we know that immediately the prices go up in much greater proportion than does the tax itself. But when taxes are reduced, it is seldom that the full reduction is passed on to the consumer. The various people who handle the product always find some way of absorbing it. Suppose a merchant in some outport in Newfoundland, has on his shop shelves a shipment of tinned fruit which he now sells for 25 cents a tin, and gets in another shipment on which the freight charges are slightly less because of this subsidy. I cannot visualize that he is going to cut his price down from 25 cents to 23 cents. I find it difficult to visualize such a thing happening. I just wonder whether the minister had in mind any way by which the interests of the consumer could be safeguarded so that we could make sure that he would benefit from this subsidy.

Apart from that, I hope that we can find a better way of distributing subsidies of this kind than we have had up to date and even better than the one we have in this bill although I admit, by confining it to commodities which bear the full rate of the increase, it is perhaps fairer to the maritimes and the eastern provinces than would be the case if it were just a straight reduction.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman, but this point of safeguarding the interests of the consumer is very much in my mind and I would like the minister, when he replies, to say if he has any ideas of enforcing my suggestion.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, if I might be permitted to answer that question, I would like to say that there is no way that I know of of forcing the shipper to pass along the freight rate reduction to the consumer. Having made a number of trips to the hon. member's province of Newfoundland and got to know the people of Newfoundland very well, I am so convinced of the honesty of the people of Newfoundland that I feel confident the dealers in Newfoundland will pass on the saving to the consumers.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has misunderstood the point which I made, because you cannot pass along any subsidy unless it is big enough to be passed along. The effect of this subsidy on the traffic going into Newfoundland will be so negligible that I do not think, however honest a person is, he would be able to pass it on anyway.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

On clause 3—Revision of rates.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on clause 3 I would like to move an amendment to subsection 1 which reads as follows:

Provided the reduction thereby effected shall not be less than 7 per cent.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, might I be permitted to submit to you that this amendment is out of order, because it clearly could provide for an increase in the amount of money which would have to be paid out. That means that there would have to be a resolution before the matter could be considered by the house. Therefore I submit the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that point may I say that my understanding of the evidence given to the committee was that 7 per cent would not do that. My reason for moving the amendment was that the minister had stated on an earlier occasion that the effect of the subsidy would be to decrease the freight rates by 7 per cent, so my purpose in moving the amendment was that not only would the subsidy amount to $20 million but also, in effect, it would mean a reduction of 7 per cent in freight rates, as the minister has stated. Again in reply to the hon. house leader, I made a similar amendment in the committee and it was not declared out of order by the chairman at that time.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works, I would like to say that if something were being moved which would alter the $20 million it might be argued at that point it would require a new resolution, but surely since the bill following the resolution which has been introduced provides for a payment of up to $20 million it is quite in order for members of the committee to specify what action the railways must take in order to qualify for this money. I am not too certain that the amendment itself adds very much to the kill or is in fact necessary, but I do not see how it can be argued that the amendment itself means an increase in the expenditures of the amount voted under this legislation. As I understood the amendment, what it means is that if the railways wished to have this money they must show a reduction in freight rates of not less than 7 per cent.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it very clear that I said in the committee, and I believe in the house, that it is estimated, and only estimated because it is not possible to make a flat statement, that the amount of reduction will be exactly 7 per cent, that it will be approximately 7 per cent. I think if the hon. member for Laurier will look up the original statement which I made when introducing the resolution he will see I specifically stated "approximately 7 per cent." In the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where the bill went for examination and study, when Commissioner Knowles was questioned about the possibility of making a flat reduction of 7 per cent he pointed out that because it is not possible to estimate exactly how much the reduction will be, if exactly 7 per cent is specified it might easily mean that the $20 million could run out in perhaps ten months' time and, therefore, of course, if that were the case it would be necessary, as the Minister of Public Works has said, to increase the subsidy in order to carry it for the full twelve months.

The Deputy Chairman: As this amendment is attaching a condition to the amount of money involved here, and owing to the fact that it does not seem to be clear whether or not it would affect the total amount of money—there are two different viewpoints expressed—I will have to rule this amendment out of order.

Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Chairman. Before the clause carries I wonder if I could ask the minister how soon after the passage of this bill it is expected that the reduction in freight rates can be made effective? Is the minister able to say whether it may be June 1, July 1 or how early will the benefits of the act come into effect?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, it is not possible to say exactly how soon. It will be put into effect, of course, just as soon as practicable. The board of transport commissioners will start work immediately on it, and it will be put into operation as soon as possible.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister can do a little better than that for the committee. Can he say whether it will be in effect this calendar year? The board of transport commissioners operate under an act of parliament, and parliament is providing $20 million to take care, at least in a partial way, of a very important national problem, the question of horizontal increases in freight rates. I think the minister must have some idea of the length of time that the board of transport commissioners would expect to need in order to put this law into effect.

I imagine that since the legislation has already been before the committee, and since this is now a matter of public discussion—as a matter of fact, it was announced in the speech from the throne that the board of transport commissioners would be doing a good deal of work in this field on the understanding that parliament was likely to enact something along the lines of the present legislation—I think the house and the country are entitled to know when action on this bill is likely to be taken. Surely the minister can tell us whether it is to be a matter of a few months or whether it is to be a matter of years? Surely he does not expect it is going to be a matter of years. The minister does not do himself any credit by giving the House of Commons a wide smile. We should like a little information in addition to the smile.

Mr. Benidickson: Before the minister answers, let me say, on that point, that I think the comments which have just been made are pertinent, because we have had evidence from the president of the C.N.R. that he has postponed certain ideas he might have had about going before the board of transport commissioners with his problems. And, of course, in my riding, in the riding of the hon. member for Port Arthur, and some others, the position of railway labour is very much related to this.

Mr. Hees: Certainly this will be in operation this year. It will certainly not be longer than, I would say, several weeks before it is in operation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just pursue that point a little further? As the hon. gentleman knows, this matter has been delayed for quite some time; longer than normally would be the case, because of the not unnatural desire of the Prime Minister and the government to give some consideration to the scope of the terms of reference. Having regard to the fact that clause 3 says: "Forthwith upon the coming into force of this act the board shall" do such and such, perhaps the minister will clear up the point. I take it that this measure will go through in a very few moments and will get third reading. Why not give this committee an undertaking that the act will be proclaimed just as soon as it has been approved by both houses?

Mr. Hees: It will begin operating as soon as it can be done. There is no desire on the part of the government or the board of transport commissioners or anybody else to hold this up. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman the exact number of days it will take, but I can tell him—and he has had considerable experience in dealing with the board of transport commissioners— that they are a hard working, conscientious and efficient body and that as soon as this bill is passed they will immediately get to work and put it into operation as quickly as it is humanly possible to do so. No one can do more than that.

Mr. Chevrier: But the board of transport commissioners have nothing to do with the date on which this measure is proclaimed and becomes effective. It is the government which determines that, and then the board takes over. The bill itself says so.

Mr. Hees: If the hon. gentleman, along with others, helps us to get this passed, the act will be proclaimed as quickly as it is possible to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: You certainly cannot complain about assistance from this side of the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Do the terms of reference, which I have not got in front of me, include provision for an examination of automation and similar developments on the railways?

Mr. Hees: I have read through the terms of reference very carefully but I have seen no reference to automation, and I feel sure the hon. member has not either.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask the minister whether the railways themselves decide those commodities with respect to which they apply the full 17 per cent increase. Do the railways make the decision themselves, or must they consult the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Hees: This measure will apply with respect to all commodities to which the 17 per cent increase applies at the time the bill becomes an act.

National Energy Board

Mr. Carter: The railways were given permission to increase rates up to 17 per cent, but that did not necessarily mean that every commodity would bear this increase. Some might be raised 10 per cent, others 12 per cent and others 15 per cent. In the case of a commodity in central Canada where the railways have decided that a 12 per cent increase should be in effect, they could apply a 17 per cent increase to that commodity and take advantage of this subsidy and bring it down to 10 per cent.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Carter: In other words, they could juggle the commodities in order to compete with trucking services.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member is a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. This whole matter was discussed at considerable length with Commissioner Knowles at the time and it was explained exactly how the whole thing would work. This would apply to any commodity which bears a 17 per cent increase at the time the bill becomes law.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment and operation of a national energy board and the appointment of its members and staff, to define its duties, to authorize it to exercise certain powers and to provide for other related and incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this proposal to establish a national energy board which we have before us for consideration is the fulfilment of an objective held by the Conservative party over the years. That objective was clearly stated on February 25, 1955, at page 1530 of Hansard by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, now Minister of Public Works, in the following words:

We believe there is a great need for an over-all energy policy. Let us get away from dealing with the problem piecemeal with different departments concerned. It is not an efficient way to deal with these important matters. For example, we suggest that consideration be given to setting up what might be called a national energy board under which could be gathered a professional staff to deal with those questions which would have the necessary information and the necessary training and which could recommend policy to the government. Then, once policy had been decided by the government, the board could implement that policy.

We believe the energy resources are among Canada's greatest assets, and that they can go far to make her one of the leading nations of the world. But if this is to be done we must get away from the present hit and miss method of dealing with those resources. We must have in Canada a national energy policy for the use of those resources, and the administrative machinery to carry it out.

When the opportunity arrived for the present government to take steps toward developing the policy outlined above an order in council was passed on October 15, 1957 setting up a royal commission on energy. The preamble of that order reads in part as follows:

That inasmuch as Canada has within its boundaries large sources of energy in the form of gas, oil, coal, water and uranium, the increasing need of energy for the growing industrial requirements of Canada renders it of the greatest importance to assure the most effective use of those resources in the public interest;

That it is desirable that an investigation be made now into a number of questions relating to sources of energy in order to assist in determining the principles and procedures to be applied in the administration of certain aspects of energy policy which fall within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada;

The royal commission was instructed to inquire into and make recommendations concerning, among other matters:

(a) the policies which will best serve the national interest in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy from Canada;

(b) the problems involved in, and the policies which ought to be applied to, the regulation of the transmission of oil and natural gas between provinces or from Canada to another country including, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the regulation of prices or rates to be charged or paid, the financial structure and control of pipe-line corporations in relation to the setting of proper prices or charges, and all such other matters as it is necessary to inquire into and report upon, in order to ensure the efficient and economical operation of pipe lines in the national interest;

(c) the extent of authority that might best be conferred on a national energy board to administer, subject to the control and authority of parliament, such aspects of energy policy coming within the jurisdiction of parliament as it may be desirable to entrust to such a board, together with the character of administration and procedure that might best be established for such a board;

The members of the royal commission were Henry Borden, Esq., C.M.G., Q.C. of the city of Toronto, Chairman; J. Louis Levesque, Esq., of the city of Montreal; George Edwin Britnell, Esq., of the city of Saskatoon; Gordon G. Cushing, Esq., of the city of Ottawa; Robert D. Howland, Esq., of the city of Halifax, and Leon J. Ladner, Esq., Q.C., of the city of Vancouver.

Subsequently, Dr. R. M. Hardy of the University of Alberta was appointed to the commission, and Mr. Cushing resigned to become assistant deputy minister of the Department of Labour.

The commission held public hearings in Victoria, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal, in the course of which it has taken some 8,500 pages of evidence and received about ninety submissions.

In October, 1958 the commission submitted a first report dealing with some aspects of its inquiry and will submit a second report soon concerning some specific problems relating to crude oil.

Since receiving the report the government has studied it very carefully. Detailed and constructive comment upon the report has been supplied by provincial governments, and by various segments of the industries concerned and by investment firms.

The commission deserves congratulations and thanks for the exhaustive study it has made of the matters before it and for the conscientious discharge of its heavy responsibilities. Many of its recommendations are to be implemented as will be clear when the bill is before the house.

The measure, as the resolution indicates, has as its principal purpose the establishment of a national energy board. It is proposed that this board have most of the powers now held by the board of transport commissioners under the Pipe Lines Act, and those parts of the Railway Act incorporated in the Pipe Lines Act by reference.

Whereas under the Pipe Lines Act the board of transport commissioners has power to grant or withhold leave to construct pipe lines under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, the new board in respect of applications for the construction of pipe lines would have the power to grant or withhold, subject to the approval of the governor in council, certificates of public convenience and necessity. It is proposed that the new measure supersede the Pipe Lines Act, and also the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act.

The new board would, on the basis of public hearings, and subject to the approval of the governor in council, grant or deny licences to export electric power or gas or to import gas.

The board would exercise certain broad advisory functions ranging over the whole field of energy and sources of energy in so far as the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction over such matters. The board would have jurisdiction over tolls charged by all pipe-line companies subject to the act, and over prices at which gas and power might be exported.

The bill will set out, in much the same way as the present Pipe Lines Act, the general powers of pipe line companies subject to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. The bill will contain provisions for transition from arrangements under the existing statutes to corresponding new arrangements.

These are the main elements of the proposed bill. I come now to certain points of policy which underlie the bill and which will guide the administration of the measure if approved by parliament.

We recognize the need for and welcome capital whether domestic or foreign for investment in the energy and associated industries, and we believe such capital, wisely invested, should enjoy a fair and reasonable rate of return. As to what is a fair return, it is not our intention to incorporate any fixed formula in the statute. Rather, our first premise is that returns on successful investment must be sufficient to attract capital for replacement and expansion, and our second premise is that the public interest requires that no pipe line company should exploit its monopoly or quasi-monopoly position to secure returns higher than are fair and reasonable. Certain general criteria will be set forth in the bill, and their application will be left to the fair and impartial judgment of the well-qualified men whose services on the board we hope to obtain.

We recognize that gas pipe lines are different from oil pipe lines, and that both are different from public utilities such as electric light and water service. Both oil and gas are subject to competition from other fuels and sources of energy, and an oil pipe line may be subject to competition in its markets by oil from other sources. There are elements of risk for both kinds of pipe line, and perhaps more risk for oil pipe lines than for gas pipe lines.

The customer of the gas pipe line is more nearly captive in that he cannot readily turn to another source of gas. The consumer of the gas in order to use an alternative fuel must convert his equipment or replace it if his gas supply becomes uneconomic or otherwise unsatisfactory. There is therefore a clear case for regulating the returns of gas pipe line companies.

The oil pipe line may not have the same sort of captive market. However, for some refineries one oil pipe line may be the only practical source of supply, and for many oil producers one oil pipe line is the only practical outlet to market. Therefore for practical purposes an oil pipe line is a carrier in a monopoly or quasi-monopoly position, and should be regulated as such. For somewhat different reasons, therefore, we have come to the conclusion that the returns of both oil pipe lines and gas pipe lines should be regulated, though not necessarily on the same terms or at the same level.

While we have reached the conclusion that in the public interest there should be appropriate regulation of the returns of gas and oil pipe line companies, it is not the intention of the government in so doing to discourage in any way the healthy and beneficial developmentof such companies.

As regards the exportation of electric power and gas, the key principle will be that quantities proposed to be exported must be surplus to present and reasonably foreseeable Canadian requirements.

In the case of electricity, it has been the policy in the past to grant only annual licences for export, so as to prevent permanent alienation of power. This remains our general policy, although some exceptions may be made in very special circumstances where the national interest would not be prejudiced by a longer term of export.

With regard to gas, we accept the recommendation of the Borden commission, which reads as follows:

> Having regard to the proven reserves of natural gas in Canada and to trends in the discovery and growth of reserves, the export from Canada of natural gas, which may from time to time be surplus to the reasonably foreseeable requirements of Canada, be permitted under licence.

It appears necessary in granting licences for the export of gas to do so for periods up to 25 years in order to make possible the financing of the pipe line facilities.

Two governments must of course be agreed upon any such export. The first is the government of the province of origin. Until it declares gas available for removal from the province, this government can entertain no application for an export permit. After the province has declared gas surplus to its own requirements, the government of Canada, with the recommendation of the proposed national energy board, must decide whether it is also surplus to the requirements of Canada and, if so, upon what terms it may be exported, including the vital and complex question of price.

The government of the United States, as represented by the federal power commission, must also decide whether it will approve the importation of the gas, and upon what terms. This raises the difficult problem of whether we should grant an export licence before or after the federal power commission grants the corresponding import permit. We are willing to work out an efficient arrangement with the United States which will satisfy our respective national requirements without hampering the mutually advantageous development of our gas industry. Our officials have already had discussions with appropriate officials of the United States state department and the federal power commission and we know from these talks that our willingness to co-operate and our desire to reach a flexible and mutually satisfactory working arrangement is reciprocated.

With regard to oil, it is not the intention at the present time to give authority in the bill for the issuing of export or import permits. However, a section of the bill will deal with this important matter and, if approved by parliament, will give authority to the governor in council to extend the application of the relevant portion of the bill to oil.

It will be evident, when the bill is distributed, that the experience of the past has been drawn upon extensively. Hon. members may wish to refer to Hansard of 1955, page 1523, for the debate on the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. At that time the act of 1907 dealing with electricity was revised with particular reference to gas.

Hon. members may also read with profit the debate on the Pipe Lines Act of 1949, which is to be found at page 2509 of Hansard. The bill which is about to be introduced reproduces the substance of those two acts. Building on that foundation, we propose the setting up of a national energy board with appropriate powers to deal, so far as is within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, with the whole problem of the utilization of the abundant sources of electrical and petroleum energy in our country in the national interest.

I am about half way through, Mr. Chairman. This is an appropriate time to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, prior to six o'clock, I was speaking to the resolution. I dealt with the main principles which will be incorporated in the bill and indicated, in general terms, the important matters that will be shown in the bill. In the remarks which follow I should like to discuss the importance of this new industry which has developed in Canada largely within the last few years.

Everyone is aware that we have moved into a new era in the development of sources of energy. The constantly increasing demands for electrical power have stimulated the use of most of the readily available sources of hydroelectric power. Thermal power units, based on the utilization of coal, are being constructed in increasing numbers. Rapid advance is being made in experiments leading to the harnessing of atomic power for the economic production of electricity. Side by side with these developments there has been a spectacular rise in the production and use of oil and gas and their by-products, and an equally spectacular increase in the installation of pipe lines for the gathering, long distance transmission and distribution of oil and gas and their products.

Ten years ago when the hon. member for Laurier, then minister of transport, was speaking on this subject he estimated that the production of crude oil in Alberta was about 100,000 barrels per day; that after allowing for the prairie provinces' requirements of 60,000 barrels per day, there would be a surplus of 40,000 barrels for use elsewhere. He estimated total Canadian consumption at 290,000 barrels per day.

In 1959, ten years later, we find western Canadian crude oil production running at a rate of about 500,000 barrels per day, equivalent to roughly two-thirds of the total Canadian oil requirements. For the sixth year in a row, oil was Canada's leading mineral in 1959, its value of production exceeding $400 million. And though our oil exports suffered a setback in 1957-58, crude oil contributed $73 million to Canadian export income in the year 1958. This is an impressive figure when one considers that the export of crude oil to the United States began as recently as 1951, via the Interprovincial pipe line, and did not become substantial until 1955, the first full year of operation for the Trans-Mountain pipe line.

Parallel developments have taken place in the natural gas industry. Proven reserves of natural gas in western Canada have increased from less than 5 trillion cubic feet in 1949 to more than 25 trillion cubic feet at the end of 1958. Net production of natural gas was 60 billion cubic feet in 1949; 336 billion in 1958. Further sharp increases can be expected to follow the recent construction of major pipe lines. Gas from northern Alberta and British Columbia started to flow to the Vancouver area and the Pacific northwestern states through the Westcoast pipe line in 1957, and the completion of the Trans-Canada pipe line in November, 1958 opened the markets of Ontario and the Montreal area to western Canadian gas.

Applications to export large quantities of gas to the western United States have now been approved by the government of Alberta, and related applications have been filed with this government and with the United States federal power commission. Other projects looking to exports to the United States middle west and to New York state are in preparation. One urgent reason why this government is anxious to press ahead with the measure referred to in the resolution before us is, of course, that we desire to establish with all proper speed administrative machinery for making appropriate disposition of such applications for gas export licences, in the light of government policy and in full consideration of all the interests involved.

The great and increasing growth in gas production and transmission industries has necessarily been accomplished by a remarkable development of the gas by-product industries. Some of the by-products, in particular sulphur, natural gasoline, propane and butane, are themselves valuable. Complicated and costly plants are required to remove them. There are now in Canada 22 such plants for the processing of natural gas and recovery of by-products.

Some export markets for propane and butane have already been developed. These markets were cut off in March when the United States oil import controls were made mandatory and extended to unfinished oil and products, but the exemption from new United States oil import controls announced on April 30 will restore access to such markets. There is good reason to hope that these natural gas liquids and sulphur will become increasingly important in our export trade.

All this growth in production, processing and transportation to market for oil and gas and related products has required an enormous quantity of capital. In 1949 about $90 million were invested in oil and gas exploration, production, processing, transportation and marketing facilities. For 1959 the comparable investment is estimated at $627 million, nearly 7 times as much, and some 13½ per cent of total business capital expenditures planned for 1959 in Canada. In the decade ending in 1958 the cumulative totals were $4.4 billion, excluding land acquisition costs.

These figures cover only direct investment in petroleum expansion and do not take into account the secondary effects of investment in new industries based on petroleum, such as petrochemicals, or new industries supplying the oil industry, such as pipe mills. Similarly, petroleum development has created jobs for thousands of Canadians, not only those directly employed by the industry but also those working in the ancillary industries I have mentioned.

If the development of the petroleum and related industries is to continue, still larger sums of capital must be attracted for future investment. It is our desire and intention that the climate for investment in these industries in Canada will, so far as it lies within control of this government, be such that this needed capital will be attracted by the prospect of fair and reasonable returns within a framework of stable and realistic government policy.

The past decade of development in the petroleum industries, remarkable as it has been, is only a beginning. We can look forward with confidence to continuing growth in reserves, in production, in employment, in export and in the necessary investment. These prospects, of course, involve the sound utilization of energy resources, perhaps the most important material resources a nation can possess. It is to protect the national interest in the wise use of these resources, and to apply to these complicated, sensitive and vital matters the careful and consistent scrutiny they require, that we have prepared the measure contemplated in this resolution, which I now commend to the house.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we have before us for consideration a resolution to the effect that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment and operation of a national energy board and the appointment of its members and staff, to define its duties, to authorize it to exercise certain powers and to provide for other related and incidental matters.

Today the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a fairly comprehensive and interesting statement. No specific statement of the matters with which this proposed national energy board should deal is contained in the resolution. The minister has said that, for the time being, the board will have authority to deal with matters pertaining to electricity, oil and natural gas.

How closely the legislation will adhere to the recommendations of the Borden commission is not yet clear, although the minister has stated that many of these recommendations will form part of the proposed legislation. Certain of these recommendations have aroused the concern of many Canadians and more particularly that of both the petroleum industry and of some of the provincial governments having direct interests in oil and gas.

It is beyond any question that this legislation outlining the constitution and the powers of this new board will have an extremely important bearing on the future development of energy resources in this country. As I have said, we have too little information with regard to the intentions of the government in this matter. Until we have the bill before us, we do not know how far the government will go in delegating powers to this proposed new national energy board.

Does the government intend to implement fully the recommendations of the Borden commission as outlined in its first report of October, 1958, or does the government intend to compromise by incorporating in its legislation some of the recommendations made to the Prime Minister and the cabinet by the Canadian petroleum association, the investment dealers' association of Canada and others; or does the government intend to include all forms of energy under the authority of this national energy board? For instance, is it the intention of the government to include coal and atomic energy? Will the government eventually bring under one authority all the agencies we have at present, including the dominion coal board, the atomic energy control board, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the international joint commission?

From the minister's statement we conclude that the government does not intend that the authority of this new proposed agency should be limited only to fact finding and advisory responsibilities. Or again, does the government intend to have so much restriction and so many regulations that private industry will be shackled in exercising its proper function in the Canadian economy?

Those are extremely important questions. For this reason we feel that when the bill is before the house for second reading we should have ample latitude to discuss all aspects of this extremely important subject. We sincerely hope that we shall be given this opportunity of reasonable latitude in debating this subject so that we can fulfil the duties which are those of the official opposition and others in this chamber.

During the last four years two royal commissions have made recommendations as to how the energy resources of this country might best be developed, namely the Gordon royal commission on Canada's economic prospects and the Borden royal commission on energy. The Gordon commission of 1955, in its final report on Canada's economic prospects, commented at length upon the extent and importance of our energy resources and, after reviewing the export prospects of same, recommended the establishment of a single national energy authority. From the report I wish to select a few paragraphs which, it seems to me, would be worth noting especially. At page 130 of the report we read the following:

To the international oil companies with operations in many parts of the world, it may not seem a matter of great urgency or concern whether large new markets are found for Canadian oil. They can supply all these markets from other sources and through other companies with which they are associated. They might even prefer to increase almost indefinitely their reserves of oil in Canada and draw down their reserves elsewhere. Also, as we have suggested, they are under pressure within the United States to do nothing that might disturb domestic prices there. In our opinion, however, it is clearly in the Canadian national interest that new markets be found. Only in this way can there be assurance that a steady and rapid pace of exploration and development in Canada will be maintained. Only in this way can early advantage be taken of this great natural resource and its exploitation not left to the hazards of an uncertain technological future. Above all, it is only in this way that a place can be left within the Canadian oil industry for the independent Canadian producers, who, unlike the large international companies, must receive some return on their investment in Canada if they are to stay in business and not be forced to sell out to the foreign-owned companies, which already hold such a high proportion of all the acreage now under reservation or lease in western Canada. It would seem that here is one instance, as is suggested in the discussion of foreign investment in a later chapter, where there might easily be some divergence between the Canadian national interest and the interest of foreign companies operating in Canada.

Further on in that same chapter, at page 135, the commission deals with the question of the terms under which gas is exported and expresses the opinion that Canadians have been insufficiently aware of some of the influences that have been operative in setting prices. This paragraph of the report on page 135 concludes as follows:

The present system of export licensing by the Canadian government would seem to be an inadequate counterweight to this bargaining advantage held by United States companies wanting to purchase Canadian gas; and in our opinion, the bargaining position of Canadian suppliers might well be strengthened by stronger institutional arrangements within the Canadian government in accordance with a proposal made later in this chapter.

I come to this proposal which we find at pages 146 and 147 of the same report. There the commission recommends the establishment of a national energy authority and this is what appears with regard to this national energy authority:

In order that a sound and comprehensive policy may be worked out with regard to development, exports, imports and consumption of all forms of energy in Canada, we propose that a national energy authority be established which would be responsible for:

(a) advising the federal government and, upon request, any provincial government on all matters connected with the long-term requirements for energy in its various forms and in different parts of Canada; methods of promoting the best uses of energy sources from a long-term point of view; export policy, including such questions as the further refining of oil and gas in Canada and the disposal of by-products; coal subsidies, etc.

(b) approving, or recommending for approval, all contracts or proposals respecting the export of oil, gas and electric power by pipeline or transmission wire, including, where necessary or desirable, the holding of public hearings in connection therewith.

If this proposal is accepted, the organization of the dominion coal board should be merged with that of the proposed national energy authority. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the proposed new body would not interfere with the rights of the provinces respecting control over natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, the Borden commission of 1957, officially known as the royal commission on energy, was asked by the present government to make recommendations, first, on the policies which will best serve the national interest in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy from Canada; second, on the policies which ought to be applied to long distance transmission of oil and natural gas; and, third, on the nature and authority of a new national energy board.

The Borden commission submitted its first report during the latter part of 1958. The said report is divided into four parts. Chapter 1 deals with the export of natural gas and crude oil. Chapter 2 deals with the regulation of pipe line companies, while chapter 3 of the report is devoted entirely to the new national energy board. In this regard the Borden commission makes specific recommendations under 20 separate headings. Finally, chapter 4 of the report is dedicated entirely to a favourite subject of the Tory party, the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company. This is the chapter where the commission in no uncertain terms is recommending that the government repudiate the commitment of a former minister of the crown.

In a brief submitted to the Prime Minister by the investment dealers' association of Canada, Mr. Ely, the president, makes the following comments on this particular subject and I quote from pages 3 and 4 of this letter where Mr. Ely is commenting on the reactions abroad following the publication of the Borden commission report. This is what he had to say:

Even apart from the recurrent adverse comment in the financial press in New York and overseas, conversations of our members with foreign investors make clear the gravity with which the Borden report is viewed abroad. This concern is based in part on the recommended repudiation by the Canadian government of an undertaking given by a former senior minister of the crown. It is also based on the view that the report reflects an attitude on the part of the new Canadian government adverse to business and the investment of private capital.

There is no doubt that the impression created by the recommended repudiation of the gas export undertaking will adversely affect Canada's ability to raise capital in foreign markets. In Great Britain and Europe this repudiation is being compared in some quarters with unilateral repudiaton of government contracts in Iran and Egypt, to the great detriment of Canada's standing as a field for capital investment. In the United States, comment is no less adverse. As one specific example, you will recall that over $100 million of first mortgage bonds of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited were placed with a group of the largest American investing institutions during the initial financing of the line. The undertaking of a senior minister of the then Canadian government regarding gas export played a necessary part in the sale of these bonds, and there is no question that the purchasing institutions take a very serious view of its subsequent repudiation. Members of our association are not looking forward to approaching them to finance development projects in Canada again.

Mr. Chairman, from what we can make out of the Borden commission's report in respect to this subject a change of government seemingly would justify the repudiation of a former minister's commitment, such as that given by Mr. Howe in his letter of September 28, 1955 to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company Limited. I do not think it has ever been the practice to repudiate letters of this kind. It is bad enough for an important body such as the royal commission on energy to have made such a recommendation, but it would be even more awful if the government was to give force de loi to such a repudiation.

Although the Borden commission has reported on only two of the principal energy resources, that is oil and gas, it makes extensive recommendations as regard to the organization of a national energy board. The commission recommends the enactment of legislation enabling the government of Canada to control the export from and the import into Canada and the movement across provincial boundaries of all energy and sources of energy. The present legislation controls the export of any power or fluids, which include gas, oil, water or any other fluids, whether liquid or gaseous, and the import of gas. The commission recommends much more elaborate control, which involves including the control of (a) imports of power and fluids; and (b) interprovincial movements of power, gas, oil, etc. This is indeed a far-reaching recommendation, as it would appear also to include uranium. In resuming, the commission recommends that the board be given extensive authority, much too extensive for the good of the economy.

There are many silly and dangerous recommendations in the first report of the Borden commission. I have mentioned a few and I would like to bring one or two others to the attention of this house. Several references in the commission's report are made or implied that private contracts should be renegotiated after financial commitments have been made and pipe lines constructed. The recommendation to impose the renegotiation of existing contracts seems to me to give rise to enormous dangers for the financing of new enterprises. When the financing of such a project is undertaken, those putting up the requisite capital, either in the form of bonds or stock, do so on the basis of the contracts entered into with the consumers, and if these contracts are to be subject to being changed and the revenues therefrom scaled down, investors would naturally be fearful as to the consequences that such a process would have on the ability of the gas pipe line company to meet its obligations and to provide a return on the investment. Compulsory renegotiation of existing contracts, Mr. Chairman, would simply mean confiscation, and in such circumstances no lending institution could afford to take the risk involved in financing a pipe line project.

The Borden commission also recommends that the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity. This recommendation has attracted the widest criticism. No one will disagree with the recommendation that tolls be just and reasonable, and indeed section 43 of the Pipe Lines Act requires that tolls be just and reasonable and likewise non-discriminatory.

The commission's recommendation that the tolls be calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity is an entirely new concept in rate-making, and would lead to the establishment of different tolls for the same services rendered by two different companies having radically different corporate structures. Thus, in the case of a company which had no funded debt, the shareholders' equity would be substantially higher than would be the case of another company whose capital was represented to the extent of say 60 per cent by bonds and debentures. The same amount of capital might have been invested in each case, but the difference in distribution could easily lead to discriminatory situations. But, apart from this, shareholders' equity is not a logical basis for rate-making. The practice varies enormously in Canada and the United States. In Quebec, legislation calls for rates based on "capital usefully invested", but there are many variants of this theme, and rate-making is in itself an extensive science.

If it is the intention of the government to follow the recommendation of the Borden commission in this respect, that is, establishing a base rate in this way, it will merely tie the hands of any board which will have to enforce the law, and at the same time it will discourage investment in Canada at a time when investment ought to be encouraged and not scared away by restrictive provisions.

The Borden commission's first report is a scarecrow. Commenting on the report in a letter dated January 7, 1959, and addressed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Ely, the president of the investment dealers' association of Canada has this to say, and I quote from page two of the letter:

> There is no doubt that the report has been a great blow to the confidence of foreign investors in Canada. Its recommendations, if implemented, will certainly impair our ability to import from abroad the large amounts of capital we require.

And further on in the same letter, at pages 4 and 5, the president has this to say:

> Canada's investment standing abroad has been no less seriously affected by the evident concern of foreign investors at the basic attitude to private enterprise and the rights of investors revealed in the Borden report. It is suggested that this attitude provides a clue to the attitude of the new Canadian government, and that on this basis Canada is no longer as attractive a field for the investment of private capital as it formerly was. The experience of our members active in foreign capital markets shows clearly that this prevailing impression is injurious to our ability to raise our full capital requirements from these sources.

Let us see now what the Canadian petroleum association has to say in regard to the Borden commission's first report. The Canadian petroleum association is an important organization in its own field. It is made up of some 240 exploration and producing companies which together produce 97 per cent of the oil and gas production in Canada. Here are a few of the most important paragraphs which I should like to quote from a special and lengthy report to the Prime Minister and the cabinet. At page 2 of the report, under the sub-section headed "Excessive regulation will be damaging to Canada", appears the following:

> In terms of government regulation of industry, "too much" can be worse than "too little"—and, unfortunately, certain sections of the interim report —the Borden Commission's first report—have given rise to fears that excessive regulation and control over Canada's oil and gas industry is suggested by the commission. Such fears now exist, not only in this industry, but by many other Canadian industrial and financial leaders and by many outside of Canada whose views have an important bearing on the rate of flow of investment capital to our nation. Since Canada cannot generate sufficient capital within itself for its current pace of development, the withdrawal of foreign capital could have serious repercussions on the whole Canadian economy.

Even some members of the Conservative party were appalled to learn of the recommendations of the Borden commission's first report. The hon. gentleman who represents Calgary South was, I am sure, very much annoyed by the contents of that report. In a Canadian Press dispatch from Hamilton, Bermuda, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 28, 1959 we read this:

> Speaking before the Canadian pipe line contractors' association, the Calgary oil expert said—

I am not disputing this title, because I think the hon. member for Calgary South really is a man who knows something about oil and gas. He is a man who has devoted much of his time to a study of these Canadian resources, and I think he knows his business. The report continues:

> —1959 will be a year of decision in which these points likely will be clarified:
> Extent of Canadian government control over the industry; changes in oil and gas tax policies; a possible Canadian policy to increase domestic oil sales by Canadian producers; easing of federal regulations on the development of Arctic oil; tariff policies on oil; question of whether a satisfactory solution can be found to separate oil in the Athabaska tar sands.
> Touching on the government's plans to set up a national energy board to regulate the oil and gas industries, Mr. Smith predicted the government will not adopt repressive action to restrict oil and gas profits as recommended by the Borden energy commission.

This shows that the hon. member for Calgary South did not too much like the recommendations of the report, but he says the government will not take action to curtail profits as recommended. The report goes on:

> He was convinced, he said, that the administration will ignore this recommendation for the government was vitally concerned, "with the importance of maintaining investment confidence in the petroleum and natural gas industry."
> He said he also believed the government would not follow another commission recommendation—to require licensing of exports of oil to the U.S.—since this might hamper Canadian opportunities of finding long-term U.S. markets.

We of the Liberal party advocate the integrated development in co-operation with the provinces of petroleum, natural gas, hydro-electric power, coal and all other energy sources across the whole of Canada to meet the needs of industrial and population growth. We advocate the establishment of a national energy authority to advise the government as to the long term requirements of energy in Canada, including the best methods of providing efficient long term uses in Canada and for export. We feel that the government should not relegate policy making to any board. And, as was mentioned by the Canadian petroleum association, I feel myself that there should be a division of energy authority as between policy making, advisory and regulatory functions. For the time being, we feel that the organization of the dominion coal board should not be merged with that of any proposed national energy authority.

The Liberal position with regard to the export of electrical energy, oil and natural gas has remained basically the same since it was enunciated in the house at different times in the past and more particularly in 1953 and 1955 by the then minister of trade and commerce, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Will the committee give the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dumas: In 1955 while introducing the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, as reported at page 1524 of Hansard, Mr. Howe with respect to electrical energy had this to say:

> While there have been differences of opinion as to how the policy on exports should be implemented, there is no doubt that such policy has crystallized in one of no firm commitment for power, that licences should be on a surplus interruptible basis only, and that they should be reviewed annually.

I think the minister said this afternoon that as far as hydroelectric power is concerned it is the intention of this government to impose a similar restriction except in special cases where we are assured there is a considerable amount of surplus in which case contracts would be negotiated.

In the same debate Mr. Howe reminded the house that he had enunciated the policy of the government with respect to oil on March 13, 1953, and with respect to natural gas on the same occasion. He summed up the position in 1955, as reported at page 1526 of Hansard in these words:

> In brief, therefore, the policy with respect to these items (oil, electricity and natural gas) is that the export of oil should be based on the movement from the source of production to refineries in the cheapest possible way, and to arrange for that portion of the Canadian output that cannot be economically used in Canadian refineries the market that offers the highest return to the producer; that with respect to electricity there should be no firm export commitments and authorizations given only for interruptible surpluses; and that natural gas should leave Canada only when it is demonstrated to be surplus to determined Canadian needs.

Both the Gordon and Borden commissions appear to have been convinced that Canada has an exportable surplus of energy. At page 9, paragraph 6 of part 1 of chapter 1 of the Borden commission's first report we read the following statement:

> It is our judgment that the entry of Canadian natural gas into available United States markets, on a moderate scale, is a highly desirable step. In recent years very large investments have been made by the natural gas industry in Canada covering, not only exploration and development, but also processing plants, pipe lines and distribution facilities. With reasonable access to United States markets, expectations of earnings in the industry would be raised to a level which would encourage further sound development.

At this point I should like to limit my observations in this respect to only one item, that of natural gas, for the simple reason that even the Borden commission reported very briefly on exports of oil. We are given to understand that another report will be filed by the same commission on this subject. There seems to be an urgency with regard to issuing permits for the exportation of natural gas to the United States. We feel that the government should not delay action in this respect. We think that the industry is right when it states that if the government were to wait until a new national energy board is organized to grant such permits this unnecessary delay could be detrimental to the economy.

In the early part of April last the Alberta government approved the granting of permits for the export of natural gas to two companies, Alberta Southern and Westcoast Transmission. Both companies have filed applications at Ottawa and Washington for Canadian federal government and United States federal government permits. I think it is reasonable to take the position that the federal government of Canada should grant a permit only if it is assured that the United States government will issue import permits.

In the Daily Oil Bulletin of April 8, 1959, Mr. Proctor, president of Canadian petroleum association, is reported to have commented as follows:

> By granting the two companies permission to export natural gas for the next 25 years, the government of Alberta has taken a firm step toward linking Alberta natural gas with logical and necessary markets. From this point on, the federal government has the responsibility of processing export permits to allow the gas to reach those markets.
> There is an important time element about all this, for Alberta is not alone in her efforts to market surplus natural gas. There are gas suppliers in the United States and Mexico just as anxious as Canada to win available markets which represent, to whoever captures them, a long-term source of income not only for producers, but for the public.
> Natural gas is being discovered in Alberta at an annual rate of growth three times that of known market demand. There are proven natural gas reserves in Alberta at the present time of 27 trillion cubic feet, and the annual gas discovery rate is between 2 and 3 trillion cubic feet. This surplus of reserves over market demand is a constant one which will be maintained by the Alberta Oil and Gas Conservation Board. It is an assurance that the needs of the province and of Canada will continue to be met first before markets for surplus natural gas are sought outside the boundaries of Canada.

We feel that this calls for prompt action, that it is vital to the national interests that greater utilization of western Canada's surplus of gas reserves should not be delayed. Again I say that the government should not necessarily wait for this new national energy board to be organized before processing these permits.

I wish to conclude by saying that we hope the government will not shackle the development of Canada's energy resources by imposing too many regulations and restrictions. When we have the bill we will be in a better position to judge the intentions of the government in this respect.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege which refers not to the speech just delivered by my hon. friend to which I listened with interest but rather to a phrase I used before the supper hour which apparently has lent itself to misinterpretation. I used the phrase "regulating the returns of gas pipe-line companies" and apparently to some hon. members this connotes profits. I want to assure the committee that there is no provision in the proposed bill to regulate the profits of pipe lines but rather the tolls charged for the transmission or transportation of oil or gas. The word "returns" was used with that meaning.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we are very glad to see this important subject brought before the committee by the minister. I listened with a great deal of interest to the introductory statement made by the minister. I was most interested to note that he referred the committee to a statement of policy on the question made during the 1955 session by the then private hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who is now the Minister of Public Works. I want to say before I proceed that I am very happy to know that the present Minister of Public Works says exactly the same things as the Minister of Public Works on the questions of conservation, the development of the Columbia and of the establishment of a national energy board as he said when he was the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and a distinguished member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. When the minister was referring us to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra of 1955, I could not help but think, is it not strange that the Minister of Finance has never referred us to any of the statements he made when in opposition on any particular question. I thought that was a most interesting parallel and I look upon it as one up for British Columbia.

The minister told us that the cabinet had carefully studied the report of the royal commission. As a result, if I heard him correctly, he introduced this measure which would make some provision for the regulation of free enterprise. That is a very interesting statement compared with things that were said a number of years ago. A few years ago the regulation of free enterprise was considered completely unorthodox and improper for some members of the minister's party when they were in opposition. I must say that I fairly glowed at one point in his remarks when he talked about regulating the returns of oil and gas companies. I thought to myself, well, the government is coming in our direction quite quickly. I was somewhat disappointed when the minister rose in his place just before I rose to speak and more or less modified his previous statement to bring it more in line with the principles of free enterprise that the government supports and wishes to give effect to.

Anyway, we were interested to know that this legislation will supersede the Pipe Lines Act and the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. The bill will provide a transition stage and I think this is very sensible. This is a very important matter, and I think experience will have to be gained more or less slowly as a result of the operation of the bringing together of the various elements that are concerned in the successful operation of the national energy board, namely the federal authority, the provincial governments and the industries.

I was very pleased to hear the minister say that it is the intention of the legislation and its operation to protect Canadian interests with respect to the export of gas and of electricity and of other commodities of that type.

Mr. Benidickson: The same as last year.

Mr. Herridge: I notice that the minister said that there had been discussions with the United States department of state and with the United States federal power commission. I do hope the result of those discussions will mean that this, shall I say, will bring on a better understanding of the Canadian position and will result in the advance of this country.

It is very difficult to say much in reply to the minister's general statement. We will have to wait for the bill for the details and for the answers to our questions to find out exactly what is intended by the government with respect to this resolution.

I want first of all to say that I shall deal more or less with a broad outline so far as our approach to this problem is concerned. The details and all the rest of it will be filled in by my colleagues later on in this debate. I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that, if I recollect correctly, the word "energy" means force, power, efficiency, potency, efficacy, activity, go, mettle, impetus, verve, drive, vim. We in this group sincerely hope that the government, the national energy board and the personnel, when it is appointed, will exercise all those attributes in the operation of this legislation. They have an immediate, a very important and I think everyone will recognize a very heavy task.

The C.C.F. policy for many years has urged the need for the establishment of what I think we were generally pleased to call a national fuel and energy board. To inform the committee in that respect and to show how consistent our policies are and how continuing they have been throughout the years because they are based on sound foundations, I want to quote our program in this respect:

> The C.C.F. proposes that it be reinforced by the following specific measures:
> Establishment of a national fuel and energy authority to ensure that the use of all fuels—coal, oil, natural gas, electricity and atomic energy—will be planned to make the maximum contribution to the Canadian economy and the welfare of the Canadian people.

Well, sir, while we have not the details of this legislation at this time, we are very pleased indeed once again to note the influence on the government of this small group in this corner of the house in this parliament and during previous parliaments.

And now, Mr. Chairman, owing to his experience in the coal mining industry and knowledge of its disabilities, trials and tribulations, Clarie Gillis, a former member for Cape Breton South, was the most frequent exponent of the need for this policy on behalf of this group. He spoke from experience in the mines as a coal miner and from a knowledge of the industry in general and the marketing disabilities it suffered. He spoke with practical common sense and I am sure all members will agree with that. He had a practical approach to this problem and a wide knowledge of the coal industry because it had been his lifetime occupation prior to coming to this parliament.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that when a member's voice ceases to echo or reverberate or, in some cases, boom around this chamber, he is soon forgotten by some people. However, I wish to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to the former member for Cape Breton South, Clarie Gillis, for the contributions he made to the debates of this house and for the work of the committees while he was a member.

No doubt some members in this house will recall his interesting speeches, dotted with colourful and at times earthy language, and his metaphors drawn from a well of experience. I can still see the famous siphon that Clarie Gillis used to picture on occasions, with one end in the maritimes and the other end in central Canada, and that siphon operating so that the provinces of central Canada were over the years sucking the wealth and the lifeblood of the maritime provinces. I always thought that was a good metaphor, and I never think of the former member for Cape Breton South without seeing that siphon, as it were, in front of me, I want to say this before going on to my further remarks with respect to the measure. In my opinion Clarie Gillis would be a most suitable person to represent the employees in the mining industry in Canada on any international or national board. He is a veteran with active service, a veteran with experience in the coal mining industry. He was a veteran C.C.F. member in this house and prior to coming to this house, and he would be I think a most appropriate person to be considered when appointments are being made to international or national bodies representing the employees in the mining industry.

I come back to fuel and energy. I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that an old man finds his energy waning a bit at this time of night. I want to deal briefly with our approach generally to this situation. The history of man's utilization of the more exhaustible forms of energy appears to be divided into several great periods or ages. First of all, there was the long period of time in which man depended upon wood fuels and, to some minor extent, upon agricultural wastes. Then, in the 19th century coal dominated the scene until after the first world war, when it was supplemented by water power. Later, petroleum and natural gas products entered the scene. Now nuclear power development is commencing and solar energy is a possibility.

These amazing developments in Canada in recent years, and particularly since the second world war, clearly indicate to me the necessity for public control and regulations, and in the circumstances where it is clearly indicated in the public interest, public ownership of pipe lines, as we in this group consider was indicated in the case of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. We think Canada today would be in a much better position if Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was owned by the Canadian people.

Few aspects of the Canadian economy are as vital to the nation as the adequate development and efficient use of energy resources. To a very great extent, the nation's standard of living, and certainly its industrial progress, are dependent on the availability of large quantities of heat, power and fuel at prices and in locations which permit their maximum utilization. The supply of many sources of energy is, of course, limited. Furthermore, the principal supplies are not uniformly distributed in Canada. This is one of our problems in connection with the efficient utilization of the natural resources we have.

The distribution and administration of various forms of energy have necessitated increasing public control over the development, conservation and use of various sources of energy supply. Public bodies have been established in every province to deal with various aspects of the production, transmission, sale and use of fuel and power, and at the national level several departments and agencies of government are also charged with various responsibilities in connection with fuels and energy.

I want to make a few comments on the present federal regulation of energy. The government regulation of energy has grown up in a somewhat haphazard manner. I think you find that if you read the history of the formation of the various boards, the work undertaken by various departments, and the work changed from one department to another. The several federal bodies concerned with energy resources have, in the main, been developed to meet particular problems in relation to specific situations. Until recently there has been very little co-ordination or correlation of these bodies, one with the other. We hope that this measure will have some effect in that direction. No less than half a dozen government departments are concerned with some aspect of energy production or the development of fuel.

Now, Mr. Chairman, clearly the federal government is already active with respect to many facets of energy production and use. It is true that intraprovincial fuel and power matters are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. This is as it should be, and under present circumstances we in this group would not want to change that one iota. Nevertheless, the precedent for federal energy regulation and federal administration of certain energy policies in the national interest is already well established.

I want to say at this point that years ago this party realized the value and necessity of public ownership, and considered certain aspects of energy development as public utilities. They should be brought under public ownership, either by federal or provincial governments of a combination of both or governments at other levels, where circumstances indicate it would be in the public interest.

I want to stress the importance of co-ordination from our point of view. Recent years have witnessed a growing recognition of the interdependence of energy sources and the importance of co-ordinating governmental policies with respect to them. Thus, there has been established a federal interdepartmental committee on energy, I understand, composed of representatives from the various departments, bodies and agencies of government concerned, to centralize information and to investigate the relationship of sources of energy to the national economy. We in this group trust that this national energy board will carry forward that same work at a greater tempo and to much more efficient advantage.

I see you looking at me with a rather worried appearance, Mr. Chairman, but I did not know my time was quite exhausted yet. It has been increasingly apparent, however, that this limited degree of co-ordination is inadequate and that federal energy policies and programs must be more closely related. No longer can individual policies be considered in isolation. Both the supply of energy resources and their uses have been changing rapidly and substantially. In recent years the tempo of these changes has been increasing from month to month. Neither the supply nor the use of any of these sources of energy can be considered in isolation, as I said before. It is increasingly apparent that governmental policies with respect to these sources of energy must be correlated.

Then there is another matter that concerns this group; the importance of reducing costs. When compared to the United States, unit costs of industrial production in Canada are high. This is true despite the fact that hourly earnings—this is a matter of interest—of Canadian workers are as much as 25 per cent below those of United States workers on the average. These higher costs are caused by a limited market and Canada's geography which necessitates long hauls and consequently much higher transportation costs. In our opinion, the government can help to alleviate this condition through this national energy board, if it functions as we hope it will function in the days to come, as a board giving full time to all aspects of this problem.

What should they be, the objectives of a national energy board? We in this group think the first objective should be to increase the use of fuel and power production as part of a national development plan, a related national development plan through co-operation between the national energy board and suitable agencies in the provinces. Second, it should aim to conserve and direct the use of energy resources to the advantage of present and future generations. Third, it should ensure that, so far as is practicable, fuel and power resources are equitably distributed to all sections of the populated areas of Canada, to develop what we in this group have frequently spoken about, and what the former member for Cape Breton South spoke about, a national standard of living in Canada. This would avoid the situation we have in Newfoundland and in sections of the maritimes, as well as some other sections of Canada, resulting from the failure of these people to enjoy the national energy resources of this country.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I suggest some means by which these objectives may be reached. First of all, what about the question of taxation? This is an important one and the committee on mines, forests and waters in recent days has been listening to representations from the forest industry of British Columbia on this very question of the need for some reconsideration of taxation to provide incentive. We think one extremely important facet or instrument of federal policy is taxation. It could have a big influence on the development of any industry and its expansion. In our opinion, federal taxation policies can and should be devised which will encourage the search for and production of various forms of fuel. Furthermore, these taxation policies, concerning various forms of energy supply, should be correlated one with the other.

As I said before, this problem cannot be considered in isolation. There is, too, the question of subventions. Transportation subventions have been available for the past 30 years to assist the movement of coal into specific areas, principally central Canada from the maritimes. When a national energy board is established, this problem will have to be considered and studied in relation to the policies of a national energy board as a whole.

What about research? To me that is an extremely important question indeed. While considerable work is being undertaken by the national research council, the defence research board, the dominion coal board and the fuels division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and other departments, there is great need for an expansion of research by federal and provincial governments. We think that a major contribution could be made by an appropriate federal government agency undertaking some co-ordination of these research programs and facilitating the exchange of information, not only by federal agencies but by the other research programs carried on by the provincial governments. If this board does the things we hope it will do, it should be the agency to correlate and to develop the research required in this connection. We think the co-ordination of the federal government agencies is a first essential in the successful administration of the policy that we hope to see developed as a result of the appointment of a national energy board.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Because of the important role which energy plays in the economy and the tremendous changes that have taken place in both the supply of and demand for energy, and in view of the many regulatory and administrative bodies with some jurisdiction and responsibility in the field of energy, it becomes increasingly important, from the point of view of the members of this group, that national policies be integrated and that actions be directed toward common goals in this field. Co-ordination, it appears to us, would be best achieved by formal action along three related lines:

1. The consolidation of policy and administration at the federal level, as I have mentioned previously, with respect to energy resources and use, in an appropriate departmental structure.

2. We have advocated the constitution of a national energy board to deal with matters of regulation falling within federal jurisdiction. That is why we are glad to see this resolution come before the house. We trust that its final result and its administration will be along the lines that we have suggested throughout the years.

3. We believe that, in order for this board to function satisfactorily, it is necessary to establish a continuing federal-provincial advisory body to protect provincial jurisdiction, and to promote in the best spirit co-operation and consultation in the administration of this extremely important sector of the Canadian economy.

I now wish to say a word or two about the national energy board. The national energy board personnel, in our opinion, should be composed of members who will represent various national interests and regional interests and be governed by the broad objectives of national policy. They must be men of capacity, intellect, industry and vision. As I said before, if this resolution proves to be the type of legislation we hope it will be, with a national energy board of the type I have mentioned we can hope to go somewhere in the development of natural resources.

Further, for successful administration under the national energy board we believe there should be a dominion-provincial advisory council. Because jurisdiction over natural resources, including sources of energy, as well as the production and intraprovincial movement or transmission of energy comes within the purview of provincial governments, as I have said before, and because the federal government has jurisdiction over other aspects relating to interprovincial transmission and export of energy, it is most important that co-operation be maintained between the federal and provincial governments. It is with that consideration in mind that we ask the minister to give consideration to some form of federal-provincial advisory council on the development of energy resources so that the work of the national energy board can proceed in the best spirit and understanding, without any violation of the constitutional jurisdictions of the provincial governments concerned.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. It is our opinion that if the national energy board is established on sound legislative foundations and if co-operation with the provinces is developed through a dominion-provincial advisory council, as I have suggested, it should soon prove to be a positive factor in the more equitable and stable development of the economy of this country which we all love, regardless of the party we support.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I propose at this point, like those who have preceded me in speaking, to deal only briefly with the general outline of the resolution which is now before the committee. Recognizing, of course, that the details of not only the legislation which will come before us in a bill but, equally important, the regulations which undoubtedly the new board will be empowered to make, will have a far-reaching effect on the development of these resources, I suggest that they must be subjected to the close scrutiny of this House of Commons. While it might be a bit early to congratulate the minister on the introduction of the resolution, I know that I speak for a great many people both inside and outside this chamber in congratulating him on behalf of the government on the fact that we have at least made a start in establishing a national oil and gas policy, something which I believe we have required for some years in the past. When the bill is introduced, I believe we shall have an opportunity to assess its limitations and the requirement for any amendments and thus to come up with a highly satisfactory working piece of legislation.

I can appreciate, as can most hon. members, the difficulty of the government in attempting to reconcile the two extreme views which have been expressed in relation to the Borden royal commission, namely those on the one hand who have stated their belief that the industry should not be in any way restricted by regulation, and those on the other hand who believe that a tight form of regulation is required in the interests of Canadian consumers. It is my contention that it is not inconsistent to believe that there can be introduced into and be passed by parliament a bill which, to a substantial degree, will satisfy both of these two extremes. I agree, however, that in introducing any resolution whatsoever it is essential that we remember that if at any time we restrict the ordinary progress or development of an industry, where there is no intention to remove the ordinary rights of the citizen, we not only hinder the industry itself but, of course, we present a serious reduction in the development of our resources and thus the advantages which can be obtained to the consumers as a whole. Unlike the hon. member for Villeneuve who spoke a short time ago, I can see, even in the resolution form, several extremely important changes from the expressions of opinion by Mr. Borden and his colleagues; I refer to the resolution which was introduced and which will form the basis of a bill.

I think perhaps it might be well to point out some of the important ones which I think are going to be, as I said at the outset, of advantage to both consumer and industry alike. First of all, we will apparently be asked to transfer a very substantial measure of authority from the board of transport commissioners to the energy board. Thus we will eliminate what has in the past been the discretionary power of the minister under the power to export act to grant a permit for export without any public hearing. If I understand the minister's remarks correctly we will apparently have in the energy board the right, first of all, to grant a public convenience certificate for the construction of the line, and in addition to that an order may be issued after a public hearing to grant the export licence. This I suggest is a major difference in that it will streamline the operation in which an applicant may apply to the government of Canada for an export permit. I would assume, Mr. Chairman, that the policy of the government will still be the final authority to determine if such a recommendation will be acceded to.

We also see other major changes indicated in the resolution. Up to this point we have only regulations with regard to tolls or tariffs on the pipe lines which carry oil. It would appear from the resolution that this will cover all pipe lines including gas, again a major change. But there is one singular and important difference indicated by the resolution from the recommendations contained in the Borden report. Mr. Borden and his colleagues indicated that they would like to see a fixed rate of return based on shareholder equity, and this has apparently been replaced by granting the authority to the board itself to determine what is fair and reasonable.

The one point which, of course, immediately comes to mind is, how is this rate to be determined? This, of course, we will only learn when we see the bill. It is apparent from the resolution—I think this is important—that the first premise is that the return must be sufficient to attract capital, and with this I heartily concur. The second premise is that no company should exploit its monopoly or position to secure returns which are higher than fair and reasonable. The important point, and this is a point which apparently escaped the Borden commission, is that you cannot lump oil and gas pipe lines together because the rate of risk is exceedingly different. The basic criticism which I have of the Borden commission is that it failed to recognize the nature of the petroleum industry as a risk undertaking.

Those who question that statement and suggest there is no risk involved in the undertaking of a pipe line need only look at the operation of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company which was built with a capacity of 275,000 barrels a day. Today it is taking deliveries of something less than 78,000. You can imagine then, gentlemen, the risk undertaking involved in a pipe line of that nature. If you set certain standards or formulas as recommended by Mr. Borden which do not take into consideration the varieties of risk involved in either a gas or oil pipe line, it is my contention that you would not see the underwriting or construction of any future pipe lines with private capital.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask my hon. friend a question. I have great regard for him, as he knows, but he said it was apparent in the resolution that there was some distinction between oil and gas, and so on. Does he speak from knowledge of the bill which is not given to other members of the house?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Of course, Mr. Chairman, my words were misinterpreted. I am making the assumption that that is accepted and that there is that difference, from the very nature of the fact that the powers which apparently are to be granted, as stated by the resolution, are to consider what would be fair and reasonable. Therefore this is an assumption that there is going to be that flexibility which there had hitherto not been. I think—

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, my point of order is that there is nothing in the wording of the resolution to indicate what my hon. friend called an apparent distinction between oil and gas.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): With all due respect to my hon. friend, I suggest that is contained in the minister's statement and by the restoration of the flexibility which I have suggested they intend to place in the energy board. However—

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am not—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): If the hon. gentleman will let me answer, I have not of course prior knowledge. I think that should be clear from the nature of my remarks.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member made the assertion that there was apparent in the resolution which we are discussing now a difference between oil and gas. I think my hon. friend is straying a little bit from the resolution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I suggest this is contained in the minister's statement to us. However, I will be happy to discuss this at the appropriate time.

I left off at the point, Mr. Chairman, where I was suggesting that there is an important difference between the two and perhaps I might be permitted to continue on exactly that theme. To date, I have dealt with three changes which I suggest differ considerably from the Borden commission report and the outline of the bill as contained in the minister's statement on the resolution. I think perhaps at this point I might make some specific comments. The hon. member for Villeneuve, when he decided to go back into history, might better have made his speech after the bill had been seen—as my hon. friend suggested might be the case in my speech—because he dealt extensively, first of all, with the Gordon report. Then he went into some detail on the Borden royal commission report. Then he was kind enough to make certain references to a speech which I made a short time ago in Bermuda.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I have served under the hon. member, who is chairman of a committee that has, I think, done a good job, and he himself deserves a great deal of credit.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: But he is now saying certain things—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not understand what point the hon. member is raising.

Mr. Benidickson: My point is, if we see the bill then we can debate at this stage. Has the hon. member seen the bill?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I made it clear to the hon. member that I had not at that point, and I do not know that I can add anything more to that.

I would now like, if I might without interruption, Mr. Chairman, to continue. The hon. member for Villeneuve expressed some concern that the Borden commission had decided to recommend to the government against the acceptance of a letter as a firm commitment written to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company by the then acting minister of trade and commerce in the former administration. The hon. member read at length from what had been said by the president of the investment dealers' association. I suggest to him there were a number of individuals who did not express concern with regard to the report issued by Mr. Borden and his colleagues of the royal commission in relation to the character of the letter. As an example, I think it is significant to note that the federal power commission of the United States said they did not consider his letter as a binding contract between the two governments. I suggest, further, especially to those who have had any legal training in this house, that when Mr. Howe offered a firm contract without any limitation as to time, certainly this was the intention, and this was contained in his letter to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. There is no basis in fact by which it should be considered as a firm contract. The fact of the matter is that the terms which Mr. Howe offered to this company changed completely during the course of the time the offer was made. It therefore follows that the conditions under which the initial contract were made were not enforceable because the time altered so materially. I do not intend to pursue this matter any further except to say that a senior official of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company Limited under examination before the Borden commission himself said he did not consider this letter was binding.

I should like to make a personal observation on two other aspects of the question. The hon. member for Villeneuve stated I said I was convinced that this government would not take any action which would place the oil and gas industry in a regulatory strait-jacket. I certainly made that statement, and I still see no suggestion of this happening in the resolution before us. Then the hon. member went on to say that I was emphatic in my plea that we should not place licences on the export of oil because of our desire to maintain our export markets abroad. Here again, while there is power within this bill to introduce licensing for the export and import of oil, there can be no doubt that this power will not be extended without just cause. Again this is clearly an indication that this is a situation which could develop, and such action could be taken.

There are two major economic problems upon which the minister commented. The first was whether to process future applications for gas export through the energy board or some other alternative. While he does not state this, the only other alternative is to process them through the present legislative facilities, otherwise the board of transport commissioners. It seems to me that if we are going to debate this legislation at any length—and it will require considerable scrutiny—we should recognize that time has the unfortunate habit of changing the circumstances of the markets to which we hope to export, and in addition the day may well come when the area to which we wish to export that gas may be captured by other sources of supply competitive with Canadian gas.

I can only hope, as in the past, to impress on the government the need for urgent action at the earliest date to process the applications currently before the board of transport commissioners so that any delay does not become unfortunate in that we may lose valuable markets to which we hope to export.

Second, I would point out the economic problem involved in the marketing of our oil. It is true that the removal of restrictions by the United States on the importation of Canadian oil is an excellent step, and the government is to be congratulated for convincing the United States of the need for freedom of trade between our two countries. We must also be realistic in recognizing that unless the United States refineries are prepared to give up their commercial preference, then indeed we may have to call upon the licensing aspect suggested in the resolution to be absolutely certain that we do not close down our petroleum industry through lack of protective action.

I suggest in addition that when Mr. Borden makes his second report—his report on the marketing of oil—that will be the time to determine what further course of action we should take. I agree it is not necessary to introduce licensing as such until a full review has been presented, and this in turn will come, we assume, in the second report.

My final comment on Borden and his work will be this: I agree with the congratulatory remarks made by the minister. I think that basically the report did produce a valuable array of information to be used for the establishment of the oil and gas policy to which I have referred. As I have said many times, my principal criticism of the commission was that it did not recognize the nature of the risk involved in the petroleum industry. I would hope that when Mr. Borden makes his second report he will not so much comment on what action the government may have taken in the past but will rather state his views on what future action he thinks desirable. In other words,

I would hope his report can be introduced in the near future in order to help the government to decide with regard to the various alternatives open to it with relation to the marketing of our oil.

I believe it is important that we should also assess the entire problem in relation to the marketing of our by-products, the development of new and changing taxation practices, and the development of our resources in general. I believe, also, in the importance of maintaining research. Again, the resolution itself indicates this. Perhaps most important of all is the need for public understanding that when we talk about the requirement for Canadian citizens in both these resources we should not only equate the requirements for consumption, but also the rate of discovery that we anticipate over same period. It is shortsighted if we do not recognize that we will continue to explore and develop these resources at an even faster rate once we have established the markets for them. Here, I agree, this energy board can provide a useful instrument or vehicle in assessing the relation between market and demand.

So I close on the same note as I began, by saying that this is a first and most useful step forward in a real and honest attempt to provide a policy for the development of our resources, and this is something which the former administration neglected for so many years.

An hon. Member: What about the Borden report?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I congratulate this government for making the first progressive step. It is up to parliament to make certain that we develop regulations from this point on that are in the interests of both the petroleum industry and the Canadian consumers.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on this resolution will be rather brief. The subject matter of the resolution is very narrow. I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the resolution merely asks for a decision on the expediency of introducing a measure for the establishment and operation of a national energy board and the appointment of its members and staff. By accepting the resolution that is all we are doing.

The usual resolution in these cases, as I understand it, is much broader. I have taken the trouble to look up the resolution used when the dominion coal board was set up. I find that on that occasion the purposes of the proposed coal board were indicated in the resolution. The coal board was to administer subventions and subsidies and there was also reference to the provision for the advisory functions of the board. For some reason or other that was not done in this case so we are somewhat limited in debating the subject at this stage. However, in his opening remarks on the resolution the minister dealt with it in a somewhat extended way and I think sought to remedy the omission as best he could. I hope he will take the opportunity at other stages of completing the remedying of the defect.

The importance of this subject is well illustrated by statistics on Canada's energy supply; that is, the relative importance of petroleum, natural gas and water power which I take it are the only three sources of energy being dealt with by this legislation. It is interesting to note that in 1926, 69 per cent of our energy was supplied from coal and 15 per cent was supplied from natural gas, petroleum and water power combined. In 1953 the comparable figures were 39 per cent from coal and 54 per cent from the other three combined. For 1980 the projected figure is 16 per cent from coal and 81 per cent from the other three sources being dealt with by this board. This illustrates more graphically than anything I could say the vast importance of this subject.

We are somewhat handicapped in discussing this question because of two factors arising out of the setting up of the Borden royal commission on energy. The first factor is the initial report of the commission published last October that is now available to the committee and the contents of that report to which I shall make further reference a little later on. The second factor is that we are still awaiting the second report of this commission. It is regrettable that the committee could not have had the second report before dealing with this matter. However, I am not going to criticize the government on that score concerning the delay of the commission in producing the second report. I think a great deal of damage has been done to some parts of the development in the petroleum and gas industry by the government not stating its policy since it assumed office in 1957. That is to say the government has not taken advantage of any opportunity to outline its policy in this whole field of development of our energy sources. While I regret very much the fact that the second report of the Borden commission is not available to the committee I am not particularly criticizing the government for proceeding without it.

The first report was rather commended to the house by both the minister in introducing the resolution and by the hon. member for Calgary South in his remarks. I must say that while they were very laudatory of that report I cannot share their views. I consider that the report has done a good deal of damage to the development of the industry in this country. While it is quite true that it has not impeded the exploration work in the oil and gas industry it undoubtedly has impeded development work. That is due to the nature of some of the recommendations contained in that report.

I also hold the view that this report has had a damaging effect on private enterprise outside this field altogether. That, of course, is a matter of debate and I suppose there could be sharply different opinions on it. However, that is the view I hold. I would wish that the minister at some point would undertake to indicate more clearly to the committee the parts of the report and those recommendations contained in it that are being adopted and the recommendations which he is prepared to reject.

If I may say so, his rising on a second occasion in this debate in committee to correct an impression taken from some words he used in introducing the resolution shows the necessity for great clarity on this question and illustrates the need for clarity as to what the government's attitude is with regard to certain recommendations in the first report of the Borden commission. The minister's action in being so quick to correct the wrong impression he inadvertently created in his opening remarks shows just how sensitive the industry is on this point.

There are two matters with which I wish to deal specifically. I was interested to notice that the minister at least on three occasions in his introductory remarks dealt with the necessity of there being capital investment in this industry. I was glad to see him stress the importance of that particularly in view of the somewhat adverse factors in the Borden commission report. I hope that when we see the bill it will indicate that his appreciation of the necessity of capital investment will find expression in the legislation and that there will be nothing in it of such a nature as to impede the proper flow of capital investment into the development of enterprise in this field.

I turn now to the second point arising out of the minister's remarks that concerned me specifically. Incidentally, I could not help but notice that the hon. member for Calgary South in his remarks kept referring to matters none of which were in the resolution and several of which were not dealt with in the minister's remarks but perhaps I can allow that to pass without further comment.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has stated, as I understood him, that I made reference to several matters which were not in the resolution. That was purely an error in description. I was referring, of course, to the speech made by the minister. I wonder whether he will be kind enough to indicate to me, though, the number of matters which were not in the statement of the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am of the opinion that this is a matter of argument. When the hon. member is through, if the hon. member for Calgary South wishes to say something, if there is time, it will be in order.

Mr. Benidickson: On this point, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: —I think the hon. member for Calgary South had—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I understood from the minister's remarks he indicated that the legislation would provide for the board having jurisdiction over the export and import of oil. I think I understood him correctly on that point. Then, I understood him to go on to say that while the board would have this jurisdiction, that provision would not become operative until the governor in council made it operative.

What I want to say on that is that it seems to me there are two objections. Perhaps we can see better when we get the legislation. The first objection is that this is a matter of such importance and of such a nature that it should be dealt with by parliament and not be taken to the governor in council by way of arbitrary authority. That is one criticism. The other is that so long as that power is contained in the legislation, then we are going to have a situation where a threat is going to be hanging over the heads of the industry at large that the board will interfere by way of regulation, and that is damaging because of recommendation 19 of the Borden commission report. It is particularly damaging for that reason. For these two reasons I would hope that the minister would take a further look at that point before introducing his legislation.

In his speech the minister covered a very wide range of matters, and made it perfectly clear that the bill will be an extensive one. It is clear, for instance, that the pipe line legislation is to be replaced by this bill as well as many other things here indicated. Perhaps the best way to proceed is to let us have a look at the bill.

I would hope that when we come to the second reading stage the minister will not be as eager as some of his colleagues have been in recent days to restrict the discussion on second reading. We can then have a full discussion when we see the bill. Bearing that in mind, I am quite prepared to curtail my remarks now so that the resolution may be dealt with and the bill introduced.

Mr. Fisher: At this late point in the evening, I should like to make a few remarks on the national energy board that this government is promising to set up. There are still perhaps a few remarks which may be made about it. The thing that interests me in connection with this bill is that it goes right back to what has been a most exciting thing in recent parliamentary history, namely the pipe line legislation. This is the logical outcome of the stand that the Conservatives took in the pipe line debate, and this is their reaction to the bad way in which the Liberals handled things back in 1955 and 1956. This means that we shall be looking with an especially critical eye for this particular bit of legislation, and no less because, since the Borden commission first report came out, the vociferous nature of the protests of the oil industry seemed to indicate that they feared very much the legislation that is forthcoming. They seemed to be very apprehensive as to just how far this energy control bill would go, and they are especially worried in connection with the export of gas.

The views of this particular party have been so expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West that I think they covered the general nature of the kind of board that we would like. As a matter of fact, I think the hon. member mentioned that for many years the C.C.F. has been talking about the planning boards that they would like for the regulation of public resources. If the speech in 1955 by the Minister of Public Works was merging toward our point of view we are very pleased to note that conversion and to give him all the credit in the world.

Mr. Green: You are in agreement with me.

Mr. Fisher: I remember that in the past he expressed very strong views about that salt water fleet that he wanted. We have not seen any indication that as a member of the government he has been converted to that point of view.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

In a minor way this is a contribution on the part of the government to taking over another part of the program that the C.C.F. has put forward if, as we have been given to understand, the legislation is to be spelled out as indicated.

I for one will be watching very closely the speech that the hon. member for Calgary South will make at the next stage of the proceedings when the bill is before us. Then we shall get an indicator as to how generally the oil industry and the gas industry in the west will view this particular legislation. If we find the hon. member for Calgary South speaking with a certain amount of criticism, or making some suggestions, we will begin perhaps to get the suspicion that this is a pretty good bit of legislation. It will be an indication that this adoption of general C.C.F. ideas has been a little bit deeper than we had felt.

Will you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Progress reported.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): May I ask leave to revert to motions for the purpose of giving the house notice of an amendment which I propose to introduce to Bill No. C-48 when it is reached. I thought it might be reached this evening. I had given copies of the amendment to hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Speaker, but if I might have leave I would put this proposed amendment on Votes and Proceedings for today for the use of hon. members when the bill is reached, presumably tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what is the business for tomorrow and what the business will be on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with this debate and then take the resolution concerning the Veterans' Land Act which appears under government notices of motion on today's order paper. The intention is to refer this measure to the standing committee on veterans affairs. If possible, we would like to have it referred to that committee this week. Then, we shall take item No. 13, concerning the convention for the abolition of forced labour; then, item No. 7, the amendments to the Excise Tax Act; item No. 8, the amendments to the Income Tax Act; item No. 16, a resolution preceding a measure to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; item No. 12, a resolution concerning the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; No. 15, to approve the state treaty for the re-establishment of an independent and democratic Austria; No. 9, the convention on the nationality of married women. When the estimates are reached, we shall take those of the Department of Labour, and then the Department of Public Works.

At 10.03 p.m., the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 19, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR PRICE SUPPORT IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture could say to the house whether or not he has yet had an opportunity of reading the submission made by the Ontario wheat producers, and if he can also say whether or not the government is now in a position to announce a price support for Ontario wheat on the basis, as requested, of a deficiency payment?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister be in a position to do so before too long?

Mr. Harkness: I think that will be the situation. I know the wheat people have made their submission to the stabilization board, but I have not yet had a recommendation from that board.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the minister has anything further to report on the state of the negotiations with Russia for a trade agreement, following the minister's statement of April 7 when he said that negotiations were proceeding satisfactorily? Would he comment on the report that negotiations are bogged down and the trade agreement does not seem as probable as it once did?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is incorrect to say that negotiations have bogged down. They are proceeding in a satisfactory manner and we have every hope they will be concluded to the general satisfaction of the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, as it is more than a month since the time the minister made his statement that negotiations were proceeding satisfactorily, is he in a position to give the house some idea of when a new agreement may be made?

Mr. Churchill: Just as soon as I am in that position the statement will be given to the house.

Mr. Argue: Next year?

HOUSING

N.H.A.—REPORTED DECREASE IN LOANS FOR HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that total N.H.A. loans during the calendar year to date are down over 50 per cent from last year, and with interest on conventional loans now running as high as 8 per cent, will the minister say what action the government is taking to ensure a greater flow of mortgage funds for house building for the balance of 1959?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I would say that I think the percentage given by the hon. member is quite a long way off the actual fact. The government is watching this situation very carefully, and when it is necessary to adopt a policy, such policy will be announced in the house.

Mr. Garland: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister say what portion of the $250 million approved by parliament earlier this year has been used to date to relieve the scarcity of mortgage funds for house construction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question appears to ask for statistical information, and perhaps the hon. member would give notice or put it on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT ON STABILIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the fact that concentrated milk manufacturers in their negotiations with producers have quoted from the minister's statement on price stabilization for dairy products, reported in Hansard of April 23, to the effect that "the net result will be to reduce producers' returns by 15 cents per 100 pounds of milk used for manufacturing purposes" as a reason for reducing prices of milk used for manufacturing concentrated products? Can the minister clarify this statement?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, I would be glad to do so. As a matter of fact I have been informed by several people that one sentence in my statement has been lifted from its context in the paragraph dealing with support prices for butter and skim milk powder and has been quoted as if it also applied to milk used for concentrated products. It was never my intention that such an interpretation should be placed on my statement. In support of this I would point out that I announced support prices for butter, cheese and skim milk powder, but not for any other dairy products.

In the statement I recognized that the subsidy of 25 cents per 100 pounds of milk would not offset the 5 cent reduction in the price for skim milk powder, and that the difference would amount to approximately 15 cents per 100 pounds of milk used for the manufacture of butter and powder. However, my statement was not meant to include other manufactured dairy products such as whole milk powder, concentrated and evaporated milk, which are not under support, since it was assumed that prices paid for milk used in the manufacture of these concentrated products would be determined by negotiation as usual.

Since the statement of April 23 became public knowledge before negotiations were undertaken in Ontario, it is clear that both parties should have had full knowledge of the fact that the government proposed to pay a subsidy of 25 cents per 100 pounds on all milk used in manufacturing.

I need hardly assure the house that I am sorry to learn that my statement has been used in the way indicated by the question which was asked by the hon. member. Consequently I am glad to make this clarification in order that further negotiation or arbitration procedures may be conducted with full knowledge that it was not my intention to deal with the prices of product for which we have no support program.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PROTECTIVE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the anxiety of the house to encourage the tourist trade, and because of the very large number of week-end visitors, would the Minister of Public Works consider increasing the protective staff, as I understand that five members of that staff tried to look after approximately 24,000 visitors to the house last Sunday? I should also like to ask whether consideration might be given to extending the hour of closing.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Fortunately this is not the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works. I suggest that the hon. member refer his question to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is against the rules.

Mr. Tucker: I have much pleasure in doing so.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT ON STEPS TO RELIEVE BAIT SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked what steps my department is taking to cope with the shortage of bait for lobster fishermen in Newfoundland.

The hon. member is of course aware that last year the squid catch in Newfoundland failed almost completely and this, despite the efforts of the government to relieve the situation by importing bait even from Norway, placed an abnormal demand on herring used for bait. This situation has been aggravated by the fact that there has been a very light catch of herring over the past few months particularly in Newfoundland. However, we were successful in obtaining 250,000 pounds of herring for bait from Nova Scotia and this was distributed to depots last week. We are continuing to obtain supplies of bait whenever possible from every source that is feasible.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

TRIPS ABROAD BY MINISTERS—AIR TRANSPORT FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, on April 15 two questions standing in my name, Nos. 52 and 53, were passed as orders for returns. I wonder if the Secretary of State could advise me when I may receive those papers.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

RETAINING WALLS, QUEBEC PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he intends to answer my question that dates back to February, about retaining walls? I have been waiting for the answer with a great deal of patience.

An hon. Member: As soon as possible.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I admire the tenacity of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, and I can tell him that progress is being reported every day.

(Text):

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN NORTHERN ALLOWANCES FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State could answer the question I asked him yesterday in regard to government employees in Hay River, Northwest Territories?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as it does not come under my jurisdiction I shall ask the hon. member to direct his question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I advised the hon. member some time ago, this matter is under consideration by the treasury board.

SHIPPING

STATEMENT ON MOVEMENT OF PILOTAGE STATION FROM FATHER POINT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked if I could give him any information on the possible move of the pilotage station from Father Point. The recommendations of the pilots' committee at present in office are being given full consideration, together with those of the previous committee, which are at variance one with the other. It is agreed that a move of the pilotage station from Father Point to a location farther up the river is desirable; however, the choice of the new site has not yet been made. Considerable expenditures of public funds are involved in the decision, as well as navigational factors on which there are differences of opinion. A thorough study is being made of the sites suggested, and it is hoped that a decision will be reached in the near future when these studies are completed.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN BACKLOG OF APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Since approximately four weeks have elapsed since the minister made a statement about immigration, and since the summer immigration season is upon us, can the hon. lady indicate how the department is progressing in achieving a reduction in the backlog of applications from eligible immigrants in certain European countries?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I could not report on that at the moment.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate when we might anticipate a report?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any appreciable improvement in the situation until possibly the summer season has gone by. We may then have a better idea what the situation is.

Mr. Fisher: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the changes in the act be made? When will the whole new approach about which the minister spoke be undertaken? Will amendments be introduced this year or next year?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I understand what the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, in the minister's speech on April 22 she outlined the steps her department hoped to take. I wondered when she would be in a position to introduce those steps formally in the house.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I am not in a position to make a statement at the moment.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PICKERSGILL—REQUEST FOR CORRECTION IN REMARKS OF MAY 15

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make two corrections in Hansard of Friday, May 15. In line 32 at page 3706 I am reported as having said, "which we put forward at that time and which was supported by all the members from Newfoundland". It should read "Liberal members".

In lines 15 and 16 at page 3727 I am quoted as having said, "these lectures about the rights of parliament are getting very repetitious". What I said was, "These lectures to members of parliament are getting very repetitive".

Mr. Fulton: That is not what the hon. gentleman said.

[Later:]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any hon. member has any right to get up and ask for a change in Hansard where there has been an interchange between members across the floor of the house. In the case of the changes asked for by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I was here and I heard what he said and what he said is reported in Hansard, and he should not be allowed to change it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I agree with what the house leader has said, but it should apply as well to those who sit on that side of the house as to those who sit here. I have reference to an exchange which took place the other day during consideration—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am discussing the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is addressing himself to the question of privilege raised by the minister and not to another instance. I would prefer that he wait until the first one is disposed of.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to say on this occasion that if there is to be a ruling by Your Honour in connection with this matter the ruling should apply equally to both sides of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since my word was called into question, it seems to me—

Mr. Speaker: That would be a further matter of privilege. I think it might be well to dispose of one at a time. As I understand the practice, where a member has been misquoted—

Mr. Fulton: He was not.

Mr. Speaker: —he is entitled to ask that a correction be made in Hansard; and I believe it has been the practice of the house to accept the statement of a member as to what he did say, for the purpose of making the correction. It is not in order, as I understand it—and I would be glad to have the views of the house on this matter—to change what was said for the purpose of clarifying the ideas the member intended to express. I think the correction suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is in both classes. In the first one he added a word to clarify the meaning; in the second place he corrected Hansard, and the second one would be permissible.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, this is very important, because the Hansard reporter will not make any change where there is a cross-play across the floor of the house. The record stands as the reporter takes it down. On this occasion there was a cross-play, and my hon. friend would not be able to change it in Hansard, but he comes here and asks for a change on the floor of the house. I suggest that it should not be allowed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why I asked for this second correction. In the first one, though I think I did say "Liberal members" and it was inadvertently omitted by the reporter, I am not making any point of that, since the minister has raised the matter. However, in the second instance, I looked at what was in Hansard and it was not my recollection of what I had said. It was sufficiently different from my recollection that I thought it would be quite improper to try to make the correction anywhere except in public, here in the house. That is what I believe I said, and that is certainly what I intended to say.

Mr. Speaker: Before leaving this matter, may I say to hon. members that when they rise to indicate that the Hansard reporters have incorrectly reported them, they do so on their own responsibility. They should do so only when they are sure that is the situation, and I feel that the house should then accept the correction. It is not a change in what Hansard has reported, because that stays and is in the record. It is an explanation of an error which the hon. member feels the Hansard reporter has made.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON EVACUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that some weeks now have passed since the provinces were communicated with, following the meeting on civil defence, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the government is in a position to state its policy on evacuation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Following the conference at which the provincial ministers and several federal ministers were present, the hon. member asked me a similar question and the answer which I gave on that occasion still holds. The matter is getting prior consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Am I correct in saying to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that from now on all questions on civil defence should be addressed to him, or should they be addressed to two others of his colleagues as well?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member continues to address questions on civil defence to myself as Minister of National Health and Welfare, for the time being that will be satisfactory.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment and operation of a national energy board and the appointment of its members and staff, to define its duties, to authorize it to exercise certain powers and to provide for other related and incidental matters.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, in his statement last night the minister outlined in some detail the powers that would be exercised by the national energy board and to some extent the type of policy that the government would wish it to follow. The minister stated, as found on page 3767 of Hansard:

We recognize the need for and welcome capital whether domestic or foreign for investment in the energy and associated industries, and we believe such capital, wisely invested, should enjoy a fair and reasonable rate of return. As to what is a fair return, it is not our intention to incorporate any fixed formula in the statute. Rather, our first premise is that returns on successful investment must be sufficient to attract capital for replacement and expansion, and our second premise is that the public interest requires that no pipe line company should exploit its monopoly or quasi-monopoly position to secure returns higher than are fair and reasonable.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the stated policy of the government is far removed from what was once the policy of the Conservative party when it formed the opposition. We in the C.C.F. believe that natural monopolies such as gas pipe lines or oil pipe lines crossing interprovincial boundaries should in the national interest be publicly owned. We support that position not because of any theoretical belief that public ownership in every field is the right way to proceed but because we believe this is a particular example of the kind of utility, the kind of industrial facility, that should be publicly owned. If our natural gas pipe lines were publicly owned, if the trans-Canada gas pipe line were publicly owned, we feel that this would assist in providing energy sources for Canadian industry at the lowest possible price. At a time when the house is giving serious consideration to the whole question of inflation, to the whole question of our high cost economy—

The Deputy Chairman: Would hon. members please talk a little more quietly. It is rather difficult for the Chair to hear the member who has the floor.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that at a time when inflation is very much in the minds of members of the House of Commons, when the government has said that its policy is to prevent a further increase in price levels in this country, with all the warnings that Canada is becoming a high cost economy which is endangering our export trade, I feel the government should consider public ownership of interprovincial pipe lines as a means of securing for Canadian industry energy sources at the lowest possible prices. If energy is brought to Canadian industries at an inflated cost or at an unnecessarily high, cost, then this in turn means that the high cost of energy is passed on in higher and higher prices for finished products. This has a detrimental effect upon the development of the Canadian economy, both from the standpoint of Canadians and also from the standpoint of the development of a healthy export trade.

The government's announced policy is not only a great departure, a complete departure, from the position it has taken in the past, but is in fact very far removed from some of the recommendations made by the royal commission on energy. The report of the commission on energy contains the following recommendation on page 28. This concerns the prices, tolls and rates which should be set by the board of transport commissioners. The recommendation reads as follows:

That the prices, tolls, rates or tariffs of a company owning or operating an oil or gas pipe line as regulated by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, should be just and reasonable, non-discriminatory and calculated to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity, after making due allowance for reasonable and proper operating expenses, depreciation, interest, income and other taxes.

The important part of this recommendation, I submit, is that in the opinion of the royal commission tolls, rates and prices than can be charged should be set at levels to yield a fair rate of return on the shareholders' equity. Instead of that the government has said they will have the board follow a general policy of setting rates that will provide a fair and reasonable rate of return. These two things are far removed, because the assets of a company very often are so much larger than the shareholders' equity. A company which finances largely by bonds or by debentures is very often able to show a very high rate of return on shareholders' equity; and the announced policy of the government means the continuation, in all probability, of fabulous returns, fabulous profits that have been made from the oil and gas pipe lines of this country.

On page 33 of the energy commission report we find a table showing the percentage return on shareholders' equity in the Trans Mountain pipe-line company. In 1955 the percentage return on shareholders' equity was 27 per cent; in 1956, 43.5 per cent; in 1957, 38 per cent. There were tremendous profits and tremendous returns on the shareholders' equity. The profit of Interprovincial Pipe-line Company, based on a percentage return on shareholders' equity, was in 1953, 18.3 per cent; in 1954, 11.3 per cent; in 1955, 11.5 per cent; in 1956, 18.1 per cent; in 1957, 15 per cent. The percentage return on shareholders' equity in the Montreal Pipe-line Company, and of the Portland Pipe-line Corporation was as follows: 1953, 15.6 per cent; 1954, 9.94 per cent; 1955, 20.45 per cent; 1956, 19.51 per cent; 1957, 14.76 per cent.

These fabulous returns and fabulous profits on pipe lines have made millionaires almost overnight. These profits have accrued not only to Canadians but to United States citizens. These profits have accrued to the Texas buccaneers about whom we heard so much from hon. members opposite when they were in opposition. How they complained about the government's policy with regard to Trans-Canada pipe line company. How they complained that the government was allowing foreign capital to come into this country and make fabulous profits in the development of Canadian natural resources, fabulous profits which were made in a way that was endangering the very sovereignty of this nation, the very control of Canadian industry.

The Prime Minister himself, when he spoke on this subject in the past, has waxed very eloquent. The Prime Minister made many statements on this subject, and on page 4032 of Hansard for May 17, 1956 he had this to say:

[Mr. Argue.]

The perquisites here are that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should abdicate his belief in democratic principles and deny those in opposition the right to advance their arguments and to educate public opinion or to find out why there is such solicitude on the part of the members of this government. For five long years this pampered pet, Trans-Canada Pipe-lines, by deviation, by change of direction, by protestation, by alteration in course, has postponed that estimable end of securing a market for Alberta gas and the making available to other parts of Canada of that necessary form of energy. I ask the Prime Minister today to tell this house why he is so fearful of the facts; why he was afraid to allow the true facts of this nefarious scheme to be elucidated? I ask why he found it necessary, and the members of his government found it necessary, to muzzle the representatives of the people in advance of anything in the nature of a filibuster or an interference on the part of the opposition with the policy and program of the government. I ask him to explain that today, for certainly the day of silence is past. Are they afraid of the truth over there? Is that why they hide behind the caricature of parliament which they have substituted by the adoption of the parliamentary form of closure in a way that it has never been adopted before?

A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, the Trans-Canada pipe line scheme was a nefarious scheme in the words of the Prime Minister. The present Minister of Public Works, speaking in the same debate on May 15, 1956, as reported at page 3955 of Hansard said:

I conclude my remarks by this statement, and I make it after careful consideration. I believe that this measure now proposed by the government is the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation.

This resolution before us assures the continuation of this greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation. The government, instead of going as far as the recommendation of the royal commission on energy to hold down profits to a fair return on shareholders' equity, has left the door wide open for the continuation of these fat and fabulous rates of profit that are accruing from the pipe lines of this country.

This is a complete reversal of the position the government has taken in days gone by. Not only is it a reversal of the position which was taken as far as the Trans-Canada pipe line is concerned; it would appear from the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night to be even much more than that, because the government has shifted its ground from the position it took in parliament in 1956. In those days it was to be Canadian capital developing these resources, but last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say, as reported at page 3767 of Hansard:

We recognize the need for and welcome capital whether domestic or foreign for investment in the energy and associated industries, and we believe such capital, wisely invested, should enjoy a fair and a reasonable rate of return.

That is opening the door wide for United States capital to come in and take over even to a larger extent the operation of pipe lines in this country as well as the control of Canada's energy resources. The government has retreated from the position it took when in opposition. It has now adopted the policy of the former government. It has now put its arms around something it once described as a nefarious scheme. It has now accepted as part of its own policy something that was once described as the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation, and this announced policy of the government leaves the door open for further betrayals of the Canadian people by a repetition in the future of the scandalous schemes of the past.

Pipe lines in this country, not only the Trans-Canada pipe line and interprovincial pipe lines, seem to be industries in which people make fabulous profits overnight. They seem to be industries in which many actions are taken which should not be condoned and which, apart from the law itself, are very questionable. We know of the pipe line scandals in the province of Ontario. We have read about alleged pipe line scandals in the province of Quebec. We know the way the people in the city of Winnipeg and in the province of Manitoba are being held up by exorbitant prices being charged for the use of natural gas by consumers, all because the Conservative party has turned its back on a policy of public development of these resources.

Public development has been used in the past by various governments as an important means of developing Canadian resources. We have a publicly owned railway. We have the Ontario hydro, which is doing a good job. We have the Manitoba hydro that has pioneered in that province the development and distribution of electrical energy. But the Conservative party has now closed its eyes to the great vision of public development which was once that of the Conservative party.

Out in the province of Manitoba the information I have is that consumers in the city of Winnipeg will have to pay 90 cents per thousand cubic feet of natural gas, a price which is at least 16 cents higher than the price paid by consumers in the province of Saskatchewan even after the additional cost of transportation of the gas is taken into account. In the province of Saskatchewan the distribution of natural gas has been undertaken by the Saskatchewan power corporation, a publicly owned company. Consumers in the city of Regina have to pay 70 cents per thousand cubic feet of gas, but in the city of Winnipeg, although it costs just 4 cents to transport a unit of gas from the city of Regina to the city of Winnipeg, the cost is 90 cents. The province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg are having to pay rates 20 per cent in excess of the rates paid in Saskatchewan even after one takes into account the cost of transporting the gas for the increased distance, and this 20 per cent is the fee the people of Manitoba have to pay for a policy that is against their own interests and is in favour of private capital, whether Canadian or foreign.

If Canada as a nation, Mr. Chairman, is to develop at a maximum rate, and if our industries are to have access to the cheapest possible power, then the policy the government has announced should now be changed. This is not a policy designed to provide low cost energy in Canada; it is a policy that will result inevitably in more scandal, in the lining of the pockets of more Texas buccaneers, in a further encroachment on Canadian sovereignty by United States capital. This policy announced by the government is the capitulation of the Conservative party to the Texas buccaneers and to the gas and oil barons in this country. This is the disappointing conclusion that the government has arrived at after studying the report of the royal commission on energy and after having been in office for almost two years.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this policy is uneconomic, it is un-Canadian, and it is a policy that will impose tremendous burdens of additional and unnecessary cost, until checked, on future generations of Canadians. I am surprised and amazed that a government that got to office to a very large extent by exploiting the need to develop Canadian resources by Canadians and by Canadian capital, a party which came to office because it advocated low cost energy sources in this country, should have now made a complete about face and embraced the policy which it once condemned so strongly. By the same token it has condemned Canadians for many years to come to paying exorbitant and excessive rates for energy sources in this country, at the same time turning over larger and larger shares of Canada's energy resources to foreign capital and foreign interests.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-49, to provide for the establishment of a national energy board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FURTHER ASSISTANCE FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION, TO FARMERS AND FISHERMEN, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Veterans' Land Act to provide further financial assistance to veterans for home construction and to veterans presently settled under the act as full-time farmers or who may be so settled in the future and to veterans who may be settled as part-time farmers or commercial fishermen; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Brooks: Before the resolution carries I should like to make a short statement with reference to the proposed bill.

This measure, to amend the Veterans' Land Act, is one of the most important I have had the pleasure of introducing since I became Minister of Veterans Affairs. The settlement of veterans of a country's war on land on advantageous terms is one of the oldest forms of rehabilitation of which we know. It was introduced in Canada in the seventeenth century, and the veterans of the American revolutionary war, the war of 1812, the Fenian raid, the Northwest rebellion and the South African war were all given land grants to help them become re-established in civil life. The earlier schemes were in some measure responsible for the settlement of Upper Canada.

During world war I consideration was given to land settlement assistance as a means of rehabilitation for soldiers returned from that war, and in 1919 the Soldier Settlement Act was passed. This act provided financial assistance in the nature of a fully repayable loan to veterans with farming experience. Due to a combination of factors, including strains of the post-war depression, the success of the measure was not as great as anticipated.

Shortly after the beginning of world war II a study was commenced of various rehabilitation measures for veterans of that conflict. The fundamental importance of agriculture and the desirability of a sound plan for the settlement of veterans on the land were paramount considerations. Much thought was given to the determination of basic principles which would increase the social stability of the country and provide veterans with a reasonable opportunity to acquire land and home ownership through sound economic arrangements. A veteran who was willing to work and practise thrift should be able to reach that desired end within the best working years of his lifetime under a contract which could be observed from the outset to its conclusion.

As hon. members know the resulting legislation, the Veterans' Land Act, has been eminently successful in enabling a large number of veterans to attain that goal, and many others are now fulfilling the terms of their contracts and give every evidence that they too will be successful.

Some years ago it became apparent that the original Veterans' Land Act might, with advantage, be enlarged to give veterans who were not primarily interested in farming and related occupations an opportunity to secure assistance in building homes. Accordingly, in 1954 amendments to the act were considered that would be of material help in providing home construction assistance, and the present part II of the act was passed.

At the same time recognition was given to the effect of price increases which tended to make more difficult the acquisition of economic units of land within the financial conditions set forth in the act. Another new part, part III, was added to the act to enable full-time veteran farmers to secure additional loans to extend or improve their properties. These amendments have proven of great benefit to many veterans who have thus been able to secure home ownership or sound farming units.

Since 1954 there have been further developments in this field, and considerable study has recently been given to the credit needs of Canadian agriculture. The importance of the development of economically sound farm units is now perhaps more readily recognized than ever. Consequently a thorough review of the Veterans' Land Act has been under way for some time in an endeavour to learn whether, with appropriate safeguards, an extension of the loan provisions of part III might offer better opportunities for success for veteran farmers than are now provided.

A thorough study of the provisions of the act has revealed the desirability of rather extensive amendments. These do not reflect at all adversely on the very evident success of the act during the past 15 years, nor on its administration, which has been outstandingly successful. Rather, the need for amendment is evidence of progressive thinking on the part of the administration and the many others who are deeply interested in the progress of agriculture in Canada. The opportunity has also been taken to include in the proposed amendments to the act certain administrative improvements which experience has shown would be desirable.

The major amendment is contained in a number of interdependent clauses which together form an important development in the philosophy of the act. This series of amendments proposes to relate more closely the conditions surrounding the granting of farm improvement assistance under part III of the act with respect to the maximum loan and the amortization period to the corresponding conditions under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. The amendment would increase the maximum amount available under part III to $20,000, less any indebtedness outstanding on an existing contract under part I of the Veterans' Land Act. This larger loan should enable a full-time veteran farmer, well established under the Veterans' Land Act, to extend his enterprise to one of sound economic proportions, which is beyond the present capacity of the act.

The present amortization period under the act is 25 years. In view of the increase in the amount of loan it is considered desirable to extend that period to 30 years.

The proposals also recommend that the purposes for which a loan under part III may be used be extended to include the purchase of livestock and equipment and the refinancing of existing indebtedness, and to increase the ratio of the loan to the security from the present 66⅔ per cent of the value of the real property to 75 per cent of the appraised value of the total security including land, buildings, basic herd livestock and farm equipment, with limitations on the percentage applicable to the latter two categories.

A further proposal would increase the maximum loan presently available under part III to small holders and commercial fishermen on establishment from $1,400 to $3,000, providing the veteran contributes $1 for each $3 so advanced. At present the veteran is required to contribute $1 for each $2 advanced. This proposal would increase from $8,100 to $10,000 the maximum amount available for the settlement of veterans as small holders and commercial fishermen. The need for this increase is evident when one considers the increase in cost of construction and equipment. It is anticipated that during the first 12 months some 2,000 veterans should be assisted by this proposal.

A further proposal would increase from $8,000 to $10,000 the maximum amount the director may advance on behalf of an eligible veteran for the construction of a home under part II of the act. Since the former limit was set the cost of land and construction has increased. The present limitation has in a number of instances forced veterans to defer plans for building their homes.

Hon. members will recall that an amendment to the War Service Grants Act recently passed by this house extended the period during which re-establishment credit may be available for the use of veterans. As this credit and benefits under the Veterans' Land Act are considered as alternative rehabilitation measures, it is deemed appropriate to set a similar time limit within which veterans may obtain a certificate of qualification under part I of this act. The proposed deadline is September 30, 1962, for veterans of world war II. For veterans of the action in Korea the time limit expires 15 years after their discharge from that service, which in most instances it will be in 1968.

There is a proposal that will confer eligibility for home construction assistance under part II to a small group of veterans who are now excluded from the benefits of the act. This group consists of those veterans who received university training allowances under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act for a period of more than nine months. Their part II eligibility will enable them to obtain financial assistance and expert technical advice during the course of construction of their homes.

I have outlined the major amendments to the act proposed by this bill. As I said earlier there are a number of administrative changes to which I need not refer now.

The financial implications of the various proposals of the bill lie generally in the increases which may be made available in loans to qualified veterans. There will undoubtedly be an increased demand for assistance, and this may require a relatively considerable demand on public funds for loans which will be repayable with interest. The net cost of the proposals will be confined to the additional administrative effort required.

I anticipate that when this bill is referred, as I trust it will be, to the standing committee on veterans affairs it will evoke considerable interest. I am confident that the committee will study thoroughly all the amendments proposed in this bill which, as I have intimated, is an important one, particularly to the continuing success of the Veterans' Land Act, and to the many veterans and communities who have benefited from the operation of this excellent and successful piece of legislation.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just intimated that these amendments will go before the standing committee on veterans affairs, and last night the house leader told us it was hoped the committee might be able to work on this during this present week, so it is not our desire to delay the proceedings unduly. I would like to take this opportunity of indicating our support of these amendments, however, and to commend the minister for bringing them in at this time.

The historical background with which the minister opened his remarks was, I am sure, extremely interesting to all hon. members, because his remarks indicated that the rehabilitation of veterans on the land has been a concern of governments over the years, and one of the oldest benefits accorded to veterans. It is my belief that the Veterans' Land Act has been the most successful of all the rehabilitation measures that make up the veterans charter. It has been extremely well administered at all levels, and in my opinion the department has been extremely fortunate in recruiting the right type of person to administer this legislation. The officials have always displayed the right attitude. That has been apparent from the beginning and maintained to this day. In all cases the interests of the veterans have been put first, and he has been given good advice even though it was perhaps not in accord with his own wishes.

The success of this phase of veterans legislation is due in large measure, I believe, to the frequent contact there has been between officials and the veterans concerned, and to the follow-up advice and guidance given in solving current problems. The passage of time has brought about changes, however, and many of the provisions in the charter have been rendered out of date. This is particularly true of the financial provisions. Land values have increased and the purchasing power of the dollar has declined, so the financial assistance available under the present legislation is no longer realistic in relation to today's prices.

I am sure the changes the minister indicated will be welcomed by all veterans everywhere, and particularly the changes in the maximum amount of the loan and in the extension of the amortization period from 25 to 30 years. The extension of the purposes for which grants under this legislation will be used will also be warmly welcomed.

Coming from Newfoundland I am particularly interested in that part of the act that provides for grants to commercial fishermen. I am very pleased to note that the minister is proposing to increase the maximum amount from $1,400 to $3,000.

For some reason or other it appears that the benefits available to commercial fishermen have not proved as attractive as those available to veterans who wish to settle on the land. I do not know what the situation is on the west coast, but it is my impression that in the Atlantic provinces we have not taken as much advantage of this legislation as we might. I hope the publicity that will attend this legislation on its passage through this house will induce more veterans to take advantage of this part of the legislation.

In addition to the changes consequent upon changing conditions there will also be other changes borne out of the experience of the department in administering the act. We hope that as far as the commercial fishermen are concerned the changes contemplated will bring this legislation in line with the changes that are taking place in the commercial fishing industry.

I am sure that all veterans will appreciate the extension of the benefit period, which will enable those who have not yet been able to take advantage of this legislation and whose time may be running out to have another chance.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of this group I want to express our support for the amendments to be introduced after this resolution has received the consideration of the committee. As this bill will be referred to the committee on veterans affairs for further study and consideration I am not going to speak at length, but I do want to take this opportunity of bringing a few points to the attention of the committee.

I am particularly interested in this type of legislation because I am one who firmly believes that if we do not maintain the family farm in Canada, and opportunities for the development of small-scale industry and small business, we will within a few years develop a monolithic state with all the horrors that go with it.

An hon. Member: Is that not the aim of the C.C.F. party?

Mr. Herridge: What was the interruption I heard, Mr. Chairman? Apparently an hon. gentleman over there is trying to massage his microscopic ego by interrupting me with rude noises but I can assure him he will not succeed.

I am particularly interested in the maintenance of the family farm because of the role it has played in Canadian society, the role it can play in the development of this country, and in the provision of a type of happiness that is lost to many who do not understand what rural life is and do not appreciate the advantages that attend it, despite the fact that on many occasions the financial returns are not equal to those available to people who take part in other activities.

The institution of the soldier settlement board shortly after the first world war was the first attempt to do something along those lines. It was almost in the nature of an experiment. Consequently many mistakes were made and there were many failures, but also there was a great deal of good done under the old Soldier Settlement Act. I know a number of veterans who benefited as a result of that act.

As a result of the experience gained over the years with the soldier settlement board in all sections of Canada, the government, the veterans affairs committee and the House of Commons, when it came to consider the Veterans' Land Act, had a background upon which to base legislation. It was that previous experience with the Soldier Settlement Act that made it possible to draft the Veterans' Land Act which, without doubt, has been much more successful generally speaking than the Soldier Settlement Act was in the years prior to the second world war.

During recent years we have noticed increasing admiration—and this is true of the group I represent—for the work of the Veterans' Land Act and what it has accomplished. Why? Well, we have been very fortunate, Mr. Chairman, in having a director of the Veterans' Land Act who comes from a farming family of many generations, whose heart is wrapped up in the problems of the family farm. This has had a lot to do with the success of this act since the second world war, and in addition he has had the loyal support of a very competent staff.

I want to bring to the attention of the committee one or two documents which have been published by the Veterans' Land Act administration. The first one is entitled "A Decade of In-Service Staff Training, 1948-1958. The Story of 'Operation Good Earth' ", compiled by S. O. Robinson. It is well worth any member's time to read this document. It is a history of the experience of the Veterans' Land Act administration.

Then I come to another book issued by the Veterans' Land Act administration, and it is entitled "Production-line Farming". It is a loose leaf handbook by T. J. Rutherford, director of the Veterans' Land Act. I say without hesitation—and I have read a great deal of literature on agriculture throughout the years, as agriculture and forestry are two of my hobbies—that this is the best book of this type that has been published to date in this country to put into the hands of men who wish to be successful farmers and carry on practical farming. This book contains a fund of information which can be readily understood by those persons who are aiming to make a success of the family farm. I recommend that every member of this house get a copy of this book when it is available. I want to compliment the director and the members of his staff. No doubt he must have had a great deal of co-operation not only from the headquarters staff but also from the staff in the field to compile such a worth-while document.

To indicate the success our Veterans' Land Act administration has had in rehabilitating veterans on the land I want to refer to the last copy of the Family Herald, dated May 21, 1959, which was brought to my attention just recently and which contains a most interesting article with respect to the success of a settler under the Veterans' Land Act in Alberta. The title is "How We Remade a Ranch". Then there are pictures showing Mr. Peter Elko, who is a supervisor in the district and who won such great respect for the Veterans' Land Act. In brief, it is a story of the value of the Veterans' Land Act administration; it is a story of the success of supervised credit as advocated in the book published by the department to which I have just referred. I suggest that anybody who is interested in finding out what can be done in developing successful farming practices should read the books I have mentioned and this article in the Family Herald.

Mr. Harkness: I have read it; it is an interesting article.

Mr. Herridge: Most interesting, and it shows the value of supervised credit and the service that skilled, devoted people can give to farmers.

As further evidence of the success of the administration of the Veterans' Land Act I want to quote from the Legion brief presented to the standing committee on veterans affairs in March, 1959. The Legion presented a resolution to the committee entitled "Supervised Farm Credit". I am going to read only briefly from the brief; it is further evidence of the value of the kind of work the Veterans' Land Act administration has been accomplishing for veteran farmers in Canada. This resolution did not spring from the headquarters of the Canadian Legion. This is not office-inspired. We all know that this country is becoming infested with a multitude of propaganda experts. This springs from resolutions that come from branches across this country. From men and women, members of the Legion, who have had contact with veterans who are farming under the Veterans' Land Act administration. What does it say in part? It says:

> Through practical experience of the operation of the Veterans' Land Act it has been shown that carefully supervised government-sponsored credit extended to competent and progressive farmers in adequate amounts and at the right time can and will enable the farmer to enjoy a standard of living more comparable to that of the average Canadian in other industries and to meet his obligations when due. Government-sponsored supervised credit is urgently needed for those presently established V.L.A. settlers and other eligible veterans, as well as for the younger farm civilian and those farmers now in low income brackets.

I am very pleased indeed to see the concern of the Legion for the other young farmers in Canada. It indicates there is a growing number of people who realize the importance of the maintenance of the family farm in Canada. Then the brief goes on to say:

> The V.L.A. administration has proved to have adequately trained, experienced and efficient personnel available and capable of administering a government-sponsored increased supervised credit plan. Full-time farming veterans still remaining under V.L.A. would be much better served by an expanding and virile organization serving all farmers than by one which must soon run down due to the fact that it will be serving only the rapidly decreasing residue of V.L.A. settlers. We believe that it is essential that a plan be developed which will improve farm management and production, thereby strengthening the entire national economy.

The Canadian Legion therefore recommends to the government:

That a plan of increased long term and short term supervised farm credit assistance under the jurisdiction of the presently well-established veterans' land administration applicable to veterans and civilians alike covering all phases of the Canadian agricultural industry, be undertaken.

I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that the experience of the Veterans' Land Act administration, and the experience of the veterans they have aimed to serve throughout the years, and this legislation will be a guide to later legislation coming from the government to serve the needs of those young people in Canada who wish to become established and practise life as family farmers in the days to come.

I was very pleased to hear the minister's reference to the fact that there will be an increase in the amount of loans available, that the time will be extended to 30 years, that money can be borrowed for livestock and equipment, and the other amendments he mentioned. The bill will go before the committee. No doubt we shall have full opportunity to study it and get further explanation at that time.

However, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I do want to say this. I hope that in framing its farm credit legislation, which I understand is being given consideration at this time, the government will give serious consideration to the success of supervised farm credit in Canada under the Veterans' Land Act administration and will then see fit to extend the same opportunity to all young Canadians who want to play their part on the farms of Canada in the days to come.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Brooks thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-50, to amend the Veterans' Land Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION NO. 105 CONCERNING THE ABOLITION OF FORCED LABOUR

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of convention No. 105, concerning the abolition of forced labour which was adopted by the international labour conference at its fortieth session at Geneva on the 25th day of June, 1957, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to obtain the approval of parliament to a convention adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization in 1957. This is convention No. 105, designated as the convention concerning the abolition of forced labour. I understand that copies of the text of this convention have been distributed to members of the house.

This convention provides that every member state which ratifies it undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development, as a means of labour discipline, as a punishment for having participated in strikes, as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination.

We have no systems of forced labour in Canada, and to the best of our knowledge there is no legislation now in effect in Canada which would be inconsistent with or in contravention of the provisions of the convention. The opinion of the Minister of Justice is that in these circumstances no legislation is required to implement the provisions of the convention. It is hardly necessary for me to say that systems of forced labour are entirely repugnant to our social, economic and political institutions in Canada.

The adoption of this convention on the abolition of forced labour by the international labour conference in June, 1957 was the outcome of inquiries and discussions by and within the United Nations and the international labour organizations over the past ten years. In 1951 an ad hoc committee on forced labour was appointed jointly by the secretary general of the United Nations and the director general of the international labour office as a fact finding body to study the problems raised by the existence in the world of forced labour employed as a means of political coercion or in large scale economic plans. The committee's report in 1953 revealed facts that showed the existence of such systems of forced labour, and established that these systems seriously threatened fundamental human rights and jeopardized the freedom and status of workers.

A proposal to adopt a convention outlawing forced labour was placed on the agenda of the international labour conference for 1956 and 1957. Throughout the discussions the Canadian delegation, representing government, workers and employers, supported the adoption of a convention which would identify and outlaw the kinds of forced labour which the committee's report had revealed. The convention for the abolition of forced labour was adopted by the 1957 international labour conference with no dissenting votes.

We are asking approval of this convention by parliament in order that we may proceed to ratify the convention immediately thereafter. This convention is an effort by the international labour organization to carry out one of its essential aims of abolishing conditions of labour which involve injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people by prevailing upon its member states to eliminate such conditions. A convention which receives a large number of ratifications becomes a powerful force. There is no doubt that Canada should ratify this convention to show our serious interest in and support for the universal abolition of forced labour, which is the objective of the convention.

I feel confident that approval of this convention by parliament will have the support of the vast majority of Canadians. Certainly this is so in the case of Canadian management and organized labour, whose representatives participated and played an active part in the formulation and approval of the convention by the international labour conference. Both these groups have also urged upon the government the ratification of this convention.

For the information of the house I might add that the United Kingdom was the first country to ratify this convention and Denmark was the second. The convention came into force 12 months after two ratifications had been registered, which in this case was January 17, 1959. It has now also been ratified by 18 other countries to date, Austria, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, Haiti, Honduras, Ireland, Israel, Jordan, Malaya, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, El Salvador, Sweden, Switzerland, Tunisia and the United Arab Republic. I trust that the house will give full support to this resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, in introducing his resolution to the house, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is asking us to approve the convention which was adopted in Geneva on June 27, 1957, by the international labour organization. I heartily agree with the minister when he says that we do not have, here in Canada, a system of forced labour which, through racial, social, national or religious discrimination, would compel a working man to work, as a disciplinary measure, or because he has taken part in strikes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution shows that today people respect organized labour and are anxious to raise the standard of living of people affected by racial discrimination or by methods other than free and voluntary work.

The hon. minister reminded us that this convention was first ratified by the United Kingdom. On reading the history of England, we realize that she was the first to recognize organized labour and to go out of her way, as it were, to satisfy the demands of labour.

In fact, if I remember rightly, it was under the Pitt administration that child labour was outlawed, that 11 or 12 year-old children were no longer allowed to work in factories, and that later on contractors were compelled to hire people over the statutory age limit.

Yes, England was the first country to recognize organized labour. She showed respect for the freedom of workers and for their labour. I do not think we have in Canada a forced labour system which compels a worker to accept a job, or to work for a disciplinary purpose or otherwise. To my mind, this convention passed by the international labour organization is all to the credit of civilized populations; it shows at the same time that they have respect for the worker's freedom, for his work and that he is allowed to earn a living under decent conditions.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. group are quite pleased that the government has introduced this resolution, and we shall certainly lend it our full support. As the minister has said in introducing the resolution, a number of countries have already approved it. Canada's approval is approval of the principle that forced labour should not exist. As the minister has said, in the terms of the resolution there is no forced labour in Canada and therefore there is no need for legislation. We are not abolishing forced labour because it does not exist in this country. In other words, the government is making a very proper gesture by approving of this convention and is showing its support for the abolition of forced labour wherever that might exist.

I think the government's position so far as the rights of labour are concerned would be greatly strengthened if the government would take action to restore the rights of labour that have recently been interfered with in this country. It is quite easy for the government to introduce a resolution which, in the words of the minister himself, has no practical significance in Canada because there is no forced labour here, and therefore nothing will happen in Canada subsequent to the passage of this motion. But Canada's position in the councils of the world would be greatly strengthened if we showed, as a parliament or as a government, that we believed in labour having its full rights in all parts of this country.

In addition to the abolition of any infringement that now exists so far as the rights of labour are concerned, the government would also greatly strengthen its own position if we had in this country an amendment to the Canadian constitution that would make it impossible for any government or any organization to interfere with basic human rights and fundamental freedom. If this were the case, then of course Canada's position would be unassailable. However, until the government takes this additional action which is necessary in connection with Canadian human rights and fundamental freedom, and to restore the basic rights of Canadian labour that have been abrogated then, of course, the position of this government will not be completely sound in the eyes of the rest of the world.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I have only a word or two to say about this international labour office convention which is number 105 in a long series of conventions which have emanated from that international organization and which have made their contribution to the betterment of labour conditions throughout the world. Indeed, I recall that Canada has ratified a great many of these conventions in the past. On one occasion the government of the day, under Mr. Bennett, thought that these conventions might be used for the passage of social security legislation in this country without reference to the provinces.

This fact persuades me to ask the minister a question in regard to this convention, the purpose of which we are heartily in accord. In asking the minister this question, I realize that this convention imposes no legislative responsibility, as I understand it, on Canada because as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has just said, none of the obligations in this convention has to be undertaken by us in the sense that the offences covered in the convention do not exist in this country. Nevertheless, the subject matter of this convention is one which, under our construction, falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I would ask the minister, therefore, whether this convention has been considered by or referred to the provinces for their consideration or for any comments they might wish to make concerning it, even though as I understand it no obligation to implement this convention is involved?

I should like also, if I may, to ask the minister—because I have not the information myself—whether, and if so how many, the communist states accepted this convention, and how many middle east Arab states and African states accepted this convention? The minister said when he was introducing the resolution that it had been accepted unanimously at the international labour organization conference called for the purpose of drawing up this convention. This might mean, of course, merely that no country voted against the convention but there might have been a long list of abstentions. Perhaps the minister could give us that information. Article 1 of this convention reads:

> Each member of the International Labour Organization—

That includes the Soviet union and other countries now.

> —which ratifies this convention undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour—
> (a) as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system;
> (b) as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development;
> (c) as a means of labour discipline;
> (d) as a punishment for having participated in strikes;
> (e) as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination.

In view of the social and economic organization of several communist states, and the attitude taken in those states towards free labour, it would be interesting indeed to know whether any communist state has accepted article 1 of this convention or indeed whether it has ratified it. I think the minister said in his opening statement that Poland had ratified the convention.

It would be interesting also to know whether states have accepted and ratified this convention whose labour legislation is so reactionary—and I think of one or two who used to talk about human rights and fundamental freedoms at the United Nations—and whose labour legislation is so reactionary that it is not an exaggeration to say that slavery is recognized in those states. However, that does not detract, Mr. Speaker, from the value of a convention of this kind. The fact that some states could not, without a change in social and economic organization, sincerely accept and carry out a convention of this kind is no argument that the provisions of this convention should not be embodied in the law elsewhere so far as that is possible. We do, therefore, support the convention as an indication of the direction in which all countries should be moving, namely the abolition of anything that might approach forced labour.

I recall that when this subject used to be discussed, and it was discussed at every United Nations assembly, there was always an attack made by communist members of the United Nations against forced labour in what they called the colonial territories. These were supposed to be the places where forced labour provisions were most used. It was interesting and a little disillusioning to realize that some of the members who used to make the strongest attacks on forced labour in colonial territories under the guise of protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms were those states who had provisions in their own constitutions and who operated their own social and economic organizations in such a way that free labour, in our sense of the word, was not possible.

Nevertheless, as I have said, this convention perhaps will help in the movement toward the abolition of forced labour or anything approaching forced labour in any country. At least it is an ideal, and to put the ideal on paper in this way as an International Labour Office convention might do some good in those countries where it is most required, some of which I have ventured to mention.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members so far I just have a few brief comments to make about the resolution now before us. As the minister indicated, it does not apply in so far as Canada is concerned, and I, and I am sure every other hon. member in the house and citizen in the country, hope we never see the day when such a convention will have to be made applicable to Canada and steps taken to abolish forced labour.

Like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who naturally has a rather detailed and considerable appreciation of conditions concerning forced labour which exist in other countries in the world, we too abhor very much the attitude and the approach to this retaliatory method of forcing people into certain types of labour because of political or religious beliefs. That has taken place in the Soviet union, and more recently on the mainland of China. Even though this convention does not apply to Canada, we may assist in promoting and setting an example to other countries of the world to follow our lead and allow to the fullest extent possible freedom as we know and understand it. I think that example could not only be set for the so-called communist countries but for other countries which are under colonial rule. That situation is changing gradually and I hope will be completely eliminated as the next few years pass by.

As has been indicated, I think the minister could have shown Canada to be much more concerned with the freedom and rights of individuals if he had been able to introduce into the house a motion concerning the endorsation or ratification of other I.L.O. conventions, and I have one in particular in mind about which I asked the minister a question some time ago. If we were to endorse and ratify I.L.O. conventions which would be applicable to Canada, and which if they were enforced would have the effect of deterring the actions of one province in particular in removing rights and freedoms of individuals, we would be doing something more concrete so far as Canada is concerned and not just in effect tagging along with other nations and agreeing with them on the ratification of a principle of this nature when, as I say, it does not apply to Canada. How much more acceptable it would have been if the minister had been able to suggest that we endorse or ratify I.L.O. convention No. 87 which deals with the freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, part of which says that workers' organizations—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not suppose that the hon. member who has the floor contends that the convention which is to be ratified today extends to the subject matter he is now proposing to discuss. Unless he does I would appreciate it if he would confine himself to the subject matter under consideration. I did allow the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) to follow that line a little, but I would not like it to be pursued.

Mr. Howard: All I was trying to do, Mr. Speaker, was to get as far along the road as my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and perhaps maybe a little bit further, but perhaps I have made my point. I merely say that this is acceptable—

Mr. Speaker: I did ask the hon. member to drop that point.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I accept the endorsation of this particular resolution before us, and may I express our regret that the minister has not seen fit to go on and deal with other matters as well.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Pearson: There were some questions asked, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Starr: An hon. member wishes to speak before I answer.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that supporting a convention or supporting the abolition of forced labour is almost akin to declaring oneself against sin. It is a sad reflection on the state of our 20th century civilization upon which we pride ourselves so much that such conventions are even necessary.

The purpose of this convention, as with previous conventions, is to spotlight public opinion on this problem of forced labour and to mobilize forces which will tend to eliminate it. This convention which is referred to in the resolution replaces a former one which I think came into existence around 1930. I believe soviet Russia was a signatory to that 1930 convention. One therefore cannot help but wonder what is going to be accomplished by merely declaring ourselves in support of a resolution when countries who are signatories do not even begin to take the matter seriously.

This problem of forced labour is perhaps a bigger one today than it was a generation ago or even two generations ago. We have now forced labour on a massive scale in Red China as a distinct part of government economic policy. We know that forced labour has always existed in Siberia and Russia, and those conditions exist today. If we are going to support a resolution of this kind, surely we should look into it a little further and try to find out exactly what it is we are supporting.

The minister read out different categories of forced labour. There is forced labour for political purposes; forced labour for economic purposes; forced labour for disciplinary or corrective action; and in many countries these are embodied in laws which exist on their own statute books. I think we should ask ourselves where we draw the line in these categories. Does this convention repudiate all forms of forced labour, or does it just repudiate the categories mentioned by the minister? Certainly if we are going to endorse the principle in this debate, as we are by supporting this resolution, we are declaring ourselves against all forms of forced labour which militates against the concept of human rights and the degradation of human beings. Unlike my hon. friends from Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and Skeena (Mr. Howard), I do not see this as a matter of the rights of organized labour; I think it is a matter of human rights.

As far as labour is concerned, I think it is necessary to distinguish between labour that is forced and labour that is not forced. When whole villages are uprooted and mass transportations to other parts of the world are ordered, we know that that is something to be condemned. We know, also, that when people are herded together in concentration camps, no matter whether for political purposes or corrective action, that is something which we condemn. We cannot say that all labour is bad, because in the case of prisoners of war a certain amount of labour is both necessary and a good thing. What we are concerned with is where to draw the line. I think we are more concerned with the treatment that these men receive. We heard from the Hong Kong veterans in the committee on veterans affairs some while ago, and they told us how they had been subjected to long hours of labour and to physical strains quite beyond human capacity, while living on insufficient food in conditions which provided inadequate shelter, and subject to a complete lack of sanitation and medical care. They told us that the pay which they should have received by international convention for the kind of work they were doing was either given them in worthless money or stolen from them.

We know that these evils against which we declare ourselves cannot be corrected by education alone, though education is certainly a part of the process. If we intend to support the principle of this resolution and then forget about it I do not think we can be regarded as acting in a sincere way. Surely we can do more than that. If we accept this resolution we are imposing upon ourselves an obligation to seize every opportunity to mobilize public opinion against these evils. If we intend to make an effort in this direction we must recognize that these evils are mainly the result of a materialist ideology, an ideology which has been embraced by a large section of the world's population. If we are to do anything about it, we in the west must ourselves develop a superior ideology which will bring about changes in men's hearts from which all these evils flow.

Mr. Starr: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked two questions of which I made a note. One was whether we had ascertained the opinions of the provinces. I must say that we did not contact the provinces, but I am quite satisfied that there is no provincial legislation in this field.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know the point which the Leader of the Opposition had in mind, and since he is not in the house now, may I point out that under the constitution of Canada certain powers are reserved to the provinces and certain powers, as the minister knows, are reserved to the federal government. This gives rise to a difficulty with respect to conventions of this nature which is shared by other federations, such as the United States, but not by unitary states such as Great Britain, Belgium and France. When the hon. gentleman says he has not consulted the provinces, does he not think—and I say this without in any way abridging our desire to ratify this worthy convention—that we should take into account the powers of the provinces as has been done, I am sure, in the past in the case of all these conventions. When the minister says he has not consulted with them, I am rather surprised.

Mr. Starr: There is no need to be surprised, because I have consulted the Department of Justice in order to satisfy myself on this very point. Since the provinces have no legislation of this nature, the federal government is taking no action which might deprive them of anything they have at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, but they have the power to pass legislation.

Mr. Starr: I think that is a matter which could be dealt with when the time arrives. This is only the ratification of an I.L.O. convention. I realize that only conventions have been ratified in the past—conventions passed by the I.L.O.—and failure to ratify in some cases was due to the fact that there was existing legislation in some of the provinces. In this case, there is none.

Of the 18 countries which have ratified this forced labour convention I can only think of one which is a communist country to my knowledge, and that is Poland.

An hon. Member: How many communist countries signed it?

Mr. Starr: I am sorry, but I do not have that information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to hold this up, but would the minister on another occasion let us have a list of the conventions involving powers of the provinces in connection with suggested ratification of I.L.O. conventions and with regard to which the provinces were not consulted? I am sure the minister will find that this is the first occasion when their views were not sought.

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member for Essex East would like to have this information, and if he will place his question on the order paper, I will be glad to provide it for him.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-47, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Before this measure is further dealt with, I should like briefly to speak on a matter which, I regret, is not included in this bill, and that is the provision of relief, as the government promised, to the automobile industry regarding the Excise Tax Act, which in 1957 it felt was needlessly burdensome and calculated to increase the amount of unemployment in the automobile industry.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think I must rise at once on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Essex East has indicated he is about to speak on a subject which is completely outside the scope of this bill. There is nothing in this bill which has any bearing on the special excise tax on automobiles. This is simply a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act. We are not on the resolution stage of our discussions, and we are faced with the well-established rule that only those matters which are relevant and which are included in the scope of this amending bill can be the subject of debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, may I say that the Minister of Finance is again usurping functions which belong, by decision of this house, to you, Mr. Speaker. We are debating the principle of the bill and I am complaining about the fact that this bill does not include relief by way of substantial reduction or elimination of the excise tax on automobiles. There can be no doubt that I am perfectly in order in saying that this bill is deficient in that it does not make provision of a kind which, I am submitting to the house at the present time, it should. I take it that Your Honour agrees with me in recognizing this elementary principle of debate.

Mr. Speaker: I recall that in an earlier parliament a very similar situation arose as a result of an amendment which was accepted as an amendment declaring a contrary principle to the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Last session.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, last session. It might be possible that the same situation would arise again but generally speaking the matter before the house is the substance of the bill itself and although to my mind it is quite relevant to indicate the deficiencies of the bill I would think it would create very considerable problems for the house if hon. members were to be free to debate at length the various deficiencies which could be ascribed to any tax bill which covers as broad a tax field as the excise tax.

For example, one might raise discussion of 50 or 100 excise taxes which exist and are not covered by this bill. It does not seem to me that the practice of the house would extend that far. I am not sure how far the hon. member wants to go in this matter but I would think that it would be in order to call attention in a general way to the deficiencies of the bill without getting into an extensive debate on any particular item that is left out unless it could be asserted as it was last year as a contrary principle to the bill. The peculiar circumstances of that case might not pertain today. I do not know if that assists the hon. member or not, but he may proceed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour has helped me up to a point but I would be inclined to say that Your Honour has not been as liberal in interpretation as I would think the situation warrants. I would have thought that under this bill any hon. member, no matter how time-consuming, would be allowed to rise and say that this bill was deficient because it does not provide for something which an hon. member felt it should provide. I think that is essential to the right of debate on the principle of the bill at this particular stage of our proceedings. If such intervention can be regularized by way of amendment as it was last year, perforce it could be done by way of a declaration or criticism such as the one I am now about to make to the minister.

Since Your Honour has recognized my right I shall briefly state my position as I tried to do on two other occasions, as the Minister of Finance will recall when we were entering into a discussion of the items that go to make up automobiles and at which time my hon. friend took strong exception to my right to do so. He objected to my discussing this particular matter then, as he does now.

I acceded to his request and am now taking the only course open in this session to put before the minister, other than in the form of interrogation, my complaint which is this. This government promised in my own city and in other communities in Canada that there would be at least a substantial elimination of the excise tax on automobiles. The Prime Minister said that because of the situation then confronting the country in terms of unemployment he would see to it that the tax would be eliminated or at least substantially removed.

Mr. Benidickson: He called it a scandalous tax.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, he referred to it as a scandalous tax and if I remember rightly my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on one occasion referred to it as an iniquitous tax. The fact is that the Minister of Finance has reduced the excise tax by only 1½ per cent.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Two and one-half per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister reduced it by 2½ per cent after it was generally thought that the government was about to make a substantial reduction in the tax or eliminate it altogether.

The situation is this. The automobile industry has been confronted with very serious unemployment for some 18 months now. While this problem will not be completely relieved by any further substantial reduction in the excise tax, it would be greatly assisted. This would be an encouragement to many people who are now reluctant to purchase automobiles to do so. The automobile companies have been requesting this as indeed has the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Spencer) who sits behind my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

We are now discussing in Canada the manufacture of small cars. I note, by the way, that the Minister of Finance has not participated in those discussions. It would seem to me to have been very useful in respect of this particular problem if the Minister of Finance had arranged to be present to have discussions when the heads of these companies met the Prime Minister, one of them today and the three others last Saturday. I ask the Minister of Finance now if he does not think as a means of relieving the serious unemployment problem the elimination of this tax at this time would be very helpful as a contribution in that direction?

If my hon. friend the minister replies he will likely say that when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power the tax was 10 per cent. It is true that the excise tax had been 25 per cent at one time and it was subsequently reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent and then to 10 per cent. The head of the previous government in an important statement indicated that if it became evident to the government that the excise tax was a serious obstacle to reducing unemployment his government would not hesitate to take the step which such a situation warranted. That situation now confronts us and indeed it confronted us last year.

As a member of parliament from one of the constituencies heavily involved in this particular problem, a problem that affects thousands of people in an extremely serious way, I would ask the Minister of Finance as one of his last acts in the Department of Finance to accede to this request on the part of one of his dear friends who speaks on behalf of thousands of men who want me to bring home to the minister at this time their serious plight. The Minister of Finance may shortly have the opportunity of doing something about peace; he now has the opportunity of doing something about giving men employment.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as a native of Norfolk county, I want to reiterate my objection to this bill on the ground that it does the exact opposite of what was promised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the election campaign, even in the second election which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) still recognizes as having some validity, although he says the promises in the first campaign were all wiped out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All carried out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Carried out? As the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has pointed out, they were carried out the back door. I should just like to recall to hon. members' minds, in case they have forgotten them since the last time this matter was discussed, some of the promises made by the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister made a very specific reference to the tobacco tax at Brantford on February 18, 1958, as reported in a Canadian Press release carried in the Ottawa Journal of that date. The reference is in these words:

> He also promised a review of taxes on tobacco, which he described as the heaviest on any industry in Canada.

I also have here a report from a reputable and indeed excellent newspaper, the Windsor Star, which after referring to the price of cigarettes and the tax, quotes the Prime Minister directly as having said:

> We are having this whole question looked into. A study is being made to ascertain what action should be taken to give the tobacco farmer a fair and reasonable return.

The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Knowles) speaking in the early election, it is true, but presumably he was still of the same mind in the second election, as reported in the newspaper of his own county the Simcoe Reformer of June 5, 1957, had this to say:

> The promises of John Diefenbaker and the Conservative party are not those from an old hat but have been brought up in the parliament time and time again so I say it is time for a change for the benefit of Norfolk and Canada.

That is a direct quotation attributed to the present hon. member for Norfolk. We have had the change for the benefit of Norfolk and the rest of western Ontario and of Canada to which he referred and in addition to the failure to do anything about the motor car tax, to which my friend the hon. member for Essex East referred, we have had this action on the tobacco tax which was the exact opposite of what was promised and which I think will not be forgotten in western Ontario.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that members of the large government party are not rising at this time to take advantage of the opportunity, on second reading of this bill, to speak as they did on previous occasions when they were sitting on this side of the house. I agree with your ruling that one would not want to go into any particular omission in an exhaustive way with respect to this bill; but, on the other hand, I simply want to remind this house, and particularly new members of the house, that in past debates when another government was in office, at this stage of the debate we heard from the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) and we heard from the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) about the excise tax on automobiles; we heard from the member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) about the excise tax on clocks and watches; we heard from a former member of the Bennett government, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) with respect to the desirability of having no taxes on the purchases by municipalities in the automobile field. We always heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and from the Minister of Finance with respect to the elimination of taxes on what they called the necessities of life and they referred to boots and shoes, clothing and the like. None of these things was either in the legislation that was proposed in 1957 and 1958, or that which is proposed now. We heard from many members who showed no indication of rising at this time with respect to some other matters that are not referred to in the bill we have before us. I think of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) who referred to municipal purchases. I think of the Minister of Finance who has forgotten some of his views in the past with respect to municipal purchases.

We, of course, always expected on this particular bill to have a very informative and helpful speech from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) with respect to the automobile industry. That has not been forthcoming. I think, too, of the lack of any interest on the part of those in the majority party today because seemingly they do not want to rise to say anything in this debate. I think of what they said in the past with respect to the elimination of sales tax obligations for welfare associations. Nothing has been said today by any of those people in that respect. I think particularly of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) who used to make speeches when he was in opposition about this. I wonder whether he has been making representations to the Minister of Finance and, if so, why they have not been successful?

I think, too, about the over-all rate. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) in past years repeatedly used to assert that the actual percentage rate was unconscionable and should be reduced. I could refer to some speeches of this nature that he made in the past. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not hearing them today and indeed there was no attempt on anybody's part from the government party to rise to say anything on any of these matters that formerly seemed to be of concern to them.

I am not going to amplify what was said about the tobacco tax by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), but we know that there was no bailiwick in Canada from coast to coast where there was an economic problem too insignificant for the Prime Minister to make pronouncements about in the elections of 1957 and 1958 and, as has been referred to, he was particularly vocal when near Norfolk county and speaking in Brantford on this particular subject.

This is the third stage of discussion of changes in our tax system as announced in the budget. Therefore, I do not want to over-emphasize some of those points. I have spoken upon some of them in the past, but I do want to say as briefly as I possibly can that the legislation we are now dealing with, which is one bill out of five resulting from the budget proposals, does in the words of taxpayers represent chickens coming home to roost kind of legislation. It spells out very well the kind of thing that I want to convey to this house. Somebody else has said that with respect to two election campaigns, after the ball is over, why, of course, now we are seeing in tax proposals many hearts broken. That, I think, is very much exemplified in this one of five bills that have been presented to us, all of which involve additional imposts on the Canadian taxpayers. We are dealing now with sales tax on municipal purchases, or the absence of any benefit for them. One of the ironical things that I think most of us noted was that even though all of the Canadian municipalities through their nationl organization called upon this government, we found that no relief was granted when the budget was announced, notwithstanding the many suggestions that had been made in the past by members of the present administration, as I have illustrated.

It is true that in this particular bill the consumer tax is not impressively raised. It was most impressively raised as a result of using the Excise Tax Act statute as a basis for the over-all 1 per cent increase and the amendment to the Old Age Security Act. I am not going to refer to that except to say that that was a very large increase in taxation upon the Canadian people. The Minister of Finance and I had something in the nature of a difference during the budget debate on this particular point and I said that taxes—and I had reference to corporation taxes—that were likely to be passed on to consumers were a very substantial portion of the over-all $352 million annual increase proposed in this budget. The minister said, "Only a quarter".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What page number?

Mr. Benidickson: I am referring to page 2613 of Hansard. Well, quite irrespective of the extra imposts on corporations which I believe will be passed on to consumers—and in this respect I often find that our friends in the C.C.F. group seem to applaud increases in corporation taxes as a very worthy method of raising funds—I find that in 1953 the then leader of the C.C.F. group, Mr. Coldwell, in a debate with the then minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, admitted that corporations, for the most part, passed on those extra taxes to the consuming public of Canada.

Mr. Howard: That is not an admission. It is a straight fact.

Mr. Benidickson: I am saying it is a fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member not rather getting back into the realm of the budget debate when he talks about corporation taxation?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be over-lengthy at this particular stage of the debate in view of the fact that this is the third time we have discussed some of these elements. However, I did say in the past that greatly enlarged costs would be imposed on the consuming public as a result of the amendments to the Excise Tax Act and as a result of the passing on of the increases in the Income Tax Act, and I think this has borne fruit. Many more millions of dollars than this parliament is obliged to raise for fiscal purposes are being extracted from the Canadian people as a result of price increases that were, as I said before, triggered off by the budget.

When the minister is discussing the amendments to the act I hope he will bring the house up to date, as he himself in the past asked the then minister to do, with respect to the over-all revision of the particular statute which we are amending in a very minor way today. I remind the house that in 1955 the Canadian tax foundation prepared a very worth-while brief with respect to the application of this tax to the Canadian people. After receiving their recommendation the then government acted very promptly and as a result a special sales tax committee was established. Some inquiries were made about this matter in the estimates committee but we were told frequently there that changes of substance depend upon the recommendation of the Minister of Finance. I wonder to what extent the minister is moving along with respect to amending the basic features of the act referred to not only in the sales tax committee report but in the recommendations of the Canadian tax foundation. I hope the minister will say something about that before the debate concludes.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, since Your Honour has ruled out discussion of the excise tax on motor cars—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no.

Mr. Badanai: —I will confine myself to saying a few words first in support of submissions made to the government by the confectionery industry and the toilet goods manufacturers. We all realize, of course, that taxes in some form, while not desirable, are necessary. But there are items on which taxes represent clear discrimination, especially when they affect food. I have in mind the 11 per cent sales tax on chocolate products as an example. This tax also applies to biscuits if they are coated with chocolate. In the submission made by the chocolate and cocoa industry of Canada it is pointed out that the imposition of a tax on chocolate and confectionery items is a flagrant form of discrimination.

Confectionery items are in direct competition with bakery and ice cream products which are tax free, as are also the ingredients of these basic foods. I say that when a chocolate bar, which delights the spirit of a child, is taxed and caviar enjoys exemption from tax—caviar, if you please, a delicacy indulged in only by people who can really afford to pay taxes—it is not only discrimination but it is an absurd paradox which should be corrected without delay. On page three of their submission to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. member for Fort William that, although I have considered it relevant and have permitted members to indicate the shortcomings of this bill in general terms, what he is saying now would have been perfectly relevant in the debate on the budget where he could go into the particulars and amount of another kind of excise tax enactment. If a debate of that kind were to be allowed on a bill of as narrow a scope as this, the house would never, within its rules, be able to conclude if members did not wish to conclude. I would consider that references to the deficiencies of the bill would be appropriate by way of illustration but if the hon. member wishes to repeat the budget debate it seems to me he is going beyond the limits.

Mr. Badanai: Then I shall only quote a paragraph or two from the submission made by the chocolate and confectionery industry.

Mr. Speaker: Is that not exactly the point concerning which I took the liberty of interrupting the hon. member? I rather hoped that he agreed with me in what I said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am a little disturbed about your ruling particularly in the light of what I, as one of the longer term members of the house, know has been the practice over the years. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has just pointed out, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) used to indulge in this sort of thing at every juncture and particularly at this particular phase of the discussion of the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You cannot back that up by reference to the record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has just done so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was quite wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that the view Your Honour has expressed is not in conformity with the practice of this house. This is the second reading of a bill and the reason why we have these various stages is so that hon. members will be given the opportunity of stating their position with regard to problems and even repeating their position. That is one of the purposes behind second reading and, particularly in the case of a new member. Having in mind the character of what he has said so far, it seems to me that it would not be interpreting the rules of debate properly to restrict him in the way that Your Honour seems to suggest.

Mr. Speaker: I shall have a look at previous debates on the second reading of amending taxation bills and see how far the house has permitted discussion to go. I am sure the hon. member for Essex East does not advocate repetition of the budget debate on the bill at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not.

Private Bills

Mr. Speaker: It is very difficult to draw the line and I find a great deal of difficulty in doing so. I see that the hour of five o'clock has arrived. I shall give some thought to this matter before we resume the debate at eight o'clock.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk calls my attention to the fact that there are a great many bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the house that all private bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN LEGION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE SERVICE LEAGUE

The house in committee on Bill No. S-19, respecting the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League—Mr. Macdonald (Kings)—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On the clause 1—Change of name.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Chairman, before this clause carries, I think it might be well if I were to make a few remarks concerning this bill. The Canadian Legion was first organized under the Companies Act by a charter granted by the secretary of state on July 17, 1926. It is rather interesting to note that the present amendments have been submitted to the parliamentary counsel, Dr. Maurice Ollivier, Q.C., who in 1926 drafted the original charter. It was the successor to the great war veterans' association and other original ex-servicemen's bodies which were formed after world war I. The latter half of the title includes the name of the parent organization to which the Canadian Legion belongs, even though it is practically an autonomous body in Canada.

There was no change in the original charter until May 14, 1948, when the Legion was incorporated by a private act of parliament, being chapter 84 of the statutes of Canada. The official title of the Legion remained unchanged, but the various provisions necessary for the proper functioning of the organization as a large nation-wide body, which it had become after the heavy influx of veterans from world war II, were spelled out. This legislation brought it in line with bodies of similar size scope functioning on a dominion-wide basis.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

In 1951 a few amendments were made to the act of incorporation, pertaining mostly to minor changes in the by-laws and restrictions on the use of legion insignia. Bill No. S-19 recommends several changes which are required at the present time but which do not change the original purpose or setup of the present organization.

Clause 1 merely changes the legal name of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League to the Canadian Legion. It will be noted from the bill that this change of name does not "in any way impair, alter or affect the rights or liabilities of the legion." The principal reason for this request was the recent change in the name of the parent organization to the British Commonwealth Ex-Services League, and the possibility of another change at a future date. This would naturally be an upsetting factor and create again considerable confusion and expense, so it was decided to adopt the simple title of "The Canadian Legion".

Clause 2 makes identical and necessary alterations to accommodate the ladies auxiliary of the Legion by striking out the words "of the British Empire Service League" in paragraph (r) of section 4 of chapter 84 of the statutes of 1948.

The intention of clause 3 is to enlarge the objects of the Legion. A perusal of the present purposes and objects as given in the explanatory notes of the bill indicates that they are particularly related to the problems and welfare of the veteran and his dependents, perpetuation of the fallen, fostering loyalty and education in the principles of patriotism, duty and unstinted public service, as well as many other matters pertaining to veterans' affairs exclusively. In this field members of the Legion have done a magnificent job. Motivated by the same high purposes and spirit of unselfish sacrifice which prompted them to serve their country in time of emergency, they have carried on a great work of voluntary service on behalf of their fellow veterans all across the nation.

If I were to pay the proper tribute to the Legion, a great deal of time would be required, and I am sure that is not necessary. Members of this house, many of whom are veterans and active members of the Legion, as well as most of our Canadian people, daily witness the great work being carried out by its members. This organization enjoys the standing of being one of the largest and most respected groups in the country, and now numbers almost a quarter of a million members. It has been somewhat confined, however, in its activities and in the use of its name beyond the purposes outlined by the present act.

In order to participate officially and more widely in other affairs, it is requested that its objects be enlarged by adding to section 4 of chapter 84 of the statutes of 1948, the following paragraph (v):

(v) "To encourage, promote, engage in or support all forms of national, provincial, municipal or community service, or any charitable or philanthropic purpose."

Clause 4 would amend section 6 of chapter 84 of the statutes of 1948, as amended by chapter 86 of the statutes of 1951 (first session), and would provide for more flexibility in the internal operation and efficiency of the Legion. Conventions are held only every second year, and it can be readily realized that considerable business must be carried on by the executive council, which is the governing body between conventions. This clause provides for an extension of powers to the executive council from the dominion convention more in line with the 1948 statutes. It should be noted that there is ample safeguard for any action taken by the executive council, as such action must be placed before a subsequent convention and ratified or modified to remain effective, or it can be deleted if the convention so wishes.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, probably I should point out to the committee that these changes have been requested by the Legion and were passed at its last dominion convention as recommended by the committee on constitution and laws of the Legion.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald) has just pointed out, this is a very simple bill which merely proposes to change the name of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League and its related auxiliaries and to enlarge the scope of the activities of their organization.

The Canadian Legion, as everyone knows, is a patriotic, non-sectarian, non-political organization of Canadian service men and service women. Following world war I Canadian veterans banded themselves together into an organization which was known as the great war veterans' association. In 1925, following a visit from Earl Haig to Canada, it at once decided to change its name to the Canadian Legion, and as the hon. member has pointed out, this organization became incorporated under a dominion charter in 1926. The new organization then affiliated itself with the British legion and other similar organizations in various parts of the commonwealth which became known as the British Empire Service League. The British Empire Service League has recently changed its name, and that in turn has made it necessary for the Canadian Legion to make corresponding changes in the name of the Canadian organization.

The membership of the Canadian Legion, of course, is formed from members of Her Majesty's services and auxiliary services who have served in a theatre of war and who have been honourably discharged. The primary objective of the Canadian Legion has always been to look after the welfare of veterans, their families and dependants. To this end they have raised funds and assisted veterans with advice, and in various ways according to the need. They have also assisted various governments with advice in connection with veterans' legislation. In this connection too they have always made a special point of looking after the burial of deceased veterans and seeing that they are buried with due ceremony and given a funeral service in which their wartime service is commemorated. The Legion has sponsored an annual poppy fund every year and the proceeds of this fund are devoted to the vetcraft industries which have afforded employment to a great many veterans who otherwise would not be able to make a living.

One of the most important activities of the Canadian Legion during the last war and in the postwar period was the institution of the Canadian Legion educational service. This was a brave experiment in adult education in the armed forces which was eminently successful and which set the pattern which was followed by many countries after the war. The inauguration of this service enabled many veterans to improve their educational standing and even to acquire knowledge of a technical nature during their spare time in the armed services. I think that has paid great dividends to Canada in the development of our human resources, which after all are the most precious resources that any country possesses.

In addition to the welfare of the veterans, the second great objective of the Canadian Legion has been to keep alive the spirit of comradeship and to keep before the nation those traditions and ideals for which our comrades fought and died. We are now approaching a period where the business of looking after the welfare of veterans will perhaps diminish, because already in this session we have revised certain legislation providing benefits to veterans, and only today we passed a resolution concerning the Veterans' Land Act. So it is clear that in the future veterans' welfare will be very well taken care of, and the Legion's efforts in this respect will be confined mainly to those veterans who need assistance and who for some reason or other are not eligible to receive assistance under the various acts of the veterans' charter.

As the role of welfare diminishes, the role of leadership in the nation will increase. We are living today in a world of ideological conflicts, and we see every day that our values are disappearing before our very eyes, the very values for which so many of our comrades fought and died. We all know that the first world war was fought to end all wars. The big slogan in those days was, "Might is Right". Our comrades fought and died because they believed that might was not right, but that slogan is widely accepted today in many parts of the world, and even in the United Nations we find big countries doing things just because of the sheer weight of their military might and we have to accept and tolerate it because we feel we cannot do much else about it.

One of the big contributions which I feel the Legion can give to this generation of Canadians and to succeeding generations is to revive the emphasis on the moral principles which inspired so many of our comrades and for which so many of them paid the supreme sacrifice. As the hon. member for Kings has pointed out, clause (c) of this bill will enlarge the scope of their community and national activities, and we welcome that. But I think that their main role in the future must be the role of moral leadership, and just as the Legion has been a tremendous force for good in the past so it can become an even greater force for good in the future.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the explanation of the purpose of this bill given by the hon. member for Kings and his outline of the activities of the Legion and its history. I well remember joining the old great war veterans' association in 1919, and I am a charter member of the Canadian Legion. Naturally I have taken an active part in that organization since its formation and I am fully aware of the excellent work being done and which has been done for veterans and their dependants throughout the years. Since coming to this house I have been more particularly concerned with their representations before the veterans affairs committee.

I should also say that the Legion does keep alive the spirit of comradeship. When you have stood alongside a chap in the face of heavy fire in the field, it promotes a bond between you which is very difficult to dissolve; in fact, it rarely is dissolved, fortunately. The purpose of clause 1 is to change the name, to meet, I assume, changing constitutional circumstances within the commonwealth. I am going to be quite frank and say I am very sorry to see that the name is to be Canadian Legion only. I cannot understand why it is not to be the Canadian Legion of the British Commonwealth Ex-servicemen's League, because I think the ex-servicemen's organization is one of the best cementing influences between the various countries of the commonwealth. I am a firm believer in the value of the commonwealth in the world today, and in the major and continuing role it can play in world affairs.

I presume there is some valid reason for the omission at this time, but as a member of the Canadian Legion I say that I look forward in the near future to the introduction of another amending bill which will complete the name of the Canadian Legion by calling it the Canadian Legion of the British Commonwealth Ex-servicemen's League.

The second major change in this bill, as I see it, is to enlarge the objects of the Legion as outlined in section 3 which reads:

> To encourage, promote, engage in or support all forms of national, provincial, municipal or community service, or any charitable or philanthropic purpose.

I think that this is, in fact, merely giving legal status to activities which have been going on in the Legion throughout the years. And why have these activities been in effect? The answer is this: because the membership of the Canadian Legion and its auxiliaries are people who have a sense of responsibility to Canada and to their communities, and on that account for many years past their activities have extended far beyond the primary objectives of the Legion, which are the welfare of veterans and the welfare of their dependants.

I know that our provincial command is engaged in a number of province-wide activities at the present time. One of them is devoted particularly to the welfare and guidance of youth. As far as our branches in Kootenay West are concerned—they are very active branches—donations—and they are not small donations in relation to the size of the branch in question—are made periodically to hospitals. Legion branches have also undertaken activities for the welfare of our aged citizens. They have assisted voluntary fire brigades in small and incorporated communities by undertaking financial drives; they have helped to develop local libraries; they have taken part in local celebrations; and they have interested themselves in the development of recreation grounds and the raising of money for the development of small parks which are of value to the district in which they are situated. They have also assisted in the building of curling rinks.

Quite recently the zone council of the Canadian Legion in Kootenay West has become very interested in promoting sports for young people on a district-wide basis as a valuable contribution to the welfare and development of our young citizens, and to this end in the very near future we are going to have the first Legion-sponsored sports in the West Kootenay district. The ladies' auxiliaries have also been singularly active. In most cases they have co-operated with the local Legion branches in efforts such as I have just described. All through the years, this kind of activity has gone on. There seems to be a greater activity in the smaller communities than in the larger towns, because there is not the same number of smaller organizations and less tendency for a person's activities and energies to be divided into so many diverse channels.

I say once again that in my opinion this part of the bill simply gives legal status to a situation which has existed in the Canadian Legion and its branches for many years. In conclusion, I wish to repeat that I trust the hon. member will soon introduce a further amending bill which will complete the name of the Canadian Legion as the Canadian Legion of the British Commonwealth Ex-servicemen's League, as one of the major organizations in the commonwealth today.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT TO GIVE INDIANS RIGHT TO VOTE IN FEDERAL ELECTIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-15 to amend the Indian Act.

He said: I have but few comments to make in speaking to the second reading of this particular bill. As the title indicates its purpose is to amend the Indian Act. Inasmuch as we have established a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which will be holding its first meeting tomorrow morning it would seem appropriate that either the bill itself or the subject matter should be referred to that committee for consideration. However, if this course does not meet the wishes of the house I am sure that some of the members present would like to take this opportunity of expressing their views with regard to the particular amendments which are now proposed, and this in itself may be of some guidance to the joint committee on Indian affairs when it begins consideration of these particular sections of the Indian Act.

While the amendment itself relates to the question of income tax exemptions for Indians in certain circumstances its main purpose is to implement a proposal which I have made in three successive sessions regarding the right of native Indians to vote in federal elections.

Subsection (2) of section 86 of the Indian Act allows for one arrangement by which Indians may have the opportunity of voting in federal elections. It is my purpose to repeal this subsection so that an Indian desiring the right to vote would not have to sign away his statutory right to income tax exemption in respect of the use of reserve land. Perhaps I should read the pertinent portions of section 86. Section 86, subsection 1, reads in part:

Notwithstanding any other act of the parliament of Canada or any act of the legislature of a province, but subject to subsection (2) and to section 82, the following property is exempt from taxation, namely,

(a) the interest of an Indian or a band in reserve or surrendered lands, and

(b) the personal property of an Indian or band situated on a reserve,—

The section then goes on to make reference to succession duty, inheritance tax, and so on.

An extensive study was given to the Indian Act by a committee of this house in 1951. When some hon. members of the present government were in opposition they clearly expressed their opinion as being that the subsection to which I have referred should be deleted from the act. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was a member of the committee in 1951 as was the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton). The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) also made comments about this section and expressed their desire to have it repealed or deleted. I am sure they are of the same opinion today and that they were not making a purely political speech expressing an attitude that may change depending on which side of the chamber one finds oneself occupying. I am convinced that the attitude they expressed in 1951 was sincere.

I submit that subsection (2) of section 86 applies to very few native Indian people. The great majority of Indians earn their livelihood from fishing, logging or other occupations not confined to the reserve. If an Indian earns his income from commercial fishing for instance, he is in the same position as any other fisherman and must pay tax on the income he receives. The same is true of logging or any other occupation. The exemption applies only to the use of reserve land or income received for its use. In order to have the right to vote an Indian must waive his right to that exemption.

The most significant point about this question is the psychological attitude of the Indian. An Indian does not like to sign away, give up, or have taken away any right he may have. It is not important to an Indian whether or not those rights are applicable in an individual case. An Indian looks upon the signing of the waiver form as an example of the white man asking him to give away some of his hereditary, aboriginal or treaty rights. We know that it is a statutory question having no relationship to treaty rights. This is a justifiable attitude based on the experience of Indians with white people over the years. It is immaterial to the Indian whether or not he will earn any money on the reserve and in all probability only a few would be affected by these provisions. The Indian considers it an attempt on the part of white men to take from him a part of his hereditary, aboriginal or treaty rights.

Indians are suspicious of the attitude of non-Indians with respect to their rights and this, I submit, is justifiable because we have a record of shameful exploitation of Indians, their resources and their rights. If we were to remove this section from the act the Indians would consider it an act of good faith on our part as non-Indians indicating that we do not want to interfere with their hereditary, aboriginal or treaty rights. It would indicate that we would want to go half way toward meeting him, and seek to achieve an understanding of his background, history and culture as we insist he understand and accept ours. This action in my opinion would be an act of good faith such as should have been demonstrated by our forefathers in their dealings with the native Indian people. These are the only remarks I have to make at this stage.

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, as I understood the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) this bill represents one step toward giving the franchise to the original inhabitants of Canada in that it will protect them from surrendering certain rights when they wish to vote in federal elections. In examining the speech made by the hon. member last year as reported at page 1009 of Hansard of June 10, 1958, I have reached the conclusion that the premise on which the hon. member seeks to obtain the vote for Indians is wrong. On that occasion the hon. member stated:

In my view this matter is important to the welfare of our Indian people. It would be a first step toward assisting them and our people to appreciate and understand each other's ideas and cultures to a greater degree than we have in the past.

Mr. Howard: Can the hon. member tell us what was under consideration at that time?

Mr. Fairfield: At that time the house was discussing Bill No. C-8 to amend the Canada Elections Act which was moved by the hon. member for Skeena. The hon. member made a statement about the psychological attitude of the Indians. In my constituency I have two rather large reservations, and I have practised amongst them for many years and on other reservations as well. Having seen many Indians I can understand the psychological attitude. The Indian still has a very defensive attitude toward the white man. Any time that you give the Indians anything they begin to look for the joker or the nigger in the woodpile. In this instance I would like to know more fully than the hon. member has been able to explain to us what the general attitude of the Indian is toward this modification or amendment to give him the franchise in the future.

As he well knows, in Manitoba we enfranchised the Indians in 1954. Any observations that I have to make along this line will be personal, of course. I find that the Indian has not taken great advantage of that enfranchisement other than the fact that he may now enter the white man's pub. I feel that that is no advancement in so far as culture is concerned, at least. I find that he is not too impressed with the political field provincially.

In the past few months we have had practically a revolution in the Six Nations down near Brantford who would, I am sure, rather abdicate or secede from the dominion than accept any further kindnesses from the great white chief. I should like to say this. Since a committee is being set up, I would rather see this question gone into more fully, to have witnesses brought from all parts of Canada particularly, as the hon. member for Skeena has said, in view of this psychological attitude of the Indian.

No doubt in his own case he has known many Indians and has had some dealings with them. In my own case I do know it is very difficult to approach the Indian and to get his real feelings on anything about which you may want to deal with him or to treat him in a different way. He has this defensive attitude and I am sure that after deliberation in committee we shall have to be sure that they will understand exactly what we are giving them before we ever try to give them the vote federally. Too often, as he has said, in the past what we have given with our left hand we have taken away with our right. Therefore, rather than see this bill debated and voted on today, I would like to see it given a great deal more examination and a great deal more thought.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am heartily in agreement actually with the comments made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) for I, too, feel that the privilege of voting in federal elections particularly should be extended to the Indians who are, after all, our first Canadians. For too long the Indian population of Canada has been sheltered and protected as wards of the crown, until their desire to make decisions of their own has almost gone. However, with better educational facilities being provided for their children by the government and religious organizations and the resultant higher level of education being attained by each succeeding generation, our Indian populations in Canada have begun to wish to do their own thinking and to make their own decisions in more and more matters pertaining to themselves and to their affairs.

I would like also to put on record here the expression of my sincere appreciation for the work of the priests and the sisters of the Oblate Order in the education of the Indian children and people in my constituency more particularly. As is well known to hon. members, various provinces have in varying degrees in the past few years been extending to the Indians the privilege of full citizenship and in some of these provinces these Indians are allowed to vote in provincial elections. That is not so, however, in Alberta.

Most of the Indian problems are of a social nature. In the past they have been particularly educational problems. We as a government in Canada have a responsibility to the Indians in this matter. If I may, I should like to say to the hon. member for Skeena, as I did when I began my remarks, that I am in particular agreement with this problem. To me it is probably a little more serious than it is to him. I think there are many things that come before the problem of the franchise, particularly that of education. Indians have not only the problem of assimilating Canadian education but also the terrific problem, as the hon. member who spoke before me mentioned, of retaining their own particular Indian culture. This culture is not only valuable to themselves but it is a valuable addition to Canadian culture, and it is certainly one to be retained if for no other reason than a purely historical one.

In talking to members of the Blood band of Indians from Cardston, which is in my constituency—naturally it is the only one with which I am particularly familiar—I found that they almost unanimously endorse the thought of the franchise for Canadian Indians. But before you much more than commence to talk about the subject you are suddenly brought face to face with the many other problems that the Indians have, everything indeed from the liquor laws to the desperate attempt to retain their own culture.

I would like to submit to hon. members that in my humble opinion, and from my experience with the Blood band of Indians in Alberta, we must consider those other problems. In other words, first problems must come first. I can well imagine Indians being given the franchise. In fact, you might compare it to a young bird or a young child being turned loose in the world without being properly prepared to fend for itself. There are a few Indian people who I understand have attained Canadian citizenship on their own initiative. They have been enabled to do this by a sort of sponsorship. When I mention the word I mean simply this. It is very hard for an Indian person to go out into the everyday life of Canada and educate himself to the point where he can convince the proper authorities that he is ready for full Canadian citizenship.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to dwell for a moment on the Blood Indians and their particular problems with respect to education. Certainly if we as members of the House of Commons are to enable them to continue or improve their education we must as well take a look at our own methods and standards. The Blood Indian reserve has a population of some 2,500 of our first citizens of the highest order and also, I might add, with problems of the first magnitude. The Indians on the Blood reserve are a very fine and proud people, particularly proud of one of their own who was appointed not long ago to the Senate. This appointment did a great deal for the Indians of Canada. It gave them a renewed interest in the government of Canada and a new zeal to become more useful, better informed and respected members of the Canadian family.

The Indians of the Blood reserve have many problems, as I mentioned before, and I should like to take a moment to point out some of the troubles of this band. I feel this is very closely integrated with the problem of citizenship. Incidentally, I do not mean to criticize our Canadian Indians in any way in this house. Rather, the criticism is of the Canadian government and when I say "Canadian government" I assure hon. members that I am speaking generally.

With these Indians, as with most of us, the chief social interest, of course, is the education of their young people and the need of increased facilities for improvement and refinement in the manner in which this is carried out. May I point out something that is now and has been for some time of great concern to our friends on the reservations in Canada, namely that educational standards are almost completely and entirely those of the white man, neglecting to consider the fact that these people on the reservations have a certain culture and way of life which it is very important to them to retain, and for us to enable them to do so would be most welcome.

Perhaps I might take a moment to refer to Canadian education, and I think this is relevant to the matter under debate. It would be desirable for Canada that a uniform standard of education prevail regardless of whether different regions are economically favoured, and certainly our reservations must be considered in this light. I would hope that educational opportunity for Canada's future citizens will soon be on an equal basis in all parts of the country. I would hope that before long the federal government would find a way to provide support and leadership throughout Canada for the purpose of establishing a basic standard of education in all provinces through some financial support and by providing leadership that will equalize every province's ability to provide this basic standard. Certainly this must carry down to the reservations to fill the great need of our Canadian Indians today.

The need for such assistance has been proven beyond doubt to all those in Canada at present interested in education by the very great percentage of high school students entering universities who are having so much trouble with reading, writing and arithmetic. There should be a way for the federal government to provide leadership to all Canadians to solve this national problem which is rapidly becoming one of great concern to the people of the nation for, as some have said, our very survival is at stake and the days of grace are few. Some have also said, and I can see no reason to question their judgment, that our very way of life cannot be expected to survive longer than a period of from 25 to 50 years unless important steps are soon taken to remedy this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not interrupted the hon. member up to this point because he related the question of education of Indians to their exercise of the franchise but it seems to me that education in general is a little remote from the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Does Your Honour not think that there is another point of order involved as well?

Mr. Gundlock: If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, I have very little left to say. If the question of education must be confined to the Indians and not discussed generally, I rather hesitate to suggest something for the Indians of the nation that Canadians as a whole could not partake of, but in conclusion I should like to point out the basic need of the Indian which does pertain to obtaining full rights of citizenship in order to be able to vote in federal elections in particular.

There is one very important point having to do with local government. The Indians have had no training whatsoever in the municipal field which includes health and welfare, justice, education and all the other aspects of local government. I think it is most needed that the government give leadership to the Indians to help them to assimilate these things so that they will have become proper Canadian citizens by the time they are ready for the vote. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill C-47 to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, I wish to point out that taxes are not levied on confectionery items in the United States or in the United Kingdom. They are taxed here because of an unwarranted assumption that a chocolate bar or cocoa is a luxury, even though the principal consumers of these products are children.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member intend to pursue the argument in favour of the removal of the tax on chocolate bars and confectionery? That is where there seems to be a difference of opinion as to what is relevant. If he is citing that instance by way of an example of deficiencies of this bill, I would allow him to go that far. But if he wants to make out a complete case with respect to a tax that is not in the bill, it seems to me that he is going beyond the precedents which I have had an opportunity to look at over the dinner recess.

Mr. Chevrier: May I remind Your Honour that you did not rule the general discussion out of order, if I understood your statement in dealing with the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I think Your Honour said that while a member should not go into details about the automobile tax, but that if he dealt with it in a general way you thought perhaps that procedure would be within the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I think that is where one should draw the line. The hon. member has spent some time on this matter and has quoted from a brief in support of the view that the confectionery tax which is not covered by the bill should be removed. I think if it is used by way of illustration it would be sufficient to meet his point; but if he wishes to elaborate the argument, it seems to me that we are going back into the budget debate. In the opportunities I had to review the debates in former years on bills to amend the Excise Tax Act I could not find that former Speakers permitted an excursion into taxes which were left out of the bill, except by way of illustration of deficiencies of the bill. If he keeps within that scope, I shall permit the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Badanai: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will move into another class of goods which I trust will come under this bill which is under discussion, namely an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. It is a class which could not, by the wildest stretch of the imagination, be considered as a luxury. I am now referring specifically to toothpaste. Surely this is one commodity that could be exempted from any tax and, indeed, other toilet preparations intended for use in connection with sanitation, the care of the human body—including besides teeth, hair, eyes, nails —such as shaving soaps and shaving creams. Perhaps the latter may be considered as a luxury. Maybe we should quit shaving and let our beards grow. It might give us a look of superiority or of the intellectual, however mistaken the notion may be. I notice that some of our distinguished members of the press gallery have given up shaving or at least they are getting away with only a partial job. Perhaps some of our members may start a fad which could mean a loss to the treasury.

The tax on toilet goods was imposed as an emergency measure in 1933 in the era of the great depression. Subsequently it was reduced and then it was raised again. But now, 26 years later, it is about time that it should be abolished once and for all.

The hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), speaking in the throne speech debate on January 22 last, made a valiant plea for the elimination of the tax on cosmetics in general and lipstick in particular, a tax which she described as incongruous and discriminatory, a situation which she said should be corrected. I fully endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. lady with respect to toilet goods. These are more or less in the nature of nuisance taxes, but in the aggregate they form a distinct barrier to the expansion of manufacturing facilities because of a low return on investment, when one considers the need for continuous research development and the replacement of machinery required in this particular industry. But the real sufferer here is the consumer who pays a tax on tax. I have here a short quotation which I wish to have on the record. It is from a brief which was prepared by the manufacturers of toilet goods last February and submitted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would consider dealing with cosmetics and toilet preparations when we come to the details of the bill. Mention is made of these items in the bill and I would think he could properly discuss the details in committee.

Mr. Badanai: In this particular, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, the quotations are brief and it seems to me that they apply to the principle of the bill. They are only short quotations.

Mr. Speaker: I do not follow the hon. member when he says that they apply to the principle of the bill. If he could indicate in what way they apply I might feel more disposed to permit him to continue with this detailed line of discussion.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, in this amending bill there is reference to the commercial articles of toilet wares and so on. I would therefore think it was most appropriate for the hon. member to discuss these matters on a second reading debate.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member had better proceed and let us see how closely he can keep to the bill.

Mr. Badanai: I promise that I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker. From this submission I merely wish to quote two paragraphs which are, I believe, pertinent to the discussion:

> Both medical and dental professions will attest that toothpastes, mouth washes, baby oils, skin care creams and like items, are necessities for physical health, as will psychiatrists that shaving creams, deodorants, lipstick, dandruff and hair products etc., are necessary for mental health.
> Mounting costs are accentuated by the special tax. Our general costs have risen with staggering rapidity. During 1958 over 200 items were increased in price—but we have not increased prices commensurate with the rise in prices of other products. The future indicates continued price increases—unless tax relief is forthcoming.

Then it goes on with a survey of the cost of various items which I will omit for the sake of brevity. In any event, I merely wish to conclude by saying in the present set-up both the retailer and the wholesaler make a profit on the tax and it pyramids with each retail price increase. I therefore submit that this special tax imposed in the early thirties as an emergency measure should be removed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in my comments upon the remarks made by hon. members opposite in the course of this debate on second reading. I do think that in general it may be said of their speeches that they were speeches which might well have been made, indeed I think should have been made in the debate on the budget. However, as reference has been made to several of these subjects with your permission, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should comment very briefly upon them.

First is the matter of the excise tax on motor cars. I am not going into that because we had a debate on that matter a year ago, and we had another debate on it in the session previous to that. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is wrong in ascribing to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) the statement that that tax would be removed. What the Prime Minister said, and this was made very clear in previous references to this subject in debate in this house, was that consideration would be given to this subject, and hon. members will recall that in the fall session of 1957 in December that tax was reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. Hon. members are aware that there has been in recent months a very great improvement in the automotive industry both in Canada and the United States.

Another subject which was mentioned was cigarettes. We will be coming to that in the committee of the whole on the clause in the bill, so I spend no time on that other than to say that we did discuss this subject at some length in the resolution stage. Nothing new has been introduced, and that earlier discussion is to be found at pages 3308 to 3313 of Hansard.

Reference was made to the application of the sales tax to certain purchases by municipalities. I would remind the house that at the 1958 session in the budget proposals we removed the tax on a wide range of purchases by municipalities.

The fourth and last matter to which I shall make brief reference is the subject introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) when he asked about the over-all revision of the Excise Tax Act and alluded to the report of the Carter committee. I think this was a proper matter to be introduced in the debate on second reading, because it is a matter of a general nature applicable to any amending bill which has any relationship at all to those matters which were embraced within the scope of the reference to the Carter committee. I would say that in general many of the provisions of the present bill are in line with the recommendations of the so-called Carter committee which submitted its report to my predecessor, Mr. Harris, on January 12, 1956. Indeed, in the budget speech at page 2422 of Hansard I made reference specifically to one of the important provisions in this bill which stems directly from the report of the Carter committee in reference No. 3 in its report; that is the reference having to do with the tax on packaging. One could point to a number of other provisions in this bill which are in line with or have been inspired by the report of the Carter committee.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question. When he says specific changes in this bill, would he relate them to the sections, or perhaps later in the debate do so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite out of order at this point. We are not at this moment dealing with the clauses of the bill.

I leave the matter with this repetition, that a number of the provisions of this bill stem from or are in line with the report of the Carter committee. I may say that the recommendations of that committee have not been overlooked and it is not the intention of the government to overlook them where they can be usefully implemented. The former government did not fully adopt or subscribe to the recommendations contained in that report. There is one finding in the report or one of the references on which the committee was not unanimous, but these recommendations are before us and as opportunity arises, Mr. Speaker, certainly regard is had to these recommendations as far as they do commend themselves to the government.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of procedure would you call subclause (1), subclause (2), subclause (3) and so on?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that I call the clauses by the subclauses, and are these subclauses to be discussed only or voted on? Shall I call each subclause for consideration separately?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1.

On subclause 1—Cosmetics.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has had any representations from any pharmaceutical companies in connection with these preparations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The first subclause, of course, is a matter of definition only. So far as some of the later clauses containing provisions pertaining to pharmaceutical products are concerned, I must say that there have been some communications from pharmaceutical companies and I am informed that they have expressed approbation of the contents of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this point I would like to ask if there is a possibility of revising the act in a way that certain of these articles would not be subject to the extra 10 per cent tax? I am thinking of toothpaste and things of that kind which are very practical for all of us and which I do not think should in any sense of the word be subject to what is called a luxury tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is referring to two taxes. There is, of course, the sales tax imposed by this statute and there are also the special excise taxes. I can only refer him to the remarks of one of my predecessors who imposed the special excise taxes on a number of products. He at one time referred to these as luxuries and later, I think, regretted having referred to them in that way because obviously some of them are not to be regarded as luxuries by modern standards. Nevertheless the special excise tax was continued in effect as applied to them.

Mr. Benidickson: That is perfectly true, but I am sure the minister is sufficiently ingenious to devise a phraseology in the statute which would exempt some of the things such as I spoke of from this extra 10 per cent tax. I think the minister will be familiar with the fact that the Canadian tax foundation made a survey among its correspondents, and one of the prominent results of that survey was the feeling that toothpicks, for example, should not be subject to an extra 10 per cent tax by the government.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 2.

Mr. Mitchell: I notice that in this particular paragraph pharmaceuticals are again mentioned. Speaking at the resolution stage I asked the minister to make it quite clear that there is no discrimination in the field of repackaging as far as pharmaceuticals, and I might even include toiletries, are concerned. With these remarks in mind I should like to have a definite assurance from the minister that there will be no discrimination as far as the actual packaging of pharmaceuticals by different types of retail organizations is concerned, and I include cosmetics in this. In other words, if the packaging is done by a central warehouse which is the distributing warehouse of a company owned and controlled by the same company it would fall into the category of a packager or wholesaler who does not have a retail connection with his outlets. In other words, they would be treated as packagers and be liable to pay the extra tax at that level which is over and above the manufacturers' level. I should like to have a definite assurance from the minister that this is the intention of this bill, otherwise there would be some discrimination as I see it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member spoke on this subject on April 22 when the resolution was under discussion, and his remarks will be found at page 2950 of Hansard. There he expressed the view that this provision created discrimination between retailers. I hope I can set his mind at rest on that point.

First, I should like to point out that care has been taken in this provision to make certain that retailers who package in their own retail stores and sell directly to consumers through such stores are not affected by these proposed changes. In other words, retailers do not become manufacturers if the packaging is done by them in such conditions. However, any retailer who packages with a view to selling other than directly to consumers becomes a manufacturer. This means that anyone, including a retailer, who does packaging at a central point, say in his warehouse, with a view to selling or transferring the packaged goods to his own retail stores or to other retail stores becomes the manufacturer of such goods. Therefore, when retailers buy either from packagers or directly from a person who fully manufactured cosmetics or pharmaceuticals, the tax will be applied at the same level in the distribution process.

These resolutions are in fact aimed at a discrimination which has been occurring at a different level than that of retailers—one that occurs between the manufacturer who carries out the complete process of manufacturing, including packaging, and one who divides the manufacturing process between himself and others. The latter in this way has been paying the tax and at a much lower level than the person who fully manufactures. This tax inequality was pointed out by the Carter sales tax committee, and these resolutions are based on the recommendations of that committee for the removal of this discrimination. The purpose is to provide a more uniform base for the tax.

Since the cost of packaging and advertising these products represents such a large proportion of the final selling price, a tax levied on these products manufactured for sale in bulk or imported in bulk is considerably less than a tax levied on the sale price of a Canadian manufacturer of similar products who also packages and advertises these products. This means that the Canadian manufacturer is put at a disadvantage in competing with products imported in bulk for packaging and distribution in Canada. He is also at a disadvantage in competing with a distributor in Canada who has products made up in bulk for him to package and distribute under his own brand name or trademark.

Accordingly the definition of manufacturer is now extended to include any person who packages toilet preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals for sale, except where this is done in a retail store for sale directly to consumers. The definition of manufacturer will also be amended to include any person who markets toilet preparations, cosmetics or pharmaceuticals made up for him to be sold under his own private brand, except a retailer who sells directly and exclusively to consumers or users.

I might point out that this principle of regarding packagers as manufacturers has been in the law for years in applying the special excise tax on cosmetics, and the same principle has also been in the law with respect to sales tax on candy.

I recall the remarks made by the hon. member on April 22. I think, if I may say so, that he did not appreciate then that once a packager becomes a manufacturer under the proposed amendments, he becomes a licensed manufacturer. This means that he may buy his supplies, either bulk or partly manufactured goods, under his licence, without any payment of tax at that time. The tax will then apply on his sales of the packaged or finished article in the same way as it applies to the sale of goods of a manufacturer who carries out all the manufacturing processes himself.

Mr. Mitchell: I wish to thank the minister for that explanation. My conclusion is that a sales tax is not paid to the manufacturer but that it is paid to the government at packaging level. That is correct, I believe. Then, in turn, the tax is passed on. In other words the department is collecting a larger amount of money because the goods are marketed at a higher level. Am I correct in saying that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman is referring to the case of a retailer who is buying from a packager then he will pay the tax once at that level.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, the tax goes on at the manufacturer's level and he in turn packages in the back of his drug store. The tax is at the manufacturer's level and not at the packaging level, is that not so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The packager in the case we are dealing with becomes a manufacturer; and the tax is levied then, as always, at the manufacturer's level, in this case the packager being the manufacturer for this purpose.

Mr. Mitchell: That would include the packager's extra cost and naturally his profit and therefore it would be a higher tax at the packaging level than at the manufacturing level, is that not right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mitchell: Therefore it would have to be passed on to his retail outlet which is not his own immediate retail outlet? Could you assure me, Mr. Minister, that the person in between who has his own retail outlet would be classified in the same manner? That is what I am trying to establish.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend means an outlet to retailers?

Mr. Mitchell: To his own retail store?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, if he has several of them.

Mr. Benidickson: On this point, Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps we have to look at section 4, is that not correct? To get the status of a retailer you would have to assume that the packaging was done in each retail unit where a customer bought at the retail unit, is that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: In consequence, the fears we expressed before that chain stores and others who might do central packaging are not likely to compete to better advantage as a result of this legislation than before have been borne out?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I shall give my hon. friend again a sentence from the statement I made earlier:

> This means that anyone, including a retailer, who does packaging at a central point, say in his warehouse, with a view to selling or transferring the packaged goods to his own retail stores or to other retail stores becomes the manufacturer of such goods—

For this purpose.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address myself to part II concerning the export of duty on electricity. I should like to ask the minister if this is just transferring to his department—

The Deputy Chairman: We are on subclause 2 of clause 1 and I think perhaps the hon. member is dealing with another. Shall subclause 2 of clause 1 carry?

Subclause carried.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Subclause 3 agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Laurier is going to speak on clause 3.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the observation of the hon. member for Laurier was on clause 2 of the bill. I may give him assurance at once that the purpose and effect of clause 2 is to transfer out of the Exportation of Powers and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act the existing tax on the export of electric power and to lift it and insert it in this act unchanged. There is no change in the tax, and that is the reason there was no resolution introduced with respect to it. It abolishes the provision in the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act which provides for the tax.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it there is nothing new in clauses 8, 9 and 10 of part 2?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only that there is this improvement on that section of the act. This act with the long title, the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, contains a feature which I must say I cannot approve and I hope my hon. friends will join with me in that respect. Section 4 of this act of 1955 which will now be repealed if this clause is adopted by the committee gave the governor in council the power to make regulations imposing export duties. This is the language of the clause:

> 4. The governor in council may make regulations imposing export duties, not exceeding ten dollars per horsepower per annum, upon power exported from Canada and respecting the manner in which such duties, shall be calculated and paid.

The feature of that existing law, which I must say I could not approve, is that it gives power to the governor in council subject to a ceiling to establish the rate of the tax. It happens that the rate of tax on the export of power is 3/100 of 1 per cent kilowatt hour. What we are doing is to make that a statutory tax and to remove any power to establish the tax by order in council. I hope that change will commend itself to the committee. There is no change in the rate of tax. We are proposing that this clause which I have read from the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act shall be repealed, and the tax imposed by order in council under that power is now being inscribed in statutory form in this present measure.

Mr. Chevrier: But under clause 9 you are giving the governor in council the power to make certain regulations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. That is just the general power to make regulations respecting the time and manner in which it shall be paid, but there will be no power to fix the rate. The rate will now be established by this act.

Mr. Benidickson: Hithertofore had the Department of Trade and Commerce been the recipient of any revenue of this nature?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the standards division of that department.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Benidickson: On this point, Mr. Chairman, would the minister assure those hon. members of the committee who were on the estimates committee that this is probably just implementing a recommendation contained in paragraph 40 of the report of the Auditor General?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on (d) of clause 5, is this related entirely to budget resolution number 6?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Has this any relationship to the remarks of the minister on second reading about the recommendations of the Carter sales tax committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not this one, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Cancellation of bond.

Mr. Benidickson: It seems reasonable to ask what difficulties have been experienced by the department and to what extent the department has advised the insurance companies about this kind of thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I am speaking now of clause 7, Mr. Chairman. Bonds provided for the department now have a clause in them stating that the bonds shall remain in force in relation to all goods in possession of the licensed wholesaler in case the bond should be cancelled. Legal opinion has been given that when a bond is cancelled the provision to which I have referred is cancelled with it. Therefore, the law is now being amended, if the committee approves, so as to provide for the continuation of the clause that I have mentioned in the cancelled guarantee bond because it relates to the goods on hand at the time of the cancellation.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Cancellation of licences.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a matter for your attention, Mr. Chairman. Since it has reference to amending certain basic sections of the whole act which refer to such things as playing cards, wines, beverages and cigars, I think that you, as a definite chairman, should consider this item, as to whether or not it should not provide members on second reading an opportunity to discuss matters that might relate to this section. I have no point to make at this time, but it is referred to here. I found that the act was being amended with respect to a part; therefore, I think this is a very important question for the legal authorities of this house.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Schedule II amended.

Mr. Benidickson: Again, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to repeat myself, but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and some others at other stages of this debate put on record the feelings expressed by the Minister of Finance in past days and by the present Prime Minister in past days, that there was a likelihood of diminishing returns with respect to this particular proposal of taxation. I know the minister gave some information to the committee at the resolution stage. I am not going to ask him to repeat it, but I must say that I rather share the feeling that this is a heavily taxed product, and I question very much whether the returns will be in accordance with the forecast in the budget as a result of this legislation. I repeat, it must be very embarrassing for many members from Norfolk and from areas in Quebec where tobacco is grown who support the government to have this particular proposal. We have heard from them that they were encouraged by this government in the current season to grow more tobacco; but the feeling among the industry is that there will be a curtailment of consumption along this line. Consequently, the industry has indicated that it is not going to take the advice of the federal Department of Agriculture and it is worried about the result of this particular clause.

Mr. McPhillips: Who are these people you are talking about?

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the hon. member permit a question? If the tobacco industry, that is the manufacturers, Imperial Tobacco and others, are so concerned about the law of diminishing returns, perhaps the hon. member will give some explanation of why they raised the price of cigarettes one cent more than was necessary because of the addition of the tax?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on that point, of course, I took the earliest opportunity to warn this house that that was the inevitable result of an increase in taxes; namely that the consumer would pay more than the amount of the tax. The hon. member comes from Oxford county. I just ask him whether or not in subsequent speeches to his electorate in that area he can defend this tax and still defend what he said on previous occasions at this stage of budget debates about the inequity of a high level of taxation on tobacco products.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member has not answered my question. He has said he thought there was concern about the law of diminishing returns because of the increase in price. Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the tobacco companies are not concerned about the law of diminishing returns in this respect. They raised the price of cigarettes an extra cent more than was necessary.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not speaking for the tobacco companies; I am speaking for the consumer. The consumer has had triggered an unjust excess cost to him as a result of this particular clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the clause carries I should like to ask the hon. member for Oxford whether he is not concerned about going back and explaining to the people who elected him the Prime Minister's promise in Brantford to reduce this tax as compared with what is happening here tonight?

Mr. Nesbitt: The Prime Minister never made any such promise. Unlike the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I happened to be at that meeting.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No. For the benefit of the hon. member for Oxford,—and I think he has the same respect for the Globe and Mail that I have—on February 17, 1958, his leader, in Brantford, near the tobacco-raising counties, had this to say:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker last night dropped a clear hint that the taxes on cigarettes, cigars and tobacco soon may be cut.

I leave it at that. There is much more in the quotation, but I leave that to the thinking of the hon. member for Oxford.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we are now discussing a bill very similar to the previous bill, one of five related to the budget. I was amazed that on the introduction of this bill there was not the same enthusiasm and applause on the part of the overwhelming majority that we have heard in this house for the minister's suggestion. I think this results from the fact that after reflection they realized that the budget speech involved the kind of thing upon which we are now asked to legislate. We have 10,000 more civil servants to pay for.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, that is not true.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can support that. There is great inconsistency on the part of the minister in his desire to keep down costs. I pointed out on budget night that all these elements of taxation would enter into the cost of products and would perhaps reduce our opportunity to sell in competitive markets abroad. I think that the bill we have before us is very consistent with that fact.

I also said in the past and I repeat that we are not only concerned with the fact that this particular bill and the other four we have dealt with involve an over-all tax load on the Canadian people for the current year of $245 million but we are concerned with the fact that the minister's own statements indicate that the take from the Canadian people in the current fiscal year is $640 million more than in the past year and the highest of any year of which we have any recollection. I am not projecting these figures for a full year with respect to the taxes involved in this amending bill.

I also want to remind the minister and all my colleagues in the house that when I say that in the current year Canadian taxpayers in aggregate are being asked to find another $640 million for the government this has no relation whatsoever to the legislation we dealt with last week respecting unemployment insurance which involved another $75 million for the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my friend has concluded this part of his remarks or whether he proposes to go on developing this theme, but obviously this is a budget speech he is making.

He is talking about the over-all balance of ways and means and questions of that kind and here we are dealing with a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would indicate for the guidance of the Chair what is the principle of the bill. It is a bill to increase certain income taxes and to make various detailed amendments to the act, as I understand it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Exactly so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I am one who, as I have said before, does not want to take undue time to repeat what has been said at an earlier stage, but we are being asked to consider a bill which increases the taxes on persons and corporations and I say that the reason for it is that the government has had no idea of economy. I think that is a very legitimate criticism. In other words, we are getting in this bill the harvest of the election promises that were seeded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and his colleagues in recent times.

Having in mind Your Honour's ruling, and I approve of it, we cannot complain too much except by way of illustration about things which are not in the amending bill that has been presented to us. But there are so many things that are not here that I think we have every reason to examine the bill closely. I think the house will recognize that this is just one of five bills and therefore we cannot be limited too much with regard to the over-all extra tax take that is contemplated.

I suggest to the house that we are on very dangerous ground even if we accept what the minister says that, granted no inflation, granted no war, granted several other things, the gross national product may increase in the next year by $2,200 million. The minister is proposing, as a result of this bill and the other four we have been discussing, to take out of that increased productivity $640 million plus $75 million for the unemployment insurance fund, and I pose the question to all hon. members who have to vote upon this legislation whether or not that is an undue proportion of the possible increase in the gross national product for the forthcoming year.

When we come to the clauses of the bill I am going to deal with some other features of the legislation now before us. I think one of the most unnecessary and silliest features of the bill is the amendment advocated by the minister that we should no longer include in medical expenses the amount that is paid by the duly authorized agent of the taxpayer. This is another prime example of the somersault on the part of the minister. He always advocated the elimination of the 3 per cent floor. I have said before and I repeat that surely the basic cost to start with in the case of any taxpayer is the hospital account. The right to claim that for purposes of exemption is being removed and therefore I say that any other adjustments to the Income Tax Act are straight camouflage and are not treating the taxpayer in a fair and square manner. The minister is removing the base upon which the taxpayer has been able to make a claim for exemption and I suggest to the minister that when he takes away the opportunity to claim for purposes of exemption the hospital bill paid in the past by a duly authorized agent, government or insurance company or otherwise, the other amendments he is proposing are completely meaningless and, to extend my term, I think they are a fraud.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a few words at this time on this particular bill. It appears to me that this bill follows very closely in line with most of the legislation that has been introduced by this government. It is a modern Tory variety of the old army stew consisting of equal parts of horse and rabbit—one horse and one rabbit. We have in this legislation rabbit that is good and horse that is bad. Sometimes we have a bigger horse and sometimes we have a smaller rabbit but it is always in equal proportions.

One thing that I think is driven home to the people is this. No matter how much you try to dress it up, there is one cold hard fact which stands out, namely that taxes are up along with interest rates and along with many other things that are rising day by day. It is true, of course, that wages are rising in certain cases, but it is also equally true that in many other cases they are not rising. One thing that seems to be ignored as completely by this government as it was by the last one is that in conjunction with these rising costs and rising taxes there should be a rise in the exemptions. If the cost of living is higher, surely the basic tax exemption should also be higher in order to correspond with the cost of living. This factor, of course, has been ignored again and I think it is most unfortunate that such is the case.

Another thing that disturbs me, Mr. Speaker, is the change that we have with regard to the exemption for medical expenses. I think everybody in this country was agreed that some changes were due. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) mentioned one. I certainly think that the people of this country were not looking for the changes that were made. I am a bit concerned as to just what effect this change is going to have. To a great many people it appears to be a bit discriminatory against the very hospitalization plan that has been advocated and, in fact, finally implemented by this present government, although it was put in the process of implementation by the previous government.

I understand the deductions will remain the same as they were in the past, with medical insurance through private companies but that as to the hospital insurance through the federal and the provincial hospital insurance plan the basic exemption will no longer be under the same formula. I sometimes wonder whether it might not be much easier for the wage earners of this country if they could just deduct the premiums paid to the hospital insurance plan or to a private insurance company from their actual costs of hospital and medical insurance. I am sure it would simplify the tax form considerably. It might save many people a great deal of money by not having to go and get a lawyer or a chartered accountant or someone else to make out their income tax forms. There would be a saving in two or three ways. But in the main I should like to sum up my few remarks by saying that regardless of how well it may be dressed up this bill is just a little bit more bad news to the people of this country.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the increase in the personal income tax is quite considerable. It amounts to two percentage points on everything over $3,000. I was a little bit surprised at this increase because the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is reported to have said that every family in Canada was overtaxed by $120. I think I saw some references to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) also having said that taxes were too high and should be reduced. I can say that in my part of the country he has in effect been right because a good many of these people have been unemployed practically ever since and have not had to pay any income taxes at all. When a person fills out his income tax form and makes out his cheque to the Receiver General of Canada, he finds that he also must pay an increase in tax for the old age pension fund. There are other taxes also such as sales tax which I will just mention in passing, and the increase in excise taxes. But when we take all of these taxes together, and take into consideration the 7 per cent increase in the gross national product, we do not go halfway in covering our deficit. I think the taxpayers of this country look to the future with foreboding. I think they feel that a better way in which to increase income taxes is to have a fiscal policy that would provide more people and more corporations paying these taxes.

I was looking over the corporation tax and I think this year it is up to the highest point in any peacetime year. In Ontario and in Quebec they are paying combined taxes—I mean by that the income tax plus the contributions to old age pensions—of 52 per cent. The other corporation taxes are very high, particularly when you add other provincial taxes and municipal taxes. Every tax adds to the cost of production. We know that our cost of production here in Canada is extremely high. We are having a hard time now to maintain our position in the highly competitive markets of the world. Representations have been made to Ottawa by manufacturers who say that they cannot compete in our own domestic market with foreign producers.

I have said before—and I will just refer to it here again—that the climate in Canada has not been good for United States capital to come in. It is really not good for our own corporations because of this increase in income tax. Our corporations in this country have already been heavily taxed and we are in the process of adding another $80 million a year to their costs by the fact that they are obliged to pay, along with their employees, for seasonal unemployment. I should think that the minister ought to know that the more industry we get in this country and the more people we get working, the more income taxes we shall collect. He should realize that the unemployment will then be taken up, more people will be working and we shall be able to tax more people instead of the fewer that we are taxing at the present time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, there is just one aspect of this bill about which I should like to speak briefly, namely the change in the provision for deduction of hospital expenses. This is a principle with which many of us, I know, cannot agree. In the province of Ontario we are still obliged to pay the premiums which we paid before the new hospitalization plan came into effect. These premiums are not deductible from taxable income. They are paid out of net income but still the hospital bills are not going to be deductible from taxable income as they have been in the past.

This principle of allowing expenses in excess of a certain percentage of income is well established and has worked well because it alleviates much of the hardship which accrues when people undergo extensive illness personally or in their families. I know of many cases where the financial circumstances in the family have been such that without the taxation relief granted they would have had to undergo severe and serious financial dislocation. As you know, we reduced the ceiling once or twice. There was considerable pressure in this house in years gone by to reduce it even further.

It was always stated that certain medical expenses were incidental to all people and that it would be administratively difficult to allow deductions for all medical expenses, and I think most people will agree with that. The expenses over and above a certain percentage of income are extraordinary expenses and certainly an exception can and should be made in those circumstances. Now this change has been made, part of the exemption which previously existed has been taken away and it is in fact, Mr. Speaker, just another form of taxation.

Surely the government did not have to squeeze the last drop out of the suffering of people who undergo lengthy and serious illness in order to increase its tax revenues. The minister in his budget speech indicated that in a full year some $9 million would be recovered by the federal treasury. This is a considerable amount of money, but I am positive that that amount of money in the hands of people who have suffered because of serious illness would do far more for Canadians generally than it would in the consolidated revenue fund.

It is therefore with regret, Mr. Speaker, that we have to consider a bill which contains this provision. I hope that the minister will give this matter some consideration between now and the time the next budget is brought down, and if he still occupies his present position at that time I hope that he will see fit to reverse himself.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister explain this clause? I confess I have not got my copy of the bill before me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, clause 1 simply adds the words "life, sickness or accident" to the terms of section 5 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act. This addition is necessary because of the detailed amendment which follows in clause 2 with respect to group life insurance. Without these qualifying words, the words "group insurance" could cover any kind of insurance purchased by a group. This provision which will follow in clause 2 of the bill is confined to group life insurance.

Mr. Benidickson: Sickness and accident.

Clause agreed to.

Income Tax Act

On clause 2—Portion of premium under certain group insurance policies.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I address myself to clause 2 only because I find it extremely difficult to understand this complicated formula which by statute law is to me a little unique. There are set up five sections which do not state law but which state mathematics. You have for instance:

(i) dividing that proportion of the total premium—

(ii) multiplying the quotient obtained—

(iii) subtracting from the product obtained—

And so on and so forth. I confess, Mr. Chairman, and I also confess to the minister too, that as a lawyer I find it most unusual to make statute law in the form of pure mathematical calculation. I do not think the average person could follow it easily, and I certainly would not relish having to argue before a court if I had to deal with this lengthy section on page 2. I ask the minister purely as a lawyer, would he explain how one could argue before a court a mathematical formula, because if there is something wrong mathematically with this formula there will be some difficulty because it is the law. Even though the mathematics may be wrong they would have to be considered as right because it is statute law. I do find that extremely difficult and unusual.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman is much too modest in disclaiming ability to understand this section. There are lots of provisions in the Income Tax Act which are much more lengthy and involved than this one.

So far as the mathematical formula is concerned, it is not part of the statute. It is here as one of the notes on the bill to give an illustration of the way in which the subclauses which are part of clause 2 of the bill will operate.

I think the hon. member is aware of the situation out of which this section has emerged. Group insurance policies which are provided, let us say, by an employer for an employee are exempt from income tax. In making use of that exemption we have found that a number of persons, let us say senior executives, have had very substantial policies written on their lives, and these enjoy an exemption which I am sure parliament did not intend in such large amounts. For instance, just because an executive happens to control a corporation, is it any good reason why he should enjoy the benefit of payment of premiums on a policy of, let us say, $100,000 on his life, tax free?

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the minister if this is beyond the other sections of the bill with respect to group policies? This is a possibility with a controlled company; is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, I am speaking about group policies. These are commonly known, I believe, as jumbo policies, and they exist in many cases where there is no general provision assuring equality of treatment or even proportionate treatment on the part of employees of the company concerned. Therefore it seemed to us that there should be some limitation placed upon the exemption now enjoyed. That is why we brought forward the proposal that premiums paid on these policies should be exempt in the case of any person up to $25,000 of life insurance, but as to the excess of the insurance over $25,000, whatever premium is paid on behalf of the individual should be regarded as income received by him and he should be taxable upon it. Otherwise, it would be relatively simple for a senior executive to take a substantial portion of his remuneration not in the form of salary but in the form of an extraordinarily large insurance policy upon which premiums would be paid on his behalf. That is the background out of which this proposal has come to the committee.

This clause deals—and deals in a straight forward way, I think—with the person who has been enjoying the benefit of a policy of more than $25,000, or who will in future be enjoying the benefit of such a policy under one of the group insurance plans. How are you going to tax such a person in respect of the premium on the excess over $25,000? That is the situation with which this clause deals. One could go about it in two ways, broadly speaking. One could say: we will regard as income in the hands of such a man the premium which he would pay at his age on that particular policy according to its amount and its provisions. But that might not be fair, because the man might be advanced in age; he might, indeed, have reached a point where insurance premiums are very heavy. He might even have passed the point where he can obtain insurance on an individual policy. What we have done, therefore, is, in effect, to work out an average so that what such a man will have to pay is the average premium on the whole group under the group plan. That is the essence, briefly, of this clause. It is well understood, I can assure the hon. gentleman, by the insurance companies. They understand what this means, and the way in which the plan works out.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask whether an estimate has been made as to the additional revenue which is expected to flow to the government from this source?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. It was not possible to work out any such calculation at all precisely. This proposal is put forward in the interests of the fair and equal treatment of taxpayers and to put an end to a situation in which some taxpayers were enjoying what was regarded as an unfair advantage under an existing exemption.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 8.

Mr. McMillan: I realize the difficulty experienced in such legislation as this, but it seems to me that there is discrimination not only between people in different provinces but also between people in the same province. For instance, in Ontario it is optional whether people contribute to hospital insurance or not. I think the person who takes the insurance is penalized because his hospital bill is not deductible for income tax purposes. But if a person takes out an insurance policy which pays for hospitalization, those payments are deductible. Then, in connection with the provinces, if a person resides in a participating province there will be practically no hospital bills eligible for deduction, whereas in a province which does not participate every bill will be eligible for deduction. Thus I think there is a good deal of discrimination in this particicular clause between, as I said before, individuals in a province such as Ontario and persons in non-participating provinces.

Mr. Benidickson: I think with regard to this particular proposed change the minister has made a very grave mistake. Reference has been made to the increased amount of revenue, but in the minds of the people—their imaginations in this respect stimulated very largely by some of the good speeches made by the hon. gentleman on this subject when he was sitting in the opposition to the effect that this was a proper tax deduction—the government's present intentions are causing great consternation. I just want to read a short excerpt from a letter I received on this point which, I think, will impress the minister. The letter comes from the international association of machinists and it says:

> We protest the noncontinuance of hospitalization payments as paid by the provincial hospitalization plan as an income tax deduction.

I raised this matter on two or three other occasions in the debate which was open to all of us. Someone said—I think it was tonight—that the tax saving would amount to $9 million. That may be so, but I think the principle which existed in the past is still valid. I was impressed, also, by a letter I have received from a doctor practising in Ontario who after hearing the proposal of the Minister of Finance in this respect pointed out that the actual cost to the taxpayer for Blue Cross insurance in Ontario under the former scheme was not much less than a person is now required to pay under the new set-up in Ontario. He also points out that inasmuch as the important province of Quebec is not participating in this hospitalization scheme the taxpayer had an opportunity of having a recognized insurance agency, the Blue Cross or whatever it may be, as his authorized agent for the purpose of presenting accounts to the Minister of National Revenue when income tax time comes around as a proper deduction if the over-all expenditure is more than 3 per cent of taxable income. I repeat that if we eliminate hospital expenses, as the minister is proposing, everything else in this bill is completely meaningless as long as you have this so-called 3 per cent restriction or floor with respect to untoward expenses resulting from illness.

Mr. McMillan: Would the minister comment on the discriminatory aspects of this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They were commented on fully in the discussion which took place in this house on May 4. I can refer the hon. member to pages 3290-3297 of Hansard where this matter was threshed over thoroughly. There is no discrimination here. The method we have chosen is the only one that does prevent discrimination.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister just repeats and repeats that there is no discrimination. He never attempts to meet the argument that a person who pays a private premium and has a hospital bill can deduct it and a person who pays a public premium and has a hospital bill cannot, and if that is not discrimination it is very difficult for anyone to say what discrimination could be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premiums were never deductible, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said that. I referred to hospital bills. The minister should listen to others occasionally.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have outlined the basis of deduction under this law. Any other basis would mean creating discriminations because of the fact that there is the widest variety across this country in the methods by which provinces collect the provincial share of the cost of the hospital and diagnostic services provisions. We had also to take account, as I pointed out in the budget speech, of any province which does not enter into this scheme at all.

I put the fundamental question, as I have on previous occasions. Here it is costing the federal treasury something like $160 million this year to provide the federal share of this hospital insurance cost. When that federal share of the cost of this scheme is being completely underwritten by the treasury, surely in order to avoid the discrimination which would otherwise result we ought to proceed as we are doing here to make provision that the bills that are paid pursuant to the provisions of this Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act should not themselves be deductible. They will have been paid out of the treasury. As against the $160 million which is being provided out of the treasury this year, what this means in terms of reduction of exemptions to individual taxpayers, as I pointed out before, is $3 million in the course of the present fiscal year or $9 million in a full year.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would consider making that part of the hospital bill which is paid by private premium deductible?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, again we were over this ground on May 4. Whatever is payable by premium under a private insurance scheme will as heretofore be deductible to the extent to which hospital costs are paid. In that way we are not taking anything away from anyone in that respect. We are simply saying that where hospital costs are being paid under this scheme—this Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to which the federal treasury has contributed—hospital bills paid in that way are not eligible to be treated as medical expenses under the act.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister is not thinking as clearly tonight as he sometimes does. He just said he is not taking anything away and yet that is precisely what he is doing. He is allowing private premiums, he says, and yet in Ontario part of the ward care hospitalization is being paid for by private premium and he is allowing no deductions in respect of that private premium. How does he reconcile that with what he has just said?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the hon. member has not put the proper interpretation on the word "private" in this instance.

Mr. Hellyer: I was using the minister's interpretation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, you were not.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, my point was that the expense to the taxpayer in the province to which I belong seemingly is no different under Blue Cross according to a medical doctor in a letter to the Kingston Whig-Standard. I was not a subscriber to Blue Cross. He indicates that the cost was $4.20 monthly for family service before the governments entered the picture. He says that the present expense is just the equivalent of that.

As a result of what the minister now proposes to do if the taxpayer sustains an emergency health problem—hospitalization and all the antecedents—the hospital cost cannot be used as a base in order to calculate his entitlement for income tax deduction.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, page 5 of Bill No. C-48 in line 38 indicates that a taxpayer or his representative shall be entitled to be reimbursed hereunder. Suppose that a person had hospital insurance and allowed his premium to lapse through forgetting to pay his premium. If he received a hospital bill for treatment in that period would it be deductible?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the bill were not paid under the provision of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to which the federal government contributes.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, since the province of Quebec does not come under the scheme may I ask the minister would the hospital costs paid on the eve of an election by a member of the Union National be deductible for income tax purposes?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the points raised by the hon. members for Welland and Kenora-Rainy River. It is fine to say that you have a choice but many people in the province of Ontario do not have a choice. If they employ over 15 they must belong to the plan. They cannot claim hospital bills as they could under Blue Cross or any private plan. Certainly this seems to weigh heavily against the plan brought into being by this government and very much in favour of private insurance plans. Why was not some compensation given under the plan to subscribers to replace what they lost?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member supported the idea of providing these hospital services. If you accept the fact that we support the idea of providing these hospital services then surely it is not to be contended that some hardship has been inflicted on someone who is brought under this plan of hospital insurance. The hon. member speaks as though some hardship had been inflicted upon those in the group of which he spoke who were brought within the provisions of this act. I do not take that view at all. I think that those who have been brought under the provisions of this Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and under the Ontario scheme to which he referred have every reason to congratulate themselves, because it is a good scheme.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I agree wholeheartedly with the minister in that respect, Mr. Chairman, but the fact remains that it costs the same now as it did before and subscribers are losing the privileges they had previously and those enjoyed by their neighbours who belong to a private insurance plan and probably pay the same rate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the neighbour is carrying insurance with a private insurance company then he is carrying it because he is not under the public plan or he is carrying private insurance in addition to the plan in order to give himself some better hospital accommodation. It is only in that case to the extent to which the hospital bill is paid by some means outside this government scheme that any right to a deduction is retained in respect of the hospital bill so paid.

The provision is quite clear. The hospital bill which can no longer be included in the definition of medical expenses in that case is the hospital bill that is paid under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, in the days before the minister's generosity we used to get exactly the same thing; but in those days the hospital bills were deductible from income if the bills were part of the medical expenses exceeding 3 per cent of the person's taxable income. Now, since the days of the minister's generosity, we pay the same amount but it is not deductible and that is the difference. What kind of giving is this?

Mr. Benidickson: We pay a higher tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is not paying the same amount. He is putting forth the extraordinary proposition that he was paying just as much before for hospital insurance as he is paying under the Ontario plan approved under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, if he is under it.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister deny that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say that for the vast majority of people it is not true.

Mr. Hellyer: Would you say for the vast majority of people in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; I would say that this plan has brought more substantial benefits to the great majority of the people in this province.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister know that the vast majority of people in Ontario had a plan, namely the Blue Cross plan, before this and they were getting the same benefits then as they are getting now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A substantial number of people were members of the Blue Cross plan, Mr. Chairman, and they can continue to be members of that plan as to hospital services which are not covered by the act.

Mr. Robichaud: Does the minister agree that in the province of New Brunswick, under the plan that is to come into effect on July 1, the residents of that province will have to pay—that is, those who want semi-private room service—$8 more under the hospital insurance plan which will be introduced than they were paying under the Blue Cross, so that they are having an extra tax of $8 imposed on them? Besides that, they are not allowed to deduct the medical expenses over and above 3 per cent of their taxable income. I want to repeat what I said on May 4 when this bill was introduced. If the minister wants to be logical, the residents of New Brunswick should be allowed to deduct at least 50 per cent of their medical expenses over and above 3 per cent of their taxable income.

Mr. Benidickson: I want to ask the minister a forthright question on section 8. I compliment him on introducing this amendment to the bill. But in view of the other things that he is taking away, can he tell this committee that the underlined words are really going to help any taxpayers and, if so, to what extent? I know that the minister is always advised by the tax collecting officials before these recommendations appear in statute form, and they give him an estimate as to what the costs to the treasury might be of things like this. The underlined words relate to beds for poliomyelitis victims, and so on. Actually, if the minister is taking away the right in most provinces to include the cost of hospitalization, what is the estimate of the tax loss as a result of the amendment we are asked to make here with respect to the underlined words?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no estimate, Mr. Chairman. It was not possible to make an estimate of the tax loss in extending these exemptions.

Mr. Robichaud: I want to come back to the argument I just made. Fifty per cent of the cost is not being paid by the federal government; 50 per cent of the cost is being paid by the residents of the province of New Brunswick. Can the minister explain why we are not allowed to deduct this 50 per cent of our medical expenses?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say to my hon. friend that he is getting a great deal more than he got before in this respect. The federal government is paying half of the cost of all hospitalization and diagnostic services provided by this act. It is costing the federal treasury this year $160 million in those provinces which have subscribed.

Mr. Robichaud: Fifty per cent of the cost?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It averages 50 per cent across the dominion. In some provinces the federal share is more than 50 per cent.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Transferred pension fund contributions to be subtracted.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to do what I do not often do, namely compliment the minister on this change. I think it does make it possible for a little greater freedom in transferring from one employment to another. The minister explained this on the resolution stage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the hon. gentleman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Associated corporations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I would like to make a comment on clause 13, as it may be of interest. This provision which we are making by way of continuing the benefits enjoyed by the corporation which has an income of less than $25,000 is, of course, subject to certain terms in the act. I draw attention particularly to the provisions of section 39, subsection 4 of the act. I may say that my attention has been drawn to certain problems connected with this provision. It sets forth rules which are followed in determining whether or not corporations are associated with one another through ownership of shares. In particular, a corporation is not regarded as being associated with another corporation unless 70 per cent of its shares are owned by the other. This latter percentage was inserted in the act several years ago by an amendment. It was intended to relieve corporate taxpayers of certain difficulties with which they were being confronted. As a result, however, there are indications that it may be becoming too easy under this provision to divide a corporation into a number of smaller components, each of which qualifies for the lower rate of tax on its first $25,000 of income.

Although no conclusion has been reached as yet on this matter, I should like to inform the committee that consideration is being given to the possible necessity of introducing in the future some further change in this respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 14 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 19—Application of section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment to clause 19, notice of which was given, which is to be found in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings on page i of the appendix. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works to move this amendment.

Mr. Green: I move:

That Bill C-48, An act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by striking out lines 25 to 34 on page 11 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

'unless,

(b) in the case of a corporation incorporated on or before April 9, 1959 that did not have a taxation year ending before 1959, the corporation was during its first taxation year ending after 1958 and each subsequent year, if any previous to the particular taxation year a foreign business corporation, or

(c) in the case of a corporation that had a taxation year ending on or before April 9, 1959, the corporation was during its taxation year in which that date occurred and each subsequent taxation year, if any, previous to the particular taxation year a foreign business corporation, and had during that part of its taxation year in which that date occurred that was before April 10, 1959 business operations that complied with one of the conditions contained in paragraph (c) of subsection (2).'

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose of the amendment is to enlarge the conditions under which corporations can qualify as foreign business corporations under this provision.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the minister will recollect the debate we had at the resolution stage. It was only because of a little better assistance from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that we got from the minister some indication of why the administration felt that a change was necessary here. I am not going to deal further with it. I realize in effect we have a pause. The administration indicates that in the meantime they are giving consideration to all the aspects connected with this. I just want to say, because this seems to be the best opportunity of saying it—and I am not scolding—that in every possible way I think the minister should, in introducing a bill of this kind which imposes a tax upon people, see to it that it is presented to the house at a time when it will get the widest possible publicity among the trade and financial papers and people who are expert in these matters. I mentioned this to the minister before, I think. As it happens, there was a delay in presenting this bill. I think it only came before the house for first reading on Wednesday last, and the bill amending the Excise Tax Act on the same day. A humble member was not able to get a copy of the bill until Thursday. I simply want to say to the minister that to my mind it is important in a democracy that the widest possible advance notice be given of amendments such as he is now proposing, resulting from presentations that have been made to him.

The minister and the administration should seek to have their views in this respect put in bill form at a time sufficiently in advance of debate in the house to ensure that people from coast to coast in our widespread country will have the opportunity to know the implications. I must also confess that it is a great advantage to humble people in the opposition to receive comments from these people.

But this was not possible in one or two respects and irrespective of whether or not the minister is moving on I suggest to him but more particularly to the officials that they should always see to it that amendments involving changes that are not in the resolutions and the bills are announced to the public before the House of Commons is asked to deal with them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think we have tried to do that. This is a shorter bill than usual in the case of the amendments to the Income Tax Act. The bill follows the provisions of the resolutions which were before the house and the country for three and a half weeks prior to being adopted in committee of ways and means, and six days have now passed since the bill was introduced and given first reading. I think the bill has had wide publicity. We had the benefit of the usual discussion between officials of the department and the representatives of the Canadian tax foundation. They were here last week for detailed discussion which, as the hon. member knows, is customary, and following that detailed discussion Mr. Perry, the director of the tax foundation, intimated to me that they had no submissions to make on the bill.

So far as the amendment now introduced is concerned, it is one which widens the provisions of the bill and to that extent it can be regarded as a relieving section.

Mr. Benidickson: I simply want to say that the minister and his officials should be well aware that our financial papers usually come out on Wednesday or Thursday. They have a wide circulation and if a bill is presented to the house on Thursday, prior to the time that these national papers can give it some comment, there is a possibility, particularly when there are amendments and changes not announced at budget time, that the public as a whole have not had a proper opportunity to present their views to their members of parliament.

I should like to ask the minister my usual question with respect to this amendment. No amendment was indicated at the resolution stage or when the bill was presented a little late, as I say, last Wednesday. Have there been any protests by anybody in the industry who has seen the purport of the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Several submissions were received with respect to the extent and terms of the original proposal.

Mr. Benidickson: And this is the result.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment which I introduced in the committee was commended by those who had made the original submissions and this further amendment was suggested by one of them.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 20—Amount of premium deductible.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question largely prompted by a combination of my dullwittedness and suspicious nature. In subclause 2 of clause 20 the amending words are:

—or in the case of a taxpayer who is an employee of a life insurance corporation and is a beneficiary, contingently or otherwise, under a registered pension plan instituted or established by the corporation.

The explanation of the amendment on the opposite page reads as follows:

This amendment adds the underlined words to make it clear that employees of life insurance corporations, who are members of a registered pension plan established by such corporation for their employees, are subject to the limitations on the amount they may deduct as premiums under a registered retirement savings plan in the same manner as other taxpayers who are members of employee pension plans. The present wording of the paragraph being amended does not cover employees of life insurance corporations because these corporations have special rules for computing their taxable income.

Was this amendment found necessary because of some discovery as to the method of computing income tax of life insurance companies on the part of the minister's officials, and can he explain what is meant by the words "these corporations have special rules for computing their taxable income?"

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Questions were asked as to whether the persons here referred to were in fact so bound. That is what gave rise to a consideration of this question. I might say broadly in reply to the hon. gentleman that taxpayers who are members of registered pension plans may also deduct premiums paid under registered retirement savings plans but the combined total of the contributions into the two kinds of plans may not exceed 10 per cent of income or $1,500 per year. Taxpayers who are not members of registered pension plans may deduct premiums not exceeding 10 per cent of income up to a maximum $2,500 per year.

This amendment makes it clear that life insurance employees who are members of registered pension plans are subject to the $1,500 maximum the same as other employees who are members of such plans. The purpose of the bill is to achieve equality of treatment. The limit on the amount deductible is lower for those who are members of registered pension plans because, in addition to deducting their own contributions, they also exclude from income during their working years amounts paid into the registered pension plan on their behalf by their employer.

Mr. Herridge: Was the amendment occasioned by a misunderstanding on the part of some people filing income tax returns or some irregularities on the part of employees of these companies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no discovery in that sense. No irregularity was discovered. It was a matter of a normal review and an attempt to assure equality.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the house leader intends to do tomorrow? Perhaps he might also give us the program for the rest of the week.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with third reading of this bill. Then we shall take item No. 13 on today's order paper, a resolution concerning Austria; then second reading of amendments to the Veterans' Land Act, the intention being to refer that act to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister give us the number of the item?

Mr. Green: That resolution appears on today's order paper as item No. 17. Then we shall take item No. 14, a resolution concerning the Bretton Woods Agreements Act; then item No. 10, a resolution concerning the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; item No. 9, a resolution dealing with the Defence Services Pension Act; and item No. 8, which concerns the convention on the nationality of married women. If we finish this business we would then go into the estimates of the Department of Labour.

On Thursday we intend to take second reading of the National Energy Board Act and to continue with that business until it is concluded. If we should finish it by Friday night, then there would be a supply motion on Monday.

Mr. Chevrier: May I indicate to the house leader that Bill No. C-49 which he intends to take on Thursday was just handed to us a few moments ago; as a matter of fact it was handed to us when the evening session had begun. This is an extremely important bill. We have co-operated with the government in getting the resolution through in excellent time, I believe. But here we are handed a bill which has 101 clauses extending over 28 pages. I do not think it is equitable on the part of the government to ask the opposition, on this short notice, to be ready to discuss second reading of a bill of this importance. I wonder whether the house leader would not give consideration to putting this bill over, as surely must have been the intention of all the members of the house, for discussion on Monday.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I always try to meet the wishes of the opposition but in this case I am afraid I cannot do so. There is a great urgency to get this measure through on the part of the people of western Canada. There comes times when we just cannot give the extra time that is requested. As the hon. member has mentioned, we arranged to distribute the bill this afternoon. There will be a day tomorrow and until 3.30 p.m. approximately on Thursday. I am sorry but I cannot accede to the wishes of the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: My submission is that on 24 hours' notice we cannot possibly give to this bill the attention that it requires and that I am sure parliament should give. The point I am making is this. While it might be urgent to get this measure through, surely it was just as urgent to bring it on earlier. If we had had it brought on earlier I am sure we would have had the requisite amount of time in which to consider it. It seems to me that this is taking an unfair advantage of the members of the opposition in asking them to deal with a matter of this importance, with the time that is being given at the moment.

Mr. Benidickson: It was mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is really an outrageous way in which to treat the House of Commons. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to talk about a deadline.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the minister is prepared to change his position, there is no point in pursuing the matter further. It being ten o'clock—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think we have been rather fair on this side of the house tonight. We have allowed the excise tax bill and the income tax bill to go through. We have sat after ten o'clock. It seems to me that this matter is one of extreme importance. I repeat that we are going to consider carefully the attitude which we shall have to take on this bill in view of the position taken by the leader of the house. I repeat that the position he has taken is not fair to us on this side of the house. This is the first time that I have made this protest on any of the matters that have been brought to the attention of the house for the next day's business. I am sure the leader of the house will bear me out when I say this. This is the first time in my recollection that I have risen, on an occasion such as this, to protest the inadequacy of the time given us for consideration of a bill of this importance. I gave the information which concerns this matter to the leader of our party and he thinks it just unconscionable that we should be asked, with barely 24 hours' notice, to deal with this bill. I ask the leader of the house whether in fairness he will not reconsider his position and allow us to deal with it over the week end so that we can discuss it intelligently on Monday.

Mr. Green: The hon. member has been extremely co-operative and I appreciate his actions throughout. However, in this case I regret that I cannot accede to his suggestion. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that I think he is under-rating his intelligence.

It being ten minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

ROYAL ROADS COLLEGE—SWIMMING POOL

Question No. 366—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the military college of Royal Roads a swimming pool?
2. If so, to what size, when and at what cost was it built?
3. During the school year how many students use the pool, at what hours of the week?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. An extension to the gymnasium at Royal Roads, housing a swimming pool, a spectator gallery, squash courts, locker rooms, store rooms, heating, pumping, filtration and chlorination plants and other facilities was completed in April of 1958 at a cost of $358,851. The swimming pool measures 75 feet in length and 30 feet in width.

3. As swimming is a compulsory sport at this college the entire student body, consisting of 134 cadets, makes use of the pool. The pool is in regular use throughout the day and evening on Saturdays and Sundays and on afternoons and evenings from Monday through Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 20, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSION OF BILL NO. C-49

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the exchange which took place last night with regard to parliamentary business. Can he give the house any indication whether we are to follow the order of business mentioned last night, or whether it will be possible to have a change made in order that the business of the house may be more effectively and expeditiously carried out?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I looked over the record last evening and considered the arguments which were advanced by the hon. member for Laurier. I am at all times desirous of having that spirit of co-operation which has been apparent in the last few days, during which the legislation has received full though somewhat more accelerated consideration than heretofore.

The measure dealing with the national energy board is a very long and important bill, and one which we should like to get through as soon as possible, or as soon as it is convenient. It is a bill which is important to the people in the areas covered by its provisions, but I feel that if the house would agree there should be some further time during which the opposition may acquaint themselves with this very comprehensive piece of legislation. We are all desirous of having it implemented at the earliest possible date, and I suggest that if hon. members have tomorrow to work on it we may proceed on Friday with the consideration of this measure and then carry on next week until it has received the approval of the house or otherwise.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fourth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—TABLING OF AIDE MEMOIRE ON PILOTAGE

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table in English and in French copies of an aide memoire regarding pilotage on the great lakes which was delivered to Washington on Saturday, May 16.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTINUATION OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to continue its sugar beet price support on the 1959 crop of sugar beets, with the prescribed price being the same percentage of the 10-year average price as for the 1958 crop, that is 93 per cent. The 1958 sugar crop is not all marketed, but it is expected that there will be some payment since sugar prices have declined in recent months.

For the 1959 crop the amount of payment, if any, will be calculated as the difference between the average gross market price for sugar delivered from each producing area and a prescribed price for Alberta sugar of 9.79 cents per pound, for Manitoba sugar 9.26 cents per pound and for Ontario sugar 7.90 cents per pound. As indicated above, this prescribed price is based on 93 per cent of the 10-year average in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, and is about one tenth cent per pound lower than for the 1958 crop due to the fact that the 10-year average has declined. In the case of Quebec, provision has again been made for similar payments per unit, if any, to those made in Ontario.

Present indications are that there will be an increased acreage planted to sugar beets in Ontario and Manitoba this year, with about the same or slightly reduced acreages in Alberta and Quebec. At present it would not appear that sugar prices would improve to any great extent during the current year.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the statement the minister has just made will, I think, bear further examination. I note that while it is based on 93 per cent of the 10-year average the price will be about one-tenth cent per pound lower than for the 1958 crop, and one would want to examine the whole statement in detail.

May I ask the minister if he hopes to be able to pursue this generous mood he has begun today by a statement on soybean prices and on Ontario wheat, perhaps tomorrow?

Starred Questions

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are glad that the government is continuing to support sugar beet prices. This, however, seems to follow the consistent pattern of recent announcements, namely that the support prices are often lower. We are pleased that the lowering of the price has not been more than one-tenth cent per pound, but with the continuing increase in the cost of agricultural production we are looking to the time when the government will implement its policy of providing floor prices based on the farmer's cost of production and therefore floor prices that would increase as the farmer's cost of production increases. The government is following the opposite policy from that which we were led to expect, in that it continues to reduce support prices.

Mr. Churchill: You are out of order.

Mr. Harkness: I think you will find that the sugar beet growers are very well satisfied.

Mr. Argue: In response to that interjection I might say that I have found—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —that many of the minister's interpolations in the past have been highly inaccurate.

Mr. Ricard: It is impossible to satisfy that hon. gentleman or the party he represents.

INDUSTRY

MEASURE TO PROMOTE INDUSTRY AND REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-51, to provide for the development of certain provinces by the distribution of industry and for the reduction of unemployment therein.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is twofold, to encourage the development of industry in the four maritime provinces and to reduce high-level unemployment by the development of industry in areas in those provinces where unemployment persists. The method used is to adapt the facilities of the Industrial Development Bank Act, which is general to all Canada, to the specific economic needs of the maritime provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

EXPLORATORY OIL AND GAS PERMITS, NORTHERN CANADA—ACREAGES

Question No. 74—Mr. Hardie:

1. For what total acreage, if any, were exploratory oil and gas permits issued between July 1, 1957 and March 31, 1959, on the mainland of northern Canada i.e. in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon?

2. What percentage of any such acreage under permit rights is held by (a) Canadian corporations; (b) United States corporations; (c) Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations; (d) British corporations; (e) Canadian subsidiaries of British corporations; (f) others?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is 60,942,006 acres.

The answer to the second question, part (a), is 29.32 per cent (17,918,074 acres); part (b), 33.22 per cent (20,203,085 acres); part (c), 30.06 per cent (18,294,054 acres); part (d) nil; part (e) nil; part (f), 7.40 per cent (4,526,793 acres).

These figures, Mr. Speaker, refer just to the mainland of northern Canada, that is, the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. In answer to a previous question on April 29, asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), a set of figures were given. To get the total for the whole of the northern part of Canada these two sets of figures should be added together.

So there will be no misunderstanding as to the figures which were reported at that time, and for the interest of the house, the percentages are as follows: Canadian individuals and corporations for the whole of the north since July 1, 1957, 55.54 per cent (81,912,041 acres); United States corporations, 22.34 per cent (32,941,271 acres); Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations, 20.22 per cent (29,828,608 acres); British corporations, nil; Canadian subsidiaries of British corporations, 1.90 per cent (2,777,452 acres).

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege, since my name has been brought into the answer to the question. The minister in answering the question sought to refer to an answer given to a question I asked some days ago. He did not give the full answer. He repeated only part of it. In that case the answer given did not deal with permits issued at all, and his present answer is therefore quite misleading to the house. Since it purports to involve information given to me I want to be dissociated in every way from anything he said indicating that the figures he has now given were given to me previously and are related to this question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am perfectly willing to have the hon. member for Ottawa West dissociate himself from these facts I have just given to the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Why mislead the house? No permits were issued at all.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This afternoon the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources answered a question of mine, which is No. 74 on the order paper today. I asked for the oil acreages on the mainland of Canada, and he has attempted to mislead the house by adding to the answer he gave me—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hardie: —acreages which—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like to remind the hon. member who is stating a question of privilege that it is one of the privileges of all members of this house that members do not have imputed to them a deliberate attempt to mislead. While it is very often said that members have misled the house, it is not in order to say that an hon. member deliberately misled the house, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement and proceed with his question.

Mr. Hardie: I withdraw that remark, sir; but in any event the minister in answer to my question added acreages in the Arctic islands as though permits had been issued for those acreages, when no permits to date have been issued. My question dealt with permits issued on the mainland of Canada. I am sure the minister would tell the house that no permits have been issued for the Arctic islands, and if he were to—

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure I understand what the question of privilege is which the hon. member is raising. I take it he is dissatisfied with the answer of the minister, but surely that is a matter for debate and discussion at the appropriate place.

Mr. Hardie: He misled the house by adding—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hardie: The part he added was not relevant to the question I asked.

Mr. Speaker: That is a point of order which the hon. member might have taken at the time. I noticed that the minister's answer went beyond the question, and for future guidance I doubt whether that is in accordance with the practice. But points of order of this kind ought to be made at the time.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he considers acreage taken up for oil and mineral development, which was the subject of a question on April 29, the same as exploratory oil and gas permits, the subject of a question today, both of which he lumped together in his answer.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think this question posed by the Leader of the Opposition can best be answered by letting our minds run back to that unfortunate episode in this house when the Leader of the Opposition took advantage of a question about a partial acreage to try to establish a certain position for the whole north. What I have done here today is to make absolutely certain that there is no misunderstanding about asking for percentages in a certain area, and so I gave the percentages over the whole area. If it is a question of quibbling over permits for oil exploratory licences and oil exploratory permits as related to mineral exploration, I do not think that is the real issue at all.

Mr. Pearson: May I now ask the minister if he would answer the question whether he considers acreage taken up for oil and mineral development the same as exploratory oil and gas permits? Perhaps he would answer that question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If I were a Philadelphia lawyer I could probably spend two or three hours in answering this question. It is one which is yes and no at the same time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In his answer to question No. 74 this afternoon, did the minister include in section (a) as Canadian corporations those corporations in which the majority of common shares are held outside Canada?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter into debate here as to the definition of a Canadian corporation, but I think the one we have assumed is the obvious one. If the Canadian corporation is formed in Canada and operated by Canadians with its stock on the market, I do not think I have to go out and examine who owns a major proportion of the common shares, which proportion changes from day to day. I think the sensitivity of the opposition on this subject indicates the tremendous regret they have for the episode of two weeks ago in this house.

REGULATIONS GOVERNING OFFICERS' MESSES

Question No. 81—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Has the Department of National Defence any regulations governing the use that can be made of officers' messes?

Starred Questions

2. If so, is there any regulation governing their use for political purposes?

3. Was a meeting recently held in the officers' mess of the 44th field regiment at St. Catharines, Ontario, and presentations made by the president of the Ontario young Progressive Conservative association?

4. If so, on whose authority?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first and second parts of the question is in the affirmative. The answer to the third and fourth parts of the question is as follows. A member of the mess, not an officer of the unit, asked the mess president whether he might invite some guests on a certain day to the mess. He did not say who the guests were or the purpose of the meeting. He has since apologized and expressed his regret at any embarrassment which might have been caused.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question; was not there—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member defer his question until we reach the orders of the day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was something in the papers on that.

[Later]:

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was the minister aware when answering starred question 81 that the meeting in the armouries at St. Catharines was advertised in the local press as a meeting of the Ontario young Conservative association?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

PURCHASE OF LAND FOR PUBLIC BUILDING, FORT COULONGE, QUE.

Question No. 82—Mr. Dumas:

1. Has the federal government purchased land at Fort Coulonge for the construction of a public building?

2. If so, from whom?

3. How much did the government pay for this land?

4. When was the payment made?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. The Department of Public Works has given approval for the acquisition of lots 258, 259 and a portion of lot 260, located on Main street, Fort Coulonge, as a site for a federal building.

2. Payment is to be made to Mrs. Marie Marion.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

3. Agreed payment to be $4,000.

4. Payment has not yet been made.

C.M.H.C. APPROVAL OF LOANS AND MORTGAGES LOW-COST HOUSING

Question No. 83—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approved any loans or mortgages for houses in the low cost, minimum standard group, the plans for which were announced in 1958?

2. If so, how many and to what total value for each office of the corporation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Loans approved as of April 30, 1959, for houses in the low cost, minimum standard group (plan No. 2,000 and adaptations thereof).

C.H.M.C. Office	Units	Loan Amounts
Fredericton	1	$ 7,665
Halifax	1	8,160
St. John's, Newfoundland	1	4,590
Chicoutimi	54	386,417

Regina	7	64,397
Prince George	68	618,827
	206	$1,773,697

Note: Loan amounts shown are based on the lending value of house and land.

TOMISLAV BEZIC—YUGOSLAV IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 87—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is Tomislav Bezic of Toronto a landed immigrant, and, if so, on what date was he landed and from what country?

2. Has the said Tomislav Bezic applied to the immigration branch to sponsor his wife as an immigrant and, if so, on what date?

3. Has the said application been rejected? If so, for what reason?

4. How many immigrants were admitted from Yugoslavia between October 1, 1958 and March 31, 1959?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of this question is yes, on February 13, 1958, from Yugoslavia. The answer to part 2 is yes, on March 28, 1958. The answer to part three is no; the department is still awaiting completion of necessary inquiries. The answer to part four is 550.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

For a copy of agreed charges entered into by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, pursuant to section 32 of the Transport Act, and posted at the headquarters of the railways as set out in general order 818 of the board of transport commissioners.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR DROPPING OF QUESTION NO. 309

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, by agreement with the hon. member for Assiniboia I would ask that question 309 be dropped, as it involves information that cannot be given out by the department.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed to dropping this question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and question dropped.

FINANCE

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with a press report concerning a United States proposal for a new billion dollar international development association. I should like to ask whether Canada has agreed to this proposal, as reported, and if so what capital contribution can be expected to be made to the resources of the proposed development association by this country.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is in the negative. Canada has not agreed to the establishment of any such fund. As a matter of fact no proposal has ever been made to us in concrete form. There were discussions of a preliminary nature last year on the proposal to establish an international development association, but these have never passed beyond the preliminary stage.

SAILS—IMPROVEMENT OF COMPETITIVE POSITION OF CANADIAN PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that finished sails enter Canada under special duties of 15 per cent British preferential and 22½ per cent most favoured nation, while Canadian sailmakers must pay on sailcloth a duty of 22½ per cent plus 25 per cent and 30 cents per pound most favoured nation, will the minister advise the house if any action is contemplated to improve the competitive position of Canadian sailmakers?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question is rather like the one with which I dealt previously. Taxation problems are properly budgetary matters. However, as has been pointed out the budget has been passed, and perhaps the minister is willing to comment upon it.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter is within the scope of the reference to the tariff board and is before the board.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. INTERFERENCE WITH CANADIAN TRUCKS IN TRANSIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether or not the report in the Toronto Telegram of Tuesday, May 19, to the effect that the United States has agreed to lift its ban on Canadian trucks transporting imports of Red Chinese foods over United States highways, is in fact true; and if so, can he indicate when an official announcement may be expected?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has no information on this matter as yet. Representations were made to the United States but there has been no indication of any final decision. As soon as a decision has been made the house will be made acquainted therewith.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the many criticisms that have appeared in the Montreal press concerning delays in the completion of Dorval airport? I wonder whether the minister would tell the house when he expects the airport to be in use. Perhaps he might also be good enough to make a statement as to the progress of construction of the terminal.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I should like to tell him that during the years I was in the opposition I used to read regularly the complaints in the Montreal press about the delay in connection with this airport. Upon receiving his question this morning I made inquiries of my air services branch and received from them the following report.

The substantial delays that plagued the Dorval airport terminal building during the early years of its construction—and I might remind my hon. friend that those were the years when the government of which he was a member had responsibility for these things —have now been substantially overcome, and progress has been satisfactory and indeed rapid in the completion of the interior of the building over the last year and a half—and I might say that is the period during which we have had responsibility—so much so that the main building is now well advanced toward completion.

Mr. Speaker, I see no reason to vary my earlier estimate that the building will be ready for occupancy next year.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the non-political answer the minister has made may I put this question to him. In the two years during which his government has been in office, what progress has been made toward the opening of the terminal which, after all, the air-minded people of Montreal are anxious to have?

Mr. Hees: When we took office I would estimate that the terminal was about five years from completion. We have been in office for two years. It is now one year from completion. Therefore, by simple arithmetic, we have gained two years over the progress made by the former administration.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether progress similar to that being made in the Department of Transport can be made in the minister's own department in the bringing in of a better system of box car allocation? What further consideration has now been given to the report of the Bracken commission? My specific question is this. What action is contemplated to remove this festering sore?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, these are rather extravagant statements, especially the talk about the festering sore. The situation with regard to box cars is not nearly as difficult as it was a few years ago under the former administration, when grain congestion plagued the prairies. Under the active measures taken by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the wheat board, equal to those taken by the Department of Transport, grain is being moved off the prairies to such an extent that there is no problem in connection with box car allocation such as there was a few years ago.

With regard to action concerning the report of the Bracken inquiry, I have purposely delayed any action in order to give every opportunity to those people who made representations to Mr. Bracken to study the report and make their comments upon it. I have been receiving comments from interested individuals over the past few weeks, and I think it is rather important that everybody have a full opportunity to study that report. I have only just heard from the Canadian wheat board their comments concerning that report. These steps must be taken before a policy can be formulated and an announcement made in the house.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the government's willingness to lay before parliament its legislative program, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether any amendments to any existing acts will be necessary this session as a result of the report of the royal commission?

Mr. Churchill: Any such amendments that are determined upon will be announced in due course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT BY U.S. OF AERIAL TOWERS ACROSS CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware of a news report last evening to the effect that a series of aerial radio towers are being established across Canada to be operated in part by the United States and in part, I believe, by Canada, following a lease of the ground rights for the construction of the towers from Canada to the United States? Is the minister able to enlighten the house on whether that report is accurate?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, the report is not accurate.

AGRICULTURE

PRICE STABILIZATION—LIMITS ON QUANTITIES ON WHICH DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO BE MADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the Minister of Agriculture yet had any advice from the Department of Justice as to whether an amendment or amendments to the Agricultural Stabilization Act are required in order to put certain limits on the quantity of goods which may be accepted on which deficiency payments may be made?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the great urgency to have Dr. Clark's report made available, can the minister say if any action has been initiated on the basis of that report?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Clark's report has been available for some weeks, and the department is now in the process of giving it very close study.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Is there any possibility that the government will bring forward legislation this session based on that report?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not anticipate any.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Another promise not carried out.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTESTS RESPECTING PROGRAM ON FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue I should like to direct a question to the acting minister.

On May 7 the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere asked the minister certain questions pertaining to a television program which appeared on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on May 3. My question is, can the minister tell the house whether the inquiry promised by the president of the C.B.C., Mr. Ouimet, has been conducted, and if so, what disciplinary action if any has been taken against those who were responsible for the production of that program?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I shall be glad to bring this question to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue on his return.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, members of the C.C.F. group are far from satisfied with this bill at the present time. We feel that it is bound to hamper the successful operation of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. We feel also that the minister has not given satisfactory answers to questions which were addressed to him at previous stages of the debate on this bill.

This is a matter which we consider to be of urgent importance. We all realize that for 40 years there has been procrastination as far as health insurance in this country is concerned. We have had 40 years of Liberal and—yes—Tory promises on this subject. We all realize, also, that this is no new idea which has suddenly dawned upon the world. Germany, to give only one illustration, has had health insurance for the last 90 years. We all realize, further, that it took two elections within the short period of nine months in order to bring to a termination the 40-year gestation period of this legislation and, of course, we all saw last year the birth of this sickly child, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

This was a child which should have been given every encouragement. It was a child which needed every encouragement if it was ever to grow up strong and healthy. This bill certainly provides no such encouragement. On the contrary, it tends to sentence this hospital insurance scheme to years of sickness and possibly even to death from malnutrition. We realize that the insurance companies have fought this legislation ever since it was first suggested, and we feel that certain of the amendments in this bill might very well have been written by some of these insurance companies. We feel they lean very heavily in their favour.

We feel that the bill penalizes those provinces which were progressive enough to take part in the hospitalization scheme. We feel that it penalizes the people who live in those provinces. In short, we feel that it is unfair and discriminatory; and, holding this view, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier):

That Bill No. C-48 be not now read the third time but that the said bill be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 8 thereof.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I speak for a moment on a point of order. It is of course competent for a member to move on third reading that a bill be referred back for the purpose of amending a clause, but according to my understanding the proposed amendment to the clause indicated must form part of the motion. This particular amendment does not have that effect at all. It simply says in general terms that the bill should be referred back for the purpose of reconsidering clause 8 thereof.

Mr. Speaker: I will give some consideration to that point while the debate on third reading is proceeding.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Before I make the remarks I wish to make on this subject I should like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to section 418 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, where it is stated:

The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

I believe the motion submitted by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) has followed the prescribed form.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Timmins make this motion, because I feel the house has not given sufficient consideration to the discriminatory effect of clause 8. As the hon. member for Timmins indicated, our new national hospital insurance venture ought to be nursed along rather than have obstacles thrown into its path which will hinder its normal growth and acceptance by more and more of our Canadian people. I regret very much that a large number of our people—I believe some 30 or 40 per cent—are not yet in a province whose government has decided to make an agreement with the federal government under which its citizens would have the blessings of a national insurance plan.

I feel that this clause 8 as it now stands is a slap in the face to the progressively-minded people of Canada. It certainly offers no inducement or encouragement to other provinces of Canada to enter the plan at this time. One of the attractions of the plan in days gone by was that if there was illness in a family some compensation was obtained, in that payments made on a family's behalf were deductible for income tax purposes. I feel that the people of Saskatchewan, the people of Alberta, the people of Ontario and the people of one or two other provinces are not going to look with much favour upon clause 8. I believe they will form the opinion that this is one more instance of the Conservatives taking one view when they were in opposition and quite a different view and course of action once they are in office and faced with the responsibility of government.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say briefly that this amendment should surely appeal to the Minister of Finance, particularly in view of the position he took when these matters were discussed when we were on the other side and had the happy responsibility of presenting to this house the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

This measure has now been accepted by practically all the provinces of Canada. There are still two to signify their intention of participating. It is hoped that the government is taking steps to persuade the province of Quebec, the second largest province of Canada, to enter into this worthwhile scheme.

As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said when speaking at the resolution stage, it is regrettable that the government, particularly at this initial period, should jeopardize the happy circumstances in which this great hospital insurance plan has been inaugurated by a measure of this sort. The minister has not given sufficient justification for this course, which I believe at this stage in the early operation of the hospital insurance plan, which our party had a lot to do with in terms of bringing it about, is receiving the discouraging attention which the minister by this particular clause in the bill accords.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point the minister made was that the amendment which the committee of the whole was to consider ought to be specified.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The amendment that may be made must be an amendment that could be made in committee. That is the purpose of reference back. There is no amendment to the bill proposed in the amendment now introduced. It simply proposes that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 8. It proposes no amendment to clause 8 at all.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would refer the house to Hansard of April 10, 1957, at page 3381, when a similar amendment to another bill was moved in these words:

> That Bill 320 be not now read the third time, but that the said bill be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 2(e) thereof.

That was the amendment that was considered, debated and allowed by the house. This had to do with the definition of the word "hospital" in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I might say that the amendment was moved by one of the outstanding authorities on parliamentary procedure in the house, the hon. member for Eglinton, the present Minister of Finance. I believe the hon. gentleman was very much in order at that time, and I might add that in bringing this amendment before the house today we were very careful to follow the appropriate precedents.

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubts about the amendment on the very grounds the minister raised, because the committee of the whole house has dealt with this bill and has no authority to deal with it again unless the house directs it to do so. This amendment does direct it to deal with it again but gives the committee no specific power. It just asks the committee to reconsider clause 8. However, in the face of the precedent cited I think I should accept the amendment, though I want to indicate that I do have some misgivings about it.

Mr. Argue: I should like to say a few words on the subject itself. We feel that this provision discriminates very greatly against the person who is unfortunate enough to be confined to hospital. If we had in Canada a complete system of health insurance that covered all medical expenses, then I could see some substantial argument on behalf of the minister's change in this bill. But even if that were the case, when a breadwinner was confined to hospital he would sustain a substantial loss of income. In other words this kind of tax exemption in such circumstances would have some considerable merit.

Even in provinces that have the hospital insurance act in operation it means in ordinary circumstances that when a person goes to hospital, while the major portion of the hospital account is paid under the act there are special costs which would not be met. Very often a person must obtain a semi-private or private room and is required to pay additional costs. The other important factor is that medical expenses are not covered. I know from personal experience that when one is confronted with heavy medical and hospital costs there are substantial amounts outside the act that must be paid by the individual even in a province where the hospital insurance act is in effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This does not preclude a claim being made for those medical expenses.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate that. What the minister's change means is that when an individual who has had heavy medical and hospital expenses files his income tax return he will receive either a smaller rebate or none at all because of the reduced exemption. For people who have medical expenses totalling hundreds of dollars it is of some assistance to have their burden of income tax somewhat reduced, as has been the case in the past; but we feel that this move is an attempt by the government to bring its budget into better balance by increasing the taxes in this way, against the people who are unfortunate enough to have to incur very substantial medical expenses.

We think the provision in the act is wrong and will create hardship for the people who now have to pay heavy medical expenses. In view of this government's repeated promises to reduce taxes it is completely baffling to us that the government should move to increase its revenue by this means, thus working a hardship on people who are unfortunate enough to be confined to hospital and who have to pay out of their own pockets heavy medical expenses.

For that reason we are pleased to have been able to move this amendment, which we feel should commend itself to hon. members of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this amendment and the reasons advanced for it by members of the C.C.F. who have spoken this afternoon require only very brief comment. One would have thought that if the matter loomed in their view in proportions of such importance as they have attempted to assign to it this afternoon they would have had something to say about it in committee of the whole last night but only one member of the C.C.F. had anything to say about clause 8 in the committee last evening, and that hon. gentleman made only two brief interventions which were replied to.

Mr. Argue: Do you want a filibuster?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So what was not very important last night, not even sufficiently important last night to call for comment by more than one member, not sufficiently important to call for amendment last night, not sufficiently important to call for an adverse vote last night, suddenly this afternoon acquires an importance in the eyes of hon. members of the C.C.F. that they would have the house believe it assumed in their eyes hitherto, although it certainly has not appeared that way.

It was said by the hon. member who introduced this amendment that they had not had explanations of this matter. Mr. Speaker, they have had explanations now on I think four occasions, explanations at some length; therefore, the statement that there has not been explanation is just not a true one. They may not agree with it but they have not said so up until now. The first of those explanations of this bill, Mr. Speaker, was given in the course of the budget speech. It will be found in Hansard of April 9 at page 2421. It is there set forth very clearly. In Hansard of May 4 it will be found again, and in Hansard of yesterday, and if I am not mistaken in one other place as well. Therefore, the statement of the hon. member who introduced this amendment this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, simply does not fit the facts.

If we had not introduced the amendment that is contained in clause 9 of this bill we would have been inviting a situation to continue which would have contemplated a veritable hodgepodge in Canada. It was necessary to introduce some uniform and equitable rule. As I pointed out on previous occasions, the only way in which this situation could be dealt with equitably is in the manner proposed in clause 8, because there is no uniform way in which the provincial contribution to hospital insurance is covered in the different provinces of Canada. There are two provinces which have not yet become parties to any agreement in pursuance of the terms of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. In other provinces you have a great variety of ways in which the provincial share of the cost of the hospital insurance scheme is provided. In some provinces it is by means of an individual contribution; in other provinces it is by means of a sales tax. In the light of this variety of conditions in different provinces, Mr. Speaker, it was necessary to find an equitable solution, and the one we have proposed is the only solution which offers equitable treatment to all parts of Canada.

We heard such a heart-rending expression from C.C.F. members this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. Their hearts were not rent last night; their hearts were not rent on this subject on previous occasions but this afternoon, somehow or other, they seem to be taking time in putting on a show of broken hearts.

What is the fact, Mr. Speaker? They say that people who have the misfortune to incur medical expenses are, somehow or other, going to be deprived of their opportunity to claim the right to deduct medical expenses from their taxable income. That is not true, sir. Anybody who has medical expenses, apart from hospital bills to which the federal government contributes in accordance with the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, loses nothing of his present right of deduction under the terms of the act. This is the only way in which the present provision in regard to the deduction of medical expenses is affected by the bill now under discussion. What are we doing when they weep over the fate of persons who are losing something under this bill? The fact is, that the federal government is this year offering $160 million for the assistance of just those people, so that persons of the kind for whom the tears were shed, those crocodile tears, this afternoon are not going to have to pay for hospital services of the kind provided under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

In order to provide an equitable solution, in the face of this hodgepodge of conditions across Canada, Mr. Speaker, it was necessary in this way to say, and say very simply, that where those bills are paid under the contributions to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act they cannot be claimed twice over in this way; you cannot have the benefit twice over. All that this subtracts from the people of Canada is $3 million this year and $9 million in a full year. Against that we put up $160 million. That is our answer to these nonsensical crocodile tears.

Mr. Argue: What a phony show.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I had not intended to speak until I listened to this hypocritical speech. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would come out honestly and say that he was doing this to raise some more revenue there might be some sense to it; but it is absolutely ridiculous for the minister to say that it is all right to deduct your hospital bills if you pay a premium to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company but it is wrong to deduct them if you pay a premium to the Ontario hospital insurance plan. This is plain discrimination in favour of the private insurer as against the public insurer and the minister knows it perfectly well. He has never attempted to reply to that argument although I have made it four times. I think it should be made once again. The government is doing this because it wants to raise a little extra money and for no other reason.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utterly untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: This phony and hypocritical explanation has nothing to do with the withdrawal of the concession.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): It is not my intention to participate in the show we just had from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), but I want to make it clear again that I did object to this clause which is being discussed. I objected to it at the resolution stage of the bill and I objected again after second reading when it came before the committee last evening. I wish to repeat that the exclusion of medical expenses for income tax purposes is not a fair deal to the taxpayers of the province of New Brunswick. It will cost us more after July 1, when the hospital insurance plan comes into effect in the province. It is true that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of the total cost of the province. The total cost will amount to approximately $18 million, but only $8,500,000 or $9 million will be paid in full by the premiums of the taxpayers of the province of New Brunswick. I still insist that if the minister wants to be logical, 50 per cent of the medical expenses over and above 3 per cent of the taxable income of the residents of the province of New Brunswick should be deductible for income tax purposes.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I also did not intend to participate in this debate until the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) got into it. What we have seen today is probably an indication of the way in which the minister hires somebody to harmonize him one step further. We saw him getting theatrical instructions today. I would suggest that it was something like what we saw out in front of the building the other day. Probably he should be standing on that. He speaks of equality. There certainly is equality in so far as private plans are concerned. You get equality on additional payments made to a private scheme, whether it be a pension fund or an amount paid to an insurance company, to the Blue Cross or whatever else there is. There is equality there, but there is inequality for those who make contributions in the regular way to the government.

The minister referred to some of the reasons why we did not object to this last night. I can speak only for myself. I would like to inform the minister that there was a committee meeting last night, which was a very important one, and I had to attend. It is not at all fair to say that we just thought of this today. We have an opportunity now to vote to indicate whether we are in favour of this unequal method of income tax deduction or the equal method. To vote in support of this amendment will indicate much more equality than the minister is giving the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I wish to say a word or two. I recognized this difficulty at the time we were debating the resolution which was proposed on budget night. My point is that subsequent changes giving taxpayers advantages by way of inclusion in their over-all expenses of some other things such as the minister has introduced in this budget are a complete camouflage if he wipes out the basic cost which in most provinces is the cost of hospitalization. I said that last night and I said it on the resolution stage. I was surprised that there was very little support from the C.C.F. group yesterday on this point.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Benidickson: It was not referred to. The point I want to make is that there is no substance to this section in the act henceforth if you remove from entitlement to exemption the natural, normal cost of substance, which is hospitalization. I am going to vote for the amendment.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following: Mr. Fleming (Eglinton), seconded by Mr. Starr, moves that Bill No. C-48, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be now read a third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Argue: On division.

Mr. Speaker: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPROVAL OF STATE TREATY FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT AUSTRIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the state treaty for the re-establishment of an independent and democratic Austria signed at Vienna May 15, 1955, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I intend to restrict myself in speaking on this resolution. It will be remembered that on February 26 the late secretary of state for external affairs, the Hon. Sidney Smith, informed the house of the government's intention to request parliament to adopt this resolution. Hon. members will have had before them the state treaty for the re-establishment of an independent and democratic Austria which was signed at Vienna on May 15, 1955 which terminated the four power occupation of Austria and permitted its re-establishment as a sovereign state. The allied and associated powers recognized that Austria was re-established as a sovereign, independent and democratic state.

The treaty was negotiated by Austria, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Soviet union and France. At the time of the negotiation other countries were not consulted, but provision was made for the accession of those countries which had participated in the war against nazi Germany. The Austrian government desires, and I think rightly, that as many friendly countries as possible should accede to this treaty and have invited Canada to do so. At the time of the announcement made by the late secretary of state for external affairs, Brazil, Czechoslovakia, Mexico, New Zealand, Poland and Yugoslavia had exercised similar rights of accession.

It is not my purpose to outline in detail the lengthy and difficult negotiations which preceded the signing of the treaty. In the years following the war numerous efforts were made, both by the western occupying powers in direct negotiation with the U.S.S.R., and in the United Nations, to persuade the Soviet union to conclude a peace treaty with Austria, but it was not until 1955 that a change of attitude by the U.S.S.R. became apparent. The treaty was signed by the five foreign ministers on May 15, 1955. Austria thus regained its sovereignty, as I said a moment ago, and in December of the same year became a member of the United Nations. Accession by Canada does not mean an increase in Canada's international obligations. Under section 2 of the treaty there is provision made whereby Canada would undertake to respect the independence and territorial integrity of Austria, but this in no way results in any additional obligations other than those which derive from the membership of Canada and Austria in the United Nations. No complication can arise either from the fact of Austria's neutrality, which was established by legislative action in Austria following the re-establishment of Austrian independence.

Under article 27 (1) of the treaty it is stated that the allied and associated powers intend to return Austrian property and that they will be prepared to conclude agreements with the Austrian government for this purpose. It might be of interest to note that the balance of Austrian assets still vested in the custodian of enemy property as of March 31 of this year was $36,604. These assets will be returned, or are being returned, to the former owners or to their respective heirs or successors at law, so that that particular section does not bring about any additional responsibilities.

The question might be raised as to the reason why there has been a delay. A number of countries have delayed acceding to the treaty pending the settlement of certain financial claims which those countries have against Austria. The satisfactory status of Canadian claims against Austria does not warrant any delay in acceding to the treaty.

I mentioned a moment ago that the Austrian authorities attach considerable importance to Canadian accession, and that desire on the part of Austria has been a major consideration in the decision of the government to take this action. Following the announcement by the late secretary of state for external affairs, the Austrian foreign minister wrote as follows:

> The Austrian government has charged me to express to you its warmest gratitude for your government's action concerning Canada's accession to the Austrian state treaty. My government welcomes this step as a further confirmation of the friendly and most cordial relations between our two countries. I need not assure you that the statement you kindly made on that occasion is highly appreciated throughout my country.

The relations between Canada and Austria are on the basis of friendship and understanding, and this further step will but underline the emphasis on that friendly relationship. I think it is well to recall how Canadians as a whole felt in the fall of 1956 because of the manner in which Austrian authorities gave assistance to Hungarian refugees, a conspicuous demonstration of Austria's adherence to the humanitarian and democratic ideals which are emphasized in the treaty. The Austrian state treaty is the foundation for Austria's existence as a state. Canada has recognized it and has established with Austria a normal diplomatic relationship. The house in this resolution expresses, in the words of the late secretary of state for external affairs, our friendship and sympathy for a country whose achievements we admire.

With these considerations in mind, Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will agree that it is appropriate and fitting for Canada to accede to the Austrian state treaty.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are happy to support what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just said and to accede to this resolution covering a state treaty for the re-establishment of an independent and democratic Austria. A state treaty of this kind was required because of the fact that a normal peace treaty covering Austria could not in the nature of things be concluded as before the war Austria had no independent existence, since it had been annexed.

The preamble to the state treaty states: "Annexed on March 31, 1938 by Hitlerite Germany and incorporated into the German reich of that date." A special state treaty was therefore required in order to return to the happier situation which existed in Austria before that annexation.

The Prime Minister has mentioned, and I recall them, the reasons why there has been some delay in dealing with this matter. At the time the treaty was signed in Vienna on May 15, 1955, to enter into force on July 27, 1955, there was no obligation on the part of Canada to accede to it, though provision was made in the treaty for the accession of Canada and other allied and associated powers. If there has been delay in our accession it was due to a variety of reasons which, I think, were legitimate ones.

I recall that some years ago the Austrian government invited Canada to accede—it was in 1956—expressing the hope that we might decide to do so at that time because, they stated, they attached considerable importance to the accession of a country such as Canada, feeling that this might encourage accession by other states and so strengthen the basis of the new state. At that time, however, there were a great many arrangements in the treaty governing assets, reparations and other matters arising out of the war which had not been satisfactorily concluded between the new state and certain other European states which were not at that time accessory to the treaty. These arrangements came under article 27 of the treaty, and it was our view at that time—and, I may say, this was reinforced by conversations we had with some of these other European countries at that time—that accession to the treaty might be delayed until these matters had been cleared up.

Now they have been cleared up, and it is entirely appropriate, I think, that we should accede to this treaty. Austria is, I believe, the first example in history since the second world war of a country, divided as a result of war, which has been reunified on a free and democratic basis. Perhaps it could be put this way: this is the first unfreezing of a situation in the cold war which was brought about by military arrangements concluded during and immediately after the war, which arrangements established boundaries which went, not around countries, but through countries. Another example of this type of division is, of course, Germany, which we have very much in mind at this time. Korea and Viet Nam are other examples. However, Austria has managed to extricate herself and is the only postwar country to have emerged from that unhappy divided position which is a source of danger to peace and security in those countries where that state of affairs still exists. This was the result of quiet, continued and patient diplomacy conducted by the four powers over a good many years in the face of great obstacles which at times appeared to be insurmountable. But success was finally achieved, and Austria became free from both division and occupation.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Of course, as the treaty indicates, there was a price which the Austrian people paid—and paid willingly—for this freedom. They accepted neutralization. They accepted the obligation—and I think this is embodied in the treaty—not to join in any power alliance. They accepted other limitations, including limitations on their right to use certain armaments, and they accepted one very important limitation which brings to mind a similar limitation in the treaty of Versailles after 1919—article 4 embodying a prohibition of anschluss with Germany, a prohibition which was contained in the treaty of Versailles but which, unfortunately was not maintained between the two wars.

This has been an encouraging and, indeed, happy development—a country freed from foreign occupation, from Nazi occupation and from communist occupation; a country which is now united on a free and democratic basis. In this regard it is interesting to recall that before the treaty was signed there was a plebiscite in that part of Austria which had been occupied for many years by the Russian communist forces. In spite of the pressure which must have been brought to bear on the people in that area and in spite of the indoctrination which must have taken place, I think some 94 per cent of the people voted to join the new unified and democratic Austria which is now, as the Prime Minister has said, playing a good part in international affairs and with whom we have the friendliest and most cordial relations.

I am glad the Prime Minister paid tribute to the part played by Austria in the reception of Hungarian refugees a few years ago. The actions of Austria at that time not only illustrated great generosity on the part of a small and not especially rich state, but also courage in the face of pressures both political and economic which must have been hard to bear at that time.

We hope this occasion will establish a new chapter in the friendly relationship between our country and this gallant and historic little state in the middle of Europe.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group I am very happy to endorse the remarks made by the Prime Minister with respect to this resolution for the approval of the treaty re-establishing an independent and democratic Austria.

This most interesting country has a colourful history. For centuries, during the period of the empire, it had power without authority or stability, and existed in a situation where compromise without agreement was a constant state of affairs. For 650 years under the Hapsburg dynasty the roots of these people were largely related to the Danubian basin.

That whole state of affairs was altered during the first world war, and among the changes introduced was the establishing of a more democratic form of government. Then, in 1938, shall I say at pistol point, German dominance was complete. There could be no question about it because of the might of the German armies. At the same time, Germany had established a psychological dominance for some years previous to 1938.

This very interesting country was a cultural centre in Europe for many years. Possibly the summit of that culture was reached in music. I never think of Austria without thinking of Viennese waltzes as they were played at very stately and formal dances which I witnessed as a boy when people liked to listen to good music and were not content to be satisfied with a collection of cow bells and kettle drums for the exercise of the waltz and other dances. Austria is a country which has enjoyed a great reputation with respect to medicine and which has, in addition, made a great contribution to world culture through its architecture.

It is one of the leading countries in Europe in terms of the signing of secret treaties in its past history. This is a treaty openly arrived at by the methods evolved in recent years and as a result of the painstaking effort of persons within and without Austria. It was a country known for its stately courts and dignified culture confined largely to a few at the top and supported by a very virile and capable peasantry who always have had strong democratic instincts. It is a country, as I said before, known for its music and, though I am no judge of this question, a country, according to history, known for its beautiful women.

It is interesting to me as a socialist and to all other hon. members of this group to know that the socialist movement of Austria has made a great contribution to the advance of democracy and toward bringing about the state of affairs that exists in Austria today. When the socialist party was first established I suppose it was what we would call very right wing in its outlook. It strongly supported the monarchy of the day. A reading of the record indicates that it had some very fruitful times and performed some very fruitful acts on behalf of those people.

When it comes to the question of the period of the second world war we realize that it was the socialist movement in Austria supported by those with strong nationalist loyalties that built the underground which effectively over a period of years did much to destroy the strength of the German forces within that country.

As a socialist I am proud to realize that it was a socialist who was the first chancellor in 1919, Dr. Karl Renner. In 1945 Dr. Karl Renner was again elected as chancellor of Austria and remained in that position until he died in 1950.

Austria occupies a unique position in history because although it was overrun by German forces and controlled by nazism for a period of years, in spirit Canada was never at war with Austria because of the circumstances.

The parliament of Canada is approving this treaty on behalf of the Canadian people. I am sure this approval receives the hearty endorsement of the Canadian people. In recent years Austria has been a member of the United Nations. I had the opportunity to be an observer with the Canadian delegation for a month in 1956, during and after the period when the Suez question was uppermost in everyone's mind and later the Hungarian question. Anyone having an opportunity to witness those debates and talk personally with some of the representatives would realize that the representatives of that country which is small physically but great in spirit were making a good contribution to that organization and, shall I say, a special contribution owing to the particular circumstances under which they live.

This group supports the confirmation of this treaty. These fortunate people are not burdened with the heavy cost of armament as are many other nations of the world. This is because of the obligations of this treaty and the circumstances under which they live. Before concluding I must say that this group wishes there were more central European countries who had the opportunity to live under the same circumstances without having imposed on them the heavy burdens caused by armaments, particularly in the central zone of Europe, not only because we wish these people to be free of such unhealthy costs but because we believe such an arrangement would add to the solution of our international questions and hasten the time when we will enter the era of peace which we all hope for in the future.

The members of this group extend their best wishes and all expressions of good will to the Austrian people for success in their support of freedom and democratic principles within and without their country. We trust that their happiest, most fruitful and glorious days are yet to come.

Motion agreed to.

Veterans' Land Act

VETERANS' LAND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FURTHER ASSISTANCE FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION, TO FARMERS AND FISHERMEN, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-50, to amend the Veterans' Land Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill was clearly discussed yesterday when the resolution was before the house. I do not intend to discuss it at any great length today except to again state that it is a very important bill as far as our veterans are concerned.

As I pointed out yesterday, some of the main features are increasing the amount of loans to veterans, the extending of the time in which a veteran may repay his loan and the enlargement of the scope of the loan to include not only land but equipment, stock and machinery. It also increases the amount of loans to fishermen and veterans who have small holdings. I would move that this bill be now read the second time and be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, our support for the principle of this bill was voiced yesterday when we were discussing the resolution. There is no reason why I should say anything to delay its submission to a committee but perhaps I may be permitted to pay my tribute to the purposes behind this bill. I hope they will be accomplished by the bill.

While I am on my feet I should also pay tribute to the administration of the Veterans' Land Act in the past. It is one of the happiest examples of constructive administration we have experienced in postwar years. Those who are responsible for it are deserving of our thanks and our tribute. I merely say, without further words, we shall be glad to support the second reading of this bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, our support for this bill was expressed at the resolution stage yesterday. In view of the fact that the bill is to go before a committee, where it will be thoroughly discussed and explained, there is no necessity for further debate at this stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AMOUNTS PAYABLE TO INTERNATIONAL FUND AND BANK

Hon. A. J. Brooks (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

[Mr. Herridge.]

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to provide for the payment, out of the consolidated revenue fund, to the international monetary fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development of sums not exceeding in the whole an amount equivalent to the subscriptions thereto required from Canada, that is to say, thirteen hundred million United States dollars, and to authorize the necessary borrowing therefor in the manner provided by the said act.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, will there be a statement from the minister on this resolution?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there will be, but things have moved so unaccustomedly rapidly that the minister is still in his office. I am not criticizing this speed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West will explain the resolution.

Mr. McMillan: We will await the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I express my apology to you and to the committee for delaying the proceedings of the committee. I have been in a session dealing with some other legislation; I will recover my breath in a moment.

Hon. members will recall that last July in this house the Prime Minister spoke in favour of expanding the resources of the international monetary fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I will use for purposes of brevity the designation "I.M.F." for international monetary fund and "I.B.R.D." for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. He emphasized that an increase in I.M.F. quotas would expand substantially the liquid assets supporting world trade and that an increase in the international bank's subscriptions would give less developed countries greater prospects of the financial aid needed for developing and diversifying their economies.

The government, therefore, welcomed the proposal by President Eisenhower in August that consideration should be given to an increase in the resources of those two organizations. At the annual meeting of the bank and fund in New Delhi last autumn the United States secretary of the treasury, Mr. Anderson, proposed that specific recommendations for increases in national contributions be prepared promptly for consideration by governments. As the representative of Canada, I strongly supported these proposals.

In response to these resolutions, the executive boards of the two institutions investigated this problem and recommended a general increase of 50 per cent in the I.M.F. quotas, and of 100 per cent in the subscriptions to the bank. In addition, they recommended special increases exceeding those percentages for certain countries, including Canada. In my capacity as the governor for Canada I voted in favour of submitting these proposals for consideration by member governments. The recommendations received virtually unanimous support, and governments are now proceeding to obtain the legislative authority for the proposed increases in their national contributions. The United Kingdom has already passed the necessary legislation. The United States and a number of other countries are now in process of doing so.

With the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like now to insert a table showing the present and future national contributions to the I.M.F. and the I.B.R.D. I request that this be printed at this point in the report of my remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent to the minister having this table printed in Hansard?

NOTES: (1) The table does not reflect the increases which countries having quotas in the IMF of less than $20 million may request in addition to the general 50 per cent increase in quotas. The 19 countries who have this option may also request corresponding increases in their subscriptions to the IBRD.

(2) The table includes, for these 17 countries, the special additional increases approved by the Boards of Governors of the IMF and the IBRD.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The bill to follow the present resolution, if it is approved, seeks authority to amend section 5 and subsection (1) of section 6 of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, 1945, to enable Canada to accept the proposed increase in our subscriptions to both organizations by raising the present statutory ceiling.

Members of the committee are, I am sure, aware of the important achievements of these two international institutions. The international monetary fund was set up to provide member countries with facilities for short term foreign currency loans required to meet temporary balance of payments difficulties. Its main purpose is the expansion of international trade through the promotion of exchange stability, the elimination of exchange restrictions and the establishment of a multilateral system of current payments.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The international bank has, by direct loans and by arranging for investment from other public and private sources, contributed to the long term economic growth of many countries, particularly those in greatest need of development capital. It has also provided a pool of competent technical personnel to assist countries in working out sound development programs.

This government has consistently supported these two world agencies in their efforts to strengthen the economies of the free nations of the world. Canada has been able to play an active role in the day to day management of the fund and bank since our quotas carry sufficient voting power to elect an executive director in both organizations. Mr. Louis Rasminsky, the very distinguished and, I may say, the very highly regarded deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, is and has for some years been the Canadian executive director for both the international bank and the international monetary fund.

Drawings of $15 million have been made from the international monetary fund in Canadian currency. In the case of the international bank authorization has been given to lend, without restriction, the 18 per cent of the Canadian subscription usable only with our concurrence. In addition, the bank has been able to place in the Canadian money market three bond issues totalling $50 million. Total disbursements in Canadian funds on international bank loans now amount to about $110 million. These outlays have, of course, assisted Canadian business in that they have enabled countries receiving loans from the fund and bank to finance purchases in Canada.

In the view of the Canadian government the successful functioning of these organizations is vital to Canada's economic and political interests. From a commercial point of view Canada, as a nation dependent for its economic welfare on the balanced growth of international trade, is as interested as any other country in the continued success of these agencies. The international monetary fund, by providing a second line of foreign exchange reserves, has contributed to a higher level of international trade than would otherwise have been possible. Member countries have, with the help of the international monetary fund, been able to overcome temporary payment difficulties without sharply reducing the level of their imports. Through the process of annual consultations the international monetary fund has been able to encourage countries to reduce substantially the maze of exchange and trade restrictions inherited from the war and the period of reconstruction. The international bank has also played its part in the development of trade through its program of loans and technical advice to underdeveloped countries. These activities contribute to a rising level of economic activity in these countries and in this way enable them to play an increasing role in the expansion of world trade.

While the bank and the fund are, of course, world institutions, the benefits derived by the commonwealth have been particularly impressive. The importance which commonwealth countries attach to the bank and fund was clearly reflected in the unanimous endorsation given at the Montreal conference last September to an expanded role for these two organizations. Since the inception of the fund until the end of February, 1959 member countries have obtained loans of foreign currency to a total amount of $3,238 million. Of this total $1,258 million has been made available to commonwealth countries. Of the total loans authorized by the international bank from 1946 until February of this year, amounting to $4,238 million, an amount of $1,386 million has been provided to members of the commonwealth.

Our interests in these institutions go beyond economic considerations. The I.M.F. and the I.B.R.D. have made a marked contribution toward the attainment of our central objective of world peace and security. By helping to stabilize the economies of the free nations of the world, by promoting a balanced expansion of world trade, and by channeling vast quantities of financial aid without political strings, the fund and bank have helped to remove potential sources of economic dislocation, social unrest and political instability in those countries which constitute the more exposed bastions of the free world.

For all these reasons it is important that the resources of these two institutions should be adequate for the continuation of their work. This is not the case at present. The original fund quotas were calculated in 1944 at the Bretton Woods conference in the light of conditions prevailing at that time. Since then there has been an enormous increase in the volume and value of international trade. Moreover, the circumstances of the past few years have led to very heavy commitments on the existing resources of the fund. As a consequence the uncommitted resources available to the I.M.F. are insufficient to meet potential future demands.

A similar situation exists with respect to the I.B.R.D. The main source of funds for the bank's lending activities is the sale of debentures to private investors. It is primarily the guarantee provided by the 80 per cent uncalled subscriptions of the United States, Canada and other economically strong member countries which enables the ready sale of international bank debentures in the private sector of the world economy. With total outstanding loans of $3,763 million at March 31, 1959, and current lending in excess of $700 million per year, the time may soon be approaching when additional guarantee would be necessary to ensure the marketability of international bank bonds.

I mentioned earlier that Canada, along with Germany, Japan and several other countries, will be increasing its quotas by more than the general percentage. The government considers that the particularly rapid economic growth of Canada in recent years is ample reason for a special increase in the Canadian subscription in the two agencies over and above the general increase. This special increase will enable Canada to continue to play a role in the work of the bank and fund in keeping with our growing economic stature in the world.

In specific terms, it is proposed that Canada's quota in the international monetary fund be increased from $300 million to $550 million. This increase would involve outlays to the fund of gold to the value of $62.5 million and non-interest-bearing government notes in an amount of $187.5 million. For the international bank the proposal is to increase our subscription to $750 million compared with the existing figure of $325 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the United States increase?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The United States increase is set out in the table which I have placed on the record. The United States subscription to the bank will be raised from $3,175 million to $6,350 million; in other words, it will be doubled. This increase on the part of Canada from $325 million to $750 million in its subscription to the international bank would call for payments of $1 million in United States dollars and $9 million in non-interest-bearing government notes, usable only with Canadian concurrence. The remaining $415 million will be in the form of a guarantee only. To clarify the financial implications of the increases in our contributions I wish now, with the permission of the committee, to submit a table showing these implications in detail.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house to agree to the table being included in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Editor's note: The table above referred to follows).

Financial Implications of Canada's Increased Contribution to the I.M.F. and the I.B.R.D.

	Canada's quota and subscription	Payment in gold or U.S. $	Payment in Canadian currency or non-interest-bearing notes	Guarantee
		(Millions of U.S. dollars)
I.M.F.
Present quota	300.0	75.0	225.0
Proposed increase	250.0	62.5	187.5
I.B.R.D.
Present subscription	325.0	6.5	58.5	260.0
Proposed increase	425.0	1.0	9.0	415.0
	1300.0	145.0	480.0	675.0

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The payments in gold and U.S. dollars in respect of the fund and the bank will be made from existing holdings in the exchange stabilization fund. No other cash payments will be required. The increases in Canada's quota in the fund and in our subscription to the bank will appear as loans and investments in the public accounts and accordingly do not affect the level of the net national debt.

The amendment that I am proposing involves not only an appropriate increase in the ceiling on funds to be provided for our subscriptions to these two international institutions but also a change in the form of the ceiling. This is really a technical matter but a word of explanation may perhaps be helpful. As hon. members will see from the first table which I have submitted, all subscriptions are, under the Bretton agreements, denominated in terms of United States dollars. In other words, the United States dollar is the yardstick used. Therefore the amendment which I am proposing expresses the ceiling on Canadian funds to be appropriated in terms of United States dollars. The actual sum is $1,300 million United States dollars. In this we are following the practice of the United Kingdom and other countries.

When the original act was passed by parliament the ceiling was expressed in Canadian dollars. The sum named, $700 million Canadian, was higher than the amount actually required at that time. The excess provided, shall we say, a cushion against the possibility of a fall in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. Parliament at that time, in effect, made provision for a possible depreciation of 12 per cent in the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. The size of any such "cushion" must be rather arbitrary, particularly when taking into account the fact that our dollar, which was then fixed in value in terms of the United States dollar, is now free to fluctuate on the market. Accordingly, under the new circumstances, it seems expedient to follow the terms of the agreements themselves and make provision for our subscriptions in terms of United States dollars. By doing so we make automatic provision for any possible movement in the exchange rate.

Mr. Chairman, I have been asked certain questions concerning the international finance corporation and I think perhaps it might be of assistance to hon. members if I say a brief word on that subject at this time. The international finance corporation is an affiliate of the international bank for reconstruction and development with membership open only to governments which are members of the bank. Its objective is to further economic development by encouraging the growth of productive private enterprise in its member countries, particularly in the less developed areas. It seeks to accomplish this end by:

(1) Investing in productive private enterprises, in association with private investors and without government guarantee of repayment, in cases where sufficient private capital is not available on reasonable terms.

Mr. Pearson: Might I ask the minister a question there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask whether this international finance corporation about which he is now speaking has any relationship to the proposed international development association?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: They are quite separate from each other?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There is no relation between them. To continue:

(2) Serving as a clearing house to bring together investment opportunities, private capital—both foreign and domestic—and experienced management; and

(3) Helping to stimulate the productive investment of private capital both domestic and foreign.

The corporation has an authorized capital of U.S. $100 million. Of that total $93.7 million had been subscribed by March 31, 1959. Fifty-seven countries are members. The corporation began operations in July, 1956 and has so far made nine effective operational investments totalling $9.2 million. Commitments have been made in connection with five other projects. These investments were for the manufacture of rubber products, automotive parts, motor vehicles, cement, steel products and cotton textiles, also for flour milling and steel forging. The projects were located in member countries in Latin America, Asia and Australia. Because of the fact that the organization has a very short history and has been able to make relatively few investments, it has been able to rely entirely upon its subscribed capital for the necessary funds. It has, however, the authority to borrow funds by the sale of its own bonds or obligations.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, perhaps a brief review of Canadian legislation in relation to the international finance corporation might be of interest to hon. members. Authority for Canadian participation in the two main Bretton Woods organizations—the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development—was, of course, given by the Bretton Woods Agreements Act of 1945. Special legislation was necessary in their case because of the undertakings regarding national monetary and exchange policy involved in the acceptance of membership in these two organizations. No such undertakings were required in connection with the international finance corporation and it was, therefore, evidently decided by the government of that day that the simpler procedure of an item in the estimates would be sufficient to authorize Canadian participation in the international finance corporation. I am informed that before making this decision the then minister of finance, my predecessor, was assured by the Department of Justice that such procedure would be sound legally. Accordingly an item was inserted in the estimates for the fiscal year 1955-56. This item, No. 789, was discussed in the estimates committee on July 5, 1955.

Although the Canadian ambassador to Washington, under authority from council, signed the articles of agreement of the international finance corporation on October 25, 1955, sufficient signatures to bring the corporation into existences were not deposited until the summer of 1956. The authority for payment of the Canadian subscription having lapsed on March 31, 1956, parliament was once again asked to provide in the estimates for the purchase by Canada of shares in the corporation. This was done by means of item 731 in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57. This item, if I may remind hon. members of it, read as follows:

731. To authorize the purchase of 3,600 shares of stock of the international finance corporation being Canada's subscription as a member thereof for the amount of $3,600,000 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May, 1956 (Revote).

This item was passed on August 14, 1956.

To my knowledge there has been no discussion in parliament of the international finance corporation, although a section on the corporation has been included in the last three annual reports to parliament required under the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

I may say to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that my predecessor Mr. Harris was, while minister of finance, the Canadian governor on the board of governors of the international finance corporation and that I succeeded him as Canadian representative on that board of directors in the summer of 1957. The three reports to parliament to which I have referred were tabled in the house by myself on October 28, 1957; June 23, 1958; and April 20, 1959, respectively.

Mr. McMillan: I was greatly interested to hear the Minister of Finance give us this survey today. I might say that we all know that the international bank and the international monetary fund were established under the Bretton Woods agreements in 1945. Considerable debate took place in this house at that time; it was carried on for a good part of December of that year. All the parties in the house at the present time supported these agreements. In fact the hon. member for Greenwood, the former financial critic of the opposition—now Minister without Portfolio—spoke highly in favour of these agreements as did the leader of the C.C.F. party at that time. As the minister has said, membership in the international monetary fund is a prerequisite for membership in the international bank. Many of the same governors, executors and directors control both of these funds as well as the international finance corporation. I heard the minister this afternoon refer to the international finance corporation and I do not think he gave the status of that fund. Perhaps he might do so later.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The status of what?

Mr. McMillan: The status of that particular fund, whether they are making money, how much they are making and so forth.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gave the figures on their operation.

Mr. McMillan: I was always under the impression that the bank was established primarily to give assistance to the more underprivileged and underdeveloped countries. I think this was true more in the earlier years than it is today. In those earlier years this was done by sending experts to these countries to help them with their development. They sent in technical assistance and they also lent money under supervision to implement the development programs in those countries. I notice that in the last three or four years there is more of a tendency to lend money to member countries, advancing them money in their development for productive purposes, thereby promoting the long range growth of international trade and the improvement of the standard of living in those countries.

The bank, of course, tries to promote foreign investment by guarantees and participation in loans, and when private capital is not available at a reasonable rate they lend money from their own resources, whether it is borrowed or provided by the bank itself. I realize that bank loans to member governments, government agencies, to authorities or private membership in the territories of member governments have to be guaranteed on a government level, but that is not true, as I think the Minister of Finance said in connection with the finance corporation. They do not require government guarantees. Loans are made for productive purposes, must have good prospects for repayment, and these loans are not competitive with private investment money when it is readily available. I notice loans are made for agricultural development, transport facilities, such as roads and railways, and also for communications and power development. But as I said earlier, in the last three or four years I notice that money is being loaned to member countries for industrial development.

I might say here that our party is very much in favour of supporting these agreements. I could not help but notice, in passing—I do not utter this by way of criticism—that I think we are probably doing our share in backing loans to countries in order to build them up industrially to compete directly against us in trade. Some of these countries, and I have one in mind, borrowed a considerable amount of money from the bank and they have a low wage scale and are very competitive in our markets. In fact, we have had delegations here in Ottawa because certain products from one particular country were more than competitive with our own in our own markets. I would like to make the observation that I am not saying it is a fact that this particular country or any other country has built up industry with money from the international bank to which we contribute, and produced products which undersell our own in our own markets. This is one aspect of these comparatively cheap loans, however, that I would like the minister to comment upon.

As the minister has said, the authorized capital of the bank is $10 billion, of which $9.5 billion is already subscribed. The capital subscription of each member is divided into three parts; the 2 per cent, the 18 per cent and the 80 per cent parts. I am not going into that at this particular time. The capital structure is designed to provide the bank with lendable capital up to 20 per cent of its subscribed capital, but I do not think, probably because of the restrictions under the 18 per cent subscription, that much over three-quarters of the members have given permission to use this part of their subscription, and I do not suppose that the bank has available much over 15 per cent of the useable subscription from each country.

As the minister said, the business has gone up by leaps and bounds and I think if we add together what they have loaned it would amount to close to $4¼ billion. The bank has to depend upon borrowed money and bond issues for most of its lending money, and since most of the bonds are sold in the United States the average bond buyer—and most of the bond buyers come from the United States—looks to see how much of these particular bonds are guaranteed by their own government. I take it then that for this reason in particular, and also to obtain greater amounts from member countries, a decision has been reached to recommend a 100 per cent increase in the capital structure. As the minister has said, our increase in the funds of the bank goes up from $325 million to $650 million, and because of the special increase of $100 million it goes up to $750 million, which means we have to put up in connection with this particular fund $1 million in gold from the exchange fund plus $9 million in the form of non-interest-bearing government notes plus the rest in guarantees.

I would like to ask the minister how this particular increase is arrived at and why Canada, more than some of the other countries, has to put up a special increase. I think the minister can probably tell us something about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say at this point that Canada does not have to, but for the reasons I gave we thought Canada should choose to.

Mr. McMillan: Yes, I appreciate that. If I used the words "had to" or "has to", then I used the wrong words. But I would like to ask on what basis that was arrived at. I realize that Canada is a guarantor of these funds, and I would like to know if Canada will ever share in the profits of the bank. I notice that the bank has something between $40 million and $50 million a year profit. I realize that Canada benefits indirectly because of the increased standard of living obtained in countries making use of borrowed funds, and these people in turn might in time, and will in time, increase trade with us. I also realize that by making the facilities of the bank available to these countries we are helping to combat the spread of communism.

The international finance corporation was set up, according to the minister, in 1956, and I think he said it had an authorized capital of $93.7 million, to which Canada subscribes under special articles of agreement. I think the minister said that it had investments in Asia, in Latin America and in Australia. I did not see how the quotas of this particular fund were made up, and I would like to ask the minister to comment upon that.

The international monetary fund, on the other hand, is subscribed by an association of nations to promote international monetary co-operation and to expand world trade by controlling and trying to promote exchange stability. This fund has done well, and I note that the executive directors by resolution recommended to the board of governors that this fund should be increased through an increase in quotas. This, plus the increase in special quotas, will bring Canada's share up to $550 million from $300 million. This would involve a further sum from Canada of $62.5 million in gold or U.S. dollars, plus further guarantees.

According to a dispatch from Washington in February 1959, the president asked congress for $1.375 billion in gold or cash to help these funds. In the United States it is evidently treated as a budgetary item, but not so here in Canada. In connection with having no option of putting up United States money, I would just like to say a word about how closely these funds might be related to to exchange rates and so forth. We know that at the present time there is a flight from the United States dollar and many economists think the United States must in the very near future either raise the price of gold or impose much higher tariffs to cut down imports.

We know they are not likely to do the latter, and having in mind the amount of gold required by statute to support the United States currency and meet other obligations, I see the possibility of the price of gold being raised. I am certainly not criticizing the Minister of Finance or the department or the Bank of Canada, but I cannot say I am not somewhat alarmed that Canada is carrying so much in United States shorter note securities on hand instead of gold. If the price of gold were raised overnight we would stand to lose hundreds of millions of dollars through holding United States short term securities instead of gold. I do not know how close the liaison is between our Department of Finance here in Canada and the United States treasury, but certainly something of the nature I have suggested would happen if the United States decided suddenly to raise the price of gold.

I do not know how much we are holding in United States currency in these particular funds or other funds. I do notice, in connection with this fund, that other members of the commonwealth borrow from it, particularly Australia. I do not know what percentage has to be paid; I have read through most of the booklets and they do not say how much. However, I did see one reference suggesting that they were paying between 5 per cent and 5½ per cent. The question arises: could Canada borrow from this fund for her developments in the northland? According to some of these reports which I read, a number of those countries abroad are underprivileged because they have to pay high interest rates. If that is the case, we are an underprivileged country because we certainly have to pay high interest rates. I understand that some of these countries, as of last year, were getting money as cheaply as 5½ per cent, and I doubt whether we could borrow much money to develop our great north country at that rate here in Canada.

One can always argue in favour of supporting such a fund as this, but it seems to me to be an anomaly inasmuch as we are guaranteeing loans to other countries at rates of interest lower than those at which we ourselves could borrow, either at home or abroad.

I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. First, how does Canada subscribe to the international finance corporation? The minister told us today we have so many shares in it, but I should like to know what proportion this is of the total number of shares held and how this corporation is doing financially. Second, in connection with these two funds, I should like to ask the minister whether the reserves are held in gold or in United States currency, and how much of these funds are put up wholly in Canadian currency.

Mr. Regier: It is a number of months now since the Prime Minister announced the intention of the government with regard to the question now before the committee, and the members of our group were very pleased indeed that the Prime Minister in this instance and also in a number of other instances involving arrangements of this kind is supplying a little leadership along lines we have advocated over a number of years.

As hon. members will recall, we have from time to time advocated that we carry out the recommendation of the United Nations that the more privileged nations of the world should be prepared to spend up to 1 per cent of their annual gross national product for the purpose of assisting the "have not" nations in order that they may arrive at a state of industrial and other development which will enable them to look after themselves. We have noticed that since the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have held office they have raised the contribution made by this government under the Colombo plan. I believe they have also raised the contribution of the government to the various agencies operating under the auspices of the United Nations. They are now asking the agreement of this committee to amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act whereby we shall in a fairly large measure take another move in the direction of supplying aid to areas of the world which have not been as blessed as we have.

We certainly intend to support the amendments for which the minister is asking. At the same time, we are pleased to note that the international finance corporation is not a part of the Bretton Woods agreements, and that endorsement of the amendment of this legislation does not automatically put our group on record as having endorsed either the intent or the activities of the international finance corporation. I think the minister made that point very clear, namely that he has only used the occasion of his report on the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to supply a report on the international finance corporation.

With regard to the latter, we find it difficult to understand exactly how the international finance corporation was first established. I listened with some care to the explanation the minister gave us half an hour ago, but I hope he may find an opportunity to deal with this question in somewhat more detail. Canada belongs to this organization. Canada is a shareholder in it, yet the only legislation which we have—if it is legislation at all—is an item in the estimates. This matter of legislating by way of inserting an item in the estimates has been the subject of considerable controversy in this house on a number of occasions and I should like to recall to the minister that on January 6, 1955 the hon. member for Algoma East, now Leader of the Opposition, had this to say as reported in Hansard on page 546 when speaking on the North Atlantic treaty. He was replying to the then hon. member for Saskatoon.

> The hon. member for Saskatoon must know what this practice is, namely that the government takes the responsibility for signing an agreement, then brings that agreement to parliament for approval before ratification. Ratification is not given—this is now constitutional practice—without such approval.

It seems to us that this parliament has never been asked to ratify this agreement signed by our government to become a member of the international finance corporation. I am only making this point now because this may be the only opportunity we shall have to raise this matter. How can the government have made the expenditure of money in the absence of any legislative authority under an agreement which was never ratified by the Canadian House of Commons? I recall again in this connection the words of the former minister for external affairs when he said:

Ratification is not given—this is now constitutional practice—without such approval.

By that he meant approval by this House of Commons. So we have here an agreement which has involved the expenditure of money but which has never been ratified by the House of Commons. As I indicated earlier this is not a part of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

One reason for my wanting to participate in this debate is that there is a fairly substantial political movement existing in Canada—although as indicated by the hon. member for Welland some moments ago it is no longer represented in this house—which operates the governments of two of our ten Canadian provinces. This movement in my opinion has misled the Canadian people to no small degree with respect to the purport, intent and operations of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. Hon. members of that party on many occasions and most frequently in little meeting places where there are not likely to be in attendance those who know very much about the act have charged that in 1945 when this act was first ratified by this parliament the Conservative, Liberal and C.C.F. parties enslaved the people of Canada to dark and sinister influences which they allege are in existence in the world today. In some of their literature this influence is referred to as the illuminati.

I know that I should not be taking up the time of the committee with this but for the sake of the record—and there are readers of Hansard in Alberta and British Columbia—I should like to read the purposes of the international monetary fund as I understand them. They are as follows:

The purposes of this organization are to promote international monetary co-operation—

They would have us believe it seeks to promote international monetary dictatorship. I continue:

—to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, to promote exchange stability, to assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and to shorten the duration and lessen the degree of disequilibrium in the international balances of payments of members.

I think it was absolutely essential after the war for those nations that emerged with a sound monetary system to join hands with each other in order to enable the other parts of the world to carry on and rebuild their economies and continue to purchase those things that we had for sale on the export market. If some move in this direction had not been taken the recovery of those countries would have been much slower if indeed it could have been undertaken at all. The possibility is that revolutions might have been more widespread had the western nations and notably Canada and the United States not taken this step at that time. It is also possible that our markets would have been less than they were at the time.

On behalf of this group I endorse all the efforts the nations make to establish organizations designed specifically to enhance world trade and to assure economic stability in all areas of the world where our help can be effective. I wish to express the wish that the criterion concerning whether or not a loan shall be granted or aid given shall be purely based on economic considerations and that political considerations will play a lesser role than they obviously have played on a number of occasions in years gone by.

I am sure that if political consideration had not blocked aid in regard to the Aswan dam in Egypt we would have avoided the crisis that developed there at the time. The reason I mention that now is that yesterday a serious political move was made by Nasser and the problem of the Aswan dam may again be dumped into our laps before we have reached a decision concerning how to deal with the situation.

The United States has supplied approximately one-third of the money that has been placed in the international monetary fund and I believe its contribution would be higher in terms of percentage in respect to the international bank. I believe that Canada has agreed to raise its percentage share. This fact ought to have some little effect on our being able to persuade the United States not to misuse these funds for political purposes.

From our own point of view as well as from the point of view of others I believe we should do these things because they are right and not because they help supply us with markets. If it is right to do this we should be prepared to do it under any appropriate circumstances. Canada's contributions through the Colombo plan, United Nations agencies, the international monetary fund and the international bank are effective contributions to the cause of world stability, world prosperity and world peace and are perhaps more significant in these terms than are expenditures on armaments.

The issue that is becoming increasingly apparent today is this. The rich are getting richer faster than the poor are getting less poor.

Mr. Nesbitt: Right back to Karl Marx.

Mr. Regier: The area of division is wider today than it has ever been before in history. Although we may have relative peace and although modern technology and automation are rapidly advancing standards of living in the western world we must be mindful of the fact that we are not necessarily advancing toward world peace. We in this group would like to see the day come when the Canadian government would adopt the United Nations recommendation and our over-all contribution would be 1 per cent of our annual gross national product. Merely for the sake of the record may I say that this year our contribution would have been in excess of $300 million. That sum expended in this way would in our opinion be more effective than a similar sum expended through the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a word or two about this resolution which deals with a matter of very great importance even though the immediate impact on the treasury may not be considerable.

I have been listening with interest to the remarks of the last speaker and I hope that when the minister winds up this discussion he will remove any anxiety in the hon. member's mind that any irregular procedures were followed in our membership in the international monetary corporation or that we in any way violated what I think is an important convention of our constitution—if not a law—that no treaty that imposes any obligation on the Canadian people should be ratified without having been approved by the House of Commons. I do not think—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that that principle is violated in any way in our activities and association with and membership in this international financial corporation.

We support, as my colleague the hon. member for Welland, has said, this amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. We support it because it will I think, make stronger, two international institutions which have played a useful part in the world since the Bretton Woods agreement. They have done something, though of course not enough, to reduce the gap which my hon. friend has talked about between the developed and the underdeveloped nations, between the peoples in those nations and which I agree, though, is perhaps increasing rather than decreasing.

We used to have many discussions on this subject in the House of Commons and the minister, I know, will be relieved on this occasion to know that we will be saved a great many hours of long debate on the iniquities of international finance because of the absence from the House of Commons of some gentlemen representing another political party who are not here at the moment, especially one gentleman who would be good for at least three 40-minute speeches on this particular subject.

However, as I have said, I think the step which is being taken now is a useful one. Indeed, perhaps in the present circumstances, as the minister pointed out, it is a necessary step. This increase in the strengthening of those two international organizations is required not only by the increased value of international trade, which the minister mentioned, but also by the increase in price levels.

I have no complaints of any kind to make on Canada's increasing participation in these international organizations. I think in the past we have played a very good part in the bank and the fund, not only in the contributions we have made to them but in the intelligent and devoted direction that has been given to their affairs by the Canadian representatives, and I am not thinking only and perhaps not even primarily of ministerial representation.

The Canadian increase, as the minister has stated, is higher than that of the general percentage applied to certain other countries. I am not in a position, Mr. Chairman, at this time, any more than my hon. friend from Welland was, as he indicated, to come to any conclusion whether we have been fairly and equitably treated in this percentage increase or not. I feel pretty certain that the minister and his officials can look after our interest very effectively in that regard. I am also aware of the fact that we are one of the strong economic countries of the world and perhaps, on the principle of the graduated income tax, we may at times be expected to give a little more than our per capita percentage. I do not complain about that.

These agencies have been useful, as the minister pointed out, and I hope they will be even more useful, not always directly but certainly in an indirect way, in the expansion of international trade, which is so essential for the developing prosperity and indeed the economic stability of our own country.

As the minister pointed out, this expansion of trade which was discussed at the commonwealth conference in Montreal last year was also discussed in a broader, and perhaps even more imposing way at the meeting which followed in India when the representatives of the bank and the fund were present. The international monetary fund, I think, has been successful over the years in stabilizing currencies, strengthening exchange rates and helping countries out of temporary exchange difficulties. That, I take it, has been its main purpose and on the whole I think it has succeeded in achieving that purpose. The international bank has been of value in international economic assistance. If there has been criticism of the bank on that score it has usually been directed to the fact that the bank has been very cautious, conservative, if I may use the word, in its approach to lending policies. Perhaps I should not complain about this too much, in view of the type of international organization it is and the provisions governing it. Yet perhaps it has been, from the point of view of international economic assistance, guided too much by hard commercial considerations in the loans that it has been able to make.

In recent years the bank has moved into other activities which are financial in character but have had some indirect political importance. One has been mentioned, namely the relationship of the bank to the Aswan dam financing and the activities of the bank —I think I am correct in saying this, although I have not been following these matters in detail recently—in the relations between India and Pakistan in the allocation of border waters, where the governor of the bank played a very helpful and constructive part. This international institution can do things as a financial institution which have important economic effects; but it will only be able to establish itself in that field if it maintains and retains its reputation as a genuine international undertaking not under the pressure or domination of any one country.

I am sure the minister knows the danger here in the case of an international organization which gets so very much of its support from the United States government which has acted with great generosity in this and in other matters but which has at the same time, because of the magnitude of its own contribution and the necessity of raising that contribution from its own legislature, exercised a good deal of influence and pressure on the organization in question. At times and not only in connection with this organization this has been a helpful development in terms of the help given but it has also affected the activity of the organization itself. The minister probably cannot say—I am sure he cannot say, any more than I could if I were the minister—but I have the feeling, based upon experience, that the Canadian representation on the board of these organizations has been very helpful in taking what steps could be taken by friendly persuasion to avoid that kind of difficulty.

There is one thing that worries me, namely that in this field of international economic assistance there is now almost a proliferation of international agencies. Perhaps the time will come when there will be a certain amount of confusion and overlapping amongst these agencies. They deal in a broad way with the same problem. Their approach may be by different methods. There is the United Nations expanded program of technical assistance; there is the United Nations international development fund; there is the Colombo plan, which in a more limited way is in the same field and doing very fine work. There are the two agencies we are talking about now, namely the bank and the fund. We now have this international financial corporation and there is a proposal now for an agency which I mentioned this afternoon in the house, and which the minister said in reply was not in existence. I think he said there had been no decisions taken by the Canadian government in respect of it and that no formal proposals had been advanced. This agency is the international development association, a new agency, presumably a billion dollar international development association, which, according to a report in the New York Times of May 19 from its Washington financial correspondent will be ready for approval in principle by the world's finance ministers in September, presumably at the annual meeting of the bank and the fund.

This report says that support must be secured for this organization, the purposes of which I am not too clear about, particularly from the hard currency nations of western Europe and Canada and Japan, and that the United States has been successful in its overtures to these countries. The article also goes on to say that the new agency would be an affiliate—that brings it right within the ambit of this resolution—of the international bank for reconstruction and development. Presumably it would be empowered as an affiliate to make what I might call loans that would be softer in character than those which the bank normally makes, and perhaps this may be a very desirable and useful development.

The article goes on to say that according to present expectations of United States officials the basic outlines of the plan would be approved by the world's finance ministers when they meet in September for the annual meeting of the international bank and international monetary fund, that the charter, if all goes well, should be ready for presentation to the next session of congress, and that in respect of this proposed organization or institution or association, whatever you wish to call it, all members, not only the United States and other hard currency countries, will have to make contributions in gold or in dollars.

When the minister replies perhaps he might have a word to say with respect to whether this is a serious development and what would be the attitude of the government toward it in principle. In any event, if it takes place it will mean the addition of another economic and financial aid institution to the number I have already mentioned. Perhaps the time will be coming pretty soon when we should have a look at all of these institutions and see if we cannot pull them together in some way which will prevent overlapping and possible confusion. But I do wish to repeat what I said a few moments ago, that it is of first importance to make these agencies genuinely international if they are going to play the part in this field that they should play and for that purpose they should be kept in as close relationship to the United Nations as possible.

I know the difficulties in that and I know there are times when this work can perhaps be done more effectively by, if I may call them such, regional organizations like the Colombo plan, but if we are going to remove these activities from any taint of political suspicion or pressure the more international we can make them the better and the best way normally, though not always, is to bring them into as close association with the United Nations as can be done.

There is one other matter that I think is of some interest. It will be noted that in all the agencies I have mentioned, including the ones referred to in this resolution, neither the Soviet union nor any communist satellite of the Soviet union plays any part in this great international work of extending economic assistance which is going on in the world today. The Soviet union, which talks so much and so often at international meetings about its desire to help underdeveloped and "enslaved" nations and all the rest of it, that country which boasts about its economic and financial strength, is playing no part in this particular international activity. Perhaps it is just as well to remind ourselves of that fact now when a country like Canada, without the resources of the Soviet union, this great superstate, is being asked and has agreed, I presume and hope, to make additional contributions to these two agencies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members who have spoken in this debate for the support they have indicated will be given to the measure on behalf of the parties for whom they have spoken. I shall be brief, Mr. Chairman, confining myself to answering questions which have been asked or endeavouring to supply information for which members have expressed a wish.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The Leader of the Opposition spoke about the necessity of preserving the international character of these institutions, the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. In that regard I think the best evidence I can cite is the fact that at the meeting at New Delhi last October, at which I had the honour to represent Canada, 68 countries were represented at that very important international meeting and more countries are continuing to join these two international bodies all the time. In the year and three-quarters that I have had the honour to represent Canada on the board of governors of both of these institutions there have been a number of additions to their membership.

Next, Mr. Chairman, may I comment on the question asked by the hon. member for Welland as to the basis upon which Canada's increased subscription to both of these institutions was arrived at. The basic increase, as I have indicated, was a 50 per cent general increase in the subscriptions to the international monetary fund and a 100 per cent increase in the subscriptions to the international bank. In addition, an opportunity was sought by a number of countries to increase their subscriptions to one or both institutions. This was sought by certain countries because of the fact that in their case they considered that the original subscriptions had been much too small in relation to their growing importance in the world, particularly in world trade, and in every case it was a matter of individual choice and individual application on the part of the country concerned. There was no coercion put upon any country to increase its subscription beyond the basic percentage of increase.

Mr. Benidickson: That would be done by the directors later. Is that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First of all, it went through the hands of the executive directors and then came to a vote on the part of the governors. I have emphasized the fact that there was no coercion and that it was a matter of free choice on the part of each one of the countries which sought an increase in excess of the general rate of increase. In all, 17 countries obtained permission to subscribe on a larger basis than the general increase.

As one would expect, perhaps the most notable increase has been in the case of the Federal Republic of Germany. Having regard to the increasing importance of West Germany in the economy and trade of the world, it is not surprising that her subscription to the international monetary fund is being increased from $330 million to $787.5 million and her subscription to the international bank is being increased from $330 million to $1,050 million. Her subscription to the international bank is being more than trebled at her request and with the approval of the governors of the bank.

Similarly, Japan has obtained permission to make a substantial increase. The increase in her subscription to the international monetary fund is from $250 million to $500 million and her subscription to the international bank is being increased from $250 million to $666 million. I could give other figures. The countries which are taking increases in subscriptions in excess of the general percentage are Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Ceylon, Cuba, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Ghana, Iran, Israel, Japan, Mexico, Norway, Saudi Arabia, Thailand, Turkey and Venezuela. In the case of Canada we have proposed and received permission to subscribe for $100 million in excess of the basic increase of subscriptions in the case of each of the institutions. It was regarded on the part of Canada, and now with the concurrence of the governors of both institutions, that this is a reasonable increase having regard to the growing importance of Canada in the economy of the world.

The next question on the part of the hon. member for Welland was this: Would Canada share in the profits of the bank? The answer, of course, is yes; if the profits should be distributed, Canada would, of course, receive her appropriate pro rata share.

The next observation by the hon. member for Welland was that Canada is holding in the exchange reserve fund too much in United States dollars and not enough in gold. Mr. Chairman, there has not been any great change in this respect now for some time. It is also worth observing that the portion of the fund that is held in United States obligations is not entirely held in United States dollars. We hold part of that fund in United States treasury bills which can be quickly turned into United States dollars if the need should ever arise, and on which we can earn some interest whereas our gold holdings, of course, are not productive of any interest return.

The hon. member held out the prospect of an increase in the price of gold. I may say that we have been talking to the United States administration about this matter for the last two years and we have not yet found any indication that there is any such intention on the part of the United States administration.

Mr. Benidickson: At New Delhi what did the United States representative say on this point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nothing was said in the open meeting at New Delhi on that subject.

The next question I was asked was about the basis of our subscription to the international finance corporation. I think the hon. member for Welland will find, if he reads Hansard, that in my remarks I dealt with that subject rather fully. Canada has subscribed for 3,600 shares of the capital stock of international finance corporation. That is out of a total of 93,277 shares at September 1, 1958. In other words, Canada holds 3.86 per cent of the total subscribed capital stock of this corporation. He asked about the balance sheet. I have before me the balance sheet for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958. I will give the figures. The total income to the corporation was $3,507,721. Expenses were $1,149,445. Net income, accordingly, was $2,358,276. The net income in the previous fiscal year was $1,675,382. It is worth noting that most of the income to date is from investment of unused capital in United States government obligations owing to the fact that investments in projects are very recent.

I think that hon. members will find the answers to most of the other questions that they have asked in the remarks I made and in the tables which have been made a part of Hansard.

I now come to the point that was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. He raised questions as to the authority for Canada to subscribe for stock in the international finance corporation. If the hon. member will examine the remarks I made, when they are recorded in Hansard, I think he will see that there can be no doubt whatever as to the regularity of the step taken in this respect. In the form of an estimate in two successive fiscal years parliament authorized the purchase by the government of 3,600 shares of the capital stock of the international finance corporation. That subscription, of course, required parliamentary sanction. If the hon. member will look at my remarks he will see there that I dealt with the difference between the situation when an act of parliament was required to permit Canada to become a party to the Bretton Woods agreements and accordingly a member of the international bank and the international monetary fund, and the changed situation with respect to Canada's joining the international finance corporation.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, as to the international development association concerning which the Leader of the Opposition asked several questions, may I say that this has no relationship to the international finance corporation, as I pointed out this afternoon in reply to his question in this regard on the orders of the day. This particular proposal is one which originated in Washington last year and was known as the Monroney plan because it was first put forward by Senator Monroney. It was designed to assist the less developed countries or the soft currency countries by means of loans. It was a feature of the plan that repayment, when the loan is obtained in hard currency originally, should not necessarily be exacted in hard currency but that provision might be made for repayment of the loan in soft currencies.

This proposal did not take a definite form at any stage in 1958. There had been some indication that this proposal might be placed in reasonably definite form before the meeting at New Delhi, but it was not placed before that meeting in any concrete form and the matter has not been publicly discussed since then. In the press today there was an indication that perhaps matters had moved further now at Washington, and that the United States administration may be proposing to place before the international bank a concrete proposal in this respect, with the thought that this new institution would be an organization related to the international bank. I think the house will agree that we should see the proposal in reasonably definite form before undertaking to make any statement as to our position on it.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Regier: We still have a number of questions that we should like to ask. May I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might put this suggestion to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. If the resolution could pass, the bill could be introduced and hon. members could see it. The bill is quite short. It is only two clauses in length. As to whatever questions the hon. member wishes to ask about the fund and the bank, if he will give me his questions I will endeavour to supply the information when the matter is before the house on second reading or in committee following second reading. However, the bill is extremely short and simply follows the terms of the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. Regier: In all fairness, Mr. Chairman, I ought to explain to the minister that some of our questions have to do with the attitude of the government in reference to the price of gold. The minister also made reference to that matter. The other has to do with the international finance corporation. That is not going to be a part of the bill. Therefore we shall be excluded from getting anywhere on that matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may say that anything that is relevant to the resolution would be relevant to the bill because of the fact that the bill does this one thing that is contemplated by the resolution and nothing further. If the hon. member wishes to ask questions at that time on the international finance corporation, I will be prepared to try to answer them. While the proposed increases in the subscription to the international bank and the international monetary fund do not directly relate to the international finance corporation, nevertheless it is an institution which is related to the international bank; and I am sure it would not be the wish of the committee to draw too sharp a line differentiating them.

Mr. Regier: I am pleased that the minister has assured us that he will not be on his feet on points of order as readily as he has been in the past. I shall therefore accede to his suggestion.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-52, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take the estimates of the Department of Labour and then commence the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Question No. 390—Mr. Denis:

Questions

1. Each year to date since the inception of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, what amount has the federal government paid to each province of Canada, including the province of Quebec, under the Trans-Canada Highway Act?

2. What further amounts to date, if any, have been agreed on to be paid to each province, including the province of Quebec, in connection with the trans-Canada highway?

3. What mileage has been constructed in each province to date, including the province of Quebec?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

NOTE: The province of Quebec has not entered into an agreement with the federal government under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Questions

2. Based on the estimated cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in each of the nine provinces that have entered into agreements under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, and amendments thereto, the amount of Canada's total contribution to the cost of constructing the highway is limited to $350,000,000. There is no limiting agreement covering the amount that may be paid to any one province. Payments are made as claims are received from each province on account of costs incurred in constructing the highway as provided for in the trans-Canada highway agreements.

CANADIAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION—REPRESENTATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE

Question No. 411—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from the Canadian Nurses' Association or any other body requesting continued financial assistance for students who wish to enter the nursing profession and for graduate nurses who wish to continue their studies in order to qualify for senior nursing positions?

2. If so, what answer has the government given to such representations?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Yes. Representation has been received from the Canadian Nurses' Association.

2. This matter was placed on the agenda of the meeting of the dominion council of health which met on April 22 to 24 last. Representatives of the Canadian Nurses' Association were invited to attend this meeting and presented their views to the council. It was also suggested that arrangements be made for representatives of the Canadian Nurses' Association to meet with the technical advisory Group concerned with hospital insurance.

In relation to student nurses the position is as follows. Under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act the federal government shares in the operating costs of listed hospitals, including the costs of training student nurses, when such costs are approved by the provincial authorities.

With respect to graduate nurses who wish to continue their studies in order to qualify for senior nursing positions, assistance is available at provincial request under the national health grants program.
